Passage of the

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill 2013

SPPB 197
Passage of the
Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill 2013

SP Bill 36 (Session 4), subsequently 2014 asp 5

SPPB 197
For information in languages other than English or in alternative formats (for example Braille, large print, audio tape or various computer formats), please send your enquiry to Public Information, The Scottish Parliament, Edinburgh, EH99 1SP.

You can also contact us by email sp.info@scottish.parliament.uk

We welcome written correspondence in any language
Contents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Foreword</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Introduction of the Bill</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bill (As Introduced) (SP Bill 36)</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Explanatory Notes (and other accompanying documents) (SP Bill 36-EN)</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Policy Memorandum (SP Bill 36-PM)</td>
<td>99</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Delegated Powers Memorandum (SP Bill 36-DPM)</td>
<td>131</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stage 1</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stage 1 Report, Equal Opportunities Committee</td>
<td>155</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oral and associated written evidence</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Written evidence received in advance of oral evidence</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Equal Opportunities Committee, 5 September 2013</td>
<td>285</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Equal Opportunities Committee, 12 September 2013</td>
<td>431</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Equal Opportunities Committee, 19 September 2013</td>
<td>458</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Equal Opportunities Committee, 26 September 2013</td>
<td>481</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Equal Opportunities Committee, 3 October 2013</td>
<td>498</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Supplementary evidence and correspondence</td>
<td>517</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Other written evidence</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anonymous submissions 1 to 510</td>
<td>564</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Other submissions</td>
<td>1667</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Report by the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee</td>
<td>2959</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extract from the Minutes, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee,</td>
<td>2974</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10 September 2013</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, 10 September 2013</td>
<td>2975</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Written submissions to the Finance Committee</td>
<td>2981</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extract from the Minutes of the Parliament, 20 November 2013</td>
<td>2994</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Meeting of the Parliament, 20 November 2013</td>
<td>2995</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>After Stage 1</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Paper for the meeting of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee,</td>
<td>3030</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26 November 2013, incorporating the Scottish Government’s response to</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>the Committee’s Report at Stage 1</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extract from the Minutes, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee,</td>
<td>3036</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26 November 2013</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, 26 November 2013</td>
<td>3037</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Response from the Scottish Government to the Stage 1 Report, December</td>
<td>3038</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2013</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Before Stage 2
Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Equal Opportunities Committee, 16 December 2013

Stage 2
1st Marshalled List of Amendments for Stage 2 (SP Bill 36-ML1)
1st Groupings of Amendments for Stage 2 (SP Bill 36-G1)
Extract from the Minutes, Equal Opportunities Committee, 19 December 2013
Official Report, Equal Opportunities Committee, 19 December 2013

Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Equal Opportunities Committee, 15 January 2014

2nd Marshalled List of Amendments for Stage 2 (SP Bill 36-ML2)
2nd Groupings of Amendments for Stage 2 (SP Bill 36-G2)
Extract from the Minutes, Equal Opportunities Committee, 16 January 2014
Official Report, Equal Opportunities Committee, 16 January 2014

Bill (As Amended at Stage 2) (SP Bill 36A)
Revised Explanatory Notes (SP Bill 36A-EN)
Supplementary Delegated Powers Memorandum (SP Bill 36A-DPM)

After Stage 2
Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Equal Opportunities Committee, 28 January 2014
Report on Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee
Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Equal Opportunities Committee, 3 February 2014
Paper for the meeting of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, 4 February 2014, incorporating the Scottish Government’s response to the Committee’s Report at Stage 2
Extract from the Minutes, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, 4 February 2014
Official Report, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, 4 February 2014

Stage 3
Marshalled List of Amendments selected for Stage 3 (SP Bill 36A-ML)
Groupings of Amendments for Stage 3 (SP Bill 36A-G)
Extract from the Minutes of the Parliament, 4 February 2014
Official Report, Meeting of the Parliament, 4 February 2014

Bill (As Passed) (SP Bill 36B)
Foreword

Purpose of the series

The aim of this series is to bring together in a single place all the official Parliamentary documents relating to the passage of the Bill that becomes an Act of the Scottish Parliament (ASP). The list of documents included in any particular volume will depend on the nature of the Bill and the circumstances of its passage, but a typical volume will include:

- every print of the Bill (usually three – “As Introduced”, “As Amended at Stage 2” and “As Passed”);
- the accompanying documents published with the “As Introduced” print of the Bill (and any revised versions published at later Stages);
- every Marshalled List of amendments from Stages 2 and 3;
- every Groupings list from Stages 2 and 3;
- the lead Committee’s “Stage 1 report” (which itself includes reports of other committees involved in the Stage 1 process, relevant committee Minutes and extracts from the Official Report of Stage 1 proceedings);
- the Official Report of the Stage 1 and Stage 3 debates in the Parliament;
- the Official Report of Stage 2 committee consideration;
- the Minutes (or relevant extracts) of relevant Committee meetings and of the Parliament for Stages 1 and 3.

All documents included are re-printed in the original layout and format, but with minor typographical and layout errors corrected. An exception is the groupings of amendments for Stage 2 and Stage 3 (a list of amendments in debating order was included in the original documents to assist members during actual proceedings but is omitted here as the text of amendments is already contained in the relevant marshalled list).

Where documents in the volume include web-links to external sources or to documents not incorporated in this volume, these links have been checked and are correct at the time of publishing this volume. The Scottish Parliament is not responsible for the content of external Internet sites. The links in this volume will not be monitored after publication, and no guarantee can be given that all links will continue to be effective.

Documents in each volume are arranged in the order in which they relate to the passage of the Bill through its various stages, from introduction to passing. The Act itself is not included on the grounds that it is already generally available and is, in any case, not a Parliamentary publication.

Outline of the legislative process

Bills in the Scottish Parliament follow a three-stage process. The fundamentals of the process are laid down by section 36(1) of the Scotland Act 1998, and amplified by Chapter 9 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. In outline, the process is as follows:
• Introduction, followed by publication of the Bill and its accompanying documents;
• Stage 1: the Bill is first referred to a relevant committee, which produces a report informed by evidence from interested parties, then the Parliament debates the Bill and decides whether to agree to its general principles;
• Stage 2: the Bill returns to a committee for detailed consideration of amendments;
• Stage 3: the Bill is considered by the Parliament, with consideration of further amendments followed by a debate and a decision on whether to pass the Bill.

After a Bill is passed, three law officers and the Secretary of State have a period of four weeks within which they may challenge the Bill under sections 33 and 35 of the Scotland Act respectively. The Bill may then be submitted for Royal Assent, at which point it becomes an Act.

Standing Orders allow for some variations from the above pattern in some cases. For example, Bills may be referred back to a committee during Stage 3 for further Stage 2 consideration. In addition, the procedures vary for certain categories of Bills, such as Committee Bills or Emergency Bills. For some volumes in the series, relevant proceedings prior to introduction (such as pre-legislative scrutiny of a draft Bill) may be included.

The reader who is unfamiliar with Bill procedures, or with the terminology of legislation more generally, is advised to consult in the first instance the Guidance on Public Bills published by the Parliament. That Guidance, and the Standing Orders, are available free of charge on the Parliament’s website (www.scottish.parliament.uk).

The series is produced by the Legislation Team within the Parliament’s Chamber Office. Comments on this volume or on the series as a whole may be sent to the Legislation Team at the Scottish Parliament, Edinburgh EH99 1SP.

Notes on this volume

The Bill to which this volume relates followed the standard 3 stage process described above.

The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s report at Stage 1 is included at Annexe D of the Stage 1 Report by the Equal Opportunities Committee. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee took oral evidence on the Bill and relevant extracts from the minutes and the Official Report are therefore included in this volume. Written submissions received by the Finance Committee are also included at the appropriate point.
CONTENTS

Chapter 1
SAME SEX MARRIAGE

1 Marriage of related persons
2 Objections to marriage
3 Preliminaries to marriage
4 Meaning of marriage and related expressions in enactments and documents
5 Same sex marriage: further provision
6 Jurisdiction in proceedings relating to same sex marriages

Chapter 2
MARRIAGE BETWEEN CIVIL PARTNERS IN QUALIFYING CIVIL PARTNERSHIPS

7 Marriage between civil partners in qualifying civil partnerships
8 Change of qualifying civil partnership into marriage
9 Effect of marriage between civil partners in a qualifying civil partnership

Chapter 3
SOLEMNISATION OF MARRIAGE

10 Persons who may solemnise marriage
11 Registration of nominated persons as celebrants
12 Temporary authorisation of celebrants
13 Religious or belief marriage: further provision

Chapter 4
SAME SEX MARRIAGE: PROTECTION OF FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION ETC.

14 Same sex marriage: protection of freedom of expression etc.

Chapter 5
OTHER CHANGES TO MARRIAGE PROCEDURE

15 Power of district registrar to require evidence of nationality: marriage
16 The Marriage Schedule
Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill

Chapter 6
Sheriff Court Jurisdiction in Relation to Declarator of Marriage

21 Sheriff court jurisdiction in relation to declarator of marriage

Part 2
Civil Partnership

22 Registration of civil partnership
23 Power of district registrar to require evidence of nationality: civil partnership
24 Recognition of overseas relationships
25 Dissolution of civil partnership: evidence

Part 3
Marriage and Civil Partnership: Other Provision

26 Bigamy

Part 4
Change of Gender of Married Persons or Civil Partners

27 Change of gender of married persons or civil partners
28 Renewed marriage or civil partnership following issue of full gender recognition certificate

Part 5
Registration Services

29 Provision of certain information to district registrars

Part 6
General Provisions

30 Interpretation
31 Ancillary provision
32 Commencement
33 Short title

Schedule 1—Jurisdiction in proceedings relating to same sex marriages
Schedule 2—Change of gender of married persons or civil partners
Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill
[AS INTRODUCED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision for the marriage of persons of the same sex; to make further provision as to the persons who may solemnise marriage and as to marriage procedure and the places at which civil marriages may be solemnised; to make provision for the registration of civil partnerships by celebrants of religious or belief bodies; to make provision about gender change by married persons and civil partners; to make a minor correction in relation to registration information; and for connected purposes.

PART 1

MARRIAGE

CHAPTER 1

SAME SEX MARRIAGE

1 Marriage of related persons

(1) The Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 ("the 1977 Act") is amended as follows.

(2) In section 2 (marriage of related persons)—

(a) for subsection (1) substitute—

"(1) Subject to subsection (1A), a marriage between persons who are related to each other in a forbidden degree is void if solemnised—

(a) in Scotland; or

(b) at a time when either party is domiciled in Scotland.

(1ZA) For the purposes of subsection (1), a person is related to another person in a forbidden degree if related to that person in a degree specified in Schedule 1.”,

(b) in subsection (1A), for the words from the beginning to "paragraph," substitute "A person who is related to another person in a degree specified in paragraph 2 of Schedule 1 (relationships by affinity) is not related to that person in a forbidden degree”,

(c) after subsection (1A) insert—

“(1C) For the purposes of paragraph 2 of Schedule 1, “spouse” means—
(a) in the case of a marriage between persons of different sexes, a wife in relation to her husband or a husband in relation to his wife; and

(b) in the case of a marriage between persons of the same sex, one of the parties to the marriage in relation to the other.

(d) in subsection (7)—

(i) for “those provisions” substitute “subsection (1C)(a) as it applies to paragraph 2 of Schedule 1”, and

(ii) the word “former” in each place where it appears is repealed, and

(e) in subsection (7A)—

(i) for “mother” substitute “parent”, and

(ii) the words “in either column” are repealed.

(3) For Schedule 1 substitute—

“SCHEDULE 1
(introduced by section 2)

DEGREES OF RELATIONSHIP

1. Relationships by consanguinity
   Parent
   Child
   Grandparent
   Grandchild
   Sibling
   Aunt or uncle
   Niece or nephew
   Great-grandparent
   Great-grandchild

2. Relationships by affinity referred to in section 2(1A)
   Child of former spouse
   Child of former civil partner
   Former spouse of parent
   Former civil partner of parent
   Former spouse of grandparent
   Former civil partner of grandparent
   Grandchild of former spouse
   Grandchild of former civil partner
3. Relationships by adoption
   Adoptive parent or former adoptive parent
   Adopted child or former adopted child.

2 Objections to marriage

   In section 5(4) of the 1977 Act (objections to marriage)—
   (a) paragraph (e) is repealed, and
   (b) in paragraph (f), for “than one mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e) above,” substitute “than—
   (i) one mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (d) above; or
   (ii) the ground that the parties are of the same sex.”.

3 Preliminaries to marriage

   (1) The 1977 Act is amended as follows.
   (2) In section 3 (notice of intention to marry)—
   (a) in subsection (1)—
   (i) for paragraph (b) substitute—
   “(b) if the person has previously been married and the marriage ended on the death of the other party to that marriage, the death certificate of that other party;”, and
   (ii) after that paragraph insert—
   “(ba) if the person has previously been in a civil partnership which ended on the death of the other party to the civil partnership, the death certificate of that other party;”,
   (b) in subsection (2), for “or (b)” substitute “, (b), (ba) or (bb)”, and
   (c) in subsection (5), after paragraph (ii)(b) of the proviso insert “; or
   (c) if no such certificate has been issued only by reason of the fact that the parties to the intended marriage are of the same sex.”.
   (3) In section 7(1) (marriage outside Scotland where a party resides in Scotland), after “(b)” insert “, (ba), (bb)”.

4 Meaning of marriage and related expressions in enactments and documents

   (1) References (however expressed) in any enactment to—
   (a) marriage (including a marriage that has ended),
   (b) a person who is (or was) married to another person, and
   (c) two people who are (or were) married to each other,
are references to marriage whether between persons of different sexes or persons of the same sex and to a party (or former party), or as the case may be the parties (or former parties), to such a marriage.

(2) Subsection (3) applies to references (however expressed) in any enactment to two people who—

(a) are (or were) not married to each other, but
(b) are (or were) living together as if they were husband and wife.

(3) The references include two people of the same sex who are (or were) not married to, nor in civil partnership with, each other but who are (or were) living together as if they were married to each other.

(4) References (however expressed) in any enactment to two people of the same sex who are (or were) living together as if they were in a civil partnership cease to have effect.

(5) Subsections (1) to (4)—

(a) apply to enactments (other than private Acts) passed or made before the commencement of this section, and
(b) do not apply in so far as the enactment, or any other enactment, provides otherwise.

(6) In so far as being (or having been) married is relevant for the operation of any rule of law, the rule of law applies equally in relation to marriage to a person of a different sex and marriage to a person of the same sex.

(7) Subsections (1) to (6) are subject to an order under subsection (8).

(8) The Scottish Ministers may by order provide for any of subsections (1) to (6)—

(a) to have effect subject to provision made by the order, or
(b) not to apply in cases specified in the order.

(9) An order under subsection (8)—

(a) may include consequential, supplementary, incidental, transitional, transitory or saving provision,
(b) is subject to the negative procedure.

(10) References (however expressed) in any document to—

(a) marriage (including a marriage that has ended),
(b) a person who is (or was) married to another person, and
(c) two people who are (or were) married to each other,

are references to marriage whether between persons of different sexes or persons of the same sex and to a party (or former party), or as the case may be the parties (or former parties), to such a marriage.

(11) The following expressions in any document have the meanings given—

(a) “widow” includes a woman whose marriage to another woman ended with the other woman’s death,
(b) “widower” includes a man whose marriage to another man ended with the other man’s death.
(12) Subsections (10) and (11)—
(a) apply to documents executed on or after the commencement of this section, and
(b) do not apply in so far as the document provides otherwise.

(13) In section 26(2) of the 1977 Act (interpretation), after the definition of “authorised registrar” insert—

““marriage” means marriage between persons of different sexes and marriage between persons of the same sex;”.

(14) In schedule 1 to the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 (definitions of words and expressions), insert at the appropriate place in alphabetical order—

““marriage” means marriage between persons of different sexes and marriage between persons of the same sex (and any reference to a person being (or having been) married to another person, or to two people being (or having been) married to each other, is to be read accordingly),”, ““widow” includes a woman whose marriage to another woman ended with the other woman’s death,”, ““widower” includes a man whose marriage to another man ended with the other man’s death,”.

5

Same sex marriage: further provision

(1) Any rule of law under which a wife who receives or conceals goods stolen by her husband is, in certain circumstances, not guilty of reset does not apply to a party to a marriage between two women.

(2) For the avoidance of doubt, the rule of law which provides for a marriage to be voidable by reason of impotence has effect only in relation to a marriage between persons of different sexes.

(3) In section 1 of the Divorce (Scotland) Act 1976 (grounds of divorce), after subsection
(3) insert—

“(3A) For the avoidance of doubt, in relation to marriage between persons of the same sex, adultery has the same meaning as it has in relation to marriage between persons of different sexes.”.

6

Jurisdiction in proceedings relating to same sex marriages

Schedule 1, which makes provision about jurisdiction in proceedings relating to same sex marriages, has effect.

CHAPTER 2

Marriage between civil partners in qualifying civil partnerships

(1) The 1977 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 3 (notice of intention to marry), in subsection (1), after paragraph (ba)
(inserted by section 3(2)(a)(ii) of this Act), insert—
“(bb) if the person is in a qualifying civil partnership within the meaning of section 5(6) with the other party to the intended marriage, an extract from the entry in the civil partnership register relating to the civil partnership;”.

(3) In section 5 (objections to marriage)—

(a) in subsection (4)(b), after “partnership” insert “other than a qualifying civil partnership with each other”, and

(b) after subsection (5) insert—

“(6) For the purposes of subsection (4)(b) a “qualifying civil partnership” is a civil partnership which—

(a) was registered in Scotland; and

(b) has not been dissolved, annulled or ended by death.

(7) A civil partnership which was registered outside the United Kingdom under an Order in Council made under Chapter 1 of Part 5 of the Civil Partnership Act 2004 is to be treated for the purposes of subsection (6)(a) as having been registered in Scotland if—

(a) the parties to the civil partnership elected Scotland as the relevant part of the United Kingdom under the Order; and

(b) details of the civil partnership have been sent to the Registrar General of Births, Deaths and Marriages for Scotland.”.

8 Change of qualifying civil partnership into marriage

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision to establish a procedure for the parties to a qualifying civil partnership to change their civil partnership into a marriage.

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) may in particular make provision—

(a) about the making by the parties to a qualifying civil partnership of an application to change their civil partnership into a marriage,

(b) about the information to be provided in support of an application,

(c) about the provision of evidence in support of an application,

(d) for persons who have made an application to appear before any person or appear at any place,

(e) conferring functions on persons in relation to applications,

(f) for fees, of such amounts as are specified in or determined in accordance with the regulations, to be payable in respect of—

(i) the making of an application,

(ii) the exercise of any function conferred by virtue of paragraph (e),

(g) about the effect of a qualifying civil partnership changing into a marriage in accordance with provision made under subsection (1).

(3) Functions conferred by virtue of subsection (2)(e) may include functions relating to—
(a) the recording of information relating to qualifying civil partnerships changing into marriages,

(b) the issuing of certified copies of any information recorded.

(4) Before making regulations under subsection (1), the Scottish Ministers must consult the Registrar General of Births, Deaths and Marriages for Scotland.

(5) Regulations under subsection (1)—

(a) may include consequential, supplementary, incidental, transitional, transitory or saving provision,

(b) may modify any enactment (including this Act),

(c) are (except where subsection (6) applies) subject to the negative procedure.

(6) Regulations under subsection (1) which add to, replace or omit any part of the text of an Act are subject to the affirmative procedure.

(7) In this section “qualifying civil partnership” has the meaning given by section 5(6) of the 1977 Act (as inserted by section 7(3)(b) of this Act).

9 Effect of marriage between civil partners in a qualifying civil partnership

(1) When civil partners in a qualifying civil partnership (within the meaning of section 5(6) of the 1977 Act) marry in accordance with that Act—

(a) the qualifying civil partnership ends on the date on which the marriage was solemnised, and

(b) the civil partners are to be treated as having been married to each other since the date on which the qualifying civil partnership was registered.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1)(b)—

(a) a civil partnership registered under an Order in Council made under section 210 of the 2004 Act is to be treated as having been registered when it is entered in the Register Book maintained under the Order,

(b) a civil partnership registered under an Order in Council made under section 211 of the 2004 Act is to be treated as having been registered when the civil partnership register is signed in accordance with the Order.

(3) Subsection (1)(b) is subject to—

(a) any provision to the contrary made by or under any enactment,

(b) an order under subsection (4).

(4) The Scottish Ministers may by order provide for subsection (1)(b)—

(a) to have effect subject to provision made by the order, or

(b) not to apply in cases specified in the order.

(5) An order under subsection (4)—

(a) may include consequential, supplementary, incidental, transitional, transitory or saving provision,

(b) is subject to the negative procedure.
(6) If a decree of aliment under section 3 of the Family Law (Scotland) Act 1985 (powers of court in action for aliment) requiring one of the civil partners to make payments to the other is in force at the time the qualifying civil partnership ends by virtue of subsection (1)(a) of this section, the decree continues to have effect despite the ending of the civil partnership.

(7) If an order under section 103(3) or (4) of the 2004 Act (regulation by court of rights of occupancy of family home) is in force at the time the qualifying civil partnership ends by virtue of subsection (1)(a) of this section the order has effect from that time as if made under section 3(3) or, as the case may be, 3(4) of the Matrimonial Homes (Family Protection) (Scotland) Act 1981 (regulation by court of rights of occupancy of matrimonial home).

(8) In section 1 of the 2004 Act (provision for civil partnership), after subsection (3)
insert—

“(3A) Subsection (3) is subject to section 9(1)(a) of the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Act 2014 (ending of certain civil partnerships on marriage under Scots law).”.

CHAPTER 3

SOLEMNISATION OF MARRIAGE

10 Persons who may solemnise marriage

(1) The 1977 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 8 (persons who may solemnise marriage)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) after “marriage” in the first place where it appears insert “between persons of different sexes”,

(ii) in paragraph (a)(ii)—

(A) for “or priest of a religious body” substitute “priest or other celebrant of a religious or belief body”,

(B) for “religious body” in the second place it appears substitute “religious or belief body”, and

(C) after “marriage” insert “between persons of different sexes”,

(iii) in paragraph (a)(iii), after “Act” insert “to solemnise marriage between persons of different sexes”, and

(iv) in paragraph (a)(iv), after “Act” insert “to solemnise marriage between persons of different sexes”,

(b) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) The Scottish Ministers may prescribe a religious or belief body under subsection (1)(a)(ii) only if—

(a) the body requests them to do so; and

(b) the Scottish Ministers are satisfied that the body meets the qualifying requirements.
(1B) Subject to section 23A, a marriage between persons of the same sex may be solemnised by and only by—

(a) a person who is—

(i) a minister, clergyman, pastor, priest or other celebrant of a religious or belief body prescribed by regulations made by the Scottish Ministers, or who, not being one of the foregoing, is recognised by a religious or belief body so prescribed as entitled to solemnise marriage between persons of the same sex on its behalf;

(ii) registered under section 9 to solemnise marriage between persons of the same sex; or

(iii) temporarily authorised under section 12 to solemnise marriage between persons of the same sex; or

(b) a person who is a district registrar or assistant registrar appointed under section 17.

(1C) The Scottish Ministers may prescribe a religious or belief body under subsection (1B)(a)(i) only if—

(a) the body requests them to do so; and

(b) the Scottish Ministers are satisfied that the body meets the qualifying requirements.

(1D) For the avoidance of doubt, nothing in subsection (1B)(a) or (1C)(a)—

(a) imposes a duty on any religious or belief body to make a request referred to in subsection (1C)(a);

(b) imposes a duty on any such body to nominate under section 9 any of its members to be registered as empowered to solemnise marriages between persons of the same sex;

(c) imposes a duty on any person to apply for temporary authorisation under section 12 to solemnise marriages between persons of the same sex;

(d) imposes a duty on any person who is an approved celebrant in relation to marriages between persons of the same sex to solemnise such marriages.

(1E) In subsections (1A)(b) and (1C)(b), the “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

(1F) Regulations under subsection (1E)—

(a) may make different provision for different cases or circumstances;

(b) may include transitional and saving provision.

(1G) Regulations under subsection (1)(a)(ii), (1B)(a)(i) or (1E) are subject to the negative procedure.”,

(c) in subsection (2)—

(i) in paragraph (a)—

(A) after “(1)(a)” insert “or (1B)(a)”, and

(B) for “‘religious marriage’” substitute “‘religious or belief marriage’”,

(ii) in paragraph (b), after “(1)(b)” insert “or (1B)(b)”.

(3) In section 14 (form of ceremony to be used by approved celebrant)—
   (a) in paragraph (a), after “or (ii)” insert “or (1B)(a)(i)”, and
   (b) in paragraph (b), after “or (iv)” insert “or (1B)(a)(ii) or (iii)”.

(4) In section 26(2) (interpretation)—
   (a) for the definition of “religious body” substitute—
       ““religious or belief body” means an organised group of people—
       (a) which meets regularly for religious worship; or
       (b) the principal object (or one of the principal objects) of which is to uphold or promote philosophical beliefs and which meets regularly for that purpose;”,
   (b) after that definition insert—
       ““religious or belief marriage” has the meaning given by section 8(2)(a);”.

11 Registration of nominated persons as celebrants

(1) The 1977 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 9 (registration of nominated persons as celebrants)—
   (a) in subsection (1)—
       (i) for “religious body” substitute “religious or belief body”,
       (ii) after “marriages” insert “between persons of different sexes”,
   (b) after subsection (1) insert—
       “(1A) A religious or belief body, not being prescribed by virtue of section 8(1B)(a)(i), may nominate to the Registrar General any of its members who it desires should be registered under this section as empowered to solemnise marriages between persons of the same sex.”,
   (c) in subsection (2)—
       (i) after “(1)” insert “or (1A)”,
       (ii) in paragraph (a), for “religious body” substitute “religious or belief body”, and
       (iii) in paragraph (d)—
           (A) the word “religious” is repealed, and
           (B) after “that body” insert “in relation to solemnising marriages between persons of different sexes or, as the case may be, marriages between persons of the same sex”,
   (d) after paragraph (d) insert “; or
   (e) the nominating body does not meet the qualifying requirements.”,
   (e) after subsection (2) insert—“(2A) In subsection (2)(e), the “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.
(2B) Regulations under subsection (2A)—
   (a) may make different provision for different cases or circumstances;
   (b) may include transitional and saving provision.

(2C) Regulations under subsection (2A) are subject to the negative procedure."

(f) in subsection (3)—
   (i) after “ceremony” insert “for marriage between persons of different sexes”, and
   (ii) after “ceremonies” insert “for marriage between persons of different sexes”,

(g) after subsection (3) insert—
   “(3A) For the purposes of subsection (2)(b) above, a marriage ceremony for marriage between persons of the same sex is of an appropriate form if it includes, and is in no way inconsistent with—
   (a) a declaration by the parties, in the presence of each other, the celebrant and two witnesses, that they accept each other in marriage;
   (b) a declaration by the celebrant, after the declaration mentioned in paragraph (a), that the parties are then married, and the Registrar General may, before deciding whether to accept or reject a nomination, require the nominating body to produce in writing the form of words used at its marriage ceremonies for marriage between persons of the same sex.”,

(h) in subsection (4)—
   (i) after “(1)” insert “or (1A)”, and
   (ii) in paragraph (b), after “area” insert “or place”,

(i) in subsection (5)(a), after “(1)” insert “or (1A)”,

(j) after subsection (5) insert—
   “(5ZA) The register mentioned in subsection (5)(a)(ii) is to be in two parts—
   (a) the first part containing the details mentioned in subsection (5)(a)(ii) in relation to persons nominated by religious or belief bodies to solemnise marriages between persons of different sexes; and
   (b) the second part containing those details in relation to persons nominated by religious or belief bodies to solemnise marriages between persons of the same sex.”,

(k) in subsection (6), in the proviso, for “religious body” in each place where it appears substitute “religious or belief body”, and

(l) the italic cross-heading preceding section 9 becomes “Religious or belief marriages”.

(3) In section 10 (removal of celebrant’s name from register)—
   (a) in subsection (1)—
   (i) in paragraph (b), after “9(1)” insert “or (1A)”, and
(ii) in paragraph (c), after “9(3)’’ insert “(3A)’’,

(b) after that subsection insert—

“(1A) In relation to any ground mentioned in subsection (1)(a) to (c), references in this section to removal from and restoration to the register include removal from and restoration to the appropriate part of the register.”, and

(c) in subsection (4), after “9(1)” insert “(1A)’’.

(4) In section 14(b) (form of ceremony to be used by approved celebrant), after “9(3)” insert “or (3A)’’.

(5) In section 24(2)(a) (offences), after “area” insert “or place”.

12 Temporary authorisation of celebrants

(1) The 1977 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 12 (temporary authorisation of celebrants)—

(a) in subsection (1), for “person” substitute “member of a religious or belief body”,

(b) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) The Registrar General may grant an authorisation to a person under subsection (1) only if satisfied that the religious or belief body of which the person is a member meets the qualifying requirements.

(1B) An authorisation under subsection (1)(b) may be granted in relation to—

(a) only marriages between persons of different sexes;

(b) only marriages between persons of the same sex; or

(c) both.

(1C) The Registrar General may grant an authorisation to a person under subsection (1)(b) to solemnise marriages between persons of the same sex only if the religious or belief body of which the person is a member—

(a) is prescribed by virtue of section 8(1B)(a)(i); or

(b) has nominated members (whether or not including that person) under section 9(1A) to solemnise marriages between persons of the same sex.

(1D) In subsection (1A), the “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

(1E) Regulations under subsection (1D)—

(a) may make different provision for different cases or circumstances;

(b) may include transitional and saving provision.

(1F) Regulations under subsection (1D) are subject to the negative procedure.”.

(3) In section 24 (offences), in subsection (2)(c), for the words from “12(a)” to the end substitute “12 of this Act—

(i) if authorised under subsection (1)(a) of that section, solemnises a marriage not specified in the authorisation;
(ii) if authorised under subsection (1)(b) of that section, solemnises a marriage outwith the period specified in the authorisation;

(iii) in either case, solemnises a marriage otherwise than in accordance with such terms and conditions as may be specified in the authorisation;”.

13 Religious or belief marriage: further provision

(1) The 1977 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 6(5) (solemnisation of marriage on date and at place in Marriage Schedule), for “religious marriage” substitute “religious or belief marriage”.

(3) In section 11 (alterations to register), in paragraph (a), for “religious body” substitute “religious or belief body”.

(4) In the title of section 13 (preliminaries to solemnisation of religious marriages), for “religious marriages” substitute “marriages by approved celebrants”.

(5) In section 14(a) (form of ceremony to be used by approved celebrant), for “religious body” substitute “religious or belief body”.

(6) In the title of section 15 (registration of religious marriages), for “religious marriages” substitute “religious or belief marriages”.

(7) In section 15(3) (entry in register of marriage on receipt of Marriage Schedule), for “religious marriage” substitute “religious or belief marriage”.

CHAPTER 4

SAME SEX MARRIAGE: PROTECTION OF FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION ETC.

14 Same sex marriage: protection of freedom of expression etc.

(1) For the avoidance of doubt, nothing in this Part so far as it makes provision for the marriage of persons of the same sex and as to the persons who may solemnise such marriages affects the exercise of—

(a) the Convention right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion,

(b) the Convention right to freedom of expression, or

(c) any equivalent right conferred by rule of law.

(2) “Convention right” has the same meaning as in the Human Rights Act 1998.

CHAPTER 5

OTHER CHANGES TO MARRIAGE PROCEDURE

15 Power of district registrar to require evidence of nationality: marriage

(1) The 1977 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 3 (notice of intention to marry), after subsection (4) insert—

“(4A) A district registrar to whom a notice under subsection (1) is submitted may require the person submitting the notice to provide the district registrar with specified nationality evidence relating to each of the parties to the marriage.
(4B) A requirement under subsection (4A) may be imposed at any time—
   (a) on or after the submitting of the notice under subsection (1); but
   (b) before the district registrar completes the Marriage Schedule.

(4C) In subsection (4A), “specified nationality evidence” means such evidence of that person’s nationality as may be specified in guidance issued by the Registrar General.”.

(3) In section 7 (marriage outside Scotland where a party resides in Scotland), in subsection
   (1) for “and (3)” substitute “, (3) and (4A) to (4C)”.

16 The Marriage Schedule

(1) The 1977 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 6 (the Marriage Schedule)—
   (a) after subsection (1) insert—
   “(1A) Regulations under subsection (1) prescribing the form of the Marriage Schedule may make different provision for different cases or circumstances.”, and
   (b) in subsection (4)(a), for “14 days” in both places where those words appear substitute “28 days”.

(3) In section 7(2) (issuing of certificate in respect of legal capacity to marry), for “14 days” substitute “28 days”.

(4) In section 19(1) (period between receipt of marriage notice and solemnisation of marriage), for “14 days” substitute “28 days”.

17 Marriage outside Scotland: evidence of dissolution of former civil partnership

In section 7(1) of the 1977 Act (marriage outside Scotland where a party resides in Scotland), after “3(1)(a),” insert “(aa),”.

18 Religious marriages: solemnisation by Church of Scotland deacons

In section 8(1)(a)(i) of the 1977 Act (solemnisation of marriage by ministers of the Church of Scotland), after “minister” insert “or deacon”.

19 Places at which civil marriages may be solemnised

(1) The 1977 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 18 (places at which civil marriages may be solemnised)—
   (a) in subsection (1)—
      (i) after paragraph (a) insert—
      “(aa) at an appropriate place in the registration district of the authorised registrar; or
   (ab) with the approval of the Registrar General, at—
      (i) the registration office of another authorised registrar;
(ii) an appropriate place in the registration district of another authorised registrar; or

(iii) an appropriate place in Scottish waters.”,

(ii) paragraph (b) (and the word “or” following it) are repealed, and

(iii) paragraph (c) is repealed,

(b) after that subsection insert—

“(1A) In this section—

“appropriate place” means a place which—

(a) the parties to the intended marriage and the local registration authority agree is to be the place of solemnisation; and

(b) is not religious premises;

“local registration authority” means—

(a) the local registration authority for the registration district which includes the place; or

(b) where the place is in Scottish waters, the local registration authority for the authorised registrar’s registration district;

“religious premises” means premises which—

(a) are used solely or mainly for religious purposes; or

(b) have been so used and have not subsequently been used solely or mainly for other purposes.”, and

(c) subsections (2) to (8) are repealed.

(3) Section 18A (approved places) is repealed.

(4) In section 19 (marriage ceremony and registration of marriage)—

(a) in subsection (4)(a)—

(i) for sub-paragraph (ii) substitute—

“(ii) at an appropriate place (within the meaning given by section 18) in the registration district of the authorised registrar; or”,

(ii) sub-paragraph (iii) (and the word “or” following it) are repealed, and

(iii) in sub-paragraph (iv), for the words “in or on an approved vessel” substitute “at an appropriate place (within the meaning given by section 18)”,

(b) in subsection (4)(b)(ii), for “approved place” substitute “appropriate place (within the meaning given by section 18)”, and

(c) subsection (5) is repealed.

(5) In section 26(2A)(b) (seaward boundary of registration district), for “within a registration district if it” substitute “a place within a registration district if the vessel”.
20  Second marriage ceremony: form of endorsement
In section 20(2)(d) of the 1977 Act (second marriage ceremony), in the form of the endorsement, the word “19” in both places where it appears is repealed.

CHAPTER 6

SHERIFF COURT JURISDICTION IN RELATION TO DECLARATOR OF MARRIAGE

21  Sheriff court jurisdiction in relation to declarator of marriage
(1) Section 8 of the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973 (jurisdiction of the sheriff court in relation to actions for separation, divorce etc.) is amended as follows.
(2) After subsection (2) insert—
“(2ZA) The court has jurisdiction to entertain an action for declarator of marriage if (and only if)—
(a) either party to the marriage—
(i) was resident in the sheriffdom for a period of 40 days ending with the date on which the action is begun, or
(ii) had been resident in the sheriffdom for a period of not less than 40 days ending not more than 40 days before that date, and has no known residence in Scotland on that date, and
(b) any of the following requirements is met in relation to either of the parties to the marriage—
(i) the party is domiciled in Scotland on the date on which the action is begun,
(ii) the party was habitually resident in Scotland throughout the period of one year ending with that date, or
(iii) the party died before that date and either—
(A) was at death domiciled in Scotland, or
(B) had been habitually resident in Scotland throughout the period of one year ending with the date of death.”.
(3) In subsection (3)—
(a) after “declarator of” insert “marriage or of”, and
(b) after “subsection (2)” in both places where those words appear insert “, (2ZA)”.
(4) In subsection (4), after “declarator of” insert “marriage or of”.

PART 2

CIVIL PARTNERSHIP

22  Registration of civil partnership
(1) The Civil Partnership Act 2004 (“the 2004 Act”) is amended as follows.
(2) In section 85 (formation of civil partnership by registration)—
(a) in subsection (1), for paragraph (c) and the words following it substitute—“(c) the approved celebrant or, as the case may be, the authorised registrar.”, and
(b) in subsection (4)(b), at the beginning insert “the approved celebrant or, as the case may be,”.

(3) In section 86 (eligibility)—
(a) for subsection (2) substitute—
“(2) Subject to subsection (3), a person is related to another person in a forbidden degree if related to that person in a degree specified in Schedule 10.”,
(b) in subsection (3), for the words from the beginning to “related” in the third place where it appears substitute “A person who is related to another person in a degree specified in paragraph 2 of Schedule 10 (relationships by affinity) is not related to that person”,
(c) after subsection (3) insert—
“(3A) For the purposes of paragraph 2 of Schedule 10, “spouse” means—
(a) in the case of a marriage between persons of different sexes, a wife in relation to her husband or a husband in relation to his wife, and
(b) in the case of a marriage between persons of the same sex, one of the parties to the marriage in relation to the other.”,
(d) in subsection (5)—
(i) after “in” insert “subsection (3A)(a) as it applies to”, and
(ii) the word “former” in each place where it appears is repealed, and
(e) in subsection (5A)—
(i) for “mother” substitute “parent”, and
(ii) the words “in either column” are repealed.

(4) In section 87 (appointment of authorised registrars), before “registration” in the first place where it appears insert “civil”.

(5) In section 88 (notice of proposed civil partnership), after subsection (6) insert—
“(7) In this section, “the district registrar” means—
(a) where the civil partnership is to be registered in a registration district, the district registrar for that district,
(b) where the civil partnership is to be registered in Scottish waters—
(i) in the case where the civil partnership is to be registered by an approved celebrant, the district registrar for any registration district,
(ii) in the case where the civil partnership is to be registered by an authorised registrar, the district registrar for the registration district of the proposed authorised registrar.”.

(6) In section 89 (civil partnership notice book), after subsection (2) insert—
“(3) In this section and sections 90, 91, 92 and 94, “the district registrar” means—
(a) where the civil partnership is to be registered in a registration district, the district registrar for that district,
(b) where the civil partnership is to be registered in Scottish waters—

(i) in the case where the civil partnership is to be registered by an approved celebrant, the district registrar to whom the civil partnership notices were submitted,

(ii) in the case where the civil partnership is to be registered by an authorised registrar, the district registrar for the registration district of the proposed authorised registrar.”

(7) In section 90 (publicisation)—

(a) in subsection (1), for “a district registrar” substitute “the district registrar”,

(b) in subsection (2)(b), for “14 days” substitute “28 days”, and

(c) in subsection (3), for “91” substitute “91(1)”.

(8) In section 91 (early registration)—

(a) the existing text becomes subsection (1),

(b) in that subsection—

(i) for “An authorised registrar who” substitute “Where the district registrar”,

(ii) for “14 days” substitute “28 days”, and

(iii) after “section 90)” insert “the district registrar”, and

(c) after that subsection insert—

“(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), a request which is made by electronic means is to be treated as in writing if it is received in a form which is legible and capable of being used for subsequent reference.”.

(9) In section 92 (objections to registration)—

(a) in subsection (3), for “at which a notice of proposed civil partnership to which the objection would relate” substitute “of the district registrar”,

(b) in subsection (4)(b)—

(i) the word “and” following sub-paragraph (i) is repealed, and

(ii) after sub-paragraph (ii) insert “, and

(iii) where, in the case of a civil partnership to be registered by an approved celebrant, the civil partnership schedule has already been issued to the parties, if possible notify that celebrant of the objection and advise the celebrant not to register the civil partnership pending consideration of the objection.”, and

(c) in subsection (5)(a), for the words “not to register the intended civil partners and to notify them” substitute “to take all reasonable steps to ensure that the registration of the civil partnership does not take place and must notify, or direct the district registrar to notify, the intended civil partners”.

(10) In section 93 (place of registration)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) after “registered” insert “by an authorised registrar”, and

(ii) for the words from “other” in the first place where it appears to the end substitute “other—

(a) at the registration office of the authorised registrar,
(b) at an appropriate place in the registration district of the authorised registrar, or
(c) with the approval of the Registrar General, at—
   (i) the registration office of another authorised registrar,
   (ii) an appropriate place in the registration district of another authorised registrar, or
   (iii) an appropriate place in Scottish waters.”,

(b) after that subsection, insert—

“(1A) In this section—

“appropriate place” means a place which—
   (a) the parties to the intended civil partnership and the local registration authority agree is to be the place of registration, and
   (b) is not religious premises,

“local registration authority” means—
   (a) the local registration authority for the registration district which includes the place, or
   (b) where the place is in Scottish waters, the local registration authority for the authorised registrar’s registration district,

“religious premises” means premises which—
   (a) are used solely or mainly for religious purposes, or
   (b) have been so used and have not subsequently been used solely or mainly for other purposes.”,

(c) subsections (2) and (3) are repealed, and

(d) the title of section 93 becomes “Place of civil registration of civil partnerships”.

(11) After section 93 insert—

“93A Date and place of registration of religious or belief civil partnerships

(1) A religious or belief civil partnership may be registered only on the date and at the place specified in the civil partnership schedule.

(2) But if, for any reason, the civil partnership cannot be registered on that date or at that place and a new date or place is fixed for the registration, the district registrar must—
   (a) issue another civil partnership schedule under section 94(2) in place of that already issued, specifying the new date or place, or
   (b) substitute, or direct the approved celebrant to substitute, the new date or place in the civil partnership schedule already issued.

(3) Subsection (2) does not apply where—
   (a) the new date is more than 3 months after the date for the registration specified in the civil partnership schedule already issued, or
(b) the new place is in a different registration district, is in Scottish waters instead of a registration district or is in a registration district instead of Scottish waters.

(4) In a case falling within subsection (3)(a) or (b) the Registrar General may, according to the circumstances—

(a) direct the district registrar—

(i) to issue another civil partnership schedule under section 94(2) in place of that already issued, specifying the new date or place, or

(ii) to substitute, or direct the approved celebrant to substitute, the new date or place in the civil partnership schedule already issued,

(whichever the Registrar General considers the more appropriate), or

(b) direct each party to the civil partnership to submit to the district registrar a new notice of proposed civil partnership.”.

(12) In section 94 (the civil partnership schedule)—

(a) the existing text becomes subsection (1),

(b) in paragraph (b) of that subsection—

(i) for “14 days” substitute “28 days”, and

(ii) for “91” substitute “91(1)”, and

(c) after that subsection insert—

“(2) In the case of a civil partnership to be registered by an approved celebrant, the civil partnership schedule completed in accordance with subsection (1) is to be issued by the district registrar to one or both of the parties to the intended civil partnership.

(3) The district registrar may not issue the civil partnership schedule on a date earlier than 7 days before the date of the intended civil partnership unless authorised to do so by the Registrar General.”.

(13) After section 94 insert—

“94A Persons who may register civil partnerships

(1) A civil partnership may be registered by and only by—

(a) a person who is—

(i) a celebrant of a religious or belief body prescribed by regulations made by the Scottish Ministers, or who, not being a celebrant, is recognised by a religious or belief body so prescribed as entitled to register civil partnerships on its behalf,

(ii) registered under section 94B, or

(iii) temporarily authorised under section 94E, or

(b) a person who is a district registrar or assistant registrar appointed under section 87.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may prescribe a religious or belief body under subsection (1)(a)(i) only if—

(a) the body requests them to do so, and
(b) the Scottish Ministers are satisfied that the body meets the qualifying requirements.

(3) For the avoidance of doubt, nothing in subsection (1)(a) or (2)(a)—

(a) imposes a duty on any religious or belief body to make a request referred to in subsection (2)(a),

(b) imposes a duty on any such body to nominate under section 94B any of its members to be registered as empowered to register civil partnerships,

(c) imposes a duty on any person to apply for temporary authorisation under section 94E to register civil partnerships,

(d) imposes a duty on any person who is an approved celebrant in relation to civil partnerships to register civil partnerships.

(4) In this Part—

(a) any such person as is mentioned in subsection (1)(a) is referred to as an “approved celebrant”,

(b) a civil partnership registered by an approved celebrant is referred to as a “religious or belief civil partnership”,

(c) a civil partnership registered by an authorised registrar is referred to as a “civil registration”.

(5) In subsection (2)(b), the “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

94B Registration of nominated persons as celebrants

(1) A religious or belief body, not being prescribed by virtue of section 94A(1)(a)(i), may nominate to the Registrar General any of its members who it desires should be registered under this section as empowered to register civil partnerships.

(2) The Registrar General must reject a nomination under subsection (1) if in the Registrar General’s opinion—

(a) the nominating body is not a religious or belief body,

(b) the nominee is not a fit and proper person to register a civil partnership,

(c) there are already registered under this section sufficient members of the same body as the nominee to meet the needs of that body, or

(d) the nominating body does not meet the qualifying requirements.

(3) In subsection (2)(d), the “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

(4) Where the Registrar General accepts a nomination made under subsection (1), the Registrar General—

(a) must determine the period during which the nominee is empowered to register civil partnerships, being a period of not more than 3 years,

(b) may determine that the nominee is empowered to register civil partnerships only in such area or place as the Registrar General may specify, and
(c) may make acceptance of the nominee’s registration subject to such other conditions as the Registrar General thinks fit.

(5) Nothing in subsection (4)(a) prevents the Registrar General from accepting a further nomination of that nominee, in accordance with this section, to take effect at any time after the end of the period determined by the Registrar General under subsection (4)(a).

(6) The Registrar General must—

(a) if accepting a nomination made under subsection (1)—

(i) so inform the nominee and the nominating body, specifying the period during which the acceptance has effect and any condition to which the acceptance is subject,

(ii) enter the name of the nominee, the nominating body and such other particulars as the Registrar General thinks fit in a register which the Registrar General must establish and maintain and which must be made available for public inspection at all reasonable times free of charge,

(b) if rejecting a nomination made under subsection (1), by notice in writing inform the nominating body of the reasons for that rejection.

(7) For the purposes of subsection (6)(b), notice which is given by electronic means is to be treated as in writing if it is received in a form which is legible and capable of being used for subsequent reference.

(8) If the nominating body is aggrieved by a rejection under this section it may, within 28 days of receiving notice of the rejection, appeal to the Scottish Ministers.

(9) On any such appeal the Scottish Ministers may—

(a) direct the Registrar General to accept the nomination, or

(b) confirm the rejection of the nomination, and must inform the nominating body of their decision and the reason for it; and their decision is final.

(10) If a reason given for confirming the rejection of a nomination is that the nominating body is not a religious or belief body, the body may, within 42 days of receiving notice of the confirmation, appeal against the decision to the Court of Session and seek the determination of that court as to whether the body is a religious or belief body.

(11) If—

(a) the Court determines that the nominating body is a religious or belief body, and

(b) the reason mentioned in subsection (10) was the only reason given for confirming the rejection of the nomination, the Registrar General must give effect to the determination as if it were a direction under subsection (9)(a) to accept the nomination.

94C  Removal of celebrant’s name from register

(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the Registrar General may remove the name of a person registered under section 94B from the register on the ground that—

(a) the person has requested that the person’s name should be so removed,

(b) the body which nominated the person under section 94B(1) no longer desires that the person should be so registered,

(c) the person—

(i) has, while registered as an approved celebrant, been convicted of an offence under this Part,

(ii) has, for the purpose of profit or gain, been carrying on a business of registering civil partnerships,

(iii) is not a fit and proper person to register civil partnerships, or

(iv) for any other reason, should not be registered as an approved celebrant.

(2) The Registrar General may not remove the name of a person from the register on any ground mentioned in subsection (1)(c) unless the Registrar General has given the person at least 21 days notice in writing of the intention to do so.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (2), notice which is given by electronic means is to be treated as in writing if it is received in a form which is legible and capable of being used for subsequent reference.

(4) The Registrar General must—

(a) in the notice given under subsection (2), specify the ground of removal and call upon the person to give any reasons, within the period specified in the notice, why the person’s name should not be removed from the register, and

(b) consider any representations made within that period by the person.

(5) Where a person’s name has been removed from the register on any of the grounds mentioned in paragraph (c) of subsection (1), the person or the body which nominated the person under section 94B(1) may, if aggrieved by the removal, within 28 days of receiving notice of the removal appeal to the Scottish Ministers.

(6) On an appeal under subsection (5) the Scottish Ministers may give any direction they think proper to the Registrar General as to the removal from, or restoration to, the register of the person’s name; and such direction is final.

(7) Where a person has received a notice in pursuance of subsection (2), the person must not register a civil partnership unless and until the person’s name is restored to the register or, as the case may be, the Registrar General has decided not to remove the person’s name from the register.

94D  Alterations to register maintained under section 94B

(1) A body registered in pursuance of section 94B(6)(a)(ii) must notify the Registrar General of any of the following events (if practicable, within 21 days of its occurrence)—
(a) any change in the name or the address of the body or any amalgamation with any other religious or belief body, giving the name and address of any approved celebrant who is a member of the body so registered,

(b) the death of an approved celebrant who is a member of the body so registered,

c) any change of name, address or designation of an approved celebrant who is a member of the body so registered,

d) the cessation of an approved celebrant who is a member of the body so registered from exercising the functions of an approved celebrant, giving the person’s name and address.

(2) The Registrar General must, on receipt of any such notification, make whatever alteration to the register maintained under section 94B the Registrar General considers necessary or desirable.

94E Temporary authorisation of celebrants

(1) The Registrar General may, in accordance with such terms and conditions as may be specified in the authorisation, grant to any member of a religious or belief body a temporary written authorisation to register—

(a) a civil partnership or partnerships specified in the authorisation, or

(b) civil partnerships during such period as is specified in the authorisation.

(2) The Registrar General may grant an authorisation to a person under subsection
(1) only if satisfied that the religious or belief body of which the person is a member meets the qualifying requirements.

(3) The Registrar General may grant an authorisation to a person under subsection
(1)(b) only if the religious or belief body of which the person is a member—

(a) is prescribed by virtue of section 94A(1)(a)(i), or

(b) has nominated members (whether or not including that person) under section 94B(1).

(4) In subsection (2), the “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (1), an authorisation which is issued by electronic means is to be treated as written if it is received in a form which is legible and capable of being used for subsequent reference.”.

(14) In section 95 (further provision as to registration)—

(a) in subsection (1), after “85” insert “the approved celebrant or, as the case may be,“,

(b) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) In the case of a religious or belief civil partnership, the parties to the civil partnership must, within 3 days of signing the civil partnership schedule in accordance with section 85(4), deliver the civil partnership schedule, or send it by post or arrange that it is delivered, to the district registrar.”,

(c) in subsection (2), for “after the civil partnership schedule has been signed, the authorised registrar” substitute “after—
(a) in the case of a civil registration, the civil partnership schedule has been signed in accordance with section 85, or

(b) in the case of a religious or belief civil partnership, the district registrar receives the civil partnership schedule, the district registrar”.

(d) after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) The district registrar must not enter the particulars set out in the civil partnership schedule relating to a religious or belief civil partnership in the civil partnership register unless and until the registrar receives a duly signed civil partnership schedule in respect of that civil partnership.

(3B) Where the Registrar General is satisfied that—

(a) a civil partnership has been properly registered, and

(b) the civil partnership schedule in respect of the civil partnership has been duly signed but has been lost or destroyed, the Registrar General may direct the district registrar to complete an exact copy of the original civil partnership schedule and, so far as practicable, to arrange for its signature by those persons who signed the original schedule.

(3C) As soon as possible after the copy schedule has been signed, the district registrar must cause the particulars as set out in it to be entered into the civil partnership register.”;

(e) in subsection (4), after “their” insert “civil”.

(15) After section 95 insert—

“95ZA Registrar’s power to require delivery of civil partnership schedule

(1) Where the civil partnership schedule is not delivered to the district registrar within 21 days from the date of registration as entered in the schedule, the registrar may serve a notice in the prescribed form on either of the parties to the civil partnership requiring that party within 8 days from the date of service to deliver the schedule, or send it by post, to the registrar.

(2) If a person on whom a notice has been served under subsection (1) fails to comply with the notice, the district registrar may serve on the person a second notice in the prescribed form requiring the person to attend personally at the registration office of the district registrar, within 8 days from the date of service of the second notice, for the purpose of delivering the civil partnership schedule to the district registrar to enable the registrar to enter the civil partnership in the civil partnership register.”.

(16) In section 95A (validity following entry in civil partnership register), in subsection (1), after “95(2)” insert “or (3C)”.

(17) In section 96 (civil partnership with former spouse)—

(a) in subsection (3)(b), for “91” substitute “91(1)”, and

(b) in subsection (3)(c), for “paragraph (b)” substitute “subsection (1)(b)”.

(18) In section 97 (certificates of no impediment for Part 2 purposes)—

(a) in subsection (4), for “14 days” substitute “28 days”, and
(b) after subsection (5) insert—

“(5A) For the purposes of subsection (5), an objection which is submitted by electronic means is to be treated as in writing if it is received in a form which is legible and capable of being used for subsequent reference.”.

(19) In section 100 (offences)—

(a) in subsection (2)—

(i) in paragraphs (c), (d) and (e), after “being” insert “an approved celebrant or, as the case may be,”, and

(ii) in paragraph (f), for the words from “in” in the second place where it appears to the end substitute “in accordance with section 93”,

(b) after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) A person commits an offence if the person—

(a) registers a civil partnership in an area or place in which by virtue of section 94B(4)(b) the person is not permitted to register a civil partnership,

(b) registers a civil partnership in contravention of section 94C(7),

(c) being a person temporarily authorised under section 94E—

(i) if authorised under subsection (1)(a) of that section, registers a civil partnership not specified in the authorisation,

(ii) if authorised under subsection (1)(b) of that section, registers a civil partnership outwith the period specified in the authorisation,

(iii) in either case, registers a civil partnership otherwise than in accordance with such terms and conditions as may be specified in the authorisation,

(d) being a party to a civil partnership, fails to comply with a notice served under section 95ZA(2).

(3B) A person guilty of an offence under subsection (3A) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.”.

(c) in subsection (4), for “or (2)” substitute “, (2) or (3A)”.

(20) In section 126(4) (regulations), after “section” insert “94A(1)(a)(i) or (5), 94B(3), 94E(4) or”.

(21) In section 135(1) (interpretation of Part 3)—

(a) after the definition of “the 1965 Act” insert—

““approved celebrant” has the meaning given by section 94A(4)(a);”,

(b) after the definition of “civil partnership schedule” insert—

““civil registration” has the meaning given by section 94A(4)(c);”, and

(c) after the definition of “registration office” insert—

““religious or belief body” means an organised group of people—

(a) which meets regularly for religious worship, or
(b) the principal object (or one of the principal objects) of which is to uphold or promote philosophical beliefs and which meets regularly for that purpose;

“religious or belief civil partnership” has the meaning given by section 94A(4)(b).”.

(22) For Schedule 10 substitute—

“SCHEDULE 10
(introduced by section 86)

FORBIDDEN DEGREES OF RELATIONSHIP: SCOTLAND

1. Relationships by consanguinity

Parent
Child
Grandparent
Grandchild

Sibling
Aunt or uncle
Niece or nephew
Great-grandparent
Great-grandchild

2. Relationships by affinity referred to in section 86(3)

Child of former spouse
Child of former civil partner
Former spouse of parent
Former civil partner of parent

Former spouse of grandparent
Former civil partner of grandparent
Grandchild of former spouse
Grandchild of former civil partner.”.

23 Power of district registrar to require evidence of nationality: civil partnership

In section 88 of the 2004 Act (notice of proposed civil partnership), after subsection (7) (inserted by section 22(5) of this Act) insert—

“(8) A district registrar to whom a notice under subsection (1) is submitted may require the person submitting the notice to provide the district registrar with specified nationality evidence relating to each of the intended civil partners.

(9) A requirement under subsection (8) may be imposed at any time—

(a) on or after the submitting of the notice under subsection (1), but
(b) before the district registrar completes the civil partnership schedule.”.
(10) In subsection (8), “specified nationality evidence” means such evidence of that person’s nationality as may be specified in guidance issued by the Registrar General.”.

24 Recognition of overseas relationships

(1) The 2004 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 214 (general conditions in relation to recognition of overseas relationships)—

(a) after paragraph (b) insert—

“(ba) the relationship is not one of marriage,”; and

(b) in paragraph (c), for the words from the second “or” to the end substitute “but are not treated as married”.

(3) In Schedule 20 to the 2004 Act (specified relationships), the following entries are repealed—

“Argentina marriage”,
“Belgium marriage”,
“Brazil marriage”,
“Canada marriage”,
“Denmark marriage”,
“Iceland marriage”,
“Mexico: Mexico City Federal District marriage”, “Netherlands marriage”,
“Norway marriage”,
“Portugal marriage”,
“South Africa marriage”,
“Spain marriage”,
“Sweden marriage”,
“United States of America: California marriage”,
“United States of America: Connecticut marriage”,
“United States of America: District of Columbia marriage”,
“United States of America: Iowa marriage”,
“United States of America: Massachusetts marriage”,
“United States of America: New Hampshire marriage”,
“United States of America: New York marriage”,
“United States of America: Vermont marriage”.
25  Dissolution of civil partnership: evidence

(1) Article 2 of the 2012 Order (which disapplies from certain actions for dissolution of civil partnership section 8(3A) of the Civil Evidence (Scotland) Act 1988 (requirement for evidence other than that of a party to the civil partnership)) is to be taken to have been in force since 5 December 2005 and to have had effect in relation to actions raised before 30 March 2012 as it has effect in relation to actions raised on or after that date.

(2) The “2012 Order” is the Evidence in Civil Partnership and Divorce Actions (Scotland) Order 2012 (SSI 2012/111).

26  Bigamy

(1) In section 24 of the 1977 Act (offences)—

(a) before subsection (1) insert—

“(A1) A person (“A”) commits an offence if A purports to enter into a marriage with another person (“B”) knowing that either or both—

(a) A is already married to or in a civil partnership with a person other than B, or

(b) B is already married to or in a civil partnership with a person other than A.

(A2) A person who commits an offence under subsection (A1) is liable—

(a) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years or to a fine (or both),

(b) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum (or both).”, and

(b) in subsection (1)(ii), for “prescribed sum” substitute “statutory maximum”.

(2) In section 100 of the 2004 Act (offences)—

(a) in subsection (1), for “registers” substitute “purports to register”, and

(b) in subsection (3)(b), for “level 3 on the standard scale” substitute “the statutory maximum”.

(3) The common law offence of bigamy is abolished.

(4) In section 13 of the Presumption of Death (Scotland) Act 1977 (defence to charge of bigamy)—

(a) for “bigamy” substitute “committing an offence under section 24(A1) of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 or section 100(1) of the Civil Partnership Act 2004”,

(b) after “marriage” insert “or civil partnership”, and

(c) after “spouse” insert “or civil partner”.

PART 3

MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP: OTHER PROVISION
PART 4

CHANGE OF GENDER OF MARRIED PERSONS OR CIVIL PARTNERS

27 Change of gender of married persons or civil partners

Schedule 2 (change of gender of married persons or civil partners) has effect.

28 Renewed marriage or civil partnership following issue of full gender recognition certificate

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision about—

(a) the solemnisation of a renewed marriage between the parties to a protected Scottish marriage following the issue of a full gender recognition certificate to a party (or both parties) to the marriage,

(b) the registration of a renewed civil partnership between the parties to a protected Scottish civil partnership following the issue of full gender recognition certificates to both parties to the civil partnership.

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) may in particular make provision—

(a) about the submitting by the parties to the protected Scottish marriage of notice of intention to enter into a renewed marriage,

(b) about the submitting by the parties to the protected Scottish civil partnership of notice of intention to enter into a renewed civil partnership,

(c) about the information to be provided by the parties,

(d) about the provision of evidence by the parties,

(e) for the parties to appear before any person or appear at any place,

(f) conferring functions on persons in relation to a renewed marriage or renewed civil partnership,

(g) for fees, of such amounts as are specified in or determined in accordance with the regulations, to be payable in respect of—

(i) the submitting of notice of intention to enter into a renewed marriage or renewed civil partnership,

(ii) the exercise of any function conferred by virtue of paragraph (f),

(h) about the effect of entering into a renewed marriage or renewed civil partnership in accordance with provision made under subsection (1).

(3) Functions conferred by virtue of subsection (2)(f) may include functions relating to—

(a) the recording of information relating to a renewed marriage or renewed civil partnership,

(b) the issuing of certified copies of any information recorded,

(c) the conducting of services or ceremonies in connection with a renewed marriage or renewed civil partnership.

(4) Before making regulations under subsection (1), the Scottish Ministers must consult the Registrar General of Births, Deaths and Marriages for Scotland.

(5) Regulations under subsection (1)—
(a) may include consequential, supplementary, incidental, transitional, transitory or saving provision,
(b) may make provision applying any provision of the 1977 Act or the 2004 Act (either with or without modifications),
(c) may modify any enactment (including this Act),
(d) are (except where subsection (6) applies) subject to the negative procedure.

(6) Regulations under subsection (1) which add to, replace or omit any part of the text of an Act are subject to the affirmative procedure.

(7) In this section “full gender recognition certificate”, “protected Scottish civil partnership” and “protected Scottish marriage” have the meanings given by section 25 of the Gender Recognition Act 2004.

PART 5
REGISTRATION SERVICES

29 Provision of certain information to district registrars
In section 39C(1)(a)(i) of the Registration of Births, Deaths and Marriages (Scotland) Act 1965 (provision of certain information to district registrars), for “section 34(3)” substitute “section 34(4)”.

PART 6
GENERAL PROVISIONS

30 Interpretation
In this Act—
“the 1977 Act” means the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977,
“the 2004 Act” means the Civil Partnership Act 2004.

31 Ancillary provision
(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order make such supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider necessary or expedient for the purposes of, or in connection with, or for giving full effect to, any provision of this Act.
(2) An order under subsection (1) may modify any enactment (including this Act).
(3) Subject to subsection (4), an order under subsection (1) is subject to the negative procedure.
(4) An order under subsection (1) containing provisions which add to, replace or omit any part of the text of an Act is subject to the affirmative procedure.

32 Commencement
(1) This section and sections 30, 31 and 33 come into force on the day after Royal Assent.
(2) The other provisions of this Act come into force on such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

(3) An order under subsection (2) may include transitional, transitory or saving provision.

33 Short title

The short title of this Act is the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Act 2014.
SCHEDULE 1
(introduced by section 6)

JURISDICTION IN PROCEEDINGS RELATING TO SAME SEX MARRIAGES

Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973

1 (1) The Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973 is amended in accordance with this paragraph.

(2) After section 8 insert—

“8A Same sex marriages

(1) Sections 7 and 8 do not apply in relation to marriages between persons of the same sex.

(2) Schedule 1B (jurisdiction in relation to same sex marriages (Scotland)) has effect.”.

(3) In section 10 (ancillary and collateral orders), after subsection (1B) insert—

“(1BA) In relation to a marriage between persons of the same sex, subsection (1) does not give the Court of Session or a sheriff court jurisdiction to entertain an application in proceedings where—

(a) the court is exercising jurisdiction in the proceedings by virtue of regulations under paragraph 2 of Schedule 1B; and

(b) the making or variation of an order in consequence of the application would contravene the regulations.”.

(4) Before Schedule 2 insert—

“SCHEDULE 1B
(introduced by section 8A)

JURISDICTION IN RELATION TO SAME SEX MARRIAGES (SCOTLAND)

Introduction

1 (1) This Schedule has effect with respect to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session and of the sheriff court to entertain, in relation to same sex marriages, proceedings for—

(a) divorce,

(b) separation,

(c) declarator of marriage,

(d) declarator of nullity of marriage,

(e) declarator of recognition, or non-recognition, of a relevant foreign decree.

(2) References in this Schedule to “relevant proceedings” are to such proceedings as are mentioned in sub-paragraph (1).

(3) In this Schedule—

“relevant foreign decree” means a decree of divorce, separation or nullity granted outwith a member State, “same sex marriage” means a marriage between persons of the same sex.

Power to make provision corresponding to EC Regulation 2201/2003

1. The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision—
   - (a) as to the jurisdiction of courts in Scotland in relevant proceedings in relation to a same sex marriage where one of the parties to the marriage—
     - (i) is or has been habitually resident in a member State,
     - (ii) is a national of a member State, or
     - (iii) is domiciled in a part of the United Kingdom or in the Republic of Ireland, and
   - (b) as to the recognition in Scotland of any judgment of a court of another member State which orders the divorce or separation of the parties to a same sex marriage, or the annulment of a same sex marriage.

3. The regulations may provide that for the purposes of this Schedule and the regulations “member State” means—
   - (a) all member States with the exception of such member States as are specified in the regulations, or
   - (b) such member States as are specified in the regulations.

4. The regulations may make provision under sub-paragraph (1)(b) which applies even in a case where the date of the divorce, separation or annulment is earlier than the date on which this paragraph comes into force.

5. The regulations are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Divorce or separation

1. The Court of Session has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for the divorce or separation of the parties to a same sex marriage if (and only if)—
   - (a) the Scottish courts have jurisdiction under regulations under paragraph 2, or
   - (b) no court has, or is recognised as having, jurisdiction under those regulations and either party to the marriage is domiciled in Scotland on the date on which the proceedings are begun.

2. The sheriff court has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for the divorce or separation of the parties to a same sex marriage if (and only if)—
   - (a) the requirements of paragraph (a) or (b) of sub-paragraph (1) are met, and
   - (b) either party to the marriage—
(i) was resident in the sheriffdom for a period of 40 days ending with the date on which the proceedings are begun, or

(ii) had been resident in the sheriffdom for a period of not less than 40 days ending not more than 40 days before that date, and has no known residence in Scotland on that date.

(3) Despite sub-paragraph (2), the sheriff court of the sheriffdom of Lothian and Borders at Edinburgh also has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for the divorce or separation of the parties to a same sex marriage if the following requirements are met—

(a) the parties married each other in Scotland,

(b) no court has, or is recognised as having, jurisdiction under regulations under paragraph 2, and

(c) it appears to the court to be in the interests of justice to assume jurisdiction in the case.

Declarator of marriage

4 (1) In relation to a same sex marriage, the Court of Session has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for declarator of marriage if (and only if) either of the parties to the marriage—

(a) is domiciled in Scotland on the date on which the proceedings are begun,

(b) was habitually resident in Scotland throughout the period of one year ending with that date, or

(c) died before that date and either—

(i) was at death domiciled in Scotland, or

(ii) had been habitually resident in Scotland throughout the period of one year ending with the date of death.

(2) In relation to a same sex marriage, the sheriff court has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for declarator of marriage if (and only if)—

(a) the requirements of paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of sub-paragraph (1) are met in relation to either party to the marriage, and

(b) either party of the marriage—

(i) was resident in the sheriffdom for a period of 40 days ending with the date on which the proceedings are begun, or

(ii) had been resident in the sheriffdom for a period of not less than 40 days ending not more than 40 days before that date, and has no known residence in Scotland on that date.

Nullity of marriage

5 (1) The Court of Session has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for declarator of nullity of a same sex marriage if (and only if)—

(a) the Scottish courts have jurisdiction under regulations under paragraph 2, or
(b) no court has, or is recognised as having, jurisdiction under those regulations and either party to the marriage—
   (i) is domiciled in Scotland on the date on which the proceedings are begun, or

   (ii) died before that date and either was at death domiciled in Scotland or had been habitually resident in Scotland throughout the period of one year ending with the date of death.

(2) The sheriff court has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for declarator of nullity of a same sex marriage if (and only if)—

   (a) the requirements of paragraph (a) or (b) of sub-paragraph (1) are met, and

   (b) either party to the marriage—

      (i) was resident in the sheriffdom for a period of 40 days ending with the date on which the proceedings are begun, or

      (ii) had been resident in the sheriffdom for a period of not less than 40 days ending not more than 40 days before that date, and has no known residence in Scotland on that date.

(3) Despite sub-paragraph (2), the sheriff court of the sheriffdom of Lothian and Borders at Edinburgh also has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for declarator of nullity of a same sex marriage if the following requirements are met—

   (a) the parties married each other in Scotland,

   (b) no court has, or is recognised as having, jurisdiction under regulations under paragraph 2, and

   (c) it appears to the court to be in the interests of justice to assume jurisdiction in the case.

Recognition, or non-recognition, of foreign decrees

6 (1) The Court of Session has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for declarator of recognition, or non-recognition, of a relevant foreign decree relating to a same sex marriage if (and only if)—

   (a) the Scottish courts have jurisdiction under regulations under paragraph 2, or

   (b) no court has, or is recognised as having, jurisdiction under those regulations and either party to the marriage—

      (i) is domiciled in Scotland on the date on which the proceedings are begun, or

      (ii) died before that date and either was at death domiciled in Scotland or had been habitually resident in Scotland throughout the period of one year ending with the date of death.

(2) The sheriff court has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for declarator of recognition, or non-recognition, of a relevant foreign decree relating to a same sex marriage if (and only if)—
(a) the requirements of paragraph (a) or (b) of sub-paragraph (1) are met, and

(b) either party to the marriage—

(i) was resident in the sheriffdom for a period of 40 days ending with the date on which the proceedings are begun, or

(ii) had been resident in the sheriffdom for a period of not less than 40 days ending not more than 40 days before that date, and has no known residence in Scotland on that date.

Supplementary provision

7 (1) Paragraph 3(1) does not affect any rule of law under which the Court of Session has jurisdiction in certain circumstances to entertain proceedings for separation as a matter of necessity and urgency.

(2) Paragraphs 3 and 5 do not affect any jurisdiction of a sheriff court to entertain any proceedings for separation, divorce or declarator of nullity of marriage remitted to the court under any enactment or rule of court, if entertaining the proceedings would not contravene regulations under paragraph 2.

(3) At any time when proceedings are pending in respect of which a court has jurisdiction by virtue of any of paragraphs 3 to 6 (or this paragraph), the court also has jurisdiction to entertain other proceedings, in respect of the same marriage, for divorce, separation or declarator of marriage or of nullity of marriage even though that jurisdiction would not be exercisable under any of paragraphs 3 to 6.”.

Presumption of Death (Scotland) Act 1977

2 In section 1 of the Presumption of Death (Scotland) Act 1977 (actions of declarator of the death of missing persons), after subsection (4) insert—

“(4A) Despite subsection (4), the sheriff court of the sheriffdom of Lothian and Borders at Edinburgh also has jurisdiction to entertain an action of declarator if—

(a) the pursuer in the action and the missing person are married to each other and are of the same sex,

(b) they married each other in Scotland, and

(c) it appears to the court to be in the interests of justice to assume jurisdiction in the case.”.

SCHEDULE 2
(introduced by section 27)

CHANGE OF GENDER OF MARRIED PERSONS OR CIVIL PARTNERS

Introductory

1 The Gender Recognition Act 2004 is amended in accordance with this schedule.
Interpretation

2 In section 25 (interpretation)—
   (a) the existing words become subsection (1),
   (b) before the definition of “registered psychologist” insert—

   “protected Scottish civil partnership” means a civil partnership registered in Scotland, “protected Scottish marriage” means a marriage solemnised in Scotland,”,
   (c) before the definition of “subordinate legislation” insert—

   “statutory declaration of consent”, in relation to the issuing of a gender recognition certificate to a person, means a statutory declaration by the person’s spouse that the spouse consents to the marriage continuing after the issue of a full gender recognition certificate,”, and
   (d) after subsection (1) insert—

   “(2) A civil partnership which was registered outside the United Kingdom under an Order in Council made under Chapter 1 of Part 5 of the Civil Partnership Act 2004 is to be treated for the purposes of this Act as having been registered in Scotland if—
     (a) the parties to the civil partnership elected Scotland as the relevant part of the United Kingdom under the Order, and
     (b) details of the civil partnership have been sent to the Registrar General for Scotland.
   (3) A marriage which was registered outside the United Kingdom under the Foreign Marriage Act 1892 (other than a marriage registered by virtue of section 18 of that Act) is to be treated for the purposes of this Act as having been solemnised in Scotland if details of the marriage have been sent to the Registrar General for Scotland.
   (4) A marriage which was solemnised outside the United Kingdom and registered under an Order in Council made under the Registration of Births, Deaths and Marriages (Special Provisions) Act 1957 is to be treated for the purposes of this Act as having been solemnised in Scotland if details of the marriage have been sent to the Registrar General for Scotland.”.

Evidence

3 In section 3 (evidence), before subsection (7) insert—

   “(6D) If the applicant is a party to a protected Scottish marriage, an application under section 1(1) must also include—
     (a) a statutory declaration by the applicant that the applicant wishes the marriage to continue after the issue of a full gender recognition certificate (if that is the case),
     (b) a statutory declaration by the applicant as to where the marriage was solemnised and, if the marriage was solemnised outside the United Kingdom, that details of the marriage have been sent to the Registrar General for Scotland, and
(6E) If an application includes a statutory declaration of consent by the applicant’s spouse under subsection (6D)(c)(i), the Gender Recognition Panel must give the spouse notice that the application has been made.

(6F) If the applicant is a party to a protected Scottish civil partnership, an application under section 1(1) must also include a statutory declaration as to where the civil partnership was registered and, if the civil partnership was registered outside the United Kingdom, that details of the civil partnership have been sent to the Registrar General for Scotland.”.

Successful applications

4 In section 4 (successful applications), for subsections (2) and (3) substitute—

“(2) The certificate is to be a full gender recognition certificate if—

(a) the applicant is neither married nor a civil partner,

(b) the applicant is a party to a protected Scottish marriage and both parties to the marriage consent to the marriage continuing after the issue of a full gender recognition certificate, or

(c) the applicant is a party to a protected Scottish civil partnership and the Gender Recognition Panel has decided to issue a full gender recognition certificate to the other party to the civil partnership.

(3) The certificate is to be an interim gender recognition certificate if—

(a) the applicant is a party to a protected Scottish marriage and either party to the marriage does not consent to the marriage continuing after the issue of a full gender recognition certificate,

(b) the applicant is a party to a marriage which is not a protected Scottish marriage,

(c) the applicant is a party to a protected Scottish civil partnership and the other party to the civil partnership has not made an application under section 1(1),

(d) the applicant is a party to a protected Scottish civil partnership and the Gender Recognition Panel has decided not to issue a full gender recognition certificate to the other party to the civil partnership, or

(e) the applicant is a party to a civil partnership which is not a protected Scottish civil partnership.

(3A) If a Gender Recognition Panel issues a full gender recognition certificate under this section to an applicant who is a party to a protected Scottish marriage, the Panel must give the applicant’s spouse notice of the issue of the certificate.

(3B) Subsection (2)(c) is subject to section 5C.”.
Issue of full gender recognition certificate after interim certificate: applicant married

Before section 5 insert—

“4C Married person with interim certificate: issue of full certificate (Scotland)

(1) A Gender Recognition Panel must issue a full gender recognition certificate to a person in either of the following cases.

(2) Case A is where, on an application by the person, the Panel is satisfied that—

(a) an interim gender recognition certificate has been issued to the person,
(b) the person was a party to a protected Scottish marriage at the time when the interim gender recognition certificate was issued,
(c) the person is still a party to that protected Scottish marriage, and
(d) both parties to the marriage now consent to the marriage continuing after the issue of the full gender recognition certificate.

(3) Case B is where, on an application by the person, the Panel is satisfied that—

(a) an interim gender recognition certificate has been issued to the person,
(b) the person was a party to a protected Scottish civil partnership at the time when the interim gender recognition certificate was issued,
(c) the protected civil partnership was a qualifying civil partnership (within the meaning of section 5(6) of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977) and the parties to the civil partnership submitted notice of intention to marry under section 3(1) of that Act within the period of six months beginning with the day on which that certificate was issued,
(d) the submitting of notice has resulted in the civil partnership becoming a marriage,
(e) the person is a party to that marriage, and
(f) the person’s spouse consents to the marriage continuing after the issue of the full gender recognition certificate.

(4) If, on an application under subsection (2) or (3), the Panel is not satisfied as mentioned in that subsection, the Panel must reject the application.

(5) An application under subsection (2) must be made within the period of six months beginning with the day on which the interim gender recognition certificate is issued.

(6) An application under subsection (3) must be made within the period of six months beginning with the day on which the civil partnership becomes a marriage.

(7) An application under subsection (2) or (3) must include a statutory declaration of consent made by the person’s spouse.

(8) An application under subsection (3) must also include—

(a) evidence of the date on which the notice referred to in subsection (3)(c) was submitted, and
(b) evidence that the civil partnership has become a marriage.
(9) If an application is made under this section, the Panel must give the applicant’s spouse—
   (a) notice of the application, and
   (b) if the Panel grants the application, notice of the issue of the full gender recognition certificate.

4D Application under section 4C: death of spouse

(1) In a case where an application is made under section 4C(2) or (3) and the applicant’s spouse dies before the application is determined—
   (a) the application is to be treated as an application, made under section 5(2) in a case where a spouse has died, for a full gender recognition certificate to be issued, and
   (b) that application is to be treated as having been made at the time when the application under section 4C was made.

(2) The Gender Recognition Panel determining the application must specify the period within which the applicant is to produce the required evidence in support of the new application.

(3) In this section—
   “new application” means the application under section 5(2) which the person is, by virtue of subsection (1), treated as having made, “required evidence” means the evidence required by section 5(4).”.

Applications by both civil partners

6 Before section 6 insert—

“5C Protected Scottish civil partnership: applications by both civil partners

(1) This section applies where a Gender Recognition Panel decides to issue a full gender recognition certificate to a party to a protected Scottish civil partnership.

(2) The Panel must not issue the full gender recognition certificate to that person unless the Panel issues a full gender recognition certificate to the other party to the protected Scottish civil partnership.

(3) In such a case, the Panel must issue both certificates on the same day.

(4) Those certificates take effect at the beginning of the day on which they are issued.

5D Protected Scottish civil partnership: power to make further provision for issue of full certificate

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order provide for the issue by a Gender Recognition Panel, on an application under section 1(1) by a qualifying person, of a full gender recognition certificate in additional circumstances to those specified in section 4(2)(c) or 5C.

(2) In subsection (1), “qualifying person” means a person who is a party to a protected Scottish civil partnership.
(3) An order under subsection (1) may include, in particular, provision about—
   (a) the evidence or other information that is to be included with an application,
   (b) the procedure to be followed in determining an application, including provision for the giving of notice to any person,
   (c) the effect of the issuing to the applicant of a full gender recognition certificate in relation to the civil partnership to which the applicant is party.

(4) Provision under subsection (3)(c) may include, in particular, provision for changing the civil partnership into a marriage.

(5) An order under subsection (1) may modify this Act or any other enactment.

(6) Before making an order under subsection (1), the Scottish Ministers must consult the Registrar General for Scotland.

Appeals etc.

In section 8 (appeals etc.)—
   (a) in subsection (1), before “5(2)” insert “4C, “,
   (b) in subsection (5), before “5(2)” insert “4C, ”,
   (c) before subsection (6) insert—
       “(5B) If an application under section 1(1), 4C, 5(2), 5A(2) or 6(1) is granted, the applicant’s spouse may apply to the Court of Session to quash the decision to grant the application on the grounds that its grant was secured by fraud.”, and
   (d) in subsection (6), before “the” in the first place where it appears insert “or an application under subsection (5B)”.

Registration

In section 10 (registration), before subsection (2) insert—
   “(1B) Where a full gender recognition certificate is issued by a Gender Recognition Panel to a person who is a party to a protected Scottish marriage or a protected Scottish civil partnership, the Panel must send a copy of the certificate to the Registrar General for Scotland.”.

In Schedule 3 (registration), in Part 2 (Scotland)—
   (a) in paragraph 14(1), after “10(1)” insert “or (1B)”,
   (b) in paragraph 19(1), before “5(2)” insert “4C,”, and
   (c) after paragraph 20 insert—
       “20A(1) The Registrar General may, with the approval of the Scottish Ministers, make regulations about—
           (a) the registration of qualifying Scottish marriages, and
           (b) the registration of qualifying Scottish civil partnerships.

   (2) In this paragraph—
“qualifying Scottish civil partnership” means a civil partnership registered in Scotland in a case where a full gender recognition certificate has been issued to each of the civil partners, “qualifying Scottish marriage” means a marriage solemnised in Scotland in a case where a full gender recognition certificate has been issued to one, or each, of the spouses.”.

Continuity of marriage

9 Before section 12 insert—

“11C Continuity of marriage: Scotland

(1) This section applies in relation to a protected Scottish marriage if (by virtue of section 4(2)(b) or 4C) a full gender recognition certificate is issued to a party to the marriage.

(2) The continuity of the protected Scottish marriage is not affected by the issuing of a full gender recognition certificate.”.

Continuity of civil partnership

10 After section 11C (inserted by paragraph 9) insert—

“11D Continuity of civil partnership: Scotland

The continuity of a protected Scottish civil partnership is not affected by the issuing of full gender recognition certificates (by virtue of section 4(2)(c)) to both civil partners.”.

Foreign gender change and marriage

11 In section 21 (foreign gender change and marriage), subsections (2) to (5) are repealed.

Consequential amendments

12 (1) In section 7(1) (applications: supplementary), before “5(2)” insert “4C,“.

(2) In section 22(2)(a) (prohibition on disclosure of information), before “5(2)” insert “4C,“.

(3) In section 24 (procedure for orders and regulations)

(a) in subsection (5)—

(i) for “A” substitute “Subject to subsection (5B), a”, and

(ii) after “section” insert “5D(1),”, and

(b) after subsection (5) insert—

“(5A) Regulations made by the Registrar General for Scotland under paragraph 20A are subject to the negative procedure.

(5B) An order under section 5D(1) which adds to, replaces or omits any part of the text of an Act is subject to the affirmative procedure.”.
Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill
[AS INTRODUCED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision for the marriage of persons of the same sex; to make further provision as to the persons who may solemnise marriage and as to marriage procedure and the places at which civil marriages may be solemnised; to make provision for the registration of civil partnerships by celebrants of religious or belief bodies; to make provision about gender change by married persons and civil partners; to make a minor correction in relation to registration information; and for connected purposes.

Introduced by: Alex Neil
On: 26 June 2013
Bill type: Government Bill
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

EXPLANATORY NOTES

(AND OTHER ACCOMPANYING DOCUMENTS)

CONTENTS

As required under Rule 9.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, the following documents are published to accompany the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013:

- Explanatory Notes;
- a Financial Memorandum;
- a Scottish Government Statement on legislative competence; and
- the Presiding Officer’s Statement on legislative competence.

A Policy Memorandum is printed separately as SP Bill 36–PM.
EXPLANATORY NOTES

INTRODUCTION

1. These Explanatory Notes have been prepared by the Scottish Executive in order to assist the reader of the Bill and to help inform debate on it. They do not form part of the Bill and have not been endorsed by the Parliament.

2. The Notes should be read in conjunction with the Bill. They are not, and are not meant to be, a comprehensive description of the Bill. So where a section or schedule, or a part of a section or schedule, does not seem to require any explanation or comment, none is given.

THE BILL

3. The draft Bill proposes a number of amendments to the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 and the Civil Partnership Act 2004. These Acts are referred to in these Explanatory Notes as “the 1977 Act” and “the 2004 Act”.

Summary and background

4. Key matters covered by the Bill are:
   • the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other;
   • putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants;
   • the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage;
   • civil partnerships changing to marriage;
   • the authorisation of Church of Scotland deacons to solemnise opposite sex marriage;
   • allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and the registrar;
   • allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships. At the moment, ceremonies to register civil partnerships can only be civil in nature (although it is possible to have a religious or belief ceremony to mark the partnership, any such ceremony would not be recognised by the state);
   • allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining the full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender.
COMMENTARY

Part 1 – Marriage

Chapter 1 – Same sex marriage

Overview

5. This Chapter makes a number of changes to marriage law. In particular, it amends the 1977 Act, in relation to the “forbidden degrees” (about people who are too closely related to each other to get married) to reflect the introduction of same sex marriage; it deals with existing references to marriage and related expressions in legislation and private documents, such as wills; and it clarifies how certain common law rules will operate in the context of a same sex marriage.

Section 1: marriage of related persons

6. This section makes a number of amendments to the 1977 Act, in relation to the “forbidden degrees”. Provision is made about the forbidden degrees in section 2 of, and Schedule 1 to, the 1977 Act. Section 2 of the 1977 Act makes various provisions about how the forbidden degrees are to operate and be interpreted. Some of these provisions refer at present to a husband and wife or make other indirect references to opposite sex marriage. Due to the introduction of same sex marriage, these provisions are amended by section 1 of the Bill so that they can apply to opposite sex and same sex marriage. Section 1(2)(c) makes provision so that “spouse” means either a wife of a husband or a husband of a wife or a same sex spouse.

7. Section 1 introduces a new Schedule 1 to the 1977 Act, replacing the current Schedule 1. Section 1(2)(d) deletes the word “former” from section 2(7) of the 1977 Act. The word “former” is not needed as the new Schedule 1 to the 1977 Act refers to “former spouse” and “spouse” is defined as outlined in paragraph 6 above. The new Schedule 1 is a simplified version of the existing table of forbidden degrees in the 1977 Act. No changes are made in respect of the types of relationships which mean that a couple cannot marry. Instead, the change relates to how the relationships are described. The table below demonstrates this:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Current table (Column 1)</th>
<th>Current table (Column 2)</th>
<th>Proposed table</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Relationships by consanguinity</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother</td>
<td>Father</td>
<td>Parent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daughter</td>
<td>Son</td>
<td>Child</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Father’s mother</td>
<td>Father’s father</td>
<td>Grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother’s mother</td>
<td>Mother’s father</td>
<td>Grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son’s daughter</td>
<td>Son’s son</td>
<td>Grandchild</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daughter’s daughter</td>
<td>Daughter’s son</td>
<td>Grandchild</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sister</td>
<td>Brother</td>
<td>Sibling</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Father’s sister</td>
<td>Father’s brother</td>
<td>Aunt or uncle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother’s sister</td>
<td>Mother’s brother</td>
<td>Aunt or uncle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Brother’s daughter</td>
<td>Brother’s son</td>
<td>Niece or nephew</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sister’s daughter</td>
<td>Sister’s son</td>
<td>Niece or nephew</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Father’s father’s mother</td>
<td>Father’s father’s father</td>
<td>Great-grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Father’s mother’s mother</td>
<td>Father’s mother’s father</td>
<td>Great-grandparent</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
These documents relate to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Current table (Column 1)</th>
<th>Current table (Column 2)</th>
<th>Proposed table</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Relationships by consanguinity</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother’s father’s mother</td>
<td>Mother’s mother’s father</td>
<td>Great-grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother’s mother’s mother</td>
<td>Mother’s mother’s father</td>
<td>Great-grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son’s son’s daughter</td>
<td>Son’s son’s son</td>
<td>Great-grandchild</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son’s daughter’s daughter</td>
<td>Son’s daughter’s son</td>
<td>Great-grandchild</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daughter’s son daughter</td>
<td>Daughter’s son’s son</td>
<td>Great-grandchild</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daughter’s daughter’s daughter</td>
<td>Daughter’s son son</td>
<td>Great-grandchild</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

| Relationships by affinity referred to in section 2(1A) | | |
| Daughter of former wife | Son of former husband | Child of former spouse |
| Daughter of former civil partner | Son of former civil partner | Child of former civil partner |
| Former wife of father | Former husband of mother | Former spouse of parent |
| Former civil partner of mother | Former civil partner of father | Former civil partner of parent |
| Former wife of father’s father | Former husband of father’s mother | Former spouse of grandparent |
| Former civil partner of mother’s mother | Former civil partner of mother’s father | Former civil partner of grandparent |
| Former wife of mother’s father | Former husband of mother’s mother | Former spouse of grandparent |
| Former civil partner of father’s mother | Former civil partner of father’s father | Former civil partner of grandparent |
| Daughter of son of former wife | Son of son of former father | Grandchild of former spouse |
| Daughter of son of former civil partner | Son of son of former civil partner | Grandchild of former civil partner |
| Daughter of daughter of former wife | Son of daughter of former husband | Grandchild of former spouse |
| Daughter of daughter of former civil partner | Son of daughter of former civil partner | Grandchild of former civil partner |

| Relationships by adoption | | |
| Adoptive mother or former adoptive mother | Adoptive father or former adoptive father | Adoptive parent or former adoptive parent |
| Adopted daughter or former adopted daughter | Adopted son or former adopted son | Adopted child or former adopted child |

Section 2: Objections to marriage

8. Section 5 of the 1977 Act currently provides for situations where there is an objection to a marriage proceeding. Section 5(4) lists the legal impediments to a marriage. These include where one or both parties are already married; where both parties are of the same sex or where one or both parties are not domiciled in Scotland and marriage would be void according to the law of the party’s domicile.
9. Section 2 of the Bill repeals the legal impediment of both parties being of the same sex, so that marriages between two people of the same sex can take place in Scotland, once the Bill is commenced.

10. Section 2 of the Bill also amends section 5(4) of the 1977 Act in relation to cases where one or both of the parties are not domiciled in Scotland.

11. The amendment makes it clear that even if a same sex marriage would be void according to the law of the domicile of one (or both) of the parties, that is not a barrier to the parties entering into a same sex marriage in Scotland.

Section 3: Preliminaries to marriage

12. This section makes some amendments to section 3 of the 1977 Act. Section 3 of the 1977 Act makes provision about the procedures a couple must go through when they want to marry. They must submit to a district registrar a notice of intention to marry, with the prescribed fee, their birth certificates and certain other documents, which are specified in section 3 of the 1977 Act.

13. Subsection (2) substitutes a new paragraph (b) in section 3(1) of the 1977 Act, to remove terms like “widow”, “widower” and “spouse”. The new paragraph instead refers to “the other party” to the marriage. Despite the change in terminology, the effect of the provision remains the same. When a marriage has ended because one of the parties has died, a person who is marrying again has to provide the death certificate of the deceased party.

14. Section 3(1) of the 1977 Act is also amended so that any person who wants to get married who has a civil partner who has died is required to submit the relevant death certificate. Section 7 of the Bill amends section 3 of the 1977 Act so that if a person who wants to get married is changing from a civil partnership to a marriage, that person must submit a relevant extract from the civil partnership register.

15. Section 3(2) of the 1977 Act makes provision in cases where someone intending to get married cannot supply his or her birth certificate or some of the other documents required by section 3(1). In essence, a person in this position has to supply the district registrar with a declaration on why the documents cannot be submitted.

16. The obligation in section 3(2) of the 1977 Act is extended by subsection (2) so that it also applies to the additional documents required as set out in paragraph 14 above. For more information on the process of changing from a civil partnership to a marriage, see the explanatory notes on sections 7 and 8.

17. Section 3(5) of the 1977 Act makes provision where one or both of the parties to the marriage is not domiciled in Scotland. Under section 3(5), such a party is required, if practicable, to submit a certificate issued by his or her home jurisdiction which confirms that there is no legal bar to him or her marrying in terms of the law of the home jurisdiction.
18. There are some exceptions in section 3(5) to the need to supply such a certificate. Subsection (2) of the Bill amends section 3(5) to provide that a certificate is not required if it would not be issued just because the parties to the marriage are of the same sex.

19. Section 7 of the 1977 Act allows a person who wants to marry outwith Scotland to apply to a district registrar in Scotland for a certificate in respect of a person’s capacity to marry. When applying, the person must submit certain documents to the registrar.

20. Subsection (3) of the Bill amends section 7(1) so it refers also to the death certificate when a civil partnership has ended by death and an extract from the entry in the civil partnership register where civil partners are changing their civil partnership to a marriage.

Section 4: Meaning of marriage and related expressions in enactments and documents

21. Section 4 makes provision on how the term “marriage” and other expressions should be interpreted in enactments (legislation) generally, the 1977 Act specifically, the common law and private documents (such as wills). The provisions of section 4 only apply to devolved legislation – legislation that is within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.

22. Subsection (1) provides that references in enactments to “marriage” and people who are or were married should be read as referring to both opposite and same sex marriage and married couples. This would, for example, apply to terms in those enactments such as “husband”, “wife”, “man and wife” and “spouse”.

23. Subsections (2) and (3) make provision in respect of references in legislation to cohabitants, so it is clear they apply to same sex cohabitants too.

24. Subsection (4) removes references in legislation to two persons of the same sex who are (or were) living together as if they are or were in a civil partnership (i.e. cohabitants). Once the Bill is enacted, such references will be unnecessary as same sex cohabitants will be covered by the references caught by the provisions made in subsections (2) and (3).

25. Subsection (5) makes it clear that subsections (1) to (4) only apply to enactments, other than private Acts, passed or made before section 4 is commenced. (As outlined below, subsection (14) makes changes to the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 in respect of future legislation). Subsection (5) also makes it clear that subsections (1) to (4) do not apply if the enactment or any other enactment provides otherwise. For example, this Bill makes separate provision in relation to the solemnisation of, on the one hand, opposite sex marriage and, on the other hand, same sex marriage. Therefore, the general provisions at subsection (1) do not apply to the legislation on solemnising marriage.

26. Subsection (6) ensures that references to being married (or having been married) in the common law are to be read as applying equally to opposite sex and same sex marriage.

27. Subsection (8) empowers the Scottish Ministers to make an Order, subject to the negative resolution procedure, to disapply or modify the effect of subsections (1) to (6).
28. For private documents which are executed after section 4 comes into force, subsection (10) provides that references in them to “marriage” or people being (or having been) married should be read as referring to both opposite and same sex marriage and married couples. This would, for example, apply to terms in private documents such as “husband”, “wife”, “man and wife” and “spouse”. Subsection (11) makes provision about the interpretation of “widow” and “widower” in any documents executed after section 4 comes into force.

29. By virtue of subsection (12), subsections (10) and (11) do not apply to documents where the document provides otherwise. Therefore, if a document executed after section 4 comes into force refers to a person being in an opposite sex marriage, subsection (10) would not enable that reference to be read as meaning a same sex marriage as well.

30. Subsection (13) adds a definition of “marriage” to the 1977 Act, referring to both opposite sex and same sex marriage. Section 26 of the 1977 Act, which contains a number of definitions, makes it clear that the definitions are to apply in the 1977 Act “except where the context otherwise requires”. An example would be the separate provisions of the 1977 Act, as amended or inserted by this Bill, on solemnising opposite sex and same sex marriage.

31. Subsection (14) adds definitions of “marriage”, “widow” and “widower” to the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010. The 2010 Act makes provision on how Acts of the Scottish Parliament and Scottish Statutory Instruments are to be interpreted. Therefore, adding a definition of “marriage” to the 2010 Act means that any references to marriage and married couples in any future Scottish Parliament legislation will cover both opposite sex and same sex marriage and spouses, unless specific provision is made so that this is not the case. The new definitions of “widow” and “widower” make it clear that in future legislation “widow” will include the female spouse of a deceased woman and “widower” the male spouse of a deceased man, unless contrary provision is made.

Section 5: Same sex marriage: further provision

32. This section makes provision relating to the introduction of same sex marriage and its effect on certain aspects of Scots law.

33. Subsection (1) makes provision in respect of the crime of reset. It is a crime to receive goods stolen by another. There is a defence to the crime where the person accused of reset is the wife, and the goods were stolen by her husband. Subsection (1) provides that any such defence does not extend to a female spouse in a same sex marriage.

34. Subsection (2) makes provision in respect of permanent and incurable impotency. In Scotland, a marriage is voidable (ie a court action may be raised to challenge and end the marriage) if one of the parties is at the time of the marriage permanently and incurably impotent in relation to the other spouse. Subsection (2) provides that this rule of law only applies to opposite sex marriages.

35. Subsection (3) amends section 1 of the Divorce (Scotland) Act 1976 (“the 1976 Act”). Under the 1976 Act, there are two grounds of divorce in Scotland:-

(a) irretrievable breakdown of the marriage;
These documents relate to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

(b) the issue, after the date of marriage, to either party of an interim gender recognition certificate under the Gender Recognition Act 2004.

36. Section 1(2) of the 1976 Act provides a number of ways in which the irretrievable breakdown of a marriage can be established. One of those ways is adultery. Adultery means in the common law sexual intercourse between a man and a woman.

37. Subsection (3) provides that “adultery” has the same meaning for the purposes of the 1976 Act for same sex marriage as it does for opposite sex marriage in that it relates to heterosexual intercourse only. This means that a spouse in a same sex marriage could, like a spouse in an opposite sex marriage, raise an action for divorce saying that the marriage has broken down irretrievably because the other spouse in the marriage has committed adultery (i.e. had sexual intercourse with a person of the opposite sex).

38. However, subsection (3) does not extend adultery to cover sexual activity between people of the same sex. Therefore, the ways of establishing irretrievable breakdown of a marriage remain unchanged. Neither an opposite sex spouse nor a same sex spouse can raise an action for divorce saying that the marriage has broken down irretrievably because the other party in the marriage has had sexual intercourse with a person of the same sex. Instead, the divorce action would have to put forward other reasons for irretrievable breakdown, such as unreasonable behaviour.

Section 6: Jurisdiction in proceedings relating to same sex marriages

39. This section introduces schedule 1 on the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts in proceedings relating to same sex marriages. This schedule is explained at paragraphs 209 to 233 of these Explanatory Notes.

Chapter 2 – Marriage between civil partners in qualifying civil partnerships

Overview

40. This Chapter relates to changing a civil partnership to a marriage and the legal effect of doing so.

Section 7: Marriage between civil partners in qualifying civil partnerships

41. Section 7 makes provision allowing civil partners, if they are in “a qualifying civil partnership”, to change their civil partnership to a marriage.

42. “A qualifying civil partnership” is defined by the amendment made by subsection (3)(b), which inserts new subsections (6) and (7) into section 3 of the 1977 Act. The definition is that to be “a qualifying civil partnership”, the civil partnership must have been registered in Scotland. In addition, the civil partnership must not have been dissolved, annulled or ended by death.

43. Subsection (3) also adds provisions to section 5 of the 1977 Act about civil partnerships registered at British consulates overseas and civil partnerships registered by British armed forces personnel.
44. Such civil partnerships are to be treated as having been registered in Scotland for the purposes of determining if they are a “qualifying civil partnership”, so long as:

(a) the parties to the civil partnership elected Scotland as the relevant part of the United Kingdom when they entered into the civil partnership; and

(b) details of the civil partnership have been sent to the Registrar General for Scotland.

45. Subsection (2) amends section 3 of the 1977 Act so that when a couple change their civil partnership to a marriage they have to provide to the district registrar an extract from the entry in the civil partnership register relating to the civil partnership.

46. Subsection (3) amends section 5(4)(b) of the 1977 Act about legal impediments to marriage. The current impediment in section 5(4)(b) is that “one of the parties is, or both are, already married or in civil partnership”. Subsection (3)(a) amends this so that being in a “qualifying civil partnership” with each other is not a legal impediment to marriage.

Section 8: Change of qualifying civil partnership into marriage

47. Section 8 makes provision so that qualifying civil partnerships can be changed to a marriage in accordance with an administrative procedure which may be prescribed by the Scottish Ministers in regulations.

48. By virtue of section 8(7), “qualifying civil partnership” in this section means a civil partnership registered in Scotland which has not been dissolved, annulled or ended by death (see section 5(6) of the 1977 Act, inserted by section 7(3) of this Bill). The definition also includes certain overseas civil partnerships treated as having been registered in Scotland (see section 5(7) of the 1977 Act, inserted by section 7(3) of this Bill).

49. Subsection (2) provides that regulations may in particular make provision on:

• the application process (subsection (2)(a));
• the information required from the applicants (subsection (2)(b));
• evidence to support the application (subsection (2)(c));
• any requirement to attend at a particular place or appear before a particular person (subsection (2)(d));
• conferring functions on persons (such as, for example, the Registrar General) (subsection (2)(e)). (Subsection (3) makes provision on particular functions which may be conferred);
• fees (subsection (2)(f));
• the effects of changing a qualifying civil partnership into a marriage (subsection (2)(g)). (Provision could be similar to the provision at section 9 of the Bill, on the effect of marriage between civil partners in a qualifying civil partnership).
50. Subsections (4) to (6) make provision on procedures in relation to any regulations made by the Scottish Ministers. Under subsection (4), the Scottish Ministers must consult the Registrar General before making any regulations. Under subsections (5) and (6), any regulations are subject to negative Parliamentary procedures unless they amend primary legislation, in which case they are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Section 9: Effect of marriage between civil partners in a qualifying civil partnership

51. This section makes provision on the effect of civil partners changing their relationship to a marriage by undergoing a marriage ceremony in accordance with the 1977 Act.

52. Subsection (1)(a) provides that the qualifying civil partnership ends when the marriage is solemnised and subsection (1)(b) that the civil partners are to be treated as having been married to each other since the date on which the qualifying civil partnership was registered.

53. Subsection (1)(a) ensures that the couple do not have two civil statuses (married and in a civil partnership) at the same time. Subsection (1)(b) ensures that their time in the civil partnership is treated as if they had been married. For example, this means that provisions in the Family Law (Scotland) Act 1985, which covers matters such as financial provision during marriage and on divorce, applies to property acquired during and for the civil partnership as well as to property acquired during and for the marriage.

54. Subsection (2) defines what is meant by “registered” for the purposes of subsection (1)(b) in relation to civil partnerships originally registered at British consulates overseas or by British armed forces personnel. Civil partnerships at consulates are treated as registered when they are entered in the Register Book. Civil partnerships through the armed forces are treated as registered when the register is signed.

55. Subsection (3) makes provision so that subsection (1)(b) is subject to any contrary provision and any order made under subsection (4). For example, provision may be needed in relation to civil partnerships which turn out be void but are changed into marriage before it is realised they are void so the marriage is not backdated to when the civil partnership first started.
In addition, there may be a need to recognise any court decrees from outwith Scotland which relate specifically to civil partnerships. The scope of any order and its Parliamentary procedure are set out in subsection (5).

56. Subsection (6) provides that any decree of aliment requiring one civil partner to make payments to the other which is in force when a civil partnership ends because it has been changed into a marriage continues to have effect. This ensures that any reference in the decree to the civil partnership does not stop the decree from continuing to have effect.

57. Subsection (7) provides that orders under section 103(3) or (4) of the 2004 Act, which relate to the regulation by the court of rights of occupancy of the family home, which were in force during the civil partnership continue to have effect once the couple are married.

58. Subsection (8) makes consequential amendments to section 1 of the 2004 Act, which contains provision on the circumstances in which a civil partnership ends.
Chapter 3 – Solemnisation of marriage

Overview

59. This Chapter makes provision on who may be authorised to solemnise marriage in Scotland.

60. Currently, for opposite sex marriage, Church of Scotland ministers are authorised by way of the Church of Scotland being named specifically in section 8 of the 1977 Act. Other religious bodies are prescribed by Statutory Instrument so that their celebrants are authorised to solemnise marriage. Other religious bodies can nominate persons to be registered by the Registrar General for Scotland as celebrants under section 9 of the 1977 Act. And the Registrar General may grant temporary authorisation to individuals to solemnise a marriage or marriages under section 12 of the 1977 Act.

61. In addition, civil registrars are authorised to solemnise marriage.

62. The Bill retains this system but makes provision for belief bodies to be authorised as well.

Section 10: Persons who may solemnise marriage

63. Section 10 of the Bill makes amendments for several different purposes.

64. Firstly, section 8 of the 1977 Act makes provision on who is authorised to solemnise marriage. This is amended so its current provisions apply to authorisations for opposite sex marriage only.

65. Secondly, section 10 of the Bill amends section 8 of the 1977 Act to allow celebrants from belief bodies to be authorised to solemnise marriages. Subsection (4) amends the existing definition of “religious body” in section 26 of the 1977 Act so that it covers belief bodies as well. The relevant aspects of the amended definition in relation to belief bodies are “an organised group of people …the principal object (or one of the principal objects) of which is to uphold or promote philosophical beliefs and which meets regularly for that purpose.”

66. Religious bodies can be prescribed under section 8 of the 1977 Act. The section is amended so that religious or belief bodies can be prescribed under this section. The effect of prescribing religious or belief bodies is that their celebrants and other persons recognised by them as entitled to solemnise opposite sex marriage can solemnise opposite sex marriages recognised by the state.

67. Thirdly, the new section 8(1A) of the 1977 Act, inserted by subsection (2)(b), provides that the Scottish Ministers may only prescribe a religious or belief body so that its celebrants are authorised to solemnise opposite sex marriage if the body requests this and if Ministers are satisfied that the body meets the “qualifying requirements”. Qualifying requirements are those set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers. These regulations are subject to the negative parliamentary procedure (new section 8(1G) refers).
68. Fourthly, section 10 of the Bill adds a number of provisions to section 8 of the 1977 Act to allow celebrants (of religious and belief bodies) to be authorised to solemnise same sex marriage. The new section 8(1B) of the 1977 Act, inserted by subsection (2)(b), provides who may solemnise a same sex marriage. The new section 8(1C) provides that the Scottish Ministers may only prescribe a religious or belief body so that its celebrants are authorised to solemnise same sex marriage if the body requests this and if Ministers are satisfied that the body meets the “qualifying requirements”.

69. Fifthly, the new section 8(1D) provides that nothing in subsection (1B) or (1C):
   (a) imposes a duty on any religious or belief body to request (under section 8(1C)(a)) to be prescribed so that their celebrants can solemnise same sex marriage;
   (b) imposes a duty on any religious or belief body to nominate members under section 9 of the 1977 Act to be empowered to solemnise same sex marriage;
   (c) imposes a duty on any person to apply for temporary authorisation under section 12 to solemnise same sex marriage;
   (d) imposes a duty on a celebrant approved to solemnise same sex marriages to solemnise such marriages.

Section 11: Registration of nominated persons as celebrants

70. Section 11 makes a number of amendments to section 9 of the 1977 Act, which relates to the registration of nominated persons as celebrants. Section 9 of the 1977 Act permits the authorisation of celebrants of bodies who have not been prescribed by regulations or are not, in the case of opposite sex marriage, the Church of Scotland.

71. Subsection (2)(a) amends section 9(1) of the 1977 Act so that it just relates to opposite sex marriages. This means that section 9(1) as amended provides that a religious or belief body, other than the Church of Scotland or a body prescribed by regulations to solemnise opposite sex marriage, may nominate to the Registrar General members so that they can solemnise opposite sex marriages.

72. Subsection (2)(b) to (l) then inserts new subsections into section 9 of the 1977 Act. The new section 9(1A), inserted by subsection (2)(b), provides that a religious or belief body who has not been prescribed by regulations to solemnise same sex marriage may nominate celebrants to the Registrar General so that they can be authorised to solemnise same sex marriage.

73. A number of amendments are made to section 9 of the 1977 Act, which provides for when the Registrar General must reject a nomination; what happens when a nomination is accepted; the register of authorised celebrants and their bodies; and for appeals. The amendments are made because of the introduction of same sex marriage and the authorisation of belief bodies and their celebrants.

74. Under section 9(2) of the 1977 Act, the Registrar General must reject a nomination on various grounds including if he or she considers the nominating body has sufficient celebrants to meet its needs. The amendment in subsection (2)(c) amends the grounds to reflect the changes made to subsection (1) and the new subsection (1A). The amendments reflect that bodies may have different needs in relation to celebrants solemnising same sex marriage when compared with opposite sex marriage.
These documents relate to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

75. A new ground of not meeting the qualifying requirements is added to section 9(2)(e) by subsection (2)(d) to the circumstances in which the Registrar General must reject a nomination.

76. Section 9(3) of the 1977 Act sets out the declarations which must be included in a marriage ceremony to ensure it is of an appropriate form. Subsection (2)(f) amends the provision so that the current provision applies to opposite sex marriage only and subsection (2)(g) inserts provisions about the declarations for same sex ceremonies.

77. Subsection (2)(h) makes amendments to section 9(4) of the 1977 Act, which deals with cases where the Registrar General accepts the nomination. The Registrar General must currently decide how long the period of authorisation for the nominee should be, and may decide which area the nominee may solemnise marriages in. The amendments give the Registrar General the power to restrict any nominee to solemnising marriages in specific places.

78. Subsections (3), (4) and (5) make several amendments to sections 10, 14 and 24 of the 1977 Act. Section 10 makes provision about when a celebrant’s name may be removed from the register of bodies and celebrants who are authorised to solemnise marriage. Section 14 is about the form of ceremony to be used by a celebrant. Section 24 is about offences under the 1977 Act.

79. The amendments made by subsections (3), (4) and (5) are consequential, as a result of changes made to other provisions of the 1977 Act about authorisation of belief bodies; maintaining separate registers for same sex and opposite sex marriages; creating separate declarations for same sex and opposite sex marriage ceremonies; and enabling the Registrar General to authorise a nominee celebrant for a particular place only.

Section 12: Temporary authorisation of celebrants

80. Section 12 of the 1977 Act allows the Registrar General to grant temporary authorisation to solemnise marriage to a person.

81. Subsection (2)(a) amends the Registrar General’s power to clarify that he or she may grant temporary authorisations only to members of religious or belief bodies.

82. Subsection (2)(b) inserts new subsections into section 12 of the 1977 Act to provide that the Registrar General may grant an authorisation only if the religious or belief body meets the “qualifying requirements”. The “qualifying requirements” are those set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers (new section 12(1D)). These regulations are subject to the negative parliamentary procedure (new section 12(1F)).

83. Under section 12(1B), as inserted, temporary authorisation may be granted for opposite sex marriage only, for same sex marriage only or for both.
84. Under section 12(1C), as inserted, the Registrar General can only grant a temporary authorisation under section 12(1)(b) to solemnise same sex marriages if the relevant religious or belief body is prescribed by regulations so that its celebrants can solemnise same sex marriage or has put forward persons to be nominated as celebrants to solemnise same sex marriage.

85. Subsection (3) clarifies the existing offence under section 24(2)(c) of the 1977 Act of solemnising a marriage not covered by a temporary authorisation. The amendments made by subsection (3) have the effect that it is an offence to solemnise a marriage:

(a) where not specified in a temporary authorisation;
(b) where outwith the period of the temporary authorisation;
(c) otherwise than in accordance with any terms and conditions in the temporary authorisation.

Section 13: Religious or belief marriage: further provision

86. Sections 10, 11 and 12 of this Bill make provision for celebrants of belief bodies to solemnise marriage. Section 13 makes a number of consequential amendments to sections 6, 11, 13, 14 and 15 of the 1977 Act, as a result of these provisions, to reflect the authorisation of belief bodies and their celebrants.

Chapter 4 – Same sex marriage: protection of freedom of expression etc.

Section 14: Same sex marriage: protection of freedom of expression etc.

87. This section provides that the introduction of same sex marriage does not affect:

(a) the exercise of rights of anyone to freedom of thought, conscience, religion and freedom of expression which have been conferred by the European Convention of Human Rights; and
(b) the exercise of any equivalent rights conferred on anyone by the common law.

Chapter 5 – Other changes to marriage procedure

Overview

88. This Chapter makes a variety of changes to marriage law.

89. These include the introduction of powers for district registrars to require evidence of nationality from people wishing to get married; provisions on the timing of the issue of the marriage schedule; providing information to the district registrar on the ending of any civil partnership when a person is marrying outwith Scotland and is seeking a certificate about his or her legal capacity to do so; the automatic authorisation of Church of Scotland deacons to marry opposite sex couples and allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere agreed by the couple and the registrar, other than religious premises.

Section 15: Power of district registrar to require evidence of nationality: marriage 90. This section makes amendments to sections 3 and 7 of the 1977 Act.

91. Section 3 of the 1977 Act makes provision on documents which people wishing to enter into an opposite sex or same sex marriage have to supply to the district registrar.

92. Subsection (2) adds new subsections to section 3 of the 1977 Act so that a district registrar may require “specified nationality evidence” in relation to the intended parties to a marriage. Guidance can be issued by the Registrar General about what evidence is required.

93. Subsection (3) amends section 7 of the 1977 Act. This amendment means that where a person wants to marry outwith Scotland and seeks a certificate about legal capacity from the district registrar, that person may be required to provide evidence of nationality.

Section 16: The Marriage Schedule

94. This section amends the 1977 Act in relation to the power to prescribe the form of the marriage schedule and makes a number of changes to how quickly the marriage schedule and a certificate of no impediment should be issued after notice of intention to marry has been submitted by the parties to an intended marriage.

95. Subsection (2) amends section 6 of the 1977 Act so that regulations prescribing the form of the marriage schedule may make different provision for different cases or circumstances. This would, for example, allow the marriage schedule to take one form for opposite sex marriage and another for same sex marriage.

96. Section 6(4)(a) of the 1977 Act provides that a district registrar shall not issue a marriage schedule within 14 days of receiving a marriage notice. A schedule may be issued earlier, on a specified date, where there is a written request and the Registrar General authorises the registrar to issue the schedule on the specified date. The amendment at subsection (2)(b) changes the 14 day period to 28 days.

97. Section 7 of the 1977 Act relates to the issue of a certificate of no impediment to marry where a person residing in Scotland intends to marry outwith Scotland. Section 7(2) currently provides that the certificate shall not be issued earlier than 14 days after receiving the marriage notice. The amendment at subsection (3) changes the 14 day period to 28 days.

98. Section 19 of the 1977 Act provides that an authorised registrar shall not solemnise a marriage within 14 days of receiving a marriage notice. The amendment at subsection (4) changes this period to 28 days. An exception in section 19(1) allows the marriage to be solemnised earlier, on a specified date, where there is a written request and the Registrar General authorises the registrar to solemnise the marriage on the specified date.

Section 17: Marriage outside Scotland: evidence of dissolution of former civil partnership

99. This section amends section 7 of the 1977 Act. The effect of the amendment is that where a person wants to marry outwith Scotland and seeks a certificate about his or her legal capacity from the district registrar the person must provide a copy of the decree of dissolution or annulment of any civil partnership which the person has previously been in.
Section 18: Religious marriages: solemnisation by Church of Scotland deacons

100. This section amends the provisions of section 8(1)(a)(i) of the 1977 Act about automatic authorisation of ministers of the Church of Scotland in respect of opposite sex marriage. The effect is that Church of Scotland deacons, like Church of Scotland ministers, are automatically authorised to solemnise opposite sex marriage.

Section 19: Places at which civil marriages may be solemnised

101. This section makes amendments, principally to section 18 of the 1977 Act, so that civil marriage ceremonies can take place anywhere, other than in religious premises, agreed by the couple and the registrar, rather than at “approved places” (places approved by the local authority). This section applies to both opposite sex and same sex marriages. The section provides definitions for “appropriate place”, “local registration authority” and “religious premises”.

102. Specifically, these amendments mean that a civil marriage ceremony can take place in either:

- the registration office of the authorised registrar; or
- at an appropriate place in the registration district of the authorised registrar; or
- with the approval of the Registrar General, at the registration office of another authorised registrar; or
- with the approval of the Registrar General, at an appropriate place in the registration district of another authorised registrar; or
- with the approval of the Registrar General, at an appropriate place in Scottish waters.

103. As a result of the above, some amendments are necessary to the 1977 Act to section 19, on the marriage ceremony and registration, and section 26, on interpretation and definitions, where those provisions refer to the place where a marriage has taken place. Those amendments are made in subsections (4) and (5).

Section 20: Second marriage ceremony: form of endorsement

104. This is a minor amendment to section 20 of the 1977 Act. This makes provision for a couple to go through a second marriage ceremony in Scotland if they have already married outwith the United Kingdom but there is some doubt about the validity of the overseas ceremony. The second marriage ceremony in Scotland must be civil in nature.

105. Section 20 of the 1977 Act prescribes some forms. At the moment, section 20 provides that the year in these forms should start with the figures “19”. This reflects the twentieth century and is no longer appropriate. As a result, the amendment repeals the figures “19”.
Chapter 6 – Sheriff court jurisdiction in relation to declarator of marriage

Section 21: Sheriff court jurisdiction in relation to declarator of marriage

106. A declarator of marriage is a court judgment that a valid marriage exists, or existed, between two parties.

108. The amendments made by section 21 of the Bill to the 1973 Act only relate to opposite sex marriage. Paragraph 1(2) of schedule 1 to this Bill disapplies section 8 (and section 7) of the 1973 Act in relation to same sex marriage. Schedule 1 to the Bill makes provision on the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts in relation to same sex matrimonial court actions, including declarators of marriage.

109. By virtue of the amendments made by section 21(2), the sheriff court has jurisdiction in declarator of marriage cases when either party to the marriage (a) is domiciled in Scotland when the action is raised or (b) was habitually resident in Scotland for a year before the action is raised or (c) died before the date when the action is raised and at death was domiciled in Scotland or had been habitually resident in Scotland for a year. In addition, either party to the marriage must have been:

- resident in the sheriffdom for a period of 40 days before the court action is raised; or
- resident in the sheriffdom for at least 40 days ending not more than 40 days before the court action is raised and with no known residence in Scotland when the action is raised.

Part 2 – Civil partnership

Overview

110. This Part of the Bill amends legislation in respect of civil partnerships. Currently, only registrars can register civil partnerships. It is possible to have a religious or belief ceremony in relation to the civil partnership but any such ceremony has no legal significance. The Bill amends legislation so that, in future, it will be possible to have a religious or belief ceremony to register the partnership. Civil ceremonies will also remain available.

111. Many of the provisions in this Bill in relation to the authorisation of religious or belief celebrants to register civil partnerships, and on ceremonies, mirror provisions in the 1977 Act, on the solemnisation of marriage.

Section 22: Registration of civil partnership

112. Subsection (2) amends section 85 of the 2004 Act, to reflect the introduction of religious and belief celebrants to register civil partnerships. Section 85 makes provision on when two people are to be regarded as having registered as civil partners of each other and provides that both must sign the civil partnership schedule (“the schedule”).

17
113. Currently, one of the persons who must be present when the schedule is signed is the authorised registrar. The amendment made by subsection 2(a) changes this so that it may be signed in the presence of the approved celebrant or the authorised registrar. Once the couple have signed the schedule, it must also be signed by the witnesses and the person carrying out the ceremony. The amendment at subsection (2)(b) means that either the approved celebrant or the authorised registrar have to sign the schedule.

114. The amendment at subsection 2(a) also removes a reference to where the civil partnership may take place.

115. Subsection (3) makes a number of changes relating to the table of forbidden degrees. This is about people who are too closely related to each other to form a civil partnership. The opportunity has been taken to simplify the table of forbidden degrees. Subsection (22), explained below, substitutes a new Schedule 10 to the 2004 Act.

116. The amendment at subsection (3)(d) amends section 86(5) of the 2004 Act. Section 86(5) provides at the moment, in respect of people who have acquired a new gender, that references in the forbidden degrees to “former wife” includes “former husband” and references to “former husband” includes “former wife”.

117. The amendment at subsection (3)(d)(i) amends section 86(5) so that it refers to the definition of “spouse” (husband and wife) as added by subsection (3)(c). The amendment at subsection 3(d)(ii) removes the word “former” from section 86(5). The word “former” is not needed in section 86(5) as the new Schedule 10 to the 2004 Act refers to “former spouse” and “spouse” is defined by the amendment at subsection (3)(c).

118. The amendment at subsection (3)(e) reflects the simplification of the table of forbidden degrees. The simplified table now refers to “parent” to cover both mothers and fathers: the amendment as subsection (3)(e)(i) reflects that drafting change. Subsection (3)(e)(ii) deletes a reference to “in either column” as the simplified table of forbidden degrees just has one column.

119. The amendment at subsection (5) provides a definition of “district registrar” for the purposes of section 88 of the 2004 Act. Section 88 makes provision on information which intended civil partners must submit to the district registrar. The definition added at subsection (5) includes provision to cover cases where the civil partnership is to be registered in Scottish waters by an approved religious or belief celebrant.

120. The amendment at subsection (6) provides a definition of “district registrar” for the purposes of certain sections in the 2004 Act: section 89 itself (civil partnership notice book), section 90 (publicisation), section 91 (early registration), section 92 (objections to registration) and section 94 (the civil partnership schedule).

121. This definition is the same as the definition provided for section 88 except that where the civil partnership is to be registered in Scottish waters by an approved religious or belief celebrant, the district registrar is defined as the district registrar to whom the civil partnership notices were submitted (under section 88).
122. Subsection (7) amends section 90 of the 2004 Act. When publicising information about a forthcoming civil partnership, the district registrar and the Registrar General must provide the date when it is intended to register the civil partnership. Currently, this date must be more than 14 days after publicising the information: the amendment makes this 28 days.

123. Section 91 of the 2004 Act allows for early registration of a civil partnership. Subsection (8) amends a reference in section 91 from an authorised registrar to district registrar. A definition of “the district registrar” is inserted into the 2004 Act by subsection (5). Subsection (8) also changes the 14 day period in section 91 to 28 days, in line with the change made by subsection (7).

124. Subsection (8)(c) also amends section 91 so that it is clear that a request for early registration can be made electronically. The amendment creates an equivalent provision to section 6 of the 1977 Act.

125. Subsection (9) makes a number of amendments to section 92 of the 2004 Act, on objections to the proposed registration of a civil partnership.

126. The amendment at subsection (9)(a) makes it clear that the office where any person claiming to have reason to object to a proposed civil partnership can inspect the relevant entry in the civil partnership book is the office of the district registrar (as defined).

127. The amendment at subsection (9)(b)(i) is a consequential amendment required for the substantive amendment at subsection (9)(b)(ii). This amendment relates to a case where the district registrar has received an objection to a civil partnership which is more significant than just a misdescription or inaccuracy in a notice.

128. The new provision requires the district registrar, if the civil partnership schedule has already been issued and the civil partnership is to be registered by an approved religious or belief celebrant, to notify, if possible, the celebrant of the objection and advise the celebrant not to register the civil partnership pending consideration of the objection. This is on similar lines to equivalent provision in section 5 of the 1977 Act, on objections to marriage.

129. The amendment at subsection (9)(c) reflects that registration of civil partnerships in future may be through a religious or belief celebrant.

130. Currently, section 92(5)(a) of the 2004 Act provides that if the Registrar General is satisfied, after considering an objection, that there is a legal impediment to registering a civil partnership, the Registrar General has to direct the district registrar not to register the intended civil partners and to notify them accordingly. The amendment at subsection (9)(c) amends this so that the Registrar General, once satisfied that there is a legal impediment to registering a civil partnership has “to take all reasonable steps to ensure that the registration of the civil partnership does not take place and must notify, or direct the district registrar to notify, the intended civil partners”.

19
131. Subsection (10) amends section 93 of the 2004 Act so that it only covers cases where the civil partnership is being registered through a civil ceremony.

132. Subsection (10)(a)(ii) makes provision on where a civil ceremony may take place. It may take place at:
- the registration office of the authorised registrar;
- an appropriate place in the registration district of the authorised registrar (“appropriate place” is defined through the next set of amendments);
- with the approval of the Registrar General, the registration office of another authorised registrar;
- with the approval of the Registrar General, an appropriate place in the registration district of another authorised registrar; or
- an appropriate place in Scottish Waters.

133. Subsection (10)(b) provides definitions of “appropriate place”, “local registration authority” and “religious premises”. “Appropriate place” excludes “religious premises” which ensures that civil ceremonies to register civil partnerships cannot take place in religious premises. Similar definitions are inserted into the 1977 Act in relation to marriage by section 19 of this Bill.

134. Subsection (10)(c) repeals sections 93(2) and (3) of the 2004 Act. These are now unnecessary. Section 93(2) made provision on civil partnerships taking place outwith the authorised registrar’s district. This is now covered by the provision outlined above on where a civil ceremony may take place.

135. Section 93(3) of the 2004 Act made provision which banned civil partnerships from taking place in religious premises. The ban on civil ceremonies to register civil partnerships taking place in religious premises remains in place, as outlined above. Subsequent provision is made to establish religious and belief ceremonies to register civil partnerships. Such ceremonies may take place in religious premises.

136. Subsection (11) adds section 93A to the 2004 Act, on the date and place of religious or belief registration of civil partnerships. The procedures outlined in section 93A are in line with procedures contained in section 6 of the 1977 Act, in relation to the solemnisation of marriage.

137. Under section 93A the civil partnership should be registered on the date and at the place specified in the schedule. If this cannot be done and a new date or place is fixed, the district registrar must issue a new schedule or amend the existing one or direct the religious or belief celebrant to amend it.

138. However, special procedures apply if the new date for registration is more than 3 months after the date specified in the original schedule or if the new place for registration is in a different registration district or is in Scottish waters instead of a registration district or is in a registration district instead of Scottish waters.
139. In these cases, the Registrar General may:

- direct the district registrar to issue a new schedule;
- direct the district registrar to amend the existing schedule or direct the religious or belief celebrant to amend it; or
- direct the intended civil partners to send the district registrar a new notice of proposed civil partnership.

140. Subsection (12) amends section 94 of the 2004 Act which concerns the schedule. These amendments reflect the introduction of religious and belief ceremonies to register civil partnerships and changes made to sections 90 and 91 by subsections (7) and (8) about the minimum time period between publicising a civil partnership and it taking place.

141. The amendment at subsection (12)(c) provides that where the civil partnership is to be registered by an approved religious or belief celebrant, the district registrar must issue the completed schedule to one or both of the intended civil partners. The district registrar must not issue the schedule more than seven days before the intended civil partnership, unless authorised to do so by the Registrar General. This provision is on similar lines to section 6(4)(b) of the 1977 Act, in relation to the marriage schedule.

142. Subsection (13) adds sections 94A, 94B, 94C, 94D and 94E to the 2004 Act. These provisions relate to who can register a civil partnership, including religious and belief celebrants, and are based on equivalent provisions in the 1977 Act, on who can solemnise marriage.

143. Section 94A makes provision on who can register civil partnerships.

144. Under section 94A(1), a civil partnership may be registered only by a person who is:

- a celebrant of a religious or belief body prescribed by regulations or, not being a celebrant, is recognised by the body as entitled to register civil partnerships;
- registered as a celebrant under section 94B of the 2004 Act;
- temporarily authorised as a celebrant under section 94E;
- a registrar.

145. Section 94A(2) provides that Ministers may only prescribe a religious or belief body if the body requests them to do so and Ministers are satisfied that the body meets the “qualifying requirements”. The “qualifying requirements” are set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers (see section 94A(5)). These regulations are subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament (i.e. the negative procedure) by virtue of amendments made by subsection (20).

146. Section 94A(3) makes it clear that nothing in section 94A imposes a duty:

- on any religious or belief body to request to be prescribed;
These documents relate to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

- on any such body to nominate members under section 94B to nominate members to register civil partnerships;
- on any person to apply for temporary authorisation under section 94E to register civil partnerships;
- on any approved celebrant for civil partnerships to register civil partnerships.

147. Section 94B(1) provides that a religious or belief body who has not been prescribed under the regulations may nominate members to the Registrar General so that they can register civil partnerships.

148. Section 94B(2) provides that the Registrar General must reject a nomination if the Registrar General considers that the nominating body is not a religious or belief body; or it already has sufficient members registered to meet its need; or it does not meet the “qualifying requirements” set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers; or the nominee is not a fit and proper person. These regulations are subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Parliament (i.e. negative parliamentary procedure) (section 22(20) of the Bill refers).

149. When the Registrar General accepts a nomination, the Registrar General must, under section 94B(4)(a), determine the period during which the nominee can register civil partnerships. This period must not be more than 3 years but section 94B(5) makes it clear that the nominee may be put forward for a further period.

150. Section 94B(4)(b) allows the Registrar General to restrict the nominee to registering civil partnerships in specific areas or places. Section 94B(4)(c) allows the Registrar General to impose such other conditions as the Registrar General thinks fit.

151. When a nomination has been accepted, section 94B(6)(a) provides that the Registrar General must advise the body and the nominee accordingly, specifying the period during which the nominee can register civil partnerships and any conditions which have been imposed.

152. The Registrar General also has to enter the name of the body, the nominee and any other relevant particulars into a register open for public inspection at all reasonable times free of charge.

153. When a nomination is rejected, section 94B(6)(b) provides that the Registrar General must inform the nominating body in writing, giving reasons. Section 94B(7) makes it clear that this may be done electronically. Section 94B(8) gives the nominating body 28 days to appeal to the Scottish Ministers against a rejection.

154. Section 94B(9) provides that on any such appeal the Scottish Ministers may confirm the rejection or direct the Registrar General to accept the nomination. Ministers have to inform the nominating body of their decision and give the reasons for the decision.

155. Section 94B (9) and (10) provides that the Scottish Ministers’ decision is final except that if the reason given by Ministers for confirming the rejection of a nomination is that the nominating body is not a religious or belief body, the body may appeal to the Court of Session, within 42 days of receiving the Ministers’ decision.

156. The appeal can seek the determination of the court that the body is a religious or belief body. Under section 94B(11), if the court determines that the body is a religious or belief body and that the only reason given by Ministers for confirming the rejection was that the body was not a religious or belief body, the Registrar General must then accept the nomination.

157. Section 94C of the 2004 Act makes provision on the removal from the register of a celebrant registered under section 94B. As well as provisions relating to the removal of a celebrant from the register, and on the procedures for doing so, provision is also made for appeals to the Scottish Ministers against decisions made by the Registrar General.

158. Section 94C(1) provides that the Registrar General may remove a person’s name from the register when:
   - the person has asked to be removed;
   - the body which nominated the person no longer wants the person to be registered;
   - the person, while registered as an approved celebrant, has been convicted of an offence under this Part of the Bill;
   - the person has, for the purpose of profit or gain, been carrying on a business of registering civil partnerships;
   - the person is not a fit and proper person to register civil partnerships;
   - the person, for any other reason, should not be on the register.

159. Section 94C(2) to (7) makes provision on removals from the register on the grounds outlined in section 94(C)(1). The Registrar General must give the person at least 21 days’ notice of the intention to remove him or her from the register (subsection (2); must specify the ground of removal; must ask the person to give reasons why he or she should not be removed; and must consider any representations made. Where a person’s name has been removed from the register, the person may then appeal to the Scottish Ministers within 28 days of receiving notice of the removal. After a notice is given under subsection (2), the person must not register a civil partnership until he or she is restored to the register or the Registrar General decides not to remove him or her from the register.

160. Section 94D makes provisions on alterations to the register of approved nominated celebrants maintained under section 94B. Provision is made that the body must notify the Registrar General when any of the events listed in section 94D occur and the Registrar General must then alter the register accordingly. The events in section 94D are:
   - changes to the name or address of the religious or belief body;
   - amalgamation of the religious or belief body;
   - death of an approved celebrant;
   - any change of name, address or designation of an approved celebrant;
• the cessation of an approved celebrant from exercising the relevant functions.

161. Section 94E makes provision on the temporary authorisation of religious or belief celebrants to register civil partnerships. Under section 94E(1), the Registrar General may grant any member of a religious or belief body temporary written authorisation to register a specific civil partnership or partnerships or to register civil partnerships during a specific period. This authorisation may contain terms and conditions. Section 94E(5) makes it clear that the authorisation can be issued electronically.

162. However, the Registrar General may only grant such temporary written authorisation when the religious or belief body of which the person is a member must meet the “qualifying requirements” (section 94E(2)). The “qualifying requirements” are defined at section 94E(4) as “such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers”. In addition, authorisation under section 94E(1)(b), which relates to authorisation for a period of time, may only be granted if the religious or belief body of which the person is a member is prescribed by regulations made under section 94A, so that its celebrants are authorised to register civil partnerships, or has nominated persons under section 94B to register civil partnerships (Section 94E(3)). The above regulations are subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Parliament (i.e. negative parliamentary procedure) (section 22(20) of the Bill refers).

163. Subsection (14) amends section 95 of the 2004 Act, on further provision as to the registration of civil partnerships including in relation to the schedule.

164. The amendment at subsection (14)(a) reflects that with the introduction of religious or belief ceremonies, it may be an approved celebrant, rather than a registrar, who asks the intended civil partners to confirm that, to the best of their knowledge, the particulars set out in the schedule are correct.

165. The amendment at subsection (14)(b) inserts a new subsection into section 95 of the 2004 Act. This provision requires civil partners who have had a religious or belief ceremony to ensure that the signed schedule is delivered to the district registrar within 3 days. (This is in line with section 15(2) of the 1977 Act, on delivering the signed marriage schedule to the district registrar).

166. The new section 95(3A) of the 2004 Act provides that the district registrar must not enter the particulars set out in the schedule for a religious or belief civil partnership in the register, unless and until the district registrar receives a duly signed schedule.

167. The new section 95(3B) empowers the Registrar General to take steps if satisfied that a civil partnership has been properly registered and the schedule has been signed but then lost or destroyed. In these cases, the Registrar General may direct the district registrar to complete an exact copy of the schedule and, so far as practicable, arrange for it be signed again by those who signed the original schedule. The new section 95(3C) provides that once the copy schedule has been signed, the district registrar must arrange for its particulars to be entered into the register.
168. Subsection (15) adds section 95ZA to the 2004 Act, on registrar’s power to require delivery of civil partnership schedule. This new provision is in line with section 16 of the 1977 Act, on a registrar’s power to require delivery of marriage schedule.

169. Under the new provision, if the district registrar does not receive the schedule within 21 days from the date of registration, the district registrar may serve a notice in the prescribed form on either of the civil partners requiring that the schedule be delivered or sent through the post to the registrar within 8 days. If this notice is not complied with, the district registrar may serve a second notice in the prescribed form requiring the person to attend personally at the registration office within 8 days in order to deliver the schedule. Failure to comply with this second notice is a criminal offence (the offence is added by subsection (19)). Section 126 of the 2004 Act means that regulations prescribing forms under section 95ZA are subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament (i.e. negative procedure).

170. Subsection (17) relates to section 96, on civil partnership with former spouse. This follows a divorce on the grounds of an interim gender recognition certificate.

171. The amendment at (a) is a consequential change, reflecting the amendments to section 91 made by subsection (8), and the amendment at (b) is also a consequential change, reflecting the amendments made to section 94 by subsection (12). (The amendments made by subsection (12) are explained at paragraphs 140 and 141).

172. The amendments at subsection (18) relates to section 97 of the 2004 Act, on the issue of a certificate of no impediment where two people propose to enter into a civil partnership in England and Wales but one of them resides in Scotland. The first amendment changes the period in which the certificate should normally be issued from no earlier than 14 days to no earlier than 28 days. Section 97(5) of the 2004 Act makes provisions for objections in writing to the district registrar against the issue of a certificate. The second amendment makes it clear that any such objection may be submitted electronically.

173. Subsection (19) makes provision in respect of criminal offences and does so by amending section 100 of the 2004 Act.

174. The amendment at (a)(i) extends three offences which currently only apply to authorised registrars (or persons pretending to be authorised registrars) to approved celebrants (or persons pretending to be approved celebrants).

175. Following the amendments, the offences now relates to a person who knowingly:

- “being an approved celebrant or, as the case may be, an authorised registrar, purports to register two people as civil partners of each other before any civil partnership schedule available to him at the time of registration has been duly completed”;
- “not being an approved celebrant or, as the case may be, an authorised registrar, conducts himself in such a way as to lead intended civil partners to believe that he is authorised to register them as civil partners of each other ”;
• “being an approved celebrant or, as the case may be, an authorised registrar, purports to register two people as civil partners of each other without both of them being present”.

176. The amendment at (a)(ii) reflects changes to section 93 on place of civil registration of civil partnerships.

177. The amendments at (b) relate to new offences created as a result of the introduction of religious and belief ceremonies and to the penalty when found guilty of one of these new offences. The penalty on summary conviction is a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

178. The offences created by (b) are:
• an approved celebrant registering a civil partnership in an area or place where the celebrant is not permitted to register a civil partnership;
• an approved celebrant registering a civil partnership after a notice has been served by the Registrar General indicating that the Registrar General intends to remove the person’s name from the register;
• a celebrant approved on a temporary basis registering a civil partnership not specified in the authorisation;
• a celebrant approved on a temporary basis registering a civil partnership outwith the period specified in the authorisation;
• a celebrant approved on a temporary basis registering a civil partnership contrary to any terms and conditions specified in the authorisation;
• a party to a civil partnership failing to comply with a second notice from the district registrar, requiring the party to appear personally at the registration office to deliver the schedule.

179. The amendment at (c) is a consequential amendment to section 100(4) of the 2004 Act, reflecting the new offences created by (b). Section 100(4) provides that summary proceedings for an offence under section 100 may be commenced within 3 months after sufficient evidence comes to the Lord Advocate’s knowledge or within 12 months after the offence is committed (whichever period last expires).

180. Subsection (20) provides that the new powers to make regulations in respect of prescribing religious or belief bodies whose celebrants are authorised to register civil partnerships on the “qualifying requirements” (for religious and belief bodies to meet) are subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Parliament (i.e. the negative procedure).

181. Subsection (21) adds definitions to Part 3 of the 2004 Act relating to civil partnerships in Scotland.

182. Subsection (22) introduces a new Schedule 10 to the 2004 Act, replacing the current Schedule. The new Schedule 10 is a simplified version of the existing table of forbidden degrees. No changes are made in respect of the types of relationships which mean that a couple cannot enter into a civil partnership. Instead, the change relates to how the relationships are described. The table below demonstrates this:

Table of forbidden degrees

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Current table (Column 1)</th>
<th>Current table (Column 2)</th>
<th>Proposed table</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Relationships by consanguinity</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Father</td>
<td>Mother</td>
<td>Parent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son</td>
<td>Daughter</td>
<td>Child</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Father’s father</td>
<td>Father’s mother</td>
<td>Grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother’s father</td>
<td>Mother’s mother</td>
<td>Grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son’s son</td>
<td>Son’s daughter</td>
<td>Grandchild</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daughter’s son</td>
<td>Daughter’s daughter</td>
<td>Grandchild</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Brother</td>
<td>Sister</td>
<td>Sibling</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Father’s brother</td>
<td>Father’s sister</td>
<td>Aunt or uncle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother’s brother</td>
<td>Mother’s sister</td>
<td>Aunt or uncle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Brother’s son</td>
<td>Brother’s daughter</td>
<td>Niece or nephew</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sister’s son</td>
<td>Sister’s daughter</td>
<td>Niece or nephew</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Father’s father’s father</td>
<td>Father’s father’s mother</td>
<td>Great-grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Father’s mother’s father</td>
<td>Father’s mother’s mother</td>
<td>Great-grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother’s mother’s father</td>
<td>Mother’s mother’s father</td>
<td>Great-grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother’s mother’s mother</td>
<td>Mother’s mother’s mother</td>
<td>Great-grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son’s son’s son</td>
<td>Son’s son’s daughter</td>
<td>Great-grandchild</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son’s daughter’s son</td>
<td>Son’s daughter’s daughter</td>
<td>Great-grandchild</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daughter’s son son</td>
<td>Daughter’s son’s daughter</td>
<td>Great-grandchild</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daughter’s daughter’s son</td>
<td>Daughter’s son daughter</td>
<td>Great-grandchild</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Relationships by affinity referred to in section 86(3)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son of former wife</td>
<td>Daughter of former husband</td>
<td>Child of former spouse</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son of former civil partner</td>
<td>Daughter of former civil partner</td>
<td>Child of former civil partner</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Former husband of mother</td>
<td>Former wife of father</td>
<td>Former spouse of parent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Former civil partner of father</td>
<td>Former civil partner of mother</td>
<td>Former civil partner of parent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Former husband of father’s mother</td>
<td>Former wife of father’s father</td>
<td>Former spouse of grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Former civil partner of father’s father</td>
<td>Former civil partner of father’s mother</td>
<td>Former civil partner of grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Former husband of mother’s mother</td>
<td>Former wife of mother’s father</td>
<td>Former spouse of grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Former civil partner of mother’s father</td>
<td>Former civil partner of mother’s mother</td>
<td>Former civil partner of grandparent</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son of son of former wife</td>
<td>Daughter of son of former husband</td>
<td>Grandchild of former spouse</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son of son of former civil</td>
<td>Daughter of son of former</td>
<td>Grandchild of former</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

These documents relate to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013
These documents relate to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>partner</th>
<th>civil partner</th>
<th>civil partner</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Son of daughter of former wife</td>
<td>Daughter of daughter of former husband</td>
<td>Grandchild of former spouse</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son of daughter of former civil partner</td>
<td>Daughter of daughter of former civil partner</td>
<td>Grandchild of former civil partner</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Section 23: Power of district registrar to require evidence of nationality: civil partnership

183. This section adds provisions to section 88 of the 2004 Act.

184. Section 88 of the 2004 Act makes provision on documents which people wishing to enter into a civil partnership have to supply to the district registrar.

185. The new section 88(8) provides that a district registrar may require “specified nationality evidence” in relation to the intended civil partners. The new section 88(9) outlines when such evidence may be requested. The new section 88(10) defines “specified nationality evidence” in terms of guidance that the Registrar General may issue.

186. Section 15 of this Bill adds similar provision to the 1977 Act, in relation to opposite sex and same sex marriage.

Section 24: Recognition of overseas relationships

187. Sections 212 to 218 and Schedule 20 to the 2004 Act makes provision on the recognition in the UK as civil partnerships of overseas same sex registered relationships. Such relationships can be recognised in the UK either by meeting general conditions laid down in section 214 of the 2004 Act or by being specified in Schedule 20. UK Ministers have the power to amend Schedule 20, with the consent of the Scottish Ministers and the Northern Ireland Department of Finance and Personnel.

188. Currently, both overseas same sex marriages and overseas same sex civil unions are recognised in the UK as civil partnerships, so long as they meet the provisions outlined above. Section 24 makes amendments so that, in future, these arrangements only relate to overseas same sex civil unions.

189. Overseas same sex marriages will, in future, be recognised in Scotland as marriages. Section 38 of the Family Law (Scotland) Act 2006 already makes provision on the formal validity of overseas marriages and marriages from elsewhere in the UK. Section 4 of this Bill makes provision so that references to “marriage” in enactments commenced before this Bill means both opposite sex and same sex marriage.

Section 25: Dissolution of civil partnership: evidence

190. The Evidence in Civil Partnership and Divorce Actions (Scotland) Order 2012 (SSI 2012/111)\(^1\) removed the need for third party evidence in actions to dissolve civil partnerships

---

\(^1\) This Order can be found at http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ssi/2012/111/contents/made
These documents relate to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

using the simplified procedure. (The simplified procedure can generally be used where there is no dispute about financial matters and no children under 16).²

191. Some civil partnerships were dissolved using the simplified procedure and without obtaining third party evidence before the Order came into effect. Section 25 provides that the Order is to be treated as having had effect since 5 December 2005 (when civil partnerships were introduced). The effect of the provision is that decrees of dissolution granted before the Order took effect cannot be challenged on the grounds that no third party evidence was provided.

Part 3 – Marriage and civil partnership: other provision

Section 26: Bigamy

192. Subsection (1) makes bigamy a statutory offence in relation to both opposite sex and same sex marriage. Subsection (3) abolishes the current common law offence.

193. Subsection (1) amends section 24 of the 1977 Act, on offences, and makes it an offence for a person to purport to enter into a marriage with another person knowing that one or both of them is already in a marriage or civil partnership with somebody else.

194. Subsection (1) provides for the penalties on conviction for bigamy. On conviction on indictment, a person is liable to a maximum of two years in prison or an unlimited fine or both. On summary conviction, a person is liable to a maximum of 12 months in prison or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum (currently £10,000) or both.

195. Subsection (1) also corrects an existing reference in section 24(1)(ii) of the 1977 Act. The term “prescribed sum” is now out of date and has been replaced in most legislation with “statutory maximum”. A similar amendment is made here, clarifying the penalties which may be imposed following summary conviction in relation to the existing offences in section 24(1) of the 1977 Act.

196. Subsection (2) makes two amendments to the offence provisions at section 100 of the 2004 Act.

197. The first amendment changes an offence from “registers” a civil partnership to “purports to register”. This reflects that under section 86(1)(d) of the 2004 Act two people are not eligible to register a civil partnership if one or either of them is married or already in a civil partnership.

198. The second amendment made by subsection (2) updates a reference to penalties on summary conviction so that section 100(3)(b) of the 2004 Act refers to the statutory maximum rather than level 3 on the standard scale.

199. Subsection (4) amends the Presumption of Death (Scotland) Act 1977 to reflect the introduction of a statutory offence of bigamy under new section 24(A1) and to take account of the offence at section 100 of the 2004 Act of entering into a civil partnership while married or already in a civil partnership. The Presumption of Death (Scotland) Act 1977 contains a defence to bigamy if for seven years the person had no reason to believe his or her spouse was alive. In future, this defence will reflect that bigamy will be a statutory offence and will reflect the offence at section 100 of the 2004 Act.

² More information on the simplified procedure is at http://www.scotcourts.gov.uk/taking-action/divorce-and-dissolution-of-civil-partnership

Part 4 – Change of gender of married persons or civil partners

Overview
200. Under the Gender Recognition Act 2004, persons over 18 may apply to the Gender Recognition Panel to obtain full legal recognition of an acquired gender. Currently, married people and people in a civil partnership have to divorce or dissolve before obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate. Part 4, and schedule 2, make provision so that married people who wish to stay married do not have to divorce and to enable people in a civil partnership to stay in their relationship.

Section 27: Change of gender of married persons or civil partners
201. This section introduces schedule 2 to the Bill on applications to the Gender Recognition Panel by married persons or persons in a civil partnership. This schedule is explained at paragraphs 234 to 272 of these Explanatory Notes.

Section 28: Renewed marriage or civil partnership following issue of full gender recognition certificate
202. Section 28 empowers the Scottish Ministers to make regulations (i) about the solemnisation of a renewed marriage for married persons in a protected Scottish marriage who have obtained a full Gender Recognition Certificate and (ii) about the registration of a renewed civil partnership between the parties to a protected Scottish civil partnership following the issue of full gender recognition certificates to both parties to the partnership. This would enable a new marriage or civil partnership certificate to be issued.

203. By virtue of section 28(7), “full gender recognition certificate” is defined by reference to the existing definition in section 25 of the Gender Recognition Act 2004. “Protected Scottish marriage” is also defined by reference to section 25 of the Gender Recognition Act 2004 as amended by paragraph 2 of schedule 2 to this Bill.

204. Subsection (2) provides that regulations under subsection (1) may in particular make provision on:

- submitting notice of an intention to enter into a renewed marriage (subsection (2)(a));
- submitting notice of an intention to enter into a renewed civil partnership (subsection (2)(b));
- the information required from the applicants (subsection (2)(c));
- evidence to support the application (subsection (2)(d));
- any requirement to attend at a particular place or appear before a particular person (subsection (2)(e));
• conferring functions on persons (such as, for example, the Registrar General) (subsection (2)(f)). (Subsection (3) makes provision on particular functions which may be conferred);
• fees (subsection (2)(g));
• the effects of entering into a renewed marriage (subsection (2)(h)).

205. Subsections (4) to (6) make provision on procedures in relation to any regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

206. Under subsection (4), the Scottish Ministers must consult the Registrar General before making any regulations. Under subsections (5) and (6), any regulations are subject to negative Parliamentary procedures unless they amend primary legislation, in which case they are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Part 5 – Registration services

Section 29: Provision of certain information to district registrars

207. This corrects an erroneous cross-reference. Section 39C(1)(a)(i) of the Registration of Births, Deaths and Marriages (Scotland) Act 1965 currently refers to “the registers of births, deaths and marriages transmitted to the Registrar General under section 34(3) of this Act”. This reference should be to section 34(4) of the 1965 Act which provides that “The district registrar for a registration district shall, at such time or times as the Registrar General may direct, transmit a relevant register to the Registrar General”. Section 29 provides the correct cross-reference.

Part 6 – General provisions

Section 31: Ancillary provision

208. This section allows Ministers to make ancillary provision, by order. Generally, such an order is subject to negative procedure but any order containing provisions which add to, replace or omit any part of the text of an Act is subject to the affirmative procedure.

SCHEDULES

Schedule 1: Jurisdiction in proceedings relating to same sex marriages

Overview

209. The Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973 (“the 1973 Act”) makes provision on the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts to deal with court actions on divorce, separation, declarator of nullity of marriage and declarator of marriage and on actions for declarator of recognition or non-recognition of relevant foreign decrees. The 1973 Act has been amended previously to take account of EC Regulation 2201/2003 (known as Brussels IIa) on jurisdiction, recognition and enforcement of judgments in matrimonial matters and in the matters of parental responsibility. EC Regulation 2201/2003 deals with opposite sex marriage only.
210. Schedule 1 makes provision on the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts in relation to same sex marriages. The schedule amends the 1973 Act to make provision for court actions in relation to same sex couples. The schedule also enables the Scottish Ministers to make provision corresponding to EC Regulation 2201/2003.

211. In addition, overseas couples who enter into a same sex marriage in Scotland but remain or become habitually resident or domiciled in another country may not be able to end their marriage in that country if it does not recognise the existence of the relationship.

212. The schedule therefore amends the 1973 Act to provide a “jurisdiction of last resort” so that those same sex couples who are unable to divorce or obtain other matrimonial order in the country which would normally have jurisdiction are able have their case heard in the Scottish courts. The Scottish courts will be able to assume jurisdiction if the couple were married in Scotland and it is the interests of justice to do so.

213. Provision of a similar nature was made in respect of civil partnerships under Chapter 3 of Part 5 to the Civil Partnership Act 2004. Part 4 of Schedule 4 to the UK Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill makes similar provision in respect of the jurisdiction of the courts in England and Wales in relation to matrimonial actions for same sex couples.

Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973

214. Paragraph 1(2) amends the 1973 Act to set out which provisions in respect of jurisdiction in matrimonial actions do not apply to marriages of same sex couples, which are instead dealt with in Schedule 1B, inserted by paragraph 1(4). Paragraph 1(3) amends section 10 of the 1973 Act, to reflect that references to EC Regulation 2201/2003 are not relevant for same sex married couples, as the Regulation extends to opposite sex marriage only.

215. Paragraph 1(4) inserts a new Schedule 1B into the 1973 Act. Paragraph 1 of the new Schedule 1B sets out that the Schedule has effect with respect to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain proceedings relating to the ending of a same sex marriage (divorce, separation, nullity) and proceedings relating to a marriage's validity, including whether or not the marriage exists. The paragraph also provides definitions.

Power to make provision corresponding to EC Regulation 2201/2003

216. Paragraph 2(1)(a) of Schedule 1B enables the Scottish Ministers to make regulations about the jurisdiction of the courts in relevant proceedings in relation to a same sex marriage. “Relevant proceedings” are defined in paragraph 1(2) of Schedule 1B with reference to the proceedings listed in paragraph 1(1): divorce; separation; declarator of marriage; declarator of nullity of marriage and declarator of recognition, or non-recognition, of a decree of divorce, separation or nullity granted outwith a Member State of the EU. Paragraph 2(1)(b) allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations to provide for the recognition in Scotland of a judgment by a court of another Member State relating to divorce, separation or annulment.

217. The regulations under paragraph 2(1) would apply where one of the couple: is or has been habitually resident in a Member State), or is an EU national, or is domiciled in a part of the UK or the Republic of Ireland. The regulations may correspond with the terms of EC Regulation 2201/2003 on jurisdiction, recognition and enforcement of judgments in matrimonial matters.

218. The provisions in regulations made under paragraph 2(1)(b) on recognition of judgments can apply retrospectively – i.e. where the date of the divorce is earlier than the date on which the paragraph comes into force.

219. A statutory instrument containing these regulations will be subject to the affirmative procedure.

Divorce or separation

220. Paragraph 3(1) of Schedule 1B provides that the Court of Session is able to deal with divorce or separation cases relating to same sex marriage either (a) where the Scottish courts have jurisdiction because of regulations made under paragraph 2 of the Schedule or (b) when no court has jurisdiction under the regulations and either of the married same sex couple is domiciled in Scotland when the case starts.

221. Under paragraph 3(2), the sheriff court has jurisdiction in these cases when either (a) or (b) above is met and:

- either party to the marriage was resident in the sheriffdom for a period of 40 days before the court action is raised; or
- either party had been resident in the sheriffdom for at least 40 days ending not more than 40 days before the court action is raised and has no known residence in Scotland when the action is raised.

222. In addition, Edinburgh sheriff court has jurisdiction if the couple married in Scotland, no court has jurisdiction under regulations made under paragraph 2 of Schedule 1B and it appears to the court to be in the interests of justice for it to deal with the case. This is referred to in paragraph 212 above as “jurisdiction of last resort”.

Declarator of marriage

223. Paragraph 4(1) of Schedule 1B provides that the Court of Session is able to deal with declarator of marriage cases relating to same sex marriage either where either of the parties is (a) domiciled in Scotland when the action is raised or (b) habitually resident in Scotland for a year before the action is raised or (c) dead and at death was domiciled in Scotland or had been habitually resident in Scotland for a year immediately preceding the death.

224. Under paragraph 4(2), the sheriff court has jurisdiction in these cases when either (a) or (b) or (c) above is met and either party to the marriage:

- was resident in the sheriffdom for a period of 40 days before the court action is raised; or
- had been resident in the sheriffdom for at least 40 days ending not more than 40 days before the court action is raised and has no known residence in Scotland when the action is raised.
Nullity of marriage

225. Paragraph 5(1) of Schedule 1B provides that the Court of Session is able to deal with declarators of nullity of a same marriage where (a) the Scottish courts have jurisdiction under regulations made under paragraph 2 of Schedule 1B or (b) no court has jurisdiction under the regulations and either party to the marriage is (i) domiciled in Scotland when the action is raised or (ii) dead and at death had been domiciled in Scotland or had been habitually resident in Scotland for a year immediately preceding the death.

226. Under paragraph 5(2), the sheriff court has jurisdiction in these cases when either (a) or (b) above is met and either party to the marriage:

- was resident in the sheriffdom for a period of 40 days before the court action is raised; or
- had been resident in the sheriffdom for at least 40 days ending not more than 40 days before the court action is raised and has no known residence in Scotland when the action is raised.

227. In addition, Edinburgh sheriff court has jurisdiction if the couple married in Scotland, no court has jurisdiction under regulations made under paragraph 2 of Schedule 1B and it appears to the court in the interests of justice for it to deal with the case. This is referred to in paragraph 212 above as “jurisdiction of last resort”.

Recognition, or non-recognition, of foreign decrees

228. Paragraph 6(1) of Schedule 1B provides that the Court of Session is able to deal with proceedings to recognise or not recognise a court decree from outwith the EU relating to divorce, separation or nullity of a same sex marriage if (a) the Scottish courts have jurisdiction under regulations made under paragraph 2 of Schedule 1B or (b) no court has jurisdiction under the regulations and either party to the marriage is (i) domiciled in Scotland when the action is raised or (ii) dead and at death was domiciled in Scotland or had been habitually resident in Scotland for a year immediately preceding the death.

229. Under paragraph 6(2), the sheriff court has jurisdiction in these cases when either (a) or (b) above is met and either party to the marriage:

- was resident in the sheriffdom for a period of 40 days before the court action is raised; or
- had been resident in the sheriffdom for at least 40 days ending not more than 40 days before the court action is raised and has no known residence in Scotland when the action is raised.

Supplementary provision

230. Paragraph 7(1) of Schedule 1B makes it clear that the provisions in this Schedule on divorce or separation do not affect the Court of Session’s jurisdiction to hear separation proceedings as a matter of urgency.
231. Paragraph 7(2) makes it clear that the provisions in Schedule 1B on divorce, separation and nullity do not affect the sheriff court’s jurisdiction to hear such cases remitted to it under any enactment or rule of court, where hearing such cases does not contravene regulations made under paragraph 2.

232. Paragraph 7(3) makes it clear that when hearing a case under paragraphs 3 to 6 of Schedule 1B, the court can also hear other proceedings in respect of the same marriage, even if it would not normally have jurisdiction.

Presumption of Death (Scotland) Act 1977

233. Paragraph 2 of schedule 1 makes amendments to section 1 of the Presumption of Death (Scotland) Act 1977, which allows actions to be raised so that someone who is missing can be presumed to be dead. The amendment allows Edinburgh sheriff court to hear such actions in relation to a person in a same sex marriage where the marriage took place in Scotland and it appears to the court to be in the interests of justice to assume jurisdiction. This is referred to in paragraph 212 above as “jurisdiction of last resort”.

Schedule 2: change of gender of married persons or civil partners

Overview

234. This schedule makes changes to the Gender Recognition Act 2004 (“the Gender Recognition Act”).

235. The Gender Recognition Act enables people to change their legal gender by applying for a gender recognition certificate under section 1 of that Act. The Gender Recognition Act extends across the UK but relates largely to devolved matters. The Gender Recognition Panel (“the Panel”) deals with applications for a gender recognition certificate and operates across the UK. Schedule 5 to the UK Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill makes similar provision to this schedule in respect of people who married in England and Wales or overseas or entered into a civil partnership in England and Wales.

236. The issue of a full gender recognition certificate enables recipients to be recognised in law for all purposes in their new gender (“the acquired gender”). At present people who are married or in a civil partnership must end their marriage or civil partnership before a full gender recognition certificate can be issued. This is achieved by the Panel issuing an interim gender recognition certificate to married applicants and applicants in civil partnerships. The issue of an interim gender recognition certificate is, in Scotland, a ground for divorce or dissolution of a civil partnership. Applicants then have six months from the date of issue of the interim gender recognition certificate to apply to the court to end their marriage or civil partnership. Once a marriage or civil partnership has been ended the court can issue a full gender recognition certificate.

237. This schedule amends the Gender Recognition Act to enable a marriage solemnised in Scotland (a “protected Scottish marriage”, defined by amendments made in paragraph 2 of the schedule) to continue where one or both parties change their gender and both parties wish to remain married. It also amends that Act to enable a civil partnership registered in Scotland
These documents relate to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

(“protected Scottish civil partnership”, defined by amendments made in paragraph 2) to continue where both parties change their gender simultaneously and wish to remain in their civil partnership.

Paragraph 2 – interpretation

238. Paragraph 2 inserts definitions of the terms “protected Scottish civil partnership”, “protected Scottish marriage” and “statutory declaration of consent” into section 25 of the Gender Recognition Act (interpretation).

239. Paragraph 2(d) makes provision in relation to civil partnerships and marriages carried out overseas by UK consular staff and through the UK armed forces. Such civil partnerships and marriages are to be treated as protected Scottish civil partnerships and marriages so long as the parties identified with Scotland at the time and details have been sent to the Registrar General for Scotland.

Paragraph 3 – evidence

240. Paragraph 3 inserts new subsections (6D), (6E) and (6F) into section 3 of the Gender Recognition Act to amend the evidence requirements for an application to the Panel.

241. At present, section 3(6)(a) of that Act requires people who apply to the Panel for a gender recognition certificate to submit a statutory declaration as to whether they are married or in a civil partnership. Submission of this evidence enables the Panel to determine whether to issue a full gender recognition certificate (for people who are not married or in a civil partnership) or an interim certificate (for people who are married or in a civil partnership).

242. New subsection (6D) requires applicants who are party to a protected Scottish marriage to include in their statutory declaration an additional declaration that they wish the marriage to continue after the issue of a full gender recognition certificate (if that is the case). It also requires the applicant to include information on where the marriage was solemnised and provide either a “statutory declaration of consent” by the applicant’s spouse (which is defined by amendments made in paragraph 2 as a declaration that he or she consents to the marriage continuing after the issue of a full gender recognition certificate), or a statutory declaration by the applicant that his or her spouse has not made a statutory declaration of consent or that the applicant does not know if such a declaration has been made.

243. If an application to the Panel contains a statutory declaration of consent by the applicant’s spouse, new subsection (6E) requires the Panel to inform the spouse that an application has been made.

244. New subsection (6F) provides that applicants in a protected Scottish civil partnership must provide a statutory declaration as to where the civil partnership was registered.

Paragraph 4 – successful applications

245. Paragraph 4 replaces existing subsections (2) and (3) of section 4 of the Gender Recognition Act (which provides for the issue of interim and full gender recognition certificates following an application). The effect of these amendments is to enable a full certificate to be issued:

- to single applicants (new subsection (2)(a));
- to applicants who are party to a protected Scottish marriage and both parties to the marriage consent to the marriage continuing (new subsection (2)(b)); and
- to applicants who are party to a protected Scottish civil partnership and the Panel has decided to issue the other party to the civil partnership with a full gender recognition certificate (new subsection (2)(c)).

246. Interim gender recognition certificates will be issued:

- to applicants in protected Scottish marriages if either party to the marriage has not consented to the marriage continuing (new subsection (3)(a));
- to applicants not in a protected Scottish marriage (new subsection (3)(b));
- to applicants in protected Scottish civil partnerships where the other party to the civil partnership has not made an application for a gender recognition certificate at the same time as the applicant or the other party has made such an application but the Panel has decided not to issue a full gender recognition certificate to him or her (new subsections (3)(c) and (3)(d); and
- to applicants not in a protected Scottish civil partnership (new subsection (3)(e)).

247. New subsection (3A) requires the Panel to notify an applicant’s spouse where it issues a full gender recognition certificate to the applicant.

248. New subsection (3B) provides that section 4(2)(c) of the Gender Recognition Act is subject to new section 5C (inserted into that Act by paragraph 6 of this schedule).

Paragraph 5 – issue of full gender recognition certificate after interim certificate: applicant married

249. Paragraph 5 inserts new sections 4C and 4D into the Gender Recognition Act.

250. New section 4C provides for two situations (“Case A” and “Case B”) when a Gender Recognition Panel must issue a full gender recognition certificate.

251. Case A is the situation where an applicant is in a protected Scottish marriage but his or her spouse has not issued a statutory declaration of consent. If the applicant’s spouse changes his or her mind before the marriage is ended and wishes the marriage to continue, subsection (2) provides that the applicant can apply to the Panel for a full gender recognition certificate. The Panel can only issue a full gender recognition certificate to the applicant following such an application if it is satisfied that the following conditions are met:

- an interim gender recognition certificate has been issued to the applicant (subsection (2)(a));
These documents relate to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

- the applicant was a party to a protected Scottish marriage at the time the interim gender recognition certificate was issued (subsection (2)(b));
- the applicant is in a protected Scottish marriage (subsection (2)(c)); and
- the applicant’s spouse consents to the marriage continuing (subsection (2)(d)).

252. If these conditions are not met, the Panel will reject an application for a full gender recognition certificate (subsection (4)). Subsection (5) sets a time limit for an application under Case A. The time limit is six months from the date on which the interim certificate was issued.

253. Case B is the situation where an application is made by a civil partner in a protected Scottish civil partnership, an interim gender recognition certificate is issued and the couple subsequently decide to change their civil partnership into a marriage under section 3 of the 1977 Act, as amended by this Bill. Subsection (3) provides that once the civil partnership has become a marriage, such applicants can apply for a full gender recognition certificate.

254. The Panel can only issue a full gender recognition certificate to the applicant if it is satisfied that the following conditions are met:

- an interim gender recognition certificate has been issued to the applicant (subsection (3)(a));
- the applicant was a party to a civil partnership at the time the interim gender recognition certificate was issued (subsection (3)(b));
- the notice of intention to marry must have been given within six months of the date of issue of the interim gender recognition certificate being issued (subsection 3(c));
- the civil partnership must have become a marriage (subsection (3)(d));
- the applicant is a party to that marriage (subsection (3)(e)); and
- the applicant’s spouse consents to the marriage continuing (subsection (3)(f)).

255. If these conditions are not met, the Panel will reject an application for a full gender recognition certificate (subsection (4)).

256. Subsection (6) sets a time limit for conversion of an interim certificate to a full certificate under this section. The time limit is six months from the date when the civil partnership becomes a marriage.

257. Applications under Case A and Case B require the applicant’s spouse to issue a statutory declaration of consent (subsection (7)). Applications under Case B must additionally include evidence of the date on which notice of intention to marry was given and evidence that the civil partnership has become a marriage (subsection (8)).

258. Where the Panel receives an application to issue a full gender recognition certificate in either Case A or Case B, subsection (9) requires them to notify the applicant’s spouse both of the application and also of the issue of the full gender recognition certificate (if the Panel grants the application).
259. New section 4D provides for the situation where an applicant has made an application for a full gender recognition certificate under new section 4C but before that application can be determined the applicant’s spouse dies.

260. At present if the applicant’s spouse dies within six months of the interim gender recognition certificate being issued, the applicant can apply for a full gender recognition certificate within six months of the date the death (section 5(2)(b) of the Gender Recognition Act). This section may not be available to applicants who have applied under new section 4C if the application has not been determined within the time limit in new section 4C(5) and (6). New section 4D provides that in such cases the applicant can still rely on the existing section 5(2)(b) to apply for a full gender recognition certificate.

Applications by both civil partners

261. Paragraph 6 inserts new section 5C into the Gender Recognition Act. If both parties to a protected Scottish civil partnership make successful applications to the Panel, section 4(2)(c) of the Gender Recognition Act as amended by the Bill, applies, and both parties will be entitled to full gender recognition certificates. In such cases, the new section 5C enables the Panel to issue full gender recognition certificates to both parties simultaneously, ensuring that the continuity of the civil partnership is not affected by the changes in law to the gender of both parties.

262. Paragraph 6 also inserts new section 5D into the Gender Recognition Act. This empowers the Scottish Ministers to make provision by order on other procedures which could be established to enable the Panel to issue full gender recognition certificates to applicants in a protected Scottish civil partnership. By virtue of paragraph 12, any such orders are subject to the negative procedure unless they amend primary legislation in which case they are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Appeals etc.

263. Paragraph 7 makes consequential amendments to section 8 (appeals etc.) of the Gender Recognition Act to reflect the insertion of section 4C of the Act by this Bill

264. Paragraph 7 also inserts new subsection (5B) into section 8 of the Gender Recognition Act and makes a consequential amendment to section 8(6) of that Act. New subsection (5B) enables an applicant’s spouse to apply to the Court of Session where he or she considers that a full gender recognition certificate has been obtained by his or her spouse fraudulently.

Registration

265. Paragraph 8(1) amends section 10 of the Gender Recognition Act. New subsection (1B) provides that if the Panel issue full gender recognition certificates to one or both parties in a protected Scottish marriage or protected Scottish civil partnership, the Panel must send a copy of the full gender recognition certificate(s) to the Registrar General for Scotland.

266. Paragraph 8(2) makes some consequential amendments to Part 2 of Schedule 3 to the Gender Recognition Act which concerns registration matters in Scotland. In addition, paragraph 8(2) inserts a new paragraph 20A into Schedule 3 to that Act. It provides the Registrar General with a power to make regulations, with the consent of the Scottish Ministers, about the registration of qualifying Scottish marriages and Scottish civil partnerships (defined as marriages and civil partnerships in Scotland where one or both parties (both parties in relation to civil partnerships) have been issued with full gender recognition certificates). Such regulations could make provision for the administrative issue of new marriage and civil partnership certificates.

267. In accordance with the amendments made by paragraph 12 of this schedule to the Gender Recognition Act, any regulations under the new paragraph 20A would be subject to negative procedure.

Continuity of marriage

268. Paragraph 9 inserts a new section 11C into the Gender Recognition Act. Section 11C provides that the continuity of a protected Scottish marriage is not affected by the issuing of full gender recognition certificates to one or both of the parties to the marriage.

Continuity of civil partnership

269. Paragraph 10 inserts a new section 11D into the Gender Recognition Act. Section 11D provides that the continuity of a protected Scottish civil partnership is not affected by the issuing of full gender recognition certificates to both of the parties to the civil partnership under section 4(2)(c) of that Act.

Foreign gender change and marriage

270. Paragraph 11 repeals section 21(2) to (5) of the Gender Recognition Act (foreign gender change and marriage).

271. Section 21(2) to (5) of that Act currently provides for the situation where a person claims to have changed gender in their country of origin and married a person of the opposite sex to their acquired gender in that country or another country outside the UK. At present, these marriages have no standing under Scots law until a full gender recognition certificate has been issued by the Panel because Scots law regards the parties as having not been respectively male and female when the marriage was solemnised. As marriages in Scotland will now be available to same sex couples these sections can be repealed for the purposes of Scots law.

Consequential amendments

272. Paragraph 12 makes consequential amendment to the Gender Recognition Act reflecting the substantive amendments made in the other paragraphs of schedule 2 to the Bill.
INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.2 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. It does not form part of the Bill and has not been endorsed by the Parliament.

2. The Bill will introduce same sex marriage and the registration of civil partnership through religious or belief ceremonies whilst putting in place protections for religious freedom and freedom of speech. The Bill also makes a number of changes to general Scottish marriage law (e.g. on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere and clarifying the role of Church of Scotland deacons) which have been under consideration for some time. The Scottish Government has undertaken two consultation exercises on the introduction of same sex marriage in Scotland, the second of which sought views on a partial Business Regulatory Impact Assessment (BRIA)\(^3\). As part of the BRIA process, the Scottish Government engaged with businesses and stakeholders about the costs and benefits of the proposed legislation.

PROVISIONS IN THE BILL

Provisions not expected to give rise to costs

3. There are a number of provisions in the Bill which are not expected to give rise to any costs, such as:

- simplifications to the forbidden degrees on persons who are too closely related to marry or enter a civil partnership (sections 1 and 22);
- changes on the preliminaries to marriage (section 3);
- provision on the meaning of marriage and related expressions (section 4);
- provision on the implications of same sex marriage for the crime of reset and for impotence and adultery (section 5);
- provision on the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts on actions relating to same sex marriages (section 6 and schedule 1);
- effect of marriage between civil partners in a qualifying civil partnership (section 9);
- persons who may solemnise marriage or register civil partnership (sections 10 and 22);
- registration of nominated persons as celebrants (sections 11 and 22);
- temporary authorisation of celebrants (sections 12 and 22);

\(^3\) This partial BRIA can be found at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0041/00410331.pdf
These documents relate to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

- putting belief (e.g. humanist) celebrants and bodies on the same footing as religious bodies in relation to the solemnisation of marriage in Scotland (sections 10, 11 and 12)\(^4\);
- making it clear that the introduction of same sex marriage has no impact on existing rights to freedom of speech (section 14);
- giving a power to the district registrar to require evidence of nationality of both parties to the marriage or civil partnership (section 15 and 23);
- extending the time period for issuing a marriage or civil partnership schedule from 14 days to 28 days (sections 16 and 22);
- provision on information on the dissolution of a former civil partnership when seeking to marry outwith Scotland (section 17);
- authorising Church of Scotland deacons to solemnise opposite sex marriage (section 18);
- allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere agreed by the registrar and the couple, other than religious premises (section 19);
- updating a form (section 20);
- clarifying the jurisdiction of the sheriff court in relation to declarators of opposite sex marriage (section 21);
- making bigamy a statutory offence in relation to both opposite sex and same sex marriage (section 26);
- provision amending the Civil Partnership Act 2004 so that, in future, overseas same sex marriages are recognised as same sex marriages in Scotland rather than as civil partnerships (section 24);
- clarification of the effect of an SSI which removed the need for third party evidence in actions to dissolve civil partnerships using the simplified procedure (section 25);
- the provisions in Parts 5 and 6.

4. Although the Bill clarifies the position of belief celebrants in relation to marriage, it is unlikely to lead to any significant increase in the number of marriages. Humanist celebrants are already permitted to solemnise opposite sex marriage by virtue of temporary authorisation under section 12 of the Marriage (Scotland) 1977 Act.

5. Allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere as agreed by the registrar and the couple could lead to an increase in demand for such ceremonies. However, any increase in costs to the local authority would be covered by a fee payable by the couple in relation to such ceremonies.

\(^4\) Church of Scotland celebrants will continue to be authorised automatically for opposite sex marriage through the Church of Scotland being named on the face of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977.
6. Although extending the period for the issue of the marriage or civil partnership schedule to 28 days could imply that more work may be involved for district registrars, this amendment reflects the reality of the amount of work which is already ongoing.

7. Sections 10, 11 and 22 of the Bill, which contain provisions allowing the Scottish Ministers to make regulations on “qualifying requirements” for religious and belief bodies to meet before their celebrants could be authorised to solemnise marriage or register civil partnership, could lead to suggestions there would be an additional cost on religious and belief bodies in relation to training for their celebrants. In practice, however, the Scottish Government and National Records of Scotland would work closely with religious and belief bodies to organise any further training that might be required: this should ensure costs are minimal. In addition, there will be full consultation on proposed regulations in this area. This will include discussions with religious and belief bodies on how to keep costs to a minimum.

Provisions likely to give rise to costs

8. The provisions in the Bill which are likely to give rise to some costs are:
   • introducing same sex marriage and the religious and belief registration of civil partnership (Part 1 and section 22);
   • allowing civil partners who registered their civil partnership in Scotland to change their civil partnership to a marriage (sections 7 and 8);
   • removing the requirement on transgender people to divorce before obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate (section 27 and schedule 2); and
   • having a renewed marriage or civil partnership following issue of a full gender recognition certificate (section 28).

COSTS GENERALLY

9. The main associated costs in this area arose following the introduction of the Civil Partnership Act 2004, which gave rights to a couple in a civil partnership. Costs this time are modest as civil partners have almost exactly the same rights as married couples. The difference therefore is predominantly around being able to marry rather than about financial issues.

10. The majority of costs are in relation to updating IT systems and forms.

POTENTIAL INCREASES IN NUMBER OF SAME SEX UNIONS

11. Costs may also arise if the introduction of same sex marriage in Scotland results in an increase in the total number of registered same sex unions. It could be the case that some same sex couples may not have entered into a civil partnership because they prefer marriage or because they would wish to enter into a religious or belief civil partnership (at the moment, civil partnership registration ceremonies can only be civil in nature).

---

12. From 2005 to 2012, 4,435 civil partnerships were registered in Scotland. There was an initial spike in demand following the introduction of the Civil Partnership Act 2004. Following 2006, the numbers entering into a civil partnership in Scotland each year fell until 2011 when numbers started to increase.

13. There will be demand from couples who are in an existing civil partnership and choose to change the civil partnership to a marriage. From a survey undertaken by the Equality Network in 2009/10, 54% of 103 respondents said that they would wish to change their civil partnership to a marriage.

14. In addition, there may be a modest pent-up demand from same-sex couples who decided not to enter a civil partnership but would enter a marriage. However, we do not expect this pent-up demand for same-sex marriage to be at the same level as the pent-up demand for civil partnership in 2005 and 2006. The numbers in 2005 and 2006 reflected that before then same-sex couples could not enter into a union where they could obtain legal responsibilities and rights.

15. There is considerable uncertainty on exactly what the pent-up demand for new same-sex unions might be after the introduction of same-sex marriage. Looking at US states which have introduced civil unions and same-sex marriage, states which allowed same-sex marriage saw higher rates of formation (30% of existing same-sex couples got married in the first year this was available) than States which introduced civil union (18% of same-sex couples entered a civil union in the first year this was available).

16. This figure might suggest that there could be an increase of 66% in registered same-sex unions when same-sex marriage is first introduced [30 less 18 = 12. 12 divided by 18 is 66%]. However, this is not like for like data, since civil partnership has been available in Scotland since 2005. Given though that using any other figures would be even more speculative, this figure will be used in this Memorandum to estimate a potential increase in the number of same-sex unions in the first year following the introduction of same-sex marriage.

17. The UK Government, in their Impact Assessment for the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill considered evidence and conclusions from a number of different countries. It concluded that England and Wales should expect to see a short-term increase in demand for same-sex marriage in the year that it is introduced.

18. Given that Scotland is in a similar position to England and Wales, in that civil partnerships have been available for several years, we would expect that there will be a short term increase in demand in Scotland for a same sex marriage in the first year. The UK

---

These documents relate to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

Government’s Impact Assessment also noted that there is not enough evidence available to suggest if any other countries have seen a long-term change in demand for marriage compared to previous demand for civil unions.

19. Therefore, in this Memorandum, we have taken the approach that there might be an additional 330 new same sex unions entered into in the first year. This is based on 500 civil partnerships taking place each year in Scotland and an increase of 66% on that figure, using the American figures quoted in paragraphs 15 and 16 above. As indicated, this is a broad estimate reflecting modest pent-up demand and available data from other jurisdictions.

20. In addition, this Memorandum assumes that there is no discernible increase after the first year in the number of new same sex unions being entered into. That is in line with the UK Government’s Impact Assessment that there is not enough evidence to suggest an increase in long-term demand. In practice, the assumption that some people have chosen not to enter a civil partnership in the past but would enter a same sex marriage indicates that the number of new same sex unions might increase on a permanent basis. However, any such increase would be expected to be low and could be counter-balanced by the fluctuations which are seen each year in any event in the number of marriages and civil partnerships.

RELATIONSHIP WITH UK POSITION

21. The UK Government introduced its Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill to the UK Parliament on 24 January 2013\(^\text{10}\). This Bill proposes the introduction of same sex marriage in England and Wales and some other changes. As a result of the proposed introduction of same sex marriage across England, Wales and Scotland, there will be modest administrative costs in relation to IT, forms and guidance for UK Government departments including departments which operate in Scotland such as HM Revenue and Customs and the Department for Work and Pensions. This has no financial impact on the Scottish Government.

22. As a consequence of the changes made by the Scottish Bill, there may, as outlined above, be an increase in the number of same sex unions. This could have an impact on the UK Government, particularly in relation to pension schemes which are not devolved. However, the Scottish Government would expect any such costs to be modest, given the low number of additional same sex unions that are expected.

23. The Scottish Government would not expect the changes made by the Scottish Bill to give rise to a claim by the UK Government for its costs under the Statement of Funding Policy. The Statement of Funding Policy relates to additional costs. As indicated above, changes to IT, forms and guidance will be needed anyway as a consequence of the UK Bill. Clearly, if the UK Bill should not pass, this situation would change and the Scottish Government would need to discuss the implications with the UK Government.

24. On pensions, the increase in the number of new same sex unions entered into is expected to be modest and there are changes each year to the number of marriages and civil partnerships.

\(^{10}\) http://services.parliament.uk/bills/2013-14/marriagesamesexcouplesbill.html entered into. Therefore, the Scottish Government would not expect the UK Government to make a claim under the Statement of Funding Policy.

COSTS ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

Pensions

25. Pension policy is a reserved matter for the UK Government, although there are some devolved powers in terms of certain public sector pension schemes in Scotland\(^\text{11}\).\n
26. There are some differences between civil partners and married couples in relation to survivor benefits in pensions. The benefit paid to a surviving civil partner can be less than the benefit paid to a surviving spouse as it may not be based on the full service given by the deceased surviving partner.

27. In public sector schemes, survivor benefits for civil partners are based on service since 1988. In schemes for which the Scottish Government has responsibility, same sex married couples will be treated in the same way as civil partners.

28. As a result, there will be no costs in relation to the devolved public sector pension schemes through the introduction of same sex marriage in Scotland if the overall number of registered same sex unions does not increase. In addition, persons changing their relationship from a civil partnership to a marriage has no cost implications for devolved public sector pension schemes. However, as indicated in paragraph 19, it is possible that there could be a small increase in the number of registered same sex unions.

29. Using the US data highlighted in paragraphs 15 and 16 (on a potential increase in the total number of registered same sex unions), the potential impact on devolved public sector pension schemes could be:
   - there are around 500 civil partnerships a year at the moment;
   - in the first year, there could be 330 additional same sex registered unions [500 x 66%];
   - around 12.6% of Scotland’s working population is employed in a devolved public sector pension scheme [approximately 315,000 scheme members\(^\text{12}\) out of a working population of around 2.5 million\(^\text{13}\) in Scotland];
   - therefore, there could be an additional 42 same sex registered unions in such schemes [330 x 12.6%];
   - the average survivor benefit is assumed to be £3,900 a year\(^\text{14}\);

---

\(^{11}\) More details can be found on the Scottish Public Pensions Agency website: http://www.sppa.gov.uk/

30. However, there are various uncertainties in these calculations.

31. First of all, not all the costs will occur at the same time. People marry, retire and die at different ages. Therefore, the estimated additional costs will occur at different times.

32. Secondly, in some cases the person who was not the member of the pension scheme may die before their partner so there would never be any survivor benefit.

33. Thirdly, around 1 in 3 of these additional unions will result in dissolution/divorce\textsuperscript{15}.

34. The Government expects, therefore, that the cost of £163,800 per year is likely to be a maximum figure. For example, assuming that 1 in 3 of the unions end in divorce/dissolution could reduce the estimated costs by £54,600 per year [£163,800/3] to £109,200.

National Records of Scotland

35. For National Records of Scotland, some minor adjustments will be needed in relation to forms, extracts and the on-line registration IT system. Upper estimates to amend these administrative processes are around £200,000 in total.

36. £75,000 would be required for the “registration administration and family history” system and £45,000 for the IT systems which maintains statistical data which would be sourced from within current budgets. However, these costs are based on a comprehensive re-write of existing marriage functionality and the underlying data structures. It is therefore likely that the final costs will be lower. In addition, the Government estimates that costs to make minor adjustments to forms and extracts would be around £80,000.

37. The Government expects that the costs will be incurred in 2014/15. This is on the assumption that the Bill is passed, receives Royal Assent early in 2014 and it then takes around 12 months in total to implement the legislation.

38. It is envisaged that IT changes could not be made any earlier than 2014/15 because:

- they could not be specified until legislation had been passed; and
- in any event, National Records of Scotland will have to give priority to work on the changes that will be required for the new arrangements for the certification of death, which are due to be introduced on 1 April 2014.

---

\textsuperscript{14} Paragraph 1.11 on page 26 of the Independent Public Services Commission suggested the average pension paid to a public sector pension member is around £7,800.

Assuming the pension for the survivor is at 50% gives a figure of £3,900.

\textsuperscript{15} Around 1 in 3 marriages end in divorce in Scotland: Statistics on life events can be found at http://www.gro-scotland.gov.uk/statistics/theme/vital-events/general/ref-tables/2011/index.html
Scottish Legal Aid Board

39. There could potentially be costs for the Scottish Legal Aid Board in relation to divorce and dissolution of civil partnerships, although any impact would be very minimal.

40. Very broadly, around one in three marriages end in divorce in Scotland. There are around 30,000 marriages a year; 10,000 divorces; 500 civil partnerships and a very small number of dissolutions of civil partnerships. The number of civil partnerships dissolving is still very low as the form of relationship is still relatively new.

41. The majority of divorces and dissolutions are dealt with in the local Sheriff Court where 60% are through the simplified divorce procedure. This can be used where there are no children under 16 and no financial issues to be sorted out between spouses. The simplified divorce procedure is straightforward and, therefore, has few legal aid implications. The remaining 40% of divorces and dissolutions can have legal aid implications.

42. The introduction of same sex marriage could increase the number of registered same sex unions (as outlined in paragraphs 11 to 20). However, as also indicated, we expect that any increase in demand would relate to the first year.

43. If there were to be an increase in the number of registered same sex unions, following the introduction of same sex marriage, there could be more divorces and dissolutions. Using the assumptions outlined above of an extra 330 same sex unions in the first year and of one third ending in divorce/dissolution:

- there could be 110 additional divorces (one third of 330);
- 40% could be through ordinary procedures, with legal aid implications, and 60% through simplified procedures;
- so 44 additional divorces (40% of 110) might have legal aid implications.

44. Therefore, an increase in the number of registered same sex unions could lead to a very modest impact on legal aid. The Scottish Legal Aid Board indicated earlier this year that it was introducing cost limitations on grants of civil legal aid. For divorces in the sheriff court, the limit is £6,000. £6,000 multiplied by 44 produces a figure of £264,000. This could be payable over a number of years, as divorces occur. The average length of a marriage which ends in divorce is around 16 years.

---

16 Statistics on life events can be found at http://www.gro-scotland.gov.uk/statistics/theme/vital-events/general/refs/tables2011/index.html
18 Guidance on the simplified procedures for divorce can be found on the Scottish Court Service website at http://www.scotcourts.gov.uk/taking-action/divorce-and-dissolution-of-civil-partnership
20 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2010/12/17151409/16
45. There would be no additional legal aid implications if there is no overall increase in the number of registered same sex unions. Instead of dissolutions of civil partnerships, there would be divorces.

Gender Recognition Panel

46. Both the Scottish and UK Bills propose to allow transgender people to obtain a full gender recognition certificate without having to divorce. This may lead to more applications to the Gender Recognition Panel (“the Panel”). The Panel operates across the UK and is run by HM Courts and Tribunals Service, an agency of the UK Ministry of Justice. The UK Government’s Impact Assessment for the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill estimates the total costs of increased applications to the Panel at up to £700,000. Financial responsibility for the Panel rests with the UK Government and there would therefore be no financial impact for the Scottish Government.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

Civil marriage ceremonies

47. Under current legislation, civil marriage ceremonies can only take place at approved places such as a registrar’s office or at premises approved by the local authority. The Bill removes the references to “approved places” from legislation. It will make it possible for civil marriage, for both opposite sex and same sex marriage, to take place at any place agreed by the registrar and the couple, except in religious premises.

48. This provision to deregulate the approval of places is expected to reduce licensing fees income to the 32 councils by a total of £150,000 to £200,000.

49. However, such fees cannot be set above cost recovery levels so, in practice, local authorities will not lose revenue given they will be relieved of the burden of carrying out a licensing function. In addition, as the function is a relatively insignificant element of licensing activity, the Government expects local authorities will redeploy their resources to reflect the removal of this function.

50. There may also be an increase in demand for civil ceremonies for opposite sex marriage once these ceremonies can take place anywhere agreed by the couple and the registrar. Couples would be choosing to have a civil ceremony rather than opting for a religious ceremony as they are no longer constrained by having a civil ceremony in a licensed venue.

51. In addition, there will be a demand from existing civil partners to change their relationship to a marriage and this change could be carried out through a ceremony under section 7 of the Bill. As indicated in paragraph 12, there were 4,435 civil partnerships in Scotland from 2005 to 2012. As paragraph 13 indicates, a survey suggested 54% of people in a civil partnership may wish to change their relationship to a marriage.

52. As indicated in paragraph 19, there may be an increase in the number of same sex civil unions in the first year of same sex marriage.

49
53. Any marriage ceremony would attract a fee, designed to recover costs\(^2\).

Familiarisation costs – civil registrars

54. There will be no significant familiarisation costs to local authority civil registrars because the proposed process for same sex marriage is the same as the existing process for opposite sex marriage and very similar to the existing civil partnership process.

55. There will therefore be a very little net financial impact on local authorities in Scotland.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

Individuals and businesses

56. There will be some impact on individuals by the Bill which would result in costs being incurred.

57. There will be costs for couples in an existing civil partnership who wish to change their civil partnership to a same sex marriage following implementation of the Bill.

58. Such couples may choose to have a marriage ceremony to change their relationship, under section 7 of the Bill. Fees would be payable by such couples. The fee for a basic marriage ceremony in Scotland is currently £125 (see information at footnote 19).

59. In addition, section 8 of the Bill gives the power for Scottish Ministers to make regulations so that an alternative administrative process could be established. Section 8 gives ministers the power to make provision on fees.

60. There would also be a fee payable by couples who enter into a same sex marriage or enter into a religious or belief registration of civil partnership who had chosen previously not to enter in to a civil partnership.

61. There could also be a cost for a couple where one partner has been issued with a full gender recognition certificate and the couple wishes to have a new marriage certificate. Section 28 of the Bill makes provision for any such couple to have a renewed marriage ceremony so that a new certificate could be issued, reflecting the acquired gender. It is possible to have a civil marriage ceremony for £125.

---

\(^2\) Information on marriage fees is at http://www.gro-scotland.gov.uk/files2/registration/rm1b-new-fees.pdf
TOTAL OF ESTIMATED COSTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Organisation</th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Cost</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Scottish Government</td>
<td>Public sector pension schemes</td>
<td>£0 – £163,800 per year (costs only likely to arise if overall number of registered same sex unions increases)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Local authorities</td>
<td>Following repeal of provisions that civil ceremonies can only take place in approved places</td>
<td>£150,000 – £200,000 (in total for all 32 local authorities) as a result of the loss of licensing income. However, these fees are aimed at recovering costs and the loss of fee income is offset through being relieved of the burden of carrying out a licensing function</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Local authorities</td>
<td>Familiarisation costs for civil registrars</td>
<td>Very little impact</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Records of Scotland</td>
<td>To reform the “registration administration and family history” system</td>
<td>£75,000 (upper estimate)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Records of Scotland</td>
<td>To reform the “statistical” systems</td>
<td>£45,000 (upper estimate)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Records of Scotland</td>
<td>Minor adjustments to forms and extracts.</td>
<td>£80,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scottish Legal Aid Board</td>
<td>Legal aid for divorces and dissolutions</td>
<td>£0 – £264,000 over a period of several years (costs only likely to arise if increase in overall number of registered same sex unions)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

On 26 June 2013, the Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing (Alex Neil MSP) made the following statement:

“In my view, the provisions of the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.”

PRESIDING OFFICER’S STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

On 26 June 2013, the Presiding Officer (Rt Hon Tricia Marwick MSP) made the following statement:

“In my view, the provisions of the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.”
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

POLICY MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. The contents are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Parliament. Explanatory Notes and other accompanying documents are published separately as SP Bill 36–EN.

Structure of the Policy Memorandum

2. This Memorandum covers first the provisions of the Bill that apply to all marriages and civil partnerships. It then covers the introduction of same sex marriage and the provisions which give effect to that policy. Therefore, the structure is as follows:

- summary of the Bill’s main provisions and the principles that informed the Bill’s development;
- changes that apply to marriages and civil partnerships generally;
- the introduction of same sex marriage and changes flowing from that;
- consultation that the Scottish Government undertook;
- the effect of the Bill in relation to equal opportunities; human rights; island communities; local government, and sustainable development; and
- provisions that the Scottish Government intends to appear in an order under section 104 of the Scotland Act 1998 in relation to reserved matters.

POLICY OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL

Principles behind the Bill

3. The principles behind this Bill are:

- equality of opportunity
- freedom of religion, belief, and expression
This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

- upholding the dignity and solemnity of marriage ceremonies and civil partnership registration in Scotland.

4. For example, the Bill gives the members of a same sex couple the opportunity to marry each other. A religious or belief body that wishes to solemnise the marriage of a same sex couple will be able to do so. Crucially, a religious or belief body which does not wish to solemnise same sex marriages will not have to. Nor will a religious or belief celebrant.

5. This Bill follows two consultations carried out by the Government. The first was on general principles\(^1\) and the second was on a draft Bill\(^2\).

Summary of the main provisions in the Bill

6. The Bill allows same sex couples to marry. It provides for the consequences of that change.

7. It also ends the current requirement for a couple to divorce before obtaining a full gender recognition certificate, which provides legal recognition in an acquired gender, under the Gender Recognition Act 2004 (“the Gender Recognition Act“)\(^3\).

8. The Bill makes the following changes that apply to all marriages and civil partnerships:
   - putting belief celebrants on an equal footing with religious celebrants;
   - introducing the religious and belief registration of civil partnership;
   - relaxation of the rules about where a civil marriage may be solemnised;
   - giving the Scottish Government power to prescribe in regulations qualifying requirements which religious and belief bodies must meet before their celebrants can be authorised to solemnise marriage or register civil partnerships.

9. Some bodies focused around a set of beliefs – such as humanism – would like to be authorised to solemnise marriage on the same basis as religious bodies. The Bill gives such bodies the opportunity to seek such authorisation.

10. The Bill introduces provisions to allow the religious and belief registration of civil partnership. Under the current law, only a civil registrar may register a civil partnership\(^4\).

11. The rules on where civil marriage ceremonies may take place are different to the rules applying to where religious marriage ceremonies may take place and where civil partnerships may take place.

---

\(^1\) The first consultation can be found at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2011/09/05153328/0

\(^2\) The second consultation can be found at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/9433

\(^3\) More information on the Gender Recognition Act is at http://www.justice.gov.uk/tribunals/gender-recognition-panel

This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

12. At the moment, civil marriage ceremonies can only take place at a registrar’s office or at premises approved by the local authority. The Bill will allow civil marriage ceremonies, for both opposite sex and same sex marriage, to take place anywhere agreed by the couple and the registrar, other than religious premises.

GENERAL PROVISIONS ON MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP

The forbidden degrees (sections 1 and 22)

13. Section 1 of the Bill makes a number of amendments to the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 (“the 1977 Act”) in relation to the “forbidden degrees”. The forbidden degrees are about people who are too closely related to marry. Section 1 of the Bill simplifies the existing table of forbidden degrees and takes account of the introduction of same sex marriage. Section 22(22) of the Bill amends the Civil Partnership Act 2004 (“the 2004 Act”) to introduce a simplified table of forbidden degrees in respect of civil partnerships.

Alternatives

14. The obvious alternative would have been to reflect the introduction of same sex marriage without simplifying the tables. However, the Government considers that this would miss an opportunity for simplification.

Belief bodies and celebrants (sections 10, 11 and 12)

15. Since 2005, the Registrar General for Scotland has authorised humanists as marriage celebrants. This means that persons who wish to have a humanist marriage ceremony recognised by the state can do so. The Government considers this provides a wide variety of choice to persons seeking to marry. Humanist celebrants are authorised temporarily under section 12 of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 (“the 1977 Act”). That is undesirable for two reasons.

16. First, the authorisation is temporary, meaning that there is a difference in treatment between religious bodies and belief bodies. Secondly, section 12 is designed at the moment for the temporary authorisation of religious celebrants. The Scottish Government considers it inappropriate to continue to authorise under that section a celebrant who is not religious.

17. Therefore, the Bill makes provision so that, in future, there will be two types of marriage ceremony in Scotland. The option of having a civil ceremony will remain available. Under the Bill, the other category of ceremony will become “religious or belief”, thus ensuring that belief bodies will be placed on the same footing in marriage legislation as religious bodies.

Alternatives

18. The Government considered a number of alternatives in this area.

---

This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

19. First of all, when the Scottish Government consulted on the draft Bill, it proposed introducing a new category of “belief” into the 1977 Act. That would have meant three kinds of celebrant in Scotland: civil registrars, religious celebrants, and belief celebrants. Following the consultation, it became clear that it can in some cases be difficult to determine whether a body is a religious body or a belief body. This suggested that it would be logical to have a religious or belief category.

20. A number of those responding to the consultation on the draft Bill suggested that it would be confusing to have three categories, which was a further reason for having two categories rather than three.

21. A second option would be to make no changes and continue to authorise humanists under the provisions at section 12 of the 1977 Act for temporary authorisation of celebrants. One argument for this option is that the Bill amends section 12 of the 1977 Act so that section 12 refers to religious or belief bodies. However, the fact remains that authorisation under section 12 was not meant to be a permanent way of authorising humanist celebrants. Therefore, the Scottish Government rejected this option.

22. A third option would be that only a civil registrar could solemnise a marriage or register a civil partnership. That would mean that only a civil marriage ceremony would be legally recognised by the state. A couple who wanted to celebrate their marriage in accordance with their religion or belief would have to do that separately to the civil ceremony.

23. This is the position in some other European countries such as France and the Netherlands. Some stakeholders, including respondents to the consultation on the draft Bill, have suggested this approach for Scotland. It would have the advantage of clarifying the roles and responsibilities of the state and of religious and belief celebrants. Arguably, it would make it clear that the legal institution of marriage, as provided for by the state, does not necessarily correspond to marriage as understood within a religious or belief context.

24. The Scottish Government decided against this option, for a number of reasons.

25. The Scottish Government values the role that religious and belief celebrants play in solemnising marriage in Scotland. That role is an important part of Scotland’s past and present and not something that it has any desire to change. The Registrar General authorises celebrants and the system operates well. It is convenient for couples to be able to have one ceremony that satisfies both their legal and their religious or belief requirements.

26. Some stakeholders have commented that the combination of being married before God and in law is, in itself, deeply spiritual and, as a result, should remain in place.

27. Finally, the Scottish Government did not consult on the possibility. It would wish to consult extensively before changing the law on marriage in Scotland in this way.

28. A fourth option would be to open up the solemnisation of marriage more widely, to celebrants without any links to religious or belief bodies. The Government has rejected this as:
This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

- a civil registration service is already available for those without religious convictions or belief values. The Bill will further improve this service by allowing civil ceremonies to take place anywhere (other than religious premises) agreed by the couple and the registrar;
- there does not appear to be any significant demand from couples to open up solemnisation more widely;
- it is legitimate to provide that non-civil ceremonies should be grounded in a set of religious or belief values;
- it would not be desirable to offer a marriage or civil partnership service as a commercial service.

Change made to the definition of belief body following the consultation on the draft Bill

29. In the consultation draft of the Bill, “belief body” was defined as meaning “an organised group of people, not being a religious body, the principal object (or one of the principal objects) of which is to uphold or promote philosophical or humanitarian beliefs and which meets regularly for that purpose”.

30. In the Bill introduced to Parliament, there is a definition of the term “religious or belief body”, to reflect the decision to have a religion or belief category of marriage ceremony rather than two separate categories. In this definition, the reference to “humanitarian” beliefs has been removed as the Government considered, on reflection, that the word “humanitarian” did not accurately reflect the type of belief bodies which it would wish to solemnise marriage.

Religious and belief registration of civil partnership (section 22)

31. Civil partnership is a status created by the 2004 Act. It is open only to same sex couples. The responsibilities and rights flowing from civil partnership largely mirror the responsibilities and rights that flow from marriage.

32. One of the significant differences between marriage and civil partnership is that the process of entering into a civil partnership is purely secular. At the moment, only a civil registrar can register a couple’s partnership. Should a couple wish to have a religious ceremony, they would have to hold that separately to the civil process. That contrasts to the law on marriage, where a religious celebrant can have a dual role, acting in both a religious and a civil capacity.

33. Section 22 of the Bill introduces the religious or belief registration of civil partnership. The Bill amends the 2004 Act to allow a religious or belief body to seek authorisation for its celebrants to register civil partnerships. Section 22(10) of the Bill also amends the 2004 Act so that it continues to be the case that civil ceremonies cannot take place on religious premises. Authorisation of religious and belief celebrants can be achieved by:

---

6 The consultation draft of the Bill is at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0041/00410333.pdf. The definition of “belief body” can be found at sections 8(4) and 19(21).
This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

- seeking to be prescribed in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers;
- putting forward members who the bodies wish to be empowered to register civil partnerships.

34. In addition, the Registrar General will be able to grant temporary authorisations to register civil partnerships.

35. Introducing the religious or belief registration of civil partnerships will give a couple who choose to enter into a civil partnership the possibility to do so within their faith or belief community. It will give religious or belief bodies who wish to register civil partnerships the opportunity to do so. There will be a number of protections for religious and belief bodies who do not wish to register civil partnerships:

- under the Bill, religious and belief bodies have to opt in. This means that a body must ask to be prescribed by regulations or nominate celebrants to the Registrar General or seek temporary authorisation of celebrants;
- the Bill makes it clear that religious and belief bodies are under no duty to opt in;
- the Bill also makes it clear that there is no duty under the Bill on any person who is an approved celebrant in relation to civil partnerships to register civil partnerships;
- the UK and Scottish Governments are preparing an amendment to the Equality Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”) to provide further protection in relation to discrimination.

Alternatives

36. The alternative approaches to permitting the religious or belief registration of civil partnership are 1) do nothing, leaving civil partnership as an entirely secular process and 2) introduce a hybrid system – for instance, where a registrar can register a civil partnership in a church.

37. The Scottish Government rejected the first option because it considers that it is right for a couple who wish to enter into a civil partnership to be able to do that within their faith of belief. Similarly, the Government wishes to permit religious or belief celebrants the opportunity to register civil partnerships, where they wish to do so.

38. The UK Government has introduced a system in England and Wales whereby a civil registrar may register a civil partnership on religious premises. The Scottish Government considers that such a system would go against the longstanding principle in Scotland that civil registrars do not carry out ceremonies on religious premises or include any religious content in a civil marriage ceremony.

39. In addition, in the first consultation the Scottish Government sought views on the system in England and Wales. Question 2 asked “Do you think that the proposals in England and Wales on registration of civil partnerships in religious premises would be appropriate for Scotland?” Of those responding to the question, 59% answered “no” and only 11% answered “yes”. The remainder did not know or did not have a view.

---

Where a civil marriage may be solemnised (section 19)

40. Under sections 18 and 18A of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977, a civil marriage ceremony may only take place in a registration office or at an approved place (places approved by the local authority). This follows changes made in 2002.

41. These provisions are more onerous than the situation applying to religious marriage ceremonies (and, in future, to religious and belief ceremonies) and to civil partnership. A religious marriage ceremony may take place anywhere agreed between the celebrant and the couple. A civil partnership may be registered at a registration office or any other place which the couple and the local registration authority agree is to be the place of registration. The exception to the latter is that a civil partnership may not be registered in religious premises.

42. The Registrar General has over 10 years’ experience in operating the system of approved places. In the light of that experience, the Scottish Government believe that the degree of regulation provided by the 2002 rules is unnecessary.

43. The Government sees no rational reason to continue to distinguish between where a civil marriage may be solemnised and where a civil partnership may be registered. The Bill repeals the rules about approved places. It permits a civil marriage to be solemnised at a place agreed between the couple and the local registration authority – so long as the place is not religious premises.

Alternatives

44. The alternative approach is to do nothing – to leave the existing legislation in place. However, that puts civil marriage ceremonies on a different footing from both civil partnership and religious marriage ceremonies. It places an unnecessary burden on local authorities. It limits the venues in which couples may marry. The Government’s experience since the introduction of approved places 10 years ago is that the level of regulation in this area is disproportionately high.

45. Around 1,200 respondents to the second consultation commented on this proposal. A number supported broadening the choices available to couples. Some suggested that the exclusion for religious premises should, in relation to same sex marriage, be extended to all religious premises owned or occupied by religious or belief bodies (e.g. church halls). Some local authorities noted practical issues such as the need to carry out a risk assessment of any unlicensed premises to ensure any health and safety issues were fully addressed. It was also noted that if an outdoor venue is chosen, there should be a requirement for an alternative indoor venue to be available in the case of bad weather.

---

8 The analysis of the responses to the first consultation is at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/5671/0 Details on question 2 are at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/5671/?table6

Power of district registrars (sections 15, 23 and 29)

46. Sections 15 and 23 of the Bill make provision so that a district registrar may require specified nationality evidence when a couple is seeking to enter a marriage or a civil partnership.

47. The Scottish Government considers that these provisions are useful to:
- verify information provided on the marriage and civil partnership notice form;
- monitor where couples come from in terms of national patterns and trends;
- combat sham and forced marriage;
- enable the registrar to remind any non-UK nationals that he or she may wish to take steps to ensure the marriage or civil partnership is recognised in his or her own country.

48. Section 29 of the Bill corrects an erroneous cross-reference. Section 39C(1)(a)(i) of the Registration of Births, Deaths and Marriages (Scotland) Act 1965 currently refers to the “registers of births, deaths and marriages transmitted to the Registrar General under section 34(3) of this Act”. This reference should be to section 34(4) of the 1965 Act which provides that “The district registrar for a registration district shall, at such time or times as the Registrar General may direct, transmit a relevant register to the Registrar General”.

Alternatives

49. The obvious alternative is to do nothing. However, on sections 15 and 23 the Scottish Government considers this would be a missed opportunity to improve marriage and civil partnership procedures. On section 29, this would be a missed opportunity to correct a minor error in the statute book.

Marriage outwith Scotland: evidence of dissolution of former civil partnership (section 17)

50. Section 17 of the Bill makes provision so that if a person wants to marry outwith Scotland and seeks a certificate about his or her legal capacity to do so, the person must provide a copy of the decree of dissolution or annulment of any previous civil partnership. This provision clarifies the law in this area.

Alternatives

51. The obvious alternative is to do nothing. However, the Scottish Government considers this would be a missed opportunity to clarify the law in this area.

Deacons of the Church of Scotland (section 18)

52. The Church of Scotland has asked the Registrar General to authorise its deacons to solemnise opposite sex marriage. The Church of Scotland’s celebrants are authorised automatically by virtue of section 8 of the 1977 Act. Section 8 currently refers to “a minister of the Church of Scotland”. That definition excludes the Church’s deacons.
This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

53. Since 1 March 2006, Church of Scotland deacons have been given temporary authorisation to solemnise marriage under section 12 of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977.

54. The Scottish Government considers it appropriate for deacons of the Church of Scotland to be authorised to solemnise opposite sex marriage by virtue of their position within the Church. Section 18 of the Bill makes provision to that effect.

Alternatives

55. Instead of authorising deacons of the Church of Scotland in section 8 of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977, the Scottish Government could have done nothing. That would have meant continuing to authorise them temporarily under section 12 of the 1977 Act. However, the Scottish Government sees no good reason for them not to be authorised automatically and the Church of Scotland has asked for the change to be made. The authorisation of deacons has worked well since 2006 and needs to be put on a permanent statutory footing.

56. Around 1,050 respondents to the second consultation commented on this proposal. Many just noted that this was a matter for the Church of Scotland. Some responses suggested that within the Christian faith, marriages should only be solemnised by ministers of religion and, therefore, Church of Scotland deacons should not be authorised to solemnise marriage. The Church of Scotland welcomed the provision.

Marriage and civil partnership schedules and certificates of no impediment (sections 16 and 22)

57. Section 16(2)(a) of the Bill amends section 6 of the 1977 Act so that the regulations to prescribe the form of the marriage schedule may make different provision for different cases or circumstances. This allows the form of the marriage schedule for opposite sex marriage to be different to the form for same sex marriage.

58. Section 16(2)(b), (3) and (4) of the Bill also increases the minimum period that must elapse before the marriage schedule or a certificate of no impediment should be issued after notice of intention to marry has been submitted by the parties to an intended marriage. Section 22(7), (8), (12) and (18) of the Bill makes similar changes in relation to issuing civil partnership schedules and the issue of a certificate of no impediment where two people propose to enter into a civil partnership in England and Wales but one of them resides in Scotland.

59. Currently, these documents should not generally be issued within 14 days. The Bill changes that so that they should not generally be issued within 28 days.

10 See the Church of Scotland’s response on question 4: http://www.actsparl.org/media/148778/or-cofs-sgmarragecpbill-mar13.pdf
60. It remains possible for the Registrar General to authorise the registrar to issue a schedule earlier, on a specified date. Section 22(8)(c) of the Bill makes it clear that a request for early registration of a civil partnership can be made electronically – this creates an equivalent provision to section 6(4A) of the 1977 Act.

61. Section 22(18) of the Bill relates to section 97 of the 2004 Act. Section 97(5) of the 2004 Act makes provisions for objections in writing to the district registrar against the issue of a certificate of no impediment. The amendment inserted by section 22(18)(b) makes it clear that any such objection may be submitted electronically.

Alternatives

62. The obvious alternative is to do nothing and not make the changes. However, the Government considers that separate marriage schedules may be required so that, for example, the forms for opposite sex marriage can continue to refer to “bridegroom” and “bride”. The changes to the time periods reflect the reality of the length of time it can take to check that a person is eligible to marry or enter into a civil partnership in Scotland.

63. The consultations did not cover issues in relation to marriage and civil partnership schedules. The Government decided at a late stage to include provisions in the Bill on time periods to reflect the reality of the existing workload.

64. On separate marriage schedules, some religious bodies indicated at meetings with the Government that they would have concerns if the current references to “bridegroom” and “bride” should be removed from the marriage schedules for opposite sex marriage.

Qualifying requirements to apply to religious and belief bodies (sections 10, 11, 12 and 22)

65. The Registrar General for Scotland authorises a wide range of bodies to solemnise marriage. All marriages and civil partnerships in Scotland ought to be conducted in a dignified and solemn manner that reflects the seriousness of the commitment involved. The Government is also concerned about sham and forced marriages taking place in Scotland.

66. We would like all celebrants to be informed about and equipped to deal with a marriage that is potentially a sham or a forced marriage.

67. Therefore, to ensure that marriages and civil partnerships are carried out with dignity, are not sham or forced and are not carried out for profit or gain, the Bill contains a power for Scottish Ministers to prescribe qualifying requirements. A religious or belief body would have to meet these requirements before its celebrants could be authorised to solemnise marriage or register civil partnership.

68. The second consultation outlined, at paragraph 2.21, the type of requirements which might be laid down in regulations:

---

11 This table shows the number of marriages in Scotland in 2011 by denomination, where the denomination solemnised 10 marriages or more: http://www.gro-scotland.gov.uk/files2/stats/ve-rectables-2011/ve2011-t7.7.xls the body and its celebrants would not be allowed to solemnise marriages or register civil partnerships for profit or gain; the body would have to show that its celebrants were trained in areas such as tackling forced marriage and sham marriage;

the body would have to show that its celebrants discuss the forthcoming marriage or civil partnership with the couple;

the body would have to show that its celebrants have a track record in carrying out relevant ceremonies (e.g. marriages recognised by the state; marriages or blessings not recognised by the state; funerals; and baptisms or baby namings).

69. The Scottish Government will consult on any regulations before they are brought into effect. Any qualifying requirements would not apply to the Church of Scotland in relation to opposite sex marriage. Under section 8 of the 1977 Act, as amended by this Bill, Church of Scotland ministers and deacons are authorised automatically to solemnise opposite sex marriage.

Alternatives

70. The primary alternative to introducing qualifying requirements for religious and belief bodies would be to do nothing – that is, to continue using the current system of authorisation.

71. The Scottish Government values the diversity of bodies authorised to solemnise marriage and expects that diversity to grow further on the introduction of belief celebrants. That diversity places a responsibility on the Government to ensure a degree of consistency of approach. The Government’s aim is to uphold the good reputation of marriage in Scotland and to tackle the problems of sham and forced marriages.

72. Another alternative would be to change the law so that only civil marriage ceremonies would be legally recognised by the state. The Scottish Government rejected that approach for the reasons set out at paragraphs 22 to 27.

73. Some respondents to the consultation on the draft Bill suggested that the qualifying requirements should also apply to the Church of Scotland. Recognising the national status of the Church of Scotland, the Government does not intend to remove the automatic authorisation of Church of Scotland celebrants to solemnise opposite sex marriage under section 8 of the 1977 Act.

74. Around 1,200 respondents to the second consultation commented on this proposal. A number noted that more detail was required (e.g. draft regulations) before they could make substantive comment. Other comments included:

- support for work against forced and sham marriages;
- concerns about placing too many burdens on religious and belief bodies [the Scottish Government and the Registrar General would intend to work closely with bodies on any training that might be required];
• concerns about how bodies from outwith Scotland could demonstrate a track record [the Scottish Government and the Registrar General would take account of track records established outwith Scotland];
• bodies currently prescribed under the Regulations so that their celebrants can solemnise marriage should not have to reapply [the Scottish Government and the Registrar General expects that such bodies would comply with the qualifying requirements];
• the qualifying requirements should not be used to discriminate against religious bodies opposed to same sex marriage [that is not the intention of the Scottish Government of the Registrar General];
• greater clarity is needed on what is meant by “profit or gain” [the Scottish Government and the Registrar General would intend to discuss this further when consulting on draft regulations].

Second marriage ceremony: form of endorsement (section 20)

75. Section 20 of the 1977 Act makes provision for a couple to go through a second marriage ceremony in Scotland if they have already married outwith the United Kingdom but there is some doubt about the validity of the overseas ceremony. Section 20 of the 1977 Act sets out the form in which the authorised registrar is to make an endorsement on the Marriage Schedule once it has been signed by the parties following the second marriage ceremony. Section 20 of the Bill amends the form of the endorsement. At the moment, the 1977 Act provides that the year in these forms should start with the figures “19”, reflecting the twentieth century.

Alternatives

76. None were considered given this is a straightforward matter.

Sheriff court jurisdiction in relation to declarator of marriage (section 21)

77. Section 21 of the Bill amends the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973 to make it clear that, in certain circumstances, the sheriff court has jurisdiction in relation to declarators of opposite sex marriage. Section 4 of the Family Law (Scotland) Act 2006 amends the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1907 to provide that actions for declarator of (opposite sex) marriage or nullity of (opposite sex) marriage are competent not only in the Court of Session but also in the sheriff courts. It is considered, however, that further amendments to the 1973 Act are needed to ensure that the intention behind the 2006 Act is achieved in relation to declarators of opposite sex marriage.

Alternatives

78. The alternative would have been to make no change. However, this would have left the question of the jurisdiction of the sheriff courts in these cases uncertain.
Dissolution of civil partnership (section 25)

79. The Evidence in Civil Partnership and Divorce Actions (Scotland) Order 2012 removed the need for third party evidence in actions to dissolve civil partnerships using the simplified procedure. Some civil partnerships were dissolved using the simplified procedure and without obtaining third party evidence before the Order came into force on 30 March 2012. Section 25 of the Bill provides that the Order is to be treated as having had effect since 5 December 2005, when civil partnerships were introduced. This means that any decrees of dissolution granted since 5 December 2005 under simplified dissolution procedures are valid, notwithstanding whether the grounds of action were based on third party evidence.

Alternatives

80. One alternative, suggested by a consultee responding to the second consultation by the Scottish Government, would be to provide instead that dissolutions through the simplified procedure could not be challenged just because no third party evidence had been provided. This seems to the Government to have the same effect.

81. A further alternative might be to do nothing. However, this could create uncertainty for couples who dissolved using the simplified procedure without third party evidence before the Order came into force on 30 March 2012.

Bigamy (section 26)

82. Section 26 of the Bill makes bigamy a statutory offence and abolishes the current offence at common law.

83. The Government considers that making bigamy a statutory offence adds clarity to the scope of the offence and ensures the penalties for the offence are proportionate. Common law offences attract a maximum penalty of life imprisonment. We consider life imprisonment to be an excessive penalty for the offence of bigamy.

Alternatives

84. One obvious alternative would be to make no changes. However, the Government wished to clarify the offence and ensure it is committed by a person purporting to enter into a marriage whilst in a civil partnership. This makes it desirable to clarify the scope of the offence by putting it wholly on a statutory footing.

85. Another alternative would be to abolish the offence. However, the Government considers that bigamy can represent a type of fraud. In addition, the offence reflects the Government’s view, and approach in legislation generally, that marriage is between two people.

86. Around 550 respondents to the second consultation commented on making bigamy a statutory offence.

---

12 The simplified procedure can, in essence, be used when there is no dispute over financial matters and no children under 16. More detail on the simplified procedure can be found at http://www.scotcourts.gov.uk/taking-action/divorce-and-dissolution-of-civil-partnership
87. A number supported the proposal. There were some comments on the proposed penalties. Some argued that the proposed penalties (the maximum proposed is imprisonment for up to 2 years) did not reflect the seriousness of the offence. Others considered imprisonment was not an appropriate penalty at all and that alternatives, such as community payback orders, would be more in keeping with the nature of the offence. Some respondents suggested that, assuming all parties are aware of the arrangements, polygamous marriages should be permitted and bigamy should not be an offence at all. The Government made it clear in the second consultation that it had no intention of allowing polygamous marriages to take place in Scotland.

PROVISIONS ON SAME SEX MARRIAGE (SECTIONS 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 14, 24, 27 AND 28, SCHEDULES 1 AND 2 AND ASPECTS OF SECTIONS 10, 11 AND 12)

Introduction of same sex marriage (sections 2, 3, 4, 10, 11 and 12)

88. The Bill introduces same sex marriage into Scots law. Under section 5(4) of the 1977 Act, there is a legal impediment to a marriage where both parties are of the same sex. Section 2 of the Bill removes that impediment. Section 3 of the Bill amends the 1977 Act so that where a party to a marriage is not domiciled in Scotland, a certificate of no impediment from the home jurisdiction is not required if it would not be issued just because the parties to the marriage are of the same sex. Section 4 of the Bill makes provision on how terms such as “marriage” should be interpreted in enactments and documents. The general intention is that such terms in future should cover both opposite sex and same sex marriage.

89. The Government intends to introduce same sex marriage because:

- it will further equality for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) people;
- LGBT people of faith or who hold belief values can be expected to welcome the introduction of religious or belief ceremonies to solemnise same sex marriage;
- a number of religious or belief bodies would wish to solemnise same sex marriage;
- protections are being put in place to protect those religious and belief bodies who do not wish to solemnise same sex marriages.

90. On protections for religious and belief bodies who do not wish to solemnise same sex marriage, the system being put in place to authorise celebrants is based on the system in place to authorise celebrants for opposite sex marriages. The exception to this is that Church of Scotland celebrants will not be authorised on the face of the 1977 Act to solemnise same sex marriage. The system is “opt-in”, so that a body which does not wish to solemnise same sex marriage will not have to do so.

91. Under section 8(1B) of the 1977 Act, as inserted by section 10(2) of the Bill, a same sex marriage can only be solemnised by a civil registrar or a person who is:

- a minister, clergyman, pastor, priest or other celebrant of a religious or belief body prescribed by regulations made by the Scottish Ministers or another person recognised by a prescribed religious or belief body as entitled to solemnise same sex marriage on its behalf;
nominated, by a religious or belief body which has not been prescribed, to the Registrar General to solemnise same sex marriage, and accepted by the Registrar General;

a member of a religious or belief body who has been granted temporary authorisation to solemnise same sex marriage by the Registrar General.

92. Under the Bill:

- a religious or belief body may only be prescribed if it makes a request to the Scottish Ministers;
- there is no duty to make such a request;
- there is no duty on any religious or belief body to nominate any persons to the Registrar General;
- temporary authorisations to solemnise same sex marriage may only be granted by the Registrar General when the religious or belief body of which the person is a member is prescribed or has nominated persons to the Registrar General;
- there is no duty on any person to apply for temporary authorisation;
- there is no duty on any person who is an approved religious or belief celebrant in relation to same sex marriages to solemnise such marriages.

93. In addition, the UK and Scottish Governments are preparing amendments to the Equality Act 2010 to provide further protection in relation to discrimination. Following comments from persons responding to the Scottish Government’s second consultation, and the approach taken in clause 2(6) of the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill, the amendment to the Equality Act for Scotland will:

- cover religious or belief celebrants who do not wish to carry out same sex marriages or civil partnerships, even if their body has opted in. The amendment on which the Scottish Government consulted just protected against sexual orientation discrimination. The amendment now will protect against discrimination claims generally. In addition, the amendment will not now depend, as originally proposed, on there being a conflict with the celebrant’s religious or philosophical beliefs;
- cover other persons (e.g. the organist, the choir and the choirmaster) who play an integral part in the religious or belief aspects of the marriage or civil partnership ceremony;
- protect a person controlling the use of religious or belief premises who refuses to allow the premises to be used for a same sex marriage or civil partnership.

Alternatives

94. The Scottish Government considered a number of potential alternatives to the introduction of same sex marriage through religious or belief and civil ceremonies.
95. The first alternative was to do nothing and just retain civil partnerships for same sex couples and not extend marriage to same sex couples.

96. The Scottish Government considers that there would be several disadvantages to continuing only to provide civil partnership for same sex couples. These are as follows:

- it would deny same sex couples the opportunity to marry solely on the grounds that they are of the same sex. There are impediments to marriage (e.g. under 16 years of age or already married) and, at the moment, being of the same sex is one of them. It seems reasonable to allow consenting same sex couples to marry;
- the introduction of same sex marriage will further equality for LGBT people. Not introducing same sex marriage would remove this opportunity to advance equality;
- not introducing same sex marriage would deny same sex couples of faith or with belief values the opportunity of having a religious or belief marriage ceremony;
- it would not end the requirement for a couple to divorce following the issue of an interim gender recognition certificate. Paragraphs 110 to 118 set out the changes the Bill makes in this area.

97. Many people and organisations hold the view that marriage can only ever be between a man and a woman. The Government has made clear its respect for this view and has taken a number of steps in the Bill (e.g. the protections for religious and belief bodies and section 14 on freedom of speech) to recognise the concerns expressed. However, the Government does not consider that marriage can only ever be between a man and a woman. As the first consultation noted, in paragraph 3.11, “same sex couples, like opposite sex couples, can and do establish loving relationships which they wish to formalise in a manner recognised by the state, and in some cases by the religious body to which they belong”.

98. A second alternative could have been the introduction of same sex marriage through civil ceremonies only. The Scottish Government consulted on this in the first consultation: question 12 asked “do you agree with the introduction of same-sex civil marriage only?”. Of those responding to question 12, 79% were against the introduction of same sex civil marriage only, and only 6% of those responding were in favour.

99. This option would allow same sex couples to marry, but not within their faith or belief system. The Scottish Government knows that for some LGBT people and for some religious and belief bodies, being able to celebrate same sex marriages within their faith or belief community is a matter of considerable importance. This option would not have provided equality with opposite sex marriage.

100. A third alternative could have been an opt-out system for celebrants. Under this system, authorisations of religious and belief celebrants to solemnise opposite sex marriage would have been extended to same sex marriage. It would have been made clear that religious and belief

---

13 Arguments put forward by consultees against same sex marriage were summarised in paragraphs 6.6 to 6.14 of the analysis of the first consultation: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/5671/8
14 See http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/5671/9#table16 bodies and celebrants who did not wish to solemnise same sex marriage would not have been required to do so.

101. The first consultation sought views on this issue. Question 17 asked: “which of the options do you favour to ensure that religious bodies and celebrants do not have to solemnise same sex marriage against their will?” Of those who responded, 9% supported an opt-out system; 50% supported an opt-in system; 31% favoured neither option and 10% did not know.\(^\text{15}\)

102. The Government considers that an opt-in system provides better protection for religious and belief bodies and celebrants and the Bill, therefore, makes appropriate provision.

Changing civil partnership to marriage (sections 7, 8 and 9)

103. A number of people in a civil partnership may wish to change their relationship to a marriage. Section 7 of the Bill allows couples who registered a civil partnership in Scotland\(^\text{16}\) to have a marriage ceremony in order to make the change. Section 9(1)(b) of the Bill provides for the responsibilities and rights that a couple acquired during their civil partnership to continue within the marriage. For instance, where spouses wish to divorce, the couple’s “matrimonial property” will include property that would have been considered “partnership property” during the time the couple were in a civil partnership with each other.

104. Section 8 of the Bill provides a power for Ministers to make regulations to establish an administrative procedure for the parties to a qualifying civil partnership to change their civil partnership into a marriage. This reflects that some people who entered into a civil partnership in Scotland may wish to change their relationship to a marriage through an administrative process rather than a marriage ceremony or may now live outwith Scotland and, as a result, may not find it easy to return to Scotland to undergo a marriage ceremony.

105. Section 9 of the Bill makes provision on the effect of two civil partners changing their relationship by marrying. The general effect is that the civil partners are to be treated as having been married since they registered their civil partnership. Where civil partners change their relationship to a marriage through administrative procedures, section 8(2)(g) allows Ministers to make provision by regulation on the effect of doing so. The intention is that the effect would be the same as if the civil partners had changed their relationship by undergoing a marriage ceremony.

Alternatives

106. One alternative would have been to restrict changing civil partnerships to marriage only to those couples who registered their civil partnership when same sex marriage was not available.

\(^{15}\) See http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/5671/9#table18

\(^{16}\) Under section 7(3) of the Bill, this includes civil partnerships registered overseas through UK consular services or the UK armed forces, so long as the couple elected Scotland as the relevant part of the UK and details of the civil partnership have been sent to the Scottish Registrar General
107. The Government rejected this option for two reasons. First, it would not have allowed for the possibility of a couple changing their mind about the type of relationship they wished to enter into. For example, a couple might acquire religious faith and consider that they should be married rather than in a civil partnership. Secondly, the proposals to allow transgender people in a civil partnership to stay together (outlined at paragraph 114) largely rest on the civil partnership being changed into a marriage.

108. A second alternative would be to allow persons who entered into a civil partnership outwith Scotland to change their relationship to a marriage in Scotland. Some consultees responding to the Government’s second consultation suggested this. The Government has rejected this as it could lead to a person having two legal statuses at the same time: e.g. married in Scotland but in a civil partnership in the Netherlands. The UK Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill makes provision at clause 9 for civil partners who registered their civil partnership in England and Wales to change their relationship to a marriage, through procedures to be set out in regulations.\(^ {17} \)

109. A number of consultees responding to the Government’s second consultation suggested that there should be an administrative route to change a civil partnership to a marriage. Section 8 of the Bill now includes provision to establish, through regulations, an administrative route to change a civil partnership to a marriage. This was not included in the consultation draft of the Bill.

Transgender persons (section 28 and schedule 2)

110. The law on gender recognition is set out in the Gender Recognition Act. This gives the Gender Recognition Panel (“the Panel”) power to issue a person meeting certain criteria with a Gender Recognition Certificate (GRC). Under section 9(1) of the Gender Recognition Act, when a full GRC is issued to a person “the person’s gender becomes for all purposes the acquired gender (so that, if the acquired gender is the male gender, the person’s sex becomes that of a man and, if it is the female gender, the person’s sex becomes that of a woman).”

111. The Gender Recognition Act currently provides that where a successful applicant to the Panel is married or in a civil partnership, the Panel should issue the applicant with an interim GRC. The interim GRC does not change the applicant’s sex. It allows the applicant to get a divorce or to dissolve his or her civil partnership. Once the court has ordered the divorce or dissolution, the applicant will receive a full GRC.

112. In other words, at the moment a couple must divorce or dissolve their civil partnership before a full GRC can be issued. The Scottish Government consider that this requirement places a couple who wish to stay together in an extremely difficult position. Therefore, schedule 2 to the Bill, and section 28, makes changes to enable couples who married in Scotland or entered into a civil partnership in Scotland\textsuperscript{18} to stay together.

\(^ {17} \) The UK Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill is at http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/bills/lbill/2013-2014/0029/14029.pdf This version takes account of amendments made in the House of Commons before the Bill moved to the House of Lords.

113. For a married person:

- where an application is made to the Panel and both parties to the marriage wish to stay married evidence must be provided to the Panel accordingly, through statutory declarations (paragraph 3 of schedule 2);
- this enables the Panel to issue a full GRC (paragraph 4 of schedule 2);
- provision is also made to allow a full GRC to be issued where an interim GRC has been issued and the couple decide within 6 months to stay married (paragraph 5 of schedule 2);
- the Registrar General, with the approval of the Scottish Ministers, may make provision through regulations on the registration of marriages (which are continuing following the issue of a full GRC) through an administrative procedure (paragraph 8 of schedule 2);
- in addition, the Scottish Ministers, after consulting the Registrar General, may make regulations about a renewal marriage ceremony following the issue of a full GRC (section 28 of the Bill).

114. For civil partners who wish to stay together:

- the Bill provides that when both parties to a civil partnership obtain a full GRC on the same day, the civil partnership can continue (paragraph 6 of schedule 2);
- the Registrar General, with the approval of the Scottish Ministers, may make provision through regulations on the registration of civil partnerships (which are continuing following the issue of a full GRC to each of the civil partners) through an administrative process (paragraph 8 of schedule 2);
- in addition, the Scottish Ministers, after consulting the Registrar General, may make regulations about a renewal civil partnership ceremony following the issue of a full GRC (section 28 of the Bill);
- in other cases, a full GRC can be issued after an interim GRC when, within 6 months, the civil partners have changed their civil partnership to a marriage (paragraph 5 of schedule 2);
- provision is also made for the possibility of a more streamlined system for civil partners who wish to stay together and change their relationship to a marriage to be established by an order made by the Scottish Ministers, after consulting the Registrar General (paragraph 6 of schedule 2).

\textsuperscript{18} Paragraph 2 of schedule 2 makes provision so that certain civil partnerships and marriages registered overseas through UK consular services and the UK armed forces are treated as having been registered in Scotland for these purposes.
115. The Bill does not affect the ability of married couples and of civil partners to divorce or dissolve their civil partnership on the grounds of the issue of an interim GRC having been issued, if they wish to do so.

Alternatives

116. The second consultation suggested that the Scottish Bill could cover applications to the Panel by persons resident in Scotland. However, the UK Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill bases jurisdiction on where the couple married or entered into a civil partnership. It is appropriate for the Scottish Bill to follow this as, otherwise, some people could miss out. For example, if the Scottish Bill had been based on residence, a person who married in Scotland but now lives in England would not have been covered by either the UK or the Scottish Bill.

117. A couple may only use the provisions in the Scottish Bill where their marriage was solemnised or their civil partnership registered in Scotland. Some consultees suggested that the Scottish Bill should go further and cover people who married or entered into a civil union outwith Scotland. The Government has rejected this option. The UK Bill covers persons who married overseas (the definition of “protected marriage” at paragraph 14 of Schedule 5 to the UK Bill refers). On civil partnerships, as outlined at paragraph 108 above, the Scottish Government’s approach prevents a person from having more than one legal status at the same time.

118. A number of consultees suggested that the process should be made as straightforward as possible. The Scottish Government has tried to reflect these comments in the procedures now contained in schedule 2 to the Bill, which reflect closely similar proposals in Schedule 5 to the UK Bill.

Freedom of speech (section 14)

119. Many stakeholders have raised the concern that if the Scottish Parliament legislates to introduce same sex marriage, it will be more difficult to publicly express opposition to such marriages.

120. Section 14 of the Bill is designed to make it clear that although the Bill introduces same sex marriage, the Bill does not affect the exercise of:

- the right in the European Convention of Human Rights to freedom of thought, conscience and religion;
- the right in the European Convention of Human Rights to freedom of expression;
- any equivalent right conferred by rule of law.

Alternatives

121. One alternative would be not to include section 14 in the Bill. The Bill does not contain any provision which limits or attempts to limit any of the rights which section 14 refers to.

---

19 As indicated above, certain overseas marriages and civil partnerships through UK consular services and the UK armed forces will be treated as having been registered in Scotland for these purposes.
However, the Scottish Ministers nonetheless considered it helpful to include provision on freedom of speech on the face of the Bill. The Scottish Government recognise the wide range of views that people hold about marriage. Section 14 underlines the Government’s commitment to upholding and protecting human rights across society.

122. Some consultees have suggested that the Scottish Government should go further.

123. In education, for example, there have been suggestions that:

- there should be specific legislation in place to protect teachers who would not wish to use certain types of teaching materials which might mention same sex marriage or homosexual relationships;
- there should be legislation in place to allow parents to withdraw their children from any lesson which might mention same sex marriage.

124. The Government’s approach to education was outlined in Annex C to the second consultation. In brief:

- the Government plans no changes to section 9 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980, which allows parents to withdraw any pupil from any instruction in religious subjects;
- the faith content of the curriculum at Roman Catholic state schools is decided by the Scottish Catholic Education Service on behalf of the Bishops’ Conference of Scotland. The Government is committed to maintaining this;
- the Scottish Government has no plans to make any changes to denominational education generally;
- there is a specific exclusion in the Equality Act 2010 in respect of the contents of the curriculum. Section 89(2) of the 2010 Act provides that: “Nothing in this Chapter applies to anything done in connection with the content of the curriculum”. Therefore, the provisions of the 2010 Act about discrimination and protected characteristics do not have a direct effect on the content of the curriculum in schools;
- the General Teaching Council for Scotland issues Professional Standards for teachers and other guidance material, including the Code of Professionalism and Conduct;
- all employers are required by the public sector equality duty to give consideration to religious beliefs of their employees. All local authorities have procedures in place to handle any moral objections by teachers;
- the Scottish Government is not seeking any changes to existing UK employment legislation which protects teaches, and other employees, against unfair dismissal;

---

20 Annex C to the second consultation is at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/9433/272400
21 The General Teaching Council for Scotland’s website is at www.gtcscotland.org.uk
• legislative provision on providing information to parents in relation to their child’s education is contained in the Education (School and Placing Information) (Scotland) Regulations 2012;
• paragraph 13 of Education Circular 2/2001 allows parents to withdraw children from specific programmes of sexual health education, although it does also encourage participation. The Scottish Government is committed to maintaining this right and intends to update the Circular;
• the Scottish Government does not consider that it would be appropriate to allow parents to withdraw children from any lesson where same sex marriage, civil partnerships or homosexuality might be mentioned. This could cut across a child’s right to an education and could be impracticable.

125. There have also been suggestions that there should be a provision in the Bill laying down that civil registrars do not have to solemnise same sex marriage. The Bill does not have a provision of this nature for a variety of reasons:
• civil registrars ( unlike religious and belief celebrants) are carrying out a civil function. Therefore, it is not appropriate to provide an opt-out for civil registrars based on religious or belief grounds;
• the registration of civil partnerships by civil registrars has worked well in Scotland;
• provision in the Bill relating to civil registrars would cut across the relationship civil registrars have with their employer – the local authority. The Government does not consider it would be helpful to intervene in this way.

126. In other areas, the Government is considering if it would be helpful to amend existing guidance on fostering to make it clear that a would-be fosterer should not be rejected just because of his or her views on same sex marriage.

Adultery, impotency and reset (section 5)
127. Under section 1 of the Divorce (Scotland) Act 1976, there are two grounds of divorce: irretrievable breakdown of the marriage, or one of the spouses being issued with an interim gender recognition certificate after the date of the marriage.
128. The irretrievable breakdown of a marriage may be established if, since the date of the marriage, the defender in an action of divorce has committed adultery. Adultery is defined in the common law to mean sexual intercourse with a member of the opposite sex outwith of marriage.

23 These can be found at http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ssi/2012/130/contents/made
25 There is a recent relevant decision by the European Court of Human Rights: http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/sites/eng/pages/search.aspx?i=001-115881#itemid:115881]. This relates to a civil registrar (Ms Ladele) in England who did not to wish register civil partnerships. The Court did not hold that there had been a violation of the Convention.
The Government’s understanding is that the leading Scottish case in this area is MacLennan v MacLennan.

129. The judge in this case considered some English cases on non-consummation. From these, the judge concluded that in relation to adultery “according at least to the law of England:- 1. For adultery to be committed there must be the two parties physically present and engaging in the sexual act at the same time. 2. To constitute the sexual act there must be an action of union involving some degree of penetration of the female organ by the male organ. 3. It is not a necessary concomitant of adultery that male seed should be deposited in the female’s ovum. 4. The placing of the male seed in the female ovum need not necessarily result from the sexual act, and if it does not, but is placed there by some other means, there is no sexual intercourse”.

130. The judge went on to say that: “I can find nothing to persuade me that the law of Scotland is not the same as the law of England so far as the legal propositions above enunciated are concerned (although non-consummation of the marriage is not a ground of nullity in the law of Scotland) and, in my opinion, these propositions are equally valid in our law.”

131. Section 5(3) of the Bill amends the Divorce (Scotland) Act 1976 to provide that “for the avoidance of doubt, in relation to marriage between persons of the same sex, adultery has the same meaning as it has in relation to marriage between persons of different sexes.” That means that for any couple, whether same sex or opposite sex, the existing definition of adultery (sexual intercourse with a person of the opposite sex outwith of marriage) will continue to apply.

132. If a spouse in a marriage (whether same sex or opposite sex) considers that his or her spouse has committed sexual infidelity which is not covered by the definition of adultery, he or she may seek a divorce on the grounds of unreasonable behaviour or the basis of non-cohabitation.

133. The Scottish Government publishes statistics on divorce. These show that the number of divorces on the basis of adultery in 2010/11 was 65 (out of 10,112 divorces) and the number in 2011/12 was 64 (out of 9,863 divorces).

134. Section 5(2) of the Bill provides that any rule of law which provides for a marriage to be voidable by reason of impotence only has effect in relation to opposite sex marriage. The Government considers this rule would be hard to apply to same sex marriage and, in any effect, is of limited effect.

---

26 The judgment in this case can be found at <http://judgmental.org.uk/judgments/ScotCS/1958/[1958]_ScotCS_CSOH_5.html>

27 In Scotland, irretrievable breakdown of the marriage can be shown in four ways: adultery; unreasonable behaviour; non-cohabitation for 1 year (where both parties agree to the divorce); non-cohabitation for 2 years (where one party does not agree to the divorce).

This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

135. Section 5(1) of the Bill provides that any rule of law under which a wife who receives or conceals stolen goods stolen by her husband is, in certain circumstances, not guilty of reset only applies to opposite sex marriage. Again, the Government considers this rule would be hard to apply to same sex marriage and, in any effect, is of limited effect.

Alternatives

136. One alternative would be to remove adultery as a way of demonstrating the irretrievable breakdown of a marriage. Some consultees responding to the Scottish Government’s consultation suggested this option. The adultery basis for divorce is seldom used and it is likely that behaviour which is adulterous would also satisfy the basis of unreasonable behaviour. In a consultation paper on family law issued in the year 2000, called “Parents and Children”29, the then Scottish Executive asked for views on whether the fault bases of adultery and unreasonable behaviour could be merged into a single fault basis.

137. There was considerable opposition to this proposal30 and it was not proceeded with.

138. The Scottish Government’s views on removing adultery from divorce law now are:
   - it has not consulted on this specific proposal and would need to do so, given responses to previous consultations;
   - this is not the right Bill in which to be making such a major change to divorce law;
   - it appears that for a small number of spouses, it may be important to have the civil court find that the other spouse was adulterous.

139. On impotence, a number of consultation responses suggested that the idea that impotency (or any other medical condition) should be grounds for voiding a marriage was archaic. Consultees suggested that impotency should be abolished as grounds for voiding a marriage. However, other consultees suggested that the concept of “voidable” marriages can have some advantages, particularly for those who might wish to enter another marriage but might not be able to do so (on religious grounds) if they were divorced.

140. On reset, a clear alternative is to abolish the defence. The Government is considering if that option should be taken up at some point.

141. A second alternative on adultery would be to extend the definition of so that it would cover homosexual activity as well as heterosexual intercourse. Some consultees responding to the Government’s second consultation suggested this option. If this option were followed, the Scottish Government assumes that such an extended definition would apply to both opposite sex and same sex marriage so that, unlike now, an opposite sex spouse could cite homosexual activity outwith marriage as adultery when raising an action for divorce.

142. The Scottish Government is not following this option, for several reasons:

29 See http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Justice/law/17867/FLSA2006/13804/ParentsandChildren (Paragraphs 4.8 and 4.9)
• it would not confer any additional rights. A spouse (whether opposite sex or same sex) who is unhappy about sexual infidelity not covered by the current definition of adultery could raise a divorce action and cite unreasonable behaviour (or non-cohabitation);
• it is not clear what further sexual activity (homosexual and heterosexual) would be covered. A spouse may be unhappy with a wide variety of conduct – e.g. looking at another person; kissing; hugging as well as forms of sexual activity. A line would need to be drawn somewhere as to what does, and does not, constitute adultery. It is doubtful that this is useful activity given that, as indicated above, divorce would still be available for a spouse concerned about infidelity;
• it is not clear what effect such a change would have on the small number of spouses for whom adultery forms a useful part of divorce law.

143. A further alternative might be to remove section 5(3) from the Bill and leave it up to the courts to determine what would or would not be considered as “adultery” in the context of same sex marriage. That does not seem satisfactory when the matter can be clarified by a provision such as section 5(3).

THE SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT CONSULTATIONS

144. The first consultation took place between 2 September and 9 December 2011 on the registration of civil partnership and same sex marriage. That is a 14 week consultation period, longer than the usual 12 weeks.

145. That consultation sought views on the possibility of allowing religious ceremonies for civil partnerships and the possible introduction of same sex marriage.

146. Counting all types of responses, over 77,000 responses were received to this consultation: the largest number of responses to a Scottish Government consultation. The Government published an analysis of the responses to that consultation on 25 July 2012. The responses from organisations that gave permission for their responses to be published are also available online.31

147. The Scottish Government acknowledges that a significant number of those responding to the 2011 consultation were opposed to the introduction of same sex marriage. Details of the number of responses received, and the views expressed in relation to same sex marriage, can be found in the analysis32.

148. A number of consultees have asked why the Government is proceeding with same sex marriage although most respondents to the first consultation were opposed. A number of points arise:

31 These are available at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/9221.
32 See http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/5671/8#table13 for information on what views the respondents to the first consultation on same sex marriage.
• a consultation is not a referendum on a particular proposal. Instead, a consultation is a way of seeking views, on detailed points as well as on matters of principle;
• the first consultation also showed significant support in Scotland for the introduction of same sex marriage;
• the Bill reflects comments made in the first consultation. For example, there are strong protections for religious and belief bodies and celebrants, with an opt-in method to be approved to solemnise same sex marriage.

149. Between 12 December 2012 and 20 March 2013, the Government consulted on the draft Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill. Again, this was a 14 week period.

150. The Scottish Government received around 15,000 responses to this consultation. The analysis and responses from organisations that gave permission for their responses to be published are available on-line\textsuperscript{33}. Key changes made to the Bill following the consultation and before the Bill was introduced to Parliament are outlined in paragraphs 152 to 164 below.

Consultation meetings

151. The Scottish Government met a wide range of organisations to discuss its proposals. It is grateful to all those who took the time to share their views. Bodies the Scottish Government met include:

• Associated Presbyterian Churches
• Baptist Union of Scotland
• CARE (Christian Action Research and Education)
• Christian Institute
• Church of Scotland
• Equality Network
• Evangelical Alliance
• Free Church of Scotland
• Free Church of Scotland (Continuing)
• Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland
• Gender Recognition Panel User Group
• Glasgow Central Mosque
• Humanist Society Scotland
• Lanarkshire Muslim Women’s Alliance
• LGBT Youth
• Methodist Church

\textsuperscript{33} They can be accessed through http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Justice/law/17867/samesex
This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

- Metropolitan Community Church
- Muslim Council of Scotland
- Pagan Federation of Scotland
- Quakers
- Roman Catholic Church
- Salvation Army
- Scottish Catholic Education Service
- Scottish Council of Jewish Communities
- Scottish Episcopal Church
- Scottish Interfaith Council
- Scottish Transgender Alliance
- Stonewall
- Unitarian Church
- United Free Church of Scotland
- United Reformed Church.

Changes between the draft Bill and the Bill as introduced to Parliament

152. Following the consultation on the draft Bill, the Scottish Government made some changes to the Bill. The main changes are as follows.

Marriage by cohabitation with habit and repute

153. We have removed the section which would have repealed the remaining law on marriage by cohabitation with habit and repute\(^34\). Section 3(3) and (4) of the Family Law (Scotland) Act 2006 extended the concept of marriages through cohabitation with habit and repute to cases where a couple erroneously believed themselves to be married overseas but it transpires after one of them dies that the marriage was not valid. Part of the rationale for repealing these provisions was that the 2006 Act, including section 29, improved rights for cohabitants. However, a number of consultees noted that the proposed repeal could remove rights from certain people and section 29 might not be an adequate solution. Given these points, we are not proceeding with the repeal of section 3(3) and (4).

154. Given the terms of section 4 of the Bill, section 3(3) and (4) of the 2006 Act will now extend to same sex relationships as well as opposite sex relationships.

\(^{34}\) The discussion on this in the second consultation was at paragraphs 2.28 to 2.31: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/9433/272394
Section 4: meaning of marriage and related expressions in enactments and documents

155. Section 4 of the Bill makes provision on how terms such as “marriage” should be interpreted in legislation and private documents following the introduction of same sex marriage. The Government has extended and clarified this section so that, for example, it covers references in legislation to unmarried persons living together as if they were husband and wife. This reflected comments by consultees that it was not clear how the provisions of the Bill would relate to references in enactments to cohabitants.

Jurisdiction

156. The Scottish Government has added provisions on jurisdiction to the Bill at section 6 and schedule 1. These provide for the Scottish courts to have jurisdiction in relation to same sex matrimonial actions which mirrors the courts’ jurisdiction in relation to opposite sex matrimonial actions.

157. The Bill also makes provision for the Scottish courts to have jurisdiction in certain circumstances where no other court has jurisdiction. Those provisions are designed to assist a couple who married in Scotland but continued to live in a country which does not recognise same sex marriage. For example, it might not be possible for such a couple to get a divorce in their home country.

158. Section 21 of the Bill now clarifies the jurisdiction of the sheriff court in relation to declarators of opposite sex marriage. More details explaining the reasons for these changes are provided at paragraphs 77 and 78 of this Memorandum.

Changing qualifying civil partnership into marriage

159. Section 8 now allows Ministers to make regulations on administrative procedures for changing civil partnerships into marriages. This is in addition to section 7, on civil partners changing their relationship by undergoing a marriage ceremony. Section 8 has been added following comments from consultees that an administrative route should be available (e.g. to cover people who entered into a civil partnership in Scotland but now live overseas and who might not wish to return to Scotland to undergo a marriage ceremony).

Belief ceremonies

160. Instead of introducing separate belief ceremonies, the Bill now makes provision so that non-civil ceremonies are “religious or belief”. The definitions relating to “belief” have been amended to remove references to “humanitarian”. More details explaining the reasons for these changes are provided at paragraphs 15 to 30 of this Memorandum.

Marriage and civil partnership schedules

161. The Bill now changes the usual period for issuing of schedules from not less than 14 days to not less than 28 days. The Bill also makes provision so that different marriage schedules could be prescribed for opposite sex marriage when compared with same sex marriage. More details on these changes are provided at paragraphs 57 to 61 of this Memorandum.
Bigamy

162. Changes have been made to the proposed statutory offence of bigamy. In particular, the penalties following summary conviction and the existing offence at section 100 of the 2004 Act, on purporting to enter into a civil partnership when already married or in a civil partnership, have been clarified.

Transgender people

163. The Bill now contains provisions on transgender persons. The consultation on the draft Bill outlined possible approaches to policy on transgender persons. The Bill now contains detailed provisions that reflect points made in consultation. The provisions are in line with the approach that the UK Government has taken in the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill. More details on the provisions are provided at paragraphs 110 to 118 of this Memorandum.

Modifications to the Family Law (Scotland) Act 1985

164. The Scottish Government removed schedule 1 as it appeared in the consultation draft of the Bill. The schedule modified the Family Law (Scotland) Act 1985. The Bill allows a couple to change their civil partnership to a marriage. The schedule was designed to ensure that the time in the civil partnership could be counted towards the period of the marriage. The provisions are no longer considered necessary. The policy intention is the same, but the Government has determined that section 9(1)(b) of the Bill achieves the desired effect.

EFFECTS ON EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES, HUMAN RIGHTS, ISLAND COMMUNITIES, LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT

Equal opportunities

165. The second consultation included a draft Equality Impact Assessment.

166. On religion and belief, a number of bodies have expressed their concern about the introduction of same sex marriage. The Scottish Government has tried to mitigate these by providing protections, such as the protections outlined at paragraphs 90 to 93 for religious and belief bodies and celebrants. Other religious and belief bodies have welcomed the planned introduction of same sex marriage and the opportunities for them to take part.

167. On sexual orientation, the Bill allows same sex couples to marry, thus increasing equality of opportunity.

168. On gender reassignment, the Bill removes the requirement on married transgender people to divorce before obtaining a full GRC. It also makes provision so that transgender people in a civil partnership can obtain a full GRC and stay together (in the civil partnership if both are acquiring a new gender or by changing the relationship to a marriage if one of them is acquiring a new gender). This increases equality of opportunity markedly for those affected.

35 This is at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/9433/272408
169. On age, data is available on the ages at which people marry or enter into a civil partnership and on how views on same sex marriage can be affected by the age of the person holding the views. However, it is hard to see any equality impact on the protected characteristic of age.

170. There is no evidence that the Bill has any impact on the protected characteristics of disability or race.

171. On sex, it appears that more women than men enter into civil partnership. However, it is hard to see any equality impact on the protected characteristic of sex.

Human rights

172. The Scottish Government considers that the Bill appropriately balances various rights. Those include the rights of those wishing to enter into a same sex marriage or civil partnership and the rights of religious and belief bodies and celebrants who do not wish to solemnise same sex marriages or register civil partnerships.

173. The Bill allows same sex couples to marry. It allows religious and belief celebrants who wish to solemnise such marriages, and register civil partnerships, to do so but also contains no requirement on any religious or belief body or on any religious or belief celebrant to make a request or apply to be authorised to solemnise or register a same sex marriage or civil partnership. The Bill respects the right of celebrants to hold any beliefs in relation to the solemnisation of same sex marriages and registration of civil partnerships. The Bill also makes it clear, in section 14, that the introduction of same sex marriage has no adverse impact on existing rights to freedom of expression.

174. The provisions of the Bill appear to the Government to be a proportionate response, dealing with conflicting aspirations.

175. The Government understands that the leading ECHR case on same sex marriage is Schalk and Kopf v Austria. Paragraph 61 of the judgment notes that “the question whether or not to allow same-sex marriage is left to regulation by the national law of the Contracting State”. Paragraph 62 goes on to say that: “In that connection the Court observes that marriage has deep-rooted social and cultural connotations which may differ largely from one society to another. The Court reiterates that it must not rush to substitute its own judgment in place of that of the national authorities, who are best placed to assess and respond to the needs of society”.

176. Therefore, the Government considers its proposals on same sex marriage and the religious or belief registration of civil partnerships are in line with the leading relevant case from the European Court of Human Rights.

177. In addition, the Government does not consider that any of the other provisions in the Bill conflict with the European Convention on Human Rights.

36 The judgment in Schalk and Kopf v Austria is at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/sites/eng/pages/search.aspx?i=001-99605#"itemid":"001-99605"
Island communities

178. The Bill has no identified differential effect on Scotland’s island communities.

Local government

179. The Bill has an impact on registration services provided by local government. These are considered in more detail in the Financial Memorandum and in the partial Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment (BRIA) prepared as part of the second consultation.

180. In brief, local authorities will no longer need to approve places where civil marriage ceremonies can take place. In future, civil marriage ceremonies can take place anywhere (other than religious premises) agreed between the couple and the registrar. Local authorities may lose licensing income in relation to approved places but will also be relieved of a licensing burden. There may also be increased demand for civil marriage ceremonies.

181. Local authority registrars will also need to familiarise themselves with arrangements for same sex marriage and for religious and belief registration of civil partnership. Familiarisation should be straightforward as arrangements are built on existing arrangements.

Sustainable development

182. The Bill has no effect on sustainable development.

SECTION 104 ORDER

183. There are a number of consequences flowing from the Bill which are matters reserved to the UK Parliament under the Scotland Act 1998. The Scottish Government and the UK Government will prepare an order under section 104 of the 1998 Act to cover these matters. The order will be voted on at Westminster.

184. At the moment, the Scottish Government has identified the following areas to be covered by the order:

- the amendment to the Equality Act 2010 to provide further protection as regards discrimination (more details on this are contained in paragraph 93);
- amendments to the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992; the Pension Schemes Act 1993 and the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 2008. These enactments are all reserved. The amendments made to them by the UK Bill following the proposed introduction of same sex marriage south of the border only extend to England and Wales and so amendments will be needed for Scotland;
- provision for Scottish same sex marriages to be recognised as civil partnerships in Northern Ireland;

37 The partial BRIA is at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/9433/272407
This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

- ensuring that references to being married in existing and new legislation are taken to be read as applying equally to opposite sex and same sex marriage in relation to reserved matters. (Section 4 of this Bill only extends to devolved matters);

- amendment to section 14 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 to reflect that the Bill makes bigamy a statutory offence in Scotland rather than a common law offence;

- provision so that transgender people who married or entered into a civil partnership in Scotland but now live elsewhere in the UK are recognised under the laws applying elsewhere in the UK, as well as under Scots law;

- potentially, provisions to protect Scottish religious and belief celebrants carrying out armed forces weddings overseas, so that they do not need to carry out same sex ceremonies. (Schedule 6 to the UK Bill already has protections but these may need to be extended for marriages having a connection with Scotland);

- potentially, provisions to allow transgender persons resident in England and Wales but who married in Scotland to go to the High Court to appeal if they were issued with the incorrect Gender Recognition Certificate.
This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

DELEGATED POWERS MEMORANDUM

PURPOSE

1. This Memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government in accordance with Rule 9.4A of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, in relation to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill. It describes the purpose of each of the subordinate legislation provisions in the Bill and outlines the reasons for seeking the proposed powers. This Memorandum should be read in conjunction with the Explanatory Notes and Policy Memorandum for the Bill.

2. The contents of this Memorandum are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Scottish Parliament.

BACKGROUND

3. The Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill makes a number of changes to marriage and civil partnership law. Key points in the Bill are:

- It allows same sex couples to get married, with protections for religious bodies and celebrants who do not wish to take part.
- It puts belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants.
- It introduces the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships.
- It makes provision so that persons in a civil partnership registered in Scotland can change the civil partnership into a marriage.
- It makes provision so that persons who are married can stay married and obtain a full Gender Recognition Certificate, providing legal recognition in their acquired gender.
This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

- It gives the Scottish Ministers power to prescribe in regulations qualifying requirements which religious and belief bodies must meet before their celebrants are authorised to solemnise marriage or register civil partnerships.

- It allows civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere agreed between the couple and the registrar, except in religious premises.

- It makes bigamy a statutory offence.

- It makes provision so that deacons of the Church of Scotland are authorised on the face of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 (“the 1977 Act”) to solemnise opposite sex marriage.

4. The Bill follows two consultations by the Scottish Government. The first consultation ran from 2 September 2011 to 9 December 2011. It was on general principles and attracted around 77,500 responses. The second consultation ran from 12 December 2012 to 20 March 2013. It was on a draft Bill and attracted around 15,000 responses.

APPROACH TO USE OF DELEGATED POWERS

5. The Government has had regard, when deciding where and how provision should be set out in subordinate legislation rather than on the face of the Bill, to:

- the need to strike the right balance between the importance of the issue and providing flexibility to respond to changing circumstances (for example, changes in relation to the existence and doctrine of religious or belief bodies) and to make changes quickly without the need for primary legislation;

- the need to allow detailed administrative and procedural arrangements to be kept up to date within the basic structures and principles set out in the primary legislation;

- the need to make proper use of valuable Parliamentary time; and

- the need to anticipate the unexpected, which might otherwise frustrate the purpose of the provision in primary legislation approved by the Parliament.

DELEGATED POWERS

Section 4(8) to (9) – meaning of marriage and related expressions in enactments and documents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>The Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>order</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>negative procedure</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Provision

6. Section 4(1) to (6) makes provision on how references to terms such as marriage in existing legislation and at common law should be interpreted. The provisions give the result that such terms will be interpreted to include same sex marriages. The power at subsection (8) gives the Scottish Ministers an order-making power to provide that the subsections have effect in a different way or do not apply. Such an order can, under subsection (9), include provisions which are consequential, supplementary, incidental, transitional, transitory or saving.

Reason for taking power

7. The general intention is that, in future, references to “marriage” and to married couples will be interpreted as including both same sex and opposite sex couples. However, there may be a small number of exceptions, reflecting that rights and responsibilities may not be exactly the same. For example, in public sector pension schemes, the intention is that same sex married couples will be treated in the same way as civil partners, rather than in the same way as opposite sex married couples. So contrary provision to the general intention may be required.

8. The power also allows consequential, supplementary, incidental, transitional, transitory or saving provision to be made. This reflects that the desired result may not be achievable by simply modifying or dis-applying the effect of any of the subsections (1) to (6). Additional provision may be necessary to ensure the intended meaning in terms of the order is clear. For example, in some cases provision may be needed to reflect the position of married transgender people, who may have been in an opposite sex marriage and which may become a same sex marriage.

9. It is also possible that transitional, transitory or saving provision may be needed in an order where, for example, the aim is to disapply the general intention for a limited period of time only, to allow adjustments to be made to take account of the general intention.

Choice of procedure

10. It is considered that negative procedure will offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expedition and convenience and, on the other, the need for scrutiny for provisions of this nature. The power does not extend to amending primary legislation but rather can only be used to modify the effect of or disapply any of subsections (1) to (6). The Government expects to discuss any potential order with key stakeholders beforehand to obtain technical and policy comments on what is proposed.
Section 8(1) – change of qualifying civil partnership into marriage

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers, after consultation with the Registrar General of Births, Deaths and Marriages for Scotland

Power exercisable by: regulations

Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure, unless amendments are made to primary legislation in which case the affirmative procedure applies

Provision

11. This provision relates to procedures by which qualifying civil partnerships can change their civil partnership to marriage by means of an administrative process. Under section 8(7), “qualifying civil partnership” is defined by reference to section 5(6) of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 (as inserted by section 7(3)(b) of the Bill). The definition covers civil partnerships registered in Scotland and certain civil partnerships registered overseas through the UK diplomatic service and the UK armed forces.

12. The provision allows regulations to be made covering the application process; the information required from the applicants; evidence needed; any requirement to attend at a particular place or appear before a particular person; the conferring of functions (including in relation to the recording of information and issuing certified copies of any such information); fees and the effect of changing a qualifying civil partnership into a marriage.

Reason for taking power

13. The Bill, at section 7, already allows qualifying civil partners to change their civil partnership to a marriage by going through a marriage ceremony. However, some civil partners (for example, persons who registered in Scotland but now live overseas) may wish to change their civil partnership to a marriage through administrative arrangements. The detailed arrangements may be complex – the Government would intend to establish a working group to consider them. Therefore, it is appropriate to set out the detailed provisions in secondary legislation rather than on the face of the Bill.

14. The power includes the ability to make consequential, supplementary, incidental, transitional, transitory and saving provision and the ability to modify any enactment including the Bill.

15. This reflects that, for example, changing a qualifying civil partnership to a marriage may have an effect on the existing registration of the civil partnership and provision may be required on what the consequences of that effect should be. Provision may include altering existing legislation about, for example, the register of civil partnerships.
16. Provision may also be needed on the effect of changing a civil partnership to a marriage. Section 9 of the Bill makes provision on the effects of having a marriage ceremony to change a civil partnership to a marriage. The general intention is that when civil partners in a qualifying civil partnership become married through administrative arrangements established under section 8, the effect of that change will be the same as in section 9(1) of the Bill. Consequential provision may be needed using the powers at section 8(5) on the effects of changing a civil partnership to a marriage through administrative arrangements, for example to make provision similar to section 9(6) and (7) in the Bill.

17. Provision may also be needed in respect of people in a civil partnership who obtain an interim gender recognition certificate. Under section 4C(3) of the Gender Recognition Act 2004, inserted by paragraph 5 of schedule 2 to the Bill, a person in a protected Scottish civil partnership (defined by amendments at paragraph 2 of schedule 2) may, in certain circumstances, make an application to change an interim gender recognition certificate to a full gender recognition certificate. (A full gender recognition certificate provides legal recognition in an acquired gender).

18. Section 4C(3) operates on the basis that the civil partners change their civil partnership to a marriage through a ceremony. The powers at section 8(5) may need to be used to amend section 4C(3) to reflect any administrative arrangements established under section 8 to change civil partnerships to marriages.

Choice of procedure

19. In line with usual practice, the regulations will be subject to affirmative procedure if they amend any primary legislation. Given the likelihood, as mentioned above, that there will be a need to amend provisions in the Gender Recognition Act 2004, the Government considers it likely that an order under these powers would be used to amend primary legislation and, therefore, affirmative procedures would apply. If any order should not amend primary legislation, it would appear appropriate for negative procedure to apply, given that the provisions are detailed and technical and deal with procedural matters.

Section 9(4) and (5) – effect of marriage between civil partners in a qualifying civil partnership

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

20. Section 9(1)(b) of the Bill provides that when civil partners in a qualifying civil partnership have a marriage ceremony to change their relationship to a marriage, the civil partners are to be treated as having been married to each other since the date on which the qualifying civil partnership was registered.
21. Section 9(3)(b) provides that this is subject to any contrary provision made by order under subsection (4). The power at subsection (4) gives the Scottish Ministers an order-making power to provide that section 9(1)(b) has effect in a different way or does not apply. Such an order can, under subsection (5), include provisions which are consequential, supplementary, incidental, transitional, transitory or saving.

Reason for taking power

22. The general intention is that same sex couples who change their civil partnership into a marriage should be regarded as having been married from when they first entered into the civil partnership. This is relevant, for example, if the couple subsequently divorce. Under the Family Law (Scotland) Act 1985, financial provision is based on a concept of “matrimonial property”. This is, broadly, property acquired for and during the marriage. It could produce perverse results if property acquired for and during the preceding civil partnership did not count as part of the “matrimonial property”.

23. However, there may be circumstances where it is not always appropriate to treat same sex couples who change their civil partnership into a marriage as having been married from when they first entered into the civil partnership. For example, provision may be needed in relation to civil partnerships which turn out to be void but are changed into marriage before it is realised they are void so the marriage is not backdated to when the civil partnership first started. In addition, there may be a need to recognise any court decrees from outwith Scotland which relate specifically to civil partnerships.

24. The power includes the ability to make consequential, supplementary, incidental, transitional, transitory and saving provision. It may not be straightforward to make provision for cases where marriages formed after changing civil partnerships to a marriage are not to be treated as having been formed when the civil partnership was first entered into. For example, any provision relating to the recognition of foreign decrees applying to civil partnerships which have now become marriages might need to outline what recognition should be given to such decrees and whether there should be any time limits on the recognition of such decrees.

Choice of procedure

25. It is considered that negative procedure will offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expedition and convenience and, on the other, the need for scrutiny for provisions of this nature. The power does not extend to amending primary legislation but rather can only be used to modify the effect of or disapply subsection (1)(b) in specified cases. The Government expects to discuss any potential order with key stakeholders beforehand to obtain technical and policy comments on what is proposed.
Section 10(2)(a)(ii) (amendment to section 8(1)(a)(ii) of the 1977 Act) – Persons who may solemnise marriage: power to prescribe religious or belief bodies whose celebrants are authorised to solemnise opposite sex marriage

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Section 10(2)(b) (inserted section 8(1B)(a)(i) of the 1977 Act) – Persons who may solemnise marriage: power to prescribe religious or belief bodies whose celebrants are authorised to solemnise same sex marriage

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Section 22(13) (inserted section 94A(1)(a)(i) of the 2004 Act) – Registration of civil partnership: power to prescribe religious or belief bodies whose celebrants are authorised to register civil partnerships

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

26. Section 10(2)(a)(ii) of the Bill amends section 8(1)(a)(ii) of the 1977 Act. This amendment extends the existing regulation-making power to allow the Scottish Ministers to prescribe religious or belief bodies whose celebrants are authorised to solemnise opposite sex marriage. The existing power relates to religious bodies only.

27. Section 10(2)(b) of the Bill inserts a new subsection (1B) into section 8 of the 1977 Act. Section 8(1B)(a)(i) allows the Scottish Ministers to prescribe religious or belief bodies whose celebrants are authorised to solemnise same sex marriage.

28. Section 22(13) of the Bill inserts section 94A into the Civil Partnership Act 2004 (“the 2004 Act”). Section 94A(1)(a)(i) allows the Scottish Ministers to prescribe religious or belief bodies whose celebrants are authorised to register civil partnership.

Reason for taking power

29. Section 10(2)(a)(ii) amends existing powers in the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 in relation to prescribing religious bodies whose celebrants are authorised to solemnise opposite sex marriage.
30. There are, at the moment, four ways in which celebrants can be authorised to solemnise marriage. Church of Scotland ministers are automatically authorised by section 8(1)(a)(i) of the 1977 Act; religious bodies can be prescribed by regulations made under section 8(1)(a)(ii); other religious bodies can nominate persons to the Registrar General for Scotland to be registered to solemnise marriage under section 9 and the Registrar General may give temporary authorisation for celebrants under section 12.

31. The effect of prescribing bodies by regulations is that their celebrants are then authorised to solemnise marriage. The reason for prescribing bodies is to reduce bureaucracy: it saves them from having to regularly nominate persons to the Registrar General. There may be bodies whose celebrants solemnise a large number of ceremonies each year\(^2\). Authorising their celebrants by name under section 9 is likely to be onerous for them and for the Registrar General who deals with each application.

32. Prescribing bodies under section 8, rather than authorising persons under section 9, also effectively places an onus on the body to ensure that their celebrants are following appropriate procedures on the conduct of ceremonies. Whereas if a celebrant is authorised by name under section 9, the Registrar General may, under section 10 of the 1977 Act, remove that person from the register where procedures have not been complied with.

33. The amendments made by section 10(2)(a)(ii) of the Bill allows the Scottish Ministers to prescribe belief bodies whose celebrants would then be authorised to solemnise opposite sex marriage. This reflects the overall policy intention to place belief bodies on the same footing as religious bodies in relation to opposite sex marriage.

34. Paragraph 2.26 of the Scottish Government’s second consultation, on a draft Bill, noted that the current regulations (SI 1977/1670) need to be revised. The current regulations are made under the existing powers. The consultation noted that one body (the Congregational Union of Scotland) no longer exists; another body, the United Reformed Church, has indicated that it would like to be prescribed; and, with the exception of the Hebrew Congregation, all of the bodies currently prescribed are Christian and there may be scope to prescribe other non-Christian bodies. In their response to the second consultation, the Scottish Council of Jewish Communities (SCoJeC) noted that the nomenclature of “The Hebrew Congregation” should be changed to “The Jewish Community”\(^3\).

35. The Scottish Government would intend to contact extant bodies which are currently prescribed, and other major religious and belief bodies, and ask if they would wish to be prescribed so their celebrants could solemnise opposite sex marriage in future. The Government expects to consult publicly on prescribing bodies. Any consultation would be linked to the “qualifying requirements”: the “qualifying requirements” are explained at paragraphs 45 to 62 below.

---

\(^3\) The SCoJeC response to the second consultation is at http://www.scojec.org/consultations/2013/13iii_marriage_and_civil_partnership.pdf The comments on nomenclature are at the end of the response.
36. Section 10(2)(b) of the Bill allows Ministers to prescribe religious or belief bodies whose celebrants are authorised to solemnise same sex marriage.

37. This power in section 10(2)(b) is separate to the power in section 8(1) to prescribe religious or belief bodies whose celebrants are authorised to solemnise opposite sex marriage. This separate power reflects that a number of bodies who wish to solemnise opposite sex marriage may not wish to solemnise same sex marriage.

38. Some bodies which are prepared to solemnise same sex marriage may have celebrants who object to doing so, notwithstanding the position of the body they belong to. In these cases, the Scottish Government would not expect to prescribe the body using the power in section 8(1B) of the 1977 Act. Instead, the body could, under section 9 of the 1977 Act, as amended by the Bill, nominate persons to the Registrar General to be empowered to solemnise same sex marriage. This would allow the body to nominate only those persons who are content to solemnise same sex marriage.

39. The Scottish Ministers would expect to consult publicly on prescribing bodies whose celebrants would be authorised to solemnise same sex marriage. Any consultation would be linked to the “qualifying requirements”: the “qualifying requirements” are explained at paragraphs 45 to 62 below.

40. Section 22(13) of the Bill inserts section 94A into the 2004 Act. Section 94A(1)(a)(i) allows the Scottish Ministers to prescribe religious or belief bodies whose celebrants are authorised to register civil partnership. At the moment, civil partnerships can only be registered through a civil ceremony. The Bill changes that to allow them to be registered through a religious or belief ceremony as well. The proposed procedures are in line with the procedures used to authorise celebrants to solemnise marriage. Therefore:

- religious or belief bodies can be prescribed by regulations so that their celebrants are authorised to register civil partnership; or
- the names of persons wishing to be empowered to register civil partnership can be put forward by religious or belief bodies to the Registrar General.

41. In addition, the Registrar General may grant temporary authorisations.

42. As with marriage, the reason for prescribing bodies is to reduce bureaucracy. It saves such bodies from having to regularly nominate persons to the Registrar General and saves the Registrar General from having to deal with individual applications. Where members of a religious or belief body have mixed views on carrying out services for same sex couples, it may be appropriate for a body to nominate persons to the Registrar General rather than be prescribed by regulations.

43. The Scottish Ministers would expect to consult publicly on prescribing bodies whose celebrants would be authorised to register civil partnerships. Any consultation would be linked to the “qualifying requirements”: the “qualifying requirements” are explained at paragraphs 45 to 62 below.

Choice of procedure

44. The Scottish Government considers that negative procedure will provide the appropriate level of scrutiny in relation to regulations which list religious or belief bodies. Before making the regulations, the Scottish Government will have liaised with the bodies to confirm that they wish to be prescribed. The existing regulation-making power in section 8(1)(a)(ii) of the 1977 Act on prescribing of religious bodies is not subject to negative or affirmative parliamentary procedure, consistent with the general approach taken by the 1977 Act.

Section 10(2)(b) (inserted section 8(1E) of the 1977 Act) – Persons who may solemnise marriage: power in relation to qualifying requirements for bodies to meet before they can be prescribed so their celebrants are authorised to solemnise marriage

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Section 11(2)(e) (inserted section 9(2A) of the 1977 Act) – Registration of nominated persons as celebrants: power on qualifying requirements for nominating bodies to meet when putting forward persons to the Registrar General to be empowered to solemnise marriage

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Section 12(2)(b) (inserted section 12(1D) of the 1977 Act) – Temporary authorisation of celebrants: power on qualifying requirements in relation to temporary celebrants

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Section 22(13) (inserted section 94A(5) of the 2004 Act) – Registration of civil partnerships: power in relation to qualifying requirements for bodies to meet before they can be prescribed so their celebrants are authorised to register civil partnerships

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure
Section 22(13) (inserted section 94(B)(3) of the 2004 Act) – Registration of civil partnership: power on qualifying requirements for nominating bodies to meet when putting forward persons to the Registrar General to be empowered to register civil partnership

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Section 22(13) (inserted section 94E(4) of the 2004 Act) – Registration of civil partnership: power on qualifying requirements in relation to temporary authorisations to register civil partnerships

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

Qualifying requirements in respect of prescribed religious or belief bodies so its celebrants can solemnise marriage

45. Section 10(2)(b) of the Bill inserts subsection (1A) into section 8 of the 1977 Act. The new subsection (1A) provides that the Scottish Ministers may only prescribe a religious or belief body so that its celebrants can solemnise opposite sex marriage if the body requests to be prescribed and the body meets the qualifying requirements.

46. Section 10(2)(b) of the Bill inserts subsection (1C) into section 8 of the 1977 Act. The new subsection (1C) provides that the Scottish Ministers may only prescribe a religious or belief body so that its celebrants can solemnise same sex marriage if the body requests to be prescribed and the body meets the qualifying requirements.

47. Section 10(2)(b) of the Bill inserts subsection (1E) into section 8 of the 1977 Act. The new subsection (1E) provides that “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

Qualifying requirements when persons are nominated to the Registrar General to solemnise marriage 48. Section 11 of the Bill amends section 9 of the 1977 Act. Under the provisions, religious or belief bodies, other than the Church of Scotland and bodies prescribed by regulations, can put forward to the Registrar General persons they wish to be empowered to solemnise opposite sex marriage. Similarly, religious and belief bodies, other than those prescribed by Statutory Instrument, can put forward to the Registrar General persons they wish to be empowered to solemnise same sex marriage.

49. The Registrar General has to reject nominations when certain circumstances arise. One of these is when, in his or her view, the nominating body does not meet qualifying requirements set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers. Under the new subsection (2A) of section 9 of the 1977 Act, inserted by section 11(2)(e) of the Bill, the “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

Qualifying requirements in respect of temporary authorisation of celebrants to solemnise marriage

50. Section 12 of the Bill amends section 12 of the 1977 Act. Under these provisions, persons who are members of a religious or belief body may obtain temporary authorisation from the Registrar General to solemnise opposite sex or same sex (or both) marriages. Under new subsection (1A) of section 12 of the 1977 Act, inserted by section 12(2)(b) of the Bill, the Registrar General may grant an authorisation only if satisfied that the body of which the person is a member meets the qualifying requirements. Under new subsection (1D) of section 12 of the 1977 Act, the “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

Qualifying requirements in respect of prescribed religious or belief bodies so its celebrants can register civil partnerships

51. Section 22(13) of the Bill inserts section 94A into the 2004 Act, on persons who may register civil partnerships. Section 94A(2)(b) provides that the Scottish Ministers may only prescribe a religious or belief body so its celebrants are authorised to register civil partnerships if Ministers are satisfied that the body meets the qualifying requirements. Section 94A(5) provides that the “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

Qualifying requirements when persons are nominated to the Registrar General to register civil partnerships 52. Section 22(13) of the Bill inserts section 94B into the 2004 Act. This makes provision so that a religious or belief body which has not been prescribed by regulations made under section 94A can nominate to the Registrar General persons who it wishes to be empowered to register civil partnership. Section 94B(2)(d) provides that the Registrar General must reject a nomination if in the Registrar General’s opinion the nominating body does not meet the qualifying requirements. Section 94B(3) provides that the “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

Qualifying requirements in respect of temporary authorisation of celebrants to register civil partnerships

53. Section 22(13) of the Bill inserts section 94E into the 2004 Act. This makes provision so that the Registrar General may grant temporary authorisation to register civil partnerships to any member of a religious or belief body. Section 94E(2) provides that the Registrar General may only grant such an authorisation if satisfied that the religious or belief body of which the person is a member meets the qualifying requirements. Section 94E(4) provides that the “qualifying requirements” are such requirements as may be set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

Reason for taking power

54. Paragraphs 2.15 to 2.17 of the second consultation outlined the rationale for introducing qualifying requirements.

55. As the consultation outlined, the Scottish Government and the Registrar General wish to ensure the integrity of Scottish marriage ceremonies, both opposite sex and same sex, which are legally recognised by the state. One of the strengths of the Scottish system is its diversity and variety. Couples are free to have a civil or religious or belief ceremony. However, recognising a wide range of bodies to solemnise marriages brings its own challenges. As the consultation noted, forced marriages and sham marriages are growing problems.

56. Therefore, the aim of the qualifying requirements is to ensure that religious and belief bodies have robust procedures in place for dealing with issues which may arise in relation to marriage ceremonies. Powers to lay down qualifying requirements for bodies to meet in relation to civil partnerships have also been taken. The Government is not aware of any particular issues at the moment in relation to forced civil partnerships but such issues could arise. Sham civil partnerships could be set up for similar reasons as sham marriages (eg to avoid immigration controls).

57. The type of requirements which might be laid down were outlined in paragraph 2.21 of the second consultation paper. These referred specifically to marriages but similar points could arise in relation to civil partnerships:

- The religious or belief body and their celebrants would not be allowed to solemnise marriages, or register civil partnerships, for profit or gain.
- The religious or belief body would have to show that their celebrants were trained in areas such as tackling forced marriage and sham marriage or civil partnership.
- The religious or belief body would have to show that their celebrants discuss the forthcoming marriage or civil partnership with the couple.
- The religious or belief body would have to show that their celebrants have a track record in carrying out relevant ceremonies (eg marriages recognised by the state; marriages or blessings not recognised by the state; baptisms or baby namings).

58. New sections 8(1F), 9(2B) and 12(1E) of the 1977 Act, inserted, respectively, by sections 10(2), 11(2) and 12(2) of the Bill, allow regulations to make different provision for different cases or circumstances. This would, for example, allow Ministers to distinguish between the requirements to meet to solemnise opposite sex marriage and the requirements to meet to solemnise same sex marriage. Power is also taken in respect of transitional and saving provision. This may be needed in respect of marriages planned before any qualification requirements are put in place.

59. The regulation-making powers added to the 2004 Act are subject to the provisions already in place at section 258 of the 2004 Act.

60. The second consultation made it clear, at paragraph 2.20, that there would be a consultation on any regulations establishing qualifying requirements before the regulations are brought into effect. This would cover any regulations introducing qualifying requirements, whether in relation to marriage or civil partnership.

Choice of procedure

61. The negative procedure applies to all of the regulations, as a result of the following provisions:

- section 8(1G) of the 1977 Act (inserted by section 10(2)(b) of the Bill);
- section 9(2C) of the 1977 Act (inserted by section 11(2)(e) of the Bill);
- section 12(1F) of the 1977 Act (inserted by section 12(2)(b) of the Bill);
- section 126(4) of the 2004 Act, as amended by section 22(20) of the Bill.

62. It is considered that negative procedure will offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expedition and convenience and, on the other, the need for scrutiny for provisions of this nature. There will be consultation on any regulations laying down qualifying requirements. In particular, the Government will work closely with religious and belief bodies, and with National Records of Scotland, before any regulations to lay down qualifying requirements are made. The Government considers that the key aim of ensuring the integrity of marriage and civil partnership ceremonies is shared across society but recognises that the detail will be important for religious and belief bodies, to ensure that what is proposed is practical and realistic.

Section 16(2) – the marriage schedule

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>The Registrar General of Births, Deaths and Marriages for Scotland, with the approval of the Scottish Ministers.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>regulations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>laid before Parliament under section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Provision

63. Section 16(2)(a) amends section 6 of the 1977 Act. Section 6 of the 1977 Act relates to the marriage schedules – forms which are completed when a marriage takes place. In accordance with section 6(1) of the 1977 Act, a marriage schedule is to be in a form prescribed by regulations. Section 26(2) of the 1977 Act provides that “prescribed” means prescribed by regulations made by the Registrar General. The amendment allows different provision for different cases or circumstances.

Reason for taking power

64. The current marriage schedule refers to “bridegroom” and “bride”. These terms are not appropriate in relation to same sex marriage. The amendment would allow different marriage schedules to be prescribed for same sex marriages when compared with opposite sex marriages.

Choice of procedure

65. This provision amends existing powers in the 1977 Act. The approach taken in the 1977 Act is that regulations made by the Registrar General are not subject to negative or affirmative Parliamentary procedures (unless they set fees, when they are subject to the negative procedure). Having no negative or affirmative Parliamentary procedure for this amended power is consistent with the 1977 Act generally. The default position applies under section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, so that the regulations are laid before Parliament.

Section 22(15) – Registration of civil partnership: prescribed forms requiring delivery of civil partnership schedule

Power conferred on: The Registrar General, with the approval of the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: negative

Provision

66. Section 22(15) adds section 95ZA to the 2004 Act. The new provision allows the district registrar to serve notices in the prescribed form if the civil partnership schedule is not delivered to the district registrar.

67. By virtue of section 126 of the 2004 Act, “prescribed” means prescribed by the Registrar General, with the approval of the Scottish Ministers, in regulations subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament (i.e. the negative procedure).
Reason for taking power

68. Currently, civil partnerships can only be registered through civil ceremonies. The Bill introduces religious or belief registration of civil partnerships.

69. As a result, the Bill makes provision for the schedule to be issued to one or both of the parties to the intended civil partnership where the partnership will be registered by an approved celebrant (see the amendments made to section 94 of the 2004 Act by section 22(12)(c) of the Bill). The Bill also makes provision for the schedule to be returned (see new subsection (1A) of section 95 of the 2004 Act, as inserted by section 22(14)(b) of the Bill).

70. The new section 95ZA makes provision on the district registrar serving notices in the prescribed forms if the schedule is not returned. The first notice, which can be served if the district registrar does not receive the schedule within 21 days of the date of registration, requires one of the parties to the civil partnership to deliver the schedule or post it to the registrar within 8 days. The second notice, served if the first is not complied with, requires the person to attend the registration office within 8 days to deliver the schedule to the district registrar.

71. As section 95ZA(2) provides, the purpose of these provisions is to enable the registrar to enter the civil partnership in the register.

72. Failure to comply with the second notice is an offence: see section 100(3A)(d) of the 2004 Act, as added by section 22(19)(b) of the Bill.

73. The provisions in section 95ZA are based on similar procedures in relation to marriage contained in section 16 of the 1977 Act.

Choice of procedure

74. The negative procedure appears appropriate to prescribe a form. This is in line with existing powers to prescribe forms relating to the registration of civil partnerships which are subject to the negative procedure. It would not appear to be an effective use of Parliamentary time to apply affirmative procedures to an SSI prescribing forms. The forms would be straightforward and would be based on similar forms already in place in relation to requiring the delivery of marriage schedules. We do not consider that the content of these forms should merit a higher degree of scrutiny than that already provided for in the 2004 Act in relation to other forms.

Section 28(1) – renewed marriage or civil partnership following issue of full gender recognition certificate

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>The Scottish Ministers after consultation with the Registrar General of Births, Deaths and Marriages for Scotland</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>regulations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>negative procedure, unless amendments are made to primary legislation in which case the affirmative procedure applies</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Provision

75. This provision relates to a married person or person in a civil partnership who has obtained a full Gender Recognition Certificate being able to have a renewal marriage or civil partnership ceremony, to reflect the acquired gender.

76. The regulations could cover: the giving of notice of intention to enter into a renewed marriage or civil partnership; the information required from the parties; evidence needed; any requirement to attend at a particular place or appear before a particular person; the conferring of functions (including in relation to the recording of information, the issue of certified copies of any such information and the conducting of services or ceremonies); fees; and the effect of entering into a renewed marriage or civil partnership.

77. The Bill makes provision, in schedule 2, for married persons to apply to the Gender Recognition Panel and receive a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender. Provision is also made in schedule 2 for civil partners to obtain a full Gender Recognition Certificate when both are acquiring a new gender.

78. The regulation-making power at section 28 enables procedures to be established so that persons can have a renewed marriage or civil partnership ceremony in their acquired gender. This could be used so that the couple could receive a marriage or civil partnership certificate reflecting the acquired gender. There is also a regulation-making power at paragraph 8 of schedule 2 which could allow changes to be made to marriage and civil partnership certificates through administrative procedures.

79. The power includes the ability to make consequential, supplementary, incidental, transitional, transitory and saving provision. This reflects that, for example, undergoing a renewal ceremony may have an effect on the existing registration of the relationship. In addition, further provision may be needed to protect religious and belief bodies and celebrants who would not wish to carry out renewal ceremonies.

80. The Scottish Government, with the Registrar General, will discuss in a working group the detail of any provision in this area. In particular, the Government will discuss with stakeholders the benefits and dis-benefits of establishing procedures under this route and how such procedures will work together with or separately to the powers at paragraph 8 of schedule 2.

Choice of procedure

81. Negative procedure seems appropriate for detailed procedural matters in this area. In line with usual practice, the affirmative procedure will apply if amendments are made to primary legislation.

Section 31 – ancillary provision

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure, unless amendments are made to primary legislation in which case the affirmative procedure applies.

Provision

82. Section 31(1) allows ministers to make by order such supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider necessary or expedient for the purposes of, or in connection with, or for giving full effect to, any provision of the Bill.

Reason for taking power

83. As with any new body of law, the Bill may give rise to a need for a range of ancillary provisions. This Bill makes a number of significant amendments to marriage and civil partnership law. The ancillary provision is needed to ensure that the policy intentions of the Bill are achieved if further changes are found to be necessary as a result of provision in the Bill. The ancillary power is wide-ranging but the Bill needs to interact well with existing legislation as well as practices and procedures in these areas. There are a number of areas which ancillary powers might have to deal with. These include, for example, formally revoking Scottish Statutory Instruments made under powers being repealed under this Bill and ensuring that marriages arranged before changes to celebrant authorisations are made can continue to take place.

84. The power will also allow the Scottish Ministers to make further changes should there be any unforeseen issues. Without this power, it may be necessary to make further primary legislation to deal with a matter which is clearly within the policy intentions of the Bill. The Scottish Government considers that this would not be an effective use of resources by the Parliament or the Scottish Government.

85. The power, whilst potentially wide, is limited to the extent that it can only be exercised if the Scottish Ministers consider it necessary or expedient for the purposes of, or in connection with, or for giving full effect to any provision of the Bill.

Choice of procedure

86. In line with usual practice, orders will follow the affirmative procedure when they are amending primary legislation. Otherwise, they will follow the negative procedure. It is considered that this provides the appropriate degree of parliamentary scrutiny where primary legislation is being amended but will strike the appropriate balance between expedition and convenience on the one hand and, on the other hand, the need for parliamentary scrutiny where subordinate legislation is being amended.
Section 32 – commencement

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order
Parliamentary procedure: laid before Parliament under section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010

Provision

87. Section 32(2) enables the Scottish Ministers to commence the Bill by conferring a power on Ministers, by order, to bring the provisions of the Bill into force on such day as the Scottish Ministers appoint. Section 32(2) provides that such an order may include transitional, transitory or saving provision. This might be required, for example, in relation to marriages being solemnised using existing authorisations under the 1977 Act. It is usual practice for such commencement provisions to be dealt with by subordinate legislation.

Reason for taking power

88. It is standard for Ministers to have powers over the commencement of Bills. It is considered appropriate for the substantive provisions of the Bill to be commenced at such a time as the Scottish Ministers consider to be suitable.

Choice of procedure

89. As is now usual for commencement orders, the default laying requirement in section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act applies. We see no reason to depart from this position in relation to the order-making power in this case. As indicated in paragraph 87, a commencement order may include transitional, transitory or saving provision. The Government expects that any such provision should be straightforward. As indicated in paragraph 87, the particular area we have identified is ensuring that marriages already due to take place under existing authorisations under the 1977 Act when the relevant provisions in the Bill are commenced can continue to take place.

Schedule 1 (paragraph 1(4)) - jurisdiction in proceedings relating to same sex marriages

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative procedure
Provision

90. The Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973 ("the 1973 Act") makes provision on the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts to deal with court actions on divorce, separation, declarator of nullity of marriage and declarator of marriage and on actions for declarator of recognition or non-recognition of relevant foreign decrees.

91. The rules in the 1973 Act often define jurisdiction by reference to Council Regulation 2201/2003 (known as Brussels IIa) on jurisdiction, recognition and enforcement of judgments in matrimonial matters and in the matters of parental responsibility. Paragraph 2 of Schedule 1B to the 1973 Act, as inserted by paragraph 1(4) of schedule 1 to the Bill, creates a power for the Scottish Ministers to make regulations about the jurisdiction of the courts in relevant proceedings in relation to a same sex marriage. The regulations may correspond with the terms of the Brussels IIa Regulation.

92. The regulation-making power also enables the Scottish Ministers to make provision as to the recognition, or non-recognition, in Scotland of any judgment of a court of another member State which orders the divorce, separation or annulment of a same sex marriage.

Reason for taking the power

93. Brussels IIa extends to opposite sex marriage only. The power in the Bill enables equivalent provision to be made for same sex married couples. In relation to the power about recognition of judgments, section 45 of the Family Law Act 1986 makes provision about recognition of overseas judgments in relation to divorce, annulments and legal separation. Section 45(2) specifies that section 45 and subsequent provisions do not apply to such judgments insofar as provision as to recognition is made by the Brussels IIa Regulation.

94. Given that Brussels IIa only applies to opposite sex marriage, it is considered useful for the Scottish Ministers to take a power to make equivalent provision to that set down in Brussels IIa as to the recognition, or non-recognition, of a judgment of a court of another member State in relation to a same sex marriage. The provision on recognition of judgments is capable of applying retrospectively to enable relevant judgments to be recognised even if the judgments were issued prior to the provision being brought into force.

95. Similar provision for civil partners was made in section 219 of the Civil Partnership Act 2004. This power has been used to make the Civil Partnership (Jurisdiction and Recognition) (Scotland) Regulations 2005 (SSI 2005/629)⁴

---

Choice of procedure

96. As this involves jurisdictional issues in a number of areas, affirmative procedure seems appropriate. The equivalent power in section 219 of the 2004 Act is subject to affirmative procedures.

Schedule 2 (paragraph 6) – change of gender of married persons or civil partners

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers, consulting the Registrar General for Scotland
Power exercisable by: order
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure unless amendments are made to primary legislation in which case the affirmative procedure applies.

Provision

97. Schedule 2 to the Bill amends the Gender Recognition Act 2004. This Act makes provision on people applying to the Gender Recognition Panel to obtain legal recognition in an acquired gender. The key policy changes being made by the Bill are to allow a married people and civil partners to stay in their relationship when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender.

98. The Bill makes provision at section 7 for civil partners to change their relationship to a marriage and obtain a full Gender Recognition Certificate. Paragraph 6 of schedule 2 would allow an order to be made to introduce a more streamlined process, to reduce the number of steps civil partners would have to go through to change their civil partnership to a marriage and obtain the full Gender Recognition Certificate. The order could cover the evidence or other information required with the application; procedures to be followed; the effect of issuing a full Gender Recognition Certificate and provision to change the civil partnership into a marriage.

Reason for taking power

99. The aim is to introduce a more streamlined procedure to reduce the number of steps which civil partners would have to go through. The procedures may be detailed and so it is appropriate for them to be included in an order rather than on the face of the Bill. Potential procedures could include the applicant in a civil partnership applying to the Gender Recognition Panel to obtain recognition in an acquired gender; the applicant including statutory declarations to show that both parties wish to stay in the civil partnership; the Panel granting a full Gender Recognition Certificate and the couple then changing their civil partnership to a marriage.

100. Power is taken to amend primary legislation in cases changes are required to the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977, the Gender Recognition Act 2004 and the Civil Partnership Act 2004.
This document relates to the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 36) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 26 June 2013

Choice of procedure

101. Negative procedure appears appropriate for detailed procedures matters of this nature. In line with usual practice, orders would follow the affirmative procedure if they are amending primary legislation.

Schedule 2 (paragraph 8) – change of gender of married persons or civil partners

Power conferred on: Registrar General, with the approval of the Scottish Ministers

Power exercisable by: regulations

Parliamentary procedure: negative resolution

Provision

102. Paragraph 8 of schedule 2 contains provisions to allow the Registrar General, with the approval of the Scottish Ministers, to make regulations on the registration of qualifying Scottish marriages and civil partnerships.

Reason for taking power

103. Following gender recognition where the person has stayed in his or her relationship, changes may be required to marriage and civil partnership certificates. These changes may be carried out by an administrative route or may follow a renewal marriage or civil partnership ceremony (as outlined in section 28 of the Bill). This power allows the Registrar General, with the approval of the Scottish Ministers, to lay down detailed procedures. Procedures could include the issue of a revised marriage or civil partnership certificate to reflect gender acquisition. In addition, it may be necessary for a link to be made from the original certificate to the revised certificate so that the parties to the marriage or the civil partnership can have access to both.

104. It is customary for the Registrar General to be involved in making regulations relating to registration.

105. The Government and the Registrar General will discuss the detail of procedures in this area with key stakeholders.

Choice of procedure

106. Negative procedure is considered appropriate for detailed procedural matters of this nature as the regulations would simply be setting out an administrative process under which qualifying marriages and civil partnerships may be registered and relevant certificates issued following the acquisition of a new gender. There will be consultation with key stakeholders on these regulations. In particular, NRS and the Government will work closely with the transgender community so that those who could be affected by any registration procedure will be given the opportunity to express their views and ensure that what is proposed is practical and realistic.

Scottish Government
June 2013
Equal Opportunities Committee

5th Report, 2013 (Session 4)

Stage 1 report on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill

Published by the Scottish Parliament on 8 November 2013
Equal Opportunities Committee

5th Report, 2013 (Session 4)

CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Remit and membership</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Report</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Summary of conclusions</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marriage reform</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scottich Government consultations</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary scrutiny</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marriage: Meaning and Purpose</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Significance of gender</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Equality and human rights</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social attitudes</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The impact on marriage</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Legitimacy to reform</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pace of reform</td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A catalyst with consequences?</td>
<td>36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Conclusion</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Protections and freedom of expression</td>
<td>39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The ‘opt-in’ approach for religious and belief celebrants</td>
<td>39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Protections for public-sector employees and commercial-service</td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>providers</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fears of attrition</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Balancing the rights of all parties</td>
<td>62</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Conclusion</td>
<td>63</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Registration of celebrants</td>
<td>63</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Belief bodies</td>
<td>63</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Position of the Church of Scotland</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Conclusion</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Civil Partnerships</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shortcomings</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Treatment in the Bill of civil partnerships registered abroad</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The future of civil partnerships</td>
<td>69</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Conclusion</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Change of gender of married persons or civil partners</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Removing the requirement to end marriages and civil partnerships</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Equal Opportunities Committee

Remit and membership

Remit:

1. The remit of the Equal Opportunities Committee is to consider and report on matters relating to equal opportunities and upon the observance of equal opportunities within the Parliament.

2. In these Rules, “equal opportunities” includes the prevention, elimination or regulation of discrimination between persons on grounds of sex or marital status, on racial grounds or on grounds of disability, age, sexual orientation, language or social origin or of other personal attributes, including beliefs or opinions such as religious beliefs or political opinions.”

(Sitting Orders of the Scottish Parliament, Rule 6.9)

Membership:

Christian Allard (from 22 May 2013)
Marco Biagi (from 18 September 2012) (Deputy Convener from 8 November 2012)
Mary Fee (Convener) (until 4 September 2013)
John Finnie
Annabel Goldie (from 16 November 2011 until 16 January 2013)
Alex Johnstone (from 17 January 2013)
John Mason (from 30 October 2012)
Margaret McCulloch (Convener) (from 5 September 2013)
Siobhan McMahon
Dennis Robertson (until 16 May 2013)

Committee Clerking Team:

Clerk
Douglas Thornton

Assistant Clerk
Ailsa Burn-Murdoch
Equal Opportunities Committee
5th Report, 2013 (Session 4)

Stage 1 report on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill

The Committee reports to the Parliament as follows—

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS

Marriage: meaning and purpose

We note the differing views expressed in evidence on the meaning and purpose of marriage.

(Paragraphs 1 to 121)

Protections and freedom of expression

We note stakeholders’ varying views on the approach taken in the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”) towards protecting celebrants of faith and religious organisations’ freedom to conduct legally valid marriages in keeping with their doctrines. We ask the Scottish Government to consider those views in its approach to the amending stages of the Bill.

(Paragraphs 122 to 206)

Registration of celebrants

We note the explanation in the Scottish Government’s Policy Memorandum as to why the Bill maintains two categories of ceremony rather than adding ‘belief’ ceremonies as a separate category. However, we also note the point raised by the Scottish Council of Jewish Communities – supporting the change aiming to designate, for example, Humanist marriages as other than ‘religious’, but disagreeing with the approach taken of designating them and religious marriages together as ‘religious or belief marriage’ rather than as ‘religious marriage or belief marriage’ – and seek the Scottish Government’s view on the suggested amendment to the redefinition of non-civil marriages, to more prominently reflect the distinction between religious ceremonies and belief ceremonies.
We seek the Scottish Government’s view on the opinion expressed by the Humanist Society Scotland that the treatment in marriage law of the Church of Scotland affords it a privileged status.

(Paragraphs 207 to 213)

Civil partnerships

We note that the Scottish Government plans to consider issues relating to reform of civil partnerships, including opposite-sex civil partnerships, in its forthcoming review.

We note that the Bill creates a requirement that those same-sex couples who have entered into a civil partnership in another country must dissolve their partnership before being permitted to marry in Scotland. We believe that if same-sex marriage is introduced, these couples should have similar access to the proposed administrative procedure for conversion of civil partnership to marriage as couples whose civil partnerships were conducted in Scotland.

(Paragraphs 214 to 247)

Change of gender of married persons or civil partners

We note the Scottish Government’s position that it has struck the right balance regarding gender-neutral ceremonies, and that allowing such ceremonies could cause problems for denominations that might not want to use a gender-neutral marriage declaration when marrying an opposite-sex couple. However, we believe that it should be possible to allow a choice of gender-neutral or gender-specific language for marriage declarations and call on the Scottish Government to reconsider its position.

We note evidence calling for the requirement for spousal consent to be removed from the gender recognition process. We accept the Scottish Government’s view that, whilst the non-transitioning spouse has at least two years to take action, it may be the application to the panel that makes a non-transitioning spouse consider his or her options. We realise that spouses of people seeking gender recognition may find themselves in circumstances that are very difficult to face and that we have not received evidence from their perspective. However, we believe that the non-transitioning spouse’s personal choice is sufficiently protected by the automatic grounds for divorce triggered by his or her partner’s seeking gender recognition. We therefore believe the requirement for spousal consent for gender recognition is unnecessary and should be removed.

We draw two further conclusions regarding gender recognition issues raised in evidence, whilst recognising that it may not be possible to deal with them effectively within the scope of the Bill—

- Regarding the difficulties facing long-termed transitioned people, we welcome the Scottish Government’s willingness to consult relevant stakeholders further with a view to lodging an amendment at Stage 2.
• We note the representations made to us about lowering the age requirement. We do not consider that we have received sufficiently comprehensive evidence in this area and ask the Scottish Government to provide, in advance of Stage 2, a detailed response on the issue.

(Paragraphs 248 to 281)

Impact on other areas of life

We draw the Parliament’s attention to the views expressed as regards the relationship between the Bill and public services, including educational matters.

(Paragraphs 282 to 334)

Delegated powers

We note and support the recommendations put forward by the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, and ask that the Scottish Government provide a response in relation to the recommendations and any relevant amendments lodged should the Bill progress.

(Paragraphs 335 to 348)

General principles

We have considered the general principles in the context of opinions expressed in written and oral evidence to us. We recognise the validity of perspectives on all sides of this issue and draw the Parliament’s attention to the depth, range and sincerity of the views submitted to us. We recommend to members of the Parliament to approach the Stage 1 decision with the same dignified tenor as our evidence sessions and with due respect for a diversity of views.

The majority of the Committee supports the general principles of the Bill and recommends that Parliament approves the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1. A minority of the committee does not support the Bill because they disagree in principle or because they are not convinced that adequate protections are in place. We wholeheartedly support the right of individual members to decide on the Bill as a matter of conscience.

(Paragraphs 349 to 351)
MARRIAGE REFORM

1. The Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”), introduced in the Parliament on 26 June 2013, covers the following key matters relating to marriage law—

   • the introduction of same-sex marriage
   • putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants
   • the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite-sex and same-sex marriage
   • civil partnerships changing to marriage
   • the authorisation of Church of Scotland deacons to solemnise opposite-sex marriage
   • allowing civil marriage ceremonies in any place agreed between the couple and the registrar, other than religious premises

Scottish Government consultations

2. Before introducing the Bill, the Scottish Government issued two consultations: between September and December 2011, *The Registration of Civil Partnerships Same Sex Marriage – A Consultation*¹ and, between December 2012 and March 2013, *The Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill – A Consultation*². Analyses of the respective consultations were published in July 2012³ and June 2013⁴. Subsequently, in October 2013, it transpired that 4,110 electronic responses to the second consultation, collected by Scotland for Marriage, were not successfully transmitted to the Scottish Government.⁵ We are satisfied with the Government’s position⁶ on including the responses concerned, which is that it will—

   • consider any additional points made in those responses which were not made in responses sent before the closing date for the consultation
   • put information on its website about this consideration

---

• reach a view about whether any amendments at Stages 2 or 3 might be desirable and whether, therefore, the Government should lodge amendments to the Bill

Parliamentary scrutiny

3. When the Bill was introduced, we issued an open call for written evidence. On 2 July 2013, the Finance Committee also called for written evidence, on the Bill’s Financial Memorandum, and published the responses. By 23 August 2013, we received 1,311 written submissions. We held oral evidence sessions in September and October 2013; the extracts from the minutes of those meetings, listing the names of witnesses that gave evidence, are at Annex E. The official reports of those meetings, together with associated written submissions, are at Annex B and all other written submissions, as published, are at Annex C. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s report to us on the delegated powers provisions in the Bill, published on 2 October 2013, is at Annex D.

MARRIAGE: MEANING AND PURPOSE

4. In this section of the report, we review, in the context of the reforms proposed by the Bill, evidence submitted to us on how marriage is viewed: for example, how it is looked on in faith groups, what it represents to LGBT people and, more generally, what social attitudes are on the matter.

Significance of gender

Complementarity and procreation

5. Currently, only couples formed of one man and one woman may enter into a legally valid marriage. The Bill would enable same-sex couples also to do so.

6. Some evidence to us described a concept of ‘complementarity’ between men and women in the context of marriage. For example, the Catholic Parliamentary Office on behalf of Bishops’ Conference of Scotland wrote—

“The complementarity of male and female, and their unique role in the transmission of life, underscores the reality of marriage as a natural social environment for the birth and growth of every person.”

7. John Deighan, Catholic Parliamentary Office, described that complementarity as the “inherent essence” of and “rational basis” for marriage—

“There are lots of friendships and they should always be valued … but why does the state take an interest in a particular relationship between a man and a woman? Fundamentally, we believe that it is because of the procreative capacity of that relationship. That is the only relationship out of which a child can come into the world. We want to ensure that that child is in the right environment. As the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child recognises, the priority should always be that the child is brought up with the

---

8 ‘Bishops’ Conference of Scotland. Written submission. parents, which is what marriage does—it keeps the parents together for the sake of the child.”

8. He conceded, however, that procreative capacity should not be a criterion for entering into a marriage—

“Saying that marriage is the environment in which procreation takes place is not the same as saying that we have marriage for only that reason. Typically and traditionally throughout society, we have recognised three ends of marriage: first, that it is built on love, the couple definitely love each other and it is for the mutual comfort of the couple, as they are attracted to each other; secondly, that they have the capacity to have children; and, thirdly, that the common good of society is aided by having that stable foundation for family life. Those are the three ends of marriage.

“Sometimes, those three ends do not always attain. For example, there are some people who just cannot have children. As a society we put a lot of effort into trying to help those people—we have adoption services and there is even quite an emphasis just now on fertility services—so we try to ensure that that environment is adequately understood and protected. We are not saying that anyone who cannot have children is not capable of entering marriage, but that is the archetypal model of what a marriage is.”

9. Asked whether they would marry people whom they knew to be infertile, the Rev David Robertson from the Free Church of Scotland, the Rt Rev Dr John Armes from the Scottish Episcopal Church and the Rev Dr Alan Hamilton from the Church of Scotland answered that they would. The Rev David Robertson said—

“Yes—I would have no problem in doing that, although I am not sure how I would know whether they were infertile.”

10. The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton said—

“I am not aware that that issue has ever been debated by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, but I am struggling to see why ministers would not do so—if they were told, which is fairly unlikely.”

11. On the same point, Ephraim Borowski, Scottish Council of Jewish Communities, said—

“Like the Rev Dr Hamilton, I am not aware that anyone has raised the question or has any concerns about the matter.”

12. In relation to Catholic Parliamentary Office’s view on the purpose of marriage – namely, to create an environment to ensure that children had parents – John Deighan was asked whether, for him, “parents” meant one man and one woman and could not involve any other combination.\[^{15}\] He replied—

“Biologically, we know that parents are a mother and a father. Yes, that is what parents are.”\[^{16}\]

13. He went on to draw a distinction between the child-centred view of marriage and what he described as a view that marriage was “just a loving relationship between any two people” who had committed themselves to each other, characterising the contrast as “a fundamental philosophical clash of opinions”.\[^{17}\] He stated—

“… the traditional view … is upheld by the Catholic Church, most of Christianity throughout time and most of western civilisation, that marriage centres around the fact that we create an environment to ensure that children have parents. That is the fundamental difference, and our grave concern is that, if we change the law as proposed, we will obscure that particular understanding.”\[^{18}\]

14. He added that the Bill would not “satisfy” everyone—

“There was talk earlier that the bill gives everyone the right option, but it does not. The issue is about how all of society, and not just religions, understand marriage. Is marriage about protecting children and ensuring that their parents are bound together so that they are there to bring up the children, or is it just a relationship that is a form of friendship? We believe that it is the former. We think that, for the common good of society, and particularly for children, we need to state that as a society and to protect it. That is about to be lost.”\[^{19}\]

15. Scotland for Marriage’s representative, Dr Gordon Macdonald, also spoke of a complementarity between men and women in marriage—

“The question that you have to ask yourselves is: what is marriage? Is marriage just a subjective expression of love between two individuals or is it more than that—does it have some sort of objective reality? In particular, what is the state’s interest in legislating for marriage? Throughout history and across societies, the state’s interest in legislating for marriage has arisen because marriage is the context in which children are normally produced and reared, and it is the most stable and secure context. The sociological data show that children perform better if they come from a family with married parents than if they come from a single-parent family or some other sort of broken home. That being the case, I think that the state has an objective interest in recognising marriage in law.\textsuperscript{20}

16. He argued that the state had “never been interested” in whether a man and a woman getting married loved each other; for him, the state’s interest was in whether they were “committed to staying together” and would “provide a framework” in which children would be raised—

“In history, there have been many society marriages that were not love marriages. That does not happen as much any more, but it used to happen. There has been a historical development in that sense.

“The point that I am making is that the state’s interest relates purely to the production of children and the raising of the next generation, in the interests of the security and stability of society. That is why the biological complementarity of male and female is crucial to the essence of what marriage is.”\textsuperscript{21}

17. The Rev David Robertson (Free Church of Scotland) also emphasised procreation in terms of the meaning of marriage, in what he described as “basically the catholic Christian orthodox position”.\textsuperscript{22} Notwithstanding his earlier answer that he would marry an infertile couple,\textsuperscript{23} he said—

“The meaning of marriage is straightforward. It is the union between one man and one woman, for the threefold purpose of mutual companionship, the procreation and upbringing of children in a secure environment, and the good of society.”\textsuperscript{24}

18. The Rt Rev Dr John Armes (Scottish Episcopal Church) drew the following from the Episcopal Church’s canon 31—

“Marriage is a physical, spiritual and mystical union of one man and one woman created by their mutual consent of heart, mind and will thereto, and is a holy and lifelong estate instituted of God.”\textsuperscript{25}

\textsuperscript{22} Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. \textit{Official Report, 12 September 2013.} Col 1458.
19. He said that the challenge currently faced in the Episcopal Church is whether to rethink that definition—

“If that is to change, we will have to undergo quite a long process of conversation, discussion and decision before we can accept that any of our ministers can preside at a marriage of two people of the same gender.”

20. The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton (Church of Scotland) added—

“There are undoubtedly theological nuances in relation to expressions of understanding of marriage across churches and religious traditions, but the issue for us here is whether or not marriage is only between one man and one woman. It is certainly the historical catholic—with a small c—Christian tradition that it is.”

21. He described the prospect of changing that as “an immense ask”, although he acknowledged that, under the Bill, the churches would be offered the possibility to change, rather than asked to do so.

22. Dr Salah Beltagui (Muslim Council of Scotland) added that marriage was “not just for the procreation of children” but also “for the growing up of the children in the family”. Drawing a link with society as a whole, he said—

“There are also the wider relationships of kinship within the family and extended family. If we lose that, we lose a lot of the cohesion of society. In relations based on the family, the children are the focus of those relations not only at the time when they are children; even when they grow up, there is still that relation between the children and their parents and grandparents. That is what holds society together, and it is important to keep that.”

23. He also felt that allowing same-sex couples to marry would take away the delineation of family roles—

“In our tradition, there are things—they are also mentioned in the bill—such as certain relations not being allowed to marry because they are so close in kinship. If we start changing the definition of marriage from what we know and what we know about who is coming from which line and who is not, there will be confusion and we will not know exactly where we stop and where we start. It will be very difficult to find out who is related to whom in those terms. Having a kinship relationship does not stop at only the father and mother—it is much wider than that—and not only for the time but also for the future of the family.”

24. Dr Beltagui foresaw potential consequences of allowing same-sex marriage—

“What scares people are the things that will happen under the bill that are not expected. The bill gives a list of people whose relationships are too close for them to marry. For us, that list includes same-sex couples. It will be dangerous for society if we keep changing the list to exclude relationships that we currently recognise as making it not possible for people to marry. As people have said, that could lead to incest and other dangerous relations. That is one thing.

“Another thing is that the definition of adultery in the bill is confusing because the Government went back to the definition of adultery between a man and a woman. The bill makes marriage acceptable between two men or two women, but it uses the definition of adultery only between a man and a woman. That means that someone can have relations with someone of the same sex outside a same-sex marriage, including in a threesome, a foursome or whatever. Because the bill goes down a new road, diverging from the main traditional, historical way of marriage, it is creating situations that we do not know the end of, and we must be careful about these things.”

25. John Deighan summed up the perspective that gender is significant to the meaning of marriage—

“The proposals … are that man and woman do not matter—they are to be completely interchangeable. We do not think that reason supports that position.”

Complementarity: other views

26. John Phillips, representing the Religious Society of Friends (Quakers), gave a different point of view—

“For us, the crucial thing is the complementarity between two individuals who are making a committed relationship with each other and need the support of their community and of God, helping them through their lives. The complementarity is not to do with gender; it is to do with the particular relationship that two individuals work out between themselves, for the benefit not only of themselves but of the community in general.”

---

27. Asked whether he agreed that there was a “complementarity of male and female”, the Equality Network’s Tim Hopkins said—

“Gender is not that simple. We know, for example, that there are transgender people, people who are born into a male body but grow up to discover that they are female, people who are intersex, who do not have a male or a female body but have a mixture of those two things, and people whose self-perceived gender identity is neither male nor female or is a mixture of those two things. The reality is that things are not as simple as people just being male or female.”

28. James Morton (Scottish Transgender Alliance) added a further dimension affecting intersex people—

“…people whose bodies are at variance with what is clearly male or female have contacted us and said that they and their partners are under massive amounts of stress as they are worried that, while same-sex marriage does not exist, their relationships might be challenged. Somebody might say, “Well, your body is not clearly male, therefore your marriage—in which you are the husband and you have a wife—is not legal because you should not be counted as male.” That causes a massive amount of distress. In addition to the detrimental discrimination faced by transgender people and their spouses under the current separate systems, there is also intense worry and distress for intersex people and their partners.”

29. Tim Hopkins acknowledged that “most marriages” and, indeed, “many same-sex couples” had children. However, he also pointed out that current marriage law did not require a marrying couple to be capable of having children and offered a different reading of the purpose of marriage—

“Our view is that the bill is about love—and marriage is about love. I think if you ask most married couples what their marriage is about they will say that it is about love, a commitment to each other and, if they have children, their family. All those things apply to same-sex couples, as well.”

30. The Rev David Coleman (United Reformed Church) expressed a view along similar lines—

“From our conversations over the past couple of years, the United Reformed Church synod of Scotland can have no objection to same-sex marriage on the basis that it will not result in the conception of children. We are of the view—I think that this is a general consensus—that the nature of marriage is primarily the fellowship of the couple and that children are an additional blessing to that. Speaking as a parent, my nurture of my children was not exhausted by my donating one cell. The nurture of children goes on throughout people’s lives. Marriage can add to the stability of society by providing a place for that.”

31. Asked whether marriage has a role in broader society as a basis for family, rearing children and providing social stability, the Rev David Coleman replied—

“When we have had discussions in the synod of Scotland, we have started by trying to come to a mind, as far as possible, on what people who have different positions regard as essential to marriage—commitment, respect and equality. It is likely that people who have differing opinions would say that marriage itself is beneficial to and a stabilising factor in society. The discussion has been on how we define marriage rather than on whether it is a good thing. The committee was very much of a mind that the introduction of same-sex marriage will have no impact whatever on opposite-sex marriage.”

32. The Rt Rev Dr John Armes (Scottish Episcopal Church) said—

“Although some people in our church take the very conservative line that marriage is between a man and a woman, others see marriage as a covenanted relationship of love. In that sense, the issue is about love, not equality, and those people would see the opportunity for people of whatever gender to form an alliance in marriage as strengthening marriage itself. I would not want people to gain the impression from this conversation that everyone in our church is of the same mind on the matter.”

33. Responding to the same question, Ross Wright from the Humanist Society Scotland said—

“I find puzzling the suggestion that opponents of the bill make in relation to children and stability, particularly because—whether you like it or not—same-sex couples have children, by adoption, surrogacy or whatever. Logically, if someone believes that marriage is good for children, it must follow that they should support marriage for same-sex couples with children. It is incoherent to argue both ways. Our point of view is that, if children deserve the protection of marriage, all children deserve that protection.”

34. He went on to argue that the purpose of marriage was much simpler than many of the views advanced in evidence—

“… it is extremely important to realise that the majority of marriages in Scotland are not religious, and it has been that way for some time. Although the religious perspective is worth while for those who have a religious faith, part of the reason for my being here is to argue for those millions of people who do not share a religious faith, but share the legal definition of marriage as a private contract between two individuals. We can dress it up with as much philosophy as we like, but that is the legal definition of a marriage.”

35. Ross Wright also argued that the purpose of marriage need not be fixed—

“A final point on the concept of marriage is that the view that most religions currently purport is a current view of marriage. As members will be aware, marriage has in the past been about owning children and women, denying rights and stigmatisation through illegitimacy, all of which have now fundamentally changed. We need to recognise that the bill proposes just another small change to marriage. Those who do not hold a religious view should be allowed to do this.”

36. Arguing that equality was “not really about numbers,” he developed this point further—

“Even if 90 per cent of people are against a piece of legislation, if it benefits some people and does not cause demonstrable harm to others, it should be passed. The problem with rehearsing all these arguments again and again is that the opponents have not put forward a shred of evidence to show how such a measure could cause demonstrable harm or even how it has caused demonstrable harm in the countries where it has been implemented.”

37. Louise Cameron, representing the Scottish Youth Parliament, also gave an interpretation of the meaning of marriage that was not rooted in having and bringing up children—

“To the Scottish Youth Parliament, same-sex relationships are just as important as mixed-sex relationships. We will not discriminate against people because of their sexual orientation. We believe that everyone should have the right to get married. Whether they are in a mixed-sex relationship or a same-sex relationship, they should have the same right.”

---

38. Asked specifically whether having children was a central purpose of marriage, she replied—

“No.”\textsuperscript{49}

39. Mark Bevan (Amnesty International) said that Amnesty did not have a position regarding the purpose of marriage and children—

“Our position is based fundamentally on the current inequality. The Parliament has the opportunity to introduce legislation that addresses an inequality, or it can decide not to do so. It can decide to lean towards the European mainstream on human rights, or not.”\textsuperscript{50}

40. He “absolutely”\textsuperscript{51} agreed, however, that, on the basis that all types of family deserved equal respect, the type of family involving a man, a woman and no children was a valid marriage.

\textit{Scottish Government}

41. Referring to the expression “definition of marriage”, used by many submitters of evidence, the Cabinet Secretary was asked whether there was a definition of marriage and, indeed, whether it could be defined. He replied—

“There is clearly a definition in law and there is a definition in each church about the union between a man and a woman and what rights and responsibilities are carried by marriage. The one change that the bill will make is that it will allow marriage to take place between two people of the same sex, whereas under current legislation a marriage in law in Scotland can take place only between one man and one woman.”\textsuperscript{52}

\textbf{Equality and human rights}

\textit{Equal recognition}

42. For Colin Macfarlane, Stonewall Scotland, the Bill was “about much more than the complementarity issue.”\textsuperscript{53} Returning to Tim Hopkins’ point about same-sex couples with children, he told us that an “increasing number of gay and lesbian people, particularly younger ones,” wanted their family structures to be “described in exactly the same way as everyone else’s are.”\textsuperscript{54} He said—

“… the bill is … much more about how gay people are viewed in society and about being equal in the eyes of the law. What the bill does for us is to completely underline that. It is a robust, strong bill and it will provide gay people with equality in the eyes of the law.

\textsuperscript{54} Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. \textit{Official Report, 5 September 2013}. Col 1382

“When civil partnerships were introduced in 2005, we were very much of the view—and we hoped—that the distinctions between gay people and heterosexual people would be eroded and that the way in which gay people were talked about and viewed in the public sphere would change.

“I am sad to say that our hard evidence shows that that has not been the case. Research that Stonewall Scotland commissioned from YouGov showed that in the past five years 216,000 people have experienced some form of homophobic or transphobic verbal or physical abuse in the workplace, and that 99 per cent of our young people have faced some form of discrimination or experienced some form of homophobic language in their playgrounds—half of those children have been directly bullied for being different or perceived to be gay. In the past year, there has been a 12 per cent increase in lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender-reported hate crimes.

“What the bill will do is to make gay people equal in the eyes of the law, and until that happens the distinction and the public discourse that I talked about will be at risk of not changing.”

43. Responding to the suggestion that the law already gave equal rights and, therefore, debate about the Bill was really about the word “marriage” rather than legal rights or other legal differences, Colin Macfarlane said—

“At the moment, gay people are not equal in the eyes of the law. They are not equal in law. Until they are afforded the same rights and responsibilities as heterosexual married couples are afforded, and until they are able to marry legally in this country, they will not be equal and the distinction will continue. As I said, that distinction allows, in the public sphere, the kind of discrimination that I described. We are very much of the view that until gay people are seen as equal in the eyes of the law, and society sees them as equal in the eyes of the law, the distinction will continue.”

44. Whilst she felt that being LGBT was viewed as a problem less amongst younger people, Louise Cameron from the Scottish Youth Parliament said—

“Bullying is a big issue—homophobic bullying as well. In our consultation, 71 per cent of respondents thought that there should be more education on the stigma that follows LGBT people. Homophobic bullying is really common in schools, with 69 per cent of people having experienced it.”

45. Picking up the theme of young people and schoolchildren’s views on the issue, Mark Bevan from Amnesty International, pointed to a recent three-country survey in Finland, the United Kingdom and France looking at suicide rates among children and young people and at the causes of the higher suicide rates—

“In the UK in particular, young gay people were at a very much higher risk of suicide than many other categories of people. For the Parliament not to pass a bill that would provide such equality would contribute to the existence of a status whereby some people have open to them only the second-class position of civil partnerships as opposed to marriage.”

46. He also responded to the citing of the fact that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the European convention on human rights conferred a right to marry in terms of a man and a woman as an argument against same-sex marriage—

“The Universal Declaration of Human Rights and, more pertinently, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, as well as the European convention on human rights, are all written as what are referred to as live instruments. They are not written in a way that is fixed and frozen in time but are designed to be interpreted in the light of contemporary society. To paraphrase the United Nations Human Rights Committee, the concept of family is so varied across cultures that there can be no standard definition. The UN committee goes on to say that, despite all the arguments in relation to marriage, all arguments place an essential value on the principle of non-discrimination at the fore of the discussion about family—all types of family—and relationships.”

47. Describing marriage as being “perceived by many people as the gold standard for relationships”, Tim Hopkins (Equality Network) outlined an expectation that same-sex marriage would have an impact on practical discrimination and issues around status and stigma—

“Respondents have said, for example, that people had said to them, “But it’s not a real marriage, is it?” We have heard of hospitals turning people away as next of kin because the hospital has not understood what civil partnership is. One effect of introducing same-sex marriage will be to make that less likely to happen.”

48. It was put to Tim Hopkins that introducing same-sex marriage would change the legal status, but might not change people’s attitudes, which might continue to be framed in terms of ‘real’ and ‘gay’ marriage. He disagreed—

“I do not think that they will. Marriage is understood widely, and allowing same-sex couples to enter marriage will not only help them to feel better about themselves, but genuinely reduce the stigma that people feel and the discrimination that they face in society.”

49. John Phillips (Religious Society of Friends (Quakers)) described the introduction of civil partnerships as having been “a significant and important step forward in equality” but continued—

“It is only through experience that we have learned, and really begun to appreciate, that same-sex couples feel that it makes them different in a way that we are unhappy about. We wish for inclusivity.

“We very much want to opt in to being allowed to conduct same-sex marriages, and we are convinced that when we have done so there will not really be any demand among our congregations for civil partnerships, because we know that marriage is what they have been seeking.”

50. Asked about the impact that the lack of equal civil recognition of same-sex relationships had on people’s ability to enjoy other rights, the Rev David Coleman (United Reformed Church) said—

“We … felt that if something is offered by the state it should be offered to all without exception. If a registrar who is an agent of the state has a conscientious problem, that is the problem of the state and somebody should be found—without hindrance or inconvenience to those who are applying—who can conduct the ceremony that is required.”

51. Ross Wright (Humanist Society Scotland) also commented—

“Our understanding of the civil partnership is that it was a nod to equality and a step in the right direction. However, it is like Rosa Parks in America being allowed to get on the bus. We see equal civil partnerships—which we would also like to have—and equal marriage as providing the fundamental step of allowing people to choose which seat they take on the bus.”

52. He went on to recount a situation that he had been placed in when conducting a ceremony—

“There was a marquee and everybody was wearing their finery. It was a beautiful day and everyone was happy, with kids running about mad and the mothers-in-law with their biggest hats on. It was a splendid day that was marred only because, when the bridal party, which was two brides, appeared, I could not say the word that everybody else at the gathering was saying, which was “marriage” … That was painful for me. However, every person there, including all the in-laws and the out-laws—Auntie Jeannie and all—saw it as a marriage. That is the emotional impact of the bill.”

---

Human rights

53. Amnesty International’s Mark Bevan gave a human rights reading of the proposal—

“The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights makes it clear that equal marriage should be available to all, so that is a fundamental campaigning issue for us. We also see, from more than a decade of research, how intolerance of LGBT people across the world has led to very significant hate crime. That is as present in Scotland today as it is in far-flung places such as Russia. For example, in Arbroath earlier this week a woman was very badly mistreated in a public park because of her sexuality.”

54. Drawing a contrast with the position in certain other countries – allowing permissive attitudes in relation to hate crime, state executions for sexual behaviour, torture, limitations on demonstrations and movements – he went on to say—

“By comparison, to bring the issue closer to home, when we look at what the Scottish Parliament has done in the past, we see that it has been a Parliament that is founded on equality. However, there is inequality in law in relation to marriage at the moment. If, as successive Parliaments have done, this Parliament wants to take action and to take a lead on promoting equality and universal human rights, this is a bill that needs to be passed. There is a tension in Scotland at the moment for a number of reasons, including because Scotland has taken a strong position in relation to a number of human rights.

“Let me quote what the UN secretary general Ban Ki-moon said earlier this year:

‘To those who are lesbian, gay, bisexual or transgender, let me say: You are not alone. Your struggle for an end to violence and discrimination is a shared struggle. Any attack on you is an attack on the universal values the United Nations … and I call upon all countries … to stand with you’.

“Any such attack is an attack on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which is a founding convention that supports a fair and civilised society.”

---

55. Speaking whether all definitions of family relationships should be equally applicable, Mark Bevan said that the Bill challenged a “cultural norm”\(^{71}\) but that international law steered towards a “progressive view”\(^{72}\) of what a family relationship should consist of, with equality as the guiding principle—

“Therefore … I would state the obvious, which is that the bill reduces an inequality that currently exists in the context of the forms of family relationships and marriage that are currently taking place in Scotland.”\(^{73}\)

56. He added, however, that Amnesty International did not take a view on marriage being a preferable status from the point of view of societal cohesion—

“… that is not a human rights issue. However, we take a strong view that, when the forms of marriage that exist are not applied equally, that is contrary to societal cohesion.”\(^{74}\)

57. Mark Bevan also said—

“The bill provides an opportunity to deliver a more equal society, which—as I have said—successive Parliaments have tried to deliver. An action that a Parliament can take to foster greater tolerance, understanding and respect for other people will create a more equal society. You are quite right—it is not about whether people are homophobic; it is about equality and all people being treated the same.”\(^{75}\)

Scottish Government

58. The Cabinet Secretary said that the Bill was “essentially about addressing an inequality”\(^{76}\) for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender people—

“It provides the option for same-sex couples to marry and for the registration of religious and belief civil partnerships. It will also impact significantly on transgender people. A couple who are already married will no longer have to divorce, as is current practice, before the transgender person can obtain a full gender recognition certificate.”\(^{77}\)

---

59. He said that passing the Bill would be a significant step to reduce inequality, but recognised the challenges for those who considered that marriage should remain a union between one man and one woman—

“We understand the concerns that they have, and that is why we have included in the bill strong protections for religious and belief bodies and celebrants, including an opt-in process for the religious or belief body and the individual celebrant before any solemnisation of a same-sex marriage can take place.”

60. Describing marriage as a “key societal issue”, he added that amendments to the Equality Act 2010 had been agreed with the United Kingdom Government, that the Bill contained a provision on freedom of speech, that the Lord Advocate had already produced prosecution guidance on that matter and that the Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning was seeking views on draft guidance that reaffirmed the rights of parents to opt children out of sexual health education classes.

61. It was put to the Cabinet Secretary that everybody currently had identical rights and, therefore, that the Bill would redefine equality. He disagreed—

“The bill deals specifically with what I would regard as an inequality, which is the right of people of the same sex to marry one another and have that marriage legally recognised in Scotland. That is the inequality that we seek to rectify through the bill.”

62. He said that people who were gay had, generally speaking, the same rights as others in most, if not all, respects but that the “one right” that they did not currently have was the right to marry someone else of the same sex—

“The bill will close that gap to ensure that that part of equality is satisfied and that people of the same sex who wish to marry are allowed to do so.”

63. He added—

“The bill will not force anybody to do anything. All that it will do will be to give people more freedoms. It will give people of the same sex who wish to marry the freedom in law to marry.”

Social attitudes

Civil partnerships

64. Asked how attitudes towards civil partnerships had changed since being introduced, Tim Hopkins (Equality Network) said that, when civil partnerships were being proposed, the Equality Network had said that they were the “right measure to introduce” and would be “of huge benefit to same-sex couples” because they would allow them a legally recognised and protected relationship for the first time.\(^\text{85}\) However, he continued—

---

“... we also said that it was not equality—that it would be a separate but equal system—and that, in the medium term, the only thing that would be true equality would be to open up marriage to same-sex couples and to open up civil partnerships to mixed-sex couples, because the two are different and the same choices should be available to couples regardless of gender.

“We also said in 2003 that it would take several years for there to be a public discussion with politicians about opening up marriage to same-sex couples. That was 10 years ago. Those several years and more have now passed. There has been wide discussion publicly and within the Parliament about opening up same-sex marriage for four years. That is why we are now in a different situation from 10 years ago. Ten years ago, it was not time for same-sex marriage; now, it is time.”\(^\text{86}\)

65. Colin Macfarlane (Stonewall Scotland) took up the same point—

“To go back to the points that I made earlier, the issue is the distinction in how society views gay people. Tim Hopkins is right that, 10 years ago, we thought that civil partnerships would erode some of those distinctions and that the public discourse on how society views gay people would shift and change. However, I go back to the hard evidence that I showed you about 216,000 people having seen homophobic bullying in the workplace. Children in our schools are still suffering some form of homophobic abuse.

“The distinction has not shifted, and gay people have come to the view that, until they are seen as equal in the eyes of the law, which the bill would achieve—it would cement legality in the eyes of the law; it would confer on gay people the same rights and responsibilities that their straight friends and family have—that distinction will not be eroded.”\(^\text{87}\)

Same-sex marriage
66. Asked to explain the position that it had not been the right time for same-sex marriage 10 years before, Tim Hopkins said—

“That may relate to the way that we work as an organisation. We try to work in a consensual way, and we try not to work in an embattled way, which would set us up against other organisations. Ten years ago, we recognised that same-sex marriage was quite contentious. In 2002, when we developed the policy, only one country in the world—the Netherlands—had same-sex marriage, and a lot of countries had civil partnership. Now, all the countries surrounding us in western Europe apart from Ireland already have same-sex marriage, and the Irish Government is working on it. The whole context has moved on.⁸⁸

67. He added that public opinion had also moved on—

“Back in 2002, the Scottish social attitudes survey found that 41 per cent of Scots were in favour of same-sex marriage. By 2006, that had risen to 53 per cent. By 2010, it had risen to 61 per cent of Scots in favour of same-sex marriage, with only 19 per cent against. We try to work in a consensual way.”⁸⁹

68. Further, he pointed to what he described as “quite a long list of legislation that discriminated against gay people and LGBT people and against same-sex couples” when the Parliament was set up 14 years ago—

“For example, there was a different age of consent for sex between men; there was section 28, which needed to be repealed; there was no recognition in law of cohabiting same-sex couples; adoption and fostering were not available to same-sex couples; sex offences law discriminated against same-sex couples; and there was no hate-crime legislation. It was a long list. We have been addressing those issues and, to the credit of the Parliament, it has been dealing with them one by one.”⁹⁰

69. He described marriage law as the “last one”⁹¹ of those discriminatory statutes—

“In terms of sexual orientation equality, this is the last big area where the law still discriminates against LGB people. If the Parliament passes the bill, which we hope it will, it can be very proud of the way in which the situation has been turned around in the past 14 years, and the very substantial discrimination that LGB people felt and faced 14 years ago will finally have been eradicated from the law.”⁹²

70. Professor John Curtice, an expert on research into social and political attitudes and survey research methods, said that, public trust in banks aside, the “principal secular change” over the last 30 years period had been in the area of sexual mores—

“As well as there being changes in attitudes to same-sex relationships, there has undoubtedly been a substantial change in attitudes towards sex outside marriage, particularly premarital sex. There have also been changes in attitudes towards abortion.\textsuperscript{93}

---

71. He set those changes in the context of a “more general apparent liberalising trend in attitudes towards sexual mores” in British society—

“Not all the changes have gone at the same pace, but they have all been going in the same direction. The change in attitudes that you refer to seems to be part and parcel of a similar liberalising phenomenon whereby society is taking a very different view of these things from what it did a relatively short time ago.”\textsuperscript{94}

72. Referring to the parallel that he had drawn\textsuperscript{95} between those changes and the trend towards people attending religious services less often, Professor Curtice was asked whether there had been any research on whether those two aspects were connected, i.e. whether society was becoming more liberal because people were attending church less. He replied—

“… it is perfectly clear that those who regularly attend religious services are more likely to take a conservative view on these subjects. However, it is also clear that that difference has widened.

“Back in the 1980s, for example, the attitudes of secular Scotland/Britain and those of religious Scotland/Britain were rather similar. The liberalisation of attitudes has occurred predominantly at the secular end of Scottish society but, that said, I also point out in my submission that there has been something of a liberalisation of attitudes even among regular worshippers. The decline of religious observance is undoubtedly one of the reasons why our society has become more liberal, but it also seems pretty clear that attendance at religious services and, indeed, religious organisations, many of which would adopt a conservative stance on these issues, seems to help to frame people’s attitudes.

“Of course, the other liberalising thing that is going on is the expansion of university education. I have not made this point in the submission, but it is clear that those with relatively high educational qualifications tend to be more liberal on these subjects than those with no educational qualifications. Therefore, as we become a better educated society, that tends to encourage social liberalism. That is another phenomenon that has tended to push our society in that direction.”\textsuperscript{96}

73. He added that, given the very strong relationship between age and attitudes towards same-sex relationships and given that each new generation of adults entering adulthood had been “consistently more liberal” on the matter than its predecessor, it was a reasonable supposition that public opinion was “probably going to become more liberal” on the subject—

\textsuperscript{95} Written submission

“Even if one has question marks about how big or firm that majority might be at the moment, it is probably only going to get bigger and firmer over time.” 97

74. Dr Kelly Kollman (University of Glasgow) was asked to add an international perspective, specifically whether bringing about those changes had been led more by social movements or more by institutions such as the European Court or parliaments. She said—

“Social movements have played a very important part in this. Having said that, when you open marriage to same-sex couples—or even, certainly in the early years, introduce same-sex unions—it is the case that it brings Governments a great deal of attention and generally, as I said, it has been quite positive attention, so it really depends on where you are looking and on what countries you are looking at.

“In Spain a new Government came in in 2004—it was not expected to win that election—and the policy change was seen as being very Government led, although, of course, the LGBT groups were on board. In the Netherlands, the Labour Party supported that change quite a bit, but, in Germany, the SPD—the social democratic party there—was much more reticent. The change there was really led by the minority Green party and it was much more of a grassroots movement, so the answer is that it depends on the country.

“However, the debate has always been a very public debate in any country that has looked at it and therefore there has been a lot of public scrutiny and a lot of involvement of public groups on both sides. In that respect, I think that it has been a good debate; it has been aired in most of those countries. Also, as I said in my submission … it is one of those policy areas in which the international realm has been very important but it has not really been led by legal mandates.

“Politics sometimes matters, and what really matters here is the power of human rights arguments. They get translated in different ways—in the UK we often talk about equalities, while other countries talk about anti-discrimination or equal treatment—but ultimately, at this point in history, the power of human rights arguments is transformative, and much more so than legal mandates from international courts or EU policy.” 98

Liberalisation

75. Asked what motivated liberalisation and whether there was an increased tendency over time for people to go with the flow, Professor Curtice' response was to point to what public opinion was in the mid-1980s—

“The idea that society has, in some sense, gone with the flow is difficult to believe given the degree to which, little more than 25 years ago, we as a society pretty much unanimously adopted a critical attitude towards same-sex relationships. It looks to me very much as if there has been a genuine, quite dramatic but substantial change in attitudes, which, in a sense, has been a society not going with the flow. Society has reversed itself.”

99. He also made the point that older generations’ views had “certainly” changed over time—

“One suspects that that is, in part, as a result of being influenced by the greater liberal views of, for example, their own children. Equally, it is almost undoubtedly the case that the views of many older people with regard to cohabitation and heterosexual relations outside marriage have changed as a result of the behaviour of their own children.”

100. He said that, as regards liberalisation and sexual mores, it was “not the case” that society had become wholly permissive—

“For the most part, we seem to be in favour of monogamous relationships at any one point in time. It is simply that we have become much more relaxed, first, about whether the relationship takes place within marriage and, secondly, about the genders of the people who are engaged in the activity.”

101. He said that society’s preference for monogamous relationships was “very clear” and expanded on the point—

“A person’s partner and the quality and nature of the relationship are what seem to matter to people now rather than a sense of obligation, let alone some religious teaching. Therefore, cheating on one’s partner is now, if anything, regarded as even less acceptable because we value the quality of the relationship more than we value the formal institutional position.”

79. He also suggested that there was a “certain irony” around the Bill—

“... we talk about enabling people in same-sex relationships to enter an institution that relatively large sections of the heterosexual community no longer get involved in, at a time when society does not think that sexual relationships should necessarily take place within marriage. That is also part of the liberalising trend of the past 25 years.”^105

80. Professor Curtice went on to state that there was insufficient evidence to know whether attitudes within religious organisations and, in particular, within the clergy, were becoming more liberal. He added, however—

“... we do know ... that there is a difference between members of different religious denominations or religions. Perhaps contrary to the general impression, the section of Scottish society that seems to be most conservative on this subject is those of a Presbyterian faith—particularly, it seems, those Presbyterians outside the Church of Scotland. The numbers are relatively small, and we therefore have to be careful, but Episcopalians are probably towards the liberal end of the spectrum, with Catholics somewhere in between.”^106

Consultation: a measure of social attitudes?

81. Asked, with reference to the Scottish social attitudes survey showing that most people believe that same-sex marriage should be acceptable, whether there was any quantitative evidence to show that social attitudes supported the perception that marriage should be for the purposes of procreation, John Deighan said—

“The biggest survey and the most profound probing of public opinion was the Government’s consultation on the proposals, to which it received 77,000 responses. That was way greater than any other survey, which would typically involve 1,000 people. The consultation engaged people who really thought about the issue. We are in a live-and-let-live society—I have that approach myself—in which, if people want something, by all means we let them have it as long as it does not impact on the rest of society. Of the 77,000 people in Scotland who responded, 64 per cent said that same-sex marriage should not be approved and that we should not redefine marriage. So there is quantitative evidence on our side.”^107

82. Ross Wright (Humanist Society Scotland), however, commented that a consultation was “not a referendum” and he felt, therefore, that it would be acceptable for the Bill to go through the parliamentary process despite most consultation responses expressing opposition.\(^\text{108}\)

83. Professor John Curtice was asked which was more accurately representative of public opinion: an open website-published Scottish Government consultation or a properly weighted scientific study such as the social attitudes surveys and reports carried out by the Scottish Centre for Social Research and the National Centre for Social Research. He replied—

“I note the terms of your question, which I suspect that not everybody would agree with. If anybody thinks that the purpose of a consultation is to find out the balance of public opinion, they do not understand that the value of a consultation is to come to some understanding of the arguments that people put forward on both sides, which you might not necessarily get out of a survey, and to uncover possible technical difficulties and objections to the detail of a bill that civil servants or ministerial colleagues might not have understood.”\(^\text{109}\)

84. He said that it was “to be regretted” that, with respect to the Scottish Government’s consultation on the Bill, there had been a tendency by protagonists on both sides of the debate to encourage standard replies, which added “no value at all to that kind of exercise”. He said—

“…To that extent at least, you should not look to consultations as a way of understanding the balance of public opinion as opposed to understanding the structure of public opinion and possible technical difficulties with any particular form of legislation.”\(^\text{110}\)

85. He also made the point that public opinion need not be the only driver in deciding whether to make a proposed reform—

“Although public opinion on the death penalty has begun to change, it has long been in favour of restoring the death penalty. Many a legislator would say, “I can think of an ethical argument why, on this occasion, I’m not going to follow public opinion.” Given that the role of legislators is, other things being equal, to take serious cognisance of public opinion, if you are going to say, “No, we’re not going to follow public opinion in this area” and if you accept my reading of public opinion, you have to come up with ethical arguments as to why following the public view is not necessarily in the public interest.”\(^\text{111}\)

86. Professor Curtice nonetheless pointed to the significance of social attitudes throughout Britain in the context of the enactment of same-sex marriage laws for England and Wales—

“... whereas even in 1999-2000 Scotland remained a more religious society than England and Wales in terms of levels of religious attendance, that is no longer the case ... attitudes in Scotland are now very similar to those south of the border on a whole load of other areas ... On social issues, Scotland, England and Wales now look very similar to each other. That inevitably raises an issue for this institution. Given that England and Wales have legislated first in the area, and given the similarity of outlooks on the two sides of the border, you would have to come up with good reasons for why Scotland should adopt a different perspective.”\textsuperscript{112}

Survey techniques
87. Professor Curtice was asked to comment on the notion that people get softened up with certain questions before the big question gets asked and whether how questions were asked made a big difference to the result—\textsuperscript{113}

“Any survey researcher will be extremely sensitive to the possibility that the context within which a question is asked and the way in which the question is phrased can affect the response. In my submission, I have tried to be quite open with the committee by indicating how differences in a question’s wording can make a difference. I think that that is absolutely the case.

“Some of the questions that I highlight in the submission are worded better than others, but I know that in the British or Scottish social attitudes surveys we are certainly very careful to avoid creating a context that leads in one direction or another. We might not always succeed, but our wish is to understand public opinion as accurately as possible and not to promote one or other cause. Clearly some of the other questions that I have highlighted have been commissioned by one side or another, and one might feel that as a result they might or might not have got the answers they were looking for.”\textsuperscript{114}

88. He said that, in the end, a judgment had to be made—

“We do not have a fantastic amount of evidence on this area—it has certainly not been polled intensively, particularly as far as attitudes in Scotland are concerned—but, looking at the variety of question wordings and the evidence across the piece, I think that on the simple question, “Should same-sex marriage happen or not?”, there seems to be a majority in favour, although I have to say that it does not necessarily look overwhelming.

\textsuperscript{112} Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. \textit{Official Report, 19 September 2013. Col 1523.}
\textsuperscript{113} Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. \textit{Official Report, 19 September 2013. Col 1516.}
\textsuperscript{114} Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. \textit{Official Report, 19 September 2013. Col 1516-7.}
“Beyond that, if you ask people to choose between same-sex marriage, civil partnerships or doing nothing, it might not be the case that a majority of people would choose the introduction of same-sex marriage as their first choice but, equally, it seems pretty clear from follow-up questions that many of those for whom civil partnerships might be their first preference are not necessarily particularly opposed to the idea of same-sex marriage. That is simply an attempt to come up with a reasonable judgment of where public opinion seems to lie, given the variety of such opinion.”

The impact on marriage

89. Evidence to us gave a variety of views on whether the Bill would strengthen marriage, diminish it or do neither.

90. Kieran Turner, representing the Evangelical Alliance Scotland, said—

“I think that the crux of the issue about the principle is what the definition of marriage is and what the function of marriage is. We would broadly say that marriage is about commitment, children and complementarity. From the state’s point of view in particular, marriage is about children, as has already been said. Beyond that, we see marriage as being the foundational structural unit to bring through the next generation. That is where the state’s interest in marriage fundamentally lies.”

91. He highlighted a submission by the Faculty of Advocates to the Scottish Government’s consultation, which, he said, referred to the importance of defining what we mean by marriage and raised several questions—

“… is marriage intended to be a lifelong relationship? Should it imply the potential for a sexual relationship? Is it intended to be an exclusive relationship between the spouses? I think that we need to think through what we are defining as marriage … In terms of devaluing marriage, our concern is not solely about same-sex couples being allowed to marry. Our concern is about the fundamental foundational understanding of marriage as good for society, particularly in its context of family. As the Faculty of Advocates would say, although it obviously does not take a policy decision on this, if we lose that definition, we are in danger of losing the meaning of marriage and the foundational understanding of what marriage is as a structure for society. That is our concern. We recognise that love and commitment are good things, but that is not really why the state recognises marriage.”

92. The Rev David Robertson (Free Church of Scotland) commented—

“… the bill will not initiate a major decline in marriage, as there has been a decline in marriage and its value in society for a long time. The bill is just part of that process, which I would like to be reversed. I believe that it is because the understanding of marriage has become so weak that the bill is taken as a given by so many people, on the ground that it is just about equality ... My fear is that what is happening here is part of a process and that, if the bill is passed, all marriages will become civil partnerships. The bill represents a move away from the Christian teaching of marriage, on which our society has been based for well over 1,000 years.

---

“Therefore, I appeal to MSPs not to vote for the bill but to think about the enormous social consequences that the proposed change will have. Even though the bill fits in with the zeitgeist and there is enormous pressure to make such a change, MSPs should say no, at least until we have looked at what the consequences will be. The bill will accelerate the decline in marriage, and the social and economic consequences will be phenomenal.”\textsuperscript{118}

93. Dr Gordon Macdonald (Scotland for Marriage) said that he believed that the weakening of the status of marriage had weakened family life and that the Bill would weaken marriage further—

“The increase in divorce and cohabitation has almost certainly led to instability in society and in families. The official report into the riots in England mentioned that most of the people who participated came from broken homes. That is a different issue from the issue that the bill is concerned with, but the decline of marriage as a social norm cannot be divorced from a range of social problems that have arisen in our society.”\textsuperscript{119}

94. Asked how increasing the number of people who marry each year would cause a decline in marriage, the Rev David Robertson said—

“Because you are redefining marriage for everyone—you are changing what marriage is—so you are turning all marriages into civil partnerships.”\textsuperscript{120}

95. The Rev Dr David Easton from the Methodist Church in Britain expressed a different perspective—

“It is interesting that in the whole debate ... phrases such as “undermining marriage” and “strengthening marriage” are thrown around. I wonder how we would know whether marriage is being strengthened, undermined or diminished. We could consider the divorce statistics. The divorce rate has been very high historically partly because legislation has made it possible while we have had marriage only between men and women, although I understand that, recently, the divorce rate has dipped somewhat. Or would we consider another criterion such as the level of domestic abuse? It is difficult. I can see where you are broadly coming from, but how can we determine whether marriage is being strengthened? What basis would we use to come to any conclusions? I could have cited examples other than those two.”

Scottish Government
96. Asked for a response to the argument that the Bill would weaken or diminish the institution of marriage, the Cabinet Secretary said—

“I have been married for 35 years and, personally, I do not feel that allowing people of the same sex to be married in any way diminishes my marriage, quite frankly. I know that there are some people who feel that, but I think that they tend to think of that more from a religious point of view than necessarily from a legal point of view.”

97. He pointed out that the Bill would recognise marriage between same-sex couples in law and that it would be “entirely up to individual churches and celebrants” to decide “from a religious point of view” on their approach—

“… obviously that has to be respected. My view is that, in many ways, the bill will actually enhance marriage because the issue of equality that I referred to in my introductory remarks will be satisfied. I think that it is unfair that people who are in love and who are of the same sex and who wish to marry are currently banned from doing so.

“Of course, one reason why institutions such as the Quaker church are in favour of this change in the law is that they believe that same-sex couples should be allowed legally to marry in their church. At the moment, the law bans, for example, the Quaker church from doing what the Quaker church would like to do, which is to administer same-sex marriages.”

Legitimacy to reform
98. Some evidence to us challenged the Parliament’s authority to reform marriage. For example, John Deighan (Bishops’ Conference of Scotland) said—

“Marriage is a natural institution and has arisen naturally from the first social grouping, which was between a man and a woman who then had children. That is the foundation of society and we believe it important not to mess around with those foundations.

“The state has a role in legislating on the civil effects of marriage but not on its essence. We cannot have laws saying, for example, that people who sell bracelets can call them watches if they do not tell the time. There is an essence to marriage; a man and a woman lie at the heart of it, and that is the relationship that gives rise to children.”

99. Asked whether he saw no scope for differences of opinion, he responded—

“We are talking about an essence here. The state does not have the right to recreate what is a natural institution; it exists to uphold the common good, not to re-engineer new foundations for what it thinks could be the common good.”

100. He added that he did not believe that the church could redefine marriage either—

“We can all comment on it, discuss it and try to understand it, but marriage is a natural institution that precedes the church as well as any other institution in society.”

101. The Rev David Robertson (Free Church of Scotland) shared that point of view, going as far as to suggest that the Parliament would be acting ultra vires if it passed the Bill—

“… marriage is what marriage is. When David Cameron and others decided to bring in same-sex marriage, they had to redefine marriage for everyone, as Mr Cameron pointed out. I do not think that any Parliament has the right to redefine marriage any more than any Parliament has the right to say that a circle is a square. There are some things that are beyond the capability even of politicians and that is one of them. Marriage cannot be redefined in that way.”

102. He argued that the state had the right to legislate on “any civil contracts” that it wished—

“My point of dispute is that marriage is not just a civil contract and the state does not have the right to change such an age-old institution. Basically, it will destroy marriage by turning all marriages into civil contracts … I was intrigued to learn that adultery will not be a ground for divorce in a same-sex marriage and to hear the discussion about children and so on. In the bizarre world in which we live, our Governments are telling us that marriage is to be redefined as genderless or sexless, childless and faithless. That is an absurd position. The state can decide any civil contracts that it wishes, but I object to its saying, “We’re going to make all marriages a civil contract.”

---

103. The Rev Dr David Easton (Methodist Church in Britain) took a different view—

“I hear what my friend is saying, that the state does not have a right to determine what society does. We could turn that round and ask whether the church has a right to determine what society does. That is an issue for debate.”

104. He highlighted that, over the centuries, there had been a change in understanding—

“… not that long ago, for example, women—and indeed their property—were considered to be the possession of their husbands. We no longer hold to that now and one must assume that over a period of time civil and even religious understandings of marriage might change.”

105. He felt that the state had a role in this issue, just as he felt that religious leaders had a role in commenting on matters of public interest and defended the state’s legitimacy to legislate—

“Some of my fellow panellists might not agree with me—I do not know; they will have to speak for themselves—but I believe that the state has the right to express an opinion and pass legislation and indeed has done so through the years. We the electorate might not agree with those decisions and have the right to chuck you out at the next election … However, it seems to me that as long as you are members of the Scottish Parliament, or indeed any other democratically elected legislative assembly, you have the right to legislate on matters that come within the boundary and scope of your responsibilities. As a representative of the church, I might disagree strongly with you but that does not mean that I think that you do not have the right to legislate on the matter. I think that you do.”

Proportionality
106. John Deighan (Bishops’ Conference of Scotland) felt that the Bill would make a disproportionate change—

“Our religious belief disagrees with the state on that, as it may on other grounds, but we believe that our religious belief concurs with natural reason on this, and that marriage is naturally and self-evidently built on the fact that men and women have children. We have to balance up conflicting claims. The conflicting claim here is that, for the sake of the possibly one in 10,000 households that wants to have a same-sex marriage, we will change the definition of marriage for everyone in our society. That is the balance, if you think that it is a matter of a balance of principles. Marriage will mean a different thing for all society, including every child and every family. I think that two households out of 1,000 have a same-sex couple in them, and we have been told that it is expected that 5 per cent of same-sex couples will want a marriage. We are talking about one in 10,000 households possibly wanting a same-sex marriage, and the whole of society has to redefine marriage for the sake of that. That is disproportionate as well as wrong in principle.\(^{134}\)

---

107. Ross Wright (Humanist Society Scotland), however, felt differently—

“It is not about numbers; it is about whether the law will benefit some people or be detrimental to anybody. Those questions have been resoundingly sorted out, so we should continue to move on the legislation at the speed that we are going at. Everything has been examined thoroughly and there is no reason not to pass the bill.”\(^{135}\)

Pace of reform

108. Some evidence to us criticised the pace of reform. The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton (Church of Scotland), for example, said—

“... the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland has not debated the matter, but ... we are moving into uncharted territory. Unless we are saying that marriage between a man and a woman is of no real significance in society and is not that important anyway, to redefine it so significantly without having the debate that we feel should take place, and without carrying out the research that we feel should be done, over a protracted period—after all, the issue is extremely important, and not just theologically, although we would argue that our theology is also our understanding of society—would be to move too far, too fast.”\(^{136}\)
109. Whilst he averred that it was “of deep concern to almost everyone in the Church of Scotland that there should be protection for everyone, regardless of sexual orientation ... and that there should also be equality”, he expressed concern that the Bill moved “beyond equality”, given the existence of civil partnership legislation—

“It is a move beyond equality into sameness, which is another issue that concerns us and one that we do not believe has been properly considered.”

110. The Rt Rev Dr John Armes (Scottish Episcopal Church) supported the point about having a more protracted series of discussions on some of the issues.

111. Stating that the issue was “being driven by politics as much as by ethics”, the Rev David Robertson (Free Church of Scotland) said—

“... what you are doing here is following the herd. I have been involved in Scottish politics for 30 years and this issue has been raised only in the past five years. All of a sudden, we find that all the major political parties are saying that they are for equality. Why were they not for equality 15 years ago or 10 years ago? ... there has been a push for the change and that people are rushing into it without thinking it through. We are just trying to encourage people to think it through.

“I also think that politics is involved. There is almost a sense that we need to show that Scotland is a progressive country and we need to be ahead of England or the United Kingdom Government. I feel that the whole thing has been rushed, and that is why we put that statement in our submission.”

112. Dr Kelly Kollman (University of Glasgow) was asked about the pace of policy change other countries that have adopted policies on same-sex unions in recent years – whether there had been enough consultation in different countries and whether the process of bringing the bills to fruition had caused any problems. She said that so many different countries now had same-sex marriage policies that it was difficult to categorise—

“... but generally the countries that introduced those policies earlier probably had more controversy around them. However, in almost all the countries—there may be a few exceptions—it was the case that a majority of the public supported the policy when it happened. These have tended to be very high-profile debates and high-profile policy processes. That means that they have gotten a lot of scrutiny in Parliaments and also in the wider public debate.”

---

113. She said that it was “amazing” to look at the media coverage of, for example, same-sex unions as opposed to anti-discrimination laws that included sexual orientation—

“There were 10 times as many articles on same-sex unions or same-sex marriage as on anti-discrimination laws in some of those countries. Same-sex unions or marriages have a lot of symbolism; they tend to be something that the media covers a lot and therefore they tend to be something that Parliaments scrutinise a lot.”

114. On the question of whether such policies had caused problems in other countries, she said that there was “always” opposition—

“Oftentimes it is from religious organisations that have a particular cultural definition of marriage and feel uncomfortable about same-sex marriage. However, I have looked at the situation in most of the European countries and in the one North American country that has a national law, and I think that public opinion—with one exception—became more tolerant of homosexuality rather than less after same-sex unions came in, although that increase in tolerance was a year or two afterwards. I would not say that that increase in tolerance is necessarily causal always—there are general long-term trends towards an increase in tolerance for homosexuality. However, such policies have brought great visibility to lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender communities and, in general, it has been positive visibility.”

A catalyst with consequences?

115. John Deighan (Bishops’ Conference of Scotland) suggested that a principle was being established with the Bill—

“... if you support this bill, you are saying that men and women are interchangeable and that gender really does not matter in any field of life. That area could easily be progressed.

“In some of the evidence and discussion, the belief that marriage is intrinsically and in essence built around the complementarity of male and female has been paralleled to segregation—we heard that earlier. Parallels have been drawn with the civil rights movement against racism. If there is to be any progression, that is where we have to look. Those are the principles that are being established just now: if you hold that view, that is how you will be perceived by society. That ties in with the public sector equality duty and that is the mindset of those who have proposed this change. I have attended EHRC presentations where people have said, “There’s terrible discrimination in Scotland because some people believe sex only belongs in marriage between a man and a woman.” In other words, they are saying that in our society it is unacceptable to hold traditional Christian beliefs, traditional Muslim beliefs or the traditional beliefs of Judaism. This approach does not lead to pluralism but to the victory of a complete redefinition of marriage and its enforcement on all of society.”

116. Referring to his earlier comment describing marriage as “a covenanted relationship of love” and broadening it out from Jewish and Christian traditions to those of some Hindu and Muslim societies, the Rt Rev Dr John Armes (Scottish Episcopal Church) was asked why that should be restricted to two people. He answered—

“Marriage has existed in different forms in different cultures over the centuries. That is why the question whether the state has the right to define marriage—to say who can get married—is relevant. I personally, and the church that I represent, would say that the state has that right. If the state were to say that marriage could be between three or four people or more, I suppose that the state would have the right to do that. However, in the context of the Christian faith, marriage has always been between two people. For me, the idea of the covenanted aspect of the relationship is that it is a covenant between two people.”

117. He added that the Scottish Episcopal Church was currently “engaged in a conversation” on whether it could officiate at same-sex marriages, but that whether people could marry more than one spouse at one time would not be part of that conversation.

118. The Scottish Youth Parliament was asked, in relation to its position that two people in love should be allowed to demonstrate their love and commitment to each other in a way that reflected their personal feelings for each other, why it had chosen the number two. Louise Cameron (Scottish Youth Parliament) responded—

“We firmly believe that marriage is between two people. Polygamy is not a equal relationship—indeed, it is usually against the women involved—whereas we believe that a relationship between two people can be equal.”

---

151 Scottish Youth Parliament, written submission.
Scottish Government

119. The argument that, if any two people in love with each other should be allowed to marry, by the same logic, two closely related people or, indeed, any three people should be allowed to marry, if they all loved one another and were willing, was raised with the Cabinet Secretary. He responded that, in terms of marriage, the Bill would do “one thing only”, namely to allow people of the same sex to marry each other—

“Let us confine ourselves to the provisions of the bill … Wider issues of defining marriage and so on are not the subject of the bill, which deals with one change and the consequences arising from that. Any other issues around the definition of marriage would require additional legislation, but we have no plans at the moment to introduce additional legislation around the definition of marriage.”

120. Responding to a similar point, that reforming marriage under the Bill could open marriage to further reform in future, he said—

“Well, we live in a democracy. My view is that this is an overdue reform of the law, but I do not envisage any further reforms to the definition of marriage, as it has been described, in terms of who can enter into a marriage legally in Scotland. My view is that, once the bill is passed, we as a Government certainly have no intention of introducing further legislation to amend marriage legislation in the future.”

Conclusion

121. We note the differing views expressed in evidence on the meaning and purpose of marriage.

---

PROTECTIONS AND FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The ‘opt-in’ approach for religious and belief celebrants

122. The Bill would add provisions to the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 to allow celebrants (of religious and belief bodies) to be authorised to solemnise same-sex marriage. Under the Bill, the Scottish Ministers would only be able to prescribe a religious or belief body so that its celebrants were authorised to solemnise same-sex marriage if the body requested to be so and if Ministers were satisfied that the body met the qualifying requirements.

123. The Bill also provides that nothing in those new provisions would impose a duty on—

- any religious or belief body to request to be prescribed so that their celebrants could solemnise same-sex marriage
- any religious or belief body to nominate members to be empowered to solemnise same-sex marriage
- any person to apply for temporary authorisation to solemnise same-sex marriage;
- a celebrant approved to solemnise same-sex marriages to solemnise such marriages.

Need for protections

124. The Humanist Society Scotland stated—

“When considering calls for conscience clauses or protection of freedom of speech on this issue, the HSS would ask for equal marriage to be treated in the same way as equality law on race, gender or disability and those with other protected characteristics. When these laws were framed lawmakers did not consider enshrining in law special rights for those opposed to treating women, minority ethnic people or disabled people equally.”\(^\text{156}\)

125. Asked whether marriage was not different, Ross Wright said—

“… the position of the Humanist Society is that it is not different. Because the subject is sexuality, we seem to be getting into a real state over it and treating it differently from race or gender. It is puzzling to me why special provision is being made to bend over backwards to allow people that. Of course, they will still have the right to disagree and to say what they want about it. We are simply arguing for the right for people who want to have a same-sex marriage to have one.”\(^\text{157}\)

\(^{156}\) Humanist Society Scotland. Written submission.

126. Ross Wright also questioned whether protections were even necessary—

“People who are not registrars are given the right to conduct marriages, not the duty to conduct marriages. It is important to realise that. Because of that, it is a mystery to me why we even need the opt-out and opt-in provisions, which are an additional part. If anybody approaches me and asks me to marry them, I do not need to do that. I do not need to give a reason—I could be … otherwise busy that day. There is no need for me to give a reason why I will not marry someone.”\textsuperscript{158}

127. The Rev David Coleman (United Reformed Church) echoed Ross Wright’s view—

“… religious or faith celebrants have a right but not a duty to solemnise a marriage. We would like to safeguard the option for people not to go ahead with any marriage for conscientious reasons. That approach goes back a long time in the history of most churches, irrespective of the sort of marriage that we are talking about.”\textsuperscript{159}

Protections for faith groups against celebrating same-sex marriages

128. Various groups raised concerns about the Bill’s approach to protecting faith groups’ right to decide whether to celebrate same-sex marriage. Dr Salah Beltagui (Muslim Council of Scotland), for example, said—

“We collected evidence about the protections that the bill offers from many sources, all of which suggest that the protections might not be sustainable when a case is taken further, for example to a higher court such as the European Court of Human Rights.”\textsuperscript{160}

129. He described the current system, with celebrants opting into the government system and conducting a marriage at any place as “a good system”\textsuperscript{161} that was “working very well”\textsuperscript{162}. He said, however, that celebrants that he had spoken to had said that they would have nothing to do with the system of marriage proposed in the Bill—

“… they will have their own system and keep away from what is proposed. That is one example of how this interference in the definition of marriage will force some groups to have their own system, whereas the current system is working well at the moment. That is mainly because of this progression, and what you said yourself about the slippery slope. When I discuss the matter with celebrants, they say that they have heard it all before. That is an example of what would happen. This situation between the Government and the celebrants could result in that."

130. Pressed to explain why, given that celebrants would be able to continue to offer marriage as they wished, Dr Beltagui replied—

“That is what has been said, but celebrants feel, because of the history of this process, that, once the legislation is passed, they will be forced to do it. That is the feeling, because of what has happened, this progression …”

131. Asked what in the Bill could be said to cause that perception and how the Bill could be amended to address it, he said that those people’s minds could not be changed—

“… because they see what is coming. It is not about what is in the bill. We welcome what is in the bill—an opt-in system, which is good. However, celebrants are now in an opt-in system, and they have found that what is proposed will be called marriage, like any other marriage. They want to have their own marriage system separate, so that it does not get confused with the system that has same-sex marriage included. That is what we heard from the people in the front line of this relationship.”

132. Kieran Turner (Evangelical Alliance Scotland) welcomed the fact that there would be an opt-in system and that the Scottish Government had recognised that churches should be free to conduct marriages according to their conscience and according to their beliefs. He cautioned, however, that that opinion was not shared by everyone—

“There are definitely some folk in Scotland who would say that churches should be forced to do this, so we welcome the fact that the Scottish Government has taken a sensible approach on that.”

133. He went on to outline the Evangelical Alliance Scotland’s concerns relating to the long-term robustness of the protection—

“How long will it hold out for? Will there be a court case at some point that will try to force a church to marry a couple that it does not feel that it can marry? We have already started to see moves towards that in England, and our concern is that that will come in Scotland. A case might go all the way to the European court, where it may be that the protection is struck down.

“At the moment, our understanding is that it is still considered to be within the margin of appreciation for states, so it might be that that does not happen now. However, we would be concerned about that happening at some point in the future.”\footnote{Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 5 September 2013. Col 1413}

---

134. He then described wider concerns for the future—

“Our concerns … are much wider than the issue of the celebrant and the ceremony. They are about churches, organisations and individuals who still hold to a traditional view of marriage. Will their views be accepted in wider society? We appreciate that it is not the Government’s intention at the moment to say that that is an unacceptable view to hold, but will that come down the line? Will that have wider effects on churches and individuals?”\footnote{Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 5 September 2013. Col 1413}

135. The Rev David Robertson (Free Church of Scotland) took a similar line as regards the long term—

“Although I would like to think that opting out or opting in would work, in reality, it will not. At the very best, it will last for a short while if we have a state-imposed morality and we regard opposition to same-sex marriage as homophobia or its equivalent and therefore equivalent to racism. I do not think that anyone in the Parliament would argue that someone who wishes to be a racist and who says, for example, that they will not marry a black person to a white person should have an opt-in or opt-out. The default moral position of those who—out of conviction rather than political cynicism—argue for same-sex marriage is that opposition to it is exactly the same as racism. Therefore, inevitably, whatever the good wishes of politicians right now, an opt-in or an opt-out will not work, because politicians change every three or four years. I would love to think that teachers, charities and others will have complete freedom to express a view that goes against the zeitgeist and the current culture, but I suspect that that will not be the case.”\footnote{Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 12 September 2013. Col 1444}

136. Ephraim Borowski (Scottish Council of Jewish Communities) also expressed concerns—

“I represent a community that has within it a number of branches that take diametrically opposed views on the issue. However, the one thing on which they are all absolutely in agreement is that there should be no compulsion on any one of them to follow the views of the other. Therefore, whether it is a matter of opting in or opting out … there have to be protections for individuals and organisations. Much of the detail of our submission is to do with the wording of the draft legislation. We want to ensure that the protections are maintained and that there cannot be accidental slippage, as it were.

“We have given several examples of how we think the current wording might result in some people not being able to opt in to do what they want to do because, for example, of the happenstance that they do not currently have an officially recognised celebrant. The bill is worded in such a way that a faith group would have to have a celebrant from the beginning in order to be able to carry out the ceremony. Likewise, individuals might find themselves compromised because they are prepared to conduct same-sex marriages but the organisation to which they belong says that it does not want to do that."\footnote{170}

137. Describing the protections in the Bill as "very weak", Dr Gordon Macdonald (Scotland for Marriage) said—

"The Scottish Government’s intent is probably honourable—I would take what it says at face value—but I do not think that it has backed it up with legislative support. In a sense, what the Scottish Government has indicated to us informally is that this is Scotland, everybody knows each other, we are all friends here, nobody will do the sorts of things that happen in England and therefore we do not need legal protection—it can all be guaranteed by guidance and by a sort of informal agreement with the registrar general or the Lord Advocate. That is the approach that the Scottish Government has taken.

"I do not think that that is sufficient. There are things that the Scottish Parliament can do in terms of legislation to protect charities. We can look at the definition of public benefit ... We can change the charity legislation so that the Office of the Scottish Charity Regulator cannot do to churches what it is doing to St Margaret’s adoption agency at the moment. We could introduce a statutory right for parents to be informed and—depending on the age of the child—to withdraw their child if they are uncomfortable with what they are being taught. There are other things that can be done under devolved legislation."\footnote{171}

138. The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton (Church of Scotland) indicated that the church broadly shared those concerns—

"There are some important points to be made. First, the Church of Scotland has no doubt that the Scottish Government is offering the protections that it is offering in good faith and is seeking to preserve the right of individual religious bodies and their celebrants to make a decision."\footnote{172}

139. He pointed out that the overall package of reforms included two “important parts”\footnote{173} not present in the Bill, namely the delegated legislation and the amendment to the UK Equality Act 2010—

"…we have the gist of what that might be but we have not seen the wording.
Those are important caveats, to which I would add another.

“There is deep concern that, even if everything falls into place, as the Scottish Government would like it to do, the proposed legislation will be ineffective in the face of a sustained challenge under the European convention on human rights. Once same-sex marriage is introduced, it will be extraordinarily difficult for a Government—a state—to discriminate. If the Scottish Parliament introduces same-sex marriage, the Scottish Government—the state—will find it extremely difficult either to discriminate or to allow others to do so.”

140. He believed that there was a vulnerability in the arrangements envisaged by the Bill because religious and belief bodies would be “seen as agents of the state”. He urged the Parliament to consider that, and highlighted the Church of Scotland’s proposal—

“…the vulnerabilities of the proposed scheme may be reduced if, instead of religious and belief bodies being agents of the state in carrying out marriages—as is currently envisaged in the statutory scheme—the religious ceremonies that they offered were simply recognised by the state as being efficacious in marrying two people. A religious body or a belief body would carry out what is essentially a private religious ceremony but the state would recognise it.”

141. Nevertheless, he said that, “even with that innovation”, the Church of Scotland had “deep concerns that, when challenged”, the proposed legislation would “unravel”, adding that there was “plenty of high-level legal opinion to that effect.”

142. The Rev David Robertson said—

“I do not think that any protections that the Parliament puts in place will ultimately last if the conception is that this is about equality … To me, the approach is intended to help to get the bill through but, ultimately, we will end up in a situation in which people who oppose same-sex marriage will automatically be regarded as bigots and as people who are discriminatory and who should therefore be discriminated against. I think that, in a short space of time, schools that do not teach the new morality and charities that do not accept the new morality will be legislated against. In fact, I do not think that there will need to be legislation; I think that the courts will find against us and we will get hammered.”¹⁸¹

---

143. Turning to the actual prospect of defending in court the position of faith groups not wishing to celebrate legally valid same-sex marriages, the Rev Dr Alan Hamilton said—

“We are voluntary bodies; we rely upon our members giving donations. The thought of years of exhausting and incredibly expensive legal challenge is very concerning. That is why in May the General Assembly of 2013 instructed my committee, together with other councils and committees in the Church of Scotland, to consider … whether it is worth the Church of Scotland continuing to offer marriages in Scotland. The matter gives us considerable internal problems and we are deeply concerned about the external threat.”¹⁸²

144. Ephraim Borowski suggested that the practice in some European countries and in other jurisdictions of civil marriage and religious marriage being completely separate from one another, with two separate ceremonies could occur more in Scotland than currently as an “unintended consequence” of the Bill—

“… we need to be conscious of the fact that what happens in all the jurisdictions in the UK is not the same as what already happens everywhere else regarding what is currently referred to as marriage. Following what one might call the European model may be a way of avoiding some of the problems that are being thrown up around the table.”¹⁸³

145. Asked about the article 9 protections in the ECHR, allowing the freedom to practice religion, and about the legal opinions that any attempt in the European Court of Human Rights to force a religion to hold same-sex marriage ceremonies would inevitably fail because of article 9, Kieran Turner said—

“There are conflicting legal views on this, which is where some of the concern comes from. We have not been there yet and no cases have gone to the court yet. Our concern is that those cases will come and we will be in danger. We know that, in a number of areas, there have been concerns about the article 9 protections and how far they go, particularly in the areas in which protected characteristics conflict. Our concern would be that doors would potentially be opened to other situations arising.”¹⁸⁴

146. John Deighan (Bishops’ Conference of Scotland) felt that the difficulty with using the ECHR as a protection was the immense cost associated with it. He added—

“In its interesting submission to the Government’s consultation, the Faculty of Advocates, without taking a position on the principle, pointed out that what will definitely give rise to difficulties and lead to conflict is section 149 of the Equality Act 2010, which relates to the public sector equality duty. This is not just about a re-understanding of marriage but about bringing down the weight of the state to enforce that particular understanding, which is what will happen through the public sector equality duty. That constitutes a considerable threat.”

147. Asked what, in practical terms, he meant by “bringing down the weight of the state”, he replied—

“As we heard earlier, those employed in the public sector, such as teachers, will have to promote the particular understanding of marriage that the state has set out. The public sector equality duty makes that clear. In England, for example, teachers have received advice from the Equality and Human Rights Commission that, in order to show that they have satisfied the public sector equality duty, they have to implement LGBT history month. That month would conflict with things, especially in Catholic schools, and there are immediate concerns for us in that regard.”

148. Dr Macdonald argued that the Bill could not be seen in isolation from other legislation, such as the Equality Act 2010 and the European convention on human rights—

“The problem that arose when adoption was considered by the Equal Opportunities Committee in the previous session of Parliament was that ministers gave lots of assurances that nothing in the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Bill would force Roman Catholic adoption agencies to do anything or shut them down. That was technically right; nothing in that act would do that. The equality legislation at Westminster is the problem that has led to most of the agencies shutting down.

“Ministers can give the same assurances on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill, but members have a moral responsibility to ask themselves whether the protections are robust and can withstand an ECHR challenge. There is already an attempt south of the border to challenge the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013—which was passed only a few weeks ago—in regard to the Church of England’s position. It is almost certain that a similar challenge will arise north of the border. Therefore, members must ensure that not only this bill but other legislation—to the extent that they can influence it—is amended to provide protections."^187

---

149. John Deighan recognised that there were substantial protections around the celebration of a marriage ceremony, but did not think them to be “fully robust”. He said—

“… the crux of the matter … is that a religious celebrant provides a public service, so there will be avenues through which those protections could be challenged further down the line. I believe that that has happened in Denmark, where a church has been told that it must provide religious celebrants. I think that there will be a challenge on that issue."^188

150. The suggestion that churches in Denmark did not have the freedom to opt out was raised with Dr Kelly Kollman (University of Glasgow). She said—

“…my understanding from having looked at the case is that the law there has protections. As far as I know, most of the controversy happened when the church itself decided that it wanted to do blessings, which was not part of the original legislation that was passed in 1989. There was a lot of internal controversy in the church and a number of members of the church were not happy with those blessings. However, as far as I know, on marriage, there was far less controversy.”^189

151. The Equality Network also commented on the position in Denmark—

“The Church of Denmark is a state church, unlike the Church of Scotland, or even the established Church of England. The Church of Denmark cannot decide its own laws, and has no decision-making body like a General Assembly or Synod. Church law for the Church of Denmark can only be decided by the Danish Parliament, and there is accordingly a government Minister for the Church.

“Church of Denmark law is proposed by the Danish government in consultation with the Church, and there was consultation on the proposals for same-sex marriage. The majority of bishops and clergy of the Church of Denmark support same-sex marriage, but a minority are opposed, and the law, which came into effect in 2012, allows clergy who disagree to opt-out of conducting such marriages. The law is fully permissive and there is no compulsion on any celebrant. Two of the ten Church of Denmark bishops opted out of developing the same-sex marriage rite, and around one third of clergy have opted out of solemnising same-sex marriages.

“There are of course many other religious bodies in Denmark, many of whom provide legally-effective marriage. They are all free to decide for themselves whether to conduct same-sex marriages.”

152. Aidan O’Neill QC also pointed to a “different relationship” between the Church of Scotland and the state compared with the relationship in Scandinavian countries with established churches—

“As I understand it … the established church, which is the Lutheran church, has been seen as a department of state, in a similar way to the Anglican settlement. There is a minister in the Government who is in charge of church affairs. There is therefore a different relationship from the traditional relationship in Scotland, particularly because the Church of Scotland is not an established church. It is recognised as the national church under the Church of Scotland Act 1921, but it is most certainly not a department of state. That would be completely contrary to the whole reformation settlement and Calvinist ecclesiology.”

153. Like John Deighan, Dr Gordon Macdonald also felt that the protections were insufficient—

“… the issue comes down to what a public function is … In the Ladele case, the court ruled that Ms Ladele was a public authority because she performed a public function and yet the public function that a civil registrar performs is exactly the same public function that a minister of religion or a religious celebrant performs. Therefore, it then becomes an issue of balance of rights, and what a court would rule as regards the balance of rights may very well change over time and may very well change from one jurisdiction to another … The religious celebrant performs a function for the Government, but they do it within the context of a religious service.”

154. Tim Hopkins rejected the suggestion that religious bodies performed a public service when conducting legally valid marriage ceremonies—

“No. I would not call marriage a public service. As far as marriage that is done by religious bodies is concerned, it is a religious function—it is a sacrament as far as some churches are concerned … It is recognised in law, but it is clearly a religious function. In fact, the amendments to the Equality Act 2010 that are going to be made if and when the bill is passed make it clear that it is a religious function of churches.”

---

190 Equality Network, supplementary written submission.
155. Asked what robust protections were in the Bill, Colin Macfarlane (Stonewall Scotland) said—

“We have had a lengthy consultation over the past two years, and the Scottish Government has listened to those who have concerns about protections. The protections in the bill are robust and strong, and the Government has got the balance right between freedom of speech and freedom of religion.

“The modifications and amendments that the Scottish Government has asked the UK Government to make with regard to celebrants et cetera are strong, and the Scottish Government should be applauded for listening to those concerns.”

156. Pressed on that point and, in particular, on whether the protections would work in practice, he said—

“I do not think that you are ever going to prevent people from making mischief, and you will never have a cast-iron guarantee that somebody is not going to try to take someone to court at some point, but the protections and the amendments to the Equality Act 2010 are—as I said—robust.”

157. He added that, across Europe, nine countries under the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights had had equal marriage for around 12 years, and “not one single religious group in those countries” had been forced to carry out same-sex marriage. He reiterated his point that the protections were “strong and robust” in domestic law as well as in European and international law.

158. Tim Hopkins (Equality Network) agreed—

“… the Scottish Government has done a very good job of drafting the amendments to the 2010 act and getting them agreed by the UK Government. The legislation is now much stronger than the draft that was published last December. The Scottish Government has really listened to the concerns of churches about ensuring, for example, that people who take part in religious services, such as organists and those in the choir, can opt out of same-sex marriages, which they are free to do.”

159. He continued—

“The Government has also listened to concerns about ensuring that people who control religious premises are able to veto any other group that rents those premises conducting a same-sex marriage. Those protections are all there.\textsuperscript{198}

160. Speaking about the protections that the Bill would afford to religious celebrants, Mark Bevan (Amnesty International) said—

“Having reviewed the proposals in the bill, we have no issues with those at all. The Lord Advocate has also made his position very clear.”\textsuperscript{199}

161. He also said that Amnesty International’s lawyers were not aware of any issue in the courts in those countries that had had legislation in place for some time.\textsuperscript{200}

162. The Rev David Coleman (United Reformed Church) also spoke in favour of the approach taken in the Bill—

“… we have been convinced that the guarantees that are contained within the bill are adequate. From one point of view, they might even be seen as excessive, but it might be sufficient guarantee that they are there and that no one is forced to engage in something that they are spiritually disinclined to do … As I said, we support the bill, because we believe that it contains guarantees, both to enable same-sex marriages to happen and to protect those who wish not to be party to that, while, from a public order point of view, not allowing them to bully those who wish to go ahead and prevent them from doing that.”\textsuperscript{201}

163. He said, however, that he was against amending the Bill to weaken the protections—

“We in the United Reformed Church greatly respect individual conscience and opinion, which is why we have not expressed an opinion as a denomination. We know that we contain people with different views. Having followed the process over the past two years, it seems that, because the protections are so thorough, the bill does not give total equality. However, on the other hand, at the end of the day, when a couple come and ask to be married, that will make no difference to them whatever. Therefore, if the protections reassure those who are opposed, let us go with them. We certainly do not advocate that the protections be weakened; we merely note that they bring into effect a state of inequality, although that is perhaps necessary to enable equality to happen.”\textsuperscript{202}

164. Turning to concerns about the European Court of Human Rights and the European convention on human rights, Tim Hopkins said that legal opinion from “experts in human rights” was very clear—

“… article 9 of the convention, which protects the freedom of religion and the freedom to manifest your religion, protects churches from having to conduct same-sex marriages. If the Scottish Government had written into the bill that churches had to conduct same-sex marriages—clearly it has not, but if it had—those churches would be able to win cases in the European Court of Human Rights because article 9 protects them. So, the domestic protection in the amendment to the Equality Act 2010 is underpinned by the European convention. That means that there is absolutely no prospect of anybody successfully taking a church to court and saying that it must conduct a same-sex marriage. The bill improves religious freedom by giving religious groups freedom to choose. We have always said that that should be the case and we are glad that the bill does that.”

165. John Deighan was asked whether, in any of the nine European countries that had already introduced same-sex marriage, his denomination had been compelled to perform same-sex marriage—

“The Catholic Church has not.”

166. Answering the same question, the Rev Dr David Easton (Methodist Church in Britain) said—

“There are Methodist churches throughout mainland Europe, although they are not large ones. I do not have the absolute figures at my fingertips to answer your question accurately. However, I am not aware of any instances in which member churches in those countries have been obliged to conduct same-sex marriages.”

Freedom for faith practitioners and groups wishing to celebrate legally valid same-sex marriages

167. Asked whether the current prohibition on performing same-sex marriages itself represented an infringement of his faith group’s religious freedom, John Phillips (Religious Society of Friends (Quakers)) said that he believed that it was—

“We have a number of gay couples in our Quaker meetings who have civil partnerships. From talking to them and working with them we can see that they feel that they have not been given the same opportunity, either by the Society of Friends or by society at large, to sanctify the relationship within the context of the religious community in which they practise. That has become clear to me really only over the past five years or so, since there have been a number of civil partnerships. We can, of course, hold meetings for worship to bless those couples, but there is something rather special about making the declaration itself within the context of religious worship. It is that which they feel singles them out as being different from opposite sex couples and which we have learned to greatly regret.”

---

168. Answering a similar question, Mark Bevan (Amnesty International) said that he “absolutely” believed that freedom to practise was an important human right and that it was a problem that many faiths in Scotland wishing to perform same-sex marriages and practise their faith in that way were forbidden to do so.

169. Ross Wright (Humanist Society Scotland) argued that the opt-in system was uneven—

“People whose organisations have opted in, like humanists, could refuse to conduct marriages, and that would be fair enough. However, freedom of conscience for people in those organisations that opt out—a Catholic priest or a minister of the Church of Scotland, for example—would not be respected. Conscience needs to be looked at from both directions.”

Protections for public-sector employees and commercial-service providers

170. It was put to Tim Hopkins that the question of protections had wider implications, for example in respect of people who are employed by public bodies? Asked whether there were robust-enough protections for those people, he replied—

“A relevant case down south is Adrian Smith v the Trafford Housing Trust. Mr Smith posted on his personal Facebook page that he disagreed with same-sex marriage and the trust demoted him because of that. That should not have happened. He went to court and he won his case. The court was very clear that that amounted to unlawful dismissal. The law is already clear that you cannot be subject to a detriment by your employer because you have views against same-sex marriage. We think, therefore, that the protections are already there.”

171. John Deighan (Bishops’ Conference of Scotland), however, felt differently—

“We believe that there will be detriments to people in terms of stating their belief. Employment law would need to be amended, because an employer could say that it does not think that someone weighs up to the latest standard... on equality because of their beliefs on marriage. As we have heard, some people already think that such beliefs are akin to racist beliefs.”

172. He argued that the equality duty would “certainly” need to be changed so that people working in the public sector did not feel that they needed to promote a value “at odds with their beliefs”. He told us about people phoning his office to say that they had been told to implement diversity training schemes in their places of work—

“Those schemes are created in such a way that they stigmatise people who disagree because of their understanding of marriage. That is the breadth of detriment that we are facing in society if we go ahead with the legislation.”

173. He called for a change to the Equality Act 2010 to give an accommodation to allow people to distinguish between two things—

“… sexual orientation and the practice of the sexual behaviour. Those two things are conflated. I think that it is wrong to in any way discriminate against someone in an unjust manner based on their sexual orientation. I will give an example of the issue that we face. There might be someone working in a Christian organisation who has a particular sexual orientation, but if they want to propose their lifestyle of living in a same-sex relationship to children who they are perhaps trying to instil with a Christian education, those are two different things. However, the 2010 act does not allow us to distinguish between the two. That is the context that gives us the threat.”

174. Pressed to point to any ruling in court thus far under the public sector equality duty that would lead to the situation he described, he spoke of the Ladele case—

“… Lillian Ladele was told that, because she can get to church on a Sunday, her religious freedom was not being infringed. That is a very narrow understanding of religious freedom …

“It was Neuberger in the UK Supreme Court who said that Lillian Ladele’s religious freedom was not being infringed. The European Court of Human Rights stated in its judgment that it could not dismiss the issue as easily as that. We are looking at a very narrow understanding of religious freedom.”

175. Dr Gordon Macdonald (Scotland for Marriage) also felt that the possibility to opt in or out should apply more widely—

“Individual conscience should be respected in a free society. That does not just apply to a narrow band of people; it applies to everyone if society is to be truly free. If you say to someone that they have no right to a conscience when they work for the public sector, which is essentially what you are saying, that is no longer a free society but one that is becoming repressive. 215

---

176. Describing freedom of conscience for people who work across the public sector as “crucial”, he said—

“For instance, a local authority could easily provide a registrar service without imposing on the conscience of any of its staff. There is no problem in that being facilitated at local level. The problem is that some people and organisations want to force people to officiate at same-sex marriage or civil partnership ceremonies as part of an ideological agenda. That will apply not only to civil registrars but right across the public sector, particularly but not exclusively in schools. The question that members must ask themselves is whether they want to shut off careers in the public sector to people who have a conscientious objection to marriage being between two people of the same sex.”216

177. Ephraim Borowski (Scottish Council of Jewish Communities) said that a distinction between rural and urban areas was relevant—

“Normally, in urban areas, reasonable accommodation will be possible, because if a particular registrar does not want to get involved in something, he or she will have colleagues who can take over and who could be scheduled to do that shift or whatever.”217

178. He said that there was also another distinction, between people already in post – who had applied for it and been appointed with a reasonable expectation as to what the job involved – and people taking up a post in the future, knowing about the new legislation—

“What worries me is exemplified by the Ladele case. There is no doubt that there were other people in Islington who could have undertaken that duty, and Ms Ladele had been in post for many years. If we think about those two distinctions, that produces four classes. Ms Ladele should have been in the most protected class, having been in post in an urban area, with other people who could have been scheduled to do the work. Nonetheless, that became the crux of a case that has gone all the way to Europe.”218

179. Dr Macdonald elaborated on that point—

“The European Court of Human Rights recognises a margin of appreciation for nation states. The UK courts did not support Ms Ladele in her case. In the Netherlands, the Parliament and the courts have ruled on the reasonable accommodation that registrars do not necessarily have to perform their function. That facility can be made—it would be within the competence of the Scottish courts to come to that view. If the Parliament gave a lead on that, it might increase the chances of that happening.\textsuperscript{219}

180. According to the Rev Dr Alan Hamilton (Church of Scotland), the church’s legal questions committee was “deeply concerned”\textsuperscript{220} that public servants, whether registrars or teachers, and particularly those who had begun their employment before the Bill was brought forward, would “find themselves prejudiced”\textsuperscript{221} and “might even lose their jobs”\textsuperscript{222}. For registrars and “others who might find themselves in positions of considerable conflict, including teachers”\textsuperscript{223}, he called for protections equivalent with those for faith celebrants.

181. The Rt Rev Dr John Armes (Scottish Episcopal Church) agreed—

“I simply concur with what Alan Hamilton has just said. We in the Episcopal Church have similar concerns.”\textsuperscript{224}

182. Tim Hopkins was asked whether the Scottish Government’s plan that people on the periphery of marriage, such as chauffeurs and photographers, would not have the freedom to choose not to take part in a same-sex marriage was just to move the discrimination away from the LGBT community on to the religious community. In his reply, Tim Hopkins accepted that there would be differences of opinion on the matter but made the point that the law would not change—

“The situation will not change at all. Wedding photographers are already required by law not to discriminate against civil partnerships so it is already the case that a commercial organisation that is selling photography services must not discriminate on grounds of religion, gender, race, disability or sexual orientation, which means that it must provide its services for civil partnerships.”\textsuperscript{225}

183. He said that, in the Equality Network’s view, the Scottish Government had “got it right”\textsuperscript{226} in the context of a difference between the operation of religious bodies, including the provision of all kinds of religious services by religious bodies, and the provision of commercial services or employment by somebody who has a personal religious belief—

“We do not think that it is appropriate to allow somebody’s personal religious or philosophical beliefs to give them an opt-out from antidiscrimination legislation as an employer, for example, or as a commercial business selling services to the public. Where would that end? If somebody has a philosophical belief that is strongly against mixed-race marriages, are we saying that that person should be able to refuse to supply services to people who are entering a mixed-race marriage? Are we saying that public servants such as the people who empty ... rubbish bins, for example, will be allowed to say, “Well, I strongly disagree with same-sex marriage, therefore I don’t want to empty the rubbish bins of people who are in same-sex marriages.” I do not want to sound flippant, but the law says that such sexual orientation discrimination should not happen.

“We are very clear that where a business is supplying commercial services to the public, where public services are provided to the public using taxpayers’ money, and where non-religious employers are employing people, every member of the public and every employee should be treated with respect. I believe that the large majority of people would not have a problem with that. I may have a religious or philosophical objection to a number of things, but that does not mean that I will treat my colleagues at work, or the people to whom I would sell food if I were running a food stall with disrespect and refuse to serve them.”

Calls for a conscience clause, comparable with the Abortion Act 1967

184. Asked whether the way that abortion was enshrined in law was a good model, Kieran Turner (Evangelical Alliance Scotland) said—

“Yes, I think that that works well for that particular case. As has just been outlined, in most cases, discriminating against someone for any reason is wrong. Most of us agree on that. For most businesses in most situations, that would be wrong. Again, I will use as an example a member organisation that we might have. If a church runs a food bank, it will never turn away someone for any reason of discrimination. That would not happen and it would be wrong if it did happen. However, there has to be an accommodation for certain views. If someone is legally entitled to a public service, provided that they can access that public service, we should make accommodation. We should not try to batter rights against each other; we should take a reasonable and commonsense approach. ... The conscientious objection approach could work in particular circumstances.”

185. Tim Hopkins (Equality Network), however, did not think that same-sex marriage could be compared to abortion—

“You are, of course, quite right that there is a conscientious objection route for people who work in the health service who disagree with abortion. There is also a similar route for people who have a conscientious objection to fighting in the armed services in wars. Why are those routes provided? For abortion, it is because if a person has particular religious beliefs about it and is asked to be involved in one, that person would believe that they were being asked to be involved in murder. The same is true for people who have a conscientious objection to fighting in the armed services during war. Those opt-outs exist so that people are not required to be involved in committing what would be murder, according to their own beliefs.”

186. He explained that he thought that “very different” from asking a civil registrar to sign off on a civil same-sex marriage, which he described as “quite reasonable”.

187. Ross Wright (Humanist Society Scotland) expressed a similar view—

“Abortion is a fundamentally different thing from two people getting married. Nobody is dying. To put the two together is ridiculous. However, it is always useful to turn things on their head to determine, for instance, whether it would be reasonable for me, as an atheist registrar … not to marry somebody if I knew them to be religious. That would be unthinkable. Why, uniquely in this situation, with sexuality, are we making a special provision? If it is the opinion of MSPs that lesbian and gay people should be regarded as equal, then everybody is equal and there is no hierarchy of equality. I would fight equally for the privilege of people to believe what they believe and for their religion. All those things are equal.”

188. Tim Hopkins went on to make the point that civil marriage ceremonies were not allowed to include any religious content, so religion did not enter into it—

“The registrar is simply there to conduct a completely secular ceremony and then to sign the piece of paper to acknowledge that the couple have said their vows and signed up and that their witnesses have signed as well. Asking somebody to do that is not comparable to asking somebody to commit what they believe is murder.”
189. He pointed out the similarity with a civil registrar with Roman Catholic beliefs against divorce who would not be allowed to refuse to marry divorced people—

“We say that civil marriage is an entirely secular, non-religious function and that civil registrars should provide that function to all couples regardless of their personal beliefs about those couples’ lifestyles.”

190. Dr Salah Beltagui (Muslim Council of Scotland) was asked whether he agreed that abortion and war were not comparable with marriage. He replied—

“The case of marriage is exactly like abortion. It is an issue on which people will differ. We accept that abortion is a controversial issue, and marriage is at the same level, or perhaps an even higher level. Abortion involves one person with an unborn baby, but the issue of marriage involves the whole of society, where everyone has to adapt to the new vision.”

191. He emphasised the importance for him of the word ‘conscience’—

“… I do not see that word in the bill at all. That is something that we need to introduce. This committee is called the Equal Opportunities Committee. The issue is not about equality; it is about equal opportunity. Equality could mean that we treat people badly but in the same way. We have to give people equal opportunity to practise their religion, no matter their race or whatever, without being forced into something that they do not want.”

192. Dr Gordon Macdonald (Scotland for Marriage) said that, for many people of faith and others, it was a “fundamental” point—

“It is of equivalent moral significance to the issues that arise when a doctor performs an abortion—in fact, it might even be of more significance.”

193. Colin Macfarlane (Stonewall Scotland), however, supported the view expressed by Tim Hopkins—

“I think that most gay people listening to the comparison of gay people’s long-term committed loving relationships with abortion would be really hurt and disappointed by that.”
194. Reiterating the point that registrars perform a public service, paid for by the public purse, he said—

“LGBT people pay their taxes in the same way as everybody else. They deserve and expect exactly the same standard of service as everybody else, be it good or bad. Tim is right that providing an opt-out is a Pandora’s box, because as soon as you have an opt-out in one area, for example same-sex marriage, you can then start having questions around opt-outs for people who have issues around mixed-faith marriage or mixed-race marriage and, as Tim also clearly stated, for people who might have objections to divorce. The fact is this: registrars provide a public service that is paid for by the public purse and everybody, including gay people, deserves exactly the same standard and level of service.”

Fears of attrition

195. Regarding his comment that, until gay people were “seen as equal in the eyes of the law”, the distinction in society’s view of gay people would remain, Colin Macfarlane (Stonewall Scotland) was asked how that view reconciled with the Bill’s opt-in approach allowing any religious organisation that so wished not to opt in and, therefore, continue with its practice. Specifically, would there be calls in, say, 10 years’ time, if the situation evolved further, for those organisations to be required to opt in? He said that he believed that there would not be—

“The opt-in is right and the balance in the bill is right. It is not for any of us on the panel to tell a religious organisation what it should do. It is for the religious organisation to come to that conclusion itself through discussion and prayer. I cannot envisage a time when we would ask any organisation that still did not want to carry out same-sex marriage to do so. The bill has the right balance on freedom of speech and freedom of religion.

“What is also brilliant about the bill is that it allows organisations that wish to allow same-sex marriage the opportunity to do so. It is not right for one religion to tell another religion whether it should be allowed to carry out same-sex marriage. The opt-in system is absolutely right. That permissive system gets it right, and the Scottish Government should be applauded for that.”

196. Tim Hopkins (Equality Network) agreed—

“One thing that has changed in the past 10 years is that a number of religious organisations, including the Quakers in 2009, have decided that they want to conduct same-sex marriages. You asked what things would be like 10 years from now. Possibly some of the other churches will have decided in 10 years’ time that they want to conduct same-sex marriages. As Colin Macfarlane says, that has to be a decision taken by the churches within the churches.

---

We can rest assured that that is the way that things will go.”

197. He drew a comparison with another other area of anti-discrimination law, that of sex discrimination—

“The laws have now been in place for about 40 years, and discrimination on grounds of sex is not allowed, but it is allowed for religious bodies. The Roman Catholic Church, for example, is allowed to employ only men as priests. Over those 40 years, there have been no moves to try to force the Roman Catholic Church through the courts to employ women as priests.
Everybody understands that it is up to each individual church to decide whether or not they want to open up their ministry to women, and those decisions are rightly made within the church.”

198. Ross Wright (Humanist Society Scotland) commented—

“I see it as the endpoint in that the final legal hurdle to equality will have been overcome. Whether other organisations—for example, the churches and so forth—will want to adapt their positions later is up to them. That is their choice.”

Comparison with adoption agencies
199. John Deighan (Bishops’ Conference of Scotland), speaking of a threat in the context in which the Bill was coming in, drew a parallel with adoption by same-sex couples. Referring to the situation whereby initially it was held that adoption agencies would be able to place children with same-sex couples, assurances were given that agencies disagreeing with that approach could operate in their own way and refer same-sex couples to other agencies but, over time, they found themselves compelled to place children with same-sex couples or lose their charitable status, he said—

“I ask the committee not to make the same mistake as their colleagues who told us that we had nothing whatsoever to fear from adoption by same-sex couples—the quote on that is in our submission. The context is that, once you establish criteria, the Equality Act 2010 enforces those on your religion.
Our adoption agencies suffered from that. If the bill is passed, we will suffer in the same way when it comes to marriage counselling, marriage preparation, marriage training and so on.”
200. Tim Hopkins (Equality Network) was asked about developments affecting adoption and whether he recognised the resultant concern that, by recognising same-sex marriages celebrated by faith groups, it would then become compulsory for faith groups to celebrate same-sex marriages. He disagreed with the description of the adoption agency situation—

“In 2007, two pieces of legislation were dealt with at the same time. The Scottish Parliament dealt with legislation to allow same-sex couples to apply jointly to be adoptive parents, because that is a devolved matter. What the law says about bodies that provide public services with public money and discriminate on religion, sexual orientation or any other ground is a reserved matter. As such, that issue was dealt with down in London at Westminster, which passed the Equality Act (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2007.

“Westminster debated carefully the specific issue of adoption agencies and whether it was valid for adoption agencies to simply turn away all same-sex couples. Both Houses of Parliament concluded that they should not do that because adoption agencies use taxpayers’ money to provide services. For example, councils pay adoption agencies to match up prospective adoptive parents with children. Westminster’s view, which I agree with, is that where public services are being supplied and being paid for by public money—we all pay our taxes, whether we are heterosexual, lesbian, gay or bisexual—those public services should be made available to everybody. That is why adoption agencies are required to allow same-sex couples to apply to adopt. There is no right to adopt; anyone who applies is put through a stringent vetting process before they are accepted as adoptive parents.”

201. He pointed out that, in the Stage 3 debate in the Scottish Parliament on the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Bill, in 2006, the Scottish Executive had specifically referred to the fact that it was the UK legislation—then under consideration—that would determine whether adoption agencies could turn away all same-sex couples. He added that the UK legislation on adoption agencies had, after a 20-month period to allow adoption agencies to adjust, come fully into effect at the end of 2008, whilst the Scottish legislation allowing same-sex couples to adopt, he continued, had not come into effect until later—

“… so the rule applying to adoption agencies was already in place before it even became possible in Scotland for same-sex couples to adopt. Things have not changed since that legislation.”

---

202. The example of the adoption agencies were raised with Ross Wright (Humanist Society Scotland), with reference to his assertion that the Bill was permissive and that the approach would not be compulsory. Asked whether, given what happened with adoption agencies, the same thing might happen in the context of the Bill, he said—

“My understanding of the situation, although I am not fully aware of it, is the adoption agencies could have stayed open, but that it was their choice to close down rather than treat people equally. No one forced them to close down; their conscience and their choice led them to do so.

“I strongly advocate that people should never be compelled to conduct same-sex marriages. Even the existing law, as far as I read it, says that I am not compelled to marry anyone.”

Balancing the rights of all parties

203. Asked about balancing rights in relation to different protected characteristics, Dr Salah Beltagui (Muslim Council of Scotland) said—

“I have asked this question ever since the equality legislation came in. If you have a conflict between two characteristics, to which do you give preference? It was always said that the decision would be left to case law, but I think that recent case law has given sexual orientation preference over religious practice. Again, that is one of the things that are not clear in the equality legislation. It is very difficult to decide which way the decision will go.”

204. Tim Hopkins (Equality Network) felt that considering whether the Bill provided a balance between equality on grounds of sexual orientation and better equality on grounds of gender identity on one hand and religious freedom on the other was “the wrong way to look at it”. He said—

“It is not a balance of those two things against each other; the bill promotes both at the same time. It increases sexual orientation equality and it increases freedom by allowing religious bodies such as that of John Phillips to conduct same-sex marriage while completely protecting the rights of religious bodies that do not want to conduct same-sex marriages not to do so.”

205. Mark Bevan (Amnesty International) similarly rejected the discourse about rights for different protected characteristics competing with one another—

“The fundamental position of Amnesty International is reflected in something called the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. That it is universal is the most important thing about it. We would not see a conflict in rights here at all ... [between] our belief that same-sex marriage should be allowed in law and our belief in equality, set against—as some have argued—the opportunity for religious celebrants to refuse to marry ... The freedom to practise a religion does not conflict with the freedom to marry everyone else in the community on an equal basis.”^{255}

Conclusion

206. We note stakeholders’ varying views on the approach taken in the Bill towards protecting celebrants of faith and religious organisations’ freedom to conduct legally valid marriages in keeping with their doctrines. We ask the Scottish Government to consider those views in its approach to the amending stages of the Bill.

REGISTRATION OF CELEBRANTS

Belief bodies

207. Under the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977, two types of marriage ceremony are possible: ‘civil’ and ‘religious’. Since 2005, the Registrar General for Scotland has temporarily authorised humanists as marriage celebrants under a provision of the 1977 Act designed for the temporary authorisation of religious celebrants. The Bill would set religious and belief celebrants on the same legal footing by redefining non-civil marriage ceremonies as ‘religious and belief’ ceremonies.\^256

208. Ephraim Borowski (Scottish Council of Jewish Communities) commented—

“It has been correctly recognised that the humanists feel to some extent compromised by the fact that the current fudge, for want of a better expression, allows them to conduct what are referred to as religious marriages. Humanists want to be able to continue doing what they currently do but not to have it labelled “religious”. That is perfectly acceptable. However, what is proposed will result in the religious aspect of genuinely religious marriage being kind of removed, because religious and belief marriages are left in the same basket. The distinction between them, which is a significant distinction that all my colleagues have founded on at various points in their answers to other questions, disappears. Therefore, we have suggested what looks like a trivial grammatical drafting change—from “religious or belief marriage” to “religious marriage or belief marriage”—because we believe that the distinction still exists and should not be elided in that way.”\^257

\^256 Policy Memorandum, paragraphs 15-17
Scottish Government

209. According to the Policy Memorandum\(^{258}\), when the Scottish Government consulted on marriage law reform prior to introducing the Bill, it proposed introducing ‘belief’ ceremonies as a third category, separate from civil ceremonies and religious ceremonies. The Policy Memorandum goes on to explain that, following the consultation, it was clear that it could—

- in some cases be difficult to determine whether a body was a religious body or a belief body. This suggested that it would be logical to have a religious or belief category
- be confusing to have three categories

Position of the Church of Scotland

210. Ross Wright (Humanist Society Scotland) commented on the Church of Scotland’s “preferential status”\(^{259}\) in law—

“… they are the only people who are, as of right, allowed to marry others. Everyone else has to be approved. Of course, that also creates a confusion in the bill in that it has required an additional amendment about deacons. If the church had been included with everyone else in the section in question, it could approve whoever it wanted, but because the Church of Scotland has this special privilege as of right to marry, a separate section relating to deacons has had to be included. Obviously, in giving evidence to an Equal Opportunities Committee, we would advocate that everyone should be treated equally; however, if a church is not established, it does not have the same special privilege.”\(^{260}\)

211. The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton (Church of Scotland), however, challenged the view that its treatment in marriage law made it privileged\(^ {261}\) and commented—

“The Church of Scotland believes that it has a responsible position that is no less than that of any other church. We have a responsibility to all the people of Scotland, regardless of religious belief or sexual orientation. That is where we are. How the state reflects the Church of Scotland’s position in the country’s national life is really up to it, but we do not seek a privileged position.”\(^ {262}\)

\(^{258}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraphs 19-20

\(^{259}\) Humanist Society Scotland, written submission

Conclusion

212. We note the explanation in the Scottish Government’s Policy Memorandum as to why the Bill maintains two categories of ceremony rather than adding ‘belief’ ceremonies as a separate category. However, we also note the point raised by the Scottish Council of Jewish Communities and seek the Scottish Government’s view on the suggested amendment to the redefinition of non-civil marriages, to more prominently reflect the distinction between religious ceremonies and belief ceremonies.

213. We seek the Scottish Government’s view on the opinion expressed by the Humanist Society Scotland that the treatment in marriage law of the Church of Scotland affords it a privileged status.

CIVIL PARTNERSHIPS

Shortcomings

214. Tim Hopkins (Equality Network) told us that there were “two significant differences”\(^{263}\) between marriage and civil partnership—

“One is in pension rights, in relation to the survivor’s pension. The other is to do with international recognition. The international recognition regime for civil partnerships is much weaker and is not common across countries that have civil partnerships, whereas it is common for same-sex marriage.”\(^{264}\)

215. He also described what he termed “practical discrimination”\(^{265}\) against civil partners—

“People have been quite distressed, for example, when they go to the bank and it does not understand what a civil partnership is or it has a form to fill in that has boxes for marriage but not for civil partnership. That type of thing … is still quite common. We carried out a survey of 103 people in civil partnerships in Scotland, and 58 per cent reported that they had not received the same respect or treatment as married couples for the reasons that I have mentioned.”\(^{266}\)

Treatment in the Bill of civil partnerships registered abroad

216. The Bill would enable couples who registered a civil partnership in Scotland to change their civil partnership into a marriage, either by having a marriage

\(^{266}\) Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. Official Report, 5 September 2013. Col 1384
ceremony or via an administrative procedure to be established by the Scottish Ministers under regulations. 267

217. Tim Hopkins (Equality Network) raised an “anomaly” 268 in the Bill’s approach to civil partnerships registered abroad, and it relates to the changing of civil partnership into marriage—

“Under the bill, a couple can change their civil partnership into a marriage in two ways. The first is an administrative route … available only for people who registered their civil partnership in Scotland, for obvious reasons, because the registration to be changed is there on the record.

“The other way in which a couple can change their civil partnership to a marriage under the bill is simply to marry in the normal way. At the moment, the bill says that they can do that only if their civil partnership was registered in Scotland. That is causing real problems for a small number of people.” 269

218. He gave the example of a couple, one of whom is American and the other is a British citizen, who entered into a civil partnership while living in New Jersey and now live permanently in Scotland—

“They are recognised as being in a civil partnership. They would like to change that to a marriage when the bill is passed. Had they registered their civil partnership here, they would be able to do that, but because their civil partnership is registered in New Jersey, under the bill as it stands they will be unable to get married in Scotland.

“To marry, the couple would first have to dissolve their civil partnership, as that is the only way that they would be able to marry. The problem is that, in order to dissolve the partnership, they would have to show that it had irrevocably broken down: the same rule as for a divorce. Of course, their civil partnership has not broken down, so the only way that they could dissolve it would be to live apart for a year.

“We have, therefore, a couple who are in a civil partnership and want to change it to a marriage, which the bill would allow if they had registered their civil partnership in Scotland. However, because they registered the civil partnership in New Jersey, they would, if they wanted to get married, have to split up for a year …” 270

267 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 103-4
219. He described the situation as a “nonsense” and said—

“Only a small number of people are affected by that issue, but they are real people who have registered a civil partnership abroad and who, under the bill as it is currently drafted, will in effect be barred from entering a same-sex marriage. We think that a small change should be made to the bill to extend the part that allows people to get married in Scotland if they are already in a civil partnership to cover civil partnerships that are registered anywhere.”

220. James Morton (Scottish Transgender Alliance) added that there would be a particular issue for transgender people in that regard—

“If people are not able to convert their civil partnership that was registered in a foreign country into a marriage, they will not be able to get gender recognition without the state inhumanely forcing them to end their civil partnership, with all the trauma that exists around that. The people who are living in Scotland in a foreign civil partnership would remain the only couples for whom the inhumane divorce requirement would still apply after the bill. That would have a particular discriminatory effect on transgender couples in that situation.”

221. He also raised the prospect of problems with regard to immigration status—

“In order to ensure that people can live in Scotland with their partner, the immigration services would need to be satisfied that they are truly a couple. All the business of having to split up and get back together could easily result in immigration services being less than convinced that everything is above board.”

222. Colin Macfarlane (Stonewall Scotland) commented that there was also the “human factor” relating to the “very fact that two people … in a loving, committed and stable relationship would have to split for a year.” He said—

“That is particularly cruel. Our view is that, although only a small number of people will be affected, they are—as Tim Hopkins said—real people. The bill should be amended, and that could be done very simply. We agree with the principles that Tim has set out.

---

67
Scottish Government

223. The point about the difficulty that couples in a foreign civil partnership would have with entering into a same-sex marriage in Scotland without dissolving their partnerships in their home jurisdictions was raised with the Cabinet Secretary. Asked whether the Scottish Government planned to look at that issue again with the passage of the Bill, the Cabinet Secretary explained that, “out of respect for foreign jurisdictions” 277, the Government was “not really inclined” to lodge any amendments on that matter—

“The law in other jurisdictions could cause enormous complications, particularly if it is proposed to dissolve the civil partnership or if it is proposed to dissolve the marriage in some way, if the partnership goes on to a marriage. The law would have to be very complicated if we tried to address those intricacies. It is much more straightforward and would not delay the passage of the bill if we did not lodge any amendments on that. 278

224. The Cabinet Secretary confirmed that civil partnerships registered abroad would be recognised in Scotland 279, that they could be dissolved in Scotland 280 and that polygamist marriages formed in countries where they were legal could also be dissolved in Scotland 281. That being the case, he was pressed on the question why those in a civil partnership performed abroad would have to dissolve the relationship, involving a year’s separation, before they could get married. The answer expanded on the reasons that he had already given—

“When we have looked at what other jurisdictions do in respect of changing overseas civil partnerships to marriages, some of them do and some of them do not. It seems to be the case that Holland and New Zealand would change overseas civil partnerships to marriages whereas Norway and Sweden would not. 282

“In Holland, one must either be resident in Holland or a Dutch national in order to get married there. That is not the case in Scotland. Pretty well anybody can come here and get married. If we introduced a residence requirement for civil partners to change their relationship to marriage in Scotland, that would be unusual in Scots marriage law. It is not impossible, but it would distinguish between most people getting married and people changing their civil partnership to marriage. There might have to be a residence requirement for those people." 283

---

225. It was explained that, because of a provision in the UK act, there was probably no need to consider English civil partnerships. A further point, though, related to when the marriage would be deemed to have started—

“In the Scottish bill, we have provision that says that if you change your civil partnership to marriage, the marriage is deemed to have started when you went into the civil partnership. It might be hard for us to do that in respect of the overseas jurisdiction because we do not have the same sort of control over civil partnerships registered in overseas jurisdictions as we do in Scotland.”

226. Asked whether it was something that the Scottish Government would consider in future, the Cabinet Secretary said—

“We will see. Those issues may well be raised during the review—the remit is wide enough to take them on board ... This is not a straightforward process and a lot of consultation and research is needed before we can decide the best way forward. However, there is no reason why the review on civil partnerships could not consider those issues.”

The future of civil partnerships

Extend, maintain or abolish?

227. Brandi Lee Lough Dennell (LGBT Youth Scotland) said that the LGBT national youth council’s concept was to open up marriage and civil partnerships to all couples—

“Bisexual couples and trans people who do not want to pursue a GRC are limited by their birth sex, for instance, to having one sort of relationship or another.”

228. She said that people also saw it as a “matter of equality” that couples could not choose between marriage and civil partnership—

“Some couples would rather have a marriage to recognise their relationship in relation to society and other couples would prefer a civil partnership. For LGBT young people, same-sex marriages as well as mixed-sex civil partnerships are important issues of equality.”

229. It was put to her that, when Sweden and Denmark had legalised same-sex marriage, their equivalents of civil partnership ceased to be available to couples not already in them, in line with a view that civil partnerships were created purely as a compromise to avoid providing equal marriage and had become redundant. In response, Brandi Lee Lough Dennell spoke of a consultation with LGBT young people in seven youth groups and with two schools on the draft bill, responses to which showed that, if mixed-sex civil partnerships were not introduced, a “sizeable number” of respondents would not have a relationship status that represented their “ideals”. 289

---

230. Dr Kelly Kollman (University of Glasgow) confirmed that many countries had created same-sex unions that were not marriage in a “politically expedient” manner in the late 1990s and early 2000s. She also described “most national LGBT rights groups” as having marriage as their “ultimate goal” and that their argument had “largely been made on equalities issues.” 290 She highlighted, however, a further dimension—

“What sometimes gets lost in the debate is that, if we go back in history and look at the Scandinavian countries, part of what was going on was a pluralisation of family policy. The ways in which people live their intimate lives these days have become much more complex and pluralistic, and there was all this talk about different ways in which the state can define and recognise couples. That is a different argument from the equalities one.

“In some ways, however, the discussion and debate that we are having about same-sex unions can allow us to look at both issues. If we want to open marriage, that will help to solve the equalities issues between same-sex and different-sex couples, but, in doing so, especially as we have had another, non-marriage type of same-sex union before, we might want to start thinking about the other side of the debate as well—the one about pluralising family policy. If a Parliament opens marriage but then closes off civil partnerships, as they are in this country, it might be going against the second part of the debate, which is about pluralising family policy. I would encourage all Parliaments to think about that second goal as well, as some have done.” 291

231. Colin Macfarlane (Stonewall Scotland) commented that the Bill’s effect on civil partnerships was as yet unknown and referred to the forthcoming review by the Scottish Government, which he described as a “pragmatic and sensible” 292 policy decision—

“…we should wait for the Scottish Government’s review and we look forward to seeing what it produces.” 293

232. Tim Hopkins also welcomed the Scottish Government’s review—

“We think it important that that review start soon. It has taken two years to get to the bill from when the consultation on same-sex marriage started. We very much hope that in two years some of us might be back here talking about legislation that would open up civil partnership to couples of any gender.”

233. Referring to the point about Sweden and Denmark’s abolishing of civil partnerships for couples not already in them when same-sex marriage was introduced, he recognised that it was “one way to go” but said that some other countries, “including France, Belgium, the Netherlands, New Zealand and South Africa”, had chosen to retain civil partnerships alongside marriage when marriage was opened to same-sex couples. However, Dr Kelly Kollman confirmed that the registered partnership schemes available in those countries were not all comparable with UK civil partnerships—

“They differ quite a bit. The scheme in the Netherlands is relatively comprehensive in terms of the rights that it gave to different sex non-married couples and same-sex registered partnerships. The French PACS is much less comprehensive. It is easier to get into and to get out of and does not include a lot of the benefits, duties and obligations that are associated with civil marriage in France.”

234. Tim Hopkins stated a preference for the Dutch model—

“In the Netherlands, the situation is quite similar to what we would like to see here: civil partnership and marriage are both available and have similar legal effects, but they are different and they are seen to be different. If you look at the stats in the Netherlands, about one quarter of same-sex couples choose civil partnership rather than marriage and three quarters choose marriage. About 90 per cent of mixed-sex couples choose marriage but 10 per cent choose civil partnership.

“Our surveys of LGBT people in this country have found similar proportions for same-sex couples.”

235. For Tim Hopkins, the point was to “maximise choices for everybody” and he said—

“Ideally, we would have liked to see mixed-sex civil partnership in the bill, but there is a lot in the bill already and there needs to be consultation and discussion about the future of civil partnership. Should it be opened up to all couples, regardless of gender, or should it be got rid of, as happened in Sweden?”

Scope for legal challenge

236. Asked whether maintaining civil partnerships for same-sex couples only might be subject to a legal challenge with merit, Aidan O’Neill QC argued that it would not, because an opposite-sex civil partnership would be no different from an opposite-sex marriage—

“The name is different, but the legal consequences are exactly the same.”

237. Although she pointed out that the legal consequences were “not quite the same”, particularly for couples who had been together for a long time, because of a “significant exclusion” in relation to pension benefits, Karon Monaghan QC agreed that any challenge would be “unlikely to succeed”. She said—

“… because there is, for an opposite-sex couple, no material distinction between a marriage and a civil partnership—that is, they can marry and get all their pension benefits—I think that the courts would say that this is an area where the legislature has some margin of discretion.”

Scottish Government

238. Asked for indication of a timeframe for the forthcoming review of civil partnerships, the Cabinet Secretary answered that he hoped for it to be done “reasonably speedily” and said—

“I have not put a deadline on it because it would make sense that our review, which has started—we have published the remit—is not totally completed until we see the conclusions and recommendations from the UK Government’s review. That is because many of the issues that will inform both reviews are reserved matters, particularly pensions and the like. It would therefore be sensible for our review to have the opportunity to study the recommendations and conclusions from the UK review in consultation with Maria Miller, the culture secretary and lead minister for the issue in the UK Cabinet. I have agreed with her that we want to try and get the review done and dusted reasonably quickly. We need to do it properly. It will be into 2014, but the sooner it is done the better.”

---

239. Asked whether the Scottish Government was minded one way or the other on the possibility of opening up civil partnerships to mixed-sex couples, he said—

“The Government has no policy on that. We will wait and see what the review says and then decide what our policy should be.”

240. In relation to the case currently before the European Court of four mixed-sex couples seeking the right to enter into civil partnerships, the Cabinet Secretary said—

“We will wait to hear what the court says about that particular case and, if it requires us to take any action, we will consider that. Given that the issue is before the courts in Europe, it would be appropriate for us to wait to see what the court says.”

241. It was put to the Cabinet Secretary that, in the context of the current challenge in the European Court, the Bill could be seen as discriminating against mixed-sex couples. In response, the Cabinet Secretary disputed the premise that the Bill could be seen as discriminating against mixed-sex couples—

“We absolutely do not accept that interpretation of either our law or the ECHR … The Scottish Government’s very clear position is that the bill does not contravene the rights of mixed-sex couples.”

242. He said that, as the people in question could get married, the Scottish Government saw “no need” to amend the Bill. Nevertheless, he set out more detail on the matter—

“Clearly, we would need to reach agreement with the UK Government on a number of the reserved matters in relation to opposite-sex civil partnerships. When we have looked at the issue in the past, one of the big questions has been this: if you could enter into an opposite-sex civil partnership in Scotland, what would be your rights and responsibilities with regard to reserved matters both in Scotland and if you travelled outside Scotland? For example, there is no guarantee that, if you entered into an opposite-sex civil partnership with someone from overseas, you would be able to bring your partner into the country, because there is no guarantee that the UK Government would recognise the partnership for immigration purposes as it would recognise, say, a same-sex civil partner or a married person. There are also social security and, as the cabinet secretary mentioned, pensions issues to take into account, and we would very much have to work with the UK Government on the implications for reserved as well as devolved matters. Otherwise, couples could enter into mixed-sex civil partnerships thinking that they have full rights and responsibilities when, in fact, they could have quite limited rights and responsibilities, unless, as the cabinet secretary has made clear, the reserved matters followed.”

---

243. The Cabinet Secretary added that covering opposite-sex civil partnerships in the Bill would have made it “much more complicated” and would have had “a lot of ramifications”. He continued—

“… not moving in concert with our colleagues south of the border could cause a lot of problems instead of solving them. Our view is that the sensible course of action on this issue is for us to take our time and work with our colleagues south of the border and, hopefully, by some time next year, we will be very cognisant of all the challenges that might arise from that particular change in the legislation. A decision will then have to be made both south and north of the border on whether we go ahead with any recommendations that result from the two reviews.”

244. He was also asked whether the review would address the situation whereby a couple in a civil partnership would have to dissolve the partnership if one of them transitioned gender. He replied—

“The review’s remit is wide enough that it can look at such issues. I suspect that that issue will feature in the evidence that is given to the review.”

245. In relation to devolved powers on pension policy regarding certain public sector schemes, the Cabinet Secretary was asked why the Scottish Government planned to treat same-sex spouses in the same way as civil partners for the pension schemes under its responsibility. He said—

“Irrespective of the provisions in the bill, the policy of the Scottish Government, where we have devolved responsibility, is, as far as possible, to have a pensions policy that is compatible with the general principles of pensions policy throughout the UK. To do otherwise would result in many potential anomalies and difficulties. That is our general approach.

“However, a review is being undertaken by the UK Government of occupational pensions in particular. We reckon that that will report in about July next year. Once we see the results of that review, we can discuss the issue with our colleagues south of the border … We are very conscious of the issue. We have an open mind about it and we think that the sensible thing to do would be to await the review of occupational pensions by the UK Government because it will give us a clear indication of the best way forward in this area.”

---

Conclusion

246. We note that the Scottish Government plans to consider issues relating to reform of civil partnerships, including opposite-sex civil partnerships, in its forthcoming review.

247. We note that the Bill creates a requirement that those same-sex couples who have entered into a civil partnership in another country must dissolve their partnership before being permitted to marry in Scotland. We believe that if same-sex marriage is introduced, these couples should have similar access to the proposed administrative procedure for conversion of civil partnership to marriage as couples whose civil partnerships were conducted in Scotland.

CHANGE OF GENDER OF MARRIED PERSONS OR CIVIL PARTNERS

248. The Gender Recognition Act 2004 (“the GRA”) empowers the Gender Recognition Panel to issue a gender recognition certificate (“GRC”) to a person meeting certain criteria. Under the GRA, once a full GRC is issued, the person’s gender becomes for all purposes the acquired gender. The GRA currently provides that, where successful applicants to the Panel are married or in civil partnerships, the Panel should issue the applicant with an interim GRC. With interim GRCs, applicants do not change gender but are able to divorce or to dissolve civil partnerships, after which full GRCs are issued. The Bill would enable couples who married in Scotland or entered into a civil partnership in Scotland to stay together throughout the transition and acquisition of the new gender.

Removing the requirement to end marriages and civil partnerships

249. Tim Hopkins (Equality Network) described the current situation as a “very important area of legal discrimination” affecting transgender people—

“Because we have a segregated system of marriage and civil partnership, if someone changes their legal sex because they are transsexual, they have to end their marriage and start a civil partnership. That causes all sorts of difficulties for people.”

250. The Humanist Society Scotland “strongly” supported that view.

Gender-neutral ceremonies

251. James Morton (Scottish Transgender Alliance) explained that somebody’s legal gender in one country does not automatically get recognised in other countries—

“You can have a situation in which a transgender woman who has gone through gender reassignment from male to female and has been fully legally

---

315 Scottish Government, Policy Memorandum, paragraphs 110-12
317 Humanist Society Scotland, written submission
recognised in her home country—say, America—is not recognised as female in Scotland, where she would still be legally male in the eyes of UK law. If she saw herself as lesbian and had a female partner and wanted to get married in Scotland, the bill as it stands would require her to declare in front of all the wedding guests that she was the husband. Obviously, that would be a gross violation of dignity and privacy and would cause humiliation and embarrassment on what should be a happy and special day.”

252. He said that all that would be required to avoid those violations of dignity and privacy would be to allow the option, when the couple and the celebrant agree, to use gender-neutral language such as “We pronounce you married” rather than “You are now husband and wife”. He continued—

“We completely respect the fact that some religions might want to continue always to use the gendered terms “husband” and “wife”—that is fine—but we want religions such as the Quakers and the Unitarians, in addition to the Humanists, to have the option of respecting privacy and dignity and allowing gender-neutral language when somebody is technically entering a mixed-sex marriage but does not perceive themselves as being the gender that is on their legal status.”

Scottish Government

253. The Cabinet Secretary said that he thought that the Scottish Government had “probably struck the right balance” regarding gender-neutral ceremonies but recognised the sensitivity of the issue. He continued—

“As I understand it, the proposal is that both the denomination and the couple would have to agree to use the gender-neutral declaration. There might be further detail added to the arrangements for the ceremonies. I would not rule out change on that altogether ... However, I am concerned about the complexity. Any further changes to the bill in this respect would require a great deal of thought. It is not so much about the amendment or amendments that might come forward; it is about the implications and unintended consequences of any potential amendments. We would welcome comments from the committee, but it is an area that we would be quite cautious about, simply because it is particularly complex and I do not want to end up with unintended consequences, particularly if they damage the people whom we are trying to support to move forward.”
254. It was added that the Government would also want to make certain that no problems would be caused for denominations that might not want to use a gender-neutral marriage declaration when marrying an opposite-sex couple.\textsuperscript{324}

Spousal consent

255. James Morton (Scottish Transgender Alliance) set out a case for an amendment to the Bill to remove the ability of a spouse to obstruct his or her partner’s gender recognition—

“The European Court of Human Rights has recognised that for someone to have their gender identity legally recognised and respected by their Government is a human right. That is a very personal issue and is not something that another person should be able to block.”\textsuperscript{325}

256. He added that a balance needed to be struck—

“We feel that it is disproportionate to allow a spouse to block the whole gender recognition of their partner, but we recognise that some spouses might feel very strongly that they want the marriage to continue to be seen in the original way and to have the marriage certificate only in the original way as it was originally solemnised.

“Our proposed amendment would allow the transgender spouse to receive their gender recognition while remaining married, but without their partner’s consent the marriage would not be re-registered to show the new details. The bill regards a marriage between a trans person and a non-trans person that happens before someone’s gender recognition as a protected marriage. There is therefore no change to the pension rights, parental rights or any aspect of the marriage because the gender recognition of one party is granted. It is recognised that when the marriage was entered into, it was a mixed-sex marriage.”\textsuperscript{326}
257. James Morton explained that, for the Scottish Transgender Alliance, the proposed amendment would enable a balance between the rights to gender recognition for the trans person, which is their individual human right, and the rights of the non-trans spouse to avoid being given a marriage certificate that reflects new details. Indeed, he argued that the proposed amendment would provide better protection for spouses who do not wish to divorce their transgender partner—

“They might be against divorce—perhaps for religious reasons—and not want to have any change noted on their marriage certificate, because they feel strongly that how it was originally solemnised is what counts.”

258. He added that the amendment would not remove any rights for people to divorce their transgender partners and recognised that transition could be quite an arduous process for people, both bureaucratically and emotionally—

“We recognise that it can be profoundly difficult for a spouse to come to terms with their partner’s transition. That is another reason why we think that access to gender recognition should be separated from the issue of whether they continue their marriage. Sometimes, it can take a number of years for people to feel more at ease with the experience and they may want to wait and see how they feel rather than have to make a vast decision in order to allow their partner gender recognition.”

Scottish Government
259. Asked whether he saw any merit in requiring a declaration of spousal consent to continue with the issuing of a GRC, the Cabinet Secretary recognised the concerns but said that it was a “difficult issue” for the Scottish Government—

“The first point to stress is that spousal consent is not required to obtain a new gender; consent is required to stay in the marriage when a new gender is acquired. Both parties must be willing to stay in the marriage. In the bill, we have recognised the specific concern that some non-transitioning spouses may not wish to be in a same-sex marriage after their spouse obtains gender recognition. The point has been made that the non-transitioning spouse has at least two years to take action, given that the transitioning spouse must live in the acquired gender for two years before applying to the gender recognition panel. However, it may be the application to the panel that makes a non-transitioning spouse consider his or her options. This is quite a complicated area, but we have been listening to the concerns and we believe that we are addressing them.”

260. Asked whether the provision in the Bill allowing a person to continue to receive a gender recognition certificate if their spouse died before the application was complete covered all eventualities, the Cabinet Secretary said that he was aware of the issue and was willing to take any comments “seriously”.

---

Long-term transitioned people

261. James Morton (Scottish Transgender Alliance) told us that, under the GRA, there had initially been a two-year period allowing people who had transitioned more than six years previously to have their gender recognised without having to provide the same level of medical evidence as others. He explained why such an arrangement was important—

“The standard route requires that a person provide not only a letter from their GP detailing what medical treatment they have had for gender reassignment, but a letter from a gender specialist evidencing exactly how they were diagnosed. They can access such a letter only while they are still in touch with that gender specialist, and if someone has been transitioned for more than six years they will be out of the system and will no longer be attending a gender identity clinic. Therefore, they will have to try to re-enter the system, in which it currently takes between one and two years to get a first appointment.”

262. He added that they would also be taking up a space that could otherwise go to somebody in greater need simply in order to get re-diagnosed for the purposes of proof for the gender recognition panel. He went on to set out the solution put forward by the Scottish Transgender Alliance—

“We propose that the long-term transitions route be reopened in recognition of the fact that some people could not access it the first time round because they did not want to divorce or because they disagreed with the discriminatory requirement for other people to divorce and felt that, on principle, they should not take advantage of a system that their fellow trans people could not access. We feel that that would be of benefit not only to transgender people but to the gender recognition panel because, when there is a difficulty in gathering evidence, that makes the process of trying to help an individual to get through the gender recognition process more time consuming for the panel. We feel that it would be to the benefit of all to reinstate that option and to require people who have been transitioned for more than six years to provide only a GP letter evidencing their medical treatment, to enable them to have their gender recognised on that ground.”

---

263. Asked for clarification as to whether that process should be put in place for people eligible for it originally or reopened retrospectively for all people, he said—

“We think that it would be best simply to reopen the route and not try to define exactly who would be eligible for it. The UK Government has tried to effect a restricted opening of it, but it seems not to have got the grouping quite right. It is hard to select exactly the right people, and we think that there are other reasons why people might need to use the long-term transitions route. For example, if they live in a rural Highland area they might not yet even have heard of the Gender Recognition Act 2004. It can take a long time for people who have been long-term transitioned and are no longer in contact with any transgender groups—people who are now just living their lives—to find out about their rights and be able to access things. We feel that it would be fairest simply to open the route for anybody who has been transitioned for more than six years.”

Scottish Government

264. The evidence requirements and the difficulties that people who were long-term transitioned could have in meeting those requirements, were raised in the evidence session with the Cabinet Secretary. His answer explained that the Bill was very similar to the UK act in this area—

“That is deliberate because, given that the gender recognition panel operates on a UK basis, we wanted to stay as far as possible in line with the way that it operates. After speaking to us, the UK Government decided to amend its bill at quite a late stage to introduce what is sometimes called a fast track for long-term transitioned people who possibly cannot get the full range of medical evidence. Obviously, the UK act relates to people who could not use the original fast track under the Gender Recognition Act 2004 when it was brought forward because they did not want to end their marriage. We think that we might lodge an amendment at stage 2 along similar lines to what is already in the UK act to try to address that issue.

“We will have some detailed discussions with the Equality Network and the Scottish Transgender Alliance, because we have seen what they have proposed in this area. We will also speak to the UK Government and the gender recognition panel, given that the panel operates on a UK basis. In principle, we think that there is scope to introduce an amendment at stage 2.”
Lowering the age requirement

265. Asked about the current requirement that a person be at least 18 years to secure a gender recognition certificate, James Morton (Scottish Transgender Alliance) said—

“Transgender people aged 16 or 17 will remain discriminated against under the bill as drafted: because they are unable to legally change their gender, they will be unable to access a marriage or civil partnership as they identify.”

266. He argued that making the age at which someone could obtain a gender recognition certificate equal to the age at which they could “undertake the life-changing decision to marry and found a family” would not “in any way” encourage more people to transition or encourage people to transition at a younger age—

“After all, this is not about the start point of a transition but about recognising the end point; it is not about access to medical treatment but about recognising the small but significant number of transgender people whose identity as the other gender is so profound and so known to them from a young age that with parental support they have been living in the other gender throughout their teenage years. Only with parental support could they have changed their school and NHS records and their name and therefore be able to evidence their readiness for a gender recognition certificate at the age of 16.”

267. He described how, without the GRC, those people would, for example, be unable to get married in the church that they wished to get married in—

“… although the Church of Scotland regularly marries transgender people and their spouses, the minister in question might not perform same-sex marriages. As a result, 16 and 17-year-old transgender people are being discriminated against.”

268. James Morton also refuted that the proposal, which would “enable people to make various decisions about their lives at the age at which Scotland recognises their legal capacity to do so” – i.e. at 16 – was controversial.
269. Brandi Lee Lough Denne ll (LGBT Youth Scotland) said that young people were aware of their gender identity “far earlier”\textsuperscript{342} than they were of their sexual orientation—

“We work with a number of trans young people who began their transition long before the age of 16. When we consulted the trans young people in our service, we found that a large number of them were very upset by the fact that at 16 they could leave education, get a job or get married but could not legally have their gender recognised. For them, there was a very large disconnect in that respect. In fact, on this very issue, a young person told us:

‘I’m currently 17 and am going away to college next year. I would much prefer to have myself as male on the official records, but they need to have my ‘real’ details on the system.’

“In our consultation, we also asked young people whether the age at which they could get a GRC, which is 18 at the moment, had stopped any of them from entering into a marriage, and several young people told us that they had delayed marriage in order to receive their GRC. If the bill as drafted is passed, someone who enters into a marriage when they are 16 would have to wait until 18 to get their GRC and then would have to re-register their marriage afterwards. If the bill does not pass, they will not have the option.\textsuperscript{343}

270. Asked whether there was an issue in terms of less favourable treatment in respect of transgender young people who, although currently able to live in the acquisition gender, were unable to obtain formal recognition of that—i.e. a GRC—until the age of 18, whereas a non-transgender young person could marry at the age of 16, Karon Monaghan QC said that there “probably” was—

“… the position would require justification. Certainly, there would be potential for that to be the subject of a discrimination claim. The issue of whether it be justified would depend on issues such as whether transgenderism is something that takes a level of maturity on the part of an individual to be clear about, such as they might be expected to attain by the age of 18. I do not know the answer to that question. However, potentially, it could violate the convention—article 8, for example—and it would require justification if it were to be lawful.”\textsuperscript{344}

271. Lynn Welsh (Equality and Human Rights Commission) agreed with that position.\textsuperscript{345}
Scottish Government

272. The Cabinet Secretary was asked why the minimum age for applying to the gender recognition panel was 18 when the age of consent for marriage and sexual activity was 16. He described the point as a “serious issue” and responded—

“Before a person may apply to the gender recognition panel, they must produce evidence that they have lived full time and exclusively in their acquired gender for a minimum of two years. That alone suggests a gap between 16 and 18.”

273. He went on to state that the age for applications was set at 18 in the GRA to reflect the fact that people are expected to live for two years in their acquired gender—

“Most adolescents can be expected to have reached sexual maturity at the age of 16, which is also the age of consent to sexual intercourse. Some people mature more quickly than others, but it might be difficult to vary the age limit from case to case.”

274. Moreover, he argued, if the age limit were lowered generally, “practical concerns” would arise about how a child between the ages of 14 and 16 would show that they had lived “full time and exclusively in their acquired gender,” as the panel looked at documents such as driving licences, household bills and passports with a person’s gender-appropriate name on. He continued—

“We would need strong medical evidence to support any change in the age limit and before we could agree to any moves to lower the limit. I would be extremely reluctant to lower the limit, for the reasons that I have outlined.”

275. It was put to the Cabinet Secretary that an individual could have lived in the acquired gender for two years before turning 16 and that confirmation of that could be obtained from the individual’s school or from a general practitioner, who could also confirm what medication they were on. He recognised that, “theoretically”, that was possible, but said—

“… we have to be quite cautious about how we move forward on the issue … As a Government and in the bill, we have shown that we are keen to ensure that transgender people have all the rights that they should have, but I think that we have to strike a balance here, because there are issues to do with the maturity of people of that age and, in particular, the ability of people who are aged between 14 and 16 to show that they have been living in that way. I take quite a cautious view … it would take a fair bit of persuading for me to decide that the bill needed to be changed in that regard … [and] we did not consult on the matter, so I think that it would raise issues if we amended to 16 the age for applying to the gender recognition panel."

83

276. Asked whether he recognised that there were public bodies involved in recognising the lifestyle choice that people from the age of 12 and upwards had made, the Cabinet Secretary said that he did—

“You mentioned the age of 12. Should we pick 12, 14, 16 or 18? This is an area in which I am being quite cautious, because the law will apply to everyone. If we allowed waivers for different age groups or variations in what is allowed, we would end up in an extremely complex situation. If we went down that road, we would end up with a bill that was almost unmanageable. I think that it is necessary to choose between 16 and 18. For the reasons that I have outlined, our view is that 18 is appropriate, although we will listen to what the committee has to say. However, it should be borne in mind that we have not consulted on the issue.”

277. The Cabinet Secretary was questioned further about the suggestion that, by not allowing a 16-year-old transgender person to marry when a non-transgender person can marry at that age, there may be grounds for a human rights challenge on the basis of less favourable treatment in law. He replied—

“Everything in the bill has been human rights law proofed. We do not believe that any aspect of the bill would be open to a successful human rights challenge. However, if the committee feels strongly that we have not got things right, we will listen to what it has to say. I admit that I am being cautious on the issue—for good reason, I think—but if the committee suggests an alternative, we will take it seriously.”

278. It was added that the situation in Scotland and in the UK more generally was “broadly in line with the position in other jurisdictions”.

Conclusion

279. We note the Scottish Government’s position that it has struck the right balance regarding gender-neutral ceremonies, and that allowing such ceremonies could cause problems for denominations that might not want to use a gender-neutral marriage declaration when marrying an opposite-sex couple. However, we believe that it should be possible to allow a choice of gender-neutral or gender-specific language for marriage declarations and call on the Scottish Government to reconsider its position.

280. We note evidence calling for the requirement for spousal consent to be removed from the gender recognition process. We accept the Scottish Government’s view that, whilst the non-transitioning spouse has at least two years to take action, it may be the application to the panel that makes a non-transitioning spouse consider his or her options. We realise that spouses of people seeking gender recognition may find themselves in circumstances that are very difficult to face and that we have not received evidence from their perspective. However, we believe that the non-transitioning spouse’s personal choice is sufficiently protected by the automatic grounds for divorce triggered by his or her partner’s seeking gender recognition. We therefore believe the requirement for spousal consent for gender recognition is unnecessary and should be removed.

---

281. We draw two further conclusions regarding gender recognition issues raised in evidence, whilst recognising that it may not be possible to deal with them effectively within the scope of this Bill—

- Regarding the difficulties facing long-termed transitioned people, we welcome the Scottish Government’s willingness to consult relevant stakeholders further with a view to lodging an amendment at Stage 2.

- We note the representations made to us about lowering the age requirement. We do not consider that we have received sufficiently comprehensive evidence in this area and ask the Scottish Government to provide, in advance of Stage 2, a detailed response on the issue.

IMPACT ON OTHER AREAS OF LIFE

Education

Impact in the classroom

282. Stephen McCrossan (Educational Institute of Scotland) was asked whether the Bill would have an impact on how teachers taught in the classroom. He replied—

“I do not think that the bill will have a significant impact on the way in which teachers teach in the classroom. We simply see the bill as another strand in equality and diversity, promoting equal opportunities and challenging discrimination. I do not think that it will make a significant difference to classroom practices and how teachers teach in the classroom. 357

283. He accepted that teachers might have personal views either for or against same-sex marriage but pointed out that they adhere to a code of professionalism and conduct through the General Teaching Council for Scotland—

“They role in the classroom is clearly defined as non-judgmental. The responsibility and onus would therefore be on the teacher to devise appropriate classroom activities to allow the children and young people to look at and explore the issues in the bill on their own and make up their own minds about it. Essentially, it is the responsibility of the teacher to be inclusive and non-judgmental in how they operate in the classroom.”

---

284. He told us that teachers were often asked what their own views were but, in his experience, they set down the parameters with the class at the beginning of the year on what was expected in the classroom—

“The teacher’s views and opinions would certainly not matter; it is all about the children exploring and expressing their own views. That would be established as a basic classroom rule.”

285. Responding to a suggestion that, on issues like this, a teacher’s interaction with, for instance, a primary 4 class would be quite different from that with a secondary 4 class, where there would be more of a discussion, he said—

“I have no experience of the primary sector, but I can say that classroom practice and teaching methodologies have opened up as a result of curriculum for excellence, and teachers are now being encouraged to explore and use many more new teaching methodologies such as collaborative learning, the use of information and communication technologies for research purposes, active learning and peer learning. People’s views of traditional teaching approaches have changed and teachers are now able to pick and choose from the approaches that I mentioned, depending on their audience.”

286. Cara Spence (LGBT Scotland Challenging Homophobia Together Schools Project) felt that the issue was not necessarily as controversial as people perceived it to be—

“LGBT Scotland has just completed a three-year project in which we worked with more than 9,000 pupils in 47 schools across Scotland and trained 350 school staff. There is a fear that this is a controversial issue and when teachers hear such language they get alarmed. However, when you unpick the issue and show that it is okay to talk about, say, love, bullying and anti-bullying approaches, teachers are okay with it. Our work with teachers was fantastic and positive; those teachers are leading the way in Scotland and particularly think that issues such as prejudice-based bullying need to be challenged in schools.”

287. John Brown (Catholic Education Commission), however, felt that a “strongly controversial” aspect of the Bill was its “redefinition of marriage” which, he said, would “come into conflict with the belief held in Catholic schools and by the Catholic church about the sanctity and dignity of marriage as being between a man and a woman”\(^\text{364}\). According to John Brown, teaching in those schools would have to represent marriage according to that religious stance and sought an assurance that it would not “change or challenge the faith curriculum in Catholic schools”\(^\text{365}\). He outlined a specific concern—

“In a Catholic school, we would be teaching the idea of marriage as being between a man and a woman. That is the sacramental element in a Catholic school. That does not prevent me from stating that some people live different lifestyles and deserve respect for that. My worry is that if a teacher says in a classroom that they do not believe something to be marriage in the sense that we understand marriage, they could be liable to be attacked or taken to court because they are seen to be against something that the state has promulgated. Therefore, we need some sort of legal protection in the bill so that we can say what we believe within the Catholic understanding of marriage and we are not prevented from saying that some people go through a form of ceremony that they call marriage but is not marriage in our view.”\(^\text{366}\)

288. Michael Calwell (Family Education Trust) also spoke of a conflict, between two “normative views of marriage”\(^\text{367}\), which he characterised as, on one hand, a “purposeful sexual union of a man and a woman … vital to human society”\(^\text{368}\) and, on the other, a “radical, new vision of marriage … invented by a pretty small political class in a very small corner of the world in the past few years”\(^\text{369}\). He said—

“We must decide which of those two conflicting understandings of the human institution of marriage we teach to children. We would say that the bill should not proceed at all. However, should it proceed, the decision on which of those conflicting views of marriage is taught to children would have to be made by parents because, in any free society, they are ultimately the people who are responsible for raising and educating their children and they have a basic right to have their ontological, philosophical and religious views communicated to their children.”\(^\text{370}\)
289. Asked why a school would have to take one side or the other, rather than have teachers explain, similar to an issue like abortion, that some people agreed with it and others disagreed with it, Michael Calwell said—

“With older children—in the teenage years, for example—we could probably tease out some of the political and ideological concepts that have gone into the bill. We could talk about gender theory, critical theory and all the ideologies that have driven the bill and then juxtapose the vision of marriage that is contained in the bill with what the human family understands the nature and purpose of marriage to be. Therefore, we could teach it in the context of a wider political and ideological conflict that is going on in this part of the world at this point in time.

“However, when it comes to small children, who really cannot digest all that complexity, the people who must decide what marriage is—what its basic meaning and purpose are—and what they want to communicate to their children about that must be the parents. We emphasise the primacy of parental sovereignty in the debate.”

290. Ruth Hunt (Stonewell/Stonewall Scotland Education Champions Programme) disagreed, feeling that there was a “fundamental misunderstanding at the heart of the debate”, namely the assumption that the law was based on people’s individual belief and faith rather than on what the nation needed. She set out the Stonewall experience of how teachers could present their own views without coming into conflict with the law—

“Faith schools that work with Stonewall Scotland and those that choose not to but still take the issue seriously are clear that teachers are able to present their views and beliefs in a respectful and dignified way while still teaching truth. People in every faith community and those of no faith would agree that all children need to be taught the truth. Children under 11 do not need Michael Caldwell’s analysis of Foucault’s changing nature of gender variance. They need to know that different couples love each other and that love and relationships are important.

“Providing age-appropriate materials and ways of describing that is exactly how good faith schools work. The faith schools with which we work say that homophobic bullying is not fair, not right and not Christian and that they strongly believe in that. They also say that some people believe that same-sex couples should be able to get married and some do not because they believe that marriage should only be between a man and a woman. Children, regardless of their level of sophisticated understanding, are able to grasp that concept easily.”

291. She argued that it was possible to present different notions of faith without telling “lies”\(^{374}\) and set her argument in the context of current, existing law—

“The truth at the moment is that opposite-sex couples can get married in a religious premises or in a registry office. Some people do not have any religion when they get married, but that is okay. Some gay people can enter into something called a civil partnership. Those are facts—factual pieces of information. The teacher can then say, for example, ‘I don’t believe that gay people should be allowed to have a civil partnership. That’s because I believe that relationships should only be sanctioned by the state when they are within a construct of faith.’ You know, you can have that conversation while presenting the truth.

“When the bill is passed, the teacher could say, ‘Some gay people get married; some don’t. Some heterosexual people get married; some don’t. I believe that gay people shouldn’t get married.’ That is not an impossible position to occupy within a school environment.”\(^{375}\)

292. She disagreed with suggestions that the Bill would “force”\(^{376}\) teachers into a position where they could not say that they did not believe that same-sex marriage was a good thing—

“The reality is that good teachers, including good Catholic teachers, frequently manage their beliefs in juxtaposition with the curriculum that they are teaching. I remember a very good lesson in my Catholic secondary school, in which we were taught about evolution but the teacher began by saying, ‘I do not believe in evolution. This is my personal belief, but I will now teach you.’ As a pupil, that was a fascinating insight into the different ways of seeing the world, but the lesson also enabled me to pass my physics GCSE. These things are not contradictory.”\(^{377}\)

293. Pressed to explain on what grounds she believed that teachers would be able to manage the juxtaposition between their beliefs, those of their schools’ denominations and the law – and if, for example, there was a specific legal protection, Ruth Hunt maintained that it was what happened already—

“This legislation will not make any difference to how teachers in faith schools and indeed non-faith schools—are already managing these issues. Teachers hold a range of beliefs about a range of different issues, but the fact is that they know that they need to teach things so that kids can pass their exams; so that they can live, work, socialise and pray in a modern society when they leave school; and so that they are equipped to work and to manage in society. Teachers

\(^{374}\) Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. Official Report, 26 September 2013. Col 1537

\(^{375}\) Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. Official Report, 26 September 2013. Col 1538

\(^{376}\) Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. Official Report, 26 September 2013. Col 1538

want to ensure that young people respect their neighbours, their colleagues and the people they are going to work with. Of course, that does not preclude them from expressing a belief; indeed, young people are very interested in the range of beliefs that people hold on issues. There is no way—in fact, it is physically impossible—to say to a teacher, ‘You have to draw a line and not say what you believe here and teach only the facts there.’”

294. She added that, were this a new issue or concern, she would be “less confident” in her answer—

“… but the reality is that teachers navigate a fine line all the time about issues relating to contraception, genetics and modern crop rotation. We constantly battle with ethical issues of interest and issues that involve holding conflicting beliefs and teaching the facts. Good teachers are very well equipped to deal with that.”

295. Stephen McCrossan said that the EIS’s view was that the system already worked—

“Normally, if a teacher has difficulties with the teaching resources that he or she is expected to use in the classroom, their professionalism allows them to flag up their difficulty with the particular topic and local arrangements come into play in the school. As the Government has pointed out, teachers have a responsibility through their professionalism, but employers also have a responsibility under the public sector equality duty to respect the beliefs of the individual teacher.”

296. According to Stephen McCrossan, he and his colleagues had not come across any cases at national level in which disciplinary procedures had been applied to teachers who had said that using certain materials went against their beliefs—

“… which indicates that such issues are either being dealt with at local level, or they simply do not happen.”

Dealing with bullying
297. Cara Spence (LGBT Scotland Challenging Homophobia Together Schools Project) was asked whether leadership that came from the classroom reduced bullying. In her answer, she emphasised the welfare of children and young people—

“At the end of the day, we know that lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender young people are in classrooms across Scotland. They tell us that if teachers said negative things about same-sex relationships, or said that same-sex relations are harmful or not equal to heterosexual relationships, they would find that damaging and hurtful. That is the most important thing. 382

298. She described considering the welfare of children and young people as “paramount” in a teacher’s role—

“… it is not secondary to their beliefs or views. Before a teacher makes a statement in the classroom, they should consider whether it might have a damaging effect on a pupil in that classroom. Teaching should not be biased;
It needs to be factual. If the bill is passed, the legislation will be fact. There is no need for teachers to state negative opinions in the classroom in relation to the legislation.” 384

299. Responding to the same question, Chief Superintendent Grant Manders (Police Scotland) said that he had been in the police for 26 years and could not remember any instances of bullying that had been precipitated by what a teacher had said in the classroom. He said that it was “more of a peer issue in the playground” than something that began in the classroom. 385

300. Relating the incidence of bullying to the introduction of civil partnerships and the prospect of same-sex marriage, Ruth Hunt (Stonewell/Stonewall Scotland Education Champions Programme) said—

“Civil partnerships brought us up a gear. We heard a lot from young people who had attended a civil partnership ceremony and then talked about them in school, and we think that civil partnerships created an environment in which these matters could be talked about in an easily understood way.” 386

301. However, she continued, civil partnerships had not completely eradicated homophobia in schools—

“… 50 per cent of young lesbian, gay and bisexual people still experience bullying—and the sense of otherness that comes from having two separate systems is incredibly damaging to gay people’s sense of self and how that is described in schools. We thought that the situation would be better than that and that things would move more quickly, but that has not happened.” 387

---

302. Whilst she recognised that same-sex marriage would “absolutely ... not end homophobic bullying”\(^{388}\), she put forward the view that it would have a “transformative effect on Scottish society”\(^{389}\). She reasoned that in other countries, people began to “stop worrying quite so much about equal marriage”\(^{390}\) when it was introduced and that that would also be the case in Scotland—

“Oh, there has already been some movement and relaxation from the Church of England and the Pope on these matters. It is perhaps not as important an issue as child poverty and some of the other major issues that faith communities are concerned about.”\(^{391}\)

303. Pointing out that not all faith communities shared the same views on the issue, with many gay and heterosexual people of faith seeing marriage as a “good endorsement of good relationships”\(^{392}\), she argued that marriage would have a “civilising effect”\(^{393}\) on people’s consideration of lesbian, gay and bisexual issues that would “feed down into the playground”\(^{394}\).

304. Acknowledging that there had been “some confusion” over why same-sex marriage would reduce homophobic bullying, she set out an explanation—

“The acceptance of equal marriage in Scotland will be heard and understood by those young people up and down the country who are sitting in their living rooms reading the papers that this country has voted for equal marriage and equal rights for lesbian, gay and bisexual people. That is very positive and inspiring news for lesbian, gay and bisexual people, their parents, their godparents and their friends and families, and it will have an impact on the culture in schools.

“The type of vitriol that we are hearing about gay people right now will have a damaging impact and damage the young lesbian, gay and bisexual people who are watching on live stream—and I can assure you that they will be watching it. They are interested in what is being said, and the way people are talking about gay people will have a negative impact. A positive vote for this legislation will change culture and attitudes and, crucially, make modern 21st century Scotland a nation that lesbian, gay and bisexual people want to stay in.”\(^{395}\)
305. Cara Spence gave some context from research—

“... the research that we carried out with 350 LGBT young people in Scotland showed that 69 per cent of LGBT respondents had experienced homophobic or bi-phobic bullying and 10 per cent had left education as a direct result of homophobia broadly within the school environment. The research also showed that homophobic bullying can impact on young people’s mental health, increase the suicide risk and the potential for someone to self-harm, and lead to poorer educational attainment.”

306. Ruth Hunt gave some further data—

“‘The School Report’, which is a self-selecting survey of lesbian, gay and bisexual young people in Scotland ... found that half had experienced homophobic bullying, one in four had tried to take their own life at some point and more than half had deliberately harmed themselves. It is also worth flagging up that the work that we did with YouGov on the Scottish attitudes survey found that 92 per cent of people of faith stated that schools should tackle homophobic and transphobic bullying. There is a very real understanding and buy-in.”

307. She emphasised that including positive examples of lesbian, gay, bisexual and trans issues in day-to-day, ordinary teaching had a positive impact on lesbian, gay and bisexual people—

“It is worth remembering that if the only things that young people hear about sexual orientation are statements such as, “Your shoes are so gay”, “It’s so gay”, and “You’re so gay”, and if they go home and their parents are unhappy and their GP or chaplain are unable to help them, that leads to low self-esteem. A positive reinforcement makes those young people feel better, and it makes the heterosexual young people who hang out with them feel better, too.”

308.Asked how Catholic schools tackled homophobic and transphobic bullying, John Brown said that they deal with it in exactly the same way as all schools did—

“Whenever HMIE reports and collects statistics on whether pupils have ever been bullied in school, the figures are horrendous ... Rightly, all schools in Scotland, including Catholic schools, have zero tolerance of all forms of bullying, but that does not stop the bullying. I agree with what has been said about the scale of homophobic bullying, but it could also be said about lots of...”
other kinds of bullying. Schools are trying to stop all bullying—some successfully, some less successfully.

309. In relation to a question about how teachers in Catholic schools would handle a situation in which a young person had experienced homophobic bullying that had been, in some way, justified by a twisted reference to scripture, John Brown said that they would “recognise the dignity of that young person as a person” which, he said, would not be dependent on their sexual orientation. He continued—

“The other side of it is that we just would not accept homophobic bullying. If the youngster who was bullying was able to quote scripture, I would question both his ability and his understanding of scripture. As with all understanding of sacred scripture, people can pull out bits and pieces without seeing the whole. We must be very careful of that, and the person who is doing the bullying—whether it is homophobic or not—must be dealt with severely. We must help young people to understand that every person in society has dignity, and under Catholic belief that dignity is formed by the fact that every person is made in the image and likeness of God. For me as a Catholic, the principle that every human is made in the image and likeness of God means that I must treat other people with a tremendous amount of dignity, whatever their sexual orientation.”

310. A question about whether there was bullying in schools of religious young people or of children holding traditional values was raised. Michael Calwell (Family Education Trust) said that he knew of people who had been bullied—

“I know a young lady who expresses religious views and has been bullied. The school, which I will not name, has dealt with it. There is an increasing amount of vehement intolerance. The process that we are undergoing here is likely to lead to more of that kind of intolerance.”

311. John Brown said that he had never seen any evidence to suggest that it was known whether people had been bullied for religious reasons. Ruth Hunt, however, quoted the national data sets which, she said, showed that bullying came in the following order—

“First and foremost, young people are bullied because of their weight, and second because of their sexual orientation, or perceived sexual orientation. About number five on the list is people who have faith. They tend to be of Muslim, Sikh or Hindu faith and are perceived to be terrorists, basically. Christian faith is lower down the list.”

Potential for controversy

312. Asked whether there were any concerns that the changes proposed by the Bill could set off a debate over teaching and classroom reactions similar to the controversy witnessed at the time of the ‘section 2A’ repeals under the bill that led to the Ethical Standards in Public Life etc. (Scotland) Act 2000, John Brown (Catholic Education Commission) raised a concern about equality duties—

“…[under] the public sector equality duty … a local authority, if it is to fulfil that duty, might develop corporate policies that champion the need to advance equality. Advancing equality uniformly at the expense of the protection of religion and belief is where I see the difficulty. The public sector equality duty does not protect teachers who say things like, ‘I don’t believe that this is marriage but the Government is allowing people to enter into what they call marriage’, and that might lead to difficulties with employment law. There are examples of people who have been castigated and taken to court because they have made statements about what marriage is in essence and said that they disagree with the bill. We are looking for protection.”

313. Ruth Hunt (Stonewell/Stonewall Scotland Education Champions Programme) described what she saw as the “fundamental impact” of section 2A on Scottish schools and young people—

“… teachers felt paralysed and unable to talk about anything that related to sexual orientation. That legacy lives on in our schools. Some teachers think that that legislation still exists, and some know that it has been repealed but do not know what that means in terms of what they can do. That leads to there being very little reference to lesbian, gay and bisexual issues in any classroom, faith or no faith. The bill has reopened that discussion and it will give teachers the opportunity to think about how they can talk about these issues in an age-appropriate and sensitive way that reflects their belief system.”

314. She said that any additional legislation relating to education should be avoided “at all costs” as it would be “perceived and received” by children and teachers as the “equivalent” of section 2A and as a “signal to teachers that they could actively go against” teaching the facts—

“... that is a legacy that you do not want to return to and we do not want to return to under any circumstances. Existing guidance and legislation protects teachers of all faiths and none when they discuss these issues in a sensitive way that protects religious freedom but also enables children to learn the facts about how our society works in 21st century Scotland.”

315. In relation to the same point, Stephen McCrossan (Educational Institute of Scotland) said—

“I work in the equality department of EIS and, as a trade union, we see it as our responsibility to keep teachers informed and give them a more informed view of equality issues. In undertaking that work, we organise LGBT networks for teachers, we have policies for giving advice to LGBT members, we are actively engaged with the Scottish Trades Union Congress to promote LGBT issues, and we actively encourage partnership activity with organisations such as LGBT Youth and Stonewall Scotland. Recently we highlighted Stonewall’s “The School Report: The experiences of gay young people in Britain’s schools in 2012”, its approach to learning and teaching materials on different families, and its education champions programme. We have made our members aware of the LGBT Youth teachers’ toolkit and lesson plans that it has provided.”

Rights and freedoms
316. Michael Calwell (Family Education Trust) felt that it was important to be mindful of demographic changes, “particularly with the inflow of people from very strong pro-marriage, pro-family cultures”. He said—

“That is visibly the case, particularly where I live. Scottish society will become increasingly reliant on people from those demographic backgrounds as our natural population, if you like, declines.”

317. He argued that, without provisions in the Bill to protect parents who wanted and needed their children to have an understanding of marriage consistent with their views, there could be “a lot of problems in classrooms, particularly with parents taking local education authorities to court for violating their rights”.

---

Quoting “Article 2, protocol 1” of the European convention on human rights, he said that three provisions needed to be added to the Bill—

“... first, a statutory obligation to inform parents if any teaching about marriage that conflicts with their views is done in the classroom; secondly, a right to withdraw children from such teaching; and, thirdly, a positive obligation on the state to provide children with education that conforms to their parents’ understanding of the vital—pre-political, if you like—nature and purpose of marriage.”

318. For Michael Calwell, even if the young individuals’ views differed from those of their parents and they wanted to be part of the education that was offered in school, parents should be the “ultimate arbiters” of what their children were taught on issues such as this, up to the age at which they could understand the “nuances” of the arguments. He continued, expressing a fear that the state education system would not teach about the subject of marriage in an impartial manner—

“We can already see forces at work within the education system and the civil service that are antagonistic towards the traditional, established view of marriage. We would therefore not be necessarily comfortable that the state education system would provide a properly contextualised version of the wider debate about marriage not just in Scotland but throughout the world.”

319. Cara Spence (LGBT Scotland Challenging Homophobia Together Schools Project) disagreed—

“As a youth organisation, we are really clear that parents’ rights should not be privileged over the rights of young people. It is important that young people’s views are listened to and considered in any decisions that are made about their lives. Such a view is outlined in current practices such as getting it right for every child as well as in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

“We recognise that some parents may want to remove children from classes such as sexual health and relationships education. However, we believe that it would be phenomenally impractical on the ground—if the bill goes through—for teachers to remove children from the classroom every time same-sex marriage is mentioned. Ultimately, good education is about dialogue between pupils and teachers—it is about discussing issues—so it

---

420 Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. Official Report, 26 September 2013. Col 1547
421 Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. Official Report, 26 September 2013. Col 1547 would be difficult to plan for when a young person may raise the issue or to discuss it in the classroom.\cite{footnote:422}

320. Stephen McCrossan (Educational Institute of Scotland) gave a different view on the subject of whether it would be possible to know in advance whether a subject was going to be taught in the classroom—

“...The curriculum for excellence offers an awful lot of opportunity. I think that—touching on a previous point—there is now perhaps more of an emphasis on parental involvement within the working life of a school. Parent councils have a more important role.

“It is also good practice within schools that, if any contentious issues are going to be covered within the curriculum, parents are advised of that well in advance. As regards any instances that I have come across, parents have the right to approach the school, the headteacher or perhaps a member of the parent council to register their objection or to withdraw their child from that specific aspect of the religious education curriculum or the sex education curriculum. That is simply my experience, but certainly the curriculum for excellence gives an opportunity for parents to express their views more powerfully.”\cite{footnote:423}

321. Asked whether, should the Bill be passed creating marriage for same-sex couples as well as heterosexual couples, he would expect teachers in schools not to discuss that situation if there were pupils with same-sex parents, Michael Calwell said—

“This is why the bill is very problematic. Ultimately, it would be down to the parents of the other children to decide which of the conflicting versions of marriage they wanted their children to be taught about. That is one of the problems that the bill poses. I wish that I had an easy answer to that question, but the bill raises more questions than it answers.”\cite{footnote:424}

322. John Brown (Catholic Education Commission) felt that the point was not about the discussion of marriage in the way that the Bill would allow it—

“... it is about the business of what marriage is. In that discussion of what marriage is, we want to say that the current legislation about denominational schools remains the same and is guaranteed so that, in the discussion of marriage, a teacher can clearly state that, for some people in society, although the Government has made a decision to call it equal marriage, in the view of the church we cannot call it marriage in the sense that we believe in marriage. That is where the problem arises: we want some sort of right to determine the faith aspects. That is not to say that we will not discuss these issues; the question is whether we say that they are exactly the same ... we want the right and the freedom to teach the definition of marriage that the church would hold to. We also want an assurance that the faith curriculum is not going to be seen necessarily as discriminatory. That is the issue that we need to be careful about in whatever comes out of the bill.”

\footnote{\textit{Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. Official Report, 26 September 2013. Col 1550}}

\footnote{\textit{Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee. Official Report, 26 September 2013. Col 1547}}

323. Asked whether, in the specific circumstances of a teacher in a Catholic school having a strong opinion and wanting to express that, the legislation as currently proposed would leave that teacher protected or unprotected, he said—

“First, I do not think that the teacher would have the right simply to say, “This is my strong belief.” However, the teacher would have the right to say, “This is the belief of the Catholic church.” We must clarify that. Secondly, as the bill stands, I believe that a teacher who made that statement would be unprotected, and that worries me.”

324. John Brown was also asked whether teachers in the sector of the Scottish education system that he covered would be allowed to express views that were different from those of the church and still hold down their jobs. He replied—

“Yes and no. A teacher is able to express any view. However, the expectation is that they will say, ‘This may be my view, but the view of the church is X.’ Parents who send their children to a Catholic school have certain expectations, one of which is that the teachers will teach what the Catholic church is about and what its views are. A teacher would be at liberty to say—as has happened in the past—‘I personally may disagree with the church on this particular point, but this is what the church believes and teaches.’ I do not think that the teacher can go beyond that.”

325. Responding to a question about teachers in Catholic schools who said, as a matter of faith, that they didn’t believe that women should be priests nor that they should be ministers and whether such teachers were currently protected under any legislation, John Brown said that he did not know. He added—

“What we are looking at here has to do with marriage, and it is the equalities legislation that worries me. If a teacher said, for example, that women cannot be priests within the Catholic church, society would see that as something for the church to sort out within the church guidelines. However, what is suggested in the bill goes beyond simply the church. That is where my worry would be.”

---

326. Speaking to the same point, Cara Spence (LGBT Scotland Challenging Homophobia Together Schools Project) said—

“I assume—although I am not a lawyer—that teachers would be protected under article 9 of the European convention on human rights, in particular in relation to religious freedom. I assume that that is the case as regards protections. 429

327. In relation to whether protections set out in guidelines could be guaranteed, Ruth Hunt stated—

“Existing guidance probably needs to be more clearly stated. We would very willingly work with Government to ensure that the guidance is very clearly stated, but that does not require legislation.

“I would also argue that new legislation would not solve the problem anyway, because it would lead to even more disputes about what means what and in what context. Teachers need to teach the facts and they need to know how far they can go in expressing their beliefs. Different schools will have different approaches to that issue, but it is not something that you can legislate about from the top, nor should you.” 430

328. John Brown (Catholic Education Commission), however, reiterated his concern that local authorities could set policies that could lead to difficulties for teachers who express their beliefs—

“We are looking for something in the bill, not just in advice, because, for example, the Lord Advocate’s advice that is given could change tomorrow. All that that requires is a change of Government and a change of personnel.

“We are looking for some sort of guarantee in the bill that … ensures that there is not the possibility of someone being considered to be discriminatory or homophobic because they hold a particular view about marriage. That would not apply to having a view about equal rights. We have to be very careful that we are not equating equal marriage with equal rights. They are not necessarily the same thing, unless we define marriage in a particular way, and that definition of marriage is not there now.

“We are saying that we want to hold to the traditional church view of marriage and to have it included in the legislation that, under the public sector equality duty … there is protection for the teacher who says, ‘I believe that this is what marriage is.’ I do not think that such protection is in place now.” 431

329. Cara Spence, however, emphasised the importance of recognising teachers as professionals—

“I have worked on the ground with teachers; of course they have beliefs and opinions on a wide range of subjects. As a professional—I am a youth worker who works with young people—I have a duty to consider the impact of what I say. Professionals who work with young people reflect critically all the time on what they will say and the impact that it might have on a young person. I do not think that it would make sense to legislate to take the power away from highly competent teachers.”

330. It was put to Cara Spence that greater protection was needed, particularly for denominational schools. She responded—

“For me, a teacher who works in a denominational school should be treated in the same way as everyone else. I know that there are lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender young people in Catholic schools, and they need to hear positive messages, too, regardless of the educational establishment that they are in. All teachers have the same duties, which are outlined in the GTC code of conduct. That is already there.”

Chaplaincy within public services

331. Asked about concerns regarding clergy who also worked as chaplains within public services – for example, in hospitals – and whether expressing a view against same-sex marriage when conducting a service outwith their chaplaincy roles might conflict with their public service duty, the Rev Blair Robertson (Healthcare Chaplaincy (NHS Scotland)) said that he did not see the issue as a concern—

“Ministers of the Church of Scotland and other denominations who work as healthcare chaplains are employees of the national health service and are bound by the codes of equality and diversity and their own professional codes of conduct, as is the case for any NHS employee.

“Healthcare chaplains often have a dual status in that they are a minister or representative of a faith community as well as a healthcare chaplain. What someone says in their pulpit on a Sunday, as a minister of their church, is what they say on a Sunday; what they do as a healthcare chaplain is what I am interested in, as their manager. I would want to ensure that the service that the chaplain delivered in the hospital was in keeping with NHS equality and diversity policies and our professional code of conduct.”

332. Adding that healthcare chaplains in the NHS were not appointed to represent any faith or tradition but to deliver a service of spiritual care to people of all faiths, he explained that not all healthcare chaplains were ministers—

“… not all have a church for which they are responsible or where they preach on Sundays. We have a number of chaplains who are laypeople. In some respects, I would see the situation as being analogous to the fact that, when someone is on NHS premises, they do not smoke, but what they do when they get home is their own business. We do not represent a faith within the hospital: we are not there on behalf of any faith or church as chaplains.”

333. The Reverend Robertson added that action would only be taken if there was the potential that a chaplain had “brought the good name of healthcare chaplaincy into disrepute” or “misrepresented NHS policies”.

Conclusion

334. We draw the Parliament’s attention to the views expressed as regards the relationship between the Bill and public services, including educational matters.

DELEGATED POWERS

335. At its meetings on 3 and 10 September and 1 October 2013 the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee (“the DPLR Committee”) considered the delegated powers provisions in the Bill at Stage 1.

336. The DPLR Committee outlined its scrutiny of the Bill in its report of 2 October. It agreed that the majority of the powers outlined in the Bill did not need to be drawn to the attention of the Parliament; however, concerns were raised over two main issues. The first concerns the proposed administrative procedure for the conversion of civil partnerships to marriage. The other concerns changes to the law on the effect of a change of gender on marriage or civil partnership.

Converting civil partnerships to marriage

337. Persons who are in a “qualifying” civil partnership are to be able to marry each other by going through a marriage ceremony under the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 as amended by the Bill. Section 9 sets out the effect of such a marriage. It provides that the civil partnership ends on the date of the marriage and the parties are to be treated as having been married from the date of registration of the civil partnership.
338. Section 8 proposes that there should be an alternative mechanism for converting qualifying civil partnerships to marriage in the form of an administrative process rather than through the full solemnisation of the marriage. The DPLR Committee was concerned that section 8(2)(g) allows the Scottish Ministers to make provision about the effect of a qualifying civil partnership changing into a marriage through this procedure. Given (a) that the Bill itself sets out the effect of converting to marriage through a marriage ceremony and (b) the Scottish Government’s position that the effects of converting to marriage administratively should be the same, it was unclear to the DPLR Committee why Ministers required power to make provision about the effect of an “administrative conversion”, rather than the provisions of section 9 also applying to section 8.

339. The DPLR Committee invited the Scottish Government to reconsider whether the power in section 8(2)(g) is necessary or is broader than required to deliver the intended policy of replicating the effect of section 9. If the Scottish Government considers that the power in section 8(2)(g) remains necessary then the Committee is of the view that the higher level of scrutiny afforded by the affirmative procedure is merited given the scope of the power and the potential for it to make different effect to that contained in section 9.

Effect of change of gender on marriage or civil partnership

340. Part 4 of the Bill concerns the effect of a change in the gender of a party to a Scottish marriage or a Scottish civil partnership. The Gender Recognition Act 2004 sets out how persons may have a change in gender legally recognised. It is not currently possible for a married person or for a party to a civil partnership to remain in that legal relationship if they change gender and their spouse or partner does not. That is because the nature of the relationship would then be incompatible with the nature of marriage or civil partnership. The Gender Recognition Act 2004 therefore only allows a full recognition certificate to be issued to persons who are not in a legal relationship or where both parties to the relationship change gender at the same time.

 Renewed marriage or civil partnership following issue of full gender recognition certificate **

341. Section 28 confers power on the Scottish Ministers to make provision about the solemnisation of a “renewed marriage” or the registration of a “renewed civil partnership” following on from the issue of a full gender recognition certificate to one or both of the parties to a marriage or both parties to a civil partnership. Before making regulations the Scottish Ministers must consult the Registrar General. Section 28(2)(h) allows the Scottish Ministers to make provision about the effect of entering into a renewed marriage or a renewed civil partnership.

342. The DPLR Committee was not clear what the effect of a “renewed marriage” or a “renewed civil partnership” was to be. As the Scottish Government confirmed that there would be no distinct legal effect, the DPLR Committee was not clear why there was a need to make provision about the effect of any change.

343. It concluded that it is not clear that the need for the power in section 28(2)(h) is justified and invited the Government to reflect on whether it should be removed. If further clarification is required as to the continuation of renewed marriages or renewed civil partnerships then it should be provided in the Bill itself. If amendments to the 1977 or 2004 Act are required to enable those Acts to operate properly then the DPLR Committee would consider those powers further. If further justification for provision about effect can be provided then, in line with its consideration of the power in section 8(2)(g) the DPLR Committee considers that such a power should be subject to the affirmative procedure.

Change of gender of married person or civil partners: additional circumstances

344. Sections 4(2)(c) and 5C of the Gender Recognition Act provide that a full gender recognition certificate can only be issued to a person in a civil partnership where both parties qualify for recognition of their change in gender at the same time. This will remain the position once the Bill is in force.

345. However, the Bill provides a route by which civil partners may stay in a legally recognised relationship after one of the parties changes gender. If the civil partners convert their civil partnership to a marriage (either before or after the issue of an interim gender recognition certificate) then new section 4C of the Gender Recognition Act provides that a full gender recognition certificate can be issued to the party changing gender provided their spouse consents to the marriage continuing.

346. The DPLR Committee expressed concerns as to whether a valid case for the delegation of power in the terms set out in section 5D had been met. New section 5D of the Gender Recognition Act 2004 confers power on the Scottish Ministers “to provide for the issue of a full gender recognition certificate in additional circumstances to those specified in section 4(2)(c) or 5C”. The DPLR Committee questions whether it is appropriate for the Scottish Ministers to be given a wide-ranging power to specify ‘any’ additional circumstances in which a full gender recognition certificate may be issued and would prefer that matter to be set out on the face of the Bill. The DPLR Committee therefore recommended that the Government bring forward amendments to address this issue during the passage of the Bill.

347. The DPLR Committee also recommended that the power should be subject to the affirmative procedure as a minimum level of scrutiny. Given that it was clear from the Scottish Government’s evidence there are a number of possible different options available, the Committee considered that a requirement for consultation on a draft laid before the Parliament would also be appropriate.

Conclusion

348. We note and support the recommendations put forward by the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, and ask that the Scottish Government provide a response in relation to the recommendations and any relevant amendments lodged should the Bill progress.
GENERAL PRINCIPLES: CONCLUSION

349. Under Rule 9.6.1 of Standing Orders, we, as lead committee, are required to report to the Parliament on the general principles of the Bill.

350. We have considered the general principles in the context of opinions expressed in written and oral evidence to us. We recognise the validity of perspectives on all sides of this issue and draw the Parliament’s attention to the depth, range and sincerity of the views submitted to us. We recommend to members of the Parliament to approach the Stage 1 decision with the same dignified tenor as our evidence sessions and with due respect for a diversity of views.

351. The majority of the Committee supports the general principles of the Bill and recommends that Parliament approves the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1. A minority of the committee does not support the Bill because they disagree in principle or because they are not convinced that adequate protections are in place. We wholeheartedly support the right of individual members to decide on the Bill as a matter of conscience.
ANNEXE A: EXTRACTS FROM THE MINUTES OF THE EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES COMMITTEE

25th Meeting, 2012 (Session 4) Thursday 13 December 2012

Petition PE1413 on Preserving marriage: The Committee considered a petition by Amy King, calling on the Scottish Parliament to urge the Scottish Government to make no changes to the current definition of marriage, as being a union between one man and one woman, regardless of what happens in Westminster. The Committee agreed to draw the Scottish Government’s attention to the petition and to consider it again following the introduction of forthcoming legislation on marriage.

11th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 28 March 2013

Work programme (in private): … The Committee also considered its approach to the Scottish Government’s forthcoming marriage and civil partnership bill and agreed to schedule a briefing with the relevant bill team and, on introduction of the bill, issue a call for written evidence.

16th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 23 May 2013

Forthcoming legislation on marriage and civil partnership (in private): The Committee considered its approach to the scrutiny of a forthcoming bill on marriage and civil partnership and agreed that, at its meeting on 20 June, it would, in private, (a) take a briefing from the Parliament’s solicitor and (b) consider its approach to taking evidence on the bill.

20th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 20 June 2013

Forthcoming legislation on marriage and civil partnership (in private): The Committee considered its approach to the scrutiny of forthcoming legislation on marriage and civil partnership at Stage 1 and agreed (a) arrangements for a call for written evidence, (b) an initial programme of oral evidence sessions and (c) an expected timetable for its inquiry and report.

21st Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 5 September 2013

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill - witness expenses: The Committee agreed to delegate to the Convener responsibility for arranging for the SPCB to pay, under Rule 12.4.3, any expenses of witnesses in the inquiry.

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Colin Macfarlane, Director, Stonewall Scotland;
Brandi Lee Lough Dennell, Policy and Participation Manager, LGBT Youth Scotland;
John Phillips, The Religious Society of Friends (Quakers);
Tim Hopkins, Director, Equality Network;
James Morton, Scottish Transgender Alliance Manager, Scottish Transgender Alliance;
Dr. Salah Beltagui, Chair, Parliamentary Committee, Muslim Council of Scotland;
Rev. Dr. David Easton, Chair, The Methodist Church in Scotland, The Methodist Church in Britain;
John Deighan, Parliamentary Officer, Bishops' Conference of Scotland;
Kieran Turner, Public Policy Officer, Scotland, Evangelical Alliance Scotland.

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: The Committee considered its approach to the scrutiny of the Bill at Stage 1 and agreed to take further oral evidence.

22nd Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 12 September 2013

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: John Finnie declared an interest as a member of Amnesty. The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Rev. Alan Hamilton, Convener, Legal Questions Committee, Church of Scotland;
Gordon Macdonald, representative, Scotland for Marriage;
Ephraim Borowski, Director, Scottish Council of Jewish Communities;
Rev. David Robertson, Minister (Dundee), The Free Church of Scotland;
Rt. Rev. Dr. John Armes, Bishop of Edinburgh, Scottish Episcopal Church (Faith and Order Board of the General Synod);
Louise Cameron MSYP, Vice Chair, Scottish Youth Parliament;
Rev. David Coleman, Convenor, Church & Society Committee, National Synod of Scotland of the United Reformed Church;
Ross Wright, Celebrant, Humanist Society Scotland;
Mark Bevan, Programme Director, Amnesty International.

23rd Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 19 September 2013

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Dr. Kelly Kollman, Senior Lecturer in Politics, University of Glasgow; Karon Monaghan QC, Matrix Chambers;
Aidan O'Neill QC, Ampersand Advocates;
Lynn Welsh, Head of Legal, Equality and Human Rights Commission;
Professor John Curtice, Professor of Politics, Strathclyde University Research Consultant, ScotCen Social Research
24th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 26 September 2013

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

John Brown, Catholic Education Commission Member, Scottish Catholic Education Service;
Michael Calwell, Spokesman, Family Education Trust;
Ruth Hunt, Deputy Chief Executive, Stonewell/Stonewall Scotland Education Champions Programme;
Chief Superintendent Grant Manders, Head of Safer Communities, Police Scotland;
Stephen McCrossan, National Officer for Education and Equality, The Educational Institute of Scotland;
Rev. Blair Robertson, Head of Chaplaincy and Spiritual Care, NHS Greater Glasgow and Clyde, Healthcare Chaplaincy (NHS Scotland);
Cara Spence, Policy Director, LGBT Scotland/Challenging Homophobia Together Schools Project.

25th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 3 October 2013

Decision on taking business in private: The Committee decided to take consideration of its draft report on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1 in private at this meeting, at item 3, and at future meetings.

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Alex Neil, Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing, Simon Stockwell, Family and Property Law, Julia McCombie, Family and Property Law, and Francesca Morton, Solicitor, Scottish Government.

(item 3) Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: The Committee considered its draft Stage 1 report.

27th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 31 October 2013

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: The Committee considered a draft Stage 1 report. Various changes were agreed to and the Committee agreed to consider a revised draft, in private, at its next meeting.

28th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 7 November 2013

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered a revised draft Stage 1 Report. Various changes were agreed to, and the report was agreed for publication.
ANNEXE B: ORAL AND ASSOCIATED WRITTEN EVIDENCE – EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES COMMITTEE

WRITTEN EVIDENCE RECEIVED IN ADVANCE OF ORAL EVIDENCE

Church of Scotland
Dr. Kelly Kollman
Evangelical Alliance Scotland
Family Education Trust
Free Church of Scotland
Humanist Society Scotland
LGBT Youth Scotland
Methodist Church in Britain
Muslim Council of Scotland
Professor John Curtice
Religious Society of Friends (Quakers)
Scotland for Marriage
Scottish Catholic Education Service
Scottish Catholic Parliamentary Office on behalf of the Bishops' Conference of Scotland
Scottish Council of Jewish Communities
Scottish Episcopal Church
Scottish Transgender Alliance
Scottish Youth Parliament
The Equality and Human Rights Commission
The Equality Network
United Reformed Church

ORAL EVIDENCE

21st Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 5 September 2013

Colin Macfarlane, Director, Stonewall Scotland;
Brandi Lee Lough Dennell, Policy and Participation Manager, LGBT Youth Scotland;
John Phillips, The Religious Society of Friends (Quakers);
Tim Hopkins, Director, Equality Network;
James Morton, Scottish Transgender Alliance Manager, Scottish Transgender Alliance;
Dr. Salah Beltagui, Chair, Parliamentary Committee, Muslim Council of Scotland;
Rev. Dr. David Easton, Chair, The Methodist Church in Scotland, The Methodist Church in Britain;
John Deighan, Parliamentary Officer, Bishops' Conference of Scotland;
Kieran Turner, Public Policy Officer, Scotland, Evangelical Alliance Scotland.
22nd Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 12 September 2013

Rev. Alan Hamilton, Convener, Legal Questions Committee, Church of Scotland; Gordon Macdonald, representative, Scotland for Marriage; Ephraim Borowski, Director, Scottish Council of Jewish Communities; Rev. David Robertson, Minister (Dundee), The Free Church of Scotland; Rt. Rev. Dr. John Armes, Bishop of Edinburgh, Scottish Episcopal Church (Faith and Order Board of the General Synod); Louise Cameron MSYP, Vice Chair, Scottish Youth Parliament; Rev. David Coleman, Convenor, Church & Society Committee, National Synod of Scotland of the United Reformed Church; Ross Wright, Celebrant, Humanist Society Scotland; Mark Bevan, Programme Director, Amnesty International

23rd Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 19 September 2013

Dr. Kelly Kollman, Senior Lecturer in Politics, University of Glasgow; Karon Monaghan QC, Matrix Chambers; Aidan O'Neill QC, Ampersand Advocates; Lynn Welsh, Head of Legal, Equality and Human Rights Commission; Professor John Curtice, Professor of Politics, Strathclyde University Research Consultant, ScotCen Social Research

24th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 26 September 2013

John Brown, Catholic Education Commission Member, Scottish Catholic Education Service; Michael Calwell, Spokesman, Family Education Trust; Ruth Hunt, Deputy Chief Executive, Stonewell/Stonewall Scotland Education Champions Programme; Chief Superintendent Grant Manders, Head of Safer Communities, Police Scotland; Stephen McCrossan, National Officer for Education and Equality, The Educational Institute of Scotland; Rev. Blair Robertson, Head of Chaplaincy and Spiritual Care, NHS Greater Glasgow and Clyde, Healthcare Chaplaincy (NHS Scotland); Cara Spence, Policy Director, LGBT Scotland/Challenging Homophobia Together Schools Project

25th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Thursday 3 October 2013

Alex Neil, Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing, Simon Stockwell, Family and Property Law, Julia McCombie, Family and Property Law, and Francesca Morton, Solicitor, Scottish Government.
SUPPLEMENTARY EVIDENCE

The Equality Network
Scottish Transgender Alliance
Scotland for Marriage
Scottish Youth Parliament
Amnesty International
Family Education Trust

CORRESPONDENCE

Dr Gordon Macdonald, CARE for Scotland, to Convener – 11 October 2013
Scottish Government to Dr Gordon Macdonald, CARE for Scotland – 11 October 2013
Dr Gordon Macdonald, CARE for Scotland, to Convener – 5 November 2013
Scottish Government to Clerk – 6 November 2013 (93KB pdf)
ANNEXE C: OTHER WRITTEN EVIDENCE – EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES COMMITTEE

Anonymous – 1 to 508

Abercrombie, David
Action for Children
Adam, Heather
Ainsworth, Mary
Aitken, Gordon
Aitken, Graeme
Alexander, Isla
Alexander, James
Allan, Andrew
Allan, Grant
Allen, Mrs K
Allison, Archie
Anderson, Peter
Anderson, Robert
Anstey, Christopher
Anthony, David
Anthony, Lily
Arnott, Andrew
Ashman, Alex
Atkinson, Michael Avison, Amanda
Bain, Hugh
Bain, Peter
Baird, Prof. Alfred
Baird, William
Baker, Sally
Baptist Union of Scotland
Barker, Timothy
Barrie, Emma Barringer, Brian
Bat Or, Clare
Beattie, Jennifer
Belcher, Helen Bell, Gordon
Bender, Rev. Stephen
Bennet, Lorna
Bentley, Steven
Beresford, John
Bestwick, Christine and John
Bevington, Jim
Beyer, Erin
Bhatti, Lesley
Bi Community News
Black, David
Blackburn, Helen Blance, Darren
Blench, Declan
Boden, Fergus
Bo’Ness Old Kirk (Church of Scotland)
Boyle, Anne-Marie
Bradley, Samuel
Braine, David
Braithwaite, Megan
Brash, Derek
Bray, Isobel
Brew, Marc
Brian, David
Brodie, Andrew
Brown, Allan
Brown, Ian
Brown, Lesley Anne
Brown, Talitha
Browne, Phil
Brownsey, Paul
Burn, Rowan
Bush, Alan Mark
Butterworth, Frances
Buxton, Anthony
Calder, Calum
Calder, Stephen
Calvary Carluke Christian Fellowship
Calwell, Michael
Cameron, Ross
Cammisar, Georjean
Campbell, Anna
Campbell, Craig
Campbell, Douglas
Care
Carlin, Eric
Carmichael, Alison
Carmichael, Helen Carnall, Jane
Carroll, Sinead
Catholic, Truth
Cavers, Shelia
Chandler, Fiona
Changing Attitude Scotland
Chapman, Vaila
Charlotte Baptist Chapel
Charleston, Taylor
Charlwood-Green, Lisa
Cheyne, Susan
Children in Scotland
Chmiel, Ross
The Christian Institute
Christy, Neil
Chryston Church of Scotland
Church of Scotland – Watt, Rev Dr Hugh Clark, Jessica
Clark, Matthew
Clarkson, Jamie
Clayton, Kevin
Clement, Rebecca
Clinton, Michael
Cochrane, Audrey
Coleman, Emma
Collins, Owen
Community Church Edinburgh
Convery, Maeve
Cookson, Lucas Jaiden
Coroon, Rebecca
Cowie, Kevin Mark Stephen
Craig, Margaret
Cree, Lisa
Creechan, Henry
Creechan, Michael
Crockard, Deborah
Crozier, Caroline
Cruikshank, Paul
Cummings, Chelsea
Cunningham, Stephanie Custodio-Forbes, Hugh
Dalrymple, Amy
Dalziel, Kirsty
Daniel, George and Linda
Davidson, Euan
Davies, Hugh
Davis, Laura-Jayne
Deeside Christian Fellowship Church
Denyer, Veronica
Diamond, Ian
Dian, Jenny
Dickie, Eileen
Dickson, Karen
Dietz, Karen
Digance, Claire
Dix, Fiona
Dodds, Dr Euan
Dolby, Douglas
Doran, David
Dorigo, Lewis
Douglas Renton Ministries
Downie, David Nathan
Dowsett, Rosemary
Ducker, Judi
Duffy, Chris
Eadie, Danielle
Earlie, Nancy
East Ayrshire Council
Edwards, Andrew
Edwards, Julie
Emily
Ewing, Mandy Evans
Faculty of Advocates
Farrell, Keith Francis
Faulds, Allan
Faulkner, Emma
Ferguson, Gavin
Fife Islamic Centre Glenrothes
Figures, Craig
Findlay, Alan
Finlayson, Connor SP
Fire Brigades Union LGBT National Committee
Fitzpatrick, Storm Potratz
Fleming, Donald
Forbes, James
Forde, Amanda
Fothergill, Rev Andrew
Fox, Richard
Fraser, Grant
Fraser-Granados, Tim
Free Church of Scotland - Dr John Morrison
Free Church of Scotland (Continuing) - Public Questions Religion and Morals Committee
Free Church of Scotland - Thomas Davis
Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland
French, Deborah
Frew, Iain
Fulton, Kirsty
Gallagher, Aodhan
Gallagher, Daniel Arthur
Gann, Roger Garman, Chris
Gay, Charlene
Gibson, Alexander W
Gill, Catriona
Gilmour, Paul
Glasgow City Council
Glasgow Unitarian Church
Goodhall, Adam
Goodman, David
Gordon, Jimmy
Gorman, Caroline
Gosling, Sarah
Graham, Natalie
Granados, Michael
Green, Liz
Greig, Shaun
Gronowski, Dr Rebekah
GUSRC
Gusterson, Mary and John
Hadfield, M
Haga, Ismar
Haggerstone, Linda
Hall, Tim
Halliday, Amy Denise
Harkinson, Anthony
Harris, Jennifer
Harris, Paula
Hart, Eric
Hearty, David
Heggie, Louise
Henderson, Roisin
Hendry, Courtney
Henry, Lynne
Heppell, Pat
Heppenstall, Jane
Higgins, Sherrie
Holdsworth, Ashley
Holmes, Mark
Honhold, Nick
Hopkins, Al
Hothersall, Duncan
Howard, CB
Howie, Alexander G
Howitt, Jamie
Hoyda, Claire
Hughes, Helen Hughes, Ian
Hughes, Laura
Humanist Fellowship of Scotland
Humphrey, Rhianna
Hunter, Ciaran
Hunter, Dr Ross
Hunter, Glen
Hutchin-Bellur, Sunil
Hutchinson, Ellie
Hutchison, Craig
Hutchison, Kirsty
Hutchison, Maureen
Hyams, Cheryl
Hylands, Jamie
Inglis, Stewart
Inshes Church of Scotland
Jack, Gillian
Jack, Ross
Jackson, Fiona
Jackson, Marilyn Jeffrey, Peter
Jewish Gay and Lesbian Group
Johnston, Fiona
Jones, Hefin
Jones, Ria Elaine
Jupp, Ed
Keilty, Ray
Kellner, Anna
Kellock, Andrew
Kelly, Blair
Kelly, Kathleen
Kennedy, Maureen
Kermode, Jennie
Kidd, Benjamin
King, Roslyn
King, Sam
Kingswood, Jane
Kinmond, James
Klip, Hugo
Laing, David
Law Society of Scotland
Lee-Chan, Bryan
Leinster, Paul
LGBT - Bristol
LGBT - Labour Scotland
LGBT & Liberal Democrats
LGBTory
LGCM
Lindsay, Caron
Linton, Mary
Little, Eilidh
Little, Gordon
Livingstone, Marc
Lloyd, Beth
Lloyd, Raychel
Lockhart, Mary
Love, Edward
Mac An Tuairneir, Marcas
MacConnell, Mr FJ
MacConnell, Mrs Angela
MacDonald, Angus
Macdonald, Don
MacDonald, Sheila
MacGillivray, Moranne
Macgregor, Loran
Mackay, Raymond
MacKenzie, Bill
MacKenzie, Jennifer
MacKenzie, William
Maclean, Sarah
MacLeod, Fraser
Macleod, Murdina
Macleod, Alasdair BM
Macphail, Kevin
Macpherson, Catriona
MacRae, Jeanette
MacVicar, James
Madden, Niamh
Magee, Andrew Campbell
Manning, Mark
Mansfield, Nigel
Marshall, Heather
Marszalek, Agnes
Martens, Roushan
Martin, David
Martin, Iain
Martin, Lee
Mason, Jonathan
Mathers, Avery
Mathie, Hugh Alexander
Matthew, Laurie
Mauchline, Emma
McArthur-Worby, Fiona
McBride, Kenneth Martin
McCabe, Liam
McCahill, Seanpaul
McClure, Anne
McCrone, Carolyn
McDonald, Eilidh
McDowell, Jacqueline
McFarlane, Fraser
McGarva, Michelle
McGread, Vincent
McGregor, David
Mcguire, Siobhan
McInally, Clarisse
McIntosh, Alex
McIntosh, Colin Stephen
Anderson McIntosh, Hugh McKay, Gemma Caitlyn
McKenna, George
Mckenna, Revd Scott
McKiernan, Jennifer
McLay, Alan
McLean, Derek
McLean, Jackie
McLeod, Lindsey
McMahon, Alan
McMurtrie, David
McNicol, Nik
Merican, Kat
Millar, Stephen
Miller, Marsali
Miller, Staci
Milner, Kerri
Mitchell, Gregory
Mitchell, Vivienne
Mitchison, Shirley
Monsma, Kylie
Moody, Maria
Mooney, Agnes
Moreland, Caroline
Morland, John-Ross
Morrison, Ian
Morrison, Katie
Morrison, Mrs Betty
Morrison, Murdo
Morrison, Peter and Marion
Morton, Craig
Mothers' Union
Muir, Greig
Murray, Elizabeth
Muslin Council of Scotland
National Trans Police Association
National Union of Journalists
McCallum, John
Nelson, Sandy
Newth, Hilary
NHS Grampian
NHS Greater Glasgow and Clyde
NHS Highland
Nightshade, Cleodhna
Nobbs, Brian
Noble, Alastair
North Lanarkshire Muslim Women and Family Alliance
NUS Scotland
O'Docherty, Neil
O'Hara, Andrew
O'Hara-Thomas, Mark
One Spirit Interfaith Foundation
O'Neill, Jennifer
O'Neill, Joanne
O'Neill, Thom
Osborne, Nicola
Our Lady of Perpetual Succour Parish
Overton, Kim
Oxborrow, Trevor
Pagan Federation (Scotland)
Parish Church in the Church of Scotland
Paterson, Iain
Paton, Hugh
Pearce, Dr Augur
Plinkett, Blair
Plinkett, Ronald
Porter, E
Porter, Jemma
Pott, Jonny
Potter, Megan
Potter, Rosemary
Potter, Stella
Predota, Elinor
Preston, Susan
Price, Julie Priest, Alex
Proctor, John
Puntis, Timothy
Qiu, Alexander
Quakers – Helen Keating
Quinn, Robin
Randall, David
Rankin, Jason
Reilly, Joe
Reoch, Gillian
Reynolds, Michael Rhatigan, Tara
Richards-Hill, Jaye
Richardson, Nathan Richter, C
Rigg, Simon
Robertson, John
Robertson, Sabrina
Robertson, Tony
Robertson, Victoria
Robinson, Elaine
Rodgers, Sarah
Roper, Beverley
Rose, James
Ross, C Brian
Rowell, Karen
Russell, C
Ryan, Sylvia
Rychter, Tomas
The Salvation Army
Sarbat
Sayers, Samantha
Schmitz, Tony
Schofield, Freya
Scott, John
Scottish Catholic Education Service
Scottish Independent Advocacy Alliance
Scottish Unitarian Association
Scottish Youth Parliament on behalf of five children and young people’s organisations
Scrutton, Erin
Seabrooke, Kim
Semple, Lynsey
Semple, Ross
Serra, Carlo
Service, Jonathan
Shaw, Stephen
Shedden, Dave
Shields, Alison M
Shirkie, William
Simmons, Peter
Slater, Jeremy Smart, Liam
Smith, Alisdair
Smith, Amanda
Smith MSP, Elaine
Smith, Alan
Smith, Fiona
Smith, Gary
SNP Students
Solomon, Rabbi Mark
South Lanarkshire Council
Stainsby, Cath
St Andrews Aquarium
St Augustine's Church
St Bernadette's Church Larbert
St Marys Cathedral Glasgow
Stenhouse, Ryan
Stevens, Laurel
Stewart, Gillian F
Stewart, Maroanne
Stewart-Amsden, Derby
Stocks, Margaret Weir
Strachan, Andrew
Sullivan, Elizabeth
Sutherland, Josh
Sutherland, Lynsey
Swan, Greg Tait, John R S
Tesco Bank
Thompson, Joe
Thomson, Tim
Thorburn, Aimee
Timmins, Thomas
Timothy, Susan
Tod, Darren
Todd, James
Tombs, Margaret
Tomlinson-Curley, Rio
Toner, Ashley
Totterdell, Tamise
Turnbull, Stuart
Turner, Yorath
Unison
United Free Church of Scotland
University of St Andrews Students Association
University of Warwick
Unsworth, Keli
Vance, Ryan
Van Der Watson, Jessica
Waitz-Rainey, Astrid
Walker, Eleanor
Walker, Zamantha
Wallace, Mary
Ward, Nicola
Ward, Sarah
Watson, Niamh
Watson, Oliver
Watt, Cailean
Watt, Conor
Watts, Stewart
Webster, Mark
Weir, Kimberley
Weir, Stephen
Welsh, Stephen
West Dunbartonshire Council
West of Scotland LGBT Forum
Westbury, Hannah
White, Nikki
White, Peter
Whyte, Ross
Wilcox, John
Wilkes, Daniel
Wilkinson, Sue
Williams, Anna
Williams, Derek
Wilson, David
Wilson, Fiona
Wilson, Hannah
Wilson, Hazel
Wilson, Patrick
Wilson, Sophie
Wilson, Stew
Wood, Andy
Woodsford-Dean, Mark
Wright, Ross
Wylie, Ralph
Wyllie, Callum
Young, Lynzi
Young, M C G
Zdravkov, Hristo
ANNEXE D: THE DELEGATED POWERS PROVISIONS IN THE MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s report to the Equal Opportunities Committee on the delegated powers provisions in the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill, published on 2 October 2013.

51st Report, 2013 (Session 4): Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill
WRITTEN EVIDENCE RECEIVED IN ADVANCE OF ORAL EVIDENCE

Church of Scotland
Dr. Kelly Kollman
Evangelical Alliance Scotland
Family Education Trust
Free Church of Scotland
Humanist Society Scotland
LGBT Youth Scotland
Methodist Church in Britain
Muslim Council of Scotland
Professor John Curtice
Religious Society of Friends (Quakers)
Scotland for Marriage
Scottish Catholic Education Service
Scottish Catholic Parliamentary Office on behalf of the Bishops’ Conference of Scotland
Scottish Council of Jewish Communities
Scottish Episcopal Church
Scottish Transgender Alliance
Scottish Youth Parliament
The Equality and Human Rights Commission
The Equality Network
United Reformed Church
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

SUBMISSION FROM CHURCH OF SCOTLAND

Same sex relationships

1. The 2013 General Assembly affirmed the Church of Scotland’s historic and current doctrine and practice in relation to human sexuality. Nevertheless it moved towards permitting individual congregations to depart from that doctrine so that they could call as their minister a man or woman who is in a civil partnership. However, this has not yet become the law of the Church since enabling legislation has not yet been presented and it will require to be passed by two successive General Assemblies and, in the intervening 12 months, a majority of presbyteries (under the Church’s Barrier Act 1697).

2. The Church’s 2011 General Assembly declared that:

(1) It is contrary to God’s will that Christians should be hostile in any way to a person because he or she is homosexual by orientation and in his or her practice. In other words we view homophobia as sinful. We do not include in the concept of homophobia both the bona fide belief that homosexual practice is contrary to God’s will and the responsible statement of that belief in preaching or writing.

(2) It is the duty of the Church to welcome, minister, and reach out to people regardless of their sexual orientation and practice. The Church should strive to manifest God’s love to all of his people.

(3) In particular, the Church should recognise the heavy burden which a homosexual orientation continues to place on some who find it difficult or impossible to reconcile their orientation with their understanding of God’s purposes as revealed in the Bible. There is a particular need for the Church to reach out pastorally to them and to make them welcome.

(4) People who are homosexual by orientation are not barred by their orientation from membership of the Church or from taking up leadership roles in the Church, including the ministry of Word and Sacrament, the diaconate and eldership.

3. The General Assembly maintained the unlawfulness of discrimination in the Church on the ground of sexual orientation (see Church’s Act V, 2007 Anent Discrimination).

4. The Church recognises that there is intense and passionate debate within Scottish society about same sex relationships. This is reflected with the Church itself. The issue impacts upon the lives of our fellow citizens, particularly among those Scots who are lesbian, gay, bi-sexual or transgender. There is much pain and sorrow, as well as frustration. The Church has undiminished concern and desire to care for all people in...
Scotland regardless of sexual orientation or theological opinion. Therefore, the Church believes that it has a responsibility to our nation to be part of that debate and to help to shape public opinion and state policy in accordance with what it understands to be the will of God. In making this submission, the Church has no desire to stifle the ongoing debate and hopes that it will be a helpful contribution.

Principle of same sex marriage

5. The Church of Scotland does not support the introduction of marriage between persons of the same sex.

6. This would fundamentally change marriage as it is understood in our country. The nature of marriage in Scottish culture is that it is a relationship between one man and one woman. This is the position in law and fact.

7. If the Church were to support the redefinition of marriage to include same sex marriage this would involve a fundamental change in its understanding of marriage. In accordance with the historic position of the Christian Church, the Church of Scotland has always viewed marriage as being between one man and one woman. Despite recent discussions on the status of same-sex and other relationships, and of civil partnerships, the General Assembly has at no point been invited to consider any such redefinition of marriage. Indeed, a recent consultation among elders and ministers indicated only limited support for same-sex marriage (Report to General Assembly 2011 of Special Commission on Same Sex Relationships and the Ministry).

8. The Church has only ever taught that marriage is the union of a man and a woman. Scriptural references to marriage, whether literal or metaphorical, all operate under this understanding. Furthermore the point is established within the Reformed tradition of the Church, not least in its subordinate standards. The Church sees itself as part of the catholic or universal Church within which there is agreement, across confessional divides, that marriage is between one man and one woman. Most recent work under the auspices of the General Assembly, in particular the work conducted by the Joint Commission on Doctrine (with the Roman Catholic Church) through the 1980s and 1990s, and the specific report on marriage from the Panel on Doctrine in 1994, have likewise upheld what can only be called the conventional or regular understanding of marriage.

9. If the Church were to change its position on marriage to include same-sex marriage, such a change would only be enacted into the law of the Church under its Barrier Act 1697.

10. The Church remains concerned at the speed with which the introduction of same sex marriage is proceeding. It appears that the Government has, with only limited exceptions, failed to persuade the religious community in Scotland. The Church believes that much more measured consideration is required before the understanding of marriage which is entrenched and valued within the culture of Scotland, both secular and religious, is surrendered to accommodate this. To redefine marriage to include same-sex marriage may have significant and, as yet, inadequately considered repercussions for our country and, in particular, for the well-being of families and communities and of individuals.

11. There is no legal requirement for the Scottish Parliament to enact legislation introducing same-sex marriage (Schalk and Kopf v. Austria (2011) 53 E.H.R.R. 20). If they choose to be registered as civil partners, same-sex couples are not disadvantaged either legally or fiscally by not being ‘married’.

Principle of religious civil partnerships

12. The Church of Scotland does not support the introduction of religious civil partnerships.

13. In 2006/7, the Church of Scotland decided against declaring that a minister or deacon ‘who conducts any service marking a civil partnership does not commit a disciplinary offence.’ In the light of this decision, the Church cannot agree that legislation should be changed so that civil partnerships may be registered through religious ceremonies whether these are conducted by religious celebrants or not or take place on religious premises or not.

14. If the Church were to agree to register civil partnerships through religious ceremonies this would require it to depart from the traditional understanding of same-sex relationships. Reference is made to paras. 1-4 of this Submission.

15. If registration of civil partnerships through religious ceremonies or in religious premises were permitted, this would so fundamentally alter the nature of civil partnerships that they would cease to be such. Civil partnerships are a creation of statute (Civil Partnership Act 2004, s. 1). Ministers or deacons and other religious celebrants are not included in the definition of ‘authorised registrars’ who may carry out registration as civil partners (s. 87). Section 93(3) specifically excludes ‘religious premises’ as a ‘place of registration.’ Therefore, the Church believes that civil partnerships were intended to be a civil institution only. Registration through religious ceremonies or in religious premises is antithetical to the original purpose for which they were introduced.

16. Furthermore, the Church is concerned at the speed with which the Scottish Government is proceeding on this issue. It appears that the Government has, with only limited exceptions, failed to persuade the religious community in Scotland. Civil partnerships, as a civil institution, were only introduced on 5 December 2005 (The Civil Partnership Act 2004 (Commencement No. 2) (Scotland) Order 2005). There is no legal requirement for the Scottish Parliament to enact legislation permitting civil partnerships to be registered through religious ceremonies (Courten v United Kingdom ((4479/06) ECtHR November 4, 2008). Civil partners are not legally or fiscally disadvantaged in comparison with married couples.
The provisions of the Bill

17. Moving beyond its positions in principle on same sex marriages and religious civil partnerships, the Church broadly welcomes the essentially permissive, 'opt-in' scheme outlined in the Bill. However, much of the detail of that scheme will be contained in an amendment to the Equality Act 2010 and delegated legislation which have not yet been published (see paras. 26-32 of this Submission).

18. The Church is also concerned than even if enacted and issued, such legislation and guidance is subject to repeal and revocation and to potential challenge in the Scottish and UK courts and in the European Court of Human Rights.

19. The Church has been considering how the permissive, ‘opt-in’ scheme outlined in sections 8 and 9 of the Bill might be rendered less vulnerable to challenge under the European Convention on Human Rights. As the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 is currently presented and proposed to be amended, celebrants of religious bodies, including the Church’s ministers anddeacons, appear to be authorised by the State to solemnise marriages (and, in future, same-sex marriages and register religious civil partnerships), making it arguable that the celebrant is acting on behalf of not only the Church but also the State. A decision by the Church or by any of its ministers or deacons to decline to do so would be vulnerable to challenge under section 29 of the Equality Act 2010 and the European Convention on Human Rights. If the religious celebrant is considered to be (in part) an agent of the State, then (after “marriage” has been redefined to encompass same sex marriage) the compatibility with the European Convention on Human Rights of any consequent amendment to section 29 becomes questionable. However, if it were put beyond doubt that the solemnisation of marriages, both opposite and same sex, and the registration of civil partnerships by a religious body’s celebrant (of any confession) were not authorised by the State but merely recognised by it (like a marriage solemnised abroad) this would mean that a decision to decline to solemnise a same sex marriage or register a religious civil partnership would be an act done in the capacity only of agent of the religious body concerned, in the exercise of that body’s religious freedom and in no sense attributable to the State. A scheme based solely upon ‘recognition’ by the State would respect the autonomy of the religious body concerned and, in particular, be consistent with the terms of the Church of Scotland Act 1921 which declares the Church’s independence in spiritual matters generally and in matters of doctrine, worship, government and discipline as well as with article 9 of the European Convention on Human Rights and with article 17 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union. At the same time, such a ‘recognition’ scheme would limit the act of civil authority to the recognition by the State of a religious marriage or civil partnership. This should substantially reduce the risk of a successful challenge to provisions of the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill and subordinate legislation and amendments to the Equality Act 2010 intended to preserve the freedom of religious bodies and individual celebrants.
to refrain from solemnising same sex marriages or registering religious civil partnerships. It would still allow different sex marriage solemnised by the same bodies to be recognised by the civil authority as having full effect in law. Furthermore, it would allow same sex marriages and civil partnerships solemnised and registered by individual celebrants who were permitted by their religious bodies and who wished to do so to be recognised by the state as having full effect in law.

20. In order to achieve a ‘recognition’ scheme for solemnisation of marriages, the Bill could be amended as follows:

Section 8
in new section 8(1D) delete “empowered” and substitute “competent”.

Section 9
(a) in existing section 9(1), delete “empowered” and substitute “competent”;
(b) in new section 9(1D), delete “empowered” and substitute “recognised as competent”;
(c) in section 9(4):
   (i) delete “empowered” and substitute “recognised as competent”;
   (ii) delete “empowered” and substitute “recognised as competent”

The parallel provisions relating to registration of civil partnerships would be similarly amended as would the provisions relating to temporary status as a celebrant if thought necessary.

21. The Church welcomes the proposed extension of section 8(1)(a)(i) of the 1977 Act to include Church of Scotland deacons.

22. The Church welcomes the intention of the Scottish Government to prescribe, after public consultation, qualifying requirements to apply to religious and belief bodies and celebrants in relation to the solemnisation of marriages and registration of civil partnerships (Policy Memorandum, paras. 65-74; Delegated Powers Memorandum, paras. 29-62).

23. The Church is deeply concerned that specific provisions have not been introduced to protect public servants who may face situations where there is a real conflict between their religious beliefs and the expectations of their employment, such that they may face job loss or disadvantage if they do not support same sex marriage or civil partnerships. The Church accordingly urges the Government to provide appropriate protections in the legislation to ensure that the rights enshrined in Article 9 of the European Convention on Human Rights will be upheld.
24. The Church believes that registrars should not be forced to solemnise same sex marriages or register civil partnerships under threat of job loss or disadvantage. Registrars should be entitled to the same protections as celebrants. This is particularly so for registrars who are already in post.

25. The Church believes that teachers should not be forced to support same sex marriage or civil partnerships in the course of teaching under threat of job loss or disadvantage. Teachers should be entitled to equivalent protections to celebrants. This is particularly so for teachers who are already in post.

Proposed Amendment to Equality Act 2010

26. The Church welcomes the agreement of the Scottish Government that the proposed amendment to the 2010 Act should not be restricted only to cases where solemnising same sex marriage or registering civil partnerships would conflict with the celebrant’s religious or philosophical beliefs or to cases of sexual orientation discrimination (Statement on the Equality Act, para. 17). However, it awaits sight of the final wording.

27. The Church welcomes the agreement of the Scottish Government that the proposed amendment to the 2010 Act should cover persons who play an integral part in the religious aspects of the marriage ceremony or the registering of a religious civil partnership (Statement on the Equality Act, para. 21). However, it awaits sight of the final wording.

28. The Church welcomes the agreement of the Scottish Government that the amendment of the 2010 Act will provide that a person controlling the use of religious premises does not contravene section 29 of the 2010 Act by refusing to allow the premises to be used for a same sex marriage or a civil partnership (Statement on the Equality Act, para. 29). However, it awaits sight of the final wording.

29. The Church welcomes the agreement of the Scottish Government that the amendment to the 2010 Act will provide similar protection for chaplains working for secular employers as is offered by section 2(5) of the 2013 Act (Statement on the Equality Act, para. 32). In fact, it urges that the protection provided should be in the same terms.

Proposed Delegated Powers

30. The Church welcomes the statement of the Scottish Government that it would not expect to use the powers conferred by proposed section 8(1B) of the 1977 Act to prescribe a body which was prepared to solemnise same sex marriage but some of whose celebrants objected to doing so (Delegated Powers Memorandum, para. 38).

31. The Church also welcomes the statement of the Scottish Government that it would use the powers conferred by proposed section 9(2A) of the 1977 Act to prescribe that a body which was prepared to allow its celebrants to solemnise same sex marriage would be allowed to nominate only those of its celebrants who consented to do so (Delegated Powers Memorandum, para. 38).

32. The Church understands that the Scottish Government intends to use its powers in relation to authorising celebrants to register religious civil partnerships in line with those relating to same sex marriage (Delegated Powers Memorandum, para. 40).

Church of Scotland
23 August 2013
I am an academic researcher, who has published widely on same-sex unions (SSU) policy in the established democracies of Western Europe and North America. My most recent publication on the topic, The Same-sex Unions Revolution in Western Democracies: International Norms and Domestic Policy Change (Manchester University Press, 2013), seeks to address two questions (1) Why have so many western democracies adopted a national SSU law since 1989? (2) Why have countries implemented different models of same-sex relationship recognition (opening marriage v. registered partnerships v. unregistered domestic cohabitants)? Below I outline the main findings from this research that I think are relevant for the Equal Opportunities Committee as it considers the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill.

Rapid Policy Convergence

Since 1989, when Denmark adopted a registered partnership (RP) law, more than thirty countries, twenty-three of them in Europe, have implemented a comprehensive national policy that recognizes same-sex couples in law (see table). Before that date not one country had such a policy in place.¹ The activist and policy campaigns that led to this rather stunning convergent change in family policy have been very similar in content, at least in broad terms. Almost all have sought to define civil relationship recognition as a right that the state in a liberal democracy should not deny same-sex couples simply because of their sexual orientation. Until very recently the goals of family policy, and therefore marriage and partnership recognition, in many western democracies had been understood in terms of promoting a particular cultural institution, namely the nuclear family, rather than a right that accrues to individuals. Today in Western, and increasingly in Central and Eastern, Europe, state relationship recognition is largely accepted as a human right that should apply to lesbians, gay men, transgenders and bisexuals (LGBT). This represents a major change in our thinking about the purposes of family policy, although it is in keeping with the 20th century trend of erasing gender distinctions in marriage law and family policy. With a few exceptions, national SSU laws in western democracies have been well-received by a majority of the public and appear to have helped to increase already growing levels of tolerance towards LGBT-identified people (see Kollman 2013: 79-81)

The Role of ‘Europe’ and the International Community in SSU Convergence

I have argued in several publications (Kollman 2007; 2009; 2013) that the rapid adoption of SSU policies in Europe since the 1990s and the similarity of the arguments used by national SSU activists to promote relationship recognition are not mere coincidence, but rather the result of an increasingly powerful international norm. More specifically, a cross-border network of LGBT activist has been able to create an international norm for same-sex relationship recognition that explicitly defines such recognition as a human right. SSU supporters have drawn on the increasing number of states that have an SSU law in place as well as the partial incorporation of sexual orientation into international and European human rights law to add legitimacy to their claims. In the context of the current debate about opening marriage in Scotland and the United Kingdom and fears about religious bodies being forced by European courts to perform same-sex marriage ceremonies in the future, it is crucial to note that this norm for same-sex relationship recognition has been created largely without legally binding mandates being imposed on member states by European courts or international tribunals. Very few such mandates currently exist in European law or policy and the two premier courts in the region—the EU’s European Court of Justice and the Council of Europe’s European Court of Human Rights—to date have been relatively conservative in their jurisprudence on the issue. SSU activists have relied far more on the power of international examples and the international legitimacy of human rights arguments to foster policy change than on the formal legal mandates of European courts.

---

¹ Both the Netherlands and Sweden adopted legislation before 1989 that recognised same-sex domestic cohabitants for certain legal purposes. This legislation was piecemeal and limited in nature until well into the 1990s.

Models of Same-sex Relationship Recognition

Before the Netherlands became the first country to open marriage to same-sex couples in 2001, European countries experimented with different forms of SSU recognition. Many (Norway, Sweden, Ireland, Austria) followed Denmark’s lead of implementing a registered partnership law that grants same-sex couples most of the rights, benefits and duties associated with civil marriage, although many of these laws at first did not allow same-sex couples jointly to adopt children. Others (Germany, France, Belgium) implemented less comprehensive registration schemes and still others (Portugal, Hungary) implemented unregistered domestic cohabitants law. These distinctions between non-marriage SSUs have become less pronounced over the years, however, as most countries have expanded the rights, including adoption rights, associated with their RP laws since the mid-2000s.

Intriguingly some countries (the Netherlands, Belgium and France) allow different-sex couples to enter their non-marriage unions. By contrast, the Nordic countries, Germany, Austria and Ireland—as well as the various jurisdictions in the United Kingdom—only allow same-sex couples to enter such schemes. Some have argued that RP laws that are open to different-sex couples fulfil the equality goals of SSU campaigns better than those laws that create a separate and exclusionary institution for same-sex couples. In addition these more open RP laws fulfil a second, less recognized, goal of SSU reform, namely to pluralise the institutions and ways that states use to recognize intimate relations to better reflect modern families. Demographic research in France shows that the RP law there, known as pacte civil de solidarité, has proven relatively popular with different-sex couples (Prioux and Mazuy 2009). This suggests that pluralizing family policy may well be beneficial to many in society and worth considering.

After implementing a registered partnership law in 1998, the Netherlands became the first country to allow same-sex couples to enter civil marriage in 2001. Belgium, Canada, Spain and South Africa followed their lead in 2003, 2005, 2005 and 2006 respectively. Interesting all five of these early marriage adopters had medium to high levels of religiosity. This suggests that the argument that withholding the symbolism of marriage from same-sex couples is discriminatory initially was easier to make in countries where marriage itself had greater symbolic value.

Since 2009 there has been a clear trend towards opening marriage to same-sex couples. Six European countries, and nine worldwide, have opened marriage to same-sex couples since that date. In that same period only three European countries implemented an RP law... and none has implemented a domestic cohabitants law for same-sex couples. The international norm for general relationship recognition is fast hardening into one in which marriage is seen, and certainly argued by most national LGBT rights organizations in Europe, to be the only way to guarantee same-sex couples full social, legal and cultural equality. Again this policy convergence has happened almost entirely in the absence of legally binding mandates from international sources.

Many of the countries that have opened marriage since 2009 did so after implementing another form of SSU. Governments have varied in their approach of how to deal with this non-marriage institution. The three Nordic countries (Norway, Sweden, Denmark) withdrew their RP laws with the passage of marriage. The Netherlands, Belgium and France have all kept their non-marriage schemes in place. Interestingly all three allow different-sex couples to enter these RP unions.

Summary

- If the Scottish Parliament were to pass the Marriage and Civil Partnership (SCOTLAND) Bill, it would be following a recent, but increasingly well-established international trend of recognizing same-sex couples by allowing them to enter civil marriage.
- It is likely that the passage of this legislation would bring the country and parliament significant international recognition.
- This trend towards opening marriage to same-sex couples and implementing SSU policies more generally has been catalysed to a significant degree by international examples and normative influence. To date this influence predominantly has NOT occurred through the legal mandates of European courts or international tribunals.
- Countries that have opened marriage to same-sex couples after implementing another form of SSU have varied in their approach to dealing with the original SSU law. The Nordic countries have withdrawn their RP law and essentially replaced it with marriage. Many of the countries that allow different-sex couples to enter their RP law have retained the latter when opening marriage.
- Opening marriage while maintaining or even creating alternative recognition schemes open to same and different-sex couples fulfils the equality goals of same-sex relationship recognition. Such alternatives to marriage also help to pluralize family policy to better reflect the reality of modern families. The latter goal cannot be accomplished by either withdrawing registered partnerships or maintaining RP laws that are open to same-sex couples only.

Dr Kelly Kollman
13 September 2013

---

2 These countries still recognize the partnerships that were entered into before the marriage law was implemented but they have not allowed any additional same-sex couples to register their relationships since that date.
Table 1: National Same-sex Unions Legislation since 1989

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Marriage</th>
<th>Registered Partnership</th>
<th>Unregistered Partnership</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>New Zealand (2005)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Czech Republic (2006)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Slovenia (2006)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Colombia (2007)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Uruguay (2008)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Ecuador (2009)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Hungary (2009)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Austria (2010)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Ireland (2010)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Liechtenstein (2011)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

*Both the Netherlands and Sweden adopted legislation before 1989 that recognised same-sex domestic cohabitants for certain legal purposes. This legislation was piecemeal and limited in nature until well into the 1990s.
References

Introduction

1. The Evangelical Alliance in Scotland is the largest body serving evangelical Christians in Scotland and has a membership including denominations, churches, organisations and individuals. Across the UK, Evangelical Alliance membership includes over 700 organisations, 3500 churches and thousands of individuals. Our members in Scotland include the Baptist Union of Scotland, Vineyard Churches, the Salvation Army, Newfrontiers, Elim Pentecostal Churches, Assemblies of God, The Free Church of Scotland, Brethren, a number of congregations within the Church of Scotland and other independent churches. We have a number of organisations as members in Scotland including Glasgow City Mission, Bethany Christian Trust, Tearfund and Scripture Union Scotland.

General Comments

2. The Evangelical Alliance is very concerned by the Scottish Government’s plan to redefine the meaning of marriage. We are concerned at two levels, both on the principle of the proposed changes and also the practical implications of the current Bill as it stands for the protection of those who disagree with the planned new definition of marriage. We are disappointed that despite two consultations on the planned legislation the Scottish Government appears to have made little substantive effort to acknowledge the potential negative effects this legislation will have on those who disagree, other than celebrants, and that there are no provisions within the Bill to effectively protect civil liberties, freedom of speech or freedom of conscience. We hope that the committee will be fair and open-minded to these concerns as it scrutinises the legislation over the coming months.

3. At the outset it is important to state that our primary concern in relation to this Bill is for the future status of marriage as a universal, historical and cultural good for society. As evangelical Christians we believe that all people have equality and dignity as made in the image of God and all are equally in need of the grace of God to find ultimate fullness of life. We are therefore not in the position of trying to deny inherent human equality or promote the rights of some individuals or groups over others. Legal equality already exists for individuals (who may equally enter into a marriage or civil partnership if they wish) and couples (where marriage and civil partnership are almost identical). This is therefore for us not a debate about equality but rather about the nature of marriage.

The Principle of redefining marriage

4. The Evangelical Alliance is very concerned about the principle of redefining marriage as proposed in the Bill. We acknowledge that a free society based on rights, responsibilities and respect requires legal frameworks to secure social institutions, reflect majority opinion and protect minority identities. However, such a society is more than the sum of rights-claiming individuals. It involves institutions that are essential for its survival and prosperity – such as marriage. As a foundational and reproductive union at the centre of society, marriage is a particularly valuable institution, and it is in this area that it is in the interest of the state. Although it is recognised and valued as the life-long, voluntary union of one man and one woman for procreation of children, marriage is much more than this. Predating Scots law, the modern state and even the Christian church, it is a universal, historical and cultural good.

5. As all cultures and civilisations attest, the uniqueness of marriage is largely premised upon the fact that only a man and a woman can produce biological children, and this confers the vital elements of identity and inter-generational affinity that contribute so fundamentally to children's wellbeing. We are concerned that redefining marriage would undermine this distinctive building block of society and it is concerning to us that the place of children in marriage does not even seem to be mentioned with regards to the proposed Bill.

6. Importantly, marriage does not, and has never merited, special recognition simply because it marks an intimate 'committed relationship' between two people. If that were the case, there would be no reason to prevent marriage, for example, between siblings or between a parent and his or her child. Rather, marriage between a man and a woman has a unique place in law because of its potential to produce children, because of the proven benefits it brings both to children and to society, and because of the web of intergenerational structure it provides.

7. Marriage is therefore about much more than mere 'love' and 'commitment' or a 'contract' between two people. Whether secular or religious, it is covenantal and premised upon the natural complementarity for having and raising children. It is about the fundamental, relational meaning of society and it has direct implications for kinship and family. Although it precedes and supersedes the state, it does confer responsibilities upon the state to encourage respectful and sustainable attitudes to life and others through the promotion of positive and responsible attitudes to motherhood, fatherhood and family life.

8. We are therefore concerned that redefining marriage will actually weaken the understanding of the structure of marriage, its purposes and its benefits to society. This is especially true if there were to be further redefinitions in the future. It is concerning that the Scottish Government do not seem to be able to articulate a new definition of marriage in the Bill and so this leaves room for further groups who feel themselves excluded in the future to claim their right to marriage on the same basis. Once there is no fixed definition of marriage it is devalued of its meaning. As an organisation passionately committed to the common good of society this is not something we are able to support.
Practical Concerns

9. We also have a number of concerns in relation to the practical outworking of the Bill, namely with regard to those who hold to the present legal definition of marriage and oppose redefinition. We are particularly concerned with the Scottish Government’s lack of protections in the Bill itself despite repeated assurances that it is consulting seriously on the implications of marriage redefinition. We have a number of specific concerns in this regard.

Protections for celebrants

10. We very much welcome the stated commitment of the Scottish Government to ensure that no church or celebrant will be forced to solemnise a same-sex marriage however we have concerns about the long term robustness of this protection. It is probable that this will be challenged in the courts (as is already happening in England) and legal opinion suggests that if a case went to the European Court it may well rule in favour of such a claim. This is in part attributable to the recent European Court case Gas and Dubois v France which has generated a consensus among lawyers that it will be illegal to refuse to carry out same-sex ceremonies where a country has adopted same-sex marriage. We have also recently seen the example of Denmark where there is now a duty upon the national church to host same-sex marriage.

Effect of Public Sector Equality Duty

11. Our wider concerns with the Bill affect the impact of the Public Sector Equality Duty upon those individuals and groups who disagree with the redefinition of marriage. This is particularly concerning for us as a membership organisation where a number of member organisations engage in productive and useful partnerships with local authorities and other statutory agencies.

12. At a time when churches are increasingly providing valuable welfare support in the form of Foodbanks, Debt Advice, Family Support, Street Pastors, Chaplaincy and other services we are extremely concerned that holding to the traditional view of marriage may cause tension or even complete breakdown in these relationships, which are widely recognised as beneficial to individuals and communities across Scotland. Whilst we recognise that the Scottish Government does not wish to see partnership with faith groups eroded in this way it is concerning that this desire does not seem to connect with the implications contained within the Bill as enforced by the Public Sector Equality Duty. It is eminently possible to include an amendment to the Bill stating that no organisation should suffer detriment in this way solely due to their view upon the definition of marriage. In addition the Scottish Government could include this issue in its discussions with the UK Government on amending the Equality Act 2010 and push for a further amendment in this area to ensure robust protection.

Fostering and Adoption

13. Finally we are concerned with the implications for those wishing to foster and adopt children. At present there is a major drive to recruit possible foster carers and adoption families from within churches to help tackle the national shortage of foster placements. Whilst clearly not all potential carers will be suitable candidates there is real concern that a person’s view on the definition
About Family Education Trust

For over forty years, Family Education Trust has conducted research into the causes and consequences of family breakdown. By means of its publications and conferences, and through its media profile, the Trust seeks to stimulate informed public debate on matters affecting the family and the welfare of children and young people, based on reputable research findings.

Family Education Trust is a registered charity and has no religious or political affiliations.

4. How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition.

Strongly committed as it is to creating legal parity between opposite sex and same-sex relationships, in drafting the legislation the Scottish Government has been unable to escape the fact that they are fundamentally different. No amount of rhetoric or manipulation of language will ever be able to make them the same. The whole notion of ‘equal marriage’ for same-sex couples is flawed.

We are concerned that, in pursuing something which does not and cannot exist out of a desire to accommodate the wishes of the few, the Scottish Government will inevitably create a whole host of injustices and inequalities for the many.

Please see our response to Question 5 for a fuller explanation of the basis on which we oppose the proposals contained in the Bill.

5. How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition.

We are opposed to the redefinition of marriage for the following reasons:

- There are four key components in the definition of marriage: it is voluntary, heterosexual, monogamous and lifelong. These four elements belong together. If any one of them were to be amended or removed, it would change the definition of marriage and the meaning attached to marriage in society. The Scottish Parliament should no more legislate for same-sex marriage than it should legislate for forced marriage, polygamous marriages, or temporary contract marriages.

- Marriage does not merit special recognition simply because it marks an intimate relationship between two people. If that were the case, there would be no reason to prevent marriage between siblings or between a parent and his or her child.¹ Rather,

¹ As Professor John Haldane of the University of St Andrews has observed, ‘In those countries where the arguments for same-sex marriage were first pressed, various polyamory and genetical sexual attraction groups now deploy parallel arguments in support of multi-party and sibling marriage (hetero- and homosexual).’ Letter to the Daily Telegraph, 21 March 2012.
marriage between a man and a woman has a unique place in law because of its potential to produce children, because of the proven benefits it brings both to children and to society, and because of the web of intergenerational support it provides.

- Once the state legislates for marriage between two men or two women simply because they 'love each other and want to formalise a commitment to each other', it is difficult to maintain a principled objection to marriage between a group of men and/or women who are seeking a formal recognition of their love for each other.

- Since same-sex couples can already obtain all the legal benefits of marriage by entering a civil partnership, there is no compelling need for same-sex marriage.

- If marriage were to be redefined as proposed, the law would be sending out the message that a household of two women or two men is just as appropriate a context for raising children and that it does not matter whether children are reared by both their mother and their father, or by a parent of each sex at all. There is no evidence to suggest that children raised by a same-sex couple in a redefined version of marriage would reap the same benefits that are associated with being raised by their natural father and mother when they are married to each other.

Although research into the outcomes for children brought up by a same-sex couple is sparse, a recent study published in the journal Social Science Research found ‘numerous, consistent differences’ on 40 different social, emotional, and relational outcome variables between young adults raised by a parent who has had a same-sex romantic relationship and those raised in other family contexts. The differences were particularly marked when comparing the children of women who have had a lesbian relationship and those with still-married (heterosexual) biological parents.²

- Some employees have already faced disciplinary action and even dismissal because they found themselves unable in good conscience to facilitate civil partnerships as part of their employment duties. Since same-sex marriage arouses stronger sensitivities than civil partnerships, the conflict experienced by employees is likely to be much more widespread.
(See response to Question 12 below.)

- Legislating for same-sex marriage would have implications for the education of children.
Children in schools would have to be taught that society recognises no distinction between a marriage between a man and a woman, and a marriage between two men or two women. Large numbers of both parents and teachers would object to this.

- Legislating for same-sex marriage would inevitably lead to individuals and organisations facing legal challenges for expressing the view that, by its nature, marriage can only be between a man and a woman. (See response to Question 13 below.)

---
² Mark Regnerus, ‘How different are the adult children of parents who have same-sex relationships? Findings from the
8. How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriage?

In opposition.

Since civil partnerships were set up to be a separate and entirely distinct institution from marriage, it should not be possible to convert one to the other as if there were no material difference between them.

There are four key components in the definition of marriage: it is voluntary, heterosexual, monogamous and lifelong. These four elements belong together. If any one of them were to be amended or removed, it would change the definition of marriage and the meaning attached to marriage in society. Since a civil partnership is defined as ‘a relationship between two people of the same sex’, it is not possible for a civil partnership to change into a marriage.

As Lord Filkin, the minister for constitutional affairs at the time the Civil Partnerships Bill was being debated, put it: ‘The concept of homosexual marriage is a contradiction in terms.’ It was so then, and it remains so now.

12. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

(a) The position of registrars who do not recognise same-sex marriage

If the proposed legislation is passed, many registrars will find themselves exposed to the risk of dismissal if they express a conscientious objection to conducting a same-sex marriage. Several registrars found themselves in this position when civil partnerships were introduced, but in view of the even greater sensitivities aroused by same-sex marriage, it is likely that many more registrars would be affected.

We would venture to suggest that the Scottish Government’s proposal not to allow an opt-out for registrars who cannot in good conscience preside at same-sex marriage ceremonies runs counter to its expressed aim to ‘provide equality whilst, at the same time, promoting and protecting religious freedom and freedom of speech’. Registrars who support the historic and well-nigh universal definition of marriage would run the risk of being denied the opportunity to continue in their role on an equal basis with those who are comfortable with embracing the redefinition of marriage.

Not all registrars who object to same-sex marriage do so on the basis of a religious faith, but if no opt-out is provided, those with a religious motivation would not enjoy the protection of religious freedom and freedom of speech which the Scottish Government professes to offer. Such protections should not be limited to the official representatives of faith groups, but should be extended to all people of faith who cannot in good conscience recognise the union of two people of the same sex as a bona fide marriage.

In the absence of an opt-out for registrars with a conscientious objection to same-sex marriage, we foresee that not only will some experienced registrars be lost to the profession, but that in the future many individuals would find themselves excluded from the field of civil registration on account of their views on marriage.

(b) The position of other wedding service providers

The Scottish Government is seeking to protect faith groups and individual religious celebrants who are persuaded that marriage can only ever be between a man and a woman.

---

However, with the exception of faith representatives who do not wish to solemnise same-sex marriages, the Bill currently contains no protections for other individuals who do not wish to be involved with same-sex marriages in the course of their employment duties, whether they are motivated by a religious faith or not.

For example, while a priest, minister, rabbi or imam is free to say he does not believe in same-sex marriage and wants nothing to do with the ceremony, the Bill provides no protection at all for the chauffeur, the seamstress, the printer, the photographer, the caterer or the marriage counsellor who is no less committed to the principle of traditional marriage than any faith leader.

It is not only church and faith leaders who require strong and effective protection. We would therefore like to see provision made within the Bill for a duty on an employer to accommodate an employee who has a conscientious belief that marriage is the union of one man to one woman for life to the exclusion of all others. In practice, that would mean taking steps to ensure that an employee is not put under pressure to assist with making arrangements for a same-sex wedding when to do so would go against his or her conscience.

‘Reasonable accommodation’ has a long pedigree in other parts of the world and particularly in the United States. The Civil Rights Act 1964 requires that employers reasonably accommodate the sincerely held religious beliefs of employees, unless doing so would impose an undue hardship on the operation of the employer’s business. This protection extends to manifestation of those beliefs. Without such protection, employees could be faced with the stark choice of being forced to act against their conscience or losing their job.

13. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Over recent years, several individuals have been investigated by the police for publicly expressing views deemed offensive to homosexuals, even though their views were expressed in a measured way. For example, childcare author Lynette Burrows was questioned for expressing the view that same-sex adoption was not in the best interests of children,⁴ and an Anglican bishop was similarly subjected to police inquiry for suggesting that it was sometimes possible for homosexuals to ‘reorientate themselves’.⁵ Although charges were not pressed in either of these cases, the very fact that the police considered the expression of such views worthy of investigation is in itself a matter of some concern.

Adrian Smith was demoted by Trafford Housing Trust and had his salary cut by 40 per cent for referring to same-sex marriage ‘an equality too far’ in a post on his personal Facebook page in his own time. Although he won his High Court appeal,⁶ he was not reinstated to his post. The cost of his case exceeded £30,000, but he received only £98 in damages.⁷

We are not convinced that section 14 of the Bill will prove an adequate safeguard in cases such as these.

We are also concerned that teachers who indicate that they do not support same-sex marriage or who are unable in good conscience to use teaching materials that refer positively to same-sex marriage may face disciplinary action. We would therefore like to see protections written into the Bill to safeguard teachers who do not accept that same-sex marriage is possible by definition and also to pay due respect to the rights of parents who do not wish

⁶ Smith v Trafford Housing Trust [2012] EWHC 3221 (Ch).
⁷ Adrian Smith, Memorandum to the House of Commons Public Bill Committee: Marriage (Same-Sex Couples) Bill (MB 37), 27 February 2013. their children to be taught that same-sex marriage is equivalent to the marriage of a man and a woman. This would include granting to parents the right to withdraw their children from classes in which same-sex marriage is to be discussed.

Norman Wells
Family Education Trust
20 August 2013
of marriage could be used to disbar them from the process. We welcome the Scottish Government’s commitment to consider issuing guidance in this area but again there could easily be an amendment added to categorically ensure that no potential foster carer could be disallowed solely because of their views on the definition of marriage.

Kieran Turner
Public Policy Officer – Scotland
Evangelical Alliance in Scotland
23 August 2013
The Organisation

The Free Church of Scotland is dedicated to bringing the Good News of Jesus Christ into public life and beyond. The Free Church is reflective of many within the Christian community who feel that in rejecting much of Scotland and Britain’s Christian past, the baby has been thrown out with the bathwater. We believe there is a danger not primarily to the church, but rather to the wider society (especially the poor and the marginalised), when the historic values of Christianity are replaced by a confused and confusing morass of whatever happens to be the secular moral vogue of the day. It is for that reason that we wish to contribute towards this consultation. We are concerned that the debate has been framed in such a way (tolerant pro-gay marriage vs intolerant religious bigots) that there is in effect little change of there being a rational, civilised and tolerant debate on what we believe is a vital subject for the future of this country.

The Consultation

The Free Church is not convinced this consultation is more than political camouflage – and thin camouflage at that. The parallel same-sex consultation by the Westminster Government suggests there is a ‘done deal’ by the ultra-liberal, secular establishment to push through these controversial proposals. While Downing Street is under compulsion from the Liberal Democrats to act, it is surprising to see a Scottish Government with a different background falling meekly into line. Nevertheless, given the social importance of the changes, the Free Church has decided to participate. It is for Scottish Ministers to show that the consultation is genuine, that they are prepared to listen to Scottish values and that they are not just a tool of the Conservative/Liberal Democrat Coalition in London.

Civil Partnerships for Same Sex Couples

These novel arrangements came into existence on a UK basis by the Civil Partnership Act 2004 after a sustained lobby by same sex campaigners. The Act has only been in existence for six years from 2005 and has resulted in a meagre response of 3,307 partnerships compared with 175,552 marriages during the same period.

The evidence is that that they have not had the pick-up expected by the lobbyists and have had little social impact apart from the initial novelty. It is too soon to make an assessment of the medium term impact made on society but as these are essentially bi-lateral contracts, they are private arrangements between consenting couples.
While it was argued at the time of the legislation that same sex couples did not have the taxation or succession benefits given married couples, any argument over human rights entitlement (if any) is satisfied by the Act. It is remarkable that given the short period that has elapsed since the primary legislation and the minimal take up of partnerships that the Scottish Government has found it necessary to consult on this issue with a view to legislation. It would appear to have succumbed to persistent lobbying and surprisingly can find legislative time on this issue despite the huge number of priority social and economic problems affecting the country and awaiting urgent attention by the Government.

The main issue is whether same sex couples should be allowed to have religious celebration of their private contracts. This runs the danger of offending against the principle that church and state should be kept separate. In mainland Europe frequently, marriage (and by extension civil partnerships) are constituted by registration by the State with religious celebration being an optional and non-essential addition to the occasion. Under the 2004 Act, partnerships are constituted and recognised by the state by registration. The parties can have any other ceremony or religious blessing in any location they wish following upon registration. They suffer no discrimination or hardship under the current arrangements and the Free Church believes there should be no further legislation. Any such would be a prodigal waste of legislative time for 450 people a year (and declining) when more urgent issues require the attention of Scotland’s Parliament.

The Scottish Government is out of touch with reality when the Ministerial Foreword states:

“...we also hope that everyone will treat those with different or opposing views with courtesy and respect, within the very highest standards given of democratic discourse.”

In the vernacular: “nae chance”. By opening up this minefield on behalf of a tiny minority, as evidenced from the numbers from the Registrar General for Scotland mentioned above, the Government cannot be unaware that the same sex issue affecting the clergy in our largest church is causing distress. Equally, the gay rights lobby will not rest until all religious bodies, be they Christian, Muslim or other be compelled to conduct same sex partnerships (or marriages) under equality law. The Government speaks of opts-out and protections, but ultimately once the principle of religious celebration is conceded, such protections will melt away under incessant pressure. If the Government is arguing that on the grounds of justice and equality, same sex-marriages should be allowed, then it cannot consistently argue that churches should be allowed to ‘discriminate’. Despite the assurances that none will be compelled, we are not reassured. The vitriolic and over the top reaction to MSP John Mason’s entirely reasonable motion to the Scottish Parliament that what the Scottish Government were assuring us would be the case anyway (that religious organisations would not be compelled to act against their beliefs), is an indication of how necessary his motion is. For such a reasonable request to be described by an MP as a ‘nasty little motion’, is testimony enough that the Government’s wish for a civilised democratic discourse was never likely to happen.

The Government cannot bind its successors. Nor can the Government influence the courts. It has already lost major appeals on human rights grounds to the UK Supreme Court and equality law will also be a source of litigation. The Scottish Parliament is not sovereign. Its acts are subject to judicial approval on human rights grounds. And even if the ‘gay rights’ lobby were prepared to tolerate non compulsory religious celebration as proposed by the Government (an unlikely prospect), the atheist and secular movements will be only too glad to cause discord for the Churches. We suspect that it will not be long before churches lose their charitable status for daring to go against the governing consensus.

Whilst we do not wish to affirm conspiracy or paranoia theories, it is already the case that some secular zealots have seen fit to attack Christians in the United Kingdom on their wearing of crosses and crucifixes. How many ministers, priests and imams or sheikhs will go to jail for non-compliance with a secular law that strikes at the heart of their faiths? Think twice before you enact this legislation. Martyrs to the faith have not been unknown in the past. Is this to be shadow on the future? This is not fanciful. MSPs have already been attacked viciously for daring to disagree with religious celebration of partnerships or marriage. The first stone has been thrown against free speech on this issue, even within the governing party.

We are aware of politicians, journalists and educationalists who dare not voice their own private opinion on this subject because of the sustained campaigns which will kick in against them, the minute they open their mouths. The gay rights lobby have sought to have candidates removed, websites banned and advertising removed, if any one dare to challenge their shibboleth. We find it interesting that the Scottish Government’s Equality Unit has funded the three national LGBT organisations to the tune of £5.94m since 2001/2 whilst giving only £3.82m to religious groups. Christian groups received £595,223 of which £104,320 was given to the Iona Community, an organisation that is affiliated with the Lesbian and Gay Christian Movement. Given the role of the churches in fighting poverty and providing many public services we think that it is more than a little disproportionate that organisations which represent less than 2 per cent of the Scottish population should receive ten times as much as the Christian churches, who represent more than 50 per cent of the population. This money is then used to ensure that government policy is prejudiced towards the gay rights agenda and to demonise any who dare to question it.
Despite the proclaimed desire of both the Scottish and Westminster governments to ‘consult’, we are concerned that there will be little consultation, because the pre-suppositions of the gays rights lobby have already been accepted by the cultural and political elites of our culture. It is assumed (rather than rationally argued) that evidence of a tolerant ‘liberal’ society is that one is for gay marriage. The conclusion has been pre-determined before the consultation has even been had. This is hardly the action of a mature, reflective and tolerant democracy. It is little wonder that there has been little civilised and tolerant discourse.

Same Sex Marriages

The Government’s perceived wish to give same sex couples the same status and rights as for opposite sex marriage (as they now charmingly describe it) is ill thought out and ultimately harmful. Of the 193 members of the United Nations, there are only 22 countries which have recognised same sex unions and 9 that have recognised same sex marriage. Whilst it may appear superficially attractive for some (witness David Cameron’s boast that Britain would be at the forefront to homosexual rights) to appear to be leading the way in the world, in reality all that the Scottish Government would be doing is following a course of action which is entirely the product of a Western liberal elitist liberalism, which is in fact far from liberal. Whilst politicians might like to talk about how tolerant and liberal they are, thinking that there is little of consequence for marriage, they need to stop and reflect that in fact this is a major step which has potentially extremely destructive consequences.

We again ask if there is minimal demand for same sex partnerships, where then will come the numbers to warrant such a revolutionary change in society. The Government is again reminded that since the Civil Partnership Act came into force, there have been only 3,307 partnerships set against 175,552 marriages. 2 per cent is not a solid foundation for tinkering with something that has been the foundation of British and Scottish society for over 1,500 years. You do not mend ‘Broken Britain’ by breaking its very foundations.

The key question, which very few seem to have actually considered, is just simply to ask, ‘What is Marriage?’ and it is to that that we now turn.

Nature of Marriage in Society

We contend that when the Prime Minister, or the Scottish Parliament claim the right to ‘redefine’ marriage, they are claiming something to which they have no claim. They are in fact acting ultra vires. It as though they are claiming the right to pronounce the earth flat or the ability to make square circles. The meaning of marriage is straightforward. It is the union between one man and one woman, for the threefold purpose of mutual companionship, the procreation and upbringing of children in a secure environment, and the good of society. If one accepts this traditional definition of marriage then by definition there can be no such thing as gay marriage – precisely because the pro-creation of children cannot be achieved by two people of the same sex. The secular state may wish to claim all sorts of powers, but the ability to enable two people of the same sex to have children, without the intrusion of a third or fourth party, is beyond even the power of the State!

When the Scottish Government claims that it has the right to redefine marriage, it is in fact doing nothing of the sort. It is simply undermining the Christian (and traditional) understanding of marriage to the extent that we believe it negates it completely. Once a government abrogates to itself the right to redefine marriage then there is of course no logical reason why any government should stop at same sex marriages. Why not redefine marriage so that polygamy is allowed? After all if the arrangement is between consenting adults who ‘love’ one another, what is the difference? And why stop there? Why not redefine marriage so that a brother can marry his sister, or a father his daughter? If marriage is not about pro-creation, and with the availability of modern birth control methods, then why should this not be allowed as well? The inevitable hysterical cry will come that we are equating gay marriage as being synonymous with polygamy and incest. We are not. We are just simply pointing out that the criteria being used in the current debate would, if accepted, be logically and equally applicable in these cases.

Human Rights to Same Sex Marriage

There is no human rights entitlement to same sex marriages. The position is clearly set out in the Consultation Document as follows:

a. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights

   Article 16

   (1) Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. They are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution.

   (2) Marriage shall be entered into only with the free and full consent of the intending spouses.

   (3) The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State.
b. European Convention of Human Rights

Article 12

Men and women of marriageable age have the right to marry and to found a family, according to the national laws governing exercise of this right.

Nowhere in these fundamental statements of human rights is there any reference to same sex marriages. Same sex couples have thus no human right to marry. Indeed, the statements go further. The UN Statement links marriage of a man and a woman as a natural and fundamental group unit of society and declares that the family as thus defined is entitled to protection of society and the State. The reference to founding a family is echoed by Article 12 of the European Convention. This is common sense. The generating and rearing of children is essential to the survival of the human race, and vital in Scotland which has an ageing population. Marriage is essential to the human condition; same sex unions are a biological cul-de-sac.

If the Scottish Government goes ahead with its proposal, it will have no validity as an exercise of human rights. Indeed, by adulterating the concept of a marriage as a union of a man and a woman, it will be guilty of removal of the protection of the state in Scotland required of it by Article 16 of the Universal Declaration. Furthermore, what consideration has the Scottish Government given to the rights of millions of people who are married? Some, of course, will approve, many will not care and a huge number will find the legislation offensive. It is arguable that their human rights under international law will be breached by the Scottish Government. Will they be entitled to separate status? Will they be compensated? Indeed, if convicted criminals can obtain compensation for slopping out as a breach of their human rights, why should those who entered into regular marriage under international human rights law not receive compensation when their ‘marriages’ are redefined in terms that are not natural and which they do not recognise? Even if after many years, the Government emerges as victor, the cost in administrative and legal time together with legal aid on-costs will not be insignificant.

Religious Celebration of Same Sex Marriages

If unrest is anticipated over religious celebration of civil partnerships, then the comments made earlier on behalf of the Free Church apply with even greater force.

By issuing this consultation, the Scottish Government has effectively lit the blue touch paper. It should extinguish it before causing needless stress to itself and its successors. It is the beginning of wisdom to recognise that you attack the essential building block of society at your peril. The days when the Christian faith will be bullied into secular submission are over. It may be that the Scottish Government does not really wish to return to a pagan society, or a pre-Christian-Greco Roman world, but we will believe that that will be the inevitable consequence. The secular myth of the continual progress of humanity towards an enlightened, liberal secular state is one, that despite all the evidence from recent history, is stubbornly held to, almost as an article of faith. We believe that this is blind faith and as such we are in danger of being led into the very opposite of what is intended.

We realise that there are many who would accept the basic arguments we are putting forward and who in their heart of hearts, do not agree with same sex marriage, and yet who will regard is as a relatively unimportant matter, and therefore not one to risk career or reputation over. They therefore, in order to appear ‘enlightened, liberal and tolerant’ will just go along with the prevailing cultural narrative. To such however we issue this plea – what if you are wrong? We offer three reasons as to why this matter is of such importance.

1) Past - This is not a new struggle. Dostoyevsky, always an astute observer of society, had one of his characters sum up the agenda of the self-styled radicals “Make haste and lock up the churches, abolish God, do away with marriage, destroy the right of inheritance, take up your knives,” (The Possessed - The Devils). In different forms several societies of Right and Left in the 20th Century attempted to enact this ‘radical’ agenda, with disastrous consequences for humanity. We find it ironic that almost all politicians and political parties in Britain are rushing lemming like into something which in effects negates marriage – at least in the eyes of the State.

2) Present – We understand why politicians either want to enact this or at the very least are not prepared to oppose it. The modern narrative is one of enforced ‘tolerance’. All the basic pre-suppositions are so fixed that to question them is to immediately be ostracized. We have seen this recently in the Conservative party – where it has been determined by the powers that be that the New Conservatism must be seen to be liberal, tolerant and that therefore any potential parliamentary candidate who does not accept the mantra and pre-suppositions of the current ruling cultural elite, will immediately be blackballed. The irony is of course that such a course of action is fundamentally intolerant, preventing any discussion and difference of opinion. We have even reached the stage where gay rights groups have succeeded in persuading major information and internet companies to censor groups who do not accept their point of view. For example Apple were persuaded to remove an app which was set up by The Manhattan Declaration. The Manhattan Declaration are not a group of right wing wacky religious fundies. They are a respected group of Christian leaders from different backgrounds. Yet their views are considered to be so extreme that they are censored. Meanwhile pornography, extremist politics and violence are allowed. At some point someone is going to have to say – enough is enough. Diversity and tolerance are going to have to be practiced rather than just words used in the most Orwellian of fashions.

3) The Future – We do not believe that the attack on marriage or on Christianity will end with the Scottish or British Parliaments’ ‘redefining marriage’. As each new piece of legislation has failed to bring in the secular humanist ‘Nirvana’, its proponents have become more and more desperate and have pushed for more. We do not advocate any form of homophobia (and indeed regard the constant accusation of such as being little more than a smokescreen and bullying tactic, to try and enforce silence), and we repeat the Christian teaching that we are to love and respect all peoples, whatever their sexual orientation. However we are concerned at the way this issue is being used to demonise and attack Christianity, whilst at the same time being used to reshape and change society in a way which we believe is ultimately harmful. The gay rights groups, funded by the State, will continue to push for that State, not just to be ‘tolerant’ of gay marriage, but intolerant of any who do not accept their agenda. There will be more pressure for social ‘re-education’ through popular media, the education system and the social welfare and political systems. The attack on the traditional understanding of marriage will not be the end of this assault on Christian morality and values. We urge our MSPs to take this into account and at the very least make an informed decision thinking about the long term consequences, rather than merely the short term sound bites and media pressure.

Conclusion:

“Scotland has chosen to believe in itself and our shared capacity to build a fair society. The nation can be better, it wants to be better, and I will do all I can as First Minister to make it better. We have given ourselves the permission to be bold and we will govern fairly and wisely, with an eye to the future but a heart to forgive.” _ Alex Salmond – Victory Speech – Kirkcaldy – May 2011

We applaud the First Minister’s desire to make Scotland a better nation and a fairer society. We do not however think that instigating gay marriage and thus undermining even further the Christian foundations of this society will lead to a better or fairer nation. Indeed in our view, it will lead to further social disintegration, sexual confusion and greater intolerance, where any in public life or service, who dare to uphold the Christian view of marriage, will be ostracised and discriminated against. If the Scottish Parliament takes the step of redefining marriage rather than displaying boldness, fairness and wisdom, we believe it will demonstrate cowardice, injustice and folly. We therefore request that the Parliament do not take such a retrograde and reactionary step and we would ask you to refuse the request to redefine marriage.
In saying this we are not arguing that the current legislation on civil partnerships should be repealed. That is a route that the State has chosen to go down and it is not the issue at stake here. Indeed there are those who wonder what all the fuss is about – given that civil partnerships already give all the same legal rights as marriages. As indicated in our submission we believe it is important because of the wider agenda being pursued.

I believe this is of such a destructive nature to Scottish society that, rather than leaving the decision to a group of MSPs (who themselves are very susceptible to the threats to their careers and positions of political and media lobbying), this decision should be put to a referendum of the Scottish people. If our relationship with the rest of the United Kingdom warrants a referendum, then surely our relationship to over 1,500 years of Christian teaching on that most fundamental of society’s institutions (marriage), merits the same treatment? Let the people have their say.

Rev. David Robertson
Free Church of Scotland
6 September 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

SUBMISSION FROM HUMANIST SOCIETY SCOTLAND

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

The Humanist Society Scotland (HSS) heartily endorse the thrust of the Bill and the intention behind it, to create a more equal Scotland. As the fundamental principle behind Humanism is that every human deserves equal rights, the HSS fully supports both allowing same sex couples to marry and equalising the status of Belief celebrants. As believers in a secular state where all are treated equally, the HSS regrets that within this Bill heterosexual couples will not have a right to form civil partnership but welcome the Scottish Government’s public commitment on 27th June 2013 to conduct a review of civil partnership law and promptly enact legislation to open up civil partnership in Scotland to couples regardless of their gender. This will also make it possible for a person in a civil partnership to get gender recognition without the need to change their civil partnership to a marriage. Finally the HSS would like to see the criteria on which organisations are judged as suitable to conduct marriage being applied equally. In chapter 3, section 2 of the Bill this would require an amendment to the Bill which would remove the privileged status of The Church of Scotland currently enshrined in section 8 (1) (a) (i) of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977. For clarity and to reflect their equal status in law, where previously some titles of Christian Celebrants eg, minister, priest or pastor have been specifically included, these specifics in the Bill are replaced throughout by the phrase “Celebrant of a Religious or Belief body”

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Humanist philosophy is about treating people equally and the HSS welcomes this move towards creating a more equal and accepting society by recognising the equal validity of love between partners of the same sex and affording the same rights and responsibility of marriage to same sex couples.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

As would be expected, the HSS strongly welcomes the move toward equal treatment of all marriage celebrants.
How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

The HSS supports the right of celebrants of all beliefs and religions to opt out. We appreciate the care that has been taken to allow a conscience opt-out for individual celebrants where their organisation has opted in to conducting same sex marriages. We are therefore disappointed that the reciprocal freedom of conscience has not been granted to allow individual celebrants within opted-out organisations from individually choosing to conduct same sex marriages and civil partnerships. A small amendment is needed to section 11(2) of the bill, in order to give those religious and belief bodies that want to, the option of using the gender-free form of the marriage ceremony, in section 11(2)(g), for mixed-sex couples who would prefer that form. This is particularly important for mixed-sex couples where one or both is transgender or intersex. Religious or belief bodies that wish to, should be permitted to continue to use the “husband and wife” gendered form of the marriage ceremony, and same sex couples should be also be given the choice of wording within a civil marriage.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

The HSS believes that both civil partnerships and marriages should be available to both same-sex and opposite sex couples. The HSS also believes that there should be no cost incurred if a couple in a civil partnership wish to change to a marriage. We consider it unjust that a group of individuals who have been discriminated against should have to pay to have that discrimination corrected. We do also think an amendment is needed to allow couples who registered a civil partnership abroad and then moved to Scotland to marry here.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

The HSS agrees that more freedom should be accorded to all individuals to have their marriage solemnised in a way, and in a place that suits them and so support this increased freedom for civil marriage ceremonies.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

Once again the HSS support increasing freedom of choice and that all couples should be free to choose the type of legal recognition they want for their relationship, as well as who conducts the ceremony and where it takes place.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

The HSS strongly supports the ability for a transgendered person to remain married when obtaining a full Gender recognition Certificate.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

The HSS does not perceive there is any legal risk to individuals who choose to speak against same-sex marriage and the provisions set out in chapter 4 reinforce that no presently existing freedom of expression will be curtailed. As regards calls for a conscience clause for registrars, it is unthinkable that a public official carrying out a public service be allowed to discriminate on the grounds of sexuality/sexual orientation. It would also be contrary to statutory obligations under the Equality Act 2010. The HSS considers that in the public sphere everyone is either equal or we are not. If the Bill becomes law, public servants will, like anybody, be free to think and believe whatever they like about anyone else. Indeed it is a fundamental human right. However, personal beliefs must not intrude in the performance of a public duty, particularly not to the detriment of those seeking a service to which they are legally entitled. Like everybody else registrars will be subject to the laws of the land. The HSS considers the existing safeguards which prevent teachers and others in authority using their position to promote a particular viewpoint sufficient.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

When considering calls for conscience clauses or protection of freedom of speech on this issue, the HSS would ask for equal marriage to be treated in the same way as equality law on race, gender or disability and those with other protected characteristics. When these laws were framed lawmakers did not consider enshrining in law special rights for those opposed to treating women, minority ethnic people or disabled people equally. In deciding to allow same-sex marriage MSPs will have decreed that the state will no longer allow discrimination against gay and lesbian people in the public sphere. If individuals opposed to equality experience social disapproval for their opposition to same sex marriage, the HSS would welcome this, in the same way it welcomes social disapproval of sectarian behaviour or racism and sexism.
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

The HSS agrees with politicians and the Registrar General that conducting marriages should not be a business. As a charity, the ceremonies carried out by our celebrants are only part of our work but we are concerned that some charities have been set up which appear to be operating as marriage businesses. We therefore welcome the modification to Section 12: Temporary Authorisation and, for clarification, that the criteria for suitable organisation should be defined as in section 10 (4) (a), and we request that if no other criteria for temporary authorisation should be permitted.

Are you responding as...

a celebrant faith/belief-based organisation

Liz Rowlett
Humanist Society Scotland
22 August 2013
Q4 & Q5 How would you characterise your view of the Bill in General? How would you characterise your views of the introduction of same sex marriage?

LGBT Youth Scotland welcomes the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill. We strongly believe that this Bill will have a positive impact on lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender people by creating equal access to marriage for all couples regardless of sexual orientation or gender identity. At present it is a robust Bill although some parts of the Bill could be improved to ensure it is considers the needs of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender people fully.

The key areas of the Bill which we believe are positive are:

- Making marriage available to same-sex couples
- Enabling religious and belief bodies the opt-in for conducting religious civil partnerships and same-sex marriages
- Recognition that there are currently sufficient legal protections to ensure that those who disagree with equal marriage are not negatively affected.

Mixed-sex Civil Partnerships

The LGBT National Youth Council, representing LGBT young people from across Scotland, first began campaigning on equal marriage in 2009. They believe that all couples, whether they are classified as ‘same-sex’ or ‘mixed-sex’ should have the same options for legal recognition. Their manifesto called for marriage and civil partnerships to be made available to all couples.

As we have stated in our previous two consultation responses, we believe that this Bill should include provision for mixed-sex civil partnership. As the current Bill does not extend civil partnerships to mixed-sex couples, it has the potential to negatively impact on bisexual people and transgender people who wish to have a civil partnership when in a mixed-sex relationship. It could also have a negative impact on transgender people who do not conform to binary gender identities. For example, those who do not identify as male or female (androgyne people) under the current legal system are forced to identify as the sex recorded on their birth certificate. This Bill would mean that they would not have access to civil partnerships if their birth certificate indicated that they were in a mixed-sex relationship, negating their gender identity.

During the consultation on the draft Bill, we asked LGBT young people what they felt about the proposed legislative changes. They expressed disappointment that the proposals created inequality based on sexual orientation or gender reassignment.
I’m bisexual and may one day want to enter a civil partnership instead of a marriage. It’s more of a right to choose between two options that’s important.

Work place – if you don’t get mixed-sex civil partnerships and at work you have to say your relationships status as civil partnership you instantly open yourself up to discrimination and homophobia.

This is also reflected in current opinion polls which showed that 71% of respondents said that mixed-sex couples should have the right to get a civil partnership. (Ipsos MORI Scotland Opinion Poll 2012)\(^1\). LGBT Youth Scotland agrees with the young people consulted that opening up mixed-sex civil partnerships would reduce inequality, increase freedom of choice and be very important for including and normalising bisexual and transgender people. We therefore ask the Equal Opportunities Committee to include in their stage 1 report the importance of the proposed review of mixed-sex civil partnership.

Age of Gender Recognition

There are additional instances where an individual of marriage age may be restricted due to gender identity. In Scotland the age of legal capacity is 16, meaning that young people aged 16 can not only consent to medical treatment, but enter into a marriage. The age for receiving a Gender Recognition Certificate, however, is 18. It is important that this Bill mirrors Scottish law in regards to the age of legal capacity.

We work with many transgender young people who begin living in their acquired gender far earlier than the age of 16. In addition to having an extended wait time prior to applying for GRC, these young people may be faced with a choice to enter into a marriage that will need to be re-registered once they are old enough to receive GRC, or wait until they attain the age of 18 and a GRC before entering into marriage.

When we asked young people from two transgender-specific youth groups what the current rules meant for them, they said:

I’m 18 and am currently engaged. My partner and I have been engaged for approximately a year and a half now and although we were both very keen to be legally married and had planned to do so the summer following our engagement. However, as the age for GRC is 18 and at the time we were 17, we couldn’t get married…[Changing the age of GRC to 16] would have made a huge difference, my partner and I could have been married when we originally planned.

---

Others highlighted the disconnect between having the ability to leave education and enter the workforce, being treated as an adult, but being denied the right to have all official documents reflect their acquired gender.

I’m currently 17 and am going away to college next year. I would much prefer to have myself as male on the official records, but they need to have my ‘real’ details on the system.

The ability to understand your own gender comes well before 16.

Legally, I could have been recognised as the gender I am and be able to be exactly who I am in every life situation as soon as I was old enough to leave school.

Q7 How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex relationships.

LGBT Youth Scotland agrees that religious and belief bodies should be allowed, but not required to conduct same-sex marriages. We agree with an opt-in process for religious and belief bodies in authorising celebrants as this would protect religious bodies and celebrants who do not wish to solemnise same-sex marriage or religious civil partnership without restricting the freedom of religious or belief bodies who wish to conduct them.

Q8 How would you characterise your views of civil partnerships changing to marriage?

We agree that couples should have the right to convert their civil partnership to a marriage. Many same-sex couples would have entered into a civil partnership in order to gain legal recognition when the option of marriage was not available to them.

Registration of marriages should be gender neutral and there should be no difference between the forms and certificates used for same-sex and mixed-sex marriages. There should be an option for couples to decide what designation they would like to use, such as spouse or bride and bridegroom. This would ensure that religious bodies who chose to not recognise same-sex marriage have the option of retaining ‘bride’ and ‘bridegroom’ during the ceremony, yet other individuals in mixed-sex marriages are also free to choose ‘spouse’.

Gender neutral language is particularly important for transgender individuals who identify as androgyne or who do not wish to apply for a GRC. Although such individuals would be able to enter into a marriage regardless of their gender (unlike for Civil Partnerships, as discussed above), gendered documents may force individuals into using language with which they are uncomfortable. For instance, if someone who identifies as androgyne enters into a marriage and their official documents designate that marriage as a ‘mixed-sex’ marriage, they may be obligated to choose ‘bride’ or ‘bridegroom’ although they do not identify with such gendered concepts. Once the Bill passes, there should not be a distinction between the documents used to register same-sex and mixed-sex marriages, there should only be marriage documents which contain wording options. For further information on the specifics around converting civil partnerships to marriage and re-registering marriages after GRC, please see the discussion by Equality Network, which we support.

The administrative route should be available alongside the ceremony route to converting civil partnerships and should be available to those in qualifying civil partnerships who currently reside in Scotland. These individuals should not be required to undertake a ceremony in order to claim the legal status that they were denied at the time of registering their civil partnership. Couples may have already registered their civil partnership with a ceremony or celebrated with family and friends and the administrative route must be an option to all couples. The administrative route should be a simple procedure, such as attending a local registrar to verify documents and signatures, and should not cost more than the staff time and documents required.

Q10 How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

LGBT Youth Scotland welcomes the introduction of religious and belief options for same-sex couples of faith who wish to include their faith or belief community in celebrating their legal relationship commitment.

Q11 How would you characterise your views of allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full GRC?

We welcome the change to the law that would enable couples to remain married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate. Our concern, however, lies with the requirement for spousal consent prior to receiving a GRC. Although it should be required for both partners to consent to remaining in the relationship, it should not be the role of the spouse to block their partner from receiving official gender recognition. We propose that spousal consent be changed to only apply for re-registering the marriage rather than recognising the individual’s gender.

Individuals possessing an interim certificate should be permitted to apply to the sheriff court to receive a full GRC, without divorcing. This would not re-register the marriage but enable it to continue in its present state. If the couple wishes to re-register their marriage with updated details, they would then supply a statutory declaration stating that they wish to remain in the relationship and re-register taking the GRC into account. For further details on the proposed changes to this process, see the Scottish Transgender Alliance’s written evidence.
Q12 & 13 Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage? Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

The Bill states that exercise of freedom of thought, conscience and religion or expression are not affected by the content of the Bill and individuals continue to remain protected in regards to these under existing laws. We feel that these protections are made clear and are sufficient, but this section must remain in the Bill. We are pleased to see reference to General Teaching Council for Scotland’s Code of Professionalism and Conduct in the Policy Memorandum. This recognises that teachers have a duty to provide young people with unbiased information and consider their rights and wellbeing; our research shows that this results in positive learning experiences for young people.

The Policy Memorandum also mentions that the Education Circular 2/2001 will be updated and maintain the right of parents and carers to withdraw children and young people from sexual health education. While we recognise the importance of including the views of parents and carers in their child’s education, and are not advocating that they be withdrawn, it is important that the rights of adults are not privileged over the rights of children and young people.

Sexual Health and Relationships Education within schools are often the only classes in which same-sex relationships are mentioned, meaning that there is low visibility for LGB identities in education and rarely does this include transgender visibility. We know that when LGBT young people do not receive appropriate health information they are less likely to have knowledge of safer sex practices, healthy relationships and may place themselves at increased risk of domestic abuse, sexual exploitation or sexually transmitted infections. It is therefore worth noting that this would be exacerbated for LGBT young people who are withdrawn by parents or carers from sexual health education.

Under the UNCRC, young people have the right to receive information that is relevant to them (Article 13) and to have a say in decisions that affect them (Article 12). At the time of the consultation on the draft Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill, we consulted with young people in seven youth groups and two school classes. Overall, young people felt that without their opinions taken into account, parental opt-out limits their education, undermines their right to information and implies that young people are unable to choose what is best for them. The Scottish Youth Parliament consulted with young people around PSE in schools. The majority felt that young people should be asked their views and have them taken into account where their parents have asked for them to be withdrawn from a lesson (80.7%). A smaller majority believed that they should be able to take part in lessons.

---

3 Scottish Youth Parliament (February 2013) ‘What Do You Think About PSE in Schools’ survey.
if they don’t agree with their parents’ view that they should be withdrawn, regardless of age (71.4%).

As noted in our previous consultation response: ‘Any decisions that result in a child being removed from a class should take into account the principles of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child regarding equal treatment, the child’s best interests, and giving appropriate weight to the views of the child. This is specifically noted in GTC Scotland’s Code of Professionalism and Conduct ⁴ which outlines these core principles and suggests that teachers ‘should be aware of the general principles of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child’.

Including the views of young people would promote better Health and Wellbeing Experiences and Outcomes as outlined within Curriculum for Excellence under ‘relationships, sexual health and parenthood’.

Q14 Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above.

We have dealt with the wider issues in line with the questions above.

Brandi Lee Lough Dennell
Policy and Participation Manager
LGBT Youth Scotland
15 August 2013

---

The Methodist Church welcomes this opportunity to give evidence to the Equal Opportunities Committee

Within the Methodist Church there is a spectrum of views on human sexuality. Methodist Standing Orders, however, state our belief, “that marriage is a gift of God and that it is God’s intention that a marriage should be a life-long union in body, mind and spirit of one man and one woman.” At the same time we have for nearly twenty years explicitly recognised, affirmed and celebrated the participation and ministry of lesbians and gay men, and been committed to a pilgrimage of faith to combat discrimination and give dignity and worth to people whatever their sexuality.

The Methodist Conference, voted in July 2013 to appoint a working group to consider whether the Methodist Church's position on marriage needs revising in light of changes in society. It also agreed that the membership of the working group should take account of the Methodist Church's breadth of theology, age, ethnicity, gender and experience.

A report submitted to the Conference by the Methodist Council had asked for a working group to undertake this consideration with reference to "scripture, tradition, reason and experience". The working group will be tasked with considering the implications of any change in legislation with reference to the Church as a consequence of the Marriage and Civil Partnerships (Scotland) Bill and the Marriages (Same Sex Couples) Bill relating to England and Wales. Recommendations for any changes in the Church's practice or polity will also be made by the working party.

Any recommendations by the Working Party will be brought to the Methodist Conference for ratification, or otherwise.

Reverend Dr David P Easton
Chair of the Methodist Church in Scotland
28 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

SUBMISSION FROM MUSLIM COUNCIL OF SCOTLAND

4. How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In-opposition

The Scottish Government SG intends to proceed with the introduction of very controversial issue of same sex marriage SSM despite of the results of the consultation in 2011 with over 77,000 responses two thirds majority opposing SSM.

By forcing a new definition of marriage the Government is interfering in one of the fundamental practices of most faith communities and their way of life.

The scope of the present consultation is very limited because it seeks views on the detail of the legislation after having already ignored the objection to the principle itself.

5. How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In-opposition

From the Islamic perspective we totally oppose same sex marriage in any shape or form. This view is very clear and straightforward within the teaching of Islam, as is the case with the very large majority of the world religions.

This belief does not and should not be considered a homophobic behaviour.

Marriage is a sacred institution and not just a contract to live together and is defined as "the union of a man and a woman with the interest of the children as the first priority and at the heart of it.

As a matter of principle, Governments do not have the right to redefine marriage and/or subject the people to such a controversial environment with severe implication for the large majority of the Scottish People.

6. How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

We are not supportive of the proposal to establish ‘belief’ ceremonies because we do not wish to encourage secular marriages, which will cause confusion in defining what is Religious Faith and Secular Belief. There is a clear difference between marriage based on faith with rules that are divine and well tried for centuries and belief contracts which could be introduced by followers at any time with no experience of application.
7. How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

Neither

We welcome the opt-in registration arrangement in the Bill. This goes well with the fact that the marriage is the act of worship as acknowledged by the SG in the consultation document.

While the UK Government will amend the Equality Act 2010 to give individual celebrants the right to refuse to solemnize same sex marriage even if their organizations opt in for solemnizing same sex marriages, there is a strong possibility that a claim of a breach of human rights might be taken against a religious organization by an individual celebrant.

This matter may be ultimately determined by the European Court of Human Rights. There is no guarantee that, at some future date, the court will not rule that religion and belief celebrants must either solemnise all 'marriages' or cease to marry people altogether.

Although the European Court of Human Rights has made it clear that it won’t impose same-sex ‘marriage’ on nation states, if a country makes it available in some contexts it must be made available on an equal basis. Discrimination in the provision of same-sex ‘marriage’ could be ruled to contravene the Convention.

In summary, while the Government brings about equality for same sex marriage and the definition and meaning this has, it will also undoubtedly have a severe negative impact on traditional marriage and the very rights of the individuals being compromised or taken away to their detriment.

8. How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriage?

In Opposition

As stated before same-sex relations/unions are not accepted in our faith under any name.

This is one of many features of inconsistency in this Bill, This will create a two tier system giving same sex couples more options to register their relationships than is available to heterosexual couples.

9. How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In Opposition

SG has not specifically clarified what they mean by ‘religious premises’. Our concern is that many Islamic mosques/ Islamic centres have halls or spaces either within or linked to the premises which they may hire out.
We agree civil marriages, especially same-sex ‘marriages’, should not be performed on religious premises as, this may force a religious organisations to let their halls for a same-sex civil ‘marriage’ ceremony against their belief.

We require that in any case clear legislation should be made to guarantee the protection of religious premises from being used for SSM and not be subject to litigation based on discrimination of supply of services.

10. How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In Opposition

As stated before same-sex relations/ unions are not accepted in our faith under any name.

11. How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In Opposition

No Comment

12. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

The SG Equality Impact Assessment (EIA) annexed to the Bill, is very biased in favour of the perceived positive implications of the Bill.

Little or no mention is made in the EIA of the negative implications of this legislation for people who hold to a religious belief or who have a conscientious objection. Rather it limits the potential negative implications of the legislation solely to the matter of religious celebrants.

It does not consider the implications of this legislation for many other faith organizations and others working across the breadth of the public sector. They may find themselves being placed in the position of having to choose between following their religion/ conscience or obeying their employer. In the event they chose their religion/ conscience they could be disciplined or even lose their job.

We made it clear that in Islam we cannot support this change in any shape or form, however we outline the following areas in the event the SG does not listen to the Scottish people and the various element of the legislations need to be addressed:

- Civil registrars are likely to be required by their employers to ‘marry’ same-sex couples.
- Teachers may well be asked to teach pupils about ‘same-sex marriage’.
- Local authorities, owing to the public sector equality duty contained in the Equality Act 2010, may well decide that they cannot partner with, let halls to or provide grants to religious organisations which refuse to ‘marry’ same-sex couples.
Some religious organisations may lose their Charity Status if they refuse to allow same sex marriages in their premise.

Chaplains working in the public sector could lose their jobs if they preach traditional marriage.

Those with a religious/ conscientious objection to same-sex ‘marriage’ might find it difficult to foster or adopt children.

We believe, like other religious organisations, that traditional family structure is the best environment to bring up children.

The introduction of this Bill will force many professionals to adopt the new definition in their teaching and work, which may be against their conscience and for those who do not comply, there is a real risk that they may be sacked from their employment.

Let us not be in any doubt that this will present limitations, restrictions and controversy on the freedom of religion.

Some of the areas of discrimination to list a few are as follows: those employed as registrars; teachers; student advisors; health workers; chaplains and also employers such as charities and businesses.

Further we would add that this would have serious impact and be detrimental to Imams, Mosques Trustees/ Executive Committee member(s), Charity Accreditations, application for funding and use of public places etc. It needs to be stressed that Islam is not the only faith which will be severely affected by this Bill, but majority of the religious organisations here in the UK and worldwide will be in a similar position.

Civil registrars, social workers, teachers etc who oppose same sex marriage may well lose their jobs. At the very least, new entrants to these professions will find it difficult to get a job if they continue to oppose same sex ‘marriage’ or have been vocal about their beliefs in the past.

Given the situation explained above, we are in no doubt that in the long term this will lead to an employment system which will exclude people who oppose SSM from both employment and from contribution to public life.

We would further state that given the religious background of the ethnic minority communities, the fact that employment within some groups of ethnic minorities’ communities being as high as three to four times higher to its white counterpart; it will give disproportionate impact to different groups of people thus widening the unemployment ratio even further.

We believe that the Civil Partnership Act 2004 in the UK already gives same sex couples most of the rights and responsibilities of a civil marriage. Taking this further as outlined in the Bill will put an entirely and exceptionally bizarre dimension to the society at large to the detriment of all who oppose it and shattering their civil rights and freedom of expression and religious conscience. We don’t believe much of the assurances given by the Scottish Government, with the best of intention, will be either practical or sustainable.
13. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Many concerns were expressed by respondents to the 2011 consultation that freedom of speech could be inhibited if the ‘same-sex marriage’ is introduced.

Government should state in the Bill that SSM is a controversial issue and amend to clarify that public discussion or criticism of marriage, as regards the sex of the parties to marriage, would not of itself amount to an offence of stirring up hatred because of sexual orientation or any other discrimination category.

There are many case examples which happened or happening already, some are still in courts, such as:

- A robust debate about ‘same-sex marriage’ in a public place could lead to a charge of Breach of the Peace, within the context of street preaching.
- Distributing religious leaflets or preaching outside a football stadium could be treated as an offence under the Offensive Behaviour at Football and Threatening Communications (Scotland) Act 2012.
- Offensive behaviour under this Act includes behaviour seen to be ‘homophobic’ etc.
- Any other public sector employee who speaks out against ‘same-sex marriage’ may be disciplined at work.
- A hospital Chaplain who preaches in his place of worship against same sex marriage can be disciplined by his employer.
- Similarly a University Chaplain, Prison Chaplain etc

Prosecutorial Guidelines by the Lord Advocate are not subject to consultation and can be easily amended by a future Lord Advocate. For these reasons we would like to have seen these guidelines as part of the Bill since we are already on a fine line to what may constitute criminal offences.

Whilst this Bill may give freedom of marriage to same sex couples, it could be detrimental to traditional marriage and religious communities in general. This could have a detrimental impact on positions that are/ or have been held by individuals due to it being a criminal offence under these changes.

It will also affect their future status in many aspects including employment.

In the circumstances the SG claims that guidance relating to NHS chaplains, current employment law and the European Convention of Human Rights are sufficient to protect freedom of expression, is not sustainable.

The European Court of Human Rights has already ruled in some cases that freedom of expression and manifestation of religion should be of secondary consideration to non-discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation where a clash of rights has occurred. There are also many cases to this effect in USA and Canada.
14. Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

At the outset it needs to be said that the Scottish Government (SG) ignored the main issue of introducing same sex marriage despite a large majority to the consultation in 2011 (which received 77,000 responses) two thirds of which were opposed to the introduction of same sex marriage, we are now asked to comment on the Bill itself despite the SG having already ignored the objection to the principle itself.

The Muslim Council of Scotland cannot support the proposal which enables “all couples” to have a civil marriage ceremony. This is not only the views of the Islamic community but reflects the views of the world religions, excluding a very few.

This Bill seeks to makes serious changes to accommodate Same Sex Marriage. The words such as “Mother”, “Father”, “son” & “daughter”, which have been with us since history began can reveal kinship relations and are now at risk of being diluted to no specific relations if changed to accommodate Same Sex Marriage. To this end we draw your attention to section 1 (2e) of the Bill. Further, we draw your attention to the table on page 27 of the Policy Memorandum attached to the Bill outlining how the relationships will be described. We strongly disapprove of these changes and we don’t believe that majority of the Scottish people will approve of this either. We don’t believe that the implications of these changes have been fully explained to or appreciated by the public at large.

On the wider scale, all literature and teachings on marriage will lose their original meaning as intended by the authors, this action would amount to a rewriting of history and cultures.

The assertion that “religious marriage” will be unaffected by the proposal is totally untrue, since fundamentally changing the state’s understanding of marriage means that the nature of marriage solemnised in places of worship would also be changed.

The Scottish Government has given various assurances that the civil liberties of those who have a conscientious objection to ‘marry’ same sex couple will be respected. We are of the strong view that whilst the Scottish Government may have the best of intention to address equality; however, it is not realistic or sustainable. We draw you attention to some of our arguments stated below:

Article 9 (1) of the European Convention on Human Rights, ECHR:

“Everyone has the freedom of thought, conscience and religion: the right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public and private, to manifest his religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance.”

Article 9 (2) “Freedom to one’s religion or belief shall be subject to such limitation as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interest of public safety, for the protection of public order, health or morals, or the protection of the rights and the freedom of the others.”
Whilst it is understood what Article 9(1) is stating, applying it in context with the controversial issue of ‘Same Sex Marriage’ as proposed in the Bill is going too far and opens up floodgates to the detriment of large majority of Scottish people. The Scottish Government would be going too far in pleasing and protecting the rights of a minority whilst seriously encroaching and negatively impacting the rights of the majority. Further, The interpretation which the Scottish Government will take of Article 9(2) is at present a total mystery as the Lord Advocate guidelines are not available and none will be made available until after the Bill has been passed.

It is our understanding that if the member state chooses to make provision in its domestic law for same sex marriage, then as far as the ECHR is concerned same sex marriage is protected by the convention in the same way that opposite sex marriage is protected: the right to marry contained in Article 12 is applicable to both categories so far as the state is concerned.

Whilst we may be prepared to accept that the present Scottish Government will do whatever is necessary to safeguard the interests of the majority of Scottish people, we must not forget that much of this will be outwith the remit of the Scottish Government and it will not be sustainable to uphold the assurances given. For example, the Equality Act 2010 is with the UK Government, articles 8,9,12 &14 fall under the European Human Rights Convention ECHR.

The European Court of Human Rights has already ruled in some cases that freedom of expression and manifestation of religion should be of secondary consideration to non-discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation where a clash of rights has occurred.

Also, we conclude that the Religious organisations not willing to ‘marry’ same sex couples may well lose their charitable status or be excluded from hiring or using public facilities. We are aware of the Scottish Government guidelines and assurances, but we do not believe much of this will be sustainable as it will be outwith the jurisdiction of the Scottish Government.

In summary we would reiterate that the Scottish Government is under no obligation to introduce this controversial Bill and that there is adequate provision already within the legislation for same sex couples.

While the Government brings about equality for same sex couples to marry, it will undoubtedly have a severe negative impact on traditional marriage and the very rights of the individuals being compromised or taken away to their detriment. The Government has a clear obligation to uphold, sustain and protect the moral values of the people. Bringing this Bill will have a serious impact on the moral fabric of the Scottish society and the Scottish Government should be very cautious before interfering with this right.

Introduction of this Bill will be detrimental to the society and many of the safeguards assurances given by the Scottish Government are unrealistic and we fear that they will not be sustainable.
We therefore oppose this Bill as a matter of principle and for the reasons explained above. The SG will not be able to give safeguards to the majority who oppose SSM as this reality can be seen from those countries that have legalised SSM.

Muslim Council of Scotland
22 August 2013
1. This note attempts to summarise what is known about public attitudes towards same sex (also known as ‘gay’ and ‘equal’) marriage in Scotland. To do so it draws both upon the evidence of polls and surveys conducted solely within Scotland and those that have been conducted across Great Britain as a whole. The note should be read alongside a set of Powerpoint slides, also entitled ‘Public Attitudes to Same Sex Marriage’. Reference here to a slide in that presentation is made thus: {n}.

2. The debate about same sex marriage, both in Scotland and in England and Wales, follows what might be regarded as a revolution in attitudes towards same sex relationships during the last 25 years {2}.

3. In 1983, the first year in which the annual British Social Attitudes (BSA) survey (Park et al., 2013) was conducted, as many as 62% said that ‘sexual relations between two adults of the same sex’ were either ‘always’ or ‘mostly’ wrong, while just 21% said that they were ‘rarely’ or ‘not at all wrong’. This reading was taken shortly after the initial discovery of AIDS, which in the ensuing few years became particularly associated with male same sex relationships, and attitudes became even more critical such that by 1987 as many as 74% said they same sex relations were always or mostly wrong.

4. Since then, however, attitudes have gradually but consistently become more liberal. In 2003, shortly before the introduction of civil partnerships for same sex couples, the proportion who felt that same relations were rarely or not all wrong outnumbered those who felt that they were always or mostly wrong for the first time. Thereafter attitudes have become yet more liberal such that according to the most recent reading, taken in 2012, as many as 57% now say that same sex relations are rarely or not all wrong while just 28% feel that they are always or mostly wrong. The balance of opinion on the subject is now almost a mirror image of what it was thirty years ago. The change represents one of the most marked changes in attitudes to have been identified by BSA.

5. Exactly the same question has been asked on four occasions since the Scottish Social Attitudes survey was conducted in 1999 {3}. Across the decade covered by those four readings both the balance of opinion in any one year and the trend over time are very similar to the picture uncovered by BSA. Given that is the case and given too the relative paucity of evidence from polls and surveys conducted in Scotland alone, it would seem both reasonable and desirable to take cognisance of Britain wide evidence in making assessment of the state of public opinion in Scotland. It might be noted that a further example cited below of where a direct comparison can be made between the results of a Britain-wide and a Scotland only survey supports this contention {12}.

6. Attitudes are strongly related to age, as illustrated by {4} which shows for each age group the proportion in the 2010 SSA that said that same sex relations were rarely or not at all wrong minus the proportion saying they were always or mostly wrong. Younger people are more liberal than older people, while the only group amongst whom the proportion who say that same sex relations are always or mostly wrong outnumbers the proportion who feel they are rarely or not all wrong are those aged 65 and over. The views of this group, who will have come of age at a time when male homosexual activity was still illegal throughout the UK, are markedly different from those of the remainder of the population. Further analysis of the long-term trend in attitudes across Britain as a whole reveals that one of the reasons why attitudes have become more liberal is that each new generation of adults has adopted a more liberal stance than its predecessor, albeit each individual generation has become more liberal over time too (Park and Rhead, 2013). This suggests that, in the absence of some unforeseen event that has a similar impact to the outbreak of AIDS in the 1980s, attitudes towards same relations can expect to continue to become yet more liberal for the foreseeable future.

7. SSA has asked its respondents on three occasions whether they agree or disagree that ‘gay or lesbian couples should have the right to marry one another if they want to’ {5}. On the first occasion in 2002, 41% agreed and while 29% disagreed. Thereafter much as one would expect given the trend in attitudes towards same sex relations in general, support for the proposition increased such that by the most recent reading in 2010, as many as 61% agreed and only 19% disagreed (see also Ormston et al., 2011).

8. A similar pattern of response to SSA’s most recent reading was obtained in an Ipsos MORI poll that was conducted in Scotland in June 2012 and which asked a not dissimilarly worded item on behalf of the Equality Network. This found that 64% agreed that ‘same sex couples should have the right to get married’, while 26% disagreed.

9. Religious organisations have been prominent amongst those opposing the introduction of same sex marriage. And indeed as well as varying with age, attitudes towards same sex relationships also vary by adherence to a religion. Thus those who say they belong to a religion are less likely to agree that same sex couples should be able to marry than are those who do not {6}. Note though, that even amongst those who claim adherence to a religion, supporters of same sex marriage outnumber opponents.

10. Not everyone who claims adherence to a religion necessarily attends a religious service on a regular basis. A sharper picture of the relationship between religion and attitudes towards same sex marriage is obtained by looking at reported frequency of attendance at a religious service. Opponents of same sex marriage do outnumber supporters amongst those who say they attend a religious service at least once a fortnight (though it might also be felt that regular worshippers still appear quite divided on the issue). Conversely, amongst those who attend a religious service only occasionally or never at all, supporters outnumber opponents by ratios of the order of 3 or 4 to 1.

11. If we look at the change in attitudes towards same sex relationships over the long term using BSA data, we can see that the views of those who are regular worshippers now appear more isolated than they did thirty years ago. In 1983 clear majorities felt that same sex relations were always or mostly wrong irrespective of their frequency of attendance at a religious service. While a majority of those who are regular attenders (defined as attending a religious service at least once a fortnight) still adopt the same outlook, the same is no longer true of those who are occasional attenders or who do not attend a religious service at all. Thus whereas in 1983 there was just a 12 point difference between regular attenders and non-attenders in the proportion who felt that same sex relations are always or mostly wrong, now the equivalent gap is 38 points. Note, however, that even amongst those who are regular attenders attitudes are somewhat more liberal now than they were thirty years ago.

12. Just over one in eight people in Scotland now attend a religious service on a regular basis, down from the one in five who did so as recently as 1999. Nearly three-quarters of Scots now claim never to attend at all.
As a result, whereas once the level of religious observance was higher in Scotland than in England & Wales, this now no longer appears to be the case. (According to the 2012 BSA, 12% of people in England & Wales are regular attenders, while 71% are non-attenders.)

13. Answers to survey questions can often depend on how they are worded. It is thus inadvisable to rely on the evidence of a single question, however expertly it might be thought to have been crafted.
We might note in particular that the SSA question on same sex marriage does not explicitly distinguish between the possibility that legal recognition to same sex relationships should be available via a civil partnership and the proposal that it be available via a marriage, and that perhaps the picture might look a little different if this distinction were to be drawn to the attention of respondents.

14. This distinction was drawn explicitly to respondents’ attention in three polls conducted by Angus Reid across Britain as a whole. It invited respondents to choose between three options: Same sex couples should be allowed to legally marry, Same sex couples should be allowed to form civil partnerships, but not legally marry, and Same sex couples should not have any kind of legal recognition. Although on the three occasions on which this question was posed between January 2012 and January 2013, the proportion saying that same sex couples should be allowed to marry was the single most popular response, the proportion in favour was somewhat less than half. However, when on one of these surveys (conducted in January 2013) respondents were then also asked which option they would choose if the only options on offer were to allow same sex couples to legally marry or not, 52% said that they would support same sex marriage, while 38% said they would not. Thus it would appear that not all those for whom same sex marriage is not their first preference are necessarily strongly opposed to its introduction.

15. A yet rather different picture was obtained by an Ipsos-MORI poll of people that was conducted across the whole of Britain in December 2012 and which not only referred to the distinction between marriage and civil partnerships, but also between a civil and a religious marriage. Respondents were invited to choose between the following four options:
   A. Gay people should not be allowed to get married to each other and should not be allowed to form a civil partnership
   B. Gay people should not be allowed to get married but should be allowed to form a civil partnership
   C. Gay people should be allowed to get married to each other but religious organisations should not be required to provide wedding ceremonies to gay people
   D. Gay people should be allowed to get married to each other and religious organisations should be required to provide wedding ceremonies to gay people

As many as 45% supported option C while another 28% backed option B, thereby implying that as many as 73% backed same sex marriage. (17% backed option B and 7% option A). It may be that the lesson of this poll is that opposition to same sex marriage diminishes somewhat if it is clear to respondents that its introduction may not necessarily involve religious marriage.

16. Further readings taken by YouGov across Britain as a whole during the height of the debate at Westminster about the introduction of same sex marriage also found consistent evidence, similar to that obtained by Angus Reid, that when faced with the dichotomous choice of supporting or opposing independence, just over half support same sex marriage {11}. (The question was introduced as follows: Since 2005 same-sex couples have been able to enter into civil partnerships. While civil partnerships offer the same legal rights as marriage, same-sex couples are not able to marry. Would you support or oppose changing the law to allow same-sex couples to marry?) It might be noted too that it appears that the public debate that surrounded the introduction and passage of legislation by Westminster had no discernible impact on the balance of public opinion.
17. The potential impact of question wording on the pattern of responses obtained is also sharply illustrated by the responses to an item that was carried on behalf of the organisations, Coalition/Scotland for Marriage {12}. Respondents were asked whether they agreed or disagreed that, 'Marriage should continue to be a lifelong exclusive commitment between a man and a woman'. Just over half agreed with this proposition, both when it was asked both across Britain as a whole and in Scotland in particular. However, it may be the case that rather than taking the word ‘exclusive’ to imply that marriage could ‘only’ take place between a man and a woman, some respondents may have felt that it meant that marriage should be a monogamous relationship, and it is apparent from the most recent BSA survey that there is still widespread disapproval of sexual infidelity (Park and Rhead, 2013).

18. From the available evidence it would appear that following a dramatic change in attitudes towards same-sex relations during the course of the last 25 years, a change that has perhaps left some older people and those with strong religious convictions living in an unfamiliar world, that there is now probably a majority, albeit not necessarily an overwhelming one, in favour of same-sex marriage, at least when the proposal is posed as a dichotomous choice {13}.

Professor John Curtice
12 September 2013

References

Public Attitudes to Same Sex Marriage

John Curtice
Strathclyde University
A Cultural Revolution?

Source: British Social Attitudes
Much the Same Change in Scotland

Source: Scottish Social Attitudes
The Generation Gap

% not wrong - % wrong

Source: SSA 2010
Change Reflected in Attitudes towards ‘Gay Marriage’

Gay/lesbian couples should have right to marry

Source: SSA
An Issue of Religion?

Gay/Lesbian Couples Right to Marry

- No religion: 72% agree, 12% disagree
- Church of Scot: 50% agree, 25% disagree
- Other Prot: 43% agree, 33% disagree
- Catholic: 55% agree, 21% disagree

Source: SSA 2010
Only for those in the Pews?

Source: SSA 2010
Religious views now very distinctive (though not unchanged)

Attitude to same sex relations

Source: British Social Attitudes
Levels of Religious Attendance

Source: Scottish Social Attitudes
Depends on how you ask us? - 1

Source: Angus Reid (GB)
Readings During E&W Debate

Source: YouGov (GB)
Depends on how you ask us? - 2

Marriage should continue to be a lifelong exclusive commitment between a man and a woman

Source: ComRes/Coalition/Scotland for Marriage
Conclusion

• There has been a dramatic and quite recent change in attitudes towards same sex relationships
• That has left some sections of society behind
• And many religious organisations looking rather isolated
• Now a (not overwhelming?) majority for equal marriage – as a dichotomous choice – and some would still be content with just civil partnerships
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

We warmly welcome the Bill as we are strong supporters of both equality and religious freedom.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

We have been celebrating same sex partnerships in the context of our religious worship for many years and welcome the possibility that we shall be able to register and celebrate them as marriages, giving such couples complete equality with heterosexual couples.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

We are fully accepting of the right to equality of those communities which do not recognise their basis of belief to be religious.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

We seek a permissive law as we fully recognise that those who do not take our stance should not be put in a difficult position. The proposal that those wishing to take advantage of the right to conduct same sex marriages should opt into such an arrangement would seem to be the best option to ensure the rights of all.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

We hope couples will be offered this possibility.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

We see no clearcut distinction between sacred and secular.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

If other-sex or same-sex couples prefer civil partnership to marriage, we hope they will be allowed the freedom to have their partnerships registered as such.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

It is central to our views on religious freedom, as a people who in the past have been persecuted for our faith, that full protection is ensured for those who feel their religious or belief stances are threatened by the proposed legislation.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a faith/belief-based organisation

Phil Lucas
Quakers in Scotland
8 July 2013
Freedom of speech – Section 14 of the Bill, which is intended to provide reassurance regarding freedom of expression, is worthless. The Lord Advocate’s prosecutorial guidelines are also insufficient. Specific free speech safeguards should be included in public order legislation.

The Equality Act 2010 – Should be amended to specify that the protected characteristic of religion or belief includes the belief in marriage as presently defined.

Public Sector Equality Duty – The Scottish Government should pursue an amendment to the Equality Act 2010 making clear that compliance with the PSED requires ensuring that no-one should suffer any detriment as a result of holding or expressing the view that marriage is between a man and a woman. The PSED should not be used to deny religious organisations known to be opposed to same-sex marriage the ability to provide public contracts or to hire public buildings.

Public sector employment – Nobody working, or seeking a career, in the public sector in Scotland should have their equality and diversity credentials (and their suitability for employment) disputed merely because they hold to the existing view of marriage.

Protecting organisations and charities – There should be a principle of reasonable accommodation to ensure that organisations with traditional views on marriage can continue to operate in the public sphere. Charity law should be amended to specify that holding a belief in traditional marriage does not constitute a disbenefit for the purposes of the public benefit test.

Protecting chaplains – Chaplains operate in various spheres in the public sector and need protecting.

Protecting foster carers – The right of those who hold to the traditional definition of marriage to foster and adopt children must be upheld.

Protecting teachers, pupils and parents – Legislative changes and not simply provisions in guidance are necessary to safeguard the civil liberties of teachers, parents and pupils. Necessary steps include a reinforced right of withdrawal and a requirement to inform parents about relevant lesson content.

Protecting civil registrars – The Bill should protect civil registrars with a conscientious objection to officiating at same-sex marriages.

Protecting religious celebrants – There are many uncertainties surrounding the operation and stability of the proposed opt-in scheme.
1. Scotland for Marriage

Scotland for Marriage is a campaign to support marriage as the union of one man and one woman. Established in November 2011, our focus is on making the positive case for marriage based on its importance for society, and in particular its importance for children.

Though supported by partners such as CARE for Scotland, the Catholic Bishops’ Conference, The Christian Institute and Evangelical Alliance Scotland, our campaign is broad-based and is open to Scots of all faiths and none.

The Scotland for Marriage petition, which supports the retention of the present definition of marriage, recently passed 50,000 signatures and currently stands at 51,245.

We have a high level of grassroots support. Over the past year we have held over 80 public meetings for supporters the length and breadth of Scotland attended by almost 2,000 people. We are supported by a team of several hundred volunteers who have helped to deliver well over half a million pieces of literature door to door, and have collected in excess of 2,500 signatures for our petition at on-street campaign days.

2. The case for marriage

The current understanding of marriage as a lifelong, exclusive commitment between one man and one woman has served Scotland well for centuries.

While a variety of circumstances may prevent it, it is our sincere conviction that the ideal scenario for every child is that they be brought up by their own biological mother and father in a stable relationship. Marriage is therefore a key, foundational building block of any society, and we are genuinely concerned about the potentially far-reaching implications of tampering with it.

3. Equality

The main argument used by those in favour of redefining marriage is that it will provide equality (‘equal marriage’) for same-sex couples. However it is far from clear what additional legal benefits (if any) same-sex couples will enjoy to which they are not already entitled via civil partnerships. If there were any, civil partnership legislation could simply be amended to cater for that.

As noted above, marriage has always been understood as a unique relationship between a man and a woman. Scotland already recognises a variety of different relationships, so there is no credible equality argument for redefining marriage.

Furthermore, as discussed in more detail below, the disproportionate impact of the Bill in terms of potential infringements of civil liberties outweighs any benefits which might accrue to those who wish to see the law changed in the manner proposed.

4. Public support

We are genuinely concerned that the Scottish Government is intent on fundamentally altering the long-established definition of marriage without any obvious mandate. The SNP election manifesto promised to consult on same-sex marriage, which as a minimum implies that the views duly expressed by those responding would be taken into account.
The fact that around 77,000 people chose to respond to the consultation underscores the huge strength of feeling on this issue, and represents a far greater number of people than any opinion polls are able to. On the specific question of whether same-sex marriage should be allowed in Scotland, it is hugely significant that of the 62,057 responses from within Scotland, 64% (39,724) said that it should not.

As noted above, our own petition currently stands at 51,245 signatures and rising, which further demonstrates the huge number of Scots who fundamentally disagree with the Bill. The best test of public opinion on this issue would be to hold a referendum.

While it is clear that a significant majority of MSPs support the redefinition of marriage, it is hard to escape the conclusion that the level of support within the Scottish Parliament is wholly disproportionate to that exhibited among the population as a whole.

5. Free to disagree

At the very least, the high level of public concern about same-sex marriage should cause the Scottish Government and the Scottish Parliament to make absolutely certain that, should the law be changed, those who hold to the current definition of marriage will be fully protected. This goes way beyond the oft-cited issue of preventing churches or religious celebrants being required to marry same-sex couples.

It is essential that both the Scottish Government and the Equal Opportunities Committee fully appreciate the strength of deep, personal conviction with which a great many people hold to the view that marriage can only be between a man and a woman. This has nothing to do with bigotry or intolerance. On the contrary, belief in the current definition of marriage has been the mainstream, prevailing view in our society for centuries and is an integral tenet to the faith of many Christians, Muslims, Jews and others. It is surely the hallmark of any free, liberal and democratic society to show the utmost tolerance and respect for those whose views may differ from the state’s own position, and to celebrate that difference. We note that the Director of Stonewall Scotland, Colin Macfarlane, recently said in giving oral evidence to the Equal Opportunities Committee that not believing in same-sex marriage does not make an individual homophobic “in any way, shape or form”.

Sadly, Mr Macfarlane’s view is not shared by everyone in our society and a lack of respect for those who disagree with same-sex marriage has been much in evidence in Scotland of late. For example:

- Rev Brian Ross, a retired Church of Scotland minister and police chaplain in Strathclyde was removed from his chaplaincy role because he voiced support for traditional marriage on his own personal blog.

- Gordon Wilson, the former leader of the SNP, was voted off the board of Dundee Citizens Advice Bureau in October 2011 for publicly supporting traditional marriage.

---

1 The Scottish Government – Registration of Civil Partnerships Same Sex Marriage: Consultation Analysis (SGSR, 2012), page 85
• John Mason MSP was attacked from within his own party for lodging a parliamentary motion on same-sex marriage. SNP MEP Alyn Smith wrote in Scotland on Sunday that: “What is in the small, mean, angry heads of bigots is a matter for them.”

• Labour MSP Elaine Smith was vilified for expressing her opposition to same-sex marriage at a meeting in her constituency in June 2013, including being labelled “akin to a Ku Klux Klan member” and “no better than a racist.”

It is interesting that the description of a belief as being “worthy of respect in a democratic society” is a key test used by the European Court of Human Rights. While the Policy Memorandum states that “Many people and organisations hold the view that marriage can only ever be between a man and a woman. The Government has made clear its respect for this view”, we firmly believe that this statement should appear on the face of the Bill.

Should the redefinition of marriage be agreed by Parliament, it is vital that individuals and organisations who do not agree with the new definition be free to express that disagreement without fear of reprisal. We are very strongly of the view that the Bill, as introduced, fails to take account of this, and we would therefore urge the Equal Opportunities Committee to scrutinise the following areas in some detail.

(a) Freedom of speech

While Section 14 of the Bill is clearly intended to provide reassurance regarding freedom of expression, it falls well short of fulfilling the Scottish Government’s pledge that the “legislation will be accompanied by important protections for freedom of speech.” We believe it is particularly important that the relevant public order legislation be amended to specify that it is not wrong simply to criticise same-sex marriage.

The Bill fails to properly protect free speech in at least two respects. Firstly, Section 14 simply states that there is no effect on the exercise of existing rights, whether under the Convention or rule of law – something that must necessarily be true of any Scottish Parliament legislation with or without this section. Section 14 is therefore meaningless. Secondly, it simply refers to “nothing in this Part” affecting the exercise of free speech, i.e. the section only applies to the Bill itself. Yet the free speech issues do not necessarily arise with the Bill directly. The concerns relate to the impact of the redefinition of marriage on how existing public order law will be applied in practice. It must be recognised that in a completely new situation where marriage has been redefined, the effectiveness of existing rights could well be reduced. What is needed to protect free speech and reassure those with reservations in this area is clear protection within public order legislation itself, to reflect the fact that there are sharply differing views in society on what the definition of marriage should be.

Free speech clauses have very clear precedent, both at Westminster and Holyrood. The incitement to religious hatred offence created in 2006 by Westminster includes a robust free speech clause that was passed with SNP support. The Scottish Government included a free speech clause in Section 7 of the Offensive Behaviour at Football and

---

6 Policy Memorandum – Marriage & Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (Para. 97)
8 Section 29J of the Public Order Act 1986
Threatening Communications (Scotland) Act protecting religious debate in the light of the threatening communications offence. The Scottish Government took important steps to mitigate the dangers posed by its legislation. The same applies to the redefinition of marriage: in order to protect free speech and debate, free speech clauses should be included in public order legislation. We note that the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013 adds a specific subsection to the incitement to hatred on grounds of sexual orientation offence, making it clear that disagreeing with same-sex marriage does not breach that law.\(^9\)

The Lord Advocate’s new prosecutorial guidelines with regard to hate crimes are inadequate. Although expressing opposition to same-sex marriage would not be the sole grounds for prosecution, it may be a factor used to justify the prosecution of street preachers, football fans and, should an incitement to homophobic hatred offence be introduced at a later date, academics, ministers of religion or those in churches who record sermons for distribution via the internet or other means. As such, it represents a significant threat to freedom of speech and religious liberty. Moreover, to relegate a hugely important issue to guidance, when the proper way to deal with it is through free speech clauses in the law, is highly unsatisfactory. Specific amendments should be made to existing legislation, such as the Offensive Behaviour at Football and Threatening Communications (Scotland) Act 2012 and the ‘threatening or abusive behaviour’ offence under Section 38 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010.

\((b)\) The Equality Act 2010

Arguably the key piece of legislation in ensuring that the beliefs of those who hold to the current definition of marriage are protected is the Equality Act 2010. The Policy Memorandum confirms that the Scottish and UK Governments are in the process of preparing amendments to the Equality Act relating to celebrants, other persons involved in a marriage ceremony and persons controlling the use of premises.\(^10\) There is however scope for further alterations to the Equality Act on the basis that the Act generally, and the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) specifically, are at the root of many of the concerns with the Bill.

The Act is meant to protect against discrimination on the grounds of “religion or belief”. However it has not, so far, protected people with strong beliefs about marriage, such as Adrian Smith. Mr Smith, a housing manager in Manchester, was demoted and had his salary cut by 40% because of his views on marriage expressed on his Facebook page.\(^11\) His subsequent victory in the High Court came under contract law; the court had no power to reinstate him and could only award him £98 for lost earnings. He was advised by his lawyers that he would not succeed on a religion or belief discrimination claim.

We would therefore like to see the Equality Act amended to specify that the protected characteristic of religion or belief includes the belief in marriage as presently defined, thereby making clear that beliefs about marriage are covered by the religion or belief ground of discrimination law. It would not guarantee success in court, but would confirm that the belief is capable of being protected by the Equality Act.

\((c)\) Public Sector Equality Duty

---

\(^9\) See Schedule 7, para. 28 of the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013, amending Section 29JA of the Public Order Act 1986

\(^10\) Policy Memorandum - Marriage & Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (Para. 93)

\(^11\) Daily Mail, 24 October 2011
The Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) in Section 149 of the Equality Act 2010 puts public authorities under a duty to have regard to the need to “eliminate discrimination”, “advance equality of opportunity” and “foster good relations”, including the need to “tackle prejudice”.

Although on paper the Equality Act, including the PSED, protects religion or belief just as much as sexual orientation, the protected characteristic of belief has consistently been trumped by that of sexual orientation, both in the courts and the actions of public authorities. Under the PSED, the local authority effectively chooses which rights will prevail in any clash. We therefore believe that the Scottish Government should pursue a further amendment to the Equality Act making clear that compliance with the PSED requires ensuring that no-one should suffer any detriment as a result of holding or expressing the view that marriage is between a man and a woman. The European Court of Human Rights case law demonstrates that religion or belief is a category in which weighty reasons are required to justify any difference of treatment.12

Ultimately, nobody working, or seeking a career, in the public sector in Scotland should have their equality and diversity credentials (and their suitability for employment) disputed merely because they hold to the existing view of marriage – whether expressed or not.

(d) Protecting organisations and charities

An important principle which should be prioritised in assessing how to fulfil the PSED is that of reasonable accommodation. Many organisations, such as churches and religious charities, are at the forefront of tackling social problems in their area, such as work with the homeless or food-banks. It must therefore be made clear that the PSED should not be used to deny religious organisations known to be opposed to same-sex marriage the ability to provide public contracts or indeed to hire public buildings (as many churches do). Public bodies should therefore seek to make reasonable accommodation for religious groups in order to facilitate those organisations maintaining their ethos.

This principle has not been implemented to date, as exemplified by the case of the Catholic adoption agencies. Scotland for Marriage is concerned that churches which do not ‘marry’ same-sex couples may be targeted by over-zealous officials in public bodies. For example, a local authority may claim that it would be in breach of the PSED if it were to give a grant towards the cost of a community project to, or to enter into a contractual relationship with, a local church if the church concerned is unwilling to marry same-sex couples.

We are also concerned that the Office of the Scottish Charity Regulator (OSCR) may seek to remove charitable status from churches and other faith groups which are unwilling to marry same-sex couples. Despite previous ministerial assurances regarding the future of the Catholic adoption agencies, OSCR is in the process of removing charitable status from St Margaret’s Children and Family Care Society because St Margaret’s gives preference to married couples. That which politicians currently say will not happen, may very quickly become normal practice if there are no robust legal protections in place. We therefore strongly urge an amendment to existing charity law to specify that holding a belief in traditional marriage cannot be treated as a disbenefit for the purposes of the public benefit test.

---

12 Carson, R (on the application of) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2005] UKHL 37, para. 58
Many of these concerns were tackled in the Westminster legislation in Section 2. That section states that no person may be “compelled by any means (including by the enforcement of a contract or a statutory or other legal requirement)” to be involved in a same-sex marriage. This will prevent a tit-for-tat scenario occurring, for example a religious organisation being refused hire of public buildings because it has not registered for same-sex marriages. The Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill should include a similar safeguard.

(e) Protecting chaplains

Chaplains operate in various spheres in the public sector – schools, NHS, police – sometimes on a voluntary basis. Volunteers would have no statutory employment rights, therefore adequate protection for them is doubly important.

Cause for concern in this area was highlighted recently in the Scottish Borders, where the Deputy Leader of Scottish Borders Council, Catriona Bhatia, implied that school chaplains who disagree with same-sex marriage should not be allowed to say so in schools. Councillor Bhatia said: “Some chaplains will stay away from issues such as [gay marriage], but others may sway into it. Some religions have different rules and they are entitled to that, but they should not be introduced in our schools.”

(f) Protecting foster carers

The Scottish Government’s willingness to consider amending existing fostering guidance “to make it clear that a would-be fosterer should not be rejected just because of his or her views on same sex marriage” is welcome and necessary.

A case in Derby saw a Christian couple turned down as foster carers apparently on the basis of their religious views on homosexuality. Lord Justice Munby and Mr Justice Beatson said that placing children with foster carers who objected to homosexuality and same-sex relationships “may well be a conflict with the local authority’s duty to ‘safeguard and promote the welfare’ of looked-after children”. Aidan O’Neill QC has affirmed that there “is no doubt that similar considerations would apply in Scotland” and is of the view that it would be lawful for a local authority to refuse a couple’s application to be foster carers on this basis.

Whether or not a local authority would similarly object based on a couple’s view of same-sex marriage is as yet untested, however it would be a terrible injustice for everyone concerned if otherwise suitable foster carers were turned down because of their views on marriage. The legislation should therefore include a clause stating that views on the nature of marriage cannot be taken into consideration during the process of approving prospective foster or adoptive parents and upholding the right of those who hold to the traditional definition of marriage to foster and adopt children. A statutory safeguard should also be introduced into the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill to ensure that the views of potential adopters on same-sex marriage do not influence decisions on their applications.

---

14 Policy Memorandum - Marriage & Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill (Para. 126)
16 The Implications for Freedom of Conscience and Religious Liberty Arising from Redefining Marriage in Scotland Advice – Aidan O’Neill QC, June 2012 (Para. 11)
(g) Protecting teachers, pupils & parents

One of our key areas of concern is education. With same-sex marriage being an undeniably controversial issue, it is paramount that the rights of parents as to what their children are taught, and the rights of teachers as to what they are obliged to endorse, are fully protected. It is of course correct that children be taught the law of the land, regardless of whether they, their parents or their teachers agree with it. This is not in dispute. However this is very different from lessons which essentially endorse or promote a particular lifestyle to which many parents, teachers and children may have a sincere moral objection – such as same-sex marriage.

The Scottish Government appeared to concede the need for safeguards in this area in July 2012 when it promised that the consultation would “consider any additional measures that may be required to guarantee freedom of speech and religion in specific circumstances, including education”.\(^{17}\) It is therefore unfortunate that this area has seemingly been neglected in the Bill itself.

The Scottish Government’s approach appears to be to simply rely on guidance, and the consultation ruled out strengthening the parental right of withdrawal. This is unacceptable. Guidance does not carry sufficient weight, and the current right of withdrawal is limited to religious and sex education. The issue of same-sex marriage will inevitably be dealt with more broadly across the curriculum. There must be mechanisms in place for parents to be made aware of lessons that are going to be focused on this issue, with a corresponding right of withdrawal from such lessons. It must be guaranteed that neither parents nor pupils will suffer any detriment at the hands of schools as a result of their traditional views on marriage. When schools teach about same-sex marriage it must be done sensitively and with awareness that there is no consensus on the issue in society.

For pupils, it is crucial that those who believe in traditional marriage or have parents holding those beliefs are not victimised at school. Bullying is a blight on the lives of many young people. In recent years there has been an emphasis on the need to eradicate bullying based on sexual orientation. Emphasis must also be given to preventing those who believe in the traditional definition of marriage being bullied.

For teachers, we believe that a conscience clause should be inserted into the Education (Scotland) Act 1980, under which teachers with a conscientious objection to same-sex marriage would be protected from being forced to actively endorse it. While in Scotland there is no statutory duty equivalent to that in England and Wales to teach about the importance of marriage in sex education, there is guidance which mentions both marriage and stable relationships. (The Scottish Government specifically recommends that schools teach children about the value of marriage as part of sex education.\(^{18}\)) Clearly teachers with a conscientious objection to same-sex marriage would be in a difficult position in attempting to adhere to the guidance and the ‘new’ meaning of marriage. We are already aware of a teacher at a Scottish secondary school who was told that he would have to teach a relationships course promoting same-sex marriage “without exemptions or safeguards”, despite it contradicting his beliefs.

For parents, we would support a further amendment to the Education (Scotland) Act allowing parents to withdraw their children from lessons on marriage. Many parents, because of their religious or other convictions, will not want their children to learn about

---

\(^{17}\) Scottish Government Press Release 25 July 2012

\(^{18}\) Scottish Executive Education Department, Circular 2/2001 (Para. 7)
same-sex marriage before a certain age, fearing they will find it confusing. Others may be concerned that teaching on the subject will not be balanced, or will not respect their own convictions on the matter.

According to official guidance parents have the right to withdraw their children from sex education, but same-sex marriage could be included in a range of other subjects across the curriculum to which the right of withdrawal does not apply. There is a danger that without an extension of the right of withdrawal the deeply-held beliefs of parents will be undermined and their ability to have their children educated in accordance with their own convictions (Article 2 of the First Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights) will be infringed. We note that the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child also points to the central role of parents in the raising of children and the duty of State Parties to respect the rights of, and support, parents in this role (see e.g. Articles 3.2, 5 and 29).

It is important that the Committee and the Government take note of what has already happened elsewhere:

- In 2009, Muslim and Christian parents in Waltham Forest, East London, were threatened with prosecution for withdrawing their children from primary school lessons that used the gay marriage story book, ‘King & King’. The council said the withdrawals were “unauthorised” absences and that action would be taken against the parents. 20

- International experience also illustrates the likely dangers. Gay marriage was legalised in the US state of Massachusetts in 2004 following a state court ruling. In 2006 two sets of parents took legal action against the school district of their children’s elementary school. A teacher in a second-grade class (children aged 7 to 8) had used the ‘King & King’ storybook, in which a prince marries another prince in a gay wedding. The parents said the book’s themes were not appropriate for their children’s age, and that using the book without their consent was a violation of their civil rights. 21 But judges in a federal appeal court ruled against the parents and sided with the school. 22 Stonewall recommends King & King for use in Scottish primary schools.

It should be made a part of Education Scotland’s inspections to ensure the system of withdrawal is operating properly and that parents, pupils and teachers suffer no detriment as a result of their views on marriage.

(h) Protecting civil registrars

The Bill does not protect civil registrars who do not wish to officiate at same-sex marriages. The Scottish Government claims that as registrars conduct a civil function it is not appropriate to allow them an opt-out on conscience grounds. A longstanding member of staff being required to do something, against their conscience and which has never previously been part of their job, is surely a scenario that employees should be protected from. Registrars face having their job transformed around them, and since the Scottish Government is responsible for this transformation it is incumbent upon the Scottish Government to provide protection for those who are disproportionately affected. The

19 Scottish Executive Education Department, Circular 2/2001 (Para. 13)
21 The Boston Globe, 27 April 2006
Scottish Government’s approach to the issue of civil registrars is fundamentally illiberal. There are other areas where – in a free society - conscientious objections are respected. The right of doctors to refuse to participate in an abortion is an example, as is the right of conscience not to fight in time of war, or the right of atheists not to participate in religious observance in schools.

Public bodies are able to fulfil their duties whilst respecting the consciences of their employees. If there is no disruption to the carrying out of the civil function, why should there not be scope for conscientious objections to be respected? It seems perfectly clear that reasonable accommodation could be made, to the effect that a registrar would be able to opt-out of solemnising same-sex marriages as long as the service provision was not unduly disrupted. The Bill should therefore contain a specific conscience clause requiring local authorities to allow civil registrars to opt-out of performing same-sex marriages.

Additionally, the Bill should include a clause which requires individual civil registrars to opt-in along the lines of that proposed for religion and belief celebrants. Moreover, the Scottish Parliament’s Equal Opportunities Committee should ask the Westminster Government to amend the Equality Act 2010 in order to incorporate the principle that an employer must make reasonable accommodation of the manifestation of religious belief by employees. It is essential that this protection is provided. Until a commitment is obtained from the UK Government, the Scottish Parliament should refrain from pursuing the introduction of same-sex marriage.

(i) Protecting religious celebrants

Even if the proposed amendment to the Equality Act does provide the necessary legal protection, many questions remain about how the proposed opt-in system will operate. Under the proposed scheme, both the religious body and the individual celebrants will have to be authorised. There will be different ways of doing this, including in some cases all the celebrants belonging to a particular body being authorised if the religious body is ‘prescribed’. To be prescribed, the religious body must assure the Registrar General in writing that all their celebrants are content to carry out the ceremonies. There are many questions about how this will work in practice. There is a heavy reliance on the religious body in question. In a large body, is it realistic for the hierarchy to be certain how all their celebrants feel? How can the Government be sure that the written assurance provided by the body is comprehensive?

From the consultation document, it seems as though the religious body is also responsible for informing the Government of any dissenting celebrants as and when they arise. There must be a mechanism for the individual celebrants themselves to inform the Government that they do not wish to be able to marry same-sex couples. If the religious body is not prescribed, they will be able to send to the Registrar General a list of celebrants to be authorised. Will this list have some kind of evidence that each celebrant on the list has agreed? Otherwise, how can the Registrar General be sure of the reliability of the list? Would there be a mechanism for individual celebrants being informed that they had been listed, giving an opportunity to decline? Would individual celebrants be able to contact the Registrar General directly to ask to be removed from the list, or would it have to be through the religious body? There are too many unanswered questions about the proposed opt-in scheme.

In addition, there is doubt over whether such a scheme would survive a challenge at the European Court of Human Rights. Currently the Court has said it will leave whether or not member states provide same-sex marriage to the member states, as there is no consensus on the issue across Europe. Clearly, such a consensus may emerge and the Court, in line with its treatment of the Convention as a ‘living instrument’, may find there is a right to same-sex marriage. The Scottish Government needs to be sure that its arrangements are future-proofed. More importantly in the short term, the Court insists that where same-sex marriage is allowed, it is allowed on the same basis as opposite-sex marriage.$^{23}$ It is this requirement of like-for-like treatment that could leave the proposed opt-in scheme open to challenge.

Scotland for Marriage
6 September 2013

---

$^{23}$ Sexual orientation discrimination has been identified by the Court as being deserving of particular attention, and particularly weighty reasons are required to justify difference of treatment.
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
SUBMISSION FROM SCOTTISH CATHOLIC EDUCATION SERVICE

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

In line with our previous submissions, and in full agreement with the submissions made on behalf of the Bishops Conference of Scotland, we are opposed to this Bill in principle. Once again we express our disappointment that the Scottish Government is proceeding with legislation to which there was overwhelming opposition in the largest ever response to a public consultation in Scotland. We repeat our commitment to recognising the worth of every human being and to respecting the dignity of all people on an equitable basis. We urge politicians to accept that equality is not synonymous with uniformity and to respect the diverse characteristics and the complementary natures of male and female in human life.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

We believe that this legislation is unnecessary, as current arrangements for civil partnerships bestow the same legal rights as Marriage. It is regrettable that State authorities are attempting to impose a re-definition of Marriage which has always been understood as having both a unitive and a procreative function, which are not present within a same sex relationship. We fear that such a significant change may have profound consequences for society, in particular for the nurturing of children by mothers and fathers and for how society views the complementary nature of the sexes. The apparent equality which is being sought by some may lead to greater inequalities in society, particularly for children.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition
How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

We are not assuaged by the rhetoric of the Scottish Government, claiming that the faith curriculum of Catholic schools will not be changed by this legislation. Such claims offer no legal protection to teachers and parents who are charged with the responsibility of educating children within a tradition of Christian moral and ethical teaching. Recent history demonstrates that political assurances are worthless when Equality legislation is exploited to champion the rights of individuals over the beliefs, traditions and practices of faith communities. Catholic schools are regularly being challenged to justify their teaching, their practices and their very existence by individuals and groups which appear determined to remove the rights of parents to choose faith-based education for their children. This Bill will provide encouragement to such challenges. Parents who sincerely believe that an authentic state of Marriage can only be realised in the union of a man and a woman may be prevented from educating their children in that belief, if schools are obliged to promulgate a revised definition of what it means to be married. This may lead to many parents seeking to withdraw their children from lessons where this new orthodoxy is being advanced. This will have a significant impact on children and on schools. Ultimately it will be children who will suffer by being confused over the new meaning of words such as wife, husband, mother, father.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

We are fearful that teachers in all schools may be compelled by their employers responsibilities, under public sector equality duty legislation, to conform to a new orthodoxy when teaching about Marriage. We are certain that this will lead to teachers being pressurised to follow their employers instructions, despite their own sincere conscientious objections. We urge the Scottish Government to offer greater protection to teachers than their current exhortations to Councils to follow good employment practice.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?
The concerns we are expressing are not narrow in their scope and they do not merely represent our particular denominational interests. This issue has huge implications for the common good of society as a whole and we fear that its ramifications are not being fully anticipated. This legislation is another measure which will damage the role of the family within society.

Are you responding as...

a faith/belief-based organisation

Michael McGrath
Scottish Catholic Education Service
23 August 2013
Overview

In submitting evidence on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill, the Bishops’ Conference of Scotland takes this opportunity to repeat its conviction that marriage should not be re-defined.

The wisdom of the ages, the light of human reason and the teaching of Christian faith concur that marriage is a conjugal union of a man and a woman designed so that the children who may be born of that union will have a father and a mother.

The institution of marriage pre-exists and pre-dates the State. This means that marriage can only be contracted by a man and a woman, and the State has no authority to redefine marriage. Crucially, children have a right to the complementarity of a father and a mother, and not just to “parents”.

We note a lack of adequate protection for civil liberties for the substantial number of citizens who will have a conscientious objection to endorsing a revised understanding of marriage.

Rights and Right

In recent public discourse there has been a tendency to view social issues in terms of personal rights. The Church has identified repeatedly the importance of recognising the inherent rights of everyone to ensure the protection of the dignity of the person. However, prioritising personal rights can lead to demands for radical personal autonomy which conflict with rational choices for society. The full context for considering society’s understanding of marriage is that in which the consequences for society are objectively assessed. The wellbeing of children and the promotion of family life are irrevocably linked to the present and future wellbeing of society. "The future of humanity passes by way of the family.”

Unrestrained demands for personal rights can turn from freedoms into a form of self-destruction. This is why the state limits certain behaviours, known to be harmful and outlaws others altogether. Eroding a foundation may not immediately damage an edifice but can hasten its long term destruction. Re-engineering the understanding of marriage, and thereby the family, is such a change. As marriage is marginalised children are increasingly vulnerable to the ill effects associated with family fragmentation.

The Equality of All Persons and Unjust Discrimination

---

1 For example Pacem in Terris details a range of rights see paragraphs 11 - 27: “Man has the right to live. He has the right to bodily integrity and to the means necessary for the proper development of life, particularly food, clothing, shelter, medical care, rest, and, finally, the necessary social services. In consequence, he has the right to be looked after in the event of ill health; disability stemming from his work; widowhood; old age; enforced unemployment; or whenever through no fault of his own he is deprived of the means of livelihood.”(para 11)

2 Familiaris Consortio, Pope John Paul II, Paragraph 86
The Church believes that all persons are equal in dignity. It is necessary to embrace all people in society and to provide the environment for the flourishing of all persons. The recognition of the equal dignity of each person however does not support the notion that men and women are identical in nature and interchangeable in their family roles. Such a vision of ‘sameness’ in fact diminishes the respect for the inherent dignity of male and female.

"Since something of the glory of God shines on the face of every person, the dignity of every person before God is the basis of the dignity of man before other men (Gaudium et Spes, 29). Moreover, this is the ultimate foundation of the radical equality and brotherhood among all people, regardless of their race, nation, sex, origin, culture, or class."3

At times society has been insensitive to injustices arising in relations to people in same sex relationships. There are those who have suffered because of their sexual attraction to those of the same sex. Regrettably the unfortunate experiences of some people have created feelings that identify the traditional structures of family life as sources of intolerance. Though sincerely held, these feelings are misplaced. The failings of individuals and groups to understand and react compassionately to the needs of persons with same-sex attraction are greatly regrettable. The human dignity of every person should be recognised at all times. Christians too have suffered denigration and injustice because of their beliefs on marriage and human sexuality. This has contributed to making the issue of same-sex marriage difficult to consider objectively in the public forum. We restate our commitment to a healthy democracy based on respect and freedom directed for the common good in which reasoned argument must be protected.

Nature of Marriage and the Family

The complementarity of male and female, and their unique role in the transmission of life, underscores the reality of marriage as a natural social environment for the birth and growth of every person.

"The family has central importance in reference to the person. It is in this cradle of life and love that people are born and grow; when a child is conceived, society receives the gift of a new person who is called from the innermost depths of self to communion with others and to the giving of self to others. It is in the family, therefore, that the mutual giving of self on the part of man and woman united in marriage creates an environment of life in which children develop their potentialities, become aware of their dignity and prepare to face their unique and individual destiny".4

"The first and fundamental structure for ‘human ecology’ is the family, in which man receives his first formative ideas about truth and goodness, and learns what it means to love and to be loved, and thus what it actually means to be a person. The obligations of its members, in fact, are not limited by the terms of a contract but derive from the very essence of the family, founded on the irrevocable marriage covenant and given structure in the relationships that arise within it following the generation or adoption of children."
The State does not have the authority to redefine the family.

Given the precedence of the family as the first society in which the human person is formed, its nature and function are not a creation of the state or of civil society, therefore it follows that the State does not have the authority to redefine the family.

“The priority of the family over society and over the State must be affirmed. The family, then, does not exist for society or the State, but society and the State exist for the family”.

Given this precedence of the family built on marriage as a natural good, ordered for the growth and flourishing of society, it is not in the gift of political or legal authorities to redefine its very nature.

This understanding of marriage and the family arises from human reason and is not a religious imposition. The European Convention of Human Rights, for example, recognises the nature of marriage built on the complementarity of male and female. The right to marry, Article 12, begins with the formulation “Men and women have the right...” rather than using the form “Everyone has the right...” which is used to assert other articles in the convention. This has been recognised as significant by the European Court of Human Rights and there is no right for same-sex marriage. “The choice of wording in Article 12 must thus be regarded as deliberate. Moreover, regard must be had to the historical context in which the Convention was adopted. In the 1950s marriage was clearly understood in the traditional sense of being a union between partners of different sex.”

Parental Bonds and Children’s Welfare

The wellbeing of children is closely linked to the family unit. It is self-evident that children have a male and female parent and that this unit is the foundational structure of social life.

Claims that “LGBT people are the only group who are banned from marrying” are unreasonable and untrue. Brothers and sisters and not discriminated against because they cannot marry each other. The law rightly restricts marriage, for example, on the basis of degrees of relationship and age. Children as a group are not allowed to marry. Those who call for same-sex marriage are not excluded from marriage; rather they wish the state to ratify and affirm a relationship which is not marriage.

The Scottish Parliament needs to ensure that it pursues an intellectually robust assessment of the provisions rather than provide an emotional response to this issue. This requires some level of objective analysis of the claims made supporting redefinition of marriage. A redefinition of marriage in law will inevitably obscure the notion of marriage’s link to parenthood in the eyes of citizens.

---

5 Compendium of Catholic Social Doctrine, paragraph 214
6 Case of Schalk and Kopf v. Austria(Application no. 30141/04), European Court of Human Rights Judgement, 24 June 2010, paragraph 55
In the pursuit of an abstract theory of equality which promotes ‘sameness’ the proposal is now made that male and female are interchangeable, denying the inherent dignity of the human person in their complementary natures of male and female. This ideological proposal creates a form of intolerance which can be fundamentalist in its denial to others of the right to proclaim what they believe to be true.

We urge those involved in the political process to be objective in their analysis of the reality of marriage and family life, rather than be guided by appeals to emotion. The consequences of this Bill will be far-reaching and will impact most profoundly on children. The loss of a sense of marriage paves the way for family instability as marriage is de-institutionalised and replaced by less stable and often chaotic serial relationships which often weaken or sever the relationships children have with their parents.

Civic Freedoms

Equality laws are so structured that they will pose a threat to basic civil freedoms if marriage is redefined. Warnings about the dangers of previous legal changes were not accepted yet have been shown to be real. Redefining marriage will lead to threats against freedom of expression, belief and association.

Following the passage of Same-sex Marriage Act there already are threats to challenge Churches in England and Wales which will not perform same-sex marriage ceremonies.\(^8\) School teachers are already vulnerable to coercion to contravene their conscience by promoting alternatives to marriage as equally valid.\(^9\)

We can learn from other jurisdictions where there are calls for people to be dismissed from employment if they don’t support same sex marriage.\(^10\) We foresee that the Equality Act 2010 provisions in conjunction with redefined marriage will lead to similar calls in Scotland, should this bill be passed.

The Equality Act 2010 has provisions which combine with other pieces of legislation to give unexpected outcomes. Catholic adoption agencies were repeatedly assured that they had nothing to fear from changes in law which permitted same-sex couples to adopt. It was stated that the “committee considered carefully the issues that relate to adoption agencies that are attached to a faith. We are sure that nothing in the bill will require such agencies to provide adoption services to people whom they feel are inappropriate. However, the committee felt that those agencies should be required to refer such people to an appropriate agency. I do not think that an ECHR issue will arise, provided that the people concerned are referred appropriately.”\(^11\) These reassuring words were quickly shown to be wholly inaccurate. We are left with no easy remedy for the apparently unintended consequences that have arisen. We are following a parallel path in changing marriage and there will be parallel consequences for those who will not wish to condone the new version of marriage.

---

\(^9\) C.f. Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill, Memorandum submitted by Samuel Webster (MB 97), URL: http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201213/cmpublic/marriage/memo/m97.htm

The Public Sector Equality Duty of the Equality Act 2010 threatens to become an instrument where controversial views are imposed rather than permitted. The Equality and Human Rights Commission has already suggested that schools could comply with the public sector equality duty by teaching Lesbian Gay Bisexual and Transsexual History Month.\(^\text{12}\)

There is a right not to be compelled to assert falsehood as truth. However, due to the structuring of the current framework of equality laws there will be an impact on civic bodies which will promote and enforce views on marriage which are contrary to the truth of human identity and the nature of sexual unions.

In consequence, freedom of expression will be undermined and the career prospects of those asked to cooperate in this work will be jeopardised.

Safeguards protecting essential democratic freedoms are lacking. The protections provided in the Bill are modest and neglect the wide implications for civil liberties for those who would wish to uphold authentic marriage.

Conclusion

We conclude our response by once again repeating that legislation for same sex marriage is wrong. It will diminish rather than strengthen marriage and it will disadvantage children. It will divide society for the sake of a totem of ‘equality’ which has arisen amongst some campaigners despite the tiny percentage of same-sex couples who avail themselves of marriage in jurisdictions where it is available to them\(^\text{13}\). Parliament should not proceed to make such changes against so many strong recommendations to the contrary and an overwhelming public rejection of the proposals in unprecedented numbers during the consultation period. For the sake of the common good, we appeal to parliamentarians not to proceed with this legislation.

John Deighan
Parliamentary Officer
Catholic Parliamentary Office on behalf of the Bishops’ Conference of Scotland
23 August 2013

\(^\text{13}\) C.f. ‘Demand For Same-Sex Marriage: Evidence From The United States, Canada, And Europe’, Maggie Gallagher & Joshua K. Baker, Institute for Marriage and Public Policy, Vol. 3, Issue 1, April 2006; see also Baroness Scotland, House of Lords Debate, 22 April 2004, Hansard Volume 660 Column 392
Please note that this response has been prepared in consultation with all branches of Judaism represented in Scotland, and reflects all of their differing views. The majority of the Jewish community in Scotland is affiliated to Orthodox Judaism, which has four synagogues in Glasgow, and one in each of Edinburgh, Dundee, and Aberdeen. In addition there is a Liberal Jewish community in Edinburgh, and a Reform synagogue in Glasgow.

4. How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In view of the widely differing opinions in the Jewish community, we welcome the fact that, if passed, the Bill will enable those faith communities that wish to solemnise same sex marriage and register civil partnerships to do so, while imposing no obligations on those faith communities that do not so wish.

5. How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

There is a wide range of opinion among individual Jewish people about same sex marriage and the registration of civil partnerships through a religious ceremony. In preparing this response we have consulted widely among organisations and individuals in the Scottish Jewish community, including the Orthodox, Liberal, and Reform congregations, and Scottish Rainbow Community, a small group of LGBT Jews in Scotland. The views expressed in this response represent the official position of the various branches of the Jewish community in Scotland.

The Orthodox Jewish view is very much opposed to same sex relationships, which it regards as forbidden according to their understanding of the Torah, Jewish Law. However, whilst it disapproves of such relationships, and particularly of the formal recognition of such relationships, the Orthodox community respects and welcomes everyone, whatever their sexual orientation, and, while it would not, under any circumstances, carry out same sex marriages or religious civil partnership registrations, it does not wish to impose its views on others.

The Liberal Jewish community strongly supports the introduction of same sex marriage, and religious civil partnership ceremonies. However, while it would hope to register to solemnise these once the proposed legislation is enacted, it does not wish to impose its views on others.

The Assembly of Reform Rabbis, a UK-level body, has stated, in relation to same sex commitment ceremonies, that “homosexual couples should have [an] opportunity for a religious ceremony within the sanctity of Jewish community, tradition, and practice” but does not suggest that this is to be a ceremony with legal force, and does not mention religious civil partnership registration or same sex marriage. The Reform community in Scotland is currently debating this statement but has not yet reached a conclusion.
6. How would you characterise your view on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

We are content for appropriate belief communities to be able to nominate celebrants to officiate at marriage ceremonies, and register civil partnerships.

However, our preference is for the proposals set out in the draft Bill included in the previous consultation\(^1\), namely the introduction of a third category of belief celebrants alongside religious and civil celebrants, rather than amalgamating religion and belief into a single category as in the Bill that has been introduced in the Parliament.

It is evident from the consultation paper on the draft Bill that the Scottish Government recognises that Humanist beliefs are not religious, and that it is, therefore, inappropriate to require Humanist celebrants to be registered under that head, as they are at present. This recognition was explicitly welcomed by the Humanist Society in their response\(^2\) to the consultation. We believe that the converse is also true, and indeed that the term “religious or belief” does not adequately recognise the Humanist objection as it is likely to be abbreviated to “religious” in practice. We therefore urge that the difference between religious and belief communities should continue to be respected, and that the words “religious or belief body” should be replaced with “religious body or belief body”, “religious or belief marriage” should be replaced with “religious marriage or belief marriage”, and “religious or belief civil partnership” should be replaced with “religious civil partnership or belief civil partnership”.

7. How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

1) We strongly agree with the proposal set out in the Bill for a dual opt-in system, in which religious and belief bodies have first to register to solemnise same sex marriages, and then nominate celebrants to officiate at such ceremonies as this will respect the views of those religious or belief bodies that do not wish to carry out same sex marriages or register civil partnerships. We also strongly support the proposed amendment to the Equality Act 2010 to protect those communities and ministers or celebrants who do not wish to solemnise same sex marriages.

We are, however, concerned that these arrangements should be robust enough to be effective against any possible challenge in the courts. In this respect, we are concerned to read reports that, because of concerns about the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013, “Sikh temples [in England and Wales] have been advised to halt all civil marriage ceremonies on their premises to protect them from possible legal challenges for refusing to conduct same-sex weddings.”\(^3\)

2) We have some concerns about the proposed procedure for prescribed organisations to nominate celebrants who are not “a minister, clergyman, pastor, priest, or other celebrant” of that organisation, but who are “recognised by a religious or belief body so prescribed as entitled to solemnise marriage between persons of the same sex on its behalf.” (section 10(2)(1B)(a)(i)), (our emphasis). This removes protection from those religious bodies that do not wish to carry out same sex marriages, since it would permit their clergy to be nominated by a different branch of the same religion. (It is, for example, conceivable that a Liberal Jewish community might “recognise” an Orthodox Rabbi as entitled to solemnise same sex marriages on their behalf, even though the Orthodox Jewish community by which the Rabbi was employed, was firmly opposed to the celebration of same sex marriage.

To resolve this concern, we suggest amending section 10(2)(1B)(a) to state:

“(1B) Subject to section 23A, a marriage between persons of the same sex may be solemnised by and only by–

(a) a person who is–

(i) a minister, clergyman, pastor, priest, or other celebrant of a religious or belief body prescribed by regulations made by the Scottish Ministers; or

(ii) not being one of the foregoing, is recognised by a religious or belief body so prescribed as entitled to solemnise marriage between persons of the same sex on its behalf, and is not a celebrant of a religious or belief body that has indicated that it is opposed to solemnising marriages between persons of the same sex; or

(iii) is registered under section 9 to solemnise marriage between persons of the same sex; or

(iv) temporarily authorised under section 12 to solemnise marriage between persons of the same sex;”

3) We also have some concerns about the proposed procedure for temporary authorisation of celebrants (section 12).

i) Our experience in relation to opposite sex marriage is that in many cases when a couple request to be married by someone other than the Rabbi of the local synagogue, it is because one partner comes from outwith Scotland and they wish to be married by their own Rabbi. In such cases, National Records of Scotland (NRS) make enquiries, through the Scottish Council of Jewish Communities, as to whether the person concerned is “recognised by 4 the Jewish community (“Hebrew Congregation” in the words of the 1977 Regulations 5) as a Rabbi authorised to officiate at Jewish weddings” The Rabbi need not necessarily be from Scotland, or even be a member of a branch of Judaism with a presence in Scotland or even in the UK, provided that his or her qualifications and bona fides are recognised by a branch of Judaism that is established the UK. Once the Rabbi’s bona fides have been confirmed, the wedding at which he or she officiates will be recognised by the relevant authorities as bringing about both a religious and a civil marriage.

376

5 The Marriage (Prescription of Religious Bodies)(Scotland) Regulations 1977 No.1670 (S.121) not available online
We anticipate that NRS will follow much the same procedure to check the bona fides of celebrants before granting temporary authorisations to officiate at same sex marriages. However, whilst a Rabbi from outwith Scotland may well be recognised by a branch of Judaism in Scotland as authorised to officiate at same sex marriages, he or she may well not be “a member” of the relevant branch. We presume this terminology (section 12(2)(b)(1C)) is to protect those religious bodies that do not wish to carry out same sex marriages, so that their clergy may not be nominated by a different branch of the same religion (for example, to prevent an Orthodox Rabbi from being nominated by a Liberal Jewish community to officiate at a same sex marriage, even if he personally were willing to be so nominated). We welcome this protection (which, as we have already pointed out, is lacking in section 10(2)(1B)(a)(i)), but are concerned that same sex couples who may wish to be married by a Rabbi from a branch of Judaism that does carry out same sex marriages but does not have a presence in Scotland, will be prevented from having the celebrant of their choice. This is inequitable, since, as we have already explained, an opposite sex couple are able to choose a celebrant from outwith the UK.

To resolve this issue, enabling same sex couples to enjoy the wider choice of celebrants which is available to opposite sex couples, whilst maintaining full protection for those faith communities that oppose same sex marriage, and also the issue raised in ii) below, we have suggested a possible amendment to the Bill in iii) below.

ii) We are concerned that section 12(2)(b)(1C)(b) may inadvertently exclude small faith communities that would wish to celebrate same sex marriages, since it requires that the relevant religious or belief body “has nominated members … to solemnise marriages between persons of the same sex.” (our emphasis). As we have already stated, the Reform Jewish community in Scotland has not yet decided whether or not it wishes to conduct same sex marriages. Were it, however, to decide to opt in to the legislation in order to conduct same sex marriages, it would not be able to nominate a regular celebrant, since it has been without a Rabbi since the last incumbent left some time ago. Since, therefore, the community would neither be prescribed under section 8(1B)(a)(i), nor would it have nominated members under section 9(1A), the current wording would prohibit any Reform Rabbi from being temporarily authorised to officiate at same sex marriages.

(NB. Note that the above example is hypothetical since the Reform Jewish community in Scotland has not yet reached a conclusion about same sex marriage, but we expect that these circumstances will also apply to a number of other small but well-established religious communities.)

To resolve this issue, and also that raised in i) above, we have suggested a possible amendment to the Bill in iii) below.

iii) To resolve both of the above concerns, we suggest amending section 12(2)(b)(1C) to state:

“The Registrar General may grant an authorisation to a person under subsection (1)(b) to solemnise marriages between persons of the same sex only if the person is recognised as entitled to solemnise marriages between persons of the same sex on its behalf by a religious or belief body—

(a)(i) that is prescribed by virtue of section 8(1B)(a)(i); or
(ii) not being prescribed by virtue of section 8(1B)(a)(i), may nominate to the Registrar General any of its members whom it desires should be registered as empowered to solemnise marriages between persons of the same sex on its behalf;

and

(b) the person is not a celebrant of a religious or belief body that has indicated that it is opposed to solemnising marriages between persons of the same sex."

8. How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriage?

We are content with the proposals in the Bill.

9. How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and the registrar?

We are content with the proposals in the Bill.

10. How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

1) We strongly agree with the proposal set out in the Bill for a dual opt-in system, in which religious and belief bodies have first to register to register civil partnerships, and then nominate people to register such ceremonies. We also strongly support the proposed amendment to the Equality Act 2010 to protect those communities and individuals who do not wish to register civil partnerships.

2) We have some concerns about the proposed procedure for authorising people to register civil partnerships (section 22(13)94A).

The wording of section 22(13)94A(1)(a)(i) fails to protect those religious and belief bodies that do not wish to register civil partnerships, since it would permit any person “who, not being a celebrant, is recognised by a [prescribed] religious or belief body … to register civil partnerships on its behalf.” (our emphasis). This would, for example, permit the Registrar General to register an Orthodox Rabbi against the wishes of the Orthodox Jewish community, on the grounds that he was “recognised by” the Liberal Jewish community to register civil partnerships on its behalf.

We therefore suggest amending section 22(13)94A(1)(a) to state:

“(1) A civil partnership may be registered by and only by–

(a) a person who is –

(i) a celebrant of a religious or belief body prescribed by regulations made by the Scottish Ministers; or
(ii) not being a celebrant, is recognised by a religious or belief body so prescribed as entitled to register civil partnerships on its behalf, and is not a celebrant of a religious or belief body that has indicated that it is opposed to registering civil partnerships; or

(iii) is registered under section 94B, or

(iv) temporarily authorised under section 94E,

3) We also have some concerns about the proposed procedure for temporary authorisation to register civil partnerships (section 22(13)94E).

i) As we have stated in relation to section 12 (see question 7), we would anticipate that many requests for temporary authorisation will be because one partner to a civil partnership comes from outwith Scotland, and they wish their civil partnership to be registered by a celebrant or other person from their own religious or belief community. In such cases, whilst the person concerned may be recognised by the relevant religious or belief body as authorised to register civil partnerships, he or she may not be “a member” of that religious or belief body. We presume this terminology (section 22(13)94E(3)) is to protect those religious bodies that do not wish to register civil partnerships, so that their clergy and other functionaries may not be nominated by a different branch of the same religion (for example, to prevent an Orthodox Rabbi from being nominated by a Liberal Jewish community to register a civil partnership, even if he personally were willing to be so nominated). We welcome this protection, (which, as we have already pointed out, is lacking in section 22(13)94A(1)(a)(i)), but are concerned that couples who may wish their civil partnership to be registered by someone from a branch of Judaism that does register civil partnerships but does not have a presence in Scotland will be prevented from having the registrar of their choice.

To resolve this issue, enabling same sex couples to enjoy a wider choice of registrar, whilst maintaining full protection for those faith communities that oppose civil partnership, and also the issue raised in ii) below, we have suggested a possible amendment to the Bill in iii) below.

ii) We are concerned that section 22(13)94E(3)(b) may inadvertently exclude small faith communities that would wish to register civil partnerships, since it requires that the relevant religious or belief body “has nominated members …under section 94B(1)” (our emphasis). As we have stated in relation to section 12(2)(b)(1C)(b) (see question 7) this would prevent members of small but well-established religious communities that have opted in to register civil partnerships, but have not been able to nominate a person to act as registrar, from being temporarily authorised to register civil partnerships.

To resolve this issue, and also that raised in i) above, we have suggested a possible amendment to the Bill in iii) below.

iii) We therefore suggest amending section 22(13)94E(3) to state:

“The Registrar General may grant an authorisation to a person under subsection (1)(b) only if the person is recognised as entitled to register civil partnerships on its behalf by a religious or belief body—
(a)(i) that is prescribed by virtue of section 94A(1)(a)(i); or

(ii) not being prescribed by virtue of section 94A(1)(a)(i), may nominate to the Registrar General any of its members who it desires should be registered as empowered to register civil partnerships.

and

(b) the person is not a celebrant or other functionary of a religious or belief body that has indicated that it is opposed to registering civil partnerships”

11. How would you characterise your view on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

We are content with the proposals in the Bill.

12. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

1) We welcome the reassurance provided by sections 10(2)(b)(1D) and 13(3) of the Bill, and in section 93 of the Policy Memorandum, but, in view of recent judgments, remain concerned that these may not be fully effective.

As stated above, we strongly support the proposed amendments to the Equality Act 2010. We agree that protection should not only be afforded to celebrants, but should cover anyone employed by or acting on behalf of a religious or belief body that has indicated that it is opposed to solemnising same sex marriages or registering civil partnerships, or for an organisation that is associated with such a body. In the Jewish community, this is likely to include, amongst others, people responsible for decisions about the use of communal buildings and other facilities, kashrut supervisors⁶, mikveh⁷ supervisors, choirs, and other musicians.

It should be noted that the religious component of a Jewish marriage is not confined to the short ceremony under the marriage canopy, but includes the celebratory meal thereafter, and for the subsequent seven days, at which part of the ceremony is repeated.

We also have concerns about people with deep-held and sincere religious beliefs who do not work for religious or belief bodies. Whilst it is important that people throughout Scotland should have no difficulty in availing themselves of the new legislation, we believe it is unreasonable to introduce a new contractual requirement for existing employees that may require some to choose between their job and their conscience. We therefore recommend that existing employees of companies providing services in relation to same sex marriage and civil partnership ceremonies should be able lawfully to refuse to participate in work relating to such ceremonies, provided that there is another employee in the area who is willing to undertake the ⁶ In order to ensure that food is kosher, i.e. that it complies with Jewish dietary laws, a supervisor, employed by a religious organisation that certifies compliance, is normally required to be in attendance throughout the time that food is being prepared and served.

---

⁷ The mikveh is a ritual bath used, amongst others, by brides on the eve of their wedding.
work, but that employees who take up employment after the commencement of the Act, and who will, therefore, have known of the requirement to provide these services before applying for the job, should not be able to do so.

2) We are also concerned at a lack of even-handedness, for example in the Crown Office press release announcing new guidelines for prosecutors in relation to same sex marriage\(^8\). The headline states “Lord Advocate issues same sex marriage opposition guidance to prosecutors”, and the press release continues “Prosecutors in Scotland have today been issued with guidance by the Lord Advocate, Frank Mulholland QC, on the prosecution of anyone who opposes same sex marriage in Scotland.” (our emphasis).

We fully support the guidelines themselves, which state that “COPFS will consider any incident reported to it involving criticism of or support for same sex marriage on its facts and circumstances. Views expressed or comments made in relation to same sex marriage in ways which do not incite hatred or violence towards a particular person or group of people and which do not cause or intend to cause public disorder will not be the subject of criminal prosecution.” The press release is, however, likely to be more widely read than the guidelines, and we are concerned that its apparent implication that simply opposing same sex marriage might be a criminal offence could cause distress and anger.

13. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

We welcome the Scottish Government’s commitment to uphold Convention rights to freedom of thought, conscience, religion, and expression (section 14), but, in view of recent judgments, remain concerned that this may be difficult to implement.

14. Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Separate Registers

It is not clear to us whether the Registrar General will keep a single register or separate registers of those people authorised to celebrate same sex marriage and register civil partnership. Since some celebrants may wish to carry out only one type of ceremony, we recommend that separate registers should be kept.

Secondary legislation

1) We do not think it appropriate that the Regulations referred to in sections 10(2)(b)(1G), 11(2)(e)(2C), and 12(2)(b)(1F) should be subject to negative procedure, and urge both that the affirmative procedure should be used, and that, in order to ensure proper scrutiny and the opportunity for all interested parties to comment, these Regulations should be subject to a full public consultation.

2) We are concerned about some of the proposed qualifying requirements for religious and belief bodies (Policy Memorandum sections 65-74).

---

While we completely agree that “All marriages and civil partnerships in Scotland ought to be conducted in a dignified and solemn manner”, we are concerned that some of the proposed tests are too restrictive and onerous, particularly for small faith communities and congregations.

The Jewish community as a whole, and, in particular, the three strands of Judaism currently represented in Scotland, have a long record of carrying out religious ceremonies, including religious marriages that are also recognised as civil marriages, and their Rabbis always take time to discuss the ceremony and its implications with the family in advance.

It is, however, conceivable, that other branches of mainstream Judaism may wish to establish a congregation in Scotland in the future, but, as new institutions, these would, ex hypothesi, not have any track record in Scotland. We therefore urge that decisions about the repute of any faith community or branch thereof, will be considered on the basis of their activities outwith as well as within Scotland, and always in discussion with authoritative representatives of the relevant faith community.

We are also concerned at the proposal that “The body and its celebrants would not be allowed to solemnise marriages or register civil partnerships for profit or gain.” It is standard practice for synagogues to charge a fee for the use of their premises for marriage ceremonies – as do hotels and other marriage premises – and also for the officiating Rabbi to charge a professional fee. Naturally these should not be (and are not) unduly onerous, but to forbid such fees entirely would be unreasonable.

Whilst we unreservedly condemn forced and sham marriages, we believe that requiring all celebrants to undergo formal training in these areas would be unduly onerous on those faith communities for which these are not an issue. The Jewish community is too small to support a rabbinical college in Scotland. All Rabbis working in Scotland will, therefore, have trained either in England or elsewhere, but the Scottish Jewish community does not have any means by which to influence the curriculum in those institutions, and the cost implications of sourcing and funding additional training for those Rabbis who obtain employment in Scotland, would be likely to be prohibitive, as would the establishment of an inspectorate to ensure effective compliance.

Note: The Scottish Council of Jewish Communities (SCoJeC) is the representative body of all the Jewish communities in Scotland. SCoJeC advances public understanding about the Jewish religion, culture and community, by providing information and assistance to educational, health, and welfare organisations, representing the Jewish community in Scotland to Government and other statutory and official bodies, and liaising with Ministers, MSPs, Churches, Trades Unions, and others on matters affecting the Jewish community. SCoJeC also provides a support network for the smaller communities and individuals and families who live outwith any Jewish community, and assists organisations within the Scottish Jewish community to comply with various regulatory requirements. SCoJeC also promotes dialogue and understanding between the Jewish community and other communities in Scotland, and works in partnership with other organisations and stakeholders to promote equality, good relations, and understanding among community groups. (Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisation SC029438)
In preparing this response we have consulted widely among members of the Scottish Jewish community.

Leah Granat
Scottish Council of Jewish Communities
22 August 2013
4. How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
The Scottish Episcopal Church serves all parts of the Scottish community and has members from a wide variety of background and geography. The Church has also sought to be an open and welcoming community, encouraging theological discussion and honest conversation while acknowledging the difficulties such conversation can cause. This has created a vibrant and diverse church and within the Scottish Episcopal Church there is a membership with a wide range of theological and doctrinal viewpoints. The Church has also gained considerable experience in working with this diversity, listening to the often opposing views of faithful people, honouring the right to open discussion while still having the ability to reach decisions.

The present public debate on issues of sexuality, marriage and inclusiveness is one which we are attempting to address in what has become the preferred way for us to reach those important decisions, decisions that can affect people's long held beliefs. This process is through conversation, prayer and discussion all held in an atmosphere of mutual respect. This is not an easy process and neither can it be a rushed process.

The response of the Faith and Order Board of the General Synod of the Scottish Episcopal Church to the 2011 consultation and also to the Consultation Bill in March 2013 recognised the current doctrine of the Church, as expressed in its canons, that marriage is "a physical, spiritual and mystical union of one man and one woman.....". (A copy of the full text of the Canon is set out in the Appendix to this submission.) Similarly, it explained that the Church could not register civil partnerships without the prior authorisation of an appropriate form of liturgy for that purpose. We also explained that the Church has a process for altering its canons, through a consultative and legislative process.

As mentioned above, within the Scottish Episcopal Church, there are those who would wish to hold to the current canonical position. Equally, there are those who would seek to encourage change. The College of Bishops announced its intention towards the end of 2012 to "encourage a measured process of discussion and reflection within the Church on matters of same-sex relationships, having regard to the Church’s context in Scotland and as a member of the Anglican Communion" and there was some discussion of this at the Church’s General Synod meeting in June 2013. (A copy of the full text of the Bishops’ statement is set out in the Appendix to this submission.) The Church will therefore seek to enable all voices to be heard before coming to a decision on whether change should be proposed.

We are therefore encouraged by the intention of the Government to endeavour to ensure a balanced approach and by its commitment to providing protections for those who may have concerns about the proposed changes. We recognise the Scottish Government’s authority to make laws relating to marriage and we recognise our need to discuss such changes fully. The Government’s proposal to allow each denomination to opt in if its internal discussion leads to willingness to celebrate same sex marriage gives us the space for our processes, while not delaying those institutions which have already made their decisions.

We acknowledge that the Scottish Government has taken note of the comments made in the initial consultation and we welcome the intention to provide safeguards. We emphasise the importance of ensuring the adequacy of such safeguards. It has been left to the Church to make a decision as to whether to opt in or out. That decision will be made by the Church following our internal conversations. We consider that that discussion should be about the Christian principles underlying human relationships and the nature and place of marriage in those relationships.

5. How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
See response to question 4 above.

6. How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

7. How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

We welcome the provisions enabling religious bodies to opt in, either in whole or in part, by the provisions in the Bill which would allow either prescription under section 10 of the Bill (amending section 8 of the 1977 Act) or registration of nominated persons under section 11 of the Bill (amending section 9 of the 1977 Act).

However, we remain cautious regarding the “qualifying requirements” which may be imposed as a precondition of prescription or registration for the purposes of nomination. We are pleased to note the commitment contained in section 69 of the Policy Memorandum that appropriate consultation will be carried out by the Scottish Government before any regulations are brought into effect.

As mentioned in our response to the Consultation Bill in March 2013, we are of the view that the tests applicable to religious and belief bodies should not impose requirements beyond the current position. If, however, additional requirements are to be introduced, careful thought will need to be given both as to their nature and as to the evidence required to be given to Scottish Ministers as a condition of prescription. For example, within the Scottish Episcopal Church, there is a regular flow of clergy from other Anglican provinces, such as the Church of England and other Anglican churches in other parts of the world. Under existing arrangements, such clergy are automatically authorised to solemnise marriages. It would be unhelpful, were the Scottish Episcopal Church to be prescribed under the revised section 8 of the 1977 Act in effect have to operate two tiers of clergy – those authorised to conduct solemnise marriage and those who, coming to the Scottish Episcopal Church from overseas, might find themselves unable to do so pending their satisfying some form of additional training condition.

Section 68 of the Policy Memorandum makes reference to the type of requirements which had been referred to in the earlier consultation document. As we indicated in our response to the Consultation Bill, if such requirements were to be introduced, it would be helpful to have clarity on matters such as:-

- references to “profit or gain” – whilst marriages are not solemnised for profit or gain, it is not unusual for those participating in a marriage to make a donation to the funds of the church where the marriage is held. We would not wish legislative provisions to place any question over the acceptability and legality of such procedures.
- what kind of evidence would be required to show a “track record” in carrying out ceremonies?
- in relation to forced marriage or sham marriage, the Scottish Episcopal Church has already issued guidance to its clergy regarding sham marriage and we would be concerned if significant training obligations were to be imposed on denominations regarding such matters over and above the issue of guidance.

In our response to the Consultation Bill we commented on the proposals enunciated in paragraphs 14 and 15 of Annex A to the December 2012 Consultation Paper and indicate that we viewed them as impractical. Such matters were they to be pursued would doubtless form part of the Regulations setting out the qualifying requirements for prescription, rather than being dealt with on the face of the Bill, but we would reiterate that those religious bodies which operate with centralised decision-making bodies have their own internal procedures for arriving at decisions. Such processes would rarely be workable if they required unanimity in all instances. Indeed the membership of decision-making bodies such as synods and assemblies may not in fact include all celebrants of the denomination in question. Any decision to opt in would need to be taken on the basis of the relevant religious body itself arriving at its decision in accordance with its own processes. Similarly, any suggestion that if, having arrived at a decision to opt in, the body in question could be removed by the Government from the prescribed list simply because one celebrant might have a change of mind or because new celebrants are appointed who happen to disagree with a decision previously arrived at by their religious body would not be workable in practice.

We welcome the additional protections mentioned at Section 93 of the Policy Memorandum in relation to the proposed alterations to the Equality Act over and above those envisaged at the time of the Consultation Bill.

8. How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriage?

9. How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

10. How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
See response to questions 4 and 7 above.

11. How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

12. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
We note the content of section 124 of the Policy Memorandum which is relevant to the Scottish Episcopal Church which has a small number of Denominational Schools. We believe that ensuring that these issues can simply flow through the school curriculum without the disruption of segregation will create an atmosphere of tolerance rather than division.

13. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
We note the provisions of section 14 of the Bill and are pleased to see that the issues of freedom of speech have been addressed. We emphasise the importance of ensuring the adequacy of such safeguards.

14. Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?
In our response to the Consultation Bill in March 2013 we indicated that whilst we recognised the difficulties associated with arriving at a new definition of adultery, we considered that the underlying principle is that adultery constitutes a breach of the marriage vow and that if the definition of marriage is changed to include same sex relationships it would be inconsistent not to develop a definition of adultery applicable to a breach of the marriage vow arising from sexual activity between members of the same sex. We appreciate the consideration given by the Government and the explanation set out in sections 136-143 of the Policy Memorandum and understand why the Government has chosen not to alter the definition of adultery.

Scottish Episcopal Church (Faith and Order Board of the General Synod)
23 August 2013
1. The Doctrine of this Church is that Marriage is a physical, spiritual and mystical union of one man and one woman created by their mutual consent of heart, mind and will thereto, and is a holy and lifelong estate instituted of God.

2. No cleric of this Church shall solemnise Matrimony except in accordance with the civil law of Scotland for the time being in force in relation to civil marriages and unless satisfied that compliance has been made with such preliminaries as are therein required for the Solemnising of Religious Marriages.

3. No cleric shall perform the Marriage Service, nor permit it to be performed in Church, for parties who are within the forbidden degrees, as specified in Appendix No.26. No cleric shall perform the Marriage Service, nor permit it to be performed in Church for parties, for one or both of whom a decree of Nullity of Marriage Ab Initio has been pronounced by a Civil Court, nor for parties, either of whom has had a previous marriage dissolved quoad civilia in a Civil Court, so long as the other spouse in the marriage so dissolved remains alive, unless that cleric shall have been given a Certificate of Authorisation on the grounds that there is no ecclesiastical impediment to the marriage in terms of Section 4.

4. In cases where a decree of Nullity of Marriage Ab Initio has been pronounced by a Civil Court, or in any case where either or both parties to a proposed marriage has, or have had, a previous marriage dissolved quoad civilia in a Civil Court, but the other spouse to that marriage remains alive, any cleric to whom an approach is made by or on behalf of either party with a view to the solemnising of such proposed marriage shall refer the matter to the Diocesan Bishop. Upon receiving such reference, the Diocesan Bishop shall make such enquiries into the circumstances of the case, and take such pastoral and legal advice, as shall seem appropriate, and thereafter may issue, or decline to issue, to an officiating cleric, a Certificate of Authorisation in terms of Appendix No.27 authorising and approving that cleric's officiating at the Solemnisation of Holy Matrimony of the parties concerned according to the Rites and Ceremonies and Canons of the Scottish Episcopal Church. No Bishop shall entertain an application which has already been before another Diocesan Bishop of the Scottish Episcopal Church without the agreement of the Bishop of that other Diocese and the Episcopal Synod.

5. A cleric may use the form of Benediction provided in the Scottish Book of Common Prayer (1929) to meet the case of those who ask for the benediction of the Church after an irregular marriage has been contracted or after a civil marriage has been legally entered into, provided only that the cleric be satisfied that the marriage is not contrary to Sections 3 and 4 of this Canon.

6. The solemnisation of Marriage shall take place in Church except with the written sanction of the Bishop.
Statement from the College Of Bishops, Regarding Process for Discussion of Same Sex Relationships (December 2012)

The College of Bishops at its last meeting discussed a number of issues around the subject of same sex relationships. It was aware that the Faith and Order Board would in due course be responding to the Scottish Government Bill on same sex marriage. Developments in the area of same sex relationships are ones which the Church needs to discuss in its own way and in its own time. A linked question is how the SEC sees itself in relation to the Anglican Communion following the decision of General Synod in June this year not to adopt the Anglican Covenant. The tone of debate at General Synod evinced continuing warmth towards the Anglican Communion and it is clear that the existing companionship links between Scottish dioceses and others in the Communion are highly valued. The Continuing Indaba project within the Communion comprises a resource which could be drawn on to enable discussion across difference.

The College of Bishops intends to invite the Mission and Ministry Board, to consider designing a process to enable consideration of matters concerning same sex relationships. Such matters are complex ones for the Church to consider since they give rise to a range of strongly held views. Such a process would enable conversation and discussion to take place across a range of places and people in an atmosphere where time can be taken for careful consideration of the matters in question. The Bishops envisage that such a process itself is likely to take some time. At this point in our life, it would represent a broadening of the concept of the Provincial Conference. It is hoped that in designing such a process, it may be possible to draw on Anglican Communion resources and perhaps involve one or more of our companion dioceses as a means of including a Communion aspect to our discussions.
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

SUBMISSION FROM SCOTTISH TRANSGENDER ALLIANCE

The Scottish Transgender Alliance (STA) is the only national transgender specific equality project currently funded in Scotland and is based within the Equality Network. The STA works for full equality and human rights for people of all sex, gender, gender identity and gender reassignment diversity. We recognise and strive to include the fullest diversity of identities and experiences within our equality and human rights work. All of our policy work is based on wide consultation with diverse transgender people across Scotland. We very much welcome this opportunity to submit evidence on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill.

4. How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

We welcome this Bill as a significant step towards greater equality for LGBT people in Scotland. As our expertise is of transgender equality and human rights we have focussed our evidence on matters affecting trans and intersex people and fully support the submission made by the Equality Network pertaining to the way in which the Bill impacts LGBT people more generally.

We are pleased that some of our views on the draft Bill have been taken into account and improvements made to the Bill as introduced, such as the provision enabling one party to a Civil Partnership to obtain gender recognition and convert their Civil Partnership to a marriage in one step. However, there are a number of further improvements we believe need made to the Bill in order to ensure it provides true marriage equality for trans and intersex people.

As the main provisions of the Bill affecting trans and intersex people were not drafted during the initial consultation on the draft Bill they have not been subject to the same level of scrutiny as the rest of the legislation. It is therefore extremely important that the impact of the legislation on trans and intersex people is thoroughly considered at this stage and detailed evidence taken by the committee.

5. How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

We have campaigned for many years for the introduction of sex and gender neutral partnership rights for all and greatly welcome the introduction of same sex marriage as a significant step towards this.

It is very important that the Bill does not create two different versions of marriage, same-sex marriage and mixed-sex marriage, because that would lead to continued discrimination. This is particularly important for trans and intersex people who do not want their legal sex to determine the type of marriage they can enter into.
We welcome that the Bill achieves that, with the exceptions of the arrangements to allow religious and belief bodies to choose to conduct mixed-sex marriages only, and the outdated rule of law that in a mixed-sex marriage the wife cannot be charged with resetting goods stolen by her husband. The treatment of those issues in the Bill is appropriate.

We also note that the Bill applies unchanged the existing meaning of adultery as evidence for divorce, to same-sex and mixed-sex marriages. Under the existing law, sexual intercourse with a person of the opposite sex is adultery; other forms of sexual infidelity, with a person of the opposite sex or the same sex, do not fall within the existing legal definition of adultery but can form the basis of a divorce under the “unreasonable behaviour” rule. We agree with the approach taken in the Bill, which applies the law on adultery and other sexual infidelity equally to same-sex and mixed-sex marriages, and allows divorce on grounds of sexual infidelity for all marriages.

6. How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Humanist celebrants in Scotland can already conduct legally-recognised marriages. The Bill clarifies that in the law, and makes clear that other philosophical belief organisations can also apply to conduct marriages. We welcome this.

7. How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In order to ensure that this Bill is trans and intersex inclusive we believe an amendment is required to the way in which nominated persons are registered as celebrants to enable religion and belief marriage ceremonies to be sex/gender neutral where both the couple and the organisation conducting the marriage wishes, (see draft amendment at Appendix A).

When a religious or belief body nominates its celebrants to the Registrar General to be approved to conduct marriages, the body must give the Registrar General details of the form of its marriage ceremonies.

The current law (section 9(3) of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977) requires that marriage ceremonies must include these two declarations:

1. a declaration by the couple that they accept each other as husband and wife;
2. followed by a declaration by the celebrant that they are then husband and wife.

Section 11(2)(f) of the Bill retains this provision for marriages between legally mixed sex couples. This is very problematic as there are couples who are legally of different sexes but who are not comfortable using the terms husband and wife. The fact that a trans person’s overseas gender recognition is not automatically recognised in the UK means that a trans woman who has fully transitioned and received gender recognition as female in her home country would still be regarded as legally male under UK law. When she and her lesbian partner get married in Scotland, they would regard their marriage as a lesbian same sex marriage but legally it would be a mixed sex marriage. It would be highly offensive and inappropriate to call her a husband during a marriage ceremony when she lives permanently as a woman. Furthermore, where someone is born with an intersex physical variation in their biological sex or is a transgender person who lives in an androgynous manner rather than simply as either a man or a woman, they should not be forced to be called a husband or a wife against their wishes.

Section 11(2)(g) however alternatively provides that where a marriage is between a couple of the same legal sex the ceremony must include a declaration that the parties “accept each other in marriage,” and it is therefore gender neutral.

We agree that religious organisations should be free, if they wish, to conduct all their mixed-sex marriages using the gender-specific terms husband and wife. And those terms should also continue to be available for all couples who want to use them. But it is wrong to impose those terms where the couple would prefer to use the gender-neutral language and the organisation conducting the marriage agrees to do that. We therefore suggest that the Bill be amended to accommodate mixed sex couples who would prefer to use this gender neutral wording, and provide that the ceremony for a mixed couple, be in one or other form.

8. How would you characterise your views on Civil Partnerships changing to marriage?

It is our view that the process of changing a Civil Partnership to a marriage should be a simple administrative procedure which costs applicants as little as possible. We are however aware that some couples may wish to marry via the usual route to marriage and we therefore welcome the fact that the Bill gives couples the option to either have a marriage ceremony (in section 7) or change their Civil Partnership to a marriage using an alternative procedure (in section 8).

We are also pleased that the Bill includes provision, in Schedule 2, paragraph 6 (new section 5D), for a person in a Civil Partnership to obtain gender recognition and change their Civil Partnership to a marriage in one step, a much less burdensome procedure than the other route provided in the Bill at Schedule 2, paragraph 5 (new section 4C(3)).

It is particularly important for trans people that a second ceremony is not required in order to re-register a marriage or change a Civil Partnership into a marriage on gender recognition. This would be an onerous, distressing and unnecessary requirement which would be experienced as offensively undermining the couple’s original marriage or Civil Partnership and their relationship, which is longstanding and continuing. We therefore welcome the fact that section 8 and Schedule 2, paragraph 6, provide administrative processes for changing a Civil Partnership to a marriage.

Our main concern relating to this question is the fact that only parties to a protected Scottish Civil Partnership will be able to change their Civil Partnership to a marriage in Scotland. This means that people who come to Scotland who have a Civil Partnership from another country will be unable to obtain gender recognition without having to dissolve their Civil Partnership because otherwise a mixed sex Civil Partnership would be created. The English Act similarly excludes couples with foreign Civil Partnerships from gender recognition but does enable those with foreign marriages to obtain gender recognition. It seems to us to be very unsatisfactory for the unfair divorce requirement to be applied only to couples who have a foreign Civil Partnership.

We therefore recommend that the Bill be amended to allow couples with Civil Partnerships registered outwith the UK to marry using section 7. This would then enable applicants with foreign Civil Partnerships to obtain gender recognition without being required to divorce. In this particular situation it would be acceptable for couples to be required to undergo a marriage ceremony; given that there is no Scottish record of their Civil Partnership.

9. How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

This is not specifically an issue for trans and intersex people, but we welcome the additional flexibility that will be allowed in choosing the location of civil marriage ceremonies.

10. How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of Civil Partnerships?

Allowing couples greater choice as to how they would like their relationship to be solemnised is to be welcomed.

11. How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Spousal consent

The requirement to divorce or dissolve a Civil Partnership in order to obtain Gender Recognition has been one of the most iniquitous effects of the lack of equal partnership rights for same sex couples. Trans people and their partners have been forced to make the extremely difficult choice between losing the legal status of their relationship and denying the trans person recognition of their identity.

While we are pleased that more people will be able to access Gender Recognition once the requirement to divorce has been repealed, we are very concerned that the provision requiring an applicant’s spouse to provide a statutory declaration of consent may mean that, in practice, some married applicants are still unable to obtain full gender recognition.
Many trans people and their allies are extremely troubled by the inclusion of the spousal consent requirement within this Bill. The spousal consent provision in the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013 generated a great deal of criticism from trans people during the passage of the Act at Westminster and has led to many trans people feeling deeply unhappy about the legislation as enacted.

Across the UK the concept has been described as a “spousal veto” as it effectively enables the spouse of a trans person to prevent their partner from obtaining gender recognition, unless the trans person is able to obtain a divorce. If the non-trans spouse is unwilling to cooperate divorce proceedings can take many years.

Our main objections to this requirement are that:

- Although the couple have been parties to an ostensibly mixed sex marriage, the trans person must have been living in their acquired gender for at least 2 years prior to applying for gender recognition, and so the non-trans spouse has already remained in a socially same sex marriage for at least 2 years.
- In the time preceding the gender recognition application the non-trans spouse could have, if they had wanted, initiated divorce proceedings on grounds of unreasonable behaviour.
- The granting of the gender recognition certificate has no practical impact on the non-trans spouse because their pension, inheritance, parenting and all other rights remain unchanged.
- Under the current provisions of the Bill, if the non-trans spouse withholds consent then urgent divorce is the only option left available to the trans person in order to access their human right to have the gender they identify as legally recognised. This government inflicted pressure to urgently divorce could cause unnecessary disruption and harm to the non-trans spouse and any children of the marriage. Separating the conflicting interests of the couple’s marriage and the trans spouse’s gender recognition enables the couple to fully consider their options without external pressures and so to arrive at the best settlement for their particular circumstances.
- Under the current provisions of the Bill, even if the trans spouse urgently initiates divorce proceedings as soon as their interim certificate has been issued, if the non-trans spouse decides to be uncooperative they can take a number of steps to delay proceedings and so deny the trans spouse access to gender recognition for an indeterminate length of time.

We understand that there may potentially be some non-trans spouses who could feel strongly that they want their marriages to remain as they were originally solemnised. Some might be distressed by the thought that their marriages would be re-registered, and a new marriage certificate issued showing new details for the trans spouse following gender recognition. At present, however, we have not heard of any such spouses requesting protection from the re-registration of their existing marriage. If such spouses exist, we agree that they should be able to block the re-registration of the existing marriage but consider it to be highly disproportionate for them to be able to block their trans spouse from the right to access gender recognition.

We view it as important to ensure that the rights of both the trans and non-trans spouse are appropriately balanced and therefore the solution we are suggesting below enables a trans spouse to be granted a full gender recognition certificate but does not enable the marriage to be re-registered if spousal consent is withheld.

We suggest this could be achieved by amending the Bill as follows (see draft amendment at Appendix B):

- As is currently the case a person applying to the Gender Recognition Panel (GRP) without a statutory declaration of consent from their spouse will receive an interim gender recognition certificate.
- An interim gender recognition certificate holder is able to make an application to the Sheriff Court for a full gender recognition certificate to be issued.
- Such an application must be made within 6 months of the date of issue of the interim certificate.
- The application will be granted as long as it is made within the time limit. Once the full gender recognition certificate has been issued the applicant will be able to obtain a new birth certificate.
- As there has been no spousal consent the marriage will not be re-registered to show new details for the trans spouse and a new marriage certificate will not be issued.
- If, once full gender recognition has been granted, the non-trans spouse consents then the marriage will be able to be re-registered.
- As is the case now either party will continue to be able to use the granting of the interim gender recognition certificate as grounds for divorce.

Our suggested improvement to the Bill is a distinctly Scottish solution. The Sheriff Court in Scotland is well placed to issue full gender recognition certificates because it already does so when a divorce is granted on grounds of a party to the marriage having been issued with an interim certificate. It has the advantage of not requiring any alternative procedures to be used by the GRP for Scottish applicants. Due to the wording of Part 2, Schedule 2 to the Gender Recognition Act 2004 either spouse will continue to be able to rely on the fact that an interim gender recognition certificate has been issued as grounds for a divorce.

Our strong view is that the fact that the trans person is issued with full gender recognition causes no actual detriment to the non-trans spouse, as their marriage remains as it was originally recorded. Conversely, the trans spouse can suffer a great deal of discrimination and other detriment while their birth certificate does not reflect the gender they live as. This proposal achieves the objective of the legislation, that being to ensure that a non-trans spouse does not find themselves in a registered same sex marriage against their wishes, because the marriage is not re-registered, while ensuring that the trans spouse is able to access their human right to have the gender they identify as legally recognised.

We are unaware of any spouses of trans people who feel strongly that their consent should be sought prior to their spouse obtaining gender recognition. We therefore believe that it would be wrong for the Committee to retain the “spousal veto” of gender recognition without having heard compelling evidence from the spouses of trans people that they would need to make use of it and why.

Long-term transitioned people

Trans people who transitioned a long time ago find it difficult to assemble the same level of medical evidence for the GRP as a recently transitioned person because long-term transitioned people are no longer in contact with the gender specialists who treated them. The Gender Recognition Act provided (in section 27) a two-year temporary arrangement for long-term transitioned people, which was available between 2005 and 2007. This enabled those who had lived in their acquired gender for at least six years to obtain gender recognition with only one medical report, rather than two, from a medical practitioner who did not have to be a specialist practising in the field of gender dysphoria. The temporary arrangement also enabled applicants to apply based on evidence of having undergone treatment to modify sexual characteristics as an alternative to providing evidence of a diagnosis of gender dysphoria.

This provision was extremely valuable because obtaining confirmation of a diagnosis of gender dysphoria can be extremely difficult after a long period of time. The specialist who provided the original diagnosis will often have retired, or may even have died, and applicants would therefore have to be re-diagnosed by another specialist. Patients currently have to wait for between one and two years between being referred and getting a first appointment with a specialist practising in the field of gender dysphoria, and it is extremely difficult for patients who have been out of the system for a considerable period to be re-referred.

Since 2007 it has become clear that long-term transitioned people are still coming forward for gender recognition who had not previously heard about it. The longer a person has been transitioned, the less likely they are to have heard about the availability of gender recognition, because the less likely they are to be in contact with trans organisations. These late applications cause the GRP difficulties and delays because it is much harder for the applicants to assemble the two medical reports required.

There are trans people who transitioned a long time ago who were unable to take advantage of the 2005–2007 temporary arrangement, because they did not want to dissolve their marriage.

There are also a significant number of trans people who would have been able make use of the temporary arrangements but chose not to on a point of principle because they felt it unjust that others could not, simply because they were married or in a Civil Partnership.
Overall, therefore, there would be advantages for married long-term transitioned people, and other long-term transitioned people, and for the GRP itself, in reinstating the alternative rules for obtaining gender recognition which were in operation for the first two years following the introduction of the legislation. Those alternative rules operated perfectly well without problems during that period.

In light of this the UK government introduced Paragraphs 15 to 20 of Schedule 5 to the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013, which provide alternative grounds for granting a gender recognition application, similar to those formerly contained within section 27 of the Gender Recognition Act.

We therefore suggest that the Scottish Bill should include a provision similar to Paragraphs 15 to 20 but remove the rather arbitrary requirement for the applicant to be, or have been, married or in a Civil Partnership prior to making the application, and rather require applicants to be ordinarily resident in Scotland. This will ensure that long-term transitioned people who had not heard in time about gender recognition and those who refused to use the discriminatory process as a matter of principle will finally be able to access the process.

The provision in the UK Government Act requires the applicant to provide evidence of having undergone surgical treatment. However a number of applicants may not be able, or may not wish, to undergo surgery (for example because they have another medical condition which means it would be dangerous for them to do so or because they were unable to access funding for surgery) but will nonetheless have fully transitioned to live as the gender they identify as for the requisite amount of time.

We therefore suggest that a similar Scottish provision should instead require evidence of medical treatment. This would mean that a long-term transitioned person who had not had surgery but had received hormone treatment to enable them to live as their acquired gender will also be able to make use of this route to gender recognition. Due to the fact that, as discussed above, many trans people remain unaware of gender recognition, we further suggest that the Scottish provision, unlike the English version which will expire 6 years after the commencement of the 2013 Act, should not be time limited.

Lowering the age for gender recognition (see draft amendment at Appendix C)

Currently one of the requirements for obtaining gender recognition is that applicants be at least 18 years of age. We suggest lowering this to 16 for the following reasons:

- The Gender Recognition Act 2004 as it applies to Scotland would thereby be harmonised with both the Age of Legal Capacity (Scotland) Act 1991 (providing that people of 16 can enter into any transaction) and the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 (providing that people can marry at 16 without parental permission) and so accurately reflect the legal position in Scotland rather than that in the rest of the UK;
- Under the current provisions of the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill, a young couple, where one person is legally male and the other person is a 16 or 17 year old trans woman who identifies and lives as female but is still legally male due to not being old enough to access gender recognition, would be discriminated against compared to other couples. This is because, as they are unable to access gender recognition, and so become a legally mixed sex couple, they would be unable to marry in a church which does not conduct same sex marriages. If the trans person was able to have their gender legally recognised at 16 they would be able to have a mixed sex marriage in their church, like any other mixed sex couple of their age. The same discrimination would apply to a couple where one person is legally female and the other person is a 16 or 17 year old trans man who is still legally female due to not being old enough to access gender recognition;

- Due to the Age of Legal Capacity (Scotland) Act 1991 young people in Scotland are able to consent to medical treatment as soon as they are able to fully understand the nature and consequences of the treatment and therefore increasing numbers are receiving a diagnosis of gender dysphoria, undergoing transition and beginning hormone blockers in early puberty. We are in contact with several young people who have already been living as their acquired gender for more than the 2 years required by the Gender Recognition Act, by the age of 16. LGBT Youth Scotland is in contact with even more young people in this situation. It is unfair to require young people to wait a further two years for gender recognition and the ability to marry in accordance with their gender identity, particularly at a time when they are at risk of facing a great deal of discrimination in education and employment due to the sex on their birth certificate not reflecting their gender.

12. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

As no religious organisations will have to conduct same sex marriages unless they choose to do so, and individual celebrants whose religious organisations have chosen to conduct such marriages will be able to opt out from doing so, we believe the Bill contains ample protections for those with concerns regarding same sex marriage.

It has been suggested that civil registrars should similarly be able to opt out from conducting marriages between people of the same sex and we strongly disagree with this. Unlike religious celebrants, civil registrars are carrying out a public function on behalf of the state and it would therefore be as inappropriate for them to be able to use their personal religious beliefs as grounds to refuse to marry a couple due to their sexual orientation or gender identity as it would be for them to use their personal religious beliefs as grounds to refuse to marry a couple with a different religion, a couple where one party is divorced, or a couple who are having a sexual relationship prior to marriage.

Some people have suggested that the Bill should include a provision enabling teachers to refuse to teach pupils about same sex marriage. Such a provision is completely unnecessary as teachers will not be required to tell pupils that they support same sex marriage, and indeed are not supposed to express their personal views in the classroom. It is however entirely appropriate that they are required to teach the facts so, in the same way that a creationist science teacher would have to teach the facts of evolution, a teacher who does not personally agree with same sex marriage would still have to state the fact that Scottish marriage legislation allows same sex marriage.

13. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Section 14 of the Bill makes clear that the Convention Rights to freedom of speech and freedom of religion are not affected by the legislation and the Bill will therefore not curtail freedom of speech. We believe this provision provides sufficient protection to opponents of equal marriage.

It has been suggested that the case of Smith v. Trafford Housing Trust is evidence of the fact that people may lose their jobs for expressing their disagreement with same sex marriage. However the court in that case in fact held that the employer had been wrong to demote Mr Smith for espousing his opinions on same sex marriage using social media.

The Lord Advocate’s guidance, published with the Bill, provides protection from prosecution for those engaging in public debate about same sex marriage, by stating that it is not in itself a crime to publicly disagree with same sex marriage.

14. Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Mixed Sex Civil Partnership

We believe that partnership rights should be sex and gender neutral, which is why opening up Civil Partnership to mixed sex couples has been central to the Equal Marriage Campaign. Introducing mixed sex Civil Partnership would also enable couples in existing Civil Partnerships, where one person obtains gender recognition, to continue their Civil Partnership rather than having to convert it to a marriage.

We therefore welcome the Scottish Government’s public commitment on 27th June 2013 to conduct a review of Civil Partnership law, “driven by the need to consider the position on opposite sex Civil Partnership”. We believe that review should start without delay, and, once it is complete, there should be prompt legislation to open up Civil Partnership in Scotland to couples regardless of their gender.

Scottish Transgender Alliance
23 August 2013
Appendix A - Text of Gender Neutral Ceremony Draft Amendment

In section 11, page 11, line 5, delete sub-subsections (f) and (g) and insert—

<f(f) in subsection (3), for the words from “(a)” to the second occurrence of “wife”, substitute—

“(a) in the case of a marriage between persons of different sexes, either the two declarations in subsection (3A) or the two declarations in subsection (3B); or

(b) in the case of a marriage between persons of the same sex, the two declarations in subsection (3B).”.

(g) after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) The two declarations are—

(a) a declaration by the parties, in the presence of each other, the celebrant and two witnesses, that they accept each other as husband and wife; and

(b) a declaration by the celebrant, after the declaration mentioned in paragraph (a), that the parties are then husband and wife.

(3B) The two declarations are—

(a) a declaration by the parties, in the presence of each other, the celebrant and two witnesses, that they accept each other in marriage; and

(b) a declaration by the celebrant, after the declaration mentioned in paragraph (a), that the parties are then married.”.

In section 11, page 11, line 40, delete from “and” to the end of line 1 on page 12.

Appendix B – Text of Spousal Consent Draft Amendment

Schedule 2, page 41, line 20, at end insert—

<4E Person with interim certificate: issue of full certificate on application to the sheriff (Scotland)
(1) A person to whom an interim gender recognition certificate has been issued may make a summary application to the sheriff for the issue of a full gender recognition certificate.

(2) The sheriff must grant the application if satisfied that–

(a) the applicant was a party to a protected Scottish marriage at the time when the interim gender recognition certificate was issued and remains a party to that marriage, and

(b) the application is made within 6 months of the date of issue of the interim gender recognition certificate.".

Schedule 2, page 42, line 37, at end insert –

<(1A) Regulations made under sub-paragraph (1)(a) must provide that where a full gender recognition certificate has been issued by virtue of section 4E to one spouse in a qualifying Scottish marriage the marriage must not be registered unless the other spouse consents thereto in writing.>

Schedule 2, page 43, line 11, replace <or 4C> with <, 4C or 4E>

Appendix C - Text of minimum age draft amendment

In schedule 2, page 38, line 32, at end insert–

<Minimum age of applicant

2A In section 1(1) (applications), after “18” insert “, or if the person is ordinarily resident in Scotland 16,”.>
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
SUBMISSION FROM SCOTTISH YOUTH PARLIAMENT

4. How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

The Scottish Youth Parliament warmly welcomes the introduction of the Bill and the opportunity to give evidence on it. Legislation to introduce equal marriage in Scotland is a priority for young people, and SYP is proud of the part we have played in campaigning for this positive change. We thank the Scottish Government for taking the decision to bring forward this Bill and would urge the Scottish Parliament to pass the Bill without delay.

Our evidence is shaped by the views of Scotland’s young people, who overwhelmingly backed the statement that “all laws regarding homosexual relationships, whether male or female, should be equal to those of heterosexual relationships” in the largest youth consultation of its kind in Scotland in the development of our youth manifesto ‘Change the Picture’ – with 42,804 responses from young people, it represents a comprehensive picture of what Scotland’s young people believe. With 74% of respondents agreeing with the statement, it provides a compelling case for the change young people in Scotland want to see.

Not only do the vast majority of Scotland’s young people agree with the principle of equal marriage, it is a principle they are prepared to actively speak out for as a priority for action. The historic decision of Members of the Scottish Youth Parliament (MSYPs) to launch Love Equally – SYP’s campaign for marriage equality has proved not only to be a successful campaigning activity for the organisation, but most importantly has demonstrated that Scotland’s decision-makers are prepared to listen to the voices of its young people and act on their desires. Not only is the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill a significant move towards equality for all in Scotland, it is a significant and welcome step for Scotland’s democracy.

The message from Scotland’s young people is consistent and straightforward - we think that two people who love each other should be able to get married. We want to live in a Scotland where same-sex couples are allowed to get married if they want to, where mixed-sex couples are allowed to register a civil partnership and if religious organisations want to perform same-sex marriages and civil partnerships, they should be allowed to do so. We welcome the provisions in the Bill that will legislate for elements of this vision, and await with interest the Scottish Government’s planned review of civil partnerships, where we hope they will be retained an opened up to mixed-sex couples. This evidence is based on these principles and should be viewed as a collective representative response on behalf of the young people of Scotland.

5. How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
The Scottish Youth Parliament believes that two people who love each other should be able to get married. The law in Scotland should be changed to allow same-sex couples to marry if they want to do so.

Following years of welcome progress in law to remove discrimination based on sexual orientation, marriage law stands virtually isolated, with the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 explicitly prohibiting same-sex couples from exercising the right to show their love and commitment to each other in the same way as mixed-sex couples can – by getting married.

Changes in the law reflect changes in society, and it is clear that there has been a seismic shift in attitudes in society towards same-sex relationships. This is particularly pronounced amongst young people – the ringing endorsement that Scotland’s young people gave as part of SYP’s ‘Picture the Change’ mass consultation, with 74% agreeing with the straightforward premise that relationship laws should be equal for mixed-sex and same-sex couples. Scotland’s young people, many of whom have friends who are openly LGBT, simply cannot understand why some of their friends are denied rights afforded to others simply because of the person with whom they fall in love.

A wealth of evidence bears this out, including in the Scottish Social Attitudes Surveys of 2009 and 2010, in opinion polls and by responding to the Scottish Government’s ‘The Registration of Civil Partnerships/Same Sex Marriage’, enormous amounts of young people have time and again made clear their support for marriage equality.

The introduction of civil partnerships in 2004 saw many of the tax and legal benefits of marriage extended to same-sex couples for the same time and were a step in the right direction. More than 3,000 civil partnerships have been registered since their introduction. However, despite being viewed by some as ‘gay marriage’, civil partnerships are not marriage. Couples in a civil partnership are not legally allowed to be referred to as ‘husband’ or ‘wife’ but as ‘civil partners’. No religious activity is permitted during the registration ceremony. In law it is a technical arrangement, which is designed to have the trappings of marriage, whilst going to great lengths to ensure that it is not viewed as a marriage but something else entirely.

Even if one was to take the view of a civil partnership as a ‘gay marriage’, why with all the positive changes towards equality, should there be a distinction? Rather than having ‘gay marriage’ and ‘straight marriage’, if one was to accept the view of the overwhelming majority of Scots, and that of Scots law, that sexual orientation is not grounds for discrimination, why the need for the qualification – why not ‘marriage’?

Significant progress has been made to make Scotland a fair and equal nation for all of its citizens under law, with human rights for all and protection from discrimination. With the weight of public opinion firmly behind the move, and young Scots in particular taking up the cause as the biggest change they want to see, we believe that the time has come for same-sex marriage in Scotland, and that the Scottish Parliament should seize the opportunity to legislate for it presented by this Bill.
6. How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

The Scottish Youth Parliament agrees that belief marriage ceremonies should be established as a distinct type of ceremony from religious and civil marriages.

Throughout the campaign for marriage equality in Scotland, the growing popularity of marriage ceremonies conducted by the Humanist Society of Scotland has been clear. In February 2011, it was reported that humanist weddings had overtaken Roman Catholic weddings to become the third most popular ceremony behind civil ceremonies and those conducted by the Church of Scotland. As humanist weddings were only granted legal status in 2005, at the current rate of growth, the Humanist Society of Scotland expects the number of ceremonies it conducts to overtake the Church of Scotland in 2015. The Humanist Society of Scotland is firmly in favour of same-sex marriage, and has been outspoken in campaigning for the right to conduct same-sex weddings.

Despite being a secular philosophy or belief system, humanist weddings are legally recognised by the Registrar General as religious marriages. Given the increasing numbers of couples choosing humanist belief ceremonies, and that humanism is secular rather than religious by its own description, we feel the creation of a third ‘belief’ category of equal marriage is welcome, reflects the reality of ceremonies available to couples today and could open the door to other similar belief organisations offering ceremonies that would allow couples to celebrate their union in a way that reflects their personal beliefs and philosophy.

7. How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

The Scottish Youth Parliament believes that if religious organisations want to perform same-sex marriages and civil partnerships, they should be allowed to do so. We understand that not every religious institution would want to do this, however we believe it should be a matter for them to decide, with appropriate legal protections put in place to protect this freedom in accordance with their own decision-making processes. However, we also firmly believe that religious institutions that wish to conduct same-sex marriages and civil partnerships should not be prevented from doing so by law and should have the ability to decide this for themselves, in accordance with their own decision-making processes.

The Scottish Youth Parliament welcomes the legal protections and freedoms for religious and belief bodies and individual celebrants proposed in the draft Bill.

The Scottish Youth Parliament supports the introduction of the option of a gender-neutral form of words for same-sex marriage ceremonies, and recommends this option be extended to mixed-sex couples who would prefer it.

Throughout Love Equally the position of the Scottish Youth Parliament and that of our campaigning partners has been clear – no religious body or celebrant who does not wish to do so should be ‘forced’ to solemnise same-sex marriages or civil partnerships. We would support any appropriate legal provisions to ensure that the rights of religious organisations and their clergy not to be required to conduct same-sex marriages are protected. We respect the rights of religious bodies to determine this for themselves in accordance with their own decision-making processes. In any event, as the law currently stands, religious bodies and their celebrants have the right to refuse to marry a mixed-sex couple who asks them to conduct a religious wedding. We see no reason why this should change, or not continue to be the case for same-sex couples – the right to refuse is an essential element of religious freedom.

Another essential element of religious freedom however, is the right for people to hold religious beliefs and choose which religion, if any, to follow. We would be concerned if the reservations and opposition of some religious bodies, such as the Roman Catholic Church or the Church of Scotland for instance, should be used to deny the right to conduct same-sex marriages to Quakers, Pagans, liberal Jews, Unitarians, the Metropolitan Community Church or other religious bodies that wish to conduct weddings for same-sex couples in accordance with their own decision-making process. To do so would effectively favour certain religions over others on the basis that they are perceived as bigger or more established.

The details of the proposed protections outlined in the Bill, together with the amendments to the Equality Act, satisfy the religious protections and freedoms we have consistently called for alongside the introduction of equal marriage. By requiring both the religious or belief body and the individual celebrant to opt in, together with an explicit commitment that there is no obligation on bodies to conduct same-sex weddings, removes any possibility of celebrants conducting ceremonies against the wishes of their organisation, or celebrants who disagree with their parent body’s view being required to do so. These guarantees remove any possibility that religious organisations or individual celebrants will be ‘forced’ to conduct same-sex marriage against their wishes. This has never been SYP’s intention at any point, and we warmly welcome these legal guarantees.

The Bill as introduced makes provision for a gender-neutral form of words to be used as an option in same-sex wedding ceremonies (e.g. a couple could choose between “I now pronounce you married” or “I now pronounce you husband and husband”). We support this option being provided, but would recommend it be extended to mixed-sex couples who would prefer the gender-neutral form of words in their ceremony.

8. How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriage?

The Scottish Youth Parliament is content with the proposed process for changing a civil partnership to a marriage.

Couples who have registered a civil partnership outside Scotland should be allowed to get married without dissolving their partnership.

The approach proposed in the Bill for couples to convert their civil partnership into a marriage appears sensible. In particular, we are pleased that civil partnerships are to be retained alongside marriage, and there will be no requirement to convert a partnership to a marriage if the couple does not wish to do so. As we have highlighted elsewhere in this response and throughout our Love Equally campaign, civil partnerships are not marriage. However, this does not mean that they could not play an important role following the introduction of religious and civil same-sex marriage for same-sex couples, and eventually for mixed-sex couples too.

The Equality Network have highlighted a technicality in the Bill that would prevent a couple whose civil partnership was registered outwith Scotland from getting married without first dissolving their civil partnership, which requires living apart. SYP does not support this, and would recommend the Bill be amended to allow civil partners whose partnership was registered outside Scotland to be allowed to get married without dissolving their civil partnership.

9. How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

The Scottish Youth Parliament agrees that mixed-sex and same-sex civil marriages should be allowed to take place anywhere that the couple wishes, provided the registrar is content and it does not take place on religious premises.

Two key principles of the Scottish Youth Parliament’s Love Equally campaign are that laws relating to mixed-sex and same-sex relationships should be equalised, and that two people in love should be allowed to demonstrate their love and commitment to each other in a way that reflects their personal feelings for each other. The change, removing the need for a civil marriage to take place in a registrar’s office or an ‘approved place’, would result in equality with the current arrangements for civil partnerships, and would give greater freedom to couples to demonstrate their love and commitment in a personal way. We welcome this change.

10. How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

The Scottish Youth Parliament believes that if religious organisations want to perform same-sex marriages and civil partnerships, they should be allowed to do so. The law in Scotland should be changed so that civil partnerships could be registered through religious ceremonies and by religious celebrants if that is how couples want to express their commitment to each other, and if the religious body and celebrant want to register their partnership.

We are firmly of the belief that two people in love should be allowed to demonstrate their love and commitment to each other in a way that reflects their personal feelings for each other. If a religious body or celebrant wishes to register their civil partnership in a place of worship, we see no reason why the law should stand in their way. In line with our responses on religious solemnisation of same-sex marriage and civil partnerships above and religious protections and freedom below, no religious body nor celebrant should be required to register a civil partnership if they do not wish to do so. These decisions should be in accordance with religious bodies’ own decision-making procedures. If mixed-sex couples are allowed to register a civil partnership in the near future, we would expect they should be able to do so in a religious or belief ceremony if they wish, and the religious body and celebrant are content.

11. How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

The Scottish Youth Parliament welcomes the provisions in the Bill to end the current situation where transgender people must divorce in order to obtain gender recognition.

The Scottish Youth Parliament notes concerns about the ‘spousal veto’ from the transgender community, and urges the Scottish Government to work with the community to create an interim process to prevent a spouse vetoing gender recognition.

As same-sex marriage and mixed-sex civil partnership are currently illegal, transgender people are forced to undergo a divorce or dissolve their civil partnership before receiving legal gender recognition – even if their partner is the same person.

The Scottish Youth Parliament believes the solution to this discrimination is equal marriage. This is an extremely welcome feature of legislating for marriage equality, and a much-needed step forward towards equality for transgender Scots.

However, we note the concerns raised by the Scottish Transgender Alliance regarding the ‘spousal veto’, where a married person requires their spouse’s agreement before acquiring gender recognition. We would recommend that an interim process is created in line with STA’s suggestion.

12. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

The Scottish Youth Parliament agrees that there should be no specific opt-out in the Bill for civil registrars who do not wish to solemnise same-sex marriage.

The Scottish Youth Parliament agrees that no new legislation is necessary specifically relating to education and same-sex marriage.

In contrast to religious or belief ceremonies, civil marriages or civil partnership registrations are services provided to the public by local authorities. They are secular, with no religious content allowed as part of the registration. We agree with the Scottish Government’s reasoning for not including an opt-out for civil registrars who do not wish to solemnise same-sex marriage. Whilst there may be civil registrars who personally disagree with the legalisation of equal marriage, we feel that this is best resolved by discussions between them and their local authority employers in accordance with employment law and in line with existing and established practice relating to the registration of civil partnerships. What matters most is that two people who love each other can choose a civil marriage if that is how they wish to celebrate their union, and that local authorities are able to offer this as a service to the public.

We note the interest that has developed in how same-sex marriage may be addressed in schools. We do not believe that any change in the law in this area is necessary, or indeed welcome. We welcome the intention to review existing guidance on sex education in schools, but would urge caution to ensure that young people’s rights are not undermined, and that discussion of same-sex marriage is not banned or restricted.

To inform our response to the Scottish Government’s consultation on the draft Bill, and in anticipation of a forthcoming refresh of Education Circular 2/2001 which provides guidance on sex education to schools, the SYP conducted an extensive consultation with young people on how same-sex marriage should be addressed in schools.

In the consultation, the majority of young people felt that pupils should be able to take part in lessons if they disagree with their parents’ view that they should be withdrawn for cultural or religious reasons, with this particularly important in the senior phase of high school. They felt that same-sex marriage should not be taught about as a controversial political or moral issue, and there should be no bar to it being mentioned in lessons. They were also concerned about the impact treating same-sex marriage on LGBT issues as controversial may have on homophobic bullying, which is still worryingly prevalent in schools.\(^{vii}\)

The message from Scotland’s young people is clear – they are entirely comfortable with same-sex marriage being taught about in schools, and are confident that teachers will be able to deliver non-judgemental information that allows pupils to make informed decisions for themselves about the issues involved, in line with their responsibility as a teacher. As the consultation document makes clear, there are already well-established processes requiring local authorities to have consideration for teachers’ religious beliefs, and to handle moral objections by teachers, which we are confident will prove more than sufficient in allowing any concerns by teachers to be addressed in a reasonable manner.

13. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

The Scottish Youth Parliament is content with a clause guaranteeing freedom of speech in the Bill.

The Scottish Youth Parliament believes in the right of free speech and the free exchange of opinion. We are content with a clause guaranteeing that nothing in the Bill will affect people’s right to freedom of speech, thought, conscience or religion and expression under the European Convention of Human Rights.

Guidance from the Lord Advocate on prosecutions for alleged breach of the peace, or threatening and abusive behaviour relating to people’s views on equal marriage would be welcome. We are confident this will appropriately balance people’s right to free speech with existing legislation on hate crime, such as the Offences Motivated by Prejudice (Scotland) Act.
14. Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

The Scottish Youth Parliament believes that mixed-sex couples should be allowed to register a civil partnership if they wish.

As the law currently stands, just as marriage is denied to same-sex couples, civil partnership is denied to mixed-sex couples, as a result of the Civil Partnership Act 2004. Scotland’s young people are firmly of the opinion that relationship laws should be equal for mixed-sex and same-sex couples. The Scottish Youth Parliament therefore supports the removal of the legal barrier to mixed-sex couples being allowed to register a civil partnership.

We have consistently called for mixed-sex civil partnership to be introduced and whilst we are disappointed that it does not feature in the Bill, we are encouraged with the review of civil partnerships announced by the Scottish Government. We would hope that the review will give serious consideration to opening up civil partnerships to ensure that all laws governing relationship laws are equal for mixed-sex and same-sex couples in Scotland – true equal marriage. The Scottish Youth Parliament looks forward to giving evidence to the review, and is confident that the case for change is strong.

15. Organisational details

The Scottish Youth Parliament is a representative body. Our elected Members (MSYPs) represent 14-25 year olds living in Scotland.

Rob Gowans
Scottish Youth Parliament
23 August 2013

---

4 Registration of Civil Partnerships Same Sex Marriage: Consultation Analysis, Scottish Government p. 7-9

5 BBC News Online - More Scots wedding couples turn to humanist marriages (20th February 2011) http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-scotland-12517893

7 Further information on the consultation can be found in SYP’s response to the Scottish Government consultation on the draft Bill (p. 7 - 15) http://www.syp.org.uk/img/consultations/Marriage%20and%20Civil%20Partnerships%20Bill_SYP%20Response.pdf
4. How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
We welcome the proposals put forward by the Scottish Government. The Commission believes in the principle of equality of access for all to marriage and to civil partnership.

5. How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
We welcome the proposals put forward by the Scottish Government. The Commission believes in the principle of equality of access for all to marriage and to civil partnership.

6. How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
We agree with the Government's proposals.

7. How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
Subject to the following, we welcome the proposals for an opt-in procedure authorising religious and belief celebrants who wish to solemnise same sex marriage.

It appears to be the intention of this Bill that ministers who do not wish to conduct or otherwise be involved in same sex marriages, could not be required by their religious organisation to do so. Section 10 (1D) (d) provides that “nothing in subsection (1B)(a) or (1C)(a) imposes a duty on any person who is an approved celebrant in relation to marriages between persons of the same sex to solemnise such marriages.”

However, it could possibly be argued that any restriction on a religious organisations' right to require a minister of theirs to take steps in relation to same sex marriage, for example requiring a minister to agree to apply to be an approved celebrant, may potentially amount to an unlawful interference with the freedom of religious organisations to enforce their religious doctrines within their organisation, contrary to Article 9 ECHR. Such matters, relating as they do to the freedom of religious organisations to ensure their employees and officials act in accordance with their ethos, may not fall within the remit of this Bill. It is however an area in which further clarification from government may be useful.

8. How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriage?
Given that the principle of same sex marriage has been established, we believe that it would be helpful to enable civil partners to convert their relationship to that of marriage if they so choose.
9. How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
We support the Governments proposals to permit opposite sex and same sex civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere agreed between the registrar and the couple, other than religious premises.

10. How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
We believe that civil partnerships should be able to be registered through religious and belief ceremonies. Where celebrants and religious organisations wish to register civil partnerships, we see no reason to prevent such ceremonies. We would however be opposed to any requirement on religious organisations to register civil partnerships.

11. How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
We believe that the principle of allowing transgender people in a relationship to stay together when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate (GRC) is right. We welcome the proposals which would mean that it is no longer always necessary to divorce for married people to stay married when obtaining a full GRC, if the spouse consents.

It would be helpful if it is made clearer how the procedures which are set up under schedule 2 sit with the Regulations which could be made under section 27: a clearer explanation of “renewed marriage” and “re-solemnisation”, when each would arise and the effect each would have; clarification that (as we understand it) re-solemnisation is intended to be an optional procedure; and clarification as to what the effect of the proposed procedures would be on a marriage which has been solemnised by a religious body which does not support same sex marriage.

12. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

13. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
We welcome the Lord Advocate’s guidelines on this matter published in June. These concise guidelines provide a useful statement of the proportionate approach to the issue which will be required.

14. Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Pensions
While we do have concerns about inequalities in pension provision for those in civil partnerships and for transgender couples, we recognise that pension policy is an area which is reserved to Westminster. The difference in treatment between same sex married couples and transgender couples on the one hand, and the opposite sex couples on the other is potentially discriminatory.
We note that the UK Government has said that it will review the issue and report by July 2014. Further, we note the impact of the recent Employment Tribunal decision in the case of Walker v Innospec (ET 2411316/2011), which held that a pension scheme’s failure to provide survivor’s benefits for civil partners equal to those provided for spouses was unlawful discrimination. The Tribunal held that the pension provisions as set out in the Civil Partnership Act in England and Wales, are not compliant with EU law. We understand that this case has now been appealed and that an EAT hearing is set for January 2014, which will be very relevant to this issue.

Where the Scottish Government has devolved powers in relation to certain public sector pension schemes in Scotland, it should exercise those powers in a way which ensures equality of access to pension benefits and avoids discrimination.

Mixed-sex civil partnership
The Bill does not make any provision for mixed-sex civil partnership. The Commission is in favour of choice being extended to all in relation to marriage and civil partnership. We welcome the extension of marriage to same sex couples and believe that opening up civil partnership to mixed-sex couples would be a further step to deliver equality.

Irene Henery
Senior Solicitor
Equality and Human Rights Commission Scotland
22 August 2013
The Equality Network is a national Scottish charity working for equality and human rights for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) people. All of our policy work is based on wide consultation with diverse LGBT people across Scotland. We very much welcome this opportunity to submit evidence on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill.

Q4: The bill in general

The Equality Network strongly supports and welcomes the bill. As set out below, equal marriage is a high priority issue for LGBT people in Scotland. Along with our partners, we have been working for this legislation for many years, including at the Parliament since petitions on the issue were submitted to the Public Petitions Committee in 2009. We welcomed the fact that the SNP and Labour manifestos for the 2011 election committed to consult on same sex marriage, and that the LibDem and Green manifestos committed to legislate.

Scotland was the first part of the UK where the government consulted on same sex marriage, in September 2011. Since then, Scotland has been overtaken by England and Wales, where legislation has now been passed. While that is disappointing for same sex couples in Scotland who are waiting to marry, we recognise that the policy development process in Scotland has been highly consultative and deliberative, leading to a well-considered bill. In particular, the bill is significantly improved on the December 2012 consultation draft, with the submissions of those on all sides of the debate taken into account.

Nevertheless, we think that there are some areas where the bill could be further improved. These mostly concern issues for transgender and intersex people, and in part this reflects the fact that schedule 2 to the bill was not available in the consultation draft. The changes we think are needed are described below, and we have also prepared draft amendments if the Committee would find those useful at this stage.

Q5: Same sex marriage

The Equality Network strongly supports the introduction of same sex marriage, and, more generally, that marriage should be available to couples regardless of their genders. LGBT people should have full equality under the law, including the equal right to marry the person they love.

In our 2009/10 survey of 427 LGBT people in Scotland^1, 85% said that this change is needed. 53% said that implementing this change is a high priority, and a further 32% said that it is a priority. From more informal qualitative consultation, we believe that, if anything, those figures underestimate the proportion of LGBT people who consider that equal marriage is required. At our five same sex marriage consultation events around the country in November 2011, every one of the 150 people present agreed that same sex marriage should be introduced.

In our survey and our consultation events we asked people why marriage should be opened up to same sex couples. People gave a number of reasons, with the following main themes.

Segregation is not equality

Even though the legal rights and responsibilities of civil partnership and marriage are almost identical, the two are not perceived as of equal status and value. Civil partnership is seen as a legal contract, while marriage is seen by many as the gold standard for celebrating the joy of love and commitment. Marriage is very widely understood for its symbolism and its personal, community, and in some cases, religious significance. Very few people propose to their partner by asking “Will you civil partner me?” – civil partnership just does not have the same meaning.

Civil partnership was invented specifically to deny same sex couples access to marriage, and is seen by many same sex couples as a second-class status.

Put simply, equality means making the same choices available to all. If mixed race couples were denied the opportunity to marry, and instead offered civil partnership with the same legal effects, that would readily be seen as unacceptable racist discrimination. The ban on same sex couples marrying is equally unacceptable.

In 2008, the Connecticut Supreme Court considered whether that state’s introduction of civil unions (a civil partnership type status for same sex couples with identical state-level legal effects to marriage) was consistent with the state constitutional equality guarantee. The Court concluded, “in the light of the history of pernicious discrimination faced by gay men and lesbians, and because the institution of marriage carries with it a status and significance that the newly created classification of civil unions does not embody, the segregation of heterosexual and homosexual couples into separate institutions constitutes a cognizable harm.” The Court ordered that marriage itself be opened up to same sex couples.

The unfair and arbitrary nature of the current law is particularly clear when considering the situation of bisexual people. A bisexual person might fall in love with someone of the same gender or of the opposite gender – apart from the gender of the person, there is no difference in the relationship. The law directs the person to civil partnership or to marriage, with no choice, depending only on the gender of their partner.

Reducing discrimination and its effects

Although the legal effects of marriage and civil partnership are almost identical, in our 2009/10 survey, of 103 people in civil partnerships, 58% said they had not been given the same rights and respect that a married couple would get. That rose to 64% for women civil partners. Examples included people being referred to as “not really married”; banks not understanding why civil partners wanted a joint account; employers refusing to change Miss to Mrs on documentation; hospitals refusing to recognise the civil partner as next of kin; forms not including civil partnership status options alongside marital status.

These kinds of discrimination and less favourable treatment are in part due to an ignorance of what civil partnership is, and are in part due to prejudice for which the separate status of civil partnership provides an excuse.

The introduction of same sex marriage would not eliminate this discrimination against same sex married couples, but it would remove the problem of ignorance, and remove one of the excuses for prejudice.

Furthermore, the segregated status of civil partnership, including the separate terminology, in itself defines same sex couples as “other”, and thereby promotes stigma, prejudice and discrimination against LGBT people. This includes homophobia, biphobia and transphobia in forms including bullying and hate crime. The introduction of same-sex marriage would help reduce these forms of prejudice against LGBT people because it would eliminate the official “otherness” status of LGBT people. We believe that it would also help to reduce prejudice and discrimination more widely, because it would be a clear public demonstration of Scotland’s refusal to accept discrimination, and Scotland’s embrace of diversity, equality and freedom.

By reducing prejudice and discrimination, the introduction of same sex marriage will enhance the safety, self-esteem, health and wellbeing of LGBT people in Scotland.

Discrimination against same sex couples also affects their children. We estimate from our surveys that around 20% of same sex couples have children, whether from a previous mixed sex relationship, through adoption, or through assisted conception. Contrary to some claims, research shows that children do as well with two parents of the same sex as with two parents of opposite sex.

The introduction of same sex marriage will benefit the children of same sex couples by reducing prejudice in the ways described above.

 Discrimination in international recognition

Although the domestic legal effects of civil partnership and marriage are almost identical, there is a significant difference in terms of international recognition. A Scottish same-sex marriage would be recognised in any other country which allowed same-sex marriage, because of the well-established international legal framework for recognising marriage. That is not the case for international recognition of civil partnership, which is more confused and irregular.

 Discrimination against transgender people

---

2 See, for example, ‘How does the gender of parents matter?’, Biblarz and Stacey, Journal of Marriage and Family, Feb 2010
A specific form of legal discrimination caused by the ban on same sex marriage is discrimination against married transsexual people in the provision of legal gender recognition. The requirement to divorce, or dissolve one’s civil partnership, in order to obtain gender recognition is a truly iniquitous aspect of the current law. It forces a transsexual person and their partner to decide between their marriage, which may have continued for decades, and their right to legal recognition of the transsexual person’s true gender. It is the only case where the law reaches into a happy marriage which the partners want to continue, and forces them to divorce, on pain of having to continue to live with the wrong legal sex. While it is possible for the same couple to register a civil partnership after the divorce and gender recognition have been granted, rights may be lost in the conversion of a marriage to a civil partnership (for example pension rights) and the change from marriage to civil partnership is seen as a “downgrade” because of the different public, social and personal status of marriage and civil partnership.

Couples may therefore choose to remain married and forgo gender recognition. However, the consequences of living in one gender while legally being the other gender are severe and harmful, as was recognised by the European Court of Human Rights in the cases of Goodwin and I v UK, which established gender recognition as a human right.

Freedom of religion and belief

Same sex couples cannot at present have their legal relationship solemnised by a humanist or religious celebrant. In our 2009/10 survey of 429 LGBT people, 22% said that they would consider a humanist marriage if it was available, and 22% said that they would consider a religious marriage.

Celebrants of the Humanist Society Scotland solemnise marriages (under the religious marriage law) and very much want to be able to solemnise same-sex marriage.

Other religious or belief bodies which we understand want the freedom to solemnise same sex marriages include the Unitarians, the Quakers, the United Reformed Church, the Metropolitan Community Church, the Open Episcopal Church, the Liberal Jewish community, some Buddhist communities, and the Pagan Federation of Scotland. For these religious groups, and for many LGBT people of faith, marriage has a significance that civil partnership does not, and consequently these groups and their members have played a significant role in calling for this legislation.

Freedom of religion and belief means respecting the right of those bodies that wish to solemnise same sex marriages, and the right of those couples who wish a religious same sex marriage to be solemnised by those bodies. It also means respecting the right of religious bodies that disagree with same sex marriage, to decline to conduct them.

Neither set of religious bodies (those that agree, and those that disagree with same sex marriage) has the right to impose their views about this issue on the other set. Marriage is not owned by any religious body (and in fact predates any current... religious faith), and no religious body should have a veto over the arrangements for marriage.

Wider effects of same sex marriage

Civil partnerships are currently running at about 2% of the rate of (non-tourist) marriages in Scotland – approximately 500 civil partnerships per year now; and 4500 in total. The future number of same sex marriages might be a little higher because of greater demand. The introduction of same sex marriage will have no effect on the existing or future marriage of any mixed sex couple. The law affecting mixed sex marriages is not changing, and there is not a finite limited number of marriages available. Rather it could be argued that introducing same sex marriage would strengthen the institution of marriage, by enriching it, and demonstrating that it is a modern, relevant and equitable institution, desired and valued across Scotland’s diverse population.

The introduction of same sex marriage will be in line with Scotland’s ideals of equality, diversity, tolerance, respect, freedom, dignity and fairness. By publicly embodying those values, the introduction of same sex marriage will also further strengthen those values in Scottish society.

The legal definition and effects of marriage have changed enormously over the past couple of hundred years, up to and including the major changes to divorce law brought about by the Family Law (Scotland) Act 2006. The introduction of same sex marriage, in contrast, will not change at all the law applying to mixed sex marriages, and is therefore arguably a relatively minor change compared to what has gone before.

Public opinion

Equal marriage is supported by a large majority of people in Scotland. Opinion polls by Ipsos MORI, Populus, YouGov and Angus Reid have been consistent. They show that the level of support in Scotland has been steadily rising, and that around two-thirds now believe that same sex couples should be able to marry³.

The opinion polls are also consistent with the academic research. The 2010 Scottish Social Attitudes Survey⁴ asked “Do you agree or disagree that gay and lesbian couples should be allowed to marry?” 61% agreed, while only 19% disagreed. Survey respondents were asked their religious denomination, so the results may be analysed by religious denomination. 54% of Catholics agreed with same sex marriage, with 21% disagreeing; 50% of Presbyterians agreed, with 25% disagreeing. Amongst those of no religion, 72% agreed with same sex marriage and 12% disagreed.

While Scottish Government consultations are not designed to provide a representative sample of public opinion, around 75% of responses to the consultation on the draft bill, and 65% of full responses to the initial consultation on the policy, supported same sex marriage.

Support for same sex marriage is particularly strong amongst younger people, with 73% of under 25s in support as long ago as the 2006 Scottish Social Attitudes Survey. An Ipsos MORI Scotland poll in June 2012 found that 75% of people under 55 now support same sex marriage. The introduction of same sex marriage has particular resonance for younger people, who see it as being about Scotland looking forward as a modern 21st century country.

International context

Nine western European countries surrounding us have already introduced same-sex marriage: Iceland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, the Netherlands, Belgium, France, Spain and Portugal. There is no evidence from any of those countries of any of the negative consequences that some of the opponents of same-sex marriage suggest would follow. Legislation for England and Wales has been passed and is due to be commenced next year. Scotland has fallen behind on this key equality issue.

Canada, New Zealand, South Africa, Argentina, Uruguay, Brazil, and a number of US and Mexican states have also introduced same sex marriage, and the issue is under active consideration in other countries such as Australia and Luxembourg.

Scotland’s international reputation with key partners will be enhanced by the introduction of same sex marriage. Scotland (and the UK) seek to promote equality and human rights internationally, and to do this effectively we need to ensure full respect for equality and human rights at home.

This change is one whose time has come – future generations will look back with surprise that the law ever prevented same sex couples from marrying.

How the bill implements same sex marriage

We welcome that the bill to a very large extent places marriage on a gender-neutral basis. It would perpetuate discrimination to introduce two legally different species of marriage: “different sex” and “same sex”, and the bill rightly avoids this. Section 4 provides that the law on marriage applies equally to mixed sex and same sex marriages.

There are a couple of inescapable exceptions. Since the bill rightly allows religious or belief bodies to choose whether or not to solemnise same sex marriages, the arrangements for approving religious or belief celebrants necessarily must distinguish between same sex and mixed sex marriage.

There is one old rule of marriage law which is gender-discriminatory: the rule that a wife cannot be guilty of resetting goods stolen by her husband, while a husband may be guilty of resetting goods stolen by his wife. Arguably, that rule should be

---

5 Table 3.6, http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2007/12/04093619/0
6 See, for example, 'When gay people get married', MV Lee Badgett, New York University Press, 2009 abolished, but this bill is not the place to do that. Section 5(1) of the bill sensibly therefore clarifies that the rule does not apply to a woman in a same sex marriage.

Section 5(3) clarifies for the avoidance of doubt that the law on adultery will apply to same sex marriages exactly as it applies to mixed sex marriages. That is, sexual intercourse with a person of the opposite sex (who is not the spouse) is, in law, adultery, and as such can be the basis for a divorce. All other sexual activity with a person other than the spouse, whether that person is of the opposite sex or the same sex, can equally be the basis for a divorce, under the “unreasonable behaviour” rule. These rules will apply equally to all marriages, meaning that sexual infidelity can found a divorce for both a mixed sex and a same sex marriage, in the same way.

There has been some discussion, in relation to same sex marriage, of the law on consummation. That is an English law concept. In Scots law, there is no rule that a marriage must be consummated, and a marriage in Scotland cannot be annulled on the basis on non-consummation. Therefore the question of the meaning of consummation for mixed sex or same sex marriage does not arise.

Finally we note and agree with section 5(2) of the bill, which clarifies, for the avoidance of doubt only, that the old common law rule that a marriage can be annulled on the petition of either spouse, on grounds of the permanent and incurable inability of the spouses, from the time of the marriage, to achieve heterosexual penetration, does not apply to a same sex marriage. Under existing law, a spouse who is aware at the time of the marriage that such penetration will not be possible is personally barred from seeking an annulment on this ground.

Q6: Putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants

As noted above, 22% of respondents in our survey of LGBT people said that they would consider a humanist same sex marriage if that was available. We welcome the fact that Scotland has allowed humanist marriages since 2005, under the religious marriage provisions of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977. We note that humanists now represent the third largest provider of marriages, after civil marriages and those solemnised by the Church of Scotland. It seems to us to make sense to clarify that marriage law applies to belief marriages as such, rather than inappropriately labelling them as a type of religious marriage.

Q7: Authorising celebrants to perform marriages

We agree that religious and belief organisations should be free to decide for themselves whether to solemnise only mixed sex marriages, or same sex marriages as well. As noted above, there is a range of religious and belief organisations in Scotland that wish to conduct same sex marriages. Others, including the larger churches, do not. Religious freedom should apply to both groups. The bill protects that freedom, and extends it for the first time to those bodies that support same sex marriage.

We think that an opt-in system is an appropriate way to do this. We note that the amendments to the Equality Act 2010 which the Scottish Government have agreed with the UK Government will ensure that religious bodies and individual religious celebrants who choose not to conduct same sex marriages are free in law to do so.
Changes made since the consultation on the draft bill have extended that protection to anyone who is an integral part of the religious (or belief) aspects of the ceremony, for example an organist or church choir member. We agree that those people should have the right to opt out of same sex marriages.

The Scottish Government do not intend that people providing commercial services in relation to a marriage, that are not an integral part of the religious ceremony, should be allowed to discriminate against same sex marriages. That would include for example chauffeurs and photographers. We agree with this. It is already the case under equality law that such commercial services have to provide their services for civil partnerships on the same basis as for marriages. To allow commercial businesses to discriminate simply because a staff member personally disagrees with same sex relationships would undermine the whole basis of anti-discrimination law.

Form of marriage ceremony

We believe that one amendment is needed to the parts of the bill that deal with the authorisation of religion and belief marriage celebrants.

When a religious or belief body nominates its celebrants to the Registrar General to be approved to conduct marriages, the body must give the Registrar General details of the form of its marriage ceremonies.

The current law (section 9(3) of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977) requires that marriage ceremonies must include these two declarations:
1. a declaration by the couple that they accept each other as husband and wife;
2. followed by a declaration by the celebrant that they are then husband and wife.

Section 11(2)(f) of the bill keeps the same rule for ceremonies for mixed sex marriages. Under section 11(2)(g), when religious or belief celebrants are nominated to conduct same sex marriages, the same sex marriage ceremonies must instead include:
1. a declaration by the couple that they accept each other in marriage;
2. followed by a declaration by the celebrant that they are then married.

We think that this form of ceremony for same sex marriages is fine – there is nothing to stop the celebrant adding extra words such as “wife and wife”, by agreement with the couple.

But we think that the required form for mixed sex marriages is too restrictive, because the law requires the use of the gender-specific terms “husband and wife”, and this will be very problematic for some couples for the reasons outlined below.

Clearly, some religious organisations will want to use the gender-specific terms “husband and wife” for all their marriages, and they should be free to do so. And those terms should continue to be available for couples who want to use them. But it is wrong to impose those terms where the couple would prefer to use the gender-neutral language and the organisation conducting the marriage agrees to do that.

This is particularly important for mixed sex couples where one or both is transgender or intersex. A trans person’s overseas gender recognition is not automatically recognised in the UK. For example, an American trans woman who has fully transitioned and received gender recognition as female in her home state, would still be regarded as legally male under UK law. When she and her lesbian partner marry in Scotland, they would regard their marriage as a lesbian same sex marriage (and it would visibly be that), but legally it would be a mixed sex marriage. It would be highly offensive and inappropriate to call the trans women a “husband” during her marriage ceremony, when she lives permanently as a woman. In a similar way, where someone is born with an intersex physical variation in their biological sex, or is a trans person who lives in an androgynous manner rather than simply as either a man or a woman, they should not be forced to be called a husband or a wife against their wishes.

We therefore believe that a small amendment is needed to the bill to allow those religious or belief bodies that choose to, to use the gender-neutral (“you are now married”) form of marriage ceremony wording for mixed sex marriages, as an alternative to the gender-specific (“you are now husband and wife”) form. That would be entirely consistent with the religious freedom principle of the bill, by allowing religious and belief organisations to choose which form of ceremony to use.

Q8: Changing a civil partnership to marriage

In our 2009/10 consultation with LGBT people in Scotland, of 103 people already in civil partnerships, 54% said they would want to change their civil partnership to a marriage if that was possible. From our informal consultation meetings, we know that some civil partners would like the opportunity to do this via a full marriage ceremony (in some cases, conducted by a religious body that chooses to solemnise same sex marriages). Other civil partners have already had a big ceremony for their civil partnership, and would prefer to change to marriage via a simple and inexpensive administrative procedure.

We therefore welcome that the bill allows civil partnerships to be changed to marriages, and allows this by two alternative routes. Section 7 allows a couple who are already in a civil partnership to marry in the usual way, in a civil ceremony, or in a religious or belief ceremony by an organisation that chooses to solemnise same sex marriages. Section 8 allows a couple to change their civil partnership to a marriage via an administrative route.

We note that, in the case of the section 8 administrative route, the details are not yet available, as they will be in secondary legislation. It is important that the procedure is lightweight and low cost: civil partners have told us that they feel they have been discriminated against by the non-availability of same sex marriage in the past, and feel it would be unfair to have to pay a large sum to correct that now.

Marriage between civil partners registered outwith Scotland
As the bill stands, sections 7 and 8 only allow those who registered a civil partnership in Scotland to change that to a marriage. It makes sense that the administrative route in section 8 is only available to those whose documents are already held by National Records of Scotland. However, since marriage in Scotland is already available to couples who reside in any part of the world, we can see no reason why the rule in section 7 should not apply to couples with a civil partnership registered in other parts of the world.

Not allowing this would cause real problems for couples who registered a civil partnership abroad and then moved to Scotland. Because section 7 does not apply to them, they will be unable to change to a marriage unless they first dissolve their civil partnership. But that requires proving that the civil partnership has irretrievably broken down (which it clearly has not), by living apart for a year. It is very unfair to ask civil partners to do that in order to marry. Even if they return to the country where they registered their civil partnership, if that country does not allow same sex marriage, they would need to dissolve their civil partnership there in a similar way, before coming back to Scotland to marry. The practical result will be that such couples will effectively, and uniquely, be barred from marrying.

In contrast, same sex couples from any part of the world who are not in a civil partnership will be able to come to Scotland to marry, whether or not that marriage would be recognised in their home country. We see no reason why this should not also apply to couples who are already in a civil partnership, and we believe that section 7 of the bill should be amended to allow civil partners to marry in Scotland wherever their civil partnership was registered.

Q9: Places where civil marriage ceremonies are allowed

This is not specifically an issue for LGBT people, but we welcome the additional flexibility that will be allowed in choosing the location of civil marriage ceremonies.

Q10: Religious and belief registration of civil partnerships

We believe that most same sex couples will prefer a civil marriage, or a religious or belief marriage, or a civil partnership conducted by a registrar. Our 2009/10 survey of LGBT people found that 74% would consider a marriage in future, and 29% would consider a civil partnership, if the choice was available. Informal consultation suggests that significantly fewer than that 29% would consider a religious or belief civil partnership ceremony.

However, allowing the registration of civil partnerships in a ceremony conducted by a religious or belief body that chooses to do so, adds a useful extra option. In particular, there may be some religious bodies that would not wish to conduct same sex marriages, but would want to offer religious civil partnership ceremonies to same sex couples who are their members. There may also be some couples whose religious beliefs will lead them to prefer a civil partnership to a marriage.

We therefore welcome these provisions in the bill.

Q11: Marriage and gender recognition
We strongly support the principle of allowing transgender people who are married to obtain gender recognition without being required by law to divorce. In our view, however, a number of amendments are required to schedule 2 to the bill, which deals with this. Schedule 2 was not available in the consultation draft of the bill published in December 2012, and the need for amendments at this stage may reflect that. We have outlined the amendments we think are needed here – please see the submission of the Scottish Transgender Alliance (which is based at the Equality Network) for more details.

As the bill stands, a married trans person will require the consent of their spouse to obtain gender recognition. This enables the spouse to effectively “veto” the trans person’s gender recognition, or at least to delay it while the trans person applies for a divorce. If the relationship between the spouses is difficult, the divorce proceedings could take a long time, during which the trans person is unable to access their human right to legal recognition in their true gender.

When a trans person applies for gender recognition, they have already been living in their acquired gender for at least two years. Obtaining gender recognition does not therefore change the practical nature of their marriage, which has been same sex for at least two years. But it does free the trans person from discrimination by bringing their legal status into line with reality. That should be available with or without the spouse’s consent, because it is a matter personal to the trans person, and has no direct effect on their spouse. It is the re-registration of the marriage after gender recognition where both spouses have a direct interest, and where a requirement for the consent of the trans person’s spouse would be appropriate.

We therefore believe that spousal consent should not be required for the granting of gender recognition, but should instead be required for the subsequent re-registration of the marriage and the issue of a new marriage certificate. As at present, the non-trans spouse would continue to be able to obtain a (non-contestable) divorce in such circumstances, if they wished to end the marriage.

The bill is also currently missing a provision that was added to the corresponding English legislation (the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013), allowing a person to obtain gender recognition with simpler evidence requirements if they transitioned to their acquired gender at least six years previously. When a person has been transitioned for a long time, it can be very difficult indeed to obtain all the medical evidence that is usually required for gender recognition applications. The doctors involved may have retired or even died. We therefore believe that, as in the legislation south of the border, a provision for simpler medical evidence for long-term transitioned people should be added to the bill – this would assist the Gender Recognition Panel as well as applicants for gender recognition.

We would also like to see the minimum age for applying for gender recognition brought into line with the minimum age for marrying in Scotland, that is, 16, rather than 18 as at present.

Q12: Protections for those with concerns about same sex marriage
We think that the bill strikes the right balance, and provides good protections for people with concerns about same-sex marriage. No religious organisation will be required to conduct same-sex marriages unless the organisation agrees to. Even where an organisation does agree, individual marriage celebrants within that organisation will be free to opt-out of same sex marriages, as will any person who plays an integral part in the religious marriage ceremonies of that organisation (eg the church organist, or a choir member). These are strong protections for religious activities.

No legal expert in human rights who has considered this issue is of the view that the European Court of Human Rights might overturn these protections and force unwilling religious bodies to conduct same sex marriages. In fact, quite to the contrary, religious bodies’ rights to refuse to solemnise same sex marriage are protected by article 9 of the ECHR. See, for example, the opinion of Karon Monaghan QC, for Liberty\(^7\), which states at paragraph 42: “In my view, therefore, any requirement upon a church or religious organisation to conduct same-sex marriages, contrary to the religious convictions of its members, would violate their Article 9 rights (and those of any person compelled to take part, for example a minister).”

Nine European countries (all subject to the ECHR) already have same sex marriage, for up to 12 years, and in no country has any religious body been required by European law to conduct such marriages.

It has been proposed by some that the bill should give civil registrars a statutory right to opt out of conducting same sex marriages. We would strongly oppose that. Unlike religious celebrants, civil registrars are carrying out a civil function on behalf of the state, and therefore an opt-out on grounds of their personal religious belief is not appropriate. Civil registrars whose personal religious denomination disapproves of divorce are not given a statutory opt-out from marrying people who are divorced. Introducing a statutory opt-out would set a dangerous precedent that public service providers (in local government, NHS, etc) should have a legal right to pick and choose who they serve. This is no more acceptable on grounds of sexual orientation and gender identity than it would be on other grounds such as race.

We understand that the registrars’ organisation, the Association of Registrars of Scotland, is not calling for a statutory opt-out. The registering of civil partnerships in Scotland by civil registrars has worked well without any such statutory opt-out, and we expect the registering of same sex marriages to work equally well in a similar way.

It has also been proposed by some that teachers should have the right to opt out of mentioning same sex marriage if a pupil asks about it or it comes up in class, and that parents should be able to remove their children from any class where same sex marriage might be mentioned. We would strongly oppose this. Teachers are there to teach the facts, not their personal views, and should answer questions factually. No teacher will be required to say that they personally agree with same sex marriage, but all teachers must treat all pupils with respect, whatever their family arrangements, including pupils with same sex married parents. It would be unworkable to allow opt-outs from lessons where same sex marriage is mentioned. Opt-outs are not available from lessons where divorce is mentioned, which is also strongly disapproved of by some religious denominations.

Q13: Freedom of speech

The bill will have no negative effect on freedom of speech, as section 14 confirms. People will remain free to disagree with same sex marriage and to express that disagreement publicly. The Equality Network strongly supports the freedom of those who disagree with same sex marriage to express that disagreement.

The Lord Advocate’s guidance published with the bill makes clear that it is not a crime to disagree publicly with same sex marriage. The case of Adrian Smith v Trafford Housing Trust\(^8\) demonstrates clearly that it is unlawful for an employer to subject an employee to detriment simply because they say publicly that they disagree with same sex marriage. Mr Smith was demoted at work because he stated on his personal facebook page that he disagreed with same sex marriage. He claimed wrongful breach of contract, and won his case on the clear grounds that there was no legitimate justification for his employer to act against him. There is no evidence in Scotland of detrimental treatment by employers towards people because of their personal disagreement with same sex marriage.

The law already clearly protects freedom of speech, there is no evidence of any problem, and no further changes to the law are needed. Any legal provision that singled out same sex marriages or relationships as being specifically open to criticism would be discriminatory on grounds of sexual orientation, in a similar way to the notorious “section 28”.

Q14: Other issues in relation to the bill

Mixed sex civil partnership

The bill is a huge step forward for equality, but it does not introduce full equal marriage. Apart from the amendments suggested above under questions 7, 8 and 11, the main substantive provision missing from the bill is the introduction of mixed sex civil partnerships. That has always been a core part of the campaign for equal marriage in Scotland. It is widely supported: Ipsos MORI Scotland found in July 2012 that 71% of Scots believe that mixed sex couples should have the right to register a civil partnership. We believe that the same choices – marriage or civil partnership – should be open to all couples regardless of their gender (for more detailed reasons, see\(^9\)).

---

\(^8\) Smith v Trafford Housing Trust [2012] EWHC 3221 (Ch)

We therefore welcome the Scottish Government’s public commitment on 27th June 2013 to conduct a review of civil partnership law, “driven by the need to consider the position on opposite sex civil partnership”. We believe that review should start without delay, and, once it is complete, there should be prompt legislation to open up civil partnership in Scotland to couples regardless of their gender. This will also make it possible for a person in a civil partnership to obtain gender recognition without the need to change their civil partnership to a marriage.

Survivors’ pensions

We note that the regulation of private sector pension schemes is reserved to Westminster, and that, under the current rules, private sector pension schemes will be allowed to pay much smaller survivors’ pensions to people in same sex marriages than to those in mixed sex marriages. This is clear discrimination, and under section 16 of the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013 the UK Government must set up a review of the situation, to report by 1st July 2014. The same section gives the UK Government power to change the law on this by statutory instrument, and we strongly believe that they should do that once the review is complete.

Section 25

We welcome section 25 of the bill, which corrects an error in the law on dissolution of civil partnership via the simplified procedure. The correction is needed to ensure that around 100 dissolutions which were obtained prior to the discovery of the error are not at risk of being overturned because of the error.

Technical issues

Finally, we believe that three technical amendments may be needed to the bill.

Firstly, we note that paragraph 154 of the Policy Memorandum states that, under the terms of section 4 of the bill, the remaining law on marriage by cohabitation with habit and repute will apply to same sex relationships. However, it has been pointed out to us that section 4(6), which extends common law rules on marriage to cover same sex marriage, may not be effective for the law on marriage by cohabitation with habit and repute. That is because section 4(6) refers to rules of law relating to being (or having been) married, whereas marriage by cohabitation with habit and repute is a rule about purported marriages. It is suggested that words such as “or being a party to a purported marriage” should be added to section 4(6).

Secondly, we think that an amendment may be needed to new section 4D of the Gender Recognition Act 2004, inserted by paragraph 5 of schedule 2 to the bill. Section 4D deals with the unfortunate circumstance of the partner of a transgender person dying before an application for a full gender recognition certificate under new section 4C (inserted by the same paragraph) is determined, and ensures that in such a case the transgender person can still obtain the certificate without having to reapply again from the start. However, section 4D does not appear to deal with the possibility, for case B, in section 4C(3), that the trans person’s civil partner / spouse might die after notices to marry are submitted, and more than six months after the issue of the interim certificate, but before the application under section 4C(3) is made. We think there would be value in amending section 4D to cover this case also.

Finally, we think that a small amendment is needed to paragraph 7(c) of schedule 2. That sub-paragraph allows the spouse of an applicant for gender recognition to apply to the Court of Session to quash the granting of the application by the Gender Recognition Panel, on the grounds that it was secured by fraud (for example, the applicant fraudulently claimed to be unmarried). We think that the same right should be available to the civil partner of an applicant for gender recognition, so that the provision should read “spouse or civil partner”. This would be consistent with the general principle that the law treats civil partners and married couples the same unless differences are strictly necessary.

Q15:

We are responding as an LGBT organisation.

Tim Hopkins
Director
Equality Network
23 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

In general, and within the limits of the work of the Church & Society Committee (given that the national Synod of Scotland, taken as a whole, has not expressed a view) we are content with the permissive, rather than prescriptive approach. It is difficult to see what further measures could reasonably have been taken to ensure that those not disposed to be party to the solemnisation of same-sex marriages were not compelled to do so, without completely undermining the intent and effectiveness of the bill.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

Neither

Our church includes opinions both for and against the legal recognition of the marriage of same-sex couples. We have not come to a policy decision for or against, but it is reasonable to note that members or ministers have already been party to the religious blessing of civil partnerships. A number of ministers have openly declared that they would want to be nominated to solemnise same-sex marriages.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

From a legal point of view, I don't think we can have any objections. It is an expression of religious freedom, which we support.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

The arrangements do continue a level of discrimination against same-sex marriage, which should be acknowledged, because of the opt-in procedures, which could be seen as cumbersome (with two systems of prescription and nomination for different 'brands' of marriage), and there may need to be some emphasis of a full equality of status in law to compensate for this bureaucratic discrimination, but we would accept that this is part of the extreme measures which are being taken to ensure that there is no compulsion upon faith bodies or individuals to act against their conscience. There is no cause for objection on the part of those opposed to equal marriage.
How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

From a pastoral point of view, it must be acknowledged that people of faith who are already living in civil partnerships often regard and refer to their relationships as marriages, thus this would be a matter of the law catching up. It is wise and welcome that the date of the ‘marriage’ will be regarded as being that of the original civil partnership. But of course, no compulsion should be involved here.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

We already solemnise marriages in locations agreed by the celebrant and the couple. Maybe there might be more support for the discretion of the celebrant, though!

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

Given the above comments, we could find no reason to oppose this development of the law.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

We firmly support this compassionate measure.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

These protections as so far described and planned, seem more than adequate. What protection is envisaged for those who, in conscience wish to solemnise same-sex marriages, under pressure from those opposed?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of speech here is more than safeguarded, leaning heavily in the direction of the protection of those opposed to same-sex marriage. Maybe it needs to be made clear that homophobia as such (discrimination without compelling religious or philosophical grounds) is completely unacceptable.
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a celebrant a faith/belief-based organisation a private individual

Rev David J M Coleman
10 July 2013
Meeting continued in public.

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: I welcome our witnesses and the people who are sitting in the public gallery. Today, we will hear from two panels of witnesses on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill. I should let everyone know that the Parliament’s photographer will be here.

I invite the first panel to introduce themselves.

Colin Macfarlane (Stonewall Scotland): Thank you very much for having us here today. I am the director of Stonewall Scotland.

Brandi Lee Lough Dennell (LGBT Youth Scotland): Thank you for inviting LGBT Youth Scotland. I am policy and participation manager.

John Phillips (Religious Society of Friends (Quakers)): I am here representing the Quakers in Scotland.

Tim Hopkins (Equality Network): Thank you very much for the opportunity to be here. I am director of the Equality Network.

James Morton (Scottish Transgender Alliance): Thank you very much for inviting the Scottish Transgender Alliance, of which I am the manager.

The Convener: Thank you. I invite questions from committee members.

John Mason (Glasgow Shettleston) (SNP): I thank the witnesses for all their submissions, which I have read—they were very helpful. You might have seen the submissions from the organisations that are represented on our next panel, one of which said:

“The complementarity of male and female, and their unique role in the transmission of life, underscores the reality of marriage as a natural social environment for the birth and growth of every person.”

Do you agree that there is a “complementarity of male and female”?

Tim Hopkins: Gender is not that simple. We know, for example, that there are transgender people, people who are born into a male body but grow up to discover that they are female, people who are intersex, who do not have a male or a female body but have a mixture of those two things, and people whose self-perceived gender identity is neither male nor female or is a mixture of those two things. The reality is that things are not as simple as people just being male or female.

You mentioned generation and new life. It is already clear that marriage law does not require a couple who are marrying to be capable of having children. There are couples in which one person is infertile, there are couples who are quite old and are not going to have children—

John Mason: The norm would be that a marriage would expect to have children.

08:30

Tim Hopkins: Most marriages do have children and of course many same-sex couples have children, too. The couples that I just talked about, who are not able to have their own children, might well adopt children, as do same-sex couples. Our view is that the bill is about love—and marriage is about love. I think if you ask most married couples what their marriage is about they will say that it is about love, a commitment to each other and, if they have children, their family. All those things apply to same-sex couples, as well.

John Phillips: I come from a slightly different point of view, from one of the faith communities in Scotland. For us, the crucial thing is the complementarity between two individuals who are making a committed relationship with each other and need the support of their community and of God, helping them through their lives. The complementarity is not to do with gender; it is to do with the particular relationship that two individuals work out between themselves, for the benefit not only of themselves but of the community in general.

Colin Macfarlane: We are alive to the fact that an increasing number of gay and lesbian people, particularly younger ones, want their family structures to be described in exactly the same way as everyone else’s are—Tim Hopkins mentioned same-sex couples who have children.

For us, the bill is about much more than the complementarity issue. It is much more about how gay people are viewed in society and about being equal in the eyes of the law. What the bill does for us is to completely underline that. It is a robust, strong bill and it will provide gay people with equality in the eyes of the law.

When civil partnerships were introduced in 2005, we were very much of the view—and we hoped—that the distinctions between gay people and heterosexual people would be eroded and that the way in which gay people were talked about and viewed in the public sphere would change.

I am sad to say that our hard evidence shows that that has not been the case. Research that Stonewall Scotland commissioned from YouGov showed that in the past five years 216,000 people have experienced some form of homophobic or transphobic verbal or physical abuse in the workplace, and that 99 per cent of our young people have faced some form of discrimination or experienced some form of homophobic language in their playgrounds—half of those children have been directly bullied for being different or perceived to be gay. In the past year, there has been a 12 per cent increase in lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender-reported hate crimes.

What the bill will do is to make gay people equal in the eyes of the law, and until that happens the distinction and the public discourse that I talked about will be at risk of not changing.

John Mason: You said that the bill will make people “equal in the eyes of the law”. Do you accept that the law already gives equal rights, so this debate is really about the word “marriage” rather than legal rights or other legal differences?

Colin Macfarlane: At the moment, gay people are not equal in the eyes of the law. They are not equal in law. Until they are afforded the same rights and responsibilities as heterosexual married couples are afforded, and until they are able to marry legally in this country, they will not be equal and the distinction will continue. As I said, that distinction allows, in the public sphere, the kind of discrimination that I described. We are very much of the view that until gay people are seen as equal in the eyes of the law, and society sees them as equal in the eyes of the law, the distinction will continue.

John Mason: In its submission, the Equality Network said:

“the legal rights and responsibilities of civil partnership and marriage are almost identical”.

Can you clarify that for us? Are they identical? Are there some differences?

Tim Hopkins: There are two significant differences at the moment. One is in pension rights, in relation to the survivor’s pension. The other is to do with international recognition. The international recognition regime for civil partnerships is much weaker and is not common across countries that have civil partnerships, whereas it is common for same-sex marriage.

There is another, very important area of legal discrimination, which affects transgender people. Because we have a segregated system of marriage and civil partnership, if someone changes their legal sex because they are transsexual, they have to end their marriage and start a civil partnership. That causes all sorts of difficulties for people.

For us, it is more about practical discrimination and status and stigma. Marriage is perceived by many people as the gold standard for relationships. Even civil partners, when they propose, do not say, “Will you civil partner me?” They say, “Will you marry me?”

People have been quite distressed, for example, when they go to the bank and it does not understand what a civil partnership is or it has a form to fill in that has boxes for marriage but not for civil partnership. That type of thing—practical discrimination against civil partners—is still quite common. We carried out a survey of 103 people in civil partnerships in Scotland, and 58 per cent reported that they had not received the same respect or treatment as married couples for the reasons that I have mentioned.

Respondents have said, for example, that people had said to them, “But it’s not a real marriage, is it?” We have heard of hospitals turning people away as next of kin because the hospital has not understood what civil partnership is. One effect of introducing same-sex marriage will be to make that less likely to happen.

John Mason: That will change the legal status, but do you think that it will change people’s attitudes? Will they not just talk about real marriage and gay marriage in different terms?

Tim Hopkins: I do not think that they will. Marriage is understood widely, and allowing same-sex couples to enter marriage will not only help them to feel better about themselves, but genuinely reduce the stigma that people feel and the discrimination that they face in society.

James Morton: John Mason mentioned male and female. Intersex people whose bodies are at variance with what is clearly male or female have contacted us and said that they and their partners are under massive amounts of stress as they are worried that, while same-sex marriage does not exist, their relationships might be challenged. Somebody might say, “Well, your body is not clearly male, therefore your marriage—in which you are the husband and you have a wife—is not legal because you should not be counted as male.” That causes a massive amount of distress. In addition to the detrimental discrimination faced by transgender people and their spouses under the current separate systems, there is also intense worry and distress for intersex people and their partners.

The Convener: Have you finished your questioning, John?

John Mason: On that area, yes.

The Convener: Siobhan McMahon would like to ask some questions.

Siobhan McMahon: A number of organisations have stated in their written submissions—and Mr Macfarlane said in his answer to John Mason—that they believe that there are robust protections in the bill. What are those robust protections? Can we have some examples?

Colin Macfarlane: We have had a lengthy consultation over the past two years, and the Scottish Government has listened to those who have concerns about protections. The protections in the bill are robust and strong, and the Government has got the balance right between freedom of speech and freedom of religion.

The modifications and amendments that the Scottish Government has asked the UK Government to make with regard to celebrants et cetera are strong, and the Scottish Government should be applauded for listening to those concerns.

Siobhan McMahon: What is robust in particular? We are talking about the bill in general terms, but what about the specifics? With regard to the amendments that you mention, the responses to the Scottish Government's consultation and the equality impact assessment have suggested that, while it is all very well for the Scottish Government to say that it would like to do something, and for people to accept that and wish for it to happen, it might not be the case in practice. What gives you the feeling that it will be the case? Is there something specific?

Colin Macfarlane: I understand where you are coming from. I do not think that you are ever going to prevent people from making mischief, and you will never have a cast-iron guarantee that somebody is not going to try to take someone to court at some point, but the protections and the amendments to the Equality Act 2010 are—as I said—robust.

Across Europe, there are nine countries under the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights that have had equal marriage for around 12 years, and not one single religious group in those countries has been forced to carry out same-sex marriage. The protections are strong and robust in our law, and in European and international law.

Tim Hopkins: I agree with Colin Macfarlane that the Scottish Government has done a very good job of drafting the amendments to the 2010 act and getting them agreed by the UK Government. The legislation is now much stronger than the draft that was published last December. The Scottish Government has really listened to the concerns of churches about ensuring, for example, that people who take part in religious services, such as organists and those in the choir, can opt out of same-sex marriages, which they are free to do.

The Government has also listened to concerns about ensuring that people who control religious premises are able to veto any other group that rents those premises conducting a same-sex marriage. Those protections are all there.

The concern that has been raised is about the European Court of Human Rights and the European convention on human rights. However, legal opinion from lawyers who are experts in human rights is very clear that article 9 of the convention, which protects the freedom of religion and the freedom to manifest your religion, protects churches from having to conduct same-sex marriages. If the Scottish Government had written into the bill that churches had to conduct same-sex marriages—clearly it has not, but if it had—those churches would be able to win cases in the European Court of Human Rights because article 9 protects them. So, the domestic protection in the amendment to the Equality Act 2010 is underpinned by the European convention. That means that there is absolutely no prospect of anybody successfully taking a church to court and saying that it must conduct a same-sex marriage. The bill improves religious freedom by giving religious groups freedom to choose. We have always said that that should be the case and we are glad that the bill does that.

Siobhan McMahon: I appreciate your answers. However, do you appreciate that it is not just about the ceremony, and that there are wider implications? Do you feel that the protections are robust enough in relation to people who are employed by public bodies?

Tim Hopkins: A relevant case down south is Adrian Smith v the Trafford Housing Trust. Mr Smith posted on his personal Facebook page that he disagreed with same-sex marriage and the trust demoted him because of that. That should not have happened. He went to court and he won his case. The court was very clear that that amounted to unlawful dismissal. The law is already clear that you cannot be subject to a detriment by your employer because you have views against same-sex marriage. We think, therefore, that the protections are already there.

The Convener: Would anybody else like to comment?

Brandi Lee Lough Dennell: No. I think that that is sufficient.

Marco Biagi (Edinburgh Central) (SNP): I have a question for Mr Phillips, who talked a lot about religious protections and religious freedom. Do you believe that the current situation, which is that, as a faith, you are forbidden to perform same-sex marriages, itself represents an infringement of your religious freedom?

John Phillips: We do. We have a number of gay couples in our Quaker meetings who have civil partnerships. From talking to them and working with them we can see that they feel that they have not been given the same opportunity, either by the Society of Friends or by society at large, to sanctify the relationship within the context of the religious community in which they practise. That has become clear to me really only over the past five years or so, since there have been a number of civil partnerships. We can, of course, hold meetings for worship to bless those couples, but there is something rather special about making the declaration itself within the context of religious worship. It is that which they feel singles them out as being different from opposite sex couples and which we have learned to greatly regret.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): I thank our witnesses for their submissions, which have been very interesting. I would like to address a series of questions to James Morton regarding his submission and, in particular, his suggested amendments.

The first suggestion is perhaps less technical than the others. It concerns the gender neutrality of the ceremony. Could you comment on that and perhaps cover some aspects that many people—myself included, initially—may have some difficulty grasping?

James Morton: Many people do not realise that somebody’s legal gender in one country does not automatically get recognised in other countries. You can have a situation in which a transgender woman who has gone through gender reassignment from male to female and has been fully legally recognised in her home country—say, America—is not recognised as female in Scotland, where she would still be legally male in the eyes of UK law. If she saw herself as lesbian and had a female partner and wanted to get married in Scotland, the bill as it stands would require her to declare in front of all the wedding guests that she was the husband. Obviously, that would be a gross violation of dignity and privacy and would cause humiliation and embarrassment on what should be a happy and special day.

08:45

All that would be required to enable her not to have those violations of her dignity and privacy would be to allow the option, when the couple and the religious body that are marrying them both agree, to use gender-neutral language and say, “We pronounce you married” and “We are now married,” rather than say, “You are now husband and wife.” We completely respect the fact that some religions might want to continue always to use the gendered terms “husband” and “wife”—that is fine—but we want religions such as the Quakers and the Unitarians, in addition to the Humanists, to have the option of respecting privacy and dignity and allowing gender-neutral language when somebody is technically entering a mixed-sex marriage but does not perceive themselves as being the gender that is on their legal status.

John Finnie: Thank you. Can you perhaps expand on the so-called spousal veto to the bill?

James Morton: The spousal veto amendment is needed to remove the ability of a spouse to obstruct for years their partner’s gender recognition. The European Court of Human Rights has recognised that for someone to have their gender identity legally recognised and respected by their Government is a human right. That is a very personal issue and is not something that another person should be able to block.

We want to ensure that the balance is correct. We feel that it is disproportionate to allow a spouse to block the whole gender recognition of their partner, but we recognise that some spouses might feel very strongly that they want the marriage to continue to be seen in the original way and to have the marriage certificate only in the original way as it was originally solemnised.

Our proposed amendment would allow the transgender spouse to receive their gender recognition while remaining married, but without their partner’s consent the marriage would not be re-registered to show the new details. The bill regards a marriage between a trans person and a non-trans person that happens before someone’s gender recognition as a protected marriage. There is therefore no change to the pension rights, parental rights or any aspect of the marriage because the gender recognition of one party is granted. It is recognised that when the marriage was entered into, it was a mixed-sex marriage.

We feel that the proposed amendment would enable a balance between the rights to gender recognition for the trans person, which is their individual human right, and the rights of the non-trans spouse to avoid being given a marriage certificate that reflects new details. Indeed, we feel that our proposed amendment would provide better protection for spouses who do not wish to divorce their transgender partner. They might be against divorce—perhaps for religious reasons—and not want to have any change noted on their marriage certificate, because they feel strongly that how it was originally solemnised is what counts.

Marco Biagi: My understanding is that the veto applies to the application for gender recognition, but in order to apply for gender recognition, a person would have to have been living as the other gender for two years, during which time we would presumably expect that, if there was an objection, other measures such as divorce would have been carried through. Is that correct?
James Morton: Yes. In effect, the gender recognition part has less impact on the non-trans spouse than the decision by the trans spouse to come out and start living publicly in their new gender for at least two years. That point, two or more years before the gender recognition, is when they change their driving licence, bank cards, passport, employment records, national health service records—that is all changed—and they live publicly in their new gender. If their partner is profoundly uncomfortable with that and does not wish to remain married to a transgender person who has transitioned, they would have had more than two years in which to start divorce proceedings on the ground of unreasonable behaviour.

Our amendment does not remove any rights for people to divorce their transgender partner. Indeed, the gender recognition has less impact than the original medical treatment and social gender change that have already occurred have.

Marco Biagi: The transition sounds as though it could be quite an arduous process for people, both bureaucratically and, potentially, emotionally.

James Morton: Yes. We recognise that it can be profoundly difficult for a spouse to come to terms with their partner’s transition. That is another reason why we think that access to gender recognition should be separated from the issue of whether they continue their marriage. Sometimes, it can take a number of years for people to feel more at ease with the experience and they may want to wait and see how they feel rather than have to make a vast decision in order to allow their partner gender recognition.

John Finnie: In your written submission, there is a suggestion about the reinstatement of rules for securing gender recognition. Can you expand on why that is important in relation to the legislation, please?

James Morton: Back when the Gender Recognition Act 2004 was introduced, there was a two-year period in which people who had been transitioned for more than six years were allowed to have their gender recognised without having to provide the same level of medical evidence as others. The standard route requires that a person provide not only a letter from their GP detailing what medical treatment they have had for gender reassignment, but a letter from a gender specialist evidencing exactly how they were diagnosed. They can access such a letter only while they are still in touch with that gender specialist, and if someone has been transitioned for more than six years they will be out of the system and will no longer be attending a gender identity clinic. Therefore, they will have to try to re-enter the system, in which it currently takes between one and two years to get a first appointment. They will also be taking up a space that could otherwise go to somebody in greater need simply in order to get re-diagnosted for the purposes of proof for the gender recognition panel.

We propose that the long-term transitions route be reopened in recognition of the fact that some people could not access it the first time round because they did not want to divorce or because they disagreed with the discriminatory requirement for other people to divorce and felt that, on principle, they should not take advantage of a system that their fellow trans people could not access. We feel that that would be of benefit not only to transgender people but to the gender recognition panel because, when there is a difficulty in gathering evidence, that makes the process of trying to help an individual to get through the gender recognition process more time consuming for the panel. We feel that it would be to the benefit of all to reinstate that option and to require people who have been transitioned for more than six years to provide only a GP letter evidencing their medical treatment, to enable them to have their gender recognised on that ground.

Marco Biagi: Can I follow that up before you move on? I seek some clarification. Are you referring to that process being put in place for people who were eligible for it originally because of the period for which they had been transitioned rather than that route being reopened retrospectively for all people?

James Morton: We think that it would be best simply to reopen the route and not try to define exactly who would be eligible for it. The UK Government has tried to effect a restricted opening of it, but it seems not to have got the grouping quite right. It is hard to select exactly the right people, and we think that there are other reasons why people might need to use the long-term transitions route. For example, if they live in a rural Highland area they might not yet even have heard of the Gender Recognition Act 2004. It can take a long time for people who have been long-term transitioned and are no longer in contact with any transgender groups—people who are now just living their lives—to find out about their rights and be able to access things. We feel that it would be fairest simply to open the route for anybody who has been transitioned for more than six years.

Marco Biagi: Are statistics available on how many people used the route when it was open for two years? Could you provide that information in writing later if you do not have it to hand?

James Morton: Yes. I would need to ask the gender recognition panel to provide those statistics, but we can collect them and pass them on.
John Finnie: My final question relates to the current requirement that a person be at least 18 years to secure a gender recognition certificate. Given that some people might see your suggestion of lowering the age limit to 16 as controversial, would you like to explain why you think such a move is appropriate?

James Morton: Transgender people aged 16 or 17 will remain discriminated against under the bill as drafted: because they are unable to legally change their gender, they will be unable to access a marriage or civil partnership as they identify.

Making the age at which someone can get a gender recognition certificate equal to the age at which they can undertake the life-changing decision to marry and found a family would not in any way encourage more people to transition or encourage people to transition at a younger age. After all, this is not about the start point of a transition but about recognising the end point; it is not about access to medical treatment but about recognising the small but significant number of transgender people whose identity as the other gender is so profound and so known to them from a young age that with parental support they have been living in the other gender throughout their teenage years. Only with parental support could they have changed their school and NHS records and their name and therefore be able to evidence their readiness for a gender recognition certificate at the age of 16.

Without that certificate, those people will, for example, be unable to get married in the church that they wish to get married in. After all, although the Church of Scotland regularly marries transgender people and their spouses, the minister in question might not perform same-sex marriages. As a result, 16 and 17-year-old transgender people are being discriminated against.

In answer to your question, we do not think that our proposal, which enables people to make various decisions about their lives at the age at which Scotland recognises their legal capacity to do so—in other words, 16—is controversial.

John Finnie: You mentioned the phrase “parental support” twice in your response. Is that pivotal to this process?

James Morton: Yes. To transition at a young age, you need your parents' support as well as the support of a child and adolescent psychiatrist who specialises in gender identity issues. A young person cannot simply make and go forward with such a decision on their own. They will be very carefully assessed; indeed, they would have been able to change their name and school and NHS records—which is required to be done at least two years before any gender recognition certificate is issued—only if they had been well supported.

John Finnie: Thank you. I am grateful for that response.

Brandi Lee Lough Dennell: Young people are aware of their gender identity far earlier than they are aware of their sexual orientation.

We work with a number of trans young people who began their transition long before the age of 16. When we consulted the trans young people in our service, we found that a large number of them were very upset by the fact that at 16 they could leave education, get a job or get married but could not legally have their gender recognised. For them, there was a very large disconnect in that respect. In fact, on this very issue, a young person told us:

“I’m currently 17 and am going away to college next year. I would much prefer to have myself as male on the official records, but they need to have my ‘real’ details on the system.”

In our consultation, we also asked young people whether the age at which they could get a GRC, which is 18 at the moment, had stopped any of them from entering into a marriage, and several young people told us that they had delayed marriage in order to receive their GRC. If the bill as drafted is passed, someone who enters into a marriage when they are 16 would have to wait until 18 to get their GRC and then would have to re-register their marriage afterwards. If the bill does not pass, they will not have the option.

One young person said:

“I’m 18 and am currently engaged. My partner and I have been engaged for approximately a year and a half now and we were both very keen to be legally married and had planned to do so the summer following our engagement. However, as the age of GRC is 18 and at the time we were 17, we couldn’t get married... [Changing the age of GRC to 16] would have made a huge difference, my partner and I could have been married when we had originally planned.”

They could then have begun their lives together.

Marco Biagi: I would be interested in a religious perspective on gender transition and how you view it within your congregations, Mr Phillips. You are sitting quietly, but you get a question; you are not getting away with it.

09:00

John Phillips: In the Society of Friends, we see God within each individual person. We would look at each couple individually and try to think what the right approach is for that couple. We would help them with marriage preparation and relationship preparation irrespective of their gender or sexuality. The question has not arisen, and I cannot imagine it giving us a problem.
Marco Biagi: To a great extent, we have covered the witnesses’ perception of the difference between civil partnerships and marriage. In what way has the attitude towards civil partnerships changed since they were introduced? At the time, their introduction was welcomed and, now, organisations are looking for more. Will the witnesses explain that change?

Tim Hopkins: I looked back through meetings that we had with the committee in the past and discovered that we gave evidence almost exactly 10 years ago—in October 2003—about exactly that question because the committee was taking evidence on the Scottish Government’s consultation about introducing civil partnerships.

We said then that civil partnerships were the right measure to introduce and that they would be of huge benefit to same-sex couples because they would allow such couples to have a legally recognised relationship for the first time and would give them the legal protections of that. However, we also said that it was not equality—that it would be a separate but equal system—and that, in the medium term, the only thing that would be true equality would be to open up marriage to same-sex couples and to open up civil partnerships to mixed-sex couples, because the two are different and the same choices should be available to couples regardless of gender.

We also said in 2003 that it would take several years for there to be a public discussion with politicians about opening up marriage to same-sex couples. That was 10 years ago. Those several years and more have now passed. There has been wide discussion publicly and within the Parliament about opening up same-sex marriage for four years. That is why we are now in a different situation from 10 years ago. Ten years ago, it was not time for same-sex marriage; now, it is time.

Colin Macfarlane: To go back to the points that I made earlier, the issue is the distinction in how society views gay people. Tim Hopkins is right that, 10 years ago, we thought that civil partnerships would erode some of those distinctions and that the public discourse on how society views gay people would shift and change. However, I go back to the hard evidence that I showed you about 216,000 people having seen homophobic bullying in the workplace. Children in our schools are still suffering some form of homophobic abuse.

The distinction has not shifted, and gay people have come to the view that, until they are seen as equal in the eyes of the law, which the bill would achieve—it would cement legality in the eyes of the law; it would confer on gay people the same rights and responsibilities that their straight friends and family have—that distinction will not be eroded.

That is why the bill is important for shifting the distinction. We are firmly of the view that it would be the vehicle to change perception in society. Tim Hopkins is absolutely right that it is about how gay people are seen in society and how that discourse happens in society. Until gay people are seen as equal in the eyes of the law, the distinction will remain and not be eroded.

Marco Biagi: How does that reconcile with the opt-in approach in the bill, whereby any religious organisation that wishes will be able not to opt in and, therefore, continue with its practice? In 10 years’ time, will you be coming back and saying that the situation has evolved and those organisations should be required to opt in?

Colin Macfarlane: The opt-in is right and the balance in the bill is right. It is not for any of us on the panel to tell a religious organisation what it should do. It is for the religious organisation to come to that conclusion itself through discussion and prayer. I cannot envisage a time when we would ask any organisation that still did not want to carry out same-sex marriage to do so. The bill has the right balance on freedom of speech and freedom of religion.

What is also brilliant about the bill is that it allows organisations that wish to allow same-sex marriage the opportunity to do so. It is not right for one religion to tell another religion whether it should be allowed to carry out same-sex marriage. The opt-in system is absolutely right. That permissive system gets it right, and the Scottish Government should be applauded for that.

Tim Hopkins: I agree with that. One thing that has changed in the past 10 years is that a number of religious organisations, including the Quakers in 2009, have decided that they want to conduct same-sex marriages. You asked what things would be like 10 years from now. Possibly some of the other churches will have decided in 10 years’ time that they want to conduct same-sex marriages. As Colin Macfarlane says, that has to be a decision taken by the churches within the churches. We can rest assured that that is the way that things will go.

Let us consider one other area of sex discrimination law. The laws have now been in place for about 40 years, and discrimination on grounds of sex is not allowed, but it is allowed for religious bodies. The Roman Catholic Church, for example, is allowed to employ only men as priests. Over those 40 years, there have been no moves to try to force the Roman Catholic Church through the courts to employ women as priests. Everybody understands that it is up to each individual church to decide whether or not they want to open up their ministry to women, and those decisions are rightly made within the church.

Some people have said that this bill provides a balance between equality on grounds of sexual orientation and better equality on grounds of gender identity, balanced against religious freedom. That is the wrong way to look at it. It is not a balance of those two things against each other; the bill promotes both at the same time. It increases sexual orientation equality and it increases freedom by allowing religious bodies such as that of John Phillips to conduct same-sex marriage while completely protecting the rights of religious bodies that do not want to conduct same-sex marriages not to do so.

Siobhan McMahon: This is not meant as an inflammatory comment, but I seek a bit of clarification. On civil partnerships, you said in your answer to Marco Biagi that it was not time for same-sex marriage 10 years ago, but it is now. Yet, in submissions that we have received, equal marriage is seen as being the same as the civil rights movement—the two have been equated by some people. We would not have said at any point that it was not time to have equal rights for those of different races, so I am wondering about that point. Could you expand on why it was not time then? If it is about equality, surely it is always time to do what is right.

Tim Hopkins: That may relate to the way that we work as an organisation. We try to work in a consensual way, and we try not to work in an embattled way, which would set us up against other organisations. Ten years ago, we recognised that same-sex marriage was quite contentious. In 2002, when we developed the policy, only one country in the world—the Netherlands—had same-sex marriage, and a lot of countries had civil partnership. Now, all the countries surrounding us in western Europe apart from Ireland already have same-sex marriage, and the Irish Government is working on it. The whole context has moved on.

Public opinion has also moved on. Back in 2002, the Scottish social attitudes survey found that 41 per cent of Scots were in favour of same-sex marriage. By 2006, that had risen to 53 per cent. By 2010, it had risen to 61 per cent of Scots in favour of same-sex marriage, with only 19 per cent against. We try to work in a consensual way.

The other factor is that, when the Parliament was set up 14 years ago, there was quite a long list of legislation that discriminated against gay people and LGBT people and against same-sex couples. For example, there was a different age of consent for sex between men; there was section 28, which needed to be repealed; there was no recognition in law of cohabiting same-sex couples; adoption and fostering were not available to same-sex couples; sex offences law discriminated against same-sex couples; and there was no hate-crime legislation. It was a long list. We have been addressing those issues and, to the credit of the Parliament, it has been dealing with them one by one.

This is the last one. In terms of sexual orientation equality, this is the last big area where the law still discriminates against LGB people. If the Parliament passes the bill, which we hope it will, it can be very proud of the way in which the situation has been turned around in the past 14 years, and the very substantial discrimination that LGB people felt and faced 14 years ago will finally have been eradicated from the law.

Siobhan McMahon: I have a question on the points made by Mr Macfarlane. You mentioned the living together report and workplace bullying. I am more familiar with the living together report. You equate people who have said that we should tackle homophobic behaviour in schools with people of faith who also hold that view. However, people who support tackling such behaviour through action in schools may not support equal marriage. Do you see that those are two separate matters?

Colin Macfarlane: Do you mean in terms of teachers or—

Siobhan McMahon: No, I am referring to the general public. Of course people want to tackle homophobia and bullying in schools—your report says that 92 per cent people of faith stated that schools should tackle that. However, those same people may not necessarily support equal marriage. Do you see that in your studies?

Colin Macfarlane: Let me be clear: people who do not agree with equal marriage do not necessarily agree with discrimination against LGBT people. Just because a person does not believe in equal marriage, that does not make them, for example, homophobic. We have always said that and been clear about that distinction.

There is a related issue. If people say that LGBT issues should be discussed in our school classrooms, that is how we should tackle homophobic abuse. We clearly believe that people of faith believe that too, which is shown by the 92 per cent figure that you referred to.

We are not saying that supporting moves to eradicate discrimination against LGBT people is incompatible with a view not to support equal marriage. We would never say that a person must support equal marriage and that, by doing so, they are therefore in favour of eradicating discrimination against people in schools. There will be people of faith who clearly think that any discrimination against LGBT people is wrong but whose faith says to them that they should not believe in equal marriage. That does not mean... that they are homophobic in any way, shape or form.

John Mason: I will follow up Marco Biagi’s point about the movement of attitudes over time. Mr Hopkins mentioned adoption. That is an example of an approach that was permissive to begin with and which has then become compulsory. I think that the original suggestion was that adoption agencies should be able to place children with same sex couples, and assurances were given that agencies that did not agree with that approach could operate in their own way and refer on such matters to other agencies. However, over time, that has changed, and agencies are now compelled to place children with same-sex couples or they will lose their charitable status. That is a fear. Do you recognise the concern that, by permitting same-sex marriage, it will then become compulsory?

Tim Hopkins: I recognise that the adoption agency issue has been raised. The situation is not quite as you have described it. In 2007, two pieces of legislation were dealt with at the same time. The Scottish Parliament dealt with legislation to allow same-sex couples to apply jointly to be adoptive parents, because that is a devolved matter. What the law says about bodies that provide public services with public money and discriminate on religion, sexual orientation or any other ground is a reserved matter. As such, that issue was dealt with down in London at Westminster, which passed the Equality Act (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2007.

Westminster debated carefully the specific issue of adoption agencies and whether it was valid for adoption agencies to simply turn away all same-sex couples. Both Houses of Parliament concluded that they should not do that because adoption agencies use taxpayers’ money to provide services. For example, councils pay adoption agencies to match up prospective adoptive parents with children. Westminster’s view, which I agree with, is that where public services are being supplied and being paid for by public money—we all pay our taxes, whether we are heterosexual, lesbian, gay or bisexual—those public services should be made available to everybody. That is why adoption agencies are required to allow same-sex couples to apply to adopt. There is no right to adopt; anyone who applies is put through a stringent vetting process before they are accepted as adoptive parents.

09:15

If you look at the stage 3 debate in the Scottish Parliament on the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Bill, you will see that the Scottish Executive specifically referred to the fact that it was the Westminster legislation that was then under consideration that would determine whether it would be valid for adoption agencies simply to turn away all same-sex couples. In fact, the situation has not changed since that legislation came into effect.

I say that with one proviso. The Westminster legislation on adoption agencies, which said that there should be no discrimination, came into effect in April 2007, but because some of the religion-affiliated adoption agencies had said, “We need time to adjust to this”, the Westminster Parliament agreed to allow a period of 20 months for them to make that adjustment. The rule that adoption agencies should not discriminate therefore actually came into effect at the end of 2008. The adoption legislation in Scotland that allowed same-sex couples to adopt did not come into effect until—I think—2009, so the rule applying to adoption agencies was already in place before it even became possible in Scotland for same-sex couples to adopt. Things have not changed since that legislation—

John Mason: The distinction that you are making is that adoption is a public service and it is paid for by the public, whereas marriage is a public service but it is not paid for by the public.

Tim Hopkins: No. I would not call marriage a public service. As far as marriage that is done by religious bodies is concerned, it is a religious function—it is a sacrament as far as some churches are concerned.

John Mason: Surely it is a public service. It is part of the legal system.

Tim Hopkins: It is recognised in law, but it is clearly a religious function. In fact, the amendments to the Equality Act 2010 that are going to be made if and when the bill is passed make it clear that it is a religious function of churches.

The Convener: Thank you. I ask Christian Allard to ask his questions.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): I thank the witnesses for coming. Tim Hopkins has talked a lot about what has happened in other countries and down south. Will the other members of the panel tell us more about what they think about the bill?

If we compare Scotland with other countries, we know that the consultation started in 2011, and a lot of things have happened in the past two years. I would like to hear your views on what has happened in other countries and what the consequences of the bill will be in Scotland. In particular, on a more technical point, I would love to know your views on the issue of marriage for couples who have a foreign civil partnership but wish to marry in Scotland.
Tim Hopkins: I will deal first with what we expect the bill’s effect to be. About 500 couples per year enter civil partnerships in Scotland, and the consultation that we have done with LGBT people suggests that the majority of those will choose a same-sex marriage rather than a civil partnership. Those are the numbers that we are talking about. We also expect—we hope, in fact—that a fair number of foreign same-sex couples will come to Scotland to marry. Just under a quarter of all marriages in Scotland are between people who do not reside here. They are called tourist marriages. That helps the Scottish economy, and we hope that that will be the case with same-sex marriages as well.

Anybody can come here from any country in the world and get married, so that will be the case with same-sex marriages as well. It does not matter whether the home country recognises same-sex marriage. There is, however, an anomaly in the bill, and it relates to the changing of civil partnership into marriage—you asked about that.

Under the bill, a couple can change their civil partnership into a marriage in two ways. The first is an administrative route whereby they apply to the registrar and say, “Please change my registration from civil partnership to marriage.” That is available only for people who registered their civil partnership in Scotland, for obvious reasons, because the registration to be changed is there on the record.

The other way in which a couple can change their civil partnership to a marriage under the bill is simply to marry in the normal way. At the moment, the bill says that they can do that only if their civil partnership was registered in Scotland, for obvious reasons, because the registration to be changed is there on the record.

The Convener: I will deal first with what we expect the bill’s effect to be. About 500 couples per year enter civil partnerships in Scotland, and the consultation that we have done with LGBT people suggests that the majority of those will choose a same-sex marriage rather than a civil partnership. Those are the numbers that we are talking about. We also expect—we hope, in fact—that a fair number of foreign same-sex couples will come to Scotland to marry. Just under a quarter of all marriages in Scotland are between people who do not reside here. They are called tourist marriages. That helps the Scottish economy, and we hope that that will be the case with same-sex marriages as well.

Anybody can come here from any country in the world and get married, so that will be the case with same-sex marriages as well. It does not matter whether the home country recognises same-sex marriage. There is, however, an anomaly in the bill, and it relates to the changing of civil partnership into marriage—you asked about that.

Under the bill, a couple can change their civil partnership into a marriage in two ways. The first is an administrative route whereby they apply to the registrar and say, “Please change my registration from civil partnership to marriage.” That is available only for people who registered their civil partnership in Scotland, for obvious reasons, because the registration to be changed is there on the record.

The other way in which a couple can change their civil partnership to a marriage under the bill is simply to marry in the normal way. At the moment, the bill says that they can do that only if their civil partnership was registered in Scotland, for obvious reasons, because the registration to be changed is there on the record.

The problem arises in the period between when they get the dissolution and when they enter their same-sex marriage, which might be a few weeks later. For that period of time, they do not have protections because they are regarded in law as unmarried. You are therefore quite right to identify that there is a practical problem in that regard, and it applies during that period.

James Morton: There are also issues with regard to immigration status. In order to ensure that people can live in Scotland with their partner, the immigration services would need to be satisfied that they are truly a couple. All the business of having to split up and get back together could easily result in immigration services being less than convinced that everything is above board.

Colin Macfarlane: There is also the human factor: the very fact that two people who are in a loving, committed and stable relationship would have to split for a year. That is particularly cruel. Our view is that, although only a small number of people will be affected, they are—as Tim Hopkins said—real people. The bill should be amended, and that could be done very simply. We agree with the principles that Tim has set out.

The Convener: Are you finished, Christian?

Christian Allard: No—I would like to bring in some of the other panel members on the question of anticipated demand for the religious and belief registration of civil partnership if and when same-sex marriage becomes available.

John Phillips: I am sorry; I did not quite follow the question, but I understand that you want clarification about when we would introduce those—

Christian Allard: No—I just want to project into the future. With regard to Tim Hopkins’s answer about what will happen if the bill is passed, do you think that there will be a much lower demand for registration of civil partnerships, and a much higher demand for same-sex marriage?

John Phillips: Thank you. I understand. I would not want you to get the impression that the Society of Friends was not delighted with civil partnership legislation when it was introduced. We saw it as a significant and important step forward in equality. It is only through experience that we have learned, and really begun to appreciate, that same-sex couples feel that it makes them different in a way that we are unhappy about. We wish for inclusivity.

We very much want to opt in to being allowed to conduct same-sex marriages, and we are convinced that when we have done so there will not really be any demand among our congregations for civil partnerships, because we know that marriage is what they have been seeking.

Nevertheless, we applaud the steps on equality generally that the measures that the Scottish Parliament has introduced will take, because they will give everybody all options. That seems to us to be right, although I do not think that it will apply in our case.

Brandi Lee Lough Dennell: The LGBT national youth council has campaigned on equal marriage since 2009. Under its concept is the idea of opening up marriage and civil partnerships to all couples; the focus should be on adding not just same-sex marriage but civil partnerships for mixed-sex couples, particularly given some of the issues that we have talked about. Bisexual couples and trans people who do not want to pursue a GRC are limited by their birth sex, for instance, to having one sort of relationship or another.

People also feel that it is a matter of equality that couples cannot choose between marriage and civil partnership. Some couples would rather have a marriage to recognise their relationship in relation to society and other couples would prefer a civil partnership. For LGBT young people, same-sex marriages as well as mixed-sex civil partnerships are important issues of equality.

Marco Biagi: I take that point, but when Sweden and Denmark legalised same-sex marriage, their experience was that their equivalent of the civil partnership became redundant. Those countries ceased to offer that option to new entrants—I am not sure whether “entrants” is the right word, but you know what I mean. That arose from the view that the civil partnership was created purely as a compromise to avoid providing equal marriage and had become useless. If marriage is equalised, why will there be a need to continue with civil partnerships?

Brandi Lee Lough Dennell: We consulted LGBT young people in seven youth groups and we consulted two schools on the draft bill. We asked them several questions about education issues as well as about mixed-sex civil partnerships. We asked how they would be affected if mixed-sex civil partnerships were not introduced. I do not have the quotations, which I can send after the meeting, but a sizeable number of responses showed that young people would in that case not have a relationship status that represented their ideals. Some do not want to identify with marriage, which has thus far excluded them; they would rather choose another option. Others feel that, even if they were to choose not a civil partnership but marriage, it would be unfair that some couples could choose marriage or a civil partnership while others could not choose a civil partnership. For them, it is about opening up all options.

Marco Biagi: I accept that it is unfair for one couple to be offered marriage while another is offered marriage or a civil partnership, but why should the civil partnership need to be offered to both rather than to neither?

Brandi Lee Lough Dennell: Some of the young people whom we spoke to would prefer a civil partnership; they would choose that when they reached the age to do so.

Colin Macfarlane: I will move away from mixed-sex civil partnerships for a moment. The bill will allow the celebration of religious or belief civil partnerships. We agree with that, primarily because some LGBT people of faith do not necessarily want to marry, for whatever reason, so they want to have the option of a civil partnership.

We do not know yet what the bill’s effect on civil partnerships will be. The Scottish Government has announced a review of civil partnerships, which is a pragmatic and sensible policy decision. Until we have hard evidence on what might happen to civil partnerships, it is a good thing that civil partnerships will be open to religious and belief blessings. We do not know yet what the evidence will be; we should wait for the Scottish Government’s review and we look forward to seeing what it produces.

Tim Hopkins: Marco Biagi mentioned a couple of Scandinavian countries that abolished civil partnerships for “new entrants”, as he put it, when same-sex marriage was introduced. That is one way to go, but a number of other countries—including France, Belgium, the Netherlands, New Zealand and South Africa—chose to retain civil partnerships alongside marriage when marriage was opened to same-sex couples.

In the Netherlands, the situation is quite similar to what we would like to see here: civil partnership and marriage are both available and have similar legal effects, but they are different and they are seen to be different. If you look at the stats in the Netherlands, about one quarter of same-sex couples choose civil partnership rather than marriage and three quarters choose marriage. About 90 per cent of mixed-sex couples choose marriage, but 10 per cent choose civil partnership.

09:30
Our surveys of LGBT people in this country have found similar proportions for same-sex couples. About one quarter of same-sex couples who are not currently in a civil partnership have said to us that in the future, they would like a civil partnership and not a marriage, for the kinds of reasons that have already been touched on, whereas three quarters would prefer a marriage.

Countries including Sweden have abolished civil partnership; I wonder to what extent LGBT communities in Sweden wanted that to happen. Clearly, it was a decision of the Swedish Parliament. I would guess that had civil partnership been retained in Sweden, you would find a similar minority of people wanting to enter a civil partnership.

It is simply about maximising choices for everybody. Ideally, we would have liked to see mixed-sex civil partnership in the bill, but there is a lot in the bill already and there needs to be consultation and discussion about the future of civil partnership. Should it be opened up to all couples, regardless of gender, or should it be got rid of, as happened in Sweden?

We very much welcome the Scottish Government’s review that was announced in June. We think it important that that review start soon. It has taken two years to get to the bill from when the consultation on same-sex marriage started. We very much hope that in two years some of us might be back here talking about legislation that would open up civil partnership to couples of any gender.

John Mason: As regards protection for those who disagree, the Equality Network submission seems to agree with the Government’s plan that people on the periphery of marriage, such as chauffeurs and photographers, should not have the freedom to choose not to take part in a same-sex marriage. Is that not just moving the discrimination away from the LGBT community on to the religious community?

Tim Hopkins: The situation will not change at all. Wedding photographers are already required by law not to discriminate against civil partnerships so it is already the case that a commercial organisation that is selling photography services must not discriminate on grounds of religion, gender, race, disability or sexual orientation, which means that it must provide its services for civil partnerships, so—

John Mason: The fact that it is law does not mean that we all agree with it, though.

Tim Hopkins: I accept that there will be differences of opinion about that, but my point is that the law is not changing.

We think that the Government has got it right because we think that there is a difference, as I said before, between the operation of religious bodies, including the provision of all kinds of religious services by religious bodies, and the provision of commercial services or employment by somebody who has a personal religious belief.

We do not think that it is appropriate to allow somebody’s personal religious or philosophical beliefs to give them an opt-out from antidiscrimination legislation as an employer, for example, or as a commercial business selling services to the public. Where would that end? If somebody has a philosophical belief that is strongly against mixed-race marriages, are we saying that that person should be able to refuse to supply services to people who are entering a mixed-race marriage? Are we saying that public servants such as the people who empty my rubbish bins, for example, will be allowed to say, “Well, I strongly disagree with same-sex marriage, therefore I don’t want to empty the rubbish bins of people who are in same-sex marriages.” I do not want to sound flippant, but the law says that such sexual orientation discrimination should not happen.
We are very clear that where a business is supplying commercial services to the public, where public services are provided to the public using taxpayers' money, and where non-religious employers are employing people, every member of the public and every employee should be treated with respect. I believe that the large majority of people would not have a problem with that. I may have a religious or philosophical objection to a number of things, but that does not mean that I will treat my colleagues at work, or the people to whom I would sell food if I were running a food stall with disrespect and refuse to serve them.

John Mason: There are two things there: one is respect and one is refusal to serve. I do not accept that the two are necessarily the same, but we can leave that, just now.

What about the model that we have in the NHS for abortion, which is, similarly, a very controversial subject? It is specified in legislation that there is protection for people who do not want to take part in abortions. That is relevant because it has been used in court cases quite recently. Is not that a good model of a kind of pluralistic society in which the public sector pays but services can be provided in different ways to fit in with both the employees and the public?

Tim Hopkins: I do not think that same-sex marriage can be compared to abortion. You are, of course, quite right that there is a conscientious objection route for people who work in the health service who disagree with abortion. There is also a similar route for people who have a conscientious objection to fighting in the armed services in wars. Why are those routes provided? For abortion, it is because if a person has particular religious beliefs about it and is asked to be involved in one, that person would believe that they were being asked to be involved in murder. The same is true for people who have a conscientious objection to fighting in the armed services during war. Those opt-outs exist so that people are not required to be involved in committing what would be murder, according to their own beliefs.

That is very different from asking a civil registrar to sign off on a civil same-sex marriage. Civil marriage ceremonies are not allowed to include any religious content, so religion does not come into it at all. The registrar is simply there to conduct a completely secular ceremony and then to sign the piece of paper to acknowledge that the couple have said their vows and signed up and that their witnesses have signed as well. Asking somebody to do that is not comparable to asking somebody to commit what they believe is murder.

We think that it is quite reasonable to say that civil registrars should be expected to sign off on same-sex marriages. Similarly, a civil registrar who holds Roman Catholic beliefs against divorce and believes that divorce is wrong is not allowed to refuse to marry divorced people. We say that civil marriage is an entirely secular, non-religious function and that civil registrars should provide that function to all couples regardless of their personal beliefs about those couples' lifestyles.

The Convener: I will bring in Colin Macfarlane very briefly, then I have one final question to be asked.

Colin Macfarlane: I agree with Tim Hopkins. I think that most gay people listening to the comparison of gay people's long-term committed loving relationships with abortion would be really hurt and disappointed by that.

I reiterate what Tim said, which is that registrars perform a public service that is paid for by the public purse, and LGBT people pay their taxes in the same way as everybody else. They deserve and expect exactly the same standard of service as everybody else, be it good or bad. Tim is right that providing an opt-out is a Pandora's box, because as soon as you have an opt-out in one area, for example same-sex marriage, you can then start having questions around opt-outs for people who have issues around mixed-faith marriage or mixed-race marriage and, as Tim also clearly stated, for people who might have objections to divorce. The fact is this: registrars provide a public service that is paid for by the public purse and everybody, including gay people, deserves exactly the same standard and level of service.

The Convener: Thank you very much. I will move on to Jim Eadie. I ask everyone who is going to be answering the questions to keep it short because we are now running out of time. Thank you.

Jim Eadie: I will be very brief, convener. Thank you for the opportunity to attend the meeting and to participate in it. I thank the witnesses for their evidence, which I think has been incredibly enlightening.

I want to clarify the importance of the legislation for ensuring transgender equality. That point has been made very forcefully this morning. In answer to questions from Mr Biagi and Mr Finnie, Mr Morton took us through the specifics and talked about the spousal veto, gender-recognition certificates and the evidence requirements for people transitioning to a new gender over quite an extended period of six years and more. He then talked about the age of application to the gender-recognition panel.

Notwithstanding those concerns and the further modifications to the bill that you seek, are you largely satisfied with the bill's provision for an administrative procedure that would allow James Morton: Yes. It is important to transgender people and their partners who want an updated marriage certificate following gender recognition that they will not be required to go through a ceremony. Their marriage is continuing—it is not a new marriage. The fact that it has continued throughout the difficult experience of one party transitioning is of prime importance to them. It would be deeply offensive to them were we to require them to go through a ceremony. The whole point of removing the requirement to divorce for gender recognition is about recognising the continuance of those marriages and the right for those marriages to continue. It is very important to transgender people to have an administrative function to update the certificate.

From a transgender perspective, civil partnerships were never satisfactory; they never removed the problems with the lack of same-sex marriage. From the start of the work to try to achieve gender recognition, and the Gender Recognition Act 2004, transgender people were always of the view that their marriages must be able to continue and that the new gender status of one party should not matter. What counts is the fact that a commitment for life was made in the marriage. We are very pleased that the bill recognises that.

We hope that the committee will take time to look in detail at the transgender amendments. During the consultation on the draft bill, the transgender parts were still being finalised. Those improvements are still needed. They are not yet as refined as the changes to the Equality Act 2010 and so on.

The Convener: Are there any other comments before I suspend the meeting?

Tim Hopkins: There is one issue, convener, that is referred to in the last couple of pages of our written submission. We had identified what we think are three slight technical errors or omissions in the bill. They are not matters of policy; they are simply about the wording in the bill being—we think—not quite right. If the committee thinks that it is appropriate, I would be grateful if it would ask the Scottish Government whether they could be put right.

The Convener: Thank you.

Brandi Lee Lough Dennell: I will be brief. My point is about education. We spoke about registrars providing a public service. Teachers also provide a public service. According to the General Teaching Council for Scotland’s code of professionalism and conduct, teachers need to be committed to social justice and inclusion, which includes social justice for all young people in education. They need to recognise the legislation in the country and the commitment to inclusion that includes LGBT young people in education.

Articles 12 and 13 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child say that young people have a right to a say in decisions that affect them and a right to receive information that is relevant to them. That is key because we know that when LGBT young people do not see themselves in the curriculum they feel excluded and that they cannot achieve. They are also much more likely to experience homophobic, biphobic and transphobic bullying.

Getting it right for every child promotes all of the indicators, but it especially promotes safe, healthy and responsible individuals when there is, in education, inclusion of all identities in society.

Colin Macfarlane: On that point from Brandi Lee Lough Dennell about education, at Stonewall Scotland we work with hundreds of schools and hundreds of teachers. Not one teacher has raised a concern with us about discussing same-sex marriage in the classroom. However, many of those teachers have been worried about some of the debate around marriage in education, such as talk about opt-outs and conscience clauses. They are very worried that we will see a return to the days of section 2A in our classrooms and are clear that they do not want a return to those days. I would say that probably no member of the committee would want to return to the days when same-sex issues and relationships could not be discussed in our classrooms, because that caused so much hurt and harm to so many people.

The Convener: Thank you all for coming along to give evidence.

09:45
Meeting suspended.

10:00
On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel of witnesses. [Interruption.] I was just waiting for someone, who I think has just walked through the door. I invite you all to introduce yourselves.

Dr Salah Beltagui (Muslim Council of Scotland): I am from the Muslim Council of Scotland.

The Rev Dr David Easton (Methodist Church in Britain): I am the head of the Methodist Church of Scotland—in my first week in post. I am here to represent the Methodist Church in Britain.
John Deighan (Bishops’ Conference of Scotland): I am from the Catholic Parliamentary Office, which is an agency of the Catholic Bishops’ Conference of Scotland.

Kieran Turner (Evangelical Alliance Scotland): I work for the Evangelical Alliance in Scotland as its public policy officer.

The Convener: Thank you. I should say that the Parliament’s photographer is here and will take some photographs.

I invite members to ask questions. Please indicate if you want to respond, so that I can include you in the conversation.

Alex Johnstone: I have read the bill and the submissions that we have received, and it is clear that the organisations or groups of organisations that you represent are offered protection from the proposed legislation—in effect, you would have to opt in. Why are you worried about the bill?

Dr Beltagui: We are more worried about the principle than we are about the protection. I mean the principle of marriage and what it has meant throughout the history of mankind, as something for the creation of a family, and the importance of the family being based on the complementarity of the male and female, father and mother. In fact, I think that the whole physical world is based on that polarity, from atoms and cells to human beings. That principle is the basis of our main objection to the bill.

We collected evidence about the protections that the bill offers from many sources, all of which suggest that the protections might not be sustainable when a case is taken further, for example to a higher court such as the European Court of Human Rights. We have had experience of that. However, it is the principle—changing the whole history of marriage—that is worrying us.

The bill talks about changing the text of Scots law and so on to accommodate the change that the bill will make. Are we going to do that for all the documents in history that faith groups or nations have, so that when we read a document we will understand that what is meant by marriage is what was meant at the time and not what will be meant? Of course, if we adopt the approach in the bill, the next thing will be that people will not distinguish between the two, so we will get a completely different picture of what was said and recommended at other times, according to the new, different definition. It will be like changing the interpretation of everything in our heritage.

John Deighan: Salah Beltagui makes the point that the principle is the bigger question but, on the opt-in and the protections, although those are fair enough and the earlier panel was right that there are substantial protections around the celebration of the ceremony of a marriage, I do not think that they are fully robust. The earlier panel did not get to the crux of the matter, which is that a religious celebrant provides a public service, so there will be avenues through which those protections could be challenged further down the line. I believe that that has happened in Denmark, where a church has been told that it must provide religious celebrants. I think that there will be a challenge on that issue.

The broader issue is that there is a fundamental philosophical clash of opinions. There is a view that marriage is just a loving relationship between any two people who have committed themselves to each other, and then there is the traditional view, which is upheld by the Catholic Church, most of Christianity throughout time and most of western civilisation, that marriage centres around the fact that we create an environment to ensure that children have parents. That is the fundamental difference, and our grave concern is that, if we change the law as proposed, we will obscure that particular understanding.

So the bill will not satisfy everyone. There was talk earlier that the bill gives everyone the right option, but it does not. The issue is about how all of society, and not just religions, understand marriage. Is marriage about protecting children and ensuring that their parents are bound together so that they are there to bring up the children, or is it just a relationship that is a form of friendship? We believe that it is the former. We think that, for the common good of society, and particularly for children, we need to state that as a society and to protect it. That is about to be lost.

Marco Biagi: Do you have any quantitative evidence that it is the perception of the majority of people in Scotland that marriage should be for the purposes of procreation? After all, we have evidence from the Scottish social attitudes survey that the majority of people believe that same-sex marriage should be acceptable, so it seems hard for those two points to be squared.

John Deighan: The biggest survey and the most profound probing of public opinion was the Government’s consultation on the proposals, to which it received 77,000 responses. That was way greater than any other survey, which would typically involve 1,000 people. The consultation engaged people who really thought about the issue. We are in a live-and-let-live society—I have that approach myself—in which, if people want something, by all means we let them have it as long as it does not impact on the rest of society. Of the 77,000 people in Scotland who responded, 64 per cent said that same-sex marriage should not be approved and that we should not redefine marriage. So there is quantitative evidence on our side.
More broadly, the consequences have not been thought through. The issue is often an emotive one and we do not want people to have hurt feelings. There is often a focus on the fact that people feel hurt, embarrassed or humiliated because their relationship is not given a particular status. We believe that we have to have a rational basis for marriage. There are lots of friendships and they should always be valued. Every friendship should be valued in society, but why does the state take an interest in a particular relationship between a man and a woman? Fundamentally, we believe that it is because of the procreative capacity of that relationship. That is the only relationship out of which a child can come into the world. We want to ensure that that child is in the right environment. As the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child recognises, the priority should always be that the child is brought up with the parents, which is what marriage does—it keeps the parents together for the sake of the child.

John Finnie: On the question of procreative capacity, would you say that marriage is not appropriate for people whom we know in advance cannot conceive children?

John Deighan: No, I would not. Saying that marriage is the environment in which procreation takes place is not the same as saying that we have marriage for only that reason. Typically and traditionally throughout society, we have recognised three ends of marriage: first, that it is built on love, the couple definitely love each other and it is for the mutual comfort of the couple, as they are attracted to each other; secondly, that they have the capacity to have children; and, thirdly, that the common good of society is aided by having that stable foundation for family life. Those are the three ends of marriage.

Sometimes, those three ends do not always attain. For example, there are some people who just cannot have children. As a society we put a lot of effort into trying to help those people—we have adoption services and there is even quite an emphasis just now on fertility services—so we try to ensure that that environment is adequately understood and protected. We are not saying that anyone who cannot have children is not capable of entering marriage, but that is the archetypal model of what a marriage is.

Always throughout history, regardless of other changes, the inherent essence of what makes it marriage is the fact that there is complementarity between a man and a woman. The proposals before the committee are that man and woman do not matter—they are to be completely interchangeable. We do not think that reason supports that position.

John Finnie: If I noted you correctly—forgive me if I have not—you said that the purpose of marriage is to create an environment to ensure that children have parents. For you, “parents” means one man and one woman and could not involve any other combination.

John Deighan: Biologically, we know that parents are a mother and a father. Yes, that is what parents are.

Dr Beltagui: To add to what John Deighan has said, marriage is not just for the procreation of children but for the growing up of the children in the family, as has been explained. There are also the wider relationships of kinship within the family and extended family. If we lose that, we lose a lot of the cohesion of society. In relations based on the family, the children are the focus of those relations not only at the time when they are children; even when they grow up, there is still that relation between the children and their parents and grandparents. That is what holds society together, and it is important to keep that.

In our tradition, there are things—they are also mentioned in the bill—such as certain relations not being allowed to marry because they are so close in kinship. If we start changing the definition of marriage from what we know and what we know about who is coming from which line and who is not, there will be confusion and we will not know exactly where we stop and where we start. It will be very difficult to find out who is related to whom in those terms. Having a kinship relationship does not stop at only the father and mother—it is much wider than that—and not only for the time but also for the future of the family.

Alex Johnstone: I want to return to and complete the line of questioning that I started with, which is about the protections that are offered to religious organisations. I have been a member of this Parliament for a while and I participated some years ago in the vote on same-sex civil partnerships, which I voted against. I get the impression that what we are dealing with here is a progressive move and that we have been progressing towards where we are. In expressing their views, the people on the previous panel suggested that this was the end of the process and perhaps the line in the sand. Do you believe that to be the case, or do you believe that where we are today with this legislation is simply a continuing step in a progressive process that may result in further changes to your protections or your rights as religious organisations in future?

Kieran Turner: First, we welcome the fact that there is an opt-in system and that the Scottish Government has recognised that churches should be free to conduct marriages according to their conscience and according to their beliefs. We think that that is a good thing, but we know that that opinion is not shared by everyone. There are definitely some folk in Scotland who would say that churches should be forced to do this, so we welcome the fact that the Scottish Government has taken a sensible approach on that.

To answer your question, our concerns are, first, on the long-term robustness of that protection. How long will it hold out for? Will there be a court case at some point that will try to force a church to marry a couple that it does not feel that it can marry? We have already started to see moves towards that in England, and our concern is that that will come in Scotland. A case might go all the way to the European court, where it may be that the protection is struck down.

10:15

At the moment, our understanding is that it is still considered to be within the margin of appreciation for states, so it might be that that does not happen now. However, we would be concerned about that happening at some point in the future.

Our concerns for the future are much wider than the issue of the celebrant and the ceremony. They are about churches, organisations and individuals who still hold to a traditional view of marriage. Will their views be accepted in wider society? We appreciate that it is not the Government’s intention at the moment to say that that is an unacceptable view to hold, but will that come down the line? Will that have wider effects on churches and individuals?

Marco Biagi: So, your concern is not that this bill in itself will create difficulties; it is about subsequent court interpretation. For example, if the Parliament were to require everybody to offer same-sex marriages, that would require another bill. You are clear on that. What you are concerned about is court interpretation. Is that correct?

Kieran Turner: We have concerns about this bill, which we will touch on when we talk about some of the wider areas. The Scottish Government seems to be concerned to protect only the ceremony aspect and the celebrant aspect—those are the only parts in relation to which it sees a need for protection. When we ask about protections in the bill, we are often told, “Well, no celebrant will have to do this.”

We accept that, at the moment, the Parliament is not proposing that, so our concern is absolutely to do with court interpretation. However, it is also to do with the direction of travel, and we are concerned that, at some point, it might become coercive.

Marco Biagi: Could you speak about the article 9 protections in the ECHR, which allow the freedom to practice your religion, and about the legal opinions that are in the public domain, such as that of Karon Monaghan QC, of Matrix Chambers in London, who said that any attempt that was brought to the European Court of Human Rights to force a religion to hold those ceremonies would inevitably fail because of article 9?

Kieran Turner: There are conflicting legal views on this, which is where some of the concern comes from. We have not been there yet and no cases have gone to the court yet. Our concern is that those cases will come and we will be in danger. We know that, in a number of areas, there have been concerns about the article 9 protections and how far they go, particularly in the areas in which protected characteristics conflict. Our concern would be that doors would potentially be opened to other situations arising.

We do not want to be alarmist or jump up and down about it, but there is a concern that that could happen—certainly our members have brought that concern to me time and again.

The Convener: Dr Easton—I apologise, I mean the Rev David Easton.

The Rev Dr David Easton: Reverend and doctor, actually, I suppose.

I am not sure how closely we are expected to respond to the questions. This is the sort of thing that could flow over into quite a general conversation, so I will try to direct my answer to parts of Alex Johnstone’s question.

You asked why, despite the fact that there are opt-outs, conscience clauses and so on, we feel threatened—that is not quite the word you used—by the situation. However, I am not sure that the Methodist Church feels threatened. My written submission, which I hope that you have read, states the position of the Methodist Church. Whether we feel threatened by any legislation that comes through this Parliament or the Westminster Parliament is another matter.

The second part of your question concerned whether we saw the situation as the end of a process or as something that might continue. From your question, I am not quite sure whether you think that churches might think that the situation continuing would be something that would undermine the position further. Who can tell if that would be the case?

We have had marriages only between people of the opposite sex. Over the centuries, there has been a change in understanding: not that long ago, for example, women—and indeed their property—were considered to be the possession of their husbands. We no longer hold to that now, and one must assume that over a period of time civil and even religious understandings of marriage might change.

I guess that there has been some sort of recognition of that on behalf of the Methodist Church in that, as our submission points out, our annual conference, which is the Methodist Church’s supreme governing body and is, I suppose, equivalent to the general assembly of the Church of Scotland, agreed to set up a working group that would revisit Methodism’s understanding of the nature of marriage. Obviously, I cannot predict what recommendations the working group will bring to the conference or how the conference will vote on the matter, but that is where we are.

John Deighan: With regard to Mr Biagi’s point about protections, the trouble with using the ECHR to protect yourself is that it costs you a few hundred thousand pounds. In its interesting submission to the Government’s consultation, the Faculty of Advocates, without taking a position on the principle, pointed out that what will definitely give rise to difficulties and lead to conflict is section 149 of the Equality Act 2010, which relates to the public sector equality duty. This is not just about a re-understanding of marriage but about bringing down the weight of the state to enforce that particular understanding, which is what will happen through the public sector equality duty. That constitutes a considerable threat.

Marco Biagi: What, in practical terms, do you mean by “bringing down the weight of the state”?

John Deighan: As we heard earlier, those employed in the public sector, such as teachers, will have to promote the particular understanding of marriage that the state has set out. The public sector equality duty makes that clear. In England, for example, teachers have received advice from the Equality and Human Rights Commission that, in order to show that they have satisfied the public sector equality duty, they have to implement LGBT history month. That month would conflict with things, especially in Catholic schools, and there are immediate concerns for us in that regard.

Marco Biagi: Why would LGBT history month conflict with things?

John Deighan: The whole aim of the month is to try to change people’s understanding of people who are homosexual and propose them as role models. We would not want to be doing that.

Marco Biagi: I am sorry, but I thought that the purpose of the month was to show that there have been gay people throughout history.

John Deighan: Our problem is accuracy with regard to the people highlighted in this initiative. On the flimsiest of evidence, people such as Florence Nightingale have been chosen and I think that even a pope is highlighted on one of the days. You are creating an environment in which you are trying to propose such examples as positive. That is where the challenge to us lies and where the conflict will arise. We want to propose our own understanding of sexual relationships.

As for the progressive nature of this, it is quite clear that this matter has progressed quickly since the Scottish Parliament’s creation. Perhaps the committee would like to examine the principle that is being established here; if you support this bill, you are saying that men and women are interchangeable and that gender really does not matter in any field of life. That area could easily be progressed.

In some of the evidence and discussion, the belief that marriage is intrinsically and in essence built around the complementarity of male and female has been paralleled to segregation—we heard that earlier. Parallels have been drawn with the civil rights movement against racism. If there is to be any progression, that is where we have to look. Those are the principles that are being established just now: if you hold that view, that is how you will be perceived by society. That ties in with the public sector equality duty and that is the mindset of those who have proposed this change. I have attended EHRC presentations where people have said, “There’s terrible discrimination in Scotland because some people believe sex only belongs in marriage between a man and a woman.” In other words, they are saying that in our society it is unacceptable to hold traditional Christian beliefs, traditional Muslim beliefs or the traditional beliefs of Judaism. This approach does not lead to pluralism but to the victory of a complete redefinition of marriage and its enforcement on all of society.

Marco Biagi: I do not doubt your sincere belief and the way in which you conceptualise marriage. I also understand that the Catholic church has different views from other denominations on aspects of marriage, for example on the acceptability of divorce. At present, you as a denomination are entirely able to practise that individual definition on divorce, just as the bill aims to allow you to continue exactly as you are at the moment. What I fail to understand is why you appear to be unsupportive of granting the same right to all the faiths, in particular including those that wish to perform same-sex marriages, to practise their faiths as they see fit. I can understand that you have a concern about a slippery slope, but I also hear from you an objection to allowing anyone, including the state, to perform same-sex marriage.
John Deighan: I am glad that you raise that, as it is a crucial point, which the committee might wish to reflect on. As regards our understanding of religious freedoms, if you conflate the freedom of any individual in society to pursue their particular religious beliefs with the idea that the state must endorse that, you are talking not about religious freedom but about theocracy. The state now needs to have a rational reflection on what the purpose of marriage is. Why does the state take an interest in it? If it is just about friendship, there are a myriad of friendships in society, and we would not want the state to interfere in those friendships.

If there is a practical implication, it is that children are born, and we want to ensure that those who have a child have it in a responsible manner and raise that child. They are more likely to do that if they are bound together in marriage, and the child is more likely to benefit from the attention of the parents if the child lives with the parents. That is why the state has an interest in marriage. It is not about friendship, and it is not about feelings, although those are important. We do not change the whole of society because people might feel upset that their relationship is not being given a particular badge by the state. It is not about badges; it is about the practical effect on children.

Dr Beltagui: I have one practical point on this discussion, going back to the original question. I have had discussions with some of our celebrants. What we have in Scotland now is a good system, where celebrants opt into the government system, and they can conduct a marriage at any place. That is working very well.

When I speak to them about the bill, however, or when they find out about the bill, they say that they will have nothing to do with the system of marriage that is proposed by the Government, and they will have their own system and keep away from what is proposed. That is one example of how this interference in the definition of marriage will force some groups to have their own system, whereas the current system is working well at the moment. That is mainly because of this progression, and what you said yourself about the slippery slope. When I discuss the matter with celebrants, they say that they have heard it all before. That is an example of what would happen. This situation between the Government and the celebrants could result in that.

Marco Biagi: I am not sure why. Celebrants will be able to continue to offer marriage as they wish.

Dr Beltagui: That is what has been said, but celebrants feel, because of the history of this process, that, once the legislation is passed, they will be forced to do it. That is the feeling, because two different things. However, the 2010 act does not allow us to distinguish between the two. That is the context that gives us the threat.

Marco Biagi: But the Equality Act 2010 has extensive specific exemptions for religious organisations on the ground of sexual orientation, which are being expanded. Can you point to any ruling in court thus far under the public sector equality duty that would lead to the situation that you describe?

John Deighan: In the Ladele case, for example, Lillian Ladele was told that, because she can get to church on a Sunday, her religious freedom was not being infringed. That is a very narrow understanding of religious freedom.

Marco Biagi: Correct me if I am wrong, but I think that Lillian Ladele was a civil registrar in London who refused to perform civil partnerships. She took her case to Europe and lost, because she was exercising a civil function in a civil situation, rather than a religious function. That is the crux of the issue.

John Deighan: It was Neuberger in the UK Supreme Court who said that Lillian Ladele’s religious freedom was not being infringed. The European Court of Human Rights stated in its judgment that it could not dismiss the issue as easily as that. We are looking at a very narrow understanding of religious freedom.

St Margaret’s adoption agency is the perfect example. If we have no problem whatever, why is it facing closure? The protections that we asked for when legislation to allow adoption by same-sex couples was discussed are the protections that are needed now. The context means that it is too dangerous to introduce same-sex marriage here because people who disagree with its introduction will find massive detriments throughout every area of society—especially if they work for the public sector.

The Rev Dr David Easton: Perhaps I may be permitted to think aloud for a second and wonder why people of faith find the whole issue of what may broadly be called sexuality so difficult, because we clearly do. There has been some evidence of that this morning and we have seen it in lots of ways.

I put my hand up and say that it is not an easy issue for us in the Methodist Church. Twenty years ago we affirmed the place of lesbian and gay people within the Methodist Church. We have moved on since and, as I said, we have set up a working party to look at the nature of marriage. Whatever its recommendations, I can assure the committee that the debate that follows will not be an easy one because, as in society in general, so within a church, this is a very difficult issue to handle. I think that there are a lot of historical reasons why we find the whole question of sexuality difficult to handle. I do not have time to go into all that here, but it is difficult to handle.

I feel, perhaps speaking specifically about the Methodist Church, that we are on a pilgrimage or journey—that is the word that has been used this morning—as we all are in this session, as part of a change in society. It is a journey, if you want to use that word, for the whole of society in its understanding about matters broadly related to sexuality. However, we do find it difficult. Speaking personally, I think that perhaps we do not always do ourselves any favours, because sometimes we seem to be fixated on the question of what two people do between themselves rather than on broader issues. Nevertheless, I have stated our position as it is in our paper, and I think that we are on that journey, too.

The Convener: Thank you. Christian Allard has a short question. I ask the witnesses to be brief so that we can move on, as we have a number of other questions that we would like to ask you.

Christian Allard: I have a couple of questions. First, though, thanks very much for coming today to share your concerns. It is very important that your voices are heard. We heard earlier that the Scottish Government has consulted on the matter for the past two years. Of course, there is an international debate on it as well, and a lot of countries have changed religious legislation.

I would like your views on a particular point. I do not want only the Catholic parliamentary office’s view, but I note that its paper said that the bill “will diminish rather than strengthen marriage”.

I would like you to elaborate on that point. We heard earlier that there is no evidence for that view and that, to the contrary, the bill could strengthen marriage, because people will perhaps think that getting married is more trendy and people could come from abroad to get married here. I am a bit confused and would like to know whether other witnesses share the view of the Catholic parliamentary office that the bill will diminish marriage rather than strengthen it.

Kieran Turner: That is a really good point to discuss. I think that the crux of the issue about the principle is what the definition of marriage is and what the function of marriage is. We would broadly say that marriage is about commitment, children and complementarity. From the state’s point of view in particular, marriage is about children, as has already been said. Beyond that, we see marriage as being the foundational structural unit to bring through the next generation. That is where the state’s interest in marriage fundamentally lies. We think that love and commitment are good things. My organisation supported civil partnerships when they came in because we recognised that they addressed a legal injustice that people in same-sex relationships felt.

However, that is different from saying that something is marriage. I agree with and highlight the submission that the Faculty of Advocates made to the Government’s previous consultation, which referred to the importance of defining what we mean by marriage and raised several questions. First, is marriage intended to be a lifelong relationship? Should it imply the potential for a sexual relationship? Is it intended to be an exclusive relationship between the spouses? I think that we need to think through what we are defining as marriage. I do not know whether that answers your question.

In terms of devaluing marriage, our concern is not solely about same-sex couples being allowed to marry. Our concern is about the fundamental foundational understanding of marriage as good for society, particularly in its context of family. As the Faculty of Advocates would say, although it obviously does not take a policy decision on this, if we lose that definition, we are in danger of losing the meaning of marriage and the foundational understanding of what marriage is as a structure for society. That is our concern. We recognise that love and commitment are good things, but that is not really why the state recognises marriage.

Marco Biagi: Would there be anything wrong with the state choosing to recognise marriage on those terms? If so, what would that be?

Kieran Turner: We think that marriage is, in part, about love and commitment. It has always been a historical Christian church point of view that love and commitment are very important, but we think that marriage is about a lot more than that. We think that marriage is the foundational building block for families and community, and in the context of bringing up children we think that it is a good thing. We have no problem with other relationships having legal recognition—we think that that is fair—but the fact that people love each other does not make relationships of any other sort marriage. People loving each other in a myriad of different ways does not, in itself, make a marriage; we believe that there is more to it than that.

Dr Beltagui: What scares people are the things that will happen under the bill that are not expected. The bill gives a list of people whose relationships are too close for them to marry. For us, that list includes same-sex couples. It will be dangerous for society if we keep changing the list to exclude relationships that we currently recognise as making it not possible for people to marry. As people have said, that could lead to incest and other dangerous relations. That is one thing.

Another thing is that the definition of adultery in the bill is confusing because the Government went back to the definition of adultery between a man and a woman. The bill makes marriage acceptable between two men or two women, but it uses the definition of adultery only between a man and a woman. That means that someone can have relations with someone of the same sex outside a same-sex marriage, including in a threesome, a foursome or whatever. Because the bill goes down a new road, diverging from the main traditional, historical way of marriage, it is creating situations that we do not know the end of, and we must be careful about these things.

The Rev Dr David Easton: Mr Allard asks whether we fear that the bill will diminish rather than strengthen marriage. It is interesting that in the whole debate—I do not mean just this morning—phrases such as “undermining marriage” and “strengthening marriage” are thrown around. I wonder how we would know whether marriage is being strengthened, undermined or diminished. We could consider the divorce statistics. The divorce rate has been very high historically partly because legislation has made it possible while we have had marriage only between men and women, although I understand that, recently, the divorce rate has dipped somewhat. Or would we consider another criterion such as the level of domestic abuse? It is difficult. I can see where you are broadly coming from, but how can we determine whether marriage is being strengthened? What basis would we use to come to any conclusions? I could have cited examples other than those two.

The Convener: Thank you. Let us move on.

Siobhan McMahon: We have heard this morning and have read in your written submissions about the lengthy consultation that has taken place and the responses that have been given. We have heard in evidence from this panel that the response from the majority of respondents is that they do not want equal marriage. In the session with the first panel, I spoke about the equality impact assessment that took place following the consultation and noted that people have concerns—which have been voiced again today—that the provisions that have been put in place to protect religious bodies are not strong enough. Do you feel that that view has been listened to in the consultation and in Parliament? If not, what could we do to strengthen those provisions if they are not robust? Is there anything that the committee or Parliament could do to make things better?

10:45

Kieran Turner: That is a really good question. We were concerned. I will try not to keep on quoting the Faculty of Advocates, but in its submission it states:

“The Faculty of Advocates respectfully questions whether the impact assessment in respect of equality is complete.”

It feels, and this has been raised with me, that some of the bill’s negative implications have not been addressed. As the Government would say, there are positive equality implications, but they have not been counterbalanced by consideration of some of the negative ones. The exception to that, which we accept, is the celebrant aspect, but there are wider implications. We hope that the committee will look at some of those.

We have a big concern in relation to the public sector equality duty because, as a member organisation, we have a huge amount of churches and organisations that provide a huge amount of social welfare in Scotland—probably more than ever before. They run food banks, provide debt advice, run homelessness projects and do all sorts of other things. They include groups such as the Salvation Army. In many situations, they partner with local authorities and statutory agencies as they deliver those services. We think that that is a good thing and we want it to continue, but we are concerned that their views on marriage could become a hindrance to them in that partnership work.

We recognise that this is not the Government’s intention, but we are concerned that, without protection in the bill, these things could come back at some point in the future. Even if an organisation does not take a view, the fact that it is affiliated to the Evangelical Alliance could be an issue. An official in a council somewhere could say, “We’re not going to rent you a hall,” or, “We’re not going to partner with you because you don’t fit the public sector equality duty and we have a duty to promote that in our partnerships as well as directly in the public sector.”

Dr Beltagui: When the bill deals with freedom of expression, it gives an overgeneral statement. What is needed—and what would be more effective—is a clear statement about freedom of expression relating to same-sex marriage, roughly on the lines of what has been adopted in the UK bill, where there is a statement that discussion of same-sex marriage should not be taken as an offence. It is something along those lines; I am sure that you know what it is. That should be in the bill and not a secondary thing that comes afterwards.

The other thing, which is similar in a way, is that the Lord Advocate’s guidance is simple and there is nothing specific in it. It will depend on who the Lord Advocate is at the time when a case comes in, and who their workers are and so on. This is an issue where we are on the very boundary of something that could be considered offensive or not offensive, or be prosecuted or not prosecuted, and prosecution in these cases will have an effect not just on the spot but on the person’s life. There should be some clear guidance on this issue and it should be part of the bill. The Lord Advocate’s statement is too simple, and also it can be changed at any time depending on the people who are present at the time. We do not know what will happen next, so there could be more difficulties there.

John Deighan: On principle, we already have equal marriage. All people have the right to marriage. Marriage is a particular thing. What we are doing now is making an arbitrary change to it. Once you bring in arbitrariness to the legal system, all sorts of changes are possible. You are then thinking about how you are going to protect yourself against all those things that could happen.

In the case of Stübing that was taken to the Strasbourg court against Germany last year, under the European convention on human rights, a brother and a sister were demanding that they be allowed to marry. If we set up a principle that marriage is only about love, we need to ask what principle then says that such relationships are not permitted. The state authorities recognised that the couple’s love was sincere and that they had a loving relationship—they had four children together—but the case failed, thankfully, for the sake of the marriages of everyone else in society. The state has a right to protect marriage as it is understood.

In principle, we should not make arbitrary changes to marriage, because it affects all children. Speak to paediatricians and ask them about the devastating impact that family fragmentation has on children. In the past eight years, the number of children under one who have been taken into care has trebled. Paediatricians whom I have spoken to say that, 30 years after we first started to see a rise in the number of children born outside of marriage who had lost that bond between their mother and father, we are now at the point of second-generation family fragmentation. That will be devastating, because there are no grandparents to step in and help the child when the parents have separated.

We believe that there will be detriments to people in terms of stating their belief. Employment law would need to be amended, because an employer could say that it does not think that someone weighs up to the latest standard on equality because of their beliefs on marriage. As we have heard, some people already think that such beliefs are akin to racist beliefs.

On freedom of expression and education, I make a plea that the committee listen to the Catholic education service of the bishops...
The equality duty would certainly need to be changed so that people working in the public sector do not feel that they need to promote a value that is at odds with their beliefs. I have already had people phoning my office to say that they have been told to implement diversity training schemes within their places of work. Those schemes are created in such a way that they stigmatisate people who disagree because of their understanding of marriage. That is the breadth of detriment that we are facing in society if we go ahead with the legislation.

The Convener: I ask Dr Easton to answer briefly, as we have another couple of issues that we need to move on to.

The Rev Dr David Easton: I am happy to leave it there, if you want to move on.

Siobhan McMahon: I just want to clarify something. I have heard organisations say this privately, and I just wonder whether you share this view. We are talking about equality—clearly, this is the Equal Opportunities Committee—but I have heard some say that to give equality is not about taking a right from one protected characteristic and giving it to another. Do you share that view? If so, why would that be the case?

Dr Beltagui: I have asked this question ever since the equality legislation came in. If you have a conflict between two characteristics, to which do you give preference? It was always said that the decision would be left to case law, but I think that recent case law has given sexual orientation preference over religious practice. Again, that is one of the things that are not clear in the equality legislation. It is very difficult to decide which way the decision will go.

By the way, on the issue of the registrar who has a belief and who is doing a civic job, it is recognised in the bill that marriage is a religious practice or a religious act. Therefore, a civil registrar is not doing only a civil job, as he is involved in a job that includes religion—whether that is his religion or the religion of the people being married. That is why cases such as Ladele are important. The court has ignored that effect in insisting that the issue involved a civil matter, but the bill before us recognises that, as an act of life, marriage is a religious thing.

To some people, religion is a way of life, of course, and that is what is stated in Islam and in Judaism in other ways. One does not go to church or a mosque and take it off when one goes out of the church or mosque, otherwise we will learn nothing. We would just go to church or to a mosque to do some rituals, but it is not just about rituals; it is about what we learn from them and what we practise in our everyday lives.

We are not saying, “Don’t allow these relations.” We are saying that we should keep the definition as it is, and people who want to have a different way of life from that under the definition that we have all used for ages should call it something else. That is one way out of it. Do not confuse the word “marriage” as we know it with a relationship that was not originally included under it.

John Deighan: All equality must recognise the equal dignity of humans. Every human is equal in dignity. The trajectory of the past 10 years has been to try to replace equality with sameness in thinking that a man has to be a woman and has to be interchangeable. That is where we have gone wrong.

When there are conflicts and disagreements, we must sometimes balance principles. We cannot just say that, because a person has a particular protected characteristic, we must agree with them, otherwise as a Catholic, I would be able to say, “You have to believe in the seven sacraments and other particular aspects of the Catholic faith.” I recognise that people can disagree, but they are not allowed to infringe my basic civil rights.

Marco Biagi: But you are saying that we have to believe in your definition of marriage.

John Deighan: No, not for religious reasons. I am saying that, based on reason, the state has to say what the reasonable basis is on which we understand marriage.

Marco Biagi: On that basis, do you have no religious objection to the state offering same-sex marriage?

John Deighan: Our religious belief disagrees with the state on that, as it may on other grounds, but we believe that our religious belief concurs with natural reason on this, and that marriage is naturally and self-evidently built on the fact that men and women have children. We have to balance up conflicting claims. The conflicting claim here is that, for the sake of the possibly one in 10,000 households that wants to have a same-sex marriage, we will change the definition of marriage for everyone in our society. That is the balance, if you think that it is a matter of a balance of principles. Marriage will mean a different thing for all society, including every child and every family. I think that two households out of 1,000 have a same-sex couple in them, and we have been told that it is expected that 5 per cent of same-sex couples will want a marriage. We are talking about one in 10,000 households possibly wanting a same-sex marriage, and the whole of society has to redefine marriage for the sake of that. That is disproportionate as well as wrong in principle.

John Mason: I want to touch on the issue of when rights conflict and how we deal with that, which we have slightly touched on before. I think that it has been said that the Equality Act 2010, despite my involvement in it, did not say that all rights are equal. We had the example before from the Equality Network that chauffeurs and photographers should not be allowed to not take part in same-sex marriages. Is that correct? Does that give the right balance between the individual’s freedom of conscience and other rights?

John Deighan: To be honest, the wisdom of Solomon is sometimes needed to decide. Someone’s conscience should not be infringed unless that is absolutely necessary. In that case, one would try to offer accommodation. For example, Sikhs are allowed not to wear a crash helmet when they drive a motor cycle, and no one else is allowed to do that. We accommodate them because they wear a turban for religious reasons. We should try to accommodate where that is possible. Therefore, if nine out of 10 registrars were happy to do a civil partnership, why would it be wrong? Where do you draw the line between individual conscience and wider rights?

John Mason: Why would that be wrong? If a printer has his own small business and is in control, why cannot he decide what he prints?

John Deighan: If the printer just says, “I don’t like your sexual orientation, so I won’t provide you with a service,” I think that that is wrong. However, if someone came in with literature for the British National Party and the printer thought that the literature was racist and they did not want to print it, I think that they would be perfectly entitled to say no. Similarly, if someone came in with pornography and the printer felt that pornography was detrimental to the rights of women, they would be entitled not to print it. If they were asked to print publicity material for LGBT history month, but they thought that that twist on history was wrong and they did not want to participate in that deception, I think that they would be entitled to say that. However, that will be difficult.

John Mason: So do you think that the present balance of the law is too far away from people’s individual conscience?

11:00

John Deighan: We have seen that under the Equality Act 2010. Most people do not realise that not only are our adoption agencies not allowed to discriminate against people with same-sex attraction or in same-sex relationships, but they are not allowed to take that into account. An agency could have a couple who have been married for five years and two people in a same-sex relationship, and they are not even allowed to take that into account. The law does that now, and that is a real infringement of conscience and religious belief.

John Mason: Do the other witnesses agree? Where do you draw the line between individual conscience and wider rights?

Kieran Turner: I think that everyone would agree that it is incredibly hard to do that. The principle of having a reasonable accommodation where possible is probably a good one, and we would certainly like that ultimately to be enshrined in law and also in the courts’ understanding.

John Mason: Is the way that abortion is enshrined in law a good model?

Kieran Turner: Yes, I think that that works well for that particular case. As has just been outlined, in most cases, discriminating against someone for any reason is wrong. Most of us agree on that. For most businesses in most situations, that would be wrong. Again, I will use as an example a member organisation that we might have. If a church runs a food bank, it will never turn away someone for any reason of discrimination. That would not happen and it would be wrong if it did happen. However, there has to be an accommodation for certain views. If someone is legally entitled to a public service, provided that they can access that public service, we should make accommodation. We should not try to batter rights against each other; we should take a reasonable and commonsense approach. The point about adoption is a good example of that. The conscientious objection approach could work in particular circumstances.

John Mason: Do you agree with the argument from the previous panel that abortion and war are on a different planet—sorry, are of a different level of severity—from something such as marriage? Is there a distinction?

Dr Beltagui: The case of marriage is exactly like abortion. It is an issue on which people will differ. We accept that abortion is a controversial issue, and marriage is at the same level, or perhaps an even higher level. Abortion involves one person with an unborn baby, but the issue of marriage involves the whole of society, where everyone has to adapt to the new vision.
I am glad that you use the word “conscience”, because I do not see that word in the bill at all. That is something that we need to introduce. This committee is called the Equal Opportunities Committee. The issue is not about equality; it is about equal opportunity. Equality could mean that we treat people badly but in the same way. We have to give people equal opportunity to practise their religion, no matter their race or whatever, without being forced into something that they do not want.

The Convener: I apologise to John Mason, but I will stop him there, because we are rushed for time and I would like to give John Finnie an opportunity to ask a question.

John Finnie: Thank you, convener. I do not know whether all the panel members were present during the evidence from the previous panel, but I posed a number of questions that came from one of the many interesting pieces of evidence that we have received, which is the evidence from the Scottish Transgender Alliance. I do not know whether the panel members have seen it, but there are a number of issues in it. Some of the issues that we have touched on are challenging, and perhaps the witnesses will feel that this is also challenging. For instance, do you have a view on the spousal veto, the simplification of gender reassignment and its certification, the lowering of the age for gender recognition to 16 and the gender-neutral language that should be applied?

Kieran Turner: Very briefly, we do not have a view on most of those aspects. Our primary concern has been the principal understanding of marriage and the need for a debate on the protections that might be needed should the bill be passed.

As for the use of gender-neutral language, we have already outlined our concerns in that respect with regard to the definition of marriage. However, as far as the practical aspects of the bill are concerned, we do not really have a view on its specific transgender aspects.

Dr Beltagui: As I said at the start of the session, we take issue with the dilution of family relations by removing references to gender and kinship. They represent a way of cementing relations between people in families and beyond, and the new list of relatives set out in the bill does not really hold in the same way. Some languages are better than others in this respect; for example, one language might have different names for an uncle or cousin on the mother’s or father’s side but English does not have such distinctions and diluting what exists even more is not really a good thing.

The Convener: Have you finished, John?

John Finnie: If none of the other panel members wishes to reply, convener, I would like to ask one more question.

One submission that we received says:

“Marriage is not owned by any religious body”.

Does anyone wish to comment on that?

The Rev Dr David Easton: I would probably agree with that statement. When this question was being discussed at Westminster, the Methodist Church was concerned about the juxtaposition in the debate between civil and religious marriage as if they were two different things. When I conduct a wedding ceremony, the couple are in the eyes of law just as legally married as if the ceremony had been conducted by a registrar. As a result, a religious marriage must have a legal public element; in fact, that is the very reason why it has to be a public ceremony and cannot be conducted in private.

Some of my fellow panellists might not agree with me—I do not know; they will have to speak for themselves—but I believe that the state has the right to express an opinion and pass legislation and indeed has done so through the years. We the electorate might not agree with those decisions and have the right to chuck you out at the next election so you can go and beg on the streets. However, it seems to me that as long as you are members of the Scottish Parliament, or indeed any other democratically elected legislative assembly, you have the right to legislate on matters that come within the boundary and scope of your responsibilities. As a representative of the church, I might disagree strongly with you, but that does not mean that I think that you do not have the right to legislate on the matter. I think that you do.

John Deighan: I agree with the initial comment. Marriage is a natural institution and has arisen naturally from the first social grouping, which was between a man and a woman who then had children. That is the foundation of society and we believe it important not to mess around with those foundations.

The state has a role in legislating on the civil effects of marriage but not on its essence. We cannot have laws saying, for example, that people who sell bracelets can call them watches if they do not tell the time. There is an essence to marriage; a man and a woman lie at the heart of it, and that is the relationship that gives rise to children.

John Finnie: So you see it as an exact science. Is there no scope for differences of opinion?

John Deighan: We are talking about an essence here. The state does not have the right to recreate what is a natural institution; it exists to uphold the common good, not to re-engineer new foundations for what it thinks could be the common good.

The Rev Dr David Easton: I hear what my friend is saying, that the state does not have a right to determine what society does. We could turn that round and ask whether the church has a right to determine what society does. That is an issue for debate.

The reality, which is hard for the churches to accept, is—I am using shorthand here—that we live in a largely secular society. It is hard for us in the churches to come to terms with that. As I said earlier, we find the whole debate about sexuality difficult.

The state has a role in this issue. Otherwise, we are saying that there are certain things that the churches may determine or that it is right for them to discuss, and that there are certain areas for the state or civic authorities to discuss, but that there may not be any crossover. Does that mean that I, as a leader of the church, may not make a statement on certain issues of public interest? Might I be told to shut up about a public or party issue because I am a religious leader? I do not accept that position. If I am arguing that I have a right to comment on public issues, I must accept that public bodies, Parliaments or whatever have a right to comment on religious issues and other matters that pertain to me and what I hold important. I do not think that we can have it both ways.

John Deighan: I would just clarify and say that I do not believe that the church can redefine marriage either. We can all comment on it, discuss it and try to understand it, but marriage is a natural institution that precedes the church as well as any other institution in society.

The Convener: Are there any brief comments before we move into private session?

Jim Eadie: I would like to clear up something that Mr Turner said earlier. You welcomed the opt-in provision in the bill, particularly as you were aware that there were people in society who would gladly compel the churches to perform same-sex marriage. We had a clear and explicit statement from the LGBT organisations on the earlier panel that they did not seek to infringe the freedom of religion of those denominations that did not wish to perform same-sex marriage. Where do you see that demand coming from in society? Are you aware of any organisations that have provided evidence to that effect?

Kieran Turner: I do not have them in front of me, so I do not want to quote on the record if that is not the case.

Jim Eadie: Do you accept that Stonewall and the Equality Network, which are the leading LGBT organisations engaging in the debate, have not made that call?

Kieran Turner: Yes. I accept what they have said publicly, but I do not think that they speak for everyone in society. You only have to go on Twitter or Facebook to see such comments. I invite the committee to look at some of the submissions that were received on the previous consultations, because there were individuals and groups—admittedly not Stonewall or the Equality Network; I am not trying to have a go at them—that said, “We disagree. We think that churches should be compelled to do this.”

Jim Eadie: Okay. I have a general question for the panel. We are aware that nine countries in Europe have introduced same-sex marriage. In which of those countries has your denomination or religion been compelled to perform same-sex marriage?

John Deighan: I think that we are quite protected under UK law, except on the basis of providing a public service—you will not be safe under that. You say nine countries; there are 193 countries in the world, so we have a long way to go. Denmark, however—

Jim Eadie: Has your denomination been compelled to perform same-sex marriage in any of the countries that have introduced same-sex marriage?

John Deighan: The Catholic Church has not. However, we have had adoption agencies all over the UK closed under equality laws. It is the context of equality laws that poses the difficulty, once we change the understanding of marriage.

There is also the sentiment behind it. You heard evidence this morning from the Equality Network, which aligns people who disagree on their understanding of marriage. It called the practice today’s segregation and said that banning same-sex marriage was akin to a ban on interracial marriage. If we believe in plurality, that sentiment should worry us.

Other organisations have made strong attacks and threats on marriage.

Jim Eadie: I asked for clarification, which you have now provided. I ask the other gentlemen to respond.

The Convener: Briefly, please.

The Rev Dr David Easton: There are Methodist churches throughout mainland Europe, although they are not large ones. I do not have the absolute figures at my fingertips to answer your question accurately. However, I am not aware of any instances in which member churches in those countries have been obliged to conduct same-sex marriages.

The Convener: That concludes the public part of our meeting. I thank the witnesses for attending, and I thank everyone for coming along. It has been very interesting. Our next meeting, which will take place on Thursday 12 September, will include further oral evidence on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill.

Meeting continued in private until 11:32.
Scottish Parliament

Equal Opportunities Committee

Thursday 12 September 2013

[The Convener opened the meeting at 08:30]

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Margaret McCulloch): Welcome to the 22nd meeting in 2013 of the Equal Opportunities Committee. I ask those present to switch off or put into flight mode any electronic devices.

The Parliament’s photographer is present and will be here for a few minutes while he takes some photographs. At the table are the clerking and research team, official reporters and broadcasting services staff. Around the room, we are supported by staff from the security office.

I welcome the observers in the public gallery. My name is Margaret McCulloch and I am the committee convener. I invite committee members and witnesses to introduce themselves. We will start on my right.

Marco Biagi (Edinburgh Central) (SNP): I am the deputy convener and the MSP for Edinburgh Central.

Siobhan McMahon (Central Scotland) (Lab): I am an MSP for Central Scotland.

John Mason (Glasgow Shettleston) (SNP): I am the MSP for Glasgow Shettleston.

Alex Johnstone (North East Scotland) (Con): I am an MSP for North East Scotland.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): I am also an MSP for North East Scotland.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): Madainn mhath—good morning. I am an MSP for the Highlands and Islands. Given that Amnesty International is providing evidence later on, I take this opportunity to refer to my declaration in the register of interests that I am a member of Amnesty.

The Convener: I also welcome Jim Eadie MSP, who is sitting on my left.

Jim Eadie (Edinburgh Southern) (SNP): I am the MSP for Edinburgh Southern.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton (Church of Scotland): I am a parish minister from Bearsden. I am also the convener of the Church of Scotland’s legal questions committee.

Ephraim Borowski (Scottish Council of Jewish Communities): I am the director of the Scottish Council of Jewish Communities.

The Rev David Robertson (Free Church of Scotland): I am the minister of St Peter’s Free Church in Dundee and director of Solas (Centre for Public Christianity).

The Rt Rev Dr John Armes (Scottish Episcopal Church): I am the Bishop of Edinburgh. I represent the Scottish Episcopal Church’s faith and order board.

The Convener: Thank you. I remind members that questions to witnesses should be put through the chair. Witnesses should indicate to me or the clerk on my left when they wish to speak. John Finnie will begin the questioning.

John Finnie: Good morning, panel. Would you marry people who you knew to be infertile?

The Rev David Robertson: Yes—I would have no problem in doing that, although I am not sure how I would know whether they were infertile.

The Rev Dr John Armes: Yes.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: I am not aware that that issue has ever been debated by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, but I am struggling to see why ministers and deacons would not do so—if they were told, which is fairly unlikely.

Ephraim Borowski: As you will be aware from our submission, I speak for a diverse range of opinions in the Jewish community. Like the Rev Dr Hamilton, I am not aware that anyone has raised the question or has any concerns about the matter.

John Finnie: I read all the witness submissions with great interest. The Rev David Robertson suggests that the Scottish Parliament would be acting ultra vires. Would you care to expand on that please?

The Rev David Robertson: I expanded on it in my submission, in which I say that marriage is what marriage is. When David Cameron and others decided to bring in same-sex marriage, they had to redefine marriage for everyone, as Mr Cameron pointed out. I do not think that any Parliament has the right to redefine marriage any more than any Parliament has the right to say that a circle is a square. There are some things that are beyond the capability even of politicians and that is one of them. Marriage cannot be redefined in that way.

John Finnie: Your submission also talked about the relationship between the Scottish ministers and the Conservative-Liberal Democrat coalition in London. Would you care to expand on that in relation to the bill?
The Rev David Robertson: That was meant to be deliberately provocative, I am afraid. It is an illustration that suggests that what you are doing here is following the herd. I have been involved in Scottish politics for 30 years and this issue has been raised only in the past five years. All of a sudden, we find that all the major political parties are saying that they are for equality. Why were they not for equality 15 years ago or 10 years ago?

The definition has changed, and what we are trying to say in our submission is that there has been a push for the change and that people are rushing into it without thinking it through. We are just trying to encourage people to think it through.

I also think that politics is involved. There is almost a sense that we need to show that Scotland is a progressive country and we need to be ahead of England or the United Kingdom Government. I feel that the whole thing has been rushed, and that is why we put that statement in our submission.

John Finnie: Do you want to put on the record the actual phrase that you used?

The Rev David Robertson: It is there in the submission and that is fine. Our argument is—and I accept that it is an emotive argument—that the issue is being driven by politics as much as by ethics. I do not think that that can be denied.

John Finnie: What is the panel’s view on opting out?

Dr Gordon Macdonald (Scotland for Marriage): Are you asking about opting out or opting in?

John Finnie: A number of submissions refer to public service employees, for example.

Dr Macdonald: Individual conscience should be respected in a free society. That does not just apply to a narrow band of people; it applies to everyone if society is to be truly free. If you say to someone that they have no right to a conscience when they work for the public sector, which is essentially what you are saying, that is no longer a free society but one that is becoming repressive.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: As we have made clear, the Church of Scotland has not debated the issue of same-sex marriage or religious civil partnerships, but the legal questions committee, which has been leading the response, is deeply concerned that public servants, whether registrars or teachers, and particularly those who began their employment before the introduction of the bill or before the bill was on the horizon—the point has been well made that this is a relatively recent innovation—will find themselves prejudiced and might even lose their jobs. For reasons that appear to be acceptable to the Scottish Government and perhaps to the Scottish Parliament in relation to celebrants and those who play an integral part in a marriage, if those celebrants are ministers or deacons of the Church of Scotland or other priests, they could find themselves at risk. There should be equivalent protections for registrars, who are obviously on the front line, and, if one extends the argument further, for others who might find themselves in positions of considerable conflict, including teachers.

The Rt Rev Dr John Armes: I simply concur with what Alan Hamilton has just said. We in the Episcopal Church have similar concerns.

Ephraim Borowski: I, too, concur. As I said, I represent a community that has within it a number of branches that take diametrically opposed views on the issue. However, the one thing on which they are all absolutely in agreement is that there should be no compulsion on any one of them to follow the views of the other. Therefore, whether it is a matter of opting in or opting out—certainly, starting from the current position, it would necessarily be opting in, because same-sex marriage is not possible at the moment—there have to be protections for individuals and organisations. Much of the detail of our submission is to do with the wording of the draft legislation. We want to ensure that the protections are maintained and that there cannot be accidental slippage, as it were.

We have given several examples of how we think the current wording might result in some people not being able to opt in to do what they want to do because, for example, of the happenstance that they do not currently have an officially recognised celebrant. The bill is worded in such a way that a faith group would have to have a celebrant from the beginning in order to be able to carry out the ceremony. Likewise, individuals might find themselves compromised because they are prepared to conduct same-sex marriages but the organisation to which they belong says that it does not want to do that.

The Rev David Robertson: Although I would like to think that opting out or opting in would work, in reality, it will not. At the very best, it will last for a short while if we have a state-imposed morality and we regard opposition to same-sex marriage as homophobia or its equivalent and therefore equivalent to racism. I do not think that anyone in the Parliament would argue that someone who wishes to be a racist and who says, for example, that they will not marry a black person to a white person should have an opt-in or opt-out. The default moral position of those who—out of conviction rather than political cynicism—argue for same-sex marriage is that opposition to it is exactly the same as racism. Therefore, inevitably, whatever the good wishes of politicians right now, an opt-in or an opt-out will not work, because politicians change every three or four years. I would love to think that teachers, charities and others will have complete freedom to express a view that goes against the zeitgeist and the current culture, but I suspect that that will not be the case.

Dr Macdonald: Freedom of conscience for people who work across the public sector is crucial. Under equalities legislation, the principle of reasonable accommodation should be taken on board in our courts, at Westminster and at Holyrood to set an example in the area. For instance, a local authority could easily provide a registrar service without imposing on the conscience of any of its staff. There is no problem in that being facilitated at local level. The problem is that some people and organisations want to force people to officiate at same-sex marriage or civil partnership ceremonies as part of an ideological agenda. That will apply not only to civil registrars but right across the public sector, particularly but not exclusively in schools. The question that members must ask themselves is whether they want to shut off careers in the public sector to people who have a conscientious objection to marriage being between two people of the same sex. For many people of faith and others, that is a fundamental point. It is of equivalent moral significance to the issues that arise when a doctor performs an abortion—in fact, it might even be of more significance.

Ephraim Borowski: In our submission, we make two distinctions that are relevant to what Gordon Macdonald has just said. One is a distinction between rural and urban areas. Normally, in urban areas, reasonable accommodation will be possible, because if a particular registrar does not want to get involved in something, he or she will have colleagues who can take over and who could be scheduled to do that shift or whatever.

08:45

The other distinction is between people who are already in post, who had a reasonable expectation as to what the job involved when they applied for it and were appointed, and people who take up a post from now on, knowing what the new legislation is. What worries me is exemplified by the Ladele case. There is no doubt that there were other people in Islington who could have undertaken that duty, and Ms Ladele had been in post for many years. If we think about those two distinctions, that produces four classes. Ms Ladele should have been in the most protected class, having been in post in an urban area, with other people who could have been scheduled to do the work. Nonetheless, that became the crux of a case that has gone all the way to Europe.

Dr Macdonald: The European Court of Human Rights recognises a margin of appreciation for nation states. The UK courts did not support Ms Ladele in her case. In the Netherlands, the Parliament and the courts have ruled on the reasonable accommodation that registrars do not necessarily have to perform their function. That facility can be made—it would be within the competence of the Scottish courts to come to that view. If the Parliament gave a lead on that, it might increase the chances of that happening.

John Finnie: If I noted your comments correctly, Mr Robertson, you mentioned “complete freedom”. Would the panel see that extending to a teacher who is an atheist not referring to God?

The Rev David Robertson: Yes, totally. To ask a teacher who is an atheist to lead in an act of Christian worship, for example, would be an act of supreme hypocrisy. To ask a teacher who is an atheist not to refer to God would be completely stupid, in the same way that asking somebody like me, who does not agree with same-sex marriage, not to refer to same-sex marriage would be stupid. People are allowed different views. If a teacher is asked whether they are an atheist or whether they believe in God, they would answer, “I am sorry, but I am not allowed to refer to God”? Freedom would of course allow them to refer to God.

John Finnie: Do you believe that there are currently safeguards regarding the difference between the views of creationists and those of others regarding teaching in schools?

The Rev David Robertson: I am not sure what creationism has to do with this subject, and I presume that by “creationism” you mean young-earth creationism. I assume that we are referring to people panicking and thinking, “Oh dear, someone may actually believe that God created the earth 6,000 years ago.” My view is that religion—religious philosophy—should be taught in philosophy classes, and science should be taught in science classes. It is as simple as that. I do not think that we should bring politics or religion into science classes. The fact that someone is an atheist or a Christian in a science class is completely irrelevant to what science they teach.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: That is a fair analysis. I am struggling to see the connection between a belief in creationism and the issue that is before us today, not least because there are so many different—

John Finnie: My reference was to freedom. Let me give you a ridiculous example—another example, anyway. If a local authority street sweeper said that they did not agree with the views of a particular religion and did not want to sweep the street outside its building, would that be reasonable?
The Rev David Robertson: It would be reasonable if his religion involved street sweeping—which it clearly does not. On the other hand, for my religion and most people's religion, particularly for those of us who are officials in it, being married is a religious thing, and it is a big act. The analogy is irrelevant. I know what you are trying to say but, logically, it does not work—not in the real world.

Dr Macdonald: It is certainly possible to have a discussion in a school environment about the law changing and same-sex marriage being introduced without that being seen as advocacy or the promotion of an ideology. The problem that we have with some of the resources that have been targeted by Stonewall Scotland at primaries 1 and 2 is that they are clearly advocacy, and there is no guarantee that parents will have a right to withdraw their children. The resources might well be used not in a sex education class but in a reading class; if so, there would be no legal right to withdraw their children. That is the problem. That does not mean, however, that people cannot have a discussion in fourth-year modern studies about the Scottish Parliament's Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill and the campaign that went around it. We are talking about completely different scenarios.

Marco Biagi: A lot of literature has been written. You drew attention to “King & King” in your submission, Dr Macdonald. How does your position extend to mainstream literature that may, for example, have homosexual relations in it? “Moll Flanders” is one such example. Is that something that should not be available to children?

Dr Macdonald: The point that we are making is that parents should have a right to know what their children are being taught and a right to withdraw their children if they are unhappy with that without fear of being prosecuted, which is apparently the threat south of the border. That seems to me to be an issue of parental choice and freedom and of respecting the rights of parents to have their children educated in accordance with their religious and philosophical beliefs, rather than a discussion about whether this or that resource should be used in this or that class.

Siobhan McMahon: A number of organisations and individuals who support the bill have written submissions suggesting that there are robust protections in the bill. Do you share that view? If you do not—I presume that you do not—what are the reasons for that? Can you think of anything that could be put into the bill to make it workable for your religious body?

Dr Macdonald: To be honest, I think that the protections in the bill are very weak. The Scottish Government's intent is probably honourable—I would take what it says at face value—but I do not think that it has backed it up with legislative support. In a sense, what the Scottish Government has indicated to us informally is that this is Scotland, everybody knows each other, we are all friends here, nobody will do the sorts of things that happen in England and therefore we do not need legal protection—it can all be guaranteed by guidance and by a sort of informal agreement with the registrar general or the Lord Advocate. That is the approach that the Scottish Government has taken.

I do not think that that is sufficient. There are things that the Scottish Parliament can do in terms of legislation to protect charities. We can look at the definition of public benefit or, more significantly, the definition of public disbenefit. We can change the charity legislation so that the Office of the Scottish Charity Regulator cannot do to churches what it is doing to St Margaret's adoption agency at the moment. We could introduce a statutory right for parents to be informed and—depending on the age of the child—to withdraw their child if they are uncomfortable with what they are being taught. There are other things that can be done under devolved legislation.

Equally, though, Parliament has quite a bit of political clout when it comes to influencing the Westminster Government. It could seek a stronger agreement from Westminster that it will amend the Equality Act 2010. I would encourage Parliament to do that.

I draw the committee's attention to what the Faculty of Advocates has said and I would encourage you to ask it for its views. It says that the current agreement that the Scottish Government has come up with is not watertight and could well be challenged, not only by chaplains and people working in the public sector but by religious celebrants who were forced by their denomination to participate, even if it goes against their conscience.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: The Church of Scotland would broadly share those concerns. There are some important points to be made. First, the Church of Scotland has no doubt that the Scottish Government is offering the protections that it is offering in good faith and is seeking to preserve the right of individual religious bodies and their celebrants to make a decision.

However, we have not seen two important parts of the scheme. The scheme is not just what is in the bill that is before Parliament. It will be contained in delegated legislation that we have not seen. It will also be contained in an amendment to the UK Equality Act 2010—we have the gist of what that might be but we have not seen the wording. Those are important caveats, to which I would add another.

There is deep concern that, even if everything falls into place, as the Scottish Government would like it to do, the proposed legislation will be ineffective in the face of a sustained challenge under the European convention on human rights. Once same-sex marriage is introduced, it will be extraordinarily difficult for a Government—a state—to discriminate. If the Scottish Parliament introduces same-sex marriage, the Scottish Government—the state—will find it extremely difficult either to discriminate or to allow others to do so.

That is why we have introduced the suggestion in paragraphs 19 and 20 of our submission that the vulnerabilities of the proposed scheme may be reduced if, instead of religious and belief bodies being agents of the state in carrying out marriages—as is currently envisaged in the statutory scheme—the religious ceremonies that they offered were simply recognised by the state as being efficacious in marrying two people. A religious body or a belief body would carry out what is essentially a private religious ceremony but the state would recognise it.

We believe that that suggestion would reduce the vulnerability of the current scheme because religious and belief bodies would not be seen as agents of the state. We urge the Scottish Parliament to consider that. Nevertheless, even with that innovation, we have deep concerns that, when challenged, the proposed legislation will unravel. There is plenty of high-level legal opinion to that effect.

We are also concerned that the proposed legislation is an invitation to take religious bodies in particular through the court system. We are voluntary bodies; we rely upon our members giving donations. The thought of years of exhausting and incredibly expensive legal challenge is very concerning. That is why in May the General Assembly of 2013 instructed my committee, together with other councils and committees in the Church of Scotland, to consider—to put it colloquially; these are not the terms of the General Assembly deliverance—whether it is worth the Church of Scotland continuing to offer marriages in Scotland. The matter gives us considerable internal problems and we are deeply concerned about the external threat.

Dr Macdonald: Just to clarify, the issue comes down to what a public function is. When the cabinet secretary comes to the committee, I encourage you to ask him what he thinks a public function is and whether a minister of religion who is marrying people is performing a public function. In the Ladele case, the court ruled that Ms Ladele was a public authority because she performed a public function and yet the public function that a civil registrar performs is exactly the same public function that a minister of religion or a religious celebrant performs. Therefore, it then becomes an issue of balance of rights, and what a court would rule as regards the balance of rights may well change over time and may very well change from one jurisdiction to another.

Siobhan McMahon: I suppose the counter to that would be that at the moment, the registrar is seen as someone who performs a function for the local authority whereas the religious celebrant performs a function for their church or organisation. Do you have a view on that, Dr Macdonald?

Dr Macdonald: The religious celebrant performs a function for the Government, but they do it within the context of a religious service.

Siobhan McMahon: Some of the witnesses have already commented on the topic that I will raise. What are your views on the equality impact assessment that has been carried out? Although the Scottish Government has said that it does not wish anyone to be forced into performing ceremonies, it has also said that those assurances might not be guaranteed—that was in the EqIA. Do you have views on that?

Ephraim Borowski: There are three aspects. One relates to what Alan Hamilton and Gordon Macdonald have said about external challenges to the bill. We did not address that directly in our submission. We addressed the internal gaps, as I said earlier, where the precise drafting means that the protections that are clearly intended by the bill might not be watertight. As for the more general question of the equality impact, we have drawn attention to a couple of things that are perhaps partially internal and partially external, which suggest that there is a lack of equality of arms, as it were, between the two sides in the debate.

09:00

It is clear that there are strongly held ethical views on both sides. Therefore, we have commented that it is a concern that, for example, the Lord Advocate produces guidance on the prosecution of people for expressing their opposition to the proposal in a particularly strong manner but not guidance on the prosecution of people who express their support of it.

That comes back to the points that have been made about what goes on in classrooms and how that is presented. There does not seem to be the same concern for the clear distinction that is already made between religious education, as it is now understood, and religious instruction. In my view at any rate, that is similar to the point that Mr
Robertson made about how things are taught and about the distinction between religious and moral education on the one hand and science education on the other.

The Rev David Robertson: My concern is not so much about the clergy—to be honest, we can look after ourselves—as about other people, who might find themselves victims of discrimination. A fundamental axiom of the way in which those who rule us govern and educate is that they discriminate against discrimination. The minute that those who are for same-sex marriage rather cleverly started calling it equal marriage—which means that people are now asked, “Are you for equal marriage?”—the ball game changed. I do not think that any protections that the Parliament puts in place will ultimately last if the conception is that this is about equality. No one should be allowed to do something that is unjust and unequal, and the Parliament will not legislate on that basis.

To me, the approach is intended to help to get the bill through but, ultimately, we will end up in a situation in which people who oppose same-sex marriage will automatically be regarded as bigots and as people who are discriminatory and who should therefore be discriminated against. I think that, in a short space of time, schools that do not teach the new morality and charities that do not accept the new morality will be legislated against. In fact, I do not think that there will need to be legislation; I think that the courts will find against us and we will get hammered.

The Convener: Bishop Armes, would you like to comment or are you okay?

The Rt Rev Dr John Armes: I think that I am okay. The Scottish Episcopal Church is probably at a slightly different place on the spectrum from some of the churches whose views we have heard. We express a wide spectrum of views. Some of us are firmly in favour of the bill and some of us are wary of and concerned about it. It is important to us that whatever is built into the bill is enacted into the law of the Church under its Barrier Act 1697. That being the case, I think that the state has an objective interest in recognising marriage in law. The sociological data show that children perform better if they come from a family with married parents than if they come from a single-parent family or some other sort of broken home. That being the case, I think that the state has an objective interest in recognising marriage in law.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: I am sure that my colleagues in the public gallery would agree that nothing in the Church of Scotland is simple.

It is important to acknowledge that there are diverse views in the Church of Scotland and that we are debating a number of matters relating to same-sex issues. It is common wisdom that the fault lines over same-sex marriage fall differently from those on the broader issue of same-sex relationships.

There would undoubtedly have to be a period of discussion and debate. Because the issue is so important, even after that period, if one general assembly decided in favour of the denomination allowing its celebrants to carry out same-sex marriage—I do not think that our celebrants would ever be forced to do that—there would still have to be a confirmatory decision of a majority of the presbyteries of the Church of Scotland over the next 12 months, followed by a second decision in favour of the proposal by the succeeding general assembly. The process is not straightforward, but such things happen.

Alex Johnstone: We have gone into detail on a number of issues. However, I do not want to miss the opportunity to discuss the more general issue that we are dealing with.

I have read through the submissions and, although I have not ticked off the boxes, I note that most of the submissions take the opportunity to talk about marriage as the basis for family and the rearing of children. Would you like to say anything specific about the role of marriage in the provision of a stable basis for rearing children?

Dr Macdonald: I think that it is good that the committee should consider the bill in principle at this stage and not just the details—part of my concern has been that the entire focus will be on the details.

The question that you have to ask yourselves is: what is marriage? Is marriage just a subjective expression of love between two individuals or is it more than that—does it have some sort of objective reality? In particular, what is the state’s interest in legislating for marriage? Throughout history and across societies, the state’s interest in legislating for marriage has arisen because marriage is the context in which children are normally produced and reared, and it is the most stable and secure context. The sociological data show that children perform better if they come from a family with married parents than if they come from a single-parent family or some other sort of broken home. That being the case, I think that the state has an objective interest in recognising marriage in law.

The state has never been interested in whether a man and a woman who are getting married love each other; it is interested in whether they are committed to staying together and will provide a framework in which children will be raised. In history, there have been many society marriages that were not love marriages. That does not happen as much any more, but it used to happen. There has been a historical development in that sense.

The point that I am making is that the state’s interest relates purely to the production of children and the raising of the next generation, in the interests of the security and stability of society. That is why the biological complementarity of male and female is crucial to the essence of what marriage is.

Alex Johnstone: Over my lifetime, and probably for a while before that, there has been a perception that the strength of marriage and its role in society and the strength of family life have been weakening, with a number of obvious impacts on how society conducts itself. Do you believe that the weakening of the status of marriage has weakened family life?

Dr Macdonald: The increase in divorce and cohabitation has almost certainly led to instability in society and in families. The official report into the riots in England mentioned that most of the people who participated came from broken homes. That is a different issue from the issue that the bill is concerned with, but the decline of marriage as a social norm cannot be divorced from a range of social problems that have arisen in our society.

Alex Johnstone: When politicians and others discuss key issues, we often use phrases such as, “All other things being equal, how will this change perceptions?” Can the changes that are contained in the bill be discussed with the assumption that they will not have an impact on the status of marriage in other respects?

Dr Macdonald: The bill fundamentally redefines marriage. It means that marriage ceases to be a relationship between a man and a woman, with the complementarity of two genders, and becomes a relationship between two people of the same sex. You get into even more confusion when you get into the whole transgender issue—that came out this week at the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, which some of the committee members are members of.

The principle is opened up that marriage can be redefined in any way that the state wishes. Whether the state has the authority to do that is not an issue on which Scotland for Marriage would take a view, but it is certainly one on which churches would take a view, given their understanding of the relationship between church and state.

Alex Johnstone: Should the proposed change in legislation take place, do you think that it would weaken marriage as one of the foundations on which family life and society as a whole are based?

Dr Macdonald: I do, but I will let others comment, too.

The Rev David Robertson: Alex Johnstone is hitting the heart of the issue. Two things that he said are particularly perceptive. First, the bill will not initiate a major decline in marriage, as there has been a decline in marriage and its value in society for a long time. The bill is just part of that process, which I would like to be reversed.

I believe that it is because the understanding of marriage has become so weak that the bill is taken as a given by so many people, on the ground that it is just about equality. I wrote a letter to David Cameron and spoke to the Liberal Democrat spokesperson who drew up the British Government’s legislation on the issue. He basically admitted that they could not define marriage. How do we redefine marriage if we cannot define it?

My fear is that what is happening here is part of a process and that, if the bill is passed, all marriages will become civil partnerships. The bill represents a move away from the Christian teaching of marriage, on which our society has been based for well over 1,000 years.

Therefore, I appeal to MSPs not to vote for the bill but to think about the enormous social consequences that the proposed change will have. Even though the bill fits in with the zeitgeist and there is enormous pressure to make such a change, MSPs should say no, at least until we have looked at what the consequences will be. The bill will accelerate the decline in marriage, and the social and economic consequences will be phenomenal.

Marco Biagi: Will you explain to me how increasing the number of people who get married each year will cause a decline in marriage?

The Rev David Robertson: Because you are redefining marriage for everyone—you are changing what marriage is—so you are turning all marriages into civil partnerships.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: As I have said repeatedly, the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland has not debated the matter, but there are certainly folk in the church who would agree with what Mr Robertson and Dr Macdonald have said. Even those who do not are anxious that we are moving into uncharted territory. Unless we are saying that marriage between a man and a woman is of no real significance in society and is not that important anyway, to redefine it so significantly without having the debate that we feel should take place, and without carrying out the research that we feel should be done, over a protracted period—after all, the issue is extremely important, and not just theologically, although we would argue that our theology is also our understanding of society—would be to move too far, too fast.

It is of deep concern to almost everyone in the Church of Scotland that there should be protection for everyone, regardless of sexual orientation—whether heterosexual or homosexual—and that there should also be equality. However, there is concern that the bill is a move beyond equality, given what is available to same-sex couples under the civil partnership legislation. It is a move beyond equality into sameness, which is another issue that concerns us and one that we do not believe has been properly considered. As I said, that is the view of my committee—the general assembly has not yet debated the matter.

09:15

The Rt Rev Dr John Armes: The Episcopal Church has a similar process, and we really need to discuss in depth all the different views in the church, which I think are pretty representative of the views of the public at large, to find out where we go on the issue. I support Mr Hamilton’s point about having a more protracted series of discussions on some of the issues.

Although some people in our church take the very conservative line that marriage is between a man and a woman, others see marriage as a covenanted relationship of love. In that sense, the issue is about love, not equality, and those people would see the opportunity for people of whatever gender to form an alliance in marriage as strengthening marriage itself. I would not want people to gain the impression from this conversation that everyone in our church is of the same mind on the matter.

John Mason: I will start with the submission from the Free Church of Scotland. I must put on record my strong disagreement with the suggestion that the Scottish Parliament is acting as “a tool of the Conservative/Liberal Democrat Coalition in London.”

The Rev David Robertson: I thought that you might.

John Mason: I am not entirely happy with the bill but, whatever the reason for it was, it was not for the Parliament to be such a “tool”.

On the point about the state’s right to be involved, it has been suggested that marriage involves three contracts: the first is between the two people in question; the second is between the two people and the state; and the third is between the two people and God. Given the second of those contracts, does the state not have the right to get involved?

The Rev David Robertson: That is an interesting question. First, I should apologise for the remark that you highlighted, which came from my friend and colleague Gordon Wilson, who is turning into something of a radical in his old age. He has promised, however, not to try to expel Mr Salmond again.

The state has the right to legislate on any civil contracts that it wishes. My point of dispute is that marriage is not just a civil contract and the state does not have the right to change such an age-old institution. Basically, it will destroy marriage by turning all marriages into civil contracts.

To refer again to the Westminster Government, I was intrigued to learn that adultery will not be a ground for divorce in a same-sex marriage and to hear the discussion about children and so on. In the bizarre world in which we live, our Governments are telling us that marriage is to be redefined as genderless or sexless, childless and faithless. That is an absurd position. The state can decide any civil contracts that it wishes, but I object to its saying, “We’re going to make all marriages a civil contract.”

John Mason: The Humanist Society Scotland, which will give evidence in the next session, has suggested that the Church of Scotland has been put in a privileged position and that that should not be the case. Does the Church of Scotland believe that it has such a position compared with other churches?

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: The Church of Scotland believes that it has a responsible position that is no less than that of any other church. We have a responsibility to all the people of Scotland, regardless of religious belief or sexual orientation. That is where we are. How the state reflects the Church of Scotland’s position in the country’s national life is really up to it, but we do not seek a privileged position.

John Mason: Does anyone else wish to comment on the Church of Scotland’s position or are you all happy to leave the matter?

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: I have to say that I am not entirely sure in what way the Church of Scotland is deemed to be privileged.

John Mason: The bill specifically mentions it as a denomination, whereas other denominations have not been mentioned.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: Does that make it privileged?

John Mason: In some people’s view it does. I just wanted to hear your views, and I will ask the Humanist Society later for its thoughts.

Ephraim Borowski: I take the opportunity to reiterate a related point in our submission that is to do not with the allegedly privileged position of the Church of Scotland but the distinction between religious marriage and belief marriage. It has been correctly recognised that the humanists feel to some extent compromised by the fact that the current fudge, for want of a better expression, allows them to conduct what are referred to as religious marriages. Humanists want to be able to continue doing what they currently do but not to have it labelled “religious”. That is perfectly acceptable. However, what is proposed will result in the religious aspect of genuinely religious marriage being kind of removed, because religious and belief marriages are left in the same basket. The distinction between them, which is a significant distinction that all my colleagues have founded on at various points in their answers to other questions, disappears. Therefore, we have suggested what looks like a trivial grammatical drafting change—from “religious or belief marriage” to “religious marriage or belief marriage”—because we believe that the distinction still exists and should not be elided in that way.

John Mason: Mr Armes, I will pick up on what you said about the definition of marriage as “a covenanted relationship of love”. Why do we restrict that to two people? From my reading of scripture, that has been the case in the Jewish and Christian traditions but, having lived in Nepal, I know that many Hindu and Muslim societies have had the tradition of marriage being between one man and more than one wife—perhaps two wives. If people, especially the two women involved, willingly entered into such a relationship knowing and accepting that the marriage involved three people, would you be happy for that to be one of the definitions of marriage as a covenanted relationship of love?

The Rt Rev Dr John Armes: That is an interesting question, but I think that my answer would be no. Marriage has existed in different forms in different cultures over the centuries. That is why the question whether the state has the right to define marriage—to say who can get married—is relevant. I personally, and the church that I represent, would say that the state has that right. If the state were to say that marriage could be between three or four people or more, I suppose that the state would have the right to do that. However, in the context of the Christian faith, marriage has always been between two people. For me, the idea of the covenanted aspect of the relationship is that it is a covenant between two people.

John Mason: Would it also be correct to say that, in Christian tradition, marriage has always been between one man and one woman?

The Rt Rev Dr John Armes: Yes.

John Mason: So if you are changing Christian tradition in one way, you would be reasonably relaxed about changing it in another way.

The Rt Rev Dr John Armes: Well, no. We are engaged in a conversation at the moment, but whether people can marry more than one spouse at one time will not be part of our conversation. My point about marriage being a covenanted relationship of love is shared by some people in one part of our church, but it is not shared by others. That is precisely the kind of conversation that we in our church need to get into—and are engaged in at the moment—before we can reach any decision on whether we can officiate at same-sex marriages.

The Convener: We are running quite tight for time. To ensure that other committee members have an opportunity to ask questions, I ask that answers be concise.

Marco Biagi: A lot of the areas that I wanted to ask about have been covered. The witness from the Free Church of Scotland referred to the definition of marriage—the definition seems to be very important to you. Did you say that the difference between marriage and civil partnership is that marriage is sacred and a civil partnership is just a civil contract?

The Rev David Robertson: No, it is more than that. You said, “sacred”; in putting forward this bill you are by definition turning every marriage into a civil contract.

Marco Biagi: Do you support the existing civil partnerships legislation?

The Rev David Robertson: That is for the Government; the Government can do that. I happen to believe the traditional Christian teaching, which is that sex should be between a man and a woman, in the confines of marriage. I realise that that is deeply unfashionable. However, that is not the issue here.

Marco Biagi: You talked about your discussion with a Whitehall official, or politician—whoever it was—in which you asked them to define marriage and they said that they could not do so. Would you say that within your faith you have a reasonably robust definition of marriage?

The Rev David Robertson: Yes. It is there in our submission. The response that the person initially gave was that marriage is between two people who love each other. The logical progression—at which people throw up their hands in horror and have a heart attack—would be to say that if that is the case there is nothing wrong with someone marrying their adult son, if they love each other. To say that marriage is between two people who love each other is emotive and sounds great in the press, but as a basis for law it is an absurd definition.

Our definition is in our submission and is basically the catholic Christian orthodox position:

“The meaning of marriage is straightforward. It is the union between one man and one woman, for the threefold purpose of mutual companionship, the procreation and upbringing of children in a secure environment, and the good of society.”

Marco Biagi: You said that you would marry an infertile couple, which casts doubt on that definition.

I am concerned that the religious groups to which the witnesses belong all have slightly different definitions. We heard that one of the Jewish communities has its own interpretation of what marriage should be, and we heard that the Episcopal Church has a variety of interpretations and is coming to a position. Are there multiple definitions out there?

The Rt Rev Dr John Armes: The Episcopal Church says in its canon 31, which is part of its submission:

“Marriage is a physical, spiritual and mystical union of one man and one woman created by their mutual consent of heart, mind and will thereto, and is a holy and lifelong estate instituted of God.”

That is how we define marriage, and I would think that is pretty much in step with most Christian churches at the moment.

What I am saying is that within our church, partly because of what is abroad in the state, the challenge that we face is whether we need to rethink that definition. However, at the moment, that is where we stand and that is what constitutes marriage in the Episcopal Church. If that is to change, we will have to undergo quite a long process of conversation, discussion and decision before we can accept that any of our ministers can preside at a marriage of two people of the same gender.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: There are undoubtedly theological nuances in relation to expressions of understanding of marriage across churches and religious traditions, but the issue for us here is whether or not marriage is only between one man and one woman. It is certainly the historical catholic—with a small c—Christian tradition that it is.

If the Scottish Government and the Scottish Parliament want the churches to change that, they need to recognise that this is an immense ask—it is a huge ask for us to depart from our historical position.

Marco Biagi: In what way does the Scottish Government want churches to change their definition?

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: It is offering the possibility.

Marco Biagi: That is a very different prospect, legally.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: Yes—if the Scottish Government’s opt-in provisions are efficacious. However, we are not convinced that they are efficacious.

Marco Biagi: If the opt-in provisions were robust and protected against challenge, would you have no objection to the bill?

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: What we have been asked all along, and particularly in the consultation, is whether we support the bill; the Scottish Government has introduced a bill and asked whether we can support it. We cannot give that because our position on human sexuality remains unchanged. It is the historic catholic orthodox position that is followed by most Christians around the world. If the Scottish Government wants our support, we will have to change, and that is a big ask for us.

The real issue is not the nuances about our understanding of marriage. The Scottish Government and the Scottish Parliament are focusing on one simple issue: is marriage between one man and one woman or can it be between people of the same sex?

09:30

Dr Macdonald: If the Parliament makes that jump and says that marriage is not only between one man and one woman—which is not only the historic Christian position but the historic British and western position—it must then ask where it goes as an issue of principle. Would it be discriminatory not to legislate to legalise polygamy, for example? The Parliament would clearly be allowing marriage to be redefined in one way but not in another way. On what basis would it be doing that? It must answer that question.

What would we do in the scenario of a bisexual man who lives with a man and a woman? There have already been moves in some European countries to recognise such relationships in law. The bill cannot be seen in isolation. We must ask where it will lead to logically, even if there is at the moment no political will to go there.

The Convener: Thank you very much. As I have said, we are quite tight for time, so I pass you over to Christian Allard.

Christian Allard: I thank the witnesses for coming. I will continue on the subject of not taking the bill in isolation.

Since the Scottish Government started the conversation in 2011, many other countries have introduced bills on same-sex marriage. The unholy relationship in London between the Liberal Democrats and the Conservatives did so, but so did other countries in Europe.

How will that play with your organisation and churches in those countries? We live in a globalised world now, so people move a lot more than they did in the past. Will that and the different legislation in different countries lead to conflict with your organisation and churches?

There are two questions. The first is about timing. Is the Scottish Government right to have taken a little bit longer in legislating than other countries have? Secondly, if the bill is not passed, how will it affect your organisation and churches if other countries have already passed similar legislation?

Dr Macdonald: Very few countries in the world have passed such legislation; I think about 10 have. France has recently done so, as Mr Allard will know. It is a particularly Western phenomenon. I do not expect that large swathes of countries in Africa, the middle east or eastern Europe will rush to legalise same-sex marriage in the next 20 years unless they are forced to do so by the Council of Europe or the European Court of Human Rights, which is a danger for those that are members of the Council of Europe, regardless of national views or democratic mandates. The view that legalisation of same-sex marriage is a progressive trend and that everybody will do it eventually is questionable, to be honest.

My organisation is a Scottish organisation and has no plans to set up a campaign in France, you will be pleased to know.

Ephraim Borowski: Perhaps I could begin to answer the first question by picking up something that Alan Hamilton said. We are discussing two different questions: one is whether we support the bill and the other is what our position is, or will be, as agents within the new legislation.

We all have opinions and some of us, as has already been made clear, have not yet formed an opinion, have different opinions or are still far away from forming an official opinion through our various governing bodies. Therefore, from that point of view, it may be that the process is far too swift. Although parliamentary procedure may seem to be very slow, the various denominations that are represented around the table grind even slower. Therefore, to ask not just the first question but to go further and ask the second question is far too swift for us.

On your second question, my understanding—I stand ready to be corrected—is that, in most European countries and in other jurisdictions, civil marriage and religious marriage are completely separate from one another and there are two separate ceremonies. People go to the registry office for one and to the church, synagogue, mosque or whatever for the other. An unintended consequence of the bill may be that that will start to happen more in this country. Therefore, we need to be conscious of the fact that what happens in all the jurisdictions in the UK is not the same as what already happens everywhere else regarding what is currently referred to as marriage. Following what one might call the European model may be a way of avoiding some of the problems that are being thrown up around the table.

The Convener: Christian, do you have another question?

Christian Allard: No—I would just like to know the views of the other panel members on the matter.

The Rt Rev Dr John Armes: For us, too, the timescale is too short; we need more time to work this through. I am not sure where the Scottish Episcopal Church will get to or what resolution we will reach on the bill.

Nevertheless, Christian Allard is right to say that we are part of a much wider family of churches; we are part of various communions of churches as well. For example, we are in communion with the church in Sweden, which celebrates same-sex marriages under the state there. We are also, in the Anglican communion, part of a world-wide family of churches that includes lots of churches in Africa and other parts of the world to which same-sex marriage would be complete anathema, and we have responsibilities to them as well. We must be careful not to be seen to be going it alone as a church, and we must respect the fact that the speed at which we might want to move is not the speed at which the whole church wants to move.

The implication in the question is correct; we are not autonomous on this issue, because we want to respect where our brothers and sisters elsewhere stand.

Christian Allard: I am interested to hear that the countries that you are talking about will not legislate in this way. An amendment has been proposed by the Equality Network and the Scottish Transgender Alliance that would allow a couple with a civil partnership that was registered in another country to marry in Scotland. Do you think that that would lead to an influx here? Could that be one of the consequences of the bill?

The Rt Rev Dr John Armes: I have not thought that one through in any depth, but that might be the case. If one of our churches were to say that it would happily officiate at same-sex marriages, I am sure that people would come here from elsewhere. There are many Christians who are gay and would want to celebrate their partnerships in a sanctified fashion. If that could be done within the context of a church service somewhere, they may well seek to go to that somewhere to do it. Whether that somewhere will be the Scottish Episcopal Church, the Church of Scotland or any of our denominations is something that we still need to work through.

Jim Eadie: My questions are primarily for the Rev Hamilton, but I would welcome views from the other panel members, if we have time. You expressed some doubt about the opt-in provisions of the bill. Do you not accept not only that the bill, in and of itself, will not compel individual celebrants to perform same-sex marriages, but that, beyond that, it will not allow individual celebrants within the Church of Scotland to celebrate same-sex marriage for the very reason that you outlined, which is that there would have to be a protracted period of debate and discussion before the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland could arrive at a definitive position?

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: The period would not be all that protracted—

Jim Eadie: Well, it will have taken from 2009 to 2015 to decide on the issue of gay clergy within the church.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: Can I be allowed to complete my answer, convener?

The decision would take not decades, but a matter of years. Our concern is that, if the Church of Scotland generally says no, we will be challenged under European legislation, and whatever is in the UK act or in delegated legislation will unravel. If we say yes, ministers and deacons may, if they so choose, celebrate same-sex marriages, but the denomination or the individual celebrant—or both—who says no will find themselves being challenged under European legislation.

Jim Eadie’s question is based on a red herring. If the Church of Scotland were even to delay taking action it could find itself being challenged. What is of deep concern is not whether the Scottish Government or the Parliament want to offer protections to the Church of Scotland or any other denomination, but whether those protections would be effective.

Jim Eadie: It is very helpful to have that response on the record.

Dr Macdonald: The bill cannot be seen in isolation from other legislation, such as the Equality Act 2010, which was passed by Westminster, and the European convention on human rights. The problem that arose when adoption was considered by the Equal Opportunities Committee in the previous session of Parliament was that ministers gave lots of assurances that nothing in the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Bill would force Roman Catholic adoption agencies to do anything or shut them down. That was technically right; nothing in that act would do that. The equality legislation at Westminster is the problem that has led to most of the agencies shutting down.

Ministers can give the same assurances on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill, but members have a moral responsibility to ask themselves whether the protections are robust and can withstand an ECHR challenge. There is already an attempt south of the border to challenge the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013—which was passed only a few weeks ago—in regard to the Church of England’s position. It is almost certain that a similar challenge will arise north of the border. Therefore, members must ensure that not only this bill but other legislation—to the extent that they can influence it—is amended to provide protections.

Ephraim Borowski: I am aware of nothing in the Equality Act 2010 that suggests that there should be a hierarchy of grounds of equality, but it is clear from looking at the decisions in case law that has emerged and that issues about gender and sexuality trump issues about religion. Although there may be nothing in the UK Equality Act 2010 to that effect, the wording of schedule 5, part II, head L (miscellaneous), in section L2 (equal opportunities) of the Scotland Act 1998 lays down a hierarchy of grounds in which religious beliefs comes right at the very end along with political beliefs.

If anything, there is even more potential for legal challenge in Scotland than is the case elsewhere in the UK. Someone mentioned—I think it was Gordon Macdonald—the provision in European law for a margin of appreciation. As he said, we need to consider whether we allow a situation to develop in all the UK jurisdictions in which it is possible to deal reasonably with clashes of different equality strands rather than one of them always being understood to trump another for whatever reason.

Jim Eadie: My final question is to the Rev Dr Alan Hamilton. Are you aware of individual clergy in the Church of Scotland who support the bill for whom it is of a source of considerable personal pain that they will not be able to perform same-sex marriages? Clergy in my constituency have expressed that view to me, so I speak with some knowledge of the issue.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: I am interested to know how you know that those clergy will not be allowed to conduct same-sex marriages because I do not know that.

Jim Eadie: I have been told that the legislation will, in and of itself, not allow that to happen.
because they are governed by the General Assembly and the Government’s intention is not to interfere in the internal affairs of individual denominations.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: I have made it clear from the outset that that is a matter that the General Assembly has yet to consider, so I struggle to understand how Mr Eadie can reach that conclusion—unless he has the gift of prophecy.

Jim Eadie: You are misinterpreting and misrepresenting the view that I have expressed. I am expressing the view of my constituents who are clergy in the Church of Scotland and other denominations. They have told me that it is a matter of personal pain that they will not be able to perform same-sex marriages.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: I refer to my earlier answer.

The Convener: I thank Jim Eadie for his questions. Marco Biagi has a quick question.

Marco Biagi: If this were a bill simply to legislate for same-sex civil marriage and left out religious officiation in its entirety, would you have the same concerns? A yes or no response would be fine.

The Rev Dr Alan Hamilton: Different concerns.

Dr Macdonald: We would certainly be concerned because we believe that marriage is between a man and a woman.

Marco Biagi: That is a yes.

Dr Macdonald: Yes.

Ephraim Borowski: I would have to take advice from the different religious strands of the Jewish community, but I suspect that we would say that that is a completely different question.

The Rev David Robertson: The question does not make sense because the state cannot regulate religious marriage; it can regulate only civil marriage. The obvious answer is that I would share the same concerns, but I would be most concerned about a state that thinks it can regulate religious marriages—the state has no right to do that.

The Rt Rev Dr John Armes: The concerns would be different. We are concerned about society at large and not just about what happens in the confines of our churches.

The Convener: I thank all the witnesses for their contributions and for coming along to the committee. I suspend the meeting to allow our second panel of witnesses to take their seats.

09:46
Meeting suspended.

09:56
On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel of witnesses and ask them to introduce themselves.

Louise Cameron (Scottish Youth Parliament): I am vice-chair of the Scottish Youth Parliament.

The Rev David Coleman (United Reformed Church): I am here in my capacity as convener of the church and society committee of the national synod of Scotland of the United Reformed Church.

Ross Wright (Humanist Society Scotland): I am from the Humanist Society Scotland and am a celebrant and spokesperson on equal marriage.

Mark Bevan (Amnesty International): I am from Amnesty International.

The Convener: John Mason will start the questioning.

John Mason: That was a surprise, convener.

I thank the witnesses for their submissions. I have to say that I found the Scottish Youth Parliament submission to be interesting. It says, for example:

“We are firmly of the belief that two people in love should be allowed to demonstrate their love and commitment to each other in a way that reflects their personal feelings for each other.”

Why did you choose the number two? In many parts of the world in the past—indeed, in some parts of the world in the present—it has been perfectly culturally acceptable to have three people in a marriage as long as everyone is willing to go into it.

Louise Cameron: We firmly believe that marriage is between two people. Polygamy is not an equal relationship—indeed, it is usually against the women involved—whereas we believe that a relationship between two people can be equal.

John Mason: So even if all three individuals loved each other and were willing to go into that relationship, you would be against that?

Louise Cameron: Yes. That is not what we are fighting for—we are fighting for the ability for two people who love each other to get married.

John Mason: Thank you.

Turning to Mr Wright from the Humanist Society, I do not know whether you were present for the previous evidence session but I asked the Church of Scotland about your comment that it was in a privileged position. I have to say that it seemed to be a bit vague about that. Can you clarify for us why you think that the church is in a privileged position?

Ross Wright: In law, they are the only people who are, as of right, allowed to marry others. Everyone else has to be approved. Of course, that also creates a confusion in the bill in that it has required an additional amendment about deacons. If the church had been included with everyone else in the section in question, it could approve whoever it wanted, but because the Church of Scotland has this special privilege as of right to marry, a separate section relating to deacons has had to be included. Obviously, in giving evidence to an Equal Opportunities Committee, we would advocate that everyone should be treated equally; however, if a church is not established, it does not have the same special privilege.

John Mason: In your submission, you say:

"it is unthinkable that a public official carrying out a public service be allowed to discriminate on the grounds of sexuality/sexual orientation."

However, there are other examples of people working in the public sector doing things in different ways. The obvious one is that individual employees are allowed to opt out of being involved in abortion. I do not know whether you think that that is a good or a bad thing, but it has been suggested as a possible model for the future in that, although the state pays everyone and provides services, a bit of movement is allowed for individual conscience.

John Mason: I assume that you would be against having faith schools at all. That is an example in which the state provides education in different ways, either in faith schools or in non-faith schools.

Ross Wright: Unfortunately, I am not here to debate faith in education, and I am not an expert on it.

John Mason: I accept that. My point is that you are not happy with the state providing funds and services in different ways—you want everything to be exactly the same.

Ross Wright: If that is the way in which the state currently agrees that things should be managed, we would prefer it to be different, but we are not campaigning for that actively in relation to the bill before us.

John Finnie: Mr Wright, you mention gender recognition certificates in your submission. Could you outline your position on that and say why you hold that position? If it helps, I will quote what you have written. Your submission states:

"The HSS strongly supports the ability for a transgendered person to remain married when obtaining a full Gender recognition Certificate."

Ross Wright: Yes. That is so that if, within a marriage between a man and a woman, one of them decides to change gender, they do not need to get divorced in order then to remarry as a same-sex couple.

John Finnie: I move on to the issue of freedom of speech. You state in your submission:

"When these laws were framed lawmakers did not consider enshrining in law special rights for those opposed to treating women, minority ethnic people or disabled people equally."

Is marriage not different?

Ross Wright: I do not see it as different, and the position of the Humanist Society is that it is not different. Because the subject is sexuality, we seem to be getting into a real state over it and treating it differently from race or gender. It is puzzling to me why special provision is being made to bend over backwards to allow people that. Of course, they will still have the right to disagree and to say what they want about it. We are simply arguing for the right for people who want to have a same-sex marriage to have one.

John Finnie: Mr Bevan, we have heard a lot about the hierarchy of rights. Amnesty will have experience of dealing with situations in which there are competing rights. How do you think that should be dealt with in relation to legislation?

Mark Bevan: The fundamental position of Amnesty International is reflected in something called the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. That it is universal is the most important thing about it. We would not see a conflict in rights here at all. I do not know whether you are referring to our belief that same-sex marriage should be allowed in law and our belief in equality, set against—as some have argued—the opportunity for religious celebrants to refuse to marry. We do not see those two things as being in conflict at all. The freedom to practise a religion does not conflict with the freedom to marry everyone else in the community on an equal basis.

John Finnie: What is your comment about what people say are the protections that the bill will afford to religious celebrants?

Mark Bevan: Having reviewed the proposals in the bill, we have no issues with those at all. The Lord Advocate has also made his position very clear.

Marco Biagi: Mr Bevan, you just referred to the freedom to practise. As the representative of an organisation that is active in many countries and is very strong on the freedom to practise and religious persecution around the world, do you consider that there is an issue with freedom to practise for those faiths, including those of the people who are sitting next to you who are not currently free to practise their view of marriage, which includes performing them for same-sex couples?

Mark Bevan: I am sorry; could you clarify your question?

Marco Biagi: Freedom to practise is an important human right. Do you think that there is a problem that many faiths in Scotland that wish to perform same-sex marriages and practise their faith in that way are forbidden to do so?

Mark Bevan: Absolutely.

Siobhan McMahon: Mr Wright, in your evidence, you said that you would defend anyone’s right to practise their beliefs, and that you would advocate for other beliefs. However, when you say that you do not understand the opposing view, is it because you might not, or do not want to, understand the religious body or its belief? Do you recognise that?

Ross Wright: No. I understand where people are coming from but if we are going to have the modern, secular democracy that we advocate, we should be able to frame laws that allow both to coexist. That is why we strongly support the bill, because it supports the rights of people like ourselves who wish to conduct such marriages and protects those who do not.

One point that I would like to make about the conscience clause—I think that Mr Eadie alluded to this—is that it works only one way. People whose organisations have opted in, like humanists, could refuse to conduct marriages, and that would be fair enough. However, freedom of conscience for people in those organisations that opt out—a Catholic priest or a minister of the Church of Scotland, for example—would not be respected. Conscience needs to be looked at from both directions.

Siobhan McMahon: It will come as no surprise to anyone if I ask the same question about the equality impact assessment and the witnesses’ views on that. As I said, it was conducted for the bill and the guarantees that we are told are robust might not be enacted. Do you have a view on that? Do you think that they can be?

The Rev David Coleman: Can you clarify which guarantees you mean?

Siobhan McMahon: The guarantee that says that no celebrant will have to perform same-sex marriages if they do not wish to, the protection for people who work in education, and the protection for freedom of speech, along with various others. They are all supposed to be contained in the bill. There are two sides of the argument. One is saying that that is fine and they are content because they do not wish to see religious bodies being forced into doing something, and they therefore believe that the principles in the bill are robust. The opposing view is that the guarantees are not robust and that they can be challenged. The equality impact assessment also casts doubt on the guarantees. I just want to hear your opinions.

The Rev David Coleman: We have been following the issue intently during the past couple of years and we have been convinced that the guarantees that are contained within the bill are adequate. From one point of view, they might even be seen as excessive, but it might be sufficient guarantee that they are there and that no one is forced to engage in something that they are spiritually disinclined to do.

As I said, we support the bill, because we believe that it contains guarantees, both to enable same-sex marriages to happen and to protect those who wish not to be party to that, while, from a public order point of view, not allowing them to bully those who wish to go ahead and prevent them from doing that.

Louise Cameron: When the Scottish Youth Parliament carried out its love equally campaign, we were clear that we believe that religious bodies that do not want to conduct same-sex marriages should not be forced into doing that, but that religious bodies that want to should have the choice to do so.

John Mason: I have a supplementary question for Mr Coleman on the point that he just made. In your written evidence, you talk about protections being “more than adequate” and you state that freedom of speech “is more than safeguarded, leaning heavily in the direction of the protection of those opposed”. Would you like the bill to be amended to weaken it or to make it more level?

The Rev David Coleman: No. We in the United Reformed Church greatly respect individual conscience and opinion, which is why we have not expressed an opinion as a denomination. We know that we contain people with different views. Having followed the process over the past two years, it seems that, because the protections are so thorough, the bill does not give total equality. However, on the other hand, at the end of the day, when a couple come and ask to be married, that will make no difference to them whatever. Therefore, if the protections reassure those who are opposed, let us go with them. We certainly do not advocate that the protections be weakened; we merely note that they bring into effect a state of inequality, although that is perhaps necessary to enable equality to happen.

Siobhan McMahon: I thank the Scottish Youth Parliament for its submission, but I seek a bit of clarification on some of the points in it. You mention the consultation that you carried out, to which you received 42,804 responses. How was the consultation advertised and how were the responses collated?

Louise Cameron: We have members of the Scottish Youth Parliament in each constituency and others who represent voluntary organisations. They went out and consulted young people on the issues that are in our youth manifesto.

Siobhan McMahon: How did they engage with young people? Was it in schools or colleges, or did it involve hosting public events? I seek a bit of clarification on that.

Louise Cameron: Because we have a variety of people in the Scottish Youth Parliament, we have people who represent schools as well as colleges and universities, and everyone has their own way of approaching people. When I consult, I do it through my school, but I know that for members who are not at school it can be difficult to go into schools to consult, so they do it in a way that is suitable for them. That works well, because we get a wide range of opinions and we do not just target the school group. We target all age ranges.

Siobhan McMahon: I am asking about the issue only because at another committee yesterday we were trying to find out whether a consultation was robust. I want to try to understand how you got to the figure of 42,804 responses. Did the consultation involve conversations with people? Alternatively, were specific forms filled out or was there an online survey?

Louise Cameron: I was not personally involved in it, because I was not a member at the time, so I cannot answer that. I am sorry, but I can get back to you on that.

Siobhan McMahon: That would help. Obviously, the submission is based solely on the 42,804 responses to the consultation. Seemingly, the bill is the priority for young people. If it is—I do not dispute that that is the case—I need to know how that was arrived at. For instance, youth unemployment might be a priority for young people. How did you arrive at the priority?

Louise Cameron: The Scottish Youth Parliament voted on which issue to choose as our national campaign, and this issue was picked over issues such as youth unemployment and transport. My generation feel strongly about the issue. We do not tolerate bullying or inequality and we are a generation that believes in fairness. Young people back the bill because it is important to them. We do not believe that inequality should stand in society any more.

Siobhan McMahon: I fully accept where you are coming from, but I am just trying to find out how the figure was collated. Could you provide more information to the committee in writing?

Louise Cameron: Yes.

Siobhan McMahon: That would be helpful. are in a mixed-sex relationship or a same-sex relationship, they should have the same right.

Mark Bevan: Our position comes, as you would expect, from a general promotion of human rights. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights makes it clear that equal marriage should be available to all, so that is a fundamental campaigning issue for us. We also see, from more than a decade of research, how intolerance of LGBT people across the world has led to very significant hate crime. That is as present in Scotland today as it is in far-flung places such as Russia. For example, in Arbroath earlier this week a woman was very badly mistreated in a public park because of her sexuality.

Looking more broadly across the world, we see legislation allowing permissive attitudes in relation to hate crime. We see people being executed by the state as a result of practising their sexual behaviour. We see people being tortured. We see limitations on demonstrations and movements in Turkey, Russia, Albania, Latvia and so on.

By comparison, to bring the issue closer to home, when we look at what the Scottish Parliament has done in the past, we see that it has been a Parliament that is founded on equality. However, there is inequality in law in relation to marriage at the moment. If, as successive Parliaments have done, this Parliament wants to take action and to take a lead on promoting equality and universal human rights, this is a bill that needs to be passed. There is a tension in Scotland at the moment for a number of reasons, including because Scotland has taken a strong position in relation to a number of human rights.

Let me quote what the UN secretary general Ban Ki-moon said earlier this year:

“To those who are lesbian, gay, bisexual or transgender, let me say: You are not alone. Your struggle for an end to violence and discrimination is a shared struggle. Any attack on you is an attack on the universal values the United Nations ... and I call upon all countries ... to stand with you”.

Any such attack is an attack on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which is a founding convention that supports a fair and civilised society.

Marco Biagi: Some people have cited the fact that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ECHR confer a right to marry in terms of a man and a woman as an argument against same-sex marriage. How do you respond to that?

Mark Bevan: The Universal Declaration of Human Rights and, more pertinently, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, as well as the European convention on human rights, are all written as what are referred to as live instruments. They are not written in a way that is fixed and frozen in time but are designed to be interpreted in the light of contemporary society. To paraphrase the United Nations Human Rights Committee, the concept of family is so varied across cultures that there can be no standard definition. The UN committee goes on to say that, despite all the arguments in relation to marriage, all arguments place an essential value on the principle of non-discrimination at the fore of the discussion about family—all types of family—and relationships.

Marco Biagi: Let me move on to a slightly different topic. Ms Cameron, can you tell me what it is like these days to be at school and be gay?

Louise Cameron: I do not think that someone being gay is an issue for my generation; it is just accepted now. There is nothing wrong with being gay; it is just accepted. Bullying is a big issue—homophobic bullying as well. In our consultation, 71 per cent of respondents thought that there should be more education on the stigma that follows LGBT people. Homophobic bullying is really common in schools, with 69 per cent of people having experienced it. However, in my school being gay is not a big deal. Young people are accepted as being gay and it is all right. My generation do not think that being LGBT is a problem.

Marco Biagi: There is a proposal to change the age for gender recognition from 18 to 16. That is the age for legal recognition of a change in gender in habitual life rather than anything else. Has the Youth Parliament considered that and do you have a position on it?

Louise Cameron: I am sorry, but I am not sure about that. I can get back to you on that.

Marco Biagi: That is fair enough. I am keen to get responses to my final question from everyone on the panel. The Amnesty International Scotland submission to the Scottish Government’s consultation states:

“Denial of equal civil recognition of same sex relationships prevents many people from enjoying a whole range of other rights ... and stigmatises those relationships in ways that can fuel discrimination”, which is the reason why civil partnerships were not adequate. I presume that Amnesty International agrees with that—do the other witnesses?

The Rev David Coleman: We are talking “civil” here. We discussed the issues in the committee and felt that if something is offered by the state it should be offered to all without exception. If a registrar who is an agent of the state has a conscientious problem, that is the problem of the state and somebody should be found—without hindrance or inconvenience to those who are applying—who can conduct the ceremony that is required.
Ross Wright: Our understanding of the civil partnership is that it was a nod to equality and a step in the right direction. However, it is like Rosa Parks in America being allowed to get on the bus. We see equal civil partnerships—which we would also like to have—and equal marriage as providing the fundamental step of allowing people to choose which seat they take on the bus.

Marco Biagi: Having compared the situation to racism, how would you respond to the comment from the Rev David Robertson that if you equate the issue to racism how can you justify allowing denominations to choose to be “racist”?

Ross Wright: It is an accommodation that, as my colleague the Rev David Coleman said, we are prepared to concede—it is giving freedom to discriminate, which we are not happy about, but for the sake of getting the bill passed we will concede it.

People who are not registrars are given the right to conduct marriages, not the duty to conduct marriages. It is important to realise that. Because of that, it is a mystery to me why we even need the opt-out and opt-in provisions, which are an additional part. If anybody approaches me and asks me to marry them, I do not need to do that. I do not need to give a reason—I could be washing my hair or be otherwise busy that day. There is no need for me to give a reason why I will not marry someone.

Alex Johnstone: I have a short question on a point that Ross Wright just made. You expressed the view that the bill is imperfect but that you see it as being an improvement. Do you see the bill as being an end in itself or simply one more step along the way?

Ross Wright: In respect of what?

Alex Johnstone: In the progress of the rights of homosexuals, for example.

Ross Wright: I see it as the endpoint in that the final legal hurdle to equality will have been overcome. Whether other organisations—for example, the churches and so forth—will want to adapt their positions later is up to them. That is their choice.

John Mason: Mr Wright, you said that the bill is permissive and that the approach will not be compulsory. However—I made this point at last week’s meeting, too—Catholic adoption agencies were originally permitted to place children with same-sex couples and it was not compulsory that they did so, but the approach quite quickly became compulsory, which meant that agencies had to close down. Might the same thing happen in the context of the bill?

Ross Wright: My understanding of the situation, although I am not fully aware of it, is that the adoption agencies could have stayed open, but that it was their choice to close down rather than treat people equally. No one forced them to close down; their conscience and their choice led them to do so.

I strongly advocate that people should never be compelled to conduct same-sex marriages. Even the existing law, as far as I read it, says that I am not compelled to marry anyone.

John Mason: So in the same way, in future, the churches might have a free choice to close down or conduct same-sex marriages.

Ross Wright: It is interesting that the witness from the Church of Scotland was so concerned that that is a threat. A solution for people, if they are so concerned about the threat, might be to choose to get out of the civil marriage business and conduct some kind of blessing to give unions the emotional and religious status that they require for their marriages.

The Convener: Alex Johnstone has some more questions.

Alex Johnstone: I do not have a huge number of questions. Before I take up a general point, I want to pick up on something that Mark Bevan said. You talked about live instruments and the wide range of family relationships that exists across the world, which makes marriage difficult to define. My instant reaction was to want to ask whether you take the view that all definitions should be equally applicable everywhere.

Mark Bevan: That is a tricky question, on which I think that I would want to come back to you, because it is important that we look at the context in which the setting for families exists. We have a cultural norm, which the bill clearly challenges, given the strength of feeling about it.

The guidance that we get from international law is that we should take a progressive view, generally speaking, of what a family relationship should consist of, and that the guiding principle behind that should be equality. Therefore, if I were to answer your question in a way that has direct relevance to the bill, I think that I would state the obvious, which is that the bill reduces an inequality that currently exists in the context of the forms of family relationships and marriage that are currently taking place in Scotland.

Alex Johnstone: Thank you. If you have additional information on that, I would be delighted to have it.

My main objective in asking this question is to ensure that I put to the panel the point that I put to the previous one—the discussion can be brief. The submissions from most of if not all the previous witnesses talked about the role of marriage in broader society. I asked the witnesses... whether marriage has a role in broader society as a basis for family, rearing children and providing social stability. Do you have views on that? Will the proposed change in the law weaken the role of marriage in other aspects of society?

The Rev David Coleman: When we have had discussions in the synod of Scotland, we have started by trying to come to a mind, as far as possible, on what people who have different positions regard as essential to marriage—commitment, respect and equality. It is likely that people who have differing opinions would say that marriage itself is beneficial to and a stabilising factor in society. The discussion has been on how we define marriage rather than on whether it is a good thing. The committee was very much of a mind that the introduction of same-sex marriage will have no impact whatever on opposite-sex marriage.

10:30

Ross Wright: I find puzzling the suggestion that opponents of the bill make in relation to children and stability, particularly because—whether you like it or not—same-sex couples have children, by adoption, surrogacy or whatever. Logically, if someone believes that marriage is good for children, it must follow that they should support marriage for same-sex couples with children. It is incoherent to argue both ways. Our point of view is that, if children deserve the protection of marriage, all children deserve that protection.

I would like to bring up another point about marriage in general. We can do as many surveys as we want to, but it is extremely important to realise that the majority of marriages in Scotland are not religious, and it has been that way for some time. Although the religious perspective is worth while for those who have a religious faith, part of the reason for my being here is to argue for those millions of people who do not share a religious faith, but share the legal definition of marriage as a private contract between two individuals. We can dress it up with as much philosophy as we like, but that is the legal definition of a marriage.

Mark Bevan: We do not take a view on marriage being a preferable status from the point of view of societal cohesion, which I think was at the heart of Alex Johnstone’s question; that is not a human rights issue. However, we take a strong view that, when the forms of marriage that exist are not applied equally, that is contrary to societal cohesion.

Earlier, a question was asked about the views of young people and schoolchildren on the issue. A three-country survey that was done last year in Finland, the United Kingdom and France looked at suicide rates among children and young people and at the causes of the higher suicide rates. In the UK in particular, young gay people were at a very much higher risk of suicide than many other categories of people. For the Parliament not to pass a bill that would provide such equality would contribute to the existence of a status whereby some people have open to them only the second-class position of civil partnerships as opposed to marriage.

Siobhan McMahon: You have twice given examples of the existence of homophobia and what it means. Last week, I suggested to the representative from Stonewall that those people who oppose the bill are not homophobic and he agreed. Those people, too, would be appalled at the high suicide rates that you mentioned. When we talk about people who oppose the bill, we are not talking about people who are homophobic. They oppose the bill for various reasons. I am sure that there are homophobic people who oppose the bill—I am not for a moment suggesting that there are not—but the vast majority of the people who oppose it are not homophobic, and I do not think that it helps the argument to conflate those issues. What is your opinion on that?

Mark Bevan: The bill provides an opportunity to deliver a more equal society, which—as I have said—successive Parliaments have tried to deliver. An action that a Parliament can take to foster greater tolerance, understanding and respect for other people will create a more equal society. You are quite right—it is not about whether people are homophobic; it is about equality and all people being treated the same.

Louise Cameron: To come back on that point, the survey that LGBT Youth Scotland conducted found that 10 per cent of people who suffered homophobic bullying left school. Should we be encouraging a Scotland in which people leave school because no one provides them with support to deal with homophobic bullying?

I do not think that the bill will weaken the role of marriage in Scotland. Marriage is personal to each person and it will not make a difference to people of other beliefs if there is same-sex marriage.

Siobhan McMahon: No one is suggesting that we should not tackle the issue of people having to leave school because of homophobic bullying. However, that is not what the bill is about. You are equating the two things. I understand that some people may think that they are linked—I do not oppose that view—but the statistic that you mentioned is not necessarily related to the bill.

Similarly, I understand that to get to equality is a huge thing, and that the bullying stats show that there are people who do not believe in equality. However, the stats that are being used are not helpful when we are talking about the principles of the bill and how it will impact on all the religions. Perhaps you will clarify whether those who were surveyed were asked specifically how the bill will impact on religions. When you conducted the survey, how many religious bodies or faith schools were asked about that?

Louise Cameron: I am not suggesting that there is a direct link between homophobic bullying and same-sex marriage, but it will make for a more tolerant Scotland if we have same-sex marriage. If stable relationships and people's rights in Scotland are taught in schools, it will make people more tolerant of same-sex relationships.

The Rev David Coleman: Might I return to Mr Allard's question about the stability of society and marriage?

Alex Johnstone: It was my question.

The Rev David Coleman: Sorry—it was Mr Johnstone.

From our conversations over the past couple of years, the United Reformed Church synod of Scotland can have no objection to same-sex marriage on the basis that it will not result in the conception of children. We are of the view—I think that this is a general consensus—that the nature of marriage is primarily the fellowship of the couple and that children are an additional blessing to that. Speaking as a parent, my nurture of my children was not exhausted by my donating one cell. The nurture of children goes on throughout people's lives. Marriage can add to the stability of society by providing a place for that.

Marco Biagi: Ms Cameron, I wonder whether you have had time to look at all the submissions from the various organisations. I want to ask about the kinds of things that have been talked about as changes to education, linked to the bill, from those who oppose it—for example, the editing of what textbooks might be available and the removal of discussion of same-sex marriage from many sections of the curriculum. If such provisions were enacted, would it make homophobic bullying better or worse?

Louise Cameron: I think that the bill will make young people more tolerant of same-sex relationships. If you introduce it, you are giving a classroom teacher who has a non-biased view, who is teaching about it—sorry.

The Convener: Maybe one of the other witnesses would like to contribute.

Ross Wright: In the classroom setting, teachers are there to teach and educate. It is really about facilitating the discussions that the children want to have; it is not about a teacher expressing a view one way or the other, because that is not their job. I was privileged to have a modern studies teacher whose political affiliations, try as I may, I never found out. That is the teaching model that I would like to see for sexuality and discussion of this kind.

The Rev David Coleman: Again based on our discussions, we feel that what is taught in schools should not introduce a note of controversy that would be intimidating to children in same-sex families. If the bill becomes law, the issues should be presented in the neutral way that Mr Wright described rather than being over in a corner as something furtive and secret.

Mark Bevan: Amnesty International and UNICEF produce a lot of information for schools on education around human rights issues. Some of that will be seen as controversial according to the views of the families of the children attending those schools, but if we want a more tolerant society it is important that we both understand ourselves—and we have knowledge and information provided by teachers; the facts—and have knowledge and information on the ways in which other people around us live.

Louise Cameron: Teachers have a responsibility to be professional and they should leave their personal opinions at the classroom door. It would just not be right if, say, I went into a classroom and a teacher said to me, "Right, you have to vote against Scottish independence." They should not show bias on any topic; education should be all about what is right in society and what the law is.

Christian Allard: Do you agree with the suggestion by the Equality Network and the Scottish Transgender Alliance that an amendment is needed to allow couples with a civil partnership registered in another country to marry in Scotland? You can just say yes or no, if you want, or you can tell us about the consequences of such an amendment.

Ross Wright: I support the suggestion that those with a civil partnership registered in another country should be able to marry in this country.

The Rev David Coleman: As far as I can tell, we also support such a move.

Mark Bevan: I, too, agree with that suggestion. Indeed, I believe that, earlier this week, the European court produced evidence and took a similar position on that very issue.

Louise Cameron: I agree with the suggestion.

Christian Allard: Thank you for those brief responses.

I want to ask about the process for and timing of the bill and indeed the legislation in England and Wales. Given that the process began in 2011, has there been enough time to consider all the issues in the run-up to the bill? What do you think of the consultation that the Scottish Government carried out?

Secondly, what are your thoughts on the Government’s proposal to carry out a review, perhaps in a year’s time, if the bill is passed? Might that answer some of the concerns that you and indeed the churches have expressed?

The Rev David Coleman: Things have certainly not been rushed and the consultations have been thorough, if not repetitive. We see no reason for any further delay or further consultation. We know where people stand; anyone with eyes and ears or other ways of absorbing information knows that. We are content with the timetable and the care that has been taken, particularly to protect those who oppose the legislation.

Louise Cameron: Every time young people have been consulted on the issue, two thirds to three quarters have said that same-sex marriage should be allowed in this country. I think that that is evidence enough that the proposal has enough backing.

The process has not been undertaken too quickly and the fact is that all the support is in place. I completely agree with the Rev David Coleman that the consultations have been repetitive; over and over again, we have had the same answer that the country is for this move.

Christian Allard: Are you saying, then, that we should not have a review after the bill is passed—if, indeed, it is passed? The fact is that the Scottish Government intends to carry out a review of the legislation once—and if—the bill is passed. Should that review take place or should the process be shortened and a review not be carried out?

Louise Cameron: It is a good idea to have a review. After all, you have to be thorough with your policies.

Ross Wright: To be honest, I did not realise that such a review was planned. I was aware of a review of civil partnership legislation, which we would fully support.

Following on from Louise Cameron’s point about majorities and numbers, I note that equality is not really about numbers. Even if 90 per cent of people are against a piece of legislation, if it benefits some people and does not cause demonstrable harm to others, it should be passed. The problem with rehearsing all these arguments again and again is that the opponents have not put forward a shred of evidence to show how such a measure could cause demonstrable harm or even how it has caused demonstrable harm in the countries where it has been implemented.

It is not about numbers; it is about whether the law will benefit some people or be detrimental to anybody. Those questions have been resoundingly sorted out, so we should continue to move on the legislation at the speed that we are going at. Everything has been examined thoroughly and there is no reason not to pass the bill.

10:45

John Mason: Convener, can you clarify the point about a review? I think that all legislation is reviewed.

The Convener: I believe that the civil partnerships legislation is to be reviewed.

Siobhan McMahon: Mr Wright, I think that you have answered this question, so it might be for other panel members, but feel free to comment. There have been two extensive consultations, but I believe that the majority of those who have presented evidence to the committee are against the bill’s proposals. Do you know of any other bill whose proposals have been put to the public and the majority have said that they are not in favour that has come to a parliamentary committee and gone through the parliamentary process as fast as this bill? Do you believe that that is acceptable?

Ross Wright: I do. First, as I am sure all committee members recognise, a consultation is not a referendum. However, if the consultation had been a referendum, there would have been challenges to it on counts of electoral law because all the postcards that were sent in were in response to one question: “Do you disagree?” If there had been the question, “Do you agree or disagree?”, we could start discussing that. However, all the submissions that were against were in one direction, whereas it is fair to say that the Equality Network allowed dissent in its submissions.

Siobhan McMahon: I do not think that it is fair to say that all the submissions were against. Perhaps the majority were, but I would not say that they all were.

Ross Wright: The vast majority were.

Siobhan McMahon: Yes, but not all of them. You accept that.

Ross Wright: Yes.

Siobhan McMahon: Okay.

The Convener: Would any of the other witnesses like to comment?

The Rev David Coleman: On the timing, I think that I noted in our written submission that people are already marrying, so the discussion is not about that but about whether the church and—from your point of view—the state recognises that people are entering into committed relationships with the aspiration that they be lifelong.

One thing that came out of our discussions was that we finally had to take seriously what everyone had been taught in college—that the people who marry are the couple, and the state or the churches either recognise or do not recognise that.

Jim Eadie: In the earlier session, we heard from witnesses that a number of the religious denominations—principally the Church of Scotland, but others as well—have concerns about the robustness of the protections in the bill and the opt-in provision. Is that something that your denomination has discussed, Mr Coleman, and do you share those reservations?

The Rev David Coleman: We have discussed it at great length and have been convinced that the protections are very robust indeed.

Jim Eadie: Can you say a bit more about that, please?

The Rev David Coleman: We looked at the matter and took legal advice from people within the church. We also spoke to civil servants working for the Scottish Parliament. We interrogated the matter as far as we could and the answer that came back every time was that it was safe to oppose same-sex marriage and safe to be in favour of it. Of course, there have been legal opinions, but we sometimes wonder whether it is the case that he who pays the piper calls the tune and expects everybody else to dance to it. We must look at where the legal opinion is coming from and perhaps judge it in that way.

Jim Eadie: In the earlier session, Mr Macdonald referred to the Faculty of Advocates, which I think has expressed the view that the bill’s provisions could be subject to legal challenge. Can you comment on that?

The Rev David Coleman: I am not a lawyer but, as I said, we have been taking legal advice, and as far as we can tell, with our work within the church we have to keep on saying, “Do not be afraid.” That phrase occurs in the Bible so many hundreds of times—“Wherever you stand, do not be afraid.”

Jim Eadie: As I understand it, the United Reformed Church is a mainstream Christian denomination within the reformed tradition, so to that extent you are similar to the Church of Scotland.

The Rev David Coleman: Yes, it is in the same family.

Jim Eadie: Another similarity is that there is a range of views within your denomination. However, despite those two similarities, you have come to a different conclusion from the Church of Scotland in that you welcome the bill. How soon will your individual celebrants who are in favour of same-sex marriage be able to perform such marriages if the bill is enacted?

The Rev David Coleman: I can tell you for a fact that there are people who would wish to register as celebrants as soon as it is legally possible to do so and others who would definitely never register. The nature of the church is that it contains a diversity of opinion. We support the bill because it is permissive and not prescriptive. That approach received the endorsement of the Scottish synod when we asked a gathering about that.

Ross Wright: It was a telling point when spokespeople for opponents of the bill were asked what they would like to be in it to make it robust but none of them could come up with anything that would make it robust enough for them. That reflects a fear, which in our opinion is unfounded, that they are in some way being victimised. However, the evidence suggests that the bill is robust. From everything that I have seen, it cannot be legally challenged.

An interesting point that came out towards the end from the Church of Scotland representative was that, ultimately, if people feel that they will be forced into it, they have the option—again, it is their choice—to opt out and then to do blessings for people who have had a civil marriage.

Mark Bevan: Seven countries in the Council of Europe have already progressed similar legislation. I checked with our lawyers yesterday and they are not aware of any issue in the courts in those countries that have had legislation in place for some time.

Marco Biagi: I have a straightforward question. Does any of our witnesses believe that having children is a central purpose of marriage?

Louise Cameron: No.

The Rev David Coleman: I have to say no because, as I said, we believe that marriage is primarily the fellowship of the couple, although, taking marriage fairly widely as a social institution and social good, it certainly adds greatly to stability and benefits children.

Ross Wright: Further to my earlier point, I reiterate that, if opponents of the bill believe that marriage is good for children, it seems logical that all those people who have children should be able to get married.

The discussion has focused on technicalities and legalities, but I would like to recount a small story about a situation that I was placed in when I was conducting a ceremony at the beautiful Tyninghame beach near North Berwick. There was a marquee and everybody was wearing their finery. It was a beautiful day and everyone was happy, with kids running about mad and the mothers-in-law with their biggest hats on. It was a splendid day that was marred only because, when the bridal party, which was two brides, appeared, I could not say the word that everybody else at the gathering was saying, which was "marriage". From the very first meeting, I had to explain that I could not say that word and I would be prosecuted if I inferred that I was marrying them. That was painful for me. However, every person there, including all the in-laws and the out-laws—Auntie Jeannie and all—saw it as a marriage. That is the emotional impact of the bill.

Mark Bevan: Amnesty would not take a position in relation to the member's question. Our position is based fundamentally on the current inequality. The Parliament has the opportunity to introduce legislation that addresses an inequality, or it can decide not to do so. It can decide to lean towards the European mainstream on human rights, or not.

Marco Biagi: I presume that Amnesty believes that, because there are a variety of types of family and they all deserve equal respect, the type of family that we see in our society of a man, a woman and no children is a valid marriage.

Mark Bevan: Absolutely.

Louise Cameron: Everyone's relationship is personal to them and everyone's marriage is personal to them. What would we do for people who are infertile and cannot have children? A child does not define a marriage. A marriage is between two people who love each other and it should be personal to them. Some people do not want to have children, and that is the choice of those in the individual relationship.

The Convener: Does any of our witnesses want to make any further comments?

The Rev David Coleman: One further point—although Mr Wright has already brought it up—is that religious or faith celebrants have a right but not a duty to solemnise a marriage. We would like to safeguard the option for people not to go ahead with any marriage for conscientious reasons. That approach goes back a long time in the history of most churches, irrespective of the sort of marriage that we are talking about.

Ross Wright: A final point on the concept of marriage is that the view that most religions currently purport is a current view of marriage. As members will be aware, marriage has in the past been about owning children and women, denying rights and stigmatisation through illegitimacy, all of which have now fundamentally changed. We need to recognise that the bill proposes just another small change to marriage. Those who do not hold a religious view should be allowed to do this.

The Convener: As there are no further comments, I thank our witnesses very much for their contributions.

That concludes today's meeting. Our next meeting will be on Thursday 19 September and will include further oral evidence on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill.

Meeting closed at 10:56.
Scottish Parliament

Equal Opportunities Committee

Thursday 19 September 2013

[The Convener opened the meeting at 09:30]

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Margaret McCulloch): I welcome everyone to the 23rd meeting in 2013 of the Equal Opportunities Committee. I ask that electronic devices be set to flight mode or switched off.

We will start by introducing ourselves. To my left are our clerks, our research team and the official reporters and around the room we are supported by broadcasting services and the security office. I also welcome observers in the public gallery.

I am the committee convener. I invite members and witnesses to introduce themselves in turn.

Marco Biagi (Edinburgh Central) (SNP): I am the deputy convener of the committee and MSP for Edinburgh Central.

Alex Johnstone (North East Scotland) (Con): I am an MSP for North East Scotland.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): I am a Highlands and Islands MSP.

John Mason (Glasgow Shettleston) (SNP): I am the MSP for Glasgow Shettleston.

Siobhan McMahon (Central Scotland) (Lab): I am an MSP for Central Scotland.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): I am an MSP for North East Scotland.

Dr Kelly Kollman (University of Glasgow): I am from the University of Glasgow.

Aidan O'Neill QC: I am a member of Matrix Chambers in London and also practise in Scotland. I suppose that I practise in European Union and human rights law, and I have a particular interest in the relationship between law and religion.

Karon Monaghan QC: I am a barrister at Matrix Chambers specialising in equality and human rights law.

The Convener: Thank you. Our only agenda item is evidence taking on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill at stage 1, and perhaps I should start by telling our witnesses that, if they wish to speak, they should indicate to me or the clerk on my left.

I welcome our first panel of witnesses to the meeting. Marco Biagi will begin the questioning.

Marco Biagi: My first question concerns the opt-in protections in the bill and whether any attempt on human rights grounds to require a faith group that had not opted into performing same-sex marriage to do so would succeed. I already have Ms Monaghan’s opinion on the record from what has been supplied to Liberty, but I would be grateful to hear the two other legal views.

Lynn Welsh: In short, the commission believes that the opt-in provision will work and will not be open to human rights challenge. Obviously, anyone can challenge it but, for many of the same reasons that Ms Monaghan has previously set out, we do not think that they would be successful.

Aidan O’Neill: I never like to say that a human rights challenge will not be successful. Constitutionally, one difference between England and Scotland relates to the Church of England and its effective position as department of marriage for the English state. It could be argued that, at a certain level, the Church of England is a public authority when it carries out marriage functions because of its duty in law to marry anyone, no matter their faith, within its parish boundaries. That is not a matter of church law; it is a matter of English common law and is backed up by the statutes that created the reformation.

In Scotland, there is a different relationship between church and state. The Church of Scotland is not and has never been a department of the state; indeed, we have always had what might be described as a Calvinist notion of the separation of church and state and in Scotland marriage law has a completely different history. Because, unlike the Church of England, the Church of Scotland cannot be seen as a public authority, the arguments that have been advanced on this issue are perhaps more plausible in the English situation and are less likely to have as much sway in Scotland.

Marco Biagi: Would article 9 of the European convention on human rights offer strong protection to a church against such a challenge?

Aidan O’Neill: Yes. Article 9, which stipulates “the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion”, is a rather overlooked ECHR provision. In addition to those absolute rights, there is also a right to manifest religion either “in public or private ... in worship, ... practice and observance.”
That right to manifest religion can be modified or subject to interference if there are good reasons for that, but the other rights—

"to freedom of thought, conscience and religion"— cannot. There would therefore be quite a hurdle and a strong protection under article 9 if churches can prove that they are not part of the state. That is the issue, and it is why there is the possibility of challenge with the Church of England, because of its peculiar status, and the Church in Wales, which also has a duty to marry anybody within its boundaries. We then get the paradox that, in England, a churchgoing and believing same-sex couple who have been attending Anglican parish services throughout their lives would not be able to marry, whereas the twin brother who has never crossed the church door in his life would have an absolute right to do so, although he would have to be marrying a woman rather than a man.

Marco Biagi: Dr Kollman, are you aware of challenges in other countries that have similar protections for churches to opt out that have sought to require religious authorities to perform same-sex marriages against their doctrinal views?

Dr Kollman: As I said when I responded to the invitation to attend the committee, I am not a legal scholar, so I do not know the ins and outs of any kind of legal challenges. There has been controversy in some other countries where there have been religious celebrations, particularly where the church can perform marriages with legal effect. However, those controversies died out relatively quickly. I certainly know of no case where a church has been forced to carry out a marriage. In fact, particularly in the Scandinavian countries, where marriage has been opened relatively recently and the churches have the ability to marry with legal effect, similar types of opt-outs and protections for the churches exist. Actually, most of the churches have opted in, but they were allowed to opt out. As far as I understand it, that has worked relatively well.

Marco Biagi: I want to move on slightly, so if anybody else wants to comment on the issue, this would be a good time.

John Mason: I have a question for Dr Kollman on that point. It has been suggested that churches in Denmark do not have the freedom to opt out. Is that the case?

Dr Kollman: I have heard that on several occasions. Again, I qualify my comments by saying that Denmark is not one of the cases that I have studied in depth, but my understanding from having looked at the case is that the law there has protections. As far as I know, most of the controversy happened when the church itself decided that it wanted to do blessings, which was not part of the original legislation that was passed in 1989. There was a lot of internal controversy in the church and a number of members of the church were not happy with those blessings. However, as far as I know, on marriage, there was far less controversy.

Aidan O'Neill: As I understand it, in Scandinavian countries, the established church, which is the Lutheran church, has been seen as a department of state, in a similar way to the Anglican settlement. There is a minister in the Government who is in charge of church affairs. There is therefore a different relationship from the traditional relationship in Scotland, particularly because the Church of Scotland is not an established church. It is recognised as the national church under the Church of Scotland Act 1921, but it is most certainly not a department of state. That would be completely contrary to the whole reformation settlement and Calvinist ecclesiology.

Christian Allard: That has answered part of the question that I was going to ask. I am interested in the relationship between church and state. Is there the same kind of relationship in other countries that have accepted same-sex marriage? Are there other churches that are linked with the state in the British or Danish way?

Aidan O'Neill: I think that the Scandinavian countries are the only ones that have that Erastian settlement, as it is known, whereby, at the time of the reformation, the king or monarch decided what the church should be and it was subordinate to them. The reformation in Scotland was different, because it was against state authority and the wishes of the reigning monarch, who was Mary, Queen of Scots. There was a different relationship in Scotland. I cannot think of many countries that have a national church that is absolutely and fundamentally separate from the state.

Dr Kollman: On a point of reference, Sweden is the one Scandinavian country that has de-established its church. Not all the Scandinavian countries have an established church.

Christian Allard: If there is a legal problem with the bill, is the relationship between church and state a bigger issue than equal marriage?

Aidan O'Neill: I think that that is a problem. I am anticipating an issue that might arise. The bill is rather unusual in that it purports to give to dissenting ministers of a church that has opted in the option of personally opting out. It seems to me to be a breach of article 9 that an opting-in church can decide what it wants in that way. The bill says, “This is not for the state or the Parliament to determine; we will allow individual ministers to exercise some kind of freedom of conscience, against the wishes of the church body.” That is a peculiarity of the Scottish bill, and I think that it is the one thing that is problematic about it, in the context of that church-state relationship.

Karon Monaghan: I agree with Aidan O’Neill that the issue creates a difficulty. Of course, article 9 protects religious organisations and churches as well as individuals—it is unusual in the convention rights that protection is given to institutions. There is a difficulty in saying that an opting-in church is required, as a matter of law, to permit a minister to exercise a conscientious objection to carrying out same-sex marriage. That is really a question for the religious organisation—the church—itself and not for the state. To the extent that there is a vulnerability, that is where it lies.

Marco Biagi: How does that work for denominations such as the United Reformed Church, or the Unitarians, which have no specific creed in a lot of areas and might, as a matter of their faith, want the decision to rest with individual ministers? Is there a distinction between that situation and, for example, a Quaker celebrant objecting to performing same-sex marriage, when the Quakers want all their celebrants to do so?

Karon Monaghan: Yes, I think so. I think that if the church or religious institution itself said that it was a matter of conscience for all its ministers, that would be permissible. The issue arises where the state permits an individual minister, contrary to the wishes of his or her own church, to opt out, notwithstanding that the church has opted in.

John Mason: Mr O’Neill, I hope that you will not mind if I refer to advice that you have previously given on the subject. You have said that, although there is no hierarchy of protected characteristics in the Equality Act 2010, some characteristics are more equal than others. Will you expand on what you meant?

Aidan O’Neill: Well, clearly I was quoting George Orwell. I think that one of the unresolved issues in the Equality Act 2010 is that there is a bit of an omnium gatherum of various protected characteristics—it is rather difficult to count them; sometimes there are six and sometimes there are seven—which, in theory, because they are all lumped together in the same act, are said to be equally worthy of protection.

However, the idea that there is no hierarchy is rather difficult when two rights appear to come into conflict. The problem is that when the European Court of Human Rights is faced with a particular issue, such as the growing case law around sexual orientation, it starts using the language that we might have associated with the United States Supreme Court. First it talked about the need for particularly weighty reasons to justify discrimination on grounds of sex. In subsequent case law, it talked about the need for particularly weighty reasons to justify discrimination on grounds of race. Then it started applying that to sexual orientation. At the same time, it has applied it to religion. There are always heavy phrases going around and it is not entirely clear what happens if there is a conflict.

09:45

This is perhaps where Lynn Welsh and I would part company, but I sometimes think that there is not a feel for religion in equalities law. Religion has somehow got in there. The problem is that one can understand the idea of people saying, “You can’t discriminate against me because of my religious faith,” or because of sectarianism in Scotland, or because I am Catholic, or whatever. That makes sense. On the other hand you might have a religious faith that says, “In conscience, I feel that there is a distinction between heterosexual relations—married relations—within an opposite-sex marriage and same-sex relations. That is what my religion tells me.” How do you not discriminate against a religion that, at some levels, could be said to be discriminatory in its intent? That is the big problem with equalities law. It has not really faced up to that yet.

John Mason: The feeling among religious people is that, up until now, when the courts in Scotland, the United Kingdom or Europe have faced that kind of choice between sexual orientation and religion, religion normally comes off worse. Is that just their mindset or is it actually the case? I would be interested in the views of the other witnesses, too.

Aidan O’Neill: We are still feeling our way. The court judgments have not been particularly good on the religious front. Part of the problem is that most of those judgments have been in English cases. As I said earlier, the English approach to that residual Anglicanism is that the state tells the church what to do, so the church is used to the idea of religious beliefs being subordinated to the general law. The Scottish tradition is completely different. The Calvinist tradition is of two separate kingdoms, in which the religious have integrity and are worthy of respect within their sphere.

It appears that there has been a sort of deafness to what makes a religious view important for the religious. The problem is that the religious are bundled up and told in effect, “Your views aren’t really worthy of respect because ultimately they are homophobic, and if you’re homophobic, you’re probably or possibly racist, sexist or whatever.” It is rather difficult for the religious to explain that it is not quite like that, or that it certainly does not feel like that. To have labels like that is not really to appreciate the world view that the religious try to articulate and hold on to. It is a view that was, paradoxically, a fairly traditional one for the past few hundred years if not the occasional millennium. There is a mismatch, I think.

John Mason: Okay. That is helpful.

Karon Monaghan: I would not accept the idea that somehow religion has been subordinated, if that is the message that Aidan O'Neill is trying to convey. Much of the carving out of how to manage the conflicts has already been done in the Equality Act 2010. As you will know, there are numerous exceptions protecting religious organisations more broadly than the church and permitting them to discriminate—if that is the word that we are using—against sexual minorities and indeed against other groups in certain circumstances, such as those who have undergone gender reassignment, where that is in conformity with their religious beliefs.

It is also right that domestically, in our law, religion is given very particular weight. As the committee will perhaps know, the Human Rights Act 1998 requires courts to “have particular regard” to religion. I do not accept that there is a hierarchy, but to the extent that one can discern one, the exceptions lie in favour of religious organisations. It is perhaps oversimplistic to suggest—if that is what Aidan O'Neill is doing—that religion is in some way subordinated. I certainly do not accept that.

Lynn Welsh: Possibly unsurprisingly, I agree with Karon Monaghan. When the bill that became the Equality Act 2010 was being drafted, a great deal of thought was given to religion. It was recognised that there might be conflicts in the future, and an attempt was made to avoid that and to make clear how all the provisions should work. It is never possible to legislate for every eventuality, but a real attempt has been made to ensure that there is balance across the legislation.

John Mason: I would like to press Ms Welsh on that point. I was on the committee that dealt with the Equality Bill at Westminster. The Government at the time refused to say that all protected characteristics were equal, so the legislation has not addressed the issue of whether there is a hierarchy. Is that not the case?

Lynn Welsh: No. You might be right that the Government would not say that they were equal, but I am not sure—

John Mason: The legislation left it up to the courts to decide whether there is a hierarchy.

Lynn Welsh: No, I do not think that that is right, either. I think that the intention of the Equality Act 2010 was to ensure that all the protected characteristics were protected and—as Karon Monaghan has set out—given specific protection in certain areas. It was recognised that more protection might be necessary when two areas come into conflict. I do not think that any attempt was made to establish a hierarchy.

John Mason: But you would accept, at least, that the act does not say that the protected characteristics are all equal—it makes no reference to that.

Karon Monaghan: No, the 2010 act does not do that, but it creates exceptions in respect of particular characteristics, such as religion—Parliament decided that it was necessary to record appropriate respect to religious organisations. There are many other exemptions in the act that address other protected characteristics. For example, in relation to gender, Parliament thought that, in certain circumstances, it was appropriate to allow discrimination in gender-specific organisations such as domestic violence facilities. It is certainly the case that the 2010 act carved out pretty wide exemptions for religious organisations without addressing the question whether there is a hierarchy.

Dr Kollman: I want to make a more general point. I would hate to leave the impression that the European Court of Human Rights has worked its way through sexual orientation, particularly as it pertains to family policy. It leaves a large amount of room for states to decide how they want to recognise same-sex couples. There are very few mandates from that court on the issue. I hate to break into the middle of a lawyers’ debate, but I think that Mr O'Neill left the impression that there is strict scrutiny of sexual orientation in the US Supreme Court and the European Court of Human Rights. That is absolutely not correct.

Aidan O'Neill: I have two points to make. There is not strict scrutiny of sexual orientation in the US Supreme Court, but there are developing cases before the European Court of Human Rights. At the moment, jurisprudence of the Court of Human Rights says that it is still lawful for a state to prefer opposite-sex marriage—it is not contrary to the European convention on human rights to do so. However, if marriage is extended to same-sex couples, it will become a human rights requirement that there be equality of treatment and regard. In a sense, that is what is important about the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill—it shifts the position in that regard.

On the issue of religious organisations being protected, when a religious organisation tries to rely on the protections that are provided by paragraph 2 of schedule 23 to the Equality Act 2010, the argument is always put forward that that paragraph must be interpreted as narrowly as possible, because it allows discrimination. In addition, no provision is made for religious individuals—people with religious conscientious objections—as the paragraph applies to religious organisations. Therefore, I think that the Equality Act 2010 leaves open the possibility of conflict and does not necessarily answer all the concerns of those who consider themselves to be religiously motivated.

The Convener: I will bring in Karon Monaghan, after which we will move on to the next question.

Karon Monaghan: Aidan O’Neill said that once we introduce same-sex marriage—if that is what we do—the position in the European courts will alter, because we will have marriage for both groups and there will be an expectation that there will be equal treatment. In my view, that is so prima facie, but whether that will intrude on the rights of a religious organisation under article 9 of the convention will be a significant question.

Again, as I have said, in my view, article 9 will be given particular weight. Therefore, even in circumstances in which the state legislates for same-sex marriage, it is extremely unlikely—indeed, I would go so far as to say that it is inconceivable—that the European Court would say that religious organisations must conduct same-sex marriages even if they find that objectionable because of religious belief.

Christian Allard: I have a question for Kelly Kollman—other witnesses may also comment if they wish to. It is about the other countries that have adopted policies on same-sex unions in recent years. In particular, I want to ask about the pace of policy change, how the bills came to fruition, whether there was enough consultation in different countries and whether the process of bringing the bills to fruition caused any problems. Some countries went through the process faster than others. What are your views on all that? That is what I would like to know after reading your submission.

Dr Kollman: It is a good question. So many different countries have such policies now, it is hard to categorise or to paint with a broad brush, but generally the countries that introduced those policies earlier probably had more controversy around them. However, in almost all the countries—there may be a few exceptions—it was the case that a majority of the public supported the policy when it happened. These have tended to be very high-profile debates and high-profile policy processes. That means that they have gotten a lot of scrutiny in Parliaments and also in the wider public debate.

It is amazing to look at the media coverage, for example, of same-sex unions as opposed to the media coverage of anti-discrimination laws that included sexual orientation. There were 10 times as many articles on same-sex unions or same-sex marriage as on anti-discrimination laws in some of those countries. Same-sex unions or marriages have a lot of symbolism; they tend to be something that the media covers a lot and therefore they tend to be something that Parliaments scrutinise a lot.

As to whether such policies have caused problems in countries—there is always opposition. Oftentimes it is from religious organisations that have a particular cultural definition of marriage and feel uncomfortable about same-sex marriage. However, I have looked at the situation in most of the European countries and in the one North American country that has a national law, and I think that public opinion—with one exception—became more tolerant of homosexuality rather than less after same-sex unions came in, although that increase in tolerance was a year or two afterwards. I would not say that that increase in tolerance is necessarily causal always—there are general long-term trends towards an increase in tolerance for homosexuality. However, such policies have brought great visibility to lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender communities and, in general, it has been positive visibility.

Christian Allard: In your experience—because I did not get an answer to this question from reading your submission—do you think that bringing about those changes has been more people led or more led by institutions such as the European Court or Parliaments?

Dr Kollman: By people led, do you mean social movement led?

Christian Allard: Yes.

Dr Kollman: Social movements have played a very important part in this. Having said that, when you open marriage to same-sex couples—or even, certainly in the early years, introduce same-sex unions—it is the case that it brings Governments a great deal of attention and generally, as I said, it has been quite positive attention, so it really depends on where you are looking and on what countries you are looking at.

In Spain a new Government came in in 2004—it was not expected to win that election—and the policy change was seen as being very Government led, although, of course, the LGBT groups were on board. In the Netherlands, the Labour Party supported that change quite a bit, but, in Germany, the SPD—the social democratic party there—was much more reticent. The change there was really led by the minority Green party and it was much more of a grass-roots movement, so the answer is that it depends on the country.

However, the debate has always been a very public debate in any country that has looked at it and therefore there has been a lot of public scrutiny and a lot of involvement of public groups on both sides. In that respect, I think that it has been a good debate; it has been aired in most of those countries. Also, as I said in my Politics sometimes matters, and what really matters here is the power of human rights arguments. They get translated in different ways—in the UK we often talk about equalities, while other countries talk about anti-discrimination or equal treatment—but ultimately, at this point in history, the power of human rights arguments is transformative, and much more so than legal mandates from international courts or EU policy.

Marco Biagi: The final comment in your written submission is about the different approaches that have been taken to civil partnerships or the equivalent arrangements in other countries in Europe. You say that the only way in which to achieve real equality is to open them up to mixed-sex couples or to get rid of them entirely. Will you expand on why that is the case?

Dr Kollman: I do not think that I quite said it in that way. I will explain what I was trying to say, perhaps more strongly. Many countries have created same-sex unions that are not marriage, which was seen as politically expedient in a large part of the late 1990s and early 2000s, but most national LGBT rights groups would always say that their ultimate goal is marriage, and that argument has largely been made on equalities issues.

What sometimes gets lost in the debate is that, if we go back in history and look at the Scandinavian countries, part of what was going on was a pluralisation of family policy. The ways in which people live their intimate lives these days have become much more complex and pluralistic, and there was all this talk about different ways in which the state can define and recognise couples. That is a different argument from the equalities one.

In some ways, however, the discussion and debate that we are having about same-sex unions can allow us to look at both issues. If we want to open marriage, that will help to solve the equalities issues between same-sex and different-sex couples, but, in doing so, especially as we have had another, non-marriage type of same-sex union before, we might want to start thinking about the other side of the debate as well—the one about pluralising family policy. If a Parliament opens marriage but then closes off civil partnerships, as they are in this country, it might be going against the second part of the debate, which is about pluralising family policy. I would encourage all Parliaments to think about that second goal as well, as some have done.

Marco Biagi: I ask for legal views on whether maintaining civil partnerships for same-sex couples only might be subject to challenge. In fact, I know that it is already subject to challenge, so I ask for a view on whether such a challenge would have merit.

Aidan O'Neill: This is a part of the debate that I really do not understand. I am in a civil partnership and I did not realise that it was a second-class relationship until equality campaigners told me that it was. As I understand civil partnerships—and I should understand them, because I am in one and I am a lawyer—they give people exactly equivalent rights to marriage. They are just not called marriage, and not calling them marriage gives those who would dissent some kind of wriggle room. At some levels, they were a compromise, but they are a compromise in favour of tolerance and pluralism.

On the issue of equality requiring that we rename all relationships as marriage or that we have opposite-sex civil partnerships, I do not understand what the difference would be between an opposite-sex—

Marco Biagi: My specific question was about whether an opposite-sex couple who feel aggrieved that they cannot enter a civil partnership could challenge that.

Aidan O'Neill: I am trying to say that I do not see how they could, because an opposite-sex civil partnership is a marriage. The name is different, but the legal consequences are exactly the same.

Karon Monaghan: Actually, the legal consequences are not quite the same because, importantly for many couples who have been together for a long time, there is a significant exclusion in relation to pension benefits. That is important for people with valuable pensions who may have worked for a long time.

Leaving that aside, I think that somebody could challenge the unavailability of civil partnerships to opposite-sex couples, but it would be unlikely to succeed because the state has a wide margin of appreciation in this area. Also, because there is, for an opposite-sex couple, no material distinction between a marriage and a civil partnership—that is, they can marry and get all their pension benefits—I think that the courts would say that this is an area where the legislature has some margin of discretion.

The Convener: The Netherlands, Belgium and France have all kept their non-marriage schemes in place. Can you confirm whether they are comparable to the one that we have just now in the UK?
Dr Kollman: The registered partnership schemes?

The Convener: Yes.

Dr Kollman: They differ quite a bit. The scheme in the Netherlands is relatively comprehensive in terms of the rights that it gave to different-sex non-married couples and same-sex registered partnerships. The French PACS is much less comprehensive. It is easier to get into and to get out of and does not include a lot of the benefits, duties and obligations that are associated with civil marriage in France.

Karon Monaghan: I am afraid that I cannot help with that.

Siobhan McMahon: My question is for Lynn Welsh first, but anyone else can comment. The equality impact assessment that has been carried out by the Scottish Government when it did the consultation states that any reassurances cannot be guaranteed at this point. Do you have a view on that?

Lynn Welsh: I think that it is honest and I applaud the Scottish Government to that extent. Equality impact assessments are supposed to gather all the information—positive and negative—and to recognise possible difficulties and attempt to mitigate where they can. The Scottish Government is obviously attempting to mitigate possible difficulties with the changes to the 2010 act, for example, and the opt-in process.

Siobhan McMahon: Absolutely, but do you not have concerns? Your submission leaned more towards same-sex couples rather than protections for religious groups and their concerns—one question about concerns was missed. Have you or, indeed, the group looked at the equality impact assessment in depth from both sides of the argument? Your submission does not make it clear that that is the case.

Lynn Welsh: When we drafted our submission we considered the issues both for churches and for people of various sexualities, if that is what you are asking. We think that, as far as it is possible to do so, both sides have been addressed.

Siobhan McMahon: I come back to Mr O'Neill, I am afraid. I think that your submission—at least the one that I have—was drafted before the final bill was published, so some of my questions might not matter any more. Let us know if that is the case. Your submission states:

"details about the impact on freedom of conscience in the workplace, in schools and other areas of everyday life have been overlooked."

Do you still think that that is the case?

Aidan O'Neill: I do not remember writing that, but it was all done a long time ago.

It is not that that has been overlooked, it is just that the notion of freedom of conscience as an individual right—it is one of the rights that is an individual right in article 9—is not something that legislatures generally, or even the courts, have taken on board, because it is a slightly odd position. It is conscientious objection when some individuals say, "I am sorry, but at some level this general law shouldn't apply to my particular situation." In Canada they have developed an approach whereby they establish whether they can get some kind of reasonable accommodation between competing views. The legislation and the courts allow that to happen. They ask, "What is happening in this specific situation? Is there some way that people can rub along while still disagreeing?"

Our legislation does not do that. There is an element of saying, "This is the law and you all have to obey the law." There is no wriggle room or even the possibility of just letting things be. Currently, because there is a differentiation between marriage and civil partnership, and because the European Court says that you are allowed to favour opposite-sex marriage, there is, at least in theory, a bit of wriggle room to allow people to maintain their views, even if they are different.

Karon Monaghan: There has certainly been a great deal of domestic and European case law on the question whether conscientious or individual objection to certain rules should be permitted in circumstances in which those beliefs derive from religion. Indeed, there has been recent case law on the issue from the European Court of Human Rights. Domestically, we deal with the issue by saying that if someone objects to a particular rule that disadvantages them because of their religious belief—if, say, they do not want to conduct a civil partnership or comply with a uniform rule that prohibits them from wearing a cross—that view, whether reasonable or not, should be accommodated, unless the rule or restriction is justified.

You will probably have heard of the recent set of cases in the European Court of Human Rights in which two women—a British Airways check-in worker and a nurse—objected to a uniform rule that prohibited them from wearing a cross. The British Airways check-in worker was refused permission to wear a cross because it conflicted with the company's corporate image; in the case of the nurse, the prohibition on the wearing of the cross was for health and safety reasons—it might, for example, get caught. The European court said that the BA check-in worker should have been allowed to wear her cross and that commercial uniform reasons were not a good justification for prohibiting it. With regard to the nurse, however, the health and safety considerations were found to be good reasons and justification for the prohibition.

These issues have already been worked out, and it has been recognised that religious belief and its manifestation through dress, expression and so on should be accommodated unless some interference is strictly justified. That is a matter of domestic and European court law, and there is much guidance from the courts on the matter.

John Mason: With regard to Mr O’Neill’s comments about wiggle room and the fact that there is a bit more scope in some countries than in others, I have to say that we did not see that kind of wiggle room in the case of the registrar Lillian Ladele. However, there is wiggle room for abortion, the legislation on which says that, although the state provides the service, an individual can opt out of it. Is that a good or possible route for this legislation?

Aidan O’Neill: Interestingly, the one case that Karon Monaghan did not mention with regard to recent European Court of Human Rights judgments was the Ladele case, in which a person who had been employed for a number of years as a registrar in a local authority said, when civil partnerships came in, that she did not feel that she could participate in them on religious grounds. Initially, she was rerostered to ensure that she did not have to participate, but when her colleagues objected, it was decided that her position was incompatible with the council’s equal opportunities policy and ultimately she lost her job. The case went to the European Court of Human Rights, which said that, although it would carry out a proportionality analysis, the employer’s equal opportunities policy was sufficient reason for the woman to lose her job. As I have said, we are still working out the notion of reasonable accommodation. It is a very recent development from the European Court of Human Rights and, as such, has not yet properly percolated through to the domestic courts.

As far as abortion is concerned, a case going to the UK Supreme Court—Doogan v NHS Greater Glasgow and Clyde Health Board—relates to the width of the application of the conscientious objection provision in the Abortion Act 1967 and whether it applies to nurses or midwives in charge of wards who might not be directly involved in providing abortion but might see themselves as facilitating it because they are running wards in which such procedures are being carried out. The conscientious objection in the abortion legislation was a specific carve-out for religious reasons; it has not really been tested in the courts and the case in question will look at it a bit more. However, you are right to highlight it as an example where religious grounds have to be protected for individuals, which is different from the protection for religious organisations that we have already discussed.

Siobhan McMahon: I will use an example from Mr O’Neill, which is that a Church of Scotland minister is also the chaplain at an NHS hospital. On Sunday, he preaches in his church that marriage is only for one man and one woman. His NHS bosses find out and he is later disciplined for breaching the NHS equality policy. I understand, Mr O’Neill, that you have advised that NHS managers would have a high chance of successfully justifying that action, even if a chaplain was preaching in his own church outside of work time. Do others on the panel share Mr O’Neill’s opinion? If so, is there something that the committee could put into the bill? Obviously, we understand that things can be challenged and we accept that the actions shown in the example can happen. Is there something that the committee could put into the bill to lessen the chance of that?

10:15

Lynn Welsh: I do not agree with Mr O’Neill’s view on that. There was a recent case involving the Trafford Housing Trust in which a gentleman who worked for the housing association put a comment on his personal blog on Facebook giving his views on same-sex marriage. They were not abusive views. He simply stated his position on same-sex marriage. It was found that to then demote him and discipline him in his job was a breach of his contract and that the employer was not entitled to look to something that was not egregious, discriminatory or harassing but simply a statement of his position in his private life, which could not be taken account of in his employment. However, I think that that case came after Mr O’Neill originally gave his example.

Siobhan McMahon: But what you are talking about is private life, whereas Mr O’Neill’s example is about workplaces.

Lynn Welsh: It is outwith employment, which I think is the important issue.

Marco Biagi: If the bill passes, there will be same-sex marriages. Given the equality duty, what is the material difference between someone saying that they do not agree with same-sex marriage and someone saying, for example, that homosexuality is sinful, which I assume a lot of NHS chaplains would do at the moment?

Lynn Welsh: I think that what you are trying to ask is whether it matters what the comment actually is as opposed to someone’s right to make the comment. Is that right?

Marco Biagi: No. I imagine that at present there are probably NHS chaplains who would get up on a Sunday and say that homosexuality is sinful. Are they in the same position right now as they would be after the legalisation of same-sex marriage if they got up and said that same-sex marriage should not be allowed? Is that the case irrespective of the bill?

Lynn Welsh: Yes, in my view.

Karon Monaghan: I agree.

Lynn Welsh: They are allowed to say what their religion’s view on the issue is, and that position will not change because of this legislation.

Karon Monaghan: I agree with Lynn Welsh’s view. As I have said before, there are carve-outs in the Equality Act 2010 that would protect a minister in that position so that there would be no obligation to change in the context of a church. Things might be different in the workplace, but certainly within the scope of ministering in a church there would be no difference at all, and article 9 would offer very significant protection in that respect.

Aidan O’Neill: Every case depends on its facts, so we can always come up with a new case and say that there is an issue. However, there clearly is an issue because what is said outside the workplace is not divorced from what can be done in the workplace. In the Smith case, which is the Trafford Housing Trust case that was just mentioned, the man was demoted for saying “Equal marriage a step too far?” on his Facebook page, and he never got his job back. His only remedy was something like four weeks’ notice pay, and he is still in that demoted position.

In terms of NHS chaplains, the case of Ladele from the European Court of Human Rights appears to say that the idea of equal opportunity within the workplace is so important that it can result in people who do not fit in with that ethos being no longer welcome in the workplace unless they change their views. There is most definitely a tension. Each case will depend on its facts, but you cannot isolate what happens outside—

Marco Biagi: Just to look at the specific—

Aidan O’Neill: Sorry, I have not finished.

You cannot isolate what happens outside the workplace from how one might be treated within the workplace.

Marco Biagi: Can we look at the specific question of the NHS chaplain who gets up on a Sunday at the moment and says that homosexuality is sinful? Would they be subject to the same potential problem at present that you advise would be the case if they got up after same-sex marriage was legalised and said that same-sex marriage was unacceptable?

Aidan O’Neill: That is a particular legal issue. We could say that they are in that situation anyway because the employer would already have an equal opportunities policy. There is a wiggle room at the moment on the basis that one can say that favouring opposite-sex marriage is permitted under European convention jurisprudence but, if we were to equalise and allow for marriage regardless of gender or sex, that would change and the situations would have to be treated in exactly the same way. Therefore, the bill changes the position in that it strengthens the position for employers’ equal opportunities policies and weakens the arguments that a minister might have in those circumstances. There is a definite change.

John Finnie: I was going to ask about article 9, which concerns “the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion”, but much of that has been covered. I will pick up on something that Mr O’Neill said about those with conscientious objections. We have touched on chaplains, foster carers, teachers, registrars and religious groups wishing to use public facilities. Would an unfettered, unlimited discretion be afforded an individual regarding what they say are their religious beliefs?

Aidan O’Neill: Are you asking whether anybody can say whatever they want if they say that that is what their religion tells them?

John Finnie: Yes.

Aidan O’Neill: That is where the notion of reasonable accommodation comes in. There are understood to be limits. It is clear from article 9 that it is possible to limit manifestation of religion if it is in accordance with the needs of a democratic society, so one can justify in convention terms limits on what is called hate speech, which is speech that is specifically aimed at whipping up hatred against a particular group. It is most certainly not an unlimited right.

John Finnie: I accept that lawyers do not like to be given scenarios and give definitive positions on them, but would there be a limit to the range of people who could apply religious belief as a conscience issue? Could, for instance, a local authority painter and decorator say that he did not want to decorate a room because it was used for same-sex marriages? Would that be a reasonable accommodation?

Aidan O’Neill: It depends greatly on the facts. There was a case two weeks ago from New Mexico involving a photography studio that was phoned up and asked whether it would cover a wedding. The studio said, “Of course we will,” and then, when it was told that it was a same-sex wedding, said, “I don’t think we’re going to. I think we’re suddenly busy that day.” That issue was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States and it was found to be unlawful for the photographers not to offer their services even though they had religiously based objections to same-sex marriage. They could not discriminate on those grounds.

It depends on the facts. It could well be that a painter and decorator would fall outwith the reasonable range of those who can expect an exception from the law.

John Finnie: Abortion has been alluded to and the term “reasonable accommodation” has been used. I represent a large landward area, where there are challenges with the delivery of public services and a limited number of people to deliver them. Do you imagine that that factor could be taken into account in determining whether a reasonable accommodation should be made?

Aidan O’Neill: Do you mean too many people potentially objecting to carrying out abortions?

John Finnie: I was thinking more about registrars and the bill.

Aidan O’Neill: Oh, sorry. Are you asking whether a body could say that it could not carry out a service that it had to carry out because it did not have the people?

John Finnie: No. I mean that if, for argument’s sake, there were registrars who claimed that they had a conscientious objection and were not prepared to carry out same-sex marriages, there would be challenges with delivering the service in the Highlands and Islands.

Aidan O’Neill: Again, everything depends on the facts. If all the registrars had conscientious objections, it might be that registrars would have to be flown in from the central belt for the occasional mass same-sex wedding. I am not quite sure. We will just have to see what happens but, if we consider that individual conscience is an important value that ought to be respected even if we disagree with it, what is reasonable might well involve such scenarios.

John Finnie: Some of our witnesses, including those from the Law Society, have suggested that the position could be open to challenge. It is certainly the case that anything could be open to challenge, but the question might be whether the challenge is reasonable or frivolous.

Karon Monaghan: Anybody can go to court and challenge anything at all. I suspect that Aidan O’Neill and I have done that ourselves. However, that does not mean that the challenge will be successful. Ultimately, some of the questions that we have both been asked from time to time do not really help the debate, because we can always construct an argument one way or the other. The real question is, of course, whether that argument will succeed. Many of the objections to same-sex marriage that rely on legal arguments that are put together by various people do not help us very much because, in all probability, challenges based on those arguments would be unsuccessful.

Marco Biagi: I would like to ask about two more potential scenarios. One concerns transgender young people who, at the moment, can live as transgender people—that is, live as the other gender—but are unable to get formal recognition of that until the age of 18, when they can get a gender recognition certificate, whereas a non-transgender young person can marry and participate in the issues that we are discussing at the age of 16. Is there an issue in terms of less favourable treatment?

Karon Monaghan: Yes, probably, and the position would require justification. Certainly, there would be potential for that to be the subject of a discrimination claim. Whether it was justified would depend on issues such as whether transgenderism is something that takes a level of maturity on the part of an individual to be clear about, such as they might be expected to attain by the age of 18. I do not know the answer to that question. However, potentially, it could violate the convention—article 8, for example—and it would require justification if it were to be lawful.

Marco Biagi: I see nodding from others.

Lynn Welsh: Yes, we would agree with that.

Marco Biagi: In a situation in which a church or a faith organisation has decided not to opt in but has within its members a plurality of views, could a celebrant, rather than leaving their church to perform same-sex marriages, challenge their church’s decision as being a violation of their personal religious rights?

Karon Monaghan: In my view, no. Not if the complaint is with the church’s position. That would be an internal matter for the church, which would be entitled to regulate its own affairs, as a matter of convention law, under article 9, and domestically.

Lynn Welsh: I would agree.

Aidan O’Neill: For once, Karon Monaghan and I are as one. It is absolutely not for the state to interfere in internal church affairs. The specific case law from the European Court of Human Rights states that you do not side with dissenters. If they want to dissent, they should leave the church and set up their own church, or join a body that is more sympathetic to their views.

John Mason: As has been mentioned, the EHRC did not answer the committee’s question 12, which was,
“Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same-sex marriage?”

Lynn Welsh, you said that you had considered all sides of the issue. Why did you not answer that question?

Lynn Welsh: I think that we thought that we had already answered it when we made it clear that we were in favour of the bill, as long as churches and religious bodies were fully protected, which we dealt with in another part of our response.

10:30

John Mason: Reference has been made to the Lord Advocate’s guidelines, which I think came out in June. I seek guidance from you as legal experts on what weight we should give to that guidance. From my understanding as an accountant, guidance can change tomorrow, so should we give it any weight at all? How definite is it? It states:

“Views expressed or comments made in relation to same-sex marriage in ways which do not incite hatred or violence towards a particular person or group of people ... will not be the subject of criminal prosecution.”

The phrase “incite hatred” strikes me as fairly vague, but perhaps the witnesses could guide us as to whether it is actually more solid.

Karon Monaghan: I am afraid that I do not know the guidance, so I cannot discuss it specifically. Certainly, hatred is a strong word, but I am not familiar with the guidance and I am not sure that I can answer that.

John Mason: As a general principle, how much weight does guidance have?

Karon Monaghan: Non-statutory guidance that is promulgated by the Law Society of Scotland or another similar body does not carry any weight at all. It is a view. It might guide the professionals in a particular profession and give them some help on how to approach the law, but in relation to reaching a final decision on the meaning of a particular law, it will be no more than a helpful way into it. It will not carry any particular weight.

Aidan O’Neill: The Lord Advocate’s guidance is different because, in effect, the Lord Advocate has a monopoly on prosecutions in Scotland. However, the courts never review what the Lord Advocate does so, as John Mason suggests, the Lord Advocate can change the guidance. I do not think that someone would have great success in saying that they cannot be prosecuted because that would be contrary to the guidance, as that would involve a civil law or judicial review function. Traditionally, the courts in Scotland very much stand back on that. If the Lord Advocate thinks that a prosecution is in the public interest, that is the Lord Advocate’s prerogative.

It is slightly interesting—to say the least—that the Lord Advocate felt that he had to produce guidance on what can be said in public about same-sex marriage and that making such comments might actually be a criminal offence. To an extent, that is to do with our incredibly broad notion of what constitutes breach of the peace, which can include insulting behaviour. Somebody can feel insulted by somebody else’s conscientious views. However, Karon Monaghan is correct. I do not see the courts enforcing the guidance, which is very much at the discretion of the Lord Advocate.

Lynn Welsh: The guidance has some value, in that it makes clear the Lord Advocate’s view of when the powers that he and his office have should be used, so, although he might not be able to be tied to the guidance if it was ever challenged, it is at least helpful in setting out where he thinks his powers will be used.

Christian Allard: I have a brief question. I would like some reassurance on an issue. We have had a lot of witnesses, and we have heard more evidence today. My impression is that a lot of the answers that have been given in evidence are more to do with the Equality Act 2010 than with the bill. Do you share my view? Do you think that, whatever happens—if the bill is passed or not passed—the same questions and challenges will still arise?

Karon Monaghan: Sorry, but I am not sure that I understand the question. If the bill does not go through—

Christian Allard: If the bill does not go through, will we have the same challenges that we have talked about today? Many of the examples that we have been given are about challenges under other legislation, not the bill.

Karon Monaghan: Yes, we will.

Christian Allard: So, in fact, we have wasted a lot of our time talking about the act.

Karon Monaghan: Probably—although I hope not.

Aidan O’Neill: Mr Allard is right that we are really talking about the Equality Act 2010, and equal opportunities are a reserved matter. However, as I have said, I believe that allowing gender-neutral marriage will actually change things, in that it will remove the wriggle room. However, the issues arise primarily because of the Equality Act 2010.

The Convener: As members have no further questions, I thank our witnesses for their contributions.
10:34

Meeting suspended.

10:40

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our witness for today’s second evidence session and invite him to introduce himself.

Professor John Curtice: I am Professor John Curtice of the University of Strathclyde and ScotCen Social Research. I should say that I am not representing either organisation and that any views that I express this morning are mine and should not be attributed to either of them.

The Convener: Thank you very much. I invite Marco Biagi to start the questioning.

Marco Biagi: Thank you for that unexpected honour, convener.

Professor Curtice, you have highlighted the rather substantial change in public attitudes towards homosexuality more broadly. Are you aware of how that compares with other countries?

Professor Curtice: The short answer is no, as I do not have that degree of expertise. The longer answer is that my understanding is that it is not particularly exceptional. You have heard the evidence from Dr Kelly Kollman on the substantial international moves. One would presume that such moves were not taken entirely in the teeth of public opinion in the countries concerned.

Marco Biagi: Have you seen any changes of similar magnitude in other areas?

Professor Curtice: Yes. The biggest change in public attitudes in Great Britain since the early 1980s is towards our banks. In the early 1980s about 90 per cent of people trusted banks and now about only 10 per cent do.

That aside, the principal secular change—by which I mean a change that has pretty much kept on going in a consistent direction during that 30-year period—has been in the area of sexual mores. As well as there being changes in attitudes to same-sex relationships, there has undoubtedly been a substantial change in attitudes towards sex outside marriage, particularly premarital sex. There have also been changes in attitudes towards abortion.

British society has experienced a more general apparent liberalising trend in attitudes towards sexual mores. Not all the changes have gone at the same pace, but they have all been going in the same direction. The change in attitudes that you refer to seems to be part and parcel of a similar liberalising phenomenon whereby society is taking a very different view of these things from what it did a relatively short time ago.

Marco Biagi: This is a “quantitative methods 101” question. Which is more accurately representative of Scottish public opinion: an open website-published Scottish Government consultation or a properly weighted scientific study such as the ones that you are quoting?

Professor Curtice: I note the terms of your question, which I suspect that not everybody would agree with. If anybody thinks that the purpose of a consultation is to find out the balance of public opinion, they do not understand that the value of a consultation is to come to some understanding of the arguments that people put forward on both sides, which you might not necessarily get out of a survey, and to uncover possible technical difficulties and objections to the detail of a bill that civil servants or ministerial colleagues might not have understood.

It is to be regretted that with respect to both this consultation and the consultations on the referendum there has been a tendency by protagonists on both sides of the debate to encourage people to send in standard replies, which add no value at all to that kind of exercise.

To that extent at least, you should not look to consultations as a way of understanding the balance of public opinion as opposed to understanding the structure of public opinion and possible technical difficulties with any particular form of legislation.

The Convener: Thank you for that. I call John Mason.

10:45

John Mason: Mr Curtice, you are very respected by many of us and indeed the public for your understanding of how all of this is done. Can you comment on the notion that people get softened up with certain questions before the big question gets asked? Does how you ask questions make a big difference to the result you get for your key question?

Professor Curtice: Any survey researcher will be extremely sensitive to the possibility that the context within which a question is asked and the way in which the question is phrased can affect the response. In my submission, I have tried to be quite open with the committee by indicating how differences in a question’s wording can make a difference. I think that that is absolutely the case.

Some of the questions that I highlight in the submission are worded better than others, but I know that in the British or Scottish social attitudes surveys we are certainly very careful to avoid creating a context that leads in one direction or another. We might not always succeed, but our wish is to understand public opinion as accurately as possible and not to promote one or other cause. Clearly some of the other questions that I have highlighted have been commissioned by one side or another, and one might feel that as a result they might or might not have got the answers they were looking for.

In the end, you have to make a judgment. We do not have a fantastic amount of evidence on this area—it has certainly not been polled intensively, particularly as far as attitudes in Scotland are concerned—but, looking at the variety of question wordings and the evidence across the piece, I think that on the simple question, “Should same-sex marriage happen or not?”, there seems to be a majority in favour, although I have to say that it does not necessarily look overwhelming.

Beyond that, if you ask people to choose between same-sex marriage, civil partnerships and doing nothing, it might not be the case that a majority of people would choose the introduction of same-sex marriage as their first choice but, equally, it seems pretty clear from follow-up questions that many of those for whom civil partnerships might be their first preference are not necessarily particularly opposed to the idea of same-sex marriage. That is simply an attempt to come up with a reasonable judgment of where public opinion seems to lie, given the variety of such opinion.

The only other thing that I would say is that, given the very strong relationship between age and attitudes towards same-sex relationships and given that each new generation of adults entering adulthood has been consistently more liberal on this subject than its predecessor, unless some dramatic event happens in this area—as happened in the 1980s—it is a reasonable supposition that public opinion is probably going to become more liberal on the subject. Even if one has question marks about how big or firm that majority might be at the moment, it is probably only going to get bigger and firmer over time.

John Mason: In that respect, you also point out that as society has become less religious—or as people have started to attend religious services less often—it has also become more liberal. Has there been any research on whether those two aspects are connected? Is society becoming more liberal because people are going to church less?

Professor Curtice: As you can see from some of my evidence, it is perfectly clear that those who regularly attend religious services are more likely to take a conservative view on these subjects. However, it is also clear that that difference has widened.

Back in the 1980s, for example, the attitudes of secular Scotland/Britain and those of religious Scotland/Britain were rather similar. The liberalisation of attitudes has occurred predominantly at the secular end of Scottish society but, that said, I also point out in my submission that there has been something of a liberalisation of attitudes even among regular worshippers. The decline of religious observance is undoubtedly one of the reasons why our society has become more liberal, but it also seems pretty clear that attendance at religious services and, indeed, religious organisations, many of which would adopt a conservative stance on these issues, seems to help to frame people’s attitudes.

Of course, the other liberalising thing that is going on is the expansion of university education. I have not made this point in the submission, but it is clear that those with a relatively high level of educational qualifications tend to be more liberal on these subjects than those with no educational qualifications. Therefore, as we become a better educated society, that tends to encourage social liberalism. That is another phenomenon that has tended to push our society in that direction.

John Mason: This is just a minor point. In line 5 of paragraph 16 of your submission, I see that independence had crept in. I had not really expected independence as part of this debate.

Professor Curtice: I am sorry. That is an error. You can imagine what else I was thinking about as I was writing the submission. It should read “same-sex marriage”. Since you have asked about that, I should say for the record that in the penultimate line of paragraph 3, “they same” should read “that same”, and in line 5 of paragraph 10, after the word “religious”, insert the word “service”. I hope that we have caught all the typographical errors.

John Mason: That is great. I knew that independence was on the minds of many of us but I had not expected it here.

The Convener: Is there any evidence that attitudes within religious organisations—within the clergy—are becoming more liberal?

Professor Curtice: We do not have enough members of the clergy, or anybody in any kind of religious order, to know the answer to that question. What we do know, which adds slightly more colour, is that there is a difference between members of different religious denominations or religions. Perhaps contrary to the general impression, the section of Scottish society that seems to be most conservative on this subject is those of a Presbyterian faith—particularly, it seems, those Presbyterians outside the Church of Scotland. The numbers are relatively small, and we therefore have to be careful, but Episcopalians are probably towards the liberal end of the spectrum, with Catholics somewhere in between.

Alex Johnstone: Sometimes in politics, you know what you are going to say next but you just cannot help yourself. I am going to take on John Curtice on an issue in which I am sure that he can quite easily make a fool of me, but I am going to try it anyway.

You were talking about the liberalisation of views. I fully accept that the information that you quoted is the case and that views are becoming more liberal. When people's views are polled, that information is very obvious. I want to look a little deeper into that. What does the public think about liberalisation? What is their motive? Is there an increased tendency over time for people to go with the flow, or is it a deliberate action?

Professor Curtice: My answer is to remind you what public opinion was in the mid-1980s. The idea that society has, in some sense, gone with the flow is difficult to believe given the degree to which, little more than 25 years ago, we as a society pretty much unanimously adopted a critical attitude towards same-sex relationships. It looks to me very much as if there has been a genuine, quite dramatic but substantial change in attitudes, which, in a sense, has been a society not going with the flow. Society has reversed itself.

I can remember when male same-sex relationships were still illegal. What is certainly true is that the views of those of older generations have changed over time. One suspects that that is, in part, as a result of being influenced by the greater liberal views of, for example, their own children. Equally, it is almost undoubtedly the case that the views of many older people with regard to cohabitation and heterosexual relations outside marriage have changed as a result of the behaviour of their own children.

As attitudes have begun to change, those who are of generations for whom these attitudes were not the norm have probably reacted to social pressure, but that is just people changing their views because they see the world changing. I do not think that it in any way undercuts the reality of the change that we have witnessed.

Alex Johnstone: Is the liberalisation of views genuinely because people at large care more about these issues and want to deliberately change their position, or is it perhaps that people simply care less?

Professor Curtice: This is an interpretation of the data, but it is probably true that people who say that there is rarely or never anything wrong with same-sex relationships are not necessarily saying that they feel strongly about the matter. They may be saying, “What’s all the fuss about? Why are we worrying about this? Of course it’s fine.”

There is probably therefore an asymmetry of feeling. It is probably true to say that those who feel that same-sex relationships are wrong, let alone those who are opposed to same-sex marriage, feel that view more intensely than many of the people who adopt the opposite view. To that extent, we have an asymmetry of passion in the debate.

It is probably also true that it is not the case that the vast majority of people in Scotland and Britain think that changing the law in this area is a major priority. It is simply a case of people thinking, “If it’s going to happen, that’s fine. Why didn’t we do it a few years ago?”

Alex Johnstone: That is what I meant by the phrase “go with the flow.” Is that—

Professor Curtice: I think that there is a misunderstanding of going with the flow. What I am saying is that most people are saying, “What are you on about? What is the issue here?”

When we talk about independence, most people understand that there is an issue and a real choice that matters. People can understand why some people are for and some are against. I suspect that, in relation to same-sex marriage, people’s views have changed such that many people are just saying, “Oh, you mean that there’s an issue?” That is probably particularly true of younger people. Because they have grown up in a society where the predominant view in recent years has been that same-sex relationships are okay, they are probably wondering what some older people are arguing about. The norm among younger people is very much to say, “Fine—whatever.”

It therefore follows that those who are passionately arguing in favour of the bill have a problem in the sense that I do not think that many people are doing that. Equally, I do not think that, if the majority of the public are saying, “Okay, this is going to happen and it’s fine—it’s what we should be doing”, we should necessarily presume that that is an argument for ignoring public opinion.

Although public opinion on the death penalty has begun to change, it has long been in favour of restoring the death penalty. Many a legislator would say, “I can think of an ethical argument why, on this occasion, I’m not going to follow public opinion.” Given that the role of legislators is, other things being equal, to take serious cognisance of public opinion, if you are going to say, “No, we’re not going to follow public opinion in this area” and if you accept my reading of public opinion, you have to come up with ethical arguments as to why following the public view is not necessarily in the public interest.
Alex Johnstone: Thank you.

Marco Biagi: In your written submission, you mention some variables that predict people’s attitudes to same-sex marriage, namely age and church attendance. You have also alluded to level of education being another variable, although that is not mentioned in your submission. Is there anything else that is statistically significant?

Professor Curtice: Gender is a factor. Men are usually less liberal than women on the subject.

Marco Biagi: And those are the only things that have been found through the—

Professor Curtice: Yes. You can look at the full detail in various reports that have been done for the Scottish Government more generally about attitudes towards discrimination, but the crucial ones in this area are gender, age, education and religious observance.

11:00

Marco Biagi: When everything else is controlled for, is there an urban/rural divide?

Professor Curtice: I would have to go and check the data—I am happy to do so. It is a little while since I engaged with the data at that level.

Marco Biagi: I think that I was asking more out of curiosity than for the purposes of scrutiny of the bill.

Professor Curtice: I simply remind you that this is a predominantly urban society, albeit that it has a distinctive rural hinterland.

Siobhan McMahon: Professor Curtice, you said that people are becoming more liberal and that, even if they do not regard changing the law as a priority, they wonder what the fuss is about the bill. Are you aware of studies that the committee can consider that have drilled down, so that rather than just ask whether same-sex marriage should happen—yes or no—they have considered the consequences of having same-sex marriage, in the context of other protections and freedoms, which we have discussed with previous panels?

Professor Curtice: The honest truth is that I am not aware of anyone who is trying to gauge public opinion in that way. The only thing to which I can point you, which will give you some guidance, is the question in the Ipsos MORI poll that I mention in paragraph 15 of my submission. As far as I am aware, that is the only poll, north or south of the border, that has drawn a distinction between religious and civil marriage. It seems pretty clear from the poll that the majority of people think that civil marriage, rather than religious marriage, should be legislated for.

There might have been the odd question on Britain-wide surveys during the passage of the equivalent bill at Westminster—I would have to check. I am pretty sure that the majority of people say that religious organisations should not be forced to perform marriage ceremonies if they do not want to do so.

You will appreciate that some of the conversation that I heard from the previous panel as I arrived in the committee room today will go way above the heads of the average person. We cannot ask in surveys about detailed legal arguments, as opposed to the principle of whether someone should or should not be required to do something.

If you want me to check, get the committee clerk to write to me and I will happily check my data file.

The Convener: Thank you.

John Mason: Professor Curtice, you said that there is a move throughout society to being more liberal. You mentioned capital punishment. Is society changing on that, too?

Professor Curtice: Yes. I looked at the UK-wide data recently. Support for the death penalty is now below 50 per cent—it is somewhere in the 40s. That is another area in which attitudes have become somewhat more liberal.

There is one area in which society has definitely not become more liberal. If anything, we have become more conservative—if that is the right word—about people who have a regular sexual partner having sexual relationships with someone else. In other words, society is even more critical of infidelity than it used to be.

When we talk about liberalisation and sexual mores, it is not the case that society thinks that anything goes. For the most part, we seem to be in favour of monogamous relationships at any one point in time. It is simply that we have become much more relaxed, first, about whether the relationship takes place within marriage and, secondly, about the genders of the people who are engaged in the activity.

The committee must be aware that there is a certain irony around the bill, in that we talk about enabling people in same-sex relationships to enter an institution that relatively large sections of the heterosexual community no longer get involved in, at a time when society does not think that sexual relationships should necessarily take place within marriage. That is also part of the liberalising trend of the past 25 years.

John Mason: I was interested to hear that you think that society still supports monogamy.

Professor Curtice: Yes, that is very clear—I refer you to the British social attitudes survey.
Indeed, I give the reference in paragraph 17 of my submission.

A person’s partner and the quality and nature of the relationship are what seem to matter to people now rather than a sense of obligation, let alone some religious teaching. Therefore, cheating on one’s partner is now, if anything, regarded as even less acceptable because we value the quality of the relationship more than we value the formal institutional position.

John Mason: That is interesting. Thank you.

Alex Johnstone: We have heard the words “liberalisation” and “conservative” used in their true sense—nothing to do with the political parties.

Professor Curtice: Absolutely. There is no normative political involvement.

Alex Johnstone: Indeed. However, my instinct is that neither description describes how I have, for most of my life, dealt with the issues surrounding this and similar subjects. The word that I would use, which has not appeared during the evidence that we have taken so far in the committee, is “tolerance”. It is about tolerance of the different choices that people make and learning not to impose one’s own views on other individuals or to see people through that prism. During a period when public opinion has become more liberalised, has Scotland become more or less tolerant?

Professor Curtice: I am happy to accept the word “tolerance”.

As I pointed out, we have much less evidence on this north of the border, but I have two points to make. First, the evidence that we have collected since 1999 in the Scottish social attitudes surveys shows, as you have seen from the evidence on attitudes towards same-sex relationships, that Scotland has largely shared in the trend to be liberalising or more tolerant.

Secondly, whereas even in 1999-2000 Scotland remained a more religious society than England and Wales in terms of levels of religious attendance, that is no longer the case. I argue in my evidence that attitudes in Scotland are now very similar to those south of the border on a whole load of other areas—I can happily send you the chapter on that if you want. On social issues, Scotland, England and Wales now look very similar to each other. That inevitably raises an issue for this institution. Given that England and Wales have legislated first in the area, and given the similarity of outlooks on the two sides of the border, you would have to come up with good reasons for why Scotland should adopt a different perspective.

Alex Johnstone: I want to compare the concept of liberalisation with the concept of tolerance, as I perceive a number of differences. Although society as a whole is becoming more liberal, levels of tolerance and intolerance have changed radically among those who hold strong views. For example, I find that those who seek greater tolerance are themselves likely to be the least tolerant of those who do not share their views. I am basically suggesting that tolerance is now a one-way street.

Professor Curtice: The difficulty with this issue is that we are talking about changing the character of an institution in which religious organisations have long played a significant role, and many of those organisations do not agree with the change that is taking place. Inevitably, we are talking about a political conflict—welcome to politics.

There are interesting arguments to have outside the committee about whether, if society comes to believe that same-sex relationships are okay, it is acceptable to use the force of the law to stop people expressing contrary views. We see those debates going on particularly in the area of race relationships, which lead on to arguments about what harm is or is not done to those with a minority view.

It comes back to the question that Mr Allard asked. My reading of opinions is that it is not clear at the moment that society wishes to force—if that is the right word—this change down the throats of the religious organisations that do not want to go down this path. That seems to be the position from the evidence, particularly in paragraph 15 of my written submission. To that extent, we seem to be tolerant rather than liberal, although most people seem to be willing to accept that, if that is what someone feels, that is okay. We are not necessarily willing to use the law to force organisations to do something.

It is an interesting question whether, given that society is liberalising and there is evidence that attitudes—even among those who regularly attend religion—are liberalising, in 20 years’ time we will discover that most religious organisations have decided to take advantage of the legislation that allows them to perform such ceremonies. Thinking about what is good for society, given that we are talking about trying to manage a dramatic social change whereby a section of society find themselves living in a climate that is very different from that which they are used to and what they believe in, it is in the interests of society to manage that change in a way that minimises conflict. I think that you, as legislators, want to do that. To that extent, having tolerance as your watchword in this area—in so far as it can be pursued, given that there is genuine conflict—is probably a good mantra to follow.

The Convener: The committee has no further questions. Thank you very much for coming along, Professor Curtice.
Our next meeting will take place on Thursday 26 September and will include further oral evidence on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill.

Meeting closed at 11:12.
Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Margaret McCulloch): Welcome to the 24th meeting in 2013 of the Equal Opportunities Committee. Please set any electronic devices to flight mode or switch them off.

Our clerking and research teams and official reporters are here. Around the room, we are supported by broadcasting services and security officers. I welcome the observers in the gallery.

I am the committee's convener. I invite members and witnesses to introduce themselves in turn.

Marco Biagi (Edinburgh Central) (SNP): I am the member of the Scottish Parliament for Edinburgh Central and the deputy convener of the committee.

John Mason (Glasgow Shettleston) (SNP): I am the MSP for Glasgow Shettleston.

Alex Johnstone (North East Scotland) (Con): I am a member for North East Scotland.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): Good morning. I am also a member for North East Scotland.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): Madainn mhath—good morning. I am an MSP for the Highlands and Islands.

Siobhan McMahon (Central Scotland) (Lab): I am an MSP for Central Scotland.

Cara Spence (LGBT Youth Scotland): I am from LGBT Youth Scotland.

The Rev Blair Robertson (Healthcare Chaplaincy (NHS Scotland)): I am head of chaplaincy and spiritual care for NHS Greater Glasgow and Clyde and represent healthcare chaplaincy in the national health service.

Stephen McCrossan (Educational Institute of Scotland): I am national officer for education and equality in the Educational Institute of Scotland.

Chief Superintendent Grant Manders (Police Scotland): I am head of safer communities in Police Scotland.

Ruth Hunt (Stonewall): I am deputy chief executive of Stonewall and oversee Stonewall Scotland's work.

Michael Calwell (Family Education Trust): I represent the Family Education Trust.

John Brown (Scottish Catholic Education Service): I represent the Catholic Education Commission.

The Convener: Thank you very much.

The only item on the agenda is an evidence session on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill at stage 1. Witnesses should indicate to me or to the clerk on my left when or if they wish to speak. John Mason will start the questions.

John Mason: I will start with education. I will aim my questions at Mr McCrossan, but others might want to come in. Can you give us a general picture of how teachers deal with equality issues and, in particular, say whether you think that the bill will have an impact on how teachers teach in the classroom?

Stephen McCrossan: I do not think that the bill will have a significant impact on the way in which teachers teach in the classroom. We simply see the bill as another strand in equality and diversity, promoting equal opportunities and challenging discrimination. I do not think that it will make a significant difference to classroom practices and how teachers teach in the classroom.

John Mason: What a school, the Government, an education authority and everybody else would say about some equalities issues is quite clear. For example, they would say, “You should treat a black person and a white person exactly the same.” The same would be true in relation to bullying or whatever. Do you accept that we are discussing a quite controversial issue and that teachers might have views either for or against same-sex marriage?

Stephen McCrossan: Yes, they will have their personal views on that, but they adhere to a code of professionalism and conduct through the General Teaching Council for Scotland. Their role in the classroom is clearly defined as non-judgmental. The responsibility and onus would therefore be on the teacher to devise appropriate classroom activities to allow the children and young people to look at and explore the issues in the bill on their own and make up their own minds about it. Essentially, it is the responsibility of the teacher to be inclusive and non-judgmental in how they operate in the classroom.

John Mason: Would a teacher ever say what their personal views are, or should they never do so? I am thinking of political issues such as the one that we are discussing.
Stephen McCrossan: Teachers are often asked what their own views are, but in my experience, they set down the parameters right at the beginning of the year with the class on what is expected in the classroom. The teacher's views and opinions would certainly not matter; it is all about the children exploring and expressing their own views. That would be established as a basic classroom rule.

John Mason: I imagine that, on issues such as this one, a teacher's interaction with, say, a primary 4 class will be quite different from their interaction with a secondary 4 class, where there will be more of a discussion.

Stephen McCrossan: I have no experience of the primary sector, but I can say that classroom practice and teaching methodologies have opened up as a result of curriculum for excellence, and teachers are now being encouraged to explore and use many more new teaching methodologies such as collaborative learning, the use of information and communication technologies for research purposes, active learning and peer learning. People's views of traditional teaching approaches have changed and teachers are now able to pick and choose from the approaches that I mentioned, depending on their audience.

John Mason: Do any of the other witnesses have views on whether the bill will make any difference in schools?

Cara Spence: I do not necessarily think that the issue is as controversial as people perceive it to be. LGBT Youth Scotland has just completed a three-year project in which we worked with more than 9,000 pupils in 47 schools across Scotland and trained 350 school staff. There is a fear that this is a controversial issue and when teachers hear such language they get alarmed. However, when you unpick the issue and show that it is okay to talk about, say, love, bullying and anti-bullying approaches, teachers are okay with it. Our work with teachers was fantastic and positive; those teachers are leading the way in Scotland and particularly think that issues such as prejudice-based bullying need to be challenged in schools.

John Mason: I agree that issues such as tackling bullying should not be controversial in any way. However, given the public reaction, do you not accept that this is quite a controversial topic?

Cara Spence: I suppose that it has been controversial as far as the media reaction is concerned but I think that a strong majority of public opinion supports the bill.

John Brown: I do not think that the bill will make very much difference to teaching in the classroom about respect for the individual, which is important and ensures that bullying is not accepted. However, the strongly controversial aspect of the bill is its redefinition of marriage and, in Catholic schools, such a redefinition will come into conflict with the belief held in Catholic schools and by the Catholic church about the sanctity and dignity of marriage as being between a man and a woman. Teaching in those schools would have to represent marriage by saying what it is, in view of that religious stance. That is why we are concerned that the bill might have particular consequences for teaching and teachers in our schools, and we are looking for an assurance that it will not change or challenge the faith curriculum in Catholic schools.

John Mason: Can you set out your concerns in a little more detail?

John Brown: For a start, we teach the current understanding of marriage as a lifelong and exclusive commitment between one man and one woman, and controversy will arise with regard to what teachers will say about equal marriage as defined in the bill.

Michael Calwell: The problem is that you cannot teach children, particularly young children, two conflicting normative views of marriage at the same time.

Ultimately, there is an understanding of marriage that is shared by the whole of the human family, which is that it is a purposeful sexual union of a man and a woman that is vital to human society and confers upon society innumerable and vital benefits that are indivisible from that nature as a man and a woman. Without that basic principle enshrined in the institution, we cannot understand why human societies even have marriage and what it does—we cannot really understand it at all. On the other hand, there is a radical, new vision of marriage that has, in essence, been invented by a pretty small political class in a very small corner of the world in the past few years and which radically conflicts with that view.

We must decide which of those two conflicting understandings of the human institution of marriage we teach to children. We would say that the bill should not proceed at all. However, should it proceed, the decision on which of those conflicting views of marriage is taught to children would have to be made by parents because, in any free society, they are ultimately the people who are responsible for raising and educating their children and they have a basic right to have their ontological, philosophical and religious views communicated to their children. If the parents do not make the decision about the manner in which their children are educated, who does?

John Mason: Why would a school have to take one side or the other? On an issue such as abortion, the teacher could tell the children that... some people agree with it and some people disagree with it. Can that not apply to same-sex marriage as well?

Michael Calwell: With older children—in the teenage years, for example—we could probably tease out some of the political and ideological concepts that have gone into the bill. We could talk about gender theory, critical theory and all the ideologies that have driven the bill and then juxtapose the vision of marriage that is contained in the bill with what the human family understands the nature and purpose of marriage to be. Therefore, we could teach it in the context of a wider political and ideological conflict that is going on in this part of the world at this point in time.

However, when it comes to small children, who really cannot digest all that complexity, the people who must decide what marriage is—what its basic meaning and purpose are—and what they want to communicate to their children about that must be the parents. We emphasise the primacy of parental sovereignty in the debate.

Ruth Hunt: There is a fundamental misunderstanding at the heart of the debate, which is the assumption that the law is based on people’s individual belief and faith. That is not the case. Scotland determines its law based on what the nation needs and has determined that same-sex marriage is a good thing.

Faith schools that work with Stonewall Scotland and those that choose not to but still take the issue seriously are clear that teachers are able to present their views and beliefs in a respectful and dignified way while still teaching truth. People in every faith community and those of no faith would agree that all children need to be taught the truth. Children under 11 do not need Michael Caldwell’s analysis of Foucault’s changing nature of gender variance. They need to know that different couples love each other and that love and relationships are important.

Providing age-appropriate materials and ways of describing that is exactly how good faith schools work. The faith schools with which we work say that homophobic bullying is not fair, not right and not Christian and that they strongly believe in that. They also say that some people believe that same-sex couples should be able to get married and some do not because they believe that marriage should only be between a man and a woman. Children, regardless of their level of sophisticated understanding, are able to grasp that concept easily.

It is possible to present different notions of faith without telling lies. That is what it comes down to. If the law changes, schools will have to teach the truth, but that does not preclude them from teaching their beliefs as well.

John Mason: What do you mean by “truth” in this? It is clear that two and two is four: that is a matter of fact and nobody argues with it. Do you accept that, on an issue such as same-sex marriage, there is, in a sense, no truth because some people have one view and some have another?

Ruth Hunt: Let me put same-sex marriage to one side. The truth at the moment is that opposite-sex couples can get married in a religious premises or in a registry office. Some people do not have any religion when they get married, but that is okay. Some gay people can enter into something called a civil partnership. Those are facts—factual pieces of information. The teacher can then say, for example, “I don’t believe that gay people should be allowed to have a civil partnership. That’s because I believe that relationships should only be sanctioned by the state when they are within a construct of faith.” You know, you can have that conversation while presenting the truth.

When the bill is passed, the teacher could say, “Some gay people get married; some don’t. Some heterosexual people get married; some don’t. I believe that gay people shouldn’t get married.” That is not an impossible position to occupy within a school environment. Some of the discussions at the moment suggest that the bill will force teachers into a position where they cannot say, “I do not believe that this is a good thing.” The reality is that good teachers, including good Catholic teachers, frequently manage their beliefs in juxtaposition with the curriculum that they are teaching. I remember a very good lesson in my Catholic secondary school, in which we were taught about evolution but the teacher began by saying, “I do not believe in evolution. This is my personal belief, but I will now teach you.” As a pupil, that was a fascinating insight into the different ways of seeing the world, but the lesson also enabled me to pass my physics GCSE. These things are not contradictory.

The Convener: We will move on to questions from John Finnie.

John Finnie: Good morning, panel. Mr Calwell, in your written evidence, you say:

“There are four key components in the definition of marriage: it is voluntary, heterosexual, monogamous and lifelong.”

What is the source of that information, please?

Michael Calwell: What we are saying is that you cannot understand what marriage is unless it has those characteristics. The purpose of marriage and the nature of marriage are indivisible, basically.
Here is a little thought experiment for you. Imagine that you were an alien coming down from outer space and you had to try to understand what marriage is. If you had to understand the human phenomenon of marriage, the purpose of marriage, why it is vital and why it is important—all those things—and all that you had was the bill that is before us, you simply would not be able to understand marriage. It would not make any sense at all. In fact, it would raise more questions—

John Finnie: What is the purpose of marriage, then?

Michael Calwell: Marriage unites a man and a woman to each other and any children they might have. It provides an ordered context for sexual activity. It provides children with a mother and father in a stable, ordered and committed relationship—

John Finnie: Is that the case with every marriage?

Michael Calwell: That is the reason why we have marriage in our society. That is why it is recognised.

In fact, the state’s relationship to marriage is essentially tangential. The state recognises the importance of the extra-legal, pre-political and what you might call anthropological nature of marriage, and the state protects it in law. The state does that for the very simple reason that any civilised, functioning, happy, stable society needs the stable sexual unions of men and women.

Of course some men and women do not have children. Some cannot have children, and some may be too old. But even if 98 per cent of marriages did not produce children and even if 98 per cent of children—

John Finnie: What percentage of marriages at the moment produce children?

Michael Calwell: I do not know off the top of my head. I suggest that it is probably the majority—perhaps something like 60 per cent. I do not know the answer to that.

The point that I was making—if you do not mind me finishing—is that, even if the majority of marriages did not produce children and even if the majority of children were born outside marriage, that would not be a legitimate pretext for this legal innovation.

John Finnie: In your written evidence, you say:

“The Scottish Parliament should no more legislate for same-sex marriage than it should legislate for forced marriage, polygamous marriages, or temporary contract marriages.”

Why do you think that that is the case?

Michael Calwell: Because those things are incompatible with the purposes of marriage.

John Finnie: Do you accept that many people would find those views offensive?

Michael Calwell: No, I do not think that they would. I think that the majority of humanity understands marriage in much the way that I have just adumbrated.

John Finnie: Do you have a view on what I thought were the very succinct comments of Mr McCrossan on the code of professionalism and conduct for teachers? Do you think that there is something wrong with the existing code?

Michael Calwell: No, but I think that the bill introduces a new dilemma, which is to do with what marriage is, what it does and how that is communicated. As I said, there is also the issue of the rights of parents over education, which is explicitly laid out. Parents have a right to have their children educated in a way that accords with their philosophical, cultural and religious values.

John Finnie: You also go on to say:

“We are also concerned that teachers who indicate that they do not support same-sex marriage or who are unable in good conscience to use teaching materials that refer positively to same-sex marriage may face disciplinary action.”

Having heard Mr McCrossan’s view, and being aware of the code of professionalism and conduct, do you still adhere to that view?

Michael Calwell: The problem with a lot of the bill and the guidelines is that they are unclear. We are not comfortable that a teacher could, in accordance with parents’ wishes, posit that positive and constructive view of marriage without falling foul of potential legal action or facing other problems such as professional misconduct allegations.

John Finnie: Given what we have heard about how the curriculum is delivered, why would a teacher indicate their personal views on such an issue?

Michael Calwell: I will give an example. If a child were to ask a teacher what marriage is, what it does and why we have it, the teacher would be forced into a position in which they would have to go along with the radical, new vision of marriage, which really is not marriage at all but is the appropriation of the word “marriage” from its extra-legal context and its application to a legal construct that has nothing to do with marriage or the understanding of marriage that, frankly, most human beings have.

John Finnie: The abolition of slavery was seen as being radical, and people quoted scripture to support the retention of slavery.
Michael Calwell: I am not quoting scripture. I am just quoting the basic—

John Finnie: No, but I am saying to you that views can change over a period of time. You would accept that.

Michael Calwell: But the nature of marriage is rooted in the human person; it is rooted in the protracted and intense developmental, emotional and social needs of human infants. That is why it is a common human phenomenon. That is why it is found in much the same way in all human societies, even when those societies differ wildly in other respects. The common phenomenon of marriage tells us something about ourselves. It is not malleable. It is not really a malleable political or legal construct.

Marco Biagi: What about the deep emotional and social needs of those infants who will grow up to have same-sex attractions?

Michael Calwell: They need exactly the same maternal and paternal input that marriage provides. We have to decide here. They are equal citizens as well, and they have as much of a right to the security that marriage provides. Why would we treat them differently?

Marco Biagi: So, children who grow up to be gay men should marry women, and children who grow up to be gay women should marry men. That is marriage, as you understand it. Is that what you are saying?

Michael Calwell: No. The genesis and nature of homosexuality has nothing to do with the nature and purpose of marriage. They are completely separate things. They are not related. The fact that someone may not want to marry—or, for whatever reason, cannot marry—does not relate. I do not really understand your question.

Marco Biagi: I did not really understand your point, which is why I was trying to tease it out. You seemed to say that marriage, as it is currently set out in law, is necessary for the social, emotional and educational needs of infants—

Michael Calwell: That is why we have it, yes.

Marco Biagi: But you seem to ignore the infants who, as they grow and develop, will have same-sex attractions and will want to form relationships with people of the same sex.

Michael Calwell: No one is stopping anyone forming a relationship with a person of the same sex. Who is doing that?

Marco Biagi: If marriage flows from the social needs of the 95 per cent of children who will not grow up to have same-sex attractions, does it not also flow from the social needs of those who will grow up to have those same-sex attractions, and should it not, therefore, simply reflect the social and educational needs that everyone has?

Michael Calwell: A child is not a sexual being.

Marco Biagi: Not when it is a child, no.

Michael Calwell: Marriage exists for them when they are children; it does not exist for them when they are adults. Do you see what I mean?

The Convener: I will bring in John Brown, and then John Finnie.

John Brown: I want to bring the argument, or the discussion, back to education in the classroom. Ruth Hunt talked about a classroom teacher presenting the facts and being able to say, "I don’t believe in that." In a Catholic school, we would be teaching the idea of marriage as being between a man and a woman. That is the sacramental element in a Catholic school. That does not prevent me from stating that some people live different lifestyles and deserve respect for that. My worry is that if a teacher says in a classroom that they do not believe something to be marriage in the sense that we understand marriage, they could be liable to be attacked or taken to court because they are seen to be against something that the state has promulgated. Therefore, we need some sort of legal protection in the bill so that we can say what we believe within the Catholic understanding of marriage and we are not prevented from saying that some people go through a form of ceremony that they call marriage but is not marriage in our view.

Stephen McCrossan: My point is allied to that and it touches on Mr Finnie’s point about disciplinary measures against teachers in schools. Our view is that the system already works. Normally, if a teacher has difficulties with the teaching resources that he or she is expected to use in the classroom, their professionalism allows them to flag up their difficulty with the particular topic and local arrangements come into play in the school. As the Government has pointed out, teachers have a responsibility through their professionalism, but employers also have a responsibility under the public sector equality duty to respect the beliefs of the individual teacher.

I work at a national level. Before I came to the committee, I asked colleagues whether they had come across any cases in which disciplinary procedures had been applied to teachers who said that using certain materials went against their beliefs. My colleagues have not come across any such instances at national level, which indicates that such issues are either being dealt with at local level, or they simply do not happen.

John Finnie: My question is in the first instance for Ms Spence and then perhaps for Chief Superintendent Manders. I do not know whether the panel has seen the document on the issue that the Scottish Government has given us and that it has helpfully told us will be posted online today. I have to say that it is marked “DRAFT 1 .... EARLY 2014”. It is titled “Conduct of Relationships, Sexual Health and Parenthood Education in Scottish schools”. I will read a few small passages from it.

Paragraph 7 states:

“RSHP education should present facts in an objective, balanced and sensitive manner within a framework of sound values and an awareness of the law on sexual behaviour.”

After a short passage comes the phrase on which I would appreciate comment, which is:

“At the same time, teachers must respect and avoid causing hurt or offence to those who come from various family backgrounds.”

That is some fairly woolly terminology, but I think that we all know where it is coming from. To what extent does such a statement, and people adhering to it, reduce the incidence of bullying? Does the leadership that comes from the classroom reduce bullying?

Cara Spence: That is so important. I would like to bring the discussion back to the welfare of children and young people. At the end of the day, we know that lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender young people are in classrooms across Scotland. They tell us that if teachers said negative things about same-sex relationships, or said that same-sex relations are harmful or not equal to heterosexual relationships, they would find that damaging and hurtful. That is the most important thing.

In essence, part of a teacher’s role is to consider the welfare of children and young people. That is paramount; it is not secondary to their beliefs or views. Before a teacher makes a statement in the classroom, they should consider whether it might have a damaging effect on a pupil in that classroom. Teaching should not be biased; it needs to be factual. If the bill is passed, the legislation will be fact. There is no need for teachers to state negative opinions in the classroom in relation to the legislation.

10:00

John Finnie: Chief superintendent, what are the implications for the police service if bullying gets to extreme levels? Does a statement like that help?

Chief Superintendent Manders: To be honest, I do not know whether it helps or not. I have been in the police for 26 years and I cannot remember an instance of bullying that has been precipitated by what a teacher has said in the classroom. It is more of a peer issue in the playground than something that begins in the classroom. I have nothing else to add on that aspect.

John Finnie: An increasing dimension is bullying using social media and the internet. Messages are very important there.

Chief Superintendent Manders: Absolutely. I return to the fact that all those instances come across my desk because that issue sits within my remit. I cannot recall any instances since the inception of Police Scotland—and probably before that, in my time in Strathclyde Police—in which the bullying has been instigated by what was taught in a classroom.

John Finnie: I was not necessarily suggesting that it was. I was wondering about the contribution that education services can make. As elected representatives, we have all dealt with instances in which parents have felt that the education authorities have not been proactive in dealing with bullying. Such bullying can escalate to the severe violence that you and your colleagues have to deal with. I am talking about the extent to which messages are important.

Chief Superintendent Manders: Messaging is absolutely important. That said, I have detected a proactive stance on bullying in the education authorities with which I have worked closely. On the messaging that goes around, there is probably not enough on the internet and social media stuff but there is always a time lag before public authorities catch up with the here and now in these things. Police Scotland needs to do a bit of catching up with how it responds to cybercrime, internet crime, social media bullying and so on.

It is a slightly different debate, but I agree that messaging is very important. The messaging can be general and sensible and, in my view, it usually is.

Alex Johnstone: I want to discuss a specific point on the subject of education and how the bill may affect us in future. I have a rough idea of the views of everybody around the table and I respect those views. For the avoidance of doubt, I am one of the people who will oppose the bill.

Many of us, on both sides of the table, are veterans of the section 28 debate, which is more accurately described in Scotland as the section 2A debate, so we know that legislation can have an impact in the classroom.

My concern is that changes in the law in this case could ignite a similar, perhaps parallel debate over how we teach and how we react in the classroom. I ask the individuals on the panel whether they share any of those fears and whether they have any information that might assist me in deciding whether the legislation may start a debate in the classroom similar to that on section 2A.

John Brown: There are issues about what is to be taught in the classroom, and about what is factual and what is belief.

The secondary element is about the public sector equality duty under which a local authority, if it is to fulfil that duty, might develop corporate policies that champion the need to advance equality. Advancing equality uniformly at the expense of the protection of religion and belief is where I see the difficulty. The public sector equality duty does not protect teachers who say things like, “I don’t believe that this is marriage but the Government is allowing people to enter into what they call marriage”, and that might lead to difficulties with employment law. There are examples of people who have been castigated and taken to court because they have made statements about what marriage is in essence and said that they disagree with the bill. We are looking for protection.

Ruth Hunt: Alex Johnstone is absolutely right to remind us about the effects of section 2A on Scottish schools and young people. The fundamental impact was that teachers felt paralysed and unable to talk about anything that related to sexual orientation. That legacy lives on in our schools. Some teachers think that that legislation still exists, and some know that it has been repealed but do not know what that means in terms of what they can do. That leads to there being very little reference to lesbian, gay and bisexual issues in any classroom, faith or no faith. The bill has reopened that discussion and it will give teachers the opportunity to think about how they can talk about these issues in an age-appropriate and sensitive way that reflects their belief system.

It is worth remembering that, as a wise man once said, just because something is not banned does not mean that it is compulsory. There is no reason why schools across Scotland would suddenly start waving rainbow flags and teaching their kids everything they need to know about gay stuff, but we need to move on from the paralysis that affected us under section 2A.

Any additional legislation in relation to education will be perceived and received by children and teachers in Scotland as the equivalent of section 2A, and that is a legacy that you do not want to return to and we do not want to return to under any circumstances. Existing guidance and legislation protects teachers of all faiths and none when they discuss these issues in a sensitive way that protects religious freedom but also enables children to learn the facts about how our society works in 21st century Scotland.

Stephen McCrossan: I work in the equality department of EIS and, as a trade union, we see it as our responsibility to keep teachers informed and give them a more informed view of equality issues. In undertaking that work, we organise LGBT networks for teachers, we have policies for giving advice to LGBT members, we are actively engaged with the Scottish Trades Union Congress to promote LGBT issues, and we actively encourage partnership activity with organisations such as LGBT Youth and Stonewall Scotland. Recently we highlighted Stonewall’s “The School Report: The experiences of gay young people in Britain’s schools in 2012”, its approach to learning and teaching materials on different families, and its education champions programme. We have made our members aware of the LGBT Youth teachers’ toolkit and lesson plans that it has provided.

We see all that as being part of our responsibility to make teachers more aware of LGBT issues and we do our best to address that.

The Convener: Alex, are you finished?

Alex Johnstone: I think that a few more people want to speak.

Michael Calwell: The word “diversity” crops up a lot during these debates and we have to be mindful of how Scotland is changing demographically, particularly with the inflow of people from very strong pro-marriage, pro-family cultures. That is visibly the case, particularly where I live. Scottish society will become increasingly reliant on people from those demographic backgrounds as our natural population, if you like, declines.

If we do not make provisions in the bill to protect parents who want and need their children to have an understanding of marriage that consists with their views, we could end up with a lot of problems in classrooms, particularly with parents taking local education authorities to court for violating their rights. Article 2, protocol 1 of the European convention on human rights makes it explicitly clear that

“the State shall respect the right of parents to ensure such education and teaching in conformity with their own religious and philosophical convictions.”

If we do not explicitly make that case, we are opening up a can of worms and problems. We therefore need to make such explicit accommodation in the bill. We need three provisions: first, a statutory obligation to inform parents if any teaching about marriage that conflicts with their views is done in the classroom; secondly, a right to withdraw children from such teaching; and, thirdly, a positive obligation on the state to provide children with education that conforms to their parents’ understanding of the vital—pre-political, if you like—nature and purpose of marriage.

The Convener: What would be the situation if the young individuals’ views differed from those of their parents and they wanted to be part of the education that was offered in school?

Michael Calwell: For issues such as this, parents are the ultimate arbiters of what their children are taught.

The Convener: Up to what age?

Michael Calwell: I do not claim to be an expert on this, but I think that it is about when children get to a point at which they can understand the nuances of the arguments. However, the fear is that the state education system would not teach about the subject of marriage in an impartial manner. We can already see forces at work within the education system and the civil service that are antagonistic towards the traditional, established view of marriage. We would therefore not be necessarily comfortable that the state education system would provide a properly contextualised version of the wider debate about marriage not just in Scotland but throughout the world.

The Convener: If teachers in schools were not allowed to discuss the issue of same-sex marriage with young pupils, and some of the pupils had two mummies or two daddies and the young children asked the teachers about that, would the teachers then be allowed to discuss the issue?

Michael Calwell: What would there be to talk about? We are talking about marriage. The bill is concerned about what marriage is and what it does, and whether the law accurately reflects or contradicts that. I am not sure how your example would relate to the issue of marriage.

The Convener: If we assume that the bill goes through and we have marriage for same-sex couples as well as heterosexual couples, would you expect teachers in schools not to discuss that situation if there are pupils with same-sex parents?

Michael Calwell: This is why the bill is very problematic. Ultimately, it would be down to the parents of the other children to decide which of the conflicting versions of marriage they wanted their children to be taught about. That is one of the problems that the bill poses. I wish that I had an easy answer to that question, but the bill raises more questions than it answers.

The Convener: Are you finished, Alex?

Alex Johnstone: Yes. There is another volunteer.

John Brown: I want to clarify certain matters. Catholic schools already discuss homosexuality and gay, lesbian and transgender issues. They can be discussed already because they are facts about people.

The question that arises is not about the discussion of marriage in the way that the bill would allow it; it is about the business of what marriage is. In that discussion of what marriage is, we want to say that the current legislation about denominational schools remains the same and is guaranteed so that, in the discussion of marriage, a teacher can clearly state that, for some people in society, although the Government has made a decision to call it equal marriage, in the view of the church we cannot call it marriage in the sense that we believe in marriage. That is where the problem arises: we want some sort of right to determine the faith aspects. That is not to say that we will not discuss these issues; the question is whether we say that they are exactly the same.

10:15

The state can define marriage—indeed, the fact that the bill does not define marriage is one of the issues—but we want the right and the freedom to teach the definition of marriage that the church would hold to. We also want an assurance that the faith curriculum is not going to be seen necessarily as discriminatory. That is the issue that we need to be careful about in whatever comes out of the bill.

Alex Johnstone: In the specific circumstances of a teacher in a Catholic school having a strong opinion and wanting to express that, would the legislation as currently proposed leave that teacher protected or unprotected?

John Brown: I will answer that question in two parts. First, I do not think that the teacher would have the right simply to say, “This is my strong belief.” However, the teacher would have the right to say, “This is the belief of the Catholic church.” We must clarify that. Secondly, as the bill stands, I believe that a teacher who made that statement would be unprotected, and that worries me.

John Finnie: I thought that Mr Johnstone was going to cover this. You have talked about the rights and freedom of teachers, and I respect the fact that a lot of people see those as important. At the moment, would a teacher in your sector of the Scottish education system be allowed to express a view that was different from that of the church and still hold down their job?

John Brown: Yes and no. A teacher is able to express any view. However, the expectation is that they will say, “This may be my view, but the view of the church is X.” Parents who send their children to a Catholic school have certain expectations, one of which is that the teachers will teach what the Catholic church is about and what its views are. A teacher would be at liberty to say—as has happened in the past—that personally may disagree with the church on this particular point, but this is what the church believes and teaches." I do not think that the teacher can go beyond that.

Marco Biagi: Are teachers in Catholic schools who say that women should not be priests currently protected under any legislation?

John Brown: Are they currently protected?

Marco Biagi: Yes.

John Brown: I do not know, frankly, because the issue has not been raised. What we are looking at here has to do with marriage, and it is the equalities legislation that worries me. If a teacher said, for example, that women cannot be priests within the Catholic church, society would see that as something for the church to sort out within the church guidelines. However, what is suggested in the bill goes beyond simply the church. That is where my worry would be.

Marco Biagi: What about someone who is Catholic and who says, "I don't believe that women should be priests and I don't believe that women should be ministers either—that is my faith"? I do not know the exact scriptural justification that they would use for that, but the point holds for all religious observance. That situation could happen right now. Is there any protection right now, or is it simply that that issue has never come up?

John Brown: It is an interesting point. Frankly, I think that it has never come up as being an issue for society. What is suggested in the bill is a big issue for society as a whole; it is not within the strict parameters of church guidance and church rules and regulations. To my mind, the issue has not been raised. This bill may raise a number of issues with regard to the public sector equality duty. We want at least to strengthen that duty, in some way or another, within the bill.

Cara Spence: I assume—although I am not a lawyer—that teachers would be protected under article 9 of the European convention on human rights, in particular in relation to religious freedom. I assume that that is the case as regards protections.

I want to pick up on an earlier point about parents’ rights. As a youth organisation, we are really clear that parents’ rights should not be privileged over the rights of young people. It is important that young people’s views are listened to and considered in any decisions that are made about their lives. Such a view is outlined in current practices such as getting it right for every child as well as in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

We recognise that some parents may want to remove children from classes such as sexual health and relationships education. However, we believe that it would be phenomenally impractical on the ground—if the bill goes through—for teachers to remove children from the classroom every time same-sex marriage is mentioned. Ultimately, good education is about dialogue between pupils and teachers—it is about discussing issues—so it would be difficult to plan for when a young person may raise the issue or to discuss it in the classroom.

Christian Allard: Does the panel agree that it would in fact be impossible to know in advance whether a subject was going to be taught in the classroom because the curriculum for excellence means that everything can be taught at any time?

Stephen McCrossan: The curriculum for excellence offers an awful lot of opportunity. I think that—touching on a previous point—there is now perhaps more of an emphasis on parental involvement within the working life of a school. Parent councils have a more important role.

It is also good practice within schools that, if any contentious issues are going to be covered within the curriculum, parents are advised of that well in advance. As regards any instances that I have come across, parents have the right to approach the school, the headteacher or perhaps a member of the parent council to register their objection or to withdraw their child from that specific aspect of the religious education curriculum or the sex education curriculum. That is simply my experience, but certainly the curriculum for excellence gives an opportunity for parents to express their views more powerfully.

Christian Allard: I will ask other members of the panel a more general question about what is happening in the classroom and what is happening in the playground.

We saw the introduction of civil partnership and now we have this bill in front of us. What are your views on what might happen? We have heard some views from representatives of the churches—today and on other panels. In particular, there is Pope Francis’s last declaration, saying that the Catholic church may have an obsession with the issue of gay marriage and perhaps would be able to move on as in the case of civil partnership. I would like your views on that.

Michael Calwell: Are you talking about Pope Francis’s view?

Christian Allard: Yes.

Michael Calwell: I do not think that it necessarily has anything to do with this bill, but I think that he was saying that these teachings have to be understood in a wider context and that the church cannot just hammer away at individual matters without putting them into the context... where they belong—for example, the good of society and so on.

Christian Allard: So is it possible to talk about these issues without, as Pope Francis suggested, being obsessed by them or thinking that they will be bigger than they actually are? Is that not what happened with civil partnerships? Perhaps Superintendent Grant Manders can tell us what happened in the classroom, the playground or the wider community in that respect.

The Convener: Ruth Hunt wants to come in on that subject.

Ruth Hunt: Civil partnerships brought us up a gear. We heard a lot from young people who had attended a civil partnership ceremony and then talked about them in school, and we think that civil partnerships created an environment in which these matters could be talked about in an easily understood way.

However, civil partnerships did not completely eradicate homophobia in our schools—50 per cent of young lesbian, gay and bisexual people still experience bullying—and the sense of otherness that comes from having two separate systems is incredibly damaging to gay people’s sense of self and how that is described in schools. We thought that the situation would be better than that and that things would move more quickly, but that has not happened.

As we have seen in other countries, people stop worrying quite so much about equal marriage when it is introduced. I should also point out that by no means all faith communities share the same views on this issue; many gay and heterosexual people of faith see marriage as a good endorsement of good relationships, and the opportunity should be extended to gay people. Marriage will have a civilising effect on people’s consideration of lesbian, gay and bisexual issues, and that will feed down into the playground.

There has been some confusion over why equal marriage will reduce homophobic bullying and, if the committee will find it useful, I will set out an explanation. The acceptance of equal marriage in Scotland will be heard and understood by those young people up and down the country who are sitting in their living rooms reading the papers that this country has voted for equal marriage and equal rights for lesbian, gay and bisexual people. That is very positive and inspiring news for young people up and down the country who are watching on live stream, and that will limit my questions to the bill and not what is happening in the wider world.

First, I think that, as we have sought evidence on the bill, a certain confusion seems to have arisen that relates more to people’s concerns than to what might actually happen. This morning, Ruth Hunt has been very eloquent about what could happen in schools, arguing that a teacher could share their own views and say, “That is what I believe; however, this is what the state teaches.” Others, on the other hand, have argued that teachers cannot say, “This is what I believe” if what they believe is in fact contradictory. Where does your belief come from? Is it a legal protection? If so, it would be great to have the evidence about where it is set out.

Christian Allard: Yes. Does anyone wish to comment?

The Convener: We are actually going to move on to Siobhan McMahon.

Siobhan McMahon: I apologise, convener, but I will limit my questions to the bill and not what is happening in the wider world.

First, I think that, as we have sought evidence on the bill, a certain confusion seems to have arisen that relates more to people’s concerns than to what might actually happen. This morning, Ruth Hunt has been very eloquent about what could happen in schools, arguing that a teacher could share their own views and say, “That is what I believe; however, this is what the state teaches.” Others, on the other hand, have argued that teachers cannot say, “This is what I believe” if what they believe is in fact contradictory. Where does your belief come from? Is it a legal protection? If so, it would be great to have the evidence about where it is set out.

Ruth Hunt: That is what happens already. This legislation will not make any difference to how teachers in faith schools and indeed non-faith schools—are already managing these issues. Teachers hold a range of beliefs about a range of different issues, but the fact is that they know that they need to teach things so that kids can pass their exams; so that they can live, work, socialise and pray in a modern society when they leave school; and so that they are equipped to work and to manage in society. Teachers want to ensure that young people respect their neighbours, their colleagues and the people they are going to work with. Of course, that does not preclude them from expressing a belief; indeed, young people are very interested in the range of beliefs that people hold on issues. There is no way—in fact, it is physically impossible—to say to a teacher, “You have to draw a line and not say what you believe here and teach only the facts there.”
If this was a new issue or concern, I would be less confident in my answer, but the reality is that teachers navigate a fine line all the time about issues relating to contraception, genetics and modern crop rotation. We constantly battle with ethical issues of interest and issues that involve holding conflicting beliefs and teaching the facts. Good teachers are very well equipped to deal with that.

Management in the school—Stephen McCrossan will know more about this—will set the policies for that school. When a teacher deviates from those policies, management is experienced in how to navigate that. Managers have vast quantities of experience about how to manage teachers who say, "Do you know what, I don’t believe Dickens; I don’t want to teach him." That is a problem, because Dickens is on the curriculum. They are very good at navigating problems that arise. This is not a new problem and we do not need new solutions.

My concern about any new legislation is that it would be misinterpreted as a reintroduction of section 2A and would give teachers a signal that they could actively go against teaching the facts. We need to avoid that at all costs.

Siobhan McMahon: Do you accept—my question is for the whole panel, so it is not directed at Ruth Hunt—that the equality impact assessment that came with the bill said that, not only for the classroom but all over, there would be guidelines and protections but that those protections cannot be guaranteed?

Ruth Hunt: I imagine that there would be the same disclaimer about any issue and that the Government is being a little bit cautious. Existing guidance probably needs to be more clearly stated. We would very willingly work with Government to ensure that the guidance is very clearly stated, but that does not require legislation.

I would also argue that new legislation would not solve the problem anyway, because it would lead to even more disputes about what means what and in what context. Teachers need to teach the facts and they need to know how far they can go in expressing their beliefs. Different schools will have different approaches to that issue, but it is not something that you can legislate about from the top, nor should you.

Siobhan McMahon: The draft Government document that John Finnie alluded to states:

"In issuing this guidance it is the Scottish Government’s expectation that if a teacher, child or young person is asked to do something against his or her conscience, he or she should be able to raise this with the school or local authority."

The Government has included that statement in the guidance. I think that everyone would agree that that is welcome. Ms Hunt has suggested that we do not have to go further in legislation. Does anyone else have other views? If you have concerns, would that statement alleviate them?

John Brown: The concern about the impact assessment was expressed well by the Faculty of Advocates when it said that it "does not extend to persons in other occupations who may face a conflict between their beliefs and the changed nature of marriage implicit in the Bill. The conflict is most likely to arise as a result of the public sector equality duties”.

We are talking about the management of schools setting a policy, but it may be that local authorities, under the public sector duty, may set a policy that could lead to difficulties for the teacher who says, "I believe." We are looking for something in the bill, not just in advice, because, for example, the Lord Advocate’s advice that is given could change tomorrow. All that that requires is a change of Government and a change of personnel.

We are looking for some sort of guarantee in the bill that equates to what the Faculty of Advocates is stating and ensures that there is not the possibility of someone being considered to be discriminatory or homophobic because they hold a particular view about marriage. That would not apply to having a view about equal rights. We have to be very careful that we are not equating equal marriage with equal rights. They are not necessarily the same thing, unless we define marriage in a particular way, and that definition of marriage is not there now.

We are saying that we want to hold to the traditional church view of marriage and to have it included in the legislation that, under the public sector duty— I know that the Parliament is discussing with Westminster the issue of looking at the public sector duty—there is protection for the teacher who says, "I believe that this is what marriage is." I do not think that such protection is in place now.

Cara Spence: I think that it is important to recognise teachers as professionals. I have worked on the ground with teachers; of course they have beliefs and opinions on a wide range of subjects. As a professional—I am a youth worker who works with young people—I have a duty to consider the impact of what I say. Professionals who work with young people reflect critically all the time on what they will say and the impact that it might have on a young person. I do not think that it would make sense to legislate to take the power away from highly competent teachers.

Siobhan McMahon: I agree entirely, but do you think that, particularly for denominational schools, greater protection—I do not know how that would be worded—is needed? Do you agree? Given the view that you have just expressed, do you think that that is needed?

Cara Spence: For me, a teacher who works in a denominational school should be treated in the same way as everyone else. I know that there are lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender young people in Catholic schools, and they need to hear positive messages, too, regardless of the educational establishment that they are in. All teachers have the same duties, which are outlined in the GTC code of conduct. That is already there.

John Brown: There is something that we need to be careful of. This is not an issue for denominational schools; it is an issue for every teacher in Scotland in terms of what statements they make and what duty is placed on them by their local authority or their own senior management. Quite rightly, we must treat everyone with dignity and respect. I hope that every teacher in Scotland treats every child and young person with dignity and respect, but it is when we look at what we have to teach that we get into difficult areas.

Siobhan McMahon: There are two things that you said in your submission that I would like to follow up on. One of them was about Catholic adoption agencies. You gave the example of what was said in previous legislation and what is happening now. Given that that related to a different bill, do you think that it is a valid example to use?

John Brown: I think that that example was included because, at the time that the bill in question went through, oral guarantees were given to the adoption agencies that fell through. It was a case of the public sector equality duty trumping religious belief. We are worried that the same thing could happen on the issue of marriage.

Siobhan McMahon: I have a final question for you before I move on. You say in your submission:

“Catholic schools are regularly being challenged to justify their teaching, their practices and their very existence by individuals and groups which appear determined to remove the rights of parents to choose faith-based education for their children.”

By whom are they being challenged and on what basis?

John Brown: At present, challenges are being made by certain groups on, for example, religious observance. There are certain groups that often challenge Catholic schools on the basis that they are divisive. We see in the newspapers from time to time that Catholic schools are divisive and sectarian.

We would simply refute that, first because parents can choose whether to send their children to Catholic schools. I do not want to get into the argument about why Catholic schools exist. The fact of the matter is that, in Scotland, they exist, and they do so within the legal framework. The legal right to send children to Catholic schools exists—there is parental choice. We could spend a lot of time debating the benefits or otherwise of Catholic schools, but it is the case that people challenge whether they have a right to exist. At present, they exist under the law of Scotland. Therefore, when it comes to how they develop and how they teach, they have a right to protection and promotion within the Scottish education system.

Siobhan McMahon: Concern has been expressed—I am not sure whether that was done on behalf of chaplains or without you realising, Mr Robertson—that if someone who worked for the Church of Scotland, for instance, and who, when conducting a service, shared their view that they were against same-sex marriage, also worked as a chaplain in a hospital, that might conflict with their public service duty.

Some of the lawyers from whom we heard last week thought that that would not be the case, and it would all be perfectly fine, but others disagreed—they could not make up their minds, as lawyers cannot. Are you aware of the concern? Is it unfounded?

The Rev Blair Robertson: Thank you for the question. I do not see the issue as a concern. Ministers of the Church of Scotland and other denominations who work as healthcare chaplains are employees of the national health service and are bound by the codes of equality and diversity and their own professional codes of conduct, as is the case for any NHS employee.

Healthcare chaplains often have a dual status in that they are a minister or representative of a faith community as well as a healthcare chaplain. What someone says in their pulpit on a Sunday, as a minister of their church, is what they say on a Sunday; what they do as a healthcare chaplain is what I am interested in, as their manager. I would want to ensure that the service that the chaplain delivered in the hospital was in keeping with NHS equality and diversity policies and our professional code of conduct.

Siobhan McMahon: You think that those policies are there, so there is no need for additional legislation in that regard.

The Rev Blair Robertson: I believe so, yes.

The Convener: Does Christian Allard have more questions?

Christian Allard: I am surprised that you want me to ask more questions, convener.

I had a question for the Rev Robertson, but he gave the answer that I was looking for when he talked about professionalism. He put it well when he talked about the difference between church and the job that someone does during the week.

Do other panel members agree that teachers will be in exactly the same situation? A professional who works in education during the week and who is a member of a church must separate the two areas. Church is what they do at the weekend, and during the week they have a professional attitude.

John Brown: I agree absolutely that teachers must act as professionals, but I would argue that they must do so whether they are at church on a Sunday or at school on a Monday. Religion is a way of life; it is not compartmentalised into a Sunday.

I would expect teachers in a Catholic school to be very professional in teaching the Catholic faith, because that is the raison d'être of a Catholic school and that is what the parents want. As I said, if a teacher says, “I might not believe in a particular aspect of the Catholic church”, their professionalism should ensure that they say, “But this is what the Catholic church teaches.” That is what I would expect.

Christian Allard: In the same way they must say what the law of the state is.

John Brown: I am sorry?

Christian Allard: A teacher must say what the church believes and what the law says.

John Brown: Yes. Currently a teacher must teach what the law states about equal rights. If the bill goes through, I expect that teachers will have to discuss the issue with pupils, because of the fact of the bill having been passed, while stating the church’s position, which is that it disagrees totally that the new arrangements constitute marriage as the Catholic church understands marriage. That is why we want the protection that we have talked about to be clearly set out in the bill, to ensure that we can say that.

Christian Allard: Will that be an issue not just in Catholic schools but in other schools? Teachers will say that some churches disagree with the law, including the Catholic church.

John Brown: Yes.

10:45

Ruth Hunt: John Brown and I are in broad agreement on those issues. Many schools with which Stonewall Scotland works frequently hold debates in their religious education lessons about what different faiths think about homosexuality. It is not a no-go zone for discussion; it is an interesting discussion about where we are at.

The General Teaching Council for Scotland and the bodies for nurses, midwives and doctors are issuing increasingly detailed guidance about how professionals should behave outside work, not in relation to sexual orientation but in relation to where they go at a weekend, what they do and what they put on their Facebook posts. There is an increased awareness about how professionalism should extend outside the classroom, ward and clinic. The professions are well equipped to navigate the issues inside and outside the school, and I am confident that everything already exists to enable them to navigate that space successfully.

Stephen McCrossan: To return to the first point that I made, teacher professionalism is paramount on the issue. It relates back to the non-judgmental aspect of the code of professionalism and conduct.

Although examples of this have been used, in my opinion there are very few teachers who would stand up in front of the classroom and start off a lesson by saying, “I believe”. They may use that as a tool to try to draw out and elicit opinion from children and young people, but a teacher’s opinion is irrelevant. It is about the children and young people considering issues, exploring the facts behind them and drawing their own conclusions. Teachers are very much facilitators in that process.

Christian Allard: I know that we are going into a wider debate, and I will maybe take us back. What you just said is not about this bill in particular; the bill only highlights what already happens in schools.

Stephen McCrossan: Yes.

Marco Biagi: Rev Robertson, will you tell me—unfortunately, I am ignorant of the matter—how many different faiths are represented in the chaplaincy services in the NHS?

The Rev Blair Robertson: I cannot give you an answer to that question. Healthcare chaplains in the NHS are not appointed to represent any faith or tradition; they are appointed to deliver a service of spiritual care to people of all faiths. We do not represent a faith within the hospital: we are not there on behalf of any faith or church as chaplains.

Marco Biagi: However, I take it that they are drawn from a range of churches.

The Rev Blair Robertson: A wide range, yes.

Marco Biagi: I take it, then, that it is possible that there are chaplains who, outwith their employment, express views that other people consider controversial. For example, there may be some who already say on a Sunday that homosexuality is sinful and then come in as a chaplain on Monday. Is that possibly the case?
The Rev Blair Robertson: It is possibly the case. Not all healthcare chaplains are ministers: not all have a church for which they are responsible or where they preach on Sundays. We have a number of chaplains who are laypeople. In some respects, I would see the situation as being analogous to the fact that, when someone is on NHS premises, they do not smoke, but what they do when they get home is their own business.

Siobhan McMahon: On a point of order. I make this point because the same thing was said last week as well: I am not aware of any faith group that teaches that homosexuality is sinful. I say that just so that Marco Biagi knows it.

Marco Biagi: I am sure that I have seen written submissions that have suggested that.

Siobhan McMahon: Not that it is sinful.

Marco Biagi: I believe that it is taught that homosexual relations are sinful.

Siobhan McMahon: That is different.

Marco Biagi: It is rather a hair to split, but I am sure that we will have that discussion later when we write the report.

Siobhan McMahon: For the record, Marco, it is different.

Marco Biagi: Noted.

Rev Robertson, if your successor came down on someone who said something like what we are discussing outwith their employment, would they have any justification for doing that?

The Rev Blair Robertson: I am not sure what you mean by my successor.

Marco Biagi: Based on what you say, I assume that you would never do that but, should the next person to occupy your post have a completely different attitude towards the work and the Sunday-Monday separation, would they have any justification for doing that?

The Rev Blair Robertson: I am not sure what you mean by my successor.

Marco Biagi: I want to move on to Chief Superintendent Manders. He has had quite a quiet morning, so I want to ask him a question.

Chief Superintendent Manders: In short, no. I think that the safeguards that are currently in place would cover any new issues that the bill brought in. I cannot see any significant issues being caused by that in respect of the policing of public order.

Marco Biagi: I have a question for the EIS. I presume that the EIS has represented teachers who have had complaints or issues relating to religious discrimination in the workplace. Am I right in thinking that? Is that very rare?

Stephen McCrossan: I cannot answer that question, to be perfectly honest with you. The way in which we organise our organisation is that we have an equality department and an employment relations department. The equality department is basically responsible for pushing out the message on equality issues, whereas the employment relations department deals with the case work that arises from equalities issues. Therefore, I have no knowledge relating to that matter.

Marco Biagi: Fair enough. Could you provide supplementary written evidence on any instances of disputes in the workplace to do with religious discrimination in which the EIS has represented members?

Stephen McCrossan: Yes. We would be happy to do that.

Ms Spence, the particular experience of transgender young people has not been touched on, but it is an important part of the bill. Do significant issues arise from the bill in that area? If so, what is their relevance to what we have talked about, and what message should we take?

Cara Spence: I suppose that the relevance is that the bill would not necessarily make sense for transgender young people if it went through. What I mean by that is that, to get a gender recognition certificate, a person needs to be 18, but the age of marriage in Scotland is 16. Those bits of legislation do not necessarily compare. Our question is: how does that make sense?

We have spoken to transgender young people about what the bill would mean for them. Largely, we work with transgender young people from 13 to 25, and they say that, ideally, earlier discussions relating to gender recognition would be much more beneficial to them in their lives.
Marco Biagi: Are you aware of the issue of transgenderism being mentioned in classrooms at all? How widespread is that? At what age does that happen, if at all?

Cara Spence: When we started our challenging homophobia together schools project, we set out to address homophobic bullying specifically. Through that journey, we discovered that more and more transgender young people are coming out as transgender in primary and secondary education. That is in relation to gender, not sexual orientation. They speak about how their experiences of school are particularly harrowing. They often experience high levels of bullying in schools and even when they go on to university or college. The issue is beginning to be raised in schools and teachers are beginning to have discussions, largely to ensure that there is effective support. However, teachers often lack in confidence in the area.

Marco Biagi: Is it the experience of the transgender young people whom you work with that when this issue is raised in schools it helps with the atmosphere?

Cara Spence: Absolutely. We have moved some way in relation to understanding sexual orientation, but there is a real lack of understanding of transgender young people. If people do not understand what is going on for them, it is very difficult for them to accept who they are. If you are 13 years old, it is very difficult to explain to somebody else what is happening. If there is a broader awareness of what it means to be transgender, that would certainly improve transgender young people’s lives.

Education is so important in terms of messaging across the board. We know that there are a lot of negative messages, particularly in the media, so it is important that education combats them.

Marco Biagi: I have seen statistics for levels of self-harm arising from homophobic bullying in schools. Can you refresh my memory as to what those were?

Cara Spence: I cannot remember off the top of my head. What I do know is that the research that we carried out with 350 LGBT young people in Scotland showed that 69 per cent of LGBT respondents had experienced homophobic or bi-phobic bullying and 10 per cent had left education as a direct result of homophobia broadly within the school environment. The research also showed that homophobic bullying can impact on young people’s mental health, increase the suicide risk and the potential for someone to self-harm, and lead to poorer educational attainment.

Marco Biagi: Do you have any examples of good practice—really shining examples of schools that have dealt with the issue and, as a result, brought down levels of homophobic bullying? How do you think that same-sex marriage would be discussed in such schools?

Cara Spence: One of the projects that we delivered worked really closely with schools to create a whole-school approach. It was about how we ensure that teachers are trained effectively, how we ensure that they have effective policies in place to support young people and how we ensure that there is age-appropriate content in the curriculum.

The project was also about having staff on the ground providing the support, because often they lack the confidence to do that, and about their having the capacity to do it, because they are phenomenally busy. We also have an LGBT charter mark, which two schools in Scotland have achieved, to showcase the amount of work that schools have delivered to ensure that they are LGBT inclusive.

Marco Biagi: In committees we are often asked to name and shame. Could you possibly name and credit?

Cara Spence: Maybe afterwards. They are two schools in Glasgow. I will tell you that much.

On connections to same-sex marriage, a number of people, including Ruth Hunt, talked about messaging. If you can talk about same-sex marriage in a positive way in the school environment, that will send positive messages to pupils as a whole, and I strongly hope that it would reduce the amount of homophobic bullying that LGBT young people experience.

Marco Biagi: Ms Hunt, do you have any comments to add?

Ruth Hunt: I have some data to help the committee. “The School Report”, which is a self-selecting survey of lesbian, gay and bisexual young people in Scotland—I stress that it is a self-selecting snapshot, which means that young people who are not out or who do not have access to computers will not have completed it—found that half had experienced homophobic bullying, one in four had tried to take their own life at some point and more than half had deliberately harmed themselves. It is also worth flagging up that the work that we did with YouGov on the Scottish attitudes survey found that 92 per cent of people of faith stated that schools should tackle homophobic and transphobic bullying. There is a very real understanding and buy-in.

When the many schools that we work with positively include good examples of lesbian, gay, bisexual and trans issues in their day-to-day ordinary teaching, that has a positive impact on lesbian, gay and bisexual people. It is worth remembering that if the only things that young people hear about sexual orientation are statements such as, “Your shoes are so gay”, “It’s so gay”, and “You’re so gay”, and if they go home and their parents are unhappy and their GP or chaplain are unable to help them, that leads to low self-esteem. A positive reinforcement makes those young people feel better, and it makes the heterosexual young people who hang out with them feel better, too.

Marco Biagi: Mr Brown, can you tell me how Catholic schools deal with homophobic and transphobic bullying?

John Brown: They deal with it in exactly the same way as all schools deal with bullying. It is a massive problem in terms of people’s perception of bullying.

Whenever HMIE reports and collects statistics on whether pupils have ever been bullied in school, the figures are horrendous. The issue is about what people see as bullying. For example, if you look at me in the wrong way just now, I may feel bullied because that is my perception. Rightly, all schools in Scotland, including Catholic schools, have zero tolerance of all forms of bullying, but that does not stop the bullying. I agree with what has been said about the scale of homophobic bullying, but it could also be said about lots of other kinds of bullying. Schools are trying to stop all bullying—some successfully, some less successfully.

11:00

We have talked about transgender young people. All young people need support when they enter our schools, and some young people need greater support than others. We would fully support those young people in understanding their sexuality—that would be part and parcel of the pastoral care of any school and would certainly apply to Catholic schools that have such young people in them. My issue is that I am not sure that same-sex marriage will suddenly solve all those problems. I think that we must be very careful if we are changing what marriage is in order to solve a number of other societal problems.

Marco Biagi: Despite what some people assume from my name, I attended a non-denominational school, so I have limited direct experience of denominational schooling. How would a teacher in a Catholic school address a young person who came to them having experienced homophobic bullying that was, in some way, justified by a twisted reference to scripture? What if the child asked how, if the teacher did not believe in same-sex marriage and all of that, the teacher could say that they were all right? How can you reconcile such issues? Have they ever come up?

John Brown: We would recognise the dignity of that young person as a person, and their dignity as a person is not dependent on their sexual orientation.

The other side of it is that we just would not accept homophobic bullying. If the youngster who was bullying was able to quote scripture, I would question both his ability and his understanding of scripture. As with all understanding of sacred scripture, people can pull out bits and pieces without seeing the whole. We must be very careful of that, and the person who is doing the bullying—whether it is homophobic or not—must be dealt with severely. We must help young people to understand that every person in society has dignity, and under Catholic belief that dignity is formed by the fact that every person is made in the image and likeness of God. For me as a Catholic, the principle that every human is made in the image and likeness of God means that I must treat other people with a tremendous amount of dignity, whatever their sexual orientation.

Ruth Hunt: I grew up in a Catholic school as a young gay woman. There were teachers who could use scripture against me and there were teachers who used scripture to make me feel better about myself. Teachers will interpret scripture in all sorts of different ways. An obscure reference to Leviticus that generally emphasises men—as the Bible does in its entirety—was easily counterbalanced by the idea that God is love and that we are all born enabled to live in that way.

The key issue is how we support young people who are experiencing bullying. The notion that everybody could perceive a slight as bullying is a distraction. If everybody was like that, the statistics would say that 100 per cent of gay young people experienced bullying. The fact that half of them experience bullying—it can be physical bullying, verbal abuse and taunts or damage to school property—means that the issue is real and pertinent.

Having one generic response to bullying has not worked, which is why the stats in schools that take that approach remain unchanged. That is a good practice issue about how schools work. Lots of Catholic schools that work with us have recognised that they need particular approaches to different issues, and they are working successfully on that.

Marco Biagi: To clarify, do you think that equal marriage is a silver bullet that will end homophobic bullying, or is it just one small factor?

Ruth Hunt: It absolutely will not end homophobic bullying, but it will have a transformative effect on Scottish society, and that should not be underestimated and cannot be denied. However, it will not by any means change everything overnight.

Marco Biagi: Mr Calwell, do you want to come in?

Michael Calwell: First of all, asserting that marriage is a purposeful sexual union of a man and a woman is not in any way, shape or form a slur on anyone who is homosexual—it just is not. That is why I really do not understand why the issues get so conflated and confused all the time. Children bully because they are insecure and often because they come from unstable family backgrounds. They do not have proper paternal or maternal role models in their lives to give them the security to accept all human beings as equal and as having dignity, and they feel the need to be superior to others.

If we start dismantling the paradigms that keep our society together, particularly the very healthy and necessary paradigm of marriage in our society—some say that it will be extended but, actually, the bill will undermine the essence of marriage—we will create a society that has a lot more problems, the nature of which will lead to more bullying and problems. At this point in Scottish history, when for example half of all children will see their parents split up by the age of 16 and almost half of all children in the country are born without a married mother and father—frankly, that does not bode well for them, as the evidence suggests—the state should be positing a positive view of marriage, not as a basically empty political and legal construct but as something that is vital to human society.

The bill undermines that and will lead to more problems, not just of a social nature but of an economic nature. We have a certain stock of human capital in society, and it is dependent on people being raised in an ordered context with a mother and father and all the basic human norms. That is why the bill is counterproductive if we want to achieve many of the noble aims that we are talking about of reducing bullying and social problems.

Marco Biagi: Can you succinctly describe how allowing two men or two women to get married to each other will cause men and women to stop getting married to each other?

Michael Calwell: What do you mean by “get married”?

Marco Biagi: I mean, after the bill is passed, marriage as recognised in law taking place.

Michael Calwell: Marriage is not just a piece of paper from a bureaucrat. Nobody denies that, at some point in the history of the increasingly atomised, childless and ageing western liberal societies, the political class can convene and create a bill such as this one in which people are issued with documents that say, “You are married.” Whether or not that constitutes marriage is the fundamental essence of the debate.

Marco Biagi: You clearly do not think that it is appropriate for two men or two women to get married to each other—

Michael Calwell: What do you mean by “get married”? I do not know what you mean by it in that context.

Marco Biagi: You do not consider that to be an adequate environment for children or for role models and so on. Do you have any concerns about a man who is in a stable relationship with another man—whether or not we call it marriage—teaching children?

Michael Calwell: I do not know what has got to do with the debate at all. I do not know how it relates to this discussion.

Marco Biagi: This is—or has become—a panel on education and marriage.

Michael Calwell: If a man does that in a way that conforms with the views of parents and does not teach anything that conflicts with parents’ understanding of marriage, I would say that the relationship is not relevant.

John Mason: We have talked quite a lot about bullying of LGBT young people. Does anyone on the panel know whether there is bullying in schools of religious young people or of children who hold traditional values?

Michael Calwell: I know of people who are bullied. I know a young lady who expresses religious views and has been bullied. The school, which I will not name, has dealt with it. There is an increasing amount of vehement intolerance. The process that we are undergoing here is likely to lead to more of that kind of intolerance.

John Brown: Based on the evidence that we have, we do not know. The biggest piece of evidence on youngsters’ attitudes in schools is based on what comes through in reports from HMIE—now Education Scotland. As I said, those reports tend to suggest that vast numbers of young people think that they are bullied in school. We need to be clear about that. I have never seen any evidence to suggest that we know whether people have been bullied for religious reasons.

Ruth Hunt: The national data sets, which I do not have to hand, say that bullying comes in the following order. First and foremost, young people are bullied because of their weight, and second because of their sexual orientation, or perceived sexual orientation. About number five on the list is people who have faith. They tend to be of Muslim, Sikh or Hindu faith and are perceived to be terrorists, basically. Christian faith is lower down the list.

John Mason: Okay. Thank you.

We have not really spent much time on chaplaincy, for which I apologise to the relevant witnesses. Mr Robertson, you have answered a few questions on that. Will you expand on what you have said? I do not know about the police or even schools, but you know about the NHS. In the NHS, is an employed chaplain different from a volunteer chaplain? Do you have both?

The Rev Blair Robertson: We do not have volunteer chaplains as such. Those who are healthcare chaplains are employed by the NHS to deliver the service. Representatives of churches and faith communities will be called upon, or will come to hospitals, to deliver a service to their own people, as and when required.

John Mason: Although you said that a chaplain is not there representing a particular faith, they are there in hospital or wherever representing the whole NHS. Presumably some patients want to see a Muslim chaplain, a Catholic chaplain, a Sikh chaplain or something very specific. Is that the case?

The Rev Blair Robertson: We would not use the term “chaplain” for those people. We would ask the patient, “Do you want to get your own minister, priest, rabbi or imam in?” and we would contact a representative of their faith community. They are not chaplains, though; they are representatives of the patient’s faith community.

John Mason: I see.

You said that if somebody was in the hospital they would not smoke, but if they went home and smoked that would have nothing to do with hospital. If they went home and put on Facebook that they think that smoking is a good thing, would the hospital get involved?

The Rev Blair Robertson: I do not know. It would be very strange if a respiratory physician did that.

John Mason: I watched the film “Diana” on Monday night and the heart surgeon was a heavy smoker.

Alex Johnstone: But he did not prescribe smoking to anyone else.

John Mason: No. I suppose that the parallel of that is that if a chaplain goes home and puts on Facebook that he or she thinks that same-sex marriage is wrong, would the NHS be interested in that?

The Rev Blair Robertson: If it came to my attention, I might say to a colleague, “Be careful what you’re saying. I’m interested in what you do in the workplace as long as you don’t discriminate in any way in the delivery of your service.”

John Mason: Do chaplains lead services in hospitals?

The Rev Blair Robertson: When I say “service”, I mean delivery of a service, as in an NHS service, and not a church service.

John Mason: Do they run church services in hospitals?

The Rev Blair Robertson: Some do and some do not.

John Mason: Would that be in line with their denominational style?

The Rev Blair Robertson: Again, that would probably be considered on a case-by-case basis. For example, we would need to assess exactly what was put on Facebook and what the context was. If what was said was clearly unlawful or offensive, a conversation would be had about that and a judgment would be made.

John Mason: Mr McCrossan, can you comment on school chaplains in this context? I do not think that they would be regarded as being employed.

Stephen McCrossan: Sorry, but I do not know.

John Mason: That is not your area. Okay. Thanks very much.

The Convener: As members have no further questions, I thank everyone for coming along to the meeting and for their contributions. Our next meeting on Thursday 3 October will include evidence from Alex Neil on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill.

Meeting closed at 11:16.
Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

09:31

The Convener: Agenda item 2 is ministerial evidence on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill at stage 1. I ask the minister and his officials to introduce themselves, and I invite the minister to make his opening remarks.

The Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing (Alex Neil): I will introduce myself first, convener. I am the Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing and I am leading on the bill on behalf of the Government.

Francesca Morton (Scottish Government): I am from the Scottish Government legal directorate.

Julia McCombie (Scottish Government): Good morning. I am from the family and property law team in the Scottish Government.

Simon Stockwell (Scottish Government): Good morning. I am from the family and property law team in the Scottish Government.

The Convener: Thank you. I remind members to ask questions through the chair.

The first question that I would like to ask the cabinet secretary is this. The Law Society notes that the bill expands the ways in which couples can choose to define their relationship, whether different or same-sex marriage, cohabitation or civil partnership. The Law Society suggests that, in order to help people to understand the differences and/or choose between them, further definition or explanation of the status of each would be useful. Can we have your comments, please?

Alex Neil: I have an opening statement to make, if that is okay, convener. Can I do that first?

The Convener: You certainly can. I apologise.

Alex Neil: I have an opening statement to make, if that is okay, convener. Can I do that first?

The Convener: You certainly can. I apologise.

Alex Neil: Thank you. I did not want to interrupt you.

I thank the committee for the opportunity to come before you before you start to prepare your stage 1 report on the principles of the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill. I promise—unusually—to be as brief and concise as I can possibly be.

The bill is essentially about addressing an inequality that exists for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender people. It provides the option for same-sex couples to marry and for the registration of religious and belief civil partnerships. It will also impact significantly on transgender people. A couple who are already married will no longer... have to divorce, as is current practice, before the transgender person can obtain a full gender recognition certificate.

In passing the bill, the Scottish Parliament will take a significant step to reduce inequality.
However, the Government also recognises the challenges that the legislation presents to those who consider that marriage should remain a union between one man and one woman. We understand the concerns that they have, and that is why we have included in the bill strong protections for religious and belief bodies and celebrants, including an opt-in process for the religious or belief body and the individual celebrant before any solemnisation of a same-sex marriage can take place.

We have agreed with the United Kingdom
Government that there will be amendments to the Equality Act 2010, and the bill also contains a provision on freedom of speech. The Lord Advocate has already produced prosecution guidance on that matter. My colleague Michael Russell, the Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning, is seeking views on draft guidance that reaffirms the rights of parents to opt children out of sexual health education classes.

Marriage is a key societal issue and the bill has attracted a great deal of interest and criticism. We have worked hard to balance everyone’s rights within the bill. I followed the evidence in the committee’s earlier sessions with great interest and I welcome your questions. Thank you.

The Convener: Perhaps I should repeat my question. The Law Society notes that the bill will expand the ways in which a couple can choose to define their relationship, whether different or same-sex marriage, cohabitation or civil partnership. The Law Society suggests that, in order to help people to understand the differences between them and/or choose between them, further definition or explanation of the status of each would be useful.

Alex Neil: My view is that, if and when the bill is passed, we will have sufficient definition. Scots law is very clear about cohabitation, on which there is a lot of case law. Civil partnerships were declared very clearly in previous legislation about eight years ago. The bill very clearly defines same-sex marriage.

The one outstanding issue is whether civil partnerships should be extended to mixed-sex couples and not confined to same-sex couples. As you know, we have announced a review on that matter, which will run concomitantly with the review that is being undertaken by the UK Government. The reason for that, as no doubt I will explain later when we get to this, is that many of the issues that need to be considered—this will require future legislation, as there will not be time to deal with this in the bill that is before us—relate to reserved matters, in particular issues around pensions.

My view is that, if and when the bill is passed, we will have very clear definitions in Scots law. Of course, in Scotland cohabitation is recognised in a way in law that does not apply south of the border.
We will have cohabitation, we will have civil partnership and we will have marriage, including same-sex marriage. My view is that the definitions will then be very clear indeed.

The Convener: Witnesses against the bill also had concerns that redefining marriage beyond simply one man and one woman could open marriage to further redefinitions in future. Does making a change to the definition of marriage potentially allow for further redefinition at a later stage?

Alex Neil: Well, we live in a democracy. My view is that this is an overdue reform of the law, but I do not envisage any further reforms to the definition of marriage, as it has been described, in terms of who can enter into a marriage legally in Scotland. My view is that, once the bill is passed, we as a Government certainly have no intention of introducing further legislation to amend marriage legislation in the future.

The Convener: How does the Scottish Government respond to witnesses who have argued that the bill weakens or diminishes the institution of marriage?

Alex Neil: I have been married for 35 years and, personally, I do not feel that allowing people of the same sex to be married in any way diminishes my marriage, quite frankly. I know that there are some people who feel that, but I think that they tend to think of that more from a religious point of view than necessarily from a legal point of view.

The bill recognises marriage between same-sex couples in law. It will be entirely up to individual churches and celebrants to decide from a religious point of view what their approach is, and obviously that has to be respected. My view is that, in many ways, the bill will actually enhance marriage because the issue of equality that I referred to in my introductory remarks will be satisfied. I think that it is unfair that people who are in love and who are of the same sex and who wish to marry are currently banned from doing so.

Of course, one reason why institutions such as the Quaker church are in favour of this change in the law is that they believe that same-sex couples should be allowed legally to marry in their church.
At the moment, the law bans, for example, the Quaker church from doing what the Quaker church would like to do, which is to administer same-sex marriages.

John Mason: The term “definition of marriage” has been used. Is there a definition of marriage? Can you define marriage?

Alex Neil: There is clearly a definition in law and there is a definition in each church about the union between a man and a woman and what rights and responsibilities are carried by marriage. The one change that the bill will make is that it will allow marriage to take place between two people of the same sex, whereas under current legislation a marriage in law in Scotland can take place only between one man and one woman.

John Mason: I am not sure whether that is really a definition. You and others have said that if people are in love with each other, that should allow their marriage. By the same logic, two closely related people of the same sex could presumably be married to each other, and even three people could be married to each other if they all loved one another and were willing.

Alex Neil: Let us confine ourselves to the provisions of the bill. In terms of marriage, the bill is doing one thing only, which is to allow people of the same sex to marry each other. Wider issues of defining marriage and so on are not the subject of the bill, which deals with one change and the consequences arising from that. Any other issues around the definition of marriage would require additional legislation, but we have no plans at the moment to introduce additional legislation around the definition of marriage.

Alex Johnstone: We are certainly redefining marriage with this piece of legislation. The minister concentrated heavily in his opening remarks on the issue of equality. I wonder whether we are perhaps also redefining equality with this legislation. If I was entitled to do something that someone else was forbidden by law to do because of the colour of their skin or because of their sex, that would be a fundamental equalities issue. What we are talking about here is slightly different, in that the rights that I have and those that everybody else has, whatever they may be, are in fact identical. So, we have, in effect, a degree of equality here. Do you think that the term “equality” as used in your opening remarks requires a reinterpretation of what we mean by equality?

Alex Neil: No. The bill deals specifically with what I would regard as an inequality, which is the right of people of the same sex to marry one another and have that marriage legally recognised in Scotland. That is the inequality that we seek to rectify through the bill.

Alex Johnstone: Just to recap: we are giving people a right that they did not previously have, but the people who will require that right have always had equality of rights under the law; they had the same rights as I had and the same rights as you had. Are we defining equality in a different way in the bill from that used in previous legislation?

Alex Neil: You are right up to a point, in the sense that people who are gay have the same rights as you and me in most other aspects, if not all. There might be some exceptions, but generally speaking, they have the same rights as you and me. However, the one right that they do not have at the moment is the right to marry someone else of the same sex. The bill will close that gap to ensure that that part of equality is satisfied and that people of the same sex who wish to marry are allowed to do so.

The bill will not force anybody to do anything. All that it will do will be to give people more freedoms. It will give people of the same sex who wish to marry the freedom in law to marry. It will also give the freedom to churches to carry out same-sex marriages, if they wish to do so. They are not allowed to do so at the moment, but they will have the freedom to do so according to their religious beliefs.

Similarly, as with the amendments to the UK Equality Act 2010, the bill will be an opt-in piece of legislation with guarantees for organisations, churches and celebrants who do not wish to solemnise same-sex marriages or, indeed, to recognise same-sex marriages in religious terms. I think that that addresses a fundamental issue of equality and freedom. Current legislation restricts the personal freedom of people of the same sex to marry and it restricts the freedom of Quakers, for example, to administer same-sex marriages. We will therefore be giving individuals, as well as the Quakers and the minority of churches who recognise same-sex couples, the freedom to carry out same-sex marriages, which is what they wish to do.

Alex Johnstone: I would suggest that much of the law is about defining and restricting personal freedom.

Alex Neil: Sometimes it is, but sometimes the law is about expanding freedom, and this law is about expanding freedom.

Marco Biagi: You referred to the forthcoming review of civil partnerships. Can you give us any indication of a timeframe for that?

09:45

Alex Neil: I hope for it to be done reasonably speedily. I have not put a deadline on it because it would make sense that our review, which has started—we have published the remit—is not totally completed until we see the conclusions and recommendations from the UK Government’s review. That is because many of the issues that will inform both reviews are reserved matters, particularly pensions and the like. It would therefore be sensible for our review to have the opportunity to study the recommendations and conclusions from the UK review in consultation with Maria Miller, the culture secretary and lead minister for the issue in the UK Cabinet. I have agreed with her that we want to try and get the review done and dusted reasonably quickly. We need to do it properly. It will be into 2014, but the sooner it is done the better.

Marco Biagi: With regard to the review and the possibility of opening up civil partnerships to mixed-sex couples, is the Government minded one way or the other on the central principle of that, or is it still undecided and awaiting the evidence from stakeholders?

Alex Neil: The Government has no policy on that. We will wait and see what the review says and then decide what our policy should be.

Marco Biagi: Are you aware of the case that is before the European Court of four mixed-sex couples who are seeking the right to enter into civil partnerships? We have heard some views about that in evidence. Will the Government’s review be conscious of that?

Alex Neil: We are always conscious of what happens in the European Court. We will wait to hear what the court says about that particular case and, if it requires us to take any action, we will consider that. Given that the issue is before the courts in Europe, it would be appropriate for us to wait to see what the court says.

Marco Biagi: The mirror image of the couple who are married and one of them transitions gender and they have to divorce is the couple who are in a civil partnership and one transitions gender and they have to dissolve the partnership. Will that also be addressed by the review? That is quite a glaring anomaly.

Alex Neil: The review’s remit is wide enough that it can look at such issues. I suspect that that issue will feature in the evidence that is given to the review.

Marco Biagi: Another point has arisen about the difficulty that people who are in a foreign civil partnership will have with entering into a same-sex marriage in Scotland without dissolving the partnership in their home jurisdiction. That will be more difficult for them than if they had a Scottish civil partnership and wanted to change that to marriage through the administrative process. Is the Government aware of that situation from the submissions and from dealing with stakeholders? Does the Government intend to look at that issue again with the passage of the bill?

Alex Neil: We are not really inclined to lodge any amendments on that out of respect for foreign jurisdictions. The law in other jurisdictions could cause enormous complications, particularly if it is proposed to dissolve the civil partnership or if it is proposed to dissolve the marriage in some way, if the partnership goes on to a marriage. The law would have to be very complicated if we tried to address those intricacies. It is much more straightforward and would not delay the passage of the bill if we did not lodge any amendments on that.

If someone who is in a civil partnership comes from abroad to live in Scotland, they would be free to marry in Scotland. I think I am right in saying that.

Simon Stockwell: No, but we would recognise the civil partnership.

Alex Neil: Yes, we would recognise the civil partnership. Simon is much more au fait with the intricacies than I am.

Marco Biagi: We can get into some quite detailed bits of drafting there.

Siobhan McMahon: Following up Marco Biagi’s point, I think that you will be aware that article 8 of the European convention on human rights has been engaged in the current challenge in the European Court, which means that this bill could be seen as discriminating against mixed-sex couples. Why do we have to take this review and why, given that this is a matter of equality, was the issue not covered in the first place?

Alex Neil: First of all, I dispute the premise behind the question that the bill could be seen as discriminating against mixed-sex couples. We absolutely do not accept that interpretation of either our law or the ECHR, so the premise—

Siobhan McMahon: This is not my personal view—it emerged in evidence from lawyers.

Alex Neil: The Scottish Government’s very clear position is that the bill does not contravene the rights of mixed-sex couples.

Siobhan McMahon: Given the legal evidence that we have heard, why did you never think to cover this in the bill? After all, the review is taking place and you are minded to look at the issue in future. Given that, as we have heard, article 8 could be engaged, why was this not covered in the first place? Why is the review taking place now? Obviously we will have to see what happens in the European Court but, if article 8 were to be engaged, would you wait for the evidence and amend the provision in the current bill?

Alex Neil: The people in question can get married so we see no need to amend the bill.
Nevertheless, I will ask Simon Stockwell to go into a bit more detail on the intricacies of the matter.

Simon Stockwell: The cabinet secretary has already explained quite a lot of the issues. Clearly, we would need to reach agreement with the UK Government on a number of the reserved matters in relation to opposite-sex civil partnerships. When we have looked at the issue in the past, one of the big questions has been this: if you could enter into an opposite-sex civil partnership in Scotland, what would be your rights and responsibilities with regard to reserved matters both in Scotland and if you travelled outside Scotland? For example, there is no guarantee that, if you entered into an opposite-sex civil partnership with someone from overseas, you would be able to bring your partner into the country, because there is no guarantee that the UK Government would recognise the partnership for immigration purposes as it would recognise, say, a same-sex civil partner or a married person. There are also social security and, as the cabinet secretary mentioned, pensions issues to take into account, and we would very much have to work with the UK Government on the implications for reserved as well as devolved matters. Otherwise, couples could enter into mixed-sex civil partnerships thinking that they have full rights and responsibilities when, in fact, they could have quite limited rights and responsibilities, unless, as the cabinet secretary has made clear, the reserved matters followed.

Siobhan McMahon: Just to be clear, you are saying that the provision was not included in the bill because mixed-sex couples can get married. It is not that they are being denied a civil partnership.

Alex Neil: It would have made the bill much more complicated and would have had a lot of ramifications. As Simon Stockwell has just made clear, not moving in concert with our colleagues south of the border could cause a lot of problems instead of solving them. Our view is that the sensible course of action on this issue is for us to take our time and work with our colleagues south of the border and, hopefully, by some time next year, we will be very cognisant of all the challenges that might arise from that particular change in the legislation. A decision will then have to be made both south and north of the border on whether we go ahead with any recommendations that result from the two reviews.

The Convener: Can civil partnerships that have been performed abroad be dissolved in Scotland?

Alex Neil: Yes.

The Convener: Can polygamist marriages such as those that happen in Saudi Arabia—where, I assume, they are legal—also be dissolved in Scotland?

Alex Neil: Francesca Morton will explain the legal aspects of the matter.

Francesca Morton: That comes back to the policy position that, under the bill’s changing provisions, only civil partnerships that have been registered and solemnised in Scotland will be permitted to change to a marriage. That is the position with overseas civil partnerships.

Simon Stockwell: We have looked at the issue of overseas civil partnerships changing to a marriage in Scotland. The cabinet secretary gave some of the reasons why we think that it is difficult. Perhaps I could outline some more of the reasons.

First, as the cabinet secretary said, there is an issue about respect for overseas jurisdictions. When we have looked at what other jurisdictions do in respect of changing overseas civil partnerships to marriages, some of them do and some of them do not. It seems to be the case that Holland and New Zealand would change overseas civil partnerships to marriages whereas Norway and Sweden would not.

In Holland, one must either be resident in Holland or a Dutch national in order to get married there. That is not the case in Scotland. Pretty well anybody can come here and get married. If we introduced a residence requirement for civil partners to change their relationship to marriage in Scotland, that would be unusual in Scots marriage law. It is not impossible, but it would distinguish between most people getting married and people changing their civil partnership to marriage. There might have to be a residence requirement for those people.

The English have their own provision in the UK act, so there is probably no need to look at English civil partnerships.

There is also a question about when we would say that the marriage would be deemed to have started. In the Scottish bill, we have provision that says that if you change your civil partnership to marriage, the marriage is deemed to have started when you went into the civil partnership. It might be hard for us to do that in respect of the overseas jurisdiction because we do not have the same sort of control over civil partnerships registered in overseas jurisdictions as we do in Scotland.

There are a number of quite complicated issues that we would need to go through before we thought about changing overseas civil partnerships to marriage in Scotland.
The Convener: Is that something that you will consider in future?

Alex Neil: We will see. Those issues may well be raised during the review—the remit is wide enough to take them on board.

You can see the complications. This is not a straightforward process and a lot of consultation and research is needed before we can decide the best way forward. However, there is no reason why the review on civil partnerships could not consider those issues.

The Convener: I would like to ask about pensions policy regarding same-sex spouses. You mentioned in your introduction that pensions policy is reserved, but there are devolved powers on pension policy relating to certain public sector schemes. Why, then, does the Scottish Government intend to treat same-sex spouses in the same way as civil partners for the pension schemes where the Scottish Government has devolved responsibility?

Alex Neil: Irrespective of the provisions in the bill, the policy of the Scottish Government, where we have devolved responsibility, is, as far as possible, to have a pensions policy that is compatible with the general principles of pensions policy throughout the UK. To do otherwise would result in many potential anomalies and difficulties. That is our general approach.

However, a review is being undertaken by the UK Government of occupational pensions in particular. We reckon that that will report in about July next year. Once we see the results of that review, we can discuss the issue with our colleagues south of the border. Of course, depending on what happens on 18 September next year, we might be able to take our own decision on the future of pensions policy in that respect.

Alex Johnstone: I think that you are safe enough.

Alex Neil: We are very conscious of the issue. We have an open mind about it and we think that the sensible thing to do would be to await the review of occupational pensions by the UK Government because it will give us a clear indication of the best way forward in this area.

The Convener: John Finnie has some questions on transgender provisions.

John Finnie: Good morning, cabinet secretary. You talked about the legislation impacting significantly on a group of people. I would like to raise a number of issues about the implications for transgender people, in particular about what has been referred to as the spousal veto. Do you see any merit in requiring a declaration of spousal consent to continue with the issuing of a gender recognition certificate?

10:00

Alex Neil: We recognise the concerns. It is a difficult issue for us. The first point to stress is that spousal consent is not required to obtain a new gender; consent is required to stay in the marriage when a new gender is acquired. Both parties must be willing to stay in the marriage. In the bill, we have recognised the specific concern that some non-transitioning spouses may not wish to be in a same-sex marriage after their spouse obtains gender recognition. The point has been made that the non-transitioning spouse has at least two years to take action, given that the transitioning spouse must live in the acquired gender for two years before applying to the gender recognition panel. However, it may be the application to the panel that makes a non-transitioning spouse consider his or her options. This is quite a complicated area, but we have been listening to the concerns and we believe that we are addressing them. If the committee wants to make any recommendations on that in its report, we would obviously listen to what it has to say.

John Finnie: I think that the options available to the spouse during that two-year period are what give rise to a lot of concern. They are seen as punitive to the other individual.

Alex Neil: If the committee wants to comment on that, we will certainly take its view into serious consideration.

John Finnie: Thanks very much. On evidence requirements, it can be quite difficult for those who are long-term transitioned—for over six years—to assemble the same level of evidence as others. Is that something that you could look at?

Alex Neil: I will ask Simon Stockwell to answer that, because there are some intricate, technical issues involved, which I think he can explain to you in some detail.

Simon Stockwell: The short answer to your question is yes. Our bill is very similar to the UK act in this area. That is deliberate because, given that the gender recognition panel operates on a UK basis, we wanted to stay as far as possible in line with the way that it operates. After speaking to us, the UK Government decided to amend its bill at quite a late stage to introduce what is sometimes called a fast track for long-term transitioned people who possibly cannot get the full range of medical evidence. Obviously, the UK act relates to people who could not use the original fast track under the Gender Recognition Act 2004 when it was brought forward because they did not want to end their marriage. We think that we might lodge an amendment at stage 2. along similar lines to what is already in the UK act to try to address that issue.

We will have some detailed discussions with the Equality Network and the Scottish Transgender Alliance, because we have seen what they have proposed in this area. We will also speak to the UK Government and the gender recognition panel, given that the panel operates on a UK basis. In principle, we think that there is scope to introduce an amendment at stage 2.

Alex Neil: Again, we would welcome the committee’s views on this matter. The issue has been raised with you and we will certainly take your views into serious consideration in deciding what stage 2 amendments to bring forward.

John Finnie: Thank you. That is reassuring. I want to ask about the use of gender-neutral language in ceremonies.

Alex Neil: Sorry, in what way, John?

John Finnie: I am asking about the use of gender-neutral language, such as "spouse", rather than "husband" or "wife."

Alex Neil: We think that we have probably struck the right balance in that regard, but this is a very sensitive issue obviously. There are some areas where there can be some licence in the approach and other areas where definitions need to be very clear.

As I understand it, the proposal is that both the denomination and the couple would have to agree to use the gender-neutral declaration. There might be further detail added to the arrangements for the ceremonies. I would not rule out change on that altogether. We will listen to what the committee has to say. However, I am concerned about the complexity. Any further changes to the bill in this respect would require a great deal of thought. It is not so much about the amendment or amendments that might come forward; it is about the implications and unintended consequences of any potential amendments. We would welcome comments from the committee, but it is an area that we would be quite cautious about, simply because it is particularly complex and I do not want to end up with unintended consequences, particularly if they damage the people whom we are trying to support to move forward.

Simon Stockwell: We would want to make certain that we would cause no problems for denominations that might not want to use a gender-neutral marriage declaration when marrying an opposite-sex couple. We would need to speak to them, too.

John Finnie: So that is a live issue.

Alex Neil: It is a live issue. If the committee wants to comment on it, we will consider that. We are very much aware of the oral and written evidence that has been given to the committee and we are looking at all that, but it is the committee’s comments that will primarily inform my view about the stage 2 amendments that we lodge.

John Finnie: I have a couple of other points that might be seen as technical. What protections will the bill offer those who seek to cohabit after a gender recognition certificate has been received from losing their accrued rights and entitlements?

Simon Stockwell: If you are talking about the scenario when a couple choose to divorce because they have decided not to live in a same-sex marriage, we have concluded that the bill provides people with considerable rights—it allows transgender people to stay married and obtain gender recognition as long as they have the spouse’s consent and it allows a civil partner to change a relationship into a marriage and acquire gender recognition. The bill makes considerable provision to allow gender recognition to take place and to allow people to stay married or change a civil partnership into a marriage. We therefore do not think that further provision is needed.

If such a couple decide to divorce or dissolve their partnership, that is their choice, and the position will be similar to that of any couple who decide to divorce or dissolve. We are not looking to put further provisions in the bill to reflect the position of those who choose to divorce or dissolve and cohabit afterwards, because they are in a similar position to that of anybody else who decides to divorce or dissolve.

John Finnie: The Law Society of Scotland has given evidence on proposed new section 4D of the Gender Recognition Act 2004, “Application under section 4C: death of spouse”, which allows a person to continue to receive a gender recognition certificate if their spouse dies before the application is complete. The Law Society suggests that that does not cover all eventualities. Would the Government be prepared to look at that if we mention it in our report?

Simon Stockwell: Yes.

Alex Neil: We are aware of the Law Society’s evidence and we are looking at the issue. If the committee wants to comment on that, we will take any comments seriously.

The Convener: Why is the minimum age for applying to the gender recognition panel 18 when the age of consent for marriage and sexual activity is 16?

Alex Neil: We expected that question to come up, because it concerns a serious issue. I will give a fairly full explanation of why the age is 16 instead of 16. Before a person may apply to the gender recognition panel, they must produce evidence that they have lived full time and exclusively in their acquired gender for a minimum of two years. That alone suggests a gap between 16 and 18.

The age for applications was set at 18 in the 2004 act to reflect the fact that people are expected to live for two years in their acquired gender. Most adolescents can be expected to have reached sexual maturity at the age of 16, which is also the age of consent to sexual intercourse. Some people mature more quickly than others, but it might be difficult to vary the age limit from case to case.

If we lowered the limit generally, practical concerns would arise about how a child would show that, between the ages of 14 and 16, they had lived full time and exclusively in their acquired gender. The panel looks at documents such as driving licences, household bills and passports with a person's gender-appropriate name on.

We would need strong medical evidence to support any change in the age limit and before we could agree to any moves to lower the limit. I would be extremely reluctant to lower the limit, for the reasons that I have outlined.

The Convener: It is possible that an individual could have lived in their acquired gender for two years before they were 16. They could have confirmation of that from their school or a general practitioner, who could also confirm what medication they were on.

Alex Neil: Theoretically, that is possible, but we have to be quite cautious about how we move forward on the issue. I would tend to err on the side of caution. As a Government and in the bill, we have shown that we are keen to ensure that transgender people have all the rights that they should have, but I think that we have to strike a balance here, because there are issues to do with the maturity of people of that age and, in particular, the ability of people who are aged between 14 and 16 to show that they have been living in that way. I take quite a cautious view. If the committee disagrees with that, I invite it to say so in its report. We will listen to what the committee has to say, but I think that it would take a fair bit of persuading for me to decide that the bill needed to be changed in that regard. [Interrupted.] Simon Stockwell has just reminded me that we did not consult on the matter, so I think that it would raise issues if we amended to 16 the age for applying to the gender recognition panel.

John Finnie: It was remiss of me not to cover that in my questioning.

I understand that there are young people at secondary school who have had their gender changed on their educational and medical records.

I have spoken to an organisation that assisted a young person with that. The education authorities were delighted to have that assistance. It is perhaps the unfortunate association between the age and the term "sex" that is unhelpful. Do you recognise that there are public bodies that are involved in recognising the lifestyle choice that people from the age of 12 and upwards have made?

Alex Neil: I do. You mentioned the age of 12. Should we pick 12, 14, 16 or 18? This is an area in which I am being quite cautious, because the law will apply to everyone. If we allowed waivers for different age groups or variations in what is allowed, we would end up in an extremely complex situation. If we went down that road, we would end up with a bill that was almost unmanageable. I think that it is necessary to choose between 16 and 18. For the reasons that I have outlined, our view is that 18 is appropriate, although we will listen to what the committee has to say. However, it should be borne in mind that we have not consulted on the issue.

John Finnie: Is there any intention to consult on it in future?

Alex Neil: We are going through stage 1 of the bill process and we will move on to stages 2 and 3, so I do not see us having the ability to consult widely, but it may be that we could take powers to make a future change in secondary legislation. We could make such a change by affirmative order rather than in primary legislation if there was a demand for us to do so.

Marco Biagi: It is my understanding that the material change happens before the GRC is issued, and that the GRC is simply recognition of what has already happened. Given that we know that such material changes in life are happening to 14 and 15-year-olds, it seems odd to withhold formal, legal recognition of that.

There is another issue that I would like to raise, which emerged from discussion with one of our previous panels. It was suggested that, by not allowing a 16-year-old person who is transgender to marry when someone who is not transgender can marry at that age, we might be treating them less favourably in law and therefore be open to a human rights challenge on that ground. Has the Government considered that?

Alex Neil: Everything in the bill has been human rights law proofed. We do not believe that any aspect of the bill would be open to a successful human rights challenge. However, if the committee feels strongly that we have not got things right, we will listen to what it has to say. I admit that I am being cautious on the issue—for good reason, I think—but if the committee suggests an alternative, we will take it seriously.
Simon Stockwell: My understanding is that what we have in Scotland and the UK is broadly in line with the position in other jurisdictions, which have similar procedures in respect of gender recognition. At the time of its introduction, our approach was seen as cutting edge, but other jurisdictions have now followed us. I was looking at the consultation documents for the Republic of Ireland the other day, and I do not think that we are out of line with what happens elsewhere.

10:15
Siobhan McMahon: For clarification, cabinet secretary, when you talked about 14 to 16-year-olds you used the terms “child” and “maturity”. Were you including 16-year-olds, or did you mean people younger than 16?

Alex Neil: I was just using the definition. Anyone under 16 is regarded as a child in law.

Siobhan McMahon: That means under-16s, not 16-year-olds. We are trying to see whether you would be willing to lower the age limit for gender recognition to 16. I have listened to your views on the matter and I appreciate that you are being cautious, but I do not understand how we can grant a 16-year-old the right to vote and take part in democracy but not the right to have their gender recognised in the way that they want it to be.

Alex Neil: There is a wider issue about variations in age limits. A person can get married at 16 but cannot drive a car until they are 17. The law says that to access alcohol in a bar someone must be 18. A person can vote in the referendum at 16, and I hope that the voting age will go to 16 more generally. The bill is not trying to solve all those problems. If we consider the general issue of the age of consent and the ages at which someone can vote, get a driving licence, get married or join the army, enter into illegal wars and get killed, we can see that all those ages vary. The bill does not address such variations; it is trying—Siobhan McMahon: I was just asking about your use of the terms “child” and “maturity”. We have your response on the record—thank you.

Alex Neil: I was using the legal definition of a child, which is anyone under 16.

The Convener: If there are no more questions on the matter, we move on to the rights of religious bodies.

John Mason: We have questions about denominations, individual celebrants and so on. How confident is the Government that a denomination such as the Church of Scotland or the Roman Catholic Church would not be successfully challenged in court if it point-blank refused to take part in same-sex marriages? Under the Equality Act 2010, the churches appear to be providing a public function, so it appears that a same-sex couple could demand that a church celebrate their marriage.

Alex Neil: There are two things to understand. First, the bill and the changes to the 2010 act, which we have agreed with the UK Government and which will be made before the bill is implemented, make the position clear and legally watertight. The advice that I have is that the position is legally watertight in respect of potential challenge under the European convention on human rights and human rights legislation.

Secondly, I think that I am right—Francesca Morton will correct me if I am not—in saying that the European convention on human rights does not include a right to same-sex marriage, so it is difficult to see under what part of the convention a challenge might be brought.

There has been a fair bit of scaremongering on the issue. The reality is that we are absolutely sure that there is no prospect of a challenge under the European convention on human rights in respect of the matter.

John Mason: Are you 100 per cent sure of that or 90 per cent sure? Would you put a figure on it?

Alex Neil: I would say that I am as sure as anyone can ever be that there is no prospect of a successful challenge. The UK Government shares that level of confidence, by the way.

John Mason: I am not questioning the intentions of the Scottish Government and the UK Government, but there is concern. The Catholic church and the Church of Scotland both say that they might have to pull out of marriages altogether, because the risk is so great. We have heard legal opinion on both sides.

I agree that the ECHR does not say that there is a right to same-sex marriage. However, if we create a right to same-sex marriage, what is to prevent someone from challenging the position and saying that the Church of Scotland or the Catholic church is discriminating against them?

Alex Neil: The key point is that the European convention on human rights also gives rights to religious organisations and to celebrants. Our clear view, which is shared by the Lord Advocate in Scotland and by the senior law officers in the UK, is that there is no realistic prospect of a successful challenge to that aspect of the bill.

John Mason: In the case of the adoption agencies, especially Catholic adoption agencies, strong assurances were given by the Government that the adoption law was only permissive in relation to adoptions by same-sex couples—that agencies would be permitted to undertake such adoptions. Do you accept that, despite those assurances, the position changed fairly swiftly to one in which it became compulsory to undertake such adoptions, and we are now losing agencies that do not want to take part in that? If the same logic is followed in the case of same-sex marriages, it could become compulsory for churches to carry them out.

Alex Neil: Those are two different scenarios, and quite frankly you cannot compare apples and oranges. The solemnisation of marriage is a function that is carried out by churches. It is at the heart of what churches do, and the work is carried out by religious celebrants. It is plain that protection can and should be provided to denominations and celebrants. Quite frankly, the situation is not the same as in the adoption law example.

John Mason: Can you explain the difference?

Alex Neil: I will get the lawyers to explain exactly what the legal difference is.

Francesca Morton: The Scottish Government is satisfied that the protections in place in the bill are robust. The ECHR permits a wide margin of appreciation when it comes to balancing the rights of different bodies or different persons, which is what the bill seeks to do. The Scottish Government considers that it is proportionate and reasonable to pursue a policy that would mean that not every couple would be permitted to have a same-sex marriage ceremony of their religious or belief choice. The justification for that is that it takes into account the religious views and article 9 rights of religious bodies and celebrants. We are satisfied that that approach is proportionate and reasonable.

Simon Stockwell: The other point is quite simple—no public money goes into churches to solemnise marriages. As I understand it, when an adoption agency is successful in placing a child with a couple, it is paid some public money by the local authority to reflect that, and a public service generally has to be available to all. We do not provide any funding to the churches to solemnise marriages. Indeed, if we offered money to the churches to solemnise marriages, they would run the other way very quickly.

John Mason: A chauffeur or a photographer would not get public money, but they would be counted as a public service and required to participate, would they not?

Simon Stockwell: They would be counted as a public service, yes.

John Mason: I am not quite sure I understand why they are different from a church.

Simon Stockwell: The church is carrying out a religious function—which is not true of a photographer, for example—and so it is entitled to rely on its rights to say what religious service it is providing. That is not true of a photographer, who is providing a civil function.

John Mason: On a slightly different point, if a denomination as a whole—the Quakers were mentioned—opts in, but an individual celebrant wants to opt out, is that not a case of the Government interfering in that religious organisation?

Alex Neil: As I say, this is about freedom and rights. If an individual celebrant does not want to opt in, they have that right.

John Mason: Some legal opinion has suggested that that would be, in effect, the state interfering in the internal workings of a religious organisation because it was stopping the denomination controlling its own members.

Alex Neil: Not at all. At the end of the day, we have to have a balance between the rights of the individual and the rights of the state. It is not our wish to interfere at all in the internal workings of any religious organisation. However, obviously every individual has certain rights and if a celebrant decides that they do not wish to participate in a same-sex marriage ceremony, they have the right not to do so as far as we are concerned.

The church organisation itself may decide that it no longer wishes to have a celebrant, a minister, a rabbi or a priest who takes that position participate in a whole host of things. That would be entirely a matter for the religious organisation to decide. As far as the state is concerned, the individual celebrant has the right not to participate.

Simon Stockwell: Another point to mention is that the bill is in line with the provisions in a number of other jurisdictions. In the second consultation paper, and possibly in the first, we referred to the Norwegian marriage act, which lays down that a clerical solemniser can refuse to solemnise a marriage. Over the past few weeks, the committee has discussed the position in Denmark, where an individual celebrant can choose not to take part in a same-sex marriage ceremony even though the church of Denmark takes part in such ceremonies. The position in England is the same under the UK Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013.

In addition, there are precedents from other jurisdictions on matters other than same-sex marriage. For example, in England there is a general obligation on Church of England celebrants to marry people who live within their parish, but that obligation is specifically disapplied in relation to divorcees.

John Mason: But we still have to see whether the provision will stand up in court.
Simon Stockwell: Other jurisdictions have had the measures in place for some time and there is no sign of any celebrant being forced to solemnise a same-sex marriage against his will in jurisdictions that are subject to the convention.

John Mason: Cabinet secretary, do you accept that, when cases go to court, although the Equality Act 2010 does not have a hierarchy of protected characteristics, in practice the courts tend to put sexual orientation and other protected characteristics above religion and belief?

Alex Neil: I do not know that I would agree with that generalisation. It is always difficult to summarise what the courts do in terms of hierarchy. Sometimes, it depends on the judge. However, on the law—and it is the law that we are addressing—we are absolutely confident that there is no serious prospect of any successful challenge to the bill.

John Mason: My final point is on an issue that the Jewish community has raised. There are different branches within the Jewish community, so it would find it difficult to be in or out as a whole. I do not know whether you have read the evidence from the Jewish community, but are you open to some kind of amendment along the lines that it has suggested?

Simon Stockwell: We have read the evidence and we will have a look at some of the detailed points that that community has raised.

John Mason: That is great.

Alex Neil: The principle remains the same, however—people and organisations will have to opt in.

The Convener: I will bring in Alex Johnstone on the same subject.

Alex Johnstone: My question refers to answers you gave to previous questions, cabinet secretary. You said that protection from prosecution under European legislation would be based on the fact that the European legislation does not grant the right to same-sex marriage, and you just used the line that you see no serious chance of a successful challenge. Is that a fair summary of the view that you have expressed?

Alex Neil: It is not a view but a fact that the European convention on human rights does not include a right to same-sex marriage.

Alex Johnstone: Earlier, you defined the right to same-sex marriage, in your view and the Government’s view, as an equality issue, and you said that you wish to include same-sex marriage in Scottish law as a result of your desire to pursue your definition of equality. Is it unusual for European human rights legislation to entrench something that you see as an inequality?

Alex Neil: It might well be, but that would obviously require the agreement of all the signatories to the European convention on human rights. As you know, there are proposals to withdraw from the European convention on human rights circulating in the UK Government, so one cannot entirely predict the future. It will depend on whether we remain part of the UK state and, if we do, on whether the UK state remains signed up to the European convention on human rights. My view is the same as that of David Cameron, Maria Miller and our law officers. Obviously, we take our advice from senior law officers, and I think that every law officer in the UK is on record as saying that they do not believe that there is any prospect of a serious challenge to the proposed legislation here or to the equivalent UK legislation.

Alex Johnstone: I accept that view but, to summarise, we have got to a stage at which, in effect, the ECHR entrenches something that you have defined as an inequality. What is the prospect of European law being changed? Are there precedents for such a change happening when there is a change in the perception of what constitutes equality?

Alex Neil: I am not qualified to answer that, and I do not know whether the lawyers can. Given the point that Simon Stockwell made about the number of jurisdictions in Europe that now have similar legislation—in some cases quite long-standing legislation—my view would be that if the European convention on human rights is changed, the likelihood is that it would be changed to entrench the provisions in the bill rather than to mount a challenge to the fundamental principle of same-sex marriage legislation. jurisdictions are making exactly the same points as religious bodies are making in Scotland.

Alex Johnstone: So you do not believe that there is a prospect of a change in another jurisdiction removing the protections that you assume will be granted to Scottish religious institutions.

Alex Neil: Nothing in the ECHR gives anyone the right to same-sex marriage. It does not cover the issue.

I will give you a parallel. When the convention was being drawn up, same-sex marriage was not an issue. In the same way, when the Scotland Act 1998 was written, no one had heard of climate change, so climate change is not a reserved matter. There is no reference in the ECHR to same-sex marriage.

If the signatories to the ECHR agreed or desired—and that is a big if—to change the convention, I think that the purpose of any change would be to accommodate balanced legislation such as the provisions in the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill and in the UK's Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013. My view is that the purpose of such a change would not be to prevent people from having same-sex marriages.

Alex Johnstone: The functionality of the bill depends on the status quo in Europe.

Alex Neil: It is not about functionality. The question is about whether there is a prospect of a serious legal challenge, under the ECHR, to the provisions of the bill, and the clear evidence from both north and south of the border is that there is no serious prospect of a successful challenge to the provisions of the bill or the equivalent UK legislation.

Alex Johnstone: Under the ECHR as it stands?

Alex Neil: Yes.

Alex Johnstone: As it stands?

Alex Neil: Absolutely.

The Convener: We are running out of time so we will move on with Marco Biagi and then Siobhan McMahon.

Marco Biagi: Amendments have been suggested in written submissions to the committee, including from the Church of Scotland, with a suggested wording change on performing marriages and having marriages recognised. This might be a question for Simon Stockwell. Has the Government considered such a change?

Simon Stockwell: We met representatives of the Church of Scotland a couple of days ago to talk about that particular point and some other issues, including the civil partnership review that the cabinet secretary mentioned earlier.

I understand that, in essence, the Church of Scotland wants the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 to be amended so that it is clear that religious celebrants are acting not as agents of the state but on their own behalf. The difficulty that we have with the proposed amendments—I said this to the Church of Scotland representatives—is that we are not sure that they would make much difference in practice. We would still recognise the services, which would be carried out by religious bodies and religious celebrants, as they are now, and the state would recognise them, and the rights and responsibilities would flow from them. We therefore tend to think that the Church of Scotland is proposing a drafting change rather than a change of substance.

We will certainly consider the matter further. I suggested that the cabinet secretary might want to write to the Church of Scotland once we have done so, but when we had looked at the suggestion, our view was that it probably would not make much practical difference.

Marco Biagi: We also heard in a submission that as well as having included a freedom of speech provision in the bill, there would be benefit in including freedom of speech provisions in other public order legislation including, I believe, the Offensive Behaviour at Football and Threatening Communications (Scotland) Act 2012. Does the Government consider that to be necessary or are the bill’s provisions covering freedom of speech sufficient?

Alex Neil: I am just dealing with this bill. Any proposals on amendments to other acts relating to football matches or anything like that would have to be made to my colleagues. I have no ministerial responsibility for that area of policy.

Siobhan McMahon: We heard evidence from Ephraim Borowski, who said:

"we have commented that it is a concern that, for example, the Lord Advocate produces guidance on the prosecution of people for expressing their opposition to the proposal in a particularly strong manner but not guidance on the prosecution of people who express their support of it."—[Official Report, Equal Opportunities Committee; 12 September 2013; c 1450.]

We are all aware that social media have been used as tools for making what can only be described as abhorrent comments, particularly if one expresses a view against the bill. Will you address the guidance or speak to the Lord Advocate about how we can make it stronger?

Alex Neil: I think that the Lord Advocate’s guidance is very balanced and fair. There is a precedent for this, Siobhan. I was in Parliament at the time of the controversy over section 2A. At that time, the then Lord Advocate published guidance of a very similar nature as a result of the change to legislation that was proposed by Wendy Alexander. The guidance is only one page and it is designed really to try to protect freedom of speech on all sides, provided that people behave reasonably and are not stirring up hatred or antagonism—the kind of things that people on both sides of the argument do not want.

Of course, the Lord Advocate does not consult on his guidance; I was not and should not be consulted on the guidance because it would be entirely wrong for it to be politically motivated. Any amendments to the guidance would need to be considered by the Lord Advocate. My view is that he has produced very proportionate, fair, balanced and practical guidance.

Siobhan McMahon: I turn to a slightly different topic. Has the Scottish Government included in the financial memorandum any cost to the public purse that would be associated with a decision by the Church of Scotland, the Roman Catholic church or any other faith community to stop performing the civil law aspects of weddings?

Alex Neil: The financial memorandum of any bill relates to the impact on the public purse and the public purse only. No financial memorandum would estimate the impact on other institutions in terms of costs. It depends how those institutions—

Siobhan McMahon: I am sorry, but that is not what I was asking. We heard in evidence from all the churches that they might have to do what the churches do in other European countries, including France, where people have to have a religious ceremony and a civil one. Clearly the costs of the public part of that would have to go up. Should those costs be included? We have evidence on that.

Alex Neil: There is nothing in the bill that would force the churches either to abandon carrying out marriages or to do things as they are done in France. It is obviously a matter for the churches, should they decide to do that. If there is a cost involved as a result of their decision, that is their affair, not mine.

Siobhan McMahon: It would be your cost; it would be a cost to the public purse. I understand that it would be the churches’ decision, but you would have to meet the cost.

Simon Stockwell: That is not covered in the financial memorandum, but civil marriage ceremonies are done on a cost-recovery basis. The cost falls on the couple, so if there was a civil marriage ceremony, the couple would have to pay for it. Clearly it would be for the couple to decide whether they wish to then have a blessing in a church.

John Mason: We received legal opinion that the Lord Advocate’s guidance does not really carry much weight. Can you confirm whether that is the case?

Alex Neil: I would strongly dispute that. The idea that the chief prosecutor’s opinion carries no weight with the prosecution service is, I think, absurd.

Christian Allard: We have heard a lot of evidence on public sector workers, particularly on the issue that we have already discussed about the interaction between pieces of legislation. Views differ, with some religious groups suggesting that, in human rights terms, there is a hierarchy in which issues of gender trump issues of religion. Others have taken the opposing view and some have no view at all on the matter.

In its submission, the Law Society of Scotland expresses uncertainty about how European convention on human rights article 14 rights will interact with the public sector equality duties in section 149 of the Equality Act 2010, about which there has also been much discussion. Will you consider the suggestion that has been made by some witnesses and allow the principle of reasonable accommodation for public sector workers who provide a service? If your answer is yes, how might that be conducted in rural areas?

Alex Neil: As I understand it, the question is about the right of public sector workers who object to the bill’s principles not to carry out their duties. That has already happened where people have objected to a particular aspect of a particular type of ceremony.

Quite frankly, our view is that there is no big issue here. We are talking, in the main, about registrars having an opt-out with regard to their work. There is a big distinction to be made between a publicly employed registrar and a celebrant in a church; after all, the former is employed to carry out a public duty. That said, if a public sector worker has specific concerns, they should, as with any such matter, raise it with their employer in the first instance.

The registration of civil partnership by civil registrars has worked well. In the eight years since the legislation was introduced, 4,800 civil partnerships have been registered in Scotland, and I do not think that there is any reason to expect that the solemnisation of same-sex marriage by civil registrars will not work as well. I have no doubt that some civil registrars had concerns and perhaps did not entirely agree with the civil partnership legislation; however, it has not presented a problem.

As you know, civil registrars in Scotland are employed by local authorities. It is for each authority to decide how best to provide services for registering marriage, and we expect local authorities to handle with sensitivity registrars who object to same-sex marriage or civil partnership on the ground either of religion or of belief. Given that we have received no representation whatever from local authorities on an opt-out with regard to civil registrars’ responsibilities, we believe that the issue is a bit of a red herring and see no problem. Common sense should prevail, as it has done for the past eight years in relation to civil partnerships.

Christian Allard: So, you see no need for such accommodation.

Alex Neil: As the employer, the local authority will always try to accommodate such things. If a civil registrar has a religious or belief objection to same-sex marriage, the local authority that employs them will, I think, come to some kind of appropriate accommodation on the matter. Common sense just has to prevail.

Christian Allard: What is the scope for conflict between ECHR article 9 rights of thought, conscience and religion and the public authorities’ public sector equality duties?

Alex Neil: This is basically the same area, Christian.

Christian Allard: What I am talking about now is a conflict between different pieces of legislation.

Alex Neil: I do not think that there is a conflict, because the public sector duty is on the authority, not on individual employees of the authority.

10:45

Christian Allard: So you do not think that the equality duties would take precedence over a public sector employee’s ECHR articles 9 and 10 rights to express and act on their own views?

Alex Neil: The public sector duties are clear. The authority—in this case, the local authority—has the public sector duty. The employee does not, as an individual, have a public sector duty. As an employee, he or she does have responsibilities, but if there is any clash in terms of religious belief, or non-religious but nevertheless conscientious objection, that is for the employer and employee to work out between them. In working it out, the employer must be cognisant of the legislative framework within which they are operating, and when this bill becomes an act it will be part of that consideration, as is the Equality Act 2010. The public sector duty would clearly also be part of that consideration.

We have rules on how the public sector duty is exercised. Although we do not define the public sector duty, which is a reserved matter, we define how the public sector duty is carried out in Scotland, which is devolved, and the European convention on human rights and employment legislation also come into the mix. We do not see any conflict in the legislation. We think that there is a precedent in the legislation for civil partnerships, which has been handled sensitively and with a great deal of common sense, and has not resulted in any pressure on employees of local authorities in carrying out their duties.

The Convener: On the same subject, I would like to bring in John Mason and then Marco Biagi.

John Mason: You said that you hope that common sense will prevail on the issue, but we have the legal case—albeit not in Scotland—of Lillian Ladele, in which the local authority insisted that she take part in a ceremony. You said that employers—that is, the local authorities—have not made any representations on the matter; of course they will not, because we are talking about protecting their employees from them, so they are not going to make representations.

On abortion—another controversial issue—we have specific protection in legislation for employees who wish not to take part, and that seems reasonable to me. Would it be possible to have such a provision in the bill?

Alex Neil: First of all, let me say that there have been a lot of questions about the European convention on human rights. The key point about the Lillian Ladele case is that the European Court of Human Rights found that there had not been a violation of Ms Ladele’s human rights, and this bill is in line with that decision. Great play has been made of the role of the European Court of Human Rights the employee’s human rights were not breached in that case.

John Mason: So the court did not protect her and you do not want to protect her.

Alex Neil: I do not think that you can say that. The European Court of Human Rights, which is the protector of human rights for all of us, having heard the case, made the decision that her human rights had not been violated. That decision is not something that I am qualified to question or to undermine in any way. The key thing about our bill is that the human rights of everybody, including employees, have to be protected. In that case, the court said that Lillian Ladele’s human rights had not been breached. You may disagree with the court’s decision—

John Mason: I certainly do.

Alex Neil: I have to legislate according to the framework of law, and that case is now part of the framework of law.

John Mason: Do you accept, in that case, that you could put in a section that would give added protection?
Alex Neil: I do not think that such a section is necessary, to be frank. I do not see a big issue here at all, and I do not think that the local authorities do. If I had had representations from local authorities saying that there is a big issue that needs to be addressed in legislation, I would have listened to them. I have not had any such representations. I think that I am also right in saying that I have not had any representation from any registrar in Scotland on the matter. Again, it is a red herring.

Marco Biagi: You have slightly pre-empted my question. Have you had formal contact with the Association of Registrars of Scotland? Has AROS given a view on the bill?

Simon Stockwell: I met some registrars. The registrar general’s office kindly organised a seminar for me with registrars from most Scottish local authorities about a year ago. We discussed the issue with them and, as the cabinet secretary has said, there was no desire around the room for any legislative opt-out. They said that when somebody is against civil partnerships, they try to ensure that the person is moved to other duties within the registrar’s office.

Alex Neil: Common sense prevails.

The Convener: I have two further questions to ask you. One regards reset. It is currently a defence in Scots law that a wife is not guilty of the criminal charge of reset of goods that have been stolen by her husband. That defence will not be available to a woman in a same-sex marriage. It would appear that that provision could be discriminatory. Is the Scottish Government considering the law in that area?

Alex Neil: I will let Simon Stockwell answer that very specific question.

Simon Stockwell: Yes. Our understanding is that the defence has not been used for a number of years; we think that it is about 20 years since it was last used. It is an odd defence, and it reflects an antiquated view of marriage and the position of men and women in society. Having discussed the matter with our criminal justice colleagues, we intend to recommend to the cabinet secretary that the Government lodge an amendment at stage 2 to repeal the defence altogether.

The Convener: The answer to this question might be the same, but I will ask it anyway. According to our advice, the current law on impotence was not drafted with same-sex marriage in mind. If it is proved, the marriage could be declared void, which could have a different effect from marriage ending through divorce. It could be argued that, since the provision clarifies that that rule of law will apply only to different-sex couples, it is discriminatory.

Simon Stockwell: This will be a different answer. We discussed the matter in the policy memorandum. The ground of incurable and permanent impotency for voiding a marriage is certainly antiquated and is not often used. We had thought in the past about whether there was any scope for removing it altogether from Scots law and we have had some comments to the effect that we should.

However, some people have suggested that the concept is useful in certain circumstances, particularly for people who might wish to enter into another marriage but do not wish to get divorced because of their religious objections to divorce. Given that particular religious aspect of this issue relating to impotency, we intend to make no change and to leave the provisions in the bill as they stand.

Alex Neil: That said, it is the type of issue to which the Scottish Law Commission might give longer-term consideration. The committee might wish to recommend to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice that he refer the matter to the Law Commission.

Simon Stockwell: I am sure that the Law Commission would welcome a look at the matter. I used to be involved in sponsoring the Law Commission, and I know that it is the sort of thing that those who work there very much enjoy doing. [Laughter.]

Alex Neil: That was meant as a compliment, let me emphasise, before we get angry letters from the Law Commission.

Simon Stockwell: I know them well.

The Convener: Committee members have no more questions to ask. I invite the cabinet secretary to make closing remarks.

Alex Neil: Thank you, convener. We have covered many specific and technical issues. I repeat what I said at the beginning: I view the bill as being about rectifying an anomaly regarding the equality of treatment of people who, at the moment, are not allowed to marry in Scotland. At the same time, we have made it absolutely clear that we are determined to protect the rights in particular of church organisations and celebrants in the way that I have described and in the way that it is described in the bill and in the amendments to the Equality Act 2010. I think that Scotland will be a better place when we pass the bill.

The Convener: Thank you again, cabinet secretary, for your contribution.
That concludes the public part of the meeting. Our next meeting will take place on Thursday 10 October, and will include evidence on the Scottish Government’s draft budget for 2014-15.
SUPPLEMENTARY EVIDENCE AND CORRESPONDENCE

Supplementary evidence
The Equality Network
Scottish Transgender Alliance
Scotland for Marriage
Scottish Youth Parliament
Amnesty International
Family Education Trust

Correspondence
Dr Gordon Macdonald, CARE for Scotland, to Convener, 11 October 2013
Scottish Government to Clerk, 11 October 2013
Dr Gordon Macdonald, CARE for Scotland, to Convener, 5 November 2013
Scottish Government to Clerk, 6 November 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
SUPPLEMENTARY SUBMISSION FROM THE EQUALITY NETWORK

We request that the Committee please consider this supplementary evidence, which focusses on providing information on some of the issues discussed in oral evidence sessions. We are happy for this evidence to be published under our name.

Possible number of same-sex marriages

The Committee has received different figures, in evidence, about the number of civil partnerships in Scotland, and the likely rate of same-sex marriages. These range from 0.01% (1 in 10,000) of households (John Deighan, 5th Sept, Official Report col 1426) upwards.

The total number of civil partnerships registered in Scotland, from commencement in December 2005, to 30th June 2013, was 4639 (2430 women couples and 2209 men couples). Complete quarterly figures may be found here:

Once the initial surge had settled down, the rate of civil partnership registration in Scotland has averaged around 2% of the rate of marriage. Our survey work indicates that a majority of same-sex couples would prefer a marriage to a civil partnership, and we therefore expect the annual rate of same-sex marriages to be at least 1.5% of the rate of mixed-sex marriages.

Effectiveness of same-sex couples as parents

It has been suggested that sociological data shows that children perform better if they come from a family with married parents (Dr Gordon Macdonald, 12th Sept, OR col 1452). However, the sociological evidence demonstrates that there is no difference between the outcomes for children with two parents of the same sex and for those with two parents of mixed sex. In our previous evidence we quoted one research review which concluded this (Biblarz and Stacey, Journal of Marriage and Family, Feb 2010).

We would like to clarify that we were not cherry-picking the research results in quoting that study. Other overview studies of all the relevant research reach the same conclusion. The American Sociological Association (ASA) provided written evidence on this to the US Supreme Court earlier this year, for Court cases considering same-sex marriage. The ASA wrote (page 5 of their brief), “when the social science evidence is exhaustively examined – which the ASA has done – the facts demonstrate that children fare just as well when raised by same-sex parents.”

The full ASA Supreme Court brief may be found here:

http://www.asanet.org/documents/ASA/pdfs/12-144_307_Amicus_%20Gottlieb%29ASA_Same-Sex_Marriage.pdf
Religious and civil marriage in the rest of Europe

It has been suggested in evidence (Ephraim Borowski, 12th Sept, OR col 1461) that in many other European countries that have same-sex marriage, religious bodies do not conduct legally-effective marriages, and all marriages are solemnised in civil ceremonies (with an optional additional non-legally-effective religious marriage).

Of the nine European countries with same-sex marriage, this is the case in only three: the Netherlands, Belgium and France. In the other six countries, religious bodies do solemnise legally-effective marriages, as in Scotland (those six are Iceland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Spain and Portugal). In all of those countries, religious bodies are free to choose whether or not to solemnise same-sex marriages.

The position of religious bodies in Denmark

It has been suggested (Dr Salah Beltagui and John Deighan, 5th Sept, OR cols 1410 and 1432) that the Church of Denmark has been unwillingly required to conduct same-sex marriages. The Church of Denmark is a state church, unlike the Church of Scotland, or even the established Church of England. The Church of Denmark cannot decide its own laws, and has no decision-making body like a General Assembly or Synod. Church law for the Church of Denmark can only be decided by the Danish Parliament, and there is accordingly a government Minister for the Church.

Church of Denmark law is proposed by the Danish government in consultation with the Church, and there was consultation on the proposals for same-sex marriage. The majority of bishops and clergy of the Church of Denmark support same-sex marriage, but a minority are opposed, and the law, which came into effect in 2012, allows clergy who disagree to opt-out of conducting such marriages. The law is fully permissive and there is no compulsion on any celebrant. Two of the ten Church of Denmark bishops opted out of developing the same-sex marriage rite, and around one third of clergy have opted out of solemnising same-sex marriages.

There are of course many other religious bodies in Denmark, many of whom provide legally-effective marriage. They are all free to decide for themselves whether to conduct same-sex marriages.

Public opinion on protections for religious belief

A member of the Committee asked Prof John Curtice whether there is information on public opinion related to the protection of the beliefs of those who oppose same-sex marriage (19th Sept, OR col 1521). Prof Curtice referred to one Britain-wide Ipsos-MORI survey in 2012, discussed in paragraph 15 of his written evidence, which found that 45% said that same-sex marriage should be introduced but that religious bodies should not be required to provide same-sex marriages, while a further 28% said that same-sex marriage should be introduced and that religious bodies should be required to provide them. The full results are here:

The Equality Network commissioned a Scotland-wide opinion poll from Ipsos-MORI, conducted in June 2012. The poll asked whether people agreed or disagreed with the statement “Religious organisations should have the right to decide for themselves whether or not to conduct same-sex marriage.” 68% agreed, and 21% disagreed, with 10% neither agreeing nor disagreeing. This represents a three to one agreement in Scotland with the principle of freedom of religious choice that is enshrined in the bill’s opt-in requirements. More details of the poll may be found here:

Registrars

It was suggested in oral evidence that, in the Netherlands, civil registrars have a statutory opt-out available if they do not wish to conduct same-sex marriages (Dr Gordon Macdonald, 12th Sept, OR col 1446). That is not in fact the case. There is no statutory opt-out in the Netherlands; however, as will also be the case in Scotland, local authorities there make their own arrangements for registrar cover for same-sex marriages, and manage their registrars accordingly.

Given the relatively small number of civil partnerships (around 3.5% of the number of civil marriages), not all registrars in Scotland have conducted them. It is for local authorities to manage their registrars to provide a good overall service, taking into account individual employees’ preferences, and the same will apply for same-sex civil marriages. No problems have arisen with the management of civil partnership registration in any part of the Scotland, and, as the Scottish Government has also said, we would expect the same good management to apply to same-sex civil marriages. We note that there is no call from the Association of Registrars of Scotland for a statutory opt-out, and the suggestion is also opposed by a number of local authorities.

Education

John Brown of the Catholic Education Commission (26th Sept, OR col 1548) expressed a concern that a teacher in a Catholic school who stated that the Catholic Church believes marriage to be between a man and a woman only, would be unprotected. However, the bill does not affect the faith content of the curriculum in any way. The Scottish Government have clearly said “the faith content at Roman Catholic schools is decided by the Scottish Catholic Education Service on behalf of the Bishops’ Conference of Scotland. The Government is committed to maintaining this” (Policy Memorandum to the bill, paragraph 124).

The Equality Network’s view is that it is appropriate for religious education to present and discuss the views of religious bodies on marriage, and in Catholic schools there will be a particular focus on the Roman Catholic faith. As Mr Brown acknowledged, that is a separate matter from presenting the facts about the law on marriage. Underlying all of this is the need to ensure that all pupils, whatever their family arrangements, are respected and supported.
Michael Calwell of the Family Education Trust asked for a number of statutory provisions (26th Sept, OR col 1546). These include a statutory obligation on schools to inform parents if any teaching about marriage conflicts with their views, and a right for parents to withdraw children from such teaching. That is clearly impractical, whether in the case of same-sex marriage or other issues on which there is a variety of strongly-held views, such as divorce. Some parents will disagree with divorce; should they have a right to be informed in advance of teaching about Henry VIII of England so they can withdraw their children? If a pupil asks what divorce is, what abortion is, or what same-sex marriage is, must the teacher say “I can’t answer that unless all your parents agree in advance”?

Mr Calwell also asked for a statutory obligation for teaching to comply with parents’ understanding of the nature and purpose of marriage. The obvious problem with that proposal is that parents of different pupils in the same class will have very different views on this (and some may be same-sex couples). How are such differences to be accommodated? Surely the answer is: just as they are at the moment on issues such as divorce and unmarried parenthood, through teachers being professional and sensitive to the situation of different pupils. The bottom line is that teachers are not there to promote their own personal opinions, or those of one set of parents, but to support and facilitate the development of all the young people in their care.

The public sector equality duty

It has been suggested in evidence that the public sector equality duty in section 149 of the Equality Act 2010 might be used by public bodies as a reason to withhold services or partnership work from religious bodies that decline to conduct same-sex marriages, or to discriminate against organisations or employees who do not agree with same-sex marriage.

The equality duty is fairly weak; it requires only that public bodies give “due regard” to the need to advance equality of opportunity and to foster good relations between different communities. It covers all the equality strands to the same extent, and so applies to religion and belief as well as to sexual orientation. Treating a person or organisation detrimentally because of their religious belief would clearly not advance equality of opportunity on grounds of religious belief, nor would it be likely to foster good relations between people of religious belief and others.

More directly, all public bodies are subject to two much stronger legal requirements, which effectively trump the public sector equality duty. Public bodies are directly prohibited by the Equality Act 2010 from acting detrimentally towards any member of the public or any employee, because of their religious belief. And under the Human Rights Act 1998, a public body must not breach the ECHR rights of any person, including the right to freedom of religion provided by article 9. As the Committee has heard (Karon Monaghan, 19th Sept, OR col 1499), the Human Rights Act (in section 13) requires particular regard to be had to the importance of the article 9 rights of religious organisations, effectively placing greater emphasis on this right than on other rights.

The Equality Impact Assessment
It has been suggested that the Scottish Government’s Equality Impact Assessment (EQIA) for the bill says that the protections for organisations and people that oppose same-sex marriage cannot be guaranteed. We would respectfully point out that that view does not form any part of the assessment results in the EQIA.

The words “Concerns that Government reassurances on religious and belief bodies and celebrants not having to take part in same sex ceremonies could not be guaranteed, as there could be challenges on human rights grounds” appear in stage 2 (evidence gathering and consultation) of the EQIA, under the heading “Some consultation responses also made other points, as outlined below”. They are the view of some consultees, not the view of the Scottish Government or the result of the assessment.

Stage 3 (assessment) of the EQIA concludes that the overall effect of the bill on religion and belief equality will be positive. Stage 4 (decision making) of the EQIA sets out the actions that the Government has taken in response to these concerns, including protecting religious bodies and celebrants by the opt in system and the amendments to the Equality Act 2010. The Committee has heard evidence from expert lawyers about those protections, including that it is “inconceivable” that a human rights challenge to the protections could succeed (Karon Monaghan, 19th Sept, OR col 1501).

The general approach to statutory “protections”

There is a clear difference of view on whether additional statutory “protections” related to same-sex marriage are needed for teachers, registrars and others. We would point out that those calling for these additional protections are mainly organisations that are opposed to the bill proceeding at all. In contrast, the organisations that represent teachers, registrars and others, such as the EIS, the Association of Registrars of Scotland, and UNISON, do not think such provisions are either needed or beneficial.

The Equality Network believes that the evidence that the Committee has heard clearly indicates that the necessary protections are already provided. Our clear view is that any new statutory provision which singled out same-sex marriage as particularly sensitive or controversial, and something to which opposition should be “protected”, would undermine the key purpose of the bill, which is to bring about sexual orientation equality in the law. Such a provision would stigmatise LGBT people and would send a signal that discrimination against LGBT people is acceptable and is endorsed by the Parliament. It would in effect return us to the days of “section 28”, and would be a huge step backwards.

Tim Hopkins
Director
Equality Network
30 September 2013
SUPPLEMENTARY SUBMISSION FROM SCOTTISH TRANSGENDER ALLIANCE

We request that the Committee please consider this supplementary evidence, which focusses on providing information on some of the issues discussed in oral evidence sessions. We are happy for this evidence to be published under our name.

Spousal Veto

The Committee received evidence from the Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing (Alex Neil, 3rd Oct, OR col 1588) that the Scottish Government’s intention in drafting this provision was not that the spouse would be required to consent to the trans person obtaining gender recognition, but rather would consent to remaining a party to the marriage once gender recognition had been awarded. However as the Bill is currently drafted we are of the view that this policy aspiration is not achieved due to the fact that at the same time as withholding spousal consent an uncooperative spouse can also delay divorce proceedings for a number of years and therefore unfairly prevent the trans person from having their gender legally recognised.

We believe that the rights of the non-trans spouse and the rights of the trans person have not been appropriately balanced. There are numerous actions which a person can take which may impact greatly on their spouse, for example risking serious physical health consequences by refusing medical treatment, but which can nonetheless be done without spousal consent. In all such situations the person is still afforded the personal autonomy to make the decision for themselves; the only recourse open to an aggrieved spouse is to initiate divorce proceedings after the action has been taken. In the same way, a trans person should be able to make their own decision to have their gender legally recognised, and if their spouse is unhappy with that decision they are then free to divorce them.

We wish to draw the Committee’s attention to the fact that no-one giving oral evidence, including those representing religious organisations, expressed any concerns about our proposed amendment. Nor has the Committee received any evidence from spouses of trans people supporting the need for the spousal consent provision. Indeed, spouses of trans people who have contacted the Scottish Transgender Alliance about this feel that the provision requiring spousal consent is unnecessary and offensive, and they support our proposed amendment.

Engender, which works and campaigns around gender equality, stated that: “the spousal veto is inimical to the principle of individual autonomy. It places an unnecessary strain on couples’ relationships by imposing an artificial deadline for non-transitioning spouses to opt themselves in or out of marriage.” It therefore appears to us that the provision in the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act has been transposed into the Scottish legislation without evidence of its necessity, in a way which harms the human rights of transgender people.

The Cabinet Secretary (Alex Neil, 3rd Oct, OR col 1588) also suggested that, although a non-trans spouse has remained in the marriage throughout the two years that their partner has been living full-time in their acquired gender, the gender recognition application may cause them to reconsider whether to remain in the marriage. Some non-trans spouses have told us that they indeed feel they need a lot longer than two years to make a final decision about the continuation of their marriage. However as currently drafted the Bill does not afford the non-trans spouse this opportunity, and rather puts intense pressure on them to decide whether they can consent to remaining in the marriage once the trans person has been living in their acquired gender for two years or face being divorced by their spouse. In contrast, by separating out the option to divorce from the granting of gender recognition our amendment enables the non-trans spouse to take the time they need to decide whether or not to continue in the marriage once their spouse has obtained gender recognition.

Although fewer in number than lesbian, gay and bisexual people, transgender people are most egregiously affected by the current gender-segregation of the marriage and civil partnership systems. We believe therefore that this legislation can only be truly regarded as successful if it fully resolves the marriage inequalities which transgender people face. The Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013 unfortunately failed to resolve such inequalities. Many transgender people feel that the legislation was progressed too quickly to take account of their needs, and feel acutely let down as a result. This Bill has the opportunity to fully consider the needs of transgender people and ensure that these inequalities are properly resolved. We are very encouraged by the excellent work of the Committee in enabling the concerns of transgender people, often the most affected but least understood, to be heard. We hope that the Committee can continue in this vein and ensure that the complex equality needs of this marginalised group are properly met by the details of the legislation.

Gender Neutral Ceremonies

The Committee was advised by the Scottish Government (Simon Stockwell, 3rd Oct, OR col 1589) that in considering this proposed amendment it wants to make sure that no difficulties are caused for denominations who do not want to use the gender-neutral marriage declaration when marrying an opposite sex couple.

We would like to draw to the Committee’s attention to the fact that our proposed amendment is specifically designed to ensure that denominations who wish to continue to use the terms “husband and wife” in their marriage ceremonies will be unaffected. We fully respect the right of religion and belief bodies to continue to conduct their marriage ceremonies as they always have done. However, just as the Bill provides religion and belief bodies the religious freedom to opt-in to providing same-sex marriages for lesbian, gay and bisexual people with no legal compulsion to do so, so too should the Bill provide them with the freedom to opt-in to using the gender-neutral wording for mixed sex couples who would prefer it, with no legal requirement to do so. In our view, the same safeguards which will protect celebrants and denominations not wishing to opt-in to same-sex marriage will protect celebrants and denominations not wishing to make use of this amendment.
Long-term transitioned people

The Committee was advised by the Scottish Government (Simon Stockwell, 3rd Oct, OR col 1588) that it intends to submit an amendment at Stage 2 relating to the evidence required by the Gender Recognition Panel for people who have been living in their acquired gender for 6 years or more. While we very much welcome this, and in order to ensure equity of access to all long-term transitioned people we urge the Committee to recommend that this amendment:

1. Not be limited to applicants who are, or have been, married. This is important because many unmarried long-term transitioned people did not make use of the temporary provision that was available from 2005-7, either because they had not heard of gender recognition or did not apply as a matter of conscience while the right was not provided to married people.

2. Provide that evidence from a medical practitioner of having undergone any gender reassignment related medical treatment (such as hormone treatment), together with proof of having lived in the acquired gender for at least six years, should be sufficient to obtain gender recognition. We suggest this as an alternative to evidence of having undergone surgery because some NHS Boards in Scotland have not funded gender reassignment surgery until very recently and some trans people are unable to have surgery due to other medical conditions. Furthermore, surgery is not a requirement for gender recognition via the standard, 2 year transitioned, route, so it should not be a requirement via the 6 year, long-term transitioned route.

The Committee requested, that the Scottish Transgender Alliance provide information about the number of people who had used the long-term transitioned route when it was first in operation from 2005-2007 (Marco Biagi, 5th Sept, OR Col 1390). We are now able to inform the Committee that:

- By 2000, the UK Government had changed the gender on the passports of around 5000 people\(^1\) meaning that when the Gender Recognition Act 2004 came into effect, on 4th April 2005, at least 5000 people would have been eligible to apply for a gender recognition certificate;

- By 31st Jan 2010\(^2\), only 1443 people had received gender recognition via the long-term transitioned ‘fast track’ route, and a further 1056 people had received gender recognition via the standard route;

- Therefore, approximately half (2500 people) of those who had already transitioned by 2000 (13 years ago) are likely to still be without gender recognition. In addition, the hundreds of people who are likely to have transitioned between 2000 and 2006, will now be long-term transitioned.

- We therefore estimate that at least as many more people could apply via a new long-term transitioned route than have received gender recognition to date.

---

Age for Gender Recognition

It was suggested by the Cabinet Secretary (Alex Neil, 3rd Oct, OR col 1591) that if the minimum age for applying for gender recognition was reduced from 18 to 16, such applicants would have difficulty in providing evidence of having lived permanently in their acquired gender for over two years, because of their young age.

However, having consulted with Mermaids, the UK’s leading support group for families of gender variant children and adolescents, and with 26 young people via LGBT Youth Scotland’s transgender residential event, it would appear that this is not the case. We found that a significant number of 16 year old trans people would have ample evidence to show that they have been living in their acquired gender for over two years and in many cases over four years.

Young people in this situation have told us that by the age of between 12 and 14, with their parents’ support, they have been able to successfully obtain a statutory declaration of change of name and update all of the following identity documents and records to reflect their acquired gender:

- passport;
- young person’s bank savings account;
- young person’s bus pass;
- secondary school reports;
- medical records;
- dental records;
- youth group records.

The Gender Recognition Panel only requires two or three such documents as evidence, together with two medical reports detailing the person’s diagnosis of gender dysphoria and any treatment received. Therefore, young trans people aged 16 are able to easily meet the evidence requirements necessary to obtain gender recognition. The gender recognition certificate is the very final stage of this process and only changes an applicant’s birth certificate.

At age 16 in Scotland, people are considered legally old enough to leave school, get married and found a family. This is in spite of the fact that making a decision which they later regret in any of these areas of life could have profound consequences and cause significant harm to the young person and others. In contrast, obtaining legal gender recognition is a purely paper exercise which carries no risk of harm as the young person must already be living all of their day to day life in their acquired gender, regardless of whether or not their birth certificate has been amended.

It is also important to recognise that allowing trans people to apply at age 16 for gender recognition is not linked in any way to them receiving medical treatment, such as medical treatment to delay puberty. Indeed specialist medical practice for young people who are profoundly and consistently gender dysphoric and living in their acquired gender, is to begin such treatment at Tanner Stage 2 of puberty\(^3\) (around age 12). This is current practice in Scotland and will not be affected in any way by changing the age for legal gender recognition.

Foreign Civil Partnerships

The Scottish Government confirmed in evidence that a couple resident in Scotland who are in a foreign civil partnership would be, uniquely, unable to marry, as the bill stands. The Cabinet Secretary advised the Committee (Alex Neil, 3\(^{rd}\) Oct, OR col 1584) that the Scottish Government were concerned about the complications which may arise in relation to the recognition of a couple’s relationship in other jurisdictions if they were able to change a foreign civil partnership to a marriage in Scotland. The international framework for recognising civil partnerships and gender recognition is already extremely complex, and in some instances unknown. In our view therefore it is unlikely that enabling couples with foreign civil partnerships to marry here will significantly add to this confusion. Indeed, once a couple are married, their status in other jurisdictions is likely to be clearer because they will be recognised as being married in any country which has same sex marriage.

Nathan Gale
Scottish Transgender Alliance Development Officer
Equality Network
28 October 2013

---

\(^3\) P. Cohen-Kettenis and F Pfafflin, Transgenderism and Intersexuality in Childhood and Adolescence: making choices, Sage Publications, 2003, p. 145
Following the oral evidence provided to the Equal Opportunities Committee on 3 October by Alex Neil MSP, Cabinet Secretary for Health & Wellbeing, Scotland for Marriage would wish to make the following comments.

Mr Neil said “We have agreed with the United Kingdom Government that there will be amendments to the Equality Act 2010” [Col 1579] and that these changes “will be made before the bill is implemented” [Col 1594]. It is our view that MSPs cannot reasonably be expected to have confidence in these protections (and therefore to vote on the bill) without having had sight of these amendments. We would therefore urge you to raise this matter with the Cabinet Secretary.

Mr Neil also noted that “the bill…contains a provision on freedom of speech” [Col 1579]. Our view is that the section of the Bill which attempts to deal with this issue (Section 14) falls short of what is required in two very important respects. Firstly, section 14 states that there is no effect on the exercise of existing rights, whether under the Convention or rule of law. As this must be true of any Holyrood legislation (apart from this section) it is essentially worthless. Secondly, it simply refers to “nothing in this part”, meaning the section only applies to the Bill itself. This is inadequate because our concerns relate to the impact of redefining marriage on how existing public order law will be applied. Mr Neil’s refusal to address amendments to other acts [Col 1600] is of great concern to us because in our view specific amendments to legislation such as the Offensive Behaviour at Football & Threatening Communications (Scotland) Act 2012 and the Criminal Justice & Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 is what is required to seriously address the free speech concerns.

Christian Allard cited the Law Society of Scotland’s concern about the interaction between article 14 rights and the public sector equality duty (PSED), and asked that Mr Neil “consider the suggestion that has been made by some witnesses and allow the principle of reasonable accommodation for public sector workers” [Col 1602]. Mr Neil said in response that: “Quite frankly, our view is that there is no big issue here” [Col 1602] and regrettably most of his subsequent remarks to this line of questioning related to the specific issue of civil registrars. His further statement that that “The employee does not, as an individual, have a public sector duty” appears to miss the point because our concern is that local authorities, which are bound by the PSED, will use the duty as a justification for disputing the equality or diversity credentials of staff or applicants who happen to be opposed to same sex marriage [Col 1603]. We are gravely concerned that the Cabinet Secretary appears not to have grasped this, as this goes to the very heart of our concerns about this Bill.

At the very least, the Scottish Government should be pursuing an amendment to the Equality Act 2010 making clear that compliance with the PSED requires ensuring that no-one should suffer detriment as a result of holding the view that marriage is between a man and a woman. The Act should also be amended to specify that the protected characteristic of religion or belief includes the belief in marriage as presently defined.
We are especially concerned about how teachers will be affected, and would advise that a conscience clause be inserted into the Education (Scotland) Act 1980, under which teachers with a conscientious objection to same-sex marriage would be protected. In terms of the specific difficulties facing civil registrars, if Mr Neil’s expectation that “the local authority that employs them will, I think, come to some kind of appropriate accommodation” [Col 1603] is correct, then surely there is no reason why this should not be made clear on the face of the Bill.

Dr Gordon Macdonald
Scotland for Marriage
30 October 2013
In her oral evidence on 12th September 2013, Louise Cameron MSYP offered to provide further information on some of the questions asked by the Committee. Please see below for information about the Scottish Youth Parliament’s Youth Manifesto consultation, on the age of gender recognition and connected issues. The Scottish Youth Parliament (SYP) would be happy to supply any other information or clarify any further points should the Committee wish.

The Scottish Youth Parliament’s Youth Manifesto and support for equal marriage amongst young people.

The Scottish Youth Parliament’s Youth Manifesto, ‘Change the Picture’ was shaped by direct consultation with young people – with a total of 42,804 responses it is the largest youth consultation of its type in Scotland. Our elected membership (MSYPs) decided on fifty policy statements, which were collected into five ten question surveys and consulted on between July and October 2010. Young people who responded were asked whether the agreed, disagreed or were not sure with each of the statements in each survey. Any statement that received agreement from 50% or more of young people responding was included in the final youth manifesto, which was published in the run-up to the 2011 Scottish Parliament elections and will shape the basis of SYP’s policy and campaigning activity until 2016.

Of the total, 29,886 responses came through direct consultation work by MSYPs in their local areas, which included them organising sessions in schools, youth clubs, at local events and in public places to ask young people their views on the statements in the survey. 6,265 responses came through engagement by SYP centrally in schools, 4,158 through outreach work at festivals and events across Scotland and 2,249 responses were submitted online. More information, and the final youth manifesto document can be found at http://www.syp.org.uk/our-manifesto-W21page-82-

49 of the fifty statements received majority support and were included in ‘Change the Picture’, including “All laws regarding homosexual relationships, whether male or female, should be equal to those of heterosexual relationships”, to which 74% of respondents agreed, 17% disagreed and 10% were not sure. At our June 2011 National Sitting, our membership discussed and voted on which of the statements in the Youth Manifesto to prioritise as a national campaign. From all the issues contained in the manifesto, MSYPs voted to prioritise a campaign for marriage equality based on the statement above, which was launched as ‘Love Equally’ in August 2011.

Further evidence of young people’s majority support for equal marriage can be seen from the Ipsos MORI opinion poll conducted in June 2012 which showed 78% of 18-24 year olds in Scotland agreed that “same-sex couples should have the right to get married” with 17% disagreeing¹. Additionally, as we noted in our written evidence to the Scottish Government’s 2011 consultation, in the 2009 Scottish Social Attitudes survey, 77% of 18-24 year olds in Scotland thought that relationships between adults of the same-sex were ‘rarely or not at all wrong’, notably higher than the population as a whole.2

The initial findings of the 2010 survey show this trend continuing, both amongst young people and Scots as a whole. As the SSA’s ‘Attitudes to discrimination and positive action’ paper noted:

“The biggest and most rapid change in discriminatory attitudes in the last decade has been in views of gay men and lesbians. In 2000, 48% felt sexual relationships between two adults of the same-sex were always or mostly wrong. By 2010 this figure had fallen to just over a quarter (27%). At the same time, support for same-sex marriage has increased from 41% in 2002 to 61% in 2010 [our emphasis], while more people said a gay man or lesbian would be a suitable primary school teacher in 2010 compared with 2006 (56% compared with 48%).

“These changes in attitudes have occurred across most groups in Scottish society, including people brought up in an era when male same-sex relationships were illegal (although it remains the case that older are more likely than younger people to hold discriminatory views towards gay men and lesbians).”3

Gender Recognition Age and transgender issues in the Bill

SYP has not yet discussed the age of gender recognition and whether it should lower from 18 to 16 so has no policy position on this emerging issue at this time.

We do however note the support and importance to young trans people as seen from LGBT Youth Scotland’s written and oral evidence, which was based on their engagement with transgender young people.

As noted in our written evidence, SYP welcomes the provisions in the Bill to end the current situation where transgender people must divorce in order to obtain gender recognition. As same-sex marriage and mixed-sex civil partnership are currently illegal, transgender people are forced to undergo a divorce or dissolve their civil partnership before receiving legal gender recognition – even if their partner is the same person. We believe that one of the many positive benefits equal marriage will bring is to end this cruel situation and a much-needed step towards quality for transgender Scots.

The Scottish Youth Parliament believes the solution to this discrimination is equal marriage. This is an extremely welcome feature of legislating for marriage equality, and a much-needed step forward towards equality for transgender Scots.

Rob Gowans
Policy and Research Officer
Scottish Youth Parliament
12 September 2013

http://www.equalityhumanrights.com/uploaded_files/Scotland/Projects_and_Campaigns/pdf_final_2.pdf

Successive Scottish Parliaments have strongly supported the development of a just and fair Scotland, working hard to take action against social inequality and celebratory of Scotland's diversity. Successive Parliaments have sought to place Scotland in the European mainstream when it comes to human rights. In some respects, within these islands the Parliament has shown itself to be a leading light.

The Scotland Act secured legal protection for human rights through the Human Rights Act. This requires that the legislature does not interfere with certain freedoms and that it takes positive action to ensure protections. The Human Rights Act is derived from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Following the barbaric inhumanity shown during the two world wars in which particular communities were targeted with unspeakable violence the Universal Declaration on Human Rights was adopted by the United Nations. That this set of Articles is universal, that it is applicable to all is central to its importance. It is the standard against which rights based legislation is judged. It is the reference point for the European Convention on Human Rights which followed it and which celebrated its 60th anniversary last week. It paved the way for the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

The international standard on gender equality is clear. Art 16 of the UDHR (right to marry and form a family) and Art 23 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. States may not discriminate with regards to the right to marry and found a family, on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity. The position in Scotland today sits in stark contrast to this international standard.

UN Human Rights Committee and UN Committee on the Rights of the Child have consistently pushed for expansive definitions of family. 'The concept of family is so varied across cultures that here can be no standard definition' (UNHRC). 'All arguments place the essential value on the principle of non-discrimination at the fore of discussion about the family' (UNCRC).

Scotland is 12 years behind the Netherlands which legislated for same sex marriage in 2001. It is behind Spain, Norway, Denmark, Sweden, Iceland, Portugal, Belgium etc. The Scottish legislature and consequently society is now behind England in taking positive action on equal marriage.

Homophobic bullying has lead to suicide in school age children with 3 national studies including one in the UK showing very high levels of suicidal thoughts amongst young LGBT people. Countries as diverse as Finland and Latvia have introduced education materials and policies ranging from compulsory education on sexual diversity to prohibition of discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation.
Amnesty International and UNICEF have ambitious programmes of human rights education. Education, knowledge, understanding and tolerance will deliver a more equal and socially just society. Knowing your rights is the first step in asserting your rights. If they’re a secret, they’re useless. Schools should be supported to teach human rights and the universal nature of those rights.

Today Scotland is not a part of that European mainstream thinking on human rights and equality. Today, on this issue it is not leading. Today the legislature is presiding over discriminatory policy which stigmatises relationships in a way that can fuel discrimination based upon sexual orientation or gender identity. Some will use this to justify their discriminatory attitude and hate crime. The media regularly reports, on gender and homophobic based hate crime in Scotland. The Times Scotland reported in June 2013 with a headline ‘Hate crimes against gay people soar to highest in 3 years’.

Amnesty International believes that the legislature in Scotland should take positive action. It should secure equality in law and not leave same-sex couples with inferior rights to the rest of society.

Failure of Parliament to secure this legislation will be a particular blow at this time when across the world the LGBT community could reasonably consider itself to be under systemic and orchestrated attack. Amnesty international global research has shown use of the death penalty for the physical expression of sexual identity, the state sanctioned public beating, harassment and oppression of LGBT people.

On the international stage the timing is very important. In Russia a draconian homophobic law came into force in July, imposing fines on individuals and organisations accused of promoting “propaganda of non-traditional sexual relations” which the Russian authorities maintain could morally corrupt children.

Russia’s new law, effectively banning public activism by lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) individuals has done nothing but create a climate of intolerance and promote violence by vigilante groups.

This law provides the framework for a state-sponsored discrimination and follows a pattern of abuse against LGBT individuals, with officials systematically failing to investigate hate crimes.

The Scottish Parliament has an opportunity to demonstrate leadership and in passing this Bill do the opposite of what is happening in Russia. Amnesty International supports the intent of the Bill and urges the Parliament to demonstrate its commitment to the values demonstrated by successive Parliaments which reflect the international standards shown by the civilised mainstream of European and world thinking.
UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon 'to LGBT, let me say you are not alone. Your struggle for an end to violence and discrimination is a shared struggle. Any attack on you is an attack on the universal values of the United Nations...I call on upon all countries to stand with you'

Mark Bevan
Programme Director
Amnesty International
13 September 2013
We are grateful to have had the opportunity to present oral evidence at the meeting of the Equal Opportunities Committee on 26 September.

Having reflected on the proceedings, we wish to submit a few further thoughts on some of the matters that were discussed and to make some additional comments on issues that were not raised at the oral evidence session.

The legal definition of marriage

In the course of the evidence session, John Finnie MSP asked for the source of the statement made in our original submission that:

‘There are four key components in the definition of marriage: it is voluntary, heterosexual, monogamous and lifelong.’

The simple answer to that question is that each of these components lies at the heart of the legal definition of marriage – a definition which reflects the very nature of marriage. For generations in free societies throughout the world, marriage has been recognised as the union of one man to one woman, for life, to the exclusion of all others, and it must be freely and voluntarily entered into.

Mr Finnie went on to enquire about the basis for our submission that:

‘The Scottish Parliament should no more legislate for same-sex marriage than it should legislate for forced marriage, polygamous marriages, or temporary contract marriages.’

The reason for this statement is that any legal change to any of the four key components in the definition of marriage would be put the law on marriage at variance with the nature of marriage. We reject the suggestion that this is an offensive view. We are not equating same-sex marriage with a forced marriage any more than we are equating polygamous marriages with temporary contract marriages. The point being made is that the four key components of marriage are indivisible and belong together. The state should not therefore tamper with any one of them.

The nature and purpose of marriage

We are concerned that the Bill demonstrates a deeply defective understanding of the nature and purpose of marriage. A concept of marriage that is not rooted in the sexual union of a man and a woman and the basic need of children for both a mother and a father cannot really be said to be marriage at all - certainly not in the sense that marriage has been understood historically and universally. To reconstruct marriage around the desires of empowered adults for the recognition of their relationships is to invert it.

The primary way in which marriage serves adults is by providing a secure environment for the adults of tomorrow to enjoy a happy and ordered childhood, ideally with maternal and paternal input. It also serves adults because stable families founded on the intergenerational support that marriage provides makes an indispensable contribution to building a prosperous, productive and peaceful society with a future.
By helping to put the interests of mothers and children first, a gendered understanding of marriage puts the interests of society first in a way that a genderless understanding of marriage never can. Marriage is a bond of solidarity between one man and one woman, and between one generation and the next. It encourages fathers to take responsibility for their children, and in health terms provides the only truly safe context for sexual activity.

Elaine Smith MSP and others have remarked that if ‘love’ provides a sufficient basis for the state to recognise a relationship as a marriage, then there is no logical reason for preventing more than two people from marrying each other. Although critics have been swift to label anyone who makes this observation ‘homophobic’, the point being made merits careful and sober reflection. The Scottish Parliament needs to consider what are the practical, philosophical and moral criteria by which it determines which types of union may be considered ‘marriages’ and which types may not. In our view, it is not possible to make any such determination without taking full account of the socio-biological purpose of marriage. It may well be that it would be unthinkable for the Scottish Parliament to legislate for polygamy at the present time, but not so many years ago, the current Bill would have been unthinkable.

‘Genderless marriage’

The terms ‘same-sex marriage’, ‘gay marriage’ and ‘equal marriage’ are used interchangeably in the context of the current debate. However, a more accurate term would be ‘genderless marriage’. What the Bill is seeking to do is to introduce a concept of marriage devoid of any recognition of sexual complementarity and difference, and that does not recognise the need of co-operation between the male and the female sexes. The Bill would remove from marriage any appreciation of the real and positive reality of sexual difference and, indeed, the place of sexual union itself. As such, the present proposals may be viewed as part of a wider ideological assault on the very idea of gender difference, and on our identities as male and female.

The ideological genesis of the concept of ‘genderless marriage’ is rooted less in simple gay rights thinking than in various Marxist theories such as gender theory and critical theory, with undemocratic and radical intent.

A divisive Bill

The recent evidence sessions have underscored the wide range of issues raised by the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill. It has become the source of a great deal of concern and distress for very many people of goodwill throughout the country and it is hard to remember a time when a single subject galvanised so many people across Scotland’s religious, racial, class and even political boundaries. At a time when politicians are frequently accused of arrogance and elitism, this Bill risks driving a greater divide between our elected representatives and the people they represent.

Conclusion

If the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill were to become law, it would present conflicts and difficulties for many people in many walks of life: for parents, teachers, public servants and even private sector employees. It would do so for the very simple reason that marriage is not a malleable and arbitrary legal or political construct. Indeed, the relationship between the state and marriage is tangential, not essential.
Since marriage is not essentially a legal institution and pre-dates the legislature, the question ‘What is marriage?’ cannot be answered by the law and must be addressed from an anthropological, philosophical and religious perspective. However, the vast majority of substantial and established anthropological, philosophical and religious perspectives on marriage are diametrically opposed to the concept of marriage set out in the Bill. To require the people of Scotland to submit to such a radical and objectively contradictory construction of marriage would conflict with the principles that lie at the heart of a free country in which religious and philosophical freedoms are paramount.

It is our sincere hope that the Committee will recommend that this Bill does not proceed, or, at the very least, that it should be delayed to allow further time to carefully consider the many far-reaching issues it raises. This would give the Scottish Parliament the opportunity to evaluate the impact and consequences of the introduction of same-sex marriage in England and Wales. A change as seismic as the legal redefinition of marriage demands years of calm, reasoned debate, not a few short months of emotive and often manipulative campaigning.

Norman Wells
Director
Family Education Trust
4 October 2013
Thank you for the opportunity to give evidence on behalf of Scotland for Marriage to the Equal Opportunities Committee regarding the Marriage and Civil Partnerships (Scotland) Bill.

Over recent months I have been in correspondence with the Scottish Government regarding a matter of serious concern relating to the Government’s 2nd consultation on the draft legislation. It became evident after the analysis of consultation responses was published that a large number of responses to the consultation were not included in the Scottish Government’s analysis. Some 4110 valid responses to the consultation which were submitted through the Scotland for Marriage web portal have not been considered by the Scottish Government or included in its analysis of consultation responses. This represents 21% of the total consultation responses.

On 21st August I wrote to the Scottish Government pointing out this problem and requesting that they take action to resolve the matter. The Government conducted a search of their server to see if they could recover the responses. The Government took this action because during the first consultation on the Marriage and Civil Partnerships (Scotland) Bill some 10,000 responses from Christian Institute supporters had been located in a holding file.

On 27th August the Scottish Government responded to my letter informing me that no trace of the responses had been found and asking for further technical information. I replied to this letter on 10th September providing the information requested. I repeated my question as to what action the Scottish Government intended to take to resolve the situation. In addition, I asked the Scottish Government to write to the Scottish Parliament requesting the Bill process be put on hold until the matter was resolved. On 20th September the Scottish Government sent a response which informed me that despite a further search based on the information I had provided, no trace of the responses had been found. During subsequent discussion it was agreed that I would provide the Scottish Government with further data identifying all those who responded to the consultation through the Scotland for Marriage web portal. This information was provided on 23rd Sept. On 4th October I wrote to the Scottish Government again and asked it to respond to the specific questions posed in my previous correspondence. In my letter I stated:
I refer to our previous correspondence regarding the missing responses from some Scotland for Marriage supporters to the Scottish Government’s 2nd consultation on the Marriage and Civil Partnerships (Scotland) Bill. I note that in your letters dated 27th August 2013 and 20th September 2013 you have not answered my question as to what action the Scottish Government intends to take to resolve the matter. I appreciate that the Scottish Government has conducted a number of searches for the missing responses based on the information I have provided on behalf of Scotland for Marriage. However, my specific request that the Scottish Government ask the Scottish Parliament to put on hold further consideration of the Marriage and Civil Partnerships (Scotland) Bill until this matter is resolved remains unanswered.

Yesterday’s session of the Equal Opportunities Committee concludes the committee’s oral evidence on the Bill. In the near future the committee will be moving towards drafting its Stage 1 report. It is highly unsatisfactory if this report is drafted without the Equal Opportunities Committee being aware of the fact that 4110 valid responses to the consultation have not been considered. Indeed I would have thought that the Cabinet Secretary might have taken the opportunity of yesterday’s evidence session to inform the committee of this fact and to ask for time to consider these responses and to bring a report analysing them to the committee before the Stage 1 report is drafted.

Scotland for Marriage is now in receipt of legal advice from Queen’s Counsel regarding the matter of the missing responses. The advice is that Scotland for Marriage has a case against the Scottish Government for acting unlawfully by progressing the Marriage and Civil Partnerships (Scotland) Bill in the absence of a proper consideration of the results of the Government’s prior consultative process. We are in the process of considering this legal advice and shall be grateful if you will provide answers to the specific questions I posed in my letters of 21st August 2013 and 10th September 2013.

I have now received a response to my letter of 4th October. I enclose the Scottish Government’s reply for your information.

In view of the doubts over the legality of the Scottish Government progressing with the Bill, in the interests of fairness to those who responded to the consultation and in order to preserve confidence in the integrity of the public consultation and legislative processes, I ask the Equal Opportunities Committee to raise this matter with the Scottish Government as a matter of urgency. In particular, I request you to write to the Cabinet Secretary asking him to provide an assurance that the Scottish Government will read the missing consultation responses (which can be provided by Scotland for Marriage) and that he will submit a report analysing these responses to the Equal Opportunities Committee before the Stage 1 report is finalised. I ask that the committee holds off drafting its Stage 1 report on the Marriage and Civil Partnerships (Scotland) Bill until after the Cabinet Secretary has submitted an analysis of the missing responses to the consultation.

Dr Gordon Macdonald
Parliamentary Officer
CARE for Scotland
11 October 2013
11 October 2013

Dear Gordon

MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL: CONSULTATION RESPONSES

Thank you for your letter of 4 October.

As you will be aware from my email of 20 September at 14:13, we consider that “www-data@recovery” is an incomplete email address as it is missing the top level domain (eg “.com” or “.org.uk”). It appears that these responses from Scotland for Marriage did not reach us because Scotland for Marriage used an incomplete email address.

The Scottish Government has already considered the points made in the standard response suggested by Scotland for Marriage (the standard response was contained in Annex A of the analysis of the responses to the consultation). The Scottish Government is prepared to consider any additional points made in responses which we did not receive that were sent before the closing date for the consultation. The Scottish Government is also prepared to put information on its website about this consideration.

If Scotland for Marriage can let me have points which the Government have not already considered, we can consider them accordingly. In considering these points, the Government would also reach a view about whether any Government amendments to the Bill at Stages 2 or 3 should be lodged.

We are writing to the Equal Opportunities Committee to advise them of your correspondence. The Government does not intend to ask the Parliament to suspend consideration of the Bill. As indicated above, we are prepared to consider points not already drawn to our attention and, if appropriate, lodge amendments. You will, of course, appreciate that once a Bill has been introduced to Parliament, its consideration and timetable is for the Parliament rather than for the Government.
Yours sincerely

SIMON STOCKWELL
11 October 2013

Dear Douglas

MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL: RESPONSES FROM SCOTLAND FOR MARRIAGE

1. I am writing to advise the Committee about a point raised with us by Scotland for Marriage.

2. As you will be aware, the Scottish Government published on 27 June the analysis of responses to the Government consultation on the draft Bill. Dr Macdonald of Care for Scotland, part of the Scotland for Marriage campaign, wrote on 21 August to tell us about a perceived discrepancy of 4,187 responses between the number of Scotland for Marriage responses noted in the analysis and the number of responses Scotland for Marriage believe were sent through their campaign. Subsequently, Dr Macdonald has told us that the difference is 4,110 responses.

3. We have checked the e-mail records which we still hold for March, which is when Scotland for Marriage ran its campaign. Over 4,000 responses sent by Scotland for Marriage did not reach the consultation mailbox.

4. We have obtained information from Scotland for Marriage on the email addresses used to send the responses. Their records show that over 2,000 emails had the return-path of www-data@c4m.org.uk, and over 4,000 had the return-path of www-data@recovery. This latter address is missing, at the end, a top level domain (such as .com or org.uk). This appears to be why the emails did not reach the consultation mailbox.

5. The responses the Government received through the Scotland for Marriage campaign mostly followed a standard format. However, individual respondents could make changes to this standard format. We have advised Scotland for Marriage that the Scottish Government is prepared to consider any additional points made in responses which we did not receive that were sent before the closing date for the consultation. The Scottish Government is also prepared to put information on its website about this consideration. In considering these points, the Government would reach a view about whether any amendments at Stages 2 or 3 might be desirable and whether, therefore, the Government should lodge amendments to the Bill.

---

1 This analysis is at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/06/2782
2 This standard format is shown at Annex A of the analysis.

6. Dr Macdonald has asked the Scottish Government to request that the Scottish Parliament suspend consideration on the Bill until the matter is resolved. The Scottish Government does not consider it appropriate to make this request to the Parliament.

7. We will keep the Committee advised of our consideration of any additional points in the 4,110 responses.

Yours sincerely

Simon Stockwell
Family and Property Law
It has come to my attention that some members of the Equal Opportunities Committee are under a false impression as to the reason over 4000 valid responses to the Scottish Government’s second consultation were not included in the Government’s analysis of consultation responses.

It has been suggested that these responses were sent to the wrong e-mail address. This is not the case. Rather the responses were sent to the correct e-mail address, but it appears that the Scottish Government’s server did not accept these responses. These responses were copied to Scotland for Marriage and our server received them. This suggests that the responses were sent to, but not accepted by, the Scottish Government owing to the particular programming of the Government’s server. Moreover, the Scottish Government did not advise any of those who submitted the responses which were rejected by its server that these responses had been rejected.

I shall be grateful if you will clarify this to those members of the Equal Opportunities Committee who seem to have misunderstood Simon Stockwell’s letter of 11th Oct 2013.

Thank you for your assistance.

Dr Gordon Macdonald
Parliamentary Officer
CARE for Scotland
5 November 2013
06 November 2013

Dear Douglas

MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL: RESPONSES FROM SCOTLAND FOR MARRIAGE

1. I have seen Gordon Macdonald’s letter of 5 November 2013 on your website.

2. The Government agrees that – so far we are aware – Scotland for Marriage tried to send the responses to the consultation email box which the Government used for the consultation.

3. It appears that the responses did not reach the Scottish Government because of the invalid “return path” used by Scotland for Marriage. The “return path” is the address used to reply to emails. Scotland for Marriage have advised that over 4,000 of their responses had the return path of www-data@recovery.

4. As I have indicated previously, this is missing, at the end, a top level domain (such as .com or org.uk). In addition, in email addresses the portion of the address after the “@” symbol needs to be convertible into a numeric value, its Internet Protocol or IP address. “Recovery” does not appear to be convertible in this way. Conversion is done by lookups performed on publicly-available name or Domain Name System (DNS) servers.

4. The reason why the Scottish Government system does not accept emails with an invalid return path is that such emails are commonly spam. The Government’s understanding is that it is common for IT systems not to accept emails with invalid return paths, in order to reduce the amount of spam which the systems receive. In this case, of course, the emails were consultation responses. It remains unclear to the Scottish Government why Scotland for Marriage used a return path of www-data@recovery for consultation responses.

5. I advised Dr Macdonald in my letter of 11 October that the Scottish Government is prepared to consider any additional points made in responses which we did not receive that were sent before the closing date for the consultation. I said this again in a further letter dated 24 October to Dr Macdonald. I phoned Dr Macdonald on 1 November to say this again and followed that up by email. Dr Macdonald replied on 1 November to say that he had “asked Scotland for Marriage’s information technology department to collate the missing responses. It is my understanding that this information has been compiled and it is now being checked by our lawyer. I shall contact you again once this process has been concluded.”

Yours sincerely

SIMON STOCKWELL
Family and Property Law
| | | | |
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td>40</td>
<td>79</td>
<td>118</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>41</td>
<td>80</td>
<td>119</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>42</td>
<td>81</td>
<td>120</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>43</td>
<td>82</td>
<td>121</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>83</td>
<td>122</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6</td>
<td>45</td>
<td>84</td>
<td>123</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>85</td>
<td>124</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>86</td>
<td>125</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9</td>
<td>48</td>
<td>87</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10</td>
<td>49</td>
<td>88</td>
<td>127</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>89</td>
<td>128</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12</td>
<td>51</td>
<td>90</td>
<td>129</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13</td>
<td>52</td>
<td>91</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>92</td>
<td>131</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15</td>
<td>54</td>
<td>93</td>
<td>132</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>94</td>
<td>133</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17</td>
<td>56</td>
<td>95</td>
<td>134</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18</td>
<td>57</td>
<td>96</td>
<td>135</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>19</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>97</td>
<td>136</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20</td>
<td>59</td>
<td>98</td>
<td>137</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21</td>
<td>60</td>
<td>99</td>
<td>138</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>22</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>139</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>23</td>
<td>62</td>
<td>101</td>
<td>140</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24</td>
<td>63</td>
<td>102</td>
<td>141</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25</td>
<td>64</td>
<td>103</td>
<td>142</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>104</td>
<td>143</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>27</td>
<td>66</td>
<td>105</td>
<td>144</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>28</td>
<td>67</td>
<td>106</td>
<td>145</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29</td>
<td>68</td>
<td>107</td>
<td>146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30</td>
<td>69</td>
<td>108</td>
<td>147</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31</td>
<td>70</td>
<td>109</td>
<td>148</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>32</td>
<td>71</td>
<td>110</td>
<td>149</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>33</td>
<td>72</td>
<td>111</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>34</td>
<td>73</td>
<td>112</td>
<td>151</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35</td>
<td>74</td>
<td>113</td>
<td>152</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>36</td>
<td>75</td>
<td>114</td>
<td>153</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>37</td>
<td>76</td>
<td>115</td>
<td>154</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>38</td>
<td>77</td>
<td>116</td>
<td>155</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>39</td>
<td>78</td>
<td>117</td>
<td>156</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

30 July 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIPS (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

This Bill will be a significant step in changing the lives of LGB Scots by ensuring that equal marriage is available to loving committed couples, who to date, have only had access to CPs. CPs were an important part of the journey to equal marriage but there is no doubt that they inhabit second class status in Scottish society.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

See answer to Q4

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

Humanist ceremonies are increasingly popular and these ceremonies should have equal footing and status.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

I welcome the plan to enable civil partnerships to change to marriages, with effect of ending the CP and regarding the original CP date as the reference date to effectiveness of equal marriage benefits. I would urge Ministers to consider keeping fees low for couples wishing to change their CP to marriage without undergoing another marriage ceremony. Many couples will have incurred significant expense in holding their CP and subsequent fees should take account of that.
How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

This is a key development. As a religious lesbian, being forced by law to accept a civil CP where my readings and music were scrutinised for any religious references was necessary but made me feel second class.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

This is an important change designed to end the cruel choice of trans folk to end their marriage to obtain their GRC

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

As equal marriage is now legal in England and Wales, I urge Scottish Ministers to proceed with this Bill as soon as possible to enable LGB Scots to receive equal treatment to their counterparts in the south

Are you responding as...

a private individual

26 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

12 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In opposition
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I consider the freedom of speech in this country had been systematically eroded over the years although i am I big believer in freedom of speech. Too many people are afraid to speak out for fear of being classed as bigots, homophobic or racist when in fact the are not but are considered to be by media and other sources. they are simply worried about the future of Scotland.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

my main concern is on what will be done in the case of religious leaders refusing to marry same sex couples further down the line and Christian faith groups being targeted for their beliefs.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

25 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

26 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

Marriage is by definition the union of a man and a woman. No government has the right to hi-jack and redefine a word. It is profoundly undemocratic. It was never in any Party Manifesto nor Queen's Speech. At least hold a referendum on this and let the people decide. We were told when same-sex civil partnerships were brought in that there was no question of introducing same-sex marriage. So the politicians have told us lies and I will never trust any politician again.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

I am not sure what this means.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

Since same-sex marriage cannot exist (because it violates the meaning of words) no celebrant should be solemnising it.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

People have the rights and equalities they seek through civil partnerships. No need to call something marriage when it is not.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

Given my previous comments I am in support only of civil marriage ceremonies between persons of the opposite gender.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

There must be full protection for everyone who supports the traditional definition of marriage in their workplace so that no one can be sacked or penalised in any way. There have been numerous cases of this type of discrimination even when same-sex marriage is not legal. The tiny gay lobby has created a climate of intimidation in which ordinary people dare not speak out for fear of being labelled as a bigot.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

It is vital that freedom of speech be preserved in this country. Thus is one thing that Britain has been justifiably proud of in the past. Don't let it be eroded by giving in to the shrill whining of the gay lobby.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

The effect of introducing same-sex marriage will be to weaken marriage in general as the definition is eroded. There is plenty of evidence that children do better in every way when they are with their biological mother and father. Tampering with the found

Are you responding as...

a private individual

9 July 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

It was not in the government manifesto and the views of the previous consultations have been ignored.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

This proposed legislation does not give additional legal rights to those in Gay relationships but it seriously jeopardises everybody who disagrees with the legislation.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

I am not sure many people outside the Scottish Parliament knows what a belief celebrant is but that in a free country everybody should be allowed to opt in or opt out of support of this policy without fear of persecution.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

It is of little advantage to gay couples but it seriously undermines the meaning of marriage and appears to be part of an ongoing process to make marriage meaningless to the detriment of family life.
How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In opposition

You do not say whether this refers to same sex couples or not but I do not have view on where civil ceremonies take place as long as people are not forced out of their jobs through changes in the law.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In opposition

I believe celebrants who wish to opt out would be at risk of prosecution if religious bodies were constrained to do this.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In opposition

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I am extremely concerned that neither Scottish or UK government are taking the issue of freedom of belief or conscience seriously. There appears to be an agenda of pushing those of religious (especially those of Abrahamic faiths i.e. Islamic, Christian and Judaic conviction ) out of the public arena. It appears that rather than becoming the progressive country so frequently talked about by politicians, we are actually reverting to the narrow, prejudiced and bigoted mindset that sent the Pilgrim Fathers and others to the Americas in earlier centuries.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I am old enough to remember an age when we had freedom of speech in this country. I have been horrified that the current Bill has done more to curtail freedom of speech than any piece of legisllation I can recall - even before it becomes law.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

My greatest concerns are in the area of education. When I was a student we lived in an age when Iron curtain countries controlled what parents could teach their children. 40 years later we seem to be heading for a position where the state can do the same.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

9 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...
19 July 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

I believe the Bill re-define both the definitions of Marriage and Adultery contrary to - Common sense - i.e. men need women to procreate Gods' word - the Bible The creation of the 'best' definition of family - i.e. one man, one woman and childre.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

I don't recognise a man and a man or a woman and a woman as a 'marriage'. I find the whole idea offensive and repugnant.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

They are completely different - i.e. lesbian/gay or humanist/atheist v religious - so why try to treat them as the same when clearly they're not.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Indeed I would! I'm dismayed that those Registrars whose personal beliefs, whether moral or religious or otherwise are opposed to this legislation are not protected with an 'Opt-out' clause - i.e. They can choose not to carry out civil partnerships or marriages of gays or lesbians. How can that situation be 'Equality'? You're preferring, in fact imposing, a single view of society on Registrars like a dictatorship - teachers will next be at risk of the same dismissal/redundancy.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

See my comments in 12. above

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

See my comments in 12. above

Are you responding as...

a private individual

11 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

We are in a time of financial difficulty with poverty, people relying on food banks, huge unemployment, social problems and so on. These are the problems that ought to be exercising Governments, not something that affects a tiny minority many of whom do not wish the redefinition of marriage. Marriage is not marriage it it isn't between a male and a female. To give it the name 'marriage is a nonsense. Civil Partnerships are already available. It looks as if, other countries have done this so Scotland must follow suit. a Poll conducted by ComRes in 2012 found that 55% of Scots believed in marriage as defined. Only 35% disagreed. Canada, USA and Holland now wish to make further redefinings. That's the danger of tampering with the status quo.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

Marriage has changed over the years but the terms of one man joined to one woman for life and to the exclusion of all others has never changed. It has always been seen as the bedrock of society. It is obvious that 2 people of the same sex cannot conceive children. It flies in the face of common sense that two people of the same sex will have the same diverse yet complementary 'family' life with 'adopted' family. It seems that because individuals want something it must be so but marriage as it stands is unique. It cannot be redefined to suit people's longings. The argument has been used in England that redefining marriage will strengthen it yet we are now told that where adultery as a ground for divorce will apply to marriages between people of the opposite sex. How can this encourage faithfulness and commitment? This means that in redefining marriage, same sex 'marriages' will have a different legal framework. How can they then both be marriage?

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In opposition

In any democracy, individual conscience ought to be a basic right.
How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

As in my previous responses, marriage is something quite special. It's really attempting to call two very different things the same. They cannot be.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

Again, good Democracy protects those who genuinely have conscientious objections and therefore the rights of people of Faith have to be protected too.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Good Democracy tries to ensure the protection of all its citizens yet already, people are not being supported. Already, in England a homosexual couple intends to sue the Church of England for not hosting gay weddings. In the European Court of Human Rights, where there is a conflict between 2 rights, the right of conscience loses. Registrars, Teachers, and others with strong religious convictions will be forced out of work unless they go against their consciences. People making private views known in conversation or debate are already losing positions and salary e.g. Rev. Brian Ross and Adrian Smith. This is discrimination. It does not happen to people airing a whole host of opinions on many issues, often extremely controversial, even on Radio and Television. The Abortion Act of 1967 protects those of conscientious objection to Abortion. Atheist teachers are not forced to teach R.E. or take religious assemblies. Parents also ought to have the right to determine whether they wish their children to participate in lessons where same sex marriage is to be taught.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of Speech must be protected. The Police seem to be exceeding their remit in arresting people for stating an opinion. No public affray has been caused. Often, those objecting can be loud and unpleasant but there is no objection to that by Police. their children to participate in lessons where same sex marriage is to be taught.
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Even greater than the crucially disappointing determination of the Scottish Parliament to redefine marriage, is the redefining of Democracy. In the UK Parliament, there was undue Pressure on those who disagreed; there was so little examination and debate

Are you responding as...

a private individual

9 August 2013
Call for evidence

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill

Questions 4 to 14 are about the Bill's proposals and wider issues. Please comment on as many or as few as you wish.

4. How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
   - In support
   - In opposition
   - Neither

Specific comments:

Once you change the character of something, its original cannot be the same. Marriage should continue to be defined as a life long exclusive commitment between a man and a woman.

5. How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples marry each other?
   - In support
   - In opposition
   - Neither

Specific comments:

Marriage can only be between a man and a woman and cannot be between a same sex couple. That can be a relationship that does not marry.

6. How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants on the same footing?
   - In support
   - In opposition
   - Neither

Specific comments:
Call for evidence: Scottish Parliament

Call for evidence

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill

Questions 4 to 14 are about the Bill's proposals and wider issues. Please comment on as many or as few as you wish.

7. How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite and same-sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

- In support
- In opposition
- Neither

Specific comments:

8. How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

- In support
- In opposition
- Neither

Specific comments:

9. How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, or religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

- In support
- In opposition
- Neither

Specific comments:
Call for evidence

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill

Questions 4 to 14 are about the Bill's proposals and wider issues. Please comment on as many or as few as you wish.

10. How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
   - [ ] In support
   - [ ] In opposition
   - [ ] Neither

   Specific comments:
   [Religion can have no part in civil partnerships]

11. How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
   - [ ] In support
   - [ ] In opposition
   - [ ] Neither

   Specific comments:

12. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

   [For those who cannot accept same sex marriage, it will be more and more difficult to hold their views if not impossible because of fear of legal action being taken against them]
Call for evidence

Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill

Questions 4 to 14 are about the Bill's proposals and wider issues. Please comment on as many or as few as you wish.

13. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

A grave danger of stumping any opposition and thus stumping freedom of speech.

14. Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

There is no demand for the change apart from a few activists. Why should the local be allowed to wag the dog?

15. Are you responding as...

- [ ] an academic
- [ ] a celebrant
- [ ] a faith/belief-based organisation
- [ ] a faith/belief local group or congregation
- [ ] an LGBT group
- [ ] another representative body
- [ ] a private individual
- [ ] a public body
- [ ] Other (please specify)

http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/65067.aspx
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...
a private individual

15 July 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

The word marriage has always defined a union between a man and a woman and to change the meaning of a word for a minority group is ridiculous.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In opposition

Don't know what that means
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

no

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

15 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

Neither

As a baptised Roman Catholic I fear that people will not take to this kindly

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

No comment

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

No comment

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

5 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

I don't see that this Bill is required because same-sex couples are provided for through civil partnerships. Also, a large proportion of the population are not in favour of this.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

To bring this Bill into law will make a colossal social change for the whole country, and it is being called for by a tiny minority. I believe it will have serious consequences for the future generations. Children and young people will be confused about sexuality as a result of this being taught in schools. The Bill is not about equality, true equality. The concept of adultery applies with reference to those in a heterosexual marriage but this will not apply for same-sex marriages. Marriage is a special relationship between a man and a woman for the purpose not only of companionship but also for the procreation of children. To include two of the same sex in "marriage" is akin to trying to call a square a circle.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I want to see protection for those who are not in agreement with same sex marriage, and I want freedom of conscience and of speech. There is concern that people will lose their jobs for reason of their conscience on this issue. This has already happened to two people even before the law was changed. I am very concerned too about churches and celebrants who refuse to conduct same-sex marriages. Only this past week or so, a gay couple announced their intention to sue the Church of England for refusing to conduct same sex marriages. There must be robust legislation in place to protect those who disagree with same-sex marriage.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

There needs to be assurance and robust protection in law to provide for freedom of speech and conscience for those who are not in favour of same-sex marriage. There needs to be freedom for Christians to teach Biblical moral values without danger of litigation.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual; A representative of a faith/belief local congregation

12 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Not all religious groups are Bible-believing Christians

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Yes- it seems that already a Millionaire Gay couple are to take the Church of England to court for refusing to marry them! So much for David Cameron's 'Guaranteed protection' for churches. It doesn't work! Christians MUST have freedom to obey the Word of God. They are entitled to freedom of speech and conscience as much as anyone else!

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?
Are you responding as...

a private individual

9 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

I do have to think to myself why on earth is so much time spent on this Equal Marriage, so many other serious things need to be addressed to help people, we already have civil partnerships the more given to one group of people the more will be wanted. In other words give an inch and people want a mile. Please lets concentrate on other things.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

27 June 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

A woman who wishes to one day be able to marry whomever she loves, regardless of their gender.

18 July 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

Celebrants who wish to perform same sex marriage ceremonies should be able to, but those who do not shouldn't be forced into performing a ceremony. I believe this is an important part of the Bill that must be stressed so that there is little conflict betw

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

Couples that wish to be involved in a civil partnership should be allowed to, regardless of whether they are in a same sex or opposite sex relationship.
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I believe that there is a widespread inaccuracy or lack of understanding of same sex relationships: there should be more emphasis on teaching people that same sex relationships are not wrong or disgusting. Furthermore, the only effect on opponents of allowing same sex marriage is a damage in their idea of what marriage is: it does not directly affect or hurt them in anyway (provided the opt-out option is available). I would also suggest that a number of these opponents are preaching false pretences, passing off the word of god as a reason to hide their hatred of things they fear or do not understand - this should not be allowed to influence the decision made of the Bill, hatred is not something that should rule over love.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Regardless of whether same sex marriage is legal or not, it will have little effect on people saying what the believe, as they are intitled to do.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a celebrant       a private individual

15 July 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

All the legal rights of marriage are already available to same-sex couples through civil partnerships. There is no great demand for same-sex marriage and the other measures contained in the bill.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same-sex marriage, so that same-sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

Marriage is a relationship between a man and a woman for the purpose of companionship and the procreation of children. It is based upon the objective reality of the complementarity of two created genders (male and female). The procreative potential of the institution of marriage is intrinsic to its nature and role in society. This is the reason the state recognises marriage in law. The Bill proposes a two-tier system of marriage and is not about true equality. For those in a heterosexual marriage, the concept of adultery will remain in law as a ground for a divorce. For those entering same-sex marriages, this will not apply. If the Scottish Government is committed to bringing same-sex relationships into the framework of marriage, it should apply the same standards of commitment to both types of relationships. If it cannot then the two types of relationship should be categorised differently. They cannot both be called marriage.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same-sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

There is a significant danger of churches and celebrants who refuse to "marry" same-sex couples being subject to litigation. In England, a gay couple has just announced their intention to sue the Church of England for refusing to conduct same sex marriages. Ultimately, the matter may be decided by the European Court of Human Rights. If the law is changed as proposed, there is a real chance that at some future date, the court will rule that religion and belief celebrants must solemnise all "marriages" or cease to marry people altogether. There is a real concern that people who for reasons of conscience cannot endorse same sex marriage might lose their jobs. This is not hypothetical. It has already happened to both Adrian Smith and Brian Ross before any law has changed. Parents should have a right (protected in law) to remove their children from lessons where same-sex marriage is being taught. They should also have a legal right to be informed in advance of when such lessons are going to occur. The Scottish Parliament's Equal Opportunities Committee should ask the Westminster Government to amend the Equality Act 2010 in order to incorporate the principle that an employer must make reasonable accommodation of the manifestation of religious belief by employees. The Scottish parliament should not pass the Marriage and Civil Partnerships (Scotland) Bill until such an amendment has been obtained.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

People should be able, graciously, politely and with proper respect for those who hold opposing views, to give full expression to the own belief with regard to the question of same sex marriage.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a celebrant

8 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

Marriage has always been and should remain a union of one man and one woman for the procreation of children. This definition has existed for millenia and has proven to be the best way of preserving family life to change this will lead to all kinds of problems, legally, morally, socially, spiritually as well as other unknown consequences.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In opposition

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Many examples already exist of people who have lost their jobs on grounds of conscience in the UK and other European countries with no evidence that this will stop.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

This will disappear as it always does in totalitarian situations e.g. Nazi Germany, USSR, China, North Korea.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

This Government is not listening to the democratic voice of the Nation.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

12 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

I believe the majority of people in this country are not in favour of changing the traditional view of marriage.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

Same sex couples have the right to a civil partnership. Marriage is held to be the joining together of one man and one woman in a manner ordained by God, and specifically for the procreation of children.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

9 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

This will have a great impact on the foundation of bringing up children. All children have the right to be brought up by a mother and father. Marriage is the foundation of a family.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In opposition
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In opposition

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

There should be a bill to protect those who do not agree with same sex marriage their beliefs should be protected and not be condemned for it.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

11 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

I think that this change in the Law was not asked for by the general public or was on a manifesto. To say that traditional marriage between a man and a woman is similar to same sex marriage is just not true. One of the main reasons for the bond of marriage has been for the procreation and nurture of children.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

All the rights of a married partnership were there for same sex couples with Civil Partnerships. All that the bill does is redefine the word marriage to mean something different, but it does not make the two types of partnerships the same. It will cause legal difficulties for those who do not agree with the bill on conscience grounds.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

Both should have the same rights.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In opposition

I've heard that one couple are already hoping to take legal action against the Church of England for refusing a same sex marriage ceremony. I think that there need to be clear and distinct legal safeguards in place for those who, because of their own beliefs, cannot agree to solemnise same sex marriage.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition
Civil partnerships have all the legal rights of a married couple.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

So long as this is done respectfully and that religious premises do not have this forced upon them.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In opposition

I would propose that belief registration would be appropriate but there should be clear legal safeguards so that religious people would be protected if they through conscience could not perform this type of ceremony.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I think that the civil rights of those who, because of their beliefs, cannot support same sex marriage will be discriminated against. As a secondary school teacher I would not be happy to teach teenagers at certain stages of their sexual development that there was no difference between the two types of relationship. Would I be discriminated against because of this. Would registrars forfeit their jobs, would people in other professions be discriminated against because they did not think that traditional marriage was the same as same sex partnership.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Perhaps the Equal opportunity act should be amended before this bill is finally passed in order to ensure that those that cannot endorse same sex marriage because of their beliefs are not discriminated against. Having heard the debate in parliament on the bill I was shocked that the way that those who opposed it were, in certain cases, treated with contempt.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?
If same sex marriage were the same as traditional marriage, would not the requirements be the same as traditional marriage. E.g. adultery be seen as a breach of the contract.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

8 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

As a practicing Christian I find this Bill Abhorrent, but having spoken to many who are not practicing Christians I find all totally apposed to this bill, it also goes against all the principles of family life in this country.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

Marriage is defined in the Oxford Dictionary (and others) as a union between A MAN and A WOMAN, not two men or two women. Who has the right to change this. This county, although very diverse in its religious groups is a Christian country with Christian principles and although many may not be practicing Christians they believe in the word of the Bible where Gods Word says quite clearly Marriage is a union between A MAN and A WOMAN , woe betide anyone who wants to change that.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In opposition
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In opposition

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I don't believe the government of this country, be it the Scottish Government or Westminster Government can ever give a 100% cast iron guarantee, that all persons in every field of society and public office, would get protection from prosecution and/or disciplinary action if they adhere to their principles that marriage between same sex people is wrong and that they wish to be no part of it. I believe that the European Court of Human Rights would have a field day. People like Ministers of the Church, Registrars, Teachers, Lawyers, Social worker, Carers etc. have been mentioned as the vulnerable people involved but I believe there are many many more people and situations that haven't even been thought about yet. With respect, if any MP or MSP who votes for this bill thinks otherwise, I would say He or She wants to try living in the real world.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

8 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

I think that it is crucial that same sex couples have the same pension rights as those currently married.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

I do not believe in religious ceremonies - all marriage should be civil. However, given that, I would not want anyone forced to perform a ceremony which is against their personal views.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

It gives far better pension protection for partners - it is not merely a name change.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

I think marriage is a personal thing, so people should be given that choice. I assume some building owners would also need to give their permission as well?
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I think there is still a lot of prejudice and ignorance in many aspects of Scottish society -by allowing this Bill to become law, it should over time improve that situation.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

1 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Firstly, there should be no concerns about same sex marriage. I firmly believe in the equal rights of all. Same sex couples love just the same. I just don't understand why anyone would have concerns. My goodness, we are all here living our lives as best we can: Gay, Lesbian, Transgender, Straight - we didn't choose who or what we are - we just are. Maybe those in society who have concerns should educate themselves away from Old - no longer relevant - out of time - story books and try and accept folk for just who they are - we can't be moulded and fitted into wee boxes.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

8 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

30 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

I feel the Bill is unnecessary as all the legal rights of marriage are already available to same-sex couples through civil partnerships. I am also informed that there is no great demand for same-sex marriage and the other measures contained in the Bill.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

As a parent I should have the right (protected in law) to remove my children from lessons where same-sex marriage is being taught. We should also have a legal right to be informed in advance of when such lessons are going to occur. There is a real concern that people who for reasons of conscience cannot endorse same sex marriage might lose their jobs. This is not hypothetical and is already a reality. Both Adrian Smith and Brian Ross have lost their jobs even before any law has been changed.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

11 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

The Scottish public, as a whole, did not seek this change. I would challenge figures which show a majority support for same-sex marriages. There was nothing mentioned by any of the mainstream political parties in their last election manifestos. The impression is that the Government is taking for granted that this law has to and will be changed. Further, using current marriage and civil partnerships figures, this proposal may affect less than 2% of adults. There is not a big demand for it and I wonder why it is such a priority? I worry that it is a priority due to pressure from other countries who have changed their laws. I am concerned that it would not be in the best interests of Scotland because it is not Scotland’s people who want it.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

By extending the definition of marriage, the Bill proposes to actually re-define it. Marriage is a union between a man and a woman: it is a complementary union. It is one in which they combine to form a completion. It is a unique relationship. I am not undermining a loving and committed relationship between 2 people of the same sex, but it is different to a complementary male/female bond. Therefore, for a marriage between same-sex couples to be equal to that of opposite-sex couples, there would have to be changes and differences to the existing definition and law (which are proposed) but these changes then undermine the conditions of marriage entered into by those who are currently married. Redefining marriage is unfair on existing marriages. Should the Government have authority to say what marriage is, or change its nature? Marriage today provides security and stability for society as a whole. This is for the common good of society. Most importantly, it provides a stable and secure environment for the nurture and upbringing of children. The proposed Bill threatens family life, which is already under attack from so many different quarters, because children would not be born from that relationship. Therefore, questions, confusions and issues regarding identity and parenthood are bound to create difficulties and could have a detrimental effect on children’s esteem. There are unknown consequences of this.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither
How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In opposition

There may be declaration in the proposals to protect religious organisations so that they can continue to conduct marriages as they have currently been doing, and also to protect individuals against being “forced” to conduct a same-sex marriage against their personal wishes. However, there is no guarantee that this will be upheld, particularly as there would undoubtedly be challenges and applications made to the European Court of Human Rights alleging some aspect of unlawful discrimination. This could lead to major court issues against religious organisations or individuals. This would be such a grave act against religion and faith.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

Civil Partnerships are contracts in themselves. They are not Marriages. It is derogatory of both Civil Partnerships and Marriages to think one could be changed to the other.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
I am concerned that allowing same-sex marriages may result in exploitation of vulnerable, naïve or immature adults, especially since the age at which people can marry in Scotland is 16. These are unknown territories at this point in time.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

1 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Neither
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I would like for there to be no recriminations against people for sincerely held beliefs.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

27 July 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

15 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

I feel that there is no need for this legislation given that LGBT only represent 1.5% (Office of National Statistics) of the UK population. I also feel that the current Civil Partnership arrangement provides all the legal protection and recognition for same sex couples. Also, there is no democratic mandate for this legislation. No party championed it in their manifestos, and during the consultation into the same sex marriage bill, the majority of respondents (however they chose to respond) were against it. The demands for this legislation have come out of nowhere, and it feels like it is being forced on the Scottish people who did not vote for it. I think a national vote on this is called for. Legislation can be passed to allow 16 year olds to vote, legislation can be progressed to allow same sex marriage, I'm sure legislation can be passed to allow a referendum to be held regardless if its constitutional or not.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

I believe that marriage has served the vast majority of Scottish people for centuries, and I do not think the State should now be meddling with something so important. There is no knowing where this will end up by re-defining relationships in this way.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In opposition

We already see a same sex couple in England taking the Church of England to court to force the CoE to perform same sex marriages, this will make any opt outs irrelevant if the ECHR rules in their favour. There is no guarantee that celebrants in Scotland will not be charged for refusing to carry out such ceremonies if ECHR law overrides any clauses in the Scottish legislation. Those who do refuse, even if protected by the law, will still be subject to accusations of homophobia and other hate language.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

As already stated I feel that civil partnerships provide all the legal protection that same sex relationships need. Same sex relationships have a completely different format and dynamic from opposite sex relationships.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

Not sure what this question means.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In opposition

This is just further undermining of traditional marriage. Traditional marriage is being completely turned on its head as it is. Transgender people represent a miniscule minority of the population, yet in the interests of equality, the vast majority of the population are having their traditional marriage beliefs re-defined by the State when it was never voted for.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I am concerned that teachers who do not want to teach same sex marriage will be forced to via social subjects. I'm also concerned that parents who do not want their children to be taught about same sex relationships or marriage will not be allowed to remove their child from the lessons under the guise of the child's human right being breached. There has been no mention of protecting citizens who fall into this category, only that religious groups will not be legally pursued for refusing to carry out same sex marriages. There really isn't enough protection for people from the State.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

The law abiding public should not have to live in fear of the State if they say, when questioned, they do not agree with same sex marriage or if they express an opinion that they do not agree with same sex marriage. People who express such a view are already subject to hate speech or are called homophones which simply isn't true. It feels that no one is standing up for the rights of the majority in this instance.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

No, thank you.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

7 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

The bill has been introduced quickly and without due discussion and consultation. The government has no mandate to do this.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

I believe that marriage is the joining of a man and a woman for companionship and procreation.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

It seems that the proposal places all beliefs, regardless of their truth or validity on the same footing. This is foolishness.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

Civil partnerships offer legal rights and protection for couples.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

Neither
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

There is developing am intolerance to those who conscientiously disagree with same sex marriage. Freedom of speech would allow people to respectfully admit that they disagree. There is grave danger that teachers etc will lose their jobs for disagreeing with this. This is a situation we used to be shocked at happening in other countries and amounts to persecution

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

It is becoming more and more difficult to express your point of view due to intolerance of religious faith. It should be possible to respectfully disagree or abstain from certain activities.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Churches and ministers will find themselves in an impossible position. Their ordination vows are contrary to the this law. The European Court will definitely challenge any on the grounds of human rights. What about the rights of someone to cct according t

Are you responding as...

a private individual

8 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

We're all Jock Tamson's bairns. I also recall reading that the first recorded same sex marriage happened several hundred years before the birth of Christ. Which would mean the practice predates many, if not all, of the religious organisations that are opposing it.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

Why should someone's belief entitle them to anything more, or less, than anyone else? Marriage is about the love of two individuals, it should not be categorised as being more, or less, because of secular or spiritual belief.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

2 July 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

The Bill has been well-thought-out in all respects.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

It is important to remember that this is not introducing a wholly new concept. There are Scottish residents who will have been married under other legal systems. In the word of the US Supreme Court: “New York acted to enlarge the definition of marriage to correct what its citizens and elected representatives perceived to be an injustice that they had not earlier known or understood.” Same-sex marriage is not anti-family, it is pro-family. Not allowing recognition would, “[humiliate] tens of thousands of children now being raised by same-sex couples. [The Defense of Marriage Act] makes it even more difficult for the children to understand the integrity and closeness of their own family and its concord with other families in their community and in their daily lives.”

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

I have been to several opposite-sex humanist marriages and they are very meaningful things.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

The most vocal religious lobbies must not distort that there are other religious and belief groups and celebrants who are pro equality.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

The protections are more than sufficient. They have been well thought out and comply with Scottish and European law. There is a danger that if extended they will go too far. Under Apartheid, some churches genuinely believed that that mixed race relationships and marriages were an abomination and contrary to God’s will. That view would not today be afforded any respect so why the genuineness of homophobic views should allow for discrimination, real pain and suffering and inequality is beyond me.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

The pro lobby has been diplomatic whereas the anti lobby has said some outrageous and damaging things in the exercise of their freedom of speech, whilst of course maintaining that they are the moderates and the pro lobby are subversive extremists.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Laws are generally prospective - they address the future. Politicians should take note that when breaking down views on equality it is older persons that are largely anti and younger persons who are overwhelmingly pro. We cannot offer young persons jobs, homes and so on but we can offer them the equality they are clamouring for.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

28 June 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

I like to think that Scotland is capable of a fairer and brighter future, and this future could very soon become a reality with the publication, and hopefully, the successful passage of this bill through the Scottish Parliament. Marriage should be about love, not gender, and love should be equal regardless of the gender of your partner. Scotland has the opportunity to join countries like Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Denmark, France, Iceland, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, South Africa & Sweden, in making our society a fairer place, both for those who wish to enter into same sex marriage, but also for those religious bodies who wish to carry them out, whilst protecting religious bodies who wish to abstain from performing them.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

I think religious bodies should be able to opt in to performing same sex marriages.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

With marriage firmly about love, and not gender (nor transgender) identity, I would be firmly in support of transgender individuals being allowed to stay married and still obtaining a full GRC.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Whilst I respect views against gay marriage, I do not think there need to be many protections built into the legislation, other than allowing religious bodies who do not wish to carry out same sex marriages, the ability to abstain from doing so.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of speech is a pillar of democratic society, and I think, on the most part, that this freedom of speech has allowed both sides of the debate, to talk freely, in a mature and respectful way.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

27 June 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

Marriage must move-on from the one-dimensional legal position it has held until now - this is the 21st century; marriage should provide legal equality for all who wish to 'tie-the-knot'.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

In this 21st century, marriage is primarily about acknowledging the love between two adults, and ensuring underlying legal equality; having children might be important, but secondary to this core issue.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

The underlying fundamental is the statement of the two adult individuals to their 'bond'; for some this may be associate with commitment given before God, for others a non-God belief should have equal status.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

Equality should be the measure - whilst obligating the underlying seriousness of the solemn commitment being undertaken.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support
if the two adult individuals in a civil partnership wish to elevate their commitment to the higher level implied by marriage, they should be able to do this.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

The underlying measure should, again, be equality - same-gender marriage should be legalised as per other marriages to date.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

Religious communities should have the right to opt-out, but no right to impose their beliefs & constraints on those who believe otherwise.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

- with qualification. The background marriage involves two equal individuals. A transgendered person should have rights, but not the right to unilaterally stay married if the other individual wishes otherwise.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Equality must be the measure. This legislation is about enabling same-gender marriage to be equal in law, but any change to the law should not jeopardise the equal right of individuals who wish a particular outlook on the [then equal] status of marriage. Protections must be in-built for those who have concerns about same-gender marriage, but such protections must prevent those with such concerns imposing their stance on others.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of speech must be tempered by the obligation not to use such freedoms, either explicitly or by more subtle messages/actions, to suppress others.
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

27 June 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Same sex couples should be treated in exactly the same way as other couples. Although civil partnerships have (as far as I know) the same rights as marriage, ‘equality’ goes beyond that strict definition; as long as there is marriage for heterosexual couples and civil partnerships for ‘the others’, there will be a distinction between them.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

"Protecting" those who object to same sex marriage is legally sanctioning discrimination. Having 'concerns' about, say, mixed race marriages would never be considered acceptable nor worthy of protection in law. Specifically, any organisation that receives state support, either direct or in kind (e.g., tax relief as a charity), should be required to fully support same sex marriage including the use of their premises for ceremonies.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of speech' is the freedom to make comments that others may disagree with - it is not the freedom to tell me how I should act. Democracy is the state of accepting the majority view, not the weighted opinion of interested parties.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

27 June 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

As a Christian I fully support equal marriage. Marriage is not a timeless immutable God-given institution. Not so long ago marriage was a property transaction of the woman moving from her father's to her husband's ownership. What is truly Christian is all those places, times and events where love is found and cherished and celebrated. Whether it is between opposite or same-sex couples, where love is, Christ is and that should be honoured and celebrated!

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

It makes sense for all options to be available to all.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Strongly support this.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Sadly, no safeguards will satisfy them. History will show their opposition in the same light as those who used the bible to justify slavery and interracial marriages.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

27 June 2013
Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air a’ Bhile san fharsaingeachd?

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air toirt a-steach pòsadh den aon ghnè, gus am faod càraidean den aon ghnè pòsadh a chèile?

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air a bhith a’ cur dhaoine le feallsanachd (belief celebrants) air an aon rèir ri daoine le creideamh (religious celebrants)?

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air na h-ullachaidhean gus ùghdarras a thoir do luchd-pòsaidh pòsaidhean den ghnè eile agus den aon ghnè a shòlaimeachadh (a’ gabhail a-steach nam modhan-obraichaidh tagadh-a-steach [opt in])?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

Neither

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air com-pàirteachasan siobhalta ag atharrachadh gu bhith nam pòsaidhean?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air leigeil le pòsaidhean siobhalta tachairt ann an àite sam bith, ach a-mhàn ionadan co-ceangailte ri creideamh, a tha air aontachadh eadar a’ chàraid agus an neach-clàraidh?
How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In opposition

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air ceadachadh clàradh feallsanachd is creideimh (religious and belief registration) de chom-pàirteachasan siobhalta?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air leigil le daoine tar-ghnèitreach cumail orra pòsta an dèidh dhaibh Teisteanas Aithneachadh-gnè fhaighinn (Gender Recognition Certificate), rud a bheir aithneachadh laghail anns a’ ghnè a fhuairadh?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Am bu mhath leat beachd a nochdadh air a’ cheist fharsaing mu dhion airson daoine a dh’fhaodadh a bhith iomagaineach mu phòsadh den aon ghnè?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Am bu mhath leat beachd a nochdadh air a’ cheist fharsaing mu shaorsa cainnte?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Am bu mhath leat beachd a nochdadh air ceist farsaing sam bith eile co-ceangailte ris a’ Bhile air nach deach iomradh a thoirt gu h-àrd?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

A bheil thu a’ freagairt mar...

Are you responding as...
Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air a’ Bhile san fharsaingeachd?

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air toirt a-steach pòsadh den aon ghnè, gus am faod càraidean den aon ghnè pòsadh a chèile?

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air a bhith a’ cur dhaoine le feallsanachd (belief celebrants) air an aon rèir ri daoine le creideamh (religious celebrants)?

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air na h-ullachaidhean gus ùghdarras a thocht do luchd-pòsaidh pòsaidhean den ghnè eile agus den aon ghnè a shòlaimeachadh (a’ gabhall a-steach nam modhan-obraichaidh tagadh-a-steach [opt in])?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air com-pàirteachasan siobhalta ag atharrachadh gu bhith nam pòsaidhean?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air leigeil le pòsaidhean siobhalta tachairt ann an aite sam bith, ach a-mhàn ionadan co-ceangailte ri creideamh, a tha air aontachadh eadar a’ chàraid agus an neach-clàraidh?
How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air ceadachadh clàradh feal'sanachd is creideimh (religious and belief registration) de chom-pàirteachasan siobhalta?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air leigel le daoine tar-ghnèitheach cumail orra pòsta an dèithd dhaibh Teisteanas Aithneachadh-gnè fhaighinn (Gender Recognition Certificate), rud a bheir aithneachadh laghail anns a' ghnè a fhuairadh?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Am bu mhath leat beachd a nochdadh air a' cheist fharsaing mu dhion airson daoine a dh'fhaoadadh a bhith iomagaineach mu phòsadh den aon ghnè?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Am bu mhath leat beachd a nochdadh air a' cheist fharsaing mu shaorsa cainnte?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Am bu mhath leat beachd a nochdadh air ceist farsaing sam bith eile co-ceangailte ris a' Bhile air nach deach iomradh a thoirt gu h-àrd?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

A bheil thu a’ freagairt mar...

Are you responding as...
A private individual

10 JULY 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

I dislike any person or group, whether religious or otherwise, having the permission to discriminate against anybody, but I accept this bill as a balance between both sides.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

Ciamar a chomharraiceadh tu na beachdan agad air a’ Bhile san fharsaingeachd?

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

Ciamar a chomharraiceadh tu na beachdan agad air toirt a-steach pòsadh den aon ghnè, gus am faod càraidean den aon ghnè pòsadh a chèile?

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

Ciamar a chomharraiceadh tu na beachdan agad air a bhith a’ cur dhaoine le feallsanachd (belief celebrants) air an aon rèir ri daoine le creideamh (religious celebrants)?

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

S beag orm cead a thoirt do dhuine no buidheann sam bith leth-bhreith a dheanamh an aghaidh duine sam bith, creideamh ann no às ach ghabhainn ris a’ bhile seo mar chothromachadh eadar an dà thaobh.

I dislike any person or group, whether religious or otherwise, having the permission to discriminate against anybody, but I accept this bill as a balance between both sides.

Ciamar a chomharraiceadh tu na beachdan agad air na h-ullachaidhean gus ùghdarras a thoir do luchd-pòsaidh pòsaidhean den ghnè eile agus den aon ghnè a shòlaimeachadh (a’ gabhail a-steach nam modhan-obrachaidh taghadh-a-steach [opt in])?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support
How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air leigeil le pòsaidhean siobhalta tachairt ann an àite sam bith, ach a-mhàin ionadan co-ceangailte ri creideamh, a tha air aontachadh eadar a’ chàraid agus an neach-clàraidh?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air ceadachadh clàradh feallsanachd is creideimh (religious and belief registration) de chom-pàirteachasan siobhalta?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

Ciamar a chomharraicheadh tu na beachdan agad air leigeil le daoine tar-ghnèitheach cumail orra pòsta an dèidh dhaibh Teisteanas Aithneachadh-gnè fhaighinn (Gender Recognition Certificate), rud a bheir aithneachadh laghail anns a’ ghnè a fhuaireadh?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Am bu mhath leat beachd a nochdadh air a’ cheist fharsaing mu dhion airson daoine a dh’fhaoaadh a bhith iomagaineach mu phòsadh den aon ghnè?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Chan eil seo a’ toirt air falbh cead no dion o dhuine sam bith nach eil airson cuideigin dhen aon ghnè a phòsadh agus leis nach e theocracy a th’ againn, cha ghabh mi ri argamaid creideimh sam bith ‘In opposition. Tha pòsadh co-sheòrsach laghail ann am barrachd air dusan duthchannan air feadh an t-saoghail ’s cha dàinig crioch air an t-saoghal fhathast, tha e san dearbh staing a bha e roimhe sin.

This doesn’t detract from the protection or rights of anybody who does not wish to marry those of the same-sex and as we don’t live in a theocracy, I don’t accept any religious argument in opposition to it. Same-sex marriage is legal in more than 12 countries around the world and the world hasn’t come to an end yet, it’s still in the same state it was in before.
Am bu mhath leat beachd a nochdadh air a' cheist fharsaing mu shaorsa cainnte?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Chan eil e furasta sgaradh a dhèanamh eadar saorsa cainnte agus gràin-chainnt uaireannan ach san fharsaingeachd, 's e saorsa cainnte an rud nas prìseil na dion o ghràin-chainnt.

It sometimes isn’t easy to distinguish between freedom of speech and hate-speak but in general, freedom of speech is more valuable than protection from hate-speak.

Am bu mhath leat beachd a nochdadh air ceist farsaing sam bith eile co-ceangailte ris a' Bhile air nach deach iomradh a thoirt gu h-àrd?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

A bheil thu a' freagairt mar...

Are you responding as...

A private individual

10 JULY 2013
Responding to the Equal Opportunities Committee's Call for Evidence.

Question 4

As this huge, fundamental and all-pervading change in society was not contained in the Manifesto of any party in the Scottish Parliament, I consider it undemocratic.

Question 12

As a former teacher in Special Education I have a certain sympathy with those who come into this world different in any way from mainstream, and would most certainly refute the label 'homophobic'. I am not afraid of a homosexual person but I am afraid of a totalitarian state. However, I do not understand why there is such a huge campaign for this in a society where marriage is no longer defined, civil partnerships are legal, and those born with this orientation constitute a very small percentage of the population. Protection for the mainstream is imperative.

Question 13

Please ponder this note. I gather that the former S.N.P. MSP, Gordon Wilson was dismissed from his post with the Citizens' Advice Bureau for this very reason that he agreed with traditional marriage (or words to that effect.)
Continued from Page 10

Gordon Wilson I seem to recall was the First Speaker of the Scottish Parliament.

Freedom of Speech?

What hope is there for teachers, people wishing to adopt/celebrate, beliefs of any church or indeed for anyone else?

Please remember that when freedom of speech is denied, eventually no one, whatever oriention, belief or lack of it will have freedom of speech.

My plea is for democracy in this land of ancient freedom.

23 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Why do they need protection? Same sex marriage will have no effect other than making sure everyone is entitled to some basic human rights.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?
Are you responding as...

15 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

It will be a huge step forward for equality in Scotland, and it balances equality with respect for freedom of religion and freedom of speech.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

It is very important that the bill does not create two different versions of marriage, same-sex marriage and mixed-sex marriage, because that would lead to continued discrimination. The law should treat all marriages the same, regardless of the genders of the spouses.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

Religious and belief organisations should be free to decide for themselves whether to solemnise only mixed-sex marriages, or same-sex marriages as well. Religious freedom should apply to both groups, and the bill gets the balance right. The opt-in procedures in the bill are the appropriate way to do this, and, together with the amendments to the Equality Act 2010 which have been agreed with the UK Government, protect the religious freedom of religious bodies and of their members who participate in marriage ceremonies. A small amendment is needed to section 11(2) of the bill, in order to give those religious and belief bodies that want to, the option of using the gender-free form of the marriage ceremony, in section 11(2)(g), for mixed-sex couples who would prefer that form. This is particularly important for mixed-sex couples where one or both is transgender or intersex. Religious bodies that wish to always use the “husband and wife” gendered form of the marriage ceremony should be free to continue to do so.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support
In the bill, couples who are already in a civil partnership can only marry in Scotland if their civil partnership was registered in Scotland. I see no reason why couples in a civil partnership registered elsewhere should not be allowed to marry in Scotland in the usual way. Not allowing this would cause real problems for couples who registered a civil partnership abroad and then moved to Scotland. They will be unable to change to a marriage unless they first dissolve their civil partnership. But that requires proving that the civil partnership has irretrievably broken down, by living apart for a year. It is very unfair to ask civil partners to do that in order to marry. Even if they return to the country where they registered their civil partnership, if that country does not allow same-sex marriage, they would need to dissolve their civil partnership there in a similar way before coming back to Scotland to marry. The practical result will be that the couple will effectively be barred from marrying. In contrast, same-sex couples from any part of the world who are not in a civil partnership will be allowed come to Scotland to marry, whether or not that marriage would be recognised in their home country. I see no reason why this should not also apply to couples who are already in a civil partnership, and believe that the bill should be amended to allow this.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

15 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support
We think that some parts of the bill could still be improved further

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

A small amendment is needed to section 11(2) of the bill, in order to give those religious and belief bodies that want to, the option of using the gender-free form of the marriage ceremony, in section 11(2)(g), for mixed-sex couples who would prefer that form.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

couples who are already in a civil partnership can only marry in Scotland if their civil partnership was registered in Scotland. Clearly the lightweight administrative procedure for changing to a marriage can only work with civil partnerships registered here in Scotland, but I see no reason why couples in a civil partnership registered elsewhere should not be allowed to marry in Scotland in the usual way.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

I believe that spousal consent should not be required for the granting of gender recognition, but should instead be required for the subsequent re-registration of the marriage and the issue of a new marriage certificate. As at present, the non-trans spouse would continue to be able to obtain a divorce in such circumstances, if they wished to end the marriage. A provision for simpler medical evidence for long-term transitioned people should be added to the bill - this would assist the Gender Recognition Panel as well as applicants. I would also like to see the minimum age for applying for gender recognition brought into line with the minimum age for marrying in Scotland, that is, 16.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

The bill is a huge step forward for equality, but it does not introduce full equal marriage. Apart from the issues mentioned under questions 7, 8 and 11 above, the main thing missing from the bill is the introduction of mixed-sex civil partnerships. That has always been a part of the wider Equal Marriage campaign in Scotland. I believe that the same choices - marriage or civil partnership - should be open to all couples regardless of their gender. I therefore welcome the Scottish Government’s public commitment on 27th June 2013 to conduct a review of civil partnership law, driven by the need to consider the position on opposite sex civil partnership. I believe that review should start without delay, and, once it is complete, there should be prompt legislation to open up civil partnership in Scotland to couples regardless of their gender. This will also make it possible for a person in a civil partnership to get gender recognition without the need to change their civil partnership to a marriage. Finally, I note that the regulation of private sector pension schemes is reserved to Westminster, and that under the current rules, private sector pension schemes will be allowed to pay much smaller survivor’s pensions to people in same-sex marriages than to those in mixed-sex marriages. This is clear discrimination, and the UK Government has agreed to set up a review of the situation, to report by July 2014. The UK Government have the power to change the rules on this by statutory instrument, and I strongly believe that they should do that once the review is complete.
Are you responding as...

15 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

All people should be allowed to marry, to show commitment to one another! Gay people have been forced to be different for years! Why can't this loving union be called a marriage, why yet again must it be called something different! Everyone knows the word marriage everyone understands the connotations behind the word! So why must gay people be singled out again and forced to call their loving union a partnership? a civil partnership when its nothing less than a "marriage"! This isn't a question of anything other than wrong and right! It's discrimination, however you want to sugar coat it! It's unacceptable and it has to stop!

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

100% agree this should be an option for ANYONE who wants it!

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

Fully support this!

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

This should happen, as my previous answer explains!

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support
They should be carried out anywhere and everywhere the same as marriage including religious premise if the minister/priest sees fit to conduct the marriage.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

Everyone should be entitled to a wedding and everyone should be entitled to a civil partnership regardless of sexual orientation!

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

If their spouse is supporting them through and staying with them through their transition why should the government be allowed to strip that person of their support system?! It's wrong, so wrong! They should be allowed to stay married and there shouldn't even be a discussion about this!

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Look at your own marriage, what does it mean to you? do you love your spouse? Do you want your children to know that his/her parents wanted to show the world how committed they were to one another? Don't you want your parents, your a family & your friends to celebrate this union? If your answer was yes, which surely it was, then don't you think gay people want this too? The fundamental reason for marriage, as above, is to show these things to your partner, to everyone! I want the world to know I love my spouse for better for worse and until death us do part, why shouldn't Gay people be allowed to tell the world that in the same way as heterosexual people do? I'm ashamed to think that Scotland even has to question this! Its not about gay and straight, it's not about religion, it's not about my opinion nor is it about yours! This is a matter of right & wrong and we currently live in a society that tells our children, our next generation that its ok to discriminate! That is what's wrong with scotland today! It is shameful! Do the right thing voteless or same sex marriage and try and restore some equality!

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

15 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

It represents an important step forward for equality making Scotland a more free and fairer society.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

'Equal but different' is not equal. That is why civil partnerships are not sufficient and why it is important that there is no distinction between 'mixed sex' and 'same sex marriage', simply having marriage for all is what is required.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

Various religious bodies want to conduct same sex marriages, to prevent them from doing so would be madness. With those who do not the option to conduct only mixed sex marriage is in the bill, this does however enshrine in law the right of religion to refuse a service based on sexuality while it is not allowed to refuse them a service on grounds of religion. Is this something we want to do?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

Those who want to should be allowed to, those who don't should not be forced.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

I can see no reason why it should not be so.
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

I can't see why anyone would want it but if there is a call for it why not?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

For many reasons yes. Other people will doubtless put it better but from the point of view of simplifying a difficult process and not involving getting remarried or in a difficult relationship the spouse blocking the gender recognition I strongly support this. The bill is also currently missing a provision that was added to the corresponding English legislation, allowing a person to obtain gender recognition with simpler evidence requirements if they have been transitioned for at least six years. When a person has been transitioned for a long time, it can be very difficult indeed to obtain all the medical evidence that is required from people who have only been transitioned two years. The doctors involved may have retired or even died. We therefore believe that a provision for simpler medical evidence for long-term transitioned people should be added to the bill – this would assist the Gender Recognition Panel as well as applicants.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

To those with concerns I strongly recommend not marrying someone of the same sex. Otherwise I fail to see how it affects any but those who benefit from it. A greater degree of equality can only improve society.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

The introduction of mixed sex civil partnerships would be welcome. Equality works both ways.

Are you responding as...

15 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

Marriage predates history, is the principal foundation & continuation of human society, and in its function as continuer of human society depends upon the reproduction, care & upbringing of children -- ideally by both a male and a female partner. Some of this is embedded in our language, since the word "matrimony" is derived from the Latin word for "mother". There is no need for same-sex marriage, since these partnerships already have sufficient legal rights.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

This is because I am against any special privileges being given to the members of religions. Beliefs are always personal to the believer, whether s/he is a member of a religion or not. However, the fact that anyone holds a particular belief does not nec

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

Since I am against same sex marriage, I am against this.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

I have no objection to this.
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Neither

I have not considered this question.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Conscientious objections to same-sex marriage are thoroughly justified, and any legislation which renders it for a moment possible to haul such objectors into court must be seen as deplorable. Freedom of thought and speech make it essential that objections to single-sex marriage remain perfectly legal, admissible, and printable. “Equality law” goes too far if it for a moment prevents people being able to speak their minds, and discuss these matters openly.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

See my reply to Question 12. I understand that there is a danger that people who express unpopular opinions may be removed from their posts -- and that this has even happened on occasion. We must resist the tyrannical view that only one opinion is admissible, and that nobody should ever rear his head against the "conventional wisdom", particularly since that shifts about all the time. Discussing such matters as who should marry whom is not -- repeat, not -- an act of discrimination. Nor should it become so even if the law is changed. Free speech is absolutely essential to the fair and proper running of a country, and we should always remember that.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

I think that's enough for the moment.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

I am responding as one who has always been interested in political & philosophical questions, and who regards this as an important one.

15 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
In support

Isn't it more pertinent to educate, rather than protect, those with small minds?
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

15 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

Me and my partner of 19 years would like to get married before we lose any more parents as it would mean a lot to them and we have both always considered civil partnerships a sidestep and an insult so it was never an option.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

I am a Humanist and my partner a secularist so why should our choice of celebrant have less rights.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

you should recognise all civil partnerships for conversion to marriage for any couples that have moved here and also those born in scotland who had to go abroad to get a civil partnership before the UK allowed it.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

Why should any organisation have a monopoly also for scotland this is essential for growing the tourist wedding market that could be a major industry here.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

very important for some people

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Their family unit has enough to deal with without you messing them around over paperwork irrelevancies.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

They shouldn't be forced (although this is another reason religions have no business being paid to provide public services) however if they work for council or government then they are paid to serve the people not their own prejudices. It should be said this is no different to mixed race marriages in the strength of peoples 'beliefs' however as the churches no longer control access to marriage this is a fight for people in their own organisations.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

This will make no difference to freedom of speech as people can say what they like about different forms of marriage now so can and will continue to do so.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

I'm sad it's taken so long as my partners mother sadly died before being able to see her child happily married; I hope we don't have to loose any more before we can celebrate as a family in Scotland.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

15 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

15 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In opposition

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

15 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

I am in a same sex relationship and feel that being told you cannot get married like a "normal couple" makes me feel like we are thought of as being different

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

It would make me feel more even in society

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

15 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

I was brought up with strict religious views and was taught that homosexuality is a sin. There are lots of sins - but the church says that homosexuality is the sin of all sins!! For decades I believed this - I never understood why, I just did. In my view gays were not proper people. Then my world turned upside down. My Son told me he was gay. I was disgusted and revolted - How can he do this to us? How can he turn his back on God? This was the worst news possible. I believed he would be better off dead. After some time I realised that my Son did not choose to be gay - he was born that way. He didn't turn his back on God - he was just being an honest man and living the life he was dealt. As a parent I was devastated to learn about the suffering he had endured his whole life, and worse still how I had contributed to this. Learning he was often discriminated against, and had even been bashed just because he was gay. I felt so guilty learning he had been seeing a psychiatrist for 18 months - all because I was not there to support my Son - and worse still my outdated view on homosexuality were contributing to my Son's feelings of isolation and oppression. I love both my children equally and I want them to be treated equally - this is a matter of basic human dignity. A person's fundamental rights, including the right to marry, should not be affected by their sexual orientation. How can I tell my Son he has less rights than my daughter has? Could you tell your own child this? I can not justify this. Society is stronger when couples make vows to each other and love and support each other. I want marriage for my gay son. Religions can decide who they want to marry, but it's not OK for the state to discriminate. It's time to understand the state can not be in the business of discrimination - the state must introduce civil marriage for all citizens.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

15 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

15 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

All societies that consider themselves to be civilised should seek equality for all its citizens without exception.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

I think civil partnerships should still be available but also be made available for heterosexual couples too.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

As long as religious celebrants are given the same freedom to conduct wedding ceremonies anywhere, other than religious premises - as is the situation currently with heterosexual couples and religious celebrants.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Why would we want to make life any more difficult for these people?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

We don't provide protection for those in society who may have concerns about race issues or disability issues so why should we protect those who wish to discriminate against same sex couples who simply seek to have their love for each other officially recognised in the form of marriage, just like any other (heterosexual) loving couple. Some Christians believe the bible condemns Homosexuality and therefore so should we. But then the bible also supports slavery and we'd not allow them to have slaves so let's just put the faith nonsense to one side as it is simply another example of some churches making themselves irrelevant in today's society.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I would support anyone's right to voice their opinion but not to voice derogatory, threatening or offensive opinions. People have the right to freedom of speech but that speech has to be diplomatically inoffensive.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

I don't believe that public employees should be given the opportunity to opt out of certain parts of their jobs simply because they don't want to recognise the right of homosexual couples to get married. Racists are not allowed to opt out and nor should anyone else.

Are you responding as...

a celebrant

15 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support
It is time for equality for all.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support
Why not? It means a lot to a lot of people, this right of passage.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support
The bill should not force religious people to change their beliefs but yes opting in or out of doing a same sex ceremony is good

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
Neither
Legally they are similar but everyone should be able to either have a civil partnership or marriage. Because that is a matter of choice.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
As I was preparing to write this submission, I received a call from the local Social Work department with a request to deliver a food and toiletries parcel for a lady who has just been discharged from hospital. She has no food so I ensured that she was given plenty supplies from our Church’s store cupboard. I did not meet her so I have no idea if she is old, young, black, white, gay or straight; all I did was respond to a need without prejudice. However, I feel it is quite ironic that the state will accept hand outs from Churches (consider the number of Church run food banks that are opening all over the country!) but it appears that people of faith are to be forbidden to express their views openly on the redefinition of marriage.

I am sure that politicians of all persuasions regard their policies as sacrosanct. Listening to debates from both parliaments leaves one in no doubt that you do not readily embrace views of other parties and consider this freedom of thought and speech to be your right. As Christians, what we believe is very precious to us. This includes the belief that marriage is the union between a man and a woman. Is our freedom of thought and speech going to be denied and are we in danger of litigation if we express our views?

The case of Rev Brian Ross, who was removed from his post as a police chaplain in Strathclyde because of his personal beliefs about marriage, proves that, even before your committee has discussed Stage 1 of the Bill, sanctions are already in place. How hypocritical and undemocratic!

Chambers dictionary definition states that: ‘marriage is the ceremony, act, or contract by which a man and woman become husband and wife; the union of a man and woman as husband and wife.’ Statistics prove that children brought up in families with fathers and mothers are more secure and successful. While I appreciate that bereavement and divorce can alter this situation and many single parents provide stable homes, the ideal is undoubtedly a unit where there are both male and female nurturers. Same sex couples cannot provide this necessary balance nor can they procreate naturally.

Rights are obviously not an issue as all the rights of marriage are already available through civil partnerships. Politicians’ attempts to reassure Church leaders, teachers, social workers, parents, grandparents and individuals that they will not face legal action if they express a different view, do not reassure me and I feel these are empty promises. Why are our leaders deliberately allowing a law that will discriminate with such militancy against one group in order to favour another?

What about the local florist. Will she be forced to provide the flowers for a same sex ‘marriage’ against her beliefs? Will the local photographer be taken to court if he declines to take pictures of a civil partnership? Already in England, a gay couple are preparing to sue a Church which does not agree with this type of ceremony. Are gays going to use Churches, Christian businesses and the ordinary Christian worker as milch cows?
Unfortunately, this whole issue makes one cynical.

After I finish this letter, I will be working on a reapplication for Fairtrade Status which has to be completed by 13th September. Later today, I hope to write up the minute of a meeting which was held last night concerning bringing Street Pastors to our town. In the evening, I will be attending a committee meeting of another local group. This is how I choose to spend my retirement – like so many other people of faith quietly helping the less fortunate and trying to improve our area. Yet, in spite of being involved in all these Community activities, I am to be gagged because of my views on redefining marriage unless watertight protection is enshrined in law.

Please remember as you consider this document, that gay marriage is only one aspect of life involving a small percentage of the population, yet it is pervading through each and every part of society. Freedom of speech must be protected in a fair and democratic country. I would hope that the Committee will be balanced and unbiased. Remember that as politicians, you are elected to represent the whole population.

21 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
4. How would you characterise your views on the bill in General

5. How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

6. How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

7. How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt in procedures)?

8. How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriage?

9. How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and the registrar?

10. How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnership?

11. How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender recognition certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

12. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protection of those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

13. Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

14. Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the bill that are not mentioned above?

My main response is in relation to the bill as a whole. I do not feel that, in its present form, the bill is fit for purpose. The wording is unclear and ambiguous. I do not believe in its present form the bill will achieve its objective if it becomes law. It is my submission that the bill requires significant redrafting. I have the following points to make. All references to the draft bill are in italics:-

1. clause 1(2)(c) which purports to amend the Marriage(Scotland) Act 1977: (b) in the case of a marriage between persons of the same sex...
   In my view this is ambiguous and lacking in specification. To describe a marriage as between 'persons' is not clear that there are two persons to the marriage.
2. Clause 1(3) which introduces a new marriage schedule 1, degrees of relationship: The explanatory notes by the minister state that the schedule is simplifying the schedule 1 of the Marriage(Scotland)Act 1977 as amended, but is this the case?

My understanding is that schedule 1 of the Marriage (Scotland) Act 1977 was amended by the Marriage (Prohibited degrees of relationship) Act 1986. This contains the prohibited degree of affinity in relationship regarding mother of former wife, former wife of son, father of former husband and former husband of daughter. Were these missed out from the new schedule in error?

3. Clause 4 (3) References (however expressed) in any enactment to two people who are (or were) not married to, nor in civil partnership with, each other but who are (or were) living together as if they were married to each other

This provision concerns me for a number of reasons. It lacks specification- how can a reference to the new type of marriage be defined in relation to an established marriage? Secondly, the 'two people' are not defined. What if they were within the forbidden degrees of relationship? What if they were not legally able to marry even if the law was changed? What if they are already married to someone else? Is it the intention of Parliament to give the status of marriage to people who are perhaps not legally able to marry for whatever reason?

4. Clause 4(10) References (However expressed) in any document...Are references to marriage whether between persons of different sexes...

In my view this is unclear? How many 'persons' can be party to the marriage? It may be implied as two but this should be said expressly.

5. Clause 4(13) 'marriage' means marriage between persons of different sex and marriage between persons of the same sex.

Again in my view this is unclear. How many persons are we talking about?

6. Clause 5(2) ... marriage between persons of different sexes.

Again, 'persons' is misleading.

7. Clause 5(3) ... in relation to marriage between persons of the same sex, adultery has the same meaning as it has in relation to marriage between persons of different sexes.

This is a difficult one to unravel. The reference to 'persons' twice makes the meaning far from clear anyway. But what is this provision designed to achieve? Marriage between one man and one woman can be dissolved on the ground of the adultery of one of the parties to the marriage. How can this be extended to same sex marriage? On the basis that one of the parties to the marriage commits adultery with a person of the opposite sex? Is it possible to discern this from the current wording? In my view, no, this is not possible.

Is it the intention of Parliament that this provision, if implemented will retrospectively change the civil partnership to marriage, as this is not specified?

Clause 8(2)(g) refers to regulations about the 'effect' of the change. Should this important matter not be expressed in the bill rather than delegated legislation after the fact?

9. Clause 9 Effect of marriage between civil partners in a qualifying civil partnership

Clause 9(1)(b) refers to civil partners as being treated as married from the date that civil partnership was registered. The explanatory document from the minister makes no mention of retrospective provisions. Is this the intention of Parliament?
10. Clause 10 Persons who may solemnise a marriage

In clause 10 (2)(a)(ii) the reference again is to persons of different sexes.

This is unclear and should in my view be made more specific.

11. Clause 11 Registration of nominated persons as celebrants

In clause 11(2)(a)(ii) the reference is again to persons of different sexes, and in clause 11(2)(c)(iii) marriages between persons of the same sex.

My previous points apply: the wording is far from clear and in my view should be changed to give clarity. The same reference to persons is found in clause 11(2)(f), (g) and (h).

This provision seeks to protect freedom of expression in its title. In my view there is nothing in the clause itself which gives any protection. If the intention of Parliament is to give protection to freedom of expression and other convention rights this should be expressly stated in the body of the bill. It should for example, make clear, as has been referred to in many press reports, that no one shall be compelled to solemnise a marriage between two people of the same sex. If it is the intention of Parliament to give the right of conscientious objection this should also be expressly stated.

15. I am responding to this call for evidence as a lawyer.

22 August 2013
Question 4

I believe that this bill is unnecessary and undemocratic. No party, either in Scottish Parliament or Westminster had this in their manifestos (and neither was it in the Queen’s Speech - she is still Queen of Scotland after all). The bill was introduced very quickly and the vast majority of people were unaware of its introduction. Very many people...
Q. 4 cont.

People are unaware of the present stage of the bill but LGBT pressure groups, funded by the government, will be pushing for this legislation. SPEQ are not ensuring maximum response from the general public because the general public do not go on line (even on line I was unable to continue beyond P. 1.)

Q. 5.
Where is this going to end? - like U.S. and Canada - attempts to legalize polygamy and as in some countries even 3-way relationships, ? I believe that marriage is between one man and one woman and that governments are taking to themselves powers with which they have not been invested, in changing the meaning of marriage and even our language - doing away with "father", "mother" - names cherished since time immemorial. It is the imposition of minority and state views on ordinary families. I think this is not only undemocratic but verging on totalitarian.

Q. 6 and Q. 7.

No celebrants should feel coerced into compromising their beliefs nor forced out of a job because they hold the belief that marriage is the union of one man and one woman for the mutual benefit of the spouses and for the normal and natural procreation of children, thus forming a family unit.
Q. 8.
Civil partnerships were created to give legal rights (e.g. inheritance) to same sex couples. Fair enough. C.P.'s should not be changed to marriage because that is not marriage.

Q. 9.
Civil marriages already take place anywhere couple chooses. People with religious beliefs generally choose religious premises. (I'm not really sure what this question is supposed to mean).

Q. 10.
I really do not understand this question.

Q. 11.
I believe this is a completely different issue and has little to do with the proposed legislation. It seems misleading.

Q. 12.
Many people are already being "affected" by equality laws - equality which does not recognise that the largely heterosexual population's rights should be preserved. Faith based adoption agencies asked to remove their religious ethos; people who disagree with same sex education not allowed to foster or adopt children; People who have conscientious objection and refuse to endorse this legislation are not guaranteed protection.
Q. 12. cont.

There must be protections in equality law to ensure that religious groups and those who oppose the re-definition of marriage are not treated less favourably by public authorities and employers. Charity laws should ensure that disagreement with this legislation will not cause the removal of charitable status. Really, I think that there is too much to lose for the majority if equality laws are deemed to favour only those who approve of the proposed re-definition of marriage.

Q. 13.

People who support “marriage” as has been understood “from the beginning” as the natural law and the normal way to beget children through procreation are now often accused of discrimination, “gross misconduct” — as in the case of Adrian Smith — the removal from his post of the Police chaplain — a breach of their equality policy. "Equality" seems skewed in favour of Same-sex so that people are almost afraid of being seen or heard to support the long-standing definition of marriage. People are vilified, called "bigots" in some cases even "anti-Christian".
Legislation should be put in place to safeguard freedom of speech and freedom of thought. No person should be compelled to agree with same-sex unions or be penalised in any way for expressing their disagreement. At present it seems that only the rights of LGBT adults are being considered. In a democratic society the views of the vast majority who hold to the traditional meaning of marriage should surely be respected.

As things stand, any two adults can live together. There is no law against this. Same-sex unions focus only on the rights of adults. Marriage is more than the love of two people. It usually focuses on the rights of children and children have a right to be brought up by a mother and father. (Of course there are marriage breakdowns but there is no guarantee that same-sex unions will be any different - in fact, I read that they are much shorter lived than opposite sex partnerships). Already, the family is being undermined by changing the language and making the names "mother" and "father" irrelevant.
Q. 14. cont.

It is not right and indeed it is most unfair to our children to change the names 'mother' and 'father' and give them instead 'Parent 1 and 2'. Children have an unspoken right to a (male) father and (female) mother. This same sex legislation will undermine the family and destroy civilised society.

I truly hope that the Equal Opportunities Committee will realise that the rights of the vast majority of heterosexual people are already being eroded and people are being silenced by so-called "equality" legislation which favours only LGBT groups and same-sex unions. C.P.s already have the same legal right as marriage and it is unnecessary to introduce this legislation or indeed write it into the statute books.

23 August 2013
In response to Question 5:

The law has never fundamentally altered the essential nature of marriage - a lifelong commitment between one man and one woman. The plan to redefine marriage is therefore radical and unprecedented. The family has been the backbone of society throughout the years. Marriage predates law, nation and church. It is not clear what new legal rights
(If any) same-sex couples would receive which they do not already have through civil partnerships.

2) As an institution, marriage has been understood as much more than the love between two people - a man and a woman not only committed to one another but to any children their union may create.

In response to Question 12: —

I was involved in the education of primary school children for more than 35 years and am concerned that many parents and teachers will have deeply-held views about their children being taught about same-sex marriage in the classroom.

While the law requires schools to provide religious education, it also protects atheist teachers from being compelled to teach it. Similar space should be given to teachers who (for religious convictions) or otherwise, do not feel able to teach about same-sex marriage.

Many parents will be unaware what their children are being taught so they should have a legal right to know if such lessons will take place.
I am concerned that people who have a conscientious objection and who work in the public sector may lose their jobs or be unable to work in certain professions if they refuse to endorse same-sex marriage. Conscience clauses should be introduced in employment and equality laws to allow employees who believe in marriage (as currently defined) not to be forced to participate in same-sex marriage ceremonies. Church and celebrants who refuse to marry same-sex couples will be susceptible to litigation. There seems to be no guarantee that in the future the Court will not rule that religion and belief celebrants must either conduct all marriages or cease to marry people altogether.

Believing in the current definition of marriage must not be used by public sector employers to dispute or question the equality and diversity credentials of existing or prospective employees.
There should be protections in equality law to ensure that religious groups that oppose the new definition of marriage are not treated less favourably by public authorities.

People fostering or adopting (who hold traditional views about marriage) should be secured, in doing this or fostering through legislative change not just through amending guidance (by the Government.)
In response to Question 13:
(Wider issue of freedom of speech.)

There are naturally different views on same-sex marriage and many people hold to the historic and long-standing definition of marriage, which is a belief worthy of respect in a democratic society. People who support this view are now often accused of discrimination (false allegations against employees and employers can be intimidating and may result in disproportionate action.)

In recent years, the vilification of those stating traditional beliefs about marriage has created a chilling effect on free speech. In theory, religion or belief is a protected characteristic that should be defended under equality law—whereas in practice, equality law has been used to create a culture in which people feel that legitimate views can no longer be aired.

More robust safeguards are needed to ensure that no person will be compelled to express agreement with a same-sex marriage or be punished for expressing their disagreement with it. Specific amendments are really necessary to protect the right to free speech and debate. They need to apply across public order and equality laws, including employment and goods and services.
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

Each individual should have the freedom to live their life as they see fit. Everyone should have the same opportunity and not be discriminated against

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
The marriage of two people should not concern anyone but the people involved in it.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support
Equality for all!

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support
Equality for all!

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

Do not understand question!

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support
Equality for all!

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support
Equality for all!

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

As I am not religious I do not care.
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Equality for all.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

For those who are against same sex marriage. Would you like to be told who you may marry? Look at history before marriage was introduced and before wedding rings were introduced. Why should we all be forced to accept religion when some people do not agree with religion? We all want the right to have the freedom to live as we wish to. As a lesbian I am not the one who sins against vulnerable people. Yet there are some individuals who are in power and say they are religious and abuse vulnerable people. Is this right? No it is not!

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

We have to respect each other without forcing others to discriminate against the minority members of society. Selecting Marriage only for those who believe in religion is discriminating against those who do not believe in religion. Religion may be viewed as power and control over individuals who do not wish to conform to religion. How many people have been victimised as a result of religion? History tells us too many!!

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

My sexuality is private. My life with my civil partner is also private. I do not expect everyone to accept my way of life however, I do not force anyone to accept my way of life, as I do not expect to be forced to live as other people wish to live. When some individuals are ‘forced to live’ as other people ‘wish them to live’ discrimination and abuse may be used against those who do not wish to conform. How is that freedom? I do not tell other people who to marry. Therefore I do not expect to be told who I may live my life with or who I can or can not marry! Where is the equality? Nineteen years I have been with my civil partner. Who should have the right to prevent us from marrying when we are not given any legal right to prevent other people from marrying. Being happy in life is important. Being valued as a member of society is also significant towards having a good lifestyle. Why should some members of society be discriminated against because of those who believe in faith?

Are you responding as...

an academic

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
I fail to see how equality compromises or threatens those in society who have concerns about same sex marriage.
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Gay relationships are just as worthwhile as heterosexual relationships and I see no reason they shouldn't be entitled to the same recognition. Whilst civil partnerships were a massive leap forward, I believe a small number of legal uncertainties still exist.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
I have very little sympathy. They’re entitled to hold these views, but the protections already in existence are more than adequate, and the bill bends over backwards to avoid offending those who justify such views through religious beliefs.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

I was slightly puzzled that only sexual activity with the opposite sex is classed as adultery. I'm not sure what the intention behind this is.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

In support of equality - of all consenting adults being able to marry the person of their choice.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Strongly support.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

The question is unclear

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

If same sex marriage is legalised, it shouldn't matter what gender a married couple are. Transgender people should be able to stay married without having to apply for a piece of paper that tells them what they already know about themselves.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
Some people have "concerns" about people with different colour skin than their own. These people should not be allowed to ruin other peoples' happiness. To deal with people who may have either concerns or intolerance of LGBTQ people, we should work harder to normalise loving relationships of all kinds, through education in schools and in representations of relationships.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Free speech is one (important) thing; using words to verbally abuse or intimidate people because of who they love is another.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support
I believe in equality for all

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support
I am a member of the Church of Scotland but believe that others who hold different beliefs deserve to be respected

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support
I believe that everyone should have a choice, even if that means they don't take part in same sex marriage or civil partnership.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support
I believe in equality

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support
I would hope that churches would also welcome same sex marriage

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Anyone who has objections to same sex marriage should not be forced to participate in any way. There should be protection of jobs if someone doesn't agree with same sex marriage

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I may not like some peoples opinion's but it is important that everyone feels able to say what they want and for open discussion to take place

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

I hope it shows the world that Scotland is open to change and more concerned with the person rather than any label that is given. I am very proud that our government is dealing with this issue in an open and honest manner.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

I believe the law in Scotland should treat all marriages the same regardless of the genders of the spouses.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

I would welcome this. Having attended several Humanist ceremonies (weddings and funerals) I have found these to be more joyous, meaningful, personal, and relevant than the religious equivalents.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

In an ideal world religious celebrants would not seek to marginalise and discriminate against same-sex couples, but since they do, I support the Opt-in procedure as proposed.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

I would assume that couples already in CPs would have been married had that been an option available to them at the time, so it seems reasonable for them to be able to change there status with as little cost or admin burden as possible.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

Neither
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Religious organisations will have an opt-out. That would appear to be sufficient protection. Civil registrars are not employed by their religious organisation and should not be able to opt-out due to their religious beliefs as this is tantamount to discrimination and would not be tolerated in any other public servant role.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Only to state my support for the complete harmonization of the treatment of opposite sex and same sex couples within the law, taxation system etc. Just as the Government does not treat "single people" any differently if they are gay or straight.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In opposition
see comments below

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In opposition
Marriage as an institution was around long before state and statutes, and tho laws on marriage have been altered slightly over the years, this move to redefine marriage is unprecedented. Scotland has much more pressing matters of importance to concern it

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

As the law currently stands, provision is made for doctors, on grounds of conscience, to opt out of performing abortions. The same guarantee of protection in law for celebrants who wish, on grounds of conscience, to opt out of same sex marriages is essential. Also, currently atheist teachers are protected by law from having to teach religious education. As a teacher, I would see, again as an essential, the same right, enshrined in law, to be afforded to Christian teachers, those of other faiths and anyone else who, because of conscience cannot, or will not, teach about the validity of same sex marriage.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

The cherished British tradition of freedom of speech is at stake here, and in a democratic society is a fundamental right which must not be eroded in the name of the rights of any section of society, or for any reason other than the most urgent reasons of national security. Equality laws must not be become the background for a culture in which legitimately held personal views on any subject can no longer be freely expressed.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

The traditional definition of marriage must continue to be a belief worthy of respect in a democratic society. Those holding that view, whether in a private or corporate context, must continue to have the right to express this view freely and without threat of prosecution, dismissal from or disciplinary procedures in the workplace, or accusations of bigotry or discrimination. The right to free speech, as already mentioned above, must be upheld as a fundamental human right. Any future bill must contain specific clauses protecting the right to free speech and debate. Such a clause would send a clear and important message to those looking to silence the views of those who wish to continue to hold to the current view of marriage.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

an academic

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

Think civil partnerships should still be made available to same sex couples and opposite sex couples

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

Personally I would not choose to get married in a religious premise. I would prefer to choose a location of that my partner and I would prefer

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

an academic/a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I don't understand this question. Why would people who have concerns about same sex marriage need protecting? That question seems to imply that something harmful would occur if same sex marriage was legalised.
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

People are free to say what they like, but they do have to understand that words can be hurtful. Still, I don't really understand how this relates to legalizing same sex marriage.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Love trumps hate. Who is this honestly harming? It in no way changes the marriages that opposite sex couples have. The only argument against it seems to be religion, and I believe religious opinions should not inform state policies. Marriage is not inherently Christian, and the part of the bible that outlaws same sex relations is the same bit that forbids certain clothing choices. Do not pick and choose from the bible just to make an offensive, intolerant point.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

equality is a human right. it is not a LGBT right and it is not a Heterosexual right; it is a human right. If two people are in love, why should they be denied the ability to proclaim their love for each other on an equal ground with the rest of the human

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

if the couple in question wish to change their civil partnership to a marriage, i see no reason as to why it should not be allowed.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

an LGBT group

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

If people want to marry, they should be allowed to. If people want a civil partnership, they should be allowed one. It's not like anyone will be forced to marry so let everyone have equal rights. I don't think religious institutions should be forced

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

Neither

I think there is a place for both and that people (same sex or different sex) should all be allowed to choose to have either

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

I can see no reason at all to stop people getting married wherever they choose provided they and the registrar agree

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
If you're against same-sex marriage, don't have one. Let others do as they wish. Religion has no place in modern legislation.
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

I particularly support the removal of discrimination throughout the legislation.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

I strongly resist the idea put forward by religious groups that they can tell people who do not share their beliefs how to live their lives. This bill is an important step forward from the tyranny that religious leaders have exerted on people for centuries.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

This is an important step forward. I am not sure that the requirement for a 'belief body' to meet regularly is meaningful in the 21st century, however. It's quite possible these days for a system of belief to be generated and attract supporters without the need for meeting at all. Except perhaps to marry people - although one day probably even that will seem quaint.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

I have no idea why civil partnership was ever defined differently to marriage.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In opposition

I think civil marriages should be allowed to take place on religious premises (if the owner agrees).
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In opposition

I still don’t understand the need for new civil partnerships. Better to call them all marriages from now on.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

If both parties wish to. I think one party changing their sex should be allowed as grounds for divorce!

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

It should be made clearer in Scottish law that religious beliefs are for the members of that religion to live by if they choose. Religious and other discriminatory beliefs are not for imposing on other people. This is very important!

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I think the ECHR is flawed. It doesn’t make the connection between rights and duties. For example the right to freedom of speech should come with a duty not to abuse people.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

no

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

I completely support the aims of the Bill.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

I view this as a long overdue step to give same sex couples the same rights as other couples.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

Particularly given that some religions have outlined their opposition to conducting same sex ceremonies, I fully support the idea of putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

I support those religious bodies willing to conduct ceremonies having the freedom to do so.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

We currently have a civil partnership and would be very keen to easily change this to a full marriage, preferably via a simple procedure without having to go through another ceremony.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support
I see no reason to restrict the places where these can take place, so long as there is agreement between the couple and the registrar.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

I think that it is useful to allow this for those who choose this option.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

I don’t think there is any need to force transgender people to divorce if they and their partner are happy for their existing relationship to continue.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I am OK with religious organisations opting out of conducting same sex ceremonies if that is their wish. However, I would be strongly against the principle of 'opt-outs' being extended beyond this one exemption. Otherwise this would encourage discrimination by the back door.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I don’t believe that the bill would have any impact on freedom of speech.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

I would like to see private pension schemes forced to pay a similar pension to the surviving member of a same sex marriage as they would for a mixed sex marriage. I understand that this is reserved to Westminster and would encourage the Scottish Government to lobby for this to be brought into line.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

Equality is important for a modern Scotland and this is just one aspect that demonstrates that we are a forward thinking equal opportunities country.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

Faith and belief are such diverse but equal concepts it is important personal belief is respected in terms of marriage and civil partnerships.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

No one should be forced to carry out a marriage or civil partnership that opposes their own belief or faith. The opt-in is a sensible approach.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I don't believe that anyone; civil official, celebrant or religious office holder, should be mandated to carry out a same sex marriage against their beliefs. Whilst an important step forward for equality in Scotland we must also protect the rights of an individual to officiate or not.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

As a tolerant country, freedom of speech should be protect within Scotland. However firm and clear conditions must be applied to cover aspects when free speech results in derogatory, defamatory or "hate" speech.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

I have been in a committed same sex relationship for nearly 9 years and see no reason as to why we cannot marry as a man and woman can. It is time for Scotland to follow many other countries and legalise gay marriage.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Totally support same sex couples marrying. The fact that I cant legally marry my partner makes me feel discriminated against because of my sexuality. When one human being marries another human being, it should be a marriage! Not a same sex marriage or a d

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

It should never have been different to a marriage in the first place - the fact that its different means that there is discrimination.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

Again, what marriage circumstances apply to a male and female, should apply to a male and male or female and female.
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Totally agree they should be able to stay married. Again, humans are humans and should not be labelled.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Its discrimination pure and simple. As a human race we are not yet fully evolved because if we were, we would accept humans for who they are. If people have a problem with it, then its the same as having a problem with black people or Asian people.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Homophobic comments are no different to racist comments in my opinion. Freedom of speech is all well and good, but people need to realise that the right to free speech has responsibilities attached.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
I would ask them to think of what they classify as marriage, if their opposition is based on the belief that marriage is a religious institution that should be kept between a man and women I would say; that at it's most basic it is an argument of semantics. Two people regardless of their gender have the right to be in love and to have the benefits that come from a long term relationship. If you argue two men or two women should not be allowed to be "married" but would allow them to be in a civil union on the basis that marriage should be between a man and women it seems a difference of opinion on what constitutes as marriage. If I own a spade and I want to use it to eat my ice cream what business is it of the person that uses it to dig holes, or go sledging on, or uses it as a door stop. As long as I am not forcing anyone else to eat ice cream with a spade what's the problem? If marriage is a religious institution why has the church sanctioned marriages of couples that have never before attended church or have any plans of attending after their wedding day?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a fellow human

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

Fairness and equality are key values for me and the people of Scotland so I welcome the bill and its basic principles.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

I believe marriage is an important formal relationship between two people, and needs to reflect the real relationships that the people of Scotland actually have, regardless of gender. Same sex partners should have exactly the same rights as different gendered partners. Marriage should be the same for all, we mustn't have two different arrangements for same sex and different sex partnerships.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

I'm strongly in favour of this. For one I believe the proportion of people in Scotland who are genuinely religious to be low and reducing. Many people are uncomfortable with religious ceremonies and would really appreciate the same kind of celebration without the religious baggage. Marriage is a civil arrangement, religion must be an optional extra. Humanist celebrants are recognised but other beliefs are valid and to be respected.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

I'm comfortable with the details of the bill.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

I support the principle of allowing transgender people who are married to obtain gender recognition without being required by the state to divorce.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I Mm aware of some opinion that civil registrars might have the right to opt out of conducting same-sex marriages. I am strongly opposed to that. I agree with the Equality Network that civil registrars are carrying out a civil function on behalf of the state, and therefore an opt-out on grounds of their personal religious belief is not appropriate. It would set a dangerous precedent that public service providers (in local government, NHS, etc) should have a legal right to pick and choose who they serve.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

Equality in all things is something a 21st Century Scotland should be seeking to endorse.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
If marriage is supposedly one of the foundation stones of society then should not all couples be encouraged to enter into it regardless of gender.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

It's later than it should have been. We are a highly welcoming country and this would have passed easily years ago.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

It is wrong and immoral that it is not already the case.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

As long as the the religious body agrees to hold the ceremony I see no problem. I would never want someone forced to take a ceremony they didn't agree with. That being said all registrar offices should have no issues as no religious aspects are involved. A registrars own religion holds no boundary over their job.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

Again, it is everyone right to be married and changes should be made available with no cost incurring to the already partnered people.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

As long as presided over by a registrar.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Marriage is not a privilege its a right for all with no exceptions.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Opposing equal marriage rights will be seen in years to come as bad as opposing equal rights for men and woman. The concerns come from a bigoted few, be that through age or lack of education, but over time it will die out.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

I am in a Civil Partnership at present and to be married would put the final seal on our relationship

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

I am a retired Church of Scotland minister and welcome all who could help

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

As I have already made clear earlier

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

I have conducted weddings in many locations which were not religious premises and welcome this opportunity to show the Church in the community.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support
Trans gender persons have normally been through a terrible period in their lives and to receive a full Gender Recognition Certificate in the acquired gender would be a fine ending to their troubled life unitl now

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

The majority of society in relation to same sex couples living together, in Civil Partnerships and the proposed marriages have their views dictated to them by a small minority of people who are completely ignorant of what it means for these couples to be together and be accepted as equal human beings in society.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I am a great believer in "Freedom of Speech" where the truth is openly discussed and not being censored by particular groups who have an axe to grind

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

I trust and pray that the Bill will pass through Parliament and bring a Freedom of life to so many men and women who feel they are being kept apart from society by those who oppose this Bill

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
Marriage should be available to same sex couples as a basic human right. In the future, we will look back with shame and wonder why same sex couples were ever discriminated against.
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Marriage should be available to same sex couples as a basic human right. In the future, we will look back with shame and wonder why same sex couples were ever discriminated against.

Are you responding as...

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

I believe that equality means equality and if as a country we are passing laws to treat everyone as equal then it should mean everyone.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

It is very important that the bill does not discriminate and create two different versions of marriage. The law should treat all marriages the same, regardless of the genders of the spouses. It is very clear that the law as it stands is no longer fit for purpose and needs to be updated to treat all people no matter what sex the same.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

As someone who does not see themselves as religious I agree that religious and belief organisation should be free to decide for themselves, Religious freedom should apply to all groups

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

I think if those couple who are in civil partnerships had been given the opportunity to get married would have got married and should be given the chance to change their civil partnership to a marriage via a simple and inexpensive administrative procedure if they wish to do so and should not be denied this no matter where there civil partnership took place. Not allowing this would cause real problems for couples who registered a civil partnership abroad and then moved to Scotland. They will be unable to change to a marriage unless they first dissolve their civil partnership. But that requires proving that the civil partnership has irretrievably broken down, by living apart for a year. It is very unfair to ask civil partners to do that in order to marry.
How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

Religious bodies that would wish to conduct same-sex marriages should be allowed to do this the same as, Religious bodies who feel that they cannot do this due to there faith should be allowed to say no. Both views should be allowed to allow each to be treated equally and allow both to be respected.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I think that the bill tries to strike the right balance to protect people with concerns about same-sex marriage, No religious organisation will be required to conduct same-sex marriages unless the organisation agrees to this, organisation will be free to opt-out of same-sex marriages, as will any person who plays a part in the religious marriage ceremonies of that organisation. These are strong protections for all.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

I believe that the bill can only be a positive addition to our society.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

I feel that this is something that will bring Scotland to the forefront of gay rights and show that as a society we will treat everyone as equal regardless of sexual orientation.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

I strongly believe that this is the right thing to do. I am passionate about equality throughout our society and I feel it is wring to have religious celebrants above belief celebrants as we do now. Being religious should not put you above anyone.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

You cannot force anyone to do something they don’t believe in therefore opting in is a procedure which will keep those against performing same sex marriages happy.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

I am very happy to support this move.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support
I am passionate about this also. I believe that you do not have to be religious to believe in the sanctity of marriage therefore allowing people to be married in a place of their choosing, within reason, is also a very positive step.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

Again I am in support if this. I feel that religion is something that can be very personal therefore it is possible to be religious and follow religion whilst being attracted to those of the same sex. Although in most organised religions same sex relationships are frowned upon it is my belief that these are outdated views.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Again I am in support of this. If someone has went through and successfully completed the gender reassignment programme then who are we as a society to deny them their marriage to the person they love and allow it to stand?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

As previously stated I truly feel that the "concerns" felt by those who are unsure or against same sex marriage are outdated and oppressive. As a society we should be making sure that everyone has an equal footing when it comes to their rights, regardless of colour, creed, sexual orientation or gender. It is almost akin with denying women to vote to deny people who love each other a marriage. Therefore I feel their concerns should be placed to one side to allow Scotland to move forward and ultimately progress as a nation. I am not attracted to the same sex as myself, I am heterosexual and I still feel that this is a very important issue for our people, gay or straight.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of speech is vital to Scotland as a nation. It is important that those both for and against this bill are allowed to air their views. As long as they are done so in an appropriate manner. Ultimately their will always be groups who don't what everyone to have the same rights and to have their own freedom of speech but we must not let them "win" as such and allow others to remain oppressed.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

N/A

Are you responding as...
a private individual
14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

We, as a country, are falling behind so many other nations that have seen it right to introduce equality for all, some, decades before us. It is not right that Scotland remains seen as a nation that is seen by many as being 'backward' in these areas, and many others. Introducing equal marriage rights is not something that should be seen a step backward, it is one of the first of many steps we must take to enable future generations to live without persecution, fear and knowing knowing that the laws of the nation they reside in are fully behind them, allowing them them to live as freely as they deserve to, and allowing them the rights and protection that anyone else, regardless of gender, sexuality or race, is given by default.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

As far as I'm concerned there should be no dividing line that would require us to label a marriage of two people of the same sex as a 'same sex marriage', there should only be marriage, for one and for all. It is time to break down the layers of red tape and the barriers of labels which cause so much division and hatred.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

I have no views upon any religious aspects of this bill. Laws Laws should not be decided by religion in any form.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

Once again, marriage should not be seen in separate terms, if someone wishes to conduct a marriage for a man and a woman then they should be required to do do the same for anyone else in interests of equality.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support
If any civil partners wish to do so the option should be made available to them.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

This is perfectly acceptable and I see no reason this should not be allowed.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

Once again, this should be allowed.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Absolutely.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I struggle to understand any valid concerns about this matter beyond bigotry, hatred and fear (three things Scotland as a nation has been allowed to steep in for far too long) I believe that minimal resources should be used to protect those who have to deal with their irrational fears of progress and equality. Scotland has spent too long pandering to the demands of bigots.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of speech is of course in theory something we should cherish and nurture, but I also believe that overall, in terms of matters such as these, common sense should prevail, there is no reason to stop progress because of the views of bigots.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same-sex marriage, so that same-sex couples can marry each other?
In support
Marriage is for all, not just for heterosexual couples

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same-sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support
Marriage and civil partnerships should be open to all - it's about having the choice of which type of ceremony you would like.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

It tends to be fed by bigotry rather than education. Love is for all not just for those who fit in with social norms. The right to celebrate that feeling and make a commitment is not just for the chosen few. Education on this issue would benefit from being widened.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of speech is something that I agree with although I disagree with the press having carte blanche to say anything they wish which can be so damaging to others.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

No

Are you responding as...

an academic
a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support
I believe Scotland should be an equal society. This cannot be achieved without marriage equality.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support
I believe Scotland should be an equal society. This cannot be achieved without marriage equality. Love is love.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
Neither
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

'Protections' against what?! I would support any 'protections' which are identical to those they have around opposite sex marriage. No more and no less.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

No

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

No

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
I believe the protections, as set out in the proposition, are robust and sufficient.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

I believe that the Bill should be expanded to allow the option of civil partnerships for all couples, i.e. to include mixed-sex civil partnerships.

Are you responding as...

an academic
a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
Neither

I think this is the only way it can work but am always frustrated that religious groups are legally exempt from equality issues.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
They need to get over themselves! This does not in any way impact on their rights to hold bigoted views. It does not dramatically affect the nature of life or society. Therefore no need for "protection"!

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

As a country you should be ashamed that ye are not leaders on human rights issues and this has not been done

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

The human rights of others should not need to be evidence or voted on. This right should be automatically enforced across all people and countries.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

Religion is a belief in delusions and a form of insanity. If the insane wish to say certain people cannot participate in the delusion too, then they are discriminating.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

All bodies should be legislated to solemnise both. Nobody should be allowed to discriminate. Did a 10 year old write these questions? You do have universities in Scotland?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

If that choice is for everyone, then it must be for everyone. No excluding people.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

This choice should be for anywhere and include the choice of religious premises, as exclusion of this choice is government sanction discrimination.
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

One law for all. Religion has no place in dictating government policy.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Makes no difference to the world.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

This has only positive benefits for a society. Screw any neurotic person who is in opposition or have baseless concerns. A neurotic is a person who knows what is right but doesn't like it.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of speech disguised to defend a historical delusion or discriminate against a group of people is not freedom of speech but permission to be deluded and insane. Insanity should be challenged. We should not allow people of very distant past, who may never have actually existed other than in contrived fairy tails, who would most likely have had lower IQs, who would have had less advance socially inclusive morals, were less open and more narrow minded, less intellectually skilled than man today, dictate what we should be doing to live life today.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Scotland should be ashamed to have lagged behind others in getting this into law. I am originally from Canada, I find it no wonder in evidencing why the outside world looks at the Scottish people as a backward, ignorant hicks. Sad but true.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

It will be a huge step forward for equality in Scotland, and it balances equality with respect for freedom of religion and freedom of speech.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

it is very important that the bill does not create two different versions of marriage, same-sex marriage and mixed-sex marriage, because that would lead to continued discrimination. The law should treat all marriages the same, regardless of the genders of the spouses. I am pleased that the bill achieves that.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

I agree that religious and belief organisations should be free to decide for themselves whether to solemnise only mixed-sex marriages, or same-sex marriages as well. Some religious bodies want to conduct same-sex marriages, including the Quakers, Unitarians, Liberal Jews and others. Some religious bodies, including the larger churches, do not want to conduct same-sex marriages. Religious freedom should apply to both groups, and the bill gets the balance right. I think that the opt-in procedures in the bill are the appropriate way to do this, and, together with the amendments to the Equality Act 2010 which have been agreed with the UK Government, protect the religious freedom of religious bodies and of their members who participate in marriage ceremonies. I think that a small amendment is needed to section 11(2) of the bill, in order to give those religious and belief bodies that want to, the option of using the gender-free form of the marriage ceremony, in section 11(2)(g), for mixed-sex couples who would prefer that form. This is particularly important for mixed-sex couples where one or both is transgender or intersex. Religious bodies that wish to always use the husband and wife gendered form of the marriage ceremony should be free to continue to do so.
How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

I think that most same-sex couples will prefer a civil marriage, a religious or belief marriage, or a civil partnership conducted by a registrar. However, allowing the registration of civil partnerships in a ceremony conducted by a religious or belief body that chooses to do so, adds a useful extra option. There may be some religious bodies that would not wish to conduct same-sex marriages, but would want to offer religious civil partnership ceremonies to same-sex couples who are their members. There may also be some couples with religious beliefs who would prefer a civil partnership to a marriage.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I think that the bill strikes the right balance, and provides good protections for people with concerns about same-sex marriage. No religious organisation will be required to conduct same-sex marriages unless the organisation agrees to. Even where an organisation does agree, individual marriage celebrants within that organisation will be free to opt-out of same-sex marriages, as will any person who plays a part in the religious marriage ceremonies of that organisation (eg the church organist). These are strong protections.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...
a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Scotland is lagging behind in terms of freedom and equality until this happens. It is embarrassing that it's taken us so long to get this far.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

People should be treated the same regardless of whether or not their beliefs are associated with an established "religion". But religion must not be allowed to shape laws to negatively impact non-religious people.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

The fact that we need opt-in procedures is slightly offensive, but probably required at this point in time in order to appease opponents of equal marriage.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

If civil partnerships really are equal to marriages, these conversions should be quick, easy and free to do.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Marriage should have nothing to do with gender.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I will be very disappointed in the Scottish Government if pandering to these people's demands for protections causes delays in the introduction of same sex marriage. Many Catholics, for example, think that Catholics should not marry Protestants - but there is nothing in the law to prevent this, and rightly so. Same goes for race, religion and age. Protections should not be necessary.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

The difference between freedom of speech and harassment should be made very clear, but freedom of speech should certainly be upheld for everyone.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Faith schools must not be allowed to give biased teaching regarding same-sex marriages. Education and worship/religious study should be separate.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

Neither

I don't think religious organisations should have the right to discriminate against people. If anybody wants to marry within a particular faith, I think that faith should be required by law to perform the marriage.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

I think any couple who want to have their civil partnership officially converted to a marriage should be allowed to do that, easily and without too much expense.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

The people who need to be protected here are the ones who are being discriminated against, i.e. the couples who wish to marry. The prejudices of people who are homophobic or intolerant of those couples, for whatever reason, should not be protected.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Mixed-sex couples should also have the right to choose civil partnership if they wish. There should be no difference in how couples are treated on the basis of their gender or sexuality.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

I think it is high time religious organizations, especially churches, started accepting gay and/or equal marriage; indeed, they should be leading the argument in favour of equality. The very least they can do is accept that they don't have to perform their ceremonies under the new law.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
Neither
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Get with the programme.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Feel free to speak - without hate. Do not wave "freedom of speech" around as an excuse for homophobic viewpoints, however.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

I have been with my same sex partner for 16 years and can't marry

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
No one is forced to marry someone of the same sex. These decisions are private so others should't interfere

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

People are entitled to their own beliefs but should not force them on others or use freedom of speech to hurt others

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
They can comment on personal issue but cannot speak for the lives of others.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
I believe in freedom of speech when it does not infringe on the beliefs of others.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

Complete support, anything less is a sham in this day and age!! Just let people be happy

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Why should they not be able to? There are horrible things going on in this world, these people love on another, that isn't a bad thing!!! People need to cop on

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

Religion is a sham, so no comment on that

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

No - leave people be. Its not your life!! Why are people committing suicide every day of the week, because of IGNORANT people!!!

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

no

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

no

Are you responding as...

a public body

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

Marriage should be an option for everyone, and we should not be forcing people to divorce if one of them changes their sex

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

Any civilised country would allow this

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

It is discriminatory to exclude people who represent other religions and beliefs from being celebrants

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

In favour, but with a particular emphasis that all celebrants should be required to solemnise these ceremonies if they are secular, regardless of the religious views of the celebrant themselves.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

It would be impractical and costly for people to have a second ceremony - although I am sure there are people who will choose to do so in a spirit of celebration that they finally have equality

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support
This is such a personal decision for people, they should be free to choose the venue themselves.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

IN support, although in an ideal world they would be hosting same sex marriages too.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

It is barbaric to break up couples who do not wish to do so - Jan Morris had to divorce her wife and they stayed together for life. No-one but the couple themselves should have the right to split them up.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

No-one conducting a religious ceremony should do these if their religion does not permit it, but outside of this there should be no protections - LGBT tax payers have as much right to be married as anyone else. I do not believe anyone should be able to make a moral judgement about this in the classroom either, and exclude mention of same sex marriages. Ten per cent of the children they are teaching are probably LGBT, and those children are alienated every time their existence is denied or downgraded or their behaviour judged.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

People are entitled to give their views so long as these are not deeply offensive. Equating LGBT people with sex offenders is offensive, and has been heard far too often during the wider debate on this issue.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

There is something deeply unpleasant about the current assumption that marriage is all about property and the inheritance of property by children- additionally dressed up in terms that suggest children are not safe with same sex couples. Marriage should be about love, not about ownership of goods. There is also something deeply distressing about the assumption that men and women are so intrinsically different, and perform such separate roles in life, that they must be paired in tandem to provide a child with a balanced background. Do we really still hold such destructive, old-fashioned views in this country?

Are you responding as...

a private individual
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support
I think it is about time the playing field was levelled for all people.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support
Weddings are not about faith any more, they are about tradition. Under normal circumstances, any literature that promoted hatred of anyone would have need banned, yet here we are defending the very rights of some people from the religious persecution that should have died out with the crusades.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support
If we are all "gods creatures" then the bible should not be discriminating against anyone, but people are entitled to a choice, and we should respect that.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support
For the simple reason that I can see no reason for not doing it. If you have a faith, then you should be afforded the same religious rights as everyone else.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support
I thought that was already practiced. I have been at weddings conducted in hotels and gardens. Or are we still discriminating against same sex couple?
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Protection of someone's narrow minded, fear based discriminating concerns is that?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
If there is an opt out clause for those who don't want to participate in same sex marriage, then I think that will suffice. No one should be forced to carry out ceremonies that they don't believe in, but everyone should have the option to marry whoever they want to.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

No thanks

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

Allowing all couples to use a gender-neutral form of the marriage ceremony wording would be the best approach to include same-sex, opposite-sex and transgender/genderqueer couples - I believe this would require a small amendment to section 11(2)(g).

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

I am concerned that couples who got a civil partnership outside of Scotland will not be able to marry in Scotland (understandably converting from another jurisdiction's civil partnership or equivalent like the french PACS would be difficult) and would like to see the proposed bill changed to allow, for example, couples with english civil partnerships to marry without dissolving their existing partnership which would be nonsensical and potentially cause unnecessary expense to UK couples.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

I welcome this proposal as it mirrors the current state for marriages by priests, ministers or belief celebrants.
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

There may be religious groups that are unwilling to solemnise same-sex marriages but can bring themselves to register civil partnerships as a halfway house or pastoral consideration for their members. Some couples might also prefer this.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

If marriage is marriage regardless of the gender of the participants, then a change of gender should not affect the status of the marriage.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same-sex marriage?

As someone who identifies as a Christian, I believe the proposed protections are strong enough to safeguard those acting in a religious capacity. I do not support the addition of an opt-out for civil registrars as there are no equivalent opt-outs for marrying divorcees or inter-racial couples.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

People love people, everyone should have the opportunity to equal marriage.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

This is 2013, Scottish society already accepts gay and lesbian people so the law needs to catch up.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

Religion is a choice.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

I support this.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

People who engaged in civil partnerships will have done so at the time as that was the only option available to them, they should be given the right to change it to marriage.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

I think so long as both parties are happy that ceremonies should be able to take place anywhere.
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

If they are happy to do so and the same sex couple are religious then I support this.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Yes because regardless of their gender if they're in love with the person they married then the most important point hasn't changed.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Those who do not agree with same sex marriage should not have a problem with the bill going into law. It does not affect them, they do not need to attend the weddings.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I think everyone is entitled to their view but I also think we all deserve equality.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

No

Are you responding as...

an LGBT group
a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support
As a lesbian currently in a civil partnership that was registered in Scotland I look forward to an opportunity to have full marriage equality.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support
There should not be a two-tiered marriage. Same sex and opposite sex couples should have identical institutions or otherwise discrimination could still exist. Religious institutions should be able to perform same sex marriages if they wish and registrars should not be allowed to opt out of these services. This would be as bad as opting out of mixed race ceremonies.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support
As a Christian who worships in the Metropolitan Community Church (a "gay" church) I would wish to have the opportunity to celebrate my union within a religious framework. I feel that all institutions that wish to perform same sex marriages should be allowed to.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support
As I am already in a civil partnership my personal decision will depend on the legal rights the institutions provide. At present my civil partner does not have equal pension rights compared to an opposite sex marriage. If this wrong was to be righted I would change to a marriage. Ideally this should not involve an extra cost as we would have married if it had been available to us.
How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

My childhood dream was to be married up the top of the campsie fells. I therefore would welcome this change.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

I can see that some religious bodies and some same-sex couples may for belief reasons wish a religious civil partnership rather than marriage. Whilst this is not something I wish I believe they should have the freedom to celebrate their love as most agrees with their beliefs.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Most people love an individual and the gender is secondary. Why should stable relationships be destroyed due to an operation. The transgender person has not changed internally.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

As stated before I do not feel civil registrars should be given an option to opt out of same sex marriage. They cannot at present opt out of civil partnerships and this would denigrates same sex marriage. It would be allowing prejudice in a manner akin to allowing an opt out for mixed race civil marriages.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I do not see why this should be an issue.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

The state, institution of Marriage is what it is, and not something else regardless of the motive for wishing to determine otherwise.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

The state, institution of Marriage is what it is, and not something else regardless of the motive for wishing to determine otherwise.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

The state, institution of Marriage is what it is, and not something else regardless of the motive for wishing to determine otherwise.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

Neither

The state, institution of Marriage is what it is, and not something else regardless of the motive for wishing to determine otherwise.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

Neither

With reference to my answer to question 4. above, only those civil partnerships of one man and one woman should be considered for change to marriage.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

Neither
With reference to my answer to question 4. above, only civil marriage ceremonies between one man and one woman should be considered for recognition regardless of location.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

Heterosexual couples in years gone by co-habited without their relationship being classed as illegal. We have now moved on where same sex couples now co-habit without their relationship being classed as illegal. There is no need to legalise those arrangements. Government surely has within its ranks those with the intellectual ability to ensure that any co-habiting persons are not materially disadvantaged. Consequently, there is no need for belief or religious registration.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In opposition

The state, institution of Marriage is what it is, and not something else regardless of the motive for wishing to determine otherwise.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

It is impossible to have same-sex marriage and it will prove impossible to protect from discrimination those who understand and uphold the state of marriage from those who wittingly or otherwise are intent on imposing acceptance of marriage redefinition.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

It is impossible to have same-sex marriage and it will prove impossible to protect from discrimination those who understand and uphold the state of marriage from those who wittingly or otherwise are intent on imposing acceptance of marriage redefinition.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

When a nation loses sight of what is right and what is wrong it becomes very introverted, selfish and consequently very vulnerable.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In opposition

Marriage is between a male and a female.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In opposition

Legalising homosexual acts between consenting adults is one thing, glorifying it by calling it marriage is not acceptable as it then involves the whole of society.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

Neither

The place of the ceremony is irrelevant.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

Allowing someone to do wrong is not a good idea but each would have to decide for themselves
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

When a government transforms something which has served society well since creation with something which is clearly not fit for purpose it must allow those who oppose it the right to speak without heed or hindrance. It should be explicit that opposition will not in any way make the opposer liable under law.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

A tiny vociferous minority have manipulated a government to process a bill without mandate. A few already have lost positions, jobs, and been sued over expressing views or maintaining practices opposed to this bill. This will become not a bill of permission to the practicing homosexual in society but a rod to beat the backs of those who see it as harmful to the homosexual and destructive to society and take any action to express these views.

Are you responding as...

an academic
a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

A vital measure to achieve full equality irrespective of gender and sexuality.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Marriage is a civil status that should not be exclusive - it should be available irrespective of the gender and sexuality of the two people involved.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

Religion is a belief like any other, so religion should not have a special status.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

However I believe all marriages should be conducted as civil marriages, and that religious and other belief organisations may then celebrate it as they wish.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In opposition

Civil partnerships have a different history and different connotation and should not be abandoned, but rather should be opened up to different sex couples too.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

The key factor is that a public official (registrar) should be able to conduct civil marriages wherever: it is the official who should qualify the event, not the location.
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

All civil partnerships and marriages should be conducted as civil ceremonies, which can separately be celebrated in whatever way the couple wishes and the organisations allow.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Anything else would be needless humiliation.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

They are not forced to get married, so they do not need protecting.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of speech always needs to take into consideration vulnerable groups that can be stigmatised by discriminatory language.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Civil partnerships must be made open to different sex couples. This would be a popular move that would enable many different sex couples to formalise their relationship in law, when they do not wish the historical and cultural connotations of a 'marriage'.

Are you responding as...

an academic

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...
a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support
in line with basic human rights

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
this is for me a human rights issue, people have the right to be in a same-sex relationship should they choose it. They should also have the concommitent right to have that relationship acknowledged by their family and friends and by the society we live in. Those rights should be on an equal footing with those in a traditional relationship. The important issue is surely that we support loving relationships within caring communities.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support
The sooner the better; the more inclusive the better!

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither
Undecided

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
They are more than adequately protected under the Bill.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

There is a very, very clear line between being polite and accepting of others' differences and being rude and vitriolic, those that stay in the first area should be fine, those that venture into the second should be dealt with in the justice system.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Discrimination laws should be upheld to ensure that people are not discriminated against on the grounds of protected characteristics. That being said, where specific religious or spiritual beliefs mean that an organisation/individual within an organisation does not feel able to perform a particular type of ceremony, there should be the option to refer to another organisation or individual within that organisation, with the emphasis on enabling citizens to marry in the way they choose within the places they choose. Religious beliefs hold an entire spectrum of support and opposition to same sex marriage, and so I think the government has a responsibility to ensure that marriage is available to all on fair, equal, and non-stigmatised grounds, whilst balancing respect for the religious/spiritual views of those who do not support such a view. The priority should be on marriage as a civil and legal right, first and foremost, covered by discrimination law, with religious objections taking a back-seat (as these objections are not enshrined nor do they represent the only available interpretation of religious texts)

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I think that freedom of speech is a right that we all have and that should be protected, but it is a right which carries a commensurate responsibility to respect and uphold the rights of others to not be discriminated against. This is part of the social contract of each individual to be a citizen within a particular society - that we can expect certain levels of respect and freedom from others because we also grant that this respect and freedom is the right of others. I do not feel that religious beliefs should be given special compensation to freedom of speech when it is discriminatory towards other social groups. They have the right to believe what they wish but should still be subject to the same responsibilities to be respectful of, and non-discriminatory towards, others. Greater awareness of what freedom of speech means in a multicultural, diverse society should be promoted

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
Everyone should have equal rights to marry who they love, whether the same gender or another. People have no more right to tell me that I cannot marry someone of the same gender than I do to tell then they cannot marry someone of the opposite gender.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I believe in free speech. Everyone has the right to say what they believe but I do not have to like/agree. It also does not mean there will not be consequences for those preaching hate and intolerance.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In opposition
civil partnerships should remain an option for those ( including mixed sex couples ) who would prefer a civil partnership to a marriage, and it is important that those who are already in civil partnerships are not made to feel that their relationship is any less valid by the new legislation.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support
religious bodies who wish to allow use of their premises for civil marriages should not be prohibited from doing so. e.g Quaker meeting houses...

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support
Those religious groups who wish to conduct or bless civil partnerships should be allowed to do so. Other groups who oppose such measures now will eventually see the error of their ways, or preferably be deserted by the vast majority of the population and wither and die!

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

That a couple who wish to stay together should be required to divorce following gender reassignment, and then only be allowed a civil partnership was one of the most ridiculous and discriminatory pieces of legislation ever passed. Such matters need to be handled with more sensitivity in future.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

The people who need protecting are those who being attacked and abused by vile bigots in the name of religious freedom. Quite honestly the scaremongering of cardinal OBrien and his ilk demonstrates how much hypocrisy is uttered in the name of Christianity. Those who support equality won't have a problem with this bill, the rest can go live with Vladimir Putain!

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

I'm a very out & proud Lesbian!

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Why should I be discriminated against because I'm Gay?

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

I 100% believe in a Democracy in that people can believe what ever they want to believe but they have NO RIGHT to ENFORCE their beliefs onto me! The LAW of the land should NEVER DISCRIMINATE against someone because of their sexuality! It is NOT against the Law to be Gay therefore we should be allowed to marry who we love, just as straight people are allowed to marry each other!

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

This is entirely due to the celebrant themselves! I would not want to get married by someone who doesn’t support Gay marriage!

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

Equality!

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

People can think and believe what they want but they have NO RIGHT to enforce their beliefs onto me or anyone else! This is about EQUALITY NOT RELIGION!

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

That's what Democracy is all about hence why we have these discussions in the first place! Religious people can voice their concerns and I will voice mine!

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Look at the rest of the World in terms of society 'growing up'

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
It seems that the Church and other religious bodies feel that their views are the be all and end all. I don't think that religion has as prominent a part in society today than it did for previous generations and the Church needs to recognise this and move with the times.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
Neither

The option should definitely be there, but some couples do just want a civil partnership - believing that marriage for life is a hard option, but still want many of the legal benefits from living together for a long time.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

In many religions, God is omnipresent. A Divine being should be able to view a marriage regardless of location, and it should be up to the couple and registrar.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
Neither

I believe state and religion should be kept apart, but if the couple wish them to mix then allow it so.
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

A marriage between two people shouldn't need a Gender Recognition Certificate in the first place, they both need to be consensual. So I support the marriages being kept, but I don't support the requirement of a Gender Recognition Certificate.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

If two people are in love let them marry and be happy; their marriage is not your marriage. Marriage has been going on since Human Civilisation has begun and it wasn't conceived by by one religion, or one ideology, or by one state - it's a term to give to two or more people who consensually agree to love each other until they're dead. Otherwise this this video should help: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=uQw0eLzfGNI

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Should be done lots, and Governments have a duty to be as transparent as possible. Thank you for this.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

The choice should be given.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

I support civil marriage ceremonies taking place anywhere agreed between the couple and registrar, including religious premises

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Some transgender people do not complete their transition due to the restriction on their marriage continuing after the transition.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Protections should be put in place the same way protections are put in place for those in society who have concerns about mixed race marriage and mixed religion marriage.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Discussion on this topic should be treated the same way we treat discussions around race and religion. We wouldn't tolerate the view that

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as…

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
No-one is forcing them to participate, and I think this is appropriate. However I feel the principle of equality is highly important and should not be overridden here.
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

I am a gay women. I think its about time gay marriage was legal. Equality for all should be a basic human right.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

I am a gay women so i would like the choice to be able to marry the person i want to spend the rest of my life with.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

I disagree with religion, i think it causes so much anger and alot of problems.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I think its disgraceful that this is even being debated. Sane sex marriage is a basic human right and its about time it was legalised

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual
Gay women

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In opposition

I am unhappy with the term ‘marriage’. I find civil partnerships acceptable, but feel that same-sex marriage is different. Marriage is a religious ceremony (or at least, began as one) so I cannot understand why same-sex couples would want to enter into a marriage in the first place.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In opposition

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

I feel that is entirely up to the celebrant (to opt-in). I am against it, but if the celebrant feels it is acceptable to his or her beliefs, then that is their decision.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In opposition

See my earlier response - marriage and civil partnerships should legally be the same, but in religious meaning they are different. I believe same sex couples in civil partnerships should be given the same legal rights as married couples, but should not have religious marriages.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

Where they have it is up to the couple, provided it does not take place within a church or religious premises.
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In opposition

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

The perception of Christians as being against gay people - although we oppose gay marriage etc., we do not 'hate' gay people, and it would be helpful if the media tried not to encourage this perception. I think this will help people to understand the Christian reasons for opposition better - giving a more balanced side of the argument which they can then make their own free mind up from.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

In general, I support the bill and think the introduction of same-sex marriage is long overdue. I feel that far too much has been done to pander to the outdated views of extreme religions and consider the provisions for them are more than generous.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Marriage should be an option for all adult couples. The existing second-class arrangements were a small move forward but enshrined bias and discrimination in law.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

I see no reason to prevent any adult from being authorised to celebrate marriage.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

It should be possible for any organisation to have authorised celebrants who can solemnise marriage.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

Civil partnerships were a fudge based on the fear of religious organisations. It should be possible for those in civil partnerships who wish to have the option of changing that partnership (wherever performed) into a marriage either by simply submitting an appropriate form or by having a marriage ceremony. In no case should a civil partnership need to be dissolved before the partners can be married.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

I see no logical reason to limit the location of any marriage ceremony.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

I see no point in civil partnerships once marriage is available to all. However, some couples may prefer a partnership and I see no logical reason for limiting their choice.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

The sex of parties to a marriage should be irrelevant in all circumstances. A spouse should have no veto on obtaining a GRC; if a change of gender causes problems to the marriage, the option of divorce is always available.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I see two issues. First, religious organisations should continue to have the choice of whom they do or do not marry. Second, those in a civil position (such as registrars) should be required to do their jobs and must not have the right to refuse to do what they are being paid to do simply because of personal feelings. I see no difference between a civil registrar refusing to marry a same-sex couple because of beliefs and a policeman refusing to investigate a crime involving a German because of memories of the war; both should lose their jobs.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

People should be free to express whatever views they hold, providing they are not inciting people to take actions which would break the law. Likewise, people should be free to express opposing views under the same conditions.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Enough talking. Get the bill passed.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

an academic

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

This bill is crucial to forwarding equality in Scotland. I support it not only for the real, practical advancements it provides for same-sex couples and other LGBT people in Scotland, but also for the changes to laws that, in theory if not in practice, adhere to antiquated views on gender and sexuality, like the resetting and adultery laws.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Although same-sex couples can currently enter into civil partnerships, this creates a "separate but equal" status and promotes discrimination. Permitting all couples, regardless of gender, to marry removes that distinction and places same-sex and mixed-sex couples on equal footing. Furthermore, allowing same-sex and mixed-sex marriages means that a transgender person's marriage need not be dissolved upon gender reassignment, as being in a marriage with a person who is now of the same sex is not illegal (for this reason I would also support civil partnerships for opposite-sex couples, for those same-sex couples who are in civil partnerships).

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

I support placing belief celebrants, for instance Humanists, on a level with religious celebrants, with one caveat: I see no reason to distinguish between non-religious and religious belief, and would rather see a single "belief" category, in addition of

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

I understand the need to preserve religious freedom, and not forcing religious celebrants to perform same-sex marriages if it goes against their religious beliefs. However, I also believe that the current form of the bill protects the right to discriminate over the right to not be discriminated against. For one thing, the opt-in procedure continues to treat same-sex marriages as different from, say, mixed-race or mixed-faith marriages. The ability to choose whether or not to marry a couple on the basis of religion is already enshrined in law; for instance a Catholic priest could choose not to marry a Catholic to a Hindu, without the need for a specific opt-in for religious bodies to marry mixed-faith couples. The Canadian province of Ontario, which has permitted same-sex marriage for the past decade, has the following protection for religious celebrants:

18.1 (1) The rights under Part I to equal treatment with respect to services and facilities are not infringed where a person registered under section 20 of the Marriage Act refuses to solemnize a marriage, to allow a sacred place to be used for solemnizing a marriage or for an event related to the solemnization of a marriage, or to otherwise assist in the solemnization of a marriage, if to solemnize the marriage, allow the sacred place to be used or otherwise assist would be contrary to, the person’s religious beliefs; or the doctrines, rites, usages or customs of the religious body to which the person belongs.

(2) Nothing in subsection (1) limits the application of section 18.

(From this site: http://www.ohrc.on.ca/en/part-ii-interpretation-and-application/solemnization-marriage-religious-officials) This includes, but is not limited, to same-sex marriages. I see no reason why Scotland should not also have a broadly-applicable law like this (which I believe already exists, as referenced above), without the need for one that specifically singles out same-sex couples. By requiring the opt-in to marry same-sex couples, the bill encourages the treatment of same-sex relationships as fundamentally different from and inferior to mixed-sex ones; rather than all religious celebrants being permitted to perform the same types of marriage, with no requirement to perform marriages that go against their religious beliefs, all will be able to perform mixed-sex marriages, but not all will be able to perform same-sex marriages. Furthermore, the requirement that both a religious body AND a celebrant must opt-in in order for the celebrant to perform a marriage needlessly limits the number of people available to perform these marriages. For instance, if the Catholic Church refuses to opt-in, no Catholic priest may perform a same-sex marriage, regardless of his own personal views on the matter. However, if the Catholic Church does opt-in, celebrants are still not required to equally opt-in.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

I support providing couples in civil partnerships with the opportunity to become married, either through an ordinary marriage service or a simple administrative procedure. However, this should not be limited to couples who entered these partnerships in Scotland, as it makes it virtually impossible for couples in civil partnerships from abroad, or even from elsewhere in the UK, to marry, as they would first have to dissolve their civil partnership.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

I see no reason for there to be a limited list of locations at which marriages can occur.
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

This permission increases the options available to religious same-sex couples, who may either wish to enter a civil partnership of their own accord or whose religion may permit same-sex civil partnerships but not same-sex marriages.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

I support the ability for transgender people to remain married, however I do think some changes need to be made. Most importantly, transgender individuals should not have to ask their spouses' permission for gender reassignment; it is a personal matter, and akin to draconian laws requiring women to ask their husbands' permission for abortions. Furthermore, because of the requirement that a person live as their identified gender for at least two years before reassignment, most spouses will have either accepted their spouse's true gender or the marriage will already have broken down, and it's therefore a needless law that places a barrier in the way of transgender people while treating them like people incapable of making decisions about their own bodies without a heteronormative person's input. I also support the changes made in England, though not in Scotland, that permit less evidence for those who have been living as their identified gender for six years, as after that time it can be difficult to obtain the evidence necessary for the procedure. Furthermore, as the age of majority - and the age at which one can marry - in Scotland is 16, it is only reasonable that gender reassignment should be available from that age.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

There are ample protections in place for people in positions of religious authority who do not wish to conduct same-sex marriages. There have been some suggestions that people in positions of civil authority - registrars and teachers, for instance - should have similar protections; however this is wholly unsuitable as it allows personal faith to get in the way of performing a civic duty. Registrars are currently required to perform any kind of legal civil marriage, and that requirement should not change when the definition of "legal civil marriage" is broadened. Likewise, teachers cannot be permitted to base their lesson plans on their own personal views, without regard for the facts or how they may be disrespecting students in their class (eg LGBT students or those with LGBT parents).

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

This bill does not address the expression of opinion in any way, and therefore has no effect on freedom of speech. People will still be permitted to speak out against same-sex marriage, just as they are allowed to speak out against mixed-race marriages (though they may face criticism from their peers).
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

The major element missing from this bill is the introduction of mixed-sex civil partnerships; the same choices should be available to all couples, regardless of orientation or gender make up. Just as some same-sex couples are not interested in marrying because it is an institution that has traditionally rejected them, there are women who wish not to marry (but still want legal recognition of their relationships) because it is an institution that has traditionally stripped them of any legal rights or identity. Furthermore, permitting mixed-sex civil partnerships would make it easier for a person in a same-sex civil partnerships to attain gender reassignment, as the partnership would remain legal. Finally, the restriction of civil partnerships to same-sex couples continues the "separate but equal" distinction currently in place. It reinforces the notion that same-sex relationships are not as "real" or "serious" as mixed-sex ones; the term "civil partnership" does not conjure up the same images of love and everlasting commitment as "marriage" does. As a result, a same-sex couple is "elevating" itself by entering a marriage rather than civil partnership, while a mixed-sex couple entering a civil partnership would be seen as a debasement, and it is only through permitting the latter that we will see true equality.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

an academic

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support
I lecture to many LGBT students, and this legislation will provide a significant source of comfort and security to them.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support
This is a simple matter of equality.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support
We are an informally secular society, and why should the majority of the population who do not adhere to any faith be seen, should they wish to marry, as of a lower 'caste' when marrying?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Bigotry ought not to be placated. By all means be sensitive to the belief systems of others, but if racism or under age sex was a part of any faith group’s world view (which around the globe it is/has been), would we tolerate it? Why should religious faith be exempt from civilized and legislated for human rights?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of speech is circumscribed, and not without legal caveats; it is nonsense to regard the expression and practice of bigotry as a civil right.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

an academic
a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Yes. In our world today we have far more pressing issues to concern ourselves with than who is marrying who and what they may or may not have between their legs. More love and tolerance in the world can only be a good thing.
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
Why do they require protection? Another persons marriage has no effect on their own.
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

I believe it would be preferable if couples whose civil partnerships were registered somewhere outside of Scotland were also able to change their civil partnership to a marriage, without having to first dissolve said partnership.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

I believe it is unfair to require trans people to have their spouse's permission to obtain gender recognition (especially since they must have already been living in their acquired gender for two years in order to apply, so it will have little effect on their spouse anyway). I think it would be more reasonable to require the spouse's permission only at the stage of re-registering the marriage, once the trans person's legal status has already been changed.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

The bill provides strong protections for such people, as religious organisations are not required to conduct same-sex marriages, and any individual celebrant who doesn't want to perform them can also opt-out. It has been suggested that civil registrars should also be able to opt-out, but I oppose this - they work for the state and therefore should behave in compliance with the law, not their own personal beliefs.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

I support equal marriage in Scotland. The bill is a huge step forward for equality in Scotland, balancing equality with respect for freedom of religion and freedom of speech.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

I do not believe gender matters in terms of suitability for lifelong partnership, civil rights or child rearing and therefore support same sex marriage. The law should treat all marriages the same, regardless of the genders of the spouses.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

I think it is correct and fair that belief celebrants will be allowed to marry individuals with full weight, celebrating their beliefs in their union.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

I think religious/belief groups should be able to decide themselves whether to endorse mixed-sex marriages and same-sex marriages as well. Some religious bodies do want to conduct same-sex marriages, others do not. Religious freedom should apply to both groups, through opt in for example.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

This for me is not an issue. I would suggest using one term for a religiously endorsed marriage and the other for a normal form marriage, where both carry identical rights as a partnership. I am heterosexual but if I every do get married I will not be having a religious wedding.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support
As above, I do not believe that religion should always have a place in marriage. In fact, I believe marriage to now be a civil and economic institution so I would prefer that many other places became eligible for marriage ceremonies.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

A useful potential option I think.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Absolutely support. In my view of marriage/partnership, gender is not consequential and therefore should not matter.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I think the bill provides balance here- no person who is against same sex marriage will be forced to perform one. I do not think civil registrars should be allowed to opt out of conducting same-sex marriages. Civil registrars are carrying out a civil function on behalf of the state, not a religious function. It would set a dangerous precedent in public service providers (in local government, NHS, etc) to allow this and is no more acceptable on grounds of sexual orientation and gender identity than it would be on other grounds such as race. The Equality Network suggest that some have proposed teachers having opt out rights when it comes to mentioning same-sex marriage. I am HUGELY against this idea. Teachers should report fact in line with government law, not in line with their personal belief.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

I don't believe the bill infringes on any freedom of speech

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

I would like to stress that I support introducing every option and right a straight couple has to same sex couples. This includes all financial rights (I believe pensions under the current bill could be reduced to a same sex husband or wife?).

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

The concept of marriage has changed enormously over the centuries, eg women were once viewed as the property of their husband (and still are in some parts of the world) with no rights of their own. The time is long overdue to recognise another change and to stop excluding and discriminating against a particular group on account of their gender. If society is to progress, it must always move forward, not back as with the current dire situation regarding LBGTs in Russia.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

provided they respect the beliefs of those with different, eg religious, views - I am very disappointed by some prejudice displayed and encouraged on the British Humanist Assoc website

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

Should be up to the individual celebrant whether or not they want to do this

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

Neither

Only if the couple want this. People should be free to choose civil partnership if they would prefer to do so.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In opposition
It becomes crazy - and often impossible for the guests! There should be some sensible restrictions.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

Many religious celebrants are already happy to conduct a service of blessing. This would legitimise this step.

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

If the couple wish to remain married, why should we interfere with their decision?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

The people who need protection and support are those who are being discriminated against, not those who cling to the past and refuse to accept that society is changing.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

It is a vitally important freedom which allows individuals and groups to have a voice and keeps this country from degenerating into an authoritarian society.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

committed Christian and parent of a gay son

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

It seems obvious to me that marriage should be extended to everyone, no matter their sexual orientation.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

This is a civil rights issue that people will look back on in 20 years and wonder what on earth the fuss is all about.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

I guess they can do what they want. If they want to marginalise themselves then they are welcome to do that.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

It seems perverse to force people who are not religious to marry on premises that have no significance to them.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

This is tricky and comes down to the definition of terms really. However the existence of the marriage does not change.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I don't really see why people need protection from this issue. They are more than welcome to disagree but I don't understand what is special about their disagreement that warrants protection. They are standing in the way of a more equal society. Let them face the changes brought about by secularism like everyone else.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

an academic
a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

I have very clear views that same sex couples should, if they wish to have a marriage, whether it be in a Church, or other religious institution. We are at a place in civilisation, where there are a significant number of same sex relationships, homosexuality is not a disease, and same sex couples for an integral part of our society. It is well documented, that gay people make an equal contribution through taxes and the like. There is no tax break available for gay people, so, albeit rather simple, on the basis that a equal contribution is made, equal marriage should also be a right!

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

There should be no restriction on marriage for same-sex couples, therefore this bill is long overdue.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Having been raised in a home without prejudice, my sister was able to embrace her sexuality as a Lesbian and know she is fully supported by her family. I believe that she should have the right to marry her partner, just as I am able to marry mine.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

In this modern age, religion has to adapt to a very changed society. There should be no distinction between the two.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

Should a celebrant wish to perform such a ceremony, they should be allowed to do so. Marriage, at its heart, is a celebration and joining of two people: I find it difficult to understand why some celebrants/institutions would restrict who is allowed to partake in this.

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

On a fundamental level, the level of "rights" would finally be the same. It is ridiculous that "partnerships" have more limited rights than "marriages".

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

Religion no longer holds the sway it once had, and Scotland is now a multicultural society, with many religions. It is naive and ignorant to believe that marriage should only "allowed" through a religious service: marriage means so much more than a benediction and authorisation from a deity/religious institution. To claim otherwise, is unrealistic and not representative of modern-day Britain.

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Just because nature has "decided" on a certain representation of a person, should not prevent them from adapting themselves to feel "true" to who they really are. The laws in this country should move with the times and allow this person the choice to stay with their married partner, in their new gender.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

Neither

needs improving, for all cases eg transgender. also civil partnerships for hetero couples

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
social mores move on. wrong done to those debarred from their civil rights is worse than 'offence' to religious beliefs

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

The Bill makes big strides towards improving equality in Scotland and towards removing ingrained prejudice from our legislative framework.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

It is wholly right that all couples, regardless of their sexuality, are free to express their love and commitment to one another in marriage, and that regardless of the gender of the parties concerned marriage be marriage; exactly the same form of marriage for all.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

As an elder of the Church of Scotland, who to my disappointment have failed to take a strong spiritual lead on this issue, I feel that it is vital that the beliefs of all are recognised and treated with tolerance and respect. It is of paramount importance.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

The Bill in its present form does not allow those who have registered a Civil Partnership outside Scotland to marry in Scotland. This seems most unfair and may create a situation where people who have registered a civil partnership outside Scotland will be unable to marry here. People from countries who do not allow same sex marriage may then find themselves unable to marry at all unless they dissolve their civil partnership and this may be beyond the reach of many. The Bill should be amended to address this and allow all resident in Scotland to marry here.
How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

There are issues surrounding spousal approval with regard to gender recognition and I am concerned that the need to obtain spousal approval for gender recognition may be very difficult for those also involved in divorce proceedings.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

The Bill seems very balanced. In particular I support the view that no civil servant (i.e. registrar) should be able to opt out of conducting same sex marriages. These individuals are performing a function on behalf of the state and their personal beliefs should play no part in that. Any suggestion that this is necessary is tantamount to allowing discrimination to continue, sanctioned by the state.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
I think freedom of speech is important, until it breaches the human rights of others.
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

I strongly support and welcome the bill. It will be a huge step forward for equality in Scotland, and it balances equality with respect for freedom of religion and freedom of speech. We think that some parts of the bill could still be improved further.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

It is very important that the bill does not create two different versions of marriage, same-sex marriage and mixed-sex marriage, because that would lead to continued discrimination. The law should treat all marriages the same, regardless of the genders of the spouses. I welcome that the bill achieves that, with the exceptions of the arrangements to allow religious and belief bodies to choose to conduct mixed-sex marriages only, and the outdated rule of law that in a mixed-sex marriage the wife cannot be charged with resetting goods stolen by her husband. The treatment of those issues in the bill is appropriate. I also note that the bill applies unchanged the existing meaning of adultery as evidence for divorce, to same-sex and mixed-sex marriages. Under the existing law, sexual intercourse with a person of the opposite sex is adultery; other forms of sexual infidelity, with a person of the opposite sex or the same sex, do not fall within the existing legal definition of adultery but can form the basis of a divorce under the “unreasonable behaviour” rule. I agree with the approach taken in the bill, which applies the law on adultery and other sexual infidelity equally to same-sex and mixed-sex marriages, and allows divorce on grounds of sexual infidelity for all marriages. In Scotland, there is no consummation requirement for marriage, and so there is no need for the bill to address this for same-sex marriage.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

I strongly support the principle of allowing transgender people who are married to obtain gender recognition without being required by the state to divorce. In our view, however, a number of amendments are needed to the parts of the bill that deal with gender recognition. As the bill stands, a married person will require the consent of their spouse to obtain gender recognition. This enables the spouse to effectively “veto” the trans person’s gender recognition, or at least to delay it while the trans person applies for a divorce. If the relationship between the spouses is difficult, the divorce proceedings could take a long time, during which the trans person is unable to access their human right to legal recognition in their true gender.

When a trans person applies for gender recognition, they have already been living in their acquired gender for at least two years. Obtaining gender recognition does not therefore change the practical nature of their marriage, which has been same-sex for at least two years. But it does free the trans person from discrimination by bringing their legal status into line with reality. That should be available with or without the spouse’s consent, because it is a matter personal to the trans person, and has no direct effect on their spouse. It is the re-registration of the marriage after gender recognition where both spouses have a direct interest, and where a requirement for the consent of the trans person’s spouse would be appropriate. I therefore strongly believe that spousal consent should not be required for the granting of gender recognition, but should instead be required for the subsequent re-registration of the marriage and the issue of a new marriage certificate. As at present, the non-trans spouse would continue to be able to obtain a divorce in such circumstances, if they wished to end the marriage. The bill is also currently missing a very important provision that was added to the corresponding English legislation, allowing a person to obtain gender recognition with simpler evidence requirements if they have been transitioned for at least six years. When a person has been transitioned for a long time, it can be very difficult indeed to obtain all the medical evidence that is required from people who have only been transitioned two years. The doctors involved may have retired or even died, and as I have transitioned 15 years ago, my doctors have retired and where would I get the information necessary? Therefore I believe that a provision for simpler medical evidence for long-term transitioned people should be added to the bill – this would assist the Gender Recognition Panel as well as applicants. We would also like to see the minimum age for applying for gender recognition brought into line with the minimum age for marrying in Scotland, that is, 16.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL

ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
Neither
It should be up to the individual if they want a civil partnership or a marriage.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
I hope we live in a modern and forward looking Scotland. Times change and I feel that many who have concerns about same sex marriage are out of touch with modern life - we don't send children to work up chimneys any more and what was acceptable even 20 years ago is sometimes no longer the case. Giving some level of protection to outdated and/or bigoted views could be a dangerous move as it could give the "justification" that some might look for to justify their views/attitudes. I think that government should be aspiring to create an open and forward looking Scotland for the 21st century making it clear what is and is not acceptable in our 21st century society - they do it in most of the Scandinavian countries and I fail to see why we cannot do so in Scotland.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

Completely in support. I believe that we are all created equally and should have the same equal rights. I believe you should have the right to love and marry whom every you wish as long as they are both consenting adults.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

If there is a God who created us then people are created gay or straight. And if there is not a God I believe that people who are gay or bisexual did NOT choose to be that way. That is the way they were born and so whether the way they choose to marry i

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
Neither

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

If that is what they couple wishes to do. And if it gives them more rights and makes them more equal in the eyes of the law then that is for the best.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

With boundaries of health and safety, common sense, discussion with land owners, etc then people should be allowed to marry wherever they wish. God does not just live in church! If he/she/it exists - he is everywhere, in everything.
How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

If the couple still love each other and wish to married after this huge life change then they should be allowed to.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Huge social change was never made by the majority - it was made by a few people or small groups of people who believed that something was not right in society (I'm talking about the abolition of slavery, giving women the right to vote, etc). So not everybody is going to agree on this issue and there will always be concerns from those who are absolutely against it. My view is that everybody in this world is equal - man, woman, child, adult, white, black, rich, poor, straight or gay..... and until everybody has the same rights we cannot say that we truly live in a democratic country. That doesn't mean everybody has to agree and approve of everyone else's choices - of course not, nobody does!! But we have to respect each individual and the choices that they make for themselves.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Such a simplistic small statement but - everyone should have the right to freedom of speech. NOT to bully, threaten, be aggressive, be violent in their language, etc. But within certain boundaries (which is always a grey area I know!) this is a basic human right.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

no.

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

This is a quantum leap in terms of equality for Scots.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In opposition

Belief is used frequently to disguise homophobia. Are 'belief celebrants' excused from marrying divorcees? They are paid to perform a job, not project their beliefs onto others.

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

Those who have had a Civil Partnership ceremony, have already encountered significant expense to join in a legal union. It would be extremely unfair to require a further ceremony to convert the union to marriage, given that marriage was not a legal option.

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

Neither
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Neither

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

There is no requirement for 'protections' for those in society who oppose same sex marriage. The Church will not be compelled to perform such ceremonies and if someone performing civil marriage has such a deep rooted belief, why are they performing that role? Surely such strong beliefs dictate that marriage must be performed by a religious celebrant? Opposition to same sex marriage is often little more than window dressing for deep rooted homophobia. Teachers for example are employed to teach the facts not their beliefs, when same sex marriage becomes law they will only be required to teach the facts not 'promote' it. If a teacher believed the earth was flat or believed in creationism, the local authority would not allow them to teach these 'beliefs', therefore why should they be allowed not to teach children (of any age) that being Gay or Lesbian is ok and that being in a loving same sex marriage is also perfectly normal. The bullying of LGBT pupils in schools is still a huge problem, and allowing teachers to promote homophobia by protecting their 'belief' is simply unacceptable.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Whilst anyone can object to same sex marriage and they do, or object to homosexuals, it is not acceptable to preach hatred. If you substitute the word gay for Jew or Muslim or Asian, in terms of the equal marriage coverage, how comfortable would you be with what had been said by objectors? Teachers, public sector employees should not be permitted to allow their 'beliefs' to prevent LGBT people from receiving equality in accessing services.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

an academic

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

I am 100% in support of the bill and same-sex marriage. I am happily married myself - marriage is a wonderful institution in my opinion and it is discriminatory and wrong that it is not available to everyone in our community. Civil partnerships were a great step forward, but ultimately highlight differences, rather than the things couples have in common - wishing to cement and celebrate their love in the way of their choice.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support
Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

I do fail to understand why people need protecting from love. However, I believe the bill makes adequate protection for those whose religious beliefs would preclude them from taking part in, or performing, religious same-sex marriage ceremonies.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support
I don't think it makes a difference in what marriage is whether the couple is same or mixed sex.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support
If I understand it correctly, civil partnership was introduced for same sex couples as they couldn't marry. If they are allowed to be married, civil partnership wouldn't be needed anymore

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
Neither
I'm for allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere. If the couple's priest agrees, I think they should also be allowed to get married on religious premises

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

How on earth does it affect anyone else if two people who love each other are getting married? It doesn't make their marriage any less valuable.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

It's about time! It's embarrassing that it's taken so long to get to this point.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?
What goes on between 2 consenting adults isn't anyone else's business & if 2 people want to get married then that doesn't affect anyone else, so there's no need for concern.

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Freedom of speech is all well & good unless it infringes on the rights of others or could be classed as hate speech.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

N/A

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Freedom of speech should not be a passport to bigotry.

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a human being

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

It's about time the rights of gay and trans gender people are recognized and treated as equal. Discrimination of all kinds has to come to an end whether it be for colour, gender, weight, sexual orientation etc.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

Long over due. I am a straight woman, happily married with 3 children but I fully support and believe in the right to fall in love and marry whomever you choose.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?

In support

why not? If someone is happy to conduct a marriage then where is the problem?

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?

In support

Everyone should be allowed the right to marriage

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?

In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?

In support
How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?

In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?

Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?
In support

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?
In support

How would you characterise your views on the arrangements for authorising celebrants to solemnise opposite sex and same sex marriage (including the opt-in procedures)?
In support

How would you characterise your views on civil partnerships changing to marriages?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing civil marriage ceremonies to take place anywhere, other than religious premises, agreed between the couple and registrar?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing the religious and belief registration of civil partnerships?
In support

How would you characterise your views on allowing transgender persons to stay married when obtaining a full Gender Recognition Certificate, which provides legal recognition in the acquired gender?
In support

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of protections for those in society who may have concerns about same sex marriage?

Would you like to comment on the wider issue of freedom of speech?
Would you like to comment on any other wider issues in relation to the Bill that are not mentioned above?

Are you responding as...

a private individual

14 August 2013
MARRIAGE AND CIVIL PARTNERSHIP (SCOTLAND) BILL
ANONYMOUS SUBMISSION

How would you characterise your views on the Bill in general?

In support

It will be a huge step forward for equality in Scotland, and it balances equality with respect for freedom of religion and freedom of speech. I think that some parts of the bill could still be improved further - see questions 7, 8 and 11 below.

How would you characterise your views on the introduction of same sex marriage, so that same sex couples can marry each other?

In support

It is very important that the bill does not create two different versions of marriage, same-sex marriage and mixed-sex marriage, because that would lead to continued discrimination. The law should treat all marriages the same, regardless of the genders of the spouses. We welcome that the bill achieves that, with the exceptions of the arrangements to allow religious and belief bodies to choose to conduct mixed-sex marriages only, and the outdated rule of law that in a mixed-sex marriage the wife cannot be charged with resetting goods stolen by her husband. The treatment of those issues in the bill is appropriate. We also note that the bill applies unchanged the existing meaning of adultery as evidence for divorce, to same-sex and mixed-sex marriages. Under the existing law, sexual intercourse with a person of the opposite sex is adultery; other forms of sexual infidelity, with a person of the opposite sex or the same sex, do not fall within the existing legal definition of adultery but can form the basis of a divorce under the unreasonable behaviour rule. We agree with the approach taken in the bill, which applies the law on adultery and other sexual infidelity equally to same-sex and mixed-sex marriages, and allows divorce on grounds of sexual infidelity for all marriages. In Scotland, there is no consummation requirement for marriage, and so there is no need for the bill to address this for same-sex marriage.

How would you characterise your views on putting belief celebrants on the same footing as religious celebrants?

In support

Humanist celebrants in Scotland can already conduct legally-recognised marriages. The bill clarifies that in the law, and makes clear that other philosophical belief organisations can also apply to conduct marriages. We welcome this.

