Foreword

Purpose of the series

The aim of this series is to bring together in a single place all the official Parliamentary documents relating to the passage of the Bill that becomes an Act of the Scottish Parliament (ASP). The list of documents included in any particular volume will depend on the nature of the Bill and the circumstances of its passage, but a typical volume will include:

- every print of the Bill (usually three – “As Introduced”, “As Amended at Stage 2” and "As Passed");
- the accompanying documents published with the “As Introduced” print of the Bill (and any revised versions published at later Stages);
- every Marshalled List of amendments from Stages 2 and 3;
- every Groupings list from Stages 2 and 3;
- the lead Committee’s “Stage 1 report” (which itself includes reports of other committees involved in the Stage 1 process, relevant committee Minutes and extracts from the Official Report of Stage 1 proceedings);
- the Official Report of the Stage 1 and Stage 3 debates in the Parliament;
- the Official Report of Stage 2 committee consideration;
- the Minutes (or relevant extracts) of relevant Committee meetings and of the Parliament for Stages 1 and 3.

All documents included are re-printed in the original layout and format, but with minor typographical and layout errors corrected. An exception is the groupings of amendments for Stage 2 and Stage 3 (a list of amendments in debating order was included in the original documents to assist members during actual proceedings but is omitted here as the text of amendments is already contained in the relevant marshalled list).

Where documents in the volume include web-links to external sources or to documents not incorporated in this volume, these links have been checked and are correct at the time of publishing this volume. The Scottish Parliament is not responsible for the content of external Internet sites. The links in this volume will not be monitored after publication, and no guarantee can be given that all links will continue to be effective.

Documents in each volume are arranged in the order in which they relate to the passage of the Bill through its various stages, from introduction to passing. The Act itself is not included on the grounds that it is already generally available and is, in any case, not a Parliamentary publication.

Outline of the legislative process

Bills in the Scottish Parliament follow a three-stage process. The fundamentals of the process are laid down by section 36(1) of the Scotland Act 1998, and amplified by Chapter 9 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. In outline, the process is as follows:
Introduction, followed by publication of the Bill and its accompanying documents;

Stage 1: the Bill is first referred to a relevant committee, which produces a report informed by evidence from interested parties, then the Parliament debates the Bill and decides whether to agree to its general principles;

Stage 2: the Bill returns to a committee for detailed consideration of amendments;

Stage 3: the Bill is considered by the Parliament, with consideration of further amendments followed by a debate and a decision on whether to pass the Bill.

After a Bill is passed, three law officers and the Secretary of State have a period of four weeks within which they may challenge the Bill under sections 33 and 35 of the Scotland Act respectively. The Bill may then be submitted for Royal Assent, at which point it becomes an Act.

Standing Orders allow for some variations from the above pattern in some cases. For example, Bills may be referred back to a committee during Stage 3 for further Stage 2 consideration. In addition, the procedures vary for certain categories of Bills, such as Committee Bills or Emergency Bills. For some volumes in the series, relevant proceedings prior to introduction (such as pre-legislative scrutiny of a draft Bill) may be included.

The reader who is unfamiliar with Bill procedures, or with the terminology of legislation more generally, is advised to consult in the first instance the Guidance on Public Bills published by the Parliament. That Guidance, and the Standing Orders, are available free of charge on the Parliament’s website (www.scottish.parliament.uk).

The series is produced by the Legislation Team within the Parliament’s Chamber Office. Comments on this volume or on the series as a whole may be sent to the Legislation Team at the Scottish Parliament, Edinburgh EH99 1SP.

Notes on this volume

The Bill to which this volume relates followed the standard 3 stage process described above.

The Education and Culture Committee was the lead committee at Stage 1. Relevant extracts from the Official Report and minutes and all written submissions received (all originally published separately from the Stage 1 Report on the Parliament’s website) are included in this volume, after the Stage 1 Report.

The Local Government and Regeneration Committee also reported on the Bill at Stage 1, as did the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee and the Finance Committee. Again, any additional material relating to each Committee’s consideration of the Bill is included after the relevant committee report.

The Education and Culture Committee took evidence on the issue of school closures between Stages 1 and 2. Relevant Official Report and minute extracts, along with written submissions received, are included at the appropriate point. No formal report was issued by the Committee in relation to this evidence.
Various additional pieces of relevant correspondence are also included throughout.

The Finance Committee took evidence on the Supplementary Financial Memorandum on the morning of the day on which Stage 3 took place. Later correspondence relating to this evidence session, along with extracts from the Official Report and minutes of a further evidence session which took place before the Committee on 4 June 2014 are included for completeness, despite the Bill having been passed by the Parliament on 19 February 2014.

RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

1 Duties of Scottish Ministers in relation to the rights of children

10 (1) The Scottish Ministers must—

(a) keep under consideration whether there are any steps which they could take which would or might secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC requirements, and

(b) if they consider it appropriate to do so, take any of the steps identified by that consideration.

15 (2) The Scottish Ministers must promote public awareness and understanding (including appropriate awareness and understanding among children) of the rights of children.

10 (3) As soon as practicable after the end of each 3 year period, the Scottish Ministers must lay before the Scottish Parliament a report of—

(a) what steps they have taken in that period to secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC requirements, and

(b) what they have done in pursuance of subsection (2).

20 (4) In subsection (3), “3 year period” means—

(a) the period of 3 years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, and

(b) each subsequent period of 3 years.
(5) As soon as practicable after a report has been laid before the Scottish Parliament under subsection (3), the Scottish Ministers must publish it (in such manner as they consider appropriate).

2 Duties of public authorities in relation to the UNCRC

(1) As soon as practicable after the end of each 3 year period, an authority to which this section applies must publish (in such manner as the authority considers appropriate) a report of what steps it has taken in that period to secure better or further effect within its areas of responsibility of the UNCRC requirements.

(2) In subsection (1), “3 year period” means—

(a) the period of 3 years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, and

(b) each subsequent period of 3 years.

(3) Two or more authorities to which this section applies may satisfy subsection (1) by publishing a report prepared by them jointly.

3 Authorities to which section 2 applies

(1) The authorities to which section 2 applies are the persons listed, or persons within a description listed, in schedule 1.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 1 by—

(a) adding a person or description of persons,

(b) removing an entry listed in it, or

(c) modifying an entry listed in it.

(3) An order under subsection (2)(a) may—

(a) add a person only if the person falls within subsection (4),

(b) add a description of persons only if each of the persons within the description falls within subsection (4).

(4) A person falls within this subsection if the person—

(a) is part of the Scottish Administration,

(b) is a Scottish public authority with mixed functions or no reserved functions (within the meaning of the Scotland Act 1998), or

(c) is a publicly owned company.

(5) In subsection (4)(c), “publicly owned company” means a company that is wholly owned by—

(a) the Scottish Ministers, or

(b) a person listed, or a person within a description listed, in schedule 1.

(6) For the purpose of subsection (5), a company is wholly owned—

(a) by the Scottish Ministers if it has no members other than—

(i) the Scottish Ministers or other companies that are wholly owned by them,
(ii) persons acting on behalf of the Scottish Ministers or of such other companies,

(b) by a person listed, or a person within a description listed, in schedule 1 if it has no members other than—

(i) the person or other companies that are wholly owned by the person, or

(ii) persons acting on behalf of the person or of such other companies.

(7) In this section, “company” includes any body corporate.

(1) In this Part—

“the rights of children” includes the rights and obligations set out in—

(a) the UNCRC,

(b) the first optional protocol to the UNCRC, and

(c) the second optional protocol to the UNCRC,

“the UNCRC” means the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child adopted and opened for signature, ratification and accession by General Assembly resolution 44/25 of 20 November 1989,

“the first optional protocol” means the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict,

“the second optional protocol” means the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography,

“the UNCRC requirements” means the rights and obligations set out in—

(a) Part 1 of the UNCRC,

(b) Articles 1 to 6(1), 6(3) and 7 of the first optional protocol, and

(c) Articles 1 to 10 of the second optional protocol.

(2) A reference in subsection (1) to a UNCRC document is to be read as a reference to that document subject to—

(a) any amendments in force in relation to the United Kingdom at the time, and

(b) any reservations, objections or interpretative declarations by the United Kingdom in force at the time.

(3) In subsection (2), “UNCRC document”—

(a) means the UNCRC or any optional protocol to the UNCRC, and

(b) includes provision of a UNCRC document.

(4) Where subsection (5) applies, the Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (1) as they consider appropriate to take account of—

(a) an optional protocol to the UNCRC, or

(b) an amendment of a document referred to in subsection (1) at the time.

(5) This subsection applies where the protocol or amendment is one which—
(a) the United Kingdom has ratified, or
(b) the United Kingdom has signed with a view to ratification.

(6) No modification may be made by an order under subsection (4) so as to come into force before the protocol or amendment is in force in relation to the United Kingdom.

PART 2

COMMISSIONER FOR CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE IN SCOTLAND

5 Investigations by the Commissioner

(1) The Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 is amended as follows.

(2) In section 7—

(a) for subsections (1) and (2), substitute—

“(1) The Commissioner may carry out an investigation into—

(a) whether, by what means and to what extent a service provider has regard to the rights, interests and views of children and young people in making decisions or taking actions that affect those children and young people (such an investigation being called a “general investigation”),

(b) whether, by what means and to what extent a service provider had regard to the rights, interests and views of a child or young person in making a decision or taking an action that affected that child or young person (such an investigation being called an “individual investigation”).

(2) The Commissioner may carry out a general investigation only if the Commissioner, having considered the available evidence on, and any information received about, the matter, is satisfied on reasonable grounds that the matter to be investigated raises an issue of particular significance to—

(a) children and young people generally, or

(b) particular groups of children and young people.

(2A) The Commissioner may carry out an investigation only if the Commissioner, having considered the available evidence on, and any information received about, the matter, is satisfied on reasonable grounds that the investigation would not duplicate work that is properly the function of another person.”;

(b) in subsection (3), omit paragraph (b),

(c) after that subsection, add—

“(4) Subsection (5) applies in relation to a matter about which the Commissioner may carry out an individual investigation.

(5) Where the Commissioner considers that the matter may be capable of being resolved without an investigation, the Commissioner may with a view to securing that outcome take such steps as the Commissioner considers appropriate.”.

(3) In section 8—

(a) in subsection (1), for paragraph (b) substitute—
“(b) take such steps as appear to the Commissioner to be appropriate with a view to bringing notice of the investigation and terms of reference to the attention of persons likely to be affected by it.”,

(b) in subsection (2), for “An” substitute “A general”,

(c) after that subsection, add—

“(3) An individual investigation is to be conducted in private.”.

(4) In section 11—

(a) in subsection (1), for “lay before the Parliament” substitute “prepare”,

(b) in subsection (3), for “laid before the Parliament” substitute “finalised”,

(c) after that subsection, add—

“(4) The Commissioner must lay before the Parliament the report of a general investigation.

(5) The Commissioner may lay before the Parliament the report of an individual investigation.”.

6 Requirement to respond to Commissioner’s recommendations

(1) The Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 is amended as follows.

(2) In section 11—

(a) after subsection (2), insert—

“(2A) In relation to any such recommendation, the report may include a requirement to respond.

(2B) A requirement to respond is a requirement that the service provider provides, within such period as the Commissioner reasonably requires, a statement in writing to the Commissioner setting out—

(a) what the service provider has done or proposes to do in response to the recommendation; or

(b) if the service provider does not intend to do anything in response to the recommendation, the reasons for that.”,

(b) after subsection (5) (as inserted by section 5 of this Act), add—

“(6) Where a report of an investigation includes a requirement to respond, the Commissioner must give a copy of the report to the service provider.”.

(3) After section 14, insert—

“14AA Publication of responses to recommendations of investigations

(1) The Commissioner must publish any statement provided in response to a requirement to respond to a recommendation arising out of a general investigation.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply if, or to the extent that, the Commissioner considers publication to be inappropriate.
(3) The Commissioner may publish any statement provided in response to a requirement to respond to a recommendation arising out of an individual investigation.

(4) The Commissioner must ensure that, so far as reasonable and practicable having regard to the subject matter, the version of the statement which is published under subsection (1) or (3) does not name or identify any child or young person, or group of children or young people, referred to in it.

(5) The Commissioner may, in such manner as the Commissioner considers appropriate, publicise a failure to comply with a requirement to respond."

PART 3

CHILDREN’S SERVICES PLANNING

7 Introductory

(1) For the purposes of this Part—

“children’s service” means any service provided in the area of a local authority by a person mentioned in subsection (2) which is provided wholly or mainly to, or for the benefit of—

(a) children generally, or
(b) children with needs of a particular type (such as looked after children or children with a disability or a need for additional support in learning),

“other service provider” means—

(a) the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland,
(b) the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service,
(c) the Principal Reporter,
(d) the National Convener of Children’s Hearings Scotland,
(e) the Scottish Court Service,
(f) the Scottish Ministers,

“related service” means any service provided in the area of a local authority by a person mentioned in subsection (2) which though not a children’s service is capable of having a significant effect on the wellbeing of children, “relevant health board” means a health board whose area comprises some or all of the area of the local authority.

(2) The persons referred to in the definitions of “children’s service” and “related service” in subsection (1) are—

(a) the local authority,
(b) any relevant health board,
(c) any other service provider.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by order specify—

(a) services which are to be considered to be included within or excluded from the definition of “children’s service” or “related service” in subsection (1),
(b) matters in relation to services falling within either of those definitions which are to be considered to be included within or excluded from those services.

(4) Before making such an order, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) each health board,
   (b) each local authority, and
   (c) where the service concerned is provided by one of the other service providers, that person.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify the definition of “other service provider” in subsection (1) by—
   (a) adding a person or a description of persons,
   (b) removing an entry listed in it, or
   (c) varying an entry listed in it.

(6) A function conferred by this Part on a local authority and each relevant health board is to be exercised by those persons jointly.

8 Requirement to prepare children’s services plan

(1) A local authority and each relevant health board must in respect of each 3 year period prepare a children’s services plan for the area of the local authority.

   “3 year period” means—
   (a) the period of 3 years beginning with such date after the coming into force of this section as the Scottish Ministers specify by order, and
   (b) each subsequent period of 3 years,
   “children’s services plan” means a document setting out their plans for the provision over that period of all—
   (a) children’s services, and
   (b) related services.

9 Aims of children’s services plan

(1) A children’s services plan is to be prepared with a view to securing the achievement of the aims in subsection (2).

(2) Those aims are—
   (a) that children’s services in the area concerned are provided in the way which—
       (i) best safeguards, supports and promotes the wellbeing of children in the area concerned,
       (ii) is most integrated from the point of view of recipients, and
       (iii) constitutes the most efficient use of available resources,
(b) that related services in the area concerned are provided in the way which, so far as consistent with the objects and proper delivery of the service concerned, safeguards, supports and promotes the wellbeing of children in the area concerned.

10 Children’s services plan: process

(1) In preparing a children’s services plan a local authority and each relevant health board must—

(a) give each of the other service providers an effective opportunity (consistent with the extent to which the services they provide are to be the subject of the children’s services plan) to participate in or contribute to the preparation of the plan, and

(b) consult—

(i) such organisations as appear to fall within subsection (2),

(ii) such social landlords as appear to provide housing in the area of the local authority, and

(iii) such other persons as the Scottish Ministers may by direction specify.

(2) The organisations falling within this subsection are organisations (whether or not formally constituted) which—

(a) represent the interests of persons who use or are likely to use any children’s service or related service in the area of the local authority, or

(b) provide a service in the area which, if it were provided by the local authority, any relevant health board or any of the other service providers, would be a children’s service or a related service.

(3) In subsection (1)(b)(ii), “social landlords” has the meaning given by section 165 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010.

(4) A direction under subsection (1)(b)(iii) may—

(a) specify different persons for different local authority areas,

(b) be revised or revoked.

(5) Each of other service providers is to participate in or contribute to the preparation of the children’s services plan in accordance with the opportunity given to them under subsection (1)(a).

(6) The persons to be consulted under subsection (1)(b) are to meet any reasonable request which the local authority and each relevant health board make of them—

(a) to participate in the preparation of the children’s services plan for the area,

(b) to contribute to the preparation of that plan.

(7) As soon as reasonably practicable after a children’s services plan has been prepared, the local authority and each relevant health board must submit it to each of the other service providers for agreement.

(8) As soon as reasonably practicable after each of the other service providers has agreed a children’s services plan, the local authority and each relevant health board must—

(a) submit it to the Scottish Ministers, and

(b) publish it (in such manner as the persons who prepared it consider appropriate).
11  Children’s services plan: review
   (1) A local authority and each relevant health board—
       (a) must keep the children’s services plan for the area of the local authority under review, and
       (b) may in consequence prepare a revised children’s services plan.
   (2) The following provisions apply to a revised children’s services plan as they apply to a children’s services plan—
           section 9,
           section 10, and subsection (1) of this section.

12  Implementation of children’s services plan
   (1) Subsection (2) applies where a children’s services plan is published under section 10(8).
   (2) The local authority, each relevant health board and each of the other service providers must, so far as reasonably practicable, provide children’s services and related services in the area of the local authority in accordance with the plan.
   (3) Subsection (2) does not apply to the extent that the person providing the service considers that to comply with it would adversely affect the wellbeing of a child.

13  Reporting on children’s services plan
   (1) As soon as practicable after the end of each 1 year period, a local authority and each relevant health board must publish (in such manner as they consider appropriate) a report on the extent to which—
           (a) children’s services and related services have in that period been provided in the area of the local authority in accordance with the children’s services plan, and
           (b) that provision has achieved—
               (i) the aims listed in section 9(2),
               (ii) such outcomes in relation to the wellbeing of children in the area as the Scottish Ministers may by order prescribe.
   (2) In subsection (1), “1 year period” means—
       (a) the period of 1 year beginning with the date specified under section 8(1), and
       (b) each subsequent period of 1 year.

14  Assistance in relation to children’s services planning
   (1) A person mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any reasonable request made of them to provide a local authority and each relevant health board with information, advice or assistance for the purposes of exercising their functions under this Part.
   (2) Those persons are—
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Part 3—Children’s services planning

(a) any of the other service providers (but only in so far as the information, advice or assistance relates to a children’s service or a related service which it is a function of the other service provider to provide),

(b) any of the persons mentioned in section 10(1)(b).

Subsection (1) does not apply where the person considers that the provision of the information, advice or assistance concerned would—

(a) be incompatible with any duty of the person, or

(b) unduly prejudice the exercise of any function of the person.

15 Guidance in relation to children’s services planning

(1) The persons mentioned in subsection (2) must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of the functions conferred on them by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 12).

(2) Those persons are—

(a) a local authority and each relevant health board,

(b) each of the other service providers.

(3) Guidance may be issued generally or for particular purposes.

(4) Different guidance may be issued for different local government areas or otherwise for different purposes.

(5) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult the persons to whom it relates.

16 Directions in relation to children’s services planning

(1) The persons mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of the functions conferred by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 12).

(2) Those persons are—

(a) a local authority and each relevant health board,

(b) each of the other service providers.

(3) Directions may be issued generally or for particular purposes.

(4) Different directions may be issued to different persons or otherwise for different purposes.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the person to which it relates.

17 Children’s services planning: default powers of Scottish Ministers

(1) This section applies where the Scottish Ministers consider that a local authority and each relevant health board—

(a) are not exercising a function conferred on them by this Part, or

(b) are in exercising such a function not complying with section 15(1).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may direct that the function—
(a) is to be exercised in particular way, or
(b) is to be exercised instead by such of the persons mentioned in subsection (3) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(3) Those persons are—
(a) one of or some of the persons whose function it is,
(b) other local authorities or health boards.

(4) A direction under subsection (2)(b) may include such provision as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate as to the making by a person who is not to be exercising the function of payment to a person who is to exercise the function by virtue of the direction.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction under subsection (2) the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) the local authority and relevant health boards whose failure is to be, or is, the subject of the direction, and
(b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

(6) Where the Scottish Ministers consider that a direction under subsection (2) has been or would be insufficient to achieve effective exercise of the function concerned they may by order constitute a joint board of the local authority and each relevant health board to exercise the function.

(7) A order under subsection (6) may include provision as to—
(a) the constitution and proceedings of the joint board,
(b) the membership of the joint board,
(c) the transfer to the joint board of any property, rights or liabilities of the local authority or any of the relevant health boards,
(d) the transfer to the joint board of any staff of the local authority or any of the relevant health boards,
(e) the supply of services or facilities by the local authority or any of the relevant health boards to the joint board,
(f) direction by the Scottish Ministers of the exercise by the joint board of any of its functions, or
(g) such other matters relating to the operation of the joint board as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(8) A joint board constituted under subsection (6) is to be a body corporate.

(9) Before making an order under subsection (6) the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) the local authority and relevant health boards to whom it relates, and
(b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

18 Interpretation of Part 3
In this Part—
“children’s services plan” has the meaning given by section 8(2),
“service” means any service or support—
(a) which must be provided by the person concerned, or
(b) which the person concerned has power to provide.

PART 4

PROVISION OF NAMED PERSONS

19 Named person service

(1) In this Part, “named person service” means the service of making available, in relation to a child or young person, an identified individual who is to exercise the functions in subsection (5).

(2) An individual may be identified for the purpose of a named person service only if the individual falls within subsection (3).

(3) An individual falls within this subsection if—

(a) the individual—

(i) is an employee of the service provider, or

(ii) is, or is an employee of, a person who exercises any function on behalf of the service provider, and

(b) the individual meets such requirements as to training, qualifications, experience or position as may be specified by the Scottish Ministers by order.

(4) An individual does not fall within subsection (3) if the individual is a parent of the child or young person.

(5) The functions referred to in subsection (1) are—

(a) doing such of the following where the named person considers it to be appropriate in order to promote, support or safeguard the wellbeing of the child or young person—

(i) advising, informing or supporting the child or young person, or a parent of the child or young person,

(ii) helping the child or young person, or a parent of the child or young person, to access a service or support, or

(iii) discussing, or raising, a matter about the child or young person with a service provider or relevant authority, and

(b) such other functions as are specified by this Act or any other enactment as being functions of a named person in relation to a child or young person.

(6) The named person functions are exercised on behalf of the service provider concerned.

(7) Responsibility for the exercise of the named person functions lies with the service provider rather than the named person.

20 Named person service in relation to pre-school child

(1) A health board is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to each pre-school child residing in its area.

(2) A “pre-school child” is a child who—
(a) has not commenced attendance at a primary school, and
(b) if the child is of school age, has not commenced attendance at a primary school because the relevant local authority has consented to the child’s commencement at primary school being delayed.

(3) For the purposes of this section—
(a) the reference to school age is to be construed by reference to the school commencement dates fixed by the relevant local authority,
(b) references to attendance at a primary school do not include attendance at a nursery class in such a school,
(c) references to the relevant local authority are to the local authority for the area in which the child concerned resides.

21 Named person service in relation to children not falling within section 20

(1) A local authority is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to each child residing in its area, other than—
(a) a pre-school child, or
(b) a child falling within subsection (2) or (3).

(2) A child falls within this subsection if the child is—
(a) a pupil at a public school which is managed by a different local authority,
(b) a pupil at—
(i) a grant-aided school, or
(ii) an independent school, or
(c) kept in secure accommodation.

(3) A child falls within this subsection if the child is a member of any of the regular forces.

(4) During any period when a child falls within subsection (2)(a), the local authority which manages the school concerned is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to the child.

(5) During any period when a child falls within subsection (2)(b) or (c), the directing authority of the establishment concerned is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to the child.

22 Continuation of named person service in relation to certain young people

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (5) is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to each young person.

(2) A “young person” is a person who falls within subsection (3) or (4).

(3) A person falls within this subsection if the person—
(a) attained the age of 18 years while a pupil at a school, and
(b) has since attaining that age, remained a pupil at that or another school.

(4) A person falls within this subsection if the person—
(a) attained the age of 18 years while kept in secure accommodation, and
(b) has since attaining that age remained kept in secure accommodation.

(5) The person referred to in subsection (1) is—
(a) where the young person is a pupil at a school managed by a local authority, that authority,
(b) in any other case, the directing authority of the establishment concerned.

23 Communication in relation to movement of children and young people

(1) This section applies where a person ceases to be the service provider in relation to a child or young person.

(2) The person (“the outgoing service provider”) must as soon as is reasonably practicable—
(a) inform any other person which has become or which it considers may be the service provider in relation to the child or young person (“the incoming service provider”) that the outgoing service provider has ceased to be the service provider in relation to the child or young person, and
(b) provide the incoming service provider with—
(i) the name and address of the child or young person and each parent of the child or young person (so far as the outgoing service provider has that information), and
(ii) all information which the outgoing service provider holds which falls within subsection (3).

(3) Information falls within this subsection if the outgoing service provider considers that—
(a) it might be relevant to—
(i) the exercise by the incoming service provider of any functions of a service provider under this Part, or
(ii) the future exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person,
(b) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and
(c) its provision would not prejudice the conduct of a criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

24 Duty to communicate information about role of named persons

(1) Each service provider must publish (in such manner as it considers appropriate) information about—
(a) the named person service in its area or establishment,
(b) how the named person functions are, generally, exercised in its area or establishment,
(c) the arrangements, generally, for contacting named persons in its area or establishment,
(d) how the service provider generally exercises its functions under this Part, and
(e) such other matters relating to this Part as it considers appropriate.
(2) The service provider in relation to a child or young person must provide the child or young person and the parents of the child or young person with information about the arrangements for contacting the named person for the child or young person—

(a) as soon as reasonably practicable after it becomes the service provider in relation to the child or young person, and

(b) as soon as reasonably practicable after there is any change in those arrangements.

25 Duty to help named person

(1) Subsection (2) applies where it appears to the service provider in relation to a child or young person that another service provider or a relevant authority could, by doing a certain thing, help in the exercise of any of the named person functions for a child or young person.

(2) The other service provider or relevant authority must comply with any request for such help which is made of it, unless subsection (3) applies.

(3) This subsection applies where the other service provider or relevant authority considers that the provision of the help would—

(a) be incompatible with any duty of the other service provider or relevant authority, or

(b) unduly prejudice the exercise of any function of the other service provider or relevant authority.

26 Information sharing

(1) A service provider or relevant authority must provide to the service provider in relation to a child or young person any information which the person holds which falls within subsection (2).

(2) Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that—

(a) it might be relevant to the exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person,

(b) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and

(c) its provision to the service provider in relation to the child or young person would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

(3) The service provider in relation to a child or young person must provide to a service provider or relevant authority any information which the person holds which falls within subsection (4).

(4) Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that—

(a) it might be relevant to the exercise of any function of the service provider or relevant authority which affects or may affect the wellbeing of the child or young person,

(b) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and

(c) its provision to the service provider or relevant authority would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.
(5) The service provider in relation to a child or young person may provide to a service provider or relevant authority any information which the person holds which falls within subsection (6).

(6) Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that its provision to the service provider or relevant authority is necessary or expedient for the purposes of the exercise of any of the named person functions.

(7) References in this section to a service provider or a relevant authority include any person exercising a function on behalf of a service provider or relevant authority.

27 Disclosure of information

(1) The provision of information under this Part is not to be taken to breach any prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information.

(2) Subsection (3) applies—
   (a) where by virtue of subsection (1), a person provides information in breach of a duty of confidentiality, and
   (b) in providing the information, the person informs the recipient of the breach of duty.

(3) The recipient is not to provide the information to any other person, unless the provision of information is permitted or required by virtue of any enactment (including this Part) or rule of law.

28 Guidance in relation to named person service

(1) Service providers must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about exercising functions under this Part.

(2) Guidance may be issued generally or for particular purposes.

(3) Different guidance may be issued—
   (a) to different service providers,
   (b) to different types of service provider, or
   (c) otherwise for different purposes.

(4) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult any person to whom it will relate.

29 Directions in relation to named person service

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by this Part.

(2) Those persons are—
   (a) a local authority,
   (b) a health board,
   (c) a directing authority.

(3) Directions may be issued generally or for particular purposes.
(4) Different directions may be issued to different persons or otherwise for different purposes.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the person to which it relates.

30 Interpretation of Part 4

(1) In this Part—

“directing authority” means—

(a) when used generally—

(i) the managers of each grant-aided school,

(ii) the proprietor of each independent school, and

(iii) the local authority or other person who manages each residential establishment which comprises secure accommodation,

(b) when used in relation to a particular establishment—

(i) in relation to a grant-aided school, the managers of the school,

(ii) in relation to an independent school, the proprietor of the school,

(iii) in relation to secure accommodation, the local authority or other person who manages the residential establishment,

“named person” means the identified individual made available in pursuance of a named person service,

“named person functions” means the functions to be exercised by way of the named person service,

“parent” has the same meaning as in the 1980 Act,

“pre-school child” has the meaning given by section 20(2),

“relevant authority” means a person listed, or within a description listed, in schedule 2,

“secure accommodation” means accommodation provided in a residential establishment, approved in accordance with regulations made under section 78(2) of the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, for the purpose of restricting the liberty of children,

“service provider” means—

(a) when used generally—

(i) each health board,

(ii) each local authority, and

(iii) each directing authority,

(b) when used in relation to a child or young person, the health board, local authority or directing authority which has the function of providing a named person service in relation to the child or young person.
“young person” has the meaning given by section 22(2).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 2 by—
   (a) adding a person or description of persons,
   (b) removing an entry listed in it, or
   (c) varying an entry listed in it.

Part 5

Child’s plan

Child’s plan: requirement

(1) For the purposes of this Part, a child requires a child’s plan if the responsible authority in relation to a child considers that—
   (a) the child has a wellbeing need, and
   (b) subsection (3) applies in relation to that need.

(2) A child has a wellbeing need if the child’s wellbeing is being, or is at risk of being, adversely affected by any matter.

(3) This subsection applies in relation to a wellbeing need if—
   (a) the need is not capable of being met, or met fully, by the taking of action other than a targeted intervention in relation to the child, and
   (b) the need, or the remainder of the need, is capable of being met, or met to some extent, by a targeted intervention in relation to the child.

(4) A “targeted intervention” is the provision of a service by a relevant authority which is directed at meeting the needs of children whose needs are not capable of being met, or met fully, by the services which are provided generally to children by the authority.

(5) In deciding whether a child requires a child’s plan, the responsible authority is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of—
   (a) the child, and
   (b) the child’s parents.

(6) In having regard to the views of the child, the responsible authority is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(7) Subsection (1) does not apply in relation to—
   (a) a child who already has a child’s plan,
   (b) a child who is a member of any of the regular forces.

(8) In subsection (7)(b), “regular forces” has the meaning given by section 374 of the Armed Forces Act 2006.

Content of a child’s plan

(1) A child’s plan is to contain a statement of—
   (a) the child’s wellbeing need,
   (b) the targeted intervention which requires to be provided in relation to the child,
Part 5—Child’s plan

(c) the relevant authority which is to provide the targeted intervention,
(d) the manner in which the targeted intervention is to be provided, and
(e) the outcome in relation to the child’s wellbeing need which the targeted intervention is intended to achieve.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision as to—
(a) other information which is, or is not, to be contained in child’s plans,
(b) the form of a child’s plans.

Preparation of a child’s plan

(1) This section applies where a child requires a child’s plan.

(2) Subject to subsection (3), the responsible authority is to prepare such a plan as soon as is reasonably practicable.

(3) Where the responsible authority and a relevant authority agree that it would be more appropriate for the relevant authority to prepare a child’s plan, the relevant authority is to prepare the plan as soon as is reasonably practicable.

(4) A child’s plan may contain a targeted intervention to be provided by a relevant authority other than the authority preparing the plan only where the authority providing the service agrees.

(5) A relevant authority which declines to give its agreement as mentioned in subsection (3) or (4) must provide a statement of its reasons.

(6) In preparing a child’s plan, an authority is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of—
(a) the child, and
(b) the child’s parents.

(7) In having regard to the views of the child, the authority preparing the child’s plan is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(8) The Scottish Ministers may by order make further provision as to the preparation of child’s plans.

Responsible authority: general

(1) For the purposes of this Part, the responsible authority in relation to a child is—
(a) where the child is a pre-school child, the health board for the area in which the child resides,
(b) where the child is not a pre-school child, the local authority for the area in which a child resides.

(2) Subsection (1) is subject to section 35.

(3) A “pre-school child” is a child who—
(a) has not commenced attendance at a primary school, and
(b) if the child is of school age, has not commenced attendance at a primary school because the relevant local authority has consented to the child’s commencement at primary school being delayed.
(4) For the purposes of this section—

(a) the reference to school age is to be construed by reference to the school commencement dates fixed by the relevant local authority,

(b) the references to attendance at a primary school do not include attendance at a nursery class in such a school, and

(c) the references to the relevant local authority are to the local authority for the area in which the child concerned resides.

35 Responsible authority: special cases

(1) Where in pursuance of a decision of a local authority or health board a pre-school child resides in the area of a health board which is different to that in which the child would otherwise reside, the health board for the area in which the child would otherwise reside is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

(2) Where the child is a pupil at a public school which is managed by a local authority other than the one for the area in which the child resides, that other authority is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

(3) Where the child is a pupil at a grant-aided school or an independent school, the directing authority of that school is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

(4) Subsection (3) does not apply where the child is such a pupil by virtue of a placement by the local authority for the area in which the child resides.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify this section so as to make further or different provision as to circumstances in which section 34(1) does not apply in relation to a child.

36 Delivery of a child’s plan

(1) A relevant authority which is to provide a targeted intervention under a child’s plan is so far as reasonably practicable to provide it in accordance with the plan.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to the extent that the authority considers that to comply with it would adversely affect the wellbeing of the child.

37 Child’s plan: management

(1) The managing authority of a child’s plan is to keep under review whether—

(a) the wellbeing need of the child stated in the plan is still accurate,

(b) the targeted intervention, or the manner of its provision, is still appropriate,

(c) the outcome of the plan has been achieved, and

(d) the management of the plan should transfer to another relevant authority.

(2) In reviewing a child’s plan, the managing authority—

(a) is to consult—

(i) each other relevant authority which is providing a targeted intervention contained in the plan, and

(ii) where it is neither the managing authority nor consulted under subparagraph (i), the responsible authority in relation to the child, and
(b) is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of—

(i) the child, and

(ii) the child’s parents.

(3) In having regard to the views of the child, the managing authority is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(4) The managing authority of a child’s plan may in consequence of the review—

(a) amend the plan so as to revise—

(i) the wellbeing need of the child,

(ii) the targeted intervention,

(iii) the manner in which the targeted intervention requires to be provided, or

(iv) the outcome which the plan is intended to achieve,

(b) transfer the management of the plan to another relevant authority, or

(c) end the plan.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about the management of child’s plans, including provision about—

(a) when and how a child’s plan is to be reviewed in accordance with subsection (1),

(b) who is to be the managing authority of a child’s plan,

(c) when and to whom management of a child’s plan is to or may transfer under subsection (4)(b),

(d) when and how a new targeted intervention may be included in a child’s plan,

(e) the keeping, disclosure and destruction of child’s plans.

(6) Subject to provision made under subsection (5)(b), the managing authority of a child’s plan is—

(a) the relevant authority which prepared it, or

(b) where management of the child’s plan has been transferred under subsection (4)(b), the relevant authority to which the management of the child’s plan was so transferred (or where there has been more than one such transfer, last so transferred).

38 Assistance in relation to child’s plan

(1) A relevant authority must comply with any reasonable request made of it to provide a person exercising functions under this Part with information, advice or assistance for that purpose.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply where the authority considers that provision of the information, advice or assistance concerned would—

(a) be incompatible with any duty of the authority, or

(b) unduly prejudice the exercise of any function of the authority.

(3) The provision of information in pursuance of subsection (1) is not to be taken to breach any prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information.

(4) Subsection (5) applies—
(a) where, by virtue of subsection (3), a person provides information in breach of a duty of confidentiality, and

(b) in providing the information, the person informs the recipient of the breach of duty.

5 (5) The recipient is not to provide the information to any other person unless the provision of information is permitted or required by virtue of any enactment (including this Part) or rule of law.

39 Guidance on child’s plans

(1) A person exercising a function under this Part (other than the function of complying with section 36) must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about that matter.

(2) Guidance may be issued generally or for particular purposes.

(3) Different guidance may be issued—

(a) to different persons,

(b) to different types of person, or

(c) otherwise for different purposes.

(4) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult any person to whom it will relate.

40 Directions in relation to child’s plans

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 36).

(2) Those persons are—

(a) a local authority,

(b) a health board,

(c) a directing authority.

(3) Directions may be issued generally or for particular purposes.

(4) Different directions may be issued to different persons or otherwise for different purposes.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the person to which it relates.

41 Interpretation of Part 5

In this Part—

“directing authority” means—

(a) when used generally—

(i) the managers of each grant-aided school,

(ii) the proprietor of each independent school,
Part 6

Early learning and childcare

In this Part, “early learning and childcare” means a service, consisting of education and care, of a kind which is suitable in the ordinary case for children who are under school age, regard being had to the importance of interactions and other experiences which support learning and development in a caring and nurturing setting.

Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

(1) An education authority must, in pursuance of its duty under section 1(1) of the 1980 Act, secure that the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare is made available for each eligible pre-school child belonging to its area.

(2) An “eligible pre-school child” is a child who—

(a) is under school age,

(b) has not commenced attendance at a primary school (other than at a nursery class in such a school), and

(c) either—

(i) falls within subsection (3), or

(ii) is within such age range, or is of such other description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) A child falls within this subsection if the child is aged 2 or over and is or has been at any time since the child’s second birthday—

(a) looked after by the authority concerned or by any other local authority, or

(b) the subject of a kinship care order.
(4) An order made under subsection (2)(c)(ii) may provide that a child is to be an eligible pre-school child only if the education authority concerned is satisfied as to any matter relating to the child which is specified in the order.

(5) In subsection (3)(b), “kinship care order” has the meaning given by section 65(1).

44 Mandatory amount of early learning and childcare

(1) The “mandatory amount”, for the purposes of section 43(1), means—

(a) 600 hours in each year for which a child is an eligible pre-school child, and

(b) a pro rata amount for each part of a year for which a child is an eligible pre-school child.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (1) so as to vary the amount of early learning and childcare which is to be made available in pursuance of section 43(1).

(3) Such an order may, without prejudice to section 77(1)(a), make different provision in relation to different types of eligible pre-school children.

45 Looked after 2 year olds: alternative arrangements to meet wellbeing needs

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) an authority’s duty under section 43(1) applies in relation to a child only by virtue of the child falling within section 43(3)(a),

(b) the authority, after assessing the child’s needs, considers that making alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care would better safeguard or promote the child’s wellbeing.

(2) Where this subsection applies, the authority—

(a) need not comply with its duty under section 43(1) in relation to the child, but

(b) must make such alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care as it considers appropriate for the purposes of safeguarding or promoting the child’s wellbeing.

(3) Subsection (2) does not apply in relation to a child who is not being looked after by the authority if a parent of the child objects to the authority making alternative arrangements.

(4) The authority may, at any time, review any alternative arrangements it makes in relation to a child in pursuance of subsection (2)(b) (and must do so on becoming aware of any significant change in the child’s circumstances) and may, following such a review, alter those arrangements.

(5) The authority must seek to ensure that a record of—

(a) the outcome of any assessment of a child’s needs that it undertakes in pursuance of subsection (1)(b), and

(b) any alternative arrangements that it makes in relation to the child’s education and care in pursuance of subsection (2)(b), is included in any child’s plan which is prepared for the child under Part 5.

Duty to consult and plan on delivery of early learning and childcare

(1) An education authority must, at least once every 2 years—

(a) consult such persons as appear to it to be representative of parents of children under school age in its area about how it should make early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part, and

(b) after having had regard to views expressed, prepare and publish a plan for how it intends to make early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (1) so as to vary the regularity within which an education authority must consult and plan in pursuance of that subsection.

Method of delivery of early learning and childcare

(1) An education authority must ensure that it makes early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part by way of sessions—

(a) which are provided during at least 38 weeks of every calendar year, and

(b) which are each of more than 2.5 hours but less than 8 hours in duration.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (1) so as to vary the method of delivering early learning and childcare which it describes.

Flexibility in way in which early learning and childcare is made available

In exercising functions under sections 46 and 47, an education authority must have regard to the desirability of ensuring that the method by which it makes early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part is flexible enough to allow parents an appropriate degree of choice when deciding how to access the service.

Interpretation of Part

In this Part—

“early learning and childcare” has the meaning given by section 42,

“eligible pre-school child” has the meaning given by section 43(2), “parent” has the same meaning as in the 1980 Act.

PART 7

CORPORATE PARENTING

Corporate parents

(1) The persons listed, or within a description listed, in schedule 3 are “corporate parents” for the purposes of this Part (subject to subsection (3)).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 3 by—

(a) adding a person or description of persons,

(b) removing an entry listed in it, or

(c) varying an entry listed in it.
(3) The Scottish Ministers are not corporate parents for the purposes of sections 55 to 58.

(4) In this Part, “corporate parenting responsibilities” means the duties conferred on corporate parents by section 52.

51 Application of Part: children and young people

This Part applies to—

(a) every child who is looked after by a local authority, and

(b) every young person who—

(i) is under the age of 26, and

(ii) was (at the time when the person ceased to be of school age or at any subsequent time) but is no longer looked after by a local authority.

52 Corporate parenting responsibilities

It is the duty of every corporate parent, in so far as consistent with the proper exercise of its other functions—

(a) to be alert to matters which, or which might, adversely affect the wellbeing of children and young people to whom this Part applies,

(b) to assess the needs of those children and young people for services and support it provides,

(c) to promote the interests of those children and young people,

(d) to seek to provide those children and young people with opportunities to participate in activities designed to promote their wellbeing,

(e) to take such action as it considers appropriate to help those children and young people—

(i) to access opportunities it provides in pursuance of paragraph (d), and

(ii) to make use of services, and access support, which it provides, and

(f) to take such other action as it considers appropriate for the purposes of improving the way in which it exercises its functions in relation to those children and young people.

53 Planning by corporate parents

(1) A corporate parent must—

(a) prepare a plan for how it proposes to exercise its corporate parenting responsibilities, and

(b) keep its plan under review.

(2) Before preparing or revising a plan, a corporate parent must consult such other corporate parents, and such other persons, as it considers appropriate.

(3) A corporate parent must publish its plan, and any revised plan, in such manner as it considers appropriate (and, in particular, plans may be published together with, or as part of, any other plan or document).
Collaborative working among corporate parents

(1) Corporate parents must, in so far as reasonably practicable, collaborate with each other when exercising their corporate parenting responsibilities or any other functions under this Part where they consider that doing so would safeguard or promote the wellbeing of children or young people to whom this Part applies.

(2) Such collaboration may include—
   (a) sharing information,
   (b) providing advice or assistance,
   (c) co-ordinating activities (and seeking to prevent unnecessary duplication),
   (d) sharing responsibility for action,
   (e) funding activities jointly,
   (f) exercising functions under this Part jointly (for example, by publishing a joint plan or joint report).

Reports by corporate parents

(1) A corporate parent must report on how it has exercised—
   (a) its corporate parenting responsibilities,
   (b) its planning and collaborating functions in pursuance of sections 53 and 54, and
   (c) its other functions under this Part.

(2) Reports may, in particular, include information about—
   (a) standards of performance,
   (b) the outcomes achieved in pursuance of this Part.

(3) Reports are to be published in such manner as the corporate parent considers appropriate (and, in particular, reports may be published together with, or as part of, any other report or document).

Duty to provide information to Scottish Ministers

(1) A corporate parent must provide the Scottish Ministers with such information as they may reasonably require about how it is—
   (a) exercising its corporate parenting responsibilities,
   (b) planning, collaborating or reporting in pursuance of sections 53, 54 or 55, or
   (c) otherwise exercising functions under this Part.

(2) Information which is required may, in particular, include information about—
   (a) standards of performance,
   (b) the outcomes achieved in pursuance of this Part.

Guidance on corporate parenting

(1) A corporate parent must have regard to any guidance about corporate parenting issued by the Scottish Ministers.
(2) Guidance may, in particular, include advice or information about—
   (a) how corporate parents should—
      (i) exercise their corporate parenting responsibilities,
      (ii) promote awareness of their corporate parenting responsibilities,
      (iii) plan, collaborate or report in pursuance of sections 53, 54 or 55, or
      (iv) otherwise exercise functions under this Part,
   (b) outcomes which corporate parents should seek to achieve in exercising functions under this Part.

(3) Guidance may be issued generally or for particular purposes.

(4) Different guidance may be issued for different corporate parents or otherwise for different purposes.

(5) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) any corporate parent to which they relate, and
   (b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

58 Directions to corporate parents

(1) A corporate parent must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about—
   (a) its corporate parenting responsibilities,
   (b) its planning, collaborating or reporting functions under sections 53, 54 or 55, or
   (c) its other functions under this Part.

(2) Directions may be issued generally or for particular purposes.

(3) Different directions may be issued to different corporate parents or otherwise for different purposes.

(4) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) any corporate parent to which it relates, and
   (b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

59 Reports by Scottish Ministers

(1) The Scottish Ministers must, as soon as practicable after the end of each 3 year period, lay before the Scottish Parliament a report on how they have exercised their corporate parenting responsibilities during that period.

(2) In subsection (1), “3 year period” means—
   (a) the period of 3 years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, and
   (b) each subsequent period of 3 years.
AFTERCARE

60 Provision of aftercare to young people

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 29—
   (a) in subsection (2)—
      (i) for “twenty-one” substitute “twenty-six”,
      (ii) the words from third “and” to the end of the subsection are repealed,
   (b) in subsection (3), for “or (2) above” substitute “above or (5A) or (5B) below”,
   (c) after subsection (5) insert—“(5A) After carrying out an assessment under subsection (5) above in pursuance of an application made by a person under subsection (2) above, the local authority—
      (a) must, if satisfied that the person has any eligible needs which cannot be met other than by taking action under this subsection, provide the person with such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers necessary for the purposes of meeting those needs, and
      (b) may otherwise provide such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers appropriate having regard to the person’s welfare, (5B) A local authority may (but is not required to) continue to provide advice, guidance and assistance to a person in pursuance of subsection (5A) after the person reaches the age of twenty-six.”,
   (d) in subsection (6), for “(5)” substitute “(5B)”,
   (e) after subsection (7) insert—
      “(8) For the purposes of subsection (5A)(a) above, a person has “eligible needs” if the person needs care, attention or support of such type as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.
      (9) An order made under subsection (8) is subject to the affirmative procedure.”.

(3) In section 30—
   (a) in subsection (2)(a), for “twenty-one” substitute “twenty-six”,
   (b) omit subsections (3) and (4).

PART 9
COUNSELLING SERVICES

61 Provision of counselling services to parents and others

(1) A local authority must make arrangements to secure that counselling services of such description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify are made available for persons residing in its area who fall within subsection (2).

(2) A person falls within this subsection if the person is—
    (a) a parent of an eligible child,
(b) an individual with parental rights or parental responsibilities in relation to an eligible child.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (2), an “eligible child” is a child who is of such description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(4) An order under subsection (3)—

(a) may include provision which describes a child by reference to a matter about which the local authority must be satisfied in relation to the child,

(b) may, without prejudice to section 77(1)(a), make different provision in relation to—

(i) different descriptions of counselling services specified under subsection (1), or

(ii) each of the paragraphs of subsection (2).

(5) The reference in subsection (2)(b) to an individual with parental rights or parental responsibilities includes an individual with any of those rights or as the case may be responsibilities.

62 Counselling services: further provision

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about—

(a) when or how counselling services specified in an order under section 61(1) are to be provided,

(b) when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child is an eligible child for the purpose of section 61(2),

(c) when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be an eligible child for the purpose of section 61(2),

(d) such other matters about the provision of counselling services specified in an order under section 61(1) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(2) An order under subsection (1)(d) may include provision about—

(a) circumstances in which counselling services specified in an order under section 61(1) may be provided subject to conditions (including conditions as to payment), and

(b) consequences of such conditions not being met.

The following expressions have the same meaning in this Part as they have in Part 1 of the 1995 Act—

parental rights.
SUPPORT FOR KINSHIP CARE

64 Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

(1) A local authority must make arrangements to secure that kinship care assistance is made available for a person residing in its area who falls within subsection (3).

(2) “Kinship care assistance” is assistance of such description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) A person falls within this subsection if the person is—

(a) a person who is applying for, or considering applying for, a kinship care order in relation to an eligible child,

(b) an eligible child who is the subject of a kinship care order,

(c) a person in whose favour a kinship care order in relation to an eligible child subsists,

(d) a child who has attained the age of 16 years, where—

(i) immediately before doing so, the child fell within paragraph (b), and

(ii) the child is an eligible child.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (3), an “eligible child” is a child who is of such description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(5) An order under subsection (4)—

(a) may include provision which describes a child by reference to a matter about which the local authority must be satisfied in relation to the child,

(b) may, without prejudice to section 77(1)(a), make different provision in relation to—

(i) different descriptions of assistance specified under subsection (1), or

(ii) different paragraphs of subsection (3).

65 Orders which are kinship care orders

(1) In section 64, “kinship care order” means—

(a) an order under section 11(1) of the 1995 Act which gives to a qualifying person the right mentioned in section 2(1)(a) of that Act in relation to a child, or

(b) a residence order which has the effect that a child is to live with, or live predominantly with, a qualifying person.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), a “qualifying person” is a person who, at the time the order is made—

(a) is related to the child,

(b) is a friend or acquaintance of a person related to the child, or

(c) has such other relationship to, or connection with, the child as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) But a parent or guardian of a child is not a “qualifying person” for the purposes of subsection (1).
(4) The references in subsection (2) to a person who is related to a child include a person who is—
   (a) married to a person who is related to the child,
   (b) related to the child by the half blood.

66 Kinship care assistance: further provision

(1) The assistance which may be specified as kinship care assistance includes—
   (a) the provision of counselling, advice or information about any matter,
   (b) the provision of financial support (or support in kind) of any description,
   (c) the provision of any service provided by a local authority on a subsidised basis.

(2) An order under section 64(1) may specify assistance by reference to assistance which a person was entitled to from, or being provided with by, a local authority immediately before becoming entitled to assistance under that section.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about—
   (a) when or how kinship care assistance is to be provided,
   (b) when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child is an eligible child for the purpose of section 64(3),
   (c) when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be an eligible child for the purpose of section 64(3),
   (d) such other matters about the provision of kinship care assistance as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(4) An order under subsection (3)(d) may include provision about—
   (a) circumstances in which a local authority may provide kinship care assistance subject to conditions (including conditions as to payment for the assistance or the repayment of financial support), and
   (b) consequences of such conditions not being met (including the recovery of any financial support provided).

67 Interpretation of Part 10

In this Part, “kinship care assistance” has the meaning given by section 64(2).

PART 11

ADOPTION REGISTER

After section 13 of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007, insert—

“CHAPTER 1A

SCOTLAND’S ADOPTION REGISTER

13A Scotland’s Adoption Register
Part 11—Adoption register

(1) The Scottish Ministers must make arrangements for the establishment and maintenance of a register to be known as Scotland’s Adoption Register (referred to in this Chapter as “the Register”).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—

(a) prescribe information which is, or types of information which are, to be included in the Register, which may include information relating to—

(i) children who adoption agencies consider ought to be placed for adoption,

(ii) persons considered by adoption agencies as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption,

(iii) matters relating to such children or persons which arise after information about them is included in the Register,

(iv) children outwith Scotland who may be suitable for adoption,

(v) prospective adopters outwith Scotland,

(b) provide for how information is to be retained in the Register,

(c) make such further provision in relation to the Register as they consider appropriate.

(3) The Register is not to be open to public inspection or search.

(4) Information is to be kept in the Register in any form the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

13B Registration organisation

(1) Arrangements made by the Scottish Ministers under section 13A(1) may in particular—

(a) authorise an organisation to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register (other than functions of making subordinate legislation),

(b) provide for payments to be made to an organisation so authorised.

(2) An organisation authorised in pursuance of subsection (1) (a “registration organisation”) must perform functions delegated to it in accordance with any directions (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers.

13C Supply of information for the Register

(1) An adoption agency must provide the Scottish Ministers with such information as may be prescribed in regulations made under section 13A(2) about—

(a) children who it considers ought to be placed for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such children,

(b) persons who it considers as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such persons.

(2) But an adoption agency is not to disclose—

(a) any information about a child of the type referred to in subsection (1)(a), without the consent of—
(i) the child’s parent or any person who has parental responsibilities or parental rights in relation to the child, and

(ii) such other person as may be prescribed in regulations made under section 13A(2),

(b) any information about a person (other than a child) of the type referred to in subsection (1)(a), without the consent of that person, or

(c) any information about a person of the type referred to in subsection (1)(b), without the consent of that person.

(3) Regulations made under section 13A(2) may—

(a) provide that information is to be provided to a registration organisation in pursuance of subsection (1) instead of to the Scottish Ministers,

(b) provide for how and by when information is to be provided in pursuance of subsection (1),

(c) prescribe a fee which is to be paid by an adoption agency when providing that information,

(d) prescribe the form in which consent is to be given for the purposes of subsection (2).

13D Disclosure of information

(1) It is an offence to disclose any information derived from the Register other than in accordance with regulations made under section 13A(2) in pursuance of this section.

(2) Regulations made under section 13A(2) may authorise the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation to disclose information derived from the Register—

(a) to an adoption agency for the purposes of helping it—

(i) to find persons with whom it would be appropriate to place a child for whom the agency is acting, or

(ii) to find a child who is appropriate for adoption by persons for whom the agency is acting,

(b) to any person (whether or not established or operating in Scotland) specified in the regulations—

(i) for any purpose connected with the performance of functions by the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation in pursuance of this Chapter,

(ii) for the purpose of enabling the information to be entered in a register which is maintained in respect of England, Wales or Northern Ireland and which contains information about children who are suitable for adoption,

(iii) for the purpose of enabling or assisting that person to perform any functions which relate to adoption,

(iv) for use for statistical or research purposes, or

(v) for any other purpose relating to adoption.
(3) Regulations made under section 13A(2) may—
   (a) set out terms and conditions on which information may be disclosed in pursuance of this section,
   (b) specify steps to be taken by an adoption agency in respect of information received in pursuance of subsection (2),
   (c) authorise an adoption agency to disclose information derived from the Register for purposes relating to adoption,
   (d) prescribe a fee which is to be paid to the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation in respect of a disclosure of information made in pursuance of subsection (2) or (4) or paragraph (c) of this subsection.

(4) Subsection (1) does not apply to a disclosure of information by or with the authority of the Scottish Ministers.

(5) A person who is guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 3 months, or a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale, or both.

13E Use of an organisation as agency for payments

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations authorise a registration organisation or any other person to act as agent for the payment or receipt of sums payable by adoption agencies to other adoption agencies and may require adoption agencies to pay or receive such sums through the organisation.

(2) A registration organisation or other person authorised under subsection (1) is to perform the functions exercisable by virtue of that subsection in accordance with any directions (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers.

13F Supplementary

Nothing authorised or required to be done by virtue of this Chapter constitutes an offence under section 72(2) or 75(1).”.

OTHER REFORMS

Children’s hearings

69 Area support teams: establishment

(1) The Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 is amended as follows.

(2) In schedule 1—
   (a) in paragraph 12—
      (i) in sub-paragraph (1), omit “and maintain”,
      (ii) for sub-paragraph (3), substitute—
         “(3) The National Convener—
            (a) must keep the designation of areas under sub-paragraph (1) under review, and
(b) may at any time revoke a designation or make a new one.

(3A) In exercising the powers to make and revoke designations, the National Convener must ensure that at all times each local authority area falls within an area designated under sub-paragraph (1).

(3B) Revocation of a designation under sub-paragraph (1) has the effect of dissolving the area support team established in consequence of the designation.

(3C) Before deciding to make or revoke a designation under sub-paragraph (1), the National Convener must consult each affected local authority.

(3D) In sub-paragraph (3C), “affected local authority” means—

(a) in the case of making a designation, each local authority whose area falls within the area proposed to be designated,

(b) in the case of revoking a designation, each constituent authority for the area support team established in consequence of the designation.

(3E) On making or revoking a designation under sub-paragraph (1), the National Convener must notify each local authority which was consulted under sub-paragraph (3C) in relation to the decision to make or revoke the designation.”,

(b) in paragraph 13—

(i) in sub-paragraph (1), the words “the National Convener establishes an area support team under paragraph 12(1)” become sub-sub-paragraph (a),

(ii) after that sub-sub-paragraph insert “; and

(b) the area of the area support team consists of or includes a new area.”,

(iii) in sub-paragraph (4)(a), for “area of the area support team” substitute “new area concerned”;

(iv) in sub-paragraph (7), after the definition of “Children’s Panel Advisory Committee” insert—

“‘new area’ means an area which has never previously been the area (or part of the area) of an area support team.”.

(3) An area support team established before this section comes into force continues in existence as if it were established under paragraph 12(1) as amended by this section.

70 Area support teams: administrative support by local authorities

(1) The Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 is amended as follows.

(2) In schedule 1, in paragraph 14, after sub-paragraph (8) insert—

“(9) A constituent authority must provide an area support team with such administrative support as the National Convener considers appropriate.

(10) In sub-paragraph (9), “administrative support” means staff, property or other services which the National Convener considers are required to facilitate the carrying out by an area support team of its functions.”.
Detention of children in secure accommodation

71 Appeal against detention of child in secure accommodation

After section 44 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 insert—

“44A Appeal against detention in secure accommodation

(1) A child, or a relevant person in relation to the child, may appeal to the sheriff against a decision by a local authority to detain the child in secure accommodation in pursuance of an order made under section 44 of this Act.

(2) The sheriff may determine an appeal by—

(a) confirming the decision to detain the child in secure accommodation; or

(b) quashing that decision and directing the local authority to move the child to be detained in residential accommodation which is not secure accommodation.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision about appeals under subsection (1).

(4) Regulations under subsection (3) may in particular—

(a) specify the period within which an appeal may be made;

(b) make provision about the hearing of evidence during an appeal;

(c) provide for appeals to the sheriff principal and Court of Session against the determination of an appeal.

(5) Regulations under subsection (3) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

(6) In this section—

“relevant person”, in relation to a child, means—

(a) any person who has parental responsibilities or parental rights (within the meaning of sections 1(3) and 2(4) respectively of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995) in relation to the child; and

(b) where the child is subject to a compulsory supervision order which does not have effect by virtue of section 44(4) of this Act, any person who is deemed to be a relevant person in relation to the child by virtue of section 81(3), 160(4)(b) or 164(6) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011; and “secure accommodation” has the same meaning as in section 44 of this Act.”.

Schools consultation

72 Closure proposals: call-in by the Scottish Ministers

(1) In section 15 of the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010, in each of subsections (3), (4) and (6) for “6” substitute “8”.

(2) The amendments made by subsection (1) have effect only where the decision of the education authority to implement the closure proposal (as referred to in section 15(1) of the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010) is made on or after the day on which that subsection comes into force.
Wellbeing under 1995 Act

73 Consideration of wellbeing in exercising certain functions

After section 23 of the 1995 Act, insert—

“23A Sections 17 and 22: consideration of wellbeing
(1) This section applies where a local authority is exercising a function under or by virtue of section 17 or 22 of this Act.
(2) The local authority must have regard to the general principle that functions should be exercised in relation to children in a way which is designed to safeguard, support and promote their wellbeing.
(3) For the purpose of subsection (2) above, the local authority is to assess the wellbeing of a child by reference to the extent to which the matters listed in section 74(2) of the 2013 Act are or, as the case may be, would be satisfied in relation to the child.
(4) In assessing the wellbeing of a child as mentioned in subsection (3) above, a local authority is to have regard to the guidance issued under section 74(3) of the 2013 Act.
(5) In this section, “the 2013 Act” means the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2013.”.

General

74 Assessment of wellbeing

(1) This section applies where under this Act a person requires to assess whether the wellbeing of a child or young person is being or would be—
(a) promoted,
(b) safeguarded,
(c) supported,
(d) affected, or
(e) subject to an effect.
(2) The person is to assess the wellbeing of the child or young person by reference to the extent to which the child or young person is or, as the case may be, would be—Safe, Healthy, Achieving, Nurtured,
Active,
Respected,
Responsible, and Included.
(3) The Scottish Ministers must issue guidance on how the matters listed in subsection (2) are to be used to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person.

(4) Before issuing or revising such guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) each local authority,
   (b) each health board, and
   (c) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

(5) In measuring the wellbeing of a child or young person as mentioned in subsection (2), a person is to have regard to the guidance issued under subsection (3).

(6) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify the list in subsection (2).

(7) Before making an order under subsection (6), the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) each local authority,
   (b) each health board, and
   (c) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

Interpretation

(1) In this Act—
   “the 1980 Act” means the Education (Scotland) Act 1980,
   “the 1995 Act” means the Children (Scotland) Act 1995,
   “child” means a person who has not attained the age of 18 years,
   “health board” means a board constituted under section 2(1)(a) of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978.

(2) References in this Act to a child being “looked after” are to be construed in accordance with section 17(6) of the 1995 Act.

(3) The following expressions have the same meaning in this Act as they have in the 1980 Act—education authority grant-aided school independent school managers nursery class primary school proprietor public school pupil school age.
Modification of enactments

Schedule 4 (which makes minor amendments to enactments and otherwise modifies enactments for the purposes of or in consequence of this Act) has effect.

Subordinate legislation

(1) Any power of the Scottish Ministers to make an order under this Act includes power to make—
   (a) different provision for different purposes,
   (b) such supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate.

(2) An order made under any of the following sections is subject to the affirmative procedure—
   section 3(2)
   section 7(5)
   section 17(6)
   section 30(2)
   section 35(5)
   section 44(2)
   section 47(2)
   section 50(2)
   section 74(6).

(3) An order made under section 78 containing provisions which add to, replace or omit any part of the text of this or any other Act is subject to the affirmative procedure.

(4) All other orders made under this Act are subject to the negative procedure.

(5) This section does not apply to an order made under section 79(2).

Ancillary provision

The Scottish Ministers may by order make—
   (a) such supplementary, incidental or consequential provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, or for the purposes of giving full effect to, any provision made by, or by virtue of, this Act, and
   (b) such transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of any provision of this Act.

Commencement

(1) This Part (apart from sections 74, 75 and 76) comes into force on the day after Royal Assent.

(2) The other provisions of this Act come into force on such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.
(3) An order under this section may include transitional, transitory or saving provision.

CONTENTS

1. As required under Rule 9.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, the following documents are published to accompany the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013:

- Explanatory Notes;
- a Financial Memorandum;
- a Scottish Government Statement on legislative competence; and
- the Presiding Officer’s Statement on legislative competence.

A Policy Memorandum is printed separately as SP Bill 27–PM.
These documents relate to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 27) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013

EXPLANATORY NOTES

INTRODUCTION

2. These Explanatory Notes have been prepared by the Scottish Government in order to assist the reader of the Bill and to help inform debate on it. They do not form part of the Bill and have not been endorsed by the Scottish Parliament.

3. The Notes should be read in conjunction with the Bill. They are not, and are not meant to be, a comprehensive description of the Bill. So where a section or schedule, or a part of a section or schedule, does not seem to require any explanation or comment, none is given.

THE BILL

Summary and background

4. The Bill makes provision in relation to aspects of children’s services reform to:

- Reflect in domestic law the role of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) in influencing the design and delivery of policies and services by placing duties on the Scottish Ministers and the wider public sector, and strengthening the powers of the Children’s Commissioner to enable investigations to be conducted in relation to individual children and young people;

- Improve the way services work to support children, young people and families by: ensuring there is a single planning approach for children who need additional support from services; creating a single point of contact around every child or young person; ensuring coordinated planning and delivery of services with a focus on outcomes, and providing a holistic and shared understanding of a child’s or young person’s wellbeing;

- Strengthen the role of early years support in children’s and families’ lives by increasing the amount and flexibility of free early learning and childcare from 475 hours a year to a minimum of 600 hours for 3 and 4 year olds, and 2 year olds who are, or have been at any time since turning 2, looked after or subject to a kinship care order;

- Ensure better permanence planning for looked after children by: extending corporate parenting across the public sector; extending support to young people leaving care for longer (up to and including the age of 25); supporting families and the parenting role of kinship carers through new legal entitlements; and putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing; and

- Strengthen existing legislation that affects children and young people by creating a new right to appeal a local authority decision to place a child in secure accommodation, and by making procedural and technical changes in the areas of children’s hearings support arrangements and school closures.
COMMENTARY ON SECTIONS

Part 1 – Children’s Rights

Section 1 – Duty on Scottish Ministers in relation to the rights of children

5. Section 1 places duties on the Scottish Ministers in relation to the rights of children as set out in the UNCRC and its First and Second Optional Protocols.

6. Subsection (1)(a) places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to keep under consideration whether there are any steps which they could take to give better or further effect to the UNCRC requirements. In effect, this means a requirement on the Scottish Ministers to keep under review their approach to implementation of the UNCRC in the exercise of their functions. Subsection (1)(b) requires the Scottish Ministers to take steps which they believe to be appropriate in consequence of that consideration.

7. Subsection (2) places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to promote public awareness and understanding of the rights of children. The term “rights of children” has a different definition to the term “UNCRC requirements” for these purposes. An interpretation of both terms is included at section 4. This provision has the effect of incorporating Article 42 of the UNCRC into Scots law, introducing a new domestic requirement on the Scottish Ministers to raise awareness and understanding of the UNCRC amongst children, and those individuals working with children and members of the public. This could involve, for example, targeted work within schools, the development of information materials, the preparation of guidance for professionals and the provision of support to other organisations who have a role in promoting children’s rights in Scotland.

8. Subsection (3) requires the Scottish Ministers to lay a report before the Scottish Parliament every 3 years detailing the steps they have taken in that 3 year period to give better or further effect to the UNCRC requirements and to promote public awareness and understanding of the rights of children.

9. Subsection (4) defines what is meant by “3 year period”. This is the period of 3 years beginning with the day the section comes into force and each period of 3 years thereafter.

10. Subsection (5) requires the Scottish Ministers to publish the report they have laid before the Scottish Parliament as soon as practicable.

Section 2 – Duties of public authorities in relation to the UNCRC

11. Subsection (1) requires each identified public authority, as listed, or with a description listed, in schedule 1, to publish (in a way each authority thinks is appropriate) a report every 3 years setting out the steps it has taken in that 3 year period to give better or further effect within its areas of responsibility to the UNCRC requirements. The public authority may choose to satisfy the duty, through, for example, annual reports. The public authority can also satisfy the duty through development of a standalone report, should it choose.
12. Subsection (3) makes clear that two or more of the public authorities to whom the duty applies may satisfy the duty through preparation and publication of a joint report.

Part 2 – Commissioner for Children and Young People In Scotland

Section 5 – Investigations by the Commissioner

13. Section 7 of the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 (the 2003 Act) provides for the Commissioner to undertake an investigation into whether, by what means and to what extent, a service provider has regard to the rights, interests and views of children and young people in making decisions or taking actions that affect those children and young people. Any such investigation must focus on a matter of particular significance to children and young people generally or to particular groups of children and young people, but not to individual children.

14. Subsections (1) and (2) amend sections 7(1) and 7(2) of the 2003 Act in order to allow for the Commissioner to undertake two distinct types of investigation: a “general investigation” which is consistent with the Commissioner’s original investigatory power under section 7 of the 2003 Act; and an “individual investigation” focusing on the extent to which a service provider has had regard to the rights, views and interests of an individual child or young person. The term “service provider” is defined in the 2003 Act and means any person or organisation providing a service to children and young people. This includes the private, public and voluntary sector. Thus any individual who, or organisation or company which, provides services to children or young people can be investigated by the Commissioner. For example, organisations which give advice, provide guidance or provide goods could be investigated. The service in question does not need to be provided exclusively to children or young people. Parents carrying out their parental responsibilities are not service providers. However, the local authorities to whom parental responsibilities have been transferred are treated as service providers.

15. Section 7(2) of the 2003 Act as amended provides that the Commissioner can only carry out a general investigation if the evidence and information collected demonstrates that there is an issue that is significant for children and young people generally or specific groups of children and young people.

16. New section 7(2A) of the 2003 Act makes clear that the Commissioner may only undertake either a general or individual investigation if they are satisfied that it would not duplicate the work that is the function of another person. There are a number of bodies already tasked with considering complaints and responding to concerns raised by members of the public in Scotland including the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman, Social Care and Social Work Improvement Scotland (the Care Inspectorate) and the Equality and Human Rights Commission. Each has a particular function and where it is recognised that a complaint falls within the remit of one of these bodies or any other complaint handling body, the Commissioner should not pursue the matter.

17. Subsection (2)(b) removes section 7(3)(b) of the 2003 Act. This is the provision that currently prevents the Commissioner from undertaking investigations in relation to individual children.
18. Subsection 2(c) amends section 7 of the 2003 Act to provide for the Commissioner to resolve a matter which could properly form the basis of an individual investigation without the need for a formal investigation. Such a step might be taken by the Commissioner where it is felt that an issue can be addressed satisfactorily without having to exhaust the investigatory process.

19. Subsection (3)(a) replaces section 8(1)(b) of the 2003 Act, removing the requirement for the Commissioner to publish notice of any investigation and terms of reference. Instead, it simply requires the Commissioner to give notice of an investigation to those individuals who are likely to be affected by it. The change reflects the fact that it will not always be appropriate for details of a planned investigation to be made widely available, particularly where the investigation focuses on sensitive matters relating to an individual child. Subsections (3)(b) and (c) provide for individual investigations to be held in private whilst the presumption is that general investigations will be held in public unless the Commissioner is satisfied that there are grounds for taking evidence in private, as is currently provided for under section 8(2) of the 2003 Act.

20. Subsection (4)(a) amends section 11(1) of the 2003 Act, removing the need for all investigation reports to be laid before the Scottish Parliament. Instead, section 11(1) will require that the Commissioner prepares a report in relation to each investigation. In order to finalise the report, the Commissioner will share its content for consideration and comment with all those persons named within the report or identifiable from it. Should the report be amended as a consequence of this process, a revised version will be made available to all of the above persons.

21. Subsection (4)(c) adds new subsections to section 11 that require the Commissioner to lay before the Scottish Parliament any finalised report relating to a general investigation. The Commissioner will have the power, but not an obligation, to lay before the Scottish Parliament a report relating to an individual investigation.

Section 6 – Requirement to respond to Commissioner’s recommendations

22. Subsection (2) amends section 11 of the 2003 Act, providing the Commissioner with a power to require a response from a service provider to any recommendations made as part of a report linked to either a general investigation or an individual investigation and to identify a time by which that response must be received. Where a report includes a requirement to respond, a copy of the report must also be shared with the service provider on whom the requirement is made.

23. Subsection (3) sets out the arrangements for publishing a service provider’s response to any recommendations made by the Commissioner. It requires the Commissioner to publish any response made by a service provider in respect of recommendations following a general investigation unless the Commissioner considers publication to be inappropriate. The Commissioner may publish a response to recommendations following an individual investigation. Any published material should not, so far as reasonable and practicable, name or identify any child/children referred to in it.

24. Where a service provider fails to respond to a requirement, the Commissioner may take steps to publicise this failure.
Part 3 – Children’s Services Planning

Section 7 – Introductory

25. Subsections (1) and (2) are interpretation subsections for this Part.

26. Subsections (3) and (4) provide that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify the services which are to be included within or excluded from the definition of children’s services or related services for the purposes of this Part. They may also specify matters in relation to those services. Before making such an order the Scottish Ministers must consult with each relevant health board, local authority and where the service is provided by another service provider, that person.

27. Subsection (5) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify the definition of “other service provider” in subsection (1) by adding a person, removing an entry or varying an entry.

28. This Part confers certain functions on “a local authority and each relevant health board”. Subsection (6) provides that those are joint functions (i.e. functions that are to be exercised by those persons together).

Section 8 – Requirement to prepare children’s services plan

29. Subsection (1) provides that each local authority and relevant health board must jointly prepare a children’s services plan for the area of the local authority, in respect of each 3 year period.

30. Subsection (2) defines “3 year period” as that beginning with such date after the coming into force of this section as the Scottish Ministers specify, by order, and each subsequent period of 3 years. It defines “children’s services plan” as a document setting out the plans of each local authority and relevant health board for the provision of children’s services and related services over that 3 year period.

Section 9 – Aims of children’s services plan

31. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that a children’s services plan should be prepared with a view to achieving the aims of providing children’s services in the area in a way which: best safeguards, supports or promotes the wellbeing of children; is most integrated from the point of view of the recipients; and constitutes the most efficient use of available resources. Most integrated would be where service providers co-operate with each other to ensure that service provision is planned and delivered in a way which best meets the needs of children and families. Also, related services in the area are to be provided in the way which safeguards, supports or promotes the wellbeing of children, so far as this is consistent with the objects and proper delivery of the service concerned.
Section 10 – Children’s services plan: process

32. Subsection (1) provides that in preparing a children’s services plan, the local authority and relevant health board must give the other service providers an effective opportunity to participate in or contribute to the preparation of the plan. The local authority and relevant health board must also consult with organisations falling within subsection (2) (which represent the interests of persons who use or are likely to use any children’s service or related service in the area; or provide a service in the area which, if it were provided by the local authority or health board, would be a children’s service or related service), such social landlords as appear to provide housing in the area of the local authority and other such persons as the Scottish Ministers may, by direction, specify. “Social landlords” has the meaning given by section 165 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010.

33. Subsection (4) provides that a direction under subsection (1)(b)(iii) may specify different persons for different local authority areas and be revised or revoked.

34. Subsections (5) and (6) require the other service providers to participate in, or contribute to, the preparation of the children’s services plan, and the bodies to be consulted within subsection (1)(b) are to meet any reasonable request of the local authority or health board in participating in, or contributing to, the preparation of the children’s services plan. Subsection (7) provides that, as soon as reasonably practicable, after the plan has been prepared, the persons who prepared it must submit it to the other service providers for agreement.

35. Subsection (8) provides that, as soon as is reasonably practicable, after a children’s services plan has been agreed, the persons who prepared it must submit it to the Scottish Ministers and publish it in a manner they consider appropriate, which could entail publication online or as a hard copy report.

Section 11 – Children’s services plan: review

36. Subsection (1) provides that local authorities and relevant health boards in an area must jointly keep the children’s services plan under review and as a consequence of that review may prepare a revised plan.

37. Subsection (2) means that where a revised plan has been prepared, the local authority and each relevant health board must keep it under review and may in consequence prepare a revised plan.

Section 12 – Implementation of children’s services plan

38. This section provides that the local authority, relevant health board, and each of the other service providers in an area must, so far as reasonably practicable, provide services in accordance with the children’s services plan for that area. This does not apply whereto the extent the person providing the service considers that doing so would adversely affect the wellbeing of a child.
Section 13 – Reporting on children’s services plan

39. Subsection (1) provides that as soon as is practicable at the end of each year, the local authority and relevant health board must publish, in a way they consider appropriate, a joint report on how the provision of children’s services and related services in that area during that period have been provided in accordance with the children’s services plan and the extent to which the aims, specified in section 9(2) have been achieved, and such outcomes in relation to the wellbeing of the children in the area as the Scottish Ministers may, by order, prescribe.

40. Subsection (2) defines “1 year period” as the period of a year beginning on the date on which the children’s services plan for the area has begun, in accordance with section 8(1), and each period of a year thereafter.

Section 14 – Assistance in relation to children’s services planning

41. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that any of the other service providers and persons mentioned in section 10(1)(b) must comply with any reasonable request made of them to provide the local authority or relevant health board with information, advice or assistance, for the purposes of carrying out their functions under this Part.

42. Subsection (3) states that subsection (1) does not apply where the person considers the provision of information, advice or assistance would be incompatible with any duties of that person or unduly prejudices the carrying out of any functions of the person.

Section 15 – Guidance in relation to children’s services planning

43. Subsections (1) to (4) state that local authorities and relevant health boards, and the other service providers, in each area must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about how to carry out their planning, reviewing and reporting functions, and this guidance may be issued either generally or for specific purposes and for different local government areas.

44. Subsection (5) states that before guidance is issued or revised, the Scottish Ministers have to consult with the persons to whom the guidance relates.

Section 16 – Directions in relation to children’s services planning

45. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that local authorities, relevant health boards and the other service providers must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the carrying out of the functions conferred by this Part (other than that of implementation).

46. Subsections (3), (4) and (5) provide that directions may be issued generally or for particular purposes, and different directions may be issued to different persons or otherwise for different purposes. Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the person to whom it relates.

47. Subsection (1) states that this section applies where the Scottish Ministers consider that local authorities and relevant health boards are either not carrying out one of their joint functions under this Part (other than that of implementation) or in carrying out such a function are not complying with guidance issued under section 15(1).

48. The Scottish Ministers may issue directions stating that the function is to be carried out in a particular way or that the function is to be carried out instead by such of the persons mentioned in subsection (3) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

49. Subsection (3) explains that persons referred to in the previous subsection are one or some of the persons whose function it is and other local authorities or health boards.

50. Subsection (4) states that a direction under subsection (2)(b) may include such provision as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate as to the making by a local authority or relevant health board in an area, which is not to be carrying out the function, of payment to a person who is to carry out the function by virtue of the direction.

51. Subsection (5) states that before issuing, revising or revoking a direction under subsection (2) the Scottish Ministers must consult with the local authority or relevant health boards whose failure is to be, or is, the subject of the direction, and such other persons as they consider appropriate.

52. Subsection (6) provides that where the Scottish Ministers consider that a direction under subsection (2) has been or would be insufficient to achieve effective exercise of the function concerned they may, by order, constitute a joint board of the principal service providers in a local government area concerned to carry out the function.

53. Subsection (7) provides that subsection (6) may include provisions as to: the constitution and proceedings of the joint board; the membership of the joint board; the transfer to the joint board of any property, rights or liabilities of any of the services providers in the local government area; the transfer to the joint board of any staff of any of the service providers in the local government area; the supply of services or facilities by any of the service providers in the local government area to the joint board; direction by the Scottish Ministers of the carrying out by the joint board of any of its functions; and such other matters relating to its operation as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

54. Subsection (8) provides that the joint board is to be a body corporate.

55. Subsection (9) provides that before making an order under subsection (6) the Scottish Ministers must consult the local authority and health board to whom it relates and such other persons as they consider appropriate.
Section 18 – Interpretation of Part 3

56. This is an interpretation section for this Part.

Part 4 – Provision of Named Persons

Section 19 – Named person service

57. Subsections (1) and (5) define “named person service” as meaning the service of making available an individual from within named person service providers who carry out the functions in order to promote, support or safeguard the wellbeing of the child or young person. They will do this through a number of activities, including: advising, informing or supporting the child or young person or their parent; helping them to access a service or support; or discussing or raising a matter about that child or young person with a service provider or relevant authority.

58. Subsections (2) and (3) provide that individuals can only be identified for the named person service if they are an employee of the service provider, or are either a person, or employee of a person, who carries out functions on behalf of the service provider. Individuals must also satisfy such requirements as to qualifications, training and experience as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order.

59. Subsection (4) provides that the named person function cannot be carried out by a parent of the child or young person.

60. Subsections (6) and (7) state that the named person functions are carried out on behalf of the service provider and the responsibility for carrying out the named person function lies with the service provider and not with the individual named person.

Section 20 – Named person service in relation to pre-school child

61. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that it is the duty of the health board to make arrangements to provide a named person for each pre-school child in its area and defines “pre-school child” as a child who has not started primary school either because they are not old enough or the education authority has allowed the child to delay starting at primary school.

62. Subsection (3) explains that for the purposes of this section, school age should be taken to be that determined by the relevant education authority by reference to the school commencement dates fixed by it. Attendance at primary school does not include attendance at a nursery class based in a school, and relevant education authority means that of the area where the child lives.

63. Subsections (1), (2) and (3) state that an education authority must make arrangements to provide a named person service for each child living in its area unless: they are a pre-school child (as defined in section 20); they attend a school managed by a different local authority or attend a grant-aided school or independent school; or are kept in secure accommodation. The duty to provide a named person does not apply to a child if they are a member of any of the regular forces.
64. Subsection (4) provides that, during any period when a child is a pupil at a public school managed by a different authority from the one in which the child resides, then that local authority must make arrangements to provide the named person service for that child. Subsection (5) provides that at any time when the child attends a grant-aided school, independent school or is kept in secure accommodation, that establishment must provide the named person service for the child.

Section 22 – Continuation of named person service in relation to certain young people

65. This section provides that, where a young person attends a public school, the education authority must provide the named person service to that young person, and in any other case the directing authority of the establishment, as defined in section 30(1), concerned must provide the named person service. “Young person” is defined as anyone who has reached the age of 18 but still attends school or is kept in secure accommodation.

Section 23 – Communication in relation to movement of children and young people

66. This section provides that where a service provider no longer provides services to a child, that service provider must provide the new service provider, or the person it considers will be the new service provider, with information it holds that might be relevant in the exercise of any functions of the service provider under this Part, or the future exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person, if it ought to be provided for that purpose and unless this information prejudices the conduct of a criminal investigation or the prosecution of an offence.

Section 24 – Duty to communicate information about role of named persons

67. Subsection (1) provides that each health board, education authority or directing authority must publish, in such a manner as it considers appropriate, information about: the named person service; the functions of the named person service; how the service exercises its functions; how to contact named persons in its area or establishment; how the body exercises its functions under this Part; and any other matters it feels appropriate.

68. Subsection (2) states that service providers must provide the child or young person for whom they are providing the named person, and their parents, with details of how to contact named persons in their area as soon as is reasonably practicable after they become the service provider for the child, and as soon as is reasonably practicable after there is any change in those arrangements.

69. This section provides that where it appears to a service provider that another relevant authority could, by doing something, help in the exercise of any of its functions as provider of a named person, the other relevant authority must comply with a request for help. This could entail the relevant authority providing assessments or analysis, chronologies of significant events or any other information which would assist the named person in assessing the overall needs of the child and determining how they can be met. This duty to comply with a request applies unless the request is incompatible with any of its own duties or unduly prejudices the exercise of any of its functions. Schedule 2 contains a list of relevant authorities.

Section 26 – Information sharing

70. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that a service provider or relevant authority (as listed in schedule 2) must provide to the service provider in relation to a child or young person information which it holds if it considers that: it might be relevant to the exercise of the named person functions; it ought to be provided for that purpose; and its provision would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

71. Subsections (3) and (4) provide that a service provider in relation to a child or young person must provide, to a service provider or relevant authority, any information which it holds that might be relevant to the exercise of any function of the service provider or relevant authority which affects or may affect the wellbeing of the child or young person. This applies where the service provider in relation to the child or young person considers that the information ought to be provided for that purpose and where its provision would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation.

72. Subsections (5) and (6) provide that the service provider or relevant authority may provide to a service provider or relevant authority any information it holds which is necessary or expedient to help the service provider or relevant authority carry out its named person role.

73. Subsection (7) provides that references in this section to a service provider or relevant authority include any person carrying out a function on behalf of a service provider or relevant authority.

Section 27 – Disclosure of information

74. Subsection (1) gives a legal protection for those who provide information under Part 4 of the Act. However, a person providing information and relying on this protection will have to consider other potentially relevant rules of law because of the provisions of subsections (2) and (3).

75. Subsections (2) and (3) provide that the person who receives information (the recipient), if it was provided to the person in breach of a duty of confidentiality in accordance with subsection (1), is not then to provide that information to anyone else (a third party), if the person who provides them with the information informs the recipient of the breach of duty unless they are permitted or required to provide that same information to the third party by virtue of any enactment (including Part 4) or any rule of law.

Section 28 – Guidance in relation to named person service

76. Subsections (1), (2) and (3) provide that health boards, education authorities and directing authorities must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about exercising functions under this Part. That guidance may be issued generally or for particular purposes and may be issued for different service providers, or otherwise, for different purposes.
77. Subsection (4) provides that before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult with any person to whom it will relate.

Section 29 – Directions in relation to named person service

78. This section provides that local authorities, health boards and directing authorities must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about carrying out the functions conferred by this Part. These directions may be issued generally or for particular purposes, and different directions may be issued to different persons for different purposes. Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the persons to whom it relates.

Section 30 – Interpretation of Part 4

79. Subsection (1) explains the definition of phrases used in this Part. Subsection (2) confers upon the Scottish Ministers a power to modify schedule 2 which contains a list of relevant authorities.

Section 31 – Child’s plan: requirement

80. Subsections (1) to (4) provide that for this Part a child requires a child’s plan where the responsible authority considers that the child has a wellbeing need and that need is not capable of being met, or fully met, by taking action other than targeted intervention, and the need is capable of being met, at least to some extent, by that targeted intervention. A child has a wellbeing need if the child’s wellbeing is being, or is at risk of being, adversely affected by any matter. “Targeted intervention” means the provision of a service, by a health board or local authority or a grant aided or independent school, which aims to meet the needs of children whose needs cannot be met, or fully met, by the services which are generally provided to all children by that body.

81. Subsections (5) and (6) provide that in deciding whether a child requires a child’s plan, the responsible authority is, so far as reasonably practicable, to have regard to the views of the child (taking account of the child’s age and maturity) and their parent.

82. Subsections (7) and (8) provide that if a child already has a plan, or if the child is a member of any of the regular forces, then subsection (1) does not apply. Where a child already has a plan, section 37 would apply. “Regular forces” has the meaning given by section 374 of the Armed Forces Act 2006.

Section 32 – Content of a child’s plan

83. Subsection (1) provides that a child’s plan must include a statement of: the child’s wellbeing need; the targeted intervention which requires to be provided in relation to the child to address the wellbeing need; the relevant authority which is to provide the targeted intervention; how the intervention is to be provided; and the outcome which the intervention is intended to achieve.
84. Subsection (2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, make provision as to any other information which is, or is not, to be contained in the child’s plan and the form of the plan.

Section 33 – Preparation of a child’s plan

85. Subsections (1), (2) and (3) state that where a child requires a child’s plan, the responsible authority should prepare the plan unless the responsible authority and a relevant authority agree that it would be more appropriate for the relevant authority to prepare the plan. The plan should always be prepared as soon as is reasonably practicable.

86. Subsections (4) and (5) provide that where a relevant authority declines to give its agreement to prepare a plan or provide a targeted intervention, the relevant authority must provide a statement of its reasons for declining.

87. Subsections (6) and (7) provide that in preparing a child’s plan, an authority is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child (taking account of the child’s age and maturity) and the child’s parents.

88. The Scottish Ministers may, by order, make further provision as to the preparation of child’s plans (subsection (8)).

Section 34 – Responsible authority: general

89. Subsection (1)(a) provides that for the purposes of this Part the responsible authority for a pre-school child is the health board for the area where the child lives. Subsection (1)(b) provides that the responsible authority for a child who is not a pre-school child is the local authority for the area where the child lives. Subsection (2) provides that subsection (1) is subject to special cases outlined in section 35. Special cases are those not covered in section 34.

90. Subsection (3) defines “pre-school child” as a child who has not started primary school and, if the child is of school age, has not started school because the education authority has consented to this being delayed.

91. Subsection (4) provides that for the purposes of this section, the reference to school age is to be construed by reference to the school commencement dates fixed by the relevant education authority; the references to attendance at primary school do not include attendance at nursery classes based in a primary school; and the references to relevant education authority are to the education authority for the area where the child resides.

Section 35 – Responsible authority: special cases

92. Section 35 makes provision about who the responsible authority is in relation to special cases, which are cases where section 34 does not apply. Subsection (1) provides that where a pre-school child resides in the area of a health board, by virtue of a placement by another health board or local authority, the health board for the area in which the child resides immediately before that placement is the responsible authority in relation to the child. “Pre-school child” has the meaning given by section 34(3).
93. Subsection (2) provides that where the child is at a public school managed by a local authority other than the one for the area in which the child lives, that other authority is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

94. Subsection (3) provides that where the child is a pupil at a grant-aided or independent school, the directing authority of that school is the responsible authority in relation to that child.

95. Subsection (4) provides that subsection (3) does not apply where the child is such a pupil by virtue of placement by the local authority for the area in which the child permanently resides and the local authority is responsible for the provision of services.

96. Subsection (5) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order (subject to affirmative procedure), modify this section so as to make further or different provision as to the circumstances in which section 34(1) does not apply in relation to the child.

Section 36 – Delivery of a child’s plan

97. Subsection (1) provides that a person who is to provide a targeted intervention in terms of a child’s plan is to provide it, so far as reasonably practicable, in accordance with the plan. This does not apply where the responsible authority considers that to do so would adversely affect the wellbeing of the child (subsection (2)).

Section 37 – Child’s plan: management

98. Subsection (1) provides that the managing authority of a child’s plan must keep under review: whether the wellbeing need of the child stated in the plan is still accurate; whether the targeted intervention or manner of its provision is still appropriate; whether the outcome of the plan has been achieved; and whether the management of the plan should transfer to another authority. In reviewing a child’s plan, subsections (2) and (3) state that the managing authority is to consult each relevant authority which is providing a targeted intervention contained in the plan and the responsible authority (where that authority is neither the managing authority nor providing a targeted intervention) and must ascertain and have regard to the views of the child (taking account of the child’s age and maturity) and parent so far as is reasonably practicable.

99. In consequence of this review, the managing authority may, under subsection (4)(a) amend the plan so as to revise the wellbeing need of the child, the targeted intervention, or manner of the provision of the targeted intervention which requires to be provided, or the outcome which the plan is intended to achieve. The managing authority may also transfer the management of the plan to a relevant authority or end the plan (subsections (4)(b) and (c)).

100. Subsection (5) provides that the Scottish Ministers may make, by order, provision about: the management of the child’s plan, including when and how a child’s plan is to be reviewed in accordance with subsection (1); who is to be the managing authority of the plan; when and to whom the management of the plan is to or may be transferred under subsection (4)(b); when and how a new targeted intervention may be included in a child’s plan; and the keeping, disclosure and destruction of child’s plans.
101. Subsection (6) provides that the managing authority of a child’s plan is the authority which prepared it, or where the management of the plan has been transferred, the person to whom it was transferred. This is subject to any different provision made under subsection (5)(b).

Section 38 – Assistance in relation to child’s plan

102. Subsection (1) provides that a relevant authority must comply with any reasonable request made of it to provide a person exercising a function under this Part with information, advice and assistance.

103. Subsection (2) provides that subsection (1) does not apply where the authority considers that the provision of such information, advice or assistance would be incompatible with any of the duties of the authority, or unduly prejudices the exercise of any of the authority’s functions.

104. Subsection (3) provides that in providing information in pursuance of subsection (1) a person is not to be taken to be in breach of any prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information.

105. Subsections (4) and (5) provide that a recipient of confidential information is not to provide the information to any other person unless the provision of information is permitted or required by virtue of any enactment (including this Part) or rule of law. This applies where, by virtue of subsection (3), a person provides information in breach of a duty of confidentiality and in providing the information, the person informs the recipient of the breach of duty.

106. Subsection (1) provides that a person exercising a function under this Part (other than the function of complying with section 36) must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about that matter.

107. Subsections (2) to (4) state that guidance may be issued generally or for specific purposes, different guidance may be issued to different persons or types of person, or otherwise for different purposes, and that before issuing any such guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult with any person to whom it will relate.

Section 40 – Directions in relation to child’s plans

108. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that a local authority, health board or directing authority must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the carrying out of the functions conferred by this Part. Directions may be issued generally or for particular purposes, different directions may be issued to different persons or otherwise for different purposes and before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the person to whom it relates.
Section 41 – Interpretation of Part 5

109. This is an interpretation section for this Part. It defines “directing authority”. When used generally, this means the managers of each grant-aided school and the proprietor of each independent school. When used in relation to a grant-aided school, it means the managers of the school, and in relation to an independent school, it means the proprietor of the school.

Part 6 – Early Learning and Childcare

Section 42 – Early learning and childcare

110. Section 1(1) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 (the 1980 Act) imposes a duty on every education authority to secure that there is adequate and efficient provision of school education made for their area. Section 42 defines “early learning and childcare” as a service, consisting of education and care, of a kind which is suitable in the ordinary case for children who are under school age, with regard being had to the importance of interactions and other experiences which support learning and development in a caring and nurturing setting. The phrase “of a kind which is suitable in the ordinary case for children who are under school age” is consistent with its use in the Education (Scotland) Act 1980. Guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers under section 34 of the Standards in Scotland’s Schools Act 2000 (the 2000 Act) (which is amended by paragraph 5 of schedule 4) will be used to provide more detail as to what those types of interactions and experiences will encapsulate.

Section 43 – Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

111. Subsection (1) provides that an education authority must, in pursuance of its duty under section 1(1) of the 1980 Act, secure that the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare (as defined in section 42) is made available for each eligible pre-school child belonging to its area. Section 23(3) of the 1980 Act provides that a pupil receiving school education is deemed to belong to the area where the pupil’s parent is ordinarily residing. This is subject to any regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

112. Subsection (2) defines “eligible pre-school child”. It means a child who is under school age, has not started primary school and either falls within subsection (3) or is within such age range, or is of such other description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

113. Subsection (3) provides that a child is also an eligible pre-school child if the child is aged 2 or over, and is, or has been at any time since their 2nd birthday, looked after by a local authority (“looked after” is defined in section 75(2)) or the subject of a kinship care order. Kinship care order is defined in subsection (5) as having the meaning given by section 65(1).

114. Section 75(3) provides that “school age” has the same meaning as it has in the 1980 Act. Section 31 of the 1980 Act defines a person as being of “school age” if they have attained the age of 5 but not 16 years. Section 31 is however qualified by section 32(3) of the 1980 Act which provides that a child who does not attain the age of 5 on a school commencement date (defined in section 32(1)) shall for the purposes of section 31 be deemed not to have attained that age until the school commencement date following his/her 5th birthday.
115. An order under section 43(2)(c)(ii) is subject to negative resolution procedure. It is anticipated that any order made under that enabling power will include provision akin to that made in the Provision of School Education for Children under School Age (Prescribed Children)(Scotland) Order 2002 (SSI 2002/90) made under section (1A) of the 1980 Act (which order making power is to be removed from the 1980 Act by paragraph 2(2)(a) and (b) of schedule 4), so for example to set out that eligibility for early learning and childcare starts from the first term following the child’s 3rd birthday. Subsection (4) provides that an order under section 43(2)(c)(ii) may sub-delegate the function of determining the eligibility criteria to an education authority, so for example the order might provide that a child is an eligible pre-school child only if the education authority is satisfied as to any matter relating to the child which is specified in the order.

Section 44 – Mandatory amount of early learning and childcare

116. Subsection (1) defines the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare for the purposes of section 43(1) as 600 hours in each year for which a child is an eligible pre-school child and a pro rata amount for each part of a year for which a child is so eligible.

117. Subsection (2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare in subsection (1) for eligible pre-school children so as to vary the amount of early learning and childcare which is to be made available. Under subsection (3) the order is capable of making different provision for different types of eligible pre-school children (for example different amounts for children of different ages). Such an order is subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of section 77(2).

Section 45 – Looked after 2 year olds: alternative arrangements to meet wellbeing needs

118. Section 45 enables an authority to make alternative provision of education and care in order to meet the wellbeing needs of children. Subsection (1) provides that where an authority’s duty under section 43(1) applies in relation to a child only by virtue of the child falling within section 43(3)(a)(that is any 2 year old who is, or has been at any time since turning 2, looked after until he or she becomes eligible under section 43(2)), and the authority, after assessing the child’s needs considers that making alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care would better safeguard or promote the child’s wellbeing, then subsection (2) applies.

119. Subsection (2) provides that in relation to these children the authority need not comply with its duty under section 43(1) in relation to the child but must make alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care as it considers appropriate for the purposes of safeguarding or promoting the child’s wellbeing. The power for the authority to make alternative arrangements by virtue of 45(1) and (2) continues to apply notwithstanding that the 2 year old child ceases to be looked after so as to ensure continuity in the education and care of the child. However, under subsection (3), alternative arrangements cannot continue to be made if a parent of the child objects to those alternative arrangements being made.

120. Subsection (4) provides that the authority may, at any time, review any alternative arrangements it makes in relation to a child in pursuance of subsection (2)(b) and must do so on becoming aware of any significant change in the child’s circumstances. It may, following such a review, alter those arrangements.
121. Subsection (5) provides that the authority must seek to ensure that a record of the outcome of any assessment of a child’s needs that it undertakes in pursuance of subsection (1)(b) and any alternative arrangements that it makes in relation to the child’s education and care in pursuance of subsection (2)(b) is included in any child’s plan which is prepared under Part 5.

Section 46 – Duty to consult and plan on delivery of early learning and childcare

122. Subsection (1)(a) provides that an education authority must consult such persons as appear to it to be representative of parents of children under school age in its area about how it should make early learning and childcare available. Subsection (1)(b) provides that the education authority must have regard to the views expressed in that consultation and having done so prepare and publish a plan for how it intends to make early learning and childcare available. Such consultation must be carried out every 2 years although subsection (2) enables the Scottish Ministers to vary the regularity of that consultation by order subject to negative resolution procedure. Guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers under section 34 of the 2000 Act (as amended by paragraph 5 of schedule 4) will be used to set out more detail about how it is expected the consultation will be carried out and in relation to the preparation of the requisite plans for how early learning and childcare will be delivered.

Section 47 – Method of delivery of early learning and childcare

123. Subsection (1) provides that an education authority must ensure that it makes early learning and childcare available by way of sessions which are provided during at least 38 weeks of every calendar year, and which are at least 2.5 hours but no more than 8 hours in duration. This is the minimum framework for delivering early learning and childcare.

124. Subsection (2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (1) so as to vary the minimum framework for delivering early learning and childcare. Such an order is subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of section 77(2).

Section 48 – Flexibility in way in which early learning and childcare is made available

125. This section provides that in exercising functions under section 46 (duty to consult and plan on delivery of early learning and childcare) and section 47 (method of delivery of early learning and childcare), an education authority must have regard to the desirability of ensuring that the method by which it makes early learning and childcare available is flexible enough to allow parents an appropriate degree of choice when deciding how to access the services.

126. This section is an interpretation section for this Part which explains that the expression “early learning and childcare” has the meaning given by section 42, “eligible pre-school child” has the meaning given by section 43(2) and “parent” has the meaning given by the 1980 Act. Other interpretation provisions relevant to this Part are contained in section 75.
Part 7 – Corporate Parenting

Section 50 – Corporate parents

127. This Part of the Bill gives effect to a concept of “corporate parenting”. This concept involves placing new duties on certain public bodies to act in particular ways in support of certain children and young people. The public bodies are called “corporate parents” and the duties are “corporate parenting responsibilities”.

128. Subsection (1) of this section provides that those people listed, or included with a description which is listed, in schedule 3 are “corporate parents”. Although the Scottish Ministers are listed, there is an exception for them in relation to certain of the duties (see subsection (3)). This is because of their special position in relation to some of the duties.

129. Subsection (2) provides that the Scottish Ministers can, by order, modify schedule 3 by adding a person or description of persons, removing an entry or changing an entry. Such an order is subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of section 77(2) (subordinate legislation).

130. Subsection (4) defines “corporate parenting responsibilities” as the duties conferred on corporate parents by section 52.

Section 51 – Application of Part: children and young people

131. The children in relation to whom corporate parenting responsibilities apply are set out in this section. They are children who are looked after by a local authority in accordance with section 17(6) of the 1995 Act and young people who are under 26 and were, at the time when they ceased to be of school age or at any subsequent time, but are no longer, looked after by a local authority.

Section 52 – Corporate parenting responsibilities

132. As noted above, this section sets out the corporate parenting responsibilities. It provides that it is the duty of every corporate parent (where consistent with their other functions): to be alert to matters which could adversely affect the wellbeing of children and young people to whom this Part applies; to assess the needs of those children and young people for support and services it provides; to promote the interests of those children and young people; to seek to provide those children and young people with opportunities to participate in activities designed to advance their wellbeing; to take such action as it considers appropriate to help those children and young people to access those opportunities and to make use of services, and access the support, which it provides; and to take any other action it considers appropriate to improve the way in which it carries out its functions in relation to those children and young people.

Section 53 – Planning by corporate parents

133. Subsection (1) provides that corporate parents must prepare a plan for how they propose exercising their corporate parenting responsibilities and must keep this plan under review.
These documents relate to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 27) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013

134. Subsection (2) provides that before preparing or revising this plan, corporate parents must consult with other corporate parents and persons as they consider appropriate.

135. Subsection (3) provides that corporate parents must publish their plan, or revised plan, in such manner as they consider appropriate (and, in particular, that plans may be published together with, or as a part of, any other plan or document).

Section 54 – Collaborative working among corporate parents

136. Subsection (1) provides that corporate parents must collaborate with each other, in so far as is reasonably practicable, when undertaking their corporate parenting responsibilities or any other functions under this Part, where they consider that doing so would safeguard or promote the wellbeing of children or young people which this Part applies to.

137. Subsection (2) gives examples of what that collaboration may include, namely sharing information, providing advice or assistance, co-ordinating activities, sharing responsibility for action, funding activities jointly and exercising these functions jointly (for example, by publishing a joint plan or joint report).

Section 55 – Reports by corporate parents

138. Subsection (1) provides that a corporate parent must report on how it has exercised its corporate parenting responsibilities, planning and collaborating functions in pursuance of sections 53 and 54, and its other functions under this Part.

139. Subsection (2) states that these reports may, in particular, include information about standards of performance, and the outcomes achieved in pursuance of this Part.

140. Subsection (3) provides that reports are to be published in such manner as the corporate parent considers appropriate (and, in particular, that reports may be published together with, or as part of, any other report or document).

Section 56 – Duty to provide information to Scottish Ministers

141. Subsection (1) states that a corporate parent must provide the Scottish Ministers with such information they require about how it is: exercising its corporate parenting responsibilities; planning, collaborating or reporting in pursuance of sections 53, 54 or 55; or otherwise exercising functions under this Part.

142. Subsection (2) states that information which is required may include information about standards of performance, and the outcomes achieved in pursuance of this Part.

Section 57 – Guidance on corporate parenting

143. Subsection (1) provides that a corporate parent must have regard to any guidance about corporate parenting issued by the Scottish Ministers.
144. Subsection (2) states that guidance may include advice or information about how corporate parents should: exercise their corporate parenting responsibilities; promote awareness of their corporate parenting responsibilities; plan, collaborate or report in pursuance of sections 53, 54 and 55; and otherwise exercise their functions under this Part. Guidance may also include information about the outcomes which corporate parents should seek to achieve in exercising their functions.

145. Subsections (3), (4) and (5) state that guidance may be issued generally or for specific purposes and that different guidance may be issued for different corporate parents or for different purposes. Before issuing guidance the Scottish Ministers must consult with the corporate parents to which guidance relates and anyone else they consider appropriate.

Section 58 – Directions to corporate parents

146. Subsection (1) provides that corporate parents have to comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about their corporate parenting responsibilities, their planning or collaborating or reporting functions in pursuance of sections 53, 54 and 55 or their functions under this Part. Section 53 requires a corporate parent to prepare and review a plan for how it proposes to exercise its corporate parenting responsibilities. Section 54 requires corporate parents to work collaboratively when exercising their corporate parent responsibilities or other functions under this Part. Section 55 requires a corporate parent to report on how it has exercised its corporate parenting responsibilities, collaborating functions and its other functions under this Part.

147. Subsections (2) and (3) state that directions may be issued generally or for specific purposes and that directions may be issued to different corporate parents or otherwise for different purposes.

148. Subsection (4) provides that before issuing, revising, or revoking directions, Scottish Ministers must consult with any corporate parent to which the directions relate and such other persons as they consider appropriate.

Section 59 – Reports by Scottish Ministers

149. Subsection (1) provides that the Scottish Ministers must, as soon as practicable, after the end of each 3 year period, lay before the Scottish Parliament a report on how they have exercised their corporate parenting responsibilities during that period.

150. Subsection (2) states that “3 year period” means the period of 3 years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, and each subsequent 3 years.

Part 8 – Aftercare

Section 60 – Provision of aftercare to young people

151. Section 29 of the 1995 Act places certain duties on, and gives certain powers to, local authorities in relation to the provision of aftercare to young people that they at one stage looked after. Section 30 of the 1995 Act gives local authorities the power to provide financial assistance to a similar category of young people for the purpose of meeting expenses connected with their education and training.

152. This section amends sections 29(2) and 30(2) of the 1995 Act to extend the age up to which formerly looked after young persons may access aftercare assistance under these provisions from 21 to 26 (subsections (2)(a)(i) and (3)(a)).

153. Subsection (2)(c) inserts new subsections (5A) and (5B) into section 29. New subsection (5A) provides that, after carrying out an assessment under section 29(5) in pursuance of an application made by a person under section 29(2), the local authority must, if satisfied that the person has eligible needs and that these cannot be met other than by taking action under this subsection, provide the person with such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers necessary for the purposes of meeting those needs. The local authority may otherwise provide such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers appropriate having regard to the person’s welfare. New subsection (5B) provides that a local authority can continue to provide advice, guidance and assistance after a person reaches the age of 26, but they are not required to do so.

154. Subsection (2)(e) inserts new subsections (8) and (9) into section 29 to provide that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify types of care, attention and support that constitute “eligible needs” for the purposes of new subsection (5A)(a).

Part 9 – Counselling Services

Section 61 – Provision of counselling services to parents and others

155. Subsection (1), (2) and (5) provide that a local authority must make arrangements to secure that counselling services as described by the Scottish Ministers, by order, are made available for those persons living in its area that are parents of eligible children or individuals with parental rights or responsibilities in relation to an eligible child. This includes an individual with any of those rights or, as the case may be, responsibilities.

156. Subsections (3) and (4) explain that an “eligible child” is a child who is of such descriptions as the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify. Such an order may include provision which describes a child by reference to a matter about which the local authority must be satisfied in relation to the child and may, without prejudice to section 77(1)(a), make different provision in relation to different descriptions of counselling services specified under subsection (1) and in relation to different paragraphs of subsection (2).

Section 62 – Counselling services: further provision

157. Subsection (1) provides that the Scottish Ministers may make, by order, provision about: when or how counselling services specified in an order under section 61(1) are to be provided; when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child is eligible for the purpose of section 61(2); when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be an eligible child; and such other matters about the provision of counselling services specified in an order under section 61(1) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.
158. Subsection (2) provides that an order under subsection (1)(d) may include provision about circumstances in which counselling services specified in an order under section 61(1) may be provided subject to conditions (including conditions as to payment), and consequences of such conditions not being met.

159. This is an interpretation section for this Part and explains that the terms parent, parental responsibilities and parental rights have the same meaning as they do in Part 1 of the 1995 Act.

Part 10 – Support for Kinship Care

Section 64 – Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

160. Subsection (1), (2) and (3) provide that local authorities must make arrangements to ensure that kinship care assistance, of such description as specified by the Scottish Ministers by order, is made available to those persons living in its area who are: a person applying for, or considering applying for, a kinship care order in relation to an eligible child; an eligible child who is subject of a kinship care order; a person in whose favour a kinship care order in relation to an eligible child subsists; and a child who is 16 years old where, immediately before the child reached 16 years old, the child fell within sub-paragraph (b) (i.e. was an eligible child who is subject to a kinship care order) and the child is an eligible child.

161. Subsection (4) provides that “eligible child” means a child that has been described by the Scottish Ministers by order. Subsection (5) provides that such an order may include provision which describes the child by reference to a matter about which the local authority must be satisfied in relation to that child, and may, without prejudice to section 77(1)(a) make different provision in relation to different descriptions of assistance specified under subsection (1) and different paragraphs of subsection (3).

Section 65 – Orders which are kinship care orders

162. Subsection (1) explains that for the purposes of this section a “kinship care order” is an order under section 11(1) of the 1995 Act which gives a qualifying person the right to have the child living with that person or to otherwise regulate the child’s residence; or a residence order which has the effect of the child living with or predominately living with a qualifying person. Subsection (2) provides that a “qualifying person” means a person related to a child, or a friend or acquaintance of someone related to a child or who has another relationship or connection with a child, as specified, by order, by the Scottish Ministers. An acquaintance is someone who is known slightly to the relative, where the relationship does not necessarily have the same depth or intimacy as a friendship, for example a neighbour. Subsection (3) provides that a “qualifying person” is not a parent or guardian for the purposes of subsection (1). In subsection (2) where it refers to a person who is related to a child subsection (4) provides that this includes someone married to a person who is related to the child or related to the child by half blood.
Section 66 – Kinship care assistance: further provision

163. Subsection (1) provides that the kinship care assistance which the Scottish Ministers may specify in an order under section 64(1) includes: counselling, advice or information about any matter; financial support (or support in kind) of any description; and any service provided by a local authority on a subsidised basis.

164. Subsection (2) provides that the assistance specified by such an order may include assistance which a person was entitled to from, or being provided with by, a local authority, immediately prior to a person becoming entitled to assistance under section 64(1).

165. Subsection (3) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, make provision about: when or how assistance is to provided; when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child is eligible for the purpose of section 64(3); when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be an eligible child for the purpose of section 64(2); when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be an eligible child for the purpose of section 64(3) and such other matters about the provision of kinship care assistance specified in an order under section 64(1) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

166. Subsection (4) provides that an order under subsection (3)(d) may include provision about circumstances in which a local authority may provide kinship care assistance specified in an order under section 64(2) subject to conditions (including conditions as to payment for the assistance or the repayment of financial support) and consequences of such conditions not being met (including the recovery of any financial support provided).

167. This is an interpretation section for this Part.

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register

168. This section amends the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 by inserting sections 13A to 13F after section 13 of that Act.

Section 13A – Scotland’s Adoption Register

169. Subsection (1) provides that the Scottish Ministers must make arrangements for the establishment and maintenance of a register to be known as Scotland’s Adoption Register (“the Register”).

170. Subsection (2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, prescribe information which is or types of information which are, to be included in the Register. This may include information relating to: children who adoption agencies consider should be placed for adoption; persons considered by adoption agencies as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption; matters relating to such children or persons which arise after information about them is included in the Register; or prospective adopters outwith Scotland. It provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, provide for how information is to be retained in the Register and make such further provision in relation to the Register as they consider appropriate.

171. Subsection (3) provides that the Register is not to be open to public inspection or search. The information on the Register cannot be accessed or searched by anyone other than the Scottish Ministers, or the Registration organisation on behalf of the Scottish Ministers.

172. Subsection (4) provides that information is to be kept in the Register in any form the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

Section 13B – Registration organisation

173. Subsection (1) provides that arrangements made by the Scottish Ministers under the previous section may, in particular, authorise an organisation to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register (other than functions of making subordinate legislation), and provide for payments to be made to an organisation so authorised.

174. Subsection (2) provides that an organisation authorised in pursuance of subsection (1) must perform functions delegated to it in accordance with any directions (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers.

175. Subsection (1) provides that an adoption agency must provide the Scottish Ministers with such information as may be prescribed in regulations made under section 13A(2) about children who it considers ought to be placed for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such children; and persons who it considers as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such persons. Subsection (2) provides that an adoption agency is not to: disclose any information about a child of the type referred to in subsection (1)(a) (children suitable for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such persons), without the consent of the child’s parent or any person who has parental responsibilities or parental rights in relation to the child, and any other person specified in regulations made under section 13A(2); any information about a person (other than a child) of the type referred to in subsection (1)(a), without the consent of that person (in other words a child that is now an adult); and any information about a person of the type referred to in subsection (1)(b) (persons suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such persons), without the consent of that person.

176. Subsection (3) provides that regulations made under section 13A(2) may: provide that information is to be provided to a registration organisation in pursuance of subsection (1) instead of to the Scottish Ministers; provide for how and by when that information is to be provided; prescribe a fee which is to be paid by an adoption agency when providing that information; and prescribe the form in which consent is to be given for the purposes of subsection (2).

177. Subsection (1) provides that it is an offence to disclose any information derived from the Register other than in accordance with the regulations under section 13A(2). Subsection (2)(a) provides that the regulations under section 13A(2) may authorise the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation to disclose information derived from the Register to an adoption agency for the purposes of helping it to find someone with whom it would be appropriate to place a child for whom the agency is acting, or to find a child who is appropriate for adoption by someone for whom the agency is acting. Subsection (2)(b) provides that the Scottish Ministers or registration organisation may also disclose this information: to any person (whether or not established or operating in Scotland) specified in the regulations, for any purpose connected with the performance of functions by the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation in pursuance of this Chapter; for the purpose of enabling the information to be entered in a register which is maintained in respect of England, Wales or Northern Ireland and which contains information about children who are suitable for adoption; for the purpose of enabling or assisting that person to perform any functions which relate to adoption; for use for statistical or research purposes; and for any other purpose relating to adoption.

178. Subsection (3) provides that regulations made under section 13A(2) may set out terms and conditions on which information may be disclosed in pursuance of this section; specify steps to be taken by an adoption agency in respect of information received in pursuance of subsection (2); authorise an adoption agency to disclose information derived from the Register for purposes relating to adoption; and prescribe a fee which is to be paid to the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation in respect of a disclosure of information made in pursuance of subsections (2), (4) or paragraph (c) of this subsection.

179. Subsection (4) provides that subsection (1) (the offence provision) does not apply to a disclosure of information by or with the authority of the Scottish Ministers.

180. Subsection (5) provides that a person who is guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 3 months, or a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale, or both.

Section 13E – Use of an organisation as agency for payments

181. Subsection (1) provides that Scottish Ministers may by regulations authorise a registration organisation or any other person to act as agent for the payment or receipt of sums payable by adoption agencies to other adoption agencies and may require adoption agencies to pay or receive such sums through the organisation.

182. Subsection (2) provides that a registration organisation or other person authorised under subsection (1) is to perform the functions exercisable under section 13E(1) in accordance with any directions given by the Scottish Ministers.

183. Section 13F provides that nothing authorised or required to be done by virtue of Chapter 1A constitutes an offence under section 72(2) or 75(1) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. Section 72(2) of this Act provides it is an offence to make, agree to make, receive or attempt to obtain certain payments in relation the adoption of a child. Section 75(1) of the 2007 Act provides that it is an offence to make arrangements for or to place a child for adoption (this does not apply to adoption agencies).
Part 12 – Other Reforms

Section 69 – Area support teams: establishment

184. Section 69 amends paragraphs 12 and 13 of schedule 1 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (the 2011 Act). Schedule 1 of the 2011 Act makes further provision about the National Convener of Children’s Hearings Scotland (CHS) and about CHS itself – such as provision relating to appointment and functions, etc. Paragraph 12 of the schedule provides for the establishment and membership of area support teams (ASTs) which are to carry out for their areas, the selection of children’s hearing members and paragraph 13 applies when the National Convener first establishes an AST under paragraph 12 and is a transitional provision dealing with the transfer of members from a Children’s Panel Advisory Committee to an AST. Paragraph 14 makes provision for the functions of ASTs.

185. Section 69(2)(a) provides that the National Convener must keep the designation of areas under paragraph 12(1) under review and that the National Convener may revoke or make a new designation at any time. The National Convener will be required to ensure, when revoking or making new designations, that each local authority will fall within a designated area under paragraph 12(1). Where a designation is revoked, this will have the effect of dissolving the area support team that was established as a consequence of the designation. New paragraph 12(3C) requires the National Convener to consult with the affected local authority before revoking or making a designation. This means that the National Convener must ensure that when exercising the power to make and revoke designations of ASTs, there will always be an AST in relation to each local authority area and therefore that there will not be a time when a local authority no longer has an AST as a result of a revocation.

186. New paragraph 12(3D) provides that in sub-paragraph 3C “affected local authority” means, in the case of making a designation, the local authority whose area falls with the area proposed to be designated and, in the case of a revocation of a designation, each constituent local authority for the area support team established as a consequence of the designation.

187. On making or revoking a designation under paragraph 12(1) and 12(3B), the National Convener must notify each affected constituent local authority.

188. Section 69(2)(b) amends paragraph 13 of schedule 1 to the 2011 Act so that paragraph 13 applies where the National Convener establishes an area support team under paragraph 12(1) and where the area of the area support team consists of or includes a new area. Paragraph 13(2) requires the National Convener to notify each relevant Children’s Panel Advisory Committee member of the National Convener’s intention to transfer the member to the area support team.

189. Paragraph 13(b)(iv) amends paragraph 13(7) to provide that “new area” means an area which has never previously been the area (or part of the area) of an area support team.

190. Section 69(3) provides that an area support team established before this section comes into force continues in existence as if it were established under paragraph 12(1) as amended by this section.
Section 70 – Area support teams: administrative support by local authorities

191. This section amends paragraph 14 of schedule 1 to the 2011 Act to provide that each constituent local authority (of an area support team, as established by the National Convener in terms of schedule 1, paragraph 12 of the 2011 Act) must provide an area support team with such administrative support as the National Convener considers appropriate. “Administrative support” is defined as staff, property or other services which the National Convener considers are required to facilitate the carrying out by an area support team of its functions.

Section 71 – Appeal against detention of child in secure accommodation

192. This section amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (the CPSA) to insert a new provision, section 44A, which provides that a child or relevant person in relation to the child may appeal to the sheriff against a local authority decision to detain the child in secure accommodation following an order having been made to detain the child in residential accommodation under section 44 of the CPSA. New section 44A(2) provides that the sheriff may either confirm the decision to detain the child in secure accommodation or quash the decision and direct the local authority to move the child to residential accommodation which is not secure accommodation instead.

193. New section 44A(3) allows the Scottish Ministers by regulations to make further provisions about appeals. These regulations, which are subject to affirmative procedure, may specify the period within which appeals should be made, make provision about the hearing of evidence during an appeal and provide for appeals to the sheriff principal and Court of Session against the determination of an appeal.

194. “Relevant person” in relation to a child is defined as any person who has parental responsibilities or parental rights (within the meaning of sections 1(3) and 2(4) of the 1995 Act in relation to the child); and, where the child is subject to a compulsory supervision order even if that order does not have any effect as a result of section 44(4) of the 1995 Act, any person who is deemed to be a relevant person in relation to the child by virtue of sections 81(3), 160(4)(b) or 164(6) of the 2011 Act.

195. This is to replicate the appeal rights under the 2011 Act. Section 151 of that Act sets out the ways in which secure accommodation authorisations are implemented where a children’s hearing makes a relevant order or warrant (including a compulsory supervision order) in relation to a child and section 162 of that Act provides for an appeal to the sheriff against a decision to implement a secure accommodation authorisation, including by one or more relevant persons in relation to a child. Section 81(4) of the 2011 Act provides that where the children’s hearing deems the individual to be a relevant person, they are to be treated as relevant persons for the purposes of Part 15 (which includes the appeal to the sheriff against secure accommodation authorisation implementation decisions) and section 81(3) provides that the children’s hearing must deem the individual to be a relevant person if it considers that the individual has or has recently had a significant involvement in the upbringing of the child.

196. Secure accommodation in this section has the meaning assigned to it in Part II of the 1995 Act.
Schools consultation

Section 72 – Closure proposals: call-in by the Scottish Ministers

197. Subsection (1) amends section 15 of the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 to provide for an extension to the period during which the Scottish Ministers may issue a call-in notice to an education authority in relation to a decision taken by that education authority to implement a closure proposal, that is a proposal to permanently discontinue a school or discontinue all nursery classes in a school or a stage of education in a school. This period is extended from 6 weeks to 8 weeks.

198. Subsection (2) provides that this extension will apply to all school closure proposals in respect of which a decision to implement has been taken by an education authority from the date that subsection (1) is commenced.

Wellbeing

Section 73 – Consideration of wellbeing in exercising certain functions

199. This section inserts text after section 23 of the 1995 Act to create a new section 23A.

200. Subsection (1) of the new section 23A applies where a local authority is exercising a function under or by virtue of section 17 or 22 of the 1995 Act.

201. Subsection (2) provides that the local authority must have regard to the general principle that its functions in relation to children should be exercised in a way which is designed to promote, safeguard and support their wellbeing.

202. Subsection (3) provides that for the purposes of the previous subsection the local authority is to assess the wellbeing of a child by referring to the extent to which the wellbeing indicators in section 74(2) are or would be satisfied in relation to the child.

203. Subsection (4) provides that a local authority is to have regard to the guidance issued under section 74(3) of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2013 when assessing the wellbeing of the child.

204. Subsection (5) defines “the 2013 Act” as the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2013.

Part 13 - General

Section 74 – Assessment of wellbeing

205. Subsection (1) applies where a person is to assess whether the wellbeing of a child or young person is being, or would be, promoted, safeguarded, supported, or adversely affected.

206. Subsection (2) provides that the person should assess the wellbeing of the child or young person by reference to the extent to which the child or young person would be safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included.
207. Subsection (3) provides that the Scottish Ministers must issue guidance on how the wellbeing indicators listed in subsection (2) are to be used to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person.

208. Subsections (4) and (5) provide that the Scottish Ministers must consult with local authorities, health boards and any other persons they think appropriate before a person issues or revises guidance and that, in measuring the wellbeing of a child or young person, they must have regard to the guidance issued in subsection (3).

209. Subsections (6) and (7) provide that Scottish Ministers can, by order, modify the list of wellbeing indicators in subsection (2) and before making an order must consult with each local authority, health board and any other people they think are appropriate.

Section 76 – Modification of enactments

210. This section introduces schedule 4 which contains minor amendments to enactments and otherwise modifies enactments for the purposes of or in consequence of this Act.

Section 77 – Subordinate legislation

211. Subsection (1) provides that any power of the Scottish Ministers to make an order or regulations includes powers to make different provision for different purposes and such supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate.

212. Subsection (2) states that an order made under the following sections is subject to the affirmative procedure – sections 3(2), 8(3), 17(6), 30(2), 35(5), 44(2), 47(2), 50(2), 74(6).

213. Subsection (3) provides that an order made under section 78 containing provisions which add to, replace or omit any part of the text of this or any other Act is subject to affirmative procedure.

214. Subsection (4) provides that other orders made under this Act, and any regulations made under this Act, are subject to negative procedure.

215. Subsection (5) provides that this section does not apply to an order made under section 79(2).

Section 78 – Ancillary Provision

216. This section allows the Scottish Ministers, by order, to make such supplementary, incidental or consequential provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with or for the purposes of giving full effect to, any provision made by, or by virtue of, this Act. Such an order may also make such transitional, transitory or savings provision as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of any provision.
Section 79 – Commencement

217. This section provides for this Part (except for sections 74, 75 and 76) to come into force on the day after Royal Assent and for the other provisions of the Act to be commenced by order made by the Scottish Ministers. Such an order may include transitional, transitory or savings provision.

Section 80 – Short Title

218. This section states the short title of the Act as being the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2013.

Schedule 1 – Authorities to which section 2 applies

219. Schedule 1 lists the authorities to which the duty in section 2 of the Act (duties of public authorities in relation to the UNCRC) applies. Schedule 1 is introduced by section 3. The persons included in this schedule are those persons who it is considered are likely to, in the course of its function, engage directly with children and young people, and as such should be taking steps to secure better or further effect, within the area of its responsibility, the UNCRC requirements.

Schedule 2 – Relevant authorities

220. Schedule 2 lists relevant authorities for the purposes of Part 4 (named persons) of the Act and is introduced by section 30. The persons included in this schedule are those persons who it is considered are likely to, in the course of their function, engage directly with children, families and adults.

Schedule 3 – Corporate parents

221. Schedule 3 lists the persons who are “corporate parents” for the purposes of Part 7 (corporate parenting) of the Act and is introduced by section 50. The persons included in this schedule are those bodies which it is considered are likely to, in the course of exercising their functions, engage directly with looked after children.

Schedule 4 – Modification of enactments

222. Schedule 4 makes minor amendments to enactments and otherwise modifies enactments for the purposes of or in consequence of this Act. Schedule 4 is introduced by section 76.

223. Paragraph 1 amends the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 (the 1968 Act). Section 5(1) of the 1968 Act provides that local authorities shall perform their functions under certain enactments under the general guidance of the Scottish Ministers. Further, section 5(1A) enables the Scottish Ministers to issue directions to local authorities (either individually or collectively) as to the manner in which they are to exercise their functions under the enactments mentioned in subsection (1B); and a local authority is required to comply with any direction made.
224. Paragraph 1(2)(a)(i) and (ii) of schedule 4 amend section 5 of the 1968 Act so as to bring the early learning and childcare provisions and the kinship care order and counselling services provisions within the ambit of section 5(1) of the 1968 Act; the effect will be that local authorities must perform their functions in relation to early learning and child care in so far as they apply to children falling within section 43(3)(a) of the Act (that is looked after 2 year olds), and in relation to the provision of support to kinship carers and the provision of counselling services to those eligible to receive it under the general guidance of the Scottish Ministers. Paragraph 1(2)(b) amends section 5(1B) of the 1968 Act so as to include the provisions on early learning and childcare in so far as they relate to looked after 2 year olds within subsection (1B) of the 1968 Act; the effect being that the Scottish Ministers will be able to issue directions to local authorities as to the manner in which they exercise their functions in relation to early learning and childcare for looked after 2 year olds. Paragraph 1(2)(c) inserts a definition of looked after children into section 5 of the 1968 Act.

225. Paragraph 2 amends the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 (the 1980 Act) in consequence of the provisions on early learning and childcare in Part 6 of the Act. Paragraph 2(2)(a) amends section 1(1A) of the 1980 Act so as to provide that the duty to provide adequate and effective provision of school education conferred on education authorities under section 1(1) of the 1980 Act, in relation to children who are under school age, is to be exercisable only to the extent required by section 43(1). Under the current law, the duty to provide adequate and effective school education in relation to children who are under school age is exercisable only in respect of children described in an order made under subsection (1A) of section 1 of the 1980 Act.

226. Paragraph 2(2)(b) removes subsections (1B) and (4A) from section 1 of the 1980 Act; those provisions set out that an order made under subsection (1A) could set out the amount of school education which children described in the order are to be provided with (subsection (1B)) and that such an order was subject to negative procedure (subsection (4A)).

227. Section 1(5)(a)(i) of the 1980 Act defines school education in relation to pupils who are under school age. Paragraph 2(2)(c) of schedule 4 replaces that definition with the concept of early learning and childcare which has the meaning given in Part 6 of the Act (see the definition of "early learning and childcare" inserted into section 135 of the 1980 Act by paragraph 2(3)(a) of schedule 4).

228. Paragraph 2(3) amends section 135 of the 1980 Act which is an interpretation section. Paragraph 2(3)(a) inserts a definition of "early learning and childcare" which has the same meaning as in Part 6. Paragraph 2(3)(b) substitutes the definitions of "nursery school" and "nursery classes" and replaces the current definition (which gives them the same meaning in section 1(5)(a)(i) of the 1980 Act) with a definition which states that they are schools and classes which provide early learning and childcare.

229. Paragraph 3 amends the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 (the 1995 Act). Paragraph 3(2) repeals section 19 (local authority plans for services for children) of the 1995 Act in consequence of the provisions in Part 3 of the Bill relating to Children’s Services Planning. Paragraph 3(3) amends section 20 (publication of information about services for children) of the 1995 Act to substitute a new subsection (2) which defines “relevant services” for the purposes of that section which means services provided by a local authority under or by virtue of Part II of the 1995 Act, the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 or any of the enactments mentioned in section 5(1B)(a) to (o) of the 1968 Act. A further connected amendment is made in paragraphs 4 and 7 of schedule 4 and is explained below.

230. Paragraph 3(4) amends section 44 of the 1995 Act to prevent a person publishing information which would identify a child, the child’s address or school only in respect of proceedings before a sheriff on an application for an exclusion order under section 76(1) of the 1995 Act. This is connected to the amendment made in paragraph 10 of schedule 4 which is explained below.

231. Paragraph 4 amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 so as to make a change to the definition of “relevant services” consequential on the repeal of section 19 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 by paragraph 3(2) of schedule 4 explained above.

232. Paragraph 5 amends the Standards in Scotland’s Schools Act 2000 (the 2000 Act) in consequence of the provisions on early learning and childcare in Part 6 of the Act. Section 34 of the 2000 Act contains a power for the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance to education authorities as respects the discharge of their functions under the 1980 Act and education authorities must in discharging those functions have regard to such guidance. Paragraph 4(a) and (b) of schedule 4 amend section 34 to enable guidance to be issued by the Scottish Ministers to local authorities about their functions in relation to the provision of early learning and childcare under Part 6 of the Act.

233. Paragraph 6 amends section 73(2)(a) of the Regulation of Care (Scotland) Act 2001 in consequence of the provision made at 60 of the Act relating to the provision of aftercare to young people. Section 73(2) is a power for the Scottish Ministers to make regulations to specify the manner in which assistance may be provided under subsections (1) and (2) of section 29 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. Section 73(2)(a) is amended so that this power may be exercised in relation to assistance provided under new subsections (5A) and (5B) which are inserted by section 60 of the Act.

234. Paragraph 7 amends the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 so as to make a change to the definition of “relevant services” consequential on the repeal of section 19 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 by paragraph 3(2) of schedule 4 explained above.

235. Paragraph 8 amends the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 (the 2004 Act) in consequence of the provisions on early learning and childcare in Part 6 of the Act. Paragraph 6(2), (3) and (4)(a) amends sections 1(3), 5(3)(a) and 29(1) of the 2004 Act respectively so as to replace the concept of "prescribed pre-school child" (as under current law such children are prescribed by an order under section 1(1A) and (1C) of the 1980 Act) with the concept of "eligible pre-school child" as defined in section 43(2) of the Act. Paragraph 8(4)(b) of schedule 4 removes the definition of "prescribed pre-school child" in consequence of the other amendments made by paragraph 8. It should be noted that an “eligible pre-school child” for the purposes of the early learning and childcare provisions in Part 6 of the Act will fall squarely within the definition of “pre-school child” in the 2000 Act and other enactments which refer to that concept.
236. Paragraph 9 amends the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 to provide that any orders or regulations made under section 13A(2) or 13E(1) respectively, are not to be made unless a draft of the instrument has been laid before and approved by resolution of the Scottish Parliament (affirmative procedure instruments).

237. Paragraph 10 amends schedule 6 (Repeals) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (the 2011 Act) to omit the repeal of section 44 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 (prohibition of publication of proceedings at children’s hearings) from the list of repealed provisions in that Act. Section 44, whilst broadly replaced by provision made at section 182 of the 2011 Act, requires to be retained in relation to proceedings for exclusion orders under section 76(1) of the 1995 Act. Paragraph 3(4) of schedule 4 makes amendments to section 44 of the 1995 Act to limit its effect in this regard.

FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”) introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy rule 9.3.2 of the Scottish Parliament’s Standing Orders. It does not form part of the Bill and it has not been endorsed by the Scottish Parliament.

OVERVIEW

2. The Memorandum summarises the cost implications of the Bill. The Bill’s intentions are to address the challenges faced by children and young people who experience poor outcomes throughout their lives by introducing various policies. The following table provides an overview of the provisions, cross referencing them with the Bill sections, and detailing where they can be found in the Financial Memorandum and the expected commencement date.

Methodology

3. The analysis and estimates contained in this Memorandum draw on a variety of sources including:

- Consultation responses to the Bill proposals\(^2\) and the draft Business Regulatory Impact Assessment (BRIA)\(^3\); and

Discussions with partners and stakeholders for whom there may be financial implications, or who may be affected as a result of the Bill including: the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities (COSLA); individual local authorities; Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs); health boards; special health boards; the Association of Directors of Education (ADES); the Association of Directors of Social Work (ADSW); Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People; partner providers of early learning and childcare; independent schools; and the third sector.

4. It is noted at several points in the document that there have been methodological challenges in estimating the costs of some provisions, particularly with respect to the duties relating to the Named Person, the Child's Plan, throughcare and aftercare, kinship carers and counselling services. These challenges in large part relate to estimating how the preventative approach set out here will result in future avoided costs, which in several cases, depends on forward projections of current costs in the absence of the provisions. The approach taken has been to estimate median costs, and assumes that there will be margins of uncertainty around some of the costs cited. However, where the assumptions used in the methodology result in significant margins, the margins have been set out in the calculations (specifically, with regards to the duties relating to kinship carers and counselling services).

5. This document should be read in conjunction with the Policy Memorandum, which sets out more fully the reasoning behind the Bill, and the BRIA, which sets out any possible implications on private organisations.

Timescales

6. If the Bill is passed then it is expected that the following commencement dates will apply:

2014:
- Duties relating to early learning and childcare;
- Placing Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing;
- Amendment to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010; and
- Provisions relating to the Children’s Hearings system.

2015:
- Duties on the Scottish Ministers relating to the UNCRC;
- Duty on public bodies to report on the steps that they have taken to further children’s rights;
- Duties to provide additional support to kinship carers through the kinship care order;
- Provisions relating to providing families with children access to appropriate intensive family therapy;
- Duties relating to throughcare and aftercare; and
- Duties relating to corporate parenting.
These documents relate to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 27) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013

2016:
- Duties relating to GIRFEC; and
- Extending the power of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People.

Why a Preventative Approach?

7. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is founded on the key principles of early intervention and prevention, an approach to which the Scottish Government is committed, that is designed to deliver better outcomes for the people of Scotland, more efficient use of public services and sustainable economic growth. Evidence shows that effective early intervention and prevention can help break recurring cycles of poor social outcomes, and prevent extensive and expensive responses from public services at a later stage.

8. Several longitudinal studies provide evidence that returns from early investment in children during the pre-birth period and up to the age of 8 are high, but reduce the later the investment is initiated.\(^4\) This is not to suggest that later interventions are ineffective, only that intervening

earlier is usually better. For example, there is clear evidence concerning the benefits of securing early and permanent placement of children who are unable to live with their birth parents.\(^5\)

9. In the longer term, failure to effectively intervene to address the complex needs of an individual in early childhood can result in a nine fold increase in direct public costs, when compared with an individual who accesses only universal services. A package of effective early years interventions designed to reduce the frequency and type of service demanded by those individuals experiencing severe problems through their lives could have a significant impact on the outcomes for those individuals, and result in a reduction in the level of cost to the public sector. For example, a 10% reduction in the total cost to the public sector supporting an individual with severe problems could result in a potential avoided cost of approximately £94,000 per individual over time.\(^6\)

10. There is evidence that children and young people with complex needs and multiple contacts with public services often receive several interventions that are uncoordinated and may not meet their individual needs in a personalised and targeted way.\(^7\) Not only does such uncoordinated intervention drain scarce public resources but it also detracts from the effectiveness of interventions overall.\(^8\) By creating services that offer a more proportionate response to issues that affect children, children would receive better tailored interventions resulting in better outcomes, while avoiding duplication. This in turn would lead to efficiency savings in both time and resource.

11. Changes introduced in the Bill are part of an overall package of targeted interventions to achieve the impact described above. It is not always possible to estimate the contribution of individual measures to this wider impact. Where possible, the avoided costs resulting from specific measures have been estimated in the sections below.

RIGHTS OF CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE

12. The following estimates were arrived at following consultation with a number of stakeholders and interested parties including: Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People; the Scottish Parliament Corporate Body; the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman; and the Children’s Commissioner for Wales.

13. The costs for these provisions primarily relate to:

- Development and delivery of policy initiatives by the Scottish Ministers to further, and raise awareness and understanding of the UNCRC;
- Preparation and publication of periodic ministerial reports focussing on UNCRC implementation;

• Preparation and publication of periodic reports by other relevant public bodies focusing on UNCRC implementation; and

• Operational costs for the office of the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland.

Section 1 – Duty on the Scottish Ministers to keep under consideration and take appropriate steps to further the UNCRC; to promote and raise awareness and understanding of the UNCRC and to report on implementation of the UNCRC.

14. The Bill will place a new duty on the Scottish Ministers to keep under consideration their approach to UNCRC implementation and to take steps which they consider to be appropriate in order to further the rights set out in the UNCRC; to promote public awareness and understanding of the UNCRC and to publish reports every 3 years which outline the steps that they have taken to further children’s and young people’s rights under the UNCRC.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

15. Implementation of the UNCRC is an international obligation which must be satisfied by the Scottish Ministers. Because Ministers currently satisfy this obligation, the ‘duty to take appropriate steps’ would not result in substantial additional costs. The Scottish Government already takes forward a wide range of activity to implement the UNCRC and we expect that similar actions will need to be taken forward in future in order to ensure that Ministers continue to satisfy both their international obligations and the new duties being proposed through the Bill. There is no evidence to suggest a need for increased spend beyond what is currently being committed in order to implement the UNCRC. Instead, as the focus of our activity changes, we will change the way that resources are targeted.

16. The key costs are linked to other provisions described below as well as guidance. The Scottish Government intends to develop guidance to support Ministers in the continued implementation of the UNCRC as well as the proposed duty to ‘keep under consideration and take appropriate steps’. The guidance will not require entirely new processes to be established within Government. One off costs associated with developing and disseminating the guidance are expected to be approximately £25,000. This estimate is based on experience of developing previous guidance linked to public sector equality duties. Costs primarily reflect the allocation of staff resource required to develop the guidance.

17. The Bill provides for individuals to test how the Scottish Ministers have implemented the UNCRC through the domestic courts in a way not currently possible. However, given the significant progress that has already been made around implementation, we anticipate challenges of this nature being rare. Accordingly, we would expect any costs associated with judicial action to be marginal, for which there is a contingency. The Scottish Legal Aid Board spent £6,500 in 2011-12 on average on a judicial review.

18. In relation to the new duty on Ministers to promote awareness and understanding, it is estimated that this will not carry any additional costs. This is because Article 42 of the UNCRC already requires Ministers to make the principles and provisions of the UNCRC widely known to both adults and children.
19. In relation to the duty to produce reports: the Scottish Ministers are already committed to the development and implementation of periodic action plans focusing on the Scottish Government’s approach to implementation of the UNCRC. In addition, in 2012 the Scottish Ministers committed themselves to the future development of interim reports which detail progress made since the publication of the last action plan. The new duty will ensure this commitment is fulfilled moving forward.

20. Based on the preparation of a report similar in size and scope to the UNCRC progress report published by the Scottish Ministers in May 2012, and the consultation activity undertaken with children and young people for the Bill, it is expected that the following costs might reasonably be incurred every 3 years when developing a report to satisfy this duty:

- Staffing costs of approximately £8,000;
- Engagement with children and young people at a cost of approximately £20,000; and
- Publication costs of approximately £4,500.

This amounts to an approximate cost of £32,500 every 3 years

Costs on local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.

21. The duty will apply solely to the Scottish Government, therefore, there will be no cost to others.

Section 2 – Duty on public bodies to report on steps taken to further the UNCRC

22. A duty will be placed on public bodies (as listed in schedule 1) to report every 3 years on the steps that they have taken to further children and young people’s rights.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

23. As this is a duty on the wider public sector, there will be no cost to the Scottish Administration. Guidance will be prepared to support bodies in satisfying the duty. However, marginal financial resources will be required to take that work forward.

Costs on local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.

24. It is not expected that the public bodies upon whom the duty will be placed will need to establish structures similar to those proposed in respect of the Ministerial reporting duty. Costs are, therefore, not expected to be as high. Those public bodies on which this duty falls should be able to utilise their current reporting process in order to satisfy this duty (such as Children’s Services Integrated Plans and annual reports), and a level of flexibility in the reporting process will be encouraged. This should minimise costs as it is expected that organisations will routinely allocate resources to support those reporting processes.

9 Scottish Government, Do the Right Thing (2012)
25. Furthermore, where a public body has a narrow remit, this may limit the extent to which they will report on UNCRC implementation. The less significant the impact of their work on UNCRC implementation, the less onerous and less costly the reporting process will be.

26. Given the level of flexibility to be encouraged, any additional costs likely to fall on public bodies as a consequence of the Bill will be marginal.

COMMISSIONER FOR CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE IN SCOTLAND

Sections 5 - 6 – Extension of the power of the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland

27. The Bill seeks to extend the powers currently available to the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland under the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003. That legislation provides for the Commissioner to undertake investigations focussing on the extent to which service providers have had regard to the rights, views and interests of groups of children and young people, or children and young people in general. This Bill seeks to extend this power in order that the Commissioner may undertake similar investigations in relation to individual children.

28. In reaching a conclusion on the financial implications for these proposals, the Scottish Government has consulted with organisations including: the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland; the Children’s Commissioner for Wales; the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman; and the Scottish Parliament Corporate Body.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

29. As the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland is a Parliamentary appointment, all costs associated with the proposed extension of powers will fall to the Scottish Parliament Corporate Body, and there will be no cost to the Scottish Administration.

Costs on the Children’s Commissioner

30. Whilst the Commissioner may require a service provider to participate in an investigation, the anticipated low volume of any such investigations suggests that costs will be marginal. To date, the Commissioner has not undertaken any investigation in line with his current powers under section 7 of the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003; therefore, the following figures should be considered speculative.

31. Under the extended powers, it is expected that the Commissioner will undertake between 1 and 4 investigations per year. This estimate has been reached following discussion with other key complaints handling bodies in Scotland, including: the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman; the Care Inspectorate; and the Equalities and Human Rights Commission. Those discussions have indicated the existence of robust processes for handling complaints in a wide range of circumstances. That being said, all of the bodies agreed that there may be limited instances where an investigation by the Commissioner would be beneficial in order to address concerns on the part of an individual child or young person, particularly from a rights perspective. The estimate is also reflective of the fact that both the Children’s Commissioner for Wales and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People have undertaken very few investigations of this nature, having had similar powers extended to them previously.

32. Following discussions with Scottish Parliamentary officials with responsibility for office holder services, we have concluded that the Commissioner will require:

- 3 additional full time equivalent (FTE) members of staff as a consequence of the changes proposed, including: a Head of Casework and Legal; an Investigator; and a Casework Support Officer;
- One-off costs associated with the appointment of additional staff (e.g. advertisement);
- Training costs and travel expenses;
- Accommodation costs, calculated on a pro-rata basis from the Commissioner’s existing accommodation costs; and
- Provision of expert advice to support delivery of investigations.

33. There are no IT costs associated with the extension of powers. The Commissioner currently deals with between 350 and 425 enquiries per year. The number of enquiries may increase as a consequence of the extension of the Commissioner’s powers, but the majority of those enquiries should be dealt with in line with current practice and existing IT systems. Only very few enquiries will lead to an individual investigation. Accordingly, we do not believe that a dedicated additional IT solution will be necessary in order to effectively manage those cases.

Costs on local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.

34. There will be no costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

* The costs for 2015-16 have the following additional assumptions: start-up costs (which have been included under staff costs as they largely relate to recruitment); a half year of staff, travel and accommodation costs; and no expert advice required as the duty will not have commenced.

PLANNING AND DELIVERY OF SERVICES

Sections 7 – 18 – Duties on planning and delivering services and reporting on wellbeing indicators

35. There will be a duty on local authorities and health boards to cooperate with other public bodies to jointly plan and deliver services for children and young people, with a focus on wellbeing, and to report on outcomes and wellbeing indicators.
Costs on the Scottish Administration

36. As this will be a duty for the wider public sector, there will be no additional cost to the Scottish Administration.

Costs on local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.

37. Local authorities already have a statutory obligation to produce integrated children’s services plans. It is expected that health boards and other public sector partners will work through the existing structures that they have with the local authorities to deliver this duty. It is understood that organisations routinely allocate resources to support existing processes, therefore, there will be no additional cost.

38. Those public bodies on which the duty to report falls should be able to utilise current reporting processes in order to satisfy this duty (such as Single Outcome Agreement Annual Reports), and a level of flexibility in the reporting process will be encouraged. This should minimise costs as it is expected organisations routinely allocate resources to support existing reporting processes.

39. Given the level of flexibility to be encouraged, any additional costs likely to fall on public bodies as a consequence of the Bill will be marginal.

GETTING IT RIGHT FOR EVERY CHILD (GIRFEC)

40. The Scottish Government and COSLA are committed to the GIRFEC approach and for several years have been promoting the development and subsequent implementation of GIRFEC by CPPs across Scotland. By March 2013, the Scottish Government will have spent £7,878,919 since 2008 working with GIRFEC Pathfinders and Learning Partners to develop GIRFEC (including the development of the concept of the Child’s Plan and Named Person).

41. Different parts of Scotland are at different stages in fully embedding the GIRFEC approach, and unfortunately none have established a cost analysis or benefit realisation model which could inform this Memorandum. It is difficult to create a definitive costing for implementation of the duties set out in the Bill and a margin of error is anticipated. The Scottish Government has consulted widely with numerous stakeholders, including: the GIRFEC Pathfinder in Highland and Learning Partners; COSLA; health boards; ADES; and ADSW. The following costs have been calculated to reflect the financial implications of GIRFEC implementation from a base rate of zero (i.e. where no GIRFEC implementation has been undertaken).

42. GIRFEC costs primarily relate to:
   - Replacement of staff training on the Named Person and Child’s Plan duties;
   - Additional time from staff required to fulfil the duties of the Named Person and the Child’s Plan; and
   - Additional administrative support required.
Sections 19 – 41 – Duties relating to the Named Person and Child’s Plan

43. These sections place a duty on a set of public bodies set out in the Bill to provide a Named Person for every child in Scotland from birth until they leave school, and provide a Child’s Plan where appropriate.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

44. There will be no additional cost to the Scottish Administration as the duties are being placed on local authorities, health boards and other organisations.

Costs on local authorities

45. Local authorities will be responsible for the duties associated for the Named Person and Child’s Plan for those children and young people from the age of 5 until they leave school who are educated within state schools or who are school leavers. Each local authority is at a different stage of implementation, so the cost to each will be dependent on what stage they are at. The following costs have been determined at a national level.

Training

46. For staff delivering the Named Person role, for those who will have significant contact with the Named Person or will be primarily involved with the Child’s Plan, it is expected that there will be a requirement for initial training on a multi-agency basis for 2 days. The expectation is that training will be delivered in house by the public body with materials already developed by the Scottish Government (in collaboration with stakeholders). Therefore, it is assumed that there would not be a cost associated with developing and delivering the training. These assumptions have been confirmed in discussion with a sample of stakeholders.

47. There will, however, be a cost associated with replacing staff for training days, where that is necessary, and this will vary depending on the level of teacher involved. The following table sets out the estimate. It does not separate out the estimates for primary, secondary and special schools. The backfill assumptions are based on: the level of likely teaching commitment for different staff (0% for head teachers, 10% for depute heads and 30% for principal teachers); and an estimated £31.56 per hour for 7 hours of training per day. These assumptions have been derived from discussion with a sample of stakeholders.

48. It is expected that training will not be a ‘one-off’ event but going forward this training will then form part of standard Continued Professional Development, and be absorbed as part of the on-going training requirements on these organisations. Discussions with stakeholders suggest that it has been mainstreamed already in many parts of educational training.

49. Training and preparation costs may require some activity ahead of commencement, depending on the planning in each area, but for the purposes of these calculations, it is assumed that the cost is applied in 2015-2016.

50. Comprehensive national guidance is to be produced ahead of commencement. While local guidance may be developed, the national guidance should mitigate any costs. This work is already underway and costed as part of current activity.

Staff costs

51. In addition to the costs of preparing for the duties, there will be costs in carrying out these duties as part of a system change. These principally relate to directly carrying out the Named Person role (and the duties relating to the Child’s Plan) and the administrative support required. There may be a need for additional management or non-class contact time to deliver the Named Person role, and this could take the form of additional teaching hours. The table below is based on the following assumptions, derived from discussion with a sample of stakeholders.

- It is not assumed that the Named Person role would lead to additional costs with respect to all children and young people in local authority education, but only those who require additional planning from local authority services.
- This latter group is estimated to equate to 10% of the children and young people school population. This reflects the experience of those areas where the Named Person role has already been operated.
- No distinction has been made between different ages in this assumption: while there will be differences in demand across the age ranges, no evidence was forthcoming to suggest that there is a consistent concentration of activity at particular ages. As education staff are already currently planning for those children who need additional support, the additional costs are associated with the transition period when the Named Person will require more time to become familiar with and use the new system of planning.
- It is assumed that the additional help required across the system for this cohort would amount to an average of approximately 3.5 hours in the first year of implementation. Again, this reflects the experience of existing GIRFEC operation.
- We have taken the salary of a grade 6 teacher as the basis for estimating salary costs.

52. It is not anticipated that these will be recurring costs once the system change has bedded in after 1 year. The experience of GIRFEC in those areas most advanced in its implementation suggests that the system change accommodates the additional hours with efficiency savings in the services required to support children and young people with additional needs. In particular, the early intervention approach of the Named Person would result in reductions in the time spent by educational staff in addressing the needs of children and young people in crisis circumstances, such as child protection case conferences or children’s panel appearances.

53. Evidence on the benefits of GIRFEC highlights these efficiency savings and improved outcomes through closer cross partnership working and information sharing. In the Highland Pathfinder evaluation, the authors cite improved outcomes for the majority of children (two thirds of around 100 sampled) all of whom had complex needs. In addition, the following tangible benefits were realised:

- Fewer meetings and reports for all agencies, 75% time saving for meetings and administration was reduced to 10% of activity;
- Social worker caseloads reduced by 50% and inappropriate referrals to social work services reduced, freeing up time to focus on more serious concerns and circumstances involving vulnerable children;
- Unnecessary referrals to the Children’s Reporter reduced by 70%, leaving reporters and children’s panels increasingly free to focus on more serious cases at an earlier stage in the child’s or young person’s life; and
- A reduction of around 50% in the number of children regarded as at risk of significant harm and, therefore, on the Child Protection Register, attributed to the appropriate targeting of resources, early intervention and a more coordinated approach by all services and agencies under GIRFEC.

54. There is also evidence reported from other parts of Scotland of the benefits of adopting elements of GIRFEC practice. In Fife, there have been: significant reductions in referrals to the Children’s Reporter; a 30% reduction in out of authority placements; reduction in the average waiting time for referral to acute paediatric clinics for children with Autistic Spectrum Disorders from 3 years to 24 weeks; 54% diversion of children between 16 and 17 being reported to the Procurator Fiscal to alternative interventions; and a 50% drop in school exclusions. Similar gains were reported by Falkirk Council.

Administrative Costs

55. As well as direct staff costs, additional administrative support needs to be estimated as well. This arises from the handling of any additional information sharing between the Named Person and other practitioners, in line with the Bill provisions, as well as administration relating to the Child’s Plan. It recognises that there would be different administrative needs between different types of schools, particularly the heavier needs of secondary schools.

56. For the same reasons set out for teacher costs above, it is assumed that this would be a one-off transitional cost of 1 year.

57. As with the costs of the Named Person and the Child’s Plan for local authorities for children and young people aged between 5 and 18, similar costs will be incurred by health boards for children aged between 0 and 5.

58. There are 2 components to training costs: development of training materials; and training to prepare for the new duties. As with local authorities, it is assumed that training itself will be one-off and subsumed within existing training programmes after the first year of implementation.

- The development of training modules to fit within existing training has been identified along with the backfill costs (estimates have been based on discussion with senior NHS managers at a 60% staff replacement rate across all midwives/health visitors/public health nurses). The estimated salary of midwives/health visitors/public health nurses staff costs with on costs is £37,125 per annum (leaving an effective hourly rate of £19.04). This would apply to training across 2 days, resulting in a total one-off cost of £1,088,949 in 2015-16.

- As adequate training materials do not currently exist, training modules based on guidance will also need to be developed. Based on previous estimates from NHS Education for Scotland, this will be approximately £300,000. For the purposes of calculation, it is assumed that this cost will be incurred in 2014-15.

59. The functions of a Named Person will require some additional activity for midwives, health visitors and public health nurses. These will involve the holistic assessment based on information received and observed, any preparation towards the creation of a Child’s Plan where needed, and management of the plan through on-going involvement with the child and family as required.
60. In calculating the financial impact of the Bill provisions, account has been taken of the current activity by midwives, health visitors and public health nurses. Where new or additional work is required, assumptions have been made based on discussions with senior health staff. Advice has varied, reflecting the current different stages of implementation of the GIRFEC approach across Scotland, so national averages have been estimated.

- For 80% of all children between 0 and 5, it is assumed that there will be marginal concerns requiring additional activity over and above routine engagement. Average activity has been estimated:
  - For midwives the need for some additional activity around pre-birth assessment is recognised at 2 hours per child per year. This pre-birth assessment will help prepare for the relevant staff to take up the Named Person (and Child’s Plan) duties after birth;
  - For health visitors and public health nurses additional activity will amount to 1 hour per child in the age bands 0-1, 1 and 2; and
  - For those children aged 3-5 the additional work is considered minimal, reflecting current levels of activity.

- For the remaining 20% of all children for whom there will be emerging or significant concerns, there will be additional work to assess whether a Child’s Plan is required. This will include liaison between the midwife and the health visitor/public health nurse at transition and an hour each per midwife and health visitor/public health nurse has been assumed on average.

- For children with particularly complex needs, the additional role of the Named Person described in the Bill will be limited. These children are estimated to account for 2% of this wider group with emerging or significant concerns. These children will already be receiving significant support and it is not anticipated that there will be any additional requirements arising from the Named Person role.

- However, for the remaining 18% of this group of children with emerging or significant concerns, health visitors/public health nurses are likely to experience additional work. This has been estimated as an average of 10 hours per health visitor/public health nurse per child in the first year of implementation. As the new approach beds in, with a number of children being siblings and from families already known to health visitors, the additional hours are expected to reduce, reflecting the impact of preventative intervention and the efficiencies arising from less time spent in addressing children in crisis circumstances (e.g. child protection case conferences and children’s panels). The assumptions of hours per child per age group are set out below, as well as the current population estimates for the different age bands (used to calculate estimated costs for each year of implementation).

61. From these estimated hours and size of cohort population, estimates of additional costs for midwife, health visitor and public health nurse activity can be calculated using the same salary assumption as above (i.e. an effective hourly rate of £19.04). These estimated costs, along with the other costs, are set out in the table below.

62. For those children and young people in independent or grant maintained schools between the ages of 5 and 18, the Named Person and Child’s Plan duties fall on the relevant organisation. The approach to calculating the costs follows the same approach as for local authorities. For staff delivering the Named Person role or who have significant contact with the Named Person, and will need to have knowledge of a Child’s Plan, there will be initial training required for 2 days. Training is currently provided by the Scottish Council of Independent Schools, at a cost of £95 per person, per day, and is, therefore, estimated to be £41,800 for Head Teachers and Depute Head Teachers.

63. As per the costings for local authority schools, there may be additional management time or non-class contact time required to deliver the Named Person role. Based on the same methodology that was used for local authority schools, this is estimated to cost £400,568.

65. With respect to children and young people in secure accommodation, staff acting as Named Persons will continue to support children’s wellbeing and we expect that new requirements including the use of the Child’s Plan can be absorbed within existing training and staff development.

Early Learning and Childcare

66. Section 43 of the Bill establishes a duty on local authorities to secure a minimum of 600 hours flexible early learning and childcare for 3 and 4 year olds, and any 2 year old who is, or has been at any time since turning 2, looked after or subject to a kinship care order. Local authorities will also be obliged to provide flexible patterns of early learning and childcare within a minimum framework to meet local need, as identified through consultation. This will include:

- The needs of parents and children identified through consultation with local populations of parents every 2 years; and
- Responses to those consultations through published plans or local strategies to re-configure services over time to meet those needs within a minimum framework of no less than 2.5 hours/day, no more than 8 hours/day; and over no less than 38 weeks a year which are not confined to term times.
67. The main costs of these Bill provisions are the additional hours and additional flexibility or options of hours for those eligible children, in particular:

- Staff costs;
- Operational costs;
- Support costs; and
- Capital costs associated with adapting and expanding accommodation to meet requirements for longer sessions of early learning and childcare for eligible children.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

68. The duty to secure the additional hours will be on the local authority so there will be no cost to the Scottish Government.

Costs on local authorities

69. The cost to local authorities has been estimated on the basis of existing costs for the delivery of pre-school education or early learning and childcare and estimated costs of delivering new models. The current default model of provision of 475 hours per annum is 2.5 hours per day, 5 days per week, for 38 weeks per year. Local Government Financial Return Data (LFR) indicates that local authorities spent approximately £318,300,000 on pre-school education in 2010-11. This total includes employee costs, operating costs and support service costs. Local authorities also spent a further £527,000,000 on Special Education; with an estimated £17,000,000 of this directed to pre-school special education (based on an estimated 3.3% of children based in special schools as pre-school children).

* Costs are estimated in 2011-12 prices.
 Marginal operational costs are adjusted to 50%, reflecting the share of operational costs that need to rise to accommodate the additional hours.
 Marginal support costs are adjusted to 30%, reflecting the share of support costs that need to rise to accommodate the additional hours.
* Revenue costs in the first year assume an implementation date of August 2014 (hence, a 75% figure has been applied to the total revenue cost for 2014-15).

71. Estimated costs have been based on:
   - an increase of 125 hours for 3 and 4 year olds;
   - a range of exemplar models of delivery;
   - an additional new entitlement of 600 hours for looked after 2 year olds and 2 year olds under a kinship care order.

72. It is not sufficient to cost the additional hours alone. Costs will vary according to how many hours per day children are in early learning and childcare. Staff ratios increase when children are in early learning and childcare for more than 4 hours (from 1:10 – 1:8) and, where children are aged 2 (a ratio of 1:5). There are other implications in terms of cover over meal times. Costs will also vary where local authorities are required to secure a range of patterns of hours in order to increase flexibility. Therefore, the estimated costs also reflect those factors.

73. The increasing flexibility will require a re-configuration of services in response to locally identified need and this will be achieved incrementally. Therefore the final estimated costs are incremental. Local authorities will have full flexibility to develop and re-configure services and provision to meet local need and circumstances, and it is expected that there will be a range of approaches to developing options over the first few years. This will be reflected in incrementally increasing revenue costs, front loaded in the first 3 years with capital to adapt or expand accommodation in response to local consultations. On-going consultation with parents, coupled with increasing revenue and capital support upfront will, therefore, ensure increasing flexibility of provision and the establishment of a range of choices and patterns for parents, and consistency for children.

74. The main additional costs arising from those provisions will be staff costs. Recruitment for additional staff and extensions or renegotiations of current staff contracts will also be required. Local authorities currently have high levels of access to a teacher in pre-school (96% of children) and local authorities often provide peripatetic teams of teachers to work with partner providers. The recent report by Education Scotland, Making the difference,\(^{11}\) found that the BA Childhood Practice Award is beginning to show a positive impact on children’s learning in the early years; and, that the best experiences for children are found where there is a range of staff with complementary skills and relevant higher qualifications. It is, therefore, envisaged that a continued mix of early years staff and skills will be paramount to ensure quality of expanded provision.

75. Working with COSLA and individual local authorities, the additional staff costs associated with a range of patterns of delivery have been estimated. The derivation of the revenue and capital costs for the early learning and childcare costs outlined below demonstrates that the incremental increase in flexibility is more complex to estimate than just additional hours. The other complex factor has been that models of flexibility used have been indicative examples developed by local authorities in advance of consultation with local populations. We have sought to mitigate this uncertainty by working closely with COSLA and others on their models and estimates of anticipated costs and, by building in an incremental approach which allows re-configuration of services in response to consultation which is planned and manageable.

76. Different models of provision will incur different costs. For the purposes of this estimate, a mixture of different flexible options set out in the consultation document\(^{12}\) and modelled by local authorities have been used as the final range of options for 2018-19 onwards. These models are only examples and, therefore, costs are indicative. The final models developed by local authorities will vary according to locally identified need and cannot be anticipated in advance of consultation. However, 5 models ranging from 2.5 hours a day extending over non-term time to 8 hours a day for 2 days a week over term time were analysed for staff implications and costs.

77. Indicative additional staff costs for those 5 models ranged from £44 million to £65 million, with an estimated increase to £75 million where there was a combination of models. The models of additional costs for local authorities were also reflective of their own different starting positions.

\(^{11}\) Education Scotland, Making the difference: The impact of staff qualifications on children’s learning in early years, November 2012

78. These figures form the derivation of estimated staff costs, adjusted incrementally as services adapt and mix to reflect identified need.

79. As indicated, the main additional costs will be associated with staff. Additional operational and support costs have been added to those staff costs, based on variable marginal costs derived from the most recent local government financial return data.\(^\text{13}\) Not all costs will increase equally; marginal operational and support costs have been accordingly adjusted to 50% and 30% respectively.

80. Costs assume a continued commencement date of first term after the third birthday for 3 year olds. Additional costs have also been estimated for looked after 2 year olds and those 2 year olds who are, or who have been at any time since turning 2, looked after or subject to a kinship care order. Provision for 2 year olds will be different, and there is flexibility to provide more individualised approaches for looked after 2 year olds in a range of settings, and with parents or carers where appropriate. Cost estimates also allow for continued provision for looked after 2 year olds and those 2 year olds who, are or who have been, at any time since turning 2, subject to a kinship care order, until they are eligible for universal provision at the first term after the third birthday, even if their looked after or kinship care status changes, in order to ensure consistency and minimise transitions for the most vulnerable 2 year olds.

81. Early learning and childcare will continue to include those children with additional support needs, and this has been factored into the estimated revenue costs. They have been calculated on a pro-rata basis from the existing additional support for learning needs published expenditure.\(^\text{14}\) Special education apportionment is estimated at 3.3% of the special school population and 3.3% of the special education budget. 90% of this is estimated as a variable cost.

82. Broadly, local authorities secure around 40% of provision through independent, private and third sector partners; it is anticipated that local authorities will continue to use those sectors to provide capacity and flexibility. The National Day Nursery Association and some partner providers have raised the issue of unsustainable funding levels for the majority of partner provider placements, especially if the patterns of placements change to full or half days. The Scottish Government issued an annual advisory floor letter to local authorities to set an advisory minimum payment level for a pre-school education. This was in place until 2007 when this stopped under the terms of Concordat and block funding, whereby it was agreed this advice was no longer appropriate. The last letter issued in 2007 advised a payment of £1,550 per annum per child. There has been no consistent increase across local authorities since then. Estimating hourly costs in line with inflation increases costs from what would have been £3.73 per hour to £4.09 an hour. The revenue estimate takes into consideration inflationary linked payments for partner providers as a partner uprating.

83. Capital costs will be required to adapt existing provision for additional hours and associated accommodation needs. Capital costs are estimated on the basis that local authorities will have variable needs ranging from adaptation of existing accommodation to additional provision, such as additional integrated space with current schools or local authority estate resources, or small stand-alone units. This will also depend upon the current pre-school estate in each local authority.

area, the use of partner providers, the response of local authorities to consultation and their reconfiguration strategies. Capital estimates are based on Scottish Futures Trust metrics for primary schools. This is an allowance of 7.5 square metres per child at a cost of £2,350 per square metre. Costs could be: around £700,000 for an integrated unit for 40 morning and 40 afternoon children; around £1,500,000 for a stand-alone unit for 80 children; or less for smaller alterations and adaptations. In the absence of inclusion of the pre-school estate in the annual national School Estate Core Facts Survey on the size, condition, suitability and capacity of all primary, secondary and special schools, refurbishment and/or rebuilding information, and knowledge of the views of local parents, this estimate is necessarily limited. Nevertheless, it has been tested with a number of local authorities.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses
84. There are no further costs anticipated for others.

GETTING IT RIGHT FOR LOOKED AFTER CHILDREN
85. The costs of these Bill provisions relate to 4 sets of provisions affecting looked after children:

- Putting Scotland’s Adoption Register on a statutory footing;
- Providing for a clear definition of corporate parenting, and defining the bodies to which it will apply;
- Placing a duty on local authorities to assess a care leaver’s request for assistance up to and including the age of 25;
- Providing families in distress where a child is at risk of being looked after access to appropriate intensive family therapy; and
- Providing for additional support to be given to kinship carers in relation to their parenting role, through the kinship care order.

Section 50 – Extending the range and number of corporate parents
86. The Bill sets out a number of public bodies which will be considered ‘corporate parents.’

Costs on the Scottish Administration
87. As this duty will fall on the wider public sector, there will be no cost to the Scottish Administration. However, the Scottish Government may continue to provide corporate parenting training. In May 2010, the Scottish Government commissioned Who Cares? Scotland to develop and run a national corporate parenting training programme, aimed at local authority elected members and health board members. The funding was £300,000 over 3 years, and came to an end in March 2013. The overall aim of the programme was to improve awareness of corporate parenting responsibilities and duties for new and existing corporate parents, and to highlight the challenges faced by looked after children and young people. The programme has recently been evaluated. A second phase, which would extend the reach of the programme to a broader range of corporate parents, is under negotiation. The cost would likely be similar to Phase 1.
Costs on local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.

88. A duty will be placed on a number of public bodies listed as corporate parents in the Bill to develop, consult on and publish a corporate parenting plan, which they will need to review from time to time. It has been assumed that every 3 years they will publish reports on how they have exercised their responsibilities, in such a manner as they consider appropriate. There may be a marginal cost associated with this duty which would fall on the corporate parents.

89. Corporate parents are encouraged to collaborate in publishing joint plans or reports, which would allow them to share costs. They are also encouraged to utilise any current reporting or planning processes to satisfy this duty. This should minimise costs as organisations will already likely have allocated resources to support these reporting processes. In addition, where a public body named as a corporate parent has a limited role in that regard, then the extent to which it is necessary to plan and report may also be limited.

90. Therefore, any additional costs likely to fall on public bodies as a consequence of the Bill would be expected to be limited to £820-2,700 per corporate parent, depending on the size of their role and influence, in relation to developing, consulting on and publishing a plan. This estimate covers web publishing costs of a short consultation document and a plan, plus staff time to analyse responses. In relation to publishing reports, the estimate is £350-770. The estimates reflect current experience in applying corporate parenting duties. Given the number of expected corporate parents, the total cost is estimated at £74,240 once every 3 years.

Section 60 – Extending throughcare and aftercare support

91. The Bill provides for care leavers to ask their local authority to be assessed as to whether they need financial support and assistance up to and including the age of 25 and for the local authority to provide support and assistance where a care leaver's needs are considered to be eligible, when the care leaver is unable to get that support from elsewhere.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

92. The duty will be placed on local authorities to provide the support and assistance, and, therefore, there will be no cost to the Scottish Government.

Costs on local authorities

93. The cost of the provision will fall on local authorities, principally through an estimated increase in the number of care leavers who will receive support. To calculate this increase, it is first necessary to establish a baseline for the expected number of care leavers who would receive support in the absence of the provision. In arriving at an estimate of cost we have consulted with a number of local authorities and COSLA.

94. The “Children Looked After Statistics” set out the number of care leavers eligible for aftercare support by age. As at 31 July 2011, there were 3,662 care leavers aged 15 to 21 (up to but not including their 22nd birthday) who were eligible for aftercare support. Over the last 3 years the number of young people leaving care has been fairly stable. Consequently, in modelling future numbers of care leavers (at commencement of this Bill provision in 2015), we use current numbers of care leavers by age as a proxy.

95. There are two groups of care leavers who will be eligible for support under the provisions. In extending the duty on local authorities to offer support and assistance to young people up to and including 25 year olds, new care leavers will be eligible to request support, including those aged between 21 and 25 who were not eligible previously but who will qualify with the age extension. In addition, there will be a number of former care leavers who will re-qualify, including those aged 19-21 who had applied previously but for whom the application for support was turned down.

96. Most local authorities neither collect nor retain data on: how long these care leavers have been out of care at the time they were granted support and assistance; who applied for support from a local authority, but were denied it; and the duration of aftercare support. For these reasons it is difficult to model fully how many young people might come forward for support. In the following modelling, costing assumptions have been made to create a realistic estimate.

97. To estimate the cost of this provision, two elements need to be determined. First, the additional number who are likely to receive support and the duration of support; and second, the average cost of support per care leaver.

98. Under current provisions, in 2011, there were 975 care leavers between the ages of 19 and 21 receiving aftercare.\(^{16}\) It is assumed that all of these care leavers will come forward to have their needs assessed under the new proposal. As the proposals will extend throughcare and aftercare support to 25 year olds, it is estimated that a further 2,500 young people aged 21-25 inclusive may also come forward to have their needs assessed. This estimate assumes that around 500 in each of the 5 age cohorts 21-25 are eligible in each 12-month period, reflecting the approximate number of 20 year olds (492) qualifying in 2011. It is, therefore, estimated that a total of around 3,725 young persons aged 19-25 in 2015 may come forward to have their needs assessed under the new duty.

99. Several other factors need to be taken into consideration to estimate the cost impact.

- First, the number of young people who come forward for support should decline with the age of the care leaver, and reflect the natural process whereby young adults gain their own support and independence as they get older. This tapering effect is reflected in the table below and the initial numbers for 2015-16 are drawn from current 2011 figures for eligible care leavers at that age.

- Second, it is not expected that all care leavers will take up the support. The uptake will more than likely happen in the early stages after they leave care. For that reason, and to annualise costs, it has been considered that support would be provided over a 3 year period. The table sets out the flow of eligible care leavers for a 5 year period.

- Lastly, the proportion of successful applicants under the provision is likely to change. It is estimated that in 2011, local authorities granted support and assistance to 56% of care leavers aged 19–21. However, under the new provision, it is estimated that the provision of support will extend to 65%. For example, in the table below, when applying this to the number of young people estimated to be eligible to apply in 2015-16 (3,225), the total would be 2,096 young people.

100. The second element that needs to be determined is the average cost of support per care leaver. Different parts of Scotland offer different throughcare and aftercare services and the average cost per young person across local authorities reflects this variation. It is difficult to identify total expenditure on throughcare and aftercare as it has been difficult to obtain data from local authorities. We have drawn on information received from a number of local authorities in Scotland detailing their aftercare services. The average costs of these services over a 12 month period have been used to arrive at an estimated range of total additional expenditure for the proposal as set out in the table below. The duty will apply only to eligible needs that cannot be met from elsewhere. Eligible needs will be defined in an order to be made by Scottish Ministers but it is anticipated that they will be those needs that are essential to daily living. The table below reflects this.

101. For the purposes of calculating the average cost per care leaver, it is useful to separate out continuing annual costs and one-off costs. Overall, annual support costs have been estimated at an average annual cost of £3,142 per young person, consisting of an average of £2,100 in support costs (based on the costs identified in the table above) and estimated application/process costs at £1,042 (based on average caseloads and average worker salaries).

102. Aftercare support is currently provided to 975 young people aged 19-21, and if there were no change in legislation, then it is likely that this will continue with a similar number. If it is assumed that under the new provisions, 2,096 young people will be likely to receive aftercare support in 2015-16 (for example), then that means there would be an additional cost for 1,121 young people. The table below sets out how this would result in a set of annual net additional costs.

* This does not include the one-off furnishing grant of £2,000, which is discussed below.

103. In addition, there may be a one-off cost of £2,000 for furnishing. Of the 2,096 young people who will be successful in receiving general financial support, it is estimated that approximately 25% will also be successfully assessed for support with this one-off furnishing cost of £2,000. This estimate is much lower than the support costs, as there will often be occasions where the young person will have already been in receipt of this furnishing cost, when they first move into new accommodation at 18. As this is a one-off cost, it has been annualised over the average term that young people are expected to be in receipt of aftercare (3 years, as stated above) for the purposes of presenting annual total costs. The table below sets out the costs per year that would result.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses.

105. It is estimated that there will be no additional cost to other bodies, individuals and businesses.

Sections 61 – 67 – Duties relating to kinship care and family therapy

106. The duty is placed on local authorities to provide, where appropriate, enhanced support to kinship carers who apply for, consider applying for, have obtained or are subject to a section 11(1) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. These section 11 orders will be re-designated a kinship care order. By placing a duty on local authorities, the Bill ensures that those who apply for, consider applying for, have obtained or are subject to a kinship care order will be entitled to assistance if the relevant eligibility test is met. This will also apply to eligible children who have reached the age of 16, but who were subject to a kinship care order immediately prior to turning this age. The type of assistance will be prescribed by the Scottish Ministers in secondary legislation.

107. There are 2 categories of kinship care that will be affected by this measure, formal and informal kinship arrangements.

108. Formal kinship care is where a child is placed under section 25, 70, 57 or 17(6) of the Children Scotland Act 1995 with a kinship carer. This arrangement is defined in the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009 and a duty is placed on local authorities to ensure their procedures explicitly address the needs of kinship care and they have appropriate processes in place.

109. Informal kinship care is where a family with limited or no social work intervention has made arrangements with the birth family to look after a child, and where the child is not looked after. In these circumstances kinship carers do not have specific entitlement to additional support from local authorities, although some local authorities may provide support under section 22 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. Some informal kinship carers may have obtained a section 11 order under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 which provides some or all parental responsibilities and rights for the child, which may include a residence order stating where the child should reside. Such an order does not, however, confer any specific duties on local authorities to provide additional support.

110. The duty will be placed on local authorities and, therefore, there will be no cost to the Scottish Government.

Costs on local authorities

111. The costs associated with the provisions relate to: additional eligibility to local authority support to kinship carers; a set of financial entitlements and other supports (to be detailed in regulations); and transitional costs for implementing the changes.

112. There will be avoided future costs associated with this measure. Estimating these costs is critical to the operation of these provisions. It is anticipated that these new measures will attract kinship carers from both formal and informal arrangements. The mechanism by which the order achieves this is by providing an enhanced permanence option for families where it is appropriate for a kinship carer to become the primary carer, with parental responsibilities and rights or in a supportive role to the birth parents. The costs will reflect the migration from both types of arrangement to the new kinship care order.

Support available in relation to the kinship care order

113. The table below sets out the proposed support available to kinship carers and families which will be set out in Regulations.

114. The first category of support is for those who are granted an order. Regulations will specify a general qualifying test which is linked to the current or projected risk that a child may need to become formally looked after. This test would only apply once and periodic reviews by the local authority would determine whether on-going support was needed. Various support options would be available.

- The right to transitional support attempts to address the concern of kinship carers who can provide long term care for a child currently looked after, that they will be unable to access support if a child leaves formal care onto a kinship care order.
- The right to an essential start up grant meets a general but important need whereby carers can find themselves facing a cliff-edge of additional costs (e.g. for bedding, clothes and household items). With a high proportion of kinship carers on low incomes, these costs can be prohibitive. The proposal is for a grant of £500 per child (based on discussion with a selection of local authorities).

- The right to assistance with essential transport costs is linked to supporting the carer with essential transport costs to comply with the terms of a section 11 contact order (e.g. where the child in kinship care meets the birth parent once a week and must be accompanied by the kinship carer). Given the older age profile of many kinship carers, many would be eligible for free bus travel locally. While most would not need this support, when it applies it can be reasonably costly. The assumption is £500 to £1,800 in a given year which translates to approximately £10 to £35 a week.

- The Bill will extend early learning and childcare entitlement to looked after 2 year olds. These costs are identified in the section on early learning and childcare. This will be available without the eligibility test.

115. The second category of support applies to kinship carers before an application is made to the court. Assistance is likely to be determined by eligibility criteria linked to the circumstances of the child and/or carer. The support provided could be by way of advice, information, practical assistance and financial contributions. This could be direct or in kind.

Costs on support relating to the kinship care order

116. The Bill measures are not designed to replace formal kinship care entirely. They will, however, offer formal and informal kinship carers an alternative means of securing care arrangements, without recourse to formal care, which is not always desirable to kinship carers or necessary for the long-term care of a child.

117. The costs associated with the support provided in relation to a section 11 order awarded to an eligible kinship carer (hence forth a kinship care order) can be broken down into different categories; the cost of formal carers obtaining a kinship care order, the cost of informal carers obtaining a kinship care order; the transitional costs for local authorities; and the avoided costs of formal care.

118. These sets of costs will be worked through individually.

Costs of formal kinship carers applying for the kinship care order

119. It is expected that a proportion of formal carers will apply for a kinship care order. We have estimated this based on the numbers of those already applying for section 11 orders and assumptions tested with some local authorities. The upper and lower bands are shown in the table below and assume a modest increase on existing applications for section 11 orders (currently accounting for 4% of formal carers).

120. For formal carers, table 25 lists the support that is likely to be applicable, estimates the proportion who are likely to be eligible applicants and sets out the upper estimates of the costs of each form of support.

121. In terms of assumptions, the following have been applied:

- The £500 start-up grant will likely be time limited to around 12 months from the date the kinship arrangement began. Around 50% of applicants for the kinship care order would be eligible.
- Information support is based on 2-14 hours of time spent with a client by a suitable officer, at an hourly rate of around £25 including on costs.
- Transport costs are likely to be high but only apply to a minority of cases. It is assumed that 1 in 10 or 10% of applicants are likely to need this support.
- It is assumed all 2 year olds (approximately 5% of all children) subject to a kinship care order will be eligible for early learning and childcare (this was modelled earlier in the Memorandum).
- Following discussions with Scottish Legal Aid Board, we believe local authorities will need to meet costs associated with petitions in around two thirds of cases. This could take the form of advice or information or financial support – our upper estimate is a typical cost for legal aid associated with a section 11 residence order.
- Transitional support would be provided for a period of 3 years: hence, costs are modelled in terms of one off costs (counted once) and recurring costs (counted 3 times for each case, and as marked in the table 25 above).
Transition costs

122. Table 25 also models eligibility for the right to transitional support, which will only apply to kinship carers of children who are formally looked after at the time the order is granted. The actual support provided will be linked to the needs of the child and as such will involve an assessment. Support will only be provided if it is not automatically provided elsewhere through universal services in Scotland or across the UK (including through the UK benefits system).

123. As transitional support is expected to be provided on top of entitlements provided by universal services it is assumed that some kinship carers will be notionally eligible but will not in fact need additional support from the local authority. For some, on-going support may mean continuing weekly allowances for a period of up to 3 years or other, non-monetary support such as counselling or respite. The order does not convey additional rights to allowances. However, for practical purposes and based on scenarios discussed with local authorities, the cost here is modelled on providing a ‘top up’ allowance of £70 a week for 3 years in addition to around £900 for other general support costs.

124. The model also needs to estimate the number of informal carers who will apply for the kinship care order and meet the ‘at risk’ test. It is estimated that between 220 and 530 informal carers will make applications each year. These lower and upper projections are based around the numbers of relevant section 11 orders currently petitioned for each year and assumptions relating to the number of kinship care applications likely to be made (based on discussion with a selection of local authorities). As a result, the kinship care order would lead to a small increase in the number of informal kinship carers applying for section 11 orders.

125. The scale of informal kinship care is difficult to gauge because of lack of data, but can be assessed using the most recent evidence collected and trend assumptions. There is anecdotal evidence that a growing proportion of kinship care is now formally recognised, and currently stands at approximately 20%. As there were 3,917 in formal kinship care in 2011, this suggests that approximately 15,668 children in Scotland may have been in informal kinship care arrangements and eligible for the new kinship care order. For simplicity it is assumed that this number would be similar in 2015. We have estimated that, the number of informal kinship carers applying for the kinship care order would account for approximately 1.5-3.5% of the estimated number of informal kinship care arrangements each year.

126. For informal carers, table 26 lists the support that is likely to be applicable and estimates the proportion of carers who are eligible applicants.

127. Assumptions are broadly similar to those relating to support for formal kinship carers. There are no transitional costs, as noted above, but in all cases of informal carers, a parenting capacity assessment would be needed to determine (i) whether the family meets the ‘at risk’ test and (ii) the type of support needed.

Combined cost impact from informal and formal arrangements

128. Part of the purpose of the order and the accompanying measures is to reduce unchecked growth in formal kinship care, which has increased by 87% over the 4 years since 2007. The population of looked after children in formal kinship care arrangements as at July 2011 stood at 3,917 children and young people aged 0-21 years. In the absence of any policy change, this is likely to continue on an upward trend. Assuming a continuing rate of annual expansion of 6.5%, by 2019-20, approximately 6,483 children would be in formal kinship care arrangements in Scotland.

129. At an average annual cost of £5,331 per child (based on kinship allowances, at an average of £102.52 per week), the cost of this obligation would exceed £35 million per annum. This does not take account of additional financial contributions, one-off support, respite, support groups and other support provided locally. On the basis of an average social worker’s time with a typical salary and a caseload of around 12, the total cost in 2019-20 would amount to nearly £58 million.

130. As a result of the additional support provided to kinship carers obtaining a section 11 order we expect numbers of such orders to rise beyond the current estimated levels (approximately 200 a year). The lower and upper estimates on the number of applications, set out in table 24, as well as assumptions on application success rates (as derived from discussion with selected local authorities) have been used to estimate the numbers in the table below. Because the kinship care order acts to prevent a child becoming looked after unnecessarily, this would give rise to future avoided costs compared with the expenditure local authorities would need to make otherwise. Table 27 demonstrates how the projected numbers in formal kinship care would be affected by the lower and upper assumptions of take up of the order.

131. On the basis of the lower and upper estimates of numbers in formal kinship care and the costs set out above, table 28 shows the avoided future costs that would arise from the order. The model suggests that avoided future costs arise from the first year of implementation and increase for the first few years before stabilising. This applies whether the lower or upper estimates are used for the numbers of children diverted from formal kinship care.

132. The model bases avoided future costs on the numbers in formal kinship care in a given year – the true picture of formal kinship care involves a significant number of children coming into and leaving formal supervision arrangements each year and across different types of care placement, including foster care, residential care and looked after at home with birth parents. This ‘churn’ is very difficult to model, so we have assumed conservatively that the avoided costs associated with diverting an individual child from care only last for a single year, rather than several years or indeed, permanently.

* This is based on an average annual cost of £5,331 per child (based on kinship allowances, at an average of £102.52 per week); and social worker costs per child of £3,667 (as tested with a number of local authorities).

 This is the difference between the projected costs of formal kinship care without and with a kinship care order in each year.

Sections 61 – 67 – Duties relating to provision of counselling services

133. A duty is placed on local authorities to assess children who are at risk of coming into care for access to counselling services such as family mediation or family group conferencing support.

134. This measure offers intensive family therapy at an early enough point in the breakdown of a family to stabilise the care environment and offset or reduce the risk of a child eventually becoming looked after. Therapy of this type may include family mediation or family group conferencing/decision making. This support would also apply to those with a relevant order. By restricting availability to those who meet the ‘at risk’ test the local authority retains professional ownership over the determination of whether the support is needed and how it is delivered.

135. Family therapy can result in a number of positive outcomes, one of which could be realising that a kinship carer may have a role in helping care for a child longer term. This may in turn lead to an application for a relevant order. Alternatively, the therapy may be sufficient in itself to arrest any further breakdown in the care environment.

136. The duties will be placed on local authorities and, therefore, there will be no cost to the Scottish Government.

Costs on local authorities

137. The costs associated with the provisions relate to the provision of information, parenting capacity assessment, and the provision of counselling services for families approaching crisis circumstances to avert children and young people being taken into care.

138. Modelling the eligible population for support to families with a child at risk of becoming looked after is particularly problematic and can be achieved in a number of ways. For practical purposes, the estimate below of the number of families likely to be eligible to access family mediation or family group conferencing is a proportion of the overall ‘children in need’ population. This group will be defined through Regulations as those families whose circumstances give rise to a substantial risk that a child will become looked after within a period of time, in the absence of additional support. It will be important to avoid this becoming overly focused on immediate risk (which is the current focus of statutory duties).

139. For practical purposes, there will be a further condition of eligibility that the right to family mediation (or the duty on the local authority to provide it) would not be triggered unless that particular form of support would benefit the family circumstances or reduce the risk of the child coming into care.

140. Table 29 provides lower and upper estimates of the numbers of eligible children based on the proportion who are referred to the Children’s Reporter on welfare grounds. The range below is necessarily broad. At the lower end, we would expect local authorities to be incurring expenditure no greater than they might otherwise through existing discretionary activity. At the upper end, we might expect a pronounced change in the volume of families who assert their right to assistance.

141. The unit cost of parenting capacity assessment, providing information and intensive family therapy is drawn from examples provided by third sector organisations. For intensive family therapy the average is made up of a lower unit cost of £750 and an upper cost of £2,500. In modelling the costs of this support, it is assumed that the support is provided once.

142. Research, project evaluations and in house evidence from local authorities generally support the effectiveness of models like family group conferencing (FGC) when applied appropriately and at a suitable point. When the explicit goal of FGC is to prevent a child becoming looked after, success has been reported as high at 87%. Because the therapy offered will be broader than just FGC, a lower overall success figure of 50-60% is assumed. Moreover, it is assumed that for every successful mediation in this scenario, a single child avoids care.

*This is based on an average annual cost of £5,331 per child (based on kinship allowances, at an average of £102.52 per week); and social worker costs per child of £3,667 (as tested with a number of local authorities).

Overall impact of duties relating to kinship care and the provision of counselling services

143. The costs to local authorities of each of these measures have been outlined separately above.

144. Taken together, the measures relating to kinship care and the provision of counselling services are intended to be a positive incentive for kinship carers and their families to assert themselves in the solutions they face which, if left unchecked, could lead to a child becoming looked after.

145. Table 32 brings together the gross costs of support and the projected avoided costs arising from the kinship care order and the provision of counselling services in combination. The costs have been derived from the estimated support costs, the eligible proportions of lower and upper numbers and the estimates of formal and informal carers successfully applying. The table suggests that there are net avoided future costs from the first year of implementation of the provisions and each year thereafter. The basis of this model is around preventing a child unnecessarily becoming formally looked after and the estimates used have been conservative. In addition, only direct costs have been taken into account: but there are likely to be avoided costs to the children’s hearings system and the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration as well.

146. Consequently, for the purposes of calculating the full costs of the provisions to local authorities, we have assumed a zero direct cost arising from the support associated with the Bill. However, in recognition of the one off transition costs associated with the Bill, as outlined above, we have attributed a cost of £2.6 million in 2015-16.

Transitional costs on local authorities

147. There will be necessary transition costs associated with this measure for which no direct savings are attributable. These represent real up-front costs to local authorities. Assumptions are drawn from previous programmes and it is assumed that these will be a one-off set of costs in the first year of implementation.

148. Key measures include the following.

- In order to facilitate the work arising from the kinship care order, it is assumed 10 staff from each local authority on average will need to spend 2 days in further training.

- Each local authority will need to generate new information in respect of the policy both electronically and in paper form, so it is assumed that around £10,000 per authority will be required.

- Around £15,000 would be needed to promote the policy locally, based on the time needed by staff to visit kinship groups, meet with key stakeholders and service providers (such as family mediation services) and commission advertising.

- This model assumes a very significant usage of parenting capacity assessment to provide initial assistance but also to trigger further support. However, to facilitate properly an earlier intervention approach that is attractive to families and kinship carers and does not stigmatise, local authorities will likely need to develop or commission an alternative type of assessment which provides early parenting support and encouragement. Costing this is difficult but for modelling purposes it is assumed councils will need around £30,000 each to commission and test a new model.

- In addition, as part of wider joint work between the Scottish Government and local authorities, funding will be required to undertake population level surveys in each area to help analyse the medium term demand on social services. This work supports a wider programme to introduce strategic commissioning into each local authority and will help authorities map service provision on kinship (and other care placements) effectively over time.

149. For simplicity we have identified costs to others across the two measures in combination.

150. For the purposes of modelling the impact on Scottish Legal Aid Board (SLAB), it is assumed that only one third of those who apply for the kinship care order would find sufficient support elsewhere through their own means or through legal aid. Table 34 sets out the net impact on SLAB in terms of cases linked to these measures.

* Bracketed numbers indicate there are net avoided costs.

151. The calculation assumes that the underlying number of residence orders petitioned for each year are already supported by legal aid – approximately 200 per year. As the policy revolves around support provided by local authorities it is assumed they will support around two thirds of applicants in the first instance and SLAB will generally need to support mainly birth parents who contest such orders (assumed to be one third of all orders) and a small number of kinship carers (assumed to be 5% of those not supported by local authorities). A relatively low level of contested applications is assumed owing to the existence of intensive family therapy in this modelling which would act to reduce conflict between parties. Based on discussions between SLAB and the British Association of Adoption and Fostering it is assumed that two thirds of applicants in both groups would be eligible for legal aid. The unit cost used is £1,475 which is the median cost of legal aid for a residence order provided by SLAB.

152. We have calculated that for each kinship care order granted and each successful intensive family therapy, 1 child avoids the care system. For modelling the impact on SLAB, this means costs avoided in respect of children’s hearings and legal actions associated with permanence. Unit costs provided by SLAB have been used and volumes drawn from Children Looked After Statistics and SLAB data. The net effect is a small annual avoided cost to SLAB of around £50-60,000 a year.

Section 68 – Putting Scotland’s Adoption Register on a statutory footing

153. There will be a requirement for local authorities and registered adoption services to provide specified information to the Register so that there is a list of prospective adopters and children in respect of which no match has been made.

154. Two thirds of local authorities and 3 registered adoption services are already using the Register.

155. The Government has committed to an additional 2 years funding for 2013-15 of £90,000, to provide for the remaining local authorities to register.

156. There will be no additional costs to the Scottish Administration, as a specific budget has already been committed to.

Costs on local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.

157. The provisions allow for Scottish Ministers to charge fees for transactions that occur in relation to the Adoption Register. The intention at present is that these charges are not applied, and for that reason there will be no additional cost to local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.

OTHER PROPOSALS

Sections 69 - 70 – National Convener and Children’s Hearings

158. The Bill will require local authorities to assist the National Convener, which in practical terms will be delivered through their contributions to AST’s which will provide support to the children’s panel. It will also relieve the National Convener of the obligation to obtain the consent of each constituent authority before establishing or re-establishing area support teams to support the national children’s panel. Instead, the National Convener’s duty in this respect will be limited to a requirement to consult with each constituent local authority before requiring the merger or reconstitution of existing AST’s in 2014 or beyond.

159. The provisions in the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 are not considered sufficient to require all local authorities to deliver on assisting the National Convener, although many local authorities do provide this assistance as part of their AST agreement.
These documents relate to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 27) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013

Costs on the Scottish Administration
160. The proposed provisions puts the arrangements that are already in place on a statutory footing and introduces nothing new, so no additional costs are anticipated.

Costs on local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.
161. This provision will not result in any additional costs on other organisations.

Section 71 – Secure accommodation
162. The proposal establishes a right of appeal to the sheriff against the decision by a chief social work officer of a local authority to place a child in secure accommodation following an order under section 44 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 to detain a child in residential accommodation.

Costs on the Scottish Administration
163. The provisions will not result in any additional costs to the Scottish Administration.

Costs on local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.
164. This provision will not result in any additional costs on other organisations.

Section 72 – Amendment to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010
165. The Bill amends the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 by making minor changes to the procedure relating to call in by the Scottish Ministers of school closure proposals.

Costs on the Scottish Administration
166. The changes make a slight increase to the time available for Ministers to consider representations in relation to a closure proposal – from 6 to 8 weeks. A small extension to this period would reduce the likelihood of unnecessary call ins by allowing better consideration of representations received in the first 3 weeks of this period. These changes should have no financial impact.

Costs on local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.
167. This provision will not result in any additional costs on other organisations.

Section 73 – Defining ‘wellbeing’ around the SHANNARI structure

Costs on the Scottish Administration, local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.
168. There will be no cost in implementing this provision, as it is creating a definition in legislation.
Section 76 – Modification of Enactments – Reversing the Repeal of Section 44 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995

169. Schedule 6 of the Childrens Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 repealed section 44 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 in its entirety, and this provision reverses this unintended repeal.

Costs on the Scottish Administration, local authorities, other bodies, individuals and businesses.

170. There are no costs associated with this provision.
SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

On 17 April 2013, the Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing (Alex Neil MSP) made the following statement:

“In my view, the provisions of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.”

PRESIDING OFFICER’S STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

On 17 April 2013, the Presiding Officer (Rt Hon Tricia Marwick MSP) made the following statement:

“In my view, the provisions of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.”
INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. The contents are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Parliament. Explanatory Notes and other accompanying documents are published separately as SP Bill 27–EN.

POLICY OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL

2. It is the aspiration of the Scottish Government for Scotland to be the best place to grow up in. The objective of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is to make real this ambition by putting children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services and ensuring their rights are respected across the public sector.

3. Specifically, the Bill aims to:
   - Ensure that children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services by placing new duties on the Scottish Ministers and the public sector and by increasing the powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People;
   - Improve the way services support children and families by promoting cooperation between services, with the child at the centre;
   - Strengthen the role of early years support in children’s and families’ lives by increasing the amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare;
   - Ensure better permanence planning for looked after children by improving support for kinship carers, families and care leavers, extending corporate parenting across the public sector, and putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing; and
   - Strengthen existing legislation that affects children and young people by making procedural and technical changes in the areas of children’s hearings support arrangements, secure accommodation placements, and school closures.
BACKGROUND

4. Scotland is in a defining period, facing unique challenges and opportunities. Our children and young people face new and significant demands both individually and collectively. In the face of such challenges, it is the job of public services to: support children and parents; strengthen resilience; provide opportunities; and encourage and enable children and young people to participate fully, whatever their background and from wherever they come. We should not be content just to address problems or maintain the status quo. Improvement must be at the core of what the Scottish Government and wider public services do. This is not just an issue of prioritising resources, important as that is. It is also about shifting the culture in how children and young people are helped to achieve their potential and how public services and communities can best work to support families.

5. The Scottish Government fully recognises this responsibility, both morally and practically, for it is through the engagement and participation of its children and young people in society that Scotland will flourish and succeed. Inevitably the constraints of the constitution are limiting, preventing the use of powerful tools such as the tax and benefits system. Nevertheless, the Scottish Government must do all it can with the powers available to improve the lives of Scotland’s children and young people.

6. On 11 May 2012, the First Minister announced the Scottish Government’s intention to introduce a Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill to the Parliament in 2013. The Bill sets out fundamental reforms to children’s services in line with the report of the Christie Commission, which highlighted the importance of early years, prevention and personalised service delivery with a clear focus on the achievement of outcomes.1

7. The Scottish Government response to the Christie Commission report explains that its public service reform programme for improving service outcomes for the people of Scotland is based on four pillars:

- A decisive shift towards prevention;
- Greater integration of public services at a local level, driven by better partnership, collaboration and effective local delivery;
- A sharp focus on improving performance, through greater transparency and innovation; and
- Use of digital technology.

8. These pillars are the basis for the Scottish Government’s agenda to achieve its stated ambitions for Scotland’s children and young people. That agenda includes:

- Re-focusing the delivery and coordination of services to children and young people around their needs and wellbeing, so that care is person-centred, with the child at the centre of service design, planning and delivery;
- A stronger emphasis on supporting children and improving their wellbeing;

1 Scottish Government, Commission On The Future Delivery of Public Services (2011)
• A fundamental shift in philosophy and approach from intervening only once a crisis has happened, to prevention and early intervention where appropriate;

• Providing the right support to parents to enable them to effectively fulfil what is the most challenging role in society and involving them in decisions that affect them and their families;

• Recognising the rights of the child as being of paramount importance to achieving the vision of improving life chances for all children and young people; and

• Empowering practitioners to take decisions and act to improve outcomes.

9. Much progress has been and continues to be made through these and other activities. There is, of course, more to do. Scotland’s children and young people continue to face a myriad of challenges:

• There were 2,706 children on the Child Protection Register in Scotland as of July 2011. Scotland has a lower proportion of children on the Child Protection Register than other parts of the UK, but the share of the wider children’s population on the Register has not changed greatly over the past decade;

• In Scotland, in 2011, over 16,000 children were looked after. Although recent years have seen a sustained fall in new referrals into care and an increase in young people leaving care, Scotland has a higher proportion of looked after children than other parts of the UK – and the proportion of “formal” kinship carers continues to grow sharply;

• Children and young people who need to come into care are more likely to have poorer outcomes than their peers. Health and educational attainment outcomes for most looked after children are significantly worse than for other children and young people;

• On current estimates, between 10,000 and 20,000 children live with at least one parent who is using drugs, and between 36,000 and 51,000 children are living with parents (or guardians) whose alcohol use is potentially problematic;

• Three-quarters of families experiencing high adversity have low parenting skills; and

• While child poverty has fallen markedly over the past decade, 170,000 children and young people in Scotland still live below the poverty threshold (17% of all children and young people). Children and young people who grow up in poor households are more likely to have low self-esteem, play truant, leave home earlier, leave school earlier and with fewer qualifications, and be economically inactive as adults.\textsuperscript{9}

3 Ibid
6 Scottish Government, Final Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment for Minimum Price Per Unit Of Alcohol As Contained In Alcohol (Minimum Pricing) (Scotland) Bill (2012)

10. Of course, children’s and young people’s future lives are not just shaped by their backgrounds. Nevertheless, the potential impact that a care environment marred by neglect, substance misuse, domestic abuse and poverty can have on a child’s development is clear. The scale of these challenges, and the economic and social costs to society, are daunting. They require a focus on early intervention, on tackling these problems at the earliest opportunity, particularly in the first years of a child’s life, and where possible, preventing these problems before they arise.

ALTERNATIVE APPROACHES AND THE ROLE OF LEGISLATION

11. The Scottish Government is pursuing a range of policy initiatives and alternative approaches as part of its agenda to improve the lives of children and young people, including:

- The Early Years Collaborative, a multi-agency, local, quality improvement programme delivered at a national scale, and a Practice Development Team have been launched to take forward the vision and priorities of the Early Years Task Force;
- A decisive shift to preventative spending has been made through the creation of an Early Years Change Fund of over £270 million;
- Separate to the legislative provisions, £4.5 million has been invested for 3 years from April 2012 to provide early learning and childcare opportunities for looked after 2 year olds;
- £4.5 million has been contributed to establish the Big Lottery £6 million Communities and Families Fund, aimed at supporting community-based solutions to family support and early learning and childcare;
- A new Third Sector Early Intervention Fund from financial year 2013-14 has been established;
- £18 million is being provided to create high quality, co-ordinated and accessible family support;
- The Family Nurse Partnership, an early intervention programme for first time teenage mothers aimed at improving pregnancy outcomes, child health and development, and parents’ economic self-sufficiency, is currently being delivered in six health board areas, with a further area due to begin delivery over the course of 2013;
- The Maternity Services Framework,\textsuperscript{10} Maternal and Infant Nutrition Framework\textsuperscript{11} and Health for All Children Guidance for Scotland\textsuperscript{12} are supporting the delivery of efficient, effective and person-centred health services for pregnant women, babies, children and young people;

• A National Parenting Strategy was published in October 2012, setting out a cohesive and compelling narrative around the value and importance of parenting, and including over 80 commitments to support Scotland’s parents; 13
• As set out in the “Do the Right Thing” report, a range of measures have been taken forward to ensure that children’s rights continue to be at the forefront of policy and service delivery in Scotland; 14
• The ambitious Curriculum for Excellence programme is on track and is now a reality in Scotland’s early learning and childcare establishments, schools and colleges; 15
• The creation of the Centre for Excellence for Looked After Children in Scotland (CELCIS) has been funded, the remit of which includes the comprehensive redesign of care, focusing on shortening every child’s care journey;
• A Corporate Parenting National Training Programme has been launched to make key decision makers in local authorities and health boards more aware of their role as corporate parents;
• The Looked After Children Strategic Implementation Group (LACSIG) has been set up to identify key “sticking points” in the looked after child’s journey; and
• The first National Advice and Support Service for all kinship carers has been established.

12. While there is no one policy or initiative that can bring about the kind of change required, there is a fundamental role for legislation: to accelerate the progress that has already been made and to ensure a consistent structure within which services operate; to bring about a step-change in the way that all services support children and young people; and to inspire renewed debate and ambition for what Scotland’s children and young people can expect.

The Role of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

13. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”) will:
• Reflect in domestic law the role of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) in influencing the design and delivery of policies and services by placing duties on the Scottish Ministers and the wider public sector, and strengthening the powers of the Children’s Commissioner to enable investigations to be conducted in relation to individual children and young people;
• Improve the way services work to support children, young people and families by: ensuring there is a single planning approach for children who need additional support from services; creating a single point of contact around every child or young person; ensuring coordinated planning and delivery of services with a focus on outcomes, and providing a holistic and shared understanding of a child’s or young person’s wellbeing;

- Strengthen the role of early years support in children’s and families’ lives by increasing the amount and flexibility of free early learning and childcare from 475 hours a year to a minimum of 600 hours for 3 and 4 year olds, and 2 year olds who are, or have been at any time since turning 2, looked after or subject to a kinship care order;
- Ensure better permanence planning for looked after children by: extending corporate parenting across the public sector; extending support to young people leaving care for longer (up to and including the age of 25); supporting families and the parenting role of kinship carers through new legal entitlements; and putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing; and
- Strengthen existing legislation that affects children and young people by creating a new right to appeal a local authority decision to place a child in secure accommodation, and by making procedural and technical changes in the areas of children’s hearings support arrangements and school closures.

14. The Bill is, therefore, fully complementary to other Scottish Government policy and legislation aimed at improving the outcomes for Scotland’s population. In particular, the Bill shares with the proposed Bill on the integration of health and social care the underpinning principles of person-centred care and the coordination of services around the needs of individuals. These principles are apparent in the content of both Bills.

Benefits of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

15. The scientific evidence is clear that the foundations for a successful society can be built in early childhood.\textsuperscript{16} The brains of children develop at an astonishing rate before birth and in the first few months of life. If their experiences are supportive and consistent in response to the child’s expressed needs, the child learns that the world is a safe, nurturing place with opportunities to learn and grow. If, on the other hand, the child experiences inconsistency of response to its signals for attention, the brain develops in a different way that sacrifices growth in centres associated with learning, memory and judgement in favour of those involved in the responses to threat.

16. Children who experience poor, unstable care environments often face greater challenges in later life as a result. As the Chief Medical Officer for Scotland stated in his 2006 Annual Report:

“Insecurely attached infants are at greater risk of problems in emotional development, and children with very poor attachment experiences are at greatest risk of failure to thrive in early years and behaviour problems, lowered self-esteem and schooling difficulties in childhood and adolescence.”\textsuperscript{17}

This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 27) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013

17. Adverse events in childhood have also been associated with higher risks of alcohol and drug misuse and teenage pregnancy among children and young people in later life.\(^{18}\)

18. In the United States, one 2007 study has estimated the annual costs of child abuse and neglect – both in terms of direct costs in supporting victims and the longer term economic costs – at $103.8 billion (approximately £66.2 billion).\(^{19}\)

19. Poor parenting and other forms of adversity in early life lead to poor outcomes. There is a wealth of evidence emerging – through the Effective Provision of Pre-school Education programme, Triple P (Positive Parenting Programme), Incredible Years, and Family Nurse Partnership – that demonstrates the effectiveness of interventions supporting children in the earliest years.

20. Intervening early not only improves outcomes for individuals, their families and communities, but can save the costs of expensive interventions in health, social care, justice and welfare over several decades. The Scottish Government examined the costs of failing to make the right interventions in the early years of a child’s life in a 2010 study, “The Financial Impact of Early Years Interventions in Scotland”.\(^{20}\) The report highlighted the significant costs of failing to act to prevent problems emerging and worsening for children at developmental risk.

21. Thus, preventative action is vital to achieve improved social outcomes for children and young people, and will also result in considerable financial savings in the medium to long term. Evidence shows that early intervention and prevention can help break recurring cycles of poor social outcomes, and can prevent extensive and expensive responses from public services at a later stage.

22. The Bill is founded upon this preventative approach. By increasing the provision of high quality early learning and childcare, ensuring more effective delivery of services to support children, young people and their families, placing children’s rights at the centre of those services and their design, improving family support at an earlier stage and enhancing permanence planning for looked after children, the Bill seeks to address the damaging problems that may affect the wellbeing and outcomes of Scotland’s children and young people.

23. The potential benefits of the provisions of the Bill are further detailed in the “Policy Objectives: Specific Provisions” section of this document.

CONSULTATION

24. On 4 July 2012, the Scottish Government published a consultation document which invited views on key areas of proposed reform. A formal, 12 week public consultation was undertaken from 4 July to 25 September 2012, and 300 responses were received from a wide range of stakeholders.

range of stakeholders from public, private and third sector organisations, and individuals. Non-confidential consultation responses were published on 30 October on the Scottish Government website.\textsuperscript{21} The Scottish Government commissioned the independent consultancy organisation The Research Shop to undertake a formal analysis of consultation responses, and this was published on 4 December 2012.\textsuperscript{22}

25. In parallel with the consultation exercise, the Scottish Government also conducted a large-scale series of national engagement events to discuss the proposal for reform with a wide range of stakeholders. These events were held in Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow and Inverness over the summer of 2012, and were attended by over 800 people from the third, public and private sectors. The majority of these individuals identified as being from either a social work (23\%), voluntary (21\%) or education (16\%) background. A series of questions on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill were posed to all attendees, and their views were captured quantitatively through electronic voting and qualitatively through extensive table discussions.

26. In addition to the national engagement events, further engagement meetings were held during Bill development involving over 150 stakeholder groups/organisations from the third, public and private sectors.

27. It was essential that the views of children and young people were represented in the consultation process, and to that end, engagement activity was commissioned with children and young people from across Scotland. Several nurseries were commissioned to conduct informal engagement around the Bill to ensure that 3 and 4 year olds were able to participate in the process. For school-age children, the Children’s Parliament was commissioned to engage on the Bill through two-day workshops at six primary schools throughout Scotland, and over 100 children were involved in these activities.

28. Young Scot and the Scottish Youth Parliament were commissioned to engage with young people aged 12 to 26. These two organisations jointly undertook a mass engagement exercise over the summer of 2012, which consisted of:

- An online and offline survey seeking the young people’s quantitative opinions on proposals in the consultation document; and
- Seven dialogue groups involving young people with diverse backgrounds and experiences, facilitated to gauge views in a qualitative manner through in-depth discussion of the Bill proposals.

Over 1,400 young people responded to the survey, and over 50 young people participated in the dialogue groups.

29. Materials and engagement tools designed by the Children’s Parliament and Young Scot/Scottish Youth Parliament were made available to others wishing to carry out engagement with children and young people. Largely through the use of these materials, around 900 children and young people were involved in engagement activities facilitated by other organisations. In Total, over 2,400 children and young people from the ages of 3 to 26 and from a diverse range of backgrounds were involved in the consultation process.

30. Useful information about parents’ views on services and childcare was gleaned from the significant engagement activity undertaken with parents during the development of the Scottish Government’s National Parenting Strategy. In addition, the Scottish Government worked with ParentLine Scotland to seek parents’ views on Bill proposals specifically.

Outcome of Consultation and Engagement

31. The analysis of consultation responses indicated that stakeholders were broadly supportive of the Bill proposals:

- 70% of those who provided a view considered that the proposals would improve transparency and scrutiny of the steps being taken by the Scottish Ministers and relevant public bodies to ensure the progressive realisation of children’s rights;
- 84% of those who commented supported the proposed definition of the wellbeing of a child or young person;
- 80% of those who provided a view supported the proposal to place a duty on public bodies to work together to jointly design, plan and deliver policies and services focused on improving children’s wellbeing, and 70% agreed that reporting arrangements should be put in place which make a direct link for the public between local services and outcomes for children and young people;
- 72% of respondents who provided a view supported the Named Person role;
- 76% of those who commented agreed that a single planning approach would help improve outcomes for children;
- 76% of those who addressed the topic agreed that the Scottish Government should increase the number of hours of funded early learning and childcare, and 83% agreed that flexibility of provision should be increased; and
- 88% of those who provided a view agreed that care-leavers should be able to request assistance from their local authority up to and including the age of 25 (instead of 21 as now) and 88% agreed that it would be helpful to define corporate parenting and to clarify the public bodies to which this definition applies.

32. Feedback from all the extensive engagement undertaken alongside the consultation was similarly supportive and broadly positive about the Scottish Government’s aspirations and the intentions behind the Bills proposals. Attention was focused largely on how the proposals would work in practice rather than on matters of principle.

33. The main issues emerging from the consultation and engagement activity in this regard were:

- Concern from some stakeholders about the effectiveness of the kinship care order as originally proposed to bring benefit to kinship carers and the children in their care and thus achieve the policy intention;
A strong feeling that providing care leavers a right to request assistance from local authorities would not necessarily mean that support would actually be provided, and that a duty on local authorities to provide support may be more effective;

Concern from key stakeholders about the proposed prescriptive approach of requiring local authorities to consult on and offer the same minimum set of options to achieve consistent flexibility of early learning and childcare provision; and

Concern that the existing legal framework for information sharing with regard to the Named Person is insufficient to enable the role to function as envisaged and would not provide professionals with confidence when making decisions as to when information should be shared.

34. These concerns were addressed in the Scottish Government’s response to the findings of the consultation, which was published on 22 March 2013. This details the intention to proceed largely as originally proposed, but also sets out the way a small number of proposals have been adapted to:

- Build on existing legislation to deliver the benefits of the kinship care order more effectively;
- Introduce a duty on local authorities to assess whether a care leaver up to and including the age of 25 who has requested assistance has eligible needs, and, if they do, to provide that assistance if it cannot be met from elsewhere;
- Provide local authorities more flexibility to determine choices and options for patterns of delivery of a minimum of 600 hours early learning and childcare as part of local strategies developed in response to local consultation with parents; and
- Provide more clarity on how the role of Named Person will operate with regard to information sharing, by placing duties on the public bodies working with children and on Named Persons.

35. Further information on these alternative approaches can be found in the “Policy Objectives: Specific Provisions” section.

Consultation on Additional Provisions

36. A small number of policy issues emerged subsequent to the launch of the consultation. These require additional provisions in the Bill that were not part of the formal consultation. However, views have been sought on these additional provisions, as set out below.

Children’s hearings

37. Officials have held informal discussions with the main national volunteers’ representative groups, with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities (COSLA) and with Children’s Hearings Scotland (CHS) since mid-2012, in order to monitor the issues affecting implementation of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (“the 2011 Act”). In December 2012, the Scottish Government circulated a policy paper to key hearings system partners—children’s panel chairs, Children’s Panel Advisory Committees (CPACs), safeguarders, the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration (SCRA), CHS, COSLA and others – seeking views on proposals to make two changes to the 2011 Act through the Bill. These changes would: allow the National Convener to determine the number and location of Area Support Teams (“ASTs”) in consultation with local authorities and thereby remove the obligation to obtain consent from each authority before establishing ASTs; and place a duty on local authorities to provide such administrative assistance to ASTs as the National Convener considers appropriate. That informal consultation closed in January 2013.

38. A total of 27 responses were received, comprising five organisations, 11 groups and 11 individuals who work within the hearings system. A small majority of respondents favoured the proposals to amend the 2011 Act. The new powers were welcomed as a means of helping to ensure consistent support for panel members moving forward and a way of avoiding long, drawn-out discussions on AST structures in future. However, there was a feeling amongst some respondents that before any changes are made, ASTs must be given a chance to work following implementation of the 2011 Act in 2013. There was also a concern amongst some respondents, in particular COSLA, that the National Convener should not have the power to decide AST structures or to decide what constitutes “appropriate” local authority administrative support to ASTs. Having considered these responses, the Scottish Government has decided to bring forward provisions in sections 69 and 70 to the Bill to introduce the proposed changes.

Amendment to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995

39. The amendment to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the CPSA”) in section 71 to the Bill will provide a new right to appeal a local authority decision to place a child in secure accommodation following an order made by the sheriff to detain the child in residential accommodation. Substantial thought was given by stakeholders to the role of secure care as part of the Securing Our Future Initiative process and joint views were expressed and recommendations were agreed. The secure accommodation provisions in the 2011 Act give effect to some of those recommendations, and were the subject of debate during passage of the Bill through the Scottish Parliament. The amendment to the CPSA is simply intended to ensure that children who are placed in secure accommodation following an order being made under section 44 to that Act will have the same appeal rights as children who are placed in secure accommodation under the provisions of the 2011 Act. As only a small number of orders are actually made under section 44 of the CPSA, it is not considered that there will be significant resource implications, or that the change will be contentious among stakeholders.

Amendment to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010

40. The amendment to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”) in section 72 derives from the extensive consultation process that the Commission on the Delivery of Rural Education carried out during 2011 and 2012 as part of its remit to examine and report on all aspects of education in rural areas - including to review the application of the 2010 Act; its final report is expected shortly. The Commission was established by the Scottish Government and COSLA and includes representatives from a wide range of interests. It gathered evidence in a number of ways, including a Call for Evidence which invited written responses from organisations and individuals with an interest in rural education, and through a programme of school visits and public meetings in the 12 local authorities with the greatest number of rural schools. The amendment to the 2010 Act in section 72 of the Bill anticipates a recommendation of the Commission.

POLICY OBJECTIVES: SPECIFIC PROVISIONS

Sections 1 – 4: The Rights of Children and Young People

41. The UNCRC was adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1989. It sets out the basic human rights of children, and consists of 54 Articles which encompass civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights. These Articles form a framework against which to evaluate legislation, policy and decision-making structures.

42. The UK Government ratified the Convention on 16 December 1991, with several declarations and reservations, and made its first report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child in January 1995.

43. The Scottish Ministers have made a clear commitment to recognising, respecting and promoting children’s rights in Scotland. The UNCRC already underpins the key legislation governing children’s services, including the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). It has shaped many of the policies which affect children’s and young people’s lives, many of which are described in the Scottish Government’s progress report “Do the Right Thing”. The Scottish Government believes that legislative steps are essential in order to ensure that the Convention continues to influence legislation, policy and practice in the future.

Duties on the Scottish Ministers to further, promote and raise awareness of the UNCRC

44. The Bill explicitly recognises the Scottish Ministers’ responsibility to review their approach to implementing the UNCRC and to implement policies which they believe will support the effective realisation of children’s rights where possible. It achieves this by placing a duty on the Scottish Ministers to: keep under consideration whether there are any steps which might secure better effect of the rights set out in the UNCRC; and to take any steps they believe to be appropriate in consequence of that consideration.

45. The Scottish Ministers view the Bill as an important opportunity to make rights more “real” for children and young people in Scotland. This means empowering children themselves to exercise their rights. It also means highlighting the important role that professionals and communities must play in making this happen.

46. In order to achieve this change, there must be a greater understanding of the rights that children and young people have and how important they are for improving their lives. The Bill requires the Scottish Ministers to promote and raise awareness and understanding of the rights of children and young people. The Scottish Ministers are already subject to such a requirement implicitly by way of the UNCRC itself. However, statutory provision will make this explicit.

A reporting duty on the Scottish Ministers and the wider public sector

47. Understanding and knowing more about rights is one important step. It is just as important that the key bodies involved in protecting and promoting rights properly understand the impact that their work is having. For that reason, the Bill place duties on the Scottish Ministers and public authorities (listed in schedule 1 to the Bill) to report on the measures they have taken which further the rights set out in the UNCRC. It is the responsibility of the Scottish Ministers and those public bodies respectively to identify the measures on which they will report.

48. Reports by the Scottish Ministers and the listed public bodies will be published on a three yearly basis. This timeframe will allow time for sufficient progress to be made between reports whilst also ensuring the availability of relevant material regarding the approaches being taken across Scotland. Reports prepared by the Scottish Ministers must be laid before the Scottish Parliament and published. Where a listed public body is required to contribute to the development of a children’s services integrated plan, the Scottish Ministers would encourage them to use this process as the mechanism for satisfying their reporting duty.

New powers for Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People

49. The role of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People (“the Commissioner”) in embedding children’s rights is critical. As seen most recently in the “Big Blether”, the Commissioner has a powerful public role in eliciting and representing children’s interests, drawing attention to their rights and pointing out where bodies are failing to implement them fully. The Scottish Ministers believe that the Commissioner’s ability to deliver these aims could be strengthened further; therefore, the Bill will extend the powers of that office in order that the Commissioner may undertake investigations on behalf of individual children. This will be achieved through an amendment to the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 Act. The change will have the effect of introducing an additional mechanism to support children in seeking redress where they feel their rights, views and interests have not been properly taken into account.

50. Any investigation will focus on whether a service provider has had regard to the rights, views and interests of the child and can involve recommendations being made. Where recommendations are made, the Bill requires a service provider to respond to the Commissioner on the matters raised where such a response is requested. The Commissioner may also choose to lay before the Parliament the report of any investigation.

Benefits

51. The duty on the Scottish Ministers to keep under consideration and take appropriate steps will have the effect of recognising an existing international obligation on the part of the Scottish Ministers to implement the UNCRC. Furthermore, it will allow for increased scrutiny of how that international obligation is being satisfied. Finally, it will require that all future Scottish Governments adopt such an approach to UNCRC implementation, providing a safeguard in domestic law which ensures that the UNCRC will continue to influence decisions on public policy in the future.

52. Much like the duty to take appropriate steps, the duty on the Scottish Ministers to promote awareness and understanding will recognise an existing international obligation. It will allow for increased scrutiny of how that obligation is being taken forward and it will provide a mechanism in domestic law for ensuring that future Scottish Governments continue to take steps to promote awareness and understanding where appropriate. More generally, improved knowledge of the UNCRC is likely to result in an increase in its influence on the individual decisions being made by practitioners and decision makers working with and for children and young people.

53. The reporting duty on the Scottish Ministers and other public bodies is designed to support individual organisations in measuring the progress they are making with UNCRC implementation and to highlight potential areas where further activity might be necessary. The increased availability of public information at both local and national level will also increase transparency around UNCRC implementation, supporting the Scottish Government, the Parliament and the Commissioner to hold to account those who play a key role in making rights “real” for children in Scotland.

54. The Bill provides a new mechanism for raising and resolving concerns regarding the rights of individual children. The nature of the Commissioner’s work means it is highly likely that any investigation process will be more accessible and child friendly than a judicial process – a point raised consistently by stakeholders. The recommendations coming from investigations may also result in improved practice within organisations, ensuring that children in similar situations in future do not encounter the same issues. Finally, the findings of investigations are likely to inform the range of other research and policy activity which is taken forward by the Commissioner, strengthening its ability to effectively promote children’s rights more generally.

55. The Scottish Government believes that consistent and full implementation of the Getting it right for every child (GIRFEC) approach across Scotland will improve the wellbeing and life chances of Scotland’s children and young people. GIRFEC is the Scottish Government’s programme for changing service delivery. It is a person-centred approach that builds on the strengths of children, young people and their families to address concerns and improve wellbeing. It supports a single system of service planning and delivery across children’s services. GIRFEC is rooted in cooperation between services with the child at the centre, encourages streamlining and collaboration, and prevents services working in isolation from each other. The GIRFEC approach ensures that children, young people and their families receive the holistic services they need and provides professionals working in children’s services, and adult services where they are working with parents or carers, with the understanding and the mechanisms they need to deliver these services.

56. The Bill will ensure that:

- A holistic definition of wellbeing underpins the various duties in the Bill and, through specific amendments of other legislation, to existing duties on public bodies when considering the planning and coordination of services in respect of children and young people;
- Public bodies work together to plan and deliver their services so that they advance the wellbeing of children and young people, and that they report on what this means for children and young people in their area through a common set of high level outcomes for them;
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 27) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013

- Children and young people from birth up to 18 (or beyond if they are still at school) have a Named Person and that relevant public bodies cooperate with the Named Person by sharing relevant information with the Named Person where there is a risk of the wellbeing of a child or young person being impaired; and
- A Child’s Plan is produced for every child who needs one, set in a single planning process to help those children and young people who need additional support or where the involvement of a range of services is required.

57. As the Bill contains key provisions to implement GIRFEC consistently across Scotland, the benefits of the provisions are considered collectively.

Definition of wellbeing

58. “Wellbeing” is a term commonly used about an individual’s development. It can mean different things, ranging from mental health to a wider vision of happiness. The term is used in the UNCRC, and by UNICEF when reporting on children’s issues. It captures the idea that a child’s or young person’s condition depends on a range of different factors. Wellbeing reflects the fact that different aspects of a child’s and young person’s quality of life will affect what they can achieve as they grow and develop and how well they are able to address any difficulties they may encounter. The better a child’s wellbeing, the better their outcomes will be. Wellbeing is not just about a child’s and young person’s economic status, health or educational attainment: it is also about how they take responsibility for their actions, their inclusion in the wider community and whether their views and voices are respected and heard.

59. In Scotland, under the GIRFEC approach, wellbeing is defined through eight Wellbeing Indicators, often known by the acronym, “SHANARRI”: Safe, Healthy, Achieving, Nurtured, Active, Respected, Responsible, and Included. These capture the full range of factors that affect a child’s and young person’s life and reflect the Scottish Government’s view that it is essential for services to take a holistic approach.

60. The Bill provides for a number of duties that seek to safeguard, support and promote the wellbeing of children and young people. To ensure that these duties take a holistic view of what a child or young person needs, the Bill provides for a holistic definition of wellbeing by reference to SHANARRI (section 74).

Duties on public bodies to plan and deliver services to improve outcomes for children and young people

61. Children and young people need services that are not simply coordinated, but share this holistic approach towards wellbeing and early intervention. What they deserve are services – across all parts of Scotland – that routinely and consistently consider the spectrum of their needs. It should become the basic design principle in how the public sector supports all children and young people and their families including, where appropriate and necessary, the provision of consistent, high quality and coordinated advice and information.

62. In recent years there has been increasing integration in the way public bodies develop, plan and operate services in support of children and young people. Existing legislation already embeds the importance of joint working and cooperation across specific services. Consequently, cooperation is linked to the responsibilities of these bodies in delivering those functions rather than considering how all relevant public services can support the whole wellbeing of children and young people in an area. Lack of clarity about who may be asked to do what can compound practical difficulties in cooperation.

63. The Bill sets out duties on local authorities and health boards, with the assistance of other public bodies and relevant third sector organisations, to work together to jointly plan and deliver their services to ensure that they focus on improving children’s and young people's wellbeing in their area. This will be done through the preparation on a three yearly basis of a children’s services plan. The intended effect will be that those bodies responsible for expenditure, planning and delivery of services will work together in considering how to improve the whole wellbeing of all children and young people in their area. It will also mean that the roles of frontline staff, who work most closely with children and young people and their families, will be set in a clear context of improving wellbeing.

A duty on public bodies to report on outcomes for children and young people

64. There are currently no requirements for public bodies to report collectively on how the lives of children and young people are improving. Existing legislation only places specific duties on certain individual bodies to report on the contributions of a particular service or specific elements of a child’s or young person’s wellbeing.

65. In order to give the public, and particularly children and young people, a full picture how their wellbeing is being promoted, supported and safeguarded at a local level, the Bill places a duty on local authorities and health boards to report on a one yearly basis on the extent to which they have achieved the aims of the children’s services plan to improve the wellbeing of the children and young people in their local government area. There will be a requirement for other service providers to participate in this reporting process. This will enhance the implementation of GIRFEC and make a direct, accountable link for the public between local services and outcomes for children and young people.

The Named Person

66. Where children and young people face issues that are not easily addressed by the practitioners with whom they and their families are in regular contact, it is not always clear who they can turn to for help.

67. The GIRFEC approach aims to have in place a network of support to safeguard, promote and support wellbeing so that children and young people get the right help at the right time. This network will always include family and/or carers, and it will include a role that the Bill puts into legislation: the Named Person.

68. The Named Person will usually be a practitioner from a health board or an education authority, and someone whose job will mean they are already working with the child. They can monitor what children and young people need, within the context of their professional responsibilities, link with the relevant services that can help them, and be a single point of contact for services that children and families can use, if they wish. The Named Person is in a position to intervene early to prevent difficulties escalating. The role offers a way for children and young people to make sense of a complicated service environment as well as a way to prevent any problems or challenges they are facing in their lives remaining unaddressed due to professional service boundaries. Their job is to understand what children and young people need and quickly make the connection to those services that can help when extra help is needed.

69. Some parts of Scotland already have the Named Person role in place, but this role has not been implemented systematically across the whole country or across all universal services. This has resulted in inconsistent and patchy implementation of the GIRFEC approach, with different experiences for children and families dependant on where they live. Legislating for the role of Named Person will underpin the national approach and help ensure that children and their families can expect services to work with them in a structured and consistent way, regardless of where they live. When information is to be shared within and across boundaries, then it needs to be directed to the right person with the minimum of delay. This will lead to better coordination of existing services, as well as quicker identification of unmet needs.

70. The Bill aims to ensure that every child in Scotland has a Named Person. It will do this by placing duties on different bodies for ensuring the Named Person is in place at different stages in a child’s and young person’s life:

- From birth up to school age or when the child starts school, health boards will be responsible for ensuring all children have a Named Person and for the carrying out of the duties of the Named Person set out in the Bill; and
- From school age up until 18 or beyond if the child is still at school, local authorities or managers and proprietors of independent and grant-aided schools will be responsible for the Named Person and the accompanying duties. A young person who is in secure accommodation is also to have Named Persons provided for them by the managers of the establishment in which they are kept.

71. The Bill makes provision to ensure that certain groups of children and young people, with a less typical pattern of involvement with health or educational services, are provided with a Named Person. These include:

- Children and young persons in gypsy/traveller communities;
- Home educated children;
- Children and young persons who attend school outside Scotland;
- Children and young people with interrupted learning (i.e. those who are unable to maintain a regular pattern of school attendance, or require a period of time out with their normal learning setting, due to a range of factors including, family lifestyle, health issues or risk factors related to their behaviour); and
- Young people who leave school before the age of 18.

72. The Bill also includes provisions to ensure:

- Children, young people and families always know about the role of the Named Person and how to contact them; and
Other relevant public authorities can identify the Named Person for a particular child or young person quickly.

73. In addition to the duty on specific public authorities to put the Named Person in place, the Bill provides for a more wide-ranging duty on all relevant public authorities to cooperate with the Named Person in the conduct of their duties. This will be of particular importance in the following areas:

- Information sharing. The role of the Named Person will depend on the successful sharing of information between relevant public authorities where there are concerns about the wellbeing of individual children and young people;

- Planning. In developing a Child’s Plan or coordinating support for individual children and young people, the Named Person will require significant cooperation from a range of services; and

- The role of public authorities. Concerns about individual children and young people may often not come from children’s services, but from any of the public authorities listed in schedule 2 to the Bill. The duty to cooperate with the Named Person will extend across all services provided by the relevant public bodies, so that they understand their duty to share concerns with the Named Person, and other services as appropriate, about risks to the wellbeing of children and young people.

74. Where a relevant authority (or any person which can provide a Named Person, but is not providing a Named Person for the child or young person who the information is about) has information which it considers may be relevant to the exercise of the Named Person functions, the Bill ensures that the information will be passed to the Named Person unless doing so would prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

Alternative Approaches

75. The proposal to provide a Named Person for every child and young person was strongly supported by stakeholders, both through the public consultation and the engagement undertaken. However, concern was expressed about the existing legal framework for information sharing. This was felt to be confusing and potentially insufficient to enable the role of the Named Person to operate as well as anticipated. In particular, there were concerns regarding the sharing of information about children where consent is not given, both between others and the Named Person, and the Named Person and other professionals. It was felt that this could lead to professionals being unsure as to when information should be shared.

76. Currently, information about a child may be shared where the child is at a significant risk of harm. However, the role of the Named Person is based on the idea that information on less critical concerns about a child’s wellbeing must be shared if a full picture of their wellbeing is to be put together and if action is to be taken to prevent these concerns developing into more serious issues. Without the necessary power to share that kind of information, the Named Person will not be able to act as effectively as is intended. This was a point raised consistently by practitioners and professionals.
77. Specific provisions in the Bill, therefore, set out arrangements on information sharing, to give professionals and Named Persons the power to share information about those concerns.
Duties will be placed on public bodies working with children and adults to share a concern they have about the child’s wellbeing with the Named Person, if it is necessary to safeguard, support and promote the wellbeing of the child, and on the Named Person to share with other relevant public bodies information appropriate to addressing relevant concerns.

The Child’s Plan

78. Assessment and planning are part of the everyday processes practitioners in health, education, social work and third sector organisations employ to help children and their families.
Practitioners work with children and families to ensure they are linked to the most appropriate help to meet their needs. Other services, such as the police, will share relevant information that they have to assist others working with the child and family in understanding what is going on in a child’s life in order for appropriate help to be organised.

79. However, where children and young people are involved with different services, they will be part of different planning systems. This can be bewildering to the children, young people and their families, particularly when the planning for these services is not joined up and they are repeatedly asked for the same information by different services. There is a risk that children and young people will experience a public sector that operates in an uncoordinated way towards responding to their needs.

80. The Bill seeks to address this by ensuring these processes are coordinated. Section 31 of the Bill will ensure that a Child’s Plan is created for every child and young person who requires one. Not every child or young person needs a plan. Most will see their wellbeing needs addressed through the services provided generally to all children and young people. But where there is concern that a young person’s wellbeing will be adversely affected without a targeted intervention then a Child’s Plan will be prepared. The Child’s Plan will set out an overview of the young person’s needs, the actions which require to be provided to meet the assessed needs, who will undertake those actions, and the desired outcomes. Whilst there will be a requirement for the Child’s Plan to be kept under review, it is expected that review and monitoring of the Plan will be largely driven by the child’s needs. In other words, the timing will be dependent on the nature and intensity of needs and risks: the more severe, the more frequent the monitoring and review.

81. These responsibilities are aligned with those for ensuring that the child or young person has a Named Person. Health boards and local authorities have responsibility for producing a Child’s Plan within their own agency when necessary, or to transfer responsibility should the plan need to be coordinated by another agency because the child’s predominant needs no longer lie within their service. Other public bodies will have a duty to cooperate as required in the production of a Child’s Plan and its maintenance.

82. In introducing a statutory requirement for a Child’s Plan, the intention is not to alter the specific statutory duties placed on agencies for particular purposes such as preparing a Coordinated Support Plan or a plan for a child who is looked after. These other plans should be considered as contributing to a broader framework of support for the wellbeing of the individual child or young person.
Benefits

83. By setting out a holistic definition of wellbeing, the Bill will create a common understanding of the needs of children or young people between services and professionals, and consequently foster a collective responsibility to ensure these needs are being met. This will further underline the fact that a child’s or young person’s wellbeing needs are better met by services working together rather than individual services working in isolation.

84. When practitioners working with children, young people and their families come across something that lies outside their responsibility and ability, it is not always simple for them to identify who they should speak to, and how the issue should be addressed. Every inquiry into a child’s death in the UK over the last 20 years, including the 2002 “Report of the Child Protection Audit and Review”,\(^{25}\) across Scotland has demonstrated clearly that effective sharing of information within and between agencies is fundamental to improving the protection of children and young people. All have shown that some services had elements of information but none had the full picture. In all cases, early indications of a threat to wellbeing were missed, or not responded to at the earliest opportunity.

85. If a practitioner as Named Person understands their own role and responsibilities and the roles and responsibilities of other practitioners and services, as well as the language of wellbeing, they will be confident in acting early on concerns about a child and responding quickly when a child needs help. Understanding the role and responsibilities of the Named Person will lend confidence to practitioners from other services to share information with the Named Person, when a child needs help to promote their wellbeing and they are unable to provide that help themselves. Practitioners from all services should feel confident that sharing information to secure services in support of improved wellbeing is a positive choice for most families.

86. The role of the Named Person was a key element in the success of the Highland Pathfinder Project, which involved Highland Council and partners across the Highland area supporting the development of the GIRFEC approach.

87. The single planning approach was also introduced in the Highland Pathfinder, with a Child’s Plan that brought together the key information about a child’s or young person’s development, the activities to support that development, and the individuals responsible for delivering those activities. There is strong evidence from an independent evaluation that this approach produces better outcomes, reduces bureaucracy, releases resources to concentrate on the most vulnerable children and increases trust within and across agencies and with children and their families.\(^{26}\) There is also evidence that through the reduction in, amongst other things, duplication, it releases resources that can be diverted to focus on early intervention and prevention. Most importantly, the child and family have a better understanding of what is to be done by whom, when and for what purpose; what the responsibilities are of each of the partners to the plan (including their own); and what the desired outcome is for the child.

Based on the independent evaluation of the GIRFEC approach, a number of performance improvements were identified:

- The changes implemented in Highland meant that concerns about children were dealt with differently; for example, greater use of enhanced support through universal services or immediate involvement by social work if their needs were complex. As a result, the numbers of referrals of non-offence concerns about children made by the police to the Children’s Reporter fell by 70%. This trend has been reported in other areas such as Fife and Forth Valley where the GIRFEC approach has also been introduced;
- Highland Council and its partners reported an initial 50% reduction in the number of children and young people placed on the Child Protection Register. This is subject to ongoing review;
- The approach led to a reduction in time needed for meetings, a reduction in social work caseload and a decrease in total administrative activity;
- Social workers, with reduced caseloads were able to work with the most vulnerable children with the most complex needs and were able to spend more face to face time with children and their families;
- There was an improvement in the quality of information that was shared within and across agencies, and the speed with which it was shared meant that children’s needs were identified at an earlier stage and fewer subsequent requests for information;
- Of the 100 children sampled in the evaluation, two thirds showed improved outcomes, even where complex need was evident; and
- There was evidence that families liked the process as they understood better what was happening and the role of everyone involved, including their own.

By creating a single system of service planning and delivery across children’s services, setting out a clear and holistic definition of wellbeing by which a child’s needs should be assessed, and requiring specified public authorities to collectively report on their progress in improving outcomes, the potential benefits of the GIRFEC approach will be available across Scotland.

Sections 42 – 49: Early Learning and Childcare

The Scottish Government is committed to improving and increasing high quality, flexible and integrated early learning and childcare which is accessible and affordable for all, matching the best in Europe. The term “early learning and childcare” emphasises the holistic and seamless provision of nurture, care and development of social, emotional, physical and cognitive skills, abilities and wellbeing. The learning journey begins from birth and is influenced before that. It is essential that the promotion of experiences and interactions, important for the learning and development of wellbeing in young children, is delivered consistently through formal early learning and childcare wherever and however this is delivered; and that patterns of delivery support parents and families with work and economic security.

Currently, parents are juggling a range of childcare arrangements around a default pattern of 2.5 hours pre-school per day for 3 and 4 year olds, embedded within the school education system of school days and term times; and, childcare is often seen as something less valuable than pre-school experiences. Parents have identified the need for free pre-school education hours to be more flexible and potentially extended for those who need it; and that they require help with costs, longer nursery hours and nursery placements that are more flexible and suit working hours.

92. The Scottish Government wants to increase the universal provision of early learning and childcare to improve outcomes for children, in particular those from disadvantaged backgrounds; to support parents to work, provide economic security for their families and routes out of unemployment and poverty; and to support parents with the costs of early learning and childcare.

Increasing the amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare to meet local need

93. Through the Bill, the Scottish Government seeks to improve and increase early learning and childcare for all, with an initial focus on the most vulnerable, by:

- Increasing the amount of funded early learning and childcare from 475 hours to a minimum of 600 hours for 3 and 4 year olds;
- Guaranteeing a minimum provision for any 2 year old who is, or has been at any time since turning 2, looked after or subject to a kinship care order;
- Improving the flexibility of provision in response to identified local need and the development of local strategies to reconfigure provision to increase options and choices for parents; and
- Setting the stage for more fundamental consideration of how to provide high quality early learning and childcare that meets the needs of all children, families, parents and employers in the future.

94. Specifically, the Bill places duties on local authorities to:

- Secure a minimum provision of 600 hours per annum early learning and childcare for 3 and 4 year olds and 2 year olds who are, or have been at any time since turning 2, looked after or subject to a kinship care order;
- Provide alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care for a 2 year old who is looked after where this better safeguards or promotes the child’s wellbeing; record the outcome of their assessment and identification of alternative arrangements in the Child’s Plan (Part 5 of the Bill); and continue to provide alternative arrangements for a 2 year old who ceases to become looked after, with agreement of a parent;
- Consult with locally representative populations of parents of children under school age every 2 years to identify what patterns of hours best suit parental early learning and childcare needs; and to respond to the views expressed through published local plans to re-configure services over time to meet those needs; and

- Deliver those hours within broad parameters of no less than 2.5 hours a day; no more than 8 hours a day; and over no less than 38 weeks a year which are not confined to term time; and have regard to the desirability of ensuring that the method of delivery is flexible enough to allow parents an appropriate degree of choice when deciding to access the service.

95. Local authorities will, therefore, be obliged to provide flexible patterns of early learning and childcare within a minimum framework which will meet local need as identified by consultation and published plans or local strategies.

Benefits

96. There is a wide range of evidence indicating the potential benefits of this increase in the amount and quality of funded early learning and childcare:

- While all social groups benefit from high quality pre-school provision, children from the poorest families gain most from universal provision;\(^{29}\)
- The benefits of high quality early learning provision persist at age 14, with particular benefit for children whose families had a poor early years home learning environment;\(^{30}\)
- 15 year olds who attended pre-school education perform better than those who do not, even after accounting for their socio-economic backgrounds;\(^{31}\)
- Among 5 year olds, non-parental childcare in the early years is generally beneficial to cognitive development and a child’s vocabulary;\(^{32}\)
- Long-lasting effects from pre-school education lead to better cognitive scores at age 7 and 16;\(^{33}\)
- The more mental stimulation a child gets around the age of 4, the more developed the parts of their brains dedicated to language and cognition will be in the decades ahead.\(^{34}\)

97. There is also a strong evidence base to link the availability of affordable and accessible childcare to the employment opportunities parents can access.\(^{35}\) Research indicates that of those mothers who chose to stay at home after the birth of their baby, 59% (equating to 1.2 million women across the UK) did so because of the high cost of childcare.\(^{36}\) There are also potential benefits for parents seeking to balance work and childcare; and for those parents who are most economically vulnerable.

98. Investment in early learning and childcare also has key economic benefits:

- Provision of subsidised early learning and childcare increases female labour force participation and along with supply-side investment in the sector, promotes jobs growth, which in turn supplements income tax receipts for governments and alleviates pensions shortfalls for women. Several studies have estimated a positive net benefit in this regard;\(^\text{37}\)

- Where subsidised childcare removes barriers to employment, it can help lift families out of poverty and help parents gain further skills, enhancing their employability and future earnings, as well as economy-wide productivity;

- Such policies that promote motherhood and work, such as subsidised childcare, have positive and lasting impacts on country fertility rates, which in turn assure the availability of a future workforce and the financing of future services;\(^\text{38}\) and

- By serving a redistributive function, universal early learning and childcare mitigates the impacts of early economic and social disadvantage and promotes longer term economic benefits which are shared by all of society. The returns to such investments among vulnerable groups are well documented and stem from children’s improved cognitive and non-cognitive skills, which in turn feed through to improved educational, social and employment outcomes, reduced dependence on the state and reduced criminal behaviour.\(^\text{39}\)

99. By increasing the provision of early learning and childcare and developing provision better suited to families’ needs, the Bill aims to make a significant impact on these critical years of a child’s development; to remove barriers to work; and to improve economic outcomes for families and wider economic growth.

Alternative Approaches

100. The current system is embedded within the school education system, with less recognition of the wider needs of working parents, and of young children who receive other formal early learning and childcare. The consultation included a proposal to achieve more flexibility of provision in response to parent need by requiring local authorities to consult on and offer the same set of minimum options or patterns of provision. It was felt that this would guarantee consistency across different local authority areas.

101. While there was wide support for increased hours and flexibility, the consultation process identified concerns around how this flexibility would be achieved and delivered. The main arguments made against the proposal were that an overarching plan would: prevent flexibility in response to the local needs of parents; fail to take into account the local circumstances of each local authority (including issues around rurality); and stifle local creativity. One recurring suggestion from respondents both in favour of and against the proposal for a common set of options was that local authorities should work within a minimum framework, but thereafter have scope to tailor provision to meet local needs.

102. Taking these views into account, the original proposal has been amended to allow for local approaches to consulting, planning and managing local delivery of flexible options and choices for parents over time. This will ensure that provision is better suited to families’ needs while providing flexibility in response to local variation.

103. Scotland’s care system provides different options for children and young people in difficult family circumstances, but the options, and the system as a whole, needs to change if it is to do justice to a child’s and young person’s overall wellbeing. The Scottish Government believes Scotland needs a care system that provides effective, rapid support for children and young people, centred on their long-term as well as their short-term needs and focused on securing healthy, caring permanence. The Bill, therefore, provides for the following reforms:

• Creating a statutory regime of corporate parenting;
• Extending the age to which care leavers can receive support from their local authority from 21 up to and including 25;
• Supporting the parenting role of kinship carers through new legal entitlements and ensuring families in the early stages of distress can receive appropriate counselling; and
• Placing Scotland’s Adoption Register on a statutory footing and making its use by adoption agencies compulsory.

Defining corporate parenting and the public bodies to which this applies

104. “Corporate parenting” means the formal and local partnerships needed between all local authority departments and services, and associated agencies, which are responsible for working together to meet the needs of looked after children and young people and care-leavers. Guidance on corporate parenting is set out in “These Are Our Bairns: A Guide for Community Planning Partnerships on Being a Good Corporate Parent”.

105. Despite efforts to increase awareness of the concept among care sector leaders and practitioners, corporate parenting is implemented inconsistently across Scotland. There is a lack of shared understanding about the definition of corporate parenting, a lack of clarity about how the concept translates to professionals working within, for example health, housing and education, and a lack of clarity around powers to ensure partners are working together.

106. Section 52 of the Bill sets out a definition of corporate parenting responsibilities (and accompanying duties to plan and report in relation to those responsibilities) that captures a move away from “corporate” thinking to acting more like a “parent” would. Schedule 3 lists the Scottish Ministers, local authorities and a range of other public bodies as being “corporate parents”. The Bill places a duty on corporate parents to collaborate with each other when exercising their corporate parenting responsibilities in relation to looked after children and young people and care leavers. The policy objective is to ensure that all looked after children and young people receive high quality corporate parenting and access to the same level of services and opportunities as a child would have if they were not looked after.

Benefits

107. There is a perception that local authorities and bodies responsible for the provision of services to looked after children and young people and care leavers view their responsibilities more as “corporate” responsibilities rather than as “parenting”. This was highlighted through the experiences of looked after children and young people described in “These Are Our Bairns”. As already noted, children and young people who need to come into care are more likely to have poorer outcomes than their peers. By setting out the definition of corporate parenting and to which bodies it applies, the Bill will ensure that these children and young people experience services that consistently are positive, outcomes-focused and aspirational.

Extending the age to which care leavers can receive support from their local authority

108. Local authorities currently have a statutory duty to prepare young people for when they will stop being looked after (known as “throughcare”) and to provide advice, guidance and assistance for young people who have ceased to be looked after (or “aftercare”) over school age up to 18, and a power to do so up to 21.

109. The current cut-off age of 21 for leaving care support is out of step with ordinary families, who provide support to their children throughout their early adult lives. It is clear that in typical families, support is provided beyond the age of 21: data from the Labour Force Survey for the UK, for example, suggests that at age 22 half of young men (53%) and 43% of young women live with their parents and by age 25 just over a third of young men (36%) and nearly a fifth of young women (18%) still live with their parents. The transition to independence is one where young care leavers are particularly vulnerable and councils, as their corporate parents, need to ensure that the right supports are in place.

110. Section 60 of the Bill amends the 1995 Act to provide young care leavers with the opportunity to continue to receive local authority support up to and including the age of 25. Care leavers will have a right to request advice, guidance and assistance from a local authority, and the local authority will then be under a duty to conduct an assessment of the needs of that care leaver. If the care leaver is found to have “eligible needs”, then the local authority must provide support to meet those needs. “Eligible needs” will be specified in an order to be made by Scottish Ministers, however, it is anticipated that those needs will be those essential to daily living. This change will not affect a young person’s right to opt out of receiving support if they do not want it.

Benefits

111. Young people who have been looked after may face particular challenges compared with other young people in terms of employment, education, training and housing. In 2010/11, on leaving school, 64% of looked after children were in a positive destination (education, employment or training) compared to 89% of all school leavers. After six months, for looked after children the figure had fallen by 9 points to 55%, compared to just a 2 point drop for all care leavers to 87%.\footnote{Scottish Government, \textit{Educational Outcomes for Scotland’s Looked After Children 2010/11} (2012)} Looking at all looked after children eligible for aftercare services in 2011 (aged 15-21) just over a third of those whose economic activity status was known were in education, employment or training.\footnote{Scottish Government \textit{Children’s Social Work Statistics Scotland, No 1: 2012 Edition} (2012)} In addition, care leavers are disproportionately represented in statistics on socially excluded youth, even though they account for less than 1% of the population.\footnote{The Institute for Research and Innovation in Social Services, \textit{Redesigning Support for Care Leavers} (2012)}

112. This is also borne out in qualitative evidence from care leavers themselves about the challenges they face, including more emotional challenges, greater financial worries, a lack of family and friendship networks, greater challenges around employment and further education and the challenges arising from a very wide range of, often unstable, accommodation types where young people might live when they leave care.\footnote{For example, The Debate Project, \textit{“Life after Care” Conference 2009: Young People’s Views on Leaving Care} (2009)} The transition to independence is one where young people are particularly vulnerable and councils, as their corporate parents, need to ensure that the right supports are in place. Through the provision of support to an age that is reflective of ordinary families, care leavers will be assisted in making a successful transition to independent living when they are ready to do so.

Alternative Approaches

113. The consultation paper proposed an amendment of the 1995 Act to extend the right of young people leaving care to request help from a local authority, and the opportunity to provide financial assistance to young people leaving care, up to the age of 25. There was strong support for this proposal. However, a number of stakeholders noted that a right to request support would not oblige the local authority to actually provide it, and, therefore, may not be very beneficial to the young person.

114. Thirty-four respondents from eight different sectors (including 23 third sector respondents) stated that although young people had a right to request assistance, unless local authorities had a “duty” and not merely a “power” to provide assistance this may not come to fruition.

115. In direct response to the views put forward by stakeholders, the original proposal has been amended in the Bill from a right of care leavers to request support to a duty on local authority to assess the needs of a young person who requests support and, should their needs be eligible, to provide it.
Supporting kinship carers and families in the early stages of distress

116. As of 31 July 2011 there were 3,917 children living in formal kinship care - a rise of 87% since 2007. A widespread criticism by kinship carers of existing residence and parental responsibilities and right orders has been that they offer no certainty of support. This can act as a disincentive to families from moving proactively to prevent a child from becoming looked after, or from cooperating fully in enabling the removal of such status.

117. Through the kinship care order, the Bill makes provision for additional support to be provided to kinship carers, in recognition of their parenting role, the bond between the child and carer and the different expectations in relation to, and circumstances experienced by, kinship carers, as opposed to other types of carers. The rationale for legislative change is to encourage more individuals to become kinship carers for those children who do not require regular supervision or corporate parenting and whose long term wellbeing is best served by being cared for in such a way.

118. Under the Bill, a kinship care order is any order made under section 11(1) of the 1995 Act that grants parental rights and responsibilities to a qualifying person or a residence order which has the effect that the child lives with (or is to live with) a qualifying person. By placing a duty on local authorities, the Bill ensures that those who apply for, consider applying for, have obtained, or are subject to a kinship care order will be entitled to assistance if the relevant eligibility test is met. This will also apply to eligible children who have reached the age of 16, but who were subject to a kinship care order immediately prior to turning this age. The type of assistance will be prescribed by the Scottish Ministers in secondary legislation.

119. Through the Bill, all 2 year olds who are or have been subject to a kinship care order at any time since turning 2 will be eligible for early learning and childcare as set out in Part 6. In addition, secondary legislation will make provision for supporting those kinship carers who wish to apply for a kinship care order and those who require advice or assistance from their local authority in relation to that application.

120. The Scottish Ministers intend to provide for specific support through secondary legislation in the form of a package of entitlements. In most cases, determining the risk to a child of becoming looked after will happen through a form of parenting capacity assessment by the local authority. The package of entitlements is focused on overcoming key issues that left unresolved can disrupt care placements and increase such a risk. To achieve this policy aim the final package of entitlements might need to be adjusted following further discussion with local authorities and kinship carers.

121. For certain types of support (e.g. financial support) local authorities may be able to take account of the means of the carer in determining what support is needed. This will be important in cases where it is agreed that a carer should continue to receive allowances when a child in their care ceases to be looked after. For example, a carer would seek financial support from the UK Benefits system in the normal way before any agreed top-up allowance by the local authority. (The Bill does not alter carers’ existing entitlements to allowances – these are the subject of a separate review by the Scottish Government.)

122. The right to transitional support attempts to address a potential concern among those kinship carers who can provide long term care for a child currently looked after, that they will still be able to access support currently provided by the authority if a child leaves care onto a kinship care order. Secondary legislation may specify that an authority must explain to a carer what support will be provided before they commit to an order, and for how long. As the intention of the kinship care order is to promote strong families, the assumption would be that support would last no longer than three years in most circumstances.

123. The Bill also introduces a duty on local authorities to ensure that families in the early stages of distress who seek help are provided with appropriate forms of counselling (for example, family group conferencing or support with substance misuse). This will be available where a child’s wellbeing would be at risk of being impaired - in particular where the child is at risk of becoming looked after - and is intended to act as an early and effective support mechanism; and, where appropriate, it can be used to promote the role of a kinship carer. An important feature of this entitlement to counselling is that families must be willing to engage with their issues and motivated to take control over the challenges they face.

124. Discretion will be afforded through secondary legislation to local authorities to determine the best form of therapeutic intervention for the circumstances of the family. Local authorities’ duties in this regard could be met through “passporting” to a pre-existing service (including those funded by other bodies).

125. By offering clearer support to eligible kinship carers, the Bill will encourage kinship carers to apply for parental responsibilities and rights where the child would otherwise be at risk of becoming unnecessarily looked after or remaining in care. It will, therefore, help to slow the rapid growth in children becoming formally looked after children, and contribute meaningfully to a more focused, therapeutic and cost effective care system.

Benefits

126. Kinship carers are fulfilling the role of a parent; providing children with warm and loving relationships and enabling them to remain part of a family unit. Kinship care, therefore, provides continuity for children not only in their family unit but also in their communities, allows for the preservation of links to their parents and minimises disruption in their lives and reinforces children’s sense of identity and self-esteem.

127. Emerging evidence also indicates that in many cases children and young people who have been looked after in a kinship care arrangement do better at school and have better life outcomes than their peers in more formal care arrangements. By supporting kinship carers and ensuring alternatives to formal care, children and young people will be more likely to avoid the loss of continuity and associated poorer outcomes that come with the impermanent early care that can occur by being formally looked after.

Alternative Approaches.

128. To achieve the aims of the Bill in relation to kinship care, the consultation paper originally proposed creating a new court order aimed at kinship carers which, if granted, would have transferred parental responsibilities and rights to them. It would also have acted as a vehicle to provide additional support to kinship carers in order to build the family's capacity to resolve the issues that could lead to a child coming into formal care. It would have offered a right to assessment of need of the child and a duty on the local authority to provide for that need.

129. While generally agreeing with the aims of the policy intention, many stakeholders questioned the specific means of delivering it. In particular, local authorities and some kinship carers suggested that: 1) in order to deliver this policy intention, existing legislation should be built upon to minimise any complexity or potential duplication; and 2) much more specificity was required about any additional support kinship carers would receive, in order to make the provisions genuinely effective.

130. The original proposal has, therefore, been altered in the Bill so that the kinship care order will build on existing legislation and provide specific new legal entitlements to additional support that should help wider families tackle issues that, if left unchecked, could lead to a child becoming looked after.

Putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing

131. The care system should meet the needs of all children who require it, and the earlier a stable placement is found for a looked after child, the better their life chances. Increasing the proportion of children leaving care to stable and secure placements will lead to a decrease in the number of children entering care each year.

132. There is clear evidence that timescales for making decisions about a looked after child’s permanent future home can take too long. A report by the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration showed that it takes on average over two years to secure an adoption from first involvement with state services, and in extreme cases, has taken up to 10 years. The report, demonstrated that some of the processes and decisions requiring to be made could be completed more efficiently if clearer support and guidance was provided, and the systems in place focused on the needs of the child and not the needs of the system. It also found that children in care were experiencing more placements as a result of poor care planning.

133. Scotland's National Adoption Register (the Register) is a non-statutory service which was set up in 2011 and is designed to increase the numbers of adoptions and to speed up the adoption process for children, once adoption is identified as the best way to secure a permanent home. The British Association of Adoption and Fostering in Scotland runs and maintains the service. The Register is already used by a number of adoption agencies and is used to match children with families on a national basis (rather than the current, more localised arrangements) and its aim is to increase, diversify and speed up adoptions for children for whom adoption is the best option for a permanent home.

134. The Scottish Government is committed to increasing the number of adoptions from care and keeping placements to a minimum. The Bill will put the Register on a statutory footing and will require all adoption agencies to provide the Scottish Ministers (who will have legal responsibility for establishing and maintaining the register) with information in relation to children who ought to be placed for adoption and prospective approved adoptive parents, as prescribed by the Scottish Ministers in regulations. It also establishes an offence of disclosing any information derived from the register otherwise than in accordance with regulations.

Benefits

135. As well as increasing the number of adoptions, the change will lift expectations in the looked after children sector for children who could be adopted but traditionally are viewed as “hard to place”; in particular black and ethnic minority children, children with disabilities, older children and sibling groups. It will also: significantly improve the evidence base for policy making; enable the sector to target prospective adopters effectively; and ensure that all adoption agencies are required to provide information to the Scottish Ministers for the register on an ongoing basis.

136. Early evidence from the Register indicates that some families who have been involved in one of the Register’s services, Adoption Exchange Days, have been willing to “stretch” their capacity approval after being exposed to children available for adoption. Many adopters reported that they would have found it beneficial to attend an event prior to approval as they would have been more realistic regarding the age range and level of need of the children they could consider. This is a key part of the behavioural change sought by adopters given the current mismatch between approved adopters and available children. In 2010/11, 294 children were adopted from care in Scotland compared with 199 the year before. The total number of matches achieved as a result of work by the Register to date is 31, a third of which happened after the recent Adoption Exchange Days in September 2012. It is envisaged that having the Adoption Register in statute will result in more children and prospective adoptive parents being referred to the Register (as all adoption agencies will be required to provide the relevant information to the Register) and subsequently more prospective adoptive parents and adoptive children attending such days.

Section 69 – 70: Children’s Hearings

137. The Children’s Hearings System is Scotland’s unique, integrated approach to child care and justice that has operated successfully since 1971. The 2011 Act and wider reforms are an improvement programme built on the current system’s strengths. Further improvements to the system will be achieved through the Bill by amendments to paragraphs 12, 13 and 14 of schedule 1 to the 2011 Act.

Relieving the National Convener of the obligation to obtain consent from each authority before establishing ASTs

138. By amending the 2011 Act, the Bill will relieve the National Convener of Children’s Hearings Scotland of the obligation to obtain the consent of each constituent authority before establishing or making changes to the future configuration of ASTs. The current obligation will be replaced by a requirement to consult with each constituent local authority. The initial process of the establishment of ASTs in support of the timely implementation of the 2011 Act has proven inconsistent across the country and delayed in certain areas, mainly as a consequence of the varied ways in which local authorities have interacted with the process. This has proved problematic for the National Convener/CHS with the result being uncertainty and hiatus for children’s panel and CPAC volunteers and designated AST members throughout the initial establishment phase. Therefore, replacing the requirement for consent with a requirement to consult should result in a simpler, more streamlined process which is quicker, more efficient and nationally consistent.

139. The process change will have no bearing on the initial AST establishment activity, but will bring certainty to the review of ASTs and partnership agreements. The first fundamental review will likely take place after the first phase of operation of these non-statutory agreements (4 years from implementation in June 2013). The provisions enable the National Convener to set in hand a sensible planned review process at that point, and also to adapt quickly to any emerging resource or relationship issues between multi-authority ASTs or within single-authority ASTs in the intervening period. The National Convener can then bring forward proposals to secure the necessary support for AST volunteers in a transparent and public manner. The stability of support arrangements is central to the National Convener delivering their mission of consistent excellence in administrative support and, through that, in children’s panel practice. The National Convener’s principal focus is on the needs of Children’s Panel and AST volunteers. The Bill seeks to ensure consistent and stable oversight and supervision of children’s panel volunteers, thereby contributing to a more independent Tribunal, with consistent support nationally designed but locally delivered.

Requiring local authorities to provide ASTs with administrative support

140. A further amendment to schedule 1 to the 2011 Act will require local authorities to provide ASTs (whose function is to select members of the children’s hearings) with such administrative support as the National Convener considers appropriate. Administrative support will include staff, property or other services which the National Convener considers are required to facilitate the carrying out by an AST of its functions. At present authorities may choose how much or how little support to provide to ASTs (if any) via non-statutory partnership agreements, as they are under no statutory duty to provide it. The amendment will, therefore, impose such a duty on local authorities and will ensure that the provision of support will be more standardised across the country.

141. The Bill also corrects an unintended repeal of section 44 of the 1995 Act. Schedule 6 to the 2011 Act repeals section 44 of the 1995 Act in its entirety. Section 44 is the provision which sets out the prohibition of publication of proceedings at children’s hearings. Whilst there is a broadly equivalent replacement provision made in section 182 (publishing restrictions) of the 2011 Act, it does not cover exclusion order hearings which continue under section 76 of the 1995 Act. Under schedule 4 to the Bill, the repeal of section 44 is reversed and the section is then amended so that going forward it will apply only to exclusion order proceedings which continue under section 76 of the 1995 Act.

Benefits

142. Bringing greater stability and certainty in relation to the establishment of ASTs and requiring local authorities to provide them with administrative support will improve their ability to carry out their functions of selecting children’s hearing members equipped to make effective, evidence based decisions for children and young people. This should result in a more nationally consistent process which will as stated above, assist the efficiency and operation of the children’s hearing system overall.

Section 71: Amendments to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995

A right to appeal a local authority decision to place a child in secure accommodation

143. In terms of the 2011 Act, a secure accommodation authorisation (SAA) enables a child to be placed and kept in secure accommodation within a specified residential establishment. An SAA is made by a children’s hearing and may only be made in conjunction with a relevant order, such as a compulsory supervision order. Section 162 of the 2011 Act provides a right of appeal to the sheriff against a decision made by the chief social work officer of a local authority to either implement the SAA, not to implement the SAA, or to remove the child from secure accommodation.

144. Section 44 of the CPSA provides that a sheriff may grant an order detaining a child in residential accommodation by the appropriate local authority in such place as the local authority may, from time to time consider appropriate, if a child appears before the sheriff in summary proceedings and pleads guilty to, or is found guilty of an offence to which the section applies. Section 44(5) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by regulation make such provision as they consider necessary as regards the detention of such a child in secure accommodation. Therefore, section 44(5) envisages that a local authority may decide that the child should be placed in secure accommodation. In terms of the Secure Accommodation (Scotland) Regulations 1996, a local authority may place the child in secure only if specific criteria are met. Although there is a review process provided for in these regulations in relation to this decision, there is no appeal route back to the sheriff. The amendment to the CPSA in the Bill will provide such an appeal route.

Benefits

145. The provision in the Bill will have a positive impact in that it will ensure that children who are placed in secure accommodation under section 44 of the CPSA will be subject to the same protections as children who are placed in secure accommodation under the provisions of the 2011 Act when it comes into operation in June 2013.

Increasing the time available for the Scottish Ministers to issue a call-in notice

146. The amendment to the 2010 Act set out in section 72 makes a minor change to the administrative process provided for by that Act when a school closure proposal is made. The amendment will increase the time available for the Scottish Ministers to issue a call-in notice from six to eight weeks. Because Scottish Ministers are under a duty to take account of any relevant representations made to them within the first three weeks of this period, the effect is to increase the time available to the Scottish Ministers to consider these representations from three to five weeks.
Benefits

147. The small extension to the period for the Scottish Ministers to consider whether or not to call-in a closure proposal will be of benefit to communities and education authorities by allowing more thorough consideration of representations thus reducing the likelihood of decisions being called-in unnecessarily. This change is not expected to have any financial impact.

EFFECTS ON EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES, HUMAN RIGHTS, ISLAND COMMUNITIES, LOCAL GOVERNMENT, SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT ETC.

Equal Opportunities

148. An Equality Impact Assessment (EQIA) has been carried out and will be published on the Scottish Government website. The Scottish Government considered the potential impacts, both positive and negative, across the protected characteristics required for EQIAs.

149. To develop and inform the EQIA, on 3 September 2012 the Scottish Government held a workshop to discuss the impact of the Bill on equalities issues. Stakeholders from organisations including Stonewall Scotland, Scottish Refugee Council, CEMVO Scotland, Roshni and Inclusion Scotland were in attendance. Separate meetings were held with two faith groups (CARE for Scotland and the Humanist Society Scotland) and with LGBT Youth Scotland. Views were also obtained from the Director of the Scottish Travellers Education Programme.

150. The EQIA concluded that the Bill's provisions are neither directly or indirectly discriminatory on the basis of age, disability, race, religion or belief, sex, sexual orientation or gender reassignment. It also found that there are a number of potential benefits to the proposals and positive impacts on individual groups that share a protected characteristic, and these include:

- The promotion of children’s wellbeing, and how actions and activities may improve their wellbeing should better engage all parents;
- Young children, including 2 year olds who are looked after or subject to a kinship care order, or have been at any time since turning 2, will benefit from additional hours of early learning and childcare;
- The increased flexibility of how early learning and childcare is provided will bring particular benefits for women as the primary carers, specifically in terms of cost and accessibility of childcare which can often act as a barrier to return to work;
- The proposals will be the key to furthering and promoting knowledge of rights for children and young people under the age of 18;
- The proposals will help diversify the age of children being adopted through putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing;
- There will be promotion of equality for young people leaving care by extending the age of support from 21 to 25 years of age; and
- The GIRFEC approach should be a positive tool in achieving equality of treatment, opportunity and, crucially, of outcomes.
151. The Scottish Government does not propose making significant changes to the policy as a result of the assessment, because the evidence and data gathered indicate that the Bill will have an overall positive impact on all children and young people and on equality issues.

152. Gaps were identified in the current evidence base around the effects of the Bill on groups that share certain characteristics. In particular, our research and consultation identified gaps in our knowledge around gender reassignment and the experiences of transgender children and parents. The consultation process reinforced the need to make appropriate arrangements for the Named Person for gypsy/traveller children. Work with equality organisations also highlighted a perceived lack of a “rights” culture in specific minority ethnic communities. These issues will be taken into account as we continue to create diverse ways of raising awareness of children’s rights among different communities.

Human Rights

153. The amendments in the Bill to the 2011 Act and to the CPSA potentially raise issues with regard to Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. However, it is considered that in the former case, the amendments have no impact on the children’s hearings themselves and in the latter, the amendment makes secure accommodation authorisations more Article 6 compliant. Therefore, neither breach Article 6.

154. The information sharing provisions in relation to the Named Person and Scotland’s Adoption Register potentially engage Article 8, but it is considered that they are compliant as they have a legitimate aim, they are proportionate and have appropriate safeguards in place. The widening of access to early learning and childcare for certain 2 year olds potentially engages Article 8, Article 2 of the First Protocol and Article 14, but again the measures in the Bill are a proportionate means of achieving the legitimate aim of improving outcomes for the most vulnerable or disadvantaged children and ensuring those children are properly looked after. Therefore, the Scottish Government is satisfied that the provisions of the Bill are compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights.

155. Consideration has been given as to whether the Bill’s provisions on data sharing raise any issues in relation to the European Convention on Human Rights, and particularly in relation to the Article 8 right to respect for private and family life. To the extent that the policy will engage this right, the Scottish Government is satisfied that it pursues a legitimate aim which is necessary in a democratic society and that the means chosen to achieve the aim are proportionate.

156. The Scottish Government has also considered if privacy implications would arise as a result of the Bill, specifically in relation to data-sharing, and to that end has completed a Privacy Impact Assessment (PIA). The PIA is a living document that will be revisited and reviewed throughout the life of the Bill. There is currently no evidence that any aspect of the Bill should be reconsidered as a result of privacy concerns.

157. It is anticipated that any potential risks can be satisfactorily addressed through adherence to best practice advice from appropriate bodies such as the Information Commissioner and through statutory guidance.
158. As part of the assessment process a number of workshops were held with representative groups of children and young people. One group consisting of current and former looked after children voiced particularly strong support for the proposed improvements on information sharing, the role of the Named Person and a single planning system. These children and young people were able to relate the Bill’s provisions to aspects to their own life journey, and how they could have benefited had these provisions been in place.

Island Communities

159. The Bill will apply to all communities across Scotland, including island communities. Comhairle nan Eilean Siar and Shetland Island Council both submitted formal consultation responses, and Scottish Government officials held positive discussions with officials from Comhairle nan Eilean Siar via videoconference. No differential impact on island communities was identified.

Local Government

160. The Bill will directly impact on local authorities in discharging their duties, and this effect is already set out in this Policy Memorandum and in the other Accompanying Documents to the Bill.

161. Thirty local authorities submitted formal responses to the consultation on the Bill proposals. Significant numbers of local government professionals attended the national engagement events, with 23% (the highest) identified as being from a social work background, and 16% from an education background.

162. Engagement has been undertaken with COSLA, the Association of Directors of Social Work (ADSW) and the Association of Directors of Education (ADES), both on a Ministerial, official and informal level. These organisations and specific local authorities have been extensively engaged during development of the provisions of the Bill and the production of the Financial Memorandum.

Sustainable Development and Environmental Issues

163. It is considered that the Bill is likely to have minimal effect in relation to the environment and, as such, is exempt for the purposes of section 7 of the Environmental Assessment (Scotland) Act 2005. A pre-screening report has been completed. This confirmed that the Bill will have minimal or no impact on the environment and consequently that a full Strategic Environmental Assessment did not need to be undertaken. The pre-screening report is published on the Scottish Government website under case number PRE\00468.
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 27) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013

CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL

DELEGATED POWERS MEMORANDUM

Purpose

1. This Memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government in accordance with Rule 9.4A of the Parliament’s Standing Orders in relation to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. It describes the purpose of the subordinate legislation provisions in the Bill and outlines the reasons for seeking the proposed powers. This Memorandum should be read in conjunction with the Explanatory Notes and Policy Memorandum for the Bill.

2. The contents of this Memorandum are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Scottish Parliament.

Outline of Bill Provisions

3. It is the aspiration of the Scottish Government for Scotland to be the best place to grow up in. The objective of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is to make real this ambition by putting children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services and ensuring their rights are respected across the public sector.

- Reflect in domestic law the role of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) in influencing the design and delivery of policies and services by placing duties on the Scottish Ministers and the wider public sector, and strengthening the powers of the Children’s Commissioner to enable investigations to be conducted in relation to individual children and young people;

- Improve the way services work to support children, young people and families by: ensuring there is a single planning approach for children who need additional support from services; creating a single point of contact around every child or young person; ensuring coordinated planning and delivery of services with a focus on outcomes, and providing a holistic and shared understanding of a child’s or young person’s wellbeing;

- Strengthen the role of early years support in children’s and families’ lives by increasing the amount and flexibility of free early learning and childcare from 475 hours a year to a minimum of 600 hours for 3 and 4 year olds, and 2 year olds who are, or have been at any time since turning 2, looked after or subject to a kinship care order;

- Ensure better permanence planning for looked after children by: extending corporate parenting across the public sector; extending support to young people leaving care for longer (up to and including the age of 25); supporting families and the parenting role of

kinship carers through new legal entitlements; and putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing; and

- Strengthen existing legislation that affects children and young people by creating a new right to appeal a local authority decision to place a child in secure accommodation, and by making procedural and technical changes in the areas of children’s hearings support arrangements and school closures.

Rationale for subordinate legislation

4. The Bill contains a number of delegated powers which are explained later in this document. In deciding whether legislative provisions should be specified on the face of the Bill or left to subordinate legislation, the Scottish Government has had regard to the need to:

- Strike the right balance between the importance of the issue and providing flexibility to respond to changing circumstances with the benefit of experience, without the need for primary legislation;

- Anticipate the unexpected, which might otherwise frustrate the purpose of the provision in primary legislation approved by the Parliament;

- Make proper use of valuable Parliamentary time;

- Allow detailed administrative arrangements to be kept up to date with the basic structures and principles set out in the primary legislation; and

- Consider the likely frequency of amendment.

Delegated Powers

Part 1 - The Rights of Children

Section 3 – Authorities to which section 2 applies
Subsection (2) – Power to modify schedule 1
Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

5. Section 3 provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify schedule 1 which lists the public authorities that section 2 applies to. This could be by adding a person or description of persons, removing an entry or modifying an entry listed in it.

Reason for taking this power
6. Section 2 provides that a public authority subject to the duty must publish a report every 3 years setting out what it has done in that period to give better or further effect within its area of responsibility to the UNCRC requirements. Schedule 1 lists the public authorities to which this provision applies. The reason for taking this power is so that the Scottish Ministers can amend the list in schedule 1 which will be useful if any new public authority is created in the future to whom the duty should apply. It will also be useful if any of the public authorities in schedule 1 change their name or cease to exist.

7. The power to amend the schedule by order will give Scottish Ministers flexibility to specify additional persons or amend the list to reflect changed circumstances in the nature or status of specified persons without the need for further primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

8. The order is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 77(2)) because it is considered that a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny would be appropriate in order to determine whether the changes are required and given that the order may be used to amend primary legislation.

Section 4—Interpretation of Part 1

Subsection (4) – Power to modify subsection (1) definitions.
Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

9. Section 4(4) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (1) as they consider appropriate to take account of any future optional protocol of the UNCRC which the United Kingdom chooses to ratify or any amendment of a document mentioned in the subsection at that time.

Reason for taking this power

10. The reason for including this power is to ensure that, once in force, the Act can be amended without further primary legislation to recognise any future changes to the content of the UNCRC or the establishment of any additional optional protocols to the UNCRC which the United Kingdom chooses to ratify. The United Kingdom has currently ratified two of the three optional protocols to the Convention.

Choice of procedure

11. The order is subject to negative procedure. The aim of this provision is to keep the definition of “the rights of children” and “the UNCRC requirements” up to date to take account of changes in the UNCRC and optional protocols to the UNCRC ratified by the United Kingdom over time.
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 27) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013

It is anticipated that changes that are affected by this power are unlikely to be controversial and consequently it should not be necessary to require a debate on each occasion that it is used. Clearly, however, the opportunity to debate any Order made under this power in the event that its use is controversial is retained using the negative procedure.

Part 3 – Children’s Services Planning

Section 7 – Introductory

Subsection (3) – Power to specify services which are considered to be included within or excluded from the definition of “children’s service” or “related service” and matters in relation to services which are considered to be included within or excluded from those services

- Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
- Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

12. Section 7(3) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify the services that are to be considered to be included within or excluded from the definition of “children’s service” or “related service”, and matters in relation to services which are to be considered to be included or excluded from those services.

Reason for taking this power

13. It would be useful to provide the Scottish Ministers with the flexibility to change the list in section 7(3) to account for any future changes to children’s services or related services.

Choice of procedure

14. The order is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate. It is considered that a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny is not required to make these changes. Before making any changes, the Scottish Ministers will have to consult with health boards, local authorities and, where the service concerned is provided by one of the other service providers, that service provider.

Subsection (5) – Power to modify the definition of “other service provider” in section 7(1)

- Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
- Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision
15. Section 7(5) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify the definition of “other service provider” in section 7(1) by adding a person or description of persons, removing an entry or varying an entry listed in it.

Reason for taking this power

16. It would be useful to provide the Scottish Ministers with the flexibility to change the list in section 7(1) to account for any future changes to children’s or related services.

Choice of procedure

17. The order is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 77(2)) which is considered appropriate as it will provide a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny given that the order may modify primary legislation.

Section 8 – Requirement to prepare children’s services plan

Subsection (1) – Power to determine commencement of the 3 year period for the purposes of section 8

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

18. This provides that the Scottish Ministers may specify, by order, when the first 3 year period which is to be covered by a children’s services plan is to begin.

Reason for taking this power

19. The reason for taking this power is to enable the Scottish Ministers, in collaboration with stakeholders, to determine when would be the most suitable date for commencement of the 3 year period that the children’s services plan is to cover.

Choice of procedure

20. This is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate. It is considered that a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny is not required for a provision of this nature.
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 27) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013

Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

21. The Scottish Ministers may, by order, prescribe outcomes in relation to the wellbeing of children in the area that can be used to measure the extent to which the provision of children’s services and related services in the area have contributed to an improvement in the wellbeing of children in the area.

Reason for taking this power

22. This is to allow the reports to reflect any changes in children’s services, related services or the measures of wellbeing.

Choice of procedure

23. This order is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate as it is not considered that a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny will be required to make these changes.

Section 17 –Children’s services planning: default powers of Scottish Ministers

Subsection (6)– Power for the Scottish Ministers to constitute a joint board of the local authority and health board where they consider that a direction under subsection (2) has been insufficient or would be insufficient

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

24. This provides the Scottish Ministers with an order making power to constitute a joint board of the local authority and health board for the area where they consider a direction under 17(2) has been or would be insufficient. The joint board would then carry out the function.

Reason for taking this power

25. The direction making power under section 17 provides that if the Scottish Ministers consider the local authority and health board in a local government area are not carrying out a function conferred on them by this Part or in carrying out a function are not complying with section 15(1), then the Scottish Ministers can direct that the function is carried out in a particular way or that it is to be carried out by other persons as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate. Where the Scottish Ministers consider that such a direction has been or would be insufficient in the particular circumstances, they may, following consultation, constitute a joint board of the local authority and each relevant health board to exercise the function.
Choice of procedure

26. The order is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 77(2)) which allows for a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny which is considered appropriate for a provision of this nature.

Part 4 – Provision of Named Persons

Section 19 – Named person service

Subsection (3)(b) – Power to specify training, qualifications, experience or position requirements

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

27. This subsection provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, make requirements as to training, qualifications, experience or position of named persons.

Reason for taking this power

28. It would be useful to provide the Scottish Ministers with the power to be able to require named persons to have specific skills and training to enable them to carry out the role and to provide for the position within an organisation that named persons are required to hold. Training requirements or provision may change in the future; therefore it would be useful for the Scottish Ministers to be able to specify these requirements through an order, to provide them with flexibility to adapt to future needs.

Choice of procedure

29. The order is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate given the nature of the provision and the fact that its use will not involve the amendment of primary legislation.

Section 30– Interpretation of Part 4

Subsection (2) – Power to modify schedule 2

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision
30. This provision provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify schedule 2 to add a person or description of persons, remove an entry in it or vary an entry in it.

Reason for taking this power

31. The reason for taking this power is so that the services providers in schedule 2 can be modified in the future should new relevant authorities be created, or current service provider’s names changed.

Choice of procedure

32. The order is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 77(2)) which allows for a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny which is considered appropriate given that the order may be used to modify primary legislation.

Part 5 – Child’s Plan

Section 32 – Content of a child’s plan

Subsection (2) – Power to make provision as to information that is or is not to be contained in, and the form of, the child’s plan

Provision

33. Section 32(2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, make provision as to other information which is or is not to be contained in a child’s plan and the form of the plan.

Reason for taking this power

34. The provision of services and needs of children and young people may change in the future, therefore it is important that the Scottish Ministers have the ability and flexibility to amend what should be included in the plan, and the form in which the information should be set out.

Choice of procedure

35. The order is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate as it is not considered that a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny will be required to make these changes.

Section 33 – Preparation of a child’s plan
Subsection (8) – Power to make further provision about the preparation of the child’s plan

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

36. This subsection provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, make further provision as to the preparation of child’s plan.

Reason for taking this power

37. The reason for taking this power is to enable the Scottish Ministers to have the flexibility to make further provision about the details of how a child’s plan is to be prepared to reflect any future changes in children’s services. This is important, for example, if the responsibilities of health boards or local authorities change.

Choice of procedure

38. The order is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate as it is not considered that a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny will be required to make these changes.

Section 35– Responsible authority: special cases

Subsection (5) – Power to modify section 35 so as to make further or different provision as to circumstances in which section 34(1) does not apply in relation to a child

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

39. Section 35(5) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify this section so as to make further or different provision as to when the responsible authority is a health board or a local authority or a directing authority, depending on the circumstances.

Reason for taking this power

40. It would be useful to provide the Scottish Ministers with the flexibility to require, in particular circumstances, a different body to be the responsible authority instead of the default position that will apply to children generally (see section 34(1)). This will help ensure that particular groups of children that may come to light in the future will have their wellbeing looked after by the most appropriate body.
Choice of procedure

41. The order is to be subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 77(2)) as it will allow a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny which is considered appropriate given that the order may modify primary legislation.

Section 37 – Child’s plan: management

Subsection (5) – Power to make provision about the management of the child’s plan

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

42. Section 37(5) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, make provision about the management of child’s plans, including provision about: when and how a child’s plan is to be reviewed in accordance with subsection (1); who is to be the managing authority of a child’s plan; when and to whom management of a child’s plan is to or may transfer under subsection (4)(b); when and how a new targeted intervention may be included in a child’s plan; and the keeping, disclosure and destruction of child’s plans.

Reason for taking this power

43. The provision of services and also the needs of children and young people may change in the future, therefore it is important that the Scottish Ministers have the ability and flexibility to amend how the plan should be managed in future to take account of any such changes.

Choice of procedure

44. The order is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate as it is not considered that a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny will be required to make these changes.

Part 6 – Early Learning and Childcare

Section 43– Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

Subsection (2)(c)(ii) – Power to specify additional categories of eligible pre-school child

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative
Provision

45. Section 43(2) sets out the children who are to be eligible for the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare in accordance with subsection (1); such children are referred to as “eligible pre-school children” and under the Bill they are those children who are under school age and who have not commenced primary school and either fall within subsection (3) (that is they are 2 or over and are, or have been at any time since their 2nd birthday, looked after or subject to a kinship care order) or are within such age range, or are of such description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify (subsection (2)(c)(ii)).

46. Section 43(2)(c)(ii) enables the Scottish Ministers to specify by order additional categories of “eligible pre-school child” in relation to whom early learning and childcare will be made by reference to the description of such children and their ages. It is likely that the power will be used to specify that 3 and 4 year olds will be eligible for early learning and childcare from the first term after their 3rd birthday in a similar way in which the current law does so by virtue of the order made under section 1(1A) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 (the 1980 Act) (which the Bill amends).

47. Subsection (4) provides that an order under section 43(2)(c)(ii) may subdelegate the function of determining eligibility criteria to an education authority so for example the order might provide that a child is an “eligible pre-school child” only if the education authority is satisfied as to any matter relating to the child which is specified in the order.

48. The current policy is part of a longer term ambition to increase and improve early learning and childcare for all children. The power will allow the Scottish Ministers to specify additional categories of “eligible pre-school child” in the future, which provides maximum flexibility and enables work towards this longer term ambition.

Choice of Procedure

49. The order is subject to negative procedure given that the power is simply being used to further specify entitlement to early learning and childcare as opposed to changing the manner in which early learning and childcare is provided, and therefore it is considered that negative procedure provides an appropriate level of scrutiny. Further, this level of scrutiny is consistent with the predecessor to this power, namely that contained in section 1(1A) and(1B) of the 1980 Act which was also subject to negative procedure (by virtue of section 1(4A) of the 1980 Act). The negative procedure is considered to offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expedition and convenience and, on the other, the need for scrutiny for a provision of this nature.
Section 44 – Mandatory amount of early learning and childcare

Subsection(2) – Power to modify the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

50. Section 44(1) sets out the “mandatory amount” of early learning and childcare for the purposes of section 43(1) which means that an education authority must in pursuance of its duty under section 1(1) of the 1980 Act secure that 600 hours in each year (or a pro rata amount for part of a year) is made available for each “eligible pre-school child”. Section 44(2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (1) so as to alter the amount of early learning and childcare which is to be made available in pursuance of section 43(1). The order may make different provision in relation to different types of eligible pre-school children so for example the power to modify the mandatory amount could be used to provide differing amounts for different types of children (e.g. children of different ages). Subsection (3) is without prejudice to the power in section 77(1)(a).

Reason for taking this power

51. The reason for taking this power is to ensure, should future requirements change, that the Scottish Ministers have the ability to amend the amount of hours of early learning and childcare which education authorities are obliged to provide. For example, the order could be used to increase the amount of hours. As noted above, the current policy is part of a longer term ambition to increase and improve early learning and childcare for all children, and that could potentially mean there will be a need to change the mandatory amount, and therefore the flexibility to do so is required.

Choice of procedure

52. The order is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 77(2)) as it will provide a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny which is considered appropriate given that the order may be used to modify primary legislation.

Section 46 – Duty to consult and plan on delivery of early learning and childcare

Subsection (2) – Power to modify the regularity within which an education authority must consult and plan

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

53. Section 46(1)(a) requires an education authority to consult in its area about how it should make early learning and childcare available. Subsection (1)(b) requires the authority, after having had regard to views expressed in that consultation, to prepare and publish a plan for how it intends to make early learning and childcare available. The education authority is required to consult and plan at least once every 2 years. Section 46(2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (1) so as to vary the regularity within which an education authority must consult and plan in pursuance of this subsection.

Reason for taking this power

54. The reason for taking this power is to provide the Scottish Ministers with a degree of flexibility over the frequency of the requirement to consult and plan. 2 years is necessary in the first instance to achieve momentum on the re-configuration of services required in response to initial consultations and to meet the current policy of improving and increasing flexibility of provision. The regularity with which authorities are required to consult and plan could be reduced if successive consultations were producing similar findings, or if a wide range of flexible provision had been achieved. Conversely, the regularity could be increased if there was, for example, a major policy change emerging in response to local consultations.

Choice of procedure

55. The order is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate. The power is not being used to change any of the requirements to consult and plan but only the regularity with which that consultation and planning is to take place and therefore it is considered that the level of Parliamentary scrutiny afforded by negative procedure is sufficient. The negative procedure is considered to offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expedition and convenience and, on the other, the need for scrutiny for a provision of this nature.

Section 47 – Method of delivery of early learning and childcare

Subsection (2) – Power to modify the method of delivering early learning and childcare

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

56. Section 47(1) sets out the minimum framework within which early learning and childcare must be delivered by education authorities. An education authority must ensure that it makes early learning and childcare available by way of sessions which are between 2.5 hours and 8 hours and which are provided during at least 38 weeks of every calendar year. Section 47(2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (1) so as to vary the method of delivering early learning and childcare (i.e. the minimum framework).

Reason for taking this power

57. The reason for taking this power is to provide the Scottish Ministers with a degree of flexibility for amending this section as a result of changes in the future. For example, it may be that in the light of local consultation exercises evidence emerges that indicates parents’ early learning and childcare needs are changing and that other or additional delivery mechanisms should be considered and consulted upon. Therefore, this power will ensure that the minimum framework is capable of amendment in response to future changes in policy or parental early learning and childcare needs.

Choice of procedure

58. The order is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 77(2)) as it will provide a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny which is considered appropriate given that the order may be used to modify primary legislation.

Part 7 – Corporate Parenting

Section 50– Corporate parents

Subsection (2) – Power to modify schedule 3

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

59. Section 50(2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may modify, by order, schedule 3 which lists the persons or description of persons who are corporate parents for the purposes of Part 6.

Reason for taking this power

60. It would be useful to allow the Scottish Ministers to change the list in schedule 3 to specify additional persons or change the list to reflect changed circumstances in the nature or status of specified persons. This would be helpful, for example, if any new public body is created which should be considered a corporate parent, or if any of the public bodies listed in the schedule change their name or cease to exist.

Choice of procedure

61. The order is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 77(2)) as it is a power to amend primary legislation and so it is considered that a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny would be appropriate in order to determine whether the changes are required.
Part 8 – Aftercare

Section 60 – Provision of aftercare to young people

Subsection (2)(e) – Power to specify what “eligible needs” are for the purposes of new section 29(5A)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”).

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

 Provision

62. Section 60(2) makes various amendments to section 29 of the 1995 Act, with the effect that a person between the ages of 19 and 26 who was formerly looked after by a local authority may apply to the authority to request that they provide them with advice, guidance and assistance. A local authority is under a duty to assess that person’s needs under section 29(5). After carrying out the assessment, new subsection (5A)(a) provides that the local authority must, if satisfied that the person has eligible needs which cannot be met other than by taking action under this subsection, provide the person with such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers necessary for the purposes of meeting those needs.

63. Section 60(2)(e) inserts new subsections (8) and (9) into section 29 to give the Scottish Ministers a power to specify by order what “eligible needs” are for the purposes of new subsection (5A)(a).

Reason for taking this power

64. It is anticipated that the definition of what are to be considered “eligible needs” for the duty in new subsection (5A)(a) will need to be changed from time to time as circumstances change. For example, as current and future UK welfare reforms affecting this group come into effect, changes may be required to deal with any unintended consequences. It is therefore preferable to take a power to specify “eligible needs” in secondary legislation with the flexibility to amend them as circumstances change rather than requiring further primary legislation to make the necessary adjustments.

Choice of procedure

65. The order is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 29(9) of the 1995 Act (as inserted by section 60(2)(e) of the Bill)) which will allow a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny which is considered appropriate for a provision of this nature.

Consequential amendment to regulation-making power in Regulation of Care (Scotland) Act 2001
66. In consequence of the provision made at section 60, paragraph 6 of schedule 4 makes a minor modification to an existing regulation-making power contained in section 73(2)(a) of the Regulation of Care (Scotland) Act 2001 (asp 8). This power allows the Scottish Ministers, in regulations, to specify the manner in which assistance may be provided under subsections (1) and (2) of section 29 of the 1995 Act. The power at section 73(2)(a) of the 2001 Act is amended so that it is exercisable in relation to the duties in new subsections (5A) and (5B) of section 29 of the 1995 Act.

67. It is thought necessary to adjust this power so that it may be used in the future to specify the manner in which assistance may be given under the new duties in section 29 inserted by section 60. This is an existing regulation-making power subject to negative procedure and, as these amendments do not alter the nature of that power, this is still considered to be an appropriate level of scrutiny for these regulations.

Part 9 – Counselling Services

Section 61– Provision of counselling services to parents and others

Subsection (1) – Power to specify the description of counselling services a local authority must secure for persons residing in a local authority area

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

68. This subsection provides that a local authority must make arrangements to secure that counselling services of such description as the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify are made available for persons residing in its area who fall within subsection (2).

Reason for taking this power

69. This power allows the Scottish Ministers to specify by order different descriptions of counselling service and gives the Scottish Ministers the flexibility to add to the number or amend the type of counselling services that might be required in different circumstances, or which is required to assist with different issues.

70. This power is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate. It is considered that it is not necessary to require the Parliament to carry out a more detailed level of scrutiny and to agree to the specification by order of every different type of counselling service that might be considered appropriate in relation to different types of family circumstance or issues.
Subsection (3) – Power to specify the definition of “eligible child”

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

71. This subsection provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify the description of “eligible child” for the purposes of subsection (2) (the parents or persons with parental rights and responsibilities in relation to such a child, will be eligible for counselling services).

Reason for taking this power

72. The reason for taking this power is to ensure that counselling services are always targeted at the appropriate families i.e. those in greatest need. It is highly desirable to retain flexibility to amend any eligibility test to ensure it achieves its aim of focusing support on the intended recipients and in order to avoid unintended consequences.

Choice of procedure

73. This power is subject to negative procedure which is considered an appropriate level of Parliamentary scrutiny because it is likely that the “eligibility” test will require to be amended from time to time to ensure that the counselling services are always targeted at the appropriate families i.e. those in greatest need.

Section 62 – Counselling services: further provision

Subsection (1) – Power to make provision about counselling services

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

74. This subsection provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, make provision about when or how counselling services specified in an order under section 61(1) are to be provided; when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child is an eligible child for the purpose of section 61(2); when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be an eligible child for the purposes of 61(2); and such other matters about the provision of counselling services specified in an order under section 61(1) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

75. The reason for taking this power is that it is considered more appropriate for the detail as to when or how counselling services are to be provided by a local authority, as to how a local authority is to decide whether a child is “eligible” for the counselling services and as to such other practical matters about the provision of the services as the Scottish Ministers may consider appropriate, to be specified in secondary legislation. It also provides the Scottish Ministers with the flexibility to amend the detail to meet the changing needs of families and as the process develops.

Choice of procedure

76. This power is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate. It is considered that it is not necessary to provide the Parliament with a more detailed level of scrutiny in relation to how a local authority decides when and how to provide the counselling services etc. to families given it is likely that the “eligibility” test in particular will be subject to change to reflect the changing needs of families, and therefore the provision as to how a local authority assesses eligibility will likely require to be amended also.

Part 10 – Support for Kinship Care

Section 64 – Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

Subsection (2) – Power to specify kinship care assistance which local authorities must make arrangements to provide for those persons residing in their areas

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

77. This order making power allows the Scottish Ministers to specify the description of kinship care assistance that local authorities must make arrangements to secure, for persons that fall within subsection (3).

Reasons for taking this power

78. It would be useful to provide the Scottish Ministers with the flexibility to amend the elements of support available to eligible kinship carers to reflect changing circumstances or the future identification of further support needs.

Choice of Procedure

79. This order making power is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate. It is not considered necessary to provide the Parliament with a more detailed level of parliamentary scrutiny to have to consider each time the description of assistance that local authorities are required to provide is added to or amended.
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 27) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013

Subsection (4) – Power to specify the description of child who is considered an “eligible child”

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

80. This subsection provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify the description of child that is an “eligible child” for the purposes of subsection (3).

Reasons for taking this power

81. It would be helpful to provide the Scottish Ministers with the flexibility to amend the eligibility criteria in relation to the receipt of kinship care assistance, in the future, should that be deemed necessary. It is reasonably likely some minor changes will be required to ensure the assistance targets the appropriate groups of children.

Choice of procedure

82. The order is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate. It is considered that it would not be necessary or appropriate for the Parliament to have a more detailed level of parliamentary scrutiny to consider each use of the order making power, when it is simply being used to add to or amend one or more of the eligibility criteria.

Section 65 – Orders which are kinship care orders

Subsection (2) – Power to specify a further category of “qualifying person” who has obtained an order under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, a “kinship care order”.

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

83. This subsection provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify such other relationship to or connection with a child, a person has which makes them a qualifying person for the purposes of subsection (1) (a person who has one of the orders under subsection (1), to be known as a “kinship care order” for the purposes of this provision, which entitles them to assistance from the local authority).

84. It would be helpful to provide the Scottish Ministers with the flexibility to specify an additional category of person who could be considered a qualified person, for the purposes of subsection (1), which therefore entitles them to support from the local authority, in order to adapt to the changing family environment.
Reasons for taking this power

85. It would be helpful to provide the Scottish Ministers with the flexibility to specify an additional category of person who could be considered a qualified person, for the purposes of subsection (1), which therefore entitles them to support from the local authority, in order to adapt to the changing family environment.

Choice of procedure

86. The order is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate. It is considered that it would not be necessary or appropriate for the Parliament to have a more detailed level of parliamentary scrutiny to consider each use of the order making power, when it is simply being used to add a new category of person who could be entitled to support from the local authority.

Section 66 – Kinship care assistance: further provision

Subsection (3) – Power to make provision specifying when or how assistance is to be provided by a local authority

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

87. This subsection provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order make provision about when or how kinship care assistance may be provided; when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child is eligible; when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be an eligible child for the purposes of section 64(3); and such other matters about the provision of kinship care assistance as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

88. It is considered that it is appropriate for the detail as to when or how assistance to kinship carers is to be provided by a local authority, as to how a local authority is to decide whether a child is “eligible” for the assistance; and as to such other practical matters about the provision of the assistance as the Scottish Ministers may consider appropriate, to be specified in secondary legislation.

It provides the Scottish Ministers with the flexibility to amend the detail to meet the changing needs of families and as the process develops.

Choice of procedure

89. This power is subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate. It is not considered necessary for the Parliament to be provided with a more detailed level of scrutiny given it is likely that the “eligibility” test in particular will be subject to change to reflect the changing needs of families, and therefore provision about how the local authority considers whether a child is eligible is likely to require to be amended also.

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register

Section 68 inserts section 13A into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 - Section 13A(2) – Power to prescribe information to be included in the Register

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

90. Section 68 inserts section 13A into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 (the 2007 Act). Section 13A(2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, prescribe information which is, or types of information which are, to be included in the Register. This may include information relating to: children who adoption agencies consider ought to be placed for adoption; persons considered by adoption agencies as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption; matters relating to such children or persons which arise after information about them is included in the Register; or children or prospective adopters outwith Scotland. The Scottish Ministers may also, by regulation, provide for how information is to be retained in the Register, and make such further provision in relation to the Register as they consider appropriate.

Reason for taking this power

91. This is a power to prescribe information to be included in the Register, how this information is to be retained in the Register, and such other further provision in relation to the Register as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate. Given this is likely to be a lengthy list of very detailed information, and given the information which is prescribed is likely to be amended from time to time as the adoption process changes, it is more appropriate for it to be in regulations than the Bill.

Choice of Procedure

92. The order is subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of section 117(5)(ia) of the 2007 Act (as inserted by paragraph 9(5) of schedule 4 to the Bill). It may be that the use of the Register will change in future and may alter and extend beyond containing information in relation to children and adopters, as currently proposed. Affirmative procedure allows for a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny, which it is considered is appropriate if it is proposed to change the original use and purpose of the Register.
Section 68 inserts section 13E into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 - Section 13E(1) – Power to authorise a registration organisation to act as agent for payment or receipt of sums payable

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

93. Section 68 inserts section 13E into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 (the 2007 Act). Section 13E(1) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, authorise a registration organisation to act as agent for the payment or receipt of sums payable by adoption agencies to other adoption agencies and may require adoption agencies to pay or receive such sums through the organisation.

Reason for taking this power

94. The Scottish Ministers may or may not choose to exercise this power. However, if they do, they may wish to amend the registration organisation which they authorise to act on their behalf. As such, a regulation making power is required.

Choice of procedure

95. The order is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 117(5)(ib) of the 2007 Act (as inserted by paragraph 9(5) of schedule 4 to the Bill). This will afford the Parliament a more detailed level of scrutiny which is considered appropriate given it involves the Scottish Ministers delegating their powers in relation to the payment or receipt of sums payable by adoption agencies to other adoption agencies, and potentially in relation to the payment or receipt of such sums through the organisation.

Part 12 – Other Reforms
Section 71 – Appeal against detention of child in secure accommodation

Section 71 inserts section 44A into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 - Section 44A(3) – Power to make further provision about appeals

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

96. Section 71 inserts section 44A into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. Section 44A(1) provides that a child, or relevant person in relation to the child, may appeal to the sheriff against a decision by a local authority to detain the child in secure accommodation in pursuance of an order made under section 44. Section 44A(3) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, make further provision about appeals under section 44A(1). Subsection (4) provides that regulations under subsection (3) may in particular specify the period within which an appeal may be made, make provision about the hearing of evidence during an appeal and provide for appeals to the sheriff principal and Court of Session against the determination of an appeal.

Reasons for taking this power

97. It is considered that it is more appropriate to provide for the administrative, evidential and procedural aspects in relation to appeals under section 44A(1) in regulations as opposed to the Bill, given the level of detail likely to be required. It is also considered that it would be useful to have the flexibility to change the administrative aspects of the appeal process if the need arises.

Choice of procedure

98. The regulations are subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of subsection (5) of section 44A). It is considered appropriate in relation to this regulation making power to allow the Parliament a more detailed level of scrutiny given the potential effect of an unsuccessful appeal on the child and on his or her family.

Part 13 – General

Section 74 – Assessment of wellbeing

Subsection (6) – Power to modify the list of wellbeing indicators

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

99. Section 74(6) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify the list of wellbeing indicators set out in subsection (2).

Reason for taking this power

100. The reason for taking this power is to allow the Scottish Ministers a degree of flexibility should there be new evidence in the future on childhood development that may require the wellbeing indicators to be amended.

Choice of procedure

101. The order is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 77(2)) which will allow for a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny which is considered appropriate given that the order may be used to modify primary legislation.
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 27) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013

Section 78 – Ancillary provision

Subsection (1)(a) – Power to make ancillary provision as is appropriate for the purposes of, in connection with, or for giving full effect to any provision of the Bill

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Generally negative but affirmative procedure if making textual changes to an Act.

Provision

102. Section 77(1)(a) of the Bill confers on the Scottish Ministers a power to make, by order, such supplementary, incidental or consequential provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, or for the purposes of giving full effect to, any provision made by, or by virtue of, the Bill.

Reason for taking this power

103. As with any new body of law, this Bill may give rise to a need for a range of ancillary provisions. For example, consequential provision may be required in order to make necessary changes to related legislation – a number of consequential amendments are identified in the Bill as introduced (see schedule 4) – but this power would allow the Scottish Ministers to make further consequential changes as may be required. We consider the order making power to be necessary to allow for this flexibility. We consider that the power to make such provision should extend to the modification of enactments.

Without the power to make supplementary, incidental and consequential provision, it may be necessary to return to Parliament, through subsequent primary legislation, to deal with a matter which is clearly within the scope and policy intentions of the original Bill.

104. That would not be an efficient use of resources by the Parliament or the Scottish Government. The power whilst potentially wide, is limited to the extent that it can only be used if the Scottish Ministers consider it appropriate to do so, for the purposes of, or in connection with, or for the purposes of giving full effect to any provision made by, or by virtue of, the Bill.

105. Section 77(3) of the Bill provides that any order made under section 78 will be subject to affirmative procedure if it contains provisions which makes textual changes to an Act. Otherwise, it will be subject to negative procedure. This provides the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny for the textual amendment of primary legislation.
Subsection (1)(b) – Power to make transitional, transitory or saving provision as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of any provision of this Act

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative

Provision

106. Section 77(1)(b) of the Bill provides power for the Scottish Ministers to make, by order, such transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of any provision of the Bill.

Reason for taking this power

107. The Scottish Government considers the order making power to be necessary to allow for flexibility as provisions within the Bill are brought into force, to make required transitional, transitory or savings arrangements. Without the power, it may be necessary to return to the Parliament, through subsequent primary legislation, to deal with a matter which could be dealt with through this power. That would not be an efficient use of resources by the Parliament or the Scottish Government. The power, whilst potentially wide is limited to the extent that it can only be used if the Scottish Ministers consider it appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of any provision of the Bill.

Choice of procedure

108. An order made under section 77(1)(b) of the Bill will be subject to negative procedure which is considered to offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expedition and convenience and, on the other, the need for scrutiny of a provision of this nature.

Section 79 – Commencement

Subsection (2) – Power to commence provisions of the Bill

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: No procedure

Provision

109. Section 79(2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, appoint days on which the provisions in the Bill may come into force. Part 12 of the Bill (apart from sections 74, 75 and 76) comes into force on the day after Royal Assent. Subsection (3) provides that an order under section 78 may include transitional, transitory or saving provision.
Reason for taking this power

110. The power will enable the Scottish Ministers to bring the provisions of the Bill into force.

Choice of procedure

111. Section 77(5) has the effect that any such commencement order will not be subject to Parliamentary procedure. This is typical of commencement powers.

11th Report, 2013 (Session 4)

Stage 1 Report on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

The Committee reports to the Parliament as follows—

INTRODUCTION

1. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill was introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013. It covers a wide range of provisions, across 13 Parts, each of which seeks to improve support services for children and young people in Scotland.

2. We were the lead committee in scrutinising the Bill at Stage 1. To support us, we received reports from the Local Government and Regeneration Committee, the Finance Committee and the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee.

Our approach to scrutiny

3. We took a considerable amount of evidence at Stage 1. We received over 180 written submissions and took oral evidence in relation to the key provisions in the Bill from 25 June to 8 October 2013.

4. Whilst we took oral evidence from many interest groups, it was not possible to hear from everyone. As ever, we have taken account of all the written submissions provided. The input of all those organisations and individuals who submitted their views to us has been essential and we thank everyone who contributed.

5. Throughout Stage 1 we raised a number of specific concerns about the Bill directly with the Scottish Government seeking additional information and clarification in various areas and have placed all of that in the public domain. We would like to record our thanks to the Scottish Government for responding to our concerns within the necessarily short timescales.

The general principles of the Bill

6. At Stage 1 our task is to report on the general principles of the Bill and this report discusses each Part of the Bill in the context of the evidence we received.

7. We support the principles underlying the Bill. Our view reflects the many positive responses we received about the Bill in general. However, we have some concerns about aspects of the proposed legislation and highlight areas that could be improved or where further clarification is needed ahead of Stage 2.

8. Our scrutiny of the Bill follows on from our recent inquiries into the educational attainment of looked after children and decision making on whether to take children into care. Those inquiries have informed our scrutiny and we hope our suggestions in this report contribute to the central aim of improving outcomes for children and young people.

9. At the outset, we highlight a number of topics representing overarching challenges in the context of the whole Bill. This provides context for the more detailed analysis that follows in the body of our report, and aims to assist other Members’ consideration of the Bill.

Early intervention and prevention

10. As the Bill’s Policy Memorandum describes, the Bill “sets out fundamental reforms to children’s services in line with the report of the Christie Commission, which highlighted the importance of early years, prevention and personalised service delivery”.

11. Whilst we support this early intervention and prevention approach, we acknowledge the challenges – as indicated in the Financial Memorandum – associated with estimating how the preventative approach will result in future savings.

12. In its report on the Financial Memorandum, the Finance Committee highlighted a number of concerns in relation to the robustness of some of the estimates and assumptions upon which the Financial Memorandum is predicated.

9 Financial Memorandum, paragraph 4.
We invited the Scottish Government to respond to the Finance Committee’s findings and specific issues are discussed throughout our report.

Reporting and planning duties

13. The Bill includes a wide range of provisions many of which have overlapping requirements to publish plans, frameworks and reports. There are also varying timescales attached to these duties.

14. For example, the Bill requires publication of children’s services plans, early learning plans and corporate parenting plans. These involve different stakeholder groups and have different timescales for publication.\(^9\)

15. Throughout the report, we ask whether a more cohesive approach could be taken in relation to some of the reporting and planning duties in the Bill. We also consider whether there is scope to integrate some duties within the overall legislative framework of which the Bill is a part.

Permeation of children’s rights throughout the Bill

16. The Scottish Government originally intended to introduce two separate children’s bills, one exclusively on children’s rights\(^10\) and the other focusing on children’s services.

17. To inform its legislative intentions, the Scottish Government launched a consultation on the children’s rights proposals in 2011\(^11\). A further consultation followed in 2012\(^12\), which included children’s rights proposals along with wider policy issues on children’s services.

18. We received evidence saying that there needed to be better links between the children’s rights part of this Bill and the other Parts.

Scottish Government consultation and the accompanying documents

19. We note the extensive consultation that the Scottish Government has undertaken in relation to the Bill and particularly its efforts to obtain the views of children and young people. We welcome the Government’s continuing engagement with key stakeholders in relation to the development of regulations and guidance under the Bill.

20. This is a wide ranging Bill, which brings together various policies. The accompanying documents have assisted us in our scrutiny of the Bill and we refer to this throughout our report. Whilst we understand the Policy Memorandum is not intended to include the details of the Bill, we observe that some important policy

\(^9\) Children’s services plans must be produced jointly by local authorities and health boards every three years, with annual reports (sections 8 and 13). Education authorities must produce early learning and childcare plans every two years (section 46). A wide range of organisations are to be required to publish corporate parenting plans in such a manner as those organisations consider appropriate (section 55).

information appears only in the Financial Memorandum. However, taken together, we consider the Policy Memorandum and accompanying documents contain adequate detail.

DISCUSSION AND FINDINGS

21. The sections of our report consider the main provisions of the Bill, largely in the order that they appear in the Bill.13

Part 1 – Rights of children

22. The Scottish Government’s policy intention is to ensure that the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) “continues to influence legislation, policy and practice in the near future”14. Although the key principles and many of the individual rights are already reflected in domestic legislation15, as the Convention was ratified by the UK in 1991, the Scottish Government believes that further legislative steps are “essential”.

23. To achieve this, the Bill places duties on the Scottish Ministers to “keep under consideration” their approach to implementing the UNCRC; to promote public awareness and understanding of the rights of children; and to report (every three years) on the steps they have taken. In addition, the Bill requires certain public bodies to report, at least every three years, setting out the steps they have taken to “secure better or further effect” of the UNCRC requirements. The Bill does not, however, seek to impose on public bodies the wider duties that would apply to Scottish Ministers.

24. We received substantial comment on Part 1 of the Bill.

Limitations of the Bill

25. The Faculty of Advocates stated that, because the UK is already bound by international law to comply with the Convention, Part 1 of the Bill does not further develop the rights of children and young people in Scotland to a significant extent. It argued that the Scottish Government’s policy was already to reflect the provisions of the Convention in the development of policy and legislation16.

26. The Law Society of Scotland described the duty placed on Ministers in respect of the UNCRC as a “diluted version of the existing obligations”17. Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People suggested that the duty in the Bill “is not a practical and effective measure to advance children’s rights,

14 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 43.
15 For example, the right to an education is included in the Standards in Scotland’s Schools etc. Act 2000; the courts and children’s hearings must regard children’s welfare as the paramount consideration and take a child’s views into account (Children (Scotland) Act 1995, section 16); local authorities must regard children’s welfare as the paramount consideration in relation to any looked after child (Children (Scotland) Act 1995, section 17).
17 Law Society of Scotland. Written submission and it contains numerous qualifiers granting Ministers ample discretion”\(^\text{18}\). The Commissioner said that he would find “it difficult to imagine an effective legal challenge to the exercise of the duty”, which, he stated, “underlines the weakness of this provision”\(^\text{19}\). Others preferred the duty that had been proposed in the original children’s rights Bill in 2011\(^\text{20}\), which would have required Scottish Ministers “to have due regard” to the UNCRC.\(^\text{21}\)

27. Many children’s organisations and charities went further and called for incorporation of the UNCRC into domestic law. For example, Together\(^\text{22}\) suggested that incorporation would “embed clear and robust measures of accountability and provide the transparency needed to ensure key bodies understand the impact their work is having on protecting and promoting children’s rights”\(^\text{23}\). It suggested doing so would “provide a strong signal from the Scottish Government that all levels of government – and society at large – must take the UNCRC seriously”\(^\text{24}\). A number of other submissions\(^\text{25}\) indicated support for Together’s view.

28. The Scottish Human Rights Commission also supported incorporation of the UNCRC.\(^\text{26}\) However, it acknowledged that the Scotland Act 1998\(^\text{27}\) already requires Scotland to “observe and implement existing UK international legal obligations, one of which is to implement the UNCRC”\(^\text{28}\). The Commission also recognised, as did the Scottish Government, that any move to incorporate the UNCRC would be limited to devolved issues\(^\text{29}\).

29. We asked witnesses to describe the practical benefits arising from incorporation. Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People told us he believed it would “lead to better outcomes for children and young people”\(^\text{30}\) and gave examples of where incorporation would be likely to make a difference. He considered that the principal effects would include: requiring Ministers and public authorities to act compatibly with the UNCRC, enabling redress through a range of accessible remedies for individuals and enabling the courts to declare unlawful legislation that is incompatible with UNCRC rights. For example, in relation to the age of leaving care, he suggested that incorporation would put young people in a stronger position to ensure they have a substantial say in decisions about them.31

30. We also discussed the viability of incorporation with other witnesses. For example, Professor Kenneth Norrie opposed incorporation, suggesting it would be “bad policy, bad practice and bad law”32. Whilst the Convention was full of good aspirations for government, it had not, he said, been drafted to be legally enforceable in a court of law as it was “full of wide, broad statements that you cannot possibly ask judges to determine”33.

31. Professor Elaine Sutherland challenged Professor Norrie’s position. She stated that it was “incorrect to assert that the UN Convention was not drafted or worded to create directly enforceable legal rights in the domestic legal system”. She supported incorporation and argued that the fundamental point to bear in mind was that “it was not anticipated that every article of the Convention would be incorporated and it will be for those drafting the statute to distinguish the solid from the aspirations and to find the appropriate means of incorporation”.

Improving the Bill
32. Whilst UNICEF UK supported full incorporation of UNCRC into Scots law, should that not be achieved, it proposed a number of practical improvements that it believed would strengthen the duties in the Bill.35 UNICEF UK agreed that Ministers should be required to demonstrate how they have fulfilled their duty to consider the UNCRC, but also suggested that public bodies should be required to act to implement the UNCRC and not just to report on the steps they have taken.

33. Also, in the absence of incorporation, the Children’s Commissioner suggested that Article 3 (child’s best interests to be a primary consideration in all matters affecting the child) and Article 12 (child’s view on all matters affecting them to be given due weight in decision-making) should be given effect through the Bill.36

34. The Minister for Children and Young People said she did not believe the case had been made for full incorporation, citing the comments made by Professor Norrie. She told us—

“The duty in the bill is a duty on ministers to reflect the UNCRC. That will child rights proof all our decisions. A tool will be developed to support that. We will take practical actions to increase awareness of children’s rights, whether through schools or with professionals or parents. As far as the practical impact is concerned, there will be a new duty on ministers to properly reflect the UNCRC in the policies that we take forward as a Government.”

35. Scottish Government officials explained that, from the evidence Ministers had seen, the benefits of incorporation lay “primarily in relation to improved culture within [public] services and increased awareness of children's rights”. Those benefits, officials said, could be delivered through “changes in policy as well as improvements in frontline practice”, such as through effective embedding of GIRFEC.

36. We asked the Minister to respond to the suggestion from children’s organisations that the Bill does not do enough to ensure that public bodies will help to strengthen children’s rights. The Minister stated that “we have a commitment to raise awareness across the public bodies and there will also be reporting to ensure that we understand where they are on children's rights”.

Conclusions
37. From the evidence received, we understand that the main argument put forward by some witnesses for full incorporation was that it would put children at the centre of decision-making. However, we received little evidence about how it would do this in practice and whether full incorporation was vital to achieving improved outcomes for children.

38. We also note that the UNCRC is implemented in Scotland in a number of ways already, not least under our obligations in the Scotland Act 1998. In addition, as some supporters of incorporation noted, incorporation would be limited to the powers devolved to the Scottish Parliament.

39. We are not persuaded of the case for full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law, although there may be opportunities to improve the Bill by incorporating specific elements of the UNCRC (see paragraph 43). We agree that the benefits arising from incorporation of the UNCRC could be realised from improvements in policy and practice, such as through the implementation of GIRFEC.

40. However, we are concerned about evidence describing the duties in Part 1 as little more than a restatement of existing obligations. Therefore, we recommend that the Scottish Government provides an explanation of the practical actions it intends to take to increase awareness of children's rights, including details of the tool that will be developed. We also recommend that, in addition to reporting on the steps they have taken to fulfil their duties under Part 1, Ministers should be required to report on the activities they intend to undertake to further children’s rights in each three-year period.

41 See evidence from the Minister at paragraph 34
In relation to the duties placed on public authorities, we recognise there are different views on the wording of the Bill. We seek further clarification from the Scottish Government on why it has chosen not to include duties to ‘keep under consideration’ and thereafter, to ‘take steps identified by that consideration’.

We welcome the intention to allow public authorities to report under this Part in their annual reports. We note that there are a number of new reporting and planning duties in the Bill, which often fall to the same organisations. We therefore ask whether some of these duties could be better integrated.

We note that Article 42 is incorporated in the Bill and request the Scottish Government’s response to the Children’s Commissioner’s suggestion that Articles 3 and 12 also be included.

A number of organisations expressed disappointment that the Scottish Government did not undertake a Child Rights Impact Assessment (CRIA) on the Bill. We wrote to the Scottish Government on this matter. We accept the Scottish Government’s reason for not undertaking a CRIA in this case, which was due to the extensive engagement activities carried out during the Bill’s development. However, the Scottish Government should commit to undertaking CRIAs in relation to relevant future legislation.

The Bill proposes an extension to the Commissioner’s power of investigation, which would allow it to undertake investigations on behalf of individual children and young people (to be known as individual investigations). The Policy Memorandum describes the effect as “introducing an additional mechanism to support children in seeking redress where they feel their rights, views and interests have not been properly taken into account”.

As is currently the case, the Commissioner would be able to investigate any person or organisation in the public, private or voluntary sector that provides a service to children and young people. The difference is that the Commissioner would be able to do so in relation to individuals rather than only where an issue is of relevance to a group of children and young people. It is anticipated that this would give rise to a small number of investigations, perhaps 1 to 4 each year.

The Bill’s Financial Memorandum has estimated that the new functions would require additional funding of around £160,000 per year (except in the first year).

42 Article 42 of the UNCRC states that “The Government should make the Convention known to all parents and children”. The Bill aims to achieve this by the duty on Scottish Minister to “promote public awareness and understanding … of the rights of the child” (section 1(2)).
43 Currently, the Commissioner may only conduct an investigation where an issue is relevant to all children, or a specific group of children (general investigations).
44 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 49.
45 Explanatory Notes, paragraph 14
46 Financial Memorandum, paragraph 31.
47 In the first year, staff, travel and accommodation costs have been estimated at a level equivalent to half a year. The total estimated cost in the first year is £83,190, compared with £162,109 in subsequent years.
Most of this increase would fund costs associated with the Commissioner employing three additional full-time members of staff. All costs would fall on the Scottish Parliamentary Corporate Body.

Avoiding duplication with the functions of other bodies

48. The Bill proposes that, in line with the Commissioner’s existing power to conduct general investigations, the Commissioner would only be permitted to conduct an individual investigation that did not duplicate the function of another organisation.

49. The Scottish Public Services Ombudsman (SPSO) has responsibility for considering complaints and responding to concerns raised by members of the public. Whilst the SPSO welcomed the new powers of investigation it was concerned about the potential for overlap with its own functions. The SPSO referred to the Commissioner’s power to investigate as likely to “amount to service failure or maladministration, the categories which are the categories we judge complaints by”.

50. In response to these concerns, the Commissioner confirmed he was in active discussion with the SPSO and other scrutiny bodies. He also said he had discussed the operation of the proposed powers with several local authorities and that, between now and the Bill’s enactment, planned to “look at the detail and discuss how wide the scope will be, how we will interpret it and how it will sit with other investigatory bodies”.

51. The majority of those who submitted written evidence on this Part supported the extension of the Commissioner’s powers. However, some suggested the “considerable cost of staffing the Commissioner’s office to support more investigations” would be better spent on mediation services and other forms of legal redress for children and young people.

Flexibility to resolve cases without formal investigation

52. In addition to allowing the Commissioner to conduct individual investigations, the Bill would allow the Commissioner to resolve a matter without recourse to a formal investigation. It is intended that this new power would only apply to matters that are covered by the power to conduct an investigation.

48 The Financial Memorandum indicates that the following staff will be required: a Head of Casework and Legal, an Investigator, and a Casework Support Officer.

49 The Explanatory Notes (paragraph 16) refer to the following organisations that have responsibility for considering complaints and responding to concerns raised by members of the public: the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman, the Care Inspectorate, and the Equality and Human Rights Commission.

56 Scottish Government. Written submission.
53. The Commissioner said he expected most of the additional resources would be required in order to resolve cases without needing to conduct a full scale investigation. He estimated “this could involve hundreds of cases”.57

54. The Commissioner also described how the new power would give him discretion to become involved in cases at an early stage, possibly where local processes had not been exhausted. He considered that early resolution of cases was of crucial importance and that “making them [children and young people] exhaust all local complaints processes would not be the best approach”58. In such cases, he said his primary role would be to “refer and signpost [the complainant] back to existing complaints processes”59.

55. It appeared to us that the Commissioner had interpreted this power more widely than intended. We, therefore, invited the Scottish Government to clarify the position. It responded as follows—

“This provision is designed to offer the Commissioner some flexibility in dealing with a case which could otherwise be dealt with through an investigation. Paragraph 16 of the Explanatory Notes makes clear that the Commissioner may not undertake such an investigation where that would duplicate the work of any other complaint handling body. We would therefore not foresee there being a role for the Commissioner to have extensive, ongoing involvement in a case prior to local processes being exhausted and it is not our view that the Commissioner should take on any mediation-type role.”60

56. The Scottish Government did, however, accept that the proposed new power linked to individual investigations was likely to result in an increase in enquiries for support received by the Commissioner’s office. The Government felt it was important that the enquiry-handling service continued to be delivered, and recognised the resource implications associated with an increase in enquiries61.

Conclusions

57. We support the Commissioner’s work in representing children’s interests. We also welcome the Commissioner’s commitment to co-operate with the various complaints-handling bodies in order to ensure the Bill does not give rise to overlap or duplication of functions.

58. However, we are concerned by the misunderstanding about what the new power of investigation will allow. It appears that the Commissioner interprets the scope of the new power more widely than intended by the Scottish Government. We expect all parties to be clear about the interpretation of the Commissioner’s new powers and suggest that, if necessary, the Bill should be amended to ensure this.

59. The issue of resources is closely linked to the interpretation of the Commissioner’s new powers. If the resources are primarily aimed at funding staff to handle more enquiries, we question whether the proposed level of staffing is necessary. We are mindful of evidence indicating that the estimated £160,000p.a. could be better spent on, for example, greater access to mediation for children and young people, and are keen to ensure that any costs are fully justified. We recommend that the Scottish Government gives further consideration to the volume and type of work that any extra enquiries will require.

Getting it right for every child (GIRFEC)

60. Parts 3 to 5 and Part 13 of the Bill advance the Scottish Government’s policy of Getting it right for every child (GIRFEC). GIRFEC supports better-integrated and child-centred service planning and delivery across children’s services. It was developed in a number of Pathfinder areas in 2006 and, since 2011 the Scottish Government has expected it to be implemented by all local authorities.

61. Inconsistencies in the implementation of GIRFEC have been noted, therefore one of the stated aims of the Bill is to achieve greater consistency and build on good practice. We acknowledge the need for flexibility in order to allow local circumstances to be taken into account in the delivery of services for children and young people, however, we agree with the Scottish Government that GIRFEC should be implemented more consistently than it is at present.

62. The Bill includes a number of proposals relating to GIRFEC—

- a requirement for the joint preparation of children’s services plans (Part 3);
- an expectation that every child and young person shall have an assigned named person (Part 4);
- a duty to require the preparation of a child’s plan (Part 5); and
- a definition of “wellbeing”, which underpins GIRFEC and includes indicators (known as the SHANARRI indicators[^63]) to assess children’s needs (Part 13).

63. These provisions seek to deliver – in line with the Bill’s overall principles of early intervention and prevention – coordinated children’s services that will improve the wellbeing and life chances of children and young people in Scotland. These are discussed in the following sections of our report.

64. In recognition of the fact that the definition of wellbeing underpins the GIRFEC provisions included in the Bill, this is discussed briefly here rather than at the end of the report. Although many organisations welcomed the statutory introduction of the term ‘wellbeing’ and the SHANARRI indicators, several organisations felt that it could cause confusion in that other children’s legislation refers to the term ‘welfare’. For example, the Law Society of Scotland stated that the correlation between the two terms was unclear. Professor Norrie, however, considered that the two concepts were different and that it was therefore appropriate to use the two different words in legislation.

Conclusion
65. We support the principles of GIRFEC and want to see GIRFEC implemented consistently and effectively throughout Scotland.

Part 3 – Children’s services planning
66. The Bill introduces a duty on local authorities and each relevant health board to prepare joint children’s services plans every three years. The Bill also introduces an annual reporting mechanism and detailed requirements about the consultation, purpose and aims of the plans. The intended effect is that “those bodies responsible for expenditure, planning and delivery of services will work together in considering how to improve the whole wellbeing of all children and young people in their area”.

67. Much of the evidence we received on this Part supported the principle of integrating children’s services planning. For example, COSLA said it had long-argued for better integration of public services locally. The North of Scotland Planning Group, a collaboration of six health boards, recognised the benefits of joint-working between local authorities and health boards, particularly in remote and rural areas, in the provision of children’s services. The Care Inspectorate also highlighted that, where third sector and independent service providers were integrated in children’s services planning, this helped to “harness their contribution, knowledge and expertise towards meeting local need”.

68. There were numerous calls for children’s services planning to be linked with the wider planning framework and, specifically, with community planning, single outcome agreements (SOAs), and other legislation. For example, Action for Children called for greater coordination at the planning stage and to defining outcomes for community planning and SOAs. COSLA wanted us to consider how the Bill would sit within the existing community planning landscape and the proposals expected in a community empowerment and renewal bill.

69. NSPCC Scotland highlighted links with the proposed Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill and the recent Social Care (Self Directed Support) (Scotland) Act 2012, which had, or were expected to have, implications for the planning and delivery of children’s services. It argued that—

70. Others highlighted the importance of integrated service provision from the perspective of children and young people with disabilities and complex needs. For Scotland’s Disabled Children (FSDC) said there needed to be good planning when young people transition from children’s services to adult services or move between local authorities. Also, UNICEF UK wanted the GIRFEC approach to children’s services to be joined-up with the broader children’s rights framework and suggested that “a child rights framework needs to be introduced within children’s services planning, through which public bodies can safeguard, support and promote the rights and well-being of children in their area.”

71. COSLA called for section 17, which gives the Scottish Ministers discretionary power to constitute a joint board to undertake children’s services planning, to be removed from the Bill.

72. The Local Government and Regeneration (LGR) Committee scrutinised this Part of the Bill and reported to us. It highlighted that community planning partnerships (CPPs) would have a key role to play if the aims of the Bill were to be realised. In the context of the forthcoming legislation to strengthen the roles and responsibilities of CPPs, the LGR Committee sought clarity around the implementation of the Children and Young People Bill and how it would fit with the role of CPPs in the new partnerships and arrangements.

Conclusions
73. We support the better integration of children’s services planning. This is of particular importance in ensuring the smooth transition, between types of services as well as geographically, for children and young people with disabilities or complex needs.

74. It is crucial, therefore, that the proposals in the Bill sit within an overall framework that is easy for service users and service providers to navigate.

75. The Scottish Government should clearly illustrate how children’s service plans fit within the wider Government strategy to integrate service planning across for example, the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, the proposed Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill\(^{81}\) and with Single Outcome Agreements and Community Planning Partnerships.

76. We agree with COSLA that the discretionary power conferred upon Scottish Ministers to constitute a joint board (section 17) is not the right approach. We welcome the Scottish Government’s confirmation that it intends to bring forward the necessary changes to the Bill at Stage 2.\(^{82}\)

77. On a separate issue, we received a public petition which called for the Bill to place a duty on local authorities to provide sufficient and satisfying play opportunities for children of all ages and abilities.\(^{83}\) The Scottish Government confirmed that Part 3 “would encompass the contributions that local authorities, health boards and other relevant service providers can make to supporting play opportunities for children”\(^{84}\). We welcome this confirmation from the Government as well as its work in developing the Play Strategy Action Plan\(^{85}\).

Part 4 – Provision of named persons

78. The Bill makes provision for every child and young person up to the age of 18 (or beyond if still at school) to have a named person. The Policy Memorandum says that named persons will be part of a network of support that will ensure children and young people “get the right help at the right time”\(^{86}\). The network of support will always include the family and/or carers.

79. Although the named person role is part of the wider GIRFEC policy and exists in some parts of Scotland, it “has not been implemented systematically across the whole country”\(^{87}\). The Policy Memorandum states that the provisions are designed to underpin the national GIRFEC approach and to help ensure that services for children and families are provided consistently nationwide.

80. The proposal for named persons has received substantial comment. Views ranged from opposition to the fundamental principle of having a named person on the belief that it diminished the role of the parent and the suggestion that the needs of vulnerable children might get lost in the universal service, to backing for the early intervention approach of which the named person was felt to be an integral part. Many bodies highlighted practical and resource issues that needed to be resolved for the role to work effectively.

The role of parents

81. Some bodies opposed the named person role as they felt it did not recognise the role of the parent. The Faculty of Advocates stated it would “dilute the legal role of parents” whether or not there is any difficulty in the way that parents are fulfilling their statutory responsibilities”.

82. In response, the Minister acknowledged that “the parent is the most important person, and the most important educator, in a child’s life”, and said that the named person provisions were “about providing a support network and framework for families, if they need it”.

The role of named persons

83. Support for the principle of the named person role focused on the benefits of having a recognised professional who knew the family and acted as the main point-of-contact for them. Highland Council said that when GIRFEC began, the named person requirement was not included in the list of components, and it was “developed through practice and experience, and discussions with families and professionals”.

84. Highland Council described one of the key benefits of the named person role as delivering “earlier support and more effective intervention for more children”. Earlier interventions, it said, generally led to more successful outcomes. The Council also highlighted the role of the named person as providing a clear point of contact, which was important for the family and other professionals.

85. Scottish Government officials described the premise of the named person as the “idea of establishing a good, trusted relationship between the individual and someone whom ... the family know and see reasonably regularly”. Similarly, Highland Council regarded the named person as “someone who has a good understanding of the child and family’s circumstances”.

86. At our meeting on 17 September, we asked witnesses whether, in a practical sense, the introduction of a named person would lead to a better service and therefore a reduction in neglect. All of those witnesses said it would. For example, the Royal College of Nursing referred to a growing evidence base, which suggested that “a comprehensive approach to universal services, with tiered support, would reduce neglect and improve mental health and attachment relationships later in a child’s life”.

87. In considering the implementation of the named person role for young people who have left school and are under the age of 18, it is notable that Highland Council had difficulties in assigning a named person. In its written evidence, the Council said “not only has this been difficult to achieve in practice, there are doubts about the desirability and necessity of this measure.”

88. Highland Council recognised its success in implementing GIRFEC was in part due to the positive culture of collaborating across different frontline services. Highland Council acknowledged that it enjoys an effective relationship with the police force and other bodies and has a very active third sector.

Specific duties of the named person

89. Some witnesses expressed uncertainty about the duties of the named person. Most evidence, including that from Highland Council, described the role of the named person as being that of a single point of contact.

90. The Bill sets out a number of fairly high-level duties that the named person will be expected to carry out, with further details to be provided in guidance.

91. In considering the details of how a named person would go about their work, however, there were some very different expectations about the role. For example, there was doubt around the level of involvement that the named person would be expected to have in complex child protection issues, such as where a child’s plan was required. Barnardo’s Scotland described the named person role as “a named co-ordination point” and considered that “the moment we start talking about managing a child’s plan, we move into lead professional territory.” Highland Council’s view was similar: “the named person would support early 102 The Bill specifies that a named person would be expected to carry out the following functions: advising, informing or supporting a child or a parent; helping a child or a parent to access services; and discussing or raising a matter about a child with a service provider (Section 19(5)).

interventions but as soon as more than one agency got involved the co-ordinating role would move to the lead professional.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Education and Culture Committee. \textit{Official Report, 24 September 2013}, Col 2857}

92. The Scottish Government indicated there would be some flexibility in the role of the named person—

“Where concerns about a child or young person’s wellbeing require to be addressed by co-ordinated intervention from more than one service or agency, then a Lead Professional can be identified to take on that co-ordinating role. The Named Person will either take on the role of Lead Professional themselves, or will agree with the partners involved in supporting the child/young person, who is most appropriate to take on the lead professional role to manage the multi-agency Child’s Plan.”\footnote{Scottish Government. Written submission.}

93. In addition, the Financial Memorandum seems to suggest there was more to the role of named person than simply acting as a point of contact for families. In relation to midwives and health visitors, it states that a named person’s responsibilities could potentially involve—

“holistic assessment based on information received and observed, any preparation towards the creation of a child’s plan where needed, and management of the plan through an on-going involvement with the child and family as required.”\footnote{Financial Memorandum, paragraph 59}

94. In oral evidence, the Minister concluded there was a need to develop “robust guidance” to accompany the Bill. This would “give greater clarity to professionals working with children and families across the country”.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Education and Culture Committee. \textit{Official Report, 8 October 2013}, Col 2955}

\textit{The professional who performs the role of named person}

95. We also received evidence that raised questions about which professionals should perform the role of named persons, and their capacity to do so.

96. Whilst the Bill does not specify those professionals who should have the role, it is envisaged that it will be performed by practitioners employed by health boards or education authorities. For a child who is below school age, the named person will be assigned by a health board and, depending on the age of the child, will be a midwife or a health visitor. For a child or young person of school age (and up to 18 years old), the named person will be assigned by the local authority and will be a senior teacher (normally the head or deputy head teacher). Specific provision is made for children and young people who attend independent or grant-aided schools, or who are in secure accommodation.

97. Concerns were raised about the capacity of staff and organisations to undertake the role of named persons. In particular, the Royal College of Nursing stated that there was an insufficient number of health visitors in Scotland\textsuperscript{108} and 450 additional health posts would be required\textsuperscript{109}. Unison agreed, suggesting health visitors were already overworked and, with the addition of the named person role, the situation would be “almost critical”\textsuperscript{110}.

98. With health visitors having such heavy workloads, it appears that it would be difficult for them to maintain a close relationship with the families to which they had been assigned. However, NHS Lothian told us it was exploring “more creative ways” of ensuring the requirements of the Bill could be met. For example, it was looking at delegating some of the administrative functions under the Bill to other staff. This would free-up health visitors and midwives to undertake the necessary face-to-face assessments and other planning duties.\textsuperscript{111}

99. There were similar concerns about teachers’ capacity to take on the named person role in addition to their teaching duties. The Educational Institute of Scotland highlighted the pressures headteachers would have on their time and stated “only time will tell whether the duties of the named person simply quantify what is currently happening or increase their workload”\textsuperscript{112}.

100. However, Highland Council reported that teachers, health visitors and midwives felt that the named person role “does not change what they do but it changes how they are regarded”\textsuperscript{113}.

101. We also received evidence questioning how the named person role would operate during school holidays.\textsuperscript{114} The Scottish Government confirmed where a named person was not contactable during school holidays, the local authority would be required to make arrangements for another member of education services to deal with any concerns.\textsuperscript{115} These arrangements may not correspond with the premise that the named person should be someone who knows the child and has a good understanding of the family’s circumstances.

102. Other comments highlighted that named persons must be able to support the complex needs of vulnerable children and young people. Some questioned whether a named person would have the breadth of experience required to handle effectively the needs of children with speech, language or communication difficulties\textsuperscript{116}; who are deaf\textsuperscript{117}; or, who have learning disabilities\textsuperscript{118}.

103. Others questioned whether a named person would be assigned to children who were educated at home\(^{119}\), whilst there was also a desire for children and young people to have a say in who their named person should be\(^{120}\). We note from the Policy Memorandum that the Bill will ensure that certain groups of children and young people with a less typical pattern of involvement with health or educational services, such as home-educated children, are provided with a named person\(^{121}\). In such cases the appointment of a named person will be left to local authorities.

Resources and the cost of the named person role

104. The Scottish Government expects the early intervention approach to save money after the first year of implementation. The Financial Memorandum estimates that for children (up to the age of five years) with “emerging or significant concerns\(^{122}\), the total additional hours required (by a midwife, health visitor or public health nurse) would be 50 hours (10 hours per year group) in the first year of implementation, decreasing to 34, 26 and 23 hours in subsequent years.\(^{123}\)

105. This assumption that savings would be realised after the first year and on such a scale was disputed in evidence to the Finance Committee.\(^{124}\) For example, the Royal College of Nursing Scotland stated “if the approach is effective, there might be a small reduction over time.”\(^{125}\)

106. Whilst NHS Lothian expressed confidence some savings would be achieved, it suggested “they were more likely to occur in services later in the life course”. It did not, however, expect to see a difference as quickly as the Scottish Government predicted and stated “the general consensus” among the child commissioners and the public health nursing advisory group was the financial model in Part 4 “is a bit off course.”\(^{126}\)

107. Similarly, Highland Council considered that, even now (three years after GIRFEC had been fully implemented), it was “fairly premature to look at the outcomes, but we are starting to see green shoots.”\(^{127}\) Highland Council did note, however, that the implementation of GIRFEC had brought savings, which it had decided to reinvest in early intervention and preventative services.\(^{128}\)

108. In response, Scottish Government officials told the Finance Committee they expected “intensive input” to result in a lesser requirement for support the following year—

“We would expect that early intervention will lead to less time being spent year on year ... The assumption is that the 10 hours that we invest on average ... will bear fruit and that such an intensive investment of health visitor time will not be needed as we go forward.” 129

109. The Finance Committee reported its concern about the disparity in evidence from health boards and the Scottish Government on costs and savings.

110. In response, the Scottish Government told us that “no health boards had taken a ‘big bang’ approach 130 to GIRFEC investment” and “so it is not possible to test the Financial Memorandum assumptions with real-world experience”. 131 Furthermore, the response refers to an evaluation of the implementation of GIRFEC 132, which indicated some savings in time had been identified because of fewer meetings and reports to write. However, as the evaluation found, it may be the case for many of these professionals that the savings are partially offset by their new responsibilities and tasks. 133

111. These comments indicate that there is some doubt as to whether the estimated savings will be realised in the timeframe set out in the Financial Memorandum.

112. The Financial Memorandum also refers to costs for training local authority and health board staff in relation to the named person role. It is assumed these would be one-off costs occurring in 2015-16 only. Whilst it acknowledges such training would also be required in future years, it states “going forward this training will then form part of standard Continued Professional Development (CPD), and be absorbed as part of the ongoing training requirements of these organisations” 134 135 However, COSLA considered ongoing training and support for teaching and other local authority staff “may not be simply addressed by one-off funding” 136.

Conclusions

113. We note that the implementation of GIRFEC in Highland was a success. That was, in part, as a result of the culture of integration and collaborative working across various frontline services. We invite the Scottish Government to provide details of the range of support it will make available to ensure that local authorities and health boards are able to replicate the successes experienced in Highland, recognising the different circumstances that will prevail in different parts of the country.

136 COSLA, supplementary written submission.
114. We believe the success of the named person role will depend on the Scottish Government’s ability to work with its local partners to clarify a number of practical issues, which we bring to the attention of the Parliament. These include the issues which a named person would be expected to handle outwith their core professional area; the types of intervention a named person would be expected to make; the point at which a named person would be expected to pass a case to a lead professional; the circumstances in which it would be appropriate for a named person to take on the role of lead professional; the ability of children and young people to have input into who is assigned as their named person; and the extent to which a named person would be expected to be involved with children and young persons for whom no support or intervention is required.

115. Concerns were expressed to us and the Finance Committee which cast doubt on the potential savings for health boards from the named person role. We note that this is, at least in part, due to a lack of real-world experience on which to base the financial assumptions. In view of this, we consider that further resource may be required for health boards to implement GIRFEC, and we recommend that the Scottish Government be prepared to make such support available where appropriate.

116. We also acknowledge the concerns about the capacity of health visitors and the numbers required to deliver the requirements in the Bill. This indicates to us that there are wider issues about health visitor numbers. The Scottish Government should therefore explain how it will ensure that the demands placed on health visitors across the entire policy landscape will be met.

117. We are concerned about the operation of the named person role during school holidays. This is an area that requires further consideration by the Scottish Government and its local partners.

118. Given Highland’s experience of implementing GIRFEC, the Scottish Government should explain how the proposal to assign a named person for young people who have left school and are under the age of 18 will work.

119. Finally, we note some views that the role of lead professional could usefully be included in the Bill. Whilst we understand the difficulties in legislating for the role, given that lead professionals may be employed from outside the public sector, we are concerned about the potential for confusion and lack of consistency in the way it will operate alongside the named person. We therefore recommend that the Scottish Government monitors the situation as these roles develop with a view to legislating for the lead professional in future, if necessary.

120. Whilst acknowledging the concerns raised in evidence about practical and resource issues, we support, in principle, the proposal to introduce the role of named person.\(^{137}\) \(^{138}\)

Part 4 – Information sharing

121. Where concerns about a child’s wellbeing exist, the Bill would allow information to be shared without the family’s consent. The current test for information sharing without consent is whether there is a ‘risk of significant harm’ to the child, although it has been shown that the application of the threshold can vary\textsuperscript{139}. The Bill proposes a lowering of the threshold and allows information to be shared without consent where there is a ‘concern about wellbeing’.\textsuperscript{140} Any information sharing would nevertheless have to be within the framework of the European Convention on Human Rights and the Data Protection Act 1998.

122. The decisions on whether to seek consent and what, if any, information to share, are left to the judgement of the professionals concerned, albeit with the aid of guidance. The Policy Memorandum explains that the power to share information in this way enables the named person to be able to perform their role effectively.\textsuperscript{141}

123. Our consideration has focused on understanding the circumstances in which a service provider or relevant authority ought to share information about wellbeing without consent, where there is no risk of significant harm to the child.

124. A number of witnesses voiced support for the proposals. Barnardo’s Scotland suggested that the lower threshold for sharing information would make it easier to identify concerns about a child at an earlier stage.\textsuperscript{142} Children in Scotland considered that, without the information-sharing provisions as proposed in the Bill, “we would not be able to achieve some of our aspirations for early intervention”.\textsuperscript{143}

125. However, the Govan Law Centre was concerned that the proposals would result in a diminution of an individual’s right to privacy. It described the Bill as proposing “a significant erosion of the right to privacy for children and families with few (if any) safeguards built in”.\textsuperscript{144} It also argued the broad definition of wellbeing would “inevitably leave the matter to subjective interpretation”, and questioned whether there was any justification for breaching an obligation of confidence and \textsuperscript{139} The Privacy Impact Assessment (PIA), which accompanies the Bill states: “Currently, information about a child may be shared where the child is at a significant risk of harm. The meaning of ‘at risk of significant harm’ may be construed differently by different people; therefore, it is important that a common understanding is reached and shared amongst all who work with children or with adults who have significant access to children.” (Page 5). The PIA is available at: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0041/00418731.pdf

\textsuperscript{140} The Bill requires information to be shared between service providers and relevant authorities (sections 26(1) and 26(3)). Relevant authorities are all those listed in Schedule 2. Service providers are health boards, local authorities, managers of independent and grant-aided schools and managers of secure accommodation (section 30).

sharing information about a “mild concern regarding any aspect of wellbeing”\textsuperscript{145}. In addition, the Law Centre criticised the Privacy Impact Assessment which accompanies the Bill, stating that it “does not demonstrate an appreciation of the purpose and requirements of data protection legislation (nor, indeed, other aspects of human rights legislation)”\textsuperscript{146}.

126. Other witnesses were concerned about the proposals’ impact on potentially vulnerable children and young people. For example, LGBT Youth Scotland felt that the Bill could exacerbate situations where the confidentiality and privacy of LGBT young people could be breached by allowing information about, for example, sexual orientation to be shared without consent.\textsuperscript{147} In relation to children and families living with domestic abuse, Scottish Women’s Aid was concerned that the proposal would be interpreted as “legislation for the sharing of any information about any child or young person, their family and family life and personal circumstances even where they are not considered to be at risk”.\textsuperscript{148}

127. Professor Kenneth Norrie referred to a lack of clarity in the Bill and described the drafting as having “huge ambiguities”\textsuperscript{149}. The terms ‘might be relevant’ and ‘ought to be shared’ that are used in section 26, were, he said, contradictory and so would leave it to the courts to strike the balance. He considered that section 27 was the worst part of the Bill and stated that “if you manage to strike it out and leave everything else, you will have achieved quite a lot”\textsuperscript{150}. His particular difficulty with section 27 was that it provided a “blanket defence to the prohibition on disclosing information”\textsuperscript{151}, which he felt, would significantly weaken the prohibitions included in other legislation\textsuperscript{152}.

128. The Information Commissioner’s Office (ICO) agreed with Professor Norrie’s concerns about section 27 and urged the Scottish Government to reconsider its content.\textsuperscript{153}

129. In addition, there was general agreement from witnesses representing the interests of education and health professionals that the drafting in sections 26 and 27 of the Bill would benefit from being “tightened up”\textsuperscript{154}. Overall, however, the witnesses felt that clear guidance would provide the necessary safeguards and give professionals confidence about what information they should and should not share.\textsuperscript{155}

130. In response to the general concerns about the information sharing provisions, the Minister emphasised the importance of establishing clear guidance, which would “enable and empower”\textsuperscript{156} professionals to make appropriate judgements on the information they share.

131. Following the evidence session, we invited the Minister to respond to the specific concerns about the breadth of sections 26 and 27. In relation to section 26, the Minister emphasised that the provisions “must be read in the context of being constrained by the ECHR and reserved legislation such as the data protection act”\textsuperscript{157}. She also referred to the work that the Government was doing to engage with various organisations to update the Privacy Impact Assessment, which included “exploring the potential impact of sections 26 and 27”\textsuperscript{158}. The Minister said this engagement activity and the evidence we received on information sharing would enable the Government to “fully consider all views on sections 26 and 27”\textsuperscript{159}.

Conclusions

132. We recognise the concerns raised by witnesses and welcome the Minister’s commitment to give further consideration to the information-sharing provisions in the Bill and, in particular, to “fully consider all views on sections 26 and 27”\textsuperscript{160}. We expect any necessary safeguards to be introduced at Stage 2. We suggest that, in considering what revisions to bring forward, the Scottish Government engages with those who have raised concerns about the drafting with us.

133. We agree that training and guidance for professionals will be absolutely crucial in determining the effectiveness of the proposals. All relevant service providers, including from the private and third sectors, must receive training and guidance in order to ensure there is a consistent approach to information-sharing. It is vital that the training and guidance engenders a common understanding of what constitutes proportionate, necessary information sharing.

134. Our expectation is that there should be a presumption that consent should be sought, however we recognise this will be left to the judgement of the professional concerned.

135. The Scottish Government is working with various groups to update the Privacy Impact Assessment (PIA) that accompanies the Bill. Given its significance, we request the Scottish Government makes it available to us at the earliest opportunity.

136. On a related matter, we received evidence about electronic information sharing by public bodies. Highland Council highlighted the ability to share information electronically as an important factor in ensuring that accurate and up to date information could be accessed by those who needed it.\textsuperscript{161} NHS Lothian referred to the development of joint IT infrastructure and information sharing as a key challenge under the Bill\textsuperscript{162}, and Falkirk Children’s Commission said there was a “lack of national IT support or coherent guidance”\textsuperscript{163}. In response to these concerns, the Scottish Government referred to the work of the Information Sharing Board that was funding local initiatives to improve information sharing as part of GIRFEC.\textsuperscript{164}

137. We note the evidence we received in relation to electronic information sharing. Concerns about the ability of organisations to share information electronically were also raised with us during our inquiries this Session. We therefore urge the Scottish Government to consider what further support it can provide to public services to improve their ability to share information in relation to the Bill.

138. The Bill proposes that a child’s plan must be created for any child who has a “wellbeing need” that requires “targeted intervention”.\textsuperscript{165} A child’s plan will require a local authority or health board to provide services to meet the wellbeing needs of a child, where those needs cannot be met by services provided to children generally.\textsuperscript{166}

139. The Bill does not alter the existing statutory duties on agencies to prepare co-ordinated support plans\textsuperscript{167} or plans for looked after children\textsuperscript{168}. This received some criticism. The Advisory Group for Additional Support for Learning considered that the Bill fell some way short of enabling a single co-ordinated approach to planning. It called for the opportunity to be taken to “harmonise the planning tools used for children into an efficient and coherent single plan”. Similarly, Glasgow City Council considered that, unless the child’s plan replaced existing plans under the Additional Support for Learning legislation, “we will continue to have a separate planning process and document”\textsuperscript{169}.

140. The importance of having a single child’s plan was also highlighted by a number of others. From its experience, Highland Council said the introduction of a single planning process and single plan had “achieved a transformational impact on assessment and action processes”\textsuperscript{170}.

141. Others commented that the child’s plan should include a dispute resolution process in the event of disagreement over its contents or delivery\textsuperscript{171}. It was also suggested that the views of children and young people should be taken into account in the development of a child’s plans\textsuperscript{172}.

142. The Minister confirmed the intention of the proposals in Part 5 was not to increase any bureaucracy, but to ensure there was a co-ordinated approach\textsuperscript{173}. She said the other statutory plans – the co-ordinated support plans and plans for looked after children – would be considered as part of the broader legislative framework for supporting the wellbeing of a child.\textsuperscript{174} However, she said cognisance would need to be taken of the new legislative landscape to “make sure that all the different parts of the legislation properly dovetail”\textsuperscript{175}.

143. We recommend that the Scottish Government ensures the child’s plan can be produced in such a way as to allow the easy incorporation of other statutory requirements.

144. We also recommend the Scottish Government considers the suggestions made in evidence to us calling for the inclusion in the Bill of a mechanism to resolve disputes in relation to a child’s plans, and for children and young people’s views to be taken into account in developing child’s plans.

Part 6 – Early learning and childcare

145. The Bill places a duty on local authorities to increase the amount of funded early learning and childcare\textsuperscript{176} from 475 hours per year to 600 hours, for 3 and 4 year olds. It would also extend provision for the most vulnerable 2 year olds who were or who had been, at any time since turning two, classed as ‘looked after’ or subject to a kinship care order (see Part 10).

\textsuperscript{172} Barnardo’s Scotland, Down’s Syndrome Scotland, Aberlour Child Care Trust, Includem, Youthlink. Written submissions.
\textsuperscript{176} The current requirement for 475 hours is defined as school education for children under school age. Early learning and care is still ‘school education’ (schedule 4 para 2). An additional definition is added by the Bill: “a service, consisting of education and care, of a kind which is suitable in the ordinary case for children who are under school age, regard being had to the importance of interactions and other experiences which support learning and development in a caring and nurturing setting” (section 42).
Extending entitlement

146. Whilst there was support for this Part of the Bill, there were calls to extend the entitlement. For example, Save the Children was disappointed the Bill did not go further "to drive the fundamental transformation in Scotland’s childcare infrastructure required to support children and families". It called for the Bill to extend the entitlement to all 2 year old children living in poverty, with a view to entitling all 2 year olds in the future. Several others wanted to see the provision extended to include 2 year olds with additional support needs or with disabilities, and for school age children.

147. The Minister told us that although she was not prepared to announce an extension to the coverage, the Bill was a "first step in transforming childcare" and it provided the opportunity to extend coverage at a later date, if required. She stated that "we want it to be a quality offering, done in a manageable and sustainable way, and that is what we are achieving through the provisions in the Bill and the funding that goes along with it".

148. The Scottish Government consultation on the Bill proposed a prescriptive approach requiring local authorities to offer the same minimum set of options to achieve consistent flexibility of early learning and childcare provision. The Explanatory Notes state that concerns about that proposal were received and, as a result, the Bill gives "local authorities more flexibility to determine choices and options for patterns of delivery".

149. In evidence, a number of organisations highlighted the importance of flexibility in the provision of early learning and childcare. We heard how increased flexibility, including after-school care (which is not covered by the Bill) and the ability to use the provision across two full days, would make it easier for parents to take up employment.

150. We also, however, heard that a large degree of flexibility could raise some concerns. The course director of the BA in Childhood Practice at the University of Strathclyde said that if children attended an early years establishment for seven and a half hours over two days they could have "difficulties settling and the continuity of their educational experience could be delivered in a patchwork manner". In addition, the course director suggested that if the additional hours were to be broken up into small amounts and added to several days in the week this could reduce the time available to staff for planning and training.

151. As COSLA stated, any flexibility in the pattern of service provision would be introduced incrementally—

“Following discussions with Scottish Government we agreed that the Bill would require local authorities to deliver the increased hours in as practical way as possible by August 2014 with no immediate requirement for more flexibility for parents. … In subsequent years additional flexibility will be introduced gradually, in consultation with parents, and within the overall resources made available by Scottish Government.”

152. COSLA told us that local authorities had the professional expertise to ensure that the service is provided as flexibly as possible.

153. The Minister said the reason for increasing the number of hours (from 475 to 600) was to provide more flexibility for parents and families who were struggling to balance work and life. She also said the Bill would allow families to have an input in the way in which the local authority configures its services.

Resources and costs

154. The provisions in Part 6 are the most expensive, with an estimated cost of £100m in the first full year of implementation. In its report on the Financial Memorandum, the Finance Committee raised a number of issues about the costs. It was particularly concerned about the partner provider payments made by local authorities to nurseries and sought further details from the Scottish Government on whether, for example, the costings were sustainable.

155. We also received evidence indicating a wide variation in partner provider payments. The National Day Nurseries Association (NDNA) suggested nurseries were underfunded to an average of £500 per child per year for early learning and childcare places. The NDNA also suggested the funding gap worked “against the objectives of a high quality professional workforce” because nurseries were “unable to provide salaries commensurate with a profession”. It called on the Scottish Government to “assess the level of funding needed centrally and explore mechanisms to protect that investment at local level‖. One option it suggested was to reintroduce a minimum floor\textsuperscript{193}.

156. COSLA responded to the call for a standard rate of payments to partner providers and stated “as the Bill is currently framed, no resource would be available to adjust the floor”\textsuperscript{194}. Its view was “the decision on rates paid for this service must fall within local decision making by councils, as they have the best understanding of the resources available to deliver all services”.\textsuperscript{195} The Scottish Government is content to leave the decision to individual local authorities on how much to pay partner providers.\textsuperscript{196}

157. The Minister also referred to the quality of care. She emphasised it was important that what was being provided had “to be of a quality that will respond to the real needs of children”\textsuperscript{197}. She suggested the work undertaken over the last few years “to make sure that the workforce is appropriately trained is paying dividends” and she said “we can have confidence that we are delivering a quality offering for three and four-year-olds”\textsuperscript{198}

Conclusions

158. We note that early years intervention is generally regarded as being of crucial importance to a child’s development and we support its proposed expansion. We also support the general desirability of continuing to expand this to two year olds as quickly as possible.

159. We welcome the Bill as a first step in the expansion of early learning and childcare, although a minority of us would like the Bill to go further.

160. Whilst we accept local authorities will need some time to ascertain the level of need locally, we urge the Scottish Government and COSLA to work to ensure that flexible arrangements are made available as quickly as possible to enable families to take advantage of the new provision.

161. We note the suggestion some nurseries are underfunded. We emphasise that the increase in supported hours of early learning and childcare must not have a detrimental effect on the quality of the service that is provided, or the sustainability of provision in the voluntary and private sectors.

162. On a related point, we heard calls for the Bill to revise the point at which children’s entitlement to supported childcare would begin. Currently, children are entitled to use the service from the start of the school term following their third birthday. It has been suggested this system is unfair in that the amount of childcare to which children are entitled depends on when their birthday falls.\(^\text{199}\) We wrote to the Scottish Government asking it to respond to those concerns and asking whether it intended to take any further action on the matter. The Government confirmed its policy intention was for the current entitlement to continue. It also stated that it encouraged local authorities to commence early learning and childcare closer to the child’s third birthday where they have capacity to do so. We invite the Scottish Government to provide further explanation of why it is not appropriate for the Bill to include measures on this matter.

Part 7 – Corporate parenting

163. The Bill places duties on a range of organisations\(^\text{200}\) that are to be regarded as ‘corporate parents’ for the purpose of working to meet the needs of looked after children and young people and care-leavers.\(^\text{201}\) The Bill also sets out particular responsibilities of corporate parents (section 52) and requires organisations to develop plans (section 53) and reports (section 55).

164. Currently, local authorities have legal duties towards looked after children and Government guidance sets out how community planning partners can act as corporate parents.

165. The Scottish Government believes there is a need to legislate in order to ensure the concept of corporate parenting is implemented consistently across Scotland and to increase awareness of the concept.\(^\text{202}\)

166. There was wide support for the concept of corporate parenting. In particular, Who Cares? Scotland said the Bill conveyed the right message about the need for public services to take responsibility as corporate parents.\(^\text{203}\) They emphasised though, that without detailed guidance the current ambiguity surrounding the role of corporate parents would continue.\(^\text{204}\) Others also highlighted the need for clarity in relation to, for example, the roles and responsibilities of adult health services when dealing with 16-25 year olds.\(^\text{205}\)

167. A number of comments questioned whether all the organisations listed as corporate parents should have such a role. For example, the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration felt the list had been too widely drawn and many of the organisations – including itself – should not be included. Also, it was concerned that conferring duties on such a wide list of organisations would run the risk of “diluting the core concept to the point that it loses all meaning”.\(^\text{206}\) Others too, did not see their roles as corresponding directly to the duties of a corporate parent, such as Children’s Hearings Scotland\(^\text{207}\) and the Scottish Court Service.\(^\text{208}\)

168. We asked the Scottish Government to explain why the list of organisations with corporate parenting duties had been drawn so widely. In response, it stated the list encompassed “as many organisations as possible that have a key role in the decision making processes that affect looked after children”\textsuperscript{209}.

Conclusions

169. We note the evidence received indicating that several organisations do not agree with their inclusion on the list of corporate parents. This risks diluting the concept of corporate parenting. In the absence of specific criteria, we seek further clarification from the Scottish Government about the reasoning underpinning the decisions to identify those with corporate parenting responsibilities.

Part 8 – Aftercare

170. The Bill places a duty on local authorities to continue to provide care-leavers with aftercare support up to the age of 26 (but only where they are classified as looked after at school-leaving age).\textsuperscript{210} If a person requests such additional support then a needs assessment\textsuperscript{211} must be carried out by the local authority.\textsuperscript{212}

171. We heard strong support for the proposal to extend aftercare, although several called for it to go even further. Who Cares? Scotland prepared a detailed proposal to give young care-leavers a right to return to care up to the age of 26. It argued for a care-leaver to be able to maintain their relationship with their core care provider, that is “someone who they know and trust”\textsuperscript{213}.\textsuperscript{214}

172. Others made similar points. The Fostering Network Scotland wanted young people in Scotland to have the opportunity to stay with their foster carers until the age of 21.\textsuperscript{215} Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People felt the Bill should “give young people who leave care aged 16-17 years and who subsequently become homeless, a right to be looked after and accommodated by the local authority”\textsuperscript{216}.

173. Others supported strengthening the Bill through extending the qualifying criteria for receiving aftercare. For example, Aberlour Child Care Trust called for the removal of the requirement in the Bill for an individual to be classified as looked after at school-leaving age. It suggested this was necessary in order to ensure support would be available to those who had left care but still required support. Others wanted the duties to apply to young people with disabilities, those in kinship care, and those with additional support needs.

174. In addition, there were concerns that local authorities would be given too much discretion to decide whether to provide support, and a number commented that an appeals mechanism should be included in the Bill.

175. In response to the calls to strengthen Part 8, the Minister was clear that adequate support should be provided to young people as they make the transition from care to independence. She said she was interested in the view of Who Cares? Scotland about providing support to the age of 26, and wanted to “ensure that the support we have in place is adequate and allows the young folk in question to have outcomes that are no different from those of their peers who are not looked after.” In addition, the Minister said she was sympathetic to some of the evidence seeking an extension to the qualifying threshold.

Conclusions

176. We have spent significant time examining the educational attainment of looked after children and decision making on whether to take children into care. It is clear from these inquiries that further work is required to improve outcomes for looked after children.

177. We welcome the positive comments from the Minister about her aim to ensure young care-leavers receive the support they require. Whilst the Bill will go some way to achieving this aim, we consider the range of support for our most vulnerable young people could be further enhanced.

178. We acknowledge the evidence that we heard from Who Cares? Scotland and others and invite the Government to respond to their suggestions that the Bill should include a right for care-leavers to return to care up to the age of 26; allow young people who have spent time in care, but are not in care at school-leaving age, to be eligible for aftercare; and include a mechanism enabling care leavers to appeal against decisions taken about the level of care they receive.

Part 9 – Counselling services

179. This Part of the Bill would require local authorities to provide counselling services to parents (or individuals with parental rights and responsibilities) for an ‘eligible’ child.

180. There is minimal detail included in the Bill. The definition of an eligible child, together with descriptions of the types of services to be included, are to be specified in regulations. 226

181. We sought clarification from the Scottish Government about the intention of this Part of the Bill. In response, the Government confirmed counselling services would be available where a child’s wellbeing was at risk and particularly where a child was at risk of being taken into care. In such cases, access to counselling services would act as “an early and effective intervention to support parents.” 227

182. The lack of detail in the Bill was criticised by some who provided evidence. For example, COSLA suggested it was difficult for local authorities to be able to assess the impact of the proposals on the basis that “local authorities are to provide undefined counselling services to parents or those with parental rights and responsibilities of an undefined group of children.” 228

183. In its report to us on the delegated powers within the Bill, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee considered that the order making powers providing for eligibility for counselling should be made under the affirmative procedure rather than negative procedure as specified in the Bill. 229

184. Other witnesses suggested the term ‘counselling services’ was unhelpful 230 and too prescriptive 231. In particular, the British Association for Counselling and Psychotherapy (BACP) highlighted references in the Financial Memorandum to family therapy, family mediation and family conferencing and appeared to suggest they had been incorrectly described as falling under the umbrella of counselling. The BACP also highlighted what it considered to be a significant omission, namely the absence of counselling support for children and young people themselves.

Conclusions

185. We note the calls for further information on the measures to be provided and request that the Scottish Government provides such information as early as possible.

186. We agree with the recommendation of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee that, due to the significance of eligibility for these matters, the affirmative procedure should apply rather than the negative procedure.

Part 10 – Support for kinship care

187. The Bill places a duty on local authorities to provide kinship care assistance to families that have obtained, or are in the process of obtaining, a kinship care order, for an eligible child.232

188. The Policy Memorandum states that the rationale for the legislative change is to “encourage more individuals to become kinship carers for those children who do not require regular supervision or corporate parenting”.233 The Financial Memorandum states that part of the purpose of the kinship care order and the accompanying measures “is to reduce unchecked growth in formal kinship care”.234

Context

189. As this section of our report refers to some specific terms, we provide a description of the main ones to assist understanding. Kinship care is the care of children by their extended family or a close friend of the family. Where the child is placed by the local authority, then the child is ‘looked after’ (also called formal kinship care). However, for the majority of children, kinship care arrangements are made privately between family members without local authority involvement (known as informal kinship care). In cases where there is some local authority involvement, unless the child is placed by the local authority as a looked after child, this is still informal kinship care.

190. There are a number of ways in which local authorities can provide support to kinship carers. Local authorities can provide discretionary support to any kinship carer, and this can include a financial allowance. For those in formal kinship care arrangements, the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009 set out requirements for assessment and support. In neither case is there a set, national minimum payment.

191. Payments made to all kinship carers are disregarded as income under the UK Government benefits system. However, if a person is a kinship carer of a looked after child and receiving a local authority payment for accommodation or maintenance, they cannot claim child benefit and child tax credit for that child. This is to avoid the situation where double payments are made. They will however receive the income disregard for other benefits they might claim, such as housing or council tax benefit.

Detail of provisions

192. As the Financial Memorandum states, a kinship care order is not a new statutory order, but is the new name given to section 11 orders235, where such an order is issued to a kinship carer. The main difference between the existing section 11 orders and the proposed kinship care orders is that the latter attaches, where the child is eligible, the provision of kinship care assistance.

235 These orders are made under section 11 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. Section 11’ orders regulate parental rights and responsibilities and can currently be applied for by kinship carers in order to give legal underpinning to the child’s residence with them

193. The criteria for determining whether a child is eligible to receive kinship care assistance will be included in regulations. However, the Scottish Government told us its intention is that an eligible child will be one “whose wellbeing would be at risk of being impaired and, in particular, where they are at risk of coming into care, if the kinship care assistance is not made available”.

194. The types of support that will constitute kinship care assistance will also be included in regulations. However, the Bill specifies that such support could include counselling, advice or information, financial support, or any service provided by a local authority on a subsidised basis.

Financial support under a kinship care order

195. The range of support envisaged under the Bill, particularly the inclusion of financial support, was broadly welcomed. However, a number of organisations expressed concern about the level of support that would be provided to kinship carers.

196. The Scottish Kinship Care Alliance was particularly critical and believed that the kinship care order was “not fit for its stated purpose of supporting more kinship carers, or increasing permanence in kinship care placements”. It argued that the primary reason for this was “because there is no guarantee of additional support as part of the proposed kinship care order”.

197. The Scottish Kinship Care Alliance was also concerned that any support provided under a kinship care order would not be comparable to what was provided to kinship carers of looked after children. It called for the same level of support to be offered and specifically mentioned priority access to specialist psychological and educational services, through-care or after-care services, and passported benefits such as school meals and uniform allowances. Citizens Advice Scotland felt that not including ongoing financial assistance under the order, gave credence to the position that “looked after and not looked after children in kinship care fall neatly into two distinct groups, with the former having more serious care needs that require greater financial support”.

198. Another key concern was the level of local authority discretion in awarding any payments. The Child Poverty Action Group (CPAG) Scotland stated that “if local authorities are enabled rather than obliged to provide financial assistance to kinship carers, there will be a strong likelihood of a ‘postcode lottery’ of support developing.” Although the Association of Directors of Social Work acknowledged there were differences in the payments local authorities made to kinship carers, it argued that there needed to be “significant local determination of what is required in an area”. 243

199. We asked the Scottish Government to respond to the concerns that kinship carers would not receive adequate support under the Bill. Government officials confirmed that they had begun to consult with stakeholders about the content of the regulations, and that some aspects of these concerns would be addressed in the context of its ongoing review of allowances paid to kinship carers of looked after children 244.

Kinship care orders and the UK benefits system

200. CPAG Scotland, and a number of others, questioned how the kinship care order would interact with the UK benefits system. Whilst the Bill should avoid most, if not all, of those difficulties (as children would no longer have looked after status), CPAG asked whether any financial assistance provided under a kinship care order would be disregarded as income under the benefits system. CPAG was concerned that if such payments were not disregarded, the financial assistance might simply be clawed back.

201. In written evidence, the Scottish Government stated that a holder of a kinship care order would be “recognised as any parent would be within the benefits system” 245. Therefore, the “kinship carer can claim the same benefits such as Child Benefit and Child Tax Credit as any parent would”.

202. We discussed the potential for claw-back with the Minister and Scottish Government officials in relation to transitional payments 246. They confirmed that where a kinship carer received a payment under the benefits system this would be deducted from any transitional payment made under a kinship care order.

203. We raised these issues with the UK Department for Work and Pensions and HM Revenue and Customs and extracts from their responses are included below.

204. Department for Work and Pensions—

“Without knowing the precise details and purpose of the financial support that will be provided to kinship carers under the new Bill, we cannot guarantee that it will have no effect on benefit entitlement. [...] If the intention is that the new payments broadly replace or replicate the purpose of these existing payments, it is very likely that we would recommend to our Ministers that they too would be disregarded. However, if the new payments are significantly more generous or for a different purpose, we would need to consider whether a disregard could still be justified.\(^{247}\)

205. HM Revenue and Customs—

“Under the ‘informal’ Kinship Care proposals, and subject to receiving details of what payments will actually be made, it appears that the children will no longer be considered to be ‘looked after’ by the Local Authority and, as a consequence, the Kinship Carer would be able to claim Child Tax Credit. We would need to see your draft regulations to understand precisely what will be paid out before a final view could be given.

“Similarly, in relation to Child Benefit, it is not yet clear from the information provided what package of support will ultimately be available. We would need to look at this again once the secondary legislation has been drafted but our initial view is that Child Benefit would continue to be available to the Kinship Carer in respect of the children being informally looked after. There is one exception to this generalisation and that is in relation to the transition from ‘formal’ to ‘informal’ Kinship Care where a top-up payment of £70 per week could be paid for up to 3 years where equivalent support is not available through the UK benefits system. We’re not certain what that means in practice and would need to understand more about these payments before a final view could be given.”\(^{248}\)

Resources and the cost of kinship care orders

206. The Financial Memorandum predicts that from 2017-18 between 6% and 11% of kinship carers of looked after children would apply for kinship care orders; and that between 1.5% and 3.5% of kinship carers of not looked after children would apply for an order.

207. In its report, the Finance Committee highlighted evidence it received from local authorities, which “cast doubt” on these assumptions.\(^{249}\) The City of Edinburgh Council, for example, did not think there was robust evidence that families would move from a position in which their child is looked after (where they receive a set of resources to support that situation), to the new kinship care order. In relation to children who are not looked after, the Council felt the estimate in the Financial Memorandum was an underestimate and therefore the costs falling on local authorities would be greater than predicted. COSLA also highlighted what it saw as “considerable uncertainty over how many families will take up an order” and considered that the financial risk facing local government was “potentially significant”.

208. The Finance Committee specifically asked us to seek further details from the Scottish Government on the estimated costs associated with diverting children from formal kinship care. The Government’s response re-stated its belief that the order would be an attractive alternative to formal kinship carers. However, it also acknowledged that it was “very difficult to model [the costs/savings], because of the complex behaviour of children going in and out of care”.

Conclusions
209. We agree with the principle that children ought not to be classed as ‘looked after’ for any longer than is necessary and welcome the aim to reduce the number of children in formal kinship care.

210. However, we acknowledge concerns that ‘looked after’ status can sometimes be seen as a gateway to resources and support. We consider it is crucial that local authority support provided under the Bill’s kinship care order is based on the needs of the child rather than resources or legal status. The transition from being ‘looked after’ to not being ‘looked after’ should not mean the removal of support still required by kinship carers and their families. To this end, we welcome the kinship care order with its duty requiring local authorities to provide assistance and consider this has the potential to ensure any necessary support is provided.

211. We recognise, however, the concerns raised by some kinship carers about the level of support available under the kinship care order and that much will depend on the detail of the regulations and how local authorities implement the provisions. We therefore welcome the Scottish Government’s work in engaging with stakeholders, including local authorities and groups representing kinship carers, on the contents of the regulations and ask the Government to reassure kinship carers about the level of support they can expect to receive under the new arrangements.

212. The Scottish Government Financial Review of kinship care expects to report by the end of 2013. We will consider its findings in due course. The Government should ensure the findings can be easily integrated into the regulations being developed under the Bill.

213. We invite the Scottish Government to provide details of the action it is taking to ensure that payments under the kinship care order will be disregarded as income in terms of the benefits system. We would be concerned if such support was not disregarded in this way and urge the Scottish Government to work closely with the relevant UK Government departments on the development of the regulations under this Part, to ensure clarity about what kinship carers can and cannot expect to receive.

Part 11 – Adoption register

214. The Bill will put Scotland’s Adoption Register\textsuperscript{252} on a statutory footing and give the Scottish Ministers responsibility for making arrangements for establishing and maintaining the Register. The Bill will require local authorities and registered adoption services to provide specified information for the Register so that there is a list of prospective adopters and children in respect of whom no match has been found.\textsuperscript{253}

215. The Policy Memorandum states this will increase the number of adoptions.\textsuperscript{254} Scottish Government officials said some adoption agencies were reluctant to refer their prospective adopters to the existing (non-statutory) Register, despite not being able to match them with any children locally. The Government stated that it envisaged “the statutory requirement on adoption agencies to use the Register will address this issue and increase the Register’s effectiveness.”\textsuperscript{255}

216. The organisations that responded on this Part supported a national register, although several questioned it being compulsory. For example, the British Association for Adoption and Fostering (BAAF), which is currently responsible for administering the existing non-statutory Register, did not consider it necessary to require mandatory referral of children to the Register, “as the current system operates satisfactorily without compulsion.”\textsuperscript{256}

217. The Association of Directors of Social Work (ADSW) preferred the use of “clear timescales and options”\textsuperscript{258} rather than the compulsory approach taken in the Bill. However, the ADSW Sub-Group on Adoption and Fostering acknowledged there could be a need for compulsion if guidance failed to increase referrals and use of the Register.\textsuperscript{259} COSLA also hesitated to support the proposal in the Bill and suggested that moving to a national adoption register through compulsion for local authorities “should only be considered where there is complete confidence that it is in the interests of children to do this.”\textsuperscript{260}

218. In addition, BAAF highlighted its concern about a technical provision, which would prohibit an adoption agency from disclosing information about a child who it considered ought to be placed for adoption, without the express consent of the child’s parent or guardian. BAAF felt this would “make referral to the Register much more difficult” and suggested adoption was possible against the wishes of parents where the court is satisfied their consent should be dispensed with. BAAF argued that, if consent was to be required before a child could be referred to the Register, this would mean “an essentially administrative part of the pre-court procedure will be more restrictive than adoption court proceedings themselves”\textsuperscript{261}.

219. \textbf{We support the aim of enabling more children, particularly those who are looked after, to be matched with suitable adopted families without having to experience delays. We consider the compulsory nature of the Register will mean the remainder of local authorities and adoption agencies will join the Register, thereby increasing the chances of a suitable match.}

220. \textbf{However, we note the concerns raised in evidence by, for example, the British Association for Adoption and Fostering and invite the Scottish Government to respond to these points.}

\textbf{Part 12 – Other reforms}

221. The Bill includes a number of smaller, less contentious issues that did not receive much, if any, comment in the evidence we received. A brief outline of those that received most interest is included below.

\textit{Children’s hearings}

222. The Bill proposes changes to the establishment and administration of Area Support Teams (ASTs)\textsuperscript{262}. It seeks to replace the existing obligation on the National Convener of Children’s Hearings Scotland (CHS) – to require the consent of each constituent local authority before making changes to the future configuration of ASTs – with a requirement to consult. The Policy Memorandum states this change will result in a “simpler, more streamlined process, which is quicker, more efficient and nationally consistent”\textsuperscript{263}. Secondly, the Bill places a duty on local authorities to provide ASTs with administrative support. This will ensure the provision of support is “more standardised across the country”\textsuperscript{264}.

223. COSLA highlighted concern that these changes raised “an issue of principle about the head of a national body potentially acting against a decision of a democratically elected authority”\textsuperscript{265}.

224. CHS supported the proposals and stated it “recognised the crucial role played by local authorities in supporting panel members and within the Children’s Hearings System”\textsuperscript{266}. The Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration agreed and also emphasised that it would remain important for the Convener of CHS to seek to engage with local authorities and “wherever possible, to get their agreement”\textsuperscript{267}.

\textsuperscript{261} British Association for Adoption and Fostering, supplementary comments provided to the Committee Clerk

Conclusion

225. On balance, we believe the proposals have the potential to streamline the establishment and administration of Area Support Teams (ASTs) and put the interests of children first, and note the requirement to consult on changes to ASTs.

Schools consultation

226. The Bill makes a minor change to the administrative process when a school closure proposal is made under the Schools (Consultation) Act 2010.268

227. However, the Scottish Government intends to lodge a number of amendments to this section at Stage 2.269 In a letter to us, the Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning said the purpose of the amendments is to implement recommendations from the Commission on the Delivery of Rural Education and the findings of the Court of Session in a judicial review concerning school closures in Comhairle nan Eilean Siar.

228. The amendments will relate to the following six topics—

- presumption against closure
- providing financial information in closure proposals
- clarifying and expanding Education Scotland’s role
- the basis for determining school closure proposals
- establishing an independent referral mechanism
- a five-year moratorium on repeating a school closure proposal

229. In order to inform our scrutiny of these matters, we will take evidence from key stakeholders before Stage 2 begins.

The Convener: Next is our first oral evidence on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, from Scottish Government officials. Because of the number of issues that are raised by the bill, we will have two panels, the first of which will deal with parts 1 to 5, which cover rights, children's services planning and getting it right for every child. We will take further oral evidence in September and October, including from the Minister for Children and Young People. That meeting will be the opportunity for members to get ministers' views and comments on the detailed policy decisions.

I welcome our first panel. There are rather a lot of you, so I will not give everybody's title, if you do not mind. We have Elisabeth Campbell, Gordon McNicoll, Scott Wood, Boyd McAdam, Lynn Townsend and Stuart Robb, all from the Scottish Government. I invite Elisabeth Campbell to make a brief opening statement.

Elisabeth Campbell (Scottish Government): I am the bill team leader for the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, which my colleagues and I are grateful to be here to discuss. The provisions are fairly wide ranging, so a number of officials are present in order that we can answer your questions as fully as possible.

The bill is fundamental to the Scottish Government's aim of making Scotland the best place in the world to grow up. It will put children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services, and will ensure that their rights are respected across the public sector.

The bill will also ensure that children's rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services and it will increase the powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People. It will improve the way that services support children and families by promoting co-operation between services, and it will strengthen the role of early years support in children’s lives by increasing the amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare. It will also ensure better permanence planning for looked-after children by improving support for kinship carers, families and care leavers; extend corporate parenting across the public sector; and put Scotland's national adoption register on a statutory footing.

The scale of the Government's ambition for children and young people is significant, and the very strong response to the consultation on the bill makes it clear that the Scottish Government is not alone in holding such high aspirations for the children and young people of this country. The bill will bring about a step change in the way in which all services support children and young people, and it will inspire renewed debate and ambition for what Scotland’s children and young people can expect. There is clearly an appetite for that kind of change. My colleagues and I will be delighted to answer questions from the committee.

Liz Smith: I think that we all agree that one of the greatest difficulties and complexities that the committee is grappling with is partly ethical and partly legal: if we extend the rights of children, there are implications for the rights of parents and other groups. The committee would welcome information on where the Government and the bill team are in seeking advice on that.

Our briefing notes for this morning mention that there has been a request regarding the incorporation into Scots law of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. How are you addressing that issue? What stage are you at?

Scott Wood (Scottish Government): As regards the balancing of the rights and responsibilities of parents against those of children and young people, the UN convention is clear on parents having primary responsibility and taking the lead role in raising children and young people.

On the question of incorporating the convention, ministers are not against making targeted changes to domestic law that build on the requirements of the UNCRC. They will tend to make those changes where they think that they will directly benefit children and young people, and where they think that the changes will ultimately strengthen our approach to children’s rights overall.

Ministers are not supportive of wholesale incorporation of the convention—of lifting the convention in its entirety and dropping it directly into Scots law. They do not feel that that would necessarily take us forward from where we are at the moment. Very little evidence has been shared with ministers that sets out the benefits of taking that approach, and the limited evidence that we have seen suggests that benefits lie primarily in relation to improved culture within services and increased awareness of children’s rights. We want to deliver those benefits, but we do not think that wholesale incorporation necessarily represents the best and most effective way of going about that.

For instance, we are seeking, through the bill, to improve the culture within public services through effective embedding of getting it right for every child, which is an approach that builds on the principles of the convention. We are also taking steps through the bill to place a new duty on the Scottish ministers to promote awareness and understanding.

There is some risk that wholesale incorporation could result in far too much emphasis being placed on the courts and on legal processes to address the range of often complex issues that can impact on this agenda.

Liz Smith: When could you provide us with the legal advice that you think is appropriate to the decision not to incorporate the whole convention?

Scott Wood: I do not think that we would seek to offer any legal advice to the committee on that issue. It is a policy decision for ministers whether they wish to pursue incorporation of the convention.

Liz Smith: We have to make a decision. If we extend the rights of children, which is part of the basis of the bill, we have to be clear about the implications for and knock-on effects on other rights. What I am driving at is that we have to make an informed decision, which depends partly on legal advice. If it is not the intention of the bill team to provide that, from where else would that advice be forthcoming prior to the start of stage 1?

Scott Wood: It is important to recognise that we are not seeking to extend the rights that are available to children and young people. Irrespective of whether the convention is incorporated into Scots law, the Scottish ministers have a responsibility to implement the UNCRC. The duty is about increasing transparency and accountability around how ministers go about that. It requires ministers to evidence how they are considering the convention when they are taking decisions that impact on children and young people.

Liz Smith: In some areas of the bill, particularly in respect of the named person, do the provisions not increase the rights of the child?

Scott Wood: I apologise. Perhaps it is better for Boyd McAdam or Lynn Townsend to comment specifically on named persons. I was talking in the context of part 1 of the bill, which focuses on the UNCRC.

Boyd McAdam (Scottish Government): The named person provisions set up a framework that is made available to children but does not give children additional rights; it provides a structure for services to support children. The rights issue is very much in relation to UNCRC. Article 3 recognises the rights of parents but does not indicate precisely how they are balanced. The UNCRC applies at present and there is no intention to adjust or extend that.

Liz Smith: So, there is no intention in the bill to extend the rights of children.

Boyd McAdam: No.

Neil Bibby: I believe that a number of organisations have requested that a children’s rights impact assessment be carried out on the bill, but I understand that that has not been done. Can you tell me the reasons behind that?

Elisabeth Campbell: Absolutely. It is essential to understand the impact of the bill on the rights of children and young people, which is why we engaged with over 2,400 of them during the bill’s development. A report on children’s views has been published on the Scottish Government website. In addition, we carried out an equality impact assessment on the bill, which looked at the impact on children and young people, based on a number of factors, including age, gender and religion. We also carried out a non-mandatory privacy impact assessment that looked at the impact on privacy factors for children and their families.

The children’s commissioner’s model for a stand-alone children’s rights impact assessment states that the point of it is to look at and raise awareness of children’s interests in policy or legislation. I feel that we have covered all of that by engaging with children and young people and doing all the other impact assessments that we did, and by explaining the rationale behind the bill’s proposals in the policy memorandum. We have not done it in a separate stand-alone document, but what we have done is more extensive than what would have been done for a stand-alone children’s rights impact assessment.

Neil Bibby: There are concerns that parts of the bill—for example, the named person aspect—could breach the UNCRC around the child’s right to privacy. Have you assessed that from a children’s rights point of view?

Boyd McAdam: On the impact of the provisions on the child and the family, there is a balance to be struck, particularly with regard to article 8 of the UNCRC on respect for family life. Part of the named person provisions and the information sharing provisions that relate to getting information to named persons are couched in terms of their being proportionate, appropriate and justified. Before sharing information, a practitioner must have a reason for doing so and must share appropriate information with the right person—that is covered by the Data Protection Act 1998. We feel that, given the proportionality element, the provisions are compliant with ECHR and the UNCRC.

Neil Bibby: I understand that, before the consultation, it was proposed that “due regard” would be given to the UNCRC but that people responded in the consultation to say that that aspect should be strengthened. However, following the consultation, the bill uses the phrase “keep under consideration”. Can you tell me the reasons for that change?

Scott Wood: Yes. A couple points arise from that. First, I will focus on stakeholders’ views of our proposals. When we consulted last year on proposals to legislate on children’s rights, about 70 per cent of respondents to the consultation agreed that our proposals would help to strengthen transparency and accountability around ministers’ approach to the UNCRC, but only about 15 per cent felt that the proposals did not go far enough and that they would like to see incorporation of the UNCRC. That suggests to us that we have got the focus about right on the nature of the duties that we seek to place on ministers through the bill.

On a “due regard” duty, whenever we introduce a new duty for ministers or anyone else, it is important that we are clear about its likely impact. We feel that we do not have that clarity in respect of a “due regard” duty. The concept of having due regard to international law is a new one in Scotland; there is no legal precedent for it and there is no case law to support us in understanding how the courts might interpret a duty of that nature. We think that, in this instance, that lack of clarity is an unnecessary risk. We have therefore sought through the bill to formulate a duty that accurately reflects exactly what ministers are looking to deliver.

The Convener: Liam McArthur has a question. Is it a supplementary on this area?

Liam McArthur: Yes. I acknowledge what you said, Mr Wood, in relation to the non-incorporation in the bill of the UNCRC, and I think that I am right in saying that you reflected that one of the potential benefits of the bill will be cultural change. We have heard from the minister this morning, in relation to improving outcomes for looked-after children, about the importance of cultural change, so I do not think that it is terribly helpful to downgrade the importance of that cultural change.

Scott Wood: Absolutely not.

Liam McArthur: Therefore, I am still trying to get my head round why ministers have decided not to incorporate, but instead, in a sense, to cherry pick the elements of the UNCRC that they see a need to implement through the bill.

Scott Wood: One factor is that limited evidence has been presented to ministers that suggests that incorporation provides benefits in terms of culture change and improved awareness and understanding. It would be beneficial to have a more robust evidence base on which to form any future view about incorporation.

We also have to weigh up the benefits against the potential risks of incorporating the convention. As I said, we feel that there is potential for incorporation to place far too much emphasis on the courts and on legal processes. We certainly do not want to end up in a situation in which the courts are considered to be the go-to forum for addressing the range of issues that impact on children in Scotland. We think that we can deliver many of the benefits through other avenues—through other provisions that are set out in the bill. We do not think that incorporation represents the best way to progress the rights agenda at this time.

Liam McArthur: If you were to put the rights in legislation, I presume that there would still be a risk that the issue would ultimately end up in the courts anyway, in terms of testing the legal status of whatever the rights were.

Scott Wood: That would depend on the focus of the duty that was being introduced. Gordon will add something on that.

Gordon McNicoll (Scottish Government): It is certainly correct that if you impose any duty on anybody—on ministers in particular—there is a risk of litigation, because someone will argue that ministers have failed to fulfil whatever duty has been imposed on them.

The position that ministers have taken, however, is that the focus is on education—on changing the culture—as has been explained. It is considered that that will best be achieved through the approach that has been taken in the bill. Ministers would prefer not to see the emphasis being on pursuit of litigation through the courts on rights that, in their view, should more properly be developed through education and through a change of culture.

Liam McArthur: You have identified potential benefits—albeit not necessarily on as robust an evidence base as you may have wished for—so is it fair to say that, through the evidence process that the committee is embarking on now, there is still willingness among ministers to look again at the issue if such evidence were to be put forward?

Scott Wood: It would be premature of us to say what ministers’ future views might be in the light of emerging evidence. However, I can certainly state that based on the evidence that ministers have seen to date, their view is that incorporation does not represent the best way to progress the agenda at this time.

Neil Findlay: It is always dangerous to ask a question that you do not know the answer to, but I will anyway. What other countries have carried out full incorporation?
Scott Wood: We do not have an exhaustive list. I know that Ireland has recently made changes to its constitution to embed rights more effectively within that constitution. The United Nations Children’s Fund undertook some research last year that looked at the approach to legal implementation of the convention in 12 countries in total. Three of those 12 countries had taken the step of incorporating the convention into law. We do not have an exhaustive list of the range of countries that have progressed the issue, but I am certainly happy to share the UNICEF report with committee members if that would be helpful, so that you can see the range of different approaches that have been adopted in progressing the issue.

The Convener: That would be helpful. Liz, did you have a question?

Liz Smith: I was just going to say that it would be very helpful to see that report.

The Convener: Yes, I am sure that it would be.

The bill also gives the Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People powers to investigate individual cases, which was pushed for back in 2003, when the post of children’s commissioner came into being, but did not happen at that time. What is the difference now as regards the children’s commissioner’s ability to undertake investigations?

Scott Wood: I can certainly talk a bit about the process that led to the development of the provisions in the bill. When ministers first proposed to legislate on children’s rights, they did not propose to extend the powers that are available to the children’s commissioner. Even without the question being asked, a significant number of stakeholders came back to us to suggest that we should actively consider including in the bill a provision on that.

We listened to that and we developed a set of proposals that were set out in a consultation that focused on the bill, which was published last June. Again, the majority of respondents suggested that there was scope for the new investigatory function to offer direct benefit to children and young people, and broader learning, in terms of practice in front-line services.

Since then, we have had a number of conversations with the other complaints-handling bodies in Scotland in order to understand better how the children’s commissioner’s investigatory power might add value, and how it should align with the range of other complaints-handling processes that are in place, because we do not want to duplicate activity. The feedback that we have had is that, by and large, there is consensus across the complaints-handling bodies that there is scope for the new investigatory power to add benefit to children and young people.

We think that the investigation function should be exercised in a fairly targeted and strategic way. That is based on the premise that we already have a fairly robust complaints-handling landscape in Scotland. We expect the number of instances in which it would be necessary for the commissioner to intervene to be quite limited.

We think that any investigation should offer benefit to the child or young person in question, but investigations should also offer wider learning and be targeted so as to inform the wider work of the children’s commissioner’s office. The approach should be strategic.

We recognise that it would be helpful to the committee to have particular examples of the types of investigations in which the children’s commissioner might be involved. We recently held a meeting with the complaints-handling bodies and the commissioner, at which it was agreed that they would develop some such examples over the summer, with a view to sharing them with the committee towards the end of the recess.

The Convener: That would be helpful.

I would like you to clarify something. As the bill stands, it proposes that investigations could, in effect, be undertaken only when they did not overlap with the work of others. I am struggling. A number of bodies undertake work in this area, so examples would help us understand what exactly the added value would be.

Scott Wood: Absolutely. We will be happy to share them as and when they become available.

Liam McArthur: The Finance Committee will look at the bill’s financial memorandum. However, if there is an agreed understanding of the level of activity, and therefore of the cost implications, that would be very helpful to us.

Scott Wood: The estimate that we set out in the financial memorandum was based on the premise that the commissioner would undertake a fairly small number of investigations—the assumption was that there would be between one and four—each year. We have shared that assumption with the commissioner and it has been the basis for our discussions until now.

Liam McArthur: The bill looks to put GIRFEC—a policy that has been in place since 2006—on a statutory footing. We heard earlier from the minister about the value that she could see in a number of cases of that move to provide a consistent approach. Can you explain where to date there have been inconsistencies? Are there geographic areas in which best practice has not been applied as it might have been? That is relevant to the committee’s inquiry, which we are drawing to a conclusion, as well as to the bill that we are about to embark on.
Boyd McAdam: The GIRFEC programme board has set up an implementation working group, which is engaging with community planning partnerships to get a better feel of where each area is on implementing GIRFEC. We are at a level at which everyone has corporate buy-in. Most areas are implementing the new processes into their key business areas, and two or three believe that they have progressed implementation to the point at which they are comfortable that they could comply with the proposed duties in the bill.

The areas that are looking for further assistance are looking for information and information-sharing materials around training, to help staff to understand how to move forward in consistent way. Lynn Townsend may speak a bit more about the work that we are doing on developing guidance. We are proposing a national training event in the next six to eight months to help people to understand how they can progress.

A report has just been issued by the implementation working group, which we can share with the committee. We are not identifying particular areas; everyone is at a different stage in their journey, but the key message is that work is well under way and we anticipate that by about this time next year implementation of GIRFEC will be well advanced.

Liam McArthur: What you describe would not necessarily require legislation, although I appreciate that it is a response to the legislation. Can you explain the rationale for going down the legislative route rather than for buttressing the policy guidance, the training and all the rest of it?

Boyd McAdam: Among the feedback that we have received as we have progressed to implementation is that people are looking for a structure within which all the activity will take place. Ministers were concerned that progress on implementation was not happening as fast as might have been anticipated. As Liam McArthur said, the GIRFEC policy has been around since 2005-06, although the actual GIRFEC approach was finalised only in 2009-10, following the pathfinder work in Highland and the learning partnerships.

We have been advocating change, but people need help to move forward. The approach is part of the big culture change that we are talking about around rights, and it requires a lot of planning, process and leadership. The bill provides the framework within which all that can happen, so that there is clarity about the role of the named person and about when information should be shared. We feel that those provisions should go in legislation, but there is still a lot of on-going activity around guidance to help people to understand what they need to do.

Liam McArthur: Concerns were expressed earlier about the UNCRC not being integrated wholesale into the legislation. I think that I am right in saying that we are not seeing wholesale integration of GIRFEC into legislation either. The absence of legislation for the lead professional to take over from the named person in complex cases is one example that has been cited. Given that some of GIRFEC will have a statutory underpinning and some of it will not, is there a potential problem in providing the consistency to which the minister—given her evidence this morning—clearly attaches considerable value?

Boyd McAdam: We describe the provisions in the bill as the key elements of GIRFEC and they are the elements on which we can legislate. A combination of practice change, systems change and culture change is required.

Liam McArthur: I am sorry for interrupting, but the phrase “on which we can legislate” tends to suggest that this is a question of what lends itself to legislation as opposed to its being a policy choice. The provision on the lead professional appears to be a policy choice, rather than a choice based on ability to legislate. You are, after all, legislating for the named person.

Boyd McAdam: The rationale is that the named person is located within the universal services of health and education and we can place a statutory responsibility on those bodies to make arrangements to provide a named person. The lead professional will be the person who is best placed to address the needs and risk of the child, and so can be drawn from any service; they will not necessarily be located within health or education. It is therefore difficult to place a duty on an individual body to make the arrangements for the lead professional. We believe that how that system will work will best be sorted out by protocols across agencies in a community planning partnership.

Liam McArthur: Is there not a risk that you will create a two-tier dimension to GIRFEC, because some of it will have a statutory underpinning and some will not? There will always be a gravitational pull to the statutory elements, and inconsistencies will arise in relation to the non-statutory elements, whether it be in respect of the lead professional or other aspects?

Boyd McAdam: The guidance groups that are being developed are working with stakeholders from across all the services to ensure that what emerges is something that they are confident in, that will make a difference and that will deliver consistency. Lynn Townsend might want to say a bit more about the guidance; there is a combination of statute and guidance.

Lynn Townsend (Scottish Government): The policy view on the provisions in the bill that cover a child’s plan and the named person was that the role of the lead professional follows from both those duties. Interestingly, in terms of implementation, most areas are already quite happy with the lead professional role, because that role has been around in practice for a number of years where an integrated assessment has been in place. The guidance will address management of the plan and the lead professional role will feature in how we frame the guidance.

Clare Adamson: Part 13 of the bill introduces a statutory definition of wellbeing. Given that welfare is already included in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, will you explain the differences between welfare and wellbeing and say why a statutory definition of wellbeing is required?

Boyd McAdam: Part of the challenge that has been faced over the past 15 years or so is that welfare as provided for in the legislation has been interpreted around vulnerability and child protection. It was recognised in the 2001 report, “For Scotland’s Children” and in “It's everyone’s job to make sure I’m alright” that practice was operating with thresholds and that children and young people were not getting the service that they required until that threshold had been reached. Part of what we are seeking to achieve with the bill is the promotion of early intervention and prevention. Adopting the concept of wellbeing and taking a more holistic approach should encourage people to identify concerns at an earlier stage. It is about trying to shift the mindset.

My colleagues can maybe advise me, but I do not think that in legal terms there is that much difference between welfare and wellbeing. What we are proposing in the bill is a definition of wellbeing. Welfare is not defined in existing legislation. Part of what we are trying to bring about is a culture shift around early intervention.

The Convener: Do you want to move on to the issue of the named person, Clare?

Clare Adamson: Certainly, convener. The named person role has been mentioned already. It is one of the things that has hit the headlines and there is perhaps a bit of confusion about what it means. Will you give us a brief definition of the named person and what their duties will be?

Lynn Townsend: Yes. As Boyd McAdam said earlier, the named person will be somebody within the universal services of health or education. Health boards will have responsibility for children up to the age of five and local authorities will have it for children aged between five and 18.

In some ways, the named person will face in two directions. First, they will be a point of contact for the child and the family and will be there to offer support and to help them to negotiate their way through systems and gain access to services. The other side of their role will relate to the wider world. They will be a recognised point of contact for others who might have a concern about wellbeing. We know from experience and research that people sometimes have concerns about aspects of a child’s development but do not feel that they can go to somebody about them because they do not breach a threshold. With a named person in place, there will be somebody whom they can go to within universal services who will have an overview of the child and will be able to take one piece of the jigsaw—the information from the other person—bring it together with what they know and make a judgment about whether there is cause for concern. Those are the main functions of the named person.

The other thing to say is that the role will be quite layered. The named person in both health and education will have a role in relation to every child. It is about ensuring that the culture within an educational establishment or in which a health visitor works supports taking a holistic view of the child and of wellbeing, rather than just looking at the person or the patient in front of them. That will benefit every child.

Where a concern emerges, the named person will also have a role in looking to see whether they can offer support within the universal service from within the resources available to them or whether they need to look beyond their agency or service to the wider multi-agency arena for resources and support. They will be the person who can support the child and family through that process, take the case into a multi-agency arena and then look to the lead professional to co-ordinate multi-agency, targeted interventions.

Boyd McAdam: Having a holistic overview of the child and all the relevant information is important. We have developed a training exercise called GIRFEC Cluedo, in which people play the roles of practitioners. Interestingly, because only partial information is available, false assumptions tend to be made about what is going on in the child’s life. We need the overall picture to be able to understand what is relevant and appropriate and where to target the right help. If people’s perceptions are false, they will propose the wrong intervention and might begin to interfere with family life.

Clare Adamson: Although the financial memorandum gives some information about resources, they very much relate to time. As one of my colleagues will ask about the statutory duty on data sharing, you should perhaps steer clear of that, but one of the key issues is consistency of data collection across the country to ensure that the same decisions are being made in different local authorities. Given that health boards and education departments are likely to be dealing with this issue, do you envisage the development of a common data-storage mechanism or, at least, best practice in data storage?

Boyd McAdam: We are not creating a central database for storing information. Instead, our fundamental approach is very much that agencies will continue to be responsible for the information that they hold; for example, a health professional will have information on their system and a teacher will have other information on theirs. We must ensure that the relevant bits, although not stored centrally, come together. After all, this information should be brought together for a particular purpose, either to address a concern or to help inform professional judgment.

In the Ayrshires, a programme called AYRshare has been developed to facilitate the electronic bringing together of information, but that is done for a particular purpose and within a particular locality. As I have said, there is no proposal to create a central database. We might specify minimum data sets to capture the relevant information that everyone needs to know, but the aim is to have proportionate sharing.

Neil Bibby: I have a practical question about the named person for a child from the age of five to 18 being a member of the education personnel. How do you expect education personnel, who will usually be teachers, to act as a named person during their 12 weeks’ holiday? If a child goes missing or is affected by an incident during the summer holidays, how will the teacher act as the point of contact?

Lynn Townsend: As the duty in the bill is on the local authority, it will have to put arrangements in place to ensure that the named person is available. Local authorities will build on current practice during the holidays; at the moment, someone based centrally in the education service will be the point of contact if, as you have suggested, a child goes missing. People will have access to school records and that type of information and will play a role in the multi-agency response to that kind of emergency situation.

In situations that are not an emergency—say, if a parent is looking for information about a course or what is happening in the school at the start of the new year—centrally deployed officers in every education department will be able to offer non-urgent advice, or not-so-urgent issues that parents wish to raise can be held over until the named person in the school returns. It is for local authorities to put the arrangements in place, but that is how we envisage the system working and we have had discussions with stakeholders on that.

Neil Bibby: What consideration has been given to the impact on staff workload and during the holiday period? For example, what sort of ratio would you be looking at, say, a school with 250 pupils that has only 12 members of staff during term time? I guess that, during the term, you could have one teacher per class but what would be the ratio outside term time if the local authority is expected to put someone else in place to cover that named person’s role?

Lynn Townsend: That brings me back to the concept of the layered approach for the named person, which I described earlier. In a school of 250 children, the vast majority will receive all the help and support that they need from their class teacher and the other services that are available in the school. It is unlikely that the named person would have to take any action over and above their current duties. The bill is predicated on the fact that, within education, there are already statutory duties around planning and around assessing and supporting children. That work goes on currently. The bill proposes an overarching framework within which that level of assessment and support will go on.

It is difficult to say and will depend on where the school is and current practice in the school but, during the school holidays, we would certainly not expect inquiries to any centrally based officer about the 250 children and their wellbeing.

Neil Findlay: How many pupils would the named person in a school be responsible for?

Lynn Townsend: As I said, it will be up to education authorities to decide how to make arrangements for named persons, but from the experience that we have so far, it seems likely that the headteacher will be the named person, particularly so that the outside world knows who the named person is. However, within a primary school, we would envisage that aspects of the role will be delegated to the depute and principal teacher levels, and similarly in a secondary school, as is current practice, there will be depute heads with a pupil support portfolio and pastoral care staff who know the young people and are involved in offering support. We envisage that is how it will operate.

Neil Findlay: So the named person in a primary school will be the headteacher.

Lynn Townsend: Yes, and I would imagine that that will also be the case in a secondary school, for the purposes of people knowing whom to contact.

Neil Findlay: The financial memorandum says that, after the first year, teachers will not need any extra hours to act as the named person. Knowing the current workload of headteachers, I find that absolutely remarkable.

Lynn Townsend: We looked at the issues around capacity. Because the policy has been in place for a number of years and because some local authorities are already implementing it, it is difficult to say definitively what the resource implications will be. However, the current workload of headteachers, depute heads and pastoral care staff is around looking after young people, assessing, working with others, putting in support, working in a multi-agency forum and going to children’s panels.

What we have looked at is a systems change burden, if you like. At present, people work in a particular way. Through getting it right for every child, we are asking them to shift some of the ways in which they work. That usually brings an additional burden, hence the year’s transition, but there are benefits to the new way of working. That came out through the Highland pathfinder project. There should be fewer meetings and reports and a more co-ordinated approach to children having to go to children’s panels.

What provision is made in the private sector, which includes quite a few special schools? Obviously, no local authority is involved there.

Lynn Townsend: In the bill, we put parallel duties on independent and grant-aided schools. Some of the independent schools will be private schools, and it would be for the proprietor to put in place the arrangements for the named person and the child’s plan, in parallel with the duties on the local authority. Where the school is a special school, the young people will be placed by a local authority. Where the school is a private special school, the local authority has made the placement, again they will hold the responsibility through the lead professional role.

Joan McAlpine: My questions are about the statutory duty to share information. We have examined that subject extensively in our two inquiries into looked-after children. There seems to be a lot of confusion among professionals about when they can share information on a child. Some professionals think that that can be done only when a child is formally on the at-risk register. As Mr McAdam outlined, we need to be able to intervene earlier to nip things in the bud. However, that throws up an issue in relation to the ECHR and the rights to privacy.

You mentioned GIRFEC Cluedo, which I played at a Government event recently. Each table is a different person in the child’s life—a childminder, the father, the mother, the school and so on. Each table has a different piece of information, and the exercise highlights the difficulty of sharing that information. In the game of GIRFEC Cluedo that I played, the crucial piece of information was held by the mother’s general practitioner and related to the mother’s mental health. Under the new arrangements, can the GP share that information about the mother’s mental health with the schoolteacher or the child’s health visitor, for instance, without being in breach of the ECHR? I am not sure how they could do that.

Boyd McAdam: The area is complex. Article 8 of the ECHR, on the right to respect for private and family life, does not give a blanket exemption from families. Irrespective of what is proposed in the bill, there are a lot of issues under the existing law in relation to the Data Protection Act 1998 and professionals feeling unable to share information because of a breach of confidentiality or because of professional practice.

The Information Commissioner’s Office in Scotland clarified in April that, under the existing law, if there is a concern about a risk of harm to a child’s future wellbeing, the practitioner should share information, if that is proportionate. That comes down to professional judgment. In the example that you cited, if the GP had concerns that the mother’s mental wellbeing was impacting adversely on the child, that would be expected to be shared with the named person, who would be a professional in universal services.

My colleague Gordon McNicoll might wish to talk a bit more about article 8 of the convention. Part of the aim is to avoid all the information being made public. We are seeking to clarify that there is a responsibility to inform the named person when there is a concern about an impact on the child and when there might be a risk to their wellbeing. That is a judgment call.

Joan McAlpine: Would you expect professionals to be open to legal challenge?
whether information can or cannot be shared. It depends on the circumstances and on why they are sharing. All that we can say is that article 8 of the ECHR and the Data Protection Act 1998 do not absolutely prohibit something such as the sharing of information. Article 8 is not an absolute right to privacy. In some circumstances, that right does not apply. Whether that case will depend on the circumstances.

Joan McAlpine: In the GIRFEC Cluedo, I played the role of childminder. The mum had started to bring the child in late and the child seemed a bit clingy. I thought that something might not be quite right, but the mum said that she had a lot of work. Although there was a serious issue in that hypothetical case, it did not seem that the childminder would feel confident that the mum coming in late and a clingy child would necessitate sharing information and breaching the mother’s confidentiality, let alone going to the GP to find out whether the mother had a mental health problem.

Gordon McNicoll: In the situation that you describe, if the childminder had concerns that the child seemed clingy, I cannot see that they would disclose personal data relating to the mother or even the child; they would just observe, based on seeing the child every day, that something did not seem quite right. I do not see an article 8 issue there. The childminder would not disclose any personal information regarding the child; they would just make an observation about how the child appeared to them and possibly to those in the population at large who knew the child well enough.

Joan McAlpine: I am sorry to press the case, but the whole point of the exercise is that, if the childminder went to the named person with that information, which did not seem particularly serious, the named person should then be able to go to the GP. The GP would have the crucial information that the mother had a historical mental health problem. In that example, the child’s wellbeing was at stake, but we could see how, if the named person went to the GP with the childminder’s information, that might breach privacy if they did not have the full picture. Do you see what I am getting at?

Gordon McNicoll: The position depends on the circumstances. It is impossible to say in abstract whether information can or cannot be shared. It depends on the circumstances and the perceived risk to the child’s wellbeing.

Joan McAlpine: Is it not the case that trying to anticipate problems that might or might not exist will inevitably lead to breaches of privacy? Perhaps we should be honest about that and say that we will have breaches of privacy for quite a lot of families to protect the children who are at risk.

Boyd McAdam: Part of the early intervention agenda requires people to pick up concerns earlier, but it is proposed to do that in a framework that relies on the professional making a proportionate judgment. If there is a concern that someone is not comfortable with, the data protection advice is that they should share that. That is covered under data protection law, because it is a professional judgment.

The practice has to be that the person records the reason why they are sharing the information and explains why there is a concern. That will be done within the structure of the named person taking a view. All the evidence shows that, at present, information is known but not necessarily put together. The named person will provide that overview.

In the light of what the named person knows, the decision might be not to go further with an issue, but if the concern provided evidence that something was not right in the child’s life, the duties on public bodies to safeguard children and treat their welfare and wellbeing as paramount would cut in. There is an issue about what is not known, but the process should be followed in a proportionate and secure environment, to avoid more public knowledge about what is going on in the family’s life. If professionals are to make the judgment, they have to be aware of what is going on.

Joan McAlpine: I presume that professionals have to be aware that they could be open to legal challenge.

The Convener: I want to move on, because I am very aware of the time.

Colin Beattie: The bill provides for a number of additional plans and reports to be produced by a range of organisations relating to all sorts of things, such as children’s rights, corporate parenting, children’s services and early education, as well as individual child plans. Local authorities and perhaps health boards will be required to provide most of those, and other agencies will report on other things. Will that increase the bureaucracy and put more layers on top of what already exists? How will local authorities and other bodies cope with that?

Elisabeth Campbell: You are right that the bill contains a number of reporting and planning duties. It is important to say that stakeholders broadly supported those duties through the consultation and subsequent engagement. We have been clear throughout the bill’s development that we do not want to place extra burdens unnecessarily on agencies or other organisations and that we certainly do not want to increase bureaucracy. Therefore, for a number of the reports that will be required under the bill, we expect organisations to use current mechanisms rather than create bespoke new reporting mechanisms.

For example, organisations can use current annual reports to include stuff on the rights duty on the public sector. The children’s services planning duty replaces a previous planning process, so it is not additional. The single child plan has been proven in the Highland pathfinder and in other areas to reduce the burden of paperwork and bureaucracy. Therefore, several aspects of the bill seek to reduce rather than increase bureaucracy.

Colin Beattie: Overall, will the bill increase or reduce the burden of paperwork?

Elisabeth Campbell: I think that that will probably balance out. Some new processes are replacing old processes, so the bill certainly should not increase bureaucracy.

The Convener: I thank our witnesses for coming. We will follow up a number of issues in writing, if you do not mind.

I suspend the meeting briefly while we change panels.

Meeting suspended.

On resuming—

The Convener: Our second panel will answer questions on parts 6 to 13 of the bill, which deal with early learning and childcare, looked-after children, children’s hearings and schools consultation. I welcome back Elisabeth Campbell, who has stayed with us from the previous panel, and David Blair, who was with us earlier, and I also welcome from the Scottish Government Kit Wyeth, Ruth Inglis, Susan Bolt and Clare Morley. If the witnesses do not mind, we will go straight to questions.

Liam McArthur: The bill, which will set in statute and extend the number of hours of childcare that are provided for, defines the phrase “early learning and childcare”. Will service provision have to include both learning and care instead of either education or care? I think that I am right in saying that the bill amends the existing definition of school education to include early learning and childcare. It would be useful to know what will change as a result and what the expectation is.

Susan Bolt (Scottish Government): The expectation is that provision will cover both learning and care. The bill defines early learning and childcare as a service that provides education and care and which promotes and supports “learning and development in a caring and nurturing setting.”

As a result, the two concepts are seen as indivisible. The fact is that, when education and care are integrated, the quality of provision is higher; that is why the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and the European Commission strongly support and promote models of integrated education and care. We are following that model, although we are calling it learning and care to fit with our learning journey policy. The expectation is that any learning should take place in a nurturing and caring environment, and we also want care to consist of activities and interactions that support learning.

The definition simply reflects current good practice. We are trying to move away from a model that is based on blocks of education—pre-school provision, for example, might be seen in two-and-a-half-hour blocks—topped up with care, which might be seen as less important. For children in half-day or full-day sessions in a nursery, we would not expect education to start at a certain point in the day and finish two hours later, after which all the interactions, activities and relationships would change to something different called “care”. Instead, we want to promote consistent, high-quality provision for the child wherever their formal early learning and childcare take place and whoever delivers them. That is the aim of the new definition.

Liam McArthur: That is helpful. Another issue that has been raised and which we will probably come back to when we discuss the financial memorandum is the extent to which the statutory 600-hour allocation is fully funded. Is it your understanding that it is fully funded?

Susan Bolt: Yes.

Liam McArthur: The point about funding was made by, among others, Save the Children. Its initial submission picks up a point made by, I think, the Equal Opportunities Committee about the broader care that is required—in other words, not only early learning and childcare but out-of-school care. All committee members will have picked up the same point through different forums. What consideration has been given to putting a broader definition of care on a statutory footing?
Susan Bolt: The definition of early learning and childcare applies broadly to formal early learning and childcare provision, but we are still grappling with definitions. The Government is committed to developing and increasing early learning and childcare that covers all children of all ages and meets not only their needs but the needs of parents and families. More work is being done on that beyond the bill, and the definitions in the bill will support improvements in the quality of provision that is not necessarily covered in the bill.

Liam McArthur: Is there some budgetary rationale behind the delay over definitions or is there simply a concern that out-of-school care is not as well understood or defined as early learning and care, so more work needs to be done on the matter?

Susan Bolt: I do not think that there is such a concern. The Government's aim is to improve and increase provision for all, but ministers have decided in the bill to focus on and prioritise building up the current high-quality universal pre-school system and to build additional hours and flexibility into it. Local authorities are being asked to make a significant change.

We are doing work more widely—for example, on out-of-school care. We have a working group that is a sub-group of the early years task force, which is looking at childcare for all. That includes all partners that support organisations to develop a wider range of provision, such as staff banks, childminders or out-of-school care. We fund a number of organisations, such as the Scottish Out of School Care Network, the National Day Nurseries Association, the Scottish Childminding Association and the Care and Learning Alliance, which is a social enterprise. All those organisations share the same aim to increase and improve the range of models that deliver care for different age groups. Although that work is not focused through the bill, it is going on in parallel.

Liam McArthur: In terms of the age spectrum, we know that the bill makes provision for two-year-olds who are looked after or in kinship care. That is welcome, but we heard a heavy emphasis on early intervention from the minister this morning. Save the Children indicated its disappointment that the bill does not look to extend the provision for two-year-olds to those from the most disadvantaged backgrounds. Will you explain why that has not been incorporated in the bill and whether, as we take evidence at stage 1, there is an open mind to go back and look at that again?

Susan Bolt: The rationale for focusing on looked-after two-year-olds is that looked-after children have the worst outcomes—and the risk of the worst outcomes—of any group of children. The bill proposes to guarantee a minimum, sustained early learning and childcare provision for those children. The bill also focuses on two-year-olds in kinship care because they are often at risk, so we can prevent children from becoming looked after or provide a positive solution and bring them out of being looked after.

The provision for looked-after two-year-olds will be flexible to their individual needs. It will look at their family circumstances and allow for different models and arrangements. Working one to one with parents or on certain programmes will be okay, as long as that meets the child’s needs and wellbeing.

As for other two-year-olds who come from more deprived or poorer backgrounds, the evidence is strong that children from poorer backgrounds or poorer home learning environments benefit more from universal provision. That has a strong equalising influence and promotes social inclusion. That is why ministers are focusing on building up strong universal provision, from which children from poorer backgrounds will benefit most. That is the rationale.

Liam McArthur: One imagines that that argument could be sustained for children from looked-after backgrounds and those in kinship care, although I appreciate that those children are particularly vulnerable; we have certainly heard enough evidence to suggest that the outcomes for them are not as good and need to be addressed. However, the definition is very tight. Quality provision is clearly needed for the two-year-olds who get access to the services, but the interventions that we make before the age of three are critical, so it seems to be a missed opportunity not to expand provision to a wider cross-section of those who are disadvantaged. As I said, that certainly concerns Save the Children.

Susan Bolt: The provisions in the bill reflect certain priorities and go as far as they can within the current economic constraints. We are asking for significant changes from local authorities and we want those changes to be achievable, sustainable and affordable. Ministers have taken certain decisions about what to prioritise in order to deliver what they can, given the economic constraints within which they are working.

Neil Bibby: Early years education is funded through the pre-school education grant, which I understand does not currently cover childcare. Will the additional hours for early learning and care be funded in the same way?

Susan Bolt: Yes, they will be funded in the same way, so it will be for local authorities to secure provision, either through their own services or through partner providers. Local authorities will deliver that directly, under their education duties.
Neil Bibby: Will there be designated elements of funding for early learning and for childcare?

Susan Bolt: No. Those are seen as indivisible. There will be the same standards of high-quality, consistent early learning and childcare that we have already defined, so it will be for local authorities to ensure that those are provided, either through their own services or through partner providers, as I said.

Neil Bibby: On flexibility, what do you envisage parents being given if, for example, they wanted their 15 hours over two days? Do you also envisage them having that time on the days of the week that they want?

Susan Bolt: There is a wide range of ways in which you could cut the 600 hours, or around 16 hours a week, and it will be for local authorities to consult local populations on what their needs and preferences are. There is a minimum framework: sessions should be no less than two and a half hours a day, no more than eight hours a day, and delivered over no fewer than 38 weeks in a year, although that does not need to be confined to term times. Within those broad parameters, local authorities are free to reconfigure services to provide a range of choices. It is up to them to decide: it could be two eight-hour days a week, or five two-and-a-half-hour sessions, with additional sessions in non-term time. It really depends on the needs that parents identify, and local authorities will make decisions about what to reconfigure and what choices to offer on that basis.

Neil Bibby: Has any consideration been given to partner nurseries that may have financial difficulties if parents elect to take all their childcare time in nursery funded places, leaving no wraparound time for which the nursery can charge?

Susan Bolt: Whether they are in the public or private sector, nurseries can charge for wraparound care. They are free to do that.

Joan McAlpine: I have a supplementary question to Mr McArthur’s point about extending provision. You mentioned the financial constraints. I know that in Scotland we have a higher ratio of carers to children in pre-school and that that has been diluted in England and Wales. Will you say something about the importance of the ratio in Scotland?

Susan Bolt: There were proposals to change the ratio in England, but I do not think that they have gone ahead. In Scotland, we have checked with stakeholders and there is certainly no appetite for changing staff ratios here from what they are. That is another key thing to remember when we talk about the economic constraints. In all the changes that we put in place, we do not want to compromise on quality at all. Any increase must be in parallel with improved quality—that is fundamental to any changes that happen.

George Adam: I want to ask about kinship care and kinship care orders. I have had some experience of kinship carers, in constituency matters and as a councillor. The bill provides for residence orders that are kinship care orders. Paragraph 119 of the financial memorandum states:

“It is expected that a proportion of formal carers will apply for a kinship care order.”

Why would they do that? What would be the advantage to them? How would the support offered by the local authority differ?

David Blair: The answer is fairly straightforward. The policy comes from the quite extensive feedback that we have had from kinship carers, who will apply for the kinship care order because it will provide much more specific support than they are accustomed to. Currently, the support that is provided to a formal kinship carer is very much at the discretion of their local authority. Kinship carers find that difficult.

The incentive for a kinship carer to apply for the kinship care order goes back to the policy rationale, which is about providing an enhanced form of permanence within kinship care. A child who is subject to compulsory supervision and who is living with a kinship carer is not in permanence. The order enhances an existing route for permanence within kinship care.

Kinship carers tell us quite strongly that they want to do what is best for the child who is in their care; they want a form of permanence that means that their parenting is not constantly being monitored when that is not required. That is the policy rationale. There should be an incentive for kinship carers to apply for the order because it is much more specific.

George Adam: Okay.

The Government is undertaking a review of existing kinship care allowances. I know that all the findings are not expected to come out until the end of the year, but are there any early ones that you might be able to share with the committee at this stage?

David Blair: There is nothing that I can share at this point, although I can tell the committee that we have had to review the timetable owing to the complexity of the modelling that we have had to do. We are exploring a number of options based on the work that we have done to date. We have done quite a bit of detailed modelling, which is being considered at the moment. I am happy to come back to the committee and advise members as to when we can share some information about that.
Neil Bibby: The Children Act 1975, the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, and the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009 have an impact on kinship carers and local authority support. Why did you decide to include additional provisions on kinship care? Is it not already covered in existing legislation? Could you not allow local authorities to apply for residence orders for kinship carers under existing legislation?

David Blair: Local authorities cannot apply for residence orders. They are petitioned for by kinship carers or by a range of people in different circumstances. We felt that there was a need for the kinship care order based on the feedback that we had from kinship carers and local authorities. Neither group seemed particularly happy with the status quo—part of that was to do with the continuing growth in formal kinship care, which, based on the feedback that we had, did not seem to represent people’s needs particularly well.

There was a feeling that children in formal kinship care were not necessarily comprehensively worse off or in greater need than those on the edge of care or at risk of becoming looked after at some point. That is a problem with how the system works. We felt that there was a need to enhance the route to permanence in kinship care and we took some feedback on that through the consultation process and in the years prior to the consultation process. This was the best mechanism that we could come up with.

Neil Bibby: When you talk about qualifying kinship carers in relation to the financial support criteria, which will be determined in—or left to—regulations, are you talking about kinship carers in relation to children who are at risk of being formally looked after?

David Blair: That is a consideration. We wanted to ensure that local authorities have some ability to focus support on families who need it most. That was one test that we thought about. We have put that into the documents accompanying the bill, but we think that the test really needs to be consulted on with practitioners through an extra piece of work that we are running now. There is good reason for that: we have to avoid stigmatising kinship care, but we also have to ensure that the test works and allows resources to be targeted at those who need it most, given the economic constraints.

Neil Bibby: The financial memorandum mentions savings being made through kinship care because there will be savings from children no longer being formally looked after unnecessarily. What evidence does the Scottish Government have that children are being looked after unnecessarily?

David Blair: That came through in the feedback that we had through the bill consultation. Also, we have been working with Children 1st for a number of years and we funded it to work with about 43 groups around the country specifically to gather useful information about how kinship care works in practice. We used that evidence to guide our policy making in the area.

Clare Adamson: For clarity—I am confused about this—will financial support be given only to kinship carers who have a formal order in place?

David Blair: Can you clarify what you mean by financial support, because the—

Clare Adamson: At present, local authorities have discretion to award kinship care payments, whether or not a residency order is in place. Does the bill remove that flexibility?

David Blair: No. At present, the expectation is that the kinship carer of a looked-after child will be entitled to an allowance, which covers a multitude of things. With kinship care orders, we are making that much more specific. We have said—we agreed this with COSLA for the purposes of the bill—that the kinship care order does not automatically extend the previous commitment to allowances for formal kinship carers. The review is looking at that aspect of things.

Clare Adamson: Okay. Thank you.

The Convener: Finally, Neil Bibby has some questions on the section on schools consultation.

Neil Bibby: The section seems out of place. Why has it been included in the bill?

Clare Morley (Scottish Government): It has been included in the bill, and it is proposed that the matter be dealt with in that way, because the bill provides an opportunity to deal with it quickly. The Government attaches importance to the area and there has been a large delay while the commission on the delivery of rural education considered the issues. Now that the commission has reported and the Government has responded to the report, we are anxious to move quickly. Also, a judicial review concluded recently and the Government wants to move to clarify the legislation. The bill is an opportunity to do that, which is not too far removed from the rest of the bill’s purpose, as it is to do with services for children.

Neil Bibby: Provisions on the matter will be added to the bill at stage 2. What consultation will there be, or has there been?

Clare Morley: We expect to issue shortly a public consultation paper on the amendments that we will produce. There will be a shorter timescale than the Government would normally like to apply, but we feel that it is important to achieve a degree of public consultation. There will also be arrangements for meeting stakeholders during the summer to carry out as much consultation as possible. That will build on the extensive consultation that the commission on the delivery of rural education did. We feel that the issues have received some airing through that.

The Convener: So that the committee can plan its work, will you clarify when the results of that consultation and the Government’s response will be available?

Clare Morley: We expect to consult during July and August, and we expect to be in a position to respond and provide detail on the amendments that we will propose in good time for the session that we understand you have scheduled for 26 November to consider the bill after stage 1. The answer is during the autumn.

The Convener: That is why I asked, I suppose, because 26 November seems a little bit late. We have to take evidence on the bill during the stage 1 part of the bill process. Although you intend to introduce the provisions at stage 2, it would be helpful if we could take relevant evidence during stage 1. I am not convinced that it would be helpful for us not to know what is going to be inserted into the bill until after stage 1.

Clare Morley: We will want to allow as much time for the consultation as we can, and we think that that will be during July and August. I expect that ministers will be happy to write to you during September to give you as much indication as they can of what they have learned from the consultation, if that would be helpful.

The Convener: It would be helpful if we could have as much information as possible from the Government as early as possible, because we have to take evidence during stage 1 in September and October. I am thinking of the clerks in particular, as they have to get witnesses in place, and we have to ensure that there is enough time for us to properly scrutinise the bill and take evidence from witnesses. It is a large bill with many different areas and there is a tight timeline for us to do that work as it is, without any additional aspects. I would be grateful if we could get information as soon as possible.

Clare Morley: We appreciate the urgency.

The Convener: Thank you for coming along this morning and giving us some additional information at this early stage of the bill.

21st Meeting, 2013 (Session 4)

Tuesday 3 September 2013

Present:

George Adam                       Clare Adamson
Colin Beattie                      Marco Biagi (Committee Substitute)
Neil Bibby                         Neil Findlay
Stewart Maxwell (Convener)         Liam McArthur
Liz Smith

Apologies were received from Joan McAlpine.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Mike Burns, Chair - Standing Committee on Children & Families, Association of Directors of Social Work;
Kenneth Norrie, Professor of Law, University of Strathclyde;
Susan Quinn, Ex-President, the Educational Institute of Scotland;
John Stevenson, Representative from Social Work Issues Group, UNISON Scotland.

The Convener: Our next item is an evidence-taking session on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. I welcome to the committee Mike Burns from the Association of Directors of Social Work; Professor Kenneth Norrie from the University of Strathclyde; Susan Quinn from the Educational Institute of Scotland; and John Stevenson from Unison Scotland. In what is our second evidence session on the bill, we intend to cover its key principles and consider how it would work in practice. I thank the witnesses for their very interesting written submissions, which of course will inform some of our questions this morning.

Before I bring in other members, I want to ask the panel a general question. What, in your view, will be the practical effect of the bill’s proposed duties? What real difference will, for example, the report-writing duties make to people’s lives? In other words, my question is more about the bill’s practical effects than about its principles.

John Stevenson (Unison): It will very much depend. We would like the practical effects to be an integrated plan for every child and every child getting the help that they need when they need it but, as we have said in the introduction to our submission, the issue is resource critical and we need to know what resources will be available on the ground to deliver that in practice. The fact is that social work, health and education departments are inundated with reports, forms and assessments. I think that all the services are pretty good at assessments, but we are less good at delivering practical help on the ground, which after all requires resources to be in place.

The key issue for us is clarity about how all this will be funded. We absolutely support the approach in principle and know that there is already good practice around Scotland and that many local authorities are operating integrated assessments and such things to some or other level. As a result, the next step towards what the bill is proposing will not be a huge one, but the big issue is that we are going to uncover a whole lot of things that we did not know about and which will require action—which, in turn, will require resources.

Susan Quinn (Educational Institute of Scotland): I do not disagree with John Stevenson’s assessment of what might happen. The EIS sees very clear potential in a single assessment and plan for young people that carries across all the services. Indeed, one of the challenges over the past few years has been the number of different assessments and plans, how they speak to each other and how we ensure that our young people get the best service available.

However, given the backdrop of the cuts and the difficulties facing education and all the services that will work together, the plans will need in some way to help us to deal with the issue that fewer people will be working in each of those services. We need to be clear about the need for the resources to ensure that that happens, particularly in education, given that a range of other initiatives across other aspects of our performance will be introduced at the same time. We are being called on not just to be the named person who delivers on an education support plan in conjunction with other services but to deliver the curriculum for excellence, the new qualifications and all the other aspects. Therefore, resources will be key. However, the potential is there for better communication within and across the services, if we can get that right.

Mike Burns (Association of Directors of Social Work): Echoing some of those points, I think that the duties in the bill will certainly consolidate getting it right for every child and the aspirations of the Christie commission. However, a critical issue was highlighted in the work that Susan Deacon did in relation to early years. She talked about the fact that, in Scotland, far too much time and attention is focused on the plan and not enough is focused on delivery. We would like to see the bill providing critical leverage in converting those aspirations into tangible outcomes for our most vulnerable children.

Professor Kenneth Norrie (University of Strathclyde): If the question is what practical effect the bill will have, it seems to me that it is almost impossible to give an answer at this stage, because there are so many ambiguities in the bill’s terminology and structure.

If the question is about the aspirations of the bill, as far as I can understand it, those are about creating a changed culture and changing people’s mindsets. The bill is about changing the way in which service providers throughout Scotland develop and deliver the services that they have been set up to provide so that the wellbeing of children and young people is put at the forefront of everybody’s minds. If, as a society, we are able to achieve that change of mindset, that will be a wholly good thing as a matter of principle. Whether legislation is the best way to go about achieving that mindset depends on the precise legal obligations and rights that the legislation encapsulates.

The Convener: Thank you very much. Before I open up the discussion to members, I want to ask Professor Norrie a specific question about the incorporation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. Could you expand on the view that you expressed about that in your written submission and say why you think that that is unwelcome—if that is not too strong a word?

Professor Norrie: The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child itself is by no means unwelcome and I would not like to suggest that it was—

The Convener: Sorry, I meant why the convention’s incorporation would be unwelcome.

Professor Norrie: I think that to incorporate the convention into the domestic legal system of Scotland would be bad policy, bad practice and bad law. I say that primarily because the UN convention was not drafted or worded to create directly enforceable legal rights in the domestic legal system.

The convention has an aspirational purpose that is attempting to change governmental mindsets across the world so that children are at the forefront of the attention of all Government policy. That is good—we want Governments to be able to do that—and that is what the UN convention tries to do. That is how it is drafted. However, if you take a document that has been drafted for one purpose and then try to pretend that it sets out strict legal rules that are enforceable in a court of law, you will get all sorts of complexities.

For example, judges would be given far more political power than we probably want them to have. To use an example that is given in my written evidence, article 4 provides:

“With regard to economic, social and cultural rights, States Parties shall undertake such measures to the maximum extent of their available resources and, where needed, within the framework of international co-operation.”

That is really good, but do you want judges to determine the maximum extent of the state’s available resources? That is not a judicial matter but a matter for social policy and for the democratic process. That is for Parliaments to decide rather than for judges. The UN convention is full of good aspirations for government, but it is also full of wide, broad statements that you cannot possibly ask judges to determine.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): I appreciate the basis of those concerns about incorporation, but it has been put to us that there are countries that have incorporated the UNCRC into their domestic law. Is there anything from their experience that would substantiate your concerns about the way in which that is then applied, or are there aspects of their legal systems that are different from ours to the extent that those concerns do not arise?
Professor Norrie: I do not know what problems those countries have had, but my understanding is that only a tiny number of countries—three or four at most—have incorporated the convention into their law.

Historically, the United Kingdom and what we call the common-law countries have been much more specific in the way that they design their legislation. European countries, for example, tend to go for grand statements and then leave it to the judges to work out what those statements mean. We do not tend to do that in our country. We like our legislation to be much more specific so that people can understand very precisely what Parliament is trying to do, and we leave it to the judges to give the proper interpretation with appropriate guidance. I suspect that countries that have incorporated the UN convention are countries that are much more comfortable than we are with legislative grand statements.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): Good morning. Staying on the general principles of the bill, I want to ask Professor Norrie about his written submission, which states:

“The point is that defining a person as a ‘child’ increases the protections that the law offers them, but decreases their own personal freedoms. Section 75 of the Bill defines ‘child’ as a person who has not attained the age of 18 years. I should have been more comfortable if the limit of childhood were set at 16.”

Obviously, there are some issues there. Can you expand on your concerns about that?

Professor Norrie: My general concern, I suppose, is that growing up is a gradual process. The law likes clear cut-off points. In Scotland, we have always had a number of important ages at which a child increases the ability to take control of their own life. The age of 12 is important because you can make a will at the age of 12 and, for example, you can have a veto to an adoption order. The age of 16 is crucially important because that is the age of marriage and is basically the age at which compulsory education might come to an end. The age of 18 is actually less important, but one of the few remaining consequences of reaching the age of 18 is that you are allowed to vote—although even that might not last, at least in Scotland, for terribly much longer. The age of 25 is also important.

As the child increases in age, they increase in capacity. Another way of saying that is that they increase in self-determination and have an increased right to make their own decisions and to determine how they will lead their own lives. The flip-side of that is that the younger a child is, the more other people have control over them. A balance has to be struck so that we protect vulnerable people who cannot protect themselves—obviously, an infant needs full protection—but there comes a point at which the child or young person should properly be given the freedom to make their own mistakes. Traditionally, Scotland has taken the view that 16—previously, it was 12 or 14, but it was increased to 16 in the 1920s—is the age at which we tend to regard children as being free from adult interference.

Liz Smith: Would you prefer the bill to set the age at 16 rather than 18?

Professor Norrie: I would much prefer the bill to define “child” as a person up to the age of 16 and “young person” as a person between the age of 16 and whatever the upper limit is set at. That is slightly different, so one would then need to consider what the implications are of being a “young person”. However, I think that it would be more coherent to stick to the age of 16 and say that a “child” is a person under the age of 16.

Liz Smith: That is my next point. You and others have mentioned that the proposals are about trying to change a culture, so this is not necessarily about trying to change the law. The ambition behind the bill is about trying to develop a culture of thinking. Do you feel that the use of that terminology within a legal context—whether the age is 16 or 18—slightly complicates some aspects of the bill?

Professor Norrie: I think so, and I think that that is uncomfortable. An example that I gave in my written submission was children in the armed services. Children should not be in the armed services, but we actually think that 16-year-olds are not children but young people. If that is what we really think, why do we not call them “young people”?

Liz Smith: Let me probe a little bit further. On the issue of how much could be achieved without legislation in trying to adopt a new culture, both Mr Stevenson and Mrs Quinn have mentioned their concern that it will be difficult to bring in the measures in the bill without very substantial new resources in the wider dimension. Do you have any concern that, as it stands, the bill will take away resources from the most vulnerable children because we are trying to make it universal? Is that a concern?

John Stevenson: On the issue of complexity, what we so often see is that, although there are big principles at the beginning, once everything is drafted and the policy comes out the other end, there are unintended consequences and complexities. There was something clear about the all-encompassing Children (Scotland) Act 1995 when it was brought in. One issue is that there are all these other bits that create complexities in terms of how things are delivered and what that means for delivery.

However, I am not sure that the bill will take resources away immediately. In order to operate, more resources will be needed. For example, the named persons will need more resources in order for people to have the time to do that, because it is not as if people are sitting around with space in their day.

My concern—you mentioned the issue of culture—is that there is a different culture across different services as to what they consider wellbeing and welfare to be. In their daily life, a social worker might see living conditions that they would assess to be good enough but which might not be viewed as such by a health visitor or by a teacher. The difficulty is where you draw the line or set the threshold. We could end up with an interference in people's family life at a very confused threshold between what is a welfare problem and what is a wellbeing problem. There would then be a risk that the resources that could have been used at the high end would be going into issues that could quite readily be sorted through other methods. A final point on that is that we already know from implementing GIRFEC that we will pick up high-end stuff at an early stage that we do not pick up at the moment.

Liz Smith: You made the very interesting point that the interpretation of welfare, as opposed to wellbeing, might be different at different ages. Will you elaborate on that?

John Stevenson: That is very difficult to do without giving an example. The interpretation of what is an acceptable family environment and what is the threshold for intervening can vary dramatically between police officers, social workers and health visitors who regularly go into people's houses. A house that might seem to a social worker to be not very clean and a bit chaotic might seem to a police officer to be a place in which a child should not be brought up.

Liz Smith: Right. Thank you. That is helpful.

Susan Quinn: On resources, work on the issue of the named person is on-going in schools. Every establishment will have someone who is responsible for ensuring that the very best is given when it comes to child protection and additional support needs. Time will tell whether the bill will change that and how much being responsible for every single child will take hold. A school would imagine that it already has a responsibility—a corporate parenting responsibility, if you like—for every single child or young person in it. From establishment to establishment there are differences in the number of young people who meet the criteria for child protection, additional support needs or wider partnership working. That is where the resource implication of what is new will have an impact.

In the beginning, the very immediate resource implication will be for additional training on what the new plan looks like. Whether it will be a single document that sits within one system or whether it will involve a number of systems talking to each other, if there is a change from the current situation, there will be a training implication for the relevant people in our schools and other education establishments. Training will be needed right from the outset. If we do not put in additional resource, one can only imagine that there will be a knock-on effect. One person in an establishment—or indeed more than one person—can only do what they can do. You cannot expand their day and their life so that they continue to take on additional things without taking things out or putting more resource in.

In the longer term, if the paperwork and plans take away some of the bureaucracy that we have mentioned in the past, that will be a good thing, which will mean that the resource can be used in a different way. However, at the very beginning of a new scheme you need to put in additional resource, as other panel members have said, to make sure that there is not an impact on what goes on elsewhere in establishments.

Liam McArthur: Susan Quinn has just articulated the resource implications very well. We have also heard from Professor Norrie about the risk that is inherent in incorporating the UNCRC wholesale into domestic law. We have heard quite a bit of evidence from stakeholders that the duties that are being introduced through the bill are not as wide ranging or significant as many had hoped and fall short of full incorporation. Do others share that view? If so, where might the duties be strengthened?

Professor Norrie: Part 1 of the bill is headed "Rights of children", but that is not an accurate description of what part 1 does, which is to impose duties—that is entirely appropriate and it is what legislation should do—on the Scottish ministers to make everybody aware and remind them that the legislation must take account of the UNCRC. That is all to the good, but the wording in section 1(1)(b) is very weak. Section 1(1)(a) states that to take any other steps, but subsection (b) states they are to take such further steps only

"if they consider it appropriate to do so".

Therefore, the Scottish ministers are legally obliged to look at that, but then it is completely up to them and within the Government's discretion whether they do anything about it. That weakens very substantially the duty that is imposed. Even without the incorporation of the UNCRC, you could do much more to strengthen the duties that the bill imposes.

Susan Quinn: In terms of specifics, the EIS has articulated its case about children at the pre-school stage having access to a General Teaching Council for Scotland-registered teacher. We continue to wish to see something in the bill that would strengthen the right to that access and quantify it in some way. Without that, what we see across the country is a clear reduction in the hours of access to a teacher at the pre-school stage.

We work very closely with our colleagues in the pre-school sector, but we continue to come back to the evidence that shows that quality early years education requires a teacher or someone who has pedagogy as part of their qualification, and the three-to-18 curriculum makes that even clearer. However, the extension of the hours for early years care and education does not make that clear. Access at the moment in some areas simply means that a teacher passes through once a fortnight or once a month to check the plans that are in place. The young people are never taught by the teacher in the terms that you would expect for a primary 1 child or, indeed, by somebody whose qualifications would allow them to do that. We continue to want to see that access as a much more specific aspect in the bill.

Mike Burns: There is also the point that social work has raised about the protection of rights, particularly for aftercare and support beyond the age of 18 and up to 25 or 26. Much more decisive action is being taken on thresholds in relation to children, and higher numbers of children are being looked after and accommodated across the country. The responsibility on us as corporate parents remains significant, as do the financial implications.

John Stevenson: We are disappointed that the initial stuff that came out about the bill was stronger on rights than the duty in the bill is. No matter what duty is applied at the level of ministers, the issue is what that translates to on the ground. Certainly, the sense of our members is that children’s rights, especially those of younger children whose welfare has been severely affected in one way or another, are not as up top as they were maybe five, six or seven years ago. The area has become much more litigious and there is much more accent in children’s hearings on thinking first about parent’s rights to contact than there is on children’s rights. Those are the things that seem real to us on the ground and which I hear about day in and day out.

The issue is not just to have a duty at the level of ministers, important though that is. We suggested in our written response that, whatever comes out of the bill, there must be some independent monitoring at the front line of whether it translates in reality to addressing the rights of children. The basic right to be protected is the most important one for younger children. Young people exercising their rights to aftercare services that they are entitled to is a different issue. We are speaking for the ones who in most circumstances cannot speak up for themselves.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): I will follow up on Liam McArthur’s question. Around 15 children’s charities, as well as Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, have called for a children’s rights impact assessment to be carried out on the bill. That would appear to be a reasonable request. If the bill is about changing culture, the Scottish Government could take a lead by agreeing to it. Do you agree with the request for a children’s rights impact assessment on the bill?

John Stevenson: Unison has supported that position before. We have asked some councils, in their reorganisations, to consider doing a children’s rights impact assessment. I am not aware of anyone having actually done one, but the commissioner’s website has an easy-to-follow system to do so. We would align ourselves with that approach with respect to the need to work out what is going to happen on the ground as opposed to just in principle.

The Convener: Not everybody has to answer. If you agree with that idea, fine; if you disagree, please speak up.

Mike Burns: From the point of view of the Association of Directors of Social Work, we would not be against that approach in any shape or form. Within the body of social work practice, social workers are out on the front line every day, promoting and seeking to protect the rights of children. The bill highlights, secures and promotes the right to protect the rights of children. The basic right to be protected is the most important one for younger children. Young people exercising their rights to aftercare services that they are entitled to is a different issue. We are speaking for the ones who in most circumstances cannot speak up for themselves.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): I wish to examine the dichotomy between protecting privacy and promoting wellbeing, referring to some of the issues that have been raised in evidence.

In relation to the named person, the bill uses the language of information that “might be relevant” to a child’s wellbeing and that “ought to” be shared. We all agree that serious welfare concerns would be raised and shared with the named person; the issue is the general wellbeing of a young person. I am interested to know what implications there are for decision makers who are working with families and young people and making the decisions as to when to share, and what impact the level of information might have on services.

John Stevenson: We are very concerned about that. On a day-to-day basis, it is unclear to people what they can share, how they can share it and how much they can share it. It is not clear to the people we work with, particularly the social workers, how much information is shared.

As we say in our written submission, the critical point is that, because of different thresholds for what is acceptable parenting and so on, there will be different thresholds for each professional as to what they think they should share. In some circumstances, we have a situation of almost blanket information sharing, particularly in child protection. You can understand why that is the case. If there is a real risk to a child, people do not want to leave out anything that might be relevant, so in practice everything is shared.

In theory, what should be shared is what needs to be shared for the purposes of what we are doing. The concern that our members have is that, if a woolly approach is taken and not enough guidance is given, they will, by default and in order to cover people's backs, end up sharing information that is not necessarily needed. At the moment, if there is a dispute in a household and the police are called, even if the child is not even there that information will be transmitted to the school, the social worker and the health visitor almost automatically—to what purpose I am sometimes not entirely sure.

There is also the individual responsibility of social workers. I have said for quite a long time that until someone takes some kind of data protection case—I am not aware of anyone having done that—we will never know where the rule lies. Many of our members feel somewhat at risk because of the tendency of lawyers in recent years to single out specific acts of social workers when they do appeals and so on, when social workers do not have a forum to reply. People are worried about that. The concern that not enough information was being shared is legitimate, but we need some guidance on what information needs to be shared or whether everything needs to be shared—and that will be extremely difficult.

Susan Quinn: In addition to the question of what is to be shared, there is the issue of consistency. The example was given that if the police are called to a household, even if the child is not there, information will be shared with the school automatically. In some areas of the country that is a threshold, but in others it is not, so the information is not shared automatically.

The training for all the groups involved needs to be clear in explaining what information it is appropriate to share at different levels of intervention. The same threshold needs to be applied across the country so that we are not in a position in which information is not shared automatically in a city area because there is a much higher level of police intervention in family disputes and to share information would mean a higher workload than there is in other parts of the country. The two parts need to go hand in hand: there needs to be a threshold, and it needs to be applied consistently across the country so that a teacher in Shetland will know to share the same kind of information as a teacher in the north-east of Glasgow or in the Scottish Borders.

We need consistency, because children—and families—move around the country. It quite often seems to be the case that our most vulnerable children are the ones who, for one reason or another, move around most often in our education system. We need to have thresholds, but we also need consistency, which will come only by having joined-up training for all the organisations involved. We all need to hear the same messages, and it is hard to deliver that consistency.

Mike Burns: The point about information sharing being proportionate is well made. I think that practice in Scotland at the moment is proportionate. On occasions, a genuine attempt is made by health visitors, early years educators and social work in localities to reflect on thresholds and the process. People in social work are very clear—that the Association of Directors of Social Work certainly is—that social work is not the panacea, nor does it seek to be involved inappropriately in individuals' lives.

In fact, the bill, in endeavouring to highlight the move from child protection to concern about children, is about saying that we need to intervene earlier and in a way that allows parents to exercise a degree of informed choice and which puts them in a position to draw down support. GIRFEC endeavours to provide a single system for drawing down support to a child at an early stage, and that may not involve social work. Therefore, we are seeing a much more proactive approach to providing assistance to children and to nipping problems in the bud that involves earlier intervention, more assertive outreach and the provision of critical support to parents at an early stage in a way that is, in a sense, open and part of a modern society. We welcome that, and we welcome the role of the named worker in that respect.

Professor Norrie: Conceptually this might be the most difficult part of the whole bill, and it taps into a number of issues that we have already discussed. Going back to Liz Smith’s question about children and young people, I should add that children and young people are entitled to privacy and confidentiality; indeed, the older they are, the more important that becomes for each individual.

The issue also illustrates the huge ambiguities in the drafting of the bill, which, if passed in its current form, will lead only to lots and lots of litigation. That might be good for lawyers but not necessarily good for children and young people.

Section 26, for example, stipulates:

“A service provider or relevant authority must provide ... information” that “might be relevant”

“ought to be provided”.

Those terms are contradictory, and if you leave them in you will be leaving it to the courts to strike the balance.

The worst section in the bill is section 27. If you manage to strike it out and leave everything else, you will have achieved quite a lot. It states:

“The provision of information under this Part is not to be taken to breach any prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information.”

In other words, it trumps every other piece of legislation from this or any other Parliament anywhere that provides law for Scotland. The Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, which is now in force, contains a very strong prohibition on the publication of information about children who appear before a children’s hearing, because children are entitled to confidentiality. The idea seems to be that it is okay to disclose such information within the very ambiguous parameters of this bill. However, it is not okay.

Clare Adamson: May I ask a quick supplementary, convener?

The Convener: As long as it is quick and as long as we have quick answers from the panel. We have a lot that I am keen to get through.

Clare Adamson: Professor Norrie has made it clear that he would like the drafting of the bill to be changed, but could many of the ambiguities that he has highlighted be dealt with in guidelines?

Professor Norrie: The problem with leaving everything to guidelines is that, given the sort of bill that this is, the legislation itself is what will lead to court cases. It will be the interpretation of the legislation, not the guidance, that will give rise to litigation.

The Convener: I will now have to ask a supplementary on this issue myself. [Laughter.]

Given the points that you have raised, do you think that the bill is fundamentally unsound or are we merely talking about minor drafting issues?

Professor Norrie: The bill is fundamentally sound. It has good aspirations for Government, public services and Scottish society.

The Convener: So you are suggesting that amendments be made to the drafting because of the ambiguity of the language that has been used.

Professor Norrie: That would be my primary concern.

John Stevenson: I agree. However, I think that this exposes a problem relating partly to children’s privacy when they are quite young that does not arise simply from this bill but which is in fact a long-term problem.

In the case of a child who is a victim of a crime, it is not unusual for the procurator fiscal, the police and all the rest to requisition the files in order to find out everything about the child. Given the amount of confusion on the issue across all the legislation covering children’s services, we have to start thinking harder about how children exercise their right to privacy in a safe way.

Neil Bibby: We have already touched on the issue of resources and the named person. The EIS has highlighted the need for resources for the public sector to pursue the bill’s intentions and that “financial constraints” on local authorities lead to “barriers to effective” partnerships. Unison has already said that staff workload and lack of resources are an impediment to GIRFEC and that there is a need to increase the number of front-line staff. Is it fair to say that you do not believe that there are enough resources to realise the bill’s ambitions?

Susan Quinn: It is fair to say that we are very concerned about the possibility.

In our schools, the named person is not named at the moment even though they are doing the job—the job is already there. It will be the same with our social work colleagues; people are doing those jobs already. What we have indicated is that it will not be the named person’s sole, single job. If the named person is the headteacher of a primary school, they will have the whole school to oversee, financially and with regard to teaching, learning and staff development. If the named person is a depute head, a pastoral care teacher or someone else in the secondary sector, they will have teaching duties and other remits.

It would be unusual for a school to say that, because 25 per cent of their young people are involved in stages 3 and 4 of intervention, it is too big a job for the named person to have anything else to do. Schools just will not have the resources to do that. The crunch point comes when attendance at a meeting is required but it clashes with one of the named person’s teaching commitments. If the school does not have anyone to cover, what is the crunch? Does the person attend the meeting and leave a class behind without somebody to teach them?

The Convener: What happens now? That must happen at the moment.

Susan Quinn: Until very recently, a supply teacher would have come in to provide cover—although that is a whole different debate that is going on at the moment. Such requirements would be covered internally or otherwise, but if the duties are increased and become clearer, as is possible under the bill, there will be problems.

Our concern is that, as the impact of the cuts in resources has taken a bite in our establishments, schools have found it much more difficult. Before, members of a senior management team in a secondary school would not have routine class commitments and would rarely be called on to do a “please take”, but we are now seeing evidence of that happening more and more. Teaching commitments for all members of staff in schools are becoming tighter, and that has an impact on what else can be done.

Another concern that we raised in relation to the named person is what happens beyond the school year, into the holiday period. That has been a great cause of concern to me in my job as a headteacher. If there are going to be routine commitments for all members of a senior management team in a school, that would make the situation almost critical.

Neil Bibby: I understand that the Scottish Government has said that, for school staff, it is expected that after initial training there will be no increased time commitment. What would you say to the Scottish Government in response to that?

Susan Quinn: I would say that, if there is no increased time commitment, that is fine if schools are working on the same resource as they had five or 10 years ago, but we are not working on the same resource. It is the same in other areas. Schools are squeezed in terms of what they can deliver in relation to the school day and beyond.

It will be fine if duties are not increased and the resource level remains the same. Our organisation and others want more resources, but resources are tighter and it is harder for our establishments. Only time will tell whether an increased level of work will be required—and we will not know that until the changes are in place.

Mike Burns: There is also an assumption that early intervention is less intense. However, what we see on the ground—most welcome though this is—is the emergence and referral on of earlier difficulties. Therefore, it is no less intense. To address, divert and secure better outcomes for children involves significant additional resource on occasions.

Neil Findlay: I am beginning to feel that my departure from the committee is rather timely. I sense that, as was the case with the Post-16 Education (Scotland) Bill, a blizzard of amendments will be lodged. Good luck with that. [Laughter.]

The financial memorandum estimates that for most children the additional role of the named person described in the bill will result in an extra two hours a year per child from midwives and one hour a year per child from health visitors. I am not very good at maths, but I have worked it out that that will mean midwives get two and a half minutes with each child a week and health visitors will get just over a minute with each child a week. What will that contribute?

John Stevenson: We have said that a significant input of resources for health visitors and other health staff will be required. We are in a position in which health visitors are overworked. The refocusing of health visiting towards the most vulnerable has meant that things such as the two-year check are missed out and lots of developmental issues are not picked up. The reintroduction of that check without the required resources alongside it, but with the named person role on top, will make the situation almost critical for health visitors and midwives on the ground.

We are aware that the pilots in Edinburgh have been with pre-school children. Where the system is working already, people find it difficult to get their head round it but they are fine once they have done so—although we are then stuck with a lack of time to carry out the role. Health visitors have sizeable case loads. As a named person, they might have to attend several meetings a week relating to children, which is time that they will not be out visiting children. A significant and on-going investment of resources is needed; it cannot just be a one-off investment.

Neil Findlay: The reality is that it has taken you longer to give that answer than health staff will have each week to address the issues. Even so, those staff will be time rich compared with teachers because, apparently, they will not need any extra time to carry out the role. On a basic level, it is incredible that that has been said. If I train a person to do something and then they go and do it, that must take some time. Perhaps we need Professor Hawking to come before us to explain the physics behind doing something that does not take any time. It must take time for teachers to act as a named person.

Susan Quinn: That probably reflects the fact that many of the areas in which we are to be trained under the bill are already dealt with in schools. Our difficulty is that, in the beginning, people will possibly become more concerned about or afraid of litigation. Therefore, more time will be taken to ensure that any new legislation or processes are embedded.

Time has been spent training staff, which is why additional time will not be required. However, the time requirement has not necessarily been resourced. We must consider how we resource and, in particular, staff our schools based on need.

Over the years, things have changed in terms of what is recognised in deciding staffing levels in schools that are in areas that are high on the index of multiple deprivation. There has been a move to using the free school meals and clothing grants entitlement, rather than the deprivation index, as the fraction that is factored in. That approach changes quite significantly the resource that our schools get in relation to staffing levels for the named person role. Although that is not the only thing that will determine the level of need and the workload of a named person, it is quite clear that it has an impact.

It may well be that there is not any additional work, but the reality is that the work is on-going and, as I have said before, it is only one part of the job that the named person will be doing. Although some of my colleagues might like to have a named person who only does that job, in reality the person will be doing a plethora of other things in relation to the wellbeing, teaching, learning and so on of young people. The named person role will become part of those things.

Whether the role becomes overwhelming in that person’s workload really depends on the make-up of their establishment at any one time. Schools might see a greater need one year and then the need could change—that is where things become difficult. We would argue again that resource has been squeezed over the years, which affects people’s roles. A secondary school that had five depute heads in the past may well now have only three. Those three have a bigger workload than they had when there were five depute heads.

Neil Findlay: In some of the large secondary schools, we are talking about rolls of a few thousand. Are we really trying to say that there will be a named person in such a school who is responsible for, say, up to 3,000 young people and that that role is not going to take any extra time? I am sorry—I just do not wear that at all.

The Convener: I want to clarify something, given that line of questioning and the statements that have been made. I presume that much of this work—as I think Susan Quinn has indicated—already goes on. We have teachers who take on a pastoral care role as part of their current duties. Is it not the case that, in effect, we are quantifying and focusing the responsibility more accurately and detailing what the role is in order to ensure that what already happens with good teachers happens across the country? Is that not what we are attempting to do?

Susan Quinn: That may well be the intention of the bill, but only time will tell what the impact is and whether that happens, because the detail of the duties of the named person is massive.

It is not just a matter of the impact of the bill in its own right and whether it comes with no additional resource. We also have to set the bill in the current context that our establishments find themselves in: yes, we have teachers who take on a pastoral care role, but in lots of areas their role has changed over the years. Their teaching commitment has increased in recent years compared with the past, with a knock-on effect. Therefore, only time will tell whether the duties of the named person simply quantify what is currently happening or increase their workload. We will not know until we see what everything looks like on the ground.

The Convener: Okay. Thank you very much. Time is rushing on, so we need to move on.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): I will touch again on a point that Professor Norrie raised in connection with a single child’s plan. The bill provides for a child’s plan to be developed if an individual child has a “wellbeing need” that requires a targeted intervention. Professor Norrie indicated that there are some deficiencies in that, and that if guidelines were laid down by the Government they would not compensate for those deficiencies because the bill does not make any reference to existing legislative duties. I am interested to hear a little bit more about that, and whether the whole panel agrees with that.

Professor Norrie: If you are referring to my written evidence, the point that I was making was about when we should take account of the child’s views. The bill suggests that we should take account of the child’s views when deciding whether a child’s plan is necessary. It struck me that it is much more important to take account of the child’s views when we are designing the content of the child’s plan.

That taps into a slightly broader concern that I had about children's views. Most child law of the past 20 or 30 years traces the duty from article 12 of the UNCRC and most of our children's legislation specifically requires bodies to take account of the views of the child, but there is very little of that in the bill. I would have preferred there to be more of a requirement on service providers—in drawing up not only the children's plans, but their general strategies—to speak to children and find out what they need in particular areas.

Colin Beattie: I appreciate that. However, we have existing legislative requirements. Do they adequately feed in to the bill? With no specific reference to those legislative requirements, will guidelines compensate?

Professor Norrie: In that context, guidelines serve a useful purpose.

Mike Burns: Core social work practice—and what we do when we are working with children—has to have at its heart the views of the child. A plan is most effective when its focus is specifically on what the child needs.

There are sufficient safeguards in the system, through child protection reviews, looked-after and accommodated reviews, relationships with schools and health visitors, and the children's hearing system itself, to ensure that core practice—whether it involves issues to do with wellbeing or welfare—has at its heart the securing of the child's view, irrespective of his or her age. Even when a child is very young, the social worker and the other professionals who are around the child are obliged to think with empathy about the absolute needs of the child and to convert some of those needs into the plan.

Susan Quinn: On the single plan relating to wellbeing, we have raised the point that education services will have plans that relate to additional support needs but not to wellbeing. We had hoped that the bill would free us from having different plans for different things, but if the plan is simply about wellbeing, there is no potential for that.

The Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2009 requires that a young person's voice is heard in their plan. That is used and developed in our schools. We hope that we will not have one plan that looks one way, at wellbeing, and another that looks a different way, at additional support needs; we hope that there will be a single document so that a plan in relation to overtaking education-related barriers to learning would look the same as a plan in relation to overtaking wellbeing barriers to learning. It would be the same document, so that if anything changes in the young person's life, people would not have to redraft the whole thing. The document will just provide the information, but expectations need to be made clear.

If that is not what comes out, and there is simply one single plan that relates to the concern about wellbeing, it will not change my members' workload, because people will still have to have a separate plan under the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2009. We hope that the two will start to look the same.

John Stevenson: The issue for us was the sharing of information without consent and how we define that in terms of wellbeing. Good practice means sharing with consent and engaging people in the process. If you start off by excluding the child from the decision about whether to share their information, the next step will be a bit of an uphill struggle.

Professor Norrie: Legal guidelines compensate?

John Stevenson: We need the single child's plan to pull together. There are sufficient safeguards in the system through child protection reviews, looked-after and accommodated reviews, relationships with schools and health visitors, and the children's hearing system itself. That should not be considered to be a separate structure; it should be ground into every part of the structure from its roots upwards.

We are looking at a system that takes a universal approach to children's wellbeing using services that have, by and large, been targeted in the past. For example, health visitor services and social work services serve only parts of the population. Schools serve the whole population and the bill is a major issue for them. We need to get our heads around the universality of the service that we are providing, which will bring into the net a whole lot of people who in the past had no connection with agencies at all.

Colin Beattie: From your experience, do you think that the practical issues around combining the child's plan with other existing plans might turn out to be bigger than we think?

John Stevenson: In giving evidence on other legislation previously, Unison made the point that we discovered that in one local authority, for a child to come into care something like 11 different forms needed to be filled in. That situation has got much better.

We have also guarded against the oversimplification of a single child's plan. The temptation is to come up with a bureaucracy and with a form that is so simplistic that it tells us nothing. We need the single child's plan to pull... together all specialist plans. We would not expect a paediatrician to be able to do their report on a single sheet of paper and we would not expect an education plan to be done in that way either. The single child’s plan needs to be a hub that brings such reports together but does not replace them. Unfortunately, we sometimes see on the ground attempts being made to replace those reports with something far more simplistic.

Colin Beattie: Do you think that there is enough clarity about which organisation might be responsible for providing and paying for the services that would be required under the child’s plan? I am thinking of instances when children might use services outside their own local authority area.

Mike Burns: If the bill captures current practice, there are well established arrangements for the team of professionals. I cannot think of a time when there has been significant dispute. There is often clarity, and professionals need to work together to be clear about how a child’s needs will be best served by the local resources that are at their disposal. The system works well at the moment.

Neil Findlay: In a previous job, I was responsible for writing individual education plans, and refreshing them made for what were probably the hardest couple of weeks of the year. It was time consuming and very difficult, at times. When I first went into the job, the plans were written in very dry education terminology and mentioned numeracy, phonics, linguistics and all the rest. They were sent to parents to be signed off and agreed, but many of the parents had not a clue what they were about. The plans would come back signed, but if we discussed them with parents, we found that they did not know what they had signed. It was not until the school completely revamped the process so that the plans were written alongside the child, who could say, “I can do this and that, but I need help with that other thing”, that the parents and the children began to realise what they were all about. That was very refreshing.

I acknowledge John Stevenson’s caution against making the plans overly simplistic. However, we need to rethink how we engage the people whom the plans are supposed to be assisting and how we get them to buy into the process. Simplifying the plans does not necessarily mean throwing out a lot of information, but the information must be presented in a way that allows people to understand what is being said.

Susan Quinn: The changes to the way in which plans are developed in schools mean that we now involve parents and young people through face-to-face meetings. However, that is a real challenge for schools, because it has to be done during the school day. We cannot say to children, “Go and wait behind, will you, so I can sit down with you, because I have had to take the class today?”

Neil Findlay mentioned large secondaries with large numbers of pupils. Some of our smaller schools face even greater challenges. Although the numbers of young people are lower, the school might have a teaching head; if they are teaching during the day, they cannot sit down with a young person or a parent and listen to their views on a plan, because they have people in front of them. Real challenges already exist in the current system.

It does not particularly matter what the paperwork looks like; teachers need time without a class in front of them to discuss a plan. Our members have said that it has in the past few years become harder to find the time for that in the school day, because there are things that they have to do. The head can sit with the class teacher at the end or the beginning of the day and develop strategies, but the part that involves young people must take place when they are there during the school day. Otherwise, we are asking our most vulnerable children to get a detention and stay behind so that we can work on their support needs. That is where the squeeze with regard to people having a bigger role has had an impact.

Mike Burns: To go back to one of the first points, the law and the plan by themselves will not deliver the cultural change that we are seeking. The important element is the ethos and the thinking behind the bill, particularly with regard to getting it right for every child, which concerns the set of attributes that early years educators and health visitors can, without a doubt, bring to the table. The third sector is critical in early engagement, and a social worker simply filling in a plan or a report by themselves will not secure the necessary engagement and outcomes. It is the set of attributes and the quality that are critical.

Marco Biagi (Edinburgh Central) (SNP): Panel members should feel free to give yes or no answers, as I am aware of the time.

The difference between welfare and wellbeing has been mentioned quite a bit today. Professor Norrie’s written submission characterises the difference as being that welfare is an imperative—almost a tripwire to trigger intervention—whereas wellbeing is much broader and is about maximising good things in a child’s life. Do the other panel members agree with that?

Professor Norrie: That is a fair summation of my view. The critical distinction that is traditionally used with regard to the state stepping in to do something compulsorily—to interfere with family life, if you want to put it that way—is the welfare test. As far as I understand it, the bill is more about avoiding the need for compulsory state intervention, which is a quite different process. Indeed, it uses the term “wellbeing” instead of “welfare”, which struck me as being quite useful.

Marco Biagi: Given that I managed to get that right, I wonder whether Mike Burns also finds that to be useful.

Mike Burns: It is certainly helpful; in fact, it is critical that we in Scotland enhance wellbeing in order to deal with some of our welfare and child protection issues. As a collective community, we need to parent better and to see parenting as a kind of active citizenship. I understand—indeed, I adhere to—the views that have been expressed about differentiating with regard to family life and protecting privacy, but the point is that a lot of situations that we have had to deal with have ended up as very acute child protection issues when the system collectively could have—and should have—intervened earlier on the basis of wellbeing.

Marco Biagi: Do the other two panel members disagree with that?

John Stevenson: I disagree only with regard to definitions and where the threshold should be set. As we have said, that will be tested in the same way that welfare continues to be tested by lawyers arguing more and more at children's hearings. We do not disagree with the principle, except on the compulsory sharing of information, which is a state intervention with regard to wellbeing.

Marco Biagi: Does the duty to promote wellbeing complement or conflict with other duties—for example, corporate parenting and supporting and promoting welfare?

Mike Burns: I do not think that that would be an issue.

Marco Biagi: Lastly, some of the written evidence has commented on the use of the safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included—or SHANARRI—indicators. Do any of you have views on that matter?

John Stevenson: Unison has commented not on whether the SHANARRI indicators themselves are good but on whether thresholds might be considerably blurred as a result of one person thinking that they might or might not be good. Going back to Neil Findlay’s earlier point about forms, the fact is that things are much better when people are involved right at the beginning. The best way of involving people is through co-operation, but our concern is that if something that should be enabling or involving merely becomes a way for officialdom to share information, we will lose them at the beginning of the process.

Susan Quinn: My only concern about the SHANARRI indicators is that we do not change them. People in schools are only now getting to grips with them in their current form, so if you were to come along and say, “Actually, we’re going to have to change them before you’ve even started to use them for anything much”, their heads might explode.

The Convener: We could not have that.

Susan Quinn: The SHANARRI aspect of GIRFEC has taken a while to permeate through many of our systems. The indicators provide a general service, but other aspects of SHANARRI will lead to much more precise and considered interventions than we have at the moment.

Marco Biagi: Would putting each of the SHANARRI indicators into the bill as headings provide people with some confidence that the system will be used, and avoid the danger of anyone’s head exploding in the near future?

Susan Quinn: Yes—having the indicators in the legislation would achieve that aim. It comes back to whether the indicators need to be in the legislation or the guidance. If the indicators are in the guidance, that will—provided that the guidance is clear—give people in our schools confidence that that is where we are going in the future and that the indicators match what we are doing in the curriculum and other aspects of our work. People will therefore begin to gain confidence in use of the indicators, which are not the only assessment tools and plans that are considered under GIRFEC, but are only one part of what schools use.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): Good morning. My question, which is about kinship care, is for Mike Burns. Kinship care is a massive issue and I know about the challenges at local authority level and the difficulties that families face when they try to navigate the administrative minefield that is put before them. What discretion should local authorities have over how they support kinship carers, and to what level?

Mike Burns: Our submission says that kinship carers have made a very positive contribution and that we welcome the securing of kinship carers through the financial support that they have been given. We have said that it is critical that the provision in the bill, rather than referring to counselling, should be about assessed need alongside the role of kinship carers and the informal supports that kinship carers have access to—or to which they have access on occasion.
A big effort has been made in three cities to try to facilitate the pathway to support to which George Adam refers. Carers whom I speak to often say that it is almost as if they have to break down barriers to get support, whether in relation to welfare rights or legal issues. We seek to provide much more assistance and much quicker access to support.

There should be significant local determination of what is required in an area. Kinship carers refer to a number of issues—such as trauma or loss—that might require counselling, but there can also be significant issues about establishing routines for meal times or sleep, about family group conferencing and about contact.

To be too prescriptive—rather than saying that counselling is part of the assessed need and bearing in mind some of the principles that we have discussed—may, in a sense, narrow what is required for the child.

George Adam: You mentioned welfare rights. Nine times out of 10 it becomes quite difficult for the kinship carer to look after the family financially. We have agreed that it is quite difficult for carers to go through the system. If the benefits system does not support the families financially, do local authorities have the right to step in to support them?

Mike Burns: A number of authorities have provided kinship care payments specifically on the basis that access to payments that would be made through the Department for Work and Pensions and so on is protected. There is probably still a postcode lottery to some degree; there are differences between authorities. The differences are partly down to the fact that some local authorities have viewed kinship carers as being similar to foster carers, whereas other local authorities took the view that kinship carers are different and felt that they had to ensure that the financial burden was not simply assumed by the local authority and that finances that would otherwise have been available to kinship carers were protected and, indeed, enhanced if the local authority decided that, in the circumstances, the child could not remain with his or her parents.

The decision comes back to the principle of the protection of private life, which we discussed. If that threshold is met, the local authority intervenes to move the child, whether it is to the aunt, the uncle or the grandparents. The kinship care payment should be made at that point. It has made a significant contribution to supporting such children. We have looked at and even audited such things and many children have, through that payment, remained within their extended family, which is to be welcomed.

Neil Bibby: I want to ask the ADSW about its submission. The start of the submission mentions the “Removal of functions” and what it interprets as “a very centralising power” that could take away the planning for children’s services and transfer assets and money from local authorities to a joint body or board. What case has the Scottish Government made to you on the need to do that?

Mike Burns: We commented on the fact that that did not form part of the consultation. We wanted to flag up that a lot of the work that the Scottish Government has led on in relation to the early years collaborative, which really does capture the GIRFEC principles and the direction of travel in the legislation, says that we need to look specifically at communities, neighbourhoods, access to services and the points that we have raised about kinship care and bringing local resources to people.

Even in my local authority—Glasgow City Council—there is at times the notion of the centralised plan, but what remains critical for me is my ability to convert that meaningfully to Possil and Drumchapel.

All that we flagged up was the fact that the deficit in performance is not often in relation to the quality of the plan. I have looked at many plans that are incredibly well written; many bright people have been at the back of them, and their aspirations and what they want for children are excellent. The critical thing is to convert those aspirations into tangible outcomes on the ground in neighbourhoods. We flagged that up in order to say that it seemed to be incongruent with the direction of travel of the early years collaborative and the GIRFEC principles to say that there will at times be a centralised solution to what could be the local determination of local issues. That was our issue.

The Convener: Thank you very much for that.

I thank all the witnesses very much for their evidence at the start of our in-depth look at the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. The meeting has been a helpful start. Again, I thank the witnesses for the written evidence that they supplied to the committee before their appearance this morning.

That concludes the public part of the meeting. Earlier, the committee agreed to take agenda item 3 in private.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from witnesses representing children’s perspectives—

Jackie Brock, Chief Executive, Children in Scotland;
Alex Cole-Hamilton, Head of Policy, Aberlour Child Care Trust;
Duncan Dunlop, Chief Executive, Who Cares? Scotland; and then from witnesses representing parents’ perspectives—

Clare Simpson, Project Manager, Parenting across Scotland;
Lori Summers;
Claire Telfer, Head of Policy, Advocacy & Campaigns (Scotland), Save the Children;
Caroline Wilson.
The Convener: Under our next agenda item we will hear evidence on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. We have two panels of witnesses today, the first of which includes organisations representing the perspectives of children.

I welcome to the committee Jackie Brock from Children in Scotland, Alex Cole-Hamilton from Aberlour Child Care Trust, and Duncan Dunlop from Who Cares? Scotland. I thank the witnesses for their written submissions, which will inform our lines of questioning. Clearly, we have quite a lot of areas to cover this morning, so I want to get straight to the questions.

I remind members that quick, precise questions would be helpful and those answering the questions that precise answers would be equally helpful. Also, if somebody else has covered a question, you do not need to answer twice. If we could all do that, it would be very helpful. I ask Liam McArthur to start us off.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): I will start with the general issue of rights. We have already heard about issues about whether or not a children’s rights impact assessment should be carried out in relation to the bill, and we have had a response from the Scottish Government on that. It would be helpful to get your views on what has not been carried out, and what the deficiency is in that respect.

The other issue that we covered last week was in relation to the incorporation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. We heard in particular from Professor Norrie about what he saw as the complications of incorporating it wholesale into Scots law. I know that this has been one of the priorities for a number of groups operating in this field, and it would be helpful to know the basis on which you believe full incorporation to be the best route and to hear about examples that we can learn from of where it has been done in other countries that would give us confidence that it could be done in this country without too many problems.

The Convener: I know that the panel was not specifically asked here today to answer questions on this area, but it would be helpful to get your responses.

Alex Cole-Hamilton (Aberlour Child Care Trust): I will take the first question about the children’s rights impact assessment. When the legislative programme was originally mooted, this
The interpretation of those aspirations, and law, which itself is more literal and more precise, sign up to, by incorporating it wholesale into Scots a series of aspirations that, obviously, we can all last week was that, whereas the UNCRC sets out specific concern that Professor Norrie articulated the best place in the world to grow up in. The international standard for what that means is the creation of a rights-based framework and approach to legislation that means that all decisions by ministers or by public bodies in the delivery of a service are taken in a transparent and accountable way that has the best interests of the child at heart, listens to the voice of the child and takes account of the impact that any particular policy might have. That would give the power of access to justice to children and a right to redress, through either judicial or non-judicial means. It would also create a framework within which we could monitor and evaluate the observance of those rights in conducting our public policy.

For us, the most elegant roadmap to that, and the most elegant solution against the international standard, is to incorporate the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child into Scots law. Until we do something like that, or we build the provisions into the way in which we make policy, we will forever be behind those countries that have already incorporated the UNCRC—countries to which we look, such as Norway and Belgium, where the UNCRC has been incorporated for several years now, and whose judicial systems still function absolutely normally, but with children’s rights at their very core. Without that, we will not have achieved the ambition to be the best place in the world to grow up in.

Liam McArthur: That is helpful. I think that the specific concern that Professor Norrie articulated last week was that, whereas the UNCRC sets out a series of aspirations that, obviously, we can all sign up to, by incorporating it wholesale into Scots law, which itself is more literal and more precise, we would run the risk of handing responsibility for the interpretation of those aspirations, and whether they have been fully reflected, to judges as opposed to legislators. You do not believe that that is a risk.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: That has certainly not been the case in the countries that have incorporated it. I named two, but there are many others. There are countries throughout Europe that automatically incorporate UN treaties, as that is just the way their legislative process works. This is about—

The Convener: Sorry—can I interrupt you? Just to be clear about this, Liam is quite right that Professor Norrie raised this issue last week. The reason why it is—I do not want to use the word “easy”—easier for some other countries to do so is that their style of law is very different from the style of law that we have. Our law is very specific and very detailed, and interpretation is done by legislators, whereas other countries have much more general ambitions in their law, and incorporation is therefore relatively straightforward. It fits with their law, whereas it does not really fit with our law. We can achieve the same ends, therefore, not by incorporation but by making changes in legislation. There is a clear difference in the style of the law that we have compared with that in other countries.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: We have a legal opinion on this point, which was commissioned by UNICEF and which we can make available to the committee. It is from Aidan O’Neill, who said that incorporating the UNCRC into Scots law is entirely compatible with Scots law both in its everyday practice and the common-law aspects that you described.

The Convener: Does anybody else want to make a very brief comment on that, or are you content with that answer?

Jackie Brock (Children in Scotland): I would very briefly point out that the vast majority of Children in Scotland’s members—400 plus—favoured incorporation and, equally, a children’s rights impact assessment. They are, quite frankly, baffled as to why the vast majority of responses, which said that they favour incorporation, have not been responded to adequately. We do not know why there is not a children’s rights impact assessment. There does not seem to be a good reason for it. In many ways, that really could have helped with a lot of the, frankly, guddle that has come through, for example the misunderstanding about information sharing and confidentiality. If we had had an impact assessment at the outset, it might well have given us a clear line of sight through some of the issues that have subsequently become quite controversial.

The Convener: Okay; thank you. I am going to move on and ask Jayne Baxter to contribute.
Jayne Baxter: Good morning. If we are going to give priority to the voices of children in this legislation, do you think that the level of engagement with children and young people that the Scottish Government has had, and continues to have, in relation to the bill has been adequate?

The Convener: Can we start with Duncan Dunlop? He has not spoken yet.

Duncan Dunlop (Who Cares? Scotland): Naturally, I have an interest in the process, and you have a vested interest in why we want to give evidence today, and that is because Who Cares? Scotland represents the voice of looked-after children and young people and those who have been in care.

Real credit needs to be given to this entire committee for the way in which it has sought to engage proactively not just the voices of looked-after children and young people on this bill but in how the Government heard what young people were saying their needs were. In the past two years, the committee has had a specific inquiry into why their outcomes have been so poor and I give real credit for that, in that we believe that their voice is truly being heard. We saw that in the way in which the committee questioned the Minister for Children and Young People at the end of the last term. We could see from the questioning that the issue is about relationships, their need for love and how we can maintain for them the needs that all other children—or the majority of other children—have within their birth family.

I truly believe that through the process of listening to children and young people, and through the process of this bill, in the conversations that there have been and in the evidence that has been gathered, we are at a point of understanding the issue and knowing what the solution is. So, for us, to a degree, the Government has listened very well, and it is now time for the Government to act to ensure that it is effective and is exercised about those children and young people.

From what the young people told us, the main issue for them is relationships and their need to continue to be cared for by those people with whom they have had a link from their early teens, so that relationships do not end relatively abruptly when they get to the age of 16, or when the supervision order is lifted, and they can continue to get support from those people. Yes, that might mean staying with them for another year or two more, but it was about their being allowed to maintain that relationship and be supported in that, as many of your children and our children have been and will be—when returning for their holidays, between jobs, coming for Christmas dinner, or looking for that emotional support that is a really key ingredient in what is happening.

Our real proposal to the committee is this: can we please work with you and look at how we can make this bill slightly more progressive to ensure that it can fulfil its ambition of making this the best place to grow up in for those looked-after young people? For us, that is about continuing to care for them and giving them a right to that, on their terms, to the age of 26.

Jackie Brock: I would echo a lot of that. As Jayne Baxter will be aware, the Government commissioned specific child and young people consultation and engagement, and it has certainly listened to many of the views from Children in Scotland, from others and from all our partners. As Duncan has said, the key thing is therefore whether the Government actually listens and feeds that in effectively by acting on what those children and young people have told us.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: I believe that the Government has consulted 2,500 children in the course of preparing for the bill, and consultation is still on-going. Aberlour Child Care Trust has a service user forum called youth voice, which is web-based and through which young people and services right across our country meet via webcam on a regular basis to discuss issues of importance to them. The Government has asked us to conduct a questionnaire on a privacy assessment that the Government wants to perform on the information-sharing provisions in the bill in particular. This consultation is on-going.

Jayne Baxter: Duncan Dunlop has outlined what the young people whom he represents have articulated. Do any of the other witnesses want to say what the concerns of children and young people are in relation to the bill?

Jackie Brock: I will just add a couple of things and build on some of Duncan’s points on the wellbeing of children and young people, particularly on the inclusion of disabled children and those with additional support needs, as that is crucial. Those children want to be like other children, but they need additional support in some areas, and funding is a key area where disadvantage is being reinforced at the moment. So, it is about how we look at those provisions in the bill, but also, crucially, about the guidance on implementation.

That relates to another area. A lot of children and young people will not get exercised about many of these provisions; they will want to see action. For example, with the child’s plan, you may quibble over some of the wording, but the commitment there is to have a plan to act and to intervene, and to ensure that it is effective and is what children need. Those who have additional needs, whatever those might be, want to see action taken so that they can resume their lives or ensure that disadvantages are removed.

Those are the two key things that have come through from our work with children and young people.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: If you ask children what they think, one of the most important things for them is to have their views heard and acted upon. As I mentioned in my opening remarks around the child’s plan in section 33, we believe that that section would not have stood up to scrutiny had there been a children’s rights impact assessment. In effect, it gives local authorities the option to disregard a child’s views based on age and immaturity, whereas we believe that, actually, any child that is capable of making a view known should have that view listened to, where possible.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): Just following on from the questions about consultation and listening to children’s and young people’s concerns about the bill, how does what is in the bill compare with your original expectations?

Alex Cole-Hamilton: We are pleasantly surprised. The Government has moved some distance on this. This is a much better bill than was originally consulted on in the summer of last year. We are very supportive, particularly of the provisions around aftercare for children leaving care. I hope that we will come on to that in more depth. We are satisfied that the bill, if passed in its current form, will help to move us on that journey towards making this country the best place in the world to grow up in.

Jackie Brock: We would build on it—for example, in early learning and childcare. There are excellent statements of intent, and particularly on flexibility in childcare. However, we would like to see those strengthened and a marker being laid down for exactly where children and their families can get the support that they need in those early years. Equally, we hugely welcome the endorsement and the putting into statute of the principles of early intervention, and the expectations that we have of universal services through the getting it right for every child principles, and the child’s plans. I absolutely echo Alex’s and Duncan’s points on aftercare and rights. Those have come through strongly for us.

Duncan Dunlop: The only thing that I would add is that it is great to see a term like “corporate parenting” actually put on the legislative agenda. There could be a little bit more work on refining what that actually looks like, and we are suggesting what could be done and what those continuing care services ought to look like, but what has been great is the way in which the conversation has evolved and that we are getting a piece of legislation that should be fit for purpose for the young people whom we are concerned with. I have confidence that it will happen.

The Convener: I want to move on now, and I will bring in Liz Smith.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): Good morning. I want to direct attention to the named person issue, which has, as you know, elicited a wide range of views, from those who are immensely supportive to those who are very much against it because, in their view, it is undermining the role of the parent. Ms Brock, you said in your evidence that, actually, it was just a formalisation of the existing practice. What is it in the bill that you expect to improve things if we are largely doing these things already?

Jackie Brock: I am delighted that we are looking at a bill that is going to endorse the excellent practice that is going on. I can give you countless examples across our universal services, such as schools and health visitors, where there is clarity for the first time for parents and children about the responsibilities that services have to ensure their child’s wellbeing. However, the implementation of that is simply not moving quickly or consistently enough.

You asked in your inquiry on looked-after children at home—and no doubt you have asked after frequent child protection reviews looking at the need for additional support—why professionals are not listening and talking to each other, why they are not listening to children and young people, and why they are not taking action. Having the duties in statute will ensure that it is the responsibility of universal services to respond and take action where necessary, where it is in the child’s best interest that they do so.

Undoubtedly, the duties as currently presented require further clarification, but this will be a hugely significant step forward in what children can expect. You should remember the consensus that you have around the GIRFEC principles across teachers, nurses, social workers, the police force and the third sector. We are at an exciting point, but we have to look at what we need in statute to get rid of some of the inconsistent practice and inconsistent funding decisions that are being made by authorities, so that services can respond effectively to prevent the situations that you talked about—such as looked-after children at home and neglect further down the line if we do not intervene earlier.

Liz Smith: Could I just develop that? Obviously, a large number of submissions that have been largely supportive of the principle of the named person have raised serious concerns about the practicalities and especially about the cost. At last week’s meeting, we were told that, by definition, it would involve an awful lot more children being in the system than there are currently. Do you have any concerns about the cost?

Jackie Brock: We have to respect the evidence that you heard last week and the views on capacity and resources, but the named person service is already happening. It is saving resources in many parts of the country, and I am sure that you have seen the evidence on that. Where it is working well, there are more streamlined systems and processes and it is reducing the bureaucracy and weeding out children and young people who should not be in the system—or should not be in the system for as long—because of the greater clarity around joint working and sharing.

Do I have concerns about costs? I absolutely do, in terms of the financial pressures that our universal services are under. Do I think that GIRFEC is going to sink the system? No, I do not, because where it is working well—where there is a commitment to proper training and implementation and there is a proper child-centred approach—we are seeing efficiencies in the system that will address some of those concerns. However, with some of the action that we are looking to take, there will be costs and we need to be realistic about that.

Liz Smith: Do you have sympathy with the view of groups such as the Educational Institute of Scotland and Unison, which feel there are substantial costs involved in additional training?

Jackie Brock: Those are our members, and I always express sympathy for the huge range of pressures that they are under, but this is part of their job. A teacher’s job is to look at the wide needs of a child’s wellbeing. We do need to ensure that training takes place, as it has been over the last seven years, and of course we need further investment, but those concerns have not been fully realised because we have been able to absorb a lot of the training as part of what teachers do and as part of their professional development. There are similar issues in relation to health.

Liz Smith: There are some who believe that the child should have an input into who the named person is, and others who say that that is not the right thing to do. What are your views on that process? If the answer to that is that the child should be involved, what are the implications? If the answer is no, what are the implications of that decision?

Alex Cole-Hamilton: First, I echo Jackie Brock’s remarks in support of the named person service, in that the bill codifies what should be happening anyway. An anxiety has developed because of confusion between the roles of the lead professional, who is traditionally a social worker, and the named person. That has led to some of the anxiety that the committee has heard about.

With regard to flexibility around who the named person is, we have had some detailed discussions with the Government about exactly that point. Particularly in rural schools, for example, where the senior teacher might be related to one of the children in their care in the school, it would be inappropriate for that teacher to be the named person for that child. Similarly, if there is a fractious relationship between a specific child and the senior teacher to whom they are assigned as the named person, there needs to be a flexibility in the system so that that can be changed.

I believe that the Government is alive to that issue. It has informed us that flexibility will underpin the guidance, and that it will be part of the system. Obviously, in any school and particularly in secondary schools, there can be a large senior teaching staff. They have maybe three or four deputy heads, and not necessarily one named person for the entire cohort of children in their care.

Liz Smith: In principle, would it be a better system if the child had greater input as to who the named person was, or should that be controlled more by services?

Alex Cole-Hamilton: The voice of the child always needs to be heard. In the vast majority of cases, there will be very little interface between the child and the named person, or between the family and the named person. There is a single point of contact through which families can access wider support should they need it, but we believe—as happens now, where this best practice is working—that there will be very little interface between a child or a family and their named person.

The child and family will obviously be informed as to who their named person is, and if there is some massive, strenuous objection on the part of the child to that named person being assigned, I believe that we need to listen to that and find a way of using some flexibility in the teaching staff or other universal services over who can perform the named person role for that particular child.

Duncan Dunlop: For the looked-after population, the issue is more about the lead professional. It is where that link will be and how long that lead professional—who is mainly the social worker, as Alex Cole-Hamilton rightly says—will maintain a link with that person. Is the case closed when the supervision order is lifted, or are they able to reconnect with that person... because they have had that relationship for a number of years?

Too often, young people have too many different social workers and too many different relationships. We need to truly hear what they want, because they are the experts on their life. We might want to put them in a box, but they do not want to be in that box, and they are not necessarily going to conform to wishes unless they trust the relationship with the person who is advising them and supporting them through the process.

The young person’s voice needs to be heard in relation to the crucial decision makers who will help them work out their way forward in life and the services they get; otherwise they just will not participate. They might be present physically, but they will not necessarily connect. They need to have some say.

Liz Smith: I will finish my questioning on the role of the parent. Should the parent be instrumental in having input as to who the named person should be?

Jackie Brock: The purpose of the named person is to support the parent as well, so there is a named contact to check in with the school or the health service if they are a bit worried about their child. How many of us have had experiences when we thought, “Things are a bit tricky at home; I am just going to check in and ask the school to keep an eye on my child”?

If, for any reason, a parent makes that contact and feels betrayed or let down because of action then taken, there will need to be some action taken, and the parent should have a role in who the named person should be. However, we need to be sensible, pragmatic and understanding of what this role is. Why make more complex the interactions between parents and those professionals working with their children? This is about ensuring that, where a parent or a child has a concern, or where a professional has a concern, they can work to take action to make sure that those problems do not get any worse.

Liz Smith: Do you dismiss the very strong complaints that have been made by some parents groups that this whole process undermines their responsibilities and that of the family?

Jackie Brock: I am not saying that the system cannot be strengthened, and I would like to work with the Government and with you on this, but these provisions—the plan, the work of the named person and so on—are all about working in partnership with due regard to children and parents.

A lot of the concerns that have been raised have possibly been brought about by bad practice or difficult relationships between parents and teachers, but I do not think that that bad practice should dictate the law on how the named person is going to work. It is about supporting family life and supporting parents to ensure that their children are nourished. We need absolutely to make sure that there is no threat in that, but I think that it is about how we can communicate better. How can schools, health services and others make sure that parents see them as the ones to help them in their central, pre-eminent role of parenting and looking after their children?

Alex Cole-Hamilton: The spirit of the named person is that it will be somebody who is known to that family, and they will be the first or single point of contact so that, if there is ever a need in the family to access support or be signposted to some intervention or assistance, it is somebody they know. The discussions that we have had with the Government have given us confidence that, should the identity of that named person be revealed to the family and the family has a visceral reaction to that and says, “We have never got on with that person,” there will be flexibility built into the system to have that altered.

Once again, I understand where some of the anxiety on the part of parents groups comes from. It is fuelled by some unhelpful tabloid headlines about there being a social worker for every child. That is not what we are talking about here. We are talking about what should be happening among the senior teaching staff of every school as it is happening right now: keeping an eye on all the children for any signs that things might not be going as well as they could be, or being there should parents ask for advice or support in relation to any aspect of state provision.

The Convener: Before we move on, I would like to address this issue head on.

Alex, you have raised the matter of the “unhelpful”, as you put it, tabloid headlines. I will play devil’s advocate for a minute. I am a parent, I am married, we have a child at school, there are no alcohol or drugs problems, there are no family problems and I have never had any contact with the social work department—I am a Joe Average parent. Why does the state have a right to intervene in and snoop around my family? I am paraphrasing the unhelpful headlines that you referred to, but that is the fear that is created by those headlines. What do you say to those who have that fear?

Jackie Brock: What right to intervene or snoop is being allowed for in this bill? There is absolutely no such right. If that is what those headlines referred to, I can say that there is no right to intervene in your life. Where your child has not told you about their unhappiness in your family life, their drug habit, or their problems with alcohol but they choose to reveal that to a professional, then the professional, acting in the best interests of the child, needs to decide what action will be taken. However, right now, there is nothing in the bill that suggests any unwarranted interference in any aspect of family life.

The Convener: Why does my family need a named person, then?

Alex Cole-Hamilton: Technically, you already have one; it is just that there is better practice in some areas than in others.

There is always somebody looking out for your child, and you would hope that, when your child goes to school, if they appear at school with a black eye, somebody is asking questions about that. If your wife went to that person at the school gate and said, “Look, I need some help to find financial advice or access another aspect of state provision—who should I turn to?” that teacher would have the answers for them. This bill codifies what should be best practice in every school in the country right now.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): I want to raise a very specific but important issue that is raised in the written evidence by LGBT Youth Scotland. It is concerned about the information-sharing aspect, in relation to both the named person and the child’s plan. It states that, while working with services, particularly education services, it has encountered widespread misunderstanding regarding the rights to privacy of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender young people. A specific example was given in which a young person was being bullied at school because of their sexual orientation and, in the spirit of being helpful, that information was shared with the parents, who had not known. There are apparently many instances of that. Do you think that the legislation needs to be tinkered with in any way to provide a safeguard for those particular young people?

Alex Cole-Hamilton: I was part of the cohort of people in the voluntary sector who helped to bring down part 3 of the Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Bill because it had a section on information sharing that was disproportionate and really did impact on privacy and the right to confidentiality. In our opinion, this section of this bill is far more measured.

As I mentioned earlier, we are engaging with the Government on a privacy assessment. The right to privacy and confidentiality is absolutely at the heart of what we believe in and will strive to achieve. We are satisfied that the provisions in this bill will help to focus the information that is shared. In some cases, it will reduce the amount of information that is shared, because people will be clearer about the thresholds at which they should share, what they should be sharing, and who they should be sharing it with—namely, the named person. Therefore, we have struck a fine balance here. We remain vigilant about the way in which that will be implemented and we will be working very closely with the Government on the guidance.

You asked about tinkering; if we had any mild anxiety about anything, it is the extension of risk to wellbeing and the point at which risk to wellbeing is triggered and information is shared. That is not an insurmountable problem; it is about looking at the safe, healthy, active, nurtured, achieving, respected, responsible and included wellbeing indicators and asking at which point, if a child presents and their indicators in the SHANARRI triangle are not being met, we need to act. That is where the balance needs to be struck. However, we are content that what is in the bill will lead to more focused and proportionate sharing of information.

Jackie Brock: We need to be very mindful of the examples that LGBT Youth Scotland and others have given regarding inappropriate information sharing, but I would worry if we were then to conclude that we should write off, in the example that you gave, Ms McAlpine, the entire secondary schools workforce.

What we have to aspire to, surely, is a confident, competent children’s services workforce that is given the right tools. At the moment, it is being fatally undermined by the complexity and the overlaying and conflicting duties on information sharing that exist within the professional protocols of, for example, some of the royal colleges, the teaching profession and others. It is a mess.

Equally importantly if you are supportive of wellbeing, those protocols do not reflect the duties relating to wellbeing. The current legislation is focused on child protection, which is good, but if we were not to introduce this duty, we would need to look at the legislation to ensure that we are sure that it is robust. However, we would not be able to achieve some of our aspirations for early intervention if these provisions were not introduced.

We have to look at the way in which this bill and the guidance will address some of the poor practice issues. However, in your example, the teacher genuinely thought that they were helping the child. They ought to have been helping, so how do we harness that in line with the age and stage of a child? Teenagers have very different needs and requirements from children under five, for example. We need a better understanding of how we work with teenagers. That is true across the children’s services workforce. However, let us not get rid of a vital tool of information sharing that is needed to do the job better for the sake of worrying about some bad examples that absolutely have to be eradicated. The implementation of this approach is the way forward.

Neil Bibby: I would like to go back to discuss the practical effects of the named person provision. Obviously, you are all signed up to the principle of the named person, but we have heard practical concerns about how it will be implemented and also requests for more detail. Would you sum up the key changes that you would suggest to the legislation and specifically say what resources and information you think are needed to make the named person effective?

Alex Cole-Hamilton: There is very little that we would change in the bill with regard to the named person section. The only thing that I would reiterate is our caution about extending the risk to wellbeing. We support that, but we think that that needs to be underpinned by robust training and definitions as to the thresholds in the SHANARRI indicators at which a child who is expressing distress under any of those indicators triggers the sharing of information or the work of the named person.

Jackie Brock: We need to look at information sharing and think about the valid concerns that have been expressed by many. For example, we need to ensure that it is in the best interests of the child and we need to think about how the accompanying guidance can support that. There has already been a huge amount of information and communication training.

I would hope that the Government—and we also need to take responsibility across the children’s sector workforce—will be thoughtful about the lessons that can be learned from some of the recent stuff in the media over the summer and the way in which some of those myths managed to get some traction. We need to do a better job, collectively, of communicating the excitement and potential of having a named person and getting it right for every child.

The final matter for us relates to the point that I made earlier about the approach that we need to take in order to move from this rather more ad hoc, inconsistent approach to roll-out and implementation of GIRFEC. We need the statutory duties to ensure that this rather more laissez-faire approach is ended and that we have commitment across the country among the children’s services workforce for robust, professional training about implementation. I hope that that will be spurred on by enacting these provisions.

Liam McArthur: I would like to pick up on some of the things that Liz Smith was touching on earlier in relation to resources. Clearly, we want to improve the bill where we can, but we need to be realistic about any piece of legislation effectively being a silver bullet; putting an end to inconsistencies may be something that simply remains an aspiration.

The point in relation to resources—Alex Cole-Hamilton touched on some of the points about extending the risk to wellbeing—is whether there is a risk that the available resources will be spread more thinly and therefore that the areas of most serious risk, which are more to do with welfare than with wellbeing, do not necessarily get the attention that they should in those areas where there remains inconsistent application. Is that concern justified? Is there anything we can do to ensure that that does not happen?

Jackie Brock: I appreciate that it is important that you want us to be pragmatic, and I would want to do everything from Children in Scotland’s perspective to ensure that we are but, when we talk about inconsistencies, I am talking not just about provision being ad hoc but about neighbouring authorities and community planning partnerships having a very different approach. That has to end. I recognise that every child getting an equal service across Scotland is a good aspiration—and let us be ambitious—but we should also be realistic.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: In the application of any legislation, there are hurdles to be overcome and a lot of the detail in the guidance attached to this section will be incredibly important. Once again, I reiterate my earlier point that this codifies what should be happening anyway. The extension of risk to wellbeing is an important one, but it is also something that we need to do in a very measured way. We cannot just have a situation where somebody with a body mass index of over 30 walks into the classroom of a guidance teacher and the guidance teacher says, “Well, their needs are not being met by universal services, so I need to instigate a child’s plan or share information across the piece.” We need to take a rational approach but to understand that the SHANARRI wellbeing indicators are an important tool for identifying children who are at risk.

Liam McArthur: In any change process, there is always a risk that the nature of the change and the thing that you are trying to do differently becomes more of a focus. Therefore, is there a risk that those who, until now, have been the subject of greater focus in terms of having a named person and being subject to the interventions that we are talking about have a little less resource applied to them than they do currently? In trying to make things better, will we increase the level of risk for some of those who probably need that intervention more than anybody else?

Jackie Brock: That is a legitimate concern. Scotland has taken a leap of faith in relation to early years, so there is a very welcome, significant investment going into early years in the hope that, over time, some of the huge costs—financial costs and costs to people—later on will be mitigated. We are asking for an extension of that to all children in the early years and calling for action to be taken. It might not be a service; it might just be a matter of having an additional person looking out for them. We do not see it as being necessarily hugely significant.

We recognise the priorities and we hope that you will be supportive of the leaving care provisions. We face a challenge in what we are doing, but there is ample evidence to suggest that early intervention will be an approach that will save Scotland resources in the long run. However, we recognise absolutely the tensions, which you have described very well.

The Convener: Thank you. I should have asked this earlier, when we discussed what a parent could do if they were not happy with the named person and whether there could perhaps be some flexibility and so on. Do parents have a right to access the information that is provided to the named person by another professional?

Alex Cole-Hamilton: Information about the child?

The Convener: Yes.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: I do not have an absolute answer on that. I imagine that that would fall within the bounds of freedom of information—or rather, data protection. Sorry.

The Convener: Would it? I would be slightly surprised if it did.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: I do not have an answer to that, I am afraid.

The Convener: Does anybody have the answer to that question?

Jackie Brock: It depends on the age and stage of the child and on what information has been given. At the moment, a parent has a right to access information within health and within education; they have a right to see school records. You have, however, illustrated the problem and, frankly, we do not know for sure. I suspect that you would get the same answer from the vast majority of the children’s sector workforce. It is ridiculous; parents and children need clarity, as do professionals.

The Convener: Liam, did you have a question?

Liam McArthur: It was on that, but I think Clare Adamson will ask about information sharing.

The Convener: I will move on to information sharing in a moment. I am sure that we will pursue that matter as we go through the evidence.

I want to take you back to the evidence that we received last week on section 26(2)(a) and (b), and particularly Professor Norrie’s evidence, which pointed to the issue of the phrases “it must be provided”, “might be relevant” and “ought to be provided”. In other words, with regard to the language and terminology that is used in the bill, I wonder whether or not you either share his views on that particular section—section 27, which he said was the “worst section in the bill”—or whether you think that marginal amendments are required. What are your views on the detail in the bill about how information sharing should be carried out?

Alex Cole-Hamilton: I would not presume to tell the committee that I am a legal draftsman, nor that I have anything like the experience of Professor Norrie. If he believes that this is in any way unsound, then I defer to that. We support the spirit of the section and you will obviously have an opportunity to amend it. However, if it is not amended, then I hope that terms like “ought” and the thresholds at which information is shared will have greater definition and be more clearly spelled out, as I suggested earlier.

The Convener: It is interesting that you defer to Professor Norrie on this, but not on the incorporation.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: I have another lawyer to defer to on that. [Laughter.]

Jackie Brock: I noted in Professor Norrie’s evidence that he accepts that the law needs to be changed in relation to information sharing around wellbeing and that he values the attempt by Government to make those changes and to enshrine them in legislation. That is great. He values having the principles of early intervention supported through this duty. I think that is great. We have a huge range of experts—Professor Norrie and others—in the children’s sector within Government who can help us to get this right and I cannot see that the issue is insurmountable. If your committee endorses the principle, we on this side of the table would certainly want to do everything that we can to work with Government to get this right.

The Convener: Thank you, Liam, you had a question on information sharing.

Liam McArthur: I do not know whether Clare Adamson will come in on this subject, but one of the most strenuous points that Professor Norrie made was in relation to section 27, which appears to override data protection and any other legal requirements. That does, on the face of it, seem to be a rather bold move and one that should cause us all to have pause for thought. Would you offer any reflections in response to what he was saying?

Jackie Brock: We know from working with Government on various advisory groups that it has worked incredibly hard with the information commissioner to provide clarity to the professionals and get advice around data protection. If section 27 is not quite right, then, with all due respect to Professor Norrie, it can be sorted out. I do not know the detail of why he does not think it is quite right, but, given the close working, officials could be instructed to go away and sort it out.

Liam McArthur: The point is that which Joan McAlpine made earlier about LGBT. That is the sort of thing where you could understand why concerns would arise very quickly about the extent of the powers in the bill as compared with some of the protections that people might reasonably expect under other provisions.

Duncan Dunlop: All this comes down to the fact that we will never get a failsafe system. We are dealing with professionals who have to work on the basis of trust. They have to earn their trustworthiness and we have to believe in them and that they can do the best for our children and young people. There will be mistakes along the way. What Joan McAlpine described was clearly an example of completely inappropriate practice: why did they not ask the child or young person whether their parents knew that they were gay or lesbian? That was a crass mistake at that level. One piece of poor practice does not mean that the entire principle behind what will be achieved here should be scrapped.

We must look at whether we have quality professionals out in the field and whether they have the right to be trusted with the wellbeing of our children. If so, we need to give them the space and autonomy to get on with the job and they need to do it appropriately. Where they do not do it appropriately, we need to address that. However, you must look at the voice of the child or young person in the process.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: The only reflection that I would add is about the situation that we have now. We have anecdotal evidence from various actors within the state whom this would cover, who are either expressing concern that colleagues are sharing too much information, because they are not clear on what should be shared and with whom, or they are sharing too little at the expense of the welfare of the child because of anxieties about the Data Protection Act 1998. The bill will cut through that and deliver a line of sight for all professionals who are working with children so that they understand what it is to share information, when it is right to do so, and how proportionately they should do it.

Duncan Dunlop: The system cannot inhibit the intuition of a professional who has learned and understands what is necessary for that child or young person at that time. They need to make sure that they are making appropriate decisions in the way they are supervised and managed, or to look at the way in which they are doing that.

The Convener: That is very helpful. I will make one final point on this; I think Professor Norrie’s concern around section 27 is particularly at section 27(1), which I will read for clarity. It says:

> “The provision of information under this Part is not to be taken to breach any prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information.”

In other words, it is not to be taken to breach any prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information. His concern and why he would be concerned about that is quite clear, given that it seems to be an absolutist position. Even if you cannot answer today, perhaps you should reflect on it, and if you think that you have something to add, you could write to us afterwards, if that is helpful. Okay?

Jackie Brock: Yes.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: Yes.

The Convener: Thank you very much; we will move on now to Colin Beattie.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): Thank you, convener. Part 5 of the bill allows for a child’s plan to be developed in circumstances in which the child has a “wellbeing need” that requires intervention. However, there seem to be many statutory and non-statutory plans in place already—that perhaps reflects, to some extent, the sheer number of bodies and organisations that are involved with each child—which is an argument for trimming them back. The bill does not seem to bring all that together. Where do you see that provision working and where do you see a complication in it?

Jackie Brock: There is a significant complication in relation to the way in which this bill will work hand in hand with the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2009, which requires a co-ordinated support plan for children. There is lots of talk about how guidance will show how you can lock those plans together, but it will undoubtedly add further complexity. In terms of looking at the needs of children in the round, it is a really unfortunate division. It would have been good to look at how we could bring together both pieces of legislation.
I hope that our submission made it clear that we are very concerned about the increasing layers of bureaucracy being placed on the children’s services workforce, both within local authorities and at CPP level around the number of plans that there are for children, and also at a local level in terms of how you are planning the resources and services more effectively. Certainly, a really good scrub out of some of the stuff in this bill and elsewhere, to create a more co-ordinated approach, would be helpful and more efficient in terms of resources.

Colin Beattie: Would it be correct to say, from what you are stating, that there is scope to reduce the number of plans that already exist from all the different bodies? Is there that capability? Are they all essential?

Jackie Brock: I think that they all grew up out of individual essential purposes, but we are now moving in Scotland to a far more co-ordinated, integrated approach that is signalled by getting it right for every child, and also the early years framework, and potentially around throughcare and aftercare. The initial purpose for these things was right, and they were essential, but now we have a more sophisticated understanding of how plans need to be more effective in relation to the child and also at a CPP level. I think that the time has come to modernise and update our thinking around that.

Duncan Dunlop: A care leaver should get a pathway plan, but about 20 to 30 per cent of them will not get that plan. It is meant to guide what happens to them as they leave care and enter their adult life. In terms of having it on the statute book, or in guidance or policy, the plan would be in place if they were helped by a proper relationship that they trusted, respected and heard when they were filling it in, so that they actually owned it. That ownership will come only via the relationship, so the piece of paper that may show that the worker has done their job is not necessarily fulfilling a need for the young person, who needs what is on that piece of paper to make a life-changing difference for them.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: Our chief concern is about part 5, and particularly sections 31 and 33, with regard to hearing the voice of the child, and indeed the voice of the family. In fact, this spills into our views about the corporate parenting section as well. There is a lot in the bill about the actors that should be brought together to plan in a connected way, but very little is said about other key stakeholders, particularly in the journey of a looked-after child. In the bill, when a child’s plan is looking at provisions for a child who has become looked after, there is little reference to the role of the birth parent or to the people who put that child to bed at night—the actual care provider.

First, in terms of the voice of the child, there are sections in part 5 that would afford the authority the opportunity to disregard the views of the child, as I mentioned earlier, in the formation of the child’s plan. The authority is also to try to elicit the views, “so far as reasonably practicable”, of the family concerned. However, that is a very subjective term, so we have concerns about that.

With regard to the actors who sit around the table, there is a very long list in Schedule 2 of those who form the corporate parent, and that includes all registered public bodies, quangos and the rest of it. However, it makes no reference to the care provider. It may not be appropriate to have somebody who has a contractual relationship with a local authority included in that list.

However, there are problems with the process of the child’s plan that this bill could ameliorate. For example, in the foster care world we have many examples of families who are affected by drift and delay because they need the social worker to liaise with the birth family to see whether the child can have his or her hair cut, can go on holiday, or can appeal their school placement decision. This leads to placement breakdown and it reduces the number of foster carers that we have in the cohort because people find that a very frustrating situation. We believe that the bill, particularly in the child’s plan section, could afford, at the very start, a greater role for those care providers, in terms of identifying the level at which they should have autonomy and decision-making, and also should perhaps afford them the right to call for a review of the child’s plan at some point if they feel that the situation is breaking down.

Colin Beattie: Based on what you are all saying, is the child’s plan practicable, with all these other plans roundabout? How are they brought together? Are you confident that they can be brought together? We are already hearing about disconnects and so on throughout the system. How will this work?

Jackie Brock: You cannot have the named person provision without the child’s plan. The point of the plan is that the child has a need and you need something to be done; you need action.

To answer your question, yes, the child’s plan is needed and necessary, but what would be very helpful for this committee to signal, either in guidance or in further discussion as part of the bill or in due course, is what the whole planning landscape is, both in relation to an individual child and across children’s services, and how it can be streamlined and made more effective. At the moment, there is undoubtedly concern and additional layers of bureaucracy being placed in the way of meeting a child’s full wellbeing needs.

Colin Beattie: Do you think that, given the introduction of the child’s plan, there might be disputes from time to time? Should there be some sort of dispute resolution process in there?

Alex Cole-Hamilton: We have suggested that there needs to be clarity about what happens when elements within the corporate parent and those actors around the table who formulated the child’s plan disagree. So, yes, we would support that.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): In terms of the child’s plan and information sharing, delivery will happen at a local level, but we know from our engagement with children who have been taken into care that they are quite often moved between local authorities, so how do you ensure that the practice is accepted throughout Scotland and that the terminology and the practices used in this area are universal?

Duncan Dunlop: That is part of the issue. The plan, in those terms, needs to have the primary carer involved. Alex mentioned that if a child is in foster care, for instance, the foster carer needs to be one of the key people helping to create and develop a plan with the young person, because if it is an effective placement the foster carer is the person with whom the young person will have the best relationship. That is the person who the young person or child will best buy into and who will enable them to understand what is in that plan and ensure that it will have a beneficial impact on them. The foster carer, as far as possible, needs to link in with the social worker, the named person, or the lead professional at that juncture to ensure that the plan is implemented in that way.

When young people or children are moved from pillar to post, it is a different issue. That is where we come back to the value of the relationship rather than the plan, or the bureaucracy or piece of documentation. If the bill focuses more on relationships and ensures that a key principle in it is that our aspiration for children and young people throughout Scotland, and what will best benefit their wellbeing, is for them to be in a loving, caring, stable family or carer relationship. That ought to be given primacy in any decision making about that young person if we are sure that it is a healthy place to be. If that was the overarching principle of this bill, all this would be a bit more straightforward. Rather than putting it on different professionals, we would be looking to the carer in the first instance to hold a lot of these relationships, we would not have placements break down as regularly and children and young people would not be moved around different local authorities as often.

Jackie Brock: You have highlighted the crux of why some of this needs to be in statute. Of course, we cannot guarantee any child or family that if they move from one area to another they will get exactly the same service, but at least what we will get from this bill is a core set of expectations and responsibilities, and expectations of the universal services to which parents and children will have a right wherever in Scotland they live. There might be some different approaches and priorities in practice, but at the very core of it we have principles that apply throughout Scotland. Of course, there are resource issues, but there must also be a requirement for some of the professional associations, for example, to share good practice across the Association of Directors of Social Work, the Association of Directors of Education in Scotland and the health colleges and so on, to ensure that we are minimising, wherever possible, the core service—the relationships and so on—that children get across Scotland.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: I understand your question and your concern, but I suggest that the bill is part of the solution and that the problems exist already across local authorities. Local authorities have different thresholds and different practices when certain things will be triggered. Codifying best practice and drawing a clear line of sight as to what is appropriate sharing of information, the triggers for a child’s plan and what an extension of risk to wellbeing means in terms of a child who presents to you on a Friday night are the things that are currently problematic and that it is hoped the bill will ameliorate.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): Good morning. I will ask Duncan two questions about care leavers. Who Cares? Scotland proposes amendments to "create a right to return to care up to the age of 26" and

"remove the assessment by the local authority."

In your submission, you say:

"We envisage that these amendments would take 5 years to implement in practice from the enactment of the Bill."

Looking at the other bits and pieces, I see that there is some really good stuff. Obviously, you have done a lot of work with the committee on previous inquiries. Coming from a local government background and with my constituency work, I am aware of the situations that we have to deal with regarding young people when they hit the age of 16, what happens after that stage and the issue of support. I agree with and quite like some of the stuff that you have in your submission. Young people who leave care, mostly at 16 years of age, are expected to take care of themselves. Yes, there are organisations and professionals from whom they can get help and support; yes, there is welfare support that they can access; yes, they can access education and employment opportunities; yes, they can access housing, and yes, they can dream for the future like anyone else, but you go on to say that they need someone to guide them through that whole process.

Correct me if I am wrong, but are you saying that social work departments in local authorities can no longer give that kind of support from age 16 onwards? Have we given up on the social work departments of local authorities? Given that you also said that it would take five years to implement, have you spoken to local authorities about the resource implications?

Duncan Dunlop: There are several points. We are very excited about this and, as I said in starting off the evidence today, this is a culmination of a lot of conversations, thoughts and processes distilled down. We take a lot of the conversations back to young people and care leavers; some of them who gave us evidence are here today. The point is that they told their stories because they believed that they would be listened to—they took a punt on that and want their views to be acted on.

What has come out of this is that we have talked to a lot of other providers around Scotland—leading children’s charities, Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People and even ADSW—who now recognise the principle that we need to be able to continue to care for these children and young people up to the age of 26. That means continuing the care relationship; it is not necessarily about continuing care in a very high cost residential bed until the age of 26. We are looking at the principle of this. Everyone we have talked to who has understood it has agreed on the principle of this, as have a lot of care leavers who reflected that it would have made a difference to them.

We talk about a five-year period because we have realised that there will be a supply and demand issue. For instance, you are a foster carer and you need to maintain a relationship with a young person, and within certain local authorities there is pressure on foster carers for that young person to leave at 16—or 18 at the most—because that bed is needed for a three-year-old or another young person coming into the system. But that 16 or 18-year-old is not ready to go out on their own. We are suggesting that we need to alter the supply and demand of care in Scotland.

These great, informative discussions have happened in a cocoon. I do not know how informed each of you is about the situation for young people in care, but most of Scotland does not know about it. If we took this issue outwith the Parliament and those involved in the sector—there is probably a maximum of 5 to 10 per cent of Scots who understand these young people’s needs and issues—we truly believe that Scotland would engage and back the issue. We would have a far more supportive infrastructure, communities and society; the ultimate corporate parent is the electorate who votes our councillors, members of the Scottish Parliament and so on into office and they in turn hold a legislative mandate. We must get Scotland engaged with this issue.

The five-year period is something that we think should happen potentially over three sessions of Parliament. We understand that we need to get to the age of 26; we cannot click our fingers and have it done tomorrow, but we know that we need to get there. What that would mean is that in this session of Parliament we go to the age of 18, in the next session we get to the age of 21 and in the following session we potentially get to the age of 26. We know that this is agreed with.

What this approach does is simplify things: we have throughcare teams, third-sector provision here for employability, this for housing there, this for child and adolescent mental health services and on and off support for that, this for teenage pregnancy and this for homelessness. All those emergency services are coming in because a young person is leaving care, and, as we heard, a trap door shuts behind them. It is very difficult when they go out there bold as brass, at age 16, which is when the majority leave care, and say, “I can take on the big wide world”. As we all know from our own experiences, or our children’s experiences, it is pretty tough out there.

The relationships that supported them up to that age are no longer there for them. They might well be there, informally, and there is real credit deserved out there for some care providers and individuals who do maintain those links. We have seen the significant benefit that that has for the young person, when they can go back and say, “Hang on a minute, I cannot cope”. We have also seen, and know that young people who have been off a supervision order have come back and said, “Please can I go back into care,” and one month later they were dead, because they were not able to do that.

We are asking whether we could please look at a system that elongates their ability to maintain—and says it is right to maintain—that relationship with their core care provider. As parents, we look after a child from when they are in nappies, through primary school, high school, college and maybe into further education, and they leave home as a process, not at a point in time. We are suggesting that we should be able to afford that to our care leavers.
The Association of Directors of Social Work supported this in principle. The point is that we know that this will come with upfront potential cost, but the savings would be immense. We have done some provisional research on this—it is very difficult because the statistics that we track for young care leavers are inadequate—and this is a very conservative estimate, but we are looking at a cost benefit ratio of at least 1:6. For every £1 we spend on this, we will save at least £6. The cost of making somebody homeless is £20,000 plus. Barnado’s Scotland opened a project three years ago in Polmont Young Offenders Institution—where 1.48 per cent of our care population is—and found that 88 per cent of them had been in care. They have been in our care, and we have spent a fortune on them, and they end up in poor places that cost us more money.

The sense is that if we enable the young person to maintain the core relationship and let them know that they can maintain it and that the relationship will be there as long as it takes for them, they will not end the relationship; or when they think that they can go out there and survive and thrive in the world, then realise that they need support, they can come back and get it. This is as close as we will get to a silver bullet to reforming the care system at a relatively low cost. We have estimated it at something like £2 million per cohort per annum, on average, for the eight years if you extend it up to the age of 26. That is not a big outlay. There are huge savings in terms of health, housing and justice that this country will get from it and it would place Scotland as the global leader in terms of care provision across the world.

We looked at the main leaders in this in Scandinavia, to which Scotland often aspires in some of our social justice work, where they do it up to the age of 22 or 23. Looking at one or two other pilot studies, we see only about 23 per cent of young people actually taking up the provision for a year or two more and staying in that care placement. It is about going home for your tea and going home for your Sunday dinner and it is about having somewhere to go for Christmas. It is about someone calling you to ask how you are doing and saying, “That is great; you are getting up for college”. It is all of that support that they want from the same person; not a different professional.

George Adam: I still have to do that with my daughter to try to get her to college in the morning. [Laughter.]

I still cannot see how your amendments will make the connection for all the organisations and everything else. Maybe it is me; perhaps I am not picking it up, but I cannot see how the amendments will make the difference. Nine times out of 10, the local authority has been the continual involvement throughout the looked-after person’s childhood, so would it not be the natural progression for it to be the anchor and the one that takes them to the next level?

Duncan Dunlop: The person who the child or young person in care sees as being the active corporate parent, or carer, is the foster carer, or the residential worker. It is the person who they have lived with and whose house they have slept in and who they have eaten their breakfast, lunch and dinner with. It is the person who helps them get off to school. That is the person. The local authority might well be paying or giving the resources to sustain that placement, but that placement ends and that relationship ends. The young person does not have a relationship with the local authority directly in terms of the way that they see it. They have a relationship with the carer; an individual; a person. That is who they want to maintain the link with and the carer wants that too. We are still coming across it. I know one or two great residential houses, where they foster and encourage young people to come back and stay in touch. I know others where, when a young person rings them after they have left care, the response is “No,” and they hang up the telephone.

George Adam: I want to ask about foster parents. I do not think that there is any statutory reason why they cannot keep a relationship with the young person when they become 16, is there?

Duncan Dunlop: There is no statutory obligation, but the child or young person and the foster carer may not think that it is right for them to leave at 16. It is the system that determines that they no longer need to be under a supervision order, that they no longer need formal support and that it is okay for them to return to their family home. It may be that no work has been done to improve the circumstance in the family home, that the great work that was done in the foster family or residential house is rapidly undone and that the young person cannot return to the foster family straightforwardly.

Our suggestion is that we should have a bit more flex in the system and the resource for the foster carer—that is the example that we are using—to maintain the relationship with the young person. It might be that they stay in the house for another year or 18 months, but at least the foster carer will not have to deal with 60, 70 or 80 relationships with different young people. They will have a more manageable case load of foster children.

That brings me back to the question of the time period. We think that we should do this over, potentially, three sessions of Parliament, because we have to do a far better job in engaging Scotland with this conversation. The Scottish Government, to its credit, gave Who Cares? Scotland £30,000 this year to go out there and talk about our anti-stigma campaign and to listen, and a lot of organisations have signed up to it, which is great. There is a £4.5 million tender out for the Scottish Government and the national health service in relation to the see me mental health campaign. That is engaging Scots, who are talking about it. We have to seriously consider how we can get Scotland engaged with the conversation.

When I talk to people about this and they hear the story, many of them say, “I didn’t know that”, as I am sure some of you did when you read the evidence that you have received. All that we have to do is to inform Scots, and I am sure that we can get the 1 per cent of Scottish households that we need to get involved in terms of fostering alone for us to have nearly an excess of supply and demand. Having “Foster me” on taxis in Edinburgh does not connect people to the issue; it does not connect them to the story of how the young person lost their identity and struggled in childhood, yet we still blame them for some of their behaviours. We need Scotland to own these children and young people, and then we will have a greater supply of Scots who care about them. We can then extend placements to include those people and we will not have this excruciating pressure on our supply and demand situation.

That is why we are saying, “Put it in the bill.” Let us maintain those relationships and give local authorities, along with the sector, the space and scope to work out what this will actually look like. It is a credit to people from the directors of social work to different charities that they have signed up to the proposal. They do not know what it will look like yet, but they know that it means change and we will not have this excruciating pressure on our supply and demand situation.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: I support what Duncan says. If the committee takes something from this evidence about how to proceed with the bill, regardless of what the amendments look like, it should be the principle. In an earlier iteration of the consultation, we talked about wanting to treat looked-after children in the same way that a birth family would treat them, regardless of the baggage attached to that term.

In law, a young person can leave their family home at 16, but their family still has an obligation to care for them up to the age of 18, which means that they can come back and the family will still look after them. Similarly, the age of leaving the parental home in Scotland is 24, yet the age of leaving care, as we all well know, is 16. We are depriving these children of a third of their childhood, or their adolescence, if you will. We need to move forward with the principle in mind.

Right now, we may be creating the best place in the world to grow up, but not for care leavers.

I would like to make a specific point on eligibility criteria, but maybe we will come to that in a minute.

The Convener: We are already over time. Two people still want to come in on this issue, so I will take them first. I ask for brief questions and, particularly, brief answers, if you do not mind.

Duncan Dunlop: When we look at corporate parents—I will be brief on this—I think that it is a great idea that we are naming so many of these public services. It is like saying, “Come on, Scotland—we actually employ you, therefore you can have a responsibility as a corporate parent.” We might need to work out who is the corporate parent, who is the great-aunt and who is the second cousin, because there is a differentiation in the responsibilities for those people, but we need to get all Scots to know that they are responsible for this. That will come in the guidance, but it is important that we go in the right direction.

Liam McArthur: Duncan Dunlop has made a compelling argument for principles that I would certainly sign up to, and I think that the committee would sign up to them as well. Specifically in relation to removing the local authority assessment of need, you talked about a wide range of possible contact from coming round for Christmas dinner to possibly going back into a residential care facility. Does that not, to some extent, pre-suppose some sort of assessment at some stage, particularly at the upper end of what that intervention might mean in due course?

Also, just because Alex Cole-Hamilton teed me up on this, maybe you could give us your views on eligibility as well.

Duncan Dunlop: A broad-brush point is that we have a perfect storm of opportunity here. The committee has spent about two years looking at the issue. I do not think that a committee—I am relatively naive on this, so I am not saying that I am totally right—will be as well informed about an issue that comes in front of it, or about a bill. This is the chance to get this right, and it really will not cost a lot. It is a challenge to us as a sector, but the sector has said that it is up for it. Let us do it.

The point about the assessment is that a lot of the young people who use throughcare services do so when they are in crisis. It is when they desperately need a hand-out, such as a bag of shopping because they do not have anything to eat that night, or when they are going to be homeless and they have to be put into an emergency bed and breakfast. That is not the progressive approach that we would want for our children and young people who are taking the next step forward in their lives.

Local authorities, along with the sector, will have to look at what returning to continuing care provision would mean—for instance, if the person has not been in it for a couple of years. However, things can also change. We had a young lad who went off to Australia travelling at 23. He came back after having a great experience and wanted to go to university, and he realised that he had to go through the homelessness route. Potentially, he would have had to go and stay in a B and B. He did not do that, as he used his informal links and relationships to stay with another foster family that he knew of, but there was no provision for that young man to be supported.

Liam McArthur: The point is not that there should necessarily be an assessment before any contact can be had, but that, particularly if the young person is going back into residential care, there should be at least some discussion about whether that is the most sensible route or whether there are others. To me, that seems to suggest that some kind of assessment needs to be undertaken but not that it needs to be done before anything else can happen. That speaks to your point that the principle needs to be about re-engagement, and we can then sort out the detail of that.

Duncan Dunlop: Exactly. Our issue is that, although there is a duty for the young person to be assessed under the bill, there is no duty for provision to be made, depending on the assessment, which would probably differ from local authority to local authority, in the way that we currently see care provision delivered across Scotland. Also, a 24-year-old will not necessarily want to go back to a residential house where there is a 12 or 13-year-old. That is not necessarily what they are looking for. We are not looking for just an extension of care as it is. It is not the way that we worked and developed as young adults.

Jackie Brock: Can I add something?

The Convener: Please be very brief.

Jackie Brock: Looking at section 60 and thinking about how the state treats looked-after children, I note that, in a sense, we are sunk by the amount of bureaucracy. For care leavers alone, Duncan has already mentioned throughcare and aftercare regulations, and the additional bit of bureaucracy under section 60 does not get close to what children and young people are saying that they need.

Whatever the amendments contain, if you can, you should stay true to some of the principles that you have been adhering to in the inquiry into children who are looked after at home around the quality of relationships and forget the list of individual organisations as corporate parents. It is a nonsense to pretend that that was going to put in the action that care leavers need. How can we almost totally rethink the legislative umbrella under which care leavers are supported?

The Convener: You have one minute, Alex.

Alex Cole-Hamilton: Even if the bill was passed as it is, the provisions on aftercare would be a welcome addition. The problem is the eligibility criteria. Eligibility is defined in terms of school-leaving age, which can fall between 15 years and eight months and 16 years and three months. It is arbitrary and it could fail vulnerable care leavers. We heard on “Good Morning Scotland” this morning of a care leaver who left care three months before his 16th birthday but had not left school, so he would not qualify for aftercare assistance.

Care is not the problem. Being in care on a certain date should not trigger aftercare. There should be a much broader assessment of the trauma that led to the young person going into care in the first place and what happened to them on coming out of it.

Donald Forrester from the University of Cambridge did a literature review that said that public care is largely improving children’s wellbeing and welfare and is not the problem. We would look to have a more sophisticated approach to when aftercare is triggered. It should be not when the young person leaves school, but perhaps their 16th birthday, and there should be another threshold after an agreed period of time in care at some point in the run-up to their 16th birthday as well.

The Convener: I thank all the witnesses for their evidence this morning. It has been extremely illuminating and interesting and I am sure that it will help us in our consideration of the bill. I suspend the meeting briefly to allow a changeover of witnesses.

Meeting suspended.
On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome to the committee Clare Simpson from parenting across Scotland, Claire Telfer from Save the Children, and Lori Summers and Caroline Wilson. Good morning to you all.

Lori Summers and Caroline Wilson have kindly agreed to attend today and to speak about the implications of the bill for parents. As such, their comments will be focused on part 6 of the bill, which deals with early education and childcare. I also thank the witnesses for their written submissions, which they sent to the committee in advance of their appearance.

We have quite a lot to cover so we will move straight to questions. We begin with Jayne Baxter.

Jayne Baxter: Would any of the witnesses like to comment on the level of engagement with parents and groups representing parents that the Scottish Government has had and continues to have in relation to this bill?

Clare Simpson (Parenting across Scotland): There has obviously been the formal consultation, which was open to reply, but given that so many bits of the bill already exist—GIRFEC and the named person, for example—there has been continued engagement and consultation with parents locally through that process, which has been fed in through the bill team.

There has been a review of kinship care, which is on-going and which has been fed into the bill. There has also been a substantial engagement with looked-after children, corporate parents and organisations such as Who Cares? Scotland.

Organisations such as ourselves are a partnership. There are nine different organisations within our partnership that deal with children and families. They range from, for example, Children 1st, Aberlour and One Parent Families Scotland, to Relationships Scotland and Scottish Marriage Care. Some of those organisations have helplines and all of them work with parents. They have also fed in to the bill.

I therefore think that there have been a number of opportunities and ways of engagement. There is also a lot of evidence through academic study and so on, which has been made available to the bill team.

Claire Telfer (Save the Children): I echo what Clare Simpson said in relation to engagement with families on the bill. In particular, the work that the Government did ahead of the national parenting strategy, in which more than 1,500 parents were consulted about some of the key issues that affect them, provided some really useful insights into the support that parents are keen on receiving. That lends itself to some of the elements of the bill in which the Government has considered the needs of parents and how they can best be addressed.

I also reiterate the point that, as well as direct consultation on proposals, it is important that as part of the process we think about what evidence already exists. That includes the research that is out there, examples from Highland in relation to GIRFEC, and the evaluations of the pathfinders that have engaged families on the impact of some of the proposals. All of that information on views from parents and the family perspective needs to be brought together to inform the process.

Colin Beattie: A couple of groups have been particularly critical of the named person service—the Schoolhouse Home Education Association and the Scottish Parent Teacher Council in particular. They have said that the named person proposal seeks to usurp the role of the parent. What do you feel about that? Do you think that that is accurate?

Clare Simpson: I do not feel that that is accurate at all. Parents’ rights and responsibilities are firmly enshrined in law.

The GIRFEC guidance says that the named person is the first point of contact. We have regularly carried out MORI polls of parents that are representative of parents in Scotland. I think that it was the 2010 MORI poll that said that 72 per cent of parents did not know where to go for help, and the figure rose to 84 per cent in deprived areas. I therefore think that there is a real need for parents to know where to go for help.

The system is also one that all parties have agreed to and which we have been working to deliver throughout Scotland. As has already been said, there is somewhat patchy and inconsistent practice, which is why the legislation has come forward.

I presume that the committee will be getting evidence from the Highland Council about how the named person approach operates there. When it started to implement GIRFEC, there was no such thing as a named person within the guidance, and it was actually parents themselves who said, “We would like a first point of contact; we want to know where to go for help if we need it”. That is where the named person came from: parents themselves.

I see the named person as a first point of contact. When practitioners are working with families, they work in partnership with them, and they would always try to get informed consent when necessary. They would take things forward—information sharing, for example—only when there was a risk of significant harm. If parents are refusing consent but there are issues and concerns, work would be taken forward—but I think that we would all agree that, in that situation, it would need to be taken forward.

I also point out that parents are not a homogeneous group: there are lots of views. I would imagine that a great number of you are parents, but you probably do not all have similar views on the named-person approach or on the bill.

Claire Telfer: Again, I echo what Clare Simpson has said in relation to the named person. Save the Children sees the approach as an extra support for families, both children and parents.

In the consultation on the national parenting strategy, some of the key issues that parents raised were on lack of communication and not knowing who to turn to if they need support. There is a very complex service landscape in terms of children and family support, and support to navigate through it is helpful for parents.

There is evidence, particularly from the Highland model, of the impact of using the named person and how that has benefited children and families. The evaluations show that parents, as well as children, have valued the extra support of a first point of contact, as somebody with whom they can raise issues at an early stage and who can support them to get a clearer idea of what is going on with their child or with any support that they might need. I therefore urge the committee, as Clare has already said, to look at the example from Highland and how the system has worked in practice.

Colin Beattie: The bill provides for a child’s plan. What happens if parents disagree with the child’s plan? How do you see that situation working? Do you have any concerns about how the plan might operate if there is disagreement?

Clare Simpson: I go back to something that Alex Cole-Hamilton said: I would really like to see the caveat “so far as reasonably practicable” taken out of the bill.

I think that there should be consultation. Good practice dictates that the plan should be drawn up in partnership with the family. I suggest also that the consultation should be on the design, content and review process, which the bill currently does not allow for. Parents should be involved throughout the process.

As you indicate, there may sometimes be areas of disagreement. When there is disagreement, I think that, rather than another tribunal or adversarial system being set up, there should be some form of alternative dispute resolution that allows parents to have advocacy, particularly if they have communication difficulties or learning disabilities. Parents should be enabled to have a voice in the process, and when there is disagreement they should be listened to.

Colin Beattie: What sort of alternative dispute resolution do you envisage?

Clare Simpson: To be honest, I am not sure. I think that that is for the detail of guidance and so on, but it really needs to be looked at. I think that there could be forms of mediation, and advocacy could be looked at for the parents, but it should involve parents having a role in sitting down and talking through the issues on a level playing field with professionals. All families are unique and different, but they are all the experts on their child’s upbringing.

The Convener: May I interrupt for a second? You said that we should move from the bill using the phrase, “so far as reasonably practicable”, to a situation in which the plan must be drawn up in some sort of relationship or co-operation with the parents, but that cannot always happen. There are obviously circumstances in which that cannot happen, so surely it is not practicably possible to have a situation in which the plan must be drawn up with the parents.

Clare Simpson: I suppose that, rather than the phrase, “so far as reasonably practicable”, which is a real get-out clause, the bill should use something like “unless there are grounds of safety or significant harm” or “unless parents cannot be involved”. It is a matter of setting the bar higher. When there are reasons of safety—for example, domestic abuse—or parents cannot be involved, it is obviously not practicable to require it, but I think that at the moment the bar is set too low.

The Convener: Thank you.

Colin Beattie: I have one other question on the back of that. We have heard in previous evidence sessions that, increasingly, lawyers and so on are becoming involved with children’s issues—on behalf of parents in particular. If there is a dispute with the child’s plan and lawyers are involved, there will have to be a pretty robust resolution process. How would that work?

Clare Simpson: Many alternative dispute resolution forms involve lawyers, so that may be a route. At the moment, the mechanism is judicial review, and I would imagine that that route would still be available; if it was, that is where the involvement of lawyers would be paramount.

Claire Telfer: I want to make a broader point about the participation of children and parents and ensuring that their views are heard within the bill as a whole.

There are a number of elements of the bill in which it is really important that we work with families. That is the case with developing the child’s plan, with the duty in part 6 of the bill to consult representatives of parents on how early learning and childcare services are provided, and with the named-person duties. However, it seems to me that the bill, from the way it is currently written, is not standard throughout in how we engage with and work with families on all these different elements, unlike the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, which has a general principle that children’s views must be heard and taken into account. I urge the committee to look at whether the engagement could be more consistent throughout the bill.

Jayne Baxter: I would briefly like to go back to something that Claire Telfer said. I agree wholeheartedly that families operate in complex environments—it is quite a scary world out there for many families. The named person could have a crucial role to play. Do you think that there is a need for named persons to have additional training or knowledge, given the circumstances in which families operate? I am thinking particularly in terms of financial inclusion, welfare reform or housing; there are issues that impact on families on which they need information. Do you think that there is a resource implication in that?

Claire Telfer: Yes. As you heard in the first evidence session this morning, there is agreement on the principle of the named person, but there are some practical concerns—I know that they were raised in last week’s evidence session as well. Training is vital in relation to being able to support parents and families effectively, so we need to look at how that can be done, as well as in the broader sense when we are talking about supporting children’s wellbeing. There will be resource implications, but we must also remember that the approach is already working in many areas. It is a matter of building on that good practice and ensuring consistency across the country.

Clare Simpson: I reiterate what Claire Telfer said. In particular, where the system is working, it is sometimes not about extra layers of knowledge and expertise—we would not expect anyone to be the font of all that—but about there being a first point of contact.

There is some training to be done, and some of that is about the other services that exist. However, the first point of contact may be a health visitor or teacher, and Highland has found that those people have said, “This is the job we are paid to do anyway; we are about guidance and we are about the wellbeing of the child”. They welcome the recognition of that role, but the system also allows them to pass on cases to a more appropriate person and, as Claire has said, to help parents navigate what is often a complex system.

Neil Bibby: Both Save the Children and parenting across Scotland have welcomed the increase in hours of childcare to 600 for three and four-year-olds. I broadly welcome that as well, as did many of my colleagues in 2007, when it was first promised. Evidence suggests, however, that there is a real lack of focus on childcare for children from zero to the age of three, and there is basically nothing to help with childcare for children who are primary school age. I have a broad question to all witnesses, including the parents: is this bill a missed opportunity?

Claire Telfer: I will kick off on that. We welcome the proposals in the bill to extend early education to 600 hours for all three and four-year-olds and some two-year-olds, and the importance of the flexibility of that provision. The points that you have raised on supporting younger children and out-of-school care are consistently raised with us by parents in relation to their child’s care needs and the difficulties, particularly for parents living on lower incomes, of accessing that support for their children from a young age.

There are many issues, and we would like to see the bill go further in looking at the childcare system as a whole. There are very welcome statements from the Scottish Government in the policy memorandum about seeing the bill as a first step and setting the stage for future developments in relation to childcare. Although we welcome that, I think that it is fair to say that we would have liked slightly more progress to be made in this bill.

We are conscious of the work that the Equal Opportunities Committee did on women and work. One of its recommendations was on a right to childcare for families in Scotland, which would approach childcare in a broader sense. Although there are definitely positives from what is already in the bill, and although families will benefit, a lot more needs to be done to ensure that all families can access the childcare they need, in order to support children to grow, learn, develop and have the opportunities that benefit them, to support families to take up work and study, and, ultimately, to support family incomes and tackle poverty and some of the bigger issues that we need to grapple with.

That is one reason why we support the elements of the bill on childcare. We see childcare as a vital service in tackling child poverty in Scotland, which is one of the biggest barriers to Scotland achieving the aim of being the best country in which to grow up.

In summary, the bill is a good step forward but we would like further progress to be made through it and in future sessions of Parliament.
Caroline Wilson: As a parent, I welcome the extra hours, as I think that they will be of real benefit. I have children of primary school age, and it would be difficult for me to have a job and be back in time to pick them up from school. If the childcare extended to after-school care, it would benefit more families and help people to get back into work, because it would help with all childcare costs and not just those for pre-school children.

Lori Summers: I like the fact that the bill is increasing the hours of childcare—that is good—but it needs to be more flexible so that a place is available not just in the morning or afternoon but, for example, for two full days.

That would help people to work because most jobs are not from 9 to 11 in the morning, five days a week. People are more likely to be able to get a part-time job for two full days a week. If you could get the childcare to support that, it would help financially if your child could be in a free place on the days that you need it. Otherwise, you will have to pay for them and you will be left out of pocket at the end. That would not really be helping.

Clare Simpson: We support the extension of childcare. We see it as part of a long-term vision—we believe that it should be the first step. We should work towards making Scotland a leader in childcare, as, we believe, that will improve the outcomes of children. We also believe that it is important for parents to have options and choice.

We would support an extension to two-year-olds. There is so much evidence to show that, by the time children get to the age of three and enter nursery, disadvantaged children from poorer backgrounds are often already far behind their peers.

On the issue of out-of-school care, I should point out that childcare responsibilities do not end when children go to school; parents still need childcare.

On flexibility, there is an obligation to consult bodies that represent parents. We would like to see that strengthened so that the consultation is with parents in different family sizes and shapes and, in particular, includes diversity and, within that, disability. We know that 84 per cent of working parents of disabled children rely on grandparents or other family members because—and I think that 60 per cent of the 84 per cent said this—they are unable to find accessible childcare because of their child’s disability.

Neil Bibby: I suppose that we can debate how big a step it is as a first step, but I will ask about the provision for two-year-olds. The bill refers to looked-after children, and it has been mentioned that the provision means that 1 or 2 per cent of two-year-olds in Scotland will be entitled to early learning and childcare. In England, we have heard proposals to go much further than that. You have mentioned that the bill should go further in the provision of childcare for two-year-olds. What would you like to see?

Claire Telfer: Save the Children has been calling for an extension to early learning and childcare for all two-year-olds, starting with children living in poverty. There are a number of arguments for that. One is based on the benefits that early education care services can have in relation to improving outcomes for children and tackling inequalities in the early years.

There is a lot of strong and compelling evidence on that issue. Save the Children’s “Thrive at Five” research last year showed that children living in poverty are twice as likely as their peers to have development difficulties across a range of areas, whether in communication and cognitive development or physical health. That is backed up by findings in the growing up in Scotland survey, for example. The evidence is really strong on the gap that we can see between children living in poverty and their peers at age five.

What is also strong in the evidence is the difference that early learning and childcare services can make in turning that situation around. If we look at the evidence from the EPPE—effective provision of pre-school education—study, which looked at short and long-term outcomes, we see the impact of even a month of early learning and childcare support from the age of two. The difference that that support can make—in the early years, by the time a child starts school and again when the child leaves school—is really significant. It is for those reasons that we support an extension to two-year-olds living in poverty.

Over the past 18 months, we have been doing a lot of work with parents, speaking to them about their childcare needs, what their experience and views are of using childcare in Scotland, and where they feel improvements need to be made. We did not ask specifically about an extension of childcare to two-year-olds, but a really strong theme that has come out of those conversations is that parents, particularly those living in more deprived areas or on lower incomes, would value the opportunity for their children to be able to use early learning and childcare services from a younger age.

Those comments are on the benefit that early learning and childcare can bring to children, and Lori and Caroline can maybe say a little more about that. A lot of the parents we have spoken to cannot afford to pay for services that currently exist and, therefore, feel that their children are missing out on the opportunities to play and socialise with other young people and on all the benefits that the services can bring.
There is also an economic argument for providing support in terms of the preventative spending agenda. We know that the critical years are from nought to three, and yet the bill in part 6 is very limited in that it provides support only to looked-after children. We very much welcome that support, because we know that those children’s outcomes are particularly lower than those of others, but this is an opportunity to extend the support to a group of children who would also really benefit from it. It would save us money in the long term and meet the aims of the bill in supporting children from more disadvantaged backgrounds. We therefore back the idea of looking at the extension of support and, in particular, providing it to the most disadvantaged initially.

The Convener: How much would it cost to extend childcare to all two-year-olds?

Claire Telfer: That is a very good question, and I do not have an answer. Extending to all two-year-olds would obviously have significant cost implications, as we would want the services to be of high quality and to benefit children and young people.

I would urge the committee to ask the Scottish Government how much it would estimate the extension costing. We have been looking at different models for extending childcare to children from more deprived backgrounds, and the cost would depend on how we define that group of children and young people. For example, it could be based on an area-based approach, looking at the Scottish index of multiple deprivation, or we could go down the route of looking at household income.

I cannot give the committee an exact figure at the moment. It is certainly something that needs to be looked at, but I think that, at this stage of the bill, the important thing is whether we agree with the principle of extending childcare to two-year-olds living in poverty.

The Convener: Thank you. I will bring in Joan McAlpine.

Joan McAlpine: There is a lot of consensus in the sense that we all want to tackle the issue of child poverty and child development. You will all be aware of the recent report by the National Children’s Bureau, which showed that 1.5 million more children are living in poverty across the UK than were in 1973. I think that it is fairly widely recognised that that is due to the UK economic model, which is one that encourages inequality.

Perhaps you would want to reflect on the fact that the economic powers that cause inequality to get worse are exercised at the UK level. Scotland will need those economic powers if we are going to tackle child poverty in the future. I think that there is a consensus that we all have the same priorities in terms of ending child poverty. If we want to do that, we need to have the economic powers to make Scotland a more equal society, rather than following economic models set in London.

The Convener: That was not specifically about the bill, and I think it was more of a statement than a question, so I will move on to Liam McArthur.

Claire Telfer: May I make a point in response?

The Convener: Yes.

Claire Telfer: It is helpful to look at how this bill supports families in Scotland that are experiencing poverty and how it helps us to tackle child poverty within the existing arrangements for Scotland. Childcare is one way of doing that by supporting children and, if the flexibility elements of the bill are delivered, it could also support parents to take up work and employment—I think that Caroline and Lori could say a little more on that.

We also support Barnardo’s Scotland, which has talked about the wellbeing provisions in the bill. If wellbeing is being enshrined in how we think about supporting children and young people, the impact of poverty needs to be a crucial factor that is taken into account.

The Government has said that child poverty is covered in the SHANARRI indicators under “included”. I hope that the bill can take forward more support for families who are experiencing poverty. I urge the committee to look at how the bill can support delivery of the child poverty strategy that already exists in Scotland and at how, for example, elements of part 3 of the bill, on children’s services planning, can link into delivery at a local level.

Joan McAlpine: May I come in—

The Convener: I will bring you back in after Liam.

Liam McArthur: That was very elegantly and diplomatically put, Claire.

I will return to the topic that Neil Bibby introduced. You have made clear your views on extending childcare to a greater number of two-year-olds, and you pointed to a range of evidence, which is also supported by the findings of Professor James Heckman, a Nobel laureate. You have also talked about the way in which it might be phased in over a period, starting with the most disadvantaged, and how, for even a limited number of hours per month, it can deliver a real advantage.

Is there anything specifically that we should be pushing the Government on in terms of the roll-out and time frames? Neil Bibby talked about the 1 or 2 per cent of children who will be covered under the bill, compared with provision south of the border that phases in coverage of around 40 per cent over a period. Is there a phasing that we should be looking at for this bill, recognising, as the convener said, that blanket coverage of all two-year-olds under the provisions of the bill does not appear to be a realistic proposition?

Claire Telfer: Save the Children’s position is clear: we support priority being given to children living in poverty. We want to see that taken forward immediately, looking at how and whether that is possible.

For a time frame, we would say “as soon as possible”. We urge the committee to look at what might be possible in this session of the Parliament, while looking towards the next session and how we might want to extend coverage to younger children. What is important is that we agree the principle of younger children having access and entitlement to the support. We would be supportive of a staged process if that were deemed the most appropriate way given the current economic context.

Liam McArthur: The convener’s point about the resource implications is one that we need always to be seized of. We are focusing on the principles behind the bill, delivery of which is likely to require changes to the budget. Should we, as we look ahead to the budget later this month, be prioritising that, in terms of spend?

Claire Telfer: Yes.

Liam McArthur: Thank you.

The Convener: Joan—I said that I would bring you back in. Please be brief.

Joan McAlpine: I would like to return to the point about resources. Once again, we all agree that the bill is a good starting point and that we would all like to go further. Do you acknowledge that the Scottish Government lives off a fixed income and has no economic control? If so, how will we find the resources, given that the UK Government has, under its austerity programme, cut Scotland’s money quite considerably? The Scottish Government has had to come in with anti-poverty measures to address that; for example, by increasing the budget for Citizens Advice Scotland and bridging the gap in council tax benefit, which has been cut. We all agree that it is going to be very expensive to further increase early-years care, even though we would like to do that. How can we do that when we live off a fixed income that has been cut by Westminster?

Clare Simpson: That is a political debate for the politicians. Obviously we would like more investment in the early years. The situation has depended on the complexion of the UK Government; there have been reductions in child poverty under some Governments, but not others.

The main thing is that we are dealing with poverty, so the bill must link up provision and improve children’s lives. The points that Claire Telfer made about vulnerable two-year-olds were well made and I agree with them.

I also reiterate, and perhaps thereby reassure the committee, that there is a section in the bill that talks about the appropriateness of care for two-year-olds. It may not always be appropriate for a two-year-old to be brought in to a nursery setting; that is not what they need if they have added layers of vulnerability. Models such as community child-minding, care in the home and especially work on parenting with vulnerable parents has really helped with vulnerable two-year-olds in moving them up and narrowing the gap in attainment between them and their peers. People may campaign for one or the other, but we are talking about children who are living in poverty, and we have to work with what we have now.

The Convener: I call Liz Smith.

Liz Smith: I am okay, convener. The two questions that I was going to ask have been covered.

The Convener: What difficulties are the two parents here today faced with relative to the current childcare arrangements and their ability to get out to work, even if that work is part time?

Caroline Wilson: Work is limited to the two and a half hours for which the child is in nursery, if they are of nursery age, or to school hours, if you have a school-age child. The flexibility to choose your 16 or 15 hours, or whatever, would make it easier to get a job, because people cannot find something that fits into those two and a half hours, which includes time to travel, and so on. It is also quite expensive to pay for that, especially if you are living on the minimum wage; travel can take up quite a lot of that wage. Flexibility is important.

The Convener: Joan.

Joan McAlpine: I would like to return to the point about economic control. We have heard about the need to protect family life, because both parents could work during the day and have more family time outwith that, rather than working different shifts in order to cover the childcare.

Lori Summers: Financially, more free childcare would be good. I also feel that it would be much better if local authority nurseries could provide more spaces for people who are willing to pay for childcare for their children, because local authority childcare provides higher quality care than private nurseries, and is less expensive for parents, who could then get back to work and start earning to provide more for their kids instead of sitting at home on benefits.

The Convener: Interestingly, the bill requires local authorities to ascertain the views of people who represent parents when establishing the pattern of early learning and childcare provision. I am not quite sure how they will do that, but the bill requires an attempt to provide that flexibility.

I read the relevant section just before you came in and it does not seem to suggest that the pattern that you described has to be provided—that is, the two and a half hours per day. Rather, there has to be a minimum of two and a half hours, so it looks as though that is a decision for the local authority and is not subject to enforcement through the bill. Can the witnesses say whether the ability to provide that flexibility varies across local authorities, or is there everywhere in Scotland two and a half hours per day?

Claire Telfer: I can speak from the Scottish perspective in terms of the engagement with parents that I talked about. One of the striking things to have come out of that is the degree of difference in availability. In some areas, parents described an abundance of local services and stated that they experienced great choice in childcare that they were able to use. That provision, particularly in the early years, was delivered in bundles over one or two days.

In other areas, a completely different picture was painted, of a lack of services and lack of choice and flexibility. It is important that we consider local flexibility in relation to how services are provided.

A key theme that has come through during discussions with parents is that there is similarity in the issues that they raise in relation to childcare—namely affordability, out-of-school care and the services that are available. There are a number of issues that we need to look at at Scotland level as well. It is a matter of how we marry up that local flexibility and in how services are provided with the national issues that need to be addressed right across Scotland.

From Save the Children’s point of view, consulting parents locally about their needs and what would support them is a step forward. We would like to see that being extended beyond the early years to out-of-school care. That would be a positive step towards a better understanding of the services that are available at local level in out-of-school care. It would also facilitate a better understanding of parents’ needs and demands at local level, which would help with local planning of services. That is something that parents would also welcome.

The Convener: The policy memorandum is quite clear; it talks about “Improving the flexibility of provision in response to identified local need”. I will not repeat what I said earlier about local authorities having to ascertain the views of parents and so on in relation to flexibility. The explanatory note also states that “The increasing flexibility will require a re-configuration of services in response to locally identified need and this will be achieved incrementally.”

Clearly, the intention in the bill is to move in that direction and to provide that flexibility. However, as we would all agree, it cannot be done overnight or instantly. Is the determination to move in that direction through the bill to be welcomed?

Clare Simpson: That is very definitely to be welcomed, but we have heard about needs including the unusual fact that although parents still need childcare once their children are in school, that is not accounted for anywhere. At the moment, the obligation to consult relates to parents of children under five years old. Even if, at the moment, we cannot provide childcare of the required standard or we cannot extend it to as many parents as we would like, if we are to have a long-term vision, we need to know what parents want, what would help them with childcare and what would help them get to work and get out of poverty. That extends beyond five-year-olds right through to, as the Equal Opportunities Committee said, 15-year-olds. We need to know what those needs are, so that even if we cannot meet them now, as you said, we can work incrementally towards meeting those needs.

Claire Telfer: Flexibility in how early learning and childcare services are provided is key, and we warmly welcome it. Parents have told us that flexibility is potentially more important than the extra hours, because it could enable them to balance their caring responsibilities with taking up work and employment. We need to be careful not to see it as being either/or in terms of extension of hours and flexibility.

The Scottish Government’s initial proposals on flexibility talked about having minimum standards and what could be achieved in relation to that. My understanding is that, at the moment, local authorities and other providers can choose to deliver early-years services in different ways—it does not have to be two and a half hours over five days. We need to look at what the bill will provide in addition that will drive forward the flexibility that is so desired by parents.

The Convener: Liam McArthur has a short question.

Liam McArthur: Having listened to witnesses’ testimony, it has occurred to me that we might be struggling a bit with the conflation of two bills. In a sense, we have a children and young people’s rights bill, and the discussion is about what benefits children and young people. Undoubtedly, being in a home environment where parents have enough income is to their benefit. The benefit of the nursery and childcare to the individual child is ultimately, I presume, what we are driving at in this legislation. Is that fair? The benefit in terms of allowing parents to go out to work is incidental compared with the direct benefit of the child getting the cognitive development, socialising skills and all the rest of it that perhaps come with nursery and childcare provision.

Claire Telfer: We should absolutely be focused on the benefit to the child. We also need to see the family in the round and look at how we can provide a service that benefits children, but which also benefits the wider family and deals with some of the issues that we have been grappling with and which have been raised by parents, such as access to work and ways to balance their caring responsibilities. We should not separate them, so to speak; we should look for best way to support families in the round, including the benefits of early learning and childcare as well as out-of-school care.

The outcomes that we want to achieve for families in Scotland can be delivered through the one service, in terms of the benefits that it brings to children’s learning development and tackling inequalities, in addition to the benefits that it has in relation to supporting parents, maximising their income and tackling poverty. We need to look at the matter in that much wider sense.

In addition, we should consider what savings could be made in terms of early years provision, through supporting children from a young age and preventing issues from escalating in the longer term.

Clare Adamson: I would like to ask about the definitions of the types of parent, specifically corporate parents. That term has come up quite a bit in today’s evidence, as it did last time. Schedule 3 to the bill states that corporate parents include all the public bodies that are listed in that schedule. Will the creation of many corporate parents lead to confusion and tensions with the parents of looked-after and vulnerable children?

Clare Simpson: Duncan Dunlop has already said that perhaps thought should be given to amendments to the bill’s schedules, and we would back that. There are people who are in direct contact with children, who are looking after them on behalf of the state, who have particular duties and responsibilities, and who should, as far as possible, act like good parents; that is, acting as the rest of us—we hope—act in giving children care. There are others who should, within their responsibilities, be taking cognisance of looked-after children and, probably, other children as well.

12:15 There are a number of confusing things. Among looked-after children there are huge variety and complexity in terms of status, from children who are looked after at home, to kinship carers and so on. Within that, some birth parents retain some responsibilities, so it needs to be teased out in guidance and regulation, and in consultation with key groups—in particular groups of parents—where rights remain, what relationships should be, what consents they have and what input they can offer.

Care leavers, who may have been away from home until they are 16, are entitled to go home, quite often to what has previously been a chaotic family life and may still be a chaotic family life. If those birth parents were somehow to be involved, and if that were to include parenting support and parenting education, when that child goes home at 16, his or her parents would at least be better prepared to meet their needs.

Clare Adamson: Part 10 of the bill is on kinship care and sets out the framework for local authorities to support kinship carers who have, or who are applying for, section 11 orders. I would like a general opinion on whether the provision for kinship care represents an enhanced level of support for kinship carers.

Clare Simpson: On the kinship care order, at the moment, as I am sure the committee knows, there is a huge variability in financial provision and so on throughout Scotland. If people are getting financial provision at all, they can be getting from the local authority anywhere from £50 to £150. We would probably all agree that it is a fairly unacceptable state of affairs that the amount depends on where you live. The kinship care order will allow eligibility for other things, like leisure opportunities and free school meals. The opening up of both doors is very welcome.

There is also an ongoing review of financial arrangements for kinship care; I hope that the two things—the bill and what the Government recommends with regard to financial arrangements—can dovetail. I believe that the committee will have a meeting on kinship care at which Children 1st will give evidence. I also draw members’ attention to the evidence of Citizens Advice Scotland, which has a specialist kinship care service. It is a very complex area, but the bill goes some way towards opening up new rights for kinship carers and allowing them to access the support that they need.

The Convener: I thank the witnesses for coming along this morning. Your evidence has been very helpful to our consideration of the bill.

Item 5 was to have been consideration of petition PE1395, but we have agreed to defer that until next week. That concludes the public part of our meeting.

Meeting continued in private until 12:50.
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Councillor Douglas Chapman, Spokesperson for Education, Children and Young People, and Robert Nicol, Chief Officer, Children and Young People, COSLA;

Joan Martlew, Course Director, BA in Childhood Practice, University of Strathclyde;

Purnima Tanuku OBE, Chief Executive, National Day Nurseries Association (Scotland);

Martin Crewe, Director, Barnardo’s Scotland;

Greg Dempster, General Secretary, Association of Headteachers and Deputes in Scotland;

Clare Mayo, Policy Adviser, Royal College of Nursing Scotland;

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Stewart Maxwell): Good morning and welcome to the 23rd meeting in 2013 of the Education and Culture Committee. I remind everyone that all electronic devices, particularly mobile phones, should be switched off at all times while the committee is in session.

Our first item is continuation of our evidence taking on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Our first panel will focus on the issue of early learning and childcare, and I welcome to the meeting Councillor Douglas Chapman and Robert Nicol from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities; Joan Martlew, course director of the bachelor of arts degree in childhood practice at the University of Strathclyde; and Purnima Tanuku, chief executive of the National Day Nurseries Association Scotland.

As we have a lot to cover this morning, we will move straight to questions. George Adam will begin.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): What effect will the change from 475 hours of mandatory pre-school education to 600 have on child development? Do you want to kick off, Douglas?

Councillor Chapman: Thanks very much for the starter for 10.

As has been widely recognised in all the evidence that has been produced to date and all the discussions about preventative spend that the Christie commission and so on have had, Scotland’s investment in early years will be important. Indeed, it is the main reason why we are pursuing more hours of education for the very earliest years. As the committee knows, the funding covers three to four-year-olds as well as vulnerable two-year-olds and, although I am sure that many people would like that provision to be extended, it is very much a welcome step in the right direction and something that we happily support in the bill.

Purnima Tanuku OBE (National Day Nurseries Association): We fully support this move by the Scottish Government, but the question of how the funding is passed to front-line providers needs to be looked at very carefully. Private, voluntary and independent day nurseries care for 60,000 children or approximately half of the children in nursery places and, in fact, that proportion increases with the under-threes. There are 40,000 under-threes in care and early learning in private and voluntary day nurseries and with the local authority funding that they receive those nurseries are making losses of about £550 per child per year. Those cost implications need to be considered in extending the amount of mandatory pre-school education to 600 hours.

Joan Martlew (University of Strathclyde): I, too, welcome the additional hours of pre-school education. Those 600 hours are important because, as far as child development is concerned, additional time in a high-quality early years environment can only enhance children’s social, emotional, cognitive and indeed all-round development. My concern, however, is where the 600 hours are going to come from, whether they are just going to be an add-on and how local authorities are going to manage all this if there is no direct guidance from the Scottish Government.

George Adam: Can you give us some guidance on those questions, Douglas?

Councillor Chapman: I will ask Robert Nicol to respond in a moment but, as members will see, flexibility is built into the bill with regard to the funding stream in the period up to 2020. I know that the Association of Directors of Education in Scotland is working up different delivery models and, as the funding streams come through, local authorities will be able to develop more flexible models in the interests of parents and—obviously—children. I take the point that the real focus for this should be high-quality education and care and I hope that, over time, we will see significant improvements in the development of young children in our communities.

Robert Nicol (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): I can take the last couple of points, about the management issue, and where the 600 hours come from. We are not starting with a blank sheet of paper here. Local authorities have been delivering education and childcare for many years. We are looking to build on what has already been well established in Scotland.

As Douglas Chapman said, an element of flexibility is built into the proposal, so we are not looking for one particular model to be delivered; we are looking at adapting what works to local areas. There will have to be an element of flexibility for delivery.

The issue of management and guidance was raised. We are working closely with the Government on what will become the statutory guidance for the act, although obviously the act has to be written first. The development of the guidance will be based on the discussions in this committee and in Parliament. That will inform what councils do. The element of flexibility is important, not just for authorities but for parents and families.

George Adam: Joan Martlew mentioned the high-quality environment that you were hoping for. Will the employment of a teacher rather than a childhood practitioner make a difference to that quality of environment?

Joan Martlew: Definitely. In any reports in the past couple of years, Her Majesty’s inspectors of education have indicated that there is a difference where there is high-quality staff training. The effective provision of pre-school education—EPPE—study has indicated that where the lead professional is educated to degree level, children have a higher-quality and better learning environment.

The Convener: You mentioned the EPPE study. Is it not the case that the study did not compare teachers and childhood practitioners?

Joan Martlew: It looked at employees who had a degree qualification, not just teachers.

The Convener: It did not make a direct comparison between teachers and childhood practitioners.

Joan Martlew: No, it did not.

The Convener: We just have to be clear about exactly what was compared in the EPPE study.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): I ask Joan Martlew to expand on her concern that the 600 hours would just be an add-on. What would your ideal be?

Joan Martlew: I would have great concerns if there was such a degree of flexibility that children could attend an early years establishment for education purposes for seven and a half hours a day over two days, which would be their 15 hours. Children would have difficulties settling and the continuity of their educational experience could be delivered in a patchwork manner.

My other concern is that if an extra half hour is added on to the two and a half hours that children receive when they go to mainstream nursery school, that has implications for staff planning and staff training. At the moment, the two and a half hours per child per day allows staff to undertake planning and additional training. I would have concerns if they were to lose an hour a day as a result of delivering another half hour per child. It is vitally important that early years professionals have planning time.

Purnima Tanuku: One of our major concerns about the bill is the lack of parental choice. Local authorities decide which settings get funding. A parent will take their child to a setting not of their choice but of the local authority’s choice, which is funded. As a result, the parent has to take their child there first and then take them to an aftercare setting or another nursery to be looked after. If a parent wants to take their child somewhere nearer to their workplace, they sometimes do not have that choice. We operate across the three nations and we think that that is the biggest difference that is not covered in the bill. We feel that the funding should follow the child and that the parent should have a choice, provided the standards are met by the setting—whether it is private, voluntary or independent—and the quality is high. Unfortunately, that is not covered in the bill.

The Convener: I ask Douglas Chapman to comment on some of those points.

Councillor Chapman: That is something that we have not really looked at in any great detail because it is not part of the proposal that is before us. Local authorities already work with partner providers in the private sector and the third sector. A huge amount of early years work goes on in local authorities. The system that we have allows intricate planning of the places that are available to children and parents. If the money follows the child, that starts to eat away at the proper planning of early years provision across the board. That has been our view and that of local authorities across Scotland. I know that Robert Nicol has been in close contact with local authorities about the subject.

Robert Nicol: I will back that up. Our point, which touches on what the other panellists have said, is that quality is the important thing. We absolutely want to deliver quality; we do not expect the flexibility or the options that are delivered to be pursued to the extent that they start to erode the quality of the service that parents and families get. Any educationist—I have spoken to them while the bill has been developed—would share the concern about pursuing options that would deliver a poorer-quality service. That is the bottom line for local government.

As for money following the child, an element of planning must go into all education delivery, as Douglas Chapman said. After all, the curriculum is for children from three to 18. It is important that local government can look at the best way of delivering in its area, which varies according to the partner providers that are present and the area’s geographical make-up.

It is important that planning can take place to ensure not just quality but improvement. Registration is important, but on-going planning, development, staff development and improvement are all part of education delivery at pre-school, primary school and secondary school levels.

The Convener: Can I clarify something with Joan Martlew? You said that you do not support the idea of extra hours being split over two days, for example—correct me if I am wrong. I think that you said that that would be disruptive. Last week, parents told the committee that such an arrangement was exactly what they wanted, because they wanted to be able to get a part-time job. They could get a job for two days a week, but it is almost impossible to get a job that is for an hour and a half a day.

Joan Martlew: My concern is that, if children attended nursery only for two full days, they would put in longer days in an educational establishment than their counterparts in primary and secondary schools do, and they would not have access to provision for another five days. I understand that parents would like flexibility but, if we put the child at the centre of their learning, attending for only two full days would be detrimental to their development.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): I will return to the point that the convener made about childhood practitioners and teachers. In the past, outcomes for children were far better if they had access to a teacher, but I understand that that has changed now because of courses such as the University of Strathclyde's degree course. Will you tell us a little more about that and about what childhood practitioners bring that perhaps teachers do not bring?

Joan Martlew: When childhood practitioners do the BA in childhood practice, they must have their initial childcare qualification, whether it is a higher national certificate in early education and childcare or a Scottish vocational qualification at level 3. They must also have two years' post-qualifying experience of working with children who are under five.

Teachers do not have to have such a background. In their training, teachers have only four weeks' practical student experience in a nursery. Teachers who exit with a BEd might have worked only as a student with children who are under five.

BACP practitioners have their initial qualification and they attend university to undertake a degree course that provides them with the opportunity to be more critically analytical of what they are doing and to investigate a wide range of topics, such as psychological approaches to working with children. Most of their outcomes relate to their workplace practice, so they must reflect on the theory and demonstrate the ability to apply it in their workplace practice.

Joan McAlpine: It seems from what you are saying that, if a child is being educated at nursery stage by people who have a degree in childhood practice, the obligation to give them access to a teacher is perhaps not as important as it has been in the past.

Joan Martlew: I do not think that it is as important, particularly given that—as I mentioned—not all teachers who are placed in nursery have experience of working in a nursery situation. Childhood practice practitioners have experience, as they must have it before they are able to take the course.

One recent addition that we have made to the University of Strathclyde's BA in childhood practice is that we have revalidated the degree and included the option of an additional honours year, which means that students can exit with the same level of qualification as teachers.

Joan McAlpine: Is there a difference between what we are providing in Scotland on those types of courses and what is provided in England?

Purnima Tanuku: A highly skilled qualified workforce is crucial to child development. However, it is not just having teachers and graduates that is important but having teachers and graduates with early years experience. Approximately 98 per cent of the early years workforce is female, and it includes mature people who may not have the qualifications but who are wonderful at caring for young children. We need to consider the balance between having a highly skilled qualified workforce and employing mature people.

If a parent goes into a nursery, they are not looking for it to be staffed purely by 18 or 17-year-olds—they want a balance between experienced practitioners and a mature workforce. That needs to be recognised, and there must be some support for the workforce. At present, given the local authority cuts, the availability of training providers has been cut at a local level, but that type of investment needs to be made.

To answer Joan McAlpine’s question, there is definitely a difference between the situation in England and Wales and that in Scotland. The Government in England is moving towards introducing early years teachers and educators, which are a slightly different level of practitioner, and there are already early years practitioners working in early years settings. The key is people with early years experience, and not just teachers per se.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): I want to focus specifically on resources. Part 6 is probably the most expensive part of the bill, as it will cost approximately £100 million. We have heard Purnima Tanuku: It certainly has affected the wage structure. The cost of childcare is increasing all the time, and you will have seen the statistics in the annual Scottish childcare costs survey. The cost—certainly for private and voluntary providers—includes rates, rent, utility bills and everything else, but 80 per cent of the costs in a nursery is workforce and staffing costs. In Scotland, business rates have increased by 100 to 150 per cent, making them highest in the UK, so that has become the second biggest cost for day nurseries.

All of that has an impact on the parental fees and on the salaries that are paid to staff. When we conducted our recent survey, we found that the amount of funding that is allocated differs a great deal between local authorities. It is laudable that the Scottish Government is investing huge amounts of money, but it is important to ensure that the money is spent on early years provision for childcare on the front line. That is the biggest challenge for day nurseries.

A lot of day nurseries are struggling, and sustainability is a big issue. The occupancy level is only between 70 and 80 per cent, depending on where a nursery is located. In isolated rural areas—in the Highlands, for example—parents need to have a choice but, unfortunately, people are not able to set up a nursery there because it is not a sustainable business.

Colin Beattie: A comment was made earlier about nurseries being underfunded by an average of £550 per child. Can you explain how that figure is worked up?

Purnima Tanuku: Yes. There is a cost per hour per child. Sometimes nurseries offer very good flexibility, such as half-day sessions and full-day sessions, and they all have a cost that the nurseries need to recover. That cost is based on all the other costs that the nurseries have, including staff wages.

There is a big difference between the rate that the nurseries charge parents and the rate that they are getting for funded hours. The Finance Committee will consider that issue tomorrow. The assumption is made that places are funded at £4.02 per hour, but since the advisory floor targets were introduced in 2007, the funding has not kept up with inflation. People are still getting the same level of funding. On average, it works out at around £3.40 to £3.50 per hour across the country. There is no way that that is adding up to the cost of childcare. Nurseries therefore end up subsidising that from the parents who are using the nurseries more than the funded hours or full time. There is no such thing as full-time day care any more. Parental choice is very different now. A lot of children are being cared for by friends, relatives and grandparents because of the cost of childcare, and that is the big conundrum.

Local authorities need some very clear guidance. I agree with my COSLA colleagues about flexibility, but there is capacity in the PVIS, so let us not reinvent the wheel. Where there is capacity, we should use it. Many local authorities work very well with PVI providers, but when some local authorities see the private sector with a big P, they still see the stigma, even though the nurseries are very small and community based.

Colin Beattie: Mention was made of the advisory floor. What would the resource implications be if that was reinstated?

Purnima Tanuku: When it was introduced in 2007, the assumption was made that if we put in a minimum level of funding, all local authorities would give a little bit more than that and pay the real cost. That did not happen. We would strongly advise the introduction of that level because the rate that is paid across the different local authorities is very different. People pay a lot more than £3.40 per hour for babysitters.

Colin Beattie: You must have some sort of a figure in mind that would be a reasonable floor.

Purnima Tanuku: That needs to be worked out across the board, taking into consideration the actual cost of childcare. We would be very happy to be part of that dialogue.

Colin Beattie: What would the cash implications be if we used childhood practitioners rather than teachers?

Joan Martlew: A childhood practitioner in a lead practitioner role might earn up to £25,000. Teachers who have years of experience might earn up to £30,000. There might therefore be some cash saving at the current rates. Again, I would need to look at more detailed figures to be able to provide that information. I do not know whether COSLA has any more information about that.

The Convener: Does COSLA have any view on the views that have been expressed by Purnima Tanuku? Do you have anything to add, or agree or disagree with?

Councillor Chapman: The advisory floor has been discussed within COSLA. As the bill is currently framed, no resource would be available to adjust the floor. Each local authority comes to its own agreement with its partner provider and we would endorse that arrangement remaining in place, unless additional resources or funding are made available to cover the additional costs.

The Convener: The minister sent a letter to the convener of the Finance Committee on 12 September, which said:

“The Financial Memorandum includes an estimate of £1.2 million for uprating partner provider payments in line with inflation from 2007.”

It goes on to say:

“We now think this figure should be in region of £2 million”.

We received that letter only this morning, but it sounds like there is a recognition of the situation and an increase in the amount of money that will be available for partner provider payments.

Councillor Chapman: Robert Nicol has been in close discussion with civil servants about the bill.

Robert Nicol: We are aware of the increase that you mention. The important point is that there is money within the costings in the financial memorandum for a variety of things, including staffing costs. However, delivery costs will always be slightly different. It is important that councils have the flexibility to judge for themselves, with their partner providers, what is a fair settlement locally in terms of investment and funding. You are right that there is money within the costings in the financial memorandum. However, as our submission highlights, the actual cash that local government will get in future years cannot always be determined, so it is important that, at the time of delivery, authorities are able to weigh up all the options and the issues that they face before they decide what they can afford to invest.

Jayne Baxter (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab): Good morning. I will ask about flexibility and parental choice. We have already talked quite a lot about those matters, but I will ask my questions anyway for the record. If you feel that you have given a sufficient answer, do not feel obliged to say more.

Section 48 requires that local authorities

“must have regard to the desirability of ensuring that the method by which it makes early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part is flexible enough to allow parents an appropriate degree of choice when deciding how to access the service.”

COSLA has stated that, although there are timescale and resource implications, it feels that it can take a reasonable approach. Given what we heard last week from parents about the importance of flexibility, how quickly can local authorities move towards implementation?

Councillor Chapman: Again, the issue is resource based. Even in your own region of Mid Scotland and Fife, there are some areas that are hugely rural and centres of population where delivery of early years education will be totally different. We need to think about having the flexibility to deal with those differences.

Local authorities have the professional expertise to ensure that the service is provided as flexibly as we can. That means that, for most local authorities, the number of hours will be increased from 475 to 600 in year 1, in August 2014. I am not sure how much flexibility will be available in that first year but, as you can see from the resource flow, as more resources come in we will be able to make more changes to the service delivery available to parents. I hope that each local authority can have a discussion with parents in its area to ensure that it tries to meet the need.

I am not sure that, at the end of five or six years, we will be able to satisfy absolutely everyone—you never can—but, as I said, the increase in the number of hours is a step in the right direction. Some people might want to take another step, but that is very much in the future.

Purnima Tanuku: Flexibility and parental choice as very closely linked together. COSLA’s submission agrees and also states that “increased flexibility is more complex and costs more money as a result”.

The PVIS sector has been delivering such flexibility for a number of years, but the bill does not give a parent the right to use a particular provider. That is the big difference.

If I am a parent who works across the border in a different local authority—let alone across the border between the countries of England and Scotland—there are already issues about how the child is funded. Some providers operate across those borders, so there are big issues about cross-border funding for children. Parents cannot take the child to the provider of their choice based on where they live or work, because the local authority has decided to use a certain provider. That is the biggest problem, so flexibility is very much interlinked with parental choice.

Joan Martlew: I think that a lot of local authorities are already moving towards more flexibility through the closure of nursery schools and the expansion of family and day centres, which are open for extended hours and are not restricted to term time. Such a move helps with flexibility and with upholding the rights of parents as well as the rights and needs of the child.

Robert Nicol: On that last point, it will be interesting for the committee to know that—certainly from our experience—authorities are thinking ahead about what it will mean to deliver flexibility in the future years. As Douglas Chapman was saying, the very first year will probably be about 600 hours with no additional flexibility. However, authorities are now thinking about flexibility and about whether they can perhaps move more quickly than is set out in the bill. Obviously, they will want to do that, but it will be a local choice and it will depend on the resources that they have available.

An important point to get across is that authorities will, we hope, be funded through the money that is within the financial memorandum and they will have to work within that budget. There is no more money available to deliver the flexibility, so we will just have to deliver what is possible.

Jayne Baxter: If resources allowed, do you think that parents should be able to choose which days and which nursery their child attends for the 600 hours?

Purnima Tanuku: I do not think that it is a question of “if resources allowed” because that choice happens in other countries. Every parent is different; every child is different. Parents’ circumstances and working patterns are different, so they should have a choice, provided that the provider delivers high quality.

From a resource point of view, it does not matter which setting the child goes to—a maintained nursery or a private or voluntary day nursery—as long as that setting is funded accordingly to deliver the high quality because, at the end of the day, what is important for children is achieving the best outcomes for all children.

Joan Martlew: I agree with that. Flexibility is of crucial importance and parents should have the right to choose, but we should not lose sight of what is best for the child.

Robert Nicol: The only thing that I would add is that we have to be careful in advocating such a position. We do not want to end up undermining the position that we have already established in Scotland through high-quality local authority early learning and childcare. The quality element is obviously the number 1 priority from a local authority point of view.

Yes, we absolutely want choice for parents, but not if it comes at the expense of quality. There is the importance of being able to plan across an entire area. What is being advocated is akin to a market-delivered solution and that approach does not always work out in the long run, as we have seen with other market-delivered solutions. Such a position would have to be very carefully considered so that it did not end up undermining the success that we have already been delivering.

The Convener: I will pick up where Robert Nicol left off. Is there not a danger of the law of unintended consequences kicking in here? Clearly, there are popular and less popular areas for parents. For example, many primary schools have nurseries attached to them. Children will go to the nursery and then move on to the primary school and the secondary school.

I live in a very popular area where there is huge demand. There is demand from parents outwith that area—parents who do not live in the council area—to get their children into the nursery school, so that they can then move on to the primary school and therefore be in that particular education system.

How do you deal with those pressures and deal with that kind of difficulty if you go down the market-driven route that Robert Nicol mentioned, when the local authority has to manage the level of demand with the level of supply in its area?

Purnima Tanuku: It is important to look at the mixed economy that already exists in Scotland. As I said, more than 60,000 under-twos and 40,000 three and four-year-olds are being looked after in the PVI sector.

As regards the unintended consequences, we need to be careful that we do not reinvent the wheel—we have given some relevant case studies in our submission. Where there is high-quality provision, we should be able to use that provision. We must be very careful: in the case of some local authorities, the providers are being told, “Thank you very much, we don’t need you any more because we are going to set up a nursery within the school,” or within the local authority catchment area. That threatens the sustainability of the high-quality provision that already exists.

When we are looking at limited resources, we must consider how we spend those resources and where there is existing provision. There must be gaps. In some areas there will be gaps; in others there will be overprovision or underprovision. That mapping needs to be done very carefully.

As an example, in England, when the children’s centres agenda first started about four years ago a lot of capital funding was spent on building brand new children’s centres right next door to existing high-quality provision. I am sure that the committee is very aware of what happened to those centres: less than 2 per cent of childcare is now delivered through them. It is important to learn the lesson not to duplicate provision but to make sure that the existing provision is utilised, provided that it is of high quality and that it meets all the standards.
Joan McAlpine: I would like to talk about some of the differences in England that have already been brought up. The Family and Childcare Trust has suggested that many nurseries in England are closing and that the targets that the United Kingdom Government set for educating children—two-year-olds in particular—may not be met because of the nursery closures.

Purnima Tanuku: Absolutely. Sustainability is a big issue across England, Scotland and Wales for the reasons that I highlighted earlier. It is the same in England in terms of the hourly rate that is paid to the nurseries in some areas. That is why the minister recently introduced a minimum level of funding for two-year-olds, and we have monitored that quite closely. There is a huge capacity issue for two-year-olds: in some local authority areas the targets can be met; in others they cannot.

It is really important that, when the 600 hours extension takes place, it is properly financed and calculated. A mapping exercise needs to be done to see where there are gaps in provision. I am sure that local authorities are already doing that work. It is important that they work together in strong partnership with the PVI providers across the country.

Joan McAlpine: You are quoted today in Children & Young People Now as saying that the proposals for one-year-olds to get 10 free hours of childcare a week are “unsustainable”.

Purnima Tanuku: The Lib Dems have just announced that as their aspiration for the next general election. What is important is that, if the current extension is not properly funded, we will increase that problem. We have estimated that in Scotland, if that level of funding does not improve, the figure for the extension will increase from a loss of £500 to a loss of £750 per child per year. We need to look at why the rates have not even kept up with inflation, never mind increased over the past four years.

Joan McAlpine: The Child Poverty Action Group and Barnardo’s have criticised some of the UK Government’s initiatives, such as income tax breaks to fund childcare, as being biased in favour of wealthier families while the poorer families are missing out. Would anyone care to comment on that criticism?

Robert Nicol: We are more interested in what happens in Scotland, and we are especially interested in making sure that the bill is funded as we have received agreement from Government for that. It is dangerous to make too many comparisons with the rest of the UK. Scotland has a different education system and rightly so. We do things because we think that they are best for Scotland, and that breaks down to local level.

I agree with the other witnesses about the planning matters. We do not want to create a great number of white elephants. It is important that planning happens at the local level to ensure that the mixed market that COSLA supports can be best utilised. We argue that local authorities are best placed to do just that.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): I assure Mr Nicol and the rest of the panel that the majority of this committee is interested in the bill rather than in necessarily spurious comparisons with other parts of the country.

Earlier on in today’s evidence we touched on the benefits—which came up in the evidence last week—of some exposure to nursery and early education in the pre-three-year-old age group. The EPPE study, to which Ms Martlew referred, suggested that “Duration of attendance (in months) is important” and that “an earlier start (under age 3 years) is related to better intellectual development.”

That was substantiated by Professor Lisa Woolfson’s evidence to the committee.

Although the bill will provide additional free provision for those who are looked after or subject to a kinship care order, concerns have been raised about the relatively small number of children who will be covered. Do you have observations on how that number might be increased, now or in future, and on where the priority areas might be? We need to recognise that, although a substantial number of two-year-olds already have access to nursery education, the presumption is that they are more likely to be from better-off backgrounds than from poorer backgrounds.

Purnima Tanuku: The fact that the Government is targeting looked-after children brings in a lot of issues for practitioners, because many of those children come with behavioural issues and a host of other issues. Practitioners have to attend case conferences and have meetings with the local authority about child protection and safeguarding people. Some two-year-olds therefore require time-consuming and intense activity. We must not underestimate the amount of time that is needed to support those children.

Liam McArthur: Does that perhaps in part explain the comment in the letter from the Minister for Children and Young People, which the convener mentioned earlier, on an increase in funding following discussions with COSLA to help cover the costs of provision for two-year-olds who are looked after or subject to a kinship care order? Is it your understanding that the additional funding reflects the additional workload that goes into delivery for that particular group and that the money is not for an expansion of the overall numbers or the coverage but simply reflects a more accurate cost basis for delivery?

Purnima Tanuku: Absolutely. It has to be recognised that those children need a lot of one-to-one care. As well as that, a lot of support for parents is required from early years practitioners. Working with the families and not just the children is time consuming and requires a lot of skill and expertise.

Liam McArthur: The point has been made that, beyond those who are looked after or subject to a kinship care order, there are other children who have additional support needs but are not covered by the bill. Have any of our witnesses been involved in discussions on that? Everybody recognises that we are talking about a first step, and I presume that there is an aspiration to go further in due course. Has there been discussion about whether we could do more now, as part of that first step?

Purnima Tanuku: Absolutely.

Joan Martlew: I have a concern about the expansion of nursery provision for looked-after two-year-olds, as I do not know whether that is necessarily the best solution. Looked-after two-year-olds will come with a degree of disruption and separation in their families. If we place them in a nursery setting, where they could be cared for by a large variety of people, that begs the question of whether that is the best place for them. I suggest that it might be better for the child to consider a more flexible provision with supported childminding that is attached to a local nursery, so that children can form close relationships and bond with a carer rather than have a variety of carers.

Liam McArthur: So, in your mind, there is not sufficient flexibility in the bill to deliver that.

Joan Martlew: There might be flexibility. Again, it depends on how local authorities interpret the bill.

The Convener: Let us ask them, then.

Robert Nicol: I was just looking at the bill. I am not a draftsman, but section 45(2) gives an element of flexibility, although whether it satisfies colleagues is for them to say. Our reading is that it gives local authorities the ability to tailor support for looked-after children if, for instance, it would not be appropriate to give them the same level of childcare that a non-looked-after two-and-a-half-year-old would receive.

The Convener: For everybody’s benefit, section 45(2)(b), to which I think Mr Nicol is referring, says that a local authority “must make such alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care as it considers appropriate for the purposes of safeguarding or promoting the child’s wellbeing.”

Robert Nicol: My other point is that it is important that we do not regard this as being a specific or single service. Obviously, there is a section in the bill relating to corporate parenting. We would argue that it is the community planning partnership that would have ownership of support for the looked-after child. The breadth of the support that can be brought to bear is obviously highly important.

Purnima Tanuku: I urge the committee to consider the importance of giving clear guidance to local authorities. Unfortunately, the inconsistency comes from how different local authorities interpret the guidance. That is why it is very important to have clear guidelines. I agree that local authorities must plan according to what is required in their local communities, but the guidance is absolutely crucial. We would be happy to work with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and others to provide support on the guidance.

Liam McArthur: The letter from the minister to the convener of the Finance Committee alludes to the additional funding, which appears to have been drawn from the early years change fund. I do not know whether COSLA can shed any light on whether that means that something that was going to happen is now not going to happen. We are constantly told that there is no additional funding. I am delighted that, if this area was underresourced previously, additional funding has been found to ensure that at least it is delivered.

In terms of the bill and the fact that we are going into a budget process, we heard from Save the Children last week that it felt that extending the provision to a wider group of two-year-olds, particularly those from more disadvantaged backgrounds, should be a budget priority. Do you share that view?

Purnima Tanuku: Absolutely.

Liam McArthur: Are there particular groups within the more disadvantaged groups that we should prioritise first, whether it is those with additional support needs or those identified on the basis of the Scottish index of multiple deprivation? Have you given any thought to that?

Purnima Tanuku: There are different ways of looking at deprivation. For example, in other countries, free school meals are used as a guideline.

The professionals who work with young people in early intervention can spot the warning signs. Things might look absolutely fine on the surface—we heard earlier about the unfortunate case in Birmingham—but there might be a number of issues underneath. A lot of skilled practitioners in the workforce are required in order to be able to identify and highlight such situations.

We need to ensure that, because of the intense nature of the work with some young children and their families, any extensions of support are properly costed and funded. It is important that local authorities and providers work closely together to support the children and families.

The Convener: Can we hear from COSLA on the issue that Liam McArthur just raised of where the money referred to in the minister's letter comes from?

Councillor Chapman: With your permission, convener, I want to refer first to the point that Robert Nicol made about the community planning partnerships. As all committee members will be aware, the CPPs in their own areas are at various stages of development and success. However, local authorities are working closely with the national health service on matters such as the early years collaborative work. All such work is pushing the whole agenda in a direction that, from our point of view, is very positive.

To answer your specific question, convener, I believe that the funding was additional funding to take nursery provision from 475 hours to 600. I do not know whether Robert Nicol has any further information on that.

Robert Nicol: I do not have the letter in front of me. However, my understanding is that local authorities have been funded for a year or two now for the delivery of early learning and childcare for looked-after two-year-olds. I assume that the letter refers to additional moneys in order to bring the provision up to the 600 hours.

Liam McArthur: What the letter refers to is "an estimate of £1.1 million for extending funded early learning and childcare to two year olds who are looked after or subject to a kinship care order. Following helpful discussions with COSLA we have decided to increase the amount allocated to local government for this priority area by £3.4 million to total £4.5 million."

The letter goes on to suggest that that is from integrated moneys via the early years change fund.

That appears to be where it has come from. Given that this support was previously underfunded in the financial memorandum, it is welcome that it has been addressed at an early stage of scrutiny of the bill. However, we are constantly told that there is no further funding. Given that this funding appears to have been brought in, does that mean that something else is not being done elsewhere, or was that always the intention?

The Convener: If you do not have the facts in front of you, I am sure that the committee would be very grateful if you could write to us with the detail of how the extra money has come about. I do not want you to jump in with an answer if you are unsure. If you can answer the question, please do so, but if you need to write to us afterwards, that would be helpful.

Robert Nicol: I would be more than happy to clarify the position. The point to make about the financial memorandum is that we want to ensure that the delivery on the ground is achievable—we have said that it takes a number of years for some implementation issues to be worked out—but we are satisfied with the resources, certainly for the 600 hours element. I will go away, check the letter and come back to the committee.

The Convener: It would be helpful for the committee if you could clarify the position in writing.

Clare Adamson has a brief question.

Clare Adamson: I think that this has partially been answered, but I just want to check for complete clarity. We are not suggesting that this funding is intended to cover everything in the bill. Early intervention and other necessary work with looked-after children will still go ahead. It is not expected that all that will happen in the context of the nursery.

Councillor Chapman: From your constituencies, you will know of local authorities that are setting up family centres and so on to support nought to three-year-olds. That is an important departure from what has happened in the past. They are there to support this agenda as well.

Joan Martlew: That is a very welcome move. When it comes to looked-after children, a lot of family support is required, which mainstream nursery very often cannot provide.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): I turn attention to the issue of the named person and the implications for resources and communication between the respective professionals. On resources, we have had a variety of submissions and I know that some people on the second panel will provide more evidence on this. There is concern about the degree of additional resources that will be required to implement the named person provisions satisfactorily. The Royal College of Nursing made it clear in its submission that "health visiting capacity across Scotland needs to be reviewed. The number of health visitors must reflect the workload associated with the Named Person role."
The Association of Headteachers and Deputes in Scotland has said that it is very concerned about the “additional burdens on school leadership teams”.

Groups such as Barnardo’s Scotland have made it clear that they have concerns about resource, too.

What are the panel’s thoughts about the extent of the additional resources that will be required and how that can be funded?

Robert Nicol: We know that a number of assumptions have been made in order to try and cost up the totality of the bill. That is set out in the financial memorandum.

On the named person, which COSLA supports in principle, we do not know for sure whether the assumptions are accurate. We hope that they are and, if they are, the costs of the bill will be met. One of the reasons why we have argued that we need to keep a close eye on expenditure on the bill is that although some of the assumptions are as well made as they can be, some of them are difficult. It may yet be that, on delivery, the implementation costs will outstrip what is in the financial memorandum.

Liz Smith: Can you be a bit more specific about why you think that those assumptions are particularly difficult?

Robert Nicol: The costs are trickier to estimate, because they come down to the number of hours that we expect to be spent carrying out the role and because there is an element of travel for rural areas. There are a few elements to consider. We know that the Government has made its best estimates, but they might be slightly off the mark when it comes to delivery. That is what worries us. When local authorities and other parts of the public sector come to implement some of this—which might be in 2017 for some elements of GIRFEC, which is some way off—we will need to be absolutely sure that there are sufficient resources to match whatever the requirements are.

Purnima Tanuku: Many day nurseries in the PVI sector already operate a key worker system, whereby a child is looked after by a key person. That operates across all three nations and is a standard procedure in many nurseries.

Under the bill, for the early years, I believe that the health visitor will be responsible for under-fives. We fully support that, but we need to consider the skills, expertise and training that people will need to be able to identify not the health and wellbeing issues that a health visitor would normally need to identify for a child, but the added difficulties that families have and that a child might have.

That is a huge responsibility for one individual. I agree with what the other submissions say about the importance of communication between different professionals. Whenever there is an unfortunate incident, everything falls down because of a lack of communication between professionals. It is really important that capacity be considered and that the individuals’ training and expertise be examined.

Liz Smith: What must be achieved to ensure that the communication between the lead professionals—particularly communication between the health visitor and the nursery teacher or, on going into primary school, the transfer of information on to the named person in primary school—is better than communication in the existing system?

Purnima Tanuku: Throughout Scotland, there are PVI provider networks that work closely with local authorities. Sometimes, local authorities coordinate those networks locally. Those are the kinds of places where people communicate about some such needs. We must appreciate that some of the information that needs to be shared is confidential, but there are existing forums. However, there needs to be a much more structured and streamlined system at a local level to enable such communication, because the transition from an early years setting to primary school is really important.

Liz Smith: How do you envisage structure developing to produce that?

Purnima Tanuku: It can happen. We have worked with local authorities in a number of areas. Setting up a network in a local authority area can work, as can two or three local authorities working together to establish a network to enable the sharing of best practice and not-so-good practice, which is how we learn.

Liz Smith: You mentioned the possibility of problems arising, which they inevitably do from time to time. Do you have any concerns about who is liable for passing on information about a problem in the new set-up? You said that the communication would have to be first class to ensure that there is not a problem. What is your understanding of the process for spreading the named person principle throughout all Scotland? Is there any issue related to liability for passing on information?

Purnima Tanuku: Absolutely, there are issues with liability, and not only around the legal implications for individuals. Many practitioners are scared to highlight to a parent that Johnny is having problems because the parent might react completely differently and said, “How dare you suggest that my child has an issue.”
Practitioners have to have confidence and think about how they are going to get the message across. If there is a named person, that is a good route. The professional can have a dialogue with that individual, say that they are really concerned about something and ask how they should handle it and get the message across.

Many early years practitioners are really worried about the legal implications, legal challenges and complaints to the regulator as a result. That happens regularly.

Liz Smith: Do the local authorities have concerns about the legality of that aspect and about what happens with confidentiality?

Robert Nicol: No such issues have been highlighted to us. For some time, local authorities have operated a variety of approaches to integrate services, so the approach does not come straight from leftfield, so to speak; it builds on what councils have been operating.

Those two particular issues have not been highlighted to us.

Liz Smith: A reasonable number of submissions to the committee have raised that concern. Should local authorities be in the front line of addressing that or should it be left to lawyers and solicitors?

Robert Nicol: I have to be careful—I am not sure that much should be left to lawyers. If there are genuine issues, they have to come out in the debate in committee. That concern in particular has not been highlighted to us but if it was, we would want to take the issue up with Government to ensure that the implementation of this happens as smoothly as possible because, in the end, that is what we would want.

Liz Smith: Finally, broadly speaking, there is a reasonable degree of support in the submissions for the principle of the named person. That is less true when it comes to the practicalities; in fact there is a lot of concern about those. Are local authorities comfortable that they can overcome those difficulties without substantial additional costs? There are also issues with confidentiality around data sharing. Are you confident that the practicalities can be overcome?

Robert Nicol: As I said before, to some extent it is in the implementation that many of the issues might come to the fore. Obviously, we want to iron out any issues as quickly as possible, but we will need to keep a close eye on all the implementation costs so that local authorities have sufficient resources to implement the bill.

Purnima Tanuku: The private and voluntary providers will feel very vulnerable because it affects their business—their livelihood. If a child is funded and goes into a setting, there needs to be some support from the local authority to help providers through the process.

Joan Martlew: Could I make a comment?

The Convener: If it is a brief one.

Joan Martlew: When I worked in family centres, they had a link health visitor and a link social worker who were the first point of contact. It would be quite a good idea if the key worker in an establishment could approach their link or liaison person, who could transfer the information. All key workers are bound by confidentiality and are used to working in those situations.

The Convener: I thank Purnima Tanuku and Joan Martlew for the moment. We have some specific questions for COSLA on other aspects of the bill, so, if you do not mind, we will direct some questions to Douglas Chapman and Robert Nicol.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): I have some questions on the relationship between local government and national Government. COSLA has raised concerns about the effect on local democracy, particularly of section 17 in part 3 and the proposals to give ministerial powers to establish joint boards for the planning of children’s services. Ministers could also transfer property assets and staff without the agreement of the local authority. COSLA has stated in its evidence that it understands why the Government wants to implement its policies successfully but that it does not support those provisions.

What other options or penalties would be available to the Scottish Government to enforce implementation of its policies if local authorities are not following guidance?

Councillor Chapman: First, there has been considerable movement from the Government since the report was submitted. We have had a fairly robust debate in COSLA on that section of the bill.

Where we are now is that the Minister for Local Government and Planning, Derek Mackay, wrote to the president of COSLA on 28 August to say that that section of the bill would be withdrawn. I think that Robert Nicol is still in discussion with civil servants about that. We are in a much better position now than we were before, when the bill contained unacceptable conditions for the imposition of joint boards and so on. It was never clear how those boards would be set up and who would drive them forward.

That is where we are on the bill, but obviously other amendments will come forward and we will wait to make sure that the letter that we have had from Mr Mackay is followed through in amendments.
Neil Bibby: Okay. So you are happy.

George Adam: Sorted.

Neil Bibby: Everyone is happy with that.

George Adam: That is how COSLA works.

Robert Nicoll: I have one last point to make. In terms of our desire for integrating services there is not much in part 3 that we would not want to support. There is a strong desire on the part of local government to get the integration of services, planning for children and community planning absolutely right. The main reason for not supporting the section of the bill that you referred to was that we felt that the position would be worse than we wanted. We are in discussion with the Government on some remaining issues; as Douglas Chapman said, we have made significant progress with the Government and we hope that the remaining issues will be resolved.

Neil Bibby: Another area that I wanted to ask about is the children’s hearings system. During the passage of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Bill, the Scottish Parliament gave local authorities the right to reach agreement on resources for children’s hearings and area support teams. The bill would remove this and give the national convener the power to compel local authorities to provide resources. Have the current arrangements made implementation more difficult or has that been sorted as well?

Robert Nicoll: Sadly that one has not been sorted. Members who have been involved in this area for some time will remember that we did not support many of the changes in the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. One of our chief concerns, which we have highlighted in our submission, was the ability of the national convener in effect to compel authorities either to become part of an area support team or to transfer staff and budgets. We recognise that the act is in force and authorities have been working with Children’s Hearings Scotland to put the new arrangements in place. However, we would argue that it is far better to reach mutual agreement with the various parties than to have any one side try to compel the other to do something that for good reasons they do not think is appropriate. We think that the 2011 act should be left as it is and that certain sections of this bill should not go forward. However, we understand that the Government takes a different view. I dare say that we will still be making these points and presenting our evidence at stage 2.

Neil Bibby: On part 11 of the bill, COSLA has raised concerns about the requirement that local authorities use the national adoption register. In what circumstances would it not be in the interests of the children to have access to the largest pool of adoptive parents?

Robert Nicoll: On this issue our position is a pragmatic one. We certainly have no problem in principle with the national adoption register. However, we recognise that there are some local arrangements that work well and believe that if such arrangements are meeting the needs of children, they should be able to continue. Obviously there will be times when it will be important to be able to access a larger group of potential families. We are saying that if local arrangements work well, we should not be compelling people to change to something else unless that can be demonstrated genuinely to add value.

The Convener: We look forward with interest to the amendment that the Government will bring forward on the joint boards issue. I am sure that you do, too. Are there any other issues that you want to raise at this point?

Robert Nicoll: No. I think that we have covered most of the issues. The chief issue that we have highlighted is that although we are satisfied that there are sufficient resources for the 600 hours’ provision, there are other parts of the bill where the financial assumptions are genuinely complex. Only when we start to deliver on the ground will we realise what the resource implications will be. The point that we will need to keep a close eye on things is the single most important one from our point of view.

The Convener: Okay. Thank you very much. I thank all the witnesses for coming along this morning. This has been a very helpful evidence session. I will suspend the meeting briefly so that we can change witness panels.

Meeting suspended.

10:54

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome to the committee our second panel of witnesses, who will, in the main focus, on the issues of the named person and the child’s plan, although I am sure that we will also cover one or two other areas.

I welcome Martin Crewe from Barnardo’s Scotland; Greg Dempster from the Association of Headteachers and Deputies in Scotland; Clare Mayo from the Royal College of Nursing Scotland; and Jackie Mitchell from the Royal College of Midwives Scotland.

Given the length of our agenda this morning, we will move straight to questions.
Liz Smith: I return to the theme of resources and named person issues. There has been huge variation in the evidence. Some people argue that, effectively, existing practice is being formalised so there is not a huge extra cost, whereas others argue that substantial extra resources will be required. I ask the witnesses to comment specifically on their concerns about the resource aspect to the introduction of the named person universally across Scotland.

Greg Dempster (Association of Headteachers and Deputies in Scotland): Our concern is about the projections in the financial memorandum that accompanies the bill. With reference to training, it says that there are no costs associated with backfilling for headteachers, and there is a backfill assumption of 10 per cent for depute posts and 30 per cent for principal teacher posts. That last estimate might be accurate, but deputes around the country are in class a lot more than they were in previous years. In recent years, a couple of authorities have increased the threshold for the number of pupils in a school before the school qualifies for a depute or a second depute, which means that people spend more time in class and there is less scope to get management time out for free than the financial memorandum supposes. We are talking about two days of training.

Highland Council, for example, moved a couple of years ago from a position in which teaching heads had three days of non-class-contact time to effectively one day of non-class-contact time. It surprises me somewhat that it is being suggested that there is no cost to a two-day training course for those staff. At a very simple level, the assumption must be that everybody would take a flask and a packed lunch to the training, and there are no costings for meeting rooms, trainers and so on. The financial memorandum does not seem to get into the detail.

I was interested in COSLA’s comments in the previous evidence session that it knows that costs around the named person are hard to quantify and so the figures in the financial memorandum are less reliable than the figures for the 600 hours for early learning and childcare. Some elements of the costs could certainly be quantified a bit better than they are now.

Moving on to how the system will operate, going by the projected costs, the suggestion seems to be that they are one-year costs and that the approach will then be rolled forward, so there will be no renewed costs for training and so on. That seems wholly unlikely—

The Convener: Can I interrupt briefly? On the specific point about renewed training costs, surely in future years such training will be rolled into the normal training that individuals undertake—they will not have to undertake additional, separate training. Therefore, the costs are effectively start-up costs.

Greg Dempster: What other training will be dropped to make that cost neutral? If you are saying that this is an additional thing that people need to be trained to do, a cost is associated with that. I do not see that the fact that it becomes part of people’s normal training somehow makes it free in future years.

The Convener: Part of Liz Smith’s original question was whether you view this area as part of somebody’s job now. We are not starting from year zero; surely a lot of the work is already done.

Greg Dempster: Absolutely. I agree with that point in part—well, I wholly agree with the first part. We are not starting from year zero. Scotland is on a getting it right for every child implementation journey. Different authorities are at different places on that journey and will therefore have different training costs. However, there is a difference between the landscape now, the landscape in which people have been trained and the landscape that will exist after the bill is enacted. The bill could force changes in practice in different authorities and could certainly mean that there would be a need for more training for those who have already been trained—and, indeed, for new training to be developed on things such as information sharing protocols, which I am sure we will come on to.

The Convener: Indeed.

Liz Smith: Does anyone else want to comment on resources?

Clare Mayo (Royal College of Nursing Scotland): The Royal College of Nursing welcomes the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and the opportunities that it presents to make a real difference to children’s rights and children’s services.

The implementation of the provisions in the bill on the named person and the child’s plan requires significant funding to enable the named person to form a meaningful relationship with families and children. That also requires time.

We welcome the figures that are set out in the financial memorandum. The Scottish Government has worked hard to come up with figures that represent the time involved. You may have seen our evidence to the Finance Committee. We have some comments about the way in which those calculations were developed. The first and most important one is that there is an insufficient number of health visitors in Scotland to undertake the role, so a significant sum needs to be made available to train more health visitors. That is not taken into account.

There is no allocation of implementation costs until 2016-17 and all the professional time has been calculated on an hourly basis, which does not take into account associated employment costs. The Scottish Government’s calculation for the employment costs of going from hourly rates to developing a workforce is an additional 22.5 per cent, which allows for annual leave, sick leave, maternity leave and so on. That 22.5 per cent has not been factored in and therefore a further 22.5 per cent is required if the number of additional hours mentioned in the financial memorandum is to be made available.

We have questioned other assumptions. No additional administrative support is budgeted for NHS staff. As the GIRFEC approach beds in, it is anticipated that costs will decrease year on year at a rate of about 20 per cent. We believe that that overstates the reduction as time goes on because the level of funding that is allocated in the first instance will need to be sustained for a significant period before we see the benefits of the GIRFEC approach.

Jackie Mitchell (Royal College of Midwives Scotland): I echo a lot of that. The position is quite similar for midwives. Obviously, midwives do not have much input with the child after it is born; we look after it for only about the first 10 days and then hand the care over to the health visitor. However, we have a significant input in the antenatal period, which is where, through the GIRFEC programme, we are looking at doing a lot of the initial assessments and identifying needs.

GIRFEC is not being rolled out in maternity services unilaterally across all health boards. Some use the programme particularly well, but in other areas, there is not much input into GIRFEC. Midwives will tell you that they know what GIRFEC is about but are not using it. That is partly because they have not been trained in its use or the systems are not there. Training needs to be accounted for.

Martin Crewe (Barnardo’s Scotland): There has been somewhat of a mixed message here. As the other panellists have said, there is an initial training period. One of the things to get into perspective is how much GIRFEC is being rolled out now. As well as my Barnardo’s experience, I am deputy chair of the GIRFEC programme board. We have recently assessed the current state of roll-out across all 32 community planning partnerships.

With regard to the named person, two CPPs describe it as embedded, another four talk about being well on the way to implementing it, and another 19 are in the development phase. Clearly, CPPs are now moving ahead with named persons and addressing some of those issues as part of what they are doing.

In the longer term, we are seeing in Highland and elsewhere that resource demands move in the system. One of the most powerful arguments around GIRFEC is that non-offence referral rates to the reporter have dropped significantly, which means that there is less pressure on some parts of the system, so the system is more efficient for children and young people. However, in the short term, there will be pressure on other parts of the system. It is worth remembering the comment of John Carnochan, the head of the violence reduction unit, that in the long run, having 1,000 extra health visitors is more effective than having 1,000 extra police officers.

Liz Smith: You mentioned 19 local authorities, plus four, plus two. That leaves seven, I think. Have some not responded, or is there a problem with them?

Martin Crewe: Everybody responded, but they are at different stages of development. GIRFEC has been around for a number of years. One thing that is absolutely clear is that the bill has galvanised people’s efforts to implement GIRFEC. I would say that we have made more progress in the past year than we did in the previous five years.

Liz Smith: Is there any concern about the seven authorities that you did not put into one of the categories?

Martin Crewe: They are further back in the process. It is a self-assessment process, but everybody is now focused on how they are going to make things happen for 2015.

Liz Smith: I will ask the second question that I asked the previous panel. Will you comment on the need for more effective communication between the named person and the professionals? Mr Dempster, I know that you have concerns about data sharing. What do we have to do to make the system work better?

Greg Dempster: It looks like I will answer first again.

A lot of concern has been expressed about information sharing, both in different pieces of evidence that have been submitted to the committee and in the media. As an association, we do not share a lot of those concerns; our concerns are slightly different. We do not think that issues of confidentiality are huge issues that cannot be overcome. To me, the response from the Information Commissioner’s Office to the committee highlighted that it was talking about the bill requiring minor tweaks rather than wholesale changes on information sharing and confidentiality.

The information-sharing protocols that are put in place and the guidance that accompanies the bill about sharing information with the named person and what the named person does with that information will be very important. Beyond seeking clarity on that, I do not have a great deal more to say on that issue.

Martin Crewe: It is important to remember that there is a presumption of confidentiality when information is shared with the named person. They are then the gatekeeper of that information. One of the problems in the current system is that because people are less certain about whom they should take the information to—I am thinking particularly of agencies that do not share information regularly, such as the fire brigade—they will end up sending the information to four or five different agencies. The advantage of having a named person is that they are clearly the person who co-ordinates the information. That professional then has to make an informed decision about whom they share that information with. There are presumptions of confidentiality all along the way, so what is proposed is potentially a better system than what we have currently.

Liz Smith: Is that because under the present system there is a lack of clarity about how or with whom to share information, or because people are not sufficiently aware of their responsibilities?

Martin Crewe: I think that people lack confidence. A subgroup of the GIRFEC programme board met Ken Macdonald from the Information Commissioner’s Office at the end of last year to clarify some of this. People do not know how the Data Protection Act 1998 works. We got very useful clarification, which was sent out to statutory agencies in March and which says very clearly that if professionals believe that there is a risk to a child or young person that may lead to harm, they should share that information. That very much supports the move to more of a wellbeing approach.

It was said earlier that, whenever there is a significant case review, it always seems to come out that somebody had information that, had another professional known about it, would have affected how they would have behaved.

Liz Smith: So from your discussions with the Information Commissioner’s Office, is it your understanding that, if a problem arises, it is the responsibility of the named person to explain why it arose in the final result?

Martin Crewe: The named person has responsibility as a professional to make an informed decision on whom to share the information with. That is effectively greater clarity of the current position.

The Convener: I want to clarify a point that I raised with Greg Dempster. Is the named person approach brand new, does it effectively quantify what staff and professionals already do, or is it somewhere between the two?

Greg Dempster: I suppose that it is the third option—it is somewhere between the two. Every authority is at a different point in the implementation of GIRFEC, as Martin Crewe said, so the named person role is new, or newer, in some areas. Largely, what a person would do as a named person would be expected to have been done previously, but there is a training aspect because a legislative aspect is coming in, and there will be specific provisions around information, for example, that will need to be addressed and which people will need to be made aware of so that they can be the new version of the named person, as it were.

The Convener: Does that sum up the position for others?

Clare Mayo: Yes, I think so. The role has been developed within getting it right for every child. As Clare Simpson said last week, the request for a single point of contact came from parents, who said that they did not know whom to get in touch with in a complex, multi-agency landscape. The request for a named person—a named midwife, a named health visitor and a named teacher—was made so that there is clarity for everyone about who the first point of contact is.

The Convener: We started to talk about information sharing a little bit earlier than I intended. I will bring in Clare Adamson to expand on that issue.

Clare Adamson: The bill requires service providers to share information with the named person and vice versa where “it might be relevant” to a child’s wellbeing and “ought to be” shared. Are you content that we will reach a common understanding of a child’s wellbeing in the process? Is there a danger that that might mean different things in different local authority areas?

Clare Mayo: A huge amount of work has been done in GIRFEC implementation on development, training and consistency. In the areas in which GIRFEC is well implemented, there have been significant improvements in information sharing, and professionals are now confident about what needs to be shared with whom and how that is to be done.

One of GIRFEC’s real successes is the way in which professionals work together and share information effectively. We need to be quite careful about how the bill is worded, but we need caveats and clarification around confidentiality, consent and involving children and families in what is shared. In practice, a huge amount of work has been done, and there is good guidance and good training that we can build on as the implementation rolls out.

Jackie Mitchell: Building on that in the rolling out is important. Midwives are quite clear about their responsibilities on information sharing, particularly in child protection cases, but sometimes when needs or vulnerability issues are not quite as severe as child protection issues, people are perhaps not quite sure and perhaps they give too much information. There is still a bit of a learning curve out there.

Martin Crewe: I echo some of Clare Mayo’s comments. GIRFEC has been around for some time. There is a danger that, for those who are coming to it fresh, “wellbeing” sounds a rather fluffy, ill-defined term. In fact, the definitions of wellbeing are very clearly established around what are called the SHANARRI—safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included—indicators. The tools that have been developed have been widely accepted across agencies. Having a common language is a real benefit.

On the threshold issue, working at a wellbeing level addresses some of the issues around the fact that we are not always sure when something relating to a child is a matter of concern. If we have such a high threshold that something has to be harmful, that gives rise to a concern that we will not pick things up early enough.

Greg Dempster: I echo what has been said. When I speak about the bill with my members—school leaders from primaries, nurseries and special schools—they often refer to difficulties with the current delivery of GIRFEC. They struggle to get other partners to share information or get round the table. The duty to share information and help the named person is one that they welcome.

Clare Adamson: You mentioned training and training requirements. Is it necessary to ensure that all front-line staff will be able to make good judgments about the information that ought to be shared? Is there a significant amount of training still to be done, or is that very much established, because of GIRFEC?

Greg Dempster: There is training in place and we have covered that point to a degree. However, my concern is that the bill changes the landscape—depending on what ends up in the bill and in the guidance. Revision and further training may be required.

Liam McArthur: Jackie Mitchell mentioned potential problems with an excessive amount of information being provided—although everybody has alluded to problems in serious case reviews where not enough information was provided, or it was not provided in a timely fashion. Is there a risk of creating a degree of white noise, so that filtering out the most relevant information becomes more difficult? Could a quantum of information be created that adds further time and resource problems for other professionals involved in the process?

Jackie Mitchell: That was indeed the point that I was trying to make. That can sometimes be the case. With education and training, however—and initially with support mechanisms, as the measures are rolled out—things will improve.

The Convener: I wish to clarify a couple of points in this area. Last week, we had some evidence—I will call it evidence, but there was confusion over whether or not parents would be able to access the information that is in effect being provided by professionals about their child. What is your understanding of the issue? Will parents be allowed to access that shared information? Will parents be among the people with whom information is shared?

I detect the same level of confusion, given the silence.

Martin Crewe: It will depend on the circumstances. We would want to give due regard to parental views and the views of children, but it will depend on the circumstances.

Clare Mayo: There is current guidance around access to medical records. That is already there—that stands.

Another thing to say in this context is that GIRFEC principles are about involving parents and children. No one is trying to hide information. The whole ethos of getting it right for every child is to have the child and family at the heart of everything that is planned. Everything is done collaboratively as far as possible.

There are clearly circumstances when things get complicated, and that takes us into different territory but, as a principle, GIRFEC and, I therefore assume, the named person approach, is about working with children and families, so information is always shared in the spirit of partnership and working together in the best interests of a child.

Jackie Mitchell: Certainly from a midwifery point of view—of course the child has not yet been born—the assessment is in the woman’s hand-held maternity records, which she carries about with her. She has the full information and can input into it.
Liam McArthur: Clare Mayo said that much of the approach to access to information is established in precedent. When Professor Norrie gave evidence, he said that there is a fear that section 27 will override data protection rules and all the rest of it, so the bill might go considerably further than established practice on information sharing. Is that a risk? Do section 27 and aspects of section 26 need to be amended?

Clare Mayo: The language of sections 26 and 27 needs to be tightened up. We need absolute clarity. I understand that all existing data protection law stands and that everything in the bill is compatible with existing legislation, but it is for the lawyers to ensure that the wording is clear. I would like additional caveats around consent to and permission for information sharing.

The Convener: I presume that the other witnesses agree—I see that you do.

Clare Adamson: In a previous evidence session we were given the example of a teenager who had said that they were lesbian or gay—I cannot remember the circumstances—and the information was imparted to the parents without the young person's consent. Are you content for such issues to be resolved through guidance and some tightening up of the wording, or is there a danger that under the bill the balance in relation to a child's right to privacy is out of kilter?

Clare Mayo: It is hard to legislate for such practice issues. There should be clear guidance, to ensure that the situation that you described would not happen. We cannot legislate for every eventuality.

Joan McAlpine: Mr Crewe said that wellbeing is assessed by using the SHANARRI indicators—I understand that that stands for “safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included”. Someone could come along and say, “This child is not achieving, so there is a threat to their wellbeing. That is a trigger for information sharing.” Surely that could apply to every child in the country.

Martin Crewe: It could do, potentially, but we need to consider how our systems currently work. They tend to work well at crisis points. We have good crisis intervention and we have good universal support, but we are less good at the gap in between, when we want to go beyond universal support and give a little extra help to families as early as possible. If concern about a child's achievement can be addressed by offering a bit of support, that is absolutely appropriate.

Joan McAlpine: What if someone decides that a child is not active enough? It is all quite subjective, is it not?
Clare Mayo: Our view is that there should be a named midwife, a named health visitor and a named teacher at the appropriate times. I think that, for all under-fives, the named person should be a health visitor, as health visitors are the only group who have universal access to children and families, and who have the skills that are required to support early years development, health and wellbeing. We would like to see an additional provision in the bill that gave every family in Scotland the right to universal health visiting services, and I think that that could be inserted into section 20(1).

Neil Bibby: You stated in your written evidence—and mentioned earlier today—that “health visiting capacity ... needs to be reviewed” and that “The number of health visitors must reflect the workload associated with the Named Person role”.

At this moment in time, could the health visiting service take on that role effectively?

Clare Mayo: The service needs rapid investment. I believe that it is the right workforce to take on that role, but significant investment is required. The financial memorandum makes the case really well that a failure to intervene effectively to address complex needs in the early years of an individual's life results in a ninefold increase in public costs over the long term. If we are going to invest in early years, as the policy memorandum states, we need to do so now so that there is universal support for every child in Scotland in the early years in order that people can intervene early and provide the support that makes a difference as soon as possible.

In answer to your question: no, we do not have the capacity right now, which is why we need urgent investment.

Neil Bibby: Can you give us an estimated number of additional health visitors that you think we need in order to implement the named person provision effectively?

Clare Mayo: The financial memorandum sets out the number of additional hours of health visiting time that the Government believes is required, and we suggest—as I mentioned earlier—that an additional 22.5 per cent needs to be added to that. One cannot pluck hours out of the air: they need to be posts, and, in order to create posts from those hours, we need to build in that additional capacity.

If we divide what the Scottish Government believes the number of hours should be by full-time hours, the result is approximately 350 additional health visitors. If we add the 22.5 per cent, we are looking at something in the region of 450 additional health visitors across Scotland.

Neil Bibby: Concerns have been raised about the named person at school. Children spend 38 weeks a year at school, but for 14 weeks a year they are not there. What practical problems would that create, and how accessible would the named person be for those 14 weeks?

We have heard that the role might move to somebody in the education department of the local authority. Would that undermine the effectiveness of the named person?

Greg Dempster: The situation has moved on from the discussions on the Scottish Government’s initial proposals. The bill as drafted refers to a “named person service”, which clarifies the point. The named person will come from education, so during school term time it will most likely be someone from school, and outside term time the service will have to be provided from elsewhere in the authority.

How effective such a system will be remains to be seen. It is more effective to have a plan that enables someone from the authority to offer support than to assume that somebody will be available while they are on holiday.

The Convener: This might seem a rather simplistic question. Are you all of the view that the introduction of a named person will reduce the amount of neglect that children in Scotland have to suffer?

Greg Dempster: Yes.

Martin Crewe: That would be important, yes.

Clare Mayo: Yes.

The Convener: That would be my hope too, but I am asking whether you think that, in a practical sense, the introduction of a named person will actually lead to a better service, and therefore a reduction in neglect?

Clare Mayo: There is a growing evidence base from the UK and internationally on the importance of early years intervention, much of which has already been examined as the bill was being drafted. Increasingly, there is robust evidence that if we take a comprehensive approach to universal services with tiered support, we will be investing in the future of children’s lives and consequently reducing neglect and improving mental health and attachment relationships. Those are things that we know make a difference to children as they move into adolescence and become adults themselves.

I believe that the bill is an opportunity to invest in the life of every child in Scotland by providing the type of universal support that is required, with the additional tiered services that have been shown to make a difference elsewhere in the world.

Martin Crewe: That is the fundamental argument towards which we have been moving for some years now, with the early years initiatives, the Christie commission and all those things that have enabled us to ask how we can get into the preventative area.

Last week I talked to Mike Burns from Glasgow’s social work department, which has carried out an internal assessment of 18 of the most high-end cases, in which a young person goes into secure accommodation or residential care at the age of 15, costing £200,000 a year each or more. Of those 18 young people, at least 12 were known at age three to display problematic behaviour in nursery. We could have gone in much earlier there, and that is where we need to focus our resources.

Greg Dempster: The bill is designed to head off issues at an earlier stage and I believe that it will achieve that, so the answer is yes.

Jackie Mitchell: Yes: early identification and support at the very early stages.

Clare Mayo: I will read a tiny quote from a case study that is on the RCN health visitors for Scotland website. This is from a health visitor who is working with a family in NHS Ayrshire and Arran, which is one of the areas that is well advanced in implementing GIRFEC. She is working with a family of four children. Mum and dad have long-standing heroin issues and the health visitor is heavily involved.

The health visitor is working with them, looking at their goals for their children, and she has been seeing the family every two weeks, and more often if necessary. Both parents are now in a methadone programme and are doing really well. At the same time their self-esteem is raised and now they are able to do things for themselves that they have never been able to do. They are booking their own appointments and attending without support. She said:

“When I visit them I can see them with their shoulders back, they speak better, they make eye contact and the children and mum and dad are happy to attend groups at school. In addition, the older children’s school attendance and school work has improved dramatically and, whereas before, they went to school periodically and were not well-dressed or clean, now it’s the opposite. The baby is also thriving and well attached to mum and dad. And for the first time in her life, the mum is considering her own future and thinking about training for a career.”

That is the kind of difference that we are hoping to make.

Colin Beattie: I would like to explore the bureaucracy around part of this bill. The bill allows for a child’s plan in certain cases where intervention is necessary but it does not actually allow for any changes to existing assessments and plans that are in place. One of the previous witnesses said that 11 different assessments must be made for every child. How will this work? GIRFEC is supposed to reduce bureaucracy and it is supposed to achieve a single child’s plan. The bill does not require that. It does not refer to that at all. How will this work?

Martin Crewe: In terms of GIRFEC implementation, having a single child’s planning system and a single child’s plan is absolutely essential. There is one area of the bill on which we would like some more clarification—the additional support for learning plans—because clearly it is in a child’s best interests that we have a single plan in place.

Colin Beattie: How does the child’s plan feed into all the other plans and assessments that are supposedly out there?

Greg Dempster: My understanding is that they would sit within the child’s plan, but I agree that it would be useful if the child’s plan brought a bit more coherence to that process. It is expressed really well in paragraphs 17 to 19 of the evidence that the advisory group for additional support for learning submitted to the committee, which summarises my position well. It is a question of bringing coherence to the process, and the ambition of achieving that single plan.

Clare Mayo: I am hearing from our members that the GIRFEC approach is reducing bureaucracy rather than increasing it. Where several years ago there might have been a large case conference with a room full of professionals, the SHANARRI approach, the wellbeing approach and the assessments that are in place mean that the right information is fed to the named person. Instead of having a large case conference, which is very intimidating for parents, the named person and the lead professional will sit down with the family in their own home and go through the child’s plan. That is much better and less bureaucratic than some of the systems that were in place before now.

Colin Beattie: Are we clear about the relationship between lead professionals and named persons?

Martin Crewe: I think we are. The guidance is very clear that the named person is the co-ordination point and is so only up to the point of co-ordinating some additional support. The moment that we start talking about managing a child’s plan, we move into lead professional territory. The statutory guidance behind the bill will reflect what is now quite a large body of information on how best this approach works, which we have established across a number of CPPs.

Jackie Mitchell: The relationship is a lot clearer now. In the earlier days, when GIRFEC was rolled out, there were concerns about the lead professional and the named person, but the position is now clear among practitioners.

Greg Dempster: I echo that. The only qualification that I add is that I have not seen the guidance that will support the bill, so I do not know what is in it. If it reflects the current understanding about the roles, it will be clear.

Liam McArthur: There has been a lot of focus on different aspects of the bill. I am particularly pleased that part 8 will increase from 21 to 26 the age limit for aftercare for people who leave care. It is only fair to acknowledge the work that Barnardo’s Scotland and Aberlour Child Care Trust have put into prosecuting the case for that increase.

Although the change is welcome, I am aware of concerns about clarity over whether the aftercare provisions will apply to people who are looked after at home and over the anomaly that relates to when a child may leave school and whether they are deemed to be in care, which might affect how the aftercare provisions apply and the eligibility for aftercare. Dispute resolution mechanisms also seem to be absent—I am not sure whether that is for the bill or for guidance. Does Martin Crewe have points that it would help the committee to bear in mind? That could apply to stage 2 amendments, but it would help to have a bit more detail for our consideration of the general principles.

Martin Crewe: We are very supportive of supporting care leavers up to the age of 26. We have broad experience in that area. There is no doubt that, although young people often want to leave care at 16, they are not suited to that. It takes them some years to get on to a stable path, often after many problems with accommodation and other things that they must try and fail at before finding their way.

We would like to submit separately to the committee a number of detailed comments on the issue. As you said, we want to ensure that aftercare is available for all looked-after children, including those who have been not accommodated but looked after at home, and we want to address the eligibility criteria that relate to birth dates. A young person who has been in care for a substantial period of their young life but is not in care at 16 should still be eligible for support. We will need some sort of dispute resolution process, in which it will be important for young people to have access to advocacy on their behalf.

There are a number of issues. If a young person who was being supported in aftercare dies, that should lead to a significant case review, as it would if they had been in care. We would like a number of measures to be tightened up and we will submit details in writing.

The Convener: That would be helpful; I am sure that the committee would appreciate that—and the sooner, the better.

I thank the witnesses very much for coming along. The session has been helpful for our examination of the bill.

I suspend the meeting briefly while we clear the table.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Stewart Maxwell): Good morning, everybody, and welcome to the 24th meeting in 2013 of the Education and Culture Committee. I remind all who are present that electronic devices, in particular mobile phones, should be switched off at all times because they interfere with the sound system, and we would prefer that that did not happen.

Our first item is continued evidence taking on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. The theme for our first panel of witnesses is kinship care. I welcome to the meeting May Barker from Clacks kinship carers; Alison Gillies from the Child Poverty Action Group in Scotland; Kate Higgins from Children 1st; and Anne Swartz from the Scottish kinship care alliance. Good morning to you all.

Before the rest of the committee ask questions, I want to start with a general background question. Perhaps you can all give brief answers, if you do not mind, as we have quite a lot on the agenda and we want to get through as much as possible. Can you all give us, from the point of view of organisations and individuals, a potted history of what has happened and what has changed for kinship carers over the past 10 years—since devolution, in effect? It is clear that the issue has come up a number of times in Parliament and in society in general, and that there have been a number of changes.

Anne Swartz (Scottish Kinship Care Alliance): There has been kinship care for a long time, but there have been many changes in kinship care legislation in the past 10 years, particularly since 2007. The Scottish kinship care alliance was formed partly to look at those issues.

The Convener: What have the changes been?

Anne Swartz: In 2007, a policy was put in place to the effect that all children in kinship care would be treated equally with children in foster care. That was changed in 2008, so that only looked-after children in kinship care would be provided for.

The Convener: Is that the only change that you are aware of?

Anne Swartz: No. Can I pass the question along to someone else?

The Convener: Okay.

Kate Higgins (Children 1st): Anne is absolutely right to identify a big shift in 2007, when kinship care was recognised in its own right as an appropriate arrangement for children who cannot live at home with their parents. The movement towards that recognition began when a reference group was set up to look at the needs of both kinship carers and foster carers. It emerged from that group that kinship carers have distinct needs.

In 2007 the Government entered into the concordat with local government and, as Anne pointed out, one of the commitments that it made was to pay an allowance for kinship carers and to place responsibility on local authorities to meet the needs of kinship carers. When local authorities translated that into action they decided to apply it only to families with looked-after children.

When the Government and Parliament wanted to formalise kinship care for the first time in legislation, a question arose about what can be put in regulations or set down in law. It was necessary to have a mechanism that identified the children whom we are talking about; the mechanism used looked-after status. At the time, everybody supported that mechanism because those were the children with the greatest needs and we needed to make sure that they were assessed when placed in kinship care and that some kind of rules applied to how those children and families were treated.

Every action, however, creates a reaction, and we have discovered that while there are almost 4,000 children formally looked after in kinship care, the estimates suggest that at least another 15,000 or 16,000 are in informal kinship care. It is probably a conservative estimate. They might be in families who are known to social workers and local authorities but in which the children do not require looked-after status. Also, kinship carers argue that they know of families who should get support but do not, simply because local authorities want to manage resources. Often, too, families keep themselves below the radar because they do not want what they see as interference by local authorities.

There has been a lot of change and a lot of movement since 2007. Alison Gillies can tell you of some changes on the financial side, and the action, reaction and consequences.

Alison Gillies (Child Poverty Action Group): My area of expertise is financial allowances—in particular, the thorny issue of the interaction between the financial allowances and the United Kingdom benefits system. As we have heard already, there have been significant changes since...
2007 and the concordat agreement. The initial agreement, which was to pay kinship carers of looked-after children at a rate equivalent to that for foster carers, has not become a reality, but all local authorities have shifted to a position where they are making payments of some sort to kinship carers of looked-after children. Quite a few local authorities are also making payments at some level to kinship carers of non-looked-after children.

I will focus briefly for the moment on two issues that are affecting looked-after children. There is wide variation in levels of payment across the 32 local authorities, from very low payments of around £50 a week up to payments that are equivalent to fostering allowances. There is also variation in the legal powers that local authorities use to make payments. You may think that does not matter, but it affects the ability of families to claim child or family-related welfare benefits. I will speak briefly about that for the moment.

The Convener: We will come back to that point in some detail later.

Alison Gillies: Good. Suffice it to say that it was obvious from the outset—or it ought to have been—that there would likely be a very complex interaction with the UK benefits system. That is one of the reasons why it is so good that some forward planning is being done in relation to changes. Although local authorities have, in many instances, stepped up to the mark and have made payments to kinship carers of looked-after children, the kinship carers are not necessarily gaining fully from that payment because of the interaction with the benefits system. That results in a complex picture across the country, in which, in some extreme cases, kinship carers would be unable to accept a payment from the local authority because it would simply not be worth their while to do so; there would be no net gain.

Other local authorities might be paying what look like quite considerable kinship care allowances, but the kinship carer’s net gain is not the whole of that payment because of the interaction with the benefits system. That is a development since 2007.

May Barker (Clacks Kinship Carers): My area of expertise is in being a kinship carer. I have learned everything the hard way, down at the pit face, as it were. I have been involved in this only since 2010. Like a lot of other people out there, I did not even know what kinship care was. It was a phrase that I had heard, but I had not thought any more about it.

Clackmannanshire kinship carers became heavily involved in what is going on because we got a sum of money that was then cut. We also found that councils were all paying different amounts when we had thought that the same amount would be being paid all over Scotland and it would not be at the discretion of councils.

The Convener: We will come to details as we go through the evidence. I just want a general feel for what has changed over the years. There has been a lot of work done in this area.

Kate Higgins: It was a bit remiss of me not to say that as well as the legislative journey and the concordat, the Scottish Government picked up on other recommendations from the reference group and funded Mentor UK to work with kinship carers to produce a guide to kinship care. The guide is pretty useful and all of us disseminate it to kinship carers. The Scottish Government also funded Children 1st to run a national service to provide advice and support to kinship carers.

The initial investment in 2007 also resulted in local authorities putting in place more support generally. There was a lot of inconsistency in how that was done, but generally there was an increase in support at local authority level—certainly in the first years. However, a lot of that is being cut back. A good example is East Lothian Council, which had a really good set-up to support kinship carers, but which has in the past 12 months gone down to one part-time worker.

All of what has been done has helped to support kinship carers to support themselves. There are an awful lot more groups, some of which are quite informal—little loose groups—and some of which are quite formal. As Anne Swartz pointed out, that has given rise to the formation of the kinship care alliance. So, there is peer support, and formal national and local support.

May Barker: Could I also say—

The Convener: I am sorry, May. I am going to stop you there because I want to get on to the questioning. I know that members are keen to go through a lot of the detail. It would not be reasonable for it just to be an exchange between the panel and me. I am sure that the other members of the committee would object quite strongly. Liam, do you have a supplementary question?

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): Yes. I want to follow up on the explanation of the chronology from Kate Higgins and Alison Gillies. With the concordat, there was quite a wide basis of coverage. Subsequently, drilling down on where need was greatest, looked-after children in kinship care were, in a sense, seen as the priority. You can understand the reason for that.

Can you shed any light on why the concordat was framed as it was? Was there discussion about the resource implications of such an open-ended commitment, or was there a misunderstanding or an inadequate assessment of how wide the net would have to be cast in order to honour that commitment?

Alison Gillies: I might hand over to Kate Higgins on that. My understanding—I could be wrong and other people might know better than I do—was that the concordat contained a commitment to kinship carers of looked-after children. Prior to that, there was a wider discussion about where resources should be targeted. Looking from the outside in at what the logic might have been, I think, as Kate Higgins has said, that it related to the idea that the commitment would focus support on the children who are most in need of support. Whether that is borne out in reality is another matter, and Kate Higgins might have more to say about that.

Anne Swartz: A lot of the problems arose when the legislation was changed to separate looked-after children in kinship care from non-looked-after children in kinship care. We had formal and informal kinship care, but there are two levels of informal care. Some informal care is based on residence orders and some is based on no orders whatever, which is where the water starts to get muddied because we then have looked-after children and non-looked-after children. All the children have comparable needs, whether or not they have looked-after status, but the way in which the bill has been written means that a lot of children with looked-after status will be moved over to non-looked-after status, so even more of their support will disappear. We need to look at those issues.

The Convener: I am sure that we will discuss much of that as we go through our questions.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): My question is on the point that Anne Swartz just made about kinship care. In your written submission and in your comments, you have raised some questions about the proposed kinship care order. However, I understand that it will not be a new order, as the initial proposal was, but will now be an adaptation of the existing section 11 order. Your written submission suggests that the kinship care order will last only three years, but a section 11 order—which is what, in effect, the new kinship care order will be—lasts indefinitely. Would you care to respond to that?

Anne Swartz: Yes—a section 11 order lasts indefinitely. The point about the new kinship care order lasting for three and a half years is that the support will, at the end of that time, cease for the children in kinship care.

The Convener: Can I just clarify something? Let us be clear about what we are discussing. I do not want us to confuse all the different orders. The support that is in place, in terms of the specific point about the order, is transitional support.

Anne Swartz: Yes, it is transitional support. However, we get the impression that, at the end of the three and a half years, when that transitional phase is over, there will not be anything in place. Because of the way in which the new order has been written, looked-after status will move further towards non-looked-after status. At the end of the three and a half years, there will be more children with non-looked-after status than with looked-after status, yet their needs are comparable.

Joan McAlpine: That is not how, in your opening statements, you described the direction of travel in policy on kinship carers in Scotland. You seemed to say that, although there are problems, the direction of travel has since 2007 been towards more support for kinship carers. I would be surprised if that suddenly went into reverse, which is what you seem to be describing now.

Anne Swartz: Our general feeling is that that is the direction in which provision is going, given all the disparity in local authorities. One local authority does one thing, while another does something else. There is no consistency out there: we need consistency.

Joan McAlpine: What kind of consistency are you looking for? Should kinship carers get exactly the same support as foster carers?

Anne Swartz: Absolutely not. We are not and would never purport to be foster carers. We are kinship carers, and the children are kinship children. However, both foster children and kinship children can in certain circumstances be on the same legal order. Foster carers receive a higher level of support, in comparison with kinship carers and their children, who receive negligible support from some authorities. That is where we see a lot of disparity, and that is the situation that we are seeking to rectify.

Joan McAlpine: Someone observed in their opening remarks that quite a number of kinship carers prefer not to have any involvement from the authorities. If a kinship carer wants financial support, can they reasonably ask for it without being assessed in the same way that a foster carer receiving such support might have been? After all, that might not be what everyone wants.

Anne Swartz: That support is not available at the moment. I accept that not everyone might want it but things should be written in such a way as to make that support open to people without their having to jump through a lot of hoops with the local authority to get access to the services that children need. In order to get such services, a child needs looked-after status; if they do not have that, those services are very difficult to obtain.
Kate Higgins: Having made the remarks that Joan McAlpine referred to, I should perhaps provide some explanation. In the two and a half years we have been running the national service—and indeed for many years before that—Children 1st has had a relationship with kinship or family-based carers to support children who cannot live at home. We have had lots of engagement with kinship carers and their families. I believe that we have shared most of that information with the committee, although there might be one piece on the financial review that we have not shared with you.

According to the most recent survey, most kinship carers—I think that the figure was 60 per cent—support the idea of a kinship care order. When we explored with kinship carers their status and their feelings about how they are being supported, two issues emerged. First, the way in which the Government established the looked-after regulations turned looked-after status into almost a gateway to support and assistance. Such an approach has not been helpful because it effectively encourages more children to enter formal care settings; after all, looked-after status means state-based care. The aspirations of most kinship carers is to get the support that their children need to get a better start in life and have ordinary childhoods, and the support that they themselves need to function as normal families. Looked-after status does not help to meet those aspirations because it means that the authorities are constantly engaging in the carer’s life and their children’s lives. We know of cases in which families have fought really hard on this issue; the child in question is quite clearly no longer at risk of significant harm and therefore does not need to be continually looked at or looked after. On the other hand, because support comes with looked-after status, some families have fought against its removal. It is not healthy to have children being unnecessarily subject to state intervention, and the kinship care order is partly an attempt to provide support in a different way that does not create such artificial barriers.

The second issue that emerged was about the recognition of kinship care in its own right as a legitimate arrangement for children who can no longer stay at home. It has always been seen as kind of like looked-after status or foster care or as a step into—but not quite—formal care.

I hope that we would all recognise family-based care as a legitimate and appropriate way forward for children who cannot live at home with their parents any more. Children 1st aspires—as we all should—to view kinship care in its own right. We must ensure that the legislation around it covers as many bases—formal and informal—as possible. The legislation should enable children to be moved from being looked after to a more permanent setting. That would provide the stability that kinship care families want, while enabling those families that currently stay below the radar because they do not want people coming into their lives to get a kinship care order through the courts, which will provide some stability and permanence in their own and their children’s lives.

We found that the additional support needs legislation and framework, which should be working for all those children who are looked after and in kinship care, and the children who have what Anne Swartz described as “comparable needs” in the form of learning support needs, are not providing the necessary support.

If the framework was working more effectively, some of the issues that have come out of our engagement, such as children not getting help and support and families not feeling properly supported, would go away, because education would rightly provide support and make use of the legislative framework to support children’s learning needs.

Joan McAlpine: From what you and previous witnesses have said about the confusion and lack of parity throughout the country, it seems that the kinship care order might provide the clarity that has been lacking.

Alison Gillies: It appears from the bill’s accompanying documents that there is a desire to shift the direction of travel slightly away from applying looked-after status where it is not absolutely necessary, which would be a correct use of the least-intervention principle. I will not reiterate what Kate Higgins has just said, but we are left with a problem. One of the bill’s objectives is to provide better support for kinship carers, but it is a bit difficult to see how that will work as things stand because there is no clear message about the support that will be attached to the new kinship care order.

I realise that it is a thorny and difficult issue, but it is difficult for us to find our way through and answer questions such as “How is this going to be better?” and “Will it be better than the existing situation?” without having some more clarity.

My fear—which is probably echoed by other organisations and individuals—is that we may end up with a situation that, by and large, replicates the current situation, in which there is a huge disparity in the treatment of kinship carers in different local authorities throughout Scotland. I am very focused on the issue of financial support—I realise that that is not the be-all and end-all, but it is my area—and there is certainly no indication at present that there will be any obligation on local authorities to provide a minimum level of financial support.
We are already in that situation with regard to looked-after children in kinship care: there is a commitment, but no legal obligation or minimum payment. We can see what has happened with that with the huge variation throughout the country in how kinship carers of looked-after children are treated. It is difficult to see how that will not be replicated unless there is a shift. That is a major concern, not least in terms of equality for kinship carers in different local authorities throughout Scotland.

Joan McAlpine: I understand what you are saying. The situation is patchy at the moment and you are concerned that it could remain so. However, I also understand that there is more cover in Scotland than there is south of the border.

Alison Gillies: I am not an expert on the situation south of the border, but I have looked at it in some detail.

I am sorry—I just leapt in there; is that okay?

Joan McAlpine: That is fine.

Alison Gillies: As I understand the situation south of the border, a kinship carer of a looked-after child is assessed as a foster carer. There are legal differences between Scotland and England—and, I assume, Wales. As a result of some hard-fought cases, case law has established that in England and Wales such people are paid a fostering allowance that is equivalent to the allowance paid to an unrelated foster carer. The position of kinship carers of looked-after children south of the border is better and more clear cut. That is the situation if we are comparing those two groups.

From research into the English and Welsh context, I know that kinship carers of children who are not looked after, such as people who have a residence order or a special guardian’s order—which does not exist in Scotland—are struggling. Local authorities have discretion over whether to pay what is called a residence allowance or a special guardian’s allowance. There are lessons to be learned from that.

Liam McArthur: Alison Gillies has been talking about uncertainty, but is that a reflection of what is not in the bill but will come about through regulation? We cannot have a bill that is laden down, with every i dotted and t crossed, but are some of your concerns about issues that might be better dealt with and clarified by the bill rather than detailed regulation?

Alison Gillies: There are lots of concerns and, as I say, I am very focused on the finance issues. My concern is about whether secondary legislation will put local authorities under a legal obligation to financially support kinship carers who have a kinship care order. Given current indications, I would be surprised if that was the intention, although I guess that it would be possible. If local authorities are not legally obliged in that way, there is likely to be a postcode lottery.

Liam McArthur: Presumably, we do not need to detail that financial support, but it would help if the policy intent was made clearer in the bill.

Alison Gillies: If we are working out how things might look, what the implications might be and whether what is proposed is likely to be better than what we have at the moment, a bit more detail would be helpful.

Liam McArthur: Anne Swartz wants to make a point.

The Convener: Please be brief; we have a lot of questions.

Anne Swartz: We cannot compare English and Welsh services to Scottish services because they are all entirely different. I have looked into the situation quite a lot. They struggle as much as we do with the inconsistencies.

The local authority will have the discretion to decide how the new kinship care order is written, what support will be available and whether someone can access a kinship care order. On the legal side of obtaining the kinship care order, it will be left to the individual to get that and to pay. There are a lot of inconsistencies throughout—

The Convener: Sorry to interrupt again, but this is very confusing. My understanding is that if somebody gets a kinship care order—in other words, an amended section 11 order—we move from a situation in which local authority support is discretionary to one in which the local authority is required to provide support. However, you just said the opposite.

Anne Swartz: Yes. I have asked to have that point clarified. Will somebody who has a residence order just now be automatically granted a kinship care order and get access to support? Some of those who have section 11 residence orders get no support at all. Will they automatically obtain the support that goes with the new kinship care order, or will they have to be assessed? If they must be assessed, how will that be done so that they get support?

The Convener: My understanding is that there is a requirement, so I am still slightly confused. Does Kate Higgins want to say something?

Kate Higgins: Yes. I will try to pick up on both points. The position is not clear yet, but it will be addressed in secondary legislation. The only assurance that can be given is that the Scottish Government is engaging with all the organisations and with kinship carers themselves on what the secondary legislation should look like.

The suggestion of the start-up grant came from kinship carers telling us that it is difficult to find support for clothes and so on for children when they arrive in their family. The idea of the start-up grant is a sign that everybody is listening; the grant is an example of the support that carers would be expected to get.

We have concerns, because we know how things are interpreted by local authorities. We have seen huge disparities between authorities with regard to the local allowance, for example. We are concerned that local authorities might pick and choose from a menu of support, if you like, creating another layer of inconsistency for families, which is what everybody wants to avoid.

This is not just about support through the kinship care order. There has been a lot of debate about the appropriateness of the term “counselling services” in section 62 and whether it describes the provision’s intention. However, the provision is entirely based on what kinship carers have told us, and what the Government has found, about the need for a mechanism that enables early intervention when a placement, particularly a kinship care placement, is at risk of breaking down. We know that there is concern on the local authority and professional sides about where the provision has come from, what it is intended to do and its resource implications. However, we make a huge plea to keep the provision in the bill. It might not be kept where it is in the bill or be termed “counselling services”, but it is an absolutely vital provision if we are to take further the idea of early intervention in families where a child is at risk, instead of waiting for a crisis point to be reached.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): In relation to kinship care orders, a £500 start-up grant and some transitional support for three years have been mentioned. However, as we have heard, some councils give kinship carers weekly amounts on an on-going basis. Presumably kinship carers get that support because they need it on an on-going basis in order to keep their children. Without that on-going weekly support, would kinship carers be able to look after their children? If transitional payments were to end after three years, is it the case that kinship care orders would not be beneficial for some kinship carers?

Anne Swartz: It is not just about financial support. In the research that I have done, I have found that there can be stability for two, three or four years for a child but then the situation destabilises, for whatever reason. If children are not on any sort of legal order or under social work support, whether they can get back into the system for access to services and support through the new kinship care order, which should be possible at any time down the road for those children, will be left to local authority discretion. We need to look at the wording.

The Convener: I am sorry for my confusion, but how would that work if it was automatic? Surely it has to be discretionary. I cannot see how there could be an automatic right. Surely somebody has to be assessed at that stage. We cannot have a system where those who might want to be in receipt of support just decide that they will get it.

Anne Swartz: What I am saying is that the discretion to assess children will be at the local authority level. That is the case at the moment and it causes a lot of difficulties in a lot of local authorities, so we need to look at tightening things up in some way. I do not know how, but we have to do that.

May Barker: As a kinship carer, I definitely could not manage without some form of financial help. I am on a state pension and I just would not have the money to look after the teenage girl that I have and bring her up in the way that other children are brought up so that she can join in and be the same as everybody else. That is what we are looking for.

However, it is not just about money, because we also need psychological services, and we want respite for both children and adults—if one goes, the other gets respite. At the beginning, especially when we were fighting head to head and toe to toe, I would have been glad to have a weekend. It has quietened down a bit now, but it was not quiet at the beginning. She did not like rules. There have to be rules, but she had not had any. I would have been glad of even an afternoon away. It is not just money that is involved, but I could not have managed without some form of financial help.

The Convener: I ask Kate Higgins to be brief because I want to move on.

Kate Higgins: It would be helpful to seek clarity from the Scottish Government on the matter. Our understanding is that the allowance that goes with the kinship care order is temporary transitional support for three years. That will not prevent those children who are still looked after from receiving a kinship care allowance through the looked-after regulations, nor will it prevent local authorities from continuing—as most of them do, and it has not been the most helpful thing that they have done—to make payments and give support through section 50 of the Children Act 1975 and section 22 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.

We find overwhelmingly that kinship carers believe that there should be no differences—that every kinship care family, both formal and informal, should get an allowance and that they should all get the same amount. They would prefer to see a national allowance. It is unfortunate that the financial review has not caught up quickly enough to allow us to address some of those issues in the bill, put them to rest and take things forward. It is almost the elephant in the room, in that it gets in the way of everything else. It is inequitable that we have local authorities paying different amounts. That is not what kinship carers want, and they recognise that. They want everybody to receive the same amount, and we should listen to that.

The Convener: Thank you.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): Many of the points that I was going to raise have been covered, but I have a question that is particularly for Kate Higgins.

Kate, you mentioned that the additional support needs framework does not work as well as it should. Getting it right for every child is key to the provisions in the bill. Will the passing of the bill and the implementation of GIRFEC address some of those problems?

Kate Higgins: I would like to think so. How people will get access to the kinship care order and the support allowance is key. Under the bill, it will be if someone is a qualifying person and if the child is eligible. We advocate that an eligible child should be identified under the definition of wellbeing in the bill, as that would put all children on a level playing field, which is the direction of travel for when services should kick in to support children. That means that there should be access where a child’s wellbeing might be compromised or need to be promoted or invested in in respect of the SHANARRI indicators—safe, healthy, active, nurtured, achieving, respected, responsible and included. That would enable GIRFEC to apply.

There are wider issues about the relationship between GIRFEC and additional support needs, and how both frameworks come together. I am not sure that those issues have been fully resolved, but I know that, where councils are implementing GIRFEC very well, they have got over that—the committee might hear about that from Highland Council. We should try to learn from that and put the lessons into practice.

What May Barker said about the kind of support that she would have welcomed in her family is there in evidence. Anne Swartz had the same issues. There is evidence about what families are looking for from engagement: they are looking for help from health services and schools.

In 2011, we did a session on additional support needs in our regional forums. A number of kinship carers had never heard before that they had the right to go to their local school and ask for their child’s learning support needs to be assessed, nor that the authorities in education rather than in social work should provide support for their children.

The approach is not currently working. GIRFEC should help. It helps where things are done well in the country and it is an aspiration, but we need to make it work better for families, particularly kinship care families.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): I want to turn attention to the situation in which a child moves from looked-after kinship care to a non-looked-after situation. Mrs Swartz, the Scottish kinship care alliance said clearly in its evidence:

“Support should last longer than three years if it is to encourage permanence and respond to the needs of the child.”

Could you provide us with clear-cut evidence on why that support should be extended? Where is the evidence that would help the committee to understand why support should be beyond three years?

Anne Swartz: It is quite difficult to get clear-cut evidence, but from speaking to members of the Scottish kinship care alliance, it has become quite clear that, as I said earlier, there are cases in which support must remain in place because there is instability. The children’s needs are comparable with those of children who go into foster care. They can have foetal alcohol syndrome and issues with withdrawal from drugs. They have all the issues and more compared with children who go into foster care and, ultimately, they could have gone into foster care at great cost to the Government.

However, it is not all about money. We need access for those children and, to obtain that access, there needs to be looked-after status; otherwise, it is extremely difficult to get that at the local level. That is why we want to see support continuing throughout the child’s life.

Liz Smith: Are you saying that there is more urgency about financial support beyond three years or about psychological or social support?

Anne Swartz: I think that they are both equal. Many kinship carers have had to give up their employment. There is such inconsistency in local authorities. Many carers have used all their savings and are told to go to the Department for Work and Pensions when their savings run out, even though the children are on the official looked-after register.

Liz Smith: I would like to ask Mrs Gillies a question. From the points that you have made, it seems that your expertise is very much in the financial area. The committee wants to get to grips with the facts that prove the case that all four of you have stated, which is that we have not quite got things right. Where is the best factual, statistical evidence to prove the case that you are making?

Alison Gillies: I refer the committee to the “Kinship Care: Fostering effective family and friends placements” research by Farmer and Moyers in 2008, which I referred to in my written evidence. That indicated—I do not think that this will be very surprising—that financial security and some enhanced financial support improve the stability of kinship care arrangements and the eventual outcomes for children.

There is a dearth of longitudinal and comparative studies in this area but the indications from that research—which, as I have said, are not surprising—are that increasing financial support in addition to other support increases the likelihood of kinship care arrangements succeeding for the child.

One question that we all have to ask ourselves is: why are kinship care arrangements different? Why—to put it bluntly—do they need extra support? A lot of information in that respect has already been given this morning, but I think there are a number of reasons. First of all, statistically speaking, kinship carers are likely to be poorer than the general population and, indeed, official foster carers. They are also likely to be caring for children at a time in their lives when they might not have been expecting to do so. I am not the expert in this area but I also think that a lot of kinship carers will have had to give up employment or might not be at a stage in their lives when they are able to contemplate employment to boost their income. For all of those reasons—and given the particular needs and experiences of at least a good proportion of the children in kinship care arrangements—additional financial and other support are likely to be necessary. The research that I mentioned is interesting and useful in pointing us in that direction.

Liz Smith: With respect, however, we—and, indeed, the Government in putting together the financial memorandum—have to take a view on the amount of money that needs to be made available to address the issue. To make a sensible decision, we must ensure that evidence lies behind all of this and that we can prove that, by spending the money, we are making things better. Where should the committee be steered to ensure that we can get the best possible knowledge and evidence to allow us to come to an informed opinion?

Alison Gillies: In a slightly promoting-of-CPAG way, I refer you to our recent report entitled “The cost of a child in 2013”. I will leave it so that you have the references and so on. Obviously, that report does not relate specifically to kinship care but it does relate to the cost of bringing up a child. I am sure that the committee has that information at its disposal anyway but it might be useful to have in the background to thoughts on this.

Kate Higgins: Echoing what Alison Gillies just said, I believe that there is a dearth of longitudinal research on the outcomes for children in kinship care. The evidence is what we already know. If it is good enough for our own children to grow up in family-based care—if it gives them the best chance of a better start in life—it is good enough for kinship care children.

There is also what we know about the outcomes for children who grow up in residential care. The committee has done an inquiry into the educational attainment of looked-after children. One of your findings was that there has not been so much progress as for those children looked after at home. Partly that is about where the resources have been invested; it is two sides of the same coin.

There are families here telling you that they are not getting enough support. We know, from our... engagement, that the additional support needs framework is not working well for them. The committee has found that there has not been a significant improvement for looked-after children. There is your chain, in effect—it is one of the impacts of poverty.

On the inquiry into taking children into care, another issue was about acting early enough. These children are compromised by a poor start in life, in their earliest years, and by the impact of poverty. There is loads of evidence on the impact of poverty on children. We know what will happen if all that we are doing, as a state, is taking children out of one deprived situation—I mean deprived in a range of ways; not just income related—and placing them into another care arrangement in which they are still not getting any more money. We are not being fair to those children and giving them the best start in life and we know the consequences of that.

We are increasingly hearing from local authorities about the cost of kinship care and about how it is becoming unaffordable. This goes back to the issue of preventative spending. We know that the cost of kinship care placements is tiny compared with the cost of residential care or even foster care placements. We have to get local authorities to recognise the value of kinship care. We know that times are tough and budgets are constrained but kinship care arrangements save all of us a lot of money in the long term. They should not be done on the cheap. These children have the same rights as other children to grow up not in poverty.

The Convener: We are rapidly running out of time and we still have to address a number of issues. I want to clarify something in the policy memorandum. When Anne Swartz was speaking earlier about the transitional arrangements, I got the impression that those would last three years and then finish.

Anne Swartz: Yes. That was our understanding.

The Convener: That was what I thought you said. Paragraph 122 on page 29 of the policy memorandum says:

“Secondary legislation may specify that an authority must explain to a carer what support will be provided before they commit to an order, and for how long. As the intention of the kinship care order is to promote strong families, the assumption would be that support would last no longer than three years in most circumstances.”

That does not sound like an automatic cut-off. Would you agree?

Anne Swartz: The fact that it "would last no longer than three years in most circumstances" would say to me that at the end of three years, in the majority of circumstances, it would cease to function.

The Convener: Yes, but it says “most circumstances” so it is not automatic.

Anne Swartz: No, it is not automatic.

The Convener: That is the question that I asked you. Secondly, the sentence before that says that the local authority “must explain ... what support will be provided before they commit to an order, and for how long.”

Clearly, the information must be available before the process is agreed upon.

Anne Swartz: Yes, but in the majority of kinship circumstances, you get the knock at the door at 2 or 3 o’clock in the morning, with someone saying, “If you don’t take these children they’ll go to foster care.”

The Convener: Sorry, Anne—we are talking about transitional arrangements, not the 2 or 3 o’clock in the morning stuff.

Anne Swartz: Right—okay.

The Convener: Do you agree that the cut-off is not the cliff face that you seemed to be describing earlier?

Anne Swartz: How much of a duty to explain the support will be placed on local authorities?

11:00

The Convener: The policy memorandum’s wording seems to be different from what you were saying. I just wanted to clarify—because it is an important point—whether the three-year cut-off is absolute or not. Those are two different circumstances, and we have to be clear about that. The issue is complicated and important, and we all need clarity—as Liz Smith said earlier—on exactly what is happening.

I am keen for us to move on. Colin Beattie will go next.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): The panel members have highlighted the fact that there is a considerable discrepancy between different local authorities in the type of support that kinship carers are given.

Will the bill do anything to improve that consistency? [Interuption.]

The Convener: Hold on for a second, Colin—whoever has their phone on should switch it off, please.

Colin Beattie: Do the panel members think that the bill will do anything to improve consistency between the 32 local councils?
Alison Gillies: Not as it stands. I may be wrong about this, but at present the bill implies that the subsequent secondary legislation will give local authorities an obligation without specifying levels of support. My understanding, from the information that is currently available, is that, in all likelihood, there will be a great deal of discretion at local authority level.

Under the system to date, local authorities have committed to assisting approved kinship carers, but there is huge discretion at a local level in how that assistance is delivered. Given what we know about how that has panned out in the past five years, my fear is that a similar pattern of differences between local authorities might develop.

My next comment might not relate precisely to your question, but I hope that it is useful information.

One area in which the bill might assist, if we are comparing the current situation with the proposed kinship care order, is in the interaction with the benefits system.

At present, the heart of the issue is a child’s looked-after status, which, in conjunction with the payments from the local authority for accommodation and/or maintenance, is problematic in relation to benefits and tax credits. That leads a number of kinship carers of looked-after children into a situation in which they are not able to claim all—or some—of the family-related benefits. The system therefore creates a great deal of complication and confusion at the moment.

If the new kinship care order comes into being, and those children no longer have looked-after status, a lot of the complexity of the interaction with the benefits system will disappear. That is a positive, but the question remains as to what local authorities will do with that new power. There might still be huge variation between local authorities, but there is unlikely to be the same complexity in that regard.

That said, my final point on the issue is that for kinship carers of looked-after children, which will obviously be quite a large group of people, all of that complexity will still exist and, in fact, is likely to become even more problematic with the advent of universal benefits. However, that is probably enough about that for the moment.

Colin Beattie: The Government's review of kinship care allowances is expected to finish towards the end of the year. What are the panel’s expectations in that respect?

Kate Higgins: I would just repeat what I said earlier about kinship carers’ aspirations. They want every kinship care family, no matter their status, to get a national allowance paid at the same amount and equity and parity across all families. That would not stop local authorities looking at particular needs and—going back to your previous question and picking up on Clare Adamson’s point—I think that we would have more consistency if there were greater alignment with GIRFEC and if we had a more child-centred approach based on individual children’s needs. Although everything would be an individualised package from the menu of options, that would mean that how things are assessed and applied would be more consistent.

There is something else that we would like and which could be done in this bill. As we uncovered from our engagement with kinship carers, some local authorities that pay a kinship care allowance deduct the value of child benefit from it, which means that families do not receive the full value of their allowance and are actually being means-tested on what until very recent times was one of the few remaining universal benefits. We would like legislation to prevent such behaviour, because it is simply not fair. We do not do that to families who, for example, qualify for free school meals or clothing grant vouchers, so why do we do it to kinship care families? Removing such options and anomalies would help the situation.

Colin Beattie: Given the bill’s provisions and hopefully the progress that is being made, is Clacks kinship carers reconsidering the need for its petition?

May Barker: We cannot reconsider that until the bill has come to fruition. We will have to discuss the matter. Given that the legislation is still going through the Parliament, we cannot take such a decision at the moment.

Colin Beattie: If the bill went through, would that influence your decision about pressing on with the petition? I am just curious to know.

May Barker: I can speak only for me, because I am the only one you can ask. Until I go back and put the question to the committee, I cannot give you an honest answer. All I can say is that we would consider the matter.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): My questions are about the benefits system, which I know has already been raised this morning. In fact, Alison Gillies almost answered all my questions in the first five minutes of the session.

Alison Gillies: Oh, good.

George Adam: I am going to ask my questions anyway.

Alison Gillies: That is fine. There is a lot more I can say about the subject, unfortunately.

George Adam: I agree with not only Alison Gillies but Anne Swartz and May Barker that this is not just about money but about other kinds of support. As a constituency MSP, I constantly get families like Anne’s and May’s coming to me, and I know that for kinship carers the benefits system is a financial minefield. Obviously, the system itself is Westminster-based but, if we were starting from day 1, with a clean sheet of paper and any other cliché I might fling in, what would be the best way forward for kinship carers in Scotland?

Alison Gillies: Are you talking about kinship carers of looked-after children?

George Adam: I am talking about kinship carers in general. How would you make things easier for them?

Alison Gillies: I will need to separate the two kinds of carers. Are we assuming that the current UK benefits system is still in place in your day 1 scenario?

George Adam: For the time being.

Alison Gillies: If we still have that and if—there are a lot of ifs and buts—we all accept for the moment anyway that kinship carers of looked-after children need and ought to get some additional financial support from the local authority, a way of working would be for the local authority to make the additional payment in a way that means the payment is not for accommodation or maintenance. That would circumvent some of the existing difficulties.

By way of a very brief explanation, my opinion is that the rules in the benefits system that are problematic to kinship carers are ones that are intended primarily to prevent, for example, anybody getting benefits for a child in foster care or in a residential unit—a child who is in the ordinary sense looked after and accommodated by the local authority. The rules are all about double funding.

Unfortunately, in certain circumstances kinship carers are caught by those rules. A way for kinship carers not to be caught by those rules is therefore for additional financial support from the local authority to be for needs that are additional to accommodation and maintenance. That is a way round the problem, but it is not a fundamental solution to the problem—a solution would lie elsewhere in the benefits system.

There are not such huge difficulties in the benefits system for kinship carers of non-looked-after children. My understanding from anecdotal evidence is that the complexities for those kinship carers mainly relate to issues such as delays in getting benefits sorted out. Problems might arise when there are competing claims for benefits—if, for example, the child’s parent still receives child benefit and child tax credit—but those are administrative difficulties rather than a fundamental issue of not being entitled. For kinship carers of non-looked-after children—even those who receive some kind of allowance from the local authority, as some do—the difficulties in relation to the benefits system are therefore not so great and are more easily overcome.

The remaining issue, which a lot of people—including me—focused on at the outset of the concordat when we were thinking about the whole issue, is whether a payment from a local authority counts as income in respect of means-tested benefits. However, that is not an issue any more. All the payments that are available to local authorities to make to kinship carers, under either section 50 of the 1975 act, section 22 of the 1995 act or regulation 33 of the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009, are disregarded as income in relation to means-tested benefits and tax credits. That is therefore not really an issue.

The issue is that, for some kinship carers of looked-after children, the very fact of looked-after status combined with a payment that relates to accommodation or maintenance come together to disentitle entirely the kinship carer from, in particular, child tax credit, which is a significant source of income if they are on a low income.

Do my comments help at all?

George Adam: Yes. Would anyone else like to comment?

Kate Higgins: Sorry, what was your question?

Alison Gillies: It was just asking us to rethink the whole benefits system.

George Adam: Yes, if it was day 1 and you had the opportunity to reshape the benefits system, how would you make it work for kinship carers?

The Convener: In 140 characters or less. [Laughter.]

Alison Gillies: Currently, the answer is that the payment should not be for accommodation or maintenance. However, I would just add that there is a problem under universal credit.

Universal credit is slightly receding into the distance at the moment, but, as things stand, the universal credit regulations will be very problematic because they say that someone will not receive universal credit for a child if the child is looked after by the local authority. There are some exceptions to that: for example, if a child is looked after but living with their parents or someone who has parental responsibility for them. As I understand it from my reading of the universal credit regulations, a kinship carer of a looked-after child would not be able to get the child element of universal credit, regardless of any payment from the local authority. It does not matter if the local authority is paying nothing; that rule will have an impact. We hope that that approach might shift before universal credit comes into being for most people.

George Adam: The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill comes from the Scottish Government, and there has been a change in the definition in Scotland since 2007 such that kinship carers are accepted. Could it therefore be argued that, if we had more powers over welfare in the Parliament, we would have the opportunity to make the difference for the individuals here, too?

Anne Swartz: The proposed kinship care order directs that the majority of kinship carers will end up receiving support from the Department for Work and Pensions for the children. I reiterate the point about the comparable needs of these children and those of foster children. Foster carers are not directed towards the DWP to provide support for these children, so why should kinship care families be sent in that direction?

The new kinship order directs them there and the majority will receive benefits from the DWP. I do not want to be too political but, if Scotland does become independent, would it then expect the UK Government to support Scottish children financially and otherwise? I do not think that that is the right approach.

George Adam: I do not think that would be the case.

The Convener: We know that that would not be the case. They would be two separate countries, so I do not quite see how that fits. To be frank, we have gone off on a tangent.

Anne Swartz: Yes, I know I was being a bit political.

The Convener: It was not all your fault, Anne.

Anne Swartz: I could not resist it. I am sorry.

The Convener: Let us stick to the bill in question. Kate, you may speak very briefly. Other people want to come in.

Kate Higgins: I want to make three quick points that focus on the here and now.

First, as part of our financial review engagement with kinship carers, we were surprised to find out how few of them receive the benefits to which they are entitled. There is a point about income maximisation when people become kinship carers and making sure that they can access everything to which they are entitled. We tried to do some work on that before the bedroom tax came in, to promote income maximisation to members and local authorities, particularly around council tax benefit and housing benefit.

The second point is that we have wrongly assumed, like everybody else, that because an awful lot of the kinship carers are grandparents they are therefore pensioners. Our engagement underscored the fact that they are not all pensioners and that many are of working age. As is evidenced by May and Anne, the carers are youthful and not necessarily of pensionable age. We need to be alert to the impact of welfare reform. We were successful when we worked together to get some degree of exemption for kinship carers from the bedroom tax.

Finally, we have raised the point at the Welfare Reform Committee that, because some of the powers have been passed on to Scotland, there is an opportunity to examine whether passported benefits, such as free school meals, clothing grants and access to leisure, work for all of the groups for which they should work. These are all things that kinship carers have told us would be of benefit to them: they would help them out and give additional support and income. We would encourage the Welfare Reform Committee—and the Government, when it makes new rules for these benefits—to consider whether kinship carers can benefit from them.

The Convener: Clare Adamson may ask a very brief question and get a very brief response.

Clare Adamson: Let us have complete clarity. From what has been said, I understand that for non-looked-after children there is no problem with the DWP and that—universal credit aside—for looked-after children it is the working practice of the local authority that can solve the problem.

Anne Swartz: It is a bit more complex than that.

The Convener: I do not want to open the whole debate up again but, frankly, it seems that reclassifying the way in which support is paid will not solve the problem entirely. We found exactly the same problem in discussing the bedroom tax.

Alison Gillies: You are right about the situation of kinship carers of non-looked-after children. There are no difficult or complex rules within the benefits system that impact on those people; the issues are more administrative.

The other issue is much trickier. All that I would say—finally and, I hope, briefly—is that the rules that exist within the benefits system currently say that, if there is a combination of a looked-after child and a payment from the local authority in respect of accommodation and/or maintenance, that is a problem. What local authorities might or might not do is beyond what I want to comment on, but that is the situation with the benefits system.

Clare Adamson: Do all local authorities pay in that way? Have some changed their practice?
Alison Gillies: Probably the majority pay under a power in section 50 of the Children Act 1975, which relates specifically to maintenance. By definition, the payment is for maintenance because that is what section 50 of that act says that it is for. I understand that only two or three local authorities use the power under regulation 33 of the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009, which causes particular problems in relation to the benefits system. A group of about six or seven local authorities, I think, use the power in section 22 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. However, as you will be aware, that is a very broad power, and payment under that power can be for a number of different things. That is the current situation as I understand it.

The Convener: I will bring in Neil Bibby, but I must clarify something first. Following what you have just said, if all local authorities that are paying under the difficult areas—under section 50 of the 1975 act and section 22 of the 1995 act—

Alison Gillies: It is under regulation 33 of the 2009 regulations. Those are the difficult payments.

The Convener: Sorry, I meant under regulation 33. If they suddenly shifted to paying in a way that is less difficult, would the DWP not spot that and deal with it, as it does?

Alison Gillies: If a local authority pays under section 50 of the 1975 act, the payment is, by definition, for maintenance—that is what it says it is for. However, I understand your point. If the local authority paid under section 22 of the 1995 act and said that the payment was for something else, would it be accepted that it was for something else? You would probably have to ask somebody else that question. At the moment, some local authorities are making payments under section 22 of the 1995 act and are specifically categorising those payments as not for accommodation or maintenance but for additional needs that are separate from those things.

The Convener: Okay. Thank you for that.

Neil Bibby: In terms of transitional support, what benefits would those who have achieved the kinship care order, which has been modelled at £70 a week, be automatically entitled to? The financial memorandum to the bill states:

“Support will only be provided if it is not automatically provided elsewhere through universal services in Scotland or across the UK (including through the UK benefits system).”

Is it conceivable that the whole £70 would be paid by the UK benefits system?

Alison Gillies: I can answer in terms of the amount of money, but I do not know what the intention is regarding payment by local authorities for anything in addition.

If someone had little or no income and they were dependent on state benefits, they would ordinarily get around £83 per week for one child. That is a combination of child benefit, which is £20.30 for the oldest child, and child tax credit. That amount could rise by up to another approximately £80 if, for example, the child has a severe disability.

Ordinarily, therefore, the money that is specifically related to the child via child benefit and child tax credit amounts to around £83 per week. Under the proposed new system, if the local authority made a payment in addition to that and it was using a current power such as that under section 50 or section 22, the additional payment would be disregarded as income for the purposes of claiming child tax credit; child benefit is not means tested.

Your other question is really about whether the local authority would therefore not make the payment, and I cannot answer that. I do not think that any of us can.

The Convener: Liam McArthur is next.

Liam McArthur: I think this question is for Kate Higgins specifically.

Kate, you were talking earlier about the appearance of a potential threat that the counselling aspects of the bill might be lost. We have heard no evidence to that effect, but clearly there are inconsistencies in the framing of the bill, which mentions counselling, while the policy memorandum extends to family group counselling and family mediation, which is a broader definition of counselling. The bill also leaves eligibility to future regulation, but the policy and financial memoranda link it to kinship carers. The policy memorandum says that counselling “can be used to promote the role of a kinship carer.”

How can the bill’s wording be improved to get better consistency of language and to help understanding of what is meant by the provisions?

Kate Higgins: The concern is centred on the word “counselling” because our understanding is that it has quite a specific definition and connotations for practice. The aspirations of the provisions are absolutely legitimate.

Counselling has been identified as desirable in relation to kinship care because, as Anne Swartz said, placements can be very last minute when it is simply no longer safe for a child to stay in their family. People are regularly phoned up out of the blue and asked to take a child that night. Our experience, as standard-bearers for activities such as the family group conference, is that when we bring families together to plan for when a child is at risk of going into care the families tend to reach family-based settlements that are also sustainable. We are doing some research in that area to look at the longer term outcomes of such settlements.

Some of our concern is motivated by that experience, but it is also a matter of early intervention and the kind of support that either enables a child to go into a sustainable, non-formal care setting or prevents them from moving into a care setting. We are therefore looking for wording around early intervention or family support services.

What comes through in the secondary legislation will be key. My understanding is that the Scottish Government has highlighted family group conferencing and family mediation in the policy memorandum, but it would not prevent parent programmes or anything that would help kinship carers and others who are providing informal care, such as foster carers or others, or helping children to stay with their parents from moving that step forward.

Liam McArthur: Given what you say about the precise definition of counselling and what you say about the understanding of what might come through in secondary legislation, are you comfortable with the way in which the bill is phrased, sitting alongside the policy memorandum, or are there things that we should be looking to firm up that might help with the secondary legislation process?

Kate Higgins: There are two things that we would like. First, we would like “counselling services” to be changed to another name. Everybody has a different view on what it should be, but we all talk to each other in the voluntary sector and there have been discussions on the matter. We would be happy to go away and produce some options that we think better describe the intention. Apart from the reference to “counselling services”, the sections that we are discussing are okay because they legitimately give effect to the intention.

The other thing that would be helpful is to move the provisions from where they sit in the bill and make them part of the GIRFEC parts because they should be seen as relating to that. In effect, they are about early intervention: they almost enshrine in the law a duty to act early rather than wait until a child is moving into care, and they absolutely fit with the GIRFEC intentions. It would give greater clarity as to why the provisions have been included in the bill if they were moved into the GIRFEC parts rather than left sitting where they are at the moment.

Liam McArthur: The financial memorandum mentions costs of between £2 million and £6 million. That money could be spread quite thinly. Should we pursue the intentions with the Scottish Government, whether or not counselling is broadened out beyond kinship care? Are there specific priorities as far as you are concerned, given where conferencing or mediation can deliver the most effective results?

Kate Higgins: The most obvious starting point would be when kinship care is being considered. We should encourage local authorities to plan more effectively for those arrangements. That would support kinship carers because, rather than their being landed with something that they were not expecting, everybody would have time to become involved. Crucial to that is the child-centred approach whereby the child or young person, if they are able to express a view, can give their views on what should happen.

We would argue that the starting point should be kinship care, but the provisions should be worded in such a way that they do not prevent the approach from being used in other circumstances. For example, family group conferences have been used successfully in arranging safe contact, and also where there has been a breakdown in contact and residence between parents. Family mediation works similarly—where there has been a breakdown in contact with grandparents, for example. It can be used in a variety of ways to get families round the table and encourage them to take responsibility for decisions about what is in the best interests of children.

We will go back and have a look at the wording, and we will perhaps make a recommendation to the Government. We have provided some costings given our knowledge of the costs of family group conferences and how to do them, and we think that the estimate is fairly accurate in so far as it applies to kinship care.

The Convener: I thank the panel of witnesses for their evidence. We spent a lot more time than we originally scheduled, but kinship care is an important and complicated issue and area of the bill, so I hope that you do not mind that we took some extra time this morning to discuss it.

I say to members that, given the difficulty that we had in getting clarity on some of the questions, it might be worth our while—I throw out this suggestion—to write to the Scottish Government and ask it a number of the questions now. In that way, we will have clarity on them before we get the minister in for questioning, rather than go through the whole scenario again. Do members agree to that approach?

Members indicated agreement.

The Convener: We will do that. Thank you.
I suspend the meeting briefly while we change panels.

11:34

Meeting suspended.

11:39

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome to the committee Bill Alexander, director of health and social care with Highland Council, which was of course the national pathfinder for the implementation of getting it right for every child. The council’s experience of that is obviously relevant to our scrutiny of the bill. We will go straight to questions, and will start with Liam McArthur.

Liam McArthur: Good morning, Mr Alexander. Highland Council’s experience will obviously be helpful for our understanding of the bill’s implications and any refinements that it needs.

The decrease in the number of referrals in Highland to the children’s reporter seems a positive indicator, but I understand that the number of hearings, proofs, child protection orders and so on has not decreased. That suggests that the financial savings realised through your application of GIRFEC have perhaps not been particularly significant. Is that a fair reflection of your experience?

Bill Alexander (Highland Council): Good morning to you, Mr McArthur, and to everyone. I am very pleased to be here.

Financial savings are a complex issue. The bottom line is that our policy has been not to take financial savings out of children’s services because of the implementation of getting it right for every child, but that does not mean that we could not have done so. We reinvested the money in early intervention and preventative services. For example, the case loads of social workers have been significantly reduced. We could have reduced the number of social workers, but we did not. We invested in front-line workers who can undertake preventative work. We are about to invest in additional health visitors.

We believe that such investment not only makes good professional sense because it means better outcomes for children and families, but is the long game in terms of financial savings. The number of child protection registrations and looked-after children is already going down, so there will be savings from there being fewer children with higher-level needs.

Liam McArthur: The figures that I have in front of me indicate that the number of child protection registrations in Highland was 125 in 2007 and 111 in 2012, which is a small reduction. In 2008, the number of registrations was down to 60, and in 2009 the number was 69, but it nudged back up towards three figures in subsequent years. Is there any detail around why that pattern occurred?

Bill Alexander: Our numbers were generally 100 to 150 over the years preceding GIRFEC, but post-GIRFEC implementation they have been between 75 or 80 and 100. They have dropped to quite a low number. There is nothing precise about how many children we have on the register, because a lot of children might be a good thing and a few children might be a good thing. When the figure bounces around, that poses questions about services. The figure sometimes bounces around in Highland because of inward migration, large families or other particular issues that are relevant to Highland.

The drop in numbers around the time of GIRFEC implementation was about confidence in the system. The key issue is not the number of children on the register, but confidence in the system. Hundreds and thousands of people work around children’s services and hundreds and thousands of people can press a red button for child protection services. We would be pretty foolish to ignore someone pressing that red button; we take that seriously and err on the side of caution. If that means that we apply a child protection registration label, we do that. Clearly, though, that is not sensible in the long run, because we could not have every child in an authority on the child protection register—that would be nonsense. We must focus on the children who we believe are at greatest risk of significant harm. If the numbers come down, that suggests that there is more confidence in the system and that we are getting things right. I think that is what we have achieved.

Liam McArthur: You said that there was a move towards having additional health visitors in due course. One of the questions around a pilot area is whether additional resources have been put in to trial particular approaches. Did you have to put in additional resources in Highland because of what you were planning to do? If so, does that teach us anything that could apply to the Scotland-wide roll-out of GIRFEC? The issue of resources has come up in relation to specific aspects, so the experience of Highland is crucial for understanding how that might play out.

Bill Alexander: It is a critical issue. There are two sets of issues around resources: the resources in the system that we need to sustain the model and the resources that we need to support a complex process of change. Are you asking about both of those?

Liam McArthur: Yes.
Bill Alexander: As Stewart Maxwell said, Highland Council was the Scottish pathfinder in the process of change. There was some other pathfinder activity, such as the domestic abuse pilots that were associated with the introduction of multi-agency risk assessment conferences, but Highland Council took a whole-system approach that included police, social care, education, health, the third sector and families. The Scottish Government funded professionals in all those areas, so we had a teacher, a social worker, a health visitor and a representative from the third sector, and they considered what the implementation of GIRFEC meant for all those professions.

Integrated working is not about some big homogenous blob, but about the joins between the different professional groups, and we had to get it right for each of those groups. Each of the professionals, apart from some people who were seconded to the Scottish Government during that period, was located within the Highland area.

That activity enabled the development of the GIRFEC components, as well as national guidance and training materials that other authorities could use. It allowed us to network with a range of authorities up and down the country, and we held road shows and all sorts of events.

In the period from 2006-07, the Scottish Government invested between £150,000 and £250,000 a year in those posts. Over the programme’s entire duration, up to 2010, approximately £640,000 was invested. That was the cost for the national pathfinder, and I am often asked how much of that each new authority would need to replicate. A lot of it would not need to be replicated, because much of the basic work has been done. However, authorities would have to go through some of the processes, because Inverness is not Glasgow, Dundee or Angus, and authorities must consider their own circumstances and context.

When GIRFEC began and we got the list of components from the Scottish Government, the named person requirement did not feature. It was developed through practice and experience, and discussions with families and professionals.

Other people do not need to do that work, because we have done it, but they still need to do some work. Critically, an authority would need an implementation plan and a training model, and would need to develop new guidance that reflects its own practice. That said, authorities already have a training programme and have to produce guidance for whatever practice model they have, so some of those costs already exist. However, there would be some additional funding to support that change, and my understanding is that it is being made available for that purpose.

Liam McArthur: The implementation of GIRFEC was, as I understand it, not finalised through the pathfinder process until around 2010, but some of the earlier improvements—in child protection registrations, for example—were being ascribed to that process prior to it being fully bedded in. What level of confidence do you have in making the link between the embedding of GIRFEC and the delivery of some of those outcomes?

Bill Alexander: Improvements in outcomes take time. Even now, it is fairly premature to look at the outcomes, but we are starting to see green shoots and various process changes. We are also seeing some changes in the number of children who use alcohol and who self-report as using drugs or smoking, and in the number of exclusions from school and so on, but some of the outcomes will take time.

The University of Edinburgh undertook a helpful evaluation that saw us through the implementation process. We had three different implementation plans, and I am happy to talk about that. The first two were not effective, but the third one was. It started in the city of Inverness, which is a contained area, and involved newborns. We started assessing newborns using the assessment framework that contained the named person and child’s plan requirements. We extended that assessment to the early years and then to school-age children, and subsequently to children with high-level needs who were already in the system.

We had a manageable group that we could look at and which was different from other areas in the Highlands. The University of Edinburgh evaluation focused on children in Inverness, and the researchers could look at the data because we had begun to implement that assessment in 2008.

Liam McArthur: Some of the outcomes for care leavers look much the same as they did in 2008. Presumably you would argue that those who fall into the final group that you mentioned are part of a strategy to deliver longer-term objectives.

Bill Alexander: I think so. Our looked-after children numbers went up at the same rate as those in most of the rest of the country until around 18 to 20 months ago. The first group whose numbers started to come down significantly were children who were looked after at home. Initially, that worried me because I thought, “No, that’s early intervention. Those numbers shouldn’t be going down.” I had many arguments with colleagues and practitioners in the children’s hearings system about why that was happening, and they convinced me that it was because the children’s hearings system was confident that a plan was in place, there were partnerships with families, and we did not require compulsory measures. It was therefore sensible that that was where the first impact was.

The next impact was on accommodated children, because they are already at the top of the system. They already have high-level needs, and things cannot be turned around overnight. Those numbers are now starting to drop significantly, and that is different from the situation in much of the rest of Scotland.

The approach has still not impacted on the number of children in specialist placements outwith the authority. I think that that will take longer.

Those are all early signs of the approach working. We continue to see the numbers coming down. I think that the number of children who are on supervision at home will shortly be under 100. That is astonishing for an authority the size of Highland Council, which used to have 600 looked-after children. The number of persistent young offenders and the number of offence referrals are dropping dramatically. We have around a third fewer offence referrals every year. The numbers continue to drop at that rate. I do not know for how long they will drop—I believe that they will plateau at some point—but that is the rate at which they are dropping now.

The Convener: The number of children who are accommodated is dropping. Where do they go? How are they classified now?

Bill Alexander: Three things are happening. First, some children are moving into permanence more quickly. That might be through kinship care arrangements, which the committee has just discussed.

Secondly, some children are returning home more successfully. My colleagues tell me—this is relevant to the report that the committee published this week—that when children become accommodated in Highland, that is because they need to be accommodated and they do not bounce back and forth, so we do not have the effect that you identified in your report. It is appalling that children bounce back and forth and it has happened in Scotland for many years.

Thirdly, fewer children need to become accommodated for the first time.

All three streams cannot be turned around overnight, but they are now being turned around. Fewer children are being accommodated, more children are moving into permanence, and more children are returning home successfully.

The Convener: That sounds pretty good, given the report that the committee published yesterday.

Bill Alexander: I did not come here to tell the committee about an untested product; I am here to tell you about our practice model. We are not perfect, we do not get everything right, and we still make mistakes. We are not complacent, and we are working to try to make sense of what is happening while we do the day job. This might sound a bit selfish, but, frankly, we are more interested in doing the day job than in explaining, evaluating and making sense of what is happening for everyone else. However, everyone in Highland passionately believes that the approach works and that it makes more sense.

As I said in my submission, I do not get complaints from people about the approach working; I get complaints only about its not working. We are not complacent.

The Convener: I am sure that you are not. Obviously, we are keen to understand whether the approach works and why it works. You said that children are returning home successfully. Where is the evidence for that? Where is the evidence that children are not simply going back to circumstances that are the same or similar to those that they were in before? The evidence from other parts of the country that we have received during our inquiry is that they are doing that.

Bill Alexander: We do not have children yo-yo-ing in and out of care, as you identified in your report. We are much clearer that, when children become accommodated, that is because it is the appropriate step to take and other options are either not available or there is a good reason why we should not do those things. It might be that we have attempted certain interventions that have not been successful, so the person becomes accommodated, but things are much clearer and people are much firmer. Our social work case loads now are much firmer and social workers are not wrestling with a whole range of cases, some of which, frankly, used to be inappropriate. They are able to concentrate on critical work with the most vulnerable.

Clare Adamson: Mr Alexander, GIRFEC will not be in the statute book until the bill goes through, so the situation in which you have been piloting it is anomalous. I would like to ask specifically about information sharing and whether Highland experienced any difficulties using the current legislation to share information and whether, given your experience, you feel that sections 26 and 27 in the bill on information sharing are required.

Bill Alexander: I have watched the webcasts and seen some of the detailed discussion of particular terminology. I will perhaps not get into that, but will try to answer your question from the point of view of a practitioner. As I understand it, what is proposed in the bill is what the Information
Commissioner’s Office regards as best practice and I suggest that that is what we do.

As a practitioner, I will emphasise two points. First, people have always both shared information and had concerns about sharing information. In the old days, that led to information not being shared when it should have been. It also led to a scatter-gun approach, because when people thought that they should pass something on they were totally unclear about who they should pass it to, so it was often passed on, not only to every agency but also within each agency to a range of different people. When I started in my post as a head of children’s services, 12 years ago, I would get an email every day about someone who had a concern about a child. That is totally inappropriate. It reflects a blockage in the system. Someone does not know where to go and therefore sprays the gun so wide that the message even goes to senior managers who do not know the first thing about that particular situation. That is entirely inappropriate.

The other thing that would happen was a referral to the children’s hearings system. Someone had a concern and thought that was how to proceed—that if you had a concern you made a referral to the children’s hearings system. That would be posted and, with due respect to the children’s reporter, it would sit in the children’s reporter’s inbox for a few days, perhaps even a couple of weeks. The children’s reporter would get around to looking at it and if there was some merit in it, would probably consider that they should ask for reports. They would write a letter to a range of different agencies, appropriate or not, and in the process of asking for the report, someone who should have that information might work out that there was a concern there and take it a bit further. That is how we used to share information. We now do it directly through named persons and lead professionals.

The lead professional issue is very relevant and if there is an opportunity to talk about it I would like to do so.

I suggest that we have actually done what the bill proposes. Why then does it need to be in legislation? Well, it is not happening elsewhere, is it? GIRFEC was published in 2006. It works. It is evaluated. Yet here we are in 2013 and children in Scotland are still not safe and their wellbeing is not being protected because it is not a fundamental entitlement that children and families can expect in Scotland. If the only way to get it done so that all children get that entitlement is to put it into legislation—even though we have done it without legislation—I accept that we need the legislation.

Clare Adamson: Was the pilot able to look at the wellbeing concern as well as child protection in terms of implementation at this stage? Have you any insight to give us on that question?

Bill Alexander: We do not use the word threshold in Highland but I guess that you mean the word threshold.

Clare Adamson: It is obvious that the bill brings in that idea of wellbeing as well as child protection. Was wellbeing included in your training for the information hearings?

Bill Alexander: We have great respect for the phrase child protection, but it suggests an awful black line—either you are on this side or that side. That is not the real world. A child is not on one or the other side of that black line. Children live in families and communities, they have a range of circumstances, a range of protective factors and a range of risk factors, and you have to look at the whole picture. If you wait until you believe that someone is on the cusp of crossing that black line it will be very difficult to address some of the risk factors in the child’s life.

That said, you do not share information unless you need to and, unless that information is about significant harm, you should never share it without the consent of the family and, depending on the age, the child or young person. There has to be a point to it; you do not rush around sharing information just for the sake of it. Mostly, you will share it because, with the family’s agreement—and indeed often at their request—you are seeking support, help or advice from another agency. Occasionally, you will need to share it because you need to take radical measures to protect a child and, in such circumstances, you do not stop to ask for consent. You simply have to take that serious action.

The whole information-sharing process has to be built on, first, the reasons for sharing that information and, secondly, the consent model, to ensure that you are doing all this in partnership with the family, except where there is risk of significant harm.

Liz Smith: Many people think that Highland’s success is down not only to ensuring that the local authority’s different departments work pretty seamlessly, but to the very good culture in the local authority. Indeed, that is perhaps one of the reasons why you have not required legislation in this area. Do you think that other local authorities have not performed so well because they have not had the same culture?

Bill Alexander: I take it that you want me to stay friends with my colleagues up and down the country.
It is a very good question. You are absolutely right to suggest that the implementation of a practice model cannot be untangled from the relationships between services, leadership in different services and how front-line practitioners already get on and collaborate. Coming back to an earlier question on outcomes, I think that a number of factors, not just the practice model, should be taken into account but the model itself is about the front-line delivery of a joined-up service. This is not just about the culture in the leadership of agencies but about people getting together on the front line, and the fact is that people in deprived communities or on remote islands in Highland are used to getting together, collaborating and getting on with things.

As for the question why this has not happened elsewhere in Scotland, the answer is that such an approach is difficult and requires a certain amount of political bottle. Indeed, the committee has called—in the report that it published this week— for leadership from Government. What we did in Highland required political bottle by NHS Highland and Highland Council, in particular, to decide to go down this road. It is easy just to go in every day, do things as they have always been done, cross your fingers and hope that it will all be all right; it is very difficult to develop a new practice model, and we had political support in doing that.

Northern Constabulary was a major player, too. We had a very effective relationship with the constabulary’s chief constables, who also had the bottle and passionately believed in improving outcomes for children and families. In addition, we have a very active third sector and good engagement with children and families. We had a number of things in our favour, but those things might not exist everywhere else. In any case, it is not for me to sit and analyse the situation in other parts of Scotland.

Colin Beattie: The committee has previously taken evidence on the single child’s plan and, indeed, concerns about the sheer volume of assessments, plans and so on that are already in place and how the plan will bring all those together. I am greatly interested in hearing about your success in bringing together those things in the Highlands. Have you encountered any difficulties in achieving that or has the process been relatively easy? Where do the other plans sit in relation to that central plan?

Bill Alexander: There are no other plans—there is only one. However, it is a really great question.

When in 1980 I started work in a busy children’s unit in Glasgow, I did not understand why the more complex a child’s life was the more plans they had. The child could have a looked-after plan; if they were on the child protection register, they could have a child protection plan; if they had a disability, they often had a respite plan; and they also had an education plan and a health plan. That was at the very least; the more complicated their life was, the more different plans they had.

Moreover, there were different processes around those plans. We would meet to look at a looked-after child plan one week, and the next week, we might meet to look at the child protection plan, potentially with a different group of people, some of whom would not know what had been decided at the previous week’s meeting. The process was complicated, and was very difficult to manage.

We had to change all that and move away from it. We talk about the single plan, but the single process is critical. There were half a dozen different processes to go through, including the education review, the health review, the learning disability review, the looked-after review, and the child protection review. We had to consolidate all those processes into a single process.

We have a plan, and I have the format for it in front of me. We spent a lot of time getting to version 1 of the plan, although it was not easy. We ran it for a year, after which we decided that we wanted to modify the plan and reduce its size. Version 2 went live about six months ago.

Stopping the processes was much more difficult. I remember going to a meeting with teachers in Wick and saying, “Single plan, single process”; they said, “That’s fine, but why have I got all these other meetings in my diary?” I told them that it was because they put them there and they should take them out. They should not have them. As well as introducing the new, we have to get rid of the old. I could not take those meetings out of those teachers’ diaries, but they had permission to stop it. That was very difficult.

The committee will probably come on to the co-ordinated support plan, so I will talk about that now. The advice that we got at the start was that we could include the co-ordinated support plan in the single plan. There are only some elements in the statutory guidance that are absolutely critical to the plan. Version 1 of the plan had that and a co-ordinated support plan was embedded in the plan. The plan is now modular and there is a page for the individualised education plan. If children also need the co-ordinated support plan, the additional demographic detail is in there. It works; it is fine.

I have talked to families and colleagues up and down Scotland, so I know that people still struggle with the requirements of the legislation on additional support for learning. There are worries that when it comes to tribunals, there will be difficulties and conflict. That might be right, because it looks as though we currently have two sets of legislation.

I also know that parents want to be reassured. Before we rolled out getting it right for every child, there were 250 children in Highland with education plans. There are now 1,200, so there are 1,200 plans whereas there were 250 of the old model, including the CSPs. We now have 1,200, although we believe that we should have 1,500. Some children in Highland schools are still getting additional support for their learning without having a plan. That should not be happening, but we are up to about 70 per cent and we want to get to 100 per cent. That is 1,200 plans in the new version as opposed to 250 old-world education plans.

Colin Beattie: You have certainly picked up on my next question. What about the looked-after child plan?

Bill Alexander: That is in the plan. The plan for a looked-after child will be a complex document that is prepared by a lead professional, who will be a social worker. If a child needs a little bit of additional support in school, the plan will be thin, proportionate, and prepared by the named person in the school. The format will be the same.

When a child is assessed for the first time by a health visitor, they get a single assessment, which goes with them and is built up throughout their life. We never move away from the three sides of the my world triangle. Every practitioner uses the same assessment framework. Some practitioners are specialists. A psychologist or psychiatrist will do additional specialist assessment, but every child has a core assessment.

Colin Beattie: You have achieved all this without the need for legislation. Do you think that the bill would benefit from anything further to ensure or to encourage integration of the different plans, or is that covered already?

Bill Alexander: A couple of things that are in the bill around getting it right for every child are not entirely helpful. We have not managed to make assigning a named person after school-leaving age work, nor are we convinced that that is desirable.

We suggested a couple of elements that should be in the bill. One of those is the assessment framework, but I do not think that that needs to be statutory. The second element is the lead professional. The named person is absolutely critical, but the named person does not deal with the more complex and vulnerable children; that has to be a lead professional.

Under the GIRFEC guidance, the named person would support early interventions but as soon as more than one agency got involved the coordinating role would move to a lead professional. Moreover, with more complex needs such as those of children who are looked after, children with significant health needs or children on the child protection register, a lead professional would always be involved.

We contract with a number of third sector partners to deliver the lead professional role for us. Going back to an earlier point, I should say that we use Barnardo’s for our throughcare services because the approach just does not work with a social worker. After all, some social workers still wear suits and ties as lead professionals for a 17 or 18-year-old who has just left care. It is much better to leave such work to a third sector agency.

We have been told that it is more difficult to draft a lead professional provision because the role is multi-agency and more complex, and that the named person role is more important. I agree entirely, but if we are legislating for the child’s plan why can we not legislate for the lead professional who prepares the more complex child’s plans? As for any challenges that might emerge, one of our two or three particular challenges is the threshold at which the named person becomes a lead professional.

Let me talk you through this: a school headteacher who is also a named person can call on a social work resource and the social work manager cannot say no to that request. However, if, after that social work resource goes in, it turns out that the situation is more difficult, more complex or worse than had been thought and will take a bit more work, that responsibility might need to be passed to a social worker. We have various mechanisms in place to deal with that transfer point and to check, say, that the headteacher is not getting involved in stuff that is not really their business and which actually goes far beyond what you would expect that person to handle. If the lead professional is not legislated for, we will also need to ensure that the named person does not stay involved for too long.

Colin Beattie: I am interested in hearing more about what you said did not work with regard to the named person. I am trying to remember what you said, but I believe that it had to do with older children or older young people.

The Convener: I think that Mr Alexander mentioned young people post-school.

Bill Alexander: I do not understand how my daughter, who is 17 and doing performing arts in Manchester, could have a named person; she will not need or want one. There are young people who are in the system, and we have proportionate ways of managing them through it. For example, someone with an activity agreement has an activity co-ordinator and a looked-after child who has left care has a lead professional through Barnardo’s as well as a multi-agency plan. I do not know why a named person would be needed for most children who have left school and, as I have said, I do not think that they would want one. Indeed, I think that Ken Norrie made similar comments to the committee.

Colin Beattie: Would a certain proportion of young people benefit from having a named person for a longer period?

Bill Alexander: Yes.

Colin Beattie: Do you identify them?

Bill Alexander: We endeavour to. Some young people who leave school still need additional support. Many of them will continue to have social workers—they will pass from a children’s social worker to an adult social worker—while others might be supported in youth work, which is increasingly focusing on vulnerable groups as well as universal services. We have a process in which youth workers support certain groups of young people in certain communities. A range of young people should still need that kind of support post-school, but I am not sure whether it is a workable universal solution.

Jayne Baxter (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab): Thank you for your submission and, in particular, for the comments on the named person role. I found them very simply written and easy to understand, and they informed my understanding of the issue.

If the named person is, say, a health visitor with a heavy case load, the headteacher of a large school—or a council official during the school holidays—will they really be able to know the family in question well? Will those resource implications weaken the role?

Bill Alexander: This comes back to Mr McArthur’s second question, which was on the resource issue for sustaining the model and which I did not get round to answering.

There are perhaps two bits to this question. First of all, we would all like more resources and there are always people who will take any opportunity to say, “Let’s get more resources.” We all do that; indeed, I do it every opportunity I get. However, that should not stop us doing things that are right anyway. We do not ask for resources for GIRFEC—we just do it with the resources that we have. At the same time, we are also trying to recycle resources and turn them into preventative resources. We can invest all the money in the children with high-level needs—and we should—but investing in those children will not prevent more children from having those high-level needs. Therefore, we should always invest in more.

Being the named person is the day job. It is what the health visitor does when she carries out her assessments and it is what the school does when it undertakes its examinations, assessments and reports home—they are being the named person. That is the role. It is what the school does when a teacher picks up the phone to a social worker and says, “Can we talk this through?” That is being the named person—it is the day job. You would not say that schools should not do that. Highland schools and Scottish schools have always done that.

A second issue is whether we have enough health visitors and the right staff in our schools. Highland Council believes that we should have more health visitors. It has had responsibility for health visiting since April last year, and I was delighted when one of its early decisions, on the back of the earliest collaborative work, was to invest an additional £2 million in those services. That is important, as it will enhance what we can do in our services for children. It is not about the named person; it is just that we think that it is a valuable service that will make a significant difference.

I do not accept the argument that it is somehow possible to get by without a structured practice model, with lots of meetings, with half a dozen different plans and without knowing what the person in the next office, never mind the next service, is doing with the same child, and that that is somehow more resource effective than having a structured model in which there is clarity about who has responsibility and about where information goes, as well as a single plan, and in which, if a meeting is needed—frankly, we took half the meetings out of people’s diaries—it takes place once and is not repeated the next week with another bunch of people. How anyone can argue the advantages of the ad hoc and chaotic system over the structured and rational system, in terms of resource allocation, I do not know.

I will always argue for more resources. My job is to use the resources that I have as effectively and efficiently as I can, and that is what the practice model gives me. I heard one contributor say that in Highland we have reduced management times in schools. Yes, we have and that is regrettable, but we do GIRFEC. We do GIRFEC although we have less management time in schools, and thank God we do. If we were still doing things the way we used to, we might have gone under.

Jayne Baxter: There will be times when a named person picks up on concerns that are critical of parents. How have parents in Highland reacted when a named person has collated or passed on information that has questioned parents’ actions or capacities?
Bill Alexander: Some courageous conversations are now happening that probably did not use to happen, and that has been challenging for teachers. Unless that concern was about possible significant harm, teachers would always want to discuss that with the family. It is particularly difficult in smaller communities where people know each other, but teachers know that that is their job and they know that it works. It is also very helpful for them in doing their job.

A previous minister, Adam Ingram, asked to come out to schools because he really did not believe that the teachers would welcome the named person policy and he wanted to meet some of them. I took him round a few schools, and he asked, “How are you coping with all the information that you’re now getting, and how are you coping with having to talk to the families about these issues?” The teachers looked at him and said, “Don’t be crazy. It’s much easier to know than not to know.” It is much easier to understand what is going on and be able to respond to it than either not to be able to respond or to respond by doing the same thing.

One thing that transformed the situation overnight for teachers was the introduction of the police concern forms. Teachers in Highland, like teachers elsewhere in Scotland, often tell me that things happen on a Monday morning that are out of control and cannot be predicted because the children have been at home, back in the communities, over the weekend. Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays are pretty predictable, but on Monday they have to pick up whatever has gone on in the family or the community at the weekend. We have had suicide attempts, serious violence and all sorts of things go on, and the teachers have had to work in ignorance of what has happened.

The school now knows on the Monday whether there has been a significant situation for a family over the weekend and whether the child has had a traumatic experience. It can then decide whether it is something that it should discuss with the family, whether it can be left or whether it is a significant harm issue on the basis of something else that it knows and it should be passed on. The school is much happier having that information and being able to make that judgment.

Jayne Baxter: Do you think that acting as a named person and being a point of contact is having an influence on and changing the day jobs of people who have that role? The bill requires named persons to support, advise and help children and families. That is more than just being a point of contact.

Bill Alexander: Teachers, health visitors and midwives tell me that it does not change what they do but it changes how they are regarded. That goes back to how the role developed. We had the child’s plan, the lead professional and the super-social worker, but teachers and health visitors said, “Actually, it is us who know children and families, talk to the parents and deal with the basic issues. What do you call us?” Families said, “We don’t want a social worker, with due respect to social workers. We want to go in and talk about this with the teacher who teaches our child in school. What do we call them?” The phrase “named person” came up. The other thing that teachers said was, “If we say something to a social worker, we want it to be valued. We’re passing it on because we have a relationship with the family, we’ve discussed it with them and we believe it’s important.”

Having the named person role has not changed what people do, but they feel that it has empowered them. I have often used the example of a pre-school child—I will try to say this without mentioning any personal circumstances—whose behaviour was challenging. The parents were distraught and distressed and they were doing the phoning round of every agency saying, “My child’s not bad. Something else is going on. Please listen.” The behaviour continued, but when they spoke to the health visitor, that person felt empowered to draw on specialist clinicians—people senior to her—and say, “There’s something here. I believe there’s a different issue.” A hearing impairment was diagnosed and it was addressed. The child does not have bad behaviour any more. That was the power of the named person.

Jayne Baxter: Thank you.

Neil Bibby: To sum up, what do councils need to do other than to follow the letter of the legislation in implementing GIRFEC? What else is required from local authorities to ensure that GIRFEC works and that we do get it right for every child?

Bill Alexander: There are other things that we need to crack. With due respect to all my colleagues, there are still some who prefer to work much more autonomously, sometimes including specialist clinicians such as paediatricians and psychiatrists. We do not yet have the full family round the child. We need to persevere with that. General practitioners would never be named persons, but we need to do more work to ensure that they fully understand what it is all about and can use the practice model to the greatest benefit of the child and family.

Going back to the information sharing issue, I think that our greatest failure as authorities, agencies and—I have to say—the Scottish Government over the past 10 years has been our failure to achieve electronic information sharing. Because I have access to an electronic social work system, from my desk I can look at the plan of any child on the child protection register, but a colleague in a different discipline who might need to know what is happening with that child today cannot do that. They will have a copy of the latest plan, but someone will have had to go to the computer, print it out, staple it, put it into an envelope, take it to a post office and post it, and the person cannot be quite sure that the plan that they have in their drawer is the latest one. That is unsafe and we really have to address it. We all tweet and Facebook and watch football on our phones, so I do not understand why we cannot do that.

There is still much to be done. The key components in getting it right are in the bill. I would have liked to have seen the lead professional there, as that is critical. I think that Scotland is now using the assessment framework, but it is important that we all use it. Scotland has something that works and we should be proud of it, and the bill will take us forward significantly.

The Convener: Thank you for that explanation of what is happening in Highland and the pathfinder project that you have been involved in.

I suspend the meeting briefly while we change panels.

Apologies were received from Joan McAlpine.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

- Tam Baillie, Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People;
- Juliet Harris, Director, Together;
- Alan Miller, Chair, Scottish Human Rights Commission;
- Sam Whyte, Domestic Policy and Parliamentary Manager, UNICEF UK.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee reviewed the evidence heard at Stage 1.
The Convener: Our next agenda item is continuation of our evidence taking on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. I welcome back Marco Biagi, who is here as substitute for Joan McAlpine.

I also welcome the panel: Tam Baillie is Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People; Juliet Harris is director of Together; Alan Miller is chair of the Scottish Human Rights Commission; and Sam Whyte is domestic policy and parliamentary manager for UNICEF UK.

This morning, we intend to explore a number of themes, including the duties that relate to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, the extension of the children’s commissioner’s powers, the named person and information sharing. Those will be our main areas of interest, although other issues might pop up.

We will start the questioning straight away, because we have a lot to get through this morning, including some budget scrutiny. I invite Jayne Baxter to begin.

Jayne Baxter (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab): Good morning. I begin by asking the witnesses whether they think that implementation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child requires that it be incorporated into Scots law.

Tam Baillie (Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People): I will kick off.

First, I welcome the Scottish Government’s intention of further embedding the UNCRC in the legislation, although—as my written submission makes clear—I think that the end point of that process should be incorporation. In fact, I have called on the Government to give us a road map to incorporation. The reason why is quite simply that I think that it will lead to better outcomes for children and young people. I have given some examples in the supplementary evidence on leaving care. The early age at which young people leave care is an issue that has taxed the committee. If UNCRC were to be incorporated into Scots law, it would be much easier for young people to seek redress when they leave care.

I know that the committee has had legal opinion—with respect, you have had one legal opinion—that questions the feasibility or the appropriateness of having the UNCRC incorporated into law. That is one legal opinion among many. Other lawyers and academics are of the view that it is possible to incorporate the UNCRC into Scots law.

However, it is a complex issue for a number of reasons. First, because there are 54 articles in UNCRC, careful consideration would have to be given to how we could transpose our international obligations into Scots law and embed them appropriately and effectively.

Secondly, the articles cover a range of responsibilities, some of which are devolved, such as those that relate to education and health; some of which are devolved and reserved—for example, Westminster and the Scottish Parliament both have powers that relate to the standard of living—and some of which are clearly reserved, such as those that relate to asylum seekers. Another complication is that consideration would need to be given to what means of redress, in the event of breaches of the UNCRC, would be built in.

I have looked at the evidence, and I think that it must be quite difficult to make sense of the conflicting views on incorporation. The committee could use its report to suggest a parliamentary inquiry into the feasibility of incorporation of the UNCRC, which would provide the basis for teasing out some of the differences of opinion, and would allow proper consideration of incorporation rather than just seeing it as part of a complicated and wide-ranging bill. That is my first point.

My second point is about the ministerial powers. I have already given evidence that that element of the bill is rather weak, and the committee has heard evidence from others who concur with that perspective. The bill is weak on that because there are so many areas of discretion that it is difficult to see how the ministerial duty would be enforceable if it was not upheld.

We should go back to the UNCRC and look at the articles that could reasonably be included in the bill. For example, we already have “best interests” in our legislation because it is narrowly defined in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. Best interests could reasonably be considered as something that could become part of the ministerial duty. We already have practices in Scotland that mean that the views of children and young people are sought and are seen to be relevant to the development of policy and practice, and the views of children and young people could reasonably be part of the duties that are included in the bill. In fact, I am giving the committee advance notice of amendments on which I would be prepared to do some work for stage 2.

My final point—

The Convener: Very quickly please.

Tam Baillie: The bill’s stated intention is that Scotland should become “the best country in the world for children to grow up in.” The Scottish Parliament has a proud record on children’s rights. There is my institution—Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People—and the Scottish Human Rights Commission. Last week, I was at a meeting in the European Parliament as part of the new network of European ombudspersons and children’s commissioners, and I was at the table with members of the European Parliament who were thumping the table and saying that we need to make sure that the UNCRC is as firmly embedded in our legislation as possible. In their view, that is what will make the difference to outcomes for children and young people across Europe. I hope, therefore, that we can have much more discourse about the UNCRC and the potential for it to become more firmly embedded than some of the measures that are currently within the bill.

The Convener: Thank you. Do other witnesses wish to comment?

Professor Alan Miller (Scottish Human Rights Commission): Thank you convener and members of the committee for inviting the SHRC.

I want to pick up on the question and on Tam Baillie’s answer, with which I agree. This committee, the Parliament and the Scottish Government need to engage much more with the international human rights system, including the UNCRC, and with the experience of other countries and what they have done.

The part of the bill that we are debating and its hesitancy or reluctance to engage with the international human rights system is not of these times. It is an inhibited and inward-looking approach to the best way of promoting and protecting the human rights of children. I say that the approach is not of these times because we in Scotland are at a time when everyone is looking at the kind of country that we want to be in the future. What kind of Scotland do we want to be? What is children’s place in it? What is the place of human rights in it?

Even if after the referendum we have more devolution, we need only look down the road to Wales, which has, under devolution, taken a more positive approach through a duty of due regard to the UNCRC. If there is a yes vote in the referendum and we have independence, Scotland will be a member of the United Nations; we will have to be quite fast in understanding what the UN, the human rights system and the UNCRC entail, and what our obligations are. Even under the Scotland Act 1998, we have an obligation to observe and implement the United Kingdom’s international human rights obligations. We really ought to be thinking bigger. The bill and its retreat from a previous consultation on incorporation of the UNCRC is not of these times.

As Tam Baillie said, this is an opportunity for us to get our hands much more around the human rights system and not to follow the path that the United Kingdom has taken, which has been to refuse repeated recommendations from the UN to incorporate the UNCRC, as well as other international human rights obligations. We should be much more outward and forward looking, particularly in these times.

Juliet Harris (Together): I echo what Tam Baillie and Allan Miller have said. I agree that now is the time for the Scottish Government to be ambitious about what we want to achieve for our children and young people. As you know, we keep on bringing incorporation to the committee's and to everybody's attention. If we are going to make rights real, and if we really want Scotland to be a better place in which to grow up, we need to be brave and to show that commitment in legislation.

We keep talking about incorporation because we see it as the way in which we can have a strong legal framework that enables the protection and provision of rights for children, and their participation in civil society and the decisions that affect them. Systematic, accountable and transparent consideration of children's rights is essential if we are to succeed in making children's rights real.

We want us all to have a common knowledge and understanding of what children's rights are and what they mean. It is important that adults, as well as children and young people themselves, understand children's rights. We need to know whether we are making rights real and what impact legislation will have on them. We also need to know that clear and consistent monitoring frameworks are in place so that we can see what impact legislation is having on children's outcomes.

For us, incorporation is the way in which we will achieve those aims, but we can take many steps on the road map towards incorporation. I urge the committee to consider some of the steps that can be taken, to look at the big picture and to be ambitious. If we are going to make rights real for children and young people, we have to look at what we are trying to achieve through incorporation and try to include that in the bill.

Sam Whyte (UNICEF UK): I will make a couple of brief additional points. First, UNICEF UK last year did a big piece of research on international examples of incorporation. One reason why was so that we could be clear about its impact on children. After all, that is why we are all here and that is what it is all about. We found that when countries had incorporated the UNCRC or had in place legal measures on children's rights, that made a real difference because there was a cultural change and a legal shift for children whereby policy and legislation were developed differently and had a much stronger impact on children's services at local level.

There are examples of incorporation of the UNCRC in a number of countries, and there are examples of incorporation of its general principles. The clear message from the research is that the decision to give legal force to children's rights, whatever form that force takes, is the decisive factor in making a difference for children.

Obviously, UNICEF UK supports direct incorporation of the convention. We are of the view that civil and political rights, and economic, social and cultural rights are justiciable. I know that there have been some questions about that, but the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child is clear that economic, social and cultural rights can as appropriately interpreted by the courts as civil and political rights, so incorporation is certainly something that we would like to happen.

Briefly, on the duties in the bill, the fact that the Scottish Government is putting forward a statutory expression of children's rights is very important and it is not usual: across the world, state parties fail to do that. That principle is therefore very important in itself, but the duties that underpin that expression need to be strong and we feel that there is a long way to go in the bill.

Jayne Baxter: Which individual rights do you think are not already reflected in some way in domestic legislation?

Tam Baillie: I gave two examples of best interest. Children's best interests are paramount through the 1995 act, but we are trying to look much wider than that. To its credit, the ministerial duty will be across all ministerial functions.

The Convener: I am sorry; I would like you to clarify something. Jayne Baxter's question was very specific: she asked which parts of incorporation are not already reflected in some way in domestic legislation. You said that you had given an example from the 1995 act. Surely that means that it is already reflected in some way in domestic legislation.

Tam Baillie: Yes, but that does not apply to all matters concerning children; it concerns matters that are covered in the 1995 act. So, the intention—

The Convener: So, the UNCRC is reflected in some way in legislation.
Tam Baillie: It is reflected in a very narrowly—that was the word that I used—through the 1995 act. The UNCRC is not considered, for instance, in planning applications; the best interests of children do not have to be taken into account in such matters. The expansion of the best-interests criterion across all our considerations of children would be very worthwhile. You do not have to consider the best interests of children in setting the budget; you will simply discuss the budget. For a host of areas, if we really and truly want to put children and young people at the centre of our policy making and concerns, we must have a much wider perspective than is shown in how we have incrementally built up our legislation. That refers to just one of the UNCRC’s articles, but it is one that I feel quite strongly about.

The views of children and young people are rarely embedded in legislation in a consistent way, but it is commonly accepted that our practices are about listening to the views of children and young people. We are in a different place now compared to where we were 10 or 15 years ago, but that is not properly reflected in all our statutes. However, there is an opportunity to include that in the bill as part of the ministerial duty. That would be a much stronger basis than anything that exists just now. Those are just two examples.

The Convener: Does anybody have a view that differs from that? No. Okay—I want to keep this moving along because we have a lot of areas to cover. Do you have further questions, Jayne?

Jayne Baxter: I am happy with what has been said.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): I have a question for Mr Miller, who opened up the hypothetical situations for the future. At the moment, we obviously have a devolved Government, so certain aspects of legislation are not within the control of the Scottish Government. However, you raised the concern that the United Kingdom Government might go in a different direction, and there have been reports this week that it might actually drop the European convention on human rights. How will that impact on what we put in legislation in Scotland in terms of the UNCRC?

Professor Miller: Under the Scotland Act 1998 as it stands, there is an obligation on the Scottish Government to observe and implement the UK’s international human rights legal obligations. The UK Government has said—or, at least, part of the coalition Government has said—that it will go into the next election with a manifesto commitment to repeal the Human Rights Act 1998 and possibly to withdraw from the European convention on human rights.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): Excuse me, but it is the Conservative party that has made that commitment.

Professor Miller: Yes—I said “part of” the UK Government.

Liam McArthur: Yes, but it is the Conservative Party that has made that commitment.

Professor Miller: Yes.

Liam McArthur: Just for the record.

The Convener: I think that was what Mr Miller said.

Liam McArthur: He said “part of the coalition Government”.

I like to be explicit about that.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): You are a bit touchy.

Liam McArthur: Well, I am no more touchy than you are.

Professor Miller: If that is an indication that the Liberal Democrats are clearly not going to take that position, I would certainly welcome that.

Liam McArthur: Nick Clegg made that explicit at our conference a week ago.

Professor Miller: I would certainly welcome that. However, if a future UK Government’s position was as I described, that would not take away the responsibility of Scotland, if it continued to be a devolved part of the UK, to do what the Scotland Act 1998 says, which is to observe and implement existing UK international legal obligations, part of which is to implement the UNCRC. In all devolved areas, it would be open to the Scottish Government—and it would be its responsibility—to take a different direction from that of future UK Governments by doing more to implement the rights of children.

The Convener: I would like clarification on a couple of points. Some witnesses have called for full incorporation, but how can we possibly fully incorporate the UNCRC under the current settlement? It has already been stated that some requirements are devolved, some are reserved and devolved, and some are reserved, so how could we fully incorporate the UNCRC? It does not seem possible to me.

Tam Baillie: You can incorporate the UNCRC as far as the devolved powers allow. However, I suggested that we have a parliamentary inquiry in order to tease out what can be done under the current constitutional settlement. The timing of such an inquiry might well open up other possibilities.
Parliamentarians—in particular, this committee—have an opportunity to consider seriously the steps that we could take towards incorporation. You are right: that is the very reason why I have highlighted the different levels of devolved and reserved powers.

That is not the only matter which makes incorporation of the UNCRC complex. I would warmly welcome the committee’s recommendation of the UNCRC. It would help us to map out what can and cannot be done within whatever constitutional settlement we reside.

Sam Whyte: The Human Rights Act 1998 is domestic law. If that act is repealed—we strongly hope that it will not be because it applies equally to children and adults—the international obligation would still apply, unless the United Kingdom Government were to withdraw from the European convention on human rights, and it would certainly still apply to the UNCRC.

It is probably worth noting that the UNCRC would need to be incorporated with regard to devolved matters, and that most things that would affect children in their day-to-day lives are devolved matters. It is quite important to remember that. The UK Government has also recognised that children should be able to raise concerns, whether they relate to reserved or devolved matters, with the Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, because children do not care about that distinction, but are concerned with what goes on in their lives now. There is an element of flexibility there, as well.

The Convener: I have one final question before I bring in Neil Bibby. Let us take the right to play as an example. Are you really saying that if we incorporate the UNCRC in domestic legislation and there is then a challenge, with somebody saying that their rights were somehow breached because they were forbidden to play, or their play was stopped, it would be a matter for the courts to decide?

Tam Baillie: I would not start with the challenge. I would start with the impact that that right has on our approach to play.

The Convener: That is not my question. The question is: are you saying that if the right to play is incorporated in domestic legislation in the way that seems to be suggested and there is then a challenge, that would be a matter for the courts to decide?

Tam Baillie: As an end point. I will go back. The purpose of having a rights—

The Convener: That is a yes.

Tam Baillie: It is a yes, but the real impact will be on the approach that we take to children’s exercise of that right to play. As of now, to be honest, we pay lip service to children’s access to play, particularly that of children with disabilities. They come at the tail end of every consideration.

Yes, the end point may well be a right of redress through the courts, but the real impact will be on the way that we approach play and serve our children by paying proper attention to cognitive and social development through play. We do not pay nearly enough attention to that. In fact, there has been general guidance to state parties that are signatories to the UNCRC on how they can give better effect to that. The real impact will come not through whether this is challengeable through the courts but through how we deal with our children. It is how we make sure that their developmental needs are met through, in this instance—

The Convener: I am sure that we accept that we have to look at both ends of the problem.

Tam Baillie: Yes.

The Convener: Although I accept what you are saying in terms of the cognitive development and rights of children, particularly disabled children, I am posing a hypothesis when I ask whether we are really saying that we want our courts to be involved in considering a potential breach of the right to play.

Tam Baillie: At the end of the day, rights of redress would be built in, but those would not determine what action we take to make sure that children actually enjoy that right to play. That will rest with policies and implementation at the local level. Effectively, the impact will be an improvement to the attention that we give, and how we deal with, children’s enjoyment of the right to play. That is the intention of the right—it is not to look just at the end point.

The Convener: I ask Sam Whyte to be brief as I want to move on. I just wanted to clarify that point.

Sam Whyte: In countries where children have enforceable rights, there is no evidence of a massive increase in strategic litigation or children going to the courts. It is rarely in children’s best interests to end up in a court environment. That would be looked into in relation to any roll-out of incorporation.

The Convener: Thank you.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): Concerns have been expressed in written evidence and this morning about the weakness of the proposed duty on ministers, which states that they must keep the UNCRC requirements “under consideration”. I hope that they do that at the moment. Stronger duties have been suggested, such as duties to have due regard to or act compatibly with the convention. What is your preferred duty, and what would be the practical effects of changing the duty from keeping the requirements under consideration to the one that you propose?

Tam Baillie: I have already commented on that.

Juliet Harris: We need to look at the qualities of the duty that we want. We want a duty that gives children’s rights systematic, accountable and transparent consideration. We want to be able to see, when ministers are considering children’s rights, how they are doing that. Are they doing it in every instance? How are they accountable for children in their consideration?

We want to see not only the systematic consideration of children’s rights in ministerial decision making, but the impact of that systematic consideration in the decisions that they make around children, and how that decision making translates in terms of policy, legislation and service provision.

I cannot go into detail on exactly what duty we want, but it is really important that, whatever duty we get under the bill, it requires systematic consideration of children’s rights across all areas of policy making, including, for example, in relation to the environment and transport, and not just those things that directly relate to children. Ministers should be held to account so that we know what has been involved in their decision making, and we need to see the results and what they found out through the decision in the practical application of legislation.

From our perspective, a duty to act compatibly with the UNCRC would be a strong duty that had all those qualities.

Professor Miller: It is a good question that points to what we said earlier about the need to have a more open, honest and mature debate about the different ways in which incorporation can take place.

We are fortunate in Scotland in that we have quite a lot of experience of devolution through the Scotland Act 1998 and the Human Rights Act 1998 and how they combine as part of the existing constitutional arrangements in Scotland. There has been a lot of learning and, by and large, it would be agreed that the combination of the two acts has worked pretty well. The Parliament is used to the requirement to comply with the European convention on human rights in its legislation, and public authorities understand their duty to act in a manner that is compatible with the ECHR, as do the courts.

A duty to act compatibly with the UNCRC would be similar to the arrangements under the Human Rights Act 1998 in relation to the European convention on human rights. That is just one approach and we need to have an open and mature debate and learn from the experiences of other countries, but given our experience under devolution, that is one path to be explored.

Sam Whyte: UNICEF UK would like a stronger duty on ministers across Government. As Juliet Harris mentioned, the duty needs to be meaningful and a real departure from the status quo. Fundamentally, we want a duty that covers both process and outcomes. A duty to act compatibly with the UNCRC would work reasonably well, but there are other examples. The original duty that the Scottish Government proposed was a due regard duty. That reflects the legislation in Wales, which has had a transformative impact on the Welsh Government and its approach to children’s legislation and policy.

There are many types of duty, but the principle is to get systematic consideration of children’s rights not only in areas that deal with children’s services but in areas that do not do that day to day. The key thing for us is to ask about the underpinning mechanisms that make the duty work in practice. At the moment, it feels as if those things that will achieve that systematic consideration, whether that is a child rights impact assessment or a really detailed reporting duty.

The bill asks ministers to report on what they have done to implement the convention, so it does not monitor how they are delivering the duty, which is a weakness in holding Government to account. In Wales, one thing that has helped to roll out the duty and to make a difference across Government is a children’s scheme that sets out how the duty works in practice. We would welcome more clarity from the minister on how the consideration duty will work in practice. The wording is rather unusual.

Neil Bibby: Sam Whyte mentioned the original proposal in Scotland to have a due regard duty, as there is in Wales. Why does Wales have a due regard duty and we do not? He also mentioned the children’s scheme in Wales, and I understand that the Welsh also have child rights impact assessments and that UNICEF has called for those to be in the bill. What difference would child rights impact assessments have?

Tam Baillie: Your first question was why there is no due regard duty in the bill, which has to be a question for the minister. The Government produced a rights for children and young people bill, in which that was the main proposal, but now it is not in this bill, so I think that that is a matter for the minister.

The second question was about child rights impact assessments. We have consistently called for such an impact assessment, because that would provide a better understanding of the impact of the Government’s proposals. I still say at this stage that I would encourage the Government to look at doing that; again, that is something that you might want to put to the minister.

I would like to add something about the ministerial duty, which I have already commented on. This is not just about a ministerial duty but about what happens at the local level. It is public bodies that make a difference and have the responsibility to do their best by our children and young people. It may be worth considering, at stage 2, how we can strengthen the duty on public bodies, because they are the ones that, day in, day out, either realise children’s rights or do not.

Juliet Harris: I would like to answer the second part of Neil Bibby’s question, about child rights impact assessments. As you know, we have written to the committee on behalf of Together and its members about the need to undertake a child rights impact assessment on the bill. We feel strongly that there is a need for child rights impact assessments to be introduced as routine, in relation to not just this bill but all future legislation, because that would ensure that any unintended consequences of legislation were considered, predicted, monitored and, if necessary, avoided or mitigated.

The committee has spent a lot of time talking about the named person and information sharing, and there is still a debate going on about where the balance lies between the child’s best interests, the right to privacy and the need to share information in relation to early intervention. That should really have been picked up earlier in the process, and it would have been if a child rights impact assessment had been undertaken in the early stages of the bill’s development. That is a key example to bring to the committee’s attention. It highlights the importance of ensuring that child rights impact assessments are introduced in the bill and are routine from now on, to ensure that children’s rights are considered in every piece of policy making and that those debates take place earlier on, when legislation is first put together, rather than at this later stage.

Sam Whyte: One of the interesting things about child rights impact assessments is that they are used as a tool worldwide. They are not a new concept and they are very much seen as a way to help develop policy that really works for children. They are used in Wales, and there have been some significant changes there, not least through the increased involvement of children in shaping and developing policy and in being engaged in budget discussions. They are also well used in Sweden, Norway and Belgium, where they have impacted on how Government works.

There are also examples of local child rights impact assessments, not only in Australia and Canada, for example, but here in Scotland. We are working with Glasgow City Council, which helped to develop a child rights-based approach to the delivery of services. Such ideas are being introduced elsewhere, in places such as Fife and Edinburgh. The process is fairly familiar to most people who develop policy or services.

The Convener: You will have seen the correspondence from the Government on the issue. Its view is that much of the work that would have been done through a child rights impact assessment has been done through the work that it has carried out—the consultations and all the other stuff that it has done. Why is it necessary to carry out a child rights impact assessment if all the work has been done but is just not called that?

Tam Baillie: I do not agree with that assessment. It would be much more comprehensive to work through the document methodically with regard to the proposals’ impact on children’s rights. If what you suggest is the case, it should be no problem for the Government to produce a child rights impact assessment on the basis of the work that it has already done. Despite repeated requests, it has failed to do that, and its reluctance to carry out a child rights impact assessment on the very piece of proposed legislation that is designed to progress children’s rights is mystifying. To me, it does not make sense that the Government has not produced a child rights impact assessment, although we have offered it plenty of assistance.

Juliet Harris: In the letter that we received from the minister in which she explained the reasons why a child rights impact assessment of the bill had not taken place, she listed the impact assessments that have taken place: the privacy impact assessment, the equalities impact assessment and the business and regulatory impact assessment. The one thing that is missing there is the specific needs of children and the impact of the legislation on children of different ages. The minister talks about the equalities impact assessment and the fact that the bill has been assessed according to its impact on lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender children and children with a disability, but that does not take into account how the bill will affect children of different ages. The needs of a very young child are very different from the rights of a teenage child. The bill needs to recognise the different ages and stages of child development, and that would have been unpicked in a child rights impact assessment.

Professor Miller: I will comment briefly, as I know that the convener wants to move on to the other areas that were identified at the beginning of the meeting.

I agree with the previous comments and will add one thing. On impact assessments, one of the lessons from how Parliament has operated since devolution is that, no matter who is in government, more transparency and more explanations need to be given to the public, not just about views received through consultation but about what the Government made of those views, what analysis it carried out and what reasons it has for agreeing with one point and not another.

As regards the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, one of the Government’s reasons for not doing more to incorporate the UNCRC was that that might have been in conflict with the perceived rights of parents under the European convention on human rights. A lot of consultation submissions, including one from the Human Rights Commission, said that that created a false conflict, and that the two instruments can be harmonised. If that is the reason for the Government’s being hesitant on incorporation, it should be taken off the table. If the Government does not agree with that, let us hear more of its reasons and arguments. We have not had that sort of engagement, transparency or open debate, and that makes it difficult to accept that there has been adequate impact assessment, even on something so straightforward. The issue has not been brought out into discourse, nor has satisfaction been given.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): Mr Baillie, I take you back to some interesting remarks that you made in your opening statement about one of the difficulties with the bill, which is that there is potentially conflicting legal advice. You said that it was perhaps inadvisable that the committee had taken only one piece of legal advice on this, and implied that other people who wish the UNCRC to be incorporated had different advice. Where do you think that there is a point of conflict between the advice that you have had and the advice that has been given to us on why it is not appropriate to incorporate the convention? I am not asking you to define—

Tam Baillie: No—that is okay.

Liz Smith: Where are the issues regarding a disputed legal opinion?

Tam Baillie: There has been very broad criticism that it is bad law, bad policy and bad practice, but that is simply not the case in the view of other academics and legal experts. As I said previously, I think that the committee should facilitate the opportunity for the conflicting views to come across. The advice that I have had is that it would be possible, within the devolved powers of the Scottish Parliament, to look at the incorporation of the UNCRC, notwithstanding the point that was raised earlier about the differences between devolved and reserved powers.

Liz Smith: Can I push you a bit further on that? When you say that something is bad law or good law—

Tam Baillie: It was not my phrase; I was paraphrasing.

Liz Smith: There are different interpretations of those words. Do you think that any of the legal opinion that we have been given about specific areas of the bill is not accurate?

Tam Baillie: The blanket statement about it being bad law, bad policy and bad practice has been made. The Government is hesitant—I hope that the committee is not—about going for something more substantial in terms of the UNCRC. I want to dispel that and give the committee confidence that it could go further. I understand some of the reluctance to do so, which is because of the advice and the discourse so far.

Liz Smith: Do you believe that the people who are advising you and others who want incorporation dispute some of the content of the Government’s spelling out of why it does not think that the UNCRC should be incorporated? Is there a dispute about that?

Tam Baillie: Yes. I am not clear what the Government’s hesitancy is about. I do not think that it has been made explicit. I would be most interested to hear the Government’s explanation of, for instance, why it did not go for the option of a due regard duty or why the ministerial duty is framed as it is and is not firmer in terms of what is expected of our ministers. I think that the Government has stepped back from the option of a due regard duty. I gave a cautious welcome to that proposal, although it is not perfect. However, the proposal in the bill is a much weaker ministerial duty. The point of dispute is that we could go beyond where the ministerial duty sits just now. Our legal advice is that we could go beyond that and, even within the confines of devolved powers, look at incorporation.

The Convener: I will bring in Liam McArthur at this stage.

Liam McArthur: I am interested in what Alan Miller said about the interaction between human rights legislation and the Scotland Act 1998. Professor Norrie has probably been the most outspoken critic of incorporation among the witnesses that we have had so far. He suggested that the common-law structure of Scots law makes it inadvisable to go down the route of full incorporation. Just to be clear, is it your opinion that the interaction of human rights legislation with our common-law structure should allay any fears that incorporation would pose perils and all the rest of it, as has been suggested?

Professor Miller: Yes, absolutely. I know that everyone has their views about this or that case or that judicial decision, but the Human Rights Act 1998 and the Scotland Act 1998 have by and large worked well as pillars of the constitutional arrangements of a devolved Scotland. We are all quite familiar now with what that means for each of us. In addition, there is a provision in the Scotland Act 1998, which is perhaps one of the secrets of that act, for the Scottish Government to observe and implement the UK’s international obligations. We can have different legal opinions about incorporation and different interpretations of the implications of that but, from the point of view of the rights of children and outcomes for them, it is ultimately implementation of the UNCRC that really matters. That is already a duty under the Scotland Act 1998 and it really needs to be put into practice much more.

The Convener: Sorry, but can I come in on that crucial point? Many people have said that we have to incorporate the UNCRC, but Professor Miller has just suggested that we have to ensure that those duties, principles and rights are taken forward in Scotland through our domestic law but not necessarily through incorporation. I was going to ask a question to ascertain the practical impact of incorporation as opposed to the cultural impact. Many of you have mentioned the cultural change, but I want to look at what the practical impact of incorporation would be versus doing all the same sort of stuff through domestic legislation without actually going for incorporation. What is the difference?

Sam Whyte: I will try to answer all those points at once. In common-law countries, the principles of incorporation hold. It is about realising children’s rights. The agenda is progressive, but it is legally possible. The Human Rights Act 1998 provides a good model, but it is not the only model and some of the principles that Tam Baillie is seeking, particularly in relation to UNCRC article 3, on best interests, and article 12, on the right to express views, could be incorporated into Scots law for all children.

There is confusion around what we mean by incorporation, whether it is the direct transposition of the UNCRC into Scots law, or something else. UNICEF UK is certainly not suggesting that you should take the UNCRC as written and put it into Scots law. However, we should look at creative drafting and at where we can build on the standards that already exist in Scots law. Certainly the UNCRC was designed to be a minimum standard, so if there are stronger standards in Scots law, such as best interests being paramount rather than a primary consideration, they trump the UNCRC; that is quite an important point.

Ultimately, some of these discussions come down to economic, social and cultural rights, which are substantive and well-articulated rights. They have been made justiciable in all manner of ways and in all manner of countries, including in UK legislation under the Child Poverty Act 2010.

We therefore have examples of where incorporation is possible. You could go all the way and have direct incorporation, or you could go with principles or ministerial duties. However, the challenge in Scotland and, more widely in Wales and the rest of the UK, is that taking a completely non-legal approach to implementing children’s rights means that there can be gaps; some children will have access only to certain rights in certain settings, and things can get missed. That is an issue for children in Scotland in the future.

Professor Miller: I will be very brief because I know that you want to move on, convener. To answer the direct question, there are different models of incorporation around the world. The best practice and most modern trend of incorporation is giving constitutional protection to international human rights treaties. Incorporation can be done in other, less effective ways through specific legislation or administrative means, but giving constitutional status is regarded as modern best practice.

What that means in Scotland pre and post-referendum is where we are at just now. If we get devolution, one way would be to give status to the UNCRC and other international human rights treaty obligations within the Scotland Act 1998, or writing into a piece of legislation such as the bill that the overarching framework and direction should be implementation of the UNCRC.

The Convener: We cannot do that. We cannot put that into the Scotland Act 1998. The UK Government would have to do that.

Professor Miller: That is right. If we have an independent Scotland, it could be part of a written constitution.

The Convener: I am sure that you are very keen to speak, Tam, but surely that has covered the point.

Tam Baillie: I will pass on it.

The Convener: Thank you. I want to move because we want to cover a number of areas.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): I want to look at the part of the bill that enables the children’s commissioner to investigate individual complaints. One of the first things that jump out is the assumption in the financial memorandum that there will be between one and four investigations per year but that that will require three extra staff and £160,000. That seems to me, as a layman, to be an awful lot of money. Is it in line with what other bodies require for individual investigations?

Tam Baillie: That would be true if the power to investigate were the only power to be introduced, but two powers will be introduced for the children’s commissioner. The first is a power of investigation, which it is estimated will be used between one and four times per year, although the financial memorandum says that that figure is “speculative”. Underneath that, there will be a power to investigate without recourse to formal investigation. In my estimation, that will involve hundreds of cases; I say that from the experience of my office not having an investigatory power but still getting hundreds of inquiries, many of which could be regarded as complaints under the new arrangements. Even if there are only one to four formal investigations using the full powers of investigation, there is another section in the proposed legislation on the handling of individual complaints, and you need only look at the number of complaints handled by our complaint scrutinising bodies to see how I arrived at my estimation of where the major resource implications will be for the office. Hundreds of complaints will come in that can be stopped short and dealt with without going for full investigation.

Colin Beattie: Would three extra staff handle hundreds of investigations?

Tam Baillie: I have been in discussion with the Scottish Government about the resources that would be required. I am reassured by some of the measures that the Government says it will review, such as information technology and staffing requirements. There is a certain amount of estimating going on, but it would be wrong to look at the additional resources to the commissioner’s office just through that lens of formal investigations. The main impact will come from those cases that come to the office as a result of complaints being made that do not require full investigation.

Colin Beattie: Under the proposed new powers, the commissioner will have powers only of recommendation in relation to complaints. How is that going to work?

Tam Baillie: That refers to the powers of recommendation following full investigations. If you look at our scrutiny landscape and ask any of the scrutiny bodies, you will see that there is an absence of complaints from children and young people. I think that it is my responsibility to build on the work that has already been done on direct contact with children and young people. This is not about an investigatory power of last resort; it is about early resolution, so that we improve children’s situations without having recourse to formal complaints procedures. In the majority of instances, I would expect to be liaising with local public bodies, as I said earlier, because they are the authorities that will improve children’s lives. That effort will not just be focused on the investigatory power.

Colin Beattie: Do you feel that having the power to make recommendations is sufficient?

Tam Baillie: Yes. If that is how we conduct a full investigation, I would expect recommendations to be made with timescales for review and the opportunity for public bodies to report back on what action they have taken as a result of the recommendations. I would not put it more strongly than that, but in the majority of instances it will be about early resolution by agreement.

Colin Beattie: The bill does not allow the commissioner to investigate issues that could be investigated by somebody else. Can you give some examples of how that would arise?

Tam Baillie: That is already in the existing power. In fact, I have been encouraged by the discussions with other scrutiny bodies, facilitated by the Scottish Government. The power is framed in such a way that an investigation can take place where rights, views and interests have not been properly taken into account. That is a wide-ranging scope of responsibility, and if those powers are agreed by Parliament, part of the responsibility on me will be to narrow that down so that it makes sense to children and young people and so that it makes sense in what is quite a complicated scrutiny landscape.

Colin Beattie: One area where there is potential for overlap is with the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman, whose written evidence states:

“It is not immediately clear from the legislation where the boundaries between their and our role will be.”

The ombudsman covers the public sector, but the commissioner covers the voluntary and private sectors as well. How do you see those overlaps being resolved?

Tam Baillie: We are in active discussion with the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman and with the other scrutiny bodies to ensure that the powers are neither too wide, so that it becomes unmanageable for the office, nor too narrow, so that it does not achieve the redress that the Scottish Government has stated in its framing of the powers in the bill.

Colin Beattie: On a general basis, do you know of cases that you would have wished to follow up but were not able to follow up?
Tam Baillie: There are several instances where cases come into the office and I tentatively send probing letters to those concerned while knowing full well that I do not have power of investigation as it stands now. We have to respond to those cases because people often come with legitimate concerns when they feel that the rights of the child or children about whom they are concerned have not been taken into account. Those cases get a response at local level, but I could take them further if there was an investigatory power. In fact, I want early resolution of complaints. I do not want complaints to come up routinely to the commissioner when they could and should be dealt with at local level.

The Convener: Thank you. May I push you a little bit on some of that? You said at the beginning of that line of questioning that you would expect there to be hundreds of complaints that you might want to look at—

Tam Baillie: That may come to the office.

The Convener: I am trying to get to the nub of this because the bill is quite clear. I have it in front of me and you know well that, as it is drafted—it is in section 5(2)(2A)—you cannot investigate an issue that someone else could investigate. Could you give some specific examples of those cases that you mention that could not be investigated by somebody else?

Tam Baillie: The Scottish Public Services Ombudsman considers process. Much of that consideration of a complaint is whether proper processes have been followed. I would get in at an earlier stage, where there are legitimate complaints that children may make. Take for instance the example that I gave at the top of my evidence, of children leaving care at too early an age, who are then out of the care system but feel that they are of an age when they should be provided with additional supports, even with additional care placements. The committee has that under consideration now, with the leaving care proposals. That is the kind of instance in which I would consider there was a role for the commissioner, in terms of the full investigation.

The Convener: If a young person leaves care, the current rules are pretty clear, no matter what we think about the age at which they leave care. They can ask for help and that is assessed by a local authority and so on. What is your role in that case?

Tam Baillie: If they are still 16 or 17 and leave care and subsequently become homeless, it is arguable that they are the on-going responsibility of the local authority. Right now, those young people languish in those particular placements. We do not revisit young people who are in that position. You asked for an example.

The Convener: Is that not the role of somebody else? Is there nobody else who would be involved in that case?

Tam Baillie: I am not aware of anybody else picking up those cases.

The Convener: If that is the case, that is an example of one that nobody else is investigating. What would be the purpose of your investigation in that case? What outcome would you expect of that investigation given that, under the rules, nothing would have gone wrong?

Tam Baillie: I come back to the different levels of power. We elevate complaints to the level of investigation only in exceptional instances. Most of this is about resolution at an early stage. Given early notice and the speed to be able to respond to it, we should get in at that early stage without taking it through formal investigation.

The Convener: We are going around in a circle here. What is this formal investigation? What are the specific examples of formal investigations that you would undertake that nobody else could undertake?

Tam Baillie: We are still developing those criteria, but they will relate to serious breaches of children’s rights of such significance that they would have an impact on the practice of public bodies in general. In all likelihood, such cases will have gone through other complaints processes. After all, my objective is to ensure that local complaints processes are, where possible, used at the earliest possible stage.

The Convener: Given that definition of what you would investigate, which I would agree with, it sounds as if we would be talking about a very small number of cases.

Tam Baillie: It is still a matter of speculation whether we are talking about one to four cases, but I point out that those are the formal investigations, not the complaints. The complaints will be resolved early on or will be elevated to full investigation. We still have to work things out in that respect. I have provided a very rough outline of the kind of criteria that I would be looking at for formal investigations, but the key point is that the bulk of the work that will take place under the individual complaints-handling procedure will consist of individual complaints that have not been elevated to full investigation status.

The Convener: Thank you. Liam McArthur has a supplementary question.

Liam McArthur: On a similar theme, my understanding is that in referring complaints to, for example, the ombudsman the person in question must demonstrate that all local avenues have been exhausted. From your comments about early intervention and resolution, it appears that that will not be a requirement on a complaint that is brought to the commissioner.

Tam Baillie: We need to act speedily on complaints from children and young people, and making them exhaust all local complaints processes would not be the best approach. It might be that I will have to refer a high number of cases back to those local processes, but I do not think that setting such a criterion would assist children and young people who wish to make complaints and who wish the commissioner to handle those complaints.

Liam McArthur: But are you not running the risk that those local avenues might be routinely circumvented? Are there not good and sound reasons why all local avenues should be exhausted first? Perhaps—and I suspect that the ombudsman will agree—early intervention might prevent a situation from reaching a certain extent by the time it is referred to him.

Tam Baillie: The answer is no because of the judgment that my office will be exercising. I have mentioned several times that we will refer and signpost back to existing complaints processes; in fact, those processes are my preferred option.

Having discussed the operation of this approach with several local authorities, I have in the main been encouraged by their response with regard to setting it up. Some time between now and the bill’s enactment, we will look at the detail and discuss how wide the scope will be, how we will interpret it and how it will sit with other investigatory bodies. I think that memorandums of understanding will form the basis of our relationship with those bodies, and we will need to be clear about how we look at cases that should have but which have not been dealt with at a local level. It would definitely be my preference for local complaints processes to be used.

Liam McArthur: So you do not think that there is a risk that you would be intercepting processes that would otherwise be followed by the ombudsman or, indeed, that you may subsequently act as a point of contact for those who have exhausted their lines of inquiry with the ombudsman and are looking to challenge findings.

Tam Baillie: I do not want to create another complaint-handling layer; I am interested in resolving the problems of children and young people at the earliest stage. You are right to suggest that judgment must be exercised to ensure that the power is not seen as meddlesome. As I said earlier, we will ensure that we refer back to what is happening at local level, because that is where changes and improvements can be made in children’s lives.

The Convener: I want to pick up on this issue, because I am still not clear about it. You said that this would be a judgment and you mentioned what your preference would be. Are you saying that you have the right to decide whether to intervene in these cases at an early stage? That is not the case with other bodies that investigate such matters, which automatically send back cases that have not gone through the proper and full process.

Tam Baillie: Yes. As the bill is framed at present, it gives discretion to the office of the commissioner. I am saying that I will use careful judgment in how it is exercised.

The Convener: So you will have that discretion. If you took up a case at an early stage because you decided that it was right to do that rather than refer it back through the full process, and then you investigated it and it went through whatever process—

Tam Baillie: I would case handle it at that stage rather than—

The Convener: Okay—you would not investigate it, but you would be involved in it. If, at the end of the day, it came back to you as a formal complaint for investigation, where would that leave you? You would have looked at it at an early stage, and then you would look at it again at a later stage.

Tam Baillie: Yes. That is a fair point. In setting up the complaints function, I will have to look at that possibility. It is quite a tricky process. We are considering it now and we have an opportunity to continue doing that as the bill proceeds, but it is a fair point and one that I need to attend to in setting up the function and considering how it will operate so that we do not compromise the formal investigation.

The Convener: Indeed. In effect, you need to do that for your own protection.

Tam Baillie: I agree.

The Convener: Thank you. We have questions from George Adam.

George Adam: Good morning. My question is about named persons and information sharing. Last week, Bill Alexander from Highland Council told us that, as a practitioner, things have moved on dramatically for him with the model that the council now uses in that it can get information and proactively deal with children and young people’s issues.

Section 26 states:

“A service provider or relevant authority must provide to the service provider ... any information which ... the information holder considers ... might be relevant to the exercise of the named person functions”.

Are the provisions on information sharing needed in order to ensure that the named person service works properly?

The Convener: We will start with someone other than Tam Baillie, if he does not mind. I will give him a rest.

Juliet Harris: I am afraid that I will not be very good at answering the question. We have been debating the issue among Together’s membership and there are mixed perspectives on whether the provisions in sections 26 and 27 are needed or whether it would be possible for the named person function to operate effectively within the current information sharing parameters.

As a membership organisation, we do not have a consistent view among our membership on whether we need sections 26 and 27 or whether robust, clear and concise guidance would fulfil the role instead. We agree that it is essential to get the right balance between the child’s right to privacy and the need to share information, and we also need to ensure that we consider the best interests of the child. Whatever information sharing provisions are introduced through the bill, they must ensure that practitioners can make clear, good judgments about when to share information and also when to act on it when it is shared. We must ensure that any information sharing is appropriate, relevant and in the best interests of the child.

I am afraid that we do not have an exact position on whether sections 26 and 27 are needed, but there is agreement that they are not precise and clear and that the wording needs to be changed if they are to be included in the legislation.

Sam Whyte: I concur with all of that. I simply add that the right to privacy, whether it is under the ECHR and the Human Rights Act 1998 or the UNCRC, is really important for children’s confidence in approaching services when they have a problem in their lives. There is something missing from the bill—if indeed it is necessary to lower the threshold from significant harm to concern about wellbeing—in that there is an issue of informed consent, particularly in relation to children. They need to know where the information will go, what it will be used for and where it will end up. That principle needs to be at the heart of any child rights approach to looking at information sharing.

Professor Miller: Going back to our earlier discussion, one of the advantages of having an overarching rights-based framework is very relevant to the bill. The named persons provisions, as regards both the information sharing and any intervention by a named person, have the potential of interfering with the rights of both parents and the child unless the bill is consistent with the existing human rights framework and an element of proportionality is used. That is required under the Human Rights Act 1998. The bill needs to be interpreted and applied in a way that is consistent with the right to respect for private and family life, which governs information sharing and state intervention into family life.

It could be clearer. One would hope that training and guidance can address the connection between the bill and the existing framework of the European convention on human rights—let alone the UNCRC, to refer to the discussion that we had earlier. The lack of a clear recognition of the framework in which the bill sits understandably gives rise to some concerns. It can be made to work, but it would be made to work most effectively if more explicit references were made to the existing law whereby any intervention or information sharing must be done when it is proportionate—the minimum necessary to achieve the aim, whether that is preventing harm to the child or ensuring the child’s privacy or that of the parents.

More explicit guidance is needed, if not in the bill—which is preferable—then certainly in training, guidance, best practice and so on.

The Convener: In March this year, the information commissioner stated:

“proportionate sharing of information is unlikely to constitute a breach of the [Data Protection] Act in such circumstances.”

That was in reference to a risk to a child or young person that may lead to harm. In other words, it was not that the harm was actually happening but that it might happen. We are talking about the wellbeing point in the cycle, and the information commissioner seems to think that, as long as the sharing of information is proportionate, it is a reasonable thing to do. Would you agree with that?

Professor Miller: Yes, but it would be better if that were more clearly understood and shared by practitioners, and if they did not think that there was some distinction between what the bill is trying to do and where the threshold is, and what I am saying and what the information commissioner is saying. There needs to be more coherence.

Tam Baillie: I support the named person provisions, although they are not perfect. A named person must be considered for three to four-year-olds, who spend a lot of their time in nursery provision, through private, partnership or state providers. That point needs to be considered.

The key point is about the resources for health visitors. It is not a matter of whether or not they can carry out the function of named person; it is about whether they can carry out the function of health visitor. The Government has chosen to overlap that with the function of named person. I endorse the previous evidence that you have received from the Royal College of Nursing and others regarding the urgent need for us to do something about health visiting. In principle, however, I absolutely support the named person provisions.

I wish to comment on how section 26 is framed. You have rightly made the point, convener, about the issue being one of wellbeing, which we define as safe, healthy, active, nurtured, achieving, respected, responsible and included—

The Convener: You are better just saying “SHANARRI”.

Tam Baillie: That definition is very wide. The duty as currently framed is that, if some information might be relevant, it ought to be shared. That is a very wide scope, and it is a significant shift from instances in which there is a risk of harm.

Therefore, you may be advised to consider amendments at stage 2 regarding how specific that wording could be, particularly the word “might”. The provisions read as if there is virtually no information that someone would not share, just in case it “might be relevant”. There is a responsibility that information holders ought to share it. There is potential to tighten up the bill so that the provisions become proportionate; I think that the way in which they sit now is disproportionate to the intention. The provisions are well intentioned. We want to capture those children whose wellbeing is being compromised and who are living in neglectful situations. That is exactly what we want to do—but we do not want to have too much information.

We have examples of where too much information causes difficulty. Through the 2000s we had a year-on-year increase in referrals to the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration, mainly on the back of the police automatically referring children who were involved in domestic abuse incidents. That almost brought our system to its knees. You heard last week about the better management of that process through pre-referral screening to sort out the children who we are genuinely concerned about from those who are just caught in the system. We must give serious consideration to the issue. I agree that there should be an increase in information sharing, but it must be proportionate to the objective that we are trying to achieve.

George Adam: I am a practical man and I am trying to establish how we can make the system work in the real world. Bill Alexander told us how the system worked in Highland Council. The only issue that Highland Council seemed to have with the named person was when the process was not enacted. Once people involved in the process understood what it was about and what it could offer, they saw it in a positive light. He also mentioned that the whole system is based on the getting it right for every child principles and that information sharing is done according to best practice in line with the information commissioner’s ideals. With all that in mind, is that not a practical, sensible, successful way for the model to go forward?

Tam Baillie: Yes. You must remember that Highland Council has developed the model over 10 years and has done it in the absence of legislation. If we are to try to have consistent practice in Scotland—I understand why that is the case—we have to be very clear about which duties we put in the bill and how they will be enacted. I flag up that the committee might want to look at some amendments to the precise wording of section 26 so that it has the same intention as the current provision but a much more proportionate impact on people at local level.

The Convener: Before I bring in Liam McArthur, you said that section 26(2)(a) is disproportionate where it refers to information that “might be relevant”. Section 26(4) states that “Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that”— and goes on to describe and define how that provision would operate. Do you not think that that is sufficient?

Tam Baillie: We are getting into a stage 2 debate. I would prefer it if section 26(2) said “which is relevant” or “is considered relevant” as that would tighten the definition. You must remember that you are putting duties on people where they ought to share information, so you want to be as clear as possible, particularly since the definition is that of SHANARRI, which is very wide-ranging. The intention is still the same: it is to ensure that we capture the children who we are concerned about in relation to whom the sharing of information does not take place. It is a debate for stage 2.

The Convener: I am concerned that, if we tighten the wording up in the way that you suggest, we effectively will not make the progress that we all want to make.

Tam Baillie: That is a matter for debate. As the provision sits at present, you will have to be very clear in the guidance about exactly what pieces of information ought to be shared. My understanding of SHANARRI is that it is a deliberately wide-ranging definition of wellbeing for our children.

Liam McArthur: I will follow up on that point. You have talked about the risks that are associated with the broad terms of SHANARRI. The other element is the lack of consent for the information sharing. Is there a risk that when consent should not be a factor — when there is perhaps a risk of harm — the bill casts a degree of doubt about information sharing generally and therefore people will not make a distinction between welfare and wellbeing, which poses problems? The point that you made about Bill Alexander’s evidence is pertinent, as Highland Council is operating in a pre-bill environment, but when you start putting stuff into legislation it becomes a bit clunky and is rather a blunt instrument, so we must get the wording right. Is there a risk that the question of consent bleeds into cases where the issue is welfare?

Tam Baillie: You have to carry parents with you. We are principally talking about parents when the information is shared. By and large, good practice would be that people are aware of information sharing, that it is consensual and that people know exactly what is happening. You would need to build that into the guidance, given that there could be a wide scope for information sharing. I do not think that it is the bill’s intention to have such a wide scope for information sharing, but my reading of it is that that could be its impact. You could avoid some of the difficulties of too much information being shared if you narrowed down the definition.

Liam McArthur: In terms of welfare, it is very easy to see why you would not necessarily want to go down the route of securing consent, but I struggle to see why that might be relevant in the case of wellbeing. Can you help me on that?

Tam Baillie: I return to what you will put in the bill and the expectations of the officers or workers who are responsible for trying to interpret what they ought to share. It is not so much about the sharing of information but about what people do with the information. The Western Isles report shows that information was shared time and again but not acted on. The guidance must indicate the purpose of sharing information and there should be an expectation that action would flow from that. Focusing on information sharing per se might mean that some key aspects would be neglected. What is required is more informed action for children whose wellbeing might be compromised.

Clare Adamson: I want to ask about children’s rights and getting it right for every child. Given that GIRFEC will be put in statute as a result of the bill, the Government has produced a recent report, which states:

“The GIRFEC approach has been built up from the UNCRC. Accordingly, ensuring that the approach applies in the way public services operate will put the UNCRC into practice for each child.”

The report has done quite comprehensive mapping of SHANARRI within the GIRFEC principles and the UNCRC. Do you agree with the Government’s position on that? If not, can you say what you think is missing in the Government’s rights perspective on GIRFEC?

The Convener: Professor Miller, if you do not mind.

Professor Miller: Sorry, but I thought that the question was directed at Tam Baillie.

The Convener: I am sure that he will contribute in a moment

Professor Miller: Tam Baillie might say more on the specifics, but more broadly, I think that there is a lack of consistency between different parts of the bill. For example, we had a discussion earlier about the investigative and complaint handling powers that are given to SCCYP, the section 1 duty and the UNCRC. Parts of the bill talk about wellbeing, the named persons and the service plans, other parts talk about the duty on the Scottish ministers and other parts talk about SCCYP being given the power to take into account the rights, views and interests of the child. There is no consistency. I think that that is the Scottish Human Rights Commission’s concern.

Whether we are talking about information sharing, intervention, or how Tam Baillie and his colleagues go about using the powers that they are given, those powers can best be used only in the shadow of what the law is. If you do not have a law that enshrines the rights, views and interests of the child, that will impact on the effectiveness with which you can handle complaints or conduct investigations. Therefore, there must be greater consistency throughout the different parts of the bill. As we said at the outset, if the bill had a more explicit reference to the UNCRC and to the existing human rights framework that is provided by the Human Rights Act 1998 and the European convention on human rights, a lot of the bill’s inconsistencies could be reconciled in a way that would make the bill much more effective and lead to better outcomes for children.

Sam Whyte: One of the realities for children is that rights come into their own at a local level in their day-to-day lives. We were quite disappointed not to see in the bill a duty on public authorities to implement the UNCRC, which would reflect the duty that has been proposed for ministers. There is a reporting duty on public authorities in relation to the UNCRC, which is very welcome, but it is limited in that it does not require an action. One would hope that best practice in the
One of the reasons for the lack of a child rights framework permeating the whole bill is the fact that the original two bills have been merged into one. There are some obvious points in part 3 of the bill at which you could begin to build that child rights framework at a local level to support the full roll-out of GIRFEC across Scotland, whether that is done by stating explicitly in the bill that children and young people need to be consulted when children’s services are being planned throughout the local area, or whether there is an explicit requirement to consult a child on the content of his or her individual plan.

Juliet Harris: I echo what Alan Miller and Sam Whyte have said. Together believes that there is much scope for greater consistency and coherence across the different parts of the bill. That is missing as a result of the fact that, rather than GIRFEC coming from the UN convention, Jane Aldgate’s research, to which you referred, shows what GIRFEC is and maps the convention into it, instead of having the convention as an overarching framework for children’s rights by which GIRFEC is underpinned. It is a bit of a back-to-front exercise and that is why the bill lacks coherence.

There is a lot of scope in part 3, and we welcome the duties around children’s services planning, but the aims of a children’s services plan are all framed around wellbeing and we feel that, although part 1 concentrates on children’s rights, part 3 is about delivery of services that have a greater day-to-day impact on children’s lives, as Sam Whyte said, and they are underpinned by wellbeing. We think that there is therefore scope to bring the rights duties into part 3, so that children’s services planning is underpinned by rights and wellbeing. In that way, we can have coherence between the ambitions of GIRFEC in promoting children’s wellbeing and the principles that are enshrined in the UNCRC around children’s rights.

At stage 2, there will be a lot of scope for amendments to bring together rights and wellbeing, to ensure that all elements of the bill, from the aims of children’s services planning and of named persons, are underpinned by rights as well as by wellbeing.

Tam Baillie: In many instances, children’s rights are realised in Scotland—you can put together documents to show where their rights have been realised—but too often, they are not. Part 1 of the bill contains a requirement to produce reports on the steps that public bodies have taken to better realise children’s rights. I think that you could improve on that by requiring action as a result of that, rather than just having a reporting requirement. In that way, you will get some of the consistency that witnesses have talked about and you will marry up ministerial duties and duties at local level, because it is at local level that that really counts. I strongly recommend that the committee look at the place of public bodies in the ambitions that have been laid out in the bill about Scotland being the best place in the world for children to grow up.

The Convener: I thank the witnesses for their evidence, which has been very interesting indeed. We have covered a lot of issues, and I appreciate you taking the time to come to the committee to give us your views.

Our final evidence-taking session on the bill will be next Tuesday, when we will hear from the Minister for Children and Young People. I am sure that many of the issues that have been raised today and in other oral evidence sessions, and in all the written submissions, will be put to the minister next week. I thank all those who have given oral and written evidence for their contribution to our work.

Decision on taking business in private: The Committee agreed to consider its draft reports on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and the Draft Budget 2014-15 in private at future meetings.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Aileen Campbell, Minister for Children and Young People, David Blair, Head of Looked After Children, Phil Raines, Head of Child Protection, and Gordon McNicoll, Divisional Solicitor/Deputy Director, Communities and Education Division, Scottish Government.
The next item is to continue our evidence taking on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. I welcome to the meeting the Minister for Children and Young People, Aileen Campbell, and her supporting officials from the Scottish Government. Phil Raines is head of child protection; David Blair is head of looked-after children; and Gordon McNicoll is a solicitor in the solicitors communities and education division.

I place on record the committee’s thanks to the minister and officials for responding in a short timescale to a range of questions from the committee from last week. I am sure that that helpful response will be covered in the questioning. Before we ask questions, I invite the minister to make a short opening statement.

The Minister for Children and Young People (Aileen Campbell): Thank you, convener. Good morning and thank you for inviting me to give evidence on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

For the past eight weeks, the committee has heard evidence on a wide range of issues in quite a complex bill. We will talk about those issues today. I want to set the tone with some remarks about what binds those issues together.

With the bill, we have set out our ambition to make Scotland the best place in the world to grow up in. I think that we all share that ambition. The bill advances the ambition by drawing on well-established policies and strategies. It takes forward our long-standing recognition that we need to make a bigger impact in our children’s early years, not least through early learning and childcare. It lifts to a new level Scotland’s unique and internationally lauded approach to helping children and young people through getting it right for every child. Over the years, the Parliament has regularly endorsed that approach. GIRFEC has already taken seed in parts of Scotland, and we believe that the time is right for its fruits to be enjoyed by all our families.

The bill advances our national determination to improve the lives of our most vulnerable children and young people. Our proposals for looked-after children are rooted in what is needed by children who are in care, by children who are at risk of going into care and by young people who have moved on from care. The bill gives our natural and deeply embedded respect for the rights of children a statutory grounding in a way that fits Scotland’s traditions and looks to our future aspirations.
bill builds on the best practice and experience of what we have already achieved in Scotland. Our proposals and our costs are drawn from extensive experience across the country.

However, the bill is not simply a series of small steps forward. It is a huge leap, not into the unknown but towards what the evidence tells us is the right thing to do for children. That is particularly true of its commitment to early intervention. We know that a light touch applied when concerns first arise can often avoid a descent into difficulties that necessitate heavy formal measures. The preventative approach usually leads to far better outcomes for the child and their family. That is why we want to set in statute the crucial principles of proportionate, preventative and child-focused support for all children. They are the principles that Parliament espouses and we have set out what we think will best achieve those principles. As we have done throughout the huge consultation on the bill, we will continue to listen and stand ready to improve the bill where necessary.

Thank you for inviting me here today. I am happy to answer any questions—I am sure that members will have many.

The Convener: You will not be surprised to know that we do have many questions. The bill is very important and we want to cover a lot of important issues. Before we get into the detail of the bill, there are some wider points that members would like to hear your response on. Liz Smith will ask those questions.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): Good morning, minister, and thank you for your opening remarks. The bill is complex and, as the convener said, it is a big bill, so we must get it right.

Some of the written evidence has pointed out to the committee that there are certain points of law on which there is a difference of opinion between what the Scottish Government’s advice has been and what certain groups are saying. For example, there is a difference of opinion between Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People and the Scottish Government about the legal advice on whether we should incorporate the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child into Scots law. There has also been a difference of opinion between the Faculty of Advocates and the Scottish Government over part 4 of the bill. There have also been some questions about legislative competence from the information commissioner. Is the Scottish Government confident that the legal advice that it has been given on those points of law is accurate?

Aileen Campbell: Thank you for the question. I cannot go into detail about the legal advice that we get. We know that every piece of legislation that the Government introduces is competent, and that is no less true for this bill. I cannot comment on the legal advice that the committee has been given. I am sure that it will come out in the stage 1 report that the committee publishes. The bill is competent and that is true of any legislation that the Government proposes.

Liz Smith: I want to home in on the point that there is a difference of interpretation of some points of law. For example, the Faculty of Advocates argues very clearly that the named person provisions in part 4 attempt to dilute the legal role of parents. That is clearly not the Government’s view. The Faculty of Advocates submission says:

“It undermines family autonomy. It provides a potential platform for interference with private and family life in a way that could violate article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights.”

The Government believes differently; how have you come to that different conclusion?

Aileen Campbell: When services intervene in a child’s life, the pendulum often has to swing between the parents’ rights and the child’s rights. The named person provisions are about providing a support network and framework for families, if they need it, and it is their right to choose to seek advice from the named person. For more complex levels of need, the named person will be there to see whether there is a cause for concern. At that point, they will seek the appropriate support to ensure that the child gets the help that they need.

On the point of law to which you point, the bill is legally competent, as is every bit of legislation that the Government introduces.

Liz Smith: I do not think that the Faculty of Advocates is arguing about the legislative competence of that part of the bill. It is making the point that it believes that there is a dilution of the role of parents.

Aileen Campbell: There is no dilution of the role of parents. The role of the named person is very different from that of the parent. We know that the parent is the most important person, and the most important educator, in a child’s life. The named person offers a framework for the provision of additional support if a family decides that it needs it or for the identification of issues that might be a cause for concern. At such a point, the named person can seek to support the child to ensure that they have better outcomes in life. There is no dilution in the role of parents, which is set out clearly in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. That is not diluted either.

Liz Smith: So the Scottish Government has no concerns about the issue that the Faculty of Advocates has raised.
Aileen Campbell: As with any proposed piece of legislation that goes through the three parliamentary stages, we will listen carefully and closely to what people have to say, but we know that the bill is competent. The named person provisions in no way dilute the role of the parent.

The Convener: An issue that is central to the bill is the UNCRC duties. Some witnesses have supported the idea of full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law, while others have taken a very different point of view and have said that that would not be particularly helpful or sensible. What is the Government’s view of the duties that you are placing on ministers in the bill? What practical difference will those ministerial duties make to children?

Aileen Campbell: I was interested to read Kenneth Norrie’s submission and the remarks that he made to the committee.

The duty in the bill is a duty on ministers to reflect the UNCRC. That will child rights proof all our decisions. A tool will be developed to support that. We will take practical actions to increase awareness of children’s rights, whether through schools or with professionals or parents. As far as the practical impact is concerned, there will be a new duty on ministers to properly reflect the UNCRC in the policies that we take forward as a Government.

The Convener: That is helpful, but what will the bill allow you to do that you could not do at the moment? What difference will it make in ensuring that ministers carry out such duties? What duties are you not carrying out at the moment that the bill will force you to carry out?

Aileen Campbell: There will be a duty to ensure that the UNCRC is properly reflected in the policies that we take forward. We will have to ensure that Parliament understands that that is what we are doing. Parliament will carry out scrutiny to ensure that we have reflected the UNCRC in our policies.

The duty will child rights proof all the decisions not just of the present Government but of future Governments, so it is not just about ensuring that the present Government does all that it can to reflect the UNCRC; it is also about ensuring that, in the future, all subsequent Governments do that.

In addition, we want to ensure that we raise awareness of children’s rights not just in the work that we do in government, but right across the public sector. There needs to be an understanding of the UNCRC before we can reflect the good practice and the culture in the decisions that we take.

The Convener: I want to move on to the nub of some of the argument. As I said, there is a difference of opinion on whether the bill should incorporate the UNCRC into Scots law or whether it should incorporate the principles of the UNCRC. Why has the Government come down on the side of moving forward with some of the principles that underlie the UNCRC without going the full way and incorporating the whole convention?

Aileen Campbell: The whole premise of the bill is to ensure that we make a practical difference to children’s lives. The approach that we have taken is to ensure that rights are made real for children and that there is tangible recognition that a child’s rights are important in the policy decisions that we take. That has been the premise. We believe that the balance that we have struck in the bill achieves that without getting caught up in legal wrangling. This is about making rights real.

The approach that is taken in the bill sits better with Scots law. I refer again to what Professor Kenneth Norrie said. He said:

"to incorporate the convention into the domestic legal system of Scotland would be bad policy, bad practice and bad law."—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 3 September 2013; c 2682.]

We want to ensure that this is a good move that makes rights real for children across Scotland and we believe that the bill strikes the right balance in that respect.

The Convener: I have a final question before I open it up to members. You will have seen evidence that we have received about the situation in Wales, where ministers are under a duty to pay “due regard” to the UNCRC. Why did the Scottish Government change the duty from “due regard” to “keep under consideration”?

Aileen Campbell: We have never had a duty to pay due regard to an international treaty. As I said at the start, our policy has not changed; we are committed to introducing legislation that requires a systematic consideration of children’s rights, which is what our initial proposals provided for and what the bill delivers.

The Convener: But was the phrase “due regard” not mentioned in the consultation?

Aileen Campbell: Absolutely, but we want to ensure that children’s rights are real and think that the approach in the bill strikes the right balance. Moreover, there was no consensus about the approach that was set out in the consultation process. What we have now is a bill that makes children’s rights real without our getting caught up in legal wranglings and uncertainty about how the courts might interpret that due regard duty.

The Convener: I want to pursue this a little bit further. What is the difference between “due regard” and “keep under consideration”? The committee has received evidence from witnesses that a duty to pay due regard to something is stronger than a duty to keep it under consideration. Do you accept that? If not—and I presume that you do not—can you explain why?

Aileen Campbell: I will ask Gordon McNicoll to comment on the more legal aspects.

Gordon McNicoll (Scottish Government): There is an interesting question about what a requirement to have due regard to anything is. For example, how much regard do you have to pay to something? In the bill, the Government has set out exactly what it wants itself, its ministers and other public authorities to do. One might argue that a requirement to pay due regard to an international legal obligation means that you must comply with it, but is that actually what we want to do? The Government’s view is that it is important not to get hung up on particular words but to set out in the bill the exact scope of the duty that we want to create for ministers and other public authorities.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): Children’s organisations have expressed concern that the bill does not do enough to ensure that public bodies will help to strengthen children’s rights. What action is the Scottish Government prepared to take to strengthen the duty on public bodies in the bill with regard to children’s rights?

Aileen Campbell: We have a commitment to raise awareness across the public bodies and there will also be reporting to ensure that we understand where they are on children’s rights.

Neil Bibby: A number of questions have been raised about children’s rights impact assessments. What commitment will the Scottish Government give that future legislation impacting on children and young people and their families will be subject to such an assessment?

Aileen Campbell: I am sorry—I did not catch the question.

Neil Bibby: There was concern about children’s rights impact assessments—

Aileen Campbell: With regard to subsequent pieces of legislation?

Neil Bibby: Yes. Will the Government consider carrying out such assessments for future legislation?

Aileen Campbell: We are developing a tool for a children’s rights impact assessment to enable us to understand how subsequent legislation might impact on children’s rights.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): I have a few questions about the bill’s information-sharing provisions. My understanding is that we are moving from the kind of information that can be shared without consent, and I wonder whether you can explain how the bill changes the type of information that is shared and why such a move is necessary.

Aileen Campbell: Good practice dictates that one should always seek the consent of the parent and, where appropriate, the child, but recent advice from the information commissioner clarified that sharing without consent information about concerns of a risk to a child’s wellbeing that might lead to harm does not breach the Data Protection Act 1998, provided that the sharing is proportionate and considered. That is the key phrase—it is a matter of ensuring that that professional judgment is proportionate and considered. The commissioner has already provided clarity that, where there is a risk of harm, information can be shared, but it is always good practice to seek consent from the parent and, where appropriate, from the child, too.

Joan McAlpine: My understanding is that there is a difference between risk of harm and risk to wellbeing.

Aileen Campbell: Yes. The whole premise of the bill is about early intervention. When there are concerns about a child’s wellbeing, the information should be proportionately shared, and at an appropriate time. Those are the trigger points, and a professional would be able to make a judgment about the appropriateness of sharing the information.

Joan McAlpine: Is there not a danger that some individual information holders, such as teachers or health visitors, will have to decide on their own whether sharing information about wellbeing would breach ECHR article 8?

Aileen Campbell: There is a lot of room for ensuring clarity in the guidance that we will produce to accompany the bill so as to enable and empower professionals to make the appropriate judgment on the information that they share. Aside from the bill, the information commissioner’s letter provided useful clarity that will empower professionals to make the correct judgment. However, that needs to be strengthened and made robust in the guidance accompanying the bill, recognising the issues and concerns that have been raised with the committee. We will work with stakeholders to develop that guidance.

Bill Alexander’s evidence to you indicated that, before GIRFEC, there was “a scatter-gun approach” to sharing some information, but the approach under the bill allows that to be done in a much better way—in a much more systematic and coherent way—so that the appropriate services are provided to the child for their long-term wellbeing.
Joan McAlpine: When will we see the guidance?

Aileen Campbell: The guidance will be developed alongside the bill. I ask Phil Raines to elaborate on that.

Phil Raines (Scottish Government): Quite a lot of work has been done by the responsible teams in the Scottish Government to develop the guidance in consultation with a wide range of stakeholders. A lot of that has been done through the GIRFEC programme board, which you are probably aware of. The board has general oversight for the development of the guidance. My understanding is that the guidance has now reached the draft stage, and I think that consultation will begin over the coming months. The intention is for the guidance and the whole range of duties with respect to GIRFEC to be well in place before the commencement of any provisions.

Joan McAlpine: LGBT Youth Scotland raised the specific concern that young people’s privacy could be compromised by information sharing. Perhaps teachers sharing information—with the best of intentions—about a young person’s sexuality would breach that person’s privacy. Can you give any reassurance to LGBT Youth Scotland that the privacy of young people will be protected?

Aileen Campbell: The whole premise of the bill is to work with the whole child and to ensure that best practice is adhered to. That involves consulting and speaking with the child. I am absolutely able to give that confirmation, and I can work with those groups as we develop guidance in the course of the bill’s progression.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): Apologies for my delayed arrival, which was due to flight problems.

I wish to follow up the concerns that Joan McAlpine has raised. Earlier, minister, you prayed in aid Professor Norrie in relation to the incorporation of the UNCRC. The professor’s evidence to the committee was equally lurid in relation to sections 26 and 27, and he encouraged us to remove section 27 entirely, as that would serve the public very well.

I would not necessarily go that far, but we have now had evidence from a range of witnesses who have expressed concerns about the breadth of the provisions in section 27 in respect of how far they go on information sharing and the absence of consent for that information sharing in areas where the issue is wellbeing as opposed to welfare. Are you prepared to look at that again?

Aileen Campbell: We are happy to look at the evidence that the committee has received and that has been presented in the evidence sessions on the bill. We are absolutely happy to listen to people such as Ken Norrie, who has a huge wealth of knowledge on the issues that we are considering.

Liam McArthur: Do you accept Ken Norrie’s assessment that, at the moment, section 27 is potentially too open-ended with regard to how people who are exercising their professional judgment may come to the right decisions? Is the way that the section is phrased at the moment too open and vague—

Aileen Campbell: As I say, we want to make the bill the best that it can be, so we need to listen to the evidence that you have received. No doubt, the committee’s stage 1 report will enable us to ensure that the bill is the best that it can be. People such as Ken Norrie, who have given of their time and knowledge to enable you to prepare that report, are well worth listening to and we give you a commitment that we will look at the evidence in detail.

The Convener: I want to follow up Liam McArthur’s line of questioning. I quote Ken Macdonald, the assistant commissioner for Scotland and Northern Ireland at the Information Commissioner’s Office, in the light of Professor Norrie’s comments, which we have just been discussing. In his written supplementary evidence, talking about section 27, he states:

“As written, the section would override all statutory bars on the disclosure of information, many of which have been enacted in order to give children protection and it may also have implications for the independence of the judiciary where court orders prohibit disclosure. We would therefore urge that the content of this section is reconsidered.”

That is quite strong language from the assistant commissioner for Scotland and Northern Ireland. What are the Government’s views on both Professor Norrie’s comments and Ken Macdonald’s supplementary evidence to the committee?

Aileen Campbell: Gordon McNicoll can respond to those questions.

Gordon McNicoll: It is important to remember, as a starting point in addressing the question in more detail, that the provision—like any other provision—must be read in accordance with the ECHR. There can be no question of the provision overriding the ECHR; neither can it override data protection, as that would be outwith competence. As for any legislation that is passed by the Scottish Parliament, any powers conferred must be read as being constrained by the ECHR and reserved legislation such as the Data Protection Act 1998. Therefore, although in principle the power to disclose information appears relatively wide, it must be read in that context. In the Government’s view, read in that way, it is not as broad as might be suggested.

The Convener: I accept what you say. I am, therefore, slightly surprised that the assistant commissioner wrote to us as he did. He says that the issue has been reconsidered in the light of Professor Norrie’s comments. I will not read out his supplementary evidence again, but he takes a very different view from the one that you have just stated. Perhaps we could get some clarity on the matter from the Government in writing, if that would be helpful to the committee. Clearly, there is a difference of opinion.

Aileen Campbell: Absolutely. We can get back to you on anything in writing. However, I make the point again that we are listening to the evidence that the committee is receiving and will use that evidence to make the bill the best that it can be.

The Convener: It would help the committee in writing its stage 1 report to have that clarity.

Aileen Campbell: Absolutely. I give that commitment. I am just making the point that we are listening to what you are being told and taking any issues seriously.

The Convener: Let us move on briefly to section 26. Professor Norrie told the committee that there are “huge ambiguities in the drafting of the bill, which, if passed in its current form, will lead only to lots and lots of litigation.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 3 September 2013; c 2691.]

He went on to talk about the section in not the most shining light. His concern with section 26, among others, seems to relate particularly to section 26(1), which uses the phrase “must provide”; section 26(2)(a), which uses the phrase “might be relevant”; and section 26(2)(b), which uses the phrase “ought to be provided”. He said that he had some difficulty with the clarity of those phrases. What is the Government’s view of Professor Norrie’s evidence to the committee on section 26?

Aileen Campbell: We will listen to the points that he raises but the bill is drafted to enable the appropriate, proportionate and timely information-sharing to happen.

I would like clarity on whether there is room for improvement here or whether the Government’s view is that the provision is correct as it is drafted. Will the individuals who will have to take the practical decision on the ground about what they should or should not share be clear about what those three phrases mean?

Aileen Campbell: It is worth while remembering that guidance will be developed in consultation with the folk who know best, who will be the people who work on the ground, to ensure that, alongside the bill, the guidance is robust enough to empower the practitioners and professionals who make these decisions.

There is always room to study the bill and, if there are real concerns, again we can listen to the comments that the committee has received. Along with that, we will have guidance to enable practitioners and professionals to make the best judgments in the interests of the child with whom they are dealing.

The Convener: Thank you very much for that.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): I would like to ask further questions about the named person. The matter has been covered and you, minister, have been quite robust in stating that you do not see any tensions between the named person and the rights and responsibilities of the parents as set out in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. Where disputes between parents, young people and the named person arise about what is best for a child or young person, what method will be used to resolve those conflicts?

Aileen Campbell: As I say, there is often a pendulum that swings between the parent and the child. The aim is to make sure that the best interests of the child and family are at the heart of the decisions taken. We want to make sure that the process is absolutely right.

Would you like to come in on that, Phil?

Phil Raines: There are three ways to think about the named person. First, the premise of the named person is the idea of establishing a good, trusted relationship between the individual and someone whom, based on the evidence that you have heard, the family know and see reasonably regularly. The structure is predicated on the idea that there are good communications and relationships, but that will not work in all circumstances. There exist mechanisms to raise grievances and challenge issues that arise from many of the roles that these people provide. We have talked about the named person being a teacher, health visitor or what have you.

At the moment we are considering whether it makes sense to use those mechanisms or whether there is a need for a more bespoke mechanism. We are in listening mode and are conscious that we do not want to clutter the landscape further with regard to how people can challenge the decisions or conduct of those in this kind of role in the public service.

Clare Adamson: Thank you. During the consultation there was a considerable amount of support: 72 per cent of respondents were in favour of having a named person role in the bill. The bill states that the named person would be responsible for support and advice to parents. How do you envisage that that will happen? What kind of support and advice will be available? What implications will that have for the capacity and the role of the named person at any particular time?

Aileen Campbell: The support and advice to parents could take several different forms, for instance for the health visitor it could be about toilet training or it could be as simple as signposting to an appropriate service within the local area. In school, it could be about identifying whether there is a need for assistance with homework. It could be as light touch as that.

Of course, where there is greater need there will be a real bonus in having the named person to coordinate services appropriately and enable the child at a timely moment to get the best support that they can get in a co-ordinated way. There are a number of ways in which the named person can help a child and can direct and advise a family as appropriate, if the family decides that they need to seek that advice and help.

Neil Bibby: One issue raised with us is the anxiety that has developed because of a confusion between the roles of the lead professional, who is traditionally a social worker, and the named person. Do you agree that the role of the named person must be clearly defined and differentiated from that of the lead professional?

Aileen Campbell: The named person will have a statutory footing in the bill. There will also be a need to develop robust guidance to go along with the bill, to give greater clarity to professionals working with children and families across the country.

The Convener: Can I follow up on something that struck me as you were answering that question about the difference between a lead professional and a named person? Who ultimately is responsible when things go wrong? Does the named person have some sort of legal responsibility?

Aileen Campbell: No, it will be the service provider. We need to ensure that the named person is supported, but it is the department, health board or local authority that they come from that is responsible. The named person is not to be held legally to account for things that go wrong, but we want to ensure that the named person is empowered to make decisions at an early stage, to avoid things going wrong in the first place. That is the whole point of preventative spending and of early and effective intervention.

The Convener: Absolutely. I could not agree more and I support that philosophy and direction of travel in policy, but I am trying to clarify for those who might be in that position what their level of responsibility is. If they fail, for whatever reason, to share vital information, what level of responsibility does that named person have? We are adding a level of responsibility to the role of the named person, whether they be a headteacher or a health visitor; that is the purpose at the core of the proposal. Therefore, it seems to follow logically that they must have some sort of responsibility for the actions that they take or do not take.

Aileen Campbell: That is still true regardless of the bill. People have a duty of care for the child that they are looking out for. As you will have seen from the tragic incidents in other parts of the United Kingdom, when information is not shared stock must be taken of the situation to figure out what to do and how to improve systems. The named person provides a framework for sharing information in a much more co-ordinated and appropriate way, to enable the right services to intervene at the appropriate time to stop and avoid the sort of horrible things that we have seen recently happening to children.

Phil Raines will answer the convener’s specific point about responsibility lying squarely with the named person.

Phil Raines: I might distinguish it in two ways. The bill makes it clear that the legal responsibility for the named person duties lies with what we call the named person service provider. Therefore, for teachers or what have you in respect of kids in schools, it would lie with the local authority. In the case of health visitors, it would lie with the health service. So it is clear that it is a corporate responsibility.

I suspect that what you are getting at, convener, is more to do with the sense of responsibility for day-to-day business and conduct, and that must be thought of in terms of the existing mechanisms for setting standards of professional conduct and—linking back to an earlier point—for grievance or redress.

Building on what the minister said, I think that one of the ways to think about it is to say that there is already a sense of responsibility in place. Many individuals are carrying out these functions already, and they are managed within the existing architecture in terms of how their roles are defined and how they are held to account. We are building on good practice and on the architecture that is already out there.

Aileen Campbell: The committee should remember that Bill Alexander said:

“Teachers … and midwives tell me that it does not change what they do but it changes how they are regarded … they feel that it has empowered them.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 24 September 2013; c 2861-2.]

That is an important message as well.

The Convener: That is helpful. Thank you, minister.

Liz Smith: The Finance Committee produced its report on the financial memorandum on the bill last week. It begins by saying that there are significant concerns about the robustness of the methodology and the forecasting that have been used for the financial memorandum. Will you comment on that quite severe criticism, minister?

Aileen Campbell: In developing any financial memorandum, we have to engage with the experts and base the memorandum on the research and the discussions that we have had. That is the way in which the financial memorandum was produced—in close dialogue with people who know best.

Liz Smith: Will you provide the committee with information on the methodology for compiling the statistics? Why do you consider that what the Government has produced is a satisfactory basis for estimating the financial implications of the bill?

Aileen Campbell: As I said, the financial memorandum was drafted after close dialogue and close working with the people who know best—the experts around the country who work in the day-to-day lives of children. The financial memorandum is robust and it is there for the committees to scrutinise.

Liz Smith: There are lots of different elements to the bill, so it would be interesting to know which areas concern you in particular. Do you have an issue around one element and the methodology behind it? If so, it would be interesting to know what that is in specific terms.

Liz Smith: Yes, I do. At last week’s meeting of the Finance Committee, there were questions from John Mason, Michael McMahon, Kenny Gibson, Malcolm Chisholm and Gavin Brown, all of whom asked for specific figures to support certain policies. They said, to varying degrees, that what the Scottish Government has put forward is based on best estimates and on committee evidence that is not particularly robust. They said that, because figures are patchy in some areas and non-existent in others, it is difficult for the Finance Committee to understand what the Government believes are the statistics that make the bill financially viable.

Aileen Campbell: Are you asking me to tell you the methodology that we used for a particular part of the bill?

Liz Smith: At the Finance Committee, the bill team was repeatedly asked to come up with the figures that would support the Government’s implementation of the policy, but the information appeared not to be forthcoming. I wonder whether you can give those to us now.

Aileen Campbell: On early learning and childcare, for example, there were discussions with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to agree the appropriate figures in the financial memorandum, which we believe will enable us to increase provision to 600 hours.

Liz Smith: I am sorry, minister, but on some aspects of this, I really want to get at what the Finance Committee has asked for. It asked for specific evidence on training and costs. It is clear that—

Aileen Campbell: Training and costs. You talked about the bill in general, but there are many different elements to it, and many different discussions have been held with many different stakeholders to enable us to come up with the best financial memorandum that we can have. I gave as an example the discussions that we had to deliver 600 hours. If you are asking about training—

Liz Smith: The financial memorandum looks at the costs that underpin the bill. It is clear that Lothian NHS Board, the Royal College of Nursing and the City of Edinburgh Council feel that the Scottish Government is not providing sufficient money to support the ambitions of the bill. Do you agree with their concerns?

Aileen Campbell: I take it that you are homing in on the GIRFEC side of the bill as opposed to any other part of it.

Liz Smith: Well, in part, but there are other issues as well.

Aileen Campbell: Okay. I just wanted to find out which part of the bill you want to examine. Again, we liaised closely with the relevant people to ensure that the financial memorandum that we provided to accompany the bill is as good as it can be. We take on board all the different views and opinions that are going around about the financial memorandum, but we believe that we have produced the right costings to cope adequately with the implementation of the GIRFEC provisions in the bill.

Would Phil Raines like to comment further?
Phil Raines: I will comment specifically on training issues. There is clearly a different answer for different sets of costs. I am happy to provide the costs for any specific issues, but with respect to training—Liz Smith mentioned health—as the minister said, the people whom we consulted are the people who have the most experience of designing a training course, implementing it and establishing how it may develop over time.

Specific groups that we spoke to about health training include a group of managers designated by each health board who have dedicated responsibility for implementing GIRFEC in their own health board. As you will be aware, GIRFEC is not something new for health boards; it has been around as a result of chief executive letter 29 and Hall 4—“Health for All Children 4”. There is therefore quite a lot of experience of thinking about how this might roll out. We also spoke to the children, young people and families nursing advisory group. It is quite difficult to remember all these complicated acronyms and names.

There are a different set of issues with regard to local authorities, some of which perhaps have made the same criticisms about training. As you would expect, again we spoke to the people who have quite a lot of experience of putting these things into practice rather than considering the issues in the abstract. We spoke to Highland Council, the City of Edinburgh Council, South Ayrshire Council, East Lothian Council, Midlothian Council, Falkirk Council and Angus Council, which are at different stages of implementing GIRFEC.

You will notice from the evidence submitted to the committee by councils who are well advanced in implementing GIRFEC, not least the City of Edinburgh Council and South Ayrshire Council, that they have no problems with the assumptions that have been made about GIRFEC costs.

Liz Smith: Forgive me for saying so, but the Finance Committee has a problem and so do some other witnesses, who say that they believe that the money that is being put forward for GIRFEC may support it in the first instance but is not nearly enough to support it on an on-going basis. Several submissions make the same comment.

Secondly, when it comes to the provision of health visitors, the RCN has made it clear that to implement the named person provision in full would require another 450 health visitors across Scotland. It claims that there is not sufficient money to fund that. Are you absolutely confident that the research that you have done is sufficiently robust to ensure that the bill has the right amount of money behind it to support the costs?

Aileen Campbell: We have been very clear about what we believe is required of health boards to fulfil the GIRFEC duties. We have worked out the additional hours required. Phil Raines has talked about the discussions that we have had with expert groups who have expertise and knowledge of implementing GIRFEC. It is about ensuring that it is not an additional thing that people and services do but is hard-wired into the daily practice of the services, which is how we expect GIRFEC to be carried out.

Liz Smith: Okay, minister. Why then was the Finance Committee—which has members from all parties—so strong in its criticism of the financial memorandum?

Aileen Campbell: A number of different people provided evidence to the Finance Committee and it has reflected that in its report. As I say, we will listen to and look at the evidence that has been provided to you as the lead committee and ensure that, at the end of the process, we have a bill of which we can all be proud. As Phil Raines said, our approach to the financial memorandum has been to engage with the people who know best and to reflect on what they have told us in order to develop a robust methodology.

Liz Smith: I will finish on this point: do you believe that the bill has sufficient money behind it or will it need to have more behind it?

Aileen Campbell: We have a financial memorandum that we believe sets out the way in which we can deliver the bill’s aspirations.

The Convener: Clare Adamson has a question.

Clare Adamson: Sorry, convener—I was listening to the minister and have lost my train of thought.

The Convener: Do you want me to come back to you?

Clare Adamson: Yes, please. Thank you.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): Good morning. We are asking questions about the financial memorandum. The process that you have gone through is basically the same process that would be gone through with any bill. You work with partner organisations to ensure that they are given the opportunity to provide some input to the bill and to work out how to make the bill work out there in the real world.

Aileen Campbell: Absolutely. The financial memorandum takes the same approach that is taken by any financial memorandum. It is about ensuring that we engage with the experts who know best so that we get the right information to develop something that will work alongside a bill that is being developed in policy terms.
Clare Adamson: The Finance Committee’s report picked up on savings that are planned through the implementation of GIRFEC. Will you give us a bit more information about the evidence that the local authorities have given on those savings?

Aileen Campbell: There has been real evidence from the Highland pathfinder of not only cost savings, but savings in time in relation to meetings and all the different things that can perhaps impede the getting it right for every child service. Even after a short period of time, clear benefits have been generated from the GIRFEC approach. There is a lot of evidence to show that it has worked with respect to inappropriate referrals to the children’s panel and such like, and that local authorities have had real benefits and savings.

Clare Adamson: Okay. There has also been evidence that questions whether the front-loaded additional moneys for year one are sufficient. Does the evidence from the roll-out in the Highland area suggest that those moneys will be enough to get the approach embedded in the normal working practices and job descriptions of the people involved so that it becomes part of their professional development?

Aileen Campbell: Yes. The evidence that the committee received from Bill Alexander was quite compelling. We are not starting from a static standpoint. A lot of work has been done through the GIRFEC implementation board and by the Government to finance greater awareness of the GIRFEC approach and its implementation. Now that we have the accompanying financial memorandum, we will have the transitional training and thereafter professionals will have that as part of their on-going training and continuing professional development. Discussions with the City of Edinburgh Council and South Ayrshire Council about the roll-out of that have been useful in helping us to develop the financial memorandum and the approach that we have outlined in the bill.

Neil Bibby: I want to follow up on the issue of resources. You are saying that you believe that there are adequate resources in the financial memorandum. However, given the concerns that the Finance Committee has raised and other concerns that the committee has heard that relate to resources, would you consider reviewing the associated costs in the financial memorandum? Concerns have been raised about the named person element of the bill and training, administration and support issues.

Aileen Campbell: We always monitor what is going on with a bill. It is important for members to realise that there is continual engagement between health boards and the Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing, for instance on ensuring that people have the capacity to deliver the aspirations that we have set out in the bill.

The Convener: I would like to follow up on one or two questions. You have talked about the money that is required to deal with some of the issues, such as the costs of training. I want to ask about the profile of the additional hours. You have mentioned the Highland area several times. Highland Council has talked about “green shoots”, which suggests that it is still early days in relation to financial savings. Given the current profile of the additional hours, the assumption in the financial memorandum about reduced training hours after the first year in relation to the named person provisions certainly seemed to a number of people who have spoken and written to us to be overly optimistic. What is your response to that?

Aileen Campbell: I have outlined some of the benefits that are already being experienced over quite a short period of time, which have been evidenced in the research on the Highland pathfinder. We have also done our own bespoke economic modelling. Every pound that is invested in the early years saves £9 in cures. A number of bits of research show us that we will see financial benefits after the initial investment in the early years has been made.

I ask Phil Raines to comment on the specific points that the convener has raised.

Phil Raines: There are different ways of thinking about this, depending on whether you are thinking more about the local authority side or the health side. It might be helpful to start with the health side. It is noticeable that there is an ongoing cost associated with the role of health in implementing the GIRFEC provisions in the bill. We recognise that if we really want to make a difference in a child’s life we must do so in the first couple of years of their life. It is assumed that that kind of major impact and the fact that it will be there year on year going forward will be reflected in their lives later. We therefore expect a tapering effect. We expect that, as the GIRFEC role beds down universally, there will be efficiencies and economies of scale from people getting better at doing their jobs. For example, midwives will get better at doing pre-birth screening, conferencing and handing over to health visitors, who will get very good at being able to do things in the first year of a child’s life. We therefore expect that, in the second, third and fourth years of the child’s life, there will be less need to support families—in particular, some of the crisis families.

When responsibility is handed over to local authorities in their role as the named person for education, we expect the early work to bear fruit and perhaps kick in quite early. The additional work that is done in the first year of a child’s life should start to bear fruit in subsequent years.
The Convener: That is interesting. Obviously, we all hope that early intervention will have a knock-on effect. My top priority would not be financial savings in particular; it would be the impact on the individual’s life. I am sure that we share that view.

I want to drill down a bit into how early on financial savings can be achieved from GIRFEC. Can you give us specific examples of the savings that we are talking about? Are we talking about bureaucratic savings in relation to the amount of paperwork? Are we talking about the expectation that we will not have to intervene in the child’s life to the same extent in future years? How exactly will the savings be made? Will they be financial savings, time savings, or both? Are we really confident that, having made interventions in year one, we will almost immediately get savings in years two and three? That is pretty quick.

Aileen Campbell: Yes. The benefits for families should be greater clarity about which professionals to contact and earlier support to prevent problems from getting worse. There should therefore be a cost saving in terms of meetings and bureaucracy, and professionals should benefit because they should be able to free up more of their time to work with more vulnerable families. Therefore, by implementing GIRFEC, there should be clear benefits for families as well as savings in costs and professionals’ time. For example, family nurse partnerships are being rolled out across the country for first-time teenage mothers and some of the evidence from that has shown that the mothers do not have subsequent children quickly after their first child. That is a quick saving, and the mothers feel empowered and are much better at being a parent. There are therefore real savings for the child and their mother. I hope that that information is helpful.

The Convener: Before we move on to another section of the bill, I have a final question, which is on health visitors. We have touched on the issue already, but can you provide the committee with some detail around the workforce planning that the Scottish Government is undertaking on health visitors? It has come up repeatedly in evidence that the bill and its various accompanying documents do not provide for sufficient health visitor cover for successful implementation of the bill’s provisions—the Government might agree or disagree with that evidence. What workforce planning is being undertaken to ensure that we have the correct number of health visitors? Never mind midwives and others; let us focus on health visitors for a moment.

Aileen Campbell: In a lot of the work that we do, we inform health boards about their responsibilities with regard to workforce planning. Nurse directors and chief executives of national health service boards will make the appropriate provision in light of the fact that there is a new bill on the landscape. There will also be regular discussions with the cabinet secretary through his regular contact with NHS boards.

The Convener: Irrespective of the bill and the roll-out of family nurse partnerships, there has been comment to this committee and in the press that we have an insufficient number of health visitors, on whom there is already pressure. In what way will the bill and the roll-out of family nurse partnerships impact on individual health visitors? Are we sure that we have sufficient numbers to achieve the ends that we all want?

Aileen Campbell: I go back to what Bill Alexander said. Health visitors in Highland feel empowered and much more highly regarded for their professional work. We are already seeing growth in the profession. There are other issues. The ratio of health visitors to the children they deal with is quite healthy in Scotland. Phil Raines might like to comment on that.

Phil Raines: Some specific things are going on. The financial memorandum sets out a cost but it does not set out the funding required. As you would expect, it does not say how the work that will be generated through the bill will be taken forward by individual health boards. That is something that health boards have to reflect on and bring into discussion as part of the natural process of budget negotiations.

It is important to recognise that the bill sits among a number of other issues with regard to health visitors, their workload and our expectations of them. A lot of work has been going on with the children, young people and families nursing advisory group, which I mentioned earlier, to develop tools that will enable health boards, given all the possible demands in future with regard to health visitors, to assess much more quickly what demand might look like and how it might translate into the numbers that are needed. As you would expect, that work will feed into future budget negotiations. Clearly, given the commencement of the duties that we are talking about, those budgets are not envisaged at the moment.

Workforce planning is going on. To be honest, health boards have been well aware of the need to do that. Ever since Hall 4 and CEL 29, they have known that GIRFEC was coming and they have been putting mechanisms in place to think about what GIRFEC might look like locally.

George Adam: I would like to ask about early education and care. The minister talked about the 600 hours of nursery care that the Government is offering, which will give parents greater flexibility.
In evidence to the committee, Lori Summers said that childcare

“needs to be more flexible so that a place is available not just in the morning or afternoon”.—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 10 September 2013; c 2751.]

Do you believe that what you have put in place offers that flexibility to people such as Lori Summers?

Aileen Campbell: The reason for increasing the hours is to help families who are struggling to balance work and life. The flexibility should help families, and they will be able to have an input in the way in which the local authority configures services, which will enable parents to enter work or training. That is why that flexibility and the way in which the additional hours are delivered will be crucial. This is an important part of the bill. It is not just about adding on extra hours; it is about changing the way in which services are delivered.

George Adam: I want to ask another question, just so that we have your answer on the record. Obviously, you will have to work with partner organisations to deliver on this part of the bill. You have had conversations with COSLA. Are things at a reasonable stage so that it will be delivered?

Aileen Campbell: Yes, absolutely. There has been close working with COSLA to develop the figures.

Aside from work on the bill, there is the early years task force, of which COSLA is part and parcel. In fact, COSLA co-chairs it with me and the chief medical officer. An enormous amount of work has been done on the delivery of early learning and childcare and to develop the financial memorandum. This is about close working. We have to recognise that COSLA is a big partner in delivering the aspiration to increase both hours and flexibility.

George Adam: Another point that has been made is that the scheme will offer children more access to qualified teachers. At the same time, not just qualified teachers will be involved. Can you explain some of that thinking?

Aileen Campbell: The other reason for making sure that we deliver this in a good way is that we recognise that it has to be a quality offering to children during their earliest years. Teachers are part of the workforce, but those who have a BA in childhood practice and nursery managers are also a crucial part of the mix of professionals who work with children. A lot of work is being done to make sure that those professionals have the appropriate skills to allow us to be confident that children are being offered a quality service.

Last year, Education Scotland published a report that showed the positive benefits of upskilling the workforce. It also showed how good progress is being made with the delivery of something that will be good for the development of three and four-year-olds.

George Adam: You are saying that, regardless of the make-up of nursery staff, the quality of the service that is being delivered on the ground is the most important thing.

Aileen Campbell: Absolutely. We have talked about how we want to deliver the service in a flexible way for families, but what is being provided has to be of a quality that will respond to the real needs of children of that age. Last year’s Education Scotland report was useful because it showed that the work that has been on-going in Scotland for a number of years to make sure that the workforce is appropriately trained is paying dividends. It also showed that there is a real need for a mix of abilities within the workforce—a mix of professionals—so that we can have confidence that we are delivering a quality offering for three and four-year-olds, as well as being flexible and meeting the needs of parents and carers.

Liam McArthur: I want to follow up the point about quality. As Liz Smith and Neil Bibby have indicated, the Finance Committee’s assessment of the financial memorandum raises some very serious questions. I cannot remember seeing a Finance Committee report that raised quite so many serious concerns about a bill.

One of those concerns is about funding for partner providers, which I presume is linked to the issue of the quality of provision to which George Adam referred. In its evidence to the Finance Committee and to this committee, the National Day Nurseries Association highlighted fairly significant discrepancies in the rates that are paid. The average is £3.28 per child per hour, but it goes from £4.09 per hour at the top end to £2.72 per hour—which Glasgow pays—at the low end. Given that the uprating process is based on assumptions about payments made, what is the status of those presumed rates? Does more need to be done to ensure that adequate payments are being made to allow for provision of the quality that we want to see?

Aileen Campbell: It is up to local authorities to decide fair and sustainable settlements with partner providers. The budget that is associated with the bill covers an uplift for the additional 125 hours that local authorities will pay partner providers.

Liam McArthur: But you are making assumptions about the funding that is required, and there is an assumed rationale behind the figures on payments to partner providers. Ought there to be more consistency in what is paid?

There might not need to be payment at a specific rate, but there should not be discrepancies between payments of £4.09 per child per hour and £2.72 per child per hour.

Aileen Campbell: It is for local authorities to decide with their partner providers what the settlement will look like. From my point of view, the settlement must be fair and sustainable, and it is in the best interests of the child for the local authority to secure good-quality provision. The financial memorandum covers the uplift for the additional 125 hours.

Liam McArthur: Another issue that has been flagged up with the Finance Committee and which I think raises concerns about the assumptions made in the financial memorandum is the provision for looked-after two-year-olds.

Last month, you announced that funding for that provision was being increased from £1.1 million to £4.5 million. Although that is welcome as it addresses concerns that had been raised with you directly about the costs of providing for this group, a witness told the Finance Committee:

“If one element of costs can go up fourfold after they have been thought about more, can other elements of costs do the same? If they could, the shortfall would be significant.”—[Official Report, Finance Committee, 18 September 2013; c 2956.]

Can you explain the thinking or the process that resulted in a fourfold increase in the funding for this element of the bill?

Aileen Campbell: I set out our reasons for reaching that decision in my letter to the Finance Committee. We are integrating money as well as providing additional new money, which would ordinarily be recognised as a good thing.

Liam McArthur: I do not dispute that—and it is better that it is done now than at some point hence. However, as you will understand, it has raised concerns about the adequacy of the assumptions that were made when the bill and its financial memorandum were put together. You have indicated that the £3.4 million increase is additional funding rather than a realignment of funding through the early years change fund. Is that correct?

Aileen Campbell: Again, I would have thought people would welcome our putting in additional money to ensure that we can deliver for our looked-after two-year-olds something that we are proud of. I made it clear in my letter to the Finance Committee that it is to be read alongside the financial memorandum, and we have developed many of these figures in conjunction with COSLA.

Liam McArthur: That is fine.

Mr Raines suggested that to make a major impact you need to intervene in the first couple of years of a child’s life. Clearly that is being addressed with regard to looked-after two-year-olds, but it will be no secret to the minister that, on the basis of the evidence that we have received, I believe that we ought to go further—

George Adam: This is Liam’s party piece.

Liam McArthur: As opposed to your party piece, George. Unlike you, I am trying to hold the Government to account.

Members: Oh!

Liam McArthur: Save the Children has said that it supports “an extension to ... all two-year-olds, starting with children living in poverty”

as much as anything

“to tackle inequalities in the early years”.—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 10 September 2013; c 2752.]

That is in recognition of the fact that many two-year-olds from better-off backgrounds already enjoy early education and nursery provision.

Are you prepared to concede any ground in this area? I ask that not least given Claire Telfer’s subsequent comment:

“we support priority being given to children living in poverty. We want to see that taken forward immediately, looking at how and whether that is possible ... in this session of Parliament”.—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 10 September 2013; c 2755.]

Aileen Campbell: As I have said to George Adam, I am keen to deliver something with quality as its hallmark to the children whom we are dealing with—in other words, three and four-year-olds and looked-after two-year-olds, who are the most vulnerable two-year-olds in society—and to ensure that we can do so in a sustainable and manageable way. I am not prepared to announce something that we cannot deliver on later, as has been the case in other parts of the UK, where announcements have been made, only for the sectors then to say that they cannot deliver on them and that they are beyond capacity.

Liam McArthur: To be honest and with all due respect, minister, I think that you are guilty of doing that. You published a bill and a financial memorandum in which the funding for provision to looked-after two-year-olds was a quarter of what was actually required.

Aileen Campbell: We are putting forward a bill with a financial memorandum. I have announced extra money to go into that, which COSLA is content with—we have worked in conjunction with COSLA. In the bill, I have announced a system of childcare that will deliver for three and four-year-olds, which is not contrary to the capacity that we have in the country and which will ensure that, at the end of the bill, 600 hours will be delivered in a quality way to three and four-year-olds and looked-after two-year-olds.

There is provision in the bill to extend that coverage at a later date, if we need to, but this is a first step in transforming childcare. Making sure that we make that step in a sustainable way is important, because we do not want to say something that we cannot deliver on when the bill is enacted.

The Convener: This is your last question, Liam.

Liam McArthur: I have to say that on the basis that the announcement was made without the adequate funding—

Aileen Campbell: No; we have made this financial memorandum—

The Convener: I am going to interrupt you, minister. Liam McArthur can ask his question, and then you can come back briefly.

Aileen Campbell: Okay. I apologise.

10:45

Liam McArthur: I appreciate that any bill of this nature is likely to introduce something in a phased way. Save the Children is telling us that part of the phased introduction of early learning and childcare can be done by extending it to two-year-olds living in poverty over the course of this parliamentary session. Therefore, I am trying to ascertain whether you are in any way open to listening to those arguments and looking to review whether the bill in its current form can be extended to include such support.

Aileen Campbell: It can be extended with secondary legislation.

Liam McArthur: So you are not prepared to do that as part—

Aileen Campbell: What I am doing is making sure that what we deliver for three and four-year-olds and looked-after two-year-olds is done in a manageable way. What I do not want is to see headlines in the paper like we have seen in other parts of the UK, where the sector has said that the capacity is not there. We have seen arguments over ratios and uncertainty there. I am not prepared to allow that when we are delivering childcare for three and four-year-olds. We want it to be a quality offering, done in a manageable and sustainable way, and that is what we are achieving through the provisions in the bill and the funding that goes along with it.

Liam McArthur: Okay. In a country where the issues are higher—

The Convener: I am sorry, Liam. I interrupted the minister and I am going to interrupt you. We will conclude it there and move on to the next area of questioning. We are running out of time, and I want to get through some important issues.

Jayne Baxter (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab): Good morning. Will the minister support the proposal by Who Cares? Scotland, Aberlour Child Care Trust and Barnardo’s Scotland to rename “aftercare” as “continuing care services” for the purpose of part 8? The bill seeks to align part 8 with part 7’s corporate parenting duties, which place a continued duty on corporate parents towards young care leavers to 26 years of age.

Aileen Campbell: I have been listening with real interest to the discussions that you have had with the providers of the information that you have. I have looked with real interest at and valued the committee’s input in terms of looked-after children as well—particularly the issue of throughcare and aftercare, because that is crucial. We want to get things right, based on the needs of the child, and provide throughcare and aftercare at a point that is relevant to that child.

We can look at and discuss amendments at stage 2. We would welcome the committee’s views in its stage 1 report and will continue to take a real interest in the on-going discussions on that issue.

Jayne Baxter: The minister will be aware that birth parents have a legal duty to care for their children up to the age of 18, even if that child leaves at the age of 16 and decides to return home for further support. Why does the corporate parent’s duty of care to looked-after children finish when those children turn 16?

Aileen Campbell: As I said, we want to make sure that decisions taken about when a child leaves care are made in the child’s best interests and are sensitive to the child’s needs. It is not our policy to encourage young people to leave care before they are ready, and that is reflected in all our current regulations and guidance.

Jayne Baxter: Would the minister agree therefore that part 8, as it is currently proposed, places an unnecessary responsibility on vulnerable young people to seek the help that they need? Do you think that it would be better for them to be consistently, routinely and appropriately assessed, rather than for them to have to seek out the help they need on an on-going basis?

Aileen Campbell: The point at which a young person makes the transition into independent living is a time when they are very vulnerable and need to be supported. If they want that help, they can get it. We want to make sure that, when they make the transition to independence at that very vulnerable point in their lives, they have the necessary support that they want, to enable them to flourish.

Jayne Baxter: Do you agree that they might need additional support to know what facilities and resources are available to them? Should it be up to them to go and find them? Should someone be looking out for them?

Aileen Campbell: If there is a need for support at the point they transition to independence, that need should be met. There are provisions throughout the bill—in terms of the named person and other elements and areas of the bill—to make sure that that support is provided to the young person.

I am interested in the dialogue and discussions that the committee has been having with the likes of Who Cares? Scotland and others about how we can ensure that we get part 8 of the bill absolutely right. Far too often, we hear stories in which support has not always been there. We need to ensure that that support is in place.

I am also interested in the discussions that the committee is having about support being provided until someone is 26 years old to ensure that the support that we have in place is adequate and allows the young folk in question to have outcomes that are no different from those of their peers who are not looked after.

Jayne Baxter: The eligibility criteria are fundamental to that. The criteria for aftercare set the qualifying threshold for support as being in care on the day that the child can legally leave school. Do you agree that the qualifying threshold for aftercare support should recognise the impact of a child’s journey through the care system, regardless of when they cease to be looked after?

Aileen Campbell: Yet again, I am sympathetic to some of the views that are coming through as the bill makes its way through Parliament. I stress my keen interest in the discussions that the committee has been having on that area, which we need to get right if we are to enable those young people who leave care to get the right support and to go on and have the outcomes that they deserve.

The Convener: Liam McArthur has a brief supplementary question.

Liam McArthur: I echo the sentiments of Jayne Baxter, and I am grateful for the willingness that the minister has shown to take them on board.

I have a follow-up question on the role that local authorities have in, and the decisions that they take about, the care that is provided. Some concern has been expressed about the scope for appealing decisions by local authorities. It has been suggested that steps need to be taken to address that and that, as part of that, consideration should perhaps be given to advocacy support so that such cases can be prosecuted as effectively as possible. Are those areas in which work is being done, or would you be prepared to look at them at stages 2 and 3?

Aileen Campbell: Work has been done on advocacy. During the summer, there was a consultation on it, which we will reflect on.

I go back to the point that we want to make the bill work. If there are gaps in the provisions that we have laid out, we will listen to what the committee has been told and to what it says in its report.

David Blair might like to comment on some of the specifics. Where did you suggest that there might be a gap?

Liam McArthur: In relation to how decisions that local authorities take might be appealed when there is a lack of provision or inadequate provision.

David Blair (Scottish Government): We have been working with Who Cares? Scotland on that issue in relation to care leavers in particular. We are trying to avoid creating more and more bureaucratic systems to compensate for the existing bureaucratic systems. The whole principle of the care-leaving provisions is about normalising the care experience for young people who leave care. One of the things that we are looking at—is this not Government policy; it is about the legitimate work that we are doing to help pin down exactly what is sought—is moving in the direction of putting more emphasis on the quality of the relationship between the social worker or the relevant person in the child’s life who makes a decision and the child or young person.

What that means is another question, which requires a bit more work. It would be preferable from the point of view of what we are trying to achieve with the bill if we could move to a system more like that, because that would replicate the sort of relationship that a child in a normal family has when they ask for something from a parent. That is what we are trying to get at. We are working with Who Cares? on some of the detail in advance of stage 2 to help put some meat on the bones so that we know how to scope the issue and react.

The Convener: Thank you very much—that was helpful.

Neil Bibby: I want to ask a couple of questions about kinship care. Some kinship carers—particularly the kinship carers of looked-after children—have expressed concern that they might get a lower level of support if they were to obtain a kinship care order. What is the incentive for a kinship carer of a looked-after child to apply for one of the new kinship care orders?
Aileen Campbell: The kinship care order is about providing an enhanced form of permanence in kinship care. It is also about recognising the best interests of the child and the fact that they are not always best served by having the formal looked-after status. The order would allow anyone making the transition from being formally looked after into an informal kinship care setting to receive support. That recognises that there might be issues in areas where the family needs support, but without the intrusive intervention of the state, which is what being formally looked after means.

Neil Bibby: If the child is moved from looked-after to non-looked-after status, the kinship carer may gain entitlement to welfare benefits such as child tax credit and child benefit. Can you clarify whether the value of those benefits would be deducted from any transitional financial allowance paid by the local authority?

Aileen Campbell: The bill contains a right to transitional support, so the package of support that existed for the child and carer continues for a period once the child leaves care. There are details on page 28 of the policy memorandum.

As regards financial support, in general, carers of looked-after children are not eligible for child benefit or child tax credit. The local authority pays allowances. Informal carers, including those with a kinship care order, are generally eligible. The kinship care order should help to shift some of the burden to the benefits system.

Neil Bibby: So the benefits gained from the Department for Work and Pensions would be deducted from any transitional financial allowance paid by the local authority.

Aileen Campbell: For an informal or formal carer?

Neil Bibby: If a child is moved from looked-after to non-looked-after status through the kinship care order, the carer would be entitled to benefits, as you have said. Can you clarify whether those benefits would be deducted from the transitional financial allowance paid by the local authority?

Aileen Campbell: There should not be a problem with informal kinship carers interacting with the DWP. The issue is always around the formal kinship carer. David Blair has an example.

David Blair: We did not design the measures to be complicated. I refer to paragraph 121 on page 28 of the policy memorandum. Where a kinship carer has petitioned for a kinship care order and the effect of it is that a child leaves care, the carer is not currently entitled to any on-going financial support.

Let us suppose, for instance, that a carer had an allowance of about £150 a week from a local authority while the child was looked after. Once the child leaves care, we would expect the carer, if they rely on benefits, to have a cleaner relationship with the benefits system. They would claim child benefit and child tax credit in the normal course of things, which would take them up to a certain level. We modelled a top-up payment from local authorities to ensure that there was parity while the carer received transitional support. That is what the measures are designed to do.

Neil Bibby: So the benefits would be deducted.

David Blair: The carers would not be entitled to the same allowance under the kinship care order. It would not make any sense to squeeze out of the benefits system people who would have an underlying entitlement.

The Convener: For absolute clarity, if things were not done in the way that you have suggested, it would possibly mean that moving from looked-after status to non-looked-after status would result in an increase in payments.

David Blair: Yes.

The Convener: And that would be rather perverse.

David Blair: Yes.

The Convener: The effect is to level out the payments. That is the purpose.

David Blair: Yes.

The Convener: That is helpful. Thank you.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): Part 5 of the bill allows for a child’s plan, should a child require targeted intervention. A number of submissions have been made to the committee, expressing concern about how that might work. In particular, there is concern about how a child’s plan would operate alongside statutory and non-statutory plans, which are also required. How would that all be brought together into one plan? Does the bill adequately address that situation?

Aileen Campbell: The bill is not intended to increase any bureaucracy; it aims to ensure that what we have in the end is much more co-ordinated in its approach. The intention is not to alter the specific statutory duties to prepare a co-ordinated support plan or a plan for a child who is looked after. All those plans would be considered part of the broader framework in supporting the wellbeing of the individual or young person. Much of the detail would be included in any subordinate legislation that we make or in any guidance that we prepare.

Colin Beattie: Is it an obstacle to GIRFEC being adequately introduced if the integration that is detailed in the bill does not happen?
Aileen Campbell: The bill provides a framework to ensure that adequate integration allows the child to benefit from the best possible service. Again, I point to the information that the committee has had from Bill Alexander and Highland about how the much more co-ordinated approach has reduced bureaucracy and cut out a lot of the things that prevent a child from getting the right services that they need. The bill is intended to enhance the service that children get.

Colin Beattie: Does the framework of wellbeing and the introduction of the child’s plan create a need to review the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 and the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009, as well as the guidance and assessment reporting on curriculum for excellence? Is there a knock-on effect?

Aileen Campbell: GIRFEC is not something that is added on to the way in which we deal with young people and children in Scotland. We are making it part and parcel of how we do business. Cognisance will therefore need to be taken of the new legislative landscape once the bill is passed. For the child’s plan, we will need to make sure that all the different parts of the legislation properly dovetail to enable the best possible service to be given to a child.

Neil Bibby: On the financial memorandum, obviously you believe that there are sufficient resources to implement the provisions in the bill. Given the points raised by the Finance Committee and the evidence that we have heard, I urge you to review the costs as laid out in the financial memorandum. What happens if there are not sufficient resources? What is the Government’s back-up plan if extra resources are required for implementation of the bill?

Aileen Campbell: We will always monitor the impact. Aside from what is set out in the financial memorandum, the Government has regular dialogue with appropriate providers about budgets.

Neil Bibby: I hear you saying that you will monitor the situation. The Scottish Government has undertaken to fully fund the implementation of the provisions in the bill, but if there is not enough money for that, what will happen? Will the costs fall to be paid by local authorities or will the Scottish Government step in? Is there a contingency plan for what will happen if there is not enough money?

Aileen Campbell: The provisions in the financial memorandum sit apart from the fact that, in the new legislative landscape, there will be ongoing and regular dialogue about budgets between Government and the local authorities and health boards.
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered a draft Stage 1 report and agreed various changes. The Committee agreed to consider a revised draft, in private, at its next meeting.

Introduction

1. As Scotland’s largest solely Scottish children’s charity, we warmly welcome the publication of the draft Children and Young People Bill and the opportunity to submit evidence around its general principles at stage 1. We broadly support the Bill and its provisions, but would like to offer some minor observations and suggestions for amendment that we believe would enhance and strengthen the provisions of the Bill.

General points:

Lack of a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment

2. Initially, this Bill was to be brought to Parliament following the passage of the Rights of Children and Young People Bill and in the new legislative context that would present. Proceeding on this basis would have ensured that consideration and promotion of children’s rights remained at the very heart of the Children and Young People Bill and throughout its provisions. It is regrettable that Scottish Government has elected not to undertake a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment on the Bill. Such an omission leads us to act when exactly CRIA’s are to be used if not in the passage and preparation of such a flagship Bill.

Definition of a service provider

3. We are concerned that the term ‘service provider’ is used interchangeably throughout the Bill to mean different groups of providers. At times, the term will include voluntary sector service providers and at others it is limited solely to statutory providers. We would suggest that clearer nomenclature is considered to better define the groups referred to in each section of the Bill. For instance: ‘statutory service providers’ or ‘all service providers’.

Comments and suggested changes to the draft Bill

Part 1: Rights of Children and Young People

Full Incorporation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child into Scots Law:

4. Aberlour seeks the full incorporation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child into Scots law and we believe this bill represents an opportunity for the Scottish Government to lead the United Kingdom in enabling Scotland to be the first nation to fully incorporate.

5. Part 1 as it stands will do very little to further children’s rights in Scotland and should in our opinion be replaced with a new part which fully incorporates the UNCRC into Scots law. This could be done either by placing a duty on Scottish Ministers and public bodies to ‘act compatibly’ with the UNCRC or to fully legally incorporate the convention into statute, in a similar manner to the incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights in the UK Human Rights Act.

6. We support the work of Together (The Scottish alliance for Children’s Right’s), of which we are members, to press for an amendment which will bring about incorporation or, should such an amendment fall, a much stronger part 1 which will give children and young people access to legal redress should their rights be violated through action or inaction by the state.

Part 2: Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland

7. We fully support the proposals within the Bill to extend the powers of the Children’s Commissioner but would respectfully ask that the committee consider the following extension to the proposals:

   Extending the powers of the Commissioner to allow them to investigate matters pertaining to a reserved power:

8. Investigations by the Commissioner (Section 5) proposes to repeal part of the Commissioner for Children and Young People Act (Scotland) 2003 to allow the investigation of cases pertaining to an individual child and we fully support this. We would however like to see the Bill go further to also omit Section 7, subsection 3 paragraph (a) which currently prohibits the Commissioner from undertaking investigation into anything relating to a matter reserved to Westminster. We believe there is an argument for allowing the Commissioner to investigate cases relating to reserved matters, such as those pertaining to welfare reform and issues affecting separated children seeking asylum in Scotland, omitting paragraph (a) would lift this restriction.

   Requiring parliament to consider the report of an investigation by the Commissioner:

9. Part 2: Section 5 clause 4 of the draft Bill includes additions to the 2003 Act which provide for the commissioner to lay reports of general and individual investigations before the parliament. Again, we welcome these additions but feel the Bill should extend the 2003 Act to include a duty on Parliament to consider such a report either in full chamber through a debate, or by the Committee deemed most relevant to the subject matter of the report.

Part 3: Children's Services planning

   Requiring Authorities and CPPs to reflect the Children’s Services Plan in the Single Outcome Agreement

10. Section 12 - Implementation of children’s services plan, puts requirement on local authorities to provide services in accordance with the children’s services plan. We warmly welcome the joined up approach to planning and service delivery that such a provision seeks to foster, but believe that this could be further strengthened with direct references to community planning and the development of the Single Outcome Agreement.
11. It is clear from the recent government review of community planning that the Single Outcome Agreement still represents the principle strategic document for local government in terms of the delivery of local outcomes. If this is the case, then it would seem logical to require local authorities and community planning partnerships to link the children’s services plan to the single outcome agreement, and ensure the mutual compatibility of both in primary legislation.

12. This could be done through amendment to both sections 12 and 13. Section 13 makes provision for reporting and we would like to see reference to delivery of the outcomes pertaining to the children’s services plan described in the Single Outcome Agreement.

Part 4: Provision of named persons

13. General comment 1: Aberlour firmly supports the legislative basis for Getting It Right For Every Child that this draft Bill proposes to create. We note there has been a campaign opposing part 4 by special interest groups and we feel such a campaign is both misinformed and risks undermining the piece of legislation which is both timely and wholly compatible with the rights, interests and welfare of both children and their families.

14. General comment 2: There is no provision in the Bill for reassigning a named person when there is a conflict of interests for the original named person or when their relationship with the child breaks down irreparably. A conflict of interests might exist for example when the head teacher of a rural primary school is named person for all of the children in their School, and their own children attend that school. It would not seem appropriate for a parent to be the named person for their child. Similarly, if the named person were to start a relationship with the child’s parent, they would no longer be able to discharge their duties dispassionately and we feel the Bill should make provision for reassigning a named person.

Ensuring that the named person service, will not be ‘contracted out’

15. Section 19 (3) (a) defines those people who can provide a named person service. It is the second sub clause in this section: 19 (3) (a) (ii) which causes us some concern, it seems to suggest that the named person service could be delivered by someone at arms-length from the actual service being delivered to the child: ‘is, or is an employee of, a person who exercises any function on behalf of the service provider’. We, along with others in the sector, would like assurances that this does not suggest that the named person service could be ‘contracted out’ as this could prove incompatible with the spirit of the named person service as being a point of contact for the family who is already known to them.

Provision of named persons for babies in prison

16. Section 20 in Part 4 - Named person service in relation to pre-school child, stipulates that it is up to the health board to assign a named person to each pre-school age child in their jurisdiction. We endorse this but would query whether this is sufficient to ensure that all children in this category will be covered.
Aberlour gives staffing support to Scotland’s only Mother and Baby unit at HMP Cornton Vale. It is not clear to us as to how a health board appointed named person would interface with a mother and her baby who were in custody, and we would suggest that in these exceptional circumstances, the Scottish Prison Service might appoint a named person from among their staff to act as named person for the duration of that families’ sentence.

Ensuring children with profound disabilities who live in hospital or another residential care setting are allocated a named person

17. Section 21 - Named person service in relation to children not falling within section 20, lists groups of school age children that would not otherwise be allocated a named person under section 20. We believe that this list should be expanded to include those children who, due to profound disability or long term illness do not go to school and reside in hospital or another residential care setting. This would need to be reflected in Section 30 – interpretation of Part 4. The Committee may wish to consider other groups that may not fall within section 20, such as children in the Gypsy Traveller community or those educated at home.

The appropriate sharing of relevant information regarding parents

18. Section 26 - Information sharing; requires a service provider or relevant authority to share information relevant to a child’s welfare and wellbeing. We cautiously support this, so long as sufficient safeguards exist to promote and protect the child’s right to privacy. We also feel that this should include a duty on adult service providers to share relevant information about parents which might have a material impact on the wellbeing of a child. This is because information of relevance to a child’s wellbeing may not solely be about them but other things like parental mental health, or domestic living arrangements.

Relationship between named person and lead professional

19. In section 28, we feel there is a lack of clarity around the relationship between the named person and the lead professional and that this lack of clarity has fuelled some of the negative campaigns against part 4. Perhaps a new section is required which clearly sets out the relationship between the named person, underpinned by statutory guidance defining each role.

Part 5: Child’s Plan

Ensuring the views of children and their parents are properly obtained and regarded

20. Section 31 Child’s plan: requirement- requires the responsible authority to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child and the child’s parents 'so far as reasonably practicable'. We are concerned that this term: ‘so far as reasonably practicable’ might allow Local Authorities to avoid going to any trouble to ascertain the views of the family. We would recommend the deletion of this phrase.

Not using maturity as an excuse to disregard the views of a child
21. Section 33 Preparation of a child’s plan (7) reads:

   In having regard to the views of the child the authority preparing the child’s plan is to take account of the child’s age and maturity

22. This suggests that when it is considering the views of a child, the authority can choose to ignore these views on grounds of maturity. We don’t think authorities should ever be able to use maturity of as grounds to dismiss the views of a child, but we do think they should consider the child’s maturity when considering the best way to seek the views of the child as such we recommend section 7 be amended to read:

   (7) In obtaining the views of the child the authority preparing the child’s plan is to take account of the child’s age and maturity

23. This amendment should be applied to section 37 (3) for the same reasons.

Part 7 Corporate parenting

Allowing residential and foster care providers, to hold corporate parental responsibilities by application

24. Section 50 - Corporate parenting: refers to a list contained in schedule 3 of some 26 individuals or groups who make up the corporate parent. We ask that a 27th group be added to include residential and foster care providers who can join the corporate parent by application.

25. Residential and foster carers take daily parenting decisions as a matter of course but are not allowed to take official decisions or will have to seek approval from social work to allow the child to engage in a range of activities from going on holiday, to appealing school placement decisions. This can cause significant delays, increased work-loads for social workers and unnecessary tension between social work and carers.

26. If we are content to place the day to day wellbeing and safety of these young people in the care of foster and residential care providers then we would suggest that they be afforded full parental decision making powers. We suggest that this be by application as some foster carers may not feel comfortable in having this level of responsibility.

   Expanding the defined responsibilities of the Corporate Parent to ensure the child is communicated with and made aware of the support available to them.

27. Section 52 Corporate parenting responsibilities: includes a list of the responsibilities of the corporate parent. We support these responsibilities but believe that it should be expanded to include responsibilities to:

   - Maintain appropriate levels of communication with the child or young person to whom the order applies
   - And to make those children and young people aware of the support available to them both during and after their time in care
Addressing conflict between elements of the corporate parent, either in statute or guidance

28. Section 54 Collaborative working among corporate parents defines the duties of collaboration incumbent on all actors who form the corporate parent. We believe that this section requires either a third party or statutory guidance which sets out means of resolving conflict between those individuals who form part of the corporate parent who may from time to time disagree on the delivery of the child’s plan or around a key decision pertaining to the child.

Part 8 Aftercare

29. General comment: This represents one of the most important sections of the draft Bill and the one which we feel will make the most positive impact of any of the draft proposals. We thank the Government for its plans to improve provision in this critical area and bolster earlier commitments and offer our full support.

Broadening the definition of care leaver to include those who have been looked after, but were no longer looked after at the age they leave school

30. Section 60: Provision of aftercare: Amends the 1995 Act to provide support to Care leavers up to the age of 26. We support all the proposed amendments to the 1995 Act, but suggest that this Bill should also seek in section 29 of the 1995 act — subsection (1) to delete “at the time when they ceased to be of school age or any subsequent time”

31. We feel this further amendment is necessary as it seeks to expand those young people who could be classified as a ‘care-leaver’ by removing the proviso that to receive this classification they were in the care system at the point at which they ceased to be of School age or at some point thereafter. This is necessary as it will ensure support is still offered to those for whom an order may have ended before they have left school but still may require support.

Giving care leavers a route of appeal and redress when a local authority decides they are not eligible for after care support

32. We feel there should be some means of redress and appeal on the part of the care leaver against the decision of the local authority both in section 29 (3) of the 1995 Act and perhaps through a new section 5(a) of the new Bill.

Automatic serious case reviews when care leavers die.

33. We have been working with Barnardos Scotland and others to see the inclusion in section 60 of a new clause which will amend the 2009 Looked After Children regulations (specifically regulation 6) to ensure that a serious case review is conducted in the event of the death of a care leaver up to the age of 36.

Creating a duty on LAs to provide age appropriate refuge to young runaways who ask for it
34. This proposed change strengthens the 95 Act, by changing the power conferred to authorities to provide refuge to young runaways that ask for it, into a duty to provide refuge. Very few local authorities currently act on this power and provide refuge under section 38.

35. After part 8 at line 31 we suggest the insertion of a new: Part 8 (a)

   61: Short term refuges for children at risk of harm: the 1995 Act is amended as follows.

36. In section 38- (a) in subsection 1(a) ‘for may’ substitute ‘must’

   Alex Cole-Hamilton
   Head of Policy, Aberlour Child Care Trust
   5 July 2013
1. Action for Children Scotland is committed to helping the most vulnerable children and young people break through injustice, deprivation and inequality, so they can achieve their full potential. Through our work and through speaking out, we empower children to overcome the obstacles in their lives and hold them back. We work directly with thousands of children and young people in 75 services across Scotland. We also promote social justice by lobbying and campaigning for change. We tailor our work to local circumstances, in partnership with children and young people, families, communities and local organisations.

General comments

2. Action for Children is very supportive of the broad policy reforms proposed in this Bill. Our comments are intended to inform the effective implementation of the measures included.

3. Action for Children supports stronger legislative measures to fully incorporate the UNCRC into Scots law and the calls for a Child Rights Impact Assessment to be undertaken on the Bill. We also support the increased responsibility of the role of Scotland’s Children Commissioner (Part 2) to be able to consider individual cases. Monitoring action and making public (where appropriate) the findings and responses from all formal investigations will be essential.

4. We strongly support proposals to put GIRFEC on a statutory footing and are particularly supportive of the focus on early intervention and family support within the Bill. In research on child neglect undertaken by the University of Stirling in partnership with Action for Children, we found that there was broad and genuine support for GIRFEC, but that it needs time to embed. Specifically there needs to be a far greater connection between the ‘child protection system’ and the GIRFEC framework as there still appears to be a gap between the developments defined as falling within the GIRFEC remit and developments associated with the child protection system. To support children’s wellbeing their needs should be seen as a continuum with help offered at the earliest possible stage; promoting a wider understanding of wellbeing that works across ‘systems’ will be a helpful step towards addressing this.

5. Action for Children supports the SHANARRI Wellbeing Indicators. This is a well-established and positive tool with a helpful focus on the range of protective factors. In addition the domains included resonate well with children and young people themselves. It is important that the existing outcomes frameworks are able to overlap and work with SHANARRI.

6. We are also supportive of proposals to increase the number of hours of funded early learning and childcare, but would like to see the priority afforded to 2 year-olds who are looked after broadened to all children in need. Finally, we support proposals that care-leavers should have greater entitlements to request care and support, but also believe that the Bill should be amended to firm up their entitlements as well as to afford these young people the choice to remain in care until they are 26.

Comments on specific provisions

Part 3, Sections 10, 12, 13, 14 – Implementation of children’s services plan

7. Action for Children is strongly supportive of the Bill’s aim to improve joint working and planning to improve children and young people’s wellbeing. Without this local tie-up agencies will find it increasingly difficult to plan together for the long-term.

8. At a time of increasingly scarce resources it will be important that the ‘delivery’ aspect of the proposed duty is given as much, if not more attention as the elements that relate to design and planning.

9. We strongly recommend that measures to improve joint working through children’s services planning include a duty of enforcement particularly around the delivery of outcomes and for accountability. More specific details are required in terms of the implications of these duties for the delivery of services and reporting on outcomes across different ‘systems’ or agencies, particularly in contract partnerships between the third sector organisations and local authorities.

10. Partners need to feel responsible for action being taken and for actually improving the lives of children and young people, rather than just a requirement to contribute to information sharing or joint assessment processes. We would be happy to contribute our experience from working across a range of local areas in partnership with public bodies and provide examples of our robust accountability and best practice methods. As major providers of services for children, young people and families, the role of the voluntary sector will need to be worked into new duties and any guidance that follows. This is crucial to ensuring that all agencies delivering and planning services are accountable and considered as equal players within the joint arrangements.

11. We note that there is nothing in statute, or any proposals in the Bill, linking children’s service planning to the Single Outcome Agreement (SOA). Measures should be included in the Bill to ensure that the children’s service planning is reflected in Community Planning and the SOA, ensuring compatibility between these frameworks. We recommend that children’s service planning is coordinated with Community Planning and the SOA in both the planning stage and in defined outcomes (under sections 12 and 13).

12. A healthy approach to integration with broader community planning may be to view a duty on joint design, planning and service delivery (Part 3) through the lens of early intervention, and to specifically express the aim to provide preventative and early help through the new duty, making the link to the broader benefits inherent to community planning on that basis.
Part 4 – Provision of Named Persons

13. Action for Children supports the proposal to provide a point of contact for children, young people and families through a universal approach to the Named Person role if this is delivered in a way that recognises and encourages trusted professional relationships with children and young people. The Named Person’s ability to take on the responsibilities listed will be dependent on time, training, resources and organisational support. We suggest that flexibility is needed to include robust arrangements for children who are educated at home and for children with particular vulnerabilities/needs.

14. Further clarity is needed in the Bill as to the working relationship between the Lead Professional and the Named Person, underpinned by statutory guidance defining each role. Consideration also needs to be given to the potential conflict of interest if the Named Person, who has a duty to advocate on behalf of a child, is also a member of a public body and has a role in decisions about access to services. We recognise that the Named Person could be helpful in addressing problems at the interface between universal and statutory ‘protection’ services, especially when parents do not accept the concerns.

Part 5 – Child’s Plan

15. Action for Children supports the single Child’s Plan. Existing good practice should be identified and shared, particularly where areas have successfully engaged agencies or professionals who had been resistant to the joint planning. The voluntary sector will have an important role to play in this process, often we serve to facilitate dialogue between agencies. For example, Action for Children currently has monthly-six week progress meetings with some local authorities.

16. Monitoring will be vital as it is not the production of the plan that will make a difference to children’s lives but rather its successful implementation. We need to learn lessons from previous initiatives where joint assessment and planning frameworks have not consistently translated into action. We feel that the child, young person and family should have a leading role in the development of the plan and have rights of access to the plan. These processes and rights should be set out in guidance not legislation as they will need to be both flexible and detailed (for example to include procedures where there are conflicts of interest between agencies over thresholds – or between parents and children).

17. Through our own consultations with children and young people regarding the Child’s Plan they were clear that plans must be written in accessible language and should include the child’s point of view. A number of person centred planning tools are already used with disabled children. These may be helpful not only to ensure disabled children and young people are involved, but as a guide when working with all children. A person centred planning pilot in one of Action for Children’s services has been evaluated, available at: http://www.actionforchildren.org.uk/media/144053/person_centred_planning_pilot.pdf
Part 6 – Early learning and childcare

18. Action for Children strongly supports the measures in the Bill to extend childcare entitlement to free early learning and childcare to 600 hours per annum, provided that there is a focus on quality provision. We believe that investing in child care, paid parental leave and effective family support services is the most effective way to improve child outcomes over the long term. Early learning and child care must be high quality, flexible, accessible and non-stigmatised.

19. Section 43, (3) outlines the extended 600 hours entitlement is to be applied to looked-after 2 year olds or those to whom kinship care orders apply. Action for Children welcomes this step but would highlight other groups of vulnerable children to whom this should be extended. These groups include: other vulnerable 2 year-olds who are not looked after (particularly those in poverty); children with additional support needs; and ideally all looked after children from birth onwards. When working with looked after and other vulnerable children it is essential that there is sufficient provision of specialist help to provide what is most needed, for example physiotherapy and speech and language therapy. We would also highlight the need for further support for out of school care for school age children, which is not mentioned in the Bill.

20. Section 48 outlines measures regarding flexibility to meet the needs of families, but flexibility is also required to meet the diverse needs of children. A report published on 25 July 2013 by the Family and Childcare Trust and Children in Scotland indicates that of the local authorities that have some knowledge about the supply of childcare in their area, there is a particular shortage of childcare for disabled children. It would be helpful if the Bill made specific reference to the support of disabled children. We are concerned that additional measures should be taken to ensure disabled children are afforded the same rights to child care as their non-disabled peers. Action for Children would be happy to discuss the practicalities of addressing childcare needs of disabled children.

Part 8 – Section 60 - Provision of aftercare to young people

21. Action for Children supports the proposals to extend the entitlements to support and assistance for looked after young people and care leavers. We would recommend that care-leavers should be able to request assistance from their local authority up to and including the age of 26. We also recommend that the Bill is amended to include a clause whereby a choice is offered to young people to remain in care until they are 26. We recognise that local authorities would need to develop both the infrastructure and resources to deliver on this. Furthermore we strongly recommend that there should be included in the Bill a means of redress and appeal on the part of the care leaver against the decision of the local authority if they determine that a young person is not eligible for after care support.

22. Action for Children works with vulnerable children and young people across Scotland. We know that many of the children in care we work with are still very vulnerable at 21 years of age and are not able to suddenly cope on their own. In our experience in Scotland, vulnerable young people have had to move into their own accommodation with no resources to fall back on. We have had cases where young people have become vulnerable to friends, and possibly birth family members, who have taken advantage of their circumstances.

23. We know that many foster carers are willing to continue to support the young people in their care, as they know the young person is not ready for independent living and they have built strong bonds which cannot simply be severed when the young person turns 21. If this proposal can help provide continuity in such circumstances it is to be strongly welcomed, but it will depend on the receipt of on-going local arrangements, not just the request for them. For this to be effective it will need to be proactively enforced in local areas. A key role for the Named Person should be to inform young people of their entitlements and ensure that help is offered once requested.

Part 10 – Support for kinship care

24. Action for Children supports the Bill’s intention to better acknowledge and meet the needs of kinship carers. We recommend a fuller consultation process whereby kinship carers and the affected children and young people are directly engaged. This group of children is particularly vulnerable and often they are not visible enough within our existing systems. The order should work to ensure that kinship carers are aware of the support that they are entitled to. But in addition to this it should serve to make these children visible within the system so that if safeguarding issues arise they can be addressed at the earliest possible stage.

25. We believe Part 10 of the Bill could be amended to make it more child focused. Ensuring that entitlements to support are effective and communicated will be the key consideration. Balancing this support to carers, while also ensuring that the wellbeing and protection of these vulnerable children is central to all decision making, will be the difficult issue in practice. This cannot be covered by legislation but again looking at the wellbeing domains in relation to these children and tracking their progress will ultimately be the most effective way to determine the success of the order.

26. We hope that you find our submission helpful. Please do not hesitate to contact us if you have any questions about any of the comments or suggestions we have made. We would be very pleased to expand on our evidence via oral evidence to the Committee and share our expertise and learning from working with children and families in Scotland.

Preliminary Comments

1. The Advisory Group for Additional Support for Learning (AGASL) advise Scottish Ministers on matters relating to the implementation of the Additional Support for Learning legislation. Its membership includes organisations representing a very wide range of stakeholders, and it is therefore well placed to offer a broad, strategic overview of issues arising from the Bill which are relevant to the existing Additional Support for Learning framework.

2. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill does not repeal, replace or significantly amend the Additional Support for Learning legislation. Given the multi-agency nature of the policy intention, it is therefore crucial that proper consideration is given to how these two legislative schemes will work together in getting it right for every child.

3. The Advisory Group notes that the Bill does not resolve the inconsistency in the definition of a parent in education legislation and the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. This has significant implications given the proposals for information sharing between agencies and the prominent role of education practitioners as named persons. It is particularly significant given the parental rights of access as set out in the Pupils Educational Records (Scotland) Regulations 2003. People who would not be recognised as parents in the Children (Scotland) Act will potentially have access to the files held by the Named Person in school.

4. With so many references within the Bill to matters yet to be decided by Scottish Ministers, it is essential that as these matters are progressed they are subject to further consultation. Some of these apply to fundamental areas of innovation (the Children’s Services Plan, the Named Person and the Child’s Plan) and will require particular attention to detail when so many hopes are pinned upon the success of this legislation leading to excellent practice in Scotland. This is especially the case in the absence of legislative overriding principles to assist practitioners. We need to be alert to the danger of unintended consequences, which may be avoided by full consultation on such matters.

Part 1 – Rights of Children

5. There is an inconsistency across relevant legislation with regard to the capacity of a child to make decisions. Currently, the ability to consent to medical intervention is presumed at age 12, yet a child cannot make a school placing request or take other decisions in relation to additional support for learning until the age of 16. In most instances education legislation affords rights to parents rather than the child. As part of the Scottish Government’s commitment to the United Nations Convention of the Rights of the Child (UNCRC), this legislation should be amended to provide the child with equivalent rights. Scottish Ministers have previously indicated\(^1\) that they looked favourably on proposals to grant children rights of appeal under the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 and this Bill would seem to be an ideal legislative vehicle for that amendment.

6. The Advisory Group would like to see the relevant rights from the United Nations Convention “hardwired” into the Bill, in the same way that Article 29 has been in the Additional Support for Learning Act. This makes the commitment of Parliament tangible, giving the rights a practical reality and allowing children to rely on them directly.

7. Reporting duties proposed by the Bill should be accompanied by duties on public bodies, including the Scottish Government, to implement the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Part 3 – Children’s Services Planning

8. Post school transitions for young people with additional support needs should have a higher profile within Community Planning structures to support better planning of post school services up to age 25 and to provide oversight and accountability.

9. A variety of evaluations and reports demonstrate that children’s transition to adult services is a general concern and in particular transitions within health and social care. There is a great deal of scope for agencies to further plan and develop integrated approaches to assessment and intervention by care agencies, education staff and the voluntary sector – including individuals making use of Self Directed Support. Where strategic planning does not take place early enough, young people and their parents often fall through the gaps between child and adult services. The Advisory Group have recommended that the Scottish Government develop an overall policy development framework which will ensure emerging, current and future policies impacting on the post school transitions of young people with additional support needs are aligned and integrated.

10. The duties of Scottish Ministers in relation to the rights of children outlined in Part 1 of the Bill are welcome. The Advisory Group expects that through these duties the Scottish Government would ensure that its directorates and policy teams would work closely to produce the required coherence.

11. The Advisory Group found that policy initiatives across education, social work, employability and health lacked cohesion in their design and implementation. Each was set within their own legislative framework and funded from different sources. As a result, at a local level, parents and young people too often found the services provided by the different agencies and professional disciplines did not join-up effectively making them difficult to access and navigate.

12. The Advisory Group is therefore very supportive of Part 3 of the Bill which will extend the existing duty to co-operate about the new children’s services plan to a wider range of bodies, voluntary organisations and services. This means services provided specifically to children must be planned with the aim of being integrated and representing efficient use of resources. Some young people cannot progress in their learning beyond school without other support. However, in our view the eligibility criteria for resources to support those with more complex needs has adverse consequences for forward planning and securing positive destinations for young people as they approach the transition to the adult world. Although services for adults are not included, section 9 of the Bill does set out the aims of plans in some detail to encompass those adult services capable of having a significant effect on children’s wellbeing. Our understanding is that relevant adult services should therefore be planned with a view to their impact on children’s wellbeing and this should be made clear in the Bill.

13. The Advisory Group considers that in order to further consolidate joined up transitional experiences for young people the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill to establish “integration joint boards” between Health and Social Care should include children’s services (including education) as well as adult services in order to support later transitions beyond the scope of this Bill.

Part 4 – Provision of Named Persons

14. The Advisory Group notes that there are no recommendations in the Bill about who within a local authority might perform the named person role for those who leave school at 16. This includes a group of very vulnerable young people who are at a high risk of being ‘not in education, employment or training’. All young people participating in post-16 learning, training or work should have access to a Named Person Service.

Part 5 – Child’s Plan

15. The Advisory Group notes that there is a need for considerable integration between all legislative frameworks which cover statutory plans for children and young people.

16. The Bill falls some way short of enabling one co-ordinated approach to planning. For example, a child’s plan will address outcomes, an Individualised Educational Programme sets targets and a Co-ordinated Support Plan refers to objectives. This represents a confusing picture to all, an inefficient use of resources and compromises transparency and accountability. The opportunity to harmonise the planning tools used for children into an efficient and coherent single plan must not be squandered.

17. The additional support for learning specialists on the Advisory Group consider that the Child’s Plan under this legislation must include and subsume the legal requirements for Co-ordinated Support Plans if the ‘One Child - One Plan’ objective is to be achieved. This will not work as a half measure – by simply embedding the existing legal requirement for a Co-ordinated Support Plan within a new planning format. ‘One Child One Plan’ will require amendment to other legislation if children and families are not to be perpetually engaged in different planning, review and appeal mechanisms.
18. The Advisory Group recommends a single plan in which each agency is responsible for its contributions. This needs to be supported by accessible, direct and proportionate means of redress. All agencies should be equally accountable under processes of dispute resolution rather than the uneven position (with a focus on Education Services within local authorities) that currently prevails.

19. An effective, independent dispute resolution mechanism must be available in the event of disagreement over the contents or delivery of such a plan. This should include an extension of the availability of mediation, independent adjudication and the Additional Support Needs Tribunal (for prescribed types of dispute). Judgements made in such disputes should make reference to the Children’s Service’s Plan.

20. The provisions to support information sharing must be appropriate, proportionate and timely and protect the child’s right to privacy. It should also protect parents’ rights to privacy, as far as this is consistent with the best interests of the child. The proposed threshold for sharing sensitive personal data about children is set too low in the Bill. The proposed statutory test that information to be shared “might be relevant” provides insufficient protection of the child’s right to privacy, whilst offering nothing that might allow others to act in the child’s best interests. The Advisory Group recognises that this is a difficult issue, but leaving the difficult decisions to be taken by individuals exercising subjective judgements on an ad hoc basis across Scotland is inefficient. We need the courage to provide the strong and positive guidance on data sharing that is essential for the concept of a Team Around the Child to be successful.

21. In any event, detailed guidance on information sharing will be essential. Safeguards, guidance and training will be required to ensure that sensitive personal data and confidential information is disclosed when necessary and agreed to; that the child’s and parents’ right to privacy is respected; and local authorities and other bodies do not increase their vulnerability to complaints of improper data handling. (See para 3, above)

22. The Advisory Group welcomes the duty to seek and take account of views of the child or young person, and the parent or carer. The Additional Support for Learning Code of Practice has helpful sections on good practice for consulting children, and working with parents. We would recommend that this is taken as a starting point in the preparation of a single statement of guidance for all children’s services.

Part 6 – Early Learning and Childcare

23. There needs to be a clear basis to prevent the child’s right under Article 29 becoming obscured in the integration of education with care and both Ministers and public bodies need to be accountable for this. There needs to be clear guidance on how the provisions of the Additional Support for Learning Act would be applicable in these circumstances. It will be challenging to determine when “school education” is being provided and when it is not. Guidance should also address safeguards to prevent a child’s educational entitlements being undermined by parental needs for flexible childcare.
24. The Advisory Group considers that further embedding the UN Convention within the Bill (see paragraph 6 above) would strengthen the rights of very young children to start school with age appropriate skills.

25. Whilst we welcome the focus within this Bill on early learning and care, the Advisory Group wishes to highlight the need for an appropriately skilled workforce to make the most of this opportunity in terms of early interventions and preventative care.

26. In order that the ASL framework can kick in as early as possible for young children who require additional support, and that transition into primary school is as smooth as possible, Scotland requires a skilled early years workforce, confident in identifying potential barriers to learning and knowledgeable about assessment or referral routes. This is a particular challenge for independent nursery providers. Education Scotland research further suggests that health visitor’s confidence in their abilities to assess/refer is patchy. Strong guidance making clear the links to the ASL referral and assessment processes, and training will be required to make the most of this opportunity for Scotland’s children.

27. Further, in order to secure the best possible outcomes for all children and young people, the Advisory Group recognises the fact that in the early years, the home is the primary learning environment in the majority of cases. Parents therefore are the primary educators, yet their needs are not mentioned in this Bill.

28. Where parents may themselves have potential barriers to parenting, via a variety of circumstances including addiction, disability, communication, or self identified parenting support needs, the Advisory Group believes that local support services should be provided to support the family as a whole, with the child’s needs firmly at the centre.

29. It would be helpful therefore if local children’s services planning and commissioning processes outlined elsewhere in the Bill (Part 3) therefore reflected the provision of parenting support, with a particular focus on early learning and childcare.

Part 13 – General

30. The Advisory Group welcomes the adoption of a universal definition of wellbeing and the basis on which this is done (SHANARRI indicators).

Advisory Group for Additional Support for Learning

19 July 2013
I refer to the consultation on the above Bill. Elected Members in Angus when considering the officer’s response to the consultation asked me to write and highlight three specific points.

1. Concerns regarding funding the implementation of the Bill. Elected members noted that the Cabinet Secretary has given a commitment to COSLA that the Bill will be fully funded from new money and will not come at any detriment to existing local government grant. However given that at this time it is difficult to calculate with any degree of accuracy how much implementation will cost without more detailed guidance on specific aspects of the Bill, Elected members are keen to get assurances that this commitment will be maintained as the costs of implementation become clearer. Elected members asked me to highlight that if the Bill is not fully funded then it will be extremely challenging to implement aspects of the Bill without detriment to other services.

2. Amendments to the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act. During the passage of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 through Parliament COSLA successfully argued for an amendment whereby the National Convener of Children’s Hearing Scotland must reach agreement with local authorities over the makeup of Area Support Team (replacements for Children’s Panel Advisory Groups). This replaced a much weaker clause which indicated the National Convener only had to consult with local authorities on the establishment of Area Support Teams. This safeguard was considered essential to stop local authorities being forced into unsuitable area support teams. The Bill now seeks to reverse COSLA’s amendment to the 2011 Act. Elected members are concerned that significant effort was put into working with neighbouring authorities and the national convener to reach agreement about a Tayside Area Support Team. Any amendments could mean that these agreements are changed without reference to the local authorities or the panel members involved. In Angus there is a long history of effective joint working between the local authority and the children’s panel and concern is expressed that the amendments proposed within the Bill will undermine these arrangements and will ultimately be to the detriment of the panel systems and the children and young people in Angus.

3. Concerns regarding Section 17(6) of the Bill. The Bill as published contains the proposal that where Scottish Ministers are not satisfied with joint working locally between local authorities and the NHS around children services planning they may “… constitute a joint board of the local authority and each relevant health board”. Concerns are expressed that there has been no previous consultation or discussions with COSLA on this proposal and that it could place Councils and local services at risk by creating a situation where significant restructuring of existing services could be undertaken by Ministers without the need for further legislation or consultation.
I trust that the Education and Culture Committee will consider the issues raised by the Elected Members in Angus and give them due consideration in their deliberations.

Margo Williamson
Strategic Director – People, Angus Council
1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

4. Ultimately this bill appears to be motivated by a philosophy that is at odds with those that undergird a free society. Specifically, the notions that government should be limited and only intervene when necessary or provided for under objective standards, that a free people are competent to raise their own children without interference or uninvited “help” from government bureaucrats, that information about children should be protected and only shared when written consent is given by parents or legal guardians. And finally, that in a free society the rights of families and the irreplaceable relationship between parents and children must be protected and respected. The proposed Scottish legislation turns the notion that parents are responsible for their children on its head and basically says that parents can't be trusted-only government can.

Education and Culture Committee
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Association of Directors of Education in Scotland

Part 1 Children’s Rights

1. ADES is fully committed to the developing and embedding of children’s rights. However it has to be acknowledged that many of the barriers to this are cultural and attitudinal rather than legal. Although the Bill supports this, there is a broader agenda of promoting children’s rights and providing genuine opportunities for having their individual and collective voices heard in all decisions which affect them.

2. While the focus on children’s rights is welcome we require greater clarity on what is meant by ‘give better or further effect to children’s rights’. This duty appears to be a duty to report on steps taken rather than a verification that policies are compliant with UNCRC or that they are having an impact on the lives of children. We do not believe that this is as sharply focussed as a requirement for compliance with UNCRC.

3. We believe that the range of scrutiny and audit activities in place ie School Inspections, Children’s Services Inspections, Audit Scotland, CPP Audits can provide appropriate reassurance to Government that Children’s Rights are being implemented and embedded in practice An additional reporting mechanism is not required.

Part 2 Investigation by the Commissioner

4. While there may be circumstances which would benefit from the power of the Commissioner to undertake general or individual investigations it should be noted that this is in the context of a confusing and overlapping range of mechanisms by which children and their parents can seek reviews and make appeals around entitlements, decisions or provisions of service. The ASN Act (Scotland) 2004 Revised 2009, offers parents and young people opportunities to challenge providers about their education, care and welfare and includes dispute resolution, mediation as well as the ASN Tribunal. The Children’s Hearing System in Scotland offers children and families the opportunity to have their voice heard within that context and legally binding decisions can be made that will ensure effective provision is implemented.

5. Local authorities also have well established complaints procedures which are available to parents, children and young people. We believe that the Bill should have addressed how a single protection of rights based on GIRFEC could ease some of the complexities inherent in the current system which parents, young people and professionals can find difficult to navigate.
Part 3 Children’s Services Planning

6. We support the requirement, the aims and the process indicated for the Children’s Services Plan. However, in section 13, we believe that the prime aim should be to focus on the outcomes for children and young people.

7. In relation to guidance in Children’s Services Planning, it would be important to ensure that there are long term evaluations rather than reportable short term proxy measures which may divert attention from the long term aims of the legislation. We have significant concerns around section 17 and the default powers of the Scottish Ministers. This appears to be focussed almost entirely on the role of Scottish Ministers to change structures and to direct resources rather than a consultative and meditative role where they feel that Councils and Health Boards are not achieving best outcomes required for children. This has significant implications for local authorities which were not made explicit during the consultation period.

Part 4 Provision of Named Person

8. The concept of the named person function, as defined, of itself presents no difficulties. However in the majority of circumstances a named person would be an education professional. While the profession recognises their responsibilities to be vigilant as to children’s wellbeing, provide support and ensure that appropriate support is accessed, issues of capacity to undertake the coordination and assessment around this role remain.

9. However, we believe that this should be for the service to identify an appropriate person with appropriate qualifications and not to be directed by the Scottish Ministers as outlined in 58, subsection 2 and 3.

10. In relation to 3-5 year olds, it would seem more appropriate that where children are taking up their entitlement to early education and care provision, which will increase, that this service should provide the named person for children aged three years and over. This makes more sense as over 90% of children take up their full entitlement and are seen on a daily basis by professional staff. Where this is not the case it would be appropriate for the named person to remain the Health Visitor.

11. We are concerned that in terms of allocating a named person, despite the fact that the Bill is quite clear that the named person function cannot be carried out by the parent of the child or young person, that the Bill remains silent on who the named person for children educated at home may be. It would be helpful to have clear direction for this.

12. We particularly welcome the duty to help the named person placed on a wider range of organisations.
Part 5 Child’s Plan

13. We fully support the development of a Child’s Plan where a wellbeing need has been identified. It will be important that the guidance recognises and supports this straightforward and practical approach to the development of a Child’s Plan and they do not become too bureaucratic or onerous. We recognise that paragraph 83, sub section 1, it is important that the Child’s Plan includes a statement of the child’s wellbeing and that the targeted intervention which requires to be provided in relation to the child to address the wellbeing need. Our concerns remain that the opportunity has not been taken to appropriately simplify planning in relation to the additional support for learning legislation and care planning.

Part 6 Early Learning and Childcare

14. We welcome the extension of universal early education and care provision. We welcome the greater flexibility in how this is delivered and believe that the parameters of a minimum of 2.5 hours and a maximum of 8 hours are appropriate. While greater flexibility and choice may be able to be delivered in the large urban areas with large private sector providers this could be challenging in rural areas or areas where partner nurseries are mainly in the voluntary sector. Many local enterprise and voluntary early years providers have ceased trading over the last year which means that local authorities are picking up greater costs for this.

15. A key issue will be increasing the provision whilst maintaining the quality and improving the capacity of early years providers to offer a wide range of supports to families.

Part 7 Corporate Parenting

16. We support the clarification of the concept of corporate parenting. It is helpful that this is more directly specified and the authorities to which it applies identified clearly. It is also important that these groups are planning together to ensure that all services are focussed on the wellbeing of these children who are our responsibility.

Association of Directors of Education in Scotland
12 August 2013
General

1. The Association of Directors of Social Work welcome the opportunity to provide this written evidence to the Education and Culture Committee on this Bill and looks forward to giving oral evidence to the Committee in September.

2. The Bill itself covers a large range of diverse issues and is therefore a complex piece of legislation. Overall, ADSW supports the policy direction and principles of the Bill, but would like to use this opportunity to explain to the Committee some of the concerns we have about both the content of the Bill, the proposed methods of implementation and highlight areas where we think the Bill can go further.

Removal of functions

3. This section of the Bill has prompted a lot of discussion both within ADSW and between ourselves and COSLA. This section, if implemented, would mean that Ministers would have the power to establish joint bodies to deliver integrated children’s services planning if they felt that local authorities and the NHS were not making significant progress in that area.

4. This power, which could be used without the need for further primary legislation would include the ability to transfer property, rights or liabilities of the local authority or relevant health boards, staff and supply of services or facilities to a joint body.

5. ADSW interpret this as a very centralising power, which could effectively remove functions from local authorities including social work services. It is unclear why this power has been included and it is also unclear the circumstances in which it might be used.

6. While there have been assurances from The Scottish Government to COSLA that they do not intend to use the power at the point of enactment of the legislation, there is the possibility that these powers can be invoked at any point after that and also may be used quite differently by subsequent administrations.

7. ADSW is also concerned that a similar provision is present in the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill and is disappointed that ministers see fit to include provisions in the Bill which anticipate failure.

Part one – rights of the child

8. ADSW welcomes the promotion and articulation of children’s rights within the Bill. Moreover, the consolidation of the UNCRC reflects not only the appropriate protection of children’s rights within Scotland, but the need to see such rights actively enhanced and promoted. With such rights however, the Bill must equally promote responsibilities’ and active citizenship.
9. Social work practice, with daily decisions and interventions being made, already attempt to balance such rights and responsibilities. Being in locum parentis, involves exercising fine judgements around risk management, personal responsibility and safeguarding. In addressing such rights, the profession seeks to mentor, influence and guide young people towards an appropriate exercise of their rights and their place in society.

10. In accepting the proposal set out in part one of the Bill, the profession would seek to highlight this complex context.

Part two – commissioner for children and young people

11. ADSW would seek further clarification on the parameters of the extended power/intervention of this office. The view from the Association is that significant scrutiny and regulation is currently in place. In addition, Local Authorities have established complaint processes to regulate the quality of care/support to children/young people.

12. Advocacy is not a separate or unique activity to frontline social work practice. Advocacy remains a core task in effective social work practice. While, as a matter of routine there are disputes between social work (the adult/locum parentis) and the child/young person, these are often the very focus of our involvement/intervention and consequently a natural component of the work we do.

13. ADSW believes that the role and availability of mediation should be enhanced to reconcile disputes and different views. The role of the commissioner and the additional powers should be both explicit and exceptional.

Part three – children service planning

14. It should be noted there are many good examples of locality planning and local collaboration to improve and secure better outcomes for children.

15. This Bill should be considered and strengthened within the context of the Early Years Collaborative, concentrating on the needs of localities and embedding support and co-ordination into local communities.

16. Early intervention, breaking the cycle of poverty and impacting on the damaging relationship many people have with alcohol and drugs is most effectively tackled at a local level and predicated on local partnerships having the right resources and investment to address need. Perceived deficits in performance often have a strong correlation with a deficit in resources.

17. In ADSW’s operational experience, the deficit is less to do with the quality and effectiveness of the plan or the planning process and more to do with the scale of the challenge around poverty, deprivation and social need. Rectifying the plan at the expense of resources and local democracy is not helpful and significantly compromises the positive elements of the Bill.
Part four – provision of named person

18. ADSW remains supportive of the Getting It Right For Every Child initiative, further clarification is required to dovetail any guidance from the Bill with the already significant material available on the Government website for GIRFEC.

Part five – child’s plan

19. ADSW endorses and supports a single plan for a child, however further guidance/co-ordination with elements of the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 will be necessary to achieve this.

Part six – early learning and child care

20. ADSW recognises the critical role of early learning and the significant contribution of our colleagues in Education in ‘breaking the cycle’ and securing better outcomes for our most disadvantaged and marginalised children. ADSW is eager to support early learning as a mechanism to enhance earlier and effective intervention.

21. The Financial Memorandum will require further scrutiny to ensure the Bill delivers the aspiration of 600 hours. Funding to deliver this will be critical.

22. ADSW is disappointed, however, that children with disabilities is scarcely mentioned in the Bill.

Part seven – corporate parenting

23. ADSW welcomes the Bill’s desire to strengthen and extend corporate parenting. The Association has many examples of good practice to highlight that the aspirations are already well understood. Never the less, the concept of corporate parenting across public bodies will need to be carefully defined. Increasing expectation will still require prioritisation against committed resources.

Part eight – after care

24. Clarification around eligibility is critical and relative to welfare reform. Moreover, coherence with the Social Care (Self-directed Support) (Scotland) Act 2013 is critical.

Part nine – council and services

25. ADSW views the term ‘counselling’ as too prescriptive and likely to undermine the critical assessment process. Likewise the reference to family group conferencing is unhelpful. ADSW would seek to assist to clarify any guidance around this support.

Part ten – support for kinship care

26. ADSW is concerned that the primary objective of reducing formal care and thus the financial cost to councils is unlikely to be secured within the parameters of this Bill. The Bill and any secondary legislation need to clarify the role and responsibility of the council in these matters, the role of the carers and family life and the distinction between formal and informal kinship care.

27. In reality, the incentive to secure an order will be predicated on confidence around ongoing financial support and the contribution from DWP. Again, a read across to current welfare reform and in particular the ‘bedroom tax’ will be critical.

Part eleven – the national adoption register

28. ADSW maintains that providing clear timescales and options for using the national adoption register would be preferable to making use of the register statutory at the point adopters are approved or when children are registered as being in need of adoption.

29. Sensitive application of any statutory penalties for not using the register in the required timescales should be considered further. The matching of children with families demands great skill and flexibility and can not be accelerated to the detriment of children or families.

Financial implications

30. We have assurances from the Scottish Government that the Bill will be fully funded. However, some aspects of the Bill may generate demand that is difficult to quantify at this stage. ADSW supports fully the following aspects of the Bill and would accept a position where full funding was based on monitoring of take-up as opposed to estimating unknown costs.

- Kinship care: the Scottish Government estimate a cost of £2.6m across Scotland for implementation costs with no recurring cost. One of our members, Glasgow City Council, has calculated an estimated cost for assessment and start up, if all of our carers were to apply for the new order, of £0.442m, with some of this recurring dependent on the nature of ongoing support.

- Supporting carers: the cost of supporting carers to apply for the new order is unknown, but if we based this on costs to support Adoption orders, there would be a considerable cost to Councils. It would appear the assumption is that once carers have applied for the order and receive a start up grant they would then be no longer in receipt of payment from the Local Authority. It is difficult therefore to estimate how many kinship carers would apply for the new order. Moreover, without a definition of 'support' the assumption that this may not include financial support could be challenged by carers.

- Support to care leavers from 21 to 25: the Scottish Government have estimated a national funding requirement of £3.87 in 2015/16, £4.03 in 2016/17, £4.03 in 2017/18 and £1.77m in both 2018/19 and 2019/20. Glasgow City Council have estimated costs to the council, based on the average financial payment for young people and costs associated with additional staffing to provide an aftercare service to young people as: £0.353m in 2015/16 rising to an additional annual cost of £1.4m.
Definitions

31. There are some concerns over lack of clear definitions in the Bill. If terms are not clearly defined it is difficult to plan and cost the implementation of the legislation. We require further definitions of the following terms:

- Part 9 - 'eligible child' in relation to counselling services
- Part 10 - 'kinship care assistance'
- Section 65 - in relation to kinship care orders the term 'related' requires to be defined

Assistance to care leavers

32. ADSW, along with the Scottish Government have been involved in the campaign to end discrimination against children in care and leaving care.

33. These young people are not service users, they are children who have been looked after by the state and therefore the local authority has corporate parental responsibilities for them. In order to assist them to achieve the same outcomes that are taken for granted by many other children, ADSW would like the committee to consider whether this bill could go further to support them.

34. Perhaps rather than assessing children from a care background prioritising their needs and sign-posting them to services and treating them as any other user of services we should consider how we can use this opportunity in legislation to enable professionals to have more of a parental relationship with children within and leaving the care system.

35. Any amendments would need to be fully costed and funded, but we understand that Who Cares? Scotland will be bringing forward an amendment at Stage 2 to this effect. In conclusion ADSW welcomes the new Bill, much of which reflects and reinforces good practice across Scotland we remain eager however, to support the Bill and is available to provide oral evidence to clarify both guidance and any secondary legislation.

Association of Directors of Social Work

Education and Culture Committee
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Association of Directors of Social Work – Sub-Group on Adoption and Fostering

This is intended to complement the more general ADSW submission.

Comments of the provisions

Provision 1: Ensure that children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services by placing new duties on the Scottish Ministers and the public sector and by increasing the powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People

1. ADSW continues to support the determination of the Government to ensure that children’s rights are fully recognised in the design and delivery of public services. Tensions in relation to parental rights can emerge in some legal settings and it is important that the wellbeing of the child determines the outcomes.

2. As indicated in our response to the consultation on the Bill, the promotion of children’s rights needs to be set within the context of a broader strategy for meeting children’s needs and addressing the social issues relating to poverty and deprivation which affect many families and children.

3. ADSW has some concerns that the focus on children exercising their rights may mean that some older young people try to exercise their rights but fail to consider the responsibilities that go along with those rights.

4. We believe it is important not to create an ethos where getting their own rights become the focus of their energies rather than being aware of the wider community needs and their responsibilities.

5. Whilst the extension to the Powers of the Children’s Commissioner is welcomed, there needs to be clear delineation about the kind of individual issues that are appropriate for the office to investigate. Concerns remain regarding the interface between these powers and already existing powers of redress (ASL Act; Children’s Hearing; “Who Cares?” Scotland; Care Inspectorate; Local Authority complaints procedures; Local Children’s Rights Services; Ombudsman). It is crucial that the guidance clarifies that this is only one of several options for redress, and clear criteria will be required to avoid duplication.

6. It is noted that it is anticipated that the Children’s Commissioner would only undertake 1 to 4 individual investigations per year. These investigations should only be undertaken where an individual’s situation will have a national resonance.

7. The proposed increased resources for the office of the Children’s Commissioner seems excessive given the projected minimum level of impact and particularly in light of ongoing concerns regarding potential under-funding of other parts of the Bill.
8. ADSW believes that the role and availability of mediation should be enhanced to try to resolve differences of view.

9. There is a need to ensure that multiple investigations of a young person’s individual issues are avoided and that systems work together to try to resolve issues rather than them being escalated to the SCCYP.

Provision 2: Improve the way services support children and families by promoting cooperation between services, with the child at the centre

10. ADSW supports this as a goal, recognising that acting early to prevent families experiencing serious problems and children’s lives being disrupted is in the best interests of children.

11. ADSW recognises the intense pressures on all universal services and specialist services and the continuing need to balance continuing to try to meet the needs of children and families already experiencing serious problems, against working with families at an early stage before they reach such critical points. There is a need to recognise that costs will have to continue to be incurred for both these areas of work for many years.

12. Adult services need to play a full part in the preventive spending but they too will need continue to provide services for people with very complex needs as well as trying to intervene earlier with others.

13. ADSW notes that the development of children’s services plans is highlighted and legislated for. The complexity of planning with so many partners has to be commensurate with the outcomes achievable.

14. Preparing such diverse plans will be time-consuming as will the annual review reports. It will be important to look at all the other demands on public services to report to a range of regulatory bodies and that this is factored into the time required to meet a statutory requirement to report but also to ensure that duplication of reporting is avoided.

15. The preparation of a child’s plan is welcomed so long as they are prepared where there is need for one and that they do not sacrifice detail where the needs are complex. Many children already require a plan in other regulations - looked after children, Individual Education plans and Child protection plans to highlight a few. The interfaces among these plans needs to be managed effectively and coordinated for action.

16. The notion of a ‘single plan’ should be pursued. There is an opportunity for the legislation to bring together all of these requirements.

Provision 3: Strengthen the role of early years support in children’s and families’ lives by increasing the amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare

17. This provision is welcome and ADSW is pleased to see the approach includes flexibility of provision as parenting support alongside childcare and early learning will be required for many families if it is to impact positively on outcomes for children.

18. Underlying severe poverty continues to be a very real challenge for many of the families with whom public services work. Relieving serious poverty would lead to better outcomes for children and more choices in meals/food and activities could be available to young families and guidance through parenting initiatives would complement efforts.

19. Early years services need to tackle some of the growing health problems of children particularly diabetes and obesity.

20. Children with disabilities could be included in addition to the two year olds who should receive 600 hours of free early learning and care. ADSW is disappointed that children with disabilities get scarce mention in the Bill.

Provision 4: Ensure better permanence planning for looked after children by improving support for kinship carers, families and care leavers, extending corporate parenting across the public sector, and putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing

21. ADSW is working closely with the Permanence Team at CELCIS to address delays in planning for permanence and the obstacles services face as they try to achieve better outcomes for children.

22. Decision making involving Children’s Hearings and Courts continues to mean some duplication of efforts and delays. ADSW is keen to see changes that would make legal systems more sensitive and responsive to the needs of children through speedier processes and less adversarial systems. The increased litigious approach to resolving children’s permanent care has a negative impact on children and carers and is costly in expenses and time.

23. Within local authorities, efforts continue to ensure that their planning systems have children’s needs at their heart and reduce any avoidable delays in their journey to permanence.

24. In relation to support for kinship carers, ADSW believes that the vision for kinship care should be that children should be cared for by suitable members of their extended family or friends without statutory intervention unless that is needed to protect the child. ADSW recognises the many stresses on kinship carers and children and would welcome Councils being able to use their resources to provide better support and specialist help to kinship carers and direct services for children rather than continue to be a major provider of income maintenance to kinship care families.

25. ADSW believes that families should not have to rely on local authority services for an adequate income to bring up the child in their family and the parallels with accessing a “Guardian’s Allowance” have formerly been raised in many communications over kinship care matters.
26. ADSW welcomes the introduction of specific mention of kinship carers within Section 11 orders giving children and carers greater security and parental rights and responsibilities.

27. The financial consequences for local authorities of supporting a high number of possibly currently unknown kinship carers through the legal processes and beyond will require careful assessment of the resources required, though we recognise the role that Legal Aid will have in some cases.

28. Whilst ADSW believes that responsibility for financial support should not lie with local authorities, should such a system of support continue there is a need for greater clarity about the cross boundary issues. These arrangements could mirror those in place in relation to adoption allowances.

29. The explanatory notes and financial memorandum suggest a menu of support for kinship carers, including financial support. Whilst such supports may be appropriate in some cases, there needs to be caution about promoting this as an entitlement to kinship carers. The provision of services should be linked to an assessment of need by local authorities. It does not seem appropriate to give blanket entitlement to specific supports regardless of need, particularly when there will be other children in need who will not have such automatic entitlement, such as children looked after at home, who, as a group have the poorest outcomes for looked after children.

30. The role of foster carers in providing looked after children with greater permanence should be enhanced. The use of Permanence Orders in favour of foster carers should be promoted and the routes to achieving those orders simplified if possible. In many cases the child will be of an age to have to give their consent and if that is the child’s wish then we need to find ways to achieve that more quickly.

31. Attention to care leavers is essential; many young people still leave care ill equipped and supported for greater independence. Earlier planning is needed for some young people to identify who will provide their ongoing support. Accommodation choices need to be improved as housing in areas which are already hard to let puts young people at higher risk.

32. The significance of a trusted adult well known to care leavers should be recognised and continuing support from that person as the young person leaves formal care can greatly enhance outcomes.

33. This has cost implications and when coupled with the increase in age of eligibility could be considerable. Some local authorities pay young care leavers higher levels of allowance than those proposed in the Bill. It is important that this Bill is fully funded

34. Services to 16-21 year olds need to be strengthened and resources invested here as well.

35. Extending the age where young people who have left care can ask for an assessment of need is a positive step but providing greater support and services will need to be properly resourced so that young people are not left to fail in the adult world.

36. Highlighting the importance of Corporate parenting is welcomed and ways of making that real and accessible rather than solely verbal commitments will require a lot of work.

37. Getting into employment as a young person is so important and councils could be a rich source of employment but this will be in tension with the reducing service levels in many public services as budget cuts continue.

38. In relation to the National Adoption Register, ADSW welcomed the Register in Scotland and it is being used for many children. The reality is still that finding adopters for hard to place children, older children and sibling groups is very difficult and the register in itself cannot resolve that.

39. ADSW responded to the Bill’s proposals on making the NAR mandatory saying that they felt that providing clear timescales and options for using the NAR would be preferable to making the use of the NAR statutory at the point adopters are approved or when children are registered as in need of adoption.

40. This continues to be our position but ADSW would acknowledge that there may be a need for the NAR becoming mandatory if the guidance fails to create increasing referrals and use of the Register. The current system of paying inter-agency fees may be an impediment to the placement of children, particularly with the voluntary adoption agencies, and should be reviewed.

41. Sensitive application of any statutory penalties for not using the NAR in the required timescales should be discussed. The matching of children with families demands great skill and flexibility and cannot be accelerated to the detriment of children or adoptive families.

42. ADSW commented previously about the areas in the consultation on better foster care

43. ADSW recognises that the Review of Foster Care is now dealing with many of these areas and will welcome the opportunity to comment on the report of the Review in due course to assess whether the review recommendations cover the points ADSW made in its consultation response.

Other provisions

44. On a general point, ADSW Fostering and Adoption sub group is concerned about the numbers of plans the new Bill proposes:

- The Children’s Services Plan- extensive and multi-agency
- Early learning plan
- Corporate Parenting Plan
45. Several areas of commonality and relationships with other significant plans will require to be clarified.

46. Although the Committee has not asked for views on GIRFEC, wellbeing and named persons, ADSW does see the GIRFEC approach as achieving better outcomes for children so long as all the relevant services commit to a plan for the child.

47. Wellbeing as defined through SHANARRI is well established and covers key aspects of positive outcomes for children. It needs to be considered if the framework adequately measures positive outcomes for children with disabilities or if these children require some additional goals.

48. In relation to the Named Person, there is some concern about the realities of people being expected to take on that role in some settings, and being able to fulfil the role fully and that would require ongoing monitoring. What happens during school holidays if the named person is a teacher? What views do parents have about mandatory named persons? There has been a mixed reception to this in the press.

49. In relation to children with disabilities, would a lead professional be better to be introduced at the early stages rather than named person?

50. Does the definition of lead professional need to be enshrined in law?

51. ADSW has concerns about the section relating to the provision of counselling. This needs to be clearly defined – counselling is a very specific type of provision and is different from more general support or a Family Group Conferencing process. It would be more appropriate to refer to the more general provision of support. Any specific service should be provided based on an assessment of need, and counselling services may be part of the output from that assessment. There needs to be greater clarity about eligibility. It is unclear if it is intended that kinship carers should be specifically targeted, or if such provision should be linked to the assessment of need, in which case other vulnerable children, who might have greater need, could also be eligible. Such powers already exist under exiting legislation. It is not clear why further legislation is required.

52. The Children’s Hearing Act does not integrate terminology of GIRFEC. Is there an opportunity to rectify this in the Children’s Bill e.g. for Reporters to request an integrated assessment/child’s plan rather than an IER/SBR. Is it appropriate to extend the time interval to allow for the time required to undertake this assessment?

53. ADSW is concerned at the amount of aspects of the bill which remain to be defined in secondary legislation and the difficulty in commenting on the implications of the bill without this information. It will be important that there is further consultation on the guidance in terms of implementation of the provision of the act.

Association of Directors of Social Work – Sub-Group on Adoption & Fostering

13 August 2013
Education and Culture Committee
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Association of Headteachers and Deputes in Scotland

1. Thank you for the opportunity to provide evidence to the Committee on this important Bill.

2. AHDS supports the Government intent with this legislation. However, we have some concerns in relation to the second and third aims as listed in your call for evidence:

   - Improve the way services support children and families by promoting cooperation between services, with the child at the centre.
   - Strengthen the role of early years support in children’s and families’ lives by increasing the amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare.

3. Undoubtedly this is what the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (CYPB) sets out to achieve. AHDS is wholly in support of this aspiration. Indeed, these aspirations are not new – the CYPB seeks to give life to such arrangements by introducing a legal underpinning. So, on the whole, we are supportive.

4. We have two areas of concern in relation to the legislation as set out – potential workload implications without adequate resources and implementation following enactment.

Workload/Resources

5. We are concerned that the role of Named Person will create additional burdens on school leadership teams (administrative, organisational and in pushing forward provision for children) which are not properly accounted for in the analysis of costs for this legislation. The focus, in some areas, is currently on getting the paperwork rather than the processes of support right and this risks the creation of resource intensive bureaucracy.

6. We are unconvinced that the training costs identified are adequate for successful implementation of this legislation. In the context of declining resources, if the costs of this legislation are not more accurately identified and provided for then this Bill should not proceed.

Implementation

7. Aside from resource issues noted above we are concerned that with thirty-two local authorities will come thirty-two different ways of managing implementation. These will vary in quality and in the pressures that they add to the role of school leaders through administrative burdens and barriers. In addition to resulting in different levels of provision around Scotland, this likely multitude of implementation models will also risk confusion when a child moves from one local authority to another.

8. Strengthen the role of early years support in children's and families' lives by increasing the amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare.

9. AHDS is persuaded by the argument that high quality pre-school settings result in better behavioural and cognitive outcomes for children. For that reason we are supportive of the principle of increased free pre-school education proposed in this Bill. However, the evidence also makes clear that the highest quality pre-school settings most often include qualified teachers on their staff. To ensure that education, rather than care alone, is at the core of these extended hours we believe it should be accompanied by a commitment that all preschool pupils should have meaningful, sustained access to a nursery teacher as well as other early years professionals. We would prefer that this was full-time access.

Association of Headteachers and Deputes in Scotland

1 July 2013
Association of Scottish Principal Educational Psychologists

1. ASPEP welcomes in principle the spirit of the Bill which seeks to strengthen children and young people's rights, safeguard and promote their wellbeing through increased ministerial duties, and new powers for the Commissioner for children and young people, as well as introducing mechanisms for the reporting of wellbeing by Community Planning Partnerships. We embrace the Getting It Right for Every Child (GIRFEC) approach which promotes cooperation between services and we recognise the key role for educational psychologists to play in improving partnership working to ensure children get the help they need when they need it.

Part 1: Rights of Children

2. ASPEP supports the clear commitment to recognising, respecting and promoting children's rights in Scotland. We also support the intention to empower children to exercise their rights and recognise the role of professionals, in making this happen. However, ASPEP does question how well the Bill actually incorporates the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC). Does it go far enough? It would be helpful if the reporting mechanism was clarified through guidance to Local Authorities. Also, if the agreed reporting process highlights poor practice or non-compliance, what powers will the Scottish Government or Commissioner for Children and Young People have here?

Part 2: Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland

3. Whilst ASPEP supports the rights of individual children, the question raised is whether providing new powers to the Commissioner to undertake investigations on behalf of individual children is practicable? How will this be resourced? ASPEP looks forward to the Scottish Government clarifying how costs will be met in light of these additional powers and how these will fit with other national investigating bodies.

Part 3: Children's Services Planning

4. As Local Authorities already engage in integrated planning and produce Integrated Children's Services Plans, these aspects of the Bill are not envisaged to be problematic. Given that educational psychologists already are integral in supporting schools and partner agencies to assess and address the key ‘SHANARRI’ indicators for children and young people, the emphasis on improving the wellbeing of children and young people is welcomed by ASPEP. With regard to the reporting of this, support and guidance from Scottish Government, on meaningful measures of wellbeing improvement would be helpful to Local Authorities.
5. ASPEP supports the Scottish Government’s statement regarding wellbeing:

6. ‘Wellbeing is not just about a child and young person’s economic status, health or educational attainment: it is also about how they take responsibility for their actions, their inclusion in the wider community and whether their views are respected and heard’ (Policy Memorandum Children and Young Peoples’ Bill 2013).

7. ASPEP will continue to encourage and support Scottish psychological services to advise and support educational establishments how best to ensure the optimum well being of all pupils.

Part 4: Provision of Named Persons

8. ASPEP supports the principles of the GIRFEC approach and recognises the significant role of educational psychologists in both the strategic and operational delivery of these. ASPEP welcomes the role of Named Person within universal services. However, following Hall 4, there are concerns regarding Health’s readiness and in particular, the capacity of Health Visitors to assume the role of named person. Guidance on information sharing between Health and Education at the point of transfer of the named person would be helpful. Guidance would also be welcome about the named person for those groups of children whose engagement with universal services is interrupted e.g. gypsy travellers/ home educated/ young people who leave school before 18yrs etc.

9. ASPEP welcomes the adoption of a shared holistic definition of wellbeing. It is recognised that some Local Authorities are already making good progress with the implementation of GIRFEC and it is therefore hoped that the legislation enhances such developments. However, it is also hoped that legislating for the Child’s Plan, for example, and introducing further routes to redress, does not impede progress made to date.

Part 5: Child’s Plan

10. The introduction of a holistic Child’s Plan is welcome. However, the emphasis on the assessment of need within a clearly defined staged intervention process, as a clear pathway to a Child’s Plan is necessary.

11. The Bill does not sufficiently describe how other plans such as Co-ordinated Support Plans (CSPs) and Individual Education Plans (IEPs) fit with the Child’s Plan. Inevitable confusions and misinterpretations of the legislation will result without this being clarified. Given that a review of current Additional Support for Learning (ASL) legislation is unlikely, guidance regarding how the requirements of both the Children and Young People Bill and the Additional Support for Learning (Scotland) Act 2009 can be met within the context of streamlining processes, is required. Again it is worth noting that, in terms of ensuring effective assessment of ASN in schools for children and young people, educational psychologists are key to an effective assessment. process. ASPEP envisage significant difficulties in local authorities being able to fulfil their statutory duties in a context of declining availability of educational psychologists.

12. The Bill does not include clarification of the role and responsibilities of the Lead Professional in relation to the Child’s Plan. ASPEP would welcome guidance on the role of the lead professional. Specifically it would be helpful for the Scottish Government to outline the parameters regarding best practice in terms of the lead professional’s role, responsibilities and outcomes given differing local authority contexts. This role is crucial in ensuring the co-ordination and delivery of the Child’s Plan where there is, by definition, multi-agency involvement. The role and responsibilities of the named person could be vulnerable to being misinterpreted without clear guidance with the named person being left to carry out tasks by default or beyond their competencies rather than those professionals best placed to deliver on a task. This is particularly important for those children and young people who are moved out with their home authority to another host authority eg a LAAC young person moved for purposes of care. It would be helpful if such forthcoming guidelines were to offer a clear statement clarifying the difference in role and function between the named person and the lead professional.

13. The issue of redress regarding the Child’s Plan requires attention. ASPEP would advocate early and solution focused local mediation as opposed to an adversarial system and would strongly caution against the ASN Tribunal becoming the route to redress. If mediation/dispute resolution services are being considered then these should be provided by nationally recognised organisations with sufficient infrastructure. Properly commissioned service providers should be suitably professionally qualified and recognised thereby ensuring the necessary safeguards for vulnerable families. A new re-dress system would be both costly and unnecessary especially when there are a number of redress options already available such as the ASN Tribunal and the Ombudsman. A single redress system integrated with other forms of hearing and review for children and families as is currently being proposed with regard to all tribunals by the Scottish Government would be beneficial. There is an opportunity within this Bill and the Code of Practice to establish a coherent framework to address this.

14. With regard to the requirements of the Child’s Plan, is a standardised format or minimum data set likely to be determined by the Scottish Government? Has consideration been given to how the impact of the Child’s Plan is to be evaluated? It would be helpful to have this clarified given variations in practice and thinking.

Part 6: Early Learning and Childcare

15. ASPEP is of the view that the extension to 600hrs for 3 & 4 year olds, and LAC aged 2yrs, should also be extended to other ‘vulnerable’ children who have additional support needs. However, it is the quality of the additional hours that is crucial in promoting positive child development. There is a considerable body of evidence from longitudinal studies that early years education and child care promote outcomes best with a highly trained and qualified workforce. There is an opportunity within the Bill and accompanying Code of Practice to establish minimum quality standards. The impact on rural authorities regarding what is possible in terms of providing flexibility and choice for parents should be highlighted. Are Local Authorities and Health Boards being supported to develop additional forms of early learning and childcare other than nursery provision?

Part 7: Corporate Parenting

16. ASPEP welcomes a definition of corporate parenting which includes the collective responsibilities of public bodies in meeting the needs of looked after children. We also welcome the raising of aspirations for looked after children and care leavers. Good examples of this working in practice would be helpful. Particular attention is required to monitor what happens to LAAC children and young people placed out with their home authority for purposes of care. ASPEP members have consistent experience of this happening to young people without multi-agency planning and without the appropriate checks and balances in place to ensure the young person has access to appropriate education and other support services. Often the only educational representative for young people placed out with their home authority is the case educational psychologist. ASPEP have a concern that if there is a combination of further reduced educational psychology capacity and an absence of a clear framework of corporate duties, this group of vulnerable youngsters may be subject to further difficulties in terms of receiving effective provision to meet their needs. It would be helpful to have a clear framework for practice which facilitates appropriate assessment and planning practice and resource provision.

Part 8: Aftercare

17. ASPEP welcomes the extension of the age range to 25 years for care leavers requesting support from local authorities, to be more in line with the transition to independence for those not looked after. Whilst the duty is to assess ‘eligible need’, a definition of such would be helpful. Guidance should also be provided which signposts how a young person is empowered to make such a request and access appropriate support. More streamlined pathways into adult services would be helpful. It is likely that the extension to 25 years will have financial implications for Local Authorities. Is additional funding to be available?

Part 9: Counselling Services

18. The rationale for this inclusion in the Bill is not clear. The terminology refers to therapeutic intervention for families in distress and, although duties can be met through ‘passporting’ to pre-existing services, there are likely to be financial implications for local authorities.
Part 10: Support for Kinship Care

19. ASPEP welcome the recognition of kinship carers and their role in preventing children requiring alternative permanent care. However, there is uncertainty as to whether a new legal order is required and if this will strengthen the legal and financial position in relation to what already exists.

Part 11: Adoption Register

20. ASPEP supports the promotion of the National Adoption Register which some Local Authorities already make good use of in an attempt to avoid drift in achieving permanence for children.

Part 12: Other Reforms

21. Within the new Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, the key principles of strengthening the place and participation of children, and ensuring consistency of practice nationally, are supported. However, there is some scepticism around realistic timescales and protocols in relation to appealing secure orders.

Part 13: General

22. Within the Bill there is basic description of the assessment of wellbeing and defining this in relation to the indicators of wellbeing, Safe, Healthy, Achieving, Nurtured, Active, Responsible, Respected and Included. It is well established that the assessment of the child needs to take account of their circumstance and context as well as the role of the key adults in promoting their outcomes. By defining in legislation what is to be assessed, there is a risk that a more holistic assessment is overlooked. It would be helpful if this section could be amended to state:

23. “The person is to assess the wellbeing of the child or young person and their circumstances and context, by reference to the extent to which the child or young person is or, as the case may be, would be…”

24. It is recognised that accompanying guidance on this matter will play a crucial role. ASPEP would be delighted to contribute to the development of the accompanying guidance.

The Role of Educational Psychologists in Supporting the Children’s & Young People’s Legislation

25. Educational psychologists are keen to support and facilitate initiatives and legislation which supports and empowers children and young people and ASPEP is fully supportive of Scottish Government’s policy drive in this area. It should be noted that in addition to being integral to establishing and maintaining the structures and processes of integrated working in local authorities, educational psychologists are responsible for the initiation and evaluation of the majority of the wellbeing related initiatives, as defined above, currently delivered in schools eg literacy initiatives, positive behaviour approaches, de-escalation, nurture, reducing exclusions, improving child participation etc (HMIe ASPECT Report 2010). There is a longstanding, record of this contribution which has led to many of the current improvements in Scottish Education. Due to loss of training funding and a decline in numbers of educational psychologists in Scotland, a shortage of educational psychologists is already apparent in a number of areas in Scotland. Given the age profile of the profession, the decline in numbers of Educational psychologists is likely to have a significant impact on local authorities’ capacity to deliver on all aspects of the aspirations of the Children and Young People’s Bill.

26. ASPEP agrees with the policy memorandum’s comment about children and young people in Scotland:

27. ‘What they deserve are services-across all parts of Scotland-that routinely and consistently consider the spectrum of their needs.’

28. It already has already been documented (eg BBC News) that a number of areas, particularly more rural areas are already struggling to provide a comprehensive service due to shortages of educational psychologists).

29. In summary, ASPEP would wish to highlight the following as the main themes arising from this Bill;

- Balancing children/ young people’s rights and parents’ rights through relevant but potentially conflicting legislation
- Redress for children and young people, and families - mechanisms and resourcing for this?
- The need for gathering measurable evidence of outcomes
- Clarity and guidance regarding information sharing systems and processes
- The omission of lead professional duties
- Financial implications of the Bill
- The integral contribution made by educational psychologists throughout many aspects of the Bill’s intentions and the real impact likely resulting from declining availability of educational psychologists across Scotland

Autism Rights

1. Autism Rights would like to make a brief submission to the committee's consultation on the above Bill.

2. We lack the time to go through this Bill with a fine toothcomb, but very much disagree with the Bill's proposals for Named Persons for EVERY child in Scotland.

3. We think this proposal is as unhealthy as it is impracticable.

4. 'Named Persons' were devised by Baroness Warnock as part of her investigations resulting in the 1980 Education Act (1981 for Scotland). They were, however, to be people chosen by parents to help and advise them in applying for the necessary supports for children with Special Educational Needs.

5. There are direct and obvious conflicts of interest inherent in the current proposals. He Who Pays the Piper Ca's the Tune. Parents of children with special educational needs continue to find that necessary supports are withheld from our children because of the aversion of local and central government to expenditure on disabled children. We will not accept that a Named Person, chosen by the very local authorities that we are forced to battle with, should abrogate our role as parents.

6. We will fight this all the way, and hope that the committee takes our comments with the seriousness that they deserve. For further information, the committee may wish to study our 'Briefing Paper' of 2007, which details some of the problems within the system, including the issue of data sharing which, in combination with the current 'Named Person' proposals, represent particular threats to the wellbeing of our children and young people. This paper is on our website, the address for which is below.

Autism Rights
1. Barnardo’s Scotland welcomes the opportunity to comment on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. This Bill has the potential to be one of the most far-reaching and influential bills considered in this session of the Parliament. At the heart of the Bill is a vision that Barnardo’s strongly shares - making Scotland the best place in the world for children to grow up.

2. We have welcomed all the opportunities we have had to engage with the Bill as it has been in development; we feel these discussions have helped strengthen the proposals. We look forward to continuing this work with the committee to ensure that we maximise the potential of the Bill to improve the outcomes for vulnerable children in Scotland.

Key elements of the Bill

3. For Barnardo’s, the key principle underlying the Bill is a desire to put the needs and wellbeing of the child at the centre of how we deliver services to children. This represents a massive culture shift for everyone who works with children.

4. We therefore welcome the proposals to put elements of GIRFEC into law. GIRFEC has been a great success where it has been fully implemented and it is right that the Bill should seek to secure its wider adoption.

5. We also welcome moves to reflect in Scots Law the role of the UNCRC in influencing the design of children’s services, and to increase the powers of the Commissioner for Children and Young People.

6. The Bill also proposes enhanced protection for some of the most vulnerable children and young people in Scotland. Support for care leavers up to the age of 26 and stronger corporate parenting will help ensure that the care system delivers better long-term support and improved outcomes.

7. Barnardo’s Scotland supports the Scottish Government’s commitment to increase the number of childcare hours to 600 per year for every 3 and 4 year old.

8. The Bill’s provision of a more coherent framework for kinship care will also help address the needs of this vulnerable group, by strengthening existing legislative provision in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.

Putting GIRFEC into law

9. We are aware that some aspects of the Bill, in particular the proposed ‘named person’ service set out in Part 4, are being questioned. Barnardo’s Scotland supports the concept of the named person and believes it should be in the proposed Bill. From our perspective, the named person should simply be a point of contact for children and families, helping them to get the best support possible.
from public services. The Bill will place existing good practice on a statutory footing: teachers and health visitors already look out for the children they work with beyond their health or education remit. They should therefore be in a position to spot concerns at an early stage, listen to issues raised by children or their parents, and work with them to find solutions before these issues become more serious and damaging.

10. The named person role has already been implemented with great success in the Highland Council area. Barnardo’s Scotland staff in Highland report that the system has helped ensure children get the support they need, when they need it. There has also been a significant reduction in the number of non-offence concerns referred to the Children’s Reporter and, as a consequence, less time is spent on writing reports because the named person can deal more effectively with many situations at an earlier stage. It is right that the proven benefits of this approach are now rolled out across Scotland to ensure all children and families get this support.

11. More broadly, putting GIRFEC into law will strengthen the culture shift towards putting children at the centre of service delivery. The mere fact that the Scottish Government has signalled its intention to legislate has already led to greater focus on implementing GIRFEC at a local level.

Areas for improvement and clarification

12. As stated earlier, Barnardo’s Scotland supports the aims and principles of the Bill. However, in order to maximise the potential of the Bill, Barnardo’s Scotland has highlighted certain areas where we think the legislation could be strengthened.

Poverty (Part 1 and Part 13)

13. The biggest challenge to making Scotland the best place in the world to grow up is the persistence of child poverty. Key elements of the Bill relate to child poverty, in particular Article 27 of the UNCRC: ‘states Parties recognize the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for the child's physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development’. The ‘included’ element of the wellbeing indicators set out in Part 13 is described in Scottish Government guidance as covering overcoming social, educational, physical and economic inequalities. However, we would like the Scottish Government to be more explicit about how the proposals in this Bill will address child poverty, and in particular how the children’s services planning framework in Part 3 will link to the Scottish Child Poverty Strategy.

Children’s rights (Part 1 and Parts 3, 4, 5, 8 and 9)

14. There is a lack of connection between the rights-based approach set out in Part 1 and the other parts of the Bill. In particular, we believe that Parts 3, 4, 5, 8 and 9 of the Bill need to make stronger provision for involving children, young people and parents in decision-making processes. In addition, rights to advocacy, tribunals and legal remedies need to be built in to deal with issues where the views of children and young people (or their parents) are in conflict with those of local authorities, health boards and other public bodies. Currently the requirements to consult children and their parents, for example on the preparation of a child’s plan in 33 (6), is weak and needs to be strengthened. ‘Reasonably practicable’ is an unhelpful phrase and not in line with children’s rights principles.

15. This needs to be part of a more general link between the principle set out in the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 that hearings ‘need to safeguard and promote the welfare of the child throughout the child’s childhood as the paramount consideration’ and the wellbeing assessment set out in section 74.

16. Barnardo’s Scotland’s response to ‘A Scotland for Children: A Consultation on the Children and Young People Bill’ in September 2012 highlighted that we remain committed to the idea that the process of embedding the UNCRC into policy and practice will only be completed by incorporation, and therefore see the new duties in Part 1 as steps in a process, rather than an end point. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child has twice called for the UK Government as a signatory to the Convention to fully incorporate the rights, principles and provisions of the UNCRC into domestic law. We therefore endorse Together’s submission for the Scottish Government to match its commitment to ‘making rights real’ by at least taking the steps it previously proposed and preferably setting a new benchmark for children’s rights in the UK by establishing a roadmap for the implementation of the UN Committee’s recommendation in full.

Putting GIRFEC into law (Parts 3, 4 and 5)

17. The Bill currently focuses on the child’s relationship with the state, without always fully taking into account the role of non-state actors involved in the life of the child, such as parents, voluntary organisations and faith groups. For example, section 32 (1) (c) limits a child’s plan to only cover interventions delivered by relevant authorities (i.e. public bodies). However, parents may pay directly for interventions or they may be provided by voluntary organisations, whether under contract or through charitable provision. Greater clarity is required as to how these interventions should feature in the single child’s plan.

18. The roles and responsibilities of non-statutory service providers need to be factored in to Parts 3, 4 and 5 of the Bill. In particular there needs to be a clarification of what can reasonably be expected of voluntary and private sector children’s service providers. This would include section 14, which places a duty on voluntary and private sector children’s service providers to comply with reasonable requests for assistance in preparing children’s services plans, and section 26, which requires voluntary and private sector children’s service providers who deliver work on behalf of public bodies to share any information they hold that might affect a child’s wellbeing with any relevant public body.

19. Some of the terminology in the Bill differs between parts, or is not defined clearly. For example, ‘relevant authority’ in Part 5 is defined in section 41 as covering... only health boards, local authorities and independent school managers, while in Part 6 the same term is used for a large number of public bodies set out schedule 3. The Principal Reporter is mentioned as a service provider in section 7 (1) (c) of Part 3, but not in the list of relevant authorities for Part 4 listed in schedule 2. We would recommend a single schedule of relevant bodies to replace schedules 1, 2 and 3 and a wider section 75 allowing more consistent use of terminology.

20. There is a recognition in section 10 (2) (b) that it is possible for private and voluntary sector bodies to deliver services which, if they were delivered by a public body, would be classified as children’s services within the definition of the Bill. However, private and voluntary organisations are treated very inconsistently in the Bill and are sometimes included as service providers and sometimes not. Duties are placed on these bodies, for example to share information, without any recognition that they are private bodies or that such information sharing can be costly and complicated. There needs to be a clearly defined relationship for non-state bodies which are involved in service delivery.

21. It is currently not clear how the proposed single child’s plans will co-exist with other plans enshrined in statute. In particular, it is not clear how the single child’s plan will relate to the child protection system, and orders made under the Children Hearings (Scotland) Act such as child protection orders.

22. It is also not clear how the children’s services plans established by Part 3 relate to other community and local authority planning processes, such as Community Planning Partnership Single Outcome Agreements, integrated health and social care plans and strategic commissioning plans. We would ask for the Scottish Government to set out clearly how all these plans interrelate and what the overall proposed planning regime will look like once the Act has been implemented.

Named person service (Part 4)

23. While recognising the established benefits of the named person system, we are concerned that section 19 (3) (a) (ii) appears to allow the named person role to be carried out by organisations delivering services on behalf of health boards or local authorities. We are unclear in what circumstances this clause would be relevant, but would be concerned at any provisions that would allow the outsourcing of this function. Greater clarity will also be required in guidance as to the relationship between named persons and lead professionals.

Information sharing (Part 4)

24. We recognise the importance of information sharing, particularly with regard to the successful operation of a named person service. However, we are concerned that section 26 of the Bill (named person: information sharing) covers two different aspects of information sharing. Section 26 (1) and 26 (2) cover requirements to share information in relation to the exercise of the named person functions. Section 26 (5) and 26 (6) appear to cover voluntary information sharing, which is also appropriate.
25. However sections 26 (3) and 26 (4) require service providers, which would include a large number of voluntary and private organisations by virtue of 26 (7), to share any information which might be relevant to the exercise of a public function and which may affect the wellbeing of a child or young person. These appear to be very broad information sharing responsibilities and would seem to cover a very large amount of information. We would therefore suggest that, as a minimum, sections 26 (3) and 26 (4) be dealt with separately, and we would like to see the responsibilities under these clauses much more tightly defined. We would also like to see more information about which organisations, and which activities of organisations would be covered by section 26 (7).

Care leavers (Part 8)

26. While we welcome and strongly support many of the proposals in the Bill, we believe that more could still be done to support care leavers and vulnerable children in the care system.

27. The proposals in section 60 to extend eligibility for aftercare are welcome, but we are worried that the actual level of support that could be made available to care leavers appears to be entirely at the discretion of the local authority. We believe that a process will be necessary to manage any differences between care leavers and local authorities over eligibility and levels of support required. Care leavers should also be able to access advocacy support when in this process.

28. The current regulations on supporting young people leaving care in Scotland state that, 'The provision of regular financial support should be limited to those who are under 18, have been looked after away from home for over 13 weeks since the age of 14 and ceased to be looked after over school age'. Barnardo's Scotland believes this is unduly restrictive even if the age limit is increased to 26, as is proposed in the Bill. We believe that aftercare, including financial support, should be open to a wider group of care leavers, including those looked after at home and those who left care shortly before school leaving age. School leaving age can be between 15 years and 8 months and 16 years and 3 months, and we believe that greater clarity would come from standardising on 16th birthday. However, we believe that some form of aftercare should also be open to those who have spent at least 13 weeks in care at any point in their lives. Consideration should also be given to legislating to ensure that the option of a return to being accommodated is available to young care leavers under 26.

29. The legislation also needs to ensure aftercare is available to care leavers in the local authority area in which they reside, and not just in the local area where they left care.

30. We would also like to see the use of significant case reviews for all care leaver deaths, as is currently routine practice in cases of deaths among children in the care system.
Early years (Part 9)

31. We welcome the Scottish Government’s recent focus on early years with the Early Years Collaborative and commitment within the Single Outcome Agreement framework used by the Community Planning Partnership. However, at the moment there is little in the Bill, apart from the new role for health visitors as named persons, that seeks to address the needs of children under the age of three. We would therefore like to see Part 9 broadened to cover greater provision of optional parenting support and parenting education for those families which would see themselves as benefiting, as well as counselling services.

32. While we support the proposals for extending eligibility for early learning and childcare to looked after children and those subject to a kinship care order, we are concerned that this may create an incentive for some children to become looked after or subject to a kinship care order, which would go against the ‘no order’ principle.

Conclusion

33. We look forward to working with Committee and Parliament to deal with the issues highlighted above, in the context of our strong support for the general principles and aims of the Bill.

Barnardo’s Scotland
1 August 2013
Barnardo’s Scotland, Who Cares? Scotland and Aberlour Childcare Trust all highlighted in their oral evidence the potentially very positive impact of Part 7 and Part 8 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill on outcomes for young people leaving the care system. We have therefore prepared this supplementary evidence on this part of the bill, to provide additional detail for the committee’s consideration on the points we raised. We all welcome the Scottish Government proposal to increase from 21 to 26 the age limit for young people leaving care to have a right to be assessed for aftercare, and the proposal that corporate parents also have a responsibility to those who have been in care. However, we would like to see elements of what is currently proposed clarified, strengthened and improved.

1) Strengthening the current proposals

As well as the more transformative changes laid out below, there are a series of improvements that could be made to the current proposals in the bill to ensure that the proposed extension of eligibility for aftercare is available to all those that need it, and that the needs of care leavers are more effectively recognised. These include:

- Aftercare should be available to all care leavers who need it, regardless of care setting. At the moment financial support as a part of aftercare is normally limited to young people who have been looked after and accommodated. Given the particularly poor outcomes for children looked after at home, it should be made clear that all care leavers will be treated equally in the proposed assessment of need.

- A key issue for care leavers is the lack of continuity in the relationships they have developed in care when they leave care. Section 51 of the draft bill states that the responsibilities of corporate parenting cover those who have been in care, and section 52 sets out what these responsibilities are. There should be a new duty in section 52 to ensure relationships with care professionals built up when a child is in care are maintained when young people leave care, to ensure these relationships can be used to access support, guidance and services, as dictated by the young person, up to the age of 26.

- At the moment aftercare is available to young people if they are in care at school leaving age, which can be any point between 15 years 8 months and 16 years 3 months. This means a young person can leave care at 16 but still not be eligible for any aftercare, because they had not reached school leaving age when they left care. This should be simplified to ensure aftercare is available to all young people in care on their 16th (or 18th – see part 2) birthday. This should be mirrored in clause 51 (b) (ii) of part 7 in terms of the corporate parenting responsibilities.
The eligibility criteria for aftercare need to be widened to also cover children who have spent several years in care, even if they are not in care at school leaving age (or 16/18th birthday). At the moment one young person can be in care for the first 15 years and 6 months of their life, but have an entitlement to aftercare, while another young person can be in care for 3 months before school leaving age and be entitled, under the proposals in this bill, to a decade of aftercare support. Being in care for a number of years should lead to an entitlement to aftercare. As first step, if a child has spent at least two years in care by the age of 11, or has been in care for at least 13 weeks after that point, they should be eligible for assessment for aftercare. This should also be mirrored in clause 51 (b) (ii) of part 7 in terms of the corporate parenting responsibilities.

There needs to be a disputes resolution process, with advocacy support, in cases where there is a difference between a local authority’s assessment of the support it needs to give a young person and the young care leavers assessment of the support they need to receive. The framework for this process needs to be laid out on the face of the bill. This should be mirrored in clause 51 (b) (ii) of part 7 in terms of the corporate parenting responsibilities.

The death of a young person receiving aftercare should trigger a significant case review, in the same way that it would for a child in care.

2) Raising the normal age of leaving care

At the moment aftercare eligibility starts at school leaving age i.e. immediately before or after the young person’s 16th birthday. However section 75 of the draft bill states that ‘child’ means ‘a person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years’. We believe that aftercare should start when young people stop being children, and the normal minimum age of leaving care should be 18. Changing the eligibility criteria, as described above, would play a major role in this, allowing for a longer term planning process for children in care. Young people who do choose to leave care before they turn 18 should be able to return directly to care if they wish. Statutory reporting and monitoring of this change would also be required, along with staff training and development, especially around transition and working effectively with older young people.

3) Transforming aftercare to continuing care

Section 51 of the bill makes it clear that corporate parents have a continuing responsibility to young care leavers under the age of 26. This is entirely appropriate, given that most young people now do not leave their parental home until their mid-twenties. Rather than a model of care for those under 16 (or 18) followed by a period of ‘aftercare’, we want to see a move to a system of ‘formal care’ for children under the age of 18, followed by a period of ‘continuing care and support’ for young adults who have been in care.

This would be part of a process of transforming aftercare into a much stronger form of continuing care, which combines the continuation of support and the continuation of the strong relationships that young people in care have come to rely on. We recognise that this transformation is an ambitious task, and will take years to deliver. However there are some key elements of the bill that could be amended, clarified and improved to help facilitate this transformation.
The name of part 8 and section 60 should be changed from describing ‘aftercare’ to better reflect a model of continuing care for young adult care leavers.

At the moment the proposed new section 5A of the 1995 Act set out in section 60 (2) (c) of the draft bill appears to give complete discretion to local authorities to determine what support they offer young care leavers who are deemed to have eligible needs. This needs to change, to avoid a postcode lottery of provision. We recognise that many local authorities are working very effectively to deliver support to formerly looked after young people, and provisions for minimum standards of aftercare in this bill would build on good work that is already being done, and encourage good practice to be taken up by all local authorities and other corporate parents.

Scottish Ministers should have the power to set minimum standards for the delivery of advice, guidance and support offered by local authorities to young adult care leavers. These standards should be about norms of support, based on a set of codified rights in areas such as accommodation, employment, education and health, rather than a model based around detailed needs assessments. A ‘reasonableness’ test would be the appropriate way to deal with situations where there were different expectations of support between the care leaver and the local authority.

In the drawing up of guidance around advice, guidance and support, Scottish Ministers should engage with young care leavers and the organisations they work with to help create a vision of what services provision should look like, in line with the vision of a move from aftercare to continuing care we would like. Local authorities and other corporate parents should also work together to provide a dedicated continued care provision in relation to accommodation, employment, education and health services.

Befriending Networks

1. Befriending Networks is an umbrella body providing support and guidance to a wide range of befriending projects and including in Scotland, 62 member services who work with children and/or young people.

2. Befriending Networks welcomes the increased focus on children’s rights that the Bill is proposing in the duties it sets out for Scottish Ministers and public bodies, in the design and delivery of policies and services. We feel that with sufficient awareness raising aimed at children and young people, this aspect of the Bill, may provide children and young people with a sense of “ownership” about the changes it brings and could lead to increased confidence around challenging policies or services against this yardstick.

3. Improving cooperation between services for children and families can only bring benefits to all parties. Children and families should gain from this synergistic approach and receive the support they need with fewer delays. It should also, through the Named Person role, help children and families view the practitioners offering support as more of a unified team working with them, than as fragmented silos of support.

4. For befriending services, this will help to avoid duplication of effort and will allow them to focus on their area of expertise, confident in the knowledge that the child or young person they are working with is getting support in other areas as needed. A key element to the success of this working in practice would seem to be the relationship that is developed with the Lead Professional – a role not to be included in the legislation. It is to be hoped that sufficient guidance will be offered to enable uptake of this role in a way which is supportive and respectful to other practitioners involved in a case. We believe cooperation between the practitioners from different agencies will best be fostered by a facilitating rather than hierarchical approach – especially as the Lead Professional acts as the information gatekeeper in terms of the Child’s Plan. We understand that by not being prescriptive over eligibility to take on the Lead Professional role, the Bill will leave this open to interpretation in the hope that this will result in the most appropriate worker being selected for the role. This flexibility has definite advantages, but could prove counter-productive for the child or young person if there is insufficient guidance offered when a Lead Professional is not obviously or harmoniously emerging, as this would cause delays and be contrary to GIRFEC principles.

5. Befriending Networks welcomes the provision in the Bill for strengthening the early years support available. This move will bolster the development of preschool children, which can only improve their chances of achieving their potential.

6. Befriending Networks also welcomes the provisions for extending the duty of care on statutory services for looked after children, as they face particular vulnerabilities at points of transition. Befriending services can offer emotional support during times of transition and help children and young people achieve their potential, but the intervention needs some stability to be most effective with evidence suggesting that relationships lasting at least 1 year are most beneficial. We would therefore welcome these changes as providing a vulnerable group with a better chance to engage effectively with the services our members provide.

Proposals relating to children’s rights

1. I want to acknowledge the strong commitment of the Government to ensure that children’s rights are fully recognised in the design and delivery of public services. Many tensions with parental rights emerge in legal settings and it is important that the wellbeing of the child determines the outcomes.

2. Tensions will emerge relating to the financial constraints and consequential impact on services which could support children’s rights more fully.

3. I feel that the promotion of children’s rights needs to be set within the context of a broader strategy for meeting children’s needs and addressing the social issues relating to poverty and deprivation which affect many families and children. The child’s basic rights to an adequate standard of living and housing need to come first.

4. For many years I have had some concerns that the focus on children exercising their rights may mean that some older young people expect to exercise their rights but have not been required to consider the responsibilities that go along with those rights. I think that it is important not to create an ethos where getting one’s own rights become the focus to the exclusion of considering the wider community needs and the young person’s responsibilities to that community.

5. There are currently many routes for young people to raise concerns. I feel that it is important to explore why people feel that they are not working well enough before the powers of the Commissioner are extended to individual issues. There needs to be a clear delineation of what kind of individual issues are appropriate for the office to investigate. The number of individual investigations projected is of 1-4 per year. The explanatory notes say this will require 3 additional staff and incur a considerable cost. Might more availability of mediation help to resolve differences of view, rather than increasing the staff at SCCYP to do more investigations?

6. Any changes in the role of the Commissioner need to ensure that multiple investigations of a young person’s individual issues are avoided and that agencies work together to try to resolve issues rather than them being escalated to the SCCYP.

Proposals to improve the way services support children and families by promoting cooperation between services, with the child at the centre

7. I fully support this as a goal recognising that acting early to prevent families experiencing serious problems and children’s lives being disrupted is in the best interests of children.
8. I am also very aware of the intense pressures on all universal services and specialist services. It is essential that families and children already being provided with services or children who are in looked after care experience no reduction in the help they need so that there can be a release of funds for others through early intervention. Recognition is needed that costs will have to continue to be incurred for both these areas of work for many years.

9. Early intervention will need major investment in universal services and putting into practice across the whole of Scotland, the GIRFEC approach to working with children and families.

10. The response of adult services will also be crucial if children’s lives are to be improved as many parents struggle with complex problems which impact adversely on the children in their care.

11. The development of Children’s Services Plans is time-consuming and costly. Caution is needed to ensure that the time spent on the complexity of planning with so many partners is commensurate with the outcomes achievable.

12. The numbers of reviews of services noted in the Bill in addition to existing ones for example from the Care Inspectorate inevitably add pressures and divert scarce resources from direct services.

13. Similarly the preparation of a Child’s Plan needs to dovetail with any other existing plans and the interfaces need to work well so that where there are complex needs every agency provides their part in the plan in collaboration with each other.

Strengthening the role of early years support in the lives of children and families by increasing the amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare

14. The increased amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare is going to have a positive impact on many children. Flexibility particularly for looked after two year olds and other 2 year olds with complex needs including those children with disabilities should be ensured. Supporting families to provide stimulating early learning opportunities is going to be more positive for many than being in a daycare setting so that secure attachments can be built rather than a range of child care workers caring for a young child.

15. Early years services also need to tackle some of the growing health problems of children particularly diabetes and obesity. This is only one example of National initiatives with which early years services will have to collaborate.

Ensure better permanence planning

16. Improvements at local service levels to reduce any avoidable delays and to make positive plans for children as early as possible will all help to achieve better permanency plans for looked after children so that they can establish secure attachments to their permanent carers as early as possible. Foster carers are often the most secure person in a child's life and they need support to enable them to seek permanence orders to give the child and them greater stability of placement. Allowances like Adoption Allowances will be needed for many of these placements.

17. Legal systems also need to work to speedier processes and develop less adversarial systems which delay the child and carers having the security of legal permanence. An increasingly litigious approach to resolving children's permanent care has been evident I feel in the past years and legislative changes need to be addressing how to reduce that negative impact on children and carers and the financial burdens such litigation imposes.

Support for kinship carers

18. Having been involved closely with the work of Moving Forward and its focus on Kinship care I still believe that the vision for kinship care should be children cared for by suitable members of their extended family or friends without statutory intervention unless that is needed to protect the child. Being a kinship carer brings many stresses and if Councils were no longer providing income maintenance for some 4000 kinship carers and children I believe that Councils could use their resources to provide better support and specialist help to kinship carers and direct services for children.

19. I do not think that kinship care families should have to rely on Councils for an adequate income to bring up the child in their family. Extension of the criteria for a "Guardian's Allowance" have already been explored but I believe still merit more consideration.

20. Keeping Section 11 orders as the core legal basis for children in kinship care with the new Kinship Care order will clarify security and parental rights and responsibilities. Greater legal security will be important in many kinship care settings but rehabilitation should not be overlooked when that could be a safe option for the child's future care.

21. Transitions for kinship carers from current allowances would need to be well managed as many of these carers already experience serious financial hardship as allowances are worked out.

Care Leavers

22. I would support extending the age for care leavers to be able to request an assessment of need but assessments will be worthless if the services assessed as needed by the care leaver cannot be made available. This should not detract from better planning much earlier for young people reaching adulthood.

23. The significance of a trusted adult well known to care leavers should be central to decisions about where they will settle and to where they can return.
24. Highlighting the importance of Corporate parenting and looking at ways of making that real and accessible rather than solely verbal commitments will require a lot of work.

25. Getting into employment as a young person is so important and councils could be a rich source of employment although this will be in tension with the reducing service levels in many public services as budget cuts continue.

The continuing need for improved resourcing and support for fostering services continues to be debated in the Foster Care review

26. I am concerned that the key role of foster carers as the best people to provide a trusting and lasting loving relationship for many looked after young people may not get the resourcing and prominence it needs now that fostering issues are removed from the C and YP Bill. I hope that the Review of Foster Care findings will give the Scottish Government a clear message about the value of fostering as an essential service for children and young people who have to be looked after by Councils. Improvements that the Review will be likely to suggest will be welcome but need the backing of Government and adequate resourcing to make outcomes the best possible for children growing up in the care of agencies across Scotland.

27. If disparities in conditions for foster carers continue there may be a need to revisit legislation to enforce the provisions

28. I see the GIRFEC framework continuing to provide a sound basis for collaborative work but to work services have to be resourced to provide early and if necessary intensive services if the SHANARRI outcomes are to be achieved for all children.

29. While the Bill makes no specific reference to children with disabilities, they do need to be able to access as a priority early learning and childcare appropriate to their needs as well as families being able to access counselling to help them cope with the stress of caring for a child with disabilities.

30. They also need good respite care as a preventive resource to reduce the stress on families.

31. There are many more aspects of the Bill for comment but the above comments relate to the issues about which I feel most familiar.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Paul Braterman, Ron McLaren and Clare Marsh

1. We welcome the proposed introduction of this new bill and hope it will provide for children, the rights which have so far been largely ignored. We propose to limit our comments to those which directly affect the rights of the child, as outlined in Article 14 of the UNCRC.

2. Article 14:
   - States Parties shall respect the right of the child to freedom of thought, conscience and religion.
   - States Parties shall respect the rights and duties of the parents and, when applicable, legal guardians, to provide direction to the child in the exercise of his or her right in a manner consistent with the evolving capacities of the child.

3. ‘CURRICULUM FOR EXCELLENCE – PROVISION OF RELIGIOUS OBSERVANCE IN SCHOOLS’ states:

   “…….we can expect Scotland to become increasingly diverse in the range of faith and belief traditions represented. Religious Observance needs to be developed in a way which reflects and understands this diversity. It must be sensitive to individual spiritual needs and beliefs, whether these come from a faith or non-faith perspective.”

4. The Review Group on Religious Observance speaks of Religious Observance as both an individual and communal activity, providing the opportunity for individual reflection on what the core beliefs and values of their community mean to them as individuals, and how they can contribute and are influenced by them. However, in much of the primary sector, many schools simply ignore this. A single religion is practised as the one true and/or locally predominant faith, excluding all others, involving a religious minister/priest or cleric who presides over a specific religious service in a whole school assembly. We see that as contrary to the awareness and acceptance of the diversity that we seek.

5. ‘CURRICULUM FOR EXCELLENCE – PROVISION OF RELIGIOUS AND MORAL EDUCATION IN NON-DENOMINATIONAL SCHOOLS and RELIGIOUS EDUCATION IN ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS’ states:

   “Education about faith and belief in non-denominational schools, and education about faith in denominational schools contributes to the development of the whole person, allowing children and young people to consider, reflect upon and respond to important questions about the meaning and purpose of existence.”

6. The Scottish Joint Committee on RME or RMPS tells us that schools have been asked to move away from the confessional approach but school chaplaincy teams abound with faith representatives and lack non-religious balance.
7. Some primary schools invite the Bible Bus to park in the playground to distribute bibles and some distribute CD-ROMS produced by the JAM Trust which teaches creationism.

8. Government guidelines advise:

   "parents have a statutory right to withdraw children from participation in religious and moral education and religious education in both non-denominational and denominational schools", and

   "Where a child or young person is withdrawn, schools should make suitable arrangements for them to participate in a worthwhile alternative activity."

9. Schools should not be allowed to impose demeaning tasks, or treat opted-out children as if they were being subjected to discipline. Many parents contact non-religious organisations to complain that their school continues to teach one religion as the only true one. Some tell us of the obstructionist approach adopted by schools to their requests for their child to opt out and no suitable activity is offered. We are told that children are left to sit in a corridor reading a book, and, in one case, asked to sharpen all the pencils and tidy the classroom.

10. In a YouGov survey of 1000 parents of school age children (March 2012), only 4% said that schools should maintain the confessional approach and only 20% had been informed by the school of their right to withdraw.

11. It would appear that the problem of the absence of parental awareness of the provision to opt-out is confined mainly but not totally to the primary sector. However, we are also told by parents of pupils in the secondary sector that Intelligent Design is advocated by invited speakers, despite the fact that it is completely contrary to the scientific consensus. The theory of evolution is incontrovertible, supported as it is by the weight of scientific evidence; the theory of I.D. is not. Surely, in the interest of the children, it should be challenged on both scientific and philosophical grounds.

12. School staff who are sympathetic to requests for opt-out explain that they simply do not have an alternative, suitable curricular activity nor do they have the resources to provide a teacher. We have great sympathy with these schools and understand their problem. As a solution, we suggest that all schools, including those in the primary sector, move away from the confessional approach. It may be that some parents do not wish this to happen and if that is the case, then the local authority should provide the staffing and training to put in place, an alternative course of study based on philosophy and morality. Excellent course materials and training in their delivery already exist, provided by the education departments of our universities. When parents are enrolling their child, they can then be offered a choice of curriculum.

13. Children of a homosexual orientation need to be protected against the homophobic attitude prevalent in some schools.

14. In the denominational sector, all schools ignore the aforementioned government guidelines. Alternative guidance issued to their staff in 'This is Our Faith', pub.
March 2011, reads: “Teachers should avoid presenting all denominations or faiths as equally true. There is no place for the explicit study of atheism or humanism”. It also appears that RME in these schools is interpreted to include not only religious issues as such, but human relationships as well, including selective factual matters of sexual health, favouring abstinence, a situation that has led to expressions of concern by the NHS, and to the promulgation under the auspices of the schools’ RME programme of damaging disinformation about the efficacy of condoms against conception and STD's (see Times Educational Supplement Scotland, 21 June 2013)

15. That is in direct opposition to the Scottish Government’s policy on human relationships education and to that cited by government ministers. In Nov 2011, Dr Alasdair Allan MSP, Minister for Learning and Skills said: “RME is not indoctrination; pupils should decide their own stances on faith, morality etc and this is true in denominational as well as in non-denominational schools.” We fully agree with Dr Allan and hope that the new law will ensure that in a progressive inclusive Scotland, all children and young pupils will be given this right.

16. Many parents have contacted us over the last few years to ask for our help. They would be more that willing to give oral evidence to the committee.

British Association for Adoption and Fostering Scotland

1. The British Association for Adoption and Fostering is the leading UK membership organisation and charity for all those concerned with adoption, fostering and child-care social work, and operates on an inter-disciplinary basis. In Scotland, all local authorities and adoption agencies and almost all fostering agencies are members. BAAF Scotland works closely with member agencies and other voluntary organisations, groups and individuals to:

- promote and develop high standards in adoption, fostering and child placement services;
- promote public and professional understanding of adoption, fostering, and the life-long needs of children separated from their birth families;
- ensure that the developmental and identity needs of looked after children are respected and addressed by social work, health, legal and educational services;
- inform and influence policy makers and legislators, and all those responsible for the welfare of children and young people.

2. BAAF Scotland generally welcomes the Bill. We recognise that many of the details of the wide-ranging proposals will be in subsequent regulations and guidance. The effectiveness of many of the Bill’s intentions will depend on the details in such secondary legalisation and guidance.

3. However, BAAF Scotland has concerns about the considerable extension of duties on public authorities, particularly on local authorities. We are concerned about the resource implications of many of the proposed duties.

4. We would also wish a clear definition of ‘local authority’ for the general duties on them. It is crucial that duties such as those in s.8 are clearly put on the local authority as a whole and are not treated as being only the responsibility of social services departments. The 1995 Act has such a definition – s.93(1). It is also important that such a general definition is distinguished within the Bill from ‘responsible authority’, ‘relevant authority’, ‘managing authority’, ‘directing authority’ and other similar terms which need to specify, as appropriate, various services and agencies, including education and health.

Comments on the provisions of the Bill

Acts referred to:

2007 Act: Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007
Part 1, Rights of Children, ss.1 to 4 and Part 2, Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland, ss.5 and 6

5. We are in agreement with the proposed general duties in s.1 on the Scottish Ministers, generally to improve the effects of the UNCRC in Scotland. In practice, the efficacy of these duties will depend on how they are implemented and how they could be challenged. So far as the duties in s.2 are concerned, again the benefits will depend on how they are implemented by the various different authorities. We continue to have concerns about how effective these duties will be and what real difference they will make for children.

6. We are content with the provisions in ss.5 and 6, assuming that the Commissioner is satisfied with them.

Part 3, Children’s Services Planning, ss.7 to 18

7. We agree with the policy intention of strategic planning for children, set out in s.8 of the Bill, and that s.19 of the 1995 Act and s.4 of the 2007 Act will be repealed, to avoid unnecessary duplication of duties. We await the regulations to be made under s.7(3), as the specific details of what constitutes ‘children’s services’ is crucial for these provisions. We welcome the fact that the list will be in new regulations, as opposed to the current list for services referred to in s.19 of the 1995 Act, which list is in the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 as amended, but is not up-to-date. There must be consultation on what services are to be included in the new list.

8. We have concerns about the resource implications of the duty in s.13 on local authorities and health boards to publish annual reports. It is crucial that reporting duties do not get in the way of effective delivery of the services.

Part 4, Provision of Named Persons; ss.19 to 30

9. We understand the underlying policy intention of these provisions but we have reservations about successful implementation. While it is very important for vulnerable children easily to be able to access support, the universality of this provision may get in the way of ensuring that those who really need support actually receive it. The provisions risk diluting the aspirations of GIRFEC.

10. We are also concerned about how the universality of named persons will sit with individual professionals who have responsibilities for looked after children.

Part 5, Child’s Plan, ss.31 to 41

11. These provisions are about plans for individual children. While we welcome the policy intention, we have serious concerns about how these duties will fit into the existing systems for plans for children, whether statutory or informal – see SPiCe Briefing, pg 5.

12. We are particularly concerned about how these duties will fit into the existing ones placed on local authorities for all looked after children, at home or away from home, in terms of s.17 of the 1995 Act and regs.3-5 (and especially reg.5) and Schedules 1 and 2 of the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009, SSI 2009/210. Over the years, much unnecessary work and bureaucracy has developed when there has been no attempt to co-ordinate difference pieces of primary and secondary legislation. While the details of such co-ordination may be left to regulations, it would be helpful to insert a provision in the Bill which states that a s.31 plan is not required when the child is looked after or about to be looked after and a plan has been made or is in the process of being made under reg.5 of the 2009 Regulations.

Part 6, Early Learning and Childcare; ss.42 to 49

13. Early learning and childcare services are not part of our core areas of detailed expertise. However, we are in agreement with the provisions, particularly as they affect looked after children at home or away from home. We would, however, like to see those provisions extended beyond looked after children to children ‘in need’ under s.22 of the 1995 Act, to include them as children who are prioritised. In this way, a number of children who are not looked after, but are vulnerable because of their circumstances, could be included. This would extend the application to e.g. children placed with kinship carers and to children with disabilities.

14. The increased duties on education authorities must come with increased funding and resources. There also need to be very clear provisions about inter-authority arrangements and duties. It is crucial that these are clearly provided for in primary or secondary legislation, for the avoidance of doubt and to prevent litigation about which authority has which duty and to whom. Guidance will not be sufficient.

Part 7, Corporate Parenting, ss.50 to 59

15. We recognise and agree with the importance of ‘corporate parenting’ for all looked after children. However, we have serious concerns about the resource implications of these provisions, particularly for local authorities themselves. As well as the duties on all corporate parents in s.52, there are new reporting and information duties, which of themselves will require additional work, particularly for local authorities.

16. Section 52 is supported by the description of ‘wellbeing’ in s.74 of the Bill, which in turn reflects the GIRFEC principles. While the impact of the s.52 duties on all but one of the ‘corporate parents’ listed in Schedule 3 may seem to be in general terms, the effect on local authorities will be much more considerable. The terms of s.52, taken with s.17 of the 1995 Act and local authorities’ responsibilities to individual children, introduce another set of considerations which local authorities will have to take into account when planning for looked after children. They already have a duty for all looked after children, to ‘safeguard and promote his welfare (which shall, in the exercise of their duty to him be their paramount concern)’, s.17(1)(a) of the 1995 Act. We are not clear how s.52 will sit with this. In many ways, it simply adds detail to what local authorities should already be doing for all looked after children. This sort of provision would be better, for local authorities, as an amendment of the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009, or in statutory guidance.

17. A further issue arises in relation to the exercise of corporate parent duties and of parental responsibilities and rights as between local authorities, the other bodies listed in Schedule 3, children’s parents and other people who have parental responsibilities and/or rights. The parental responsibilities and rights of some looked after children are held by their birth parents; the parental responsibilities and rights of looked after children subject to permanence orders are held by local authorities, parents and/or others (each order is different); and for some looked after children, no-one, including local authorities, has parental responsibilities and rights or is available to exercise them, if parents are dead or have disappeared.

18. It is unclear how the duties in s.52 will impact for each individual child on these already complex arrangements.

19. We also think that the list of corporate parents in Schedule 3 is too wide.

Part 8, Aftercare, s.60

20. We welcome the extension of duties towards young people who have left the care system. However, there are significant resource implications for the provision of these services. There are difficulties for many young people in accessing the existing Aftercare system, and an extension of duties must be accompanied by sufficient resources and clear direction to ensure that all eligible young people are able to access and obtain the support they need.

Part 9, Counselling Services, s.61 to 63

21. This section imposes a very wide-ranging duty on local authorities. Those eligible will be set out in regulations and we are concerned about another possibly onerous duty being placed on local authorities. It is not clear where such duties will fit with existing support duties such as those under s.22 of the 1995 Act (children ‘in need’) and adoption support duties under the 2007 Act.

Part 10, Support for Kinship Care, ss.64 to 67

22. We welcome increased support for kinship carers. We are pleased that there is no new court order in the Bill, as we consider that orders under s.11 of the 1995 Act, or for some kinship carers, permanence orders under the 2007 Act, provide a good existing range of options. We look forward to seeing the details of the secondary legislation which will underpin these sections.

23. It is appropriate that parents are excluded from receiving kinship care assistance, as they are eligible for other support when caring for their children. The definition of parent for Part 10 should be any genetic parent – see s.15 of the 1995 Act, as amended.
Part 11, Adoption Register, s.68;

24. This section of the Bill proposes to amend the 2007 Act by inserting six new sections, ss.13A to 13F. These proposed sections are all concerned with the Scottish Adoption Register, SAR.

25. BAAF Scotland is currently responsible for administering SAR on behalf of the Scottish Ministers. We understand that the regulations to be introduced under the proposed s.13A(2) will, among other matters, require agencies to refer children to the SAR in certain circumstances. We do not consider that it is necessary to require mandatory referral of children to the SAR, as the current system operates satisfactorily without compulsion.

26. However, we are extremely concerned about the proposed s.13C(2)(a). This states that an adoption agency cannot disclose information (effectively ‘refer’ children) to the Scottish Ministers (i.e. SAR) without the permission of children’s parents or anyone else with parental responsibilities and rights. The effect of this provision would be that many fewer children would be able to be referred. If parents’ consent is required for referral and parents are not in favour of plans for adoption, they will usually and understandably not be willing to consent to such a disclosure/referral. In other situations, the whereabouts of parents may be unknown, and therefore no consent will be obtainable.

27. While obtaining parental consent for referral is good practice, it will not normally be forthcoming when adoption plans are not agreed to. It is our view that such consent is not legally necessary, although it is good practice, in terms of the 1998 Act. Schedule 2 of the 1998 Act lists the conditions for processing data, one of which must be met in most cases. Consent of the subject is only one of these conditions, para 1. The condition in para 5 is that the processing is necessary for administering justice, or for exercising statutory, governmental, or other public functions. When local authorities are looking after children, they are required to plan for when the children will no longer be looked after, under s.17 of the 1995 Act. They are also adoption agencies and have statutory duties for planning under the 2007 Act. Therefore, the consent of the parents (Condition 1) is not essential, as Condition 5 may be used instead.

28. If our view of the data protection provisions is incorrect, there is, in any case, no need for specific consent provisions in the Bill. The 1998 Act will apply anyway. There are no equivalent provisions about consent in the Adoption and Children Act 2002 or the Children and Families Bill currently under consideration at Westminster, both dealing with Adoption Registers for other parts of the UK.

29. In addition, the proposed s.13C(2)(a) requires consent from parents or any other person with parental responsibilities and rights, and this is a wider group of people than those whose consent to adoption must be given or dispensed with under s.31 of the 2007 Act.

30. Overall, we consider that this provision is not only unnecessary but also counter-productive to the policy intention of encouraging the referral of children to the SAR.
Other matters

31. As we have pointed out in some of our answers, there are serious resources issues for local authorities and other public bodies arising from many of the provisions. Implementation must be supported by sufficient resources.

32. We would wish the Scottish Government to take the opportunity of new legislation to amend ss.95 and 96 of the 2007 Act. These provisions cover the interface between the hearing system and the courts, when children are the subject of compulsory supervision requirements and also of applications for permanence orders. They are causing considerable difficulties for children, families and public authorities. We would be happy to provide further details and proposals.

33. We would also wish the Scottish Government to take the opportunity of new legislation to address the difficulties in the system for curators and reporting officers who must be appointed in all permanence and adoption court cases. Despite recommendations in a number of reports, notably the Adoption Policy Review Group’s Phase II Report in June 2005 and the Scottish Civil Courts Review Report (the Gill Review) in September 2009, there have been no real improvements in the overall system for appointment, management and monitoring of curators, etc, in over 20 years. This contrasts with the establishment of a National Safeguarders Panel under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 – safeguarders have a similar role in the hearing system. Again, we would be happy to provide further details and proposals.

Education and Culture Committee
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

British Association for Counselling and Psychotherapy

1. The British Association for Counselling and Psychotherapy (BACP) would like to submit the following response to the Scottish Parliament’s Education and Culture Committee’s call for evidence on the general principles of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

2. Our submission will focus on Part 9: Counselling services and what BACP sees as an important and obvious omission from the Bill around counselling services for children and young people.

The British Association for Counselling and Psychotherapy

3. BACP is the leading and largest body for counselling and psychotherapy in Scotland with over 1,700 practitioner members and over 38,000 UK-wide. Our members work across the public, private and voluntary sectors and of our 38,000 members, almost half say that they have an interest in working with children and young people.

4. BACP also has a specialist Counselling Children and Young People Division. It is the biggest, and the fastest growing Division, with currently over 4,000 members across the UK.

5. BACP has a strong public commitment to high practice standards and public protection. All BACP members are bound by the Ethical Framework for Good Practice for Counselling and Psychotherapy and within this, the Professional Conduct Procedure. These set out the basis of good practice for BACP therapists and their clients.

Executive Summary

6. BACP welcomes the commitment to counselling within the Bill; however, it is unclear what constitutes the counselling suggested and further details are needed to ensure that the recommended interventions are evidence-based and delivered by suitable practitioners.

7. A range of counselling interventions should be offered and families should be provided with enough information to make an informed choice on what is suitable for them. Any other support offered to a family should not be contingent on their participating in a recommended therapeutic intervention.

8. Given the importance of counselling as an early intervention, BACP believes the Bill as currently drafted has a major omission in relation to counselling for children and young people and that this important area needs to be included within the Bill.
9. BACP recommends that consideration is given to policy in Wales, where the Government has recently placed a statutory duty on local authorities to provide counselling services for all secondary school pupils.

Part 9: Counselling Services

10. BACP welcomes the recognition by the Scottish Government that counselling can be an effective early intervention for troubled families and can support families and kinship carers in maintaining wellbeing and best outcomes for children.

11. The mechanism for putting this provision in place, however, is unclear. The Bill uses the terms ‘family therapy’, ‘family mediation’ and ‘family conferencing’ interchangeably, suggesting these are similar activities, and all fall under the umbrella of ‘counselling’. BACP would welcome a clearer understanding of what interventions are being recommended, the criteria and evidence on which these have been selected, how they were identified and who will be determined most appropriate to deliver them.

12. The Bill states that local authorities, through secondary legislation, will determine the best therapeutic intervention for a family. BACP is concerned about the qualifications of whoever will be making these clinical decisions and about the involvement of families in being informed and having a say about the form of therapy in which they will be engaging. In line with the principles of ‘Autonomy’ and ‘Keeping trust’ in the BACP Ethical Framework, BACP would welcome reassurance that families are given appropriate information on types of therapeutic intervention available, consulted on their needs and wishes and have a choice about a counselling intervention rather than having it decided for them by the local authority.

13. Also with reference to the principles of ‘Autonomy’ and ‘Keeping trust’ in the BACP Ethical Framework, BACP would like to ensure that families are given a choice about accessing therapies, and that any other support offered to a family is not contingent on their participating in a recommended therapeutic intervention.

14. BACP recognises that confidentiality is a vital component of a therapeutic relationship and would want to be reassured that any mechanisms for information sharing with other services would take into account this aspect of therapeutic work and be negotiated in line with guidance in the BACP Ethical Framework.

15. BACP has a commitment to monitoring practice and researching outcomes. The Bill appears to have expectations as to outcomes for counselling i.e. preventing family breakdown and/or arriving at a need for a kinship carer. BACP would want to be assured that appropriate outcomes based on evidence-based practice are identified and that mechanisms are agreed for assessing outcomes.

16. The Bill stresses the importance of respecting a child’s rights under the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC). The UNCRC states that ‘a child who is capable of forming his or her own views [has] the right to express those views freely in all matters affecting the child, the views of the child being given due weight in accordance with the age and maturity of the child’\(^4\). In accordance with the UNCRC and the principles of ‘Autonomy’ and ‘Keeping trust’ (mentioned above) BACP would like to ensure that the views of children are taken into account when a counselling intervention is specified.

Omission of Counselling for Children and Young People

17. In 2004, the level of identified mental health problems in Scottish children aged 5–16 years was estimated at just over eight per cent of the population (over 55,000 children)\(^5\). Many more go unidentified and do not seek, or have access to, help. In addition, nearly half (45 per cent) of all children looked after by Scottish councils, for example those living in care homes, have mental health problems\(^6\).

18. Therefore, whilst welcoming the Bill’s commitment through Part 9 to counselling services for troubled families and kinship carers, BACP believe that the Bill has an important and obvious omission in relation to counselling for children and young people.

19. The Children (Scotland) Act 1995\(^7\) states that local authorities have a duty to provide for children in need, and children at risk. As this Bill recognised the importance of counselling as an effective intervention for families at risk, then it should follow that counselling should also be a resource for children and young people at risk and in need. In addition to the counselling already outlined in the Bill, BACP believes that the Bill should also include provision for counselling for children and young people.

20. Counselling can be an effective early intervention strategy for young people who have a range of problems. Evidence, from the University of Strathclyde\(^8\), shows that counselling for young people is associated with improvements around family issues, bereavement, eating disorders, bullying and relationships as well as other emotional, behavioural and social difficulties, including anger management.

21. The guidance set out in the 2005 Scottish Government report “The Mental Health of Children and Young People: A Framework for Promotion, Prevention, and Care”\(^9\) called for the provision of confidential, accessible and non-stigmatising counselling support for all. Since this commitment in 2005, there has been little movement towards this target and there is still no Scottish national strategy for its implementation. BACP believes this Bill provides the Government with the opportunity to deliver on this commitment to deliver counselling for children and young people.

22. More recently, Scotland’s Curriculum for Excellence\textsuperscript{10} and Getting it right for every child\textsuperscript{11} (GIRFEC) both support the principle of children and young people having access to support they need and when they need it. We believe these statements supporting counselling for children and young people back up the need for it to be incorporated into this legislation.

23. Delivering counselling for young people through local authorities can be done. Following the success of the Welsh Government’s national school-based counselling strategy\textsuperscript{12} it was recommended that funding should be granted permanently to embed counselling in the Welsh secondary school sector. The Welsh Government agreed and the School Standards and Organisation (Wales) Act placed a statutory obligation on Local Authorities in Wales to provide school-based counselling services for all its secondary school pupils. BACP would recommend that this model for providing counselling for children and young people should investigated in more detail.

24. To ensure universal provision, children and young people who prefer not to access services in school, and those who are not in school, should have a choice of alternative provision within community settings. Services need to ensure that they are responsive to the needs of the populations that they serve.

Further information

25. Should the Committee be seeking further written or oral evidence, BACP would be delighted to provide additional information about the provisions surrounding counselling within the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

The British Medical Association (BMA) is a registered trade union and professional association representing doctors from all branches of medicine. The BMA has a total membership of around 140,000 representing around 70% of all practising doctors in the UK. In Scotland, the BMA represents around 16,000 members.

The BMA supports the sharing of information to promote, support and safeguard the well-being of children and young people. As drafted, however, sections 26 and 27 of the Bill are too broad (see also section 38). The BMA would welcome the inclusion, on the face of the Bill, of the requirement that relevant information can only be shared with consent, or where there is an overriding public interest or in order to protect the patient. Patient confidentiality should be maintained wherever possible and access to patient information without the consent or knowledge of a patient should be used only as a last resort.

Confidentiality of personal health information is the cornerstone of the patient/doctor relationship. Patients need to be reassured that their health information, which they share in confidence with a doctor, will be treated confidentially otherwise they may feel unable to trust and seek help from healthcare professionals.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Natalie Campbell

1. I am horrified by threats to family autonomy and privacy from this bill. Parents know and love their children much more than a government worker and are uniquely qualified to make good decisions regarding their children's care, upbringing, and education. From reading history, I always thought the Scots were a freedom loving people. Now I'm beginning to wonder. By this proposed action you're telling parents that they're not competent to raise their children. Don't be surprised if they become less responsible and expect more and more help from the government. Please don't pass this bill.

Capability Scotland

1. Capability Scotland campaigns with, and provides education, employment and care services, for disabled people across Scotland.

Summary

2. Capability Scotland strongly supports the proposed Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill which it believes has the potential to strengthen the rights of disabled children in Scotland. There is, however, a need for the Bill to make specific reference to the needs and requirements of disabled children in relation to early learning, childcare and the codification of the GIRFEC system.

3. Capability Scotland believes there is a need for consideration of how increased entitlement to childcare and early learning will be made meaningful to disabled children who often struggle to access any childcare or early learning opportunities that meet their specific requirements. Capability Scotland also believes that the extension of free childcare to 2 year olds should also be made available to disabled children, many of whom face similar barriers to learning and social inclusion as Looked After children.

4. Capability Scotland believes there is a need for both the Children’s Services Plan and individual Child’s Plan to make specific reference to the need to plan to ensure successful transitions from child to adult services where this is relevant. This should include a duty placed on the authority responsible for the Child’s Plan to consult with adult services (such as adult social care, housing and health) in advance of the young person turning 18.

Our Response

Part 1: Rights of Children

1. Capability Scotland supports the duty placed on Scottish Ministers by Section 1 of the Bill. We are concerned, however, that this duty falls far short of the obligations contained in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) itself, which obliges the Scottish Government to protect, respect and fulfil the rights of children in Scotland. We support Together (the campaign for children’s rights) in their calls for incorporation of the UNCRC into domestic Scottish law.

2. We also believe there is a need for more consideration to be given to the Scottish Government’s reporting requirements and the need for independent scrutiny. We would also therefore ask that the Scottish Human Rights Commission or Scottish Commissioner for Children and Young People be given a statutory duty to provide a shadow report on the Scottish Government’s progress in relation to the UNCRC.
Part 3: Children’s Service Planning

3. Capability Scotland is concerned that there is insufficient reference made within the Bill to the establishment of Joint Boards created through the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill. Given the likelihood that Children’s Service Planning will come under the responsibility of such bodies we are concerned about the lack of consideration it has been given. We would therefore seek clarification as to the role Joint Boards will have in developing Children’s Service Plans.

4. The Bill also states that the purpose of taking a co-ordinated approach to service planning is to promote the wellbeing of the child and to integrate services from the user’s perspective. While this is welcome, we believe Children’s Services Planning should also have a role to play in ensuring that children and young people can move smoothly from children’s service to adult services when they reach the age of 18. Capability Scotland’s experience is that young disabled adults often struggle to access the care and support they require after leaving school and moving into adult settings such as college, employment and/or accessing social care services. Capability Scotland therefore believes that one of the stated purposes of CSP should be to encourage joint working between relevant services to facilitate successful transitions to adult services.

Part 4: Named Person

5. There needs to be increased clarity in the Bill as to how the Named Person and Lead Professional roles will relate to one another. Currently, some children with complex needs are assigned a lead professional to co-ordinate and monitor multi-agency activity, while the Named Person coordinates access to more universal services such as health and education. No reference is made in the Bill to the role of Lead Professional and we believe there is a need for clarification about how the two roles will interact. In particular there is a need for clarification as to whether the Named Person will still have responsibility for the implementation of the Child’s Plan where a Lead Professional has been assigned.

6. Furthermore, section 60 of the Bill increases the age at which care leavers can receive support from the local authority from 18 to 25. Capability Scotland believe that there is need for consideration of whether the role of the Named Person might be extended in relation to disabled children to ensure there is always a clear point of contact during the potentially difficult transition from children’s to adult services. A Named Person could provide young people with crucial support during this period.

Part 5: Child’s Plan

7. There has been a lack of consideration as to how the Child’s Plan will relate to current systems in place to achieve similar outcomes such as the Coordinated Support Plan developed for children accessing two or more services. Currently, the Policy Memorandum only points to a ‘consideration’ of the CSP, not its full integration into the Child’s Plan. Without such integration, we are concerned that disabled children could potentially have a Child’s Plan and a CSP, resulting in unnecessary confusion. Anecdotal evidence suggests that in areas where Child’s Plans are already being developed, the CSP and CP are developed separately and ‘stapled together before meetings’.

8. It is also essential that children and their families are involved at the earliest possible stage in developing the Child’s Plan. The Bill should also make reference to the need for communication support and/or advocacy to be made available to ensure that all children are in a position to make an active contribution to the development of their plan. In particular, we would urge the Scottish Government to consider provision of the kind demonstrated in sections 5 and 15 of the Social Work (Self Directed Support) (Scotland) Act 2012 which give individuals the right to communication support and/or support understanding the decision making process where necessary.

9. Capability Scotland also believes that the Child’s Plan should incorporate a commitment to consider the transitional arrangements for children approaching the age of 18. We would therefore suggest that the Bill place a duty on the authority responsible for the Child’s Plan to consult with adult services (such as adult social care, housing and health) in advance of the young person turning 18.

Part 6: Early Learning and Childcare

10. The increased entitlement to 600 hours of free childcare for three and four year olds in Scotland is extremely welcome. The Bill, however, does not currently recognise the barriers faced by disabled children and their families in accessing suitable childcare at a cost equal to that of other families. In many cases, disabled children are not able to access any suitable childcare because of the lack of specialist provision in their local area. Research conducted by Capability Scotland has found that 70% of working parents with a disabled child relied on family members to care for the child, and half of them said this was because of a lack of suitable or affordable childcare1. Furthermore research conducted by Children in Scotland found that only 10% of local authorities could say whether they provide adequate childcare services to meet the needs of disabled children in their area2. Given these statistics there is a clear need for the legislation to specify that the childcare and early learning should be both suitable and accessible to the child and their family.

11. Capability Scotland also believe that the provision of flexible childcare for looked-after two year olds should also be extended to all two year old disabled children. This is necessary to ensure that disabled children receive the additional support for early learning and opportunities for social interaction that they may otherwise struggle to access.

General Comments

12. Capability Scotland welcomes the fact that under the Bill, the wellbeing of children will be measured using SHANARRI indicators. The use of broad indicators of wellbeing is especially welcome in relation to disabled children whose wellbeing has traditionally been understood in narrower terms. Historically, a medical model of disability has often been employed resulting in the wellbeing of disabled children being understood in terms of their physical health rather than their wider wellbeing. The Bill represents an important legislative shift towards understanding and acting upon their wider needs, particularly in relation to social, economic and cultural rights.

13. Our only concern in relation to the employment of SHANARRI indicators is that they do little to bridge the gap between children’s services and adult services. The people who use Capability Scotland’s services consistently struggle to access the support and services they need when they turn 18 and are no longer considered children by public bodies. In many cases the transition is abrupt and leads to young adults being denied the help and support they need to realise their rights to education, participation and independent living. Given the increasing emphasis on personalised, outcomes-based approaches to adult services we would question whether there is any need for there to be a different framework of indicators for adults and children. An overarching, rights-based framework might allow for smoother, better planned transitions into adulthood.

About Us

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
CARE for Scotland

Introduction

1. CARE is a well-established mainstream Christian charity which provides resources and helps to bring Christian insight and experience to matters of public policy and practical caring initiatives. For many years CARE has been active in the field of education. We have produced resources for schools, parents and teachers. We have a particular interest in those areas of the curriculum and education which interact with religious belief, the development of personal values and parental rights. CARE is also involved in advancing a Christian understanding of marriage and the family, including the important rights and responsibilities of parents with regard to the welfare and wellbeing of their children, and seeking to encourage agencies of the state to recognise the important role of parents in the raising of children. Within this context we have engaged at the international, European and domestic levels in debates over the drafting of human rights (including child rights) documents and laws.

General Comments

1. Children’s rights should not be viewed in isolation from parental rights and the family context. Our view is that the rights of children are best protected by being brought up by their natural parents within the context of the wider family and in a loving and secure home. CARE’s view of the central role of parents and importance of the wider family for children’s well-being is echoed in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC). The preamble to the UNCRC states that the State Parties are:

“Convinced that the family, as the fundamental group of society and the natural environment for the growth and well-being of all its members and particularly children, should be afforded the necessary protection and assistance so that it can assume its responsibilities with the community.

Recognizing that the child, for the full and harmonious development of his or her personality, should grow up in a family environment, in an atmosphere of happiness, love and understanding.”

2. Article 3:2 states:

State Parties undertake to ensure the child such protection and care as is necessary for his or her well-being, taking into account the rights and duties of his or her parents …”

3. Article 5 states:

State Parties shall respect the responsibilities, rights and duties of parents or, where applicable, members of the extended family or community as provided for by local custom … to provide, in a manner consistent with the evolving capacities of the child, appropriate direction and guidance in the exercise by the child of the rights recognized in the present Convention.”

4. Article 29 of the Convention requires education provided by State Parties to encourage:

“the development of respect for the child's parents, his or her own cultural identity, language and values …”

5. These, and other, parts of the UNCRC indicate the central role of parents in the raising of children and the duty of State Parties to respect the rights of, and support, parents in this role. However, those groups which advocate for child rights often fail to present the UNCRC in a holistic manner, but rather articulate a view which highlights specific rights (e.g. Article 12 – the right for the child to express his/her views and for these views to be taken into consideration) without drawing attention to the wider context of parental and family rights. This can lead to a distorted interpretation of the UNCRC and its implementation in a manner which undermines family structures and views the child as a wholly autonomous individual. Such an interpretation is contrary to the overall content of the UNCRC.

Duty on Scottish Ministers in Relation to the Rights of Children

6. Scottish Ministers should take a holistic approach to the implementation of the UNCRC, including placing an emphasis upon the rights of parents and the wider family context. This approach should be reflected in the duties placed on Scottish Ministers. Ministers should recognise that the rights and wellbeing of children and young people do not stand in isolation. Children and young people should not be seen as being totally autonomous from their parents, other adult relatives or carers. Rather the rights and wellbeing of children and young people should be viewed within the context of marriage, parental rights and responsibilities, the wider family and the social and cultural context. It is imperative that this perspective is reflected in the legislation and in subsequent guidance which is issued by the Scottish Government. This holistic approach should be adopted in education programmes and materials regarding the UNCRC which are used in schools in order to fulfill the Article 42 requirement.

7. CARE notes the requirement in the Bill that Ministers are required to keep under consideration whether there are steps which they could take to further effect the UNCRC requirements. We raise one caveat with regard to this requirement which relates to the third optional protocol of the UNCRC. This protocol has not been adopted by the UK and CARE would have concerns about the Scottish Government endorsing it. The third optional protocol allows children to submit complaints regarding the violation of their rights to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child. We have concerns about the operation of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, its democratic accountability, its receptiveness to being overly influenced by organised child rights pressure groups, its supra-national nature and its authority to determine the correct interpretation of the UNCRC. We consider that the appropriate mechanism for redress is at the national level and that State Parties are the appropriate bodies in international law to interpret the UNCRC.
Duties of Public Authorities in Relation to the UNCRC

8. We would reiterate our comments in paragraphs 2-6 with regard to our concerns regarding the unbalanced manner in which the UNCRC is interpreted on occasions. It is important that Scottish public bodies adopt a holistic approach to the UNCRC which respects the rights or parents, wider family religious, ethnic and cultural communities. There should be an explicit requirement in the reporting of public bodies to consider child rights within this wider context.

The Role of the Commissioner for Children and Young People

9. As with other public bodies, the Commissioner should be required to take a holistic approach to the UNCRC which includes respect for the rights of parents. In addition, the Commissioner must have regard to the European Convention of Human Rights, including the parental rights contained within that convention as exemplified in Protocol 1, Article 2 of that Convention which states that parents have a right to have their children educated in accordance with their religious and philosophical beliefs.

10. CARE was of the view when the Commissioner was established in 2003 that the correct balance had been struck with regard to his/her powers. We remain of this view and are not convinced that he/she should be able to investigate individual cases. Rather we suggest that his powers of investigation should be limited to issues of a general nature.

Provision of Named Persons

11. We are concerned by the proposal to introduce a ‘named person’ for every child in Scotland. We are concerned that the rights and the important role of parents may be eroded by state officials and civil liberties infringed. Our concern is that the named person provision reflects an ideological view which denies the primacy of parental authority in relation to child rearing. Rather it reflects an ideology which emphasises society as a corporate parent and views children essentially as the property of the state. There is a danger that the civil liberties of parents and families could be infringed by over-intervention on the part of public officials. For example, health board or local authority officials might use the Public Sector Equality Duty as a reason to undermine the values or religious beliefs of parents with regard to issues of human sexuality. This may include the provision of sexual health education programmes at a pre-school or primary level against the wishes of parents. Pressure may be brought to access contraceptive services or termination of pregnancy with little regard to the religious beliefs or ethical objections of parents. Full information or spiritual guidance may not be available, leading to regret and emotional trauma later in life on the part of the young person concerned.

Childcare Provision

12. We welcome the additional funding for childcare and the increased flexibility it allows for working parents. We are concerned, however, that parents who wish to stay at home to look after their children should not feel under pressure to go out to work and place their children in childcare from an early age. In addition, parental involvement in a child’s pre-school education should be supported and the values promoted in the nursery should not undermine the values of the family or their cultural and religious identity. In order to do so a diversity of pre-school provision should be facilitated in order to increase parental choice. One means of addressing both these issues would be to allow the funding to follow the child, rather than perpetuating the current arrangements which give the local authority control over the allocation of funding between the council, private and voluntary sectors.

Wellbeing

13. Whilst CARE understands the motivation of the Scottish Government for wishing to adopt a wider definition of the child or young person’s wellbeing than has traditionally been incorporated in the term ‘welfare’, we have some concerns that this move may represent an approach which sees the child or young person as a wholly autonomous individual. Autonomy is never absolute (at any stage in life) and is a developing characteristic which should accompany a growing sense of moral responsibility. In the Christian tradition, children are to be valued as individuals made in the image of God, but are also to be instructed by their parents in right living as they grow up. This understanding is compatible with a positive view of child rights, but does place limitations on the extent to which the rights of children and young people should be viewed as paramount within the wider context of family or societal life. For example, the role of moderate physical chastisement may be defended in order to raise children with an appropriate sense of respect for authority and the rule of law.

14. We are concerned that the approach being adopted in the Bill may undermine efforts to view children as part of the wider community of family and society, instead prioritising individual autonomy across a spectrum of aspects of life. For example, some health officials may argue that children and young people should have access to comprehensive sexual health education, even if this runs contrary to the value system of the family, religious community or school. The family’s preference might be for education in these matters for the child or young person which reflects their religious or cultural identity. However, the approach to ‘wellbeing’ being contained in the Bill could be used by health board and local authority officials to prioritise the perceived physical health benefits for the child from comprehensive sexual health education over the religious or cultural values of the family and indeed over the child or young person’s own spiritual development and emotional health.

CARE for Scotland
26 July 2013
Introduction

1. The Care Inspectorate is the independent scrutiny and improvement body established under the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, that brings together the scrutiny work previously undertaken by the Care Commission, HMIE child protection team and the Social Work Inspection Agency. Our role is to regulate and inspect care and support services (including criminal justice services) and carry out scrutiny of social work services. At the request of Scottish Ministers we conduct joint inspections of children’s services or any other services in conjunction with other scrutiny bodies. We provide independent assurance and protection for people who use services, their families and carers and the wider public. In addition, we play a significant role in supporting improvements in the quality of services for people in Scotland.

2. In addition to our ongoing inspection and regulation of registered care services, the Care Inspectorate has developed a new model for scrutiny and improvement of services for children, young people and families provided in local authority areas. The new approach focuses on the experiences of, and outcomes for, children and young people and is based on the premise that positive outcomes are achieved when agencies work effectively together with a clear focus on the interests of children and young people at the heart of their activity. Inspections are undertaken by the Care Inspectorate working in partnership with colleagues from Education Scotland, Healthcare Improvement Scotland (HIS) and Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland (HMICS) and hold community planning partners collectively accountable for the outcomes achieved for children and young people.

3. We published ‘How well are we improving the lives of children and young people?’, a guide for community planning partners with a draft set of quality indicators to assist in their self-evaluation of the quality of services for children and young people. This guide also aims to assist services to assess how well they are implementing the Getting it Right for Every Child (GIRFEC) approach. The Care Inspectorate has begun to publish reports on pilot joint inspections using these quality indicators. The model for joint inspections of services for children and young people has been developed on the successful model for joint inspections of services to protect children, with all 32 local authorities inspected over a three year period between 2009 and 2012. We recently published ‘Child Protection Services: Findings of Joint Inspections 2009-12’, an overview report of findings from these inspections. The Care Inspectorate is also piloting new methodology for the inspection of childminding services using the GIRFEC wellbeing indicators to focus more clearly on outcomes for children.

4. In responding to this call for evidence we have examined the Bill’s stated aims in turn, drawing on findings from a range of inspection activities.
Ensure that children's rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services by placing new duties on the Scottish Ministers and the public sector and by increasing the powers of Scotland's Commissioner for Children and Young People.

5. We welcome the intention to ensure that children’s rights influence the design and delivery of policies and services. As a public authority we strive to ensure that the rights of people in Scotland are promoted and protected. The proposed duties in this part of the Bill will help provide for increased transparency and better public reporting in this regard. The emphasis on securing improved implementation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) over time is particularly welcome.

6. The Care Inspectorate welcomes the opportunity to report jointly with other scrutiny and regulatory bodies on progress in fulfilling our duties under the legislation. We note that Education Scotland is omitted from the list of bodies set out in Schedule 1 and suggest that it is included as a body which provides independent scrutiny and supports improvement of education services for children and young people across Scotland.

7. In principle we welcome measures to strengthen the role of the Scottish Commissioner for Children and Young People (SCYPP) by extending its remit to include the conducting of investigations on behalf of individuals. Our view is that this will raise the profile of children’s and young people’s entitlements to be heard and for their rights, interests and views to be taken into account when decisions are made which affect them. We would however seek to ensure that this does not cause duplication or confusion around the role of the Commissioner, ourselves, Education Scotland, HIS and the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman (SPSO), all of whom already have some responsibilities in this area. We would also seek clear responsibilities and guidance within these measures for the SCYPP to report situations where children and young people are at immediate risk to the relevant authorities which hold a statutory responsibility for investigating child protection concerns and keeping children safe.

8. The new model for joint inspections of services for children, described above, will report routinely on the extent to which community planning partners involve children, young people, families and other stakeholders in policy, planning and service development. These inspections will consider the extent to which services communicate well with children, young people and families and how evident their views are within children’s services plans, corporate parenting strategy, policy making and planning processes.

Improve the way services support children and families by promoting cooperation between services, with the child at the centre.

9. We welcome the requirement for each local authority and relevant health board to jointly prepare a children’s services plan and the duty on those bodies to ensure that other service providers can participate and contribute to this plan. The joint inspections of services for children and young people will report routinely on the extent to which integrated approaches to children’s services planning is improving the wellbeing of children and young people across a community planning partnership area. Experience from the pilot inspections of services for children suggests there is a direct correlation between how effectively local partners cooperate across all relevant services and how effectively they plan to meet the needs of children and young people. For example involving the third sector and independent providers of services in integrated children’s services planning helps to harness their contribution, knowledge and expertise towards meeting local need.

10. We suggest that there should be more emphasis on the responsibility of other community planning partners not only to make meaningful contributions and participate in the development of children’s plans but to carry out desired actions towards achieving its aims. This will encourage services to pool resources towards integrated service delivery. We have found that the most successful plans for children's services are underpinned by joint leadership and a shared commitment across all relevant partners to improving the lives of children, young people and families and closing outcome gaps for the most vulnerable children and young people. Police Scotland and the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration are important bodies omitted from the obligation to prepare a children's services plan.

11. We know from two three year programmes of joint inspections of services to protect children, and from our considerable experience in regulating and inspecting services for children and young people, that the third sector often plays a key role in delivering essential services to improve the wellbeing of children and young people across Scotland. In some areas, the third sector is at the forefront of intervention to meet the wellbeing needs of the most vulnerable children and families. However, the extent to which the third sector is enabled to contribute to planning for children at strategic level is variable across the country. We suggest the Bill would be strengthened by the inclusion of specific reference to third sector organisations in Part 3.

12. We welcome the clarity provided around the definition and role of the ‘named person’ and consider this to be significant in strengthening responsibilities to ensure that a child or young person’s wellbeing is optimised throughout their childhood. We are particularly pleased to see the intention that all school-aged children should be provided with a named person irrespective of where they live or whether they are attending school. We consider this to be a crucial factor in meeting the child’s entitlements to support and protection when they are not on a school roll, such as those who are home educated.

13. We suggest there would be merit in considering the appointment of a named person for young people between the ages of 16 and 18 years who are not in full time education, who are not legally entitled to the support of the corporate parent as proposed and do not have a lead professional but whose circumstances make them particularly vulnerable. This would help to ensure the necessary support and guidance for vulnerable young people at such a key stage in their transition into adulthood. This might include young people whose names have recently been removed from the child protection register and those young people who have recently ceased to be looked after at home. Inspections show that practice in making aftercare support available to young people looked after at home and young people looked after in kinship care is widely variable across the country. A young person who has no access to formal aftercare support would benefit significantly from having a designated named person for a period of time.

14. We also greatly welcome the reference to a definition of wellbeing using the SHANARRI indicators. Our inspection evidence, from both the joint inspections of services to protect children and our new joint inspections of services for children and young people, underlines the importance of a common understanding of wellbeing across services to the effective identification of needs and joint working to meet them.

15. We are pleased to see the intention to ensure a single planning process through the Child’s Plan for those children and young people that require it. An overview of the findings of the last programme of joint inspections of services to protect children tells us that improvement in the assessment of risks and needs is still required across many parts of the country. In our scrutiny of services for children and young people, we will continue to focus on the quality of assessments, the rigour and comprehensiveness of individual plans and the effectiveness of planning processes in improving the day to day circumstances and the longer-term outcomes for children and young people.

Strengthen the role of early years support in children’s and families’ lives by increasing the amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare.

16. We welcome proposed investment in early years provision and the principle of increasing flexibility of early learning and childcare. The more flexible approach to the allocation of a child’s 600 hours entitlement will support the varying needs of working families including those with irregular working patterns. This approach will require the support of local authorities to consider the needs of individual families. The extended entitlement for children should be strengthened through the work established by the Early Years Collaborative.

17. It will be challenging for local authorities at a time of financial constraints to develop new services or strengthen existing arrangements with partner providers in relation to the provision of early learning. From our inspections, we know that local authorities in smaller or more remote areas find ensuring a wide range of options especially challenging. It will be important that a range of options are considered for each child and family so that their particular needs can be met appropriately. Traditional models of nursery provision will require to be supplemented by other types of provision to ensure a range of services with sufficient breadth to support the wellbeing of all young children. Our joint inspections will explore how local community planning partners are working together to ensure they understand the range of needs of families in their particular communities and the extent to which they are involving children and families in designing services.
18. We welcome the extended eligibility for looked after two year olds. We know from our inspections of community childminding services that a significant number of looked after two year olds already receive care packages funded by local authorities, such as funded social work places within childminding settings or parent support groups. Local authorities should be encouraged to include these arrangements when considering the most appropriate provision for vulnerable children in their communities.

19. It is also important that local authorities make arrangements to ensure continuation of services, where needed, when a child ceases to be looked after. It should be noted that being 'looked after' is not the only indicator of vulnerability; it is important that vulnerable children and families do not lose out by reason of living in areas where services have been successful at implementing the ‘no-order principle’ and have become skilled at engaging families without recourse to statutory measures. In these areas there will be larger numbers of young people who have been supported successfully to remain in the care of their families through highly effective multi-agency plans. As such these young people will not be legally entitled to the support of the corporate parent as proposed.

20. It is important that the extension of provision does not increase the regulatory burden placed upon providers. The Care Inspectorate’s regulatory activity already takes account of children’s services within a local authority area through the joint inspections of children services and inspections of individual services.

Ensure better permanence planning for looked after children by improving support for kinship carers, families and care leavers, extending corporate parenting across the public sector, and putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing.

21. The Care Inspectorate is pleased to note the emphasis on collaboration among corporate parents in support of a joint commitment to meeting corporate parenting responsibilities for children who are looked after, and to young people under the age of 26 who were looked after upon reaching school leaving age.

22. We welcome the identification of certain bodies to act as corporate parents and we take our duties to support and safeguard children and young people seriously.
We welcome the duty to be alert to matters which could adversely affect the wellbeing of children and young people as we conduct our inspection and regulatory functions and to take action to improve our working practices.
However, the duties conferred on all listed bodies to act as corporate parents may be argued to inappropriately extend the remit of the Care Inspectorate towards direct provision of services for children and young people. We would suggest that these duties are redrafted to better reflect the role and function of the Care Inspectorate. For example, we firmly agree with the duty as a corporate parent to be alert to matters which might adversely affect the wellbeing of children and young people and in the proper exercise of our functions promote the interests of children and young people. However, it would not be consistent with our functions as an independent regulator of services to exercise the duty to assess the needs of children and young people or to provide services or support to meet these needs.

23. The extension of the age up to which formerly looked after young persons may request access to aftercare assistance from 21 to 26 is welcome. However, a shift of emphasis from the young person ‘requesting’ access to the local authority ‘ensuring’ access would be preferable and efforts should be made to ensure awareness among care leavers of their rights in this regard. We know from the many young people we meet during the course of our work that awareness of children’s rights is highly variable and more work is needed to promote understanding among young people and staff. We would particularly like to see greater encouragement to corporate parents to ensure the principles of permanency (that is, forward planning to ensure a secure home base and continuity of care) are implemented for older young people who may otherwise face significant and distressing upheaval at age 16 when they are required to leave foster placements and residential care.

24. The Care Inspectorate recognises the potential of the Adoption Register to expedite adoption processes. We consider it will be particularly useful as a complement to existing tools where there are complex matching needs. We would however welcome clarification about whether the Care Inspectorate will be expected to play a role in supporting use of the register and a clear indication that maintenance of the Adoption register will not constitute the provision of a care service as defined in Paragraph 8 of Schedule 12 to the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010.

25. Inspectors working over a number of years in the joint inspection programme for services to protect children and, more recently, in the pilot inspections of services for children and young people have found many examples of improved outcomes for children who are unable to grow up in the care of their birth parents by consistent nurturing care provided by friends and relatives. However, we also found that support made available to kinship carers to enable them to provide this nurturing care is highly variable across the country. The Care Inspectorate therefore greatly welcomes the intention to strengthen mechanisms for provision of support to kinship carers through the establishment of a Kinship Care Order. We would welcome clarification about the expectations of the Care Inspectorate as a regulator where children are living with relatives under such an order.

Strengthen existing legislation that affects children and young people by making procedural and technical changes in the areas of children’s hearings support arrangements, secure accommodation placements, and school closures.

26. We welcome provision for a child or relevant person to be able to appeal to the Sheriff against a local authority decision to detain the child in secure accommodation. We regard this as consistent with aspirations to better safeguard and promote the human rights of a child or young person.
Other comments

27. We note that a number of provisions related to foster care, originally proposed in the Scottish Government’s consultation on the legislation, have been omitted from the Bill. We appreciate that these proposals are likely to be taken forward through alternative mechanisms, such as the national review of foster care, but clarification on this would be helpful.

Extension of Aftercare Support for Care Leavers up to the age of 26

2. The proposed amendment to section 29 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 extends a care leavers’ right to request assistance from the age of 21 up to the age of 26. The Bill proposes that following an application by a care leaver, the local authority is required to carry out an assessment, and:

- must, if satisfied that the person has any eligible needs which cannot be met other than by taking action under this subsection, provide the person with such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers necessary for the purposes of meeting those needs, and
- may otherwise provide such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers appropriate having regard to the person’s welfare.

3. While we welcome the extension of the duty to support a care leaver who is deemed to have eligible needs, it should be recognised that these provisions do not guarantee improved aftercare support for these vulnerable young people. Care leavers will still have to (and be able to) actively request assistance and be assessed as eligible. Local authorities will continue to define what are ‘eligible needs’ and provide what they consider ‘necessary for the purposes of meeting those needs’. There is, therefore, considerable scope in how aftercare support will be provided, potentially perpetuating the status quo of inconsistent practice nationally (For further details on these points, please see the CELCIS response to the consultation on the Bill.)

4. We strongly recommend that the legislation is strengthened to reflect a duty on local authorities (and relevant corporate parenting partners, such as NHS Health Boards) to provide support to care leavers up to the age of 26, without caveats. If assessments are necessary, it is critical that clear and consistent eligibility criteria are applied across Scotland and that these are made public. There must also be a requirement on local authorities to provide accessible information to young people leaving care, and care leavers aged 19 -25, informing them of their right to be assessed, providing realistic timescales for the process and offering a transparent procedure for challenging decisions. Access to advocacy services up to the age of 25 should be provided to ensure all care leavers are supported through the process. Provision of oral evidence to the Committee on these issues would be helpful.

5. The Financial Memorandum’s stated projection was that 65% of care leavers will be successful in their applications. However, without any detail of the eligibility criteria, it is difficult to predict and thus calculate how many care leavers will be eligible for support. In the year between July 2011-2012, statistics show that over one third (34%) of young people deemed eligible for aftercare support (aged 19-21) did not receive any service. For those that did, provision was patchy and fragmented (as the results of a CELCIS/STAF survey showed). Provision for 19-21 year olds is already limited and inequitable. A major strategic vision for the development of Throughcare and Aftercare is needed if services are to expand their remit to support young people up to the age of 26.

6. On the issue of data, the Committee is advised that Scotland does not have robust data on the levels of Aftercare support currently provided. We would recommend that the provisions in the Bill be accompanied by national reporting mechanisms to monitor the outcomes of requests and the levels of support provided.

7. In relation to transitions, we would recommend that the needs of disabled young people are given greater consideration. Navigating the transition from Children into Adult services, and the complex financial arrangements which often accompany this, can be a challenging, if not often distressing, experience for young people and their families.

8. Finally, we strongly recommend that a duty is imposed on the reporting, monitoring and recording of all care leaver's deaths (up to the age of 26) to the Minister and Care Inspectorate, as currently required for looked after children. As a ‘good corporate parent’ it is unacceptable that we hold no information on ‘our’ care leavers who die prematurely.

Duties of corporate parents

9. We strongly agree with the Bill’s assertion that public bodies have a collective responsibility for the welfare of looked after children and young people. As set out in ‘These are our Bairns: A guide for Community Planning Partnerships - being a good corporate parent’ (Scottish Government, 2008), many public bodies have a corporate parenting role and it should be noted that many areas and organisations have embraced the concept without the need for legislation. The question posed by the Bill is whether it is advantageous overall to specify explicitly who should be deemed a ‘corporate parent’ (as schedule 3 does) and what their responsibilities consist of (or are limited to).

10. In respect to specifying who will be deemed a corporate parent, we strongly welcome the Bill’s inclusion of health boards as corporate parents, in recognition of their critical responsibility for the wellbeing of looked after children at strategic, operational and practice levels. However, we do have some concerns about the appropriateness of including public bodies such as the Scottish Children’s Reporters Association and Children’s Hearings Scotland, who do not provide services directly to looked after children or care leavers.

11. In terms of the responsibilities of corporate parents set out in Bill, these seem appropriate and proportional. The principle behind corporate parenting is that organisations have a positive bias in favour of looked after children and care leavers. The responsibilities listed should go some way to realising that aspiration. We would, however, urge the Government to consider strengthening the reporting duties of corporate parents: if the Minister is to report to parliament on performance and outcomes every three years it seems reasonable for all corporate parents to do so too.

12. One area of this section of the Bill we would strengthen is around corporate parenting responsibilities for care leavers (up to age of 26). All relevant public bodies should be aware of the concept, responsibilities and practical implications of being a corporate parent for care leavers and should be required to set out a statement of intent in terms of how they will discharge these duties. As with looked after children, principle and practice should reflect a default favourable bias towards care leavers, in terms of any discretionary power they may have over provisions and support. Such an approach should include undertaking Equality Impact Assessments (current practice for other ‘equalities groups’) for any policy or procedural change which may impact on care leavers support and provision in order to ensure existing and future policy is ‘careproofed’ in favour of care leavers. This should also address any cross-border or inter-authority arrangements where care leavers can often find themselves disadvantaged when remaining in or moving between local authorities areas where this is not their home area (For further reference, please see the Access All Areas report, published National Care Advisory Service).

13. While generally supportive of this section of the Bill, we urge the Committee to consider some of challenges presented by embedding this collective responsibility for looked after children in a legislative framework. Firstly, many looked after children will still have birth parents who have parental rights and responsibilities: what will the interaction be between birth parents and corporate parents? Secondly, like parents, corporate parents may have different views on the ‘best possible care and protection’: does one corporate parent have a greater say than another? Thirdly, we know that there can be considerable disagreement between public bodies about who should provide a service and finance a service (for example, decisions between health and social care): this can be a cause of legal action. Questions remain about how these differences will be resolved and how the views of the child are heard throughout this process.

Extending assistance for kinship carers

14. We welcome the recognition of the role of kinship carers and their right to assistance. The re-designation of the section 11 order of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 as a ‘kinship care order’ may be useful in providing legal security for a child without them becoming formally ‘looked after’. However, it is clear that kinship carers have faced barriers in attempting to obtain section 11 orders (for example, time involved, cost and acrimony in using the court system) and these must be addressed in secondary legislation. The Committee is also encouraged to consider how ‘contact’ for children with birth families will be handled under these new provisions, as this can present many challenges for kinship carers. The provision of information, support and assistance in this process by local authorities and other organisations is welcomed, but a key concern will be the cost of pursuing an order and access to legal aid. It should be recognised that many families may choose not to involve courts and we endorse the work of Family Group Conferences in supporting families to resolve conflicts.

15. It is vital to understand the interplay between legal status, financial assistance and the benefits system. We are in a time of flux with the UK welfare reforms. Any legal order has to be understood in the context of these changes to ensure that kinship caring families are not penalised. Particular issues relate to child-related benefits and tax credit; income support and jobseekers allowance; housing benefit and council tax benefit; disability living allowance and carers allowance. Depending on whether a child is formerly ‘looked after’ or not has a consequence on different benefits. Therefore, given the introduction of Universal Credit in 2013, we need to ensure kinship carers do not face further hardships due to a potential disconnect between policies. It should also be recognised that the use of specific benefits can lead to ‘passported benefits’ such as school clothing allowances, school meals, etc. and the implications of this need to be understood.

16. Finally, the current provisions in the Bill relate to assistance provided by a local authority. We would support an amendment to the Bill that saw this obligation to provide assistance to kinship cares extended to all relevant service providers (especially the NHS Health Boards).

Counselling Provision

17. Although we are positive about the policy intention, this section of the Bill requires much greater clarity. First, the term ‘counselling’ is unhelpful. What is described in the policy and financial memorandum are family mediation and intervention services. As such, this should be stated clearly. Secondly, the Bill’s accompanying documents state that these services are to be made available to ‘children who are at risk of coming into care’ (pg72, Financial Memorandum). However the proposed legislation does not limit the provision to this group (unless Scottish Ministers decree this by Order). Indeed we would be supportive of a broader interpretation of eligibility, to include a wider group of children and families who may experience adversity. For instance, services such as Family Group Conferencing could be particularly valuable for care leavers who return home to birth family or wider family following care experiences.

18. Finally, as with other sections of the Bill, the duties to provide additional services should apply to all relevant organisations: not just local authorities. Many of the issues faced by families in crisis (such as drug and alcohol dependency) will demand interventions or services provided by other agencies, particularly health.

Children’s Services Planning, Provision of Named Persons and Child’s Plan

19. We welcome these provisions and strongly support any efforts to further imbed GIRFEC principles across Scotland, especially in relation to streamlining the assessment and care planning process through the use of the Child’s Plan.

20. While some confusion has arisen during the consultation process in relation to the delineation between Lead Professional and Named Person, it is important to acknowledge that clear guidance in relation to the role and function of the former already exists and there are examples of where this is working well.

21. We would encourage some debate and clarification about the new information sharing duty placed on public bodies and its implications for maintaining young people’s right to confidentiality.

22. We would suggest that the specific needs of disabled children are not adequately addressed and further consideration is required.

23. In relation to the implementation of GIRFEC, a challenge remains in supporting the culture shift required to fully realise consistent implementation and practice across Scotland – legislation alone will not achieve this.

Early childcare provision for looked after two year olds

24. We welcome the Bill’s extension of free early learning and childcare to looked after two year olds (and children subject to a kinship care order). However, to be meaningful (and effective as an early intervention measure) it is critical that provision adequately reflects the breadth of the population’s needs. It should, therefore, include family support and services that help foster carers to develop positive attachments with children.

25. The same arguments for additional priority for looked after two year olds may also be valid for other groups, such as children ‘in need’ (Section 22, Children (Scotland) Act 1995) and children on child protection registers. We believe that any additional support and resources for looked after two year olds should also be provided for children who might be diverted from the being formally ‘looked after’, given their needs are likely to be very similar. It should be noted that this provision – if restricted to just looked after children – could actually incentivise families (and professionals working with them) to seek compulsory supervision. Hence careful consideration should be given to how similar support is provided for children with the same needs who are not formally ‘looked after': particularly as there are relatively few 'looked after' two year olds in Scotland (the projected population for mid-2014 being 1,653.2).

Centre for Research on Families and Relationships

1. The Centre for Research on Families and Relationships is a consortium research centre, based at the University of Edinburgh. CRFR produces, stimulates and disseminates high quality social research and commentary on families and relationships. CRFR generates and builds on partnerships across and within the statutory, voluntary, private and academic sectors. This response is from CRFR at the University of Edinburgh.

2. CRFR welcomes the aspirations set out for the Bill. In particular, CRFR commends the continued commitment of the Scottish Government to children’s rights: “We want a Scotland where the rights of children and young people are not just recognised, but rooted deep in our society and our public services. A nation that strives to make these rights real in our everyday lives”\(^1\).

3. However, the Bill currently does not operationalise this commitment and is little improved from the consultation document on key aspects:
   - Weak promotion of children’s rights
   - Inconsistency with provisions on children’s rights and children’s wellbeing

4. Further, the new provisions on information sharing are unduly wide, leaving very little discretion for confidentiality.

Weak promotion of children’s rights: “To make these rights real”

5. The Scottish Government (as part of the UK Government) has the responsibility to observe and implement the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC), amongst human rights treaties, but the UNCRC is not currently actionable in any domestic court. The proposed Bill, if underlined by processes and commitments, could ensure that children’s rights are given more breadth and depth in policy-making and thus practice.

6. However, the Bill does not propose to incorporate the UNCRC into domestic law. This should be the ultimate goal of the Scottish Government, to fulfil its commitment ‘to make these rights real’. This goal could be clearly stated, with a timeline and supporting process for due consideration. This would include commissioning research that would consider the legal and policy implications of incorporating the UNCRC, specific to the Scottish context.

7. The proposed Bill is weaker than the prior consultation document, in terms of furthering children’s rights. While the consultation recommended a duty requiring Scottish Ministers to take ‘appropriate steps’\(^2\), the proposed Bill only requires

Scottish Ministers to ‘keep under consideration’ (s.1(1)) whether there are any steps to take and 'if they consider it appropriate to do so' (s.1(2)) to take any of the steps identified. The process supporting any such duty is not yet described: any such process should be transparent, open to scrutiny and meaningfully impact on policy-making and other ministerial functions. It is not clear what avenues there would be to challenge Ministers’ exercise of the duty. The Bill should have a stronger duty placed on Scottish Ministers, with a debate on its legal interpretation, and supporting processes identified.

8. The proposed duty on Scottish Ministers should be extended to public authorities. The current proposals will not be effective, in at least two ways:

- Public authorities could fulfill their obligation under s. 2(1) by publishing a report that states they have taken no steps towards implementing children’s rights. Thus the reporting duty could enhance transparency, accountability and scrutiny – but not progressive implementation of children’s rights, ‘to make these rights real’.

- Part 2 of the Bill proposes that the Scotland’s Commissioner for Children & Young People has extended powers to investigate infringements of individual children’s rights. As stated by Together, “For this additional power to be effective, it is essential that there is a duty on public bodies in domestic law to comply with the UNCRC in the first place”\(^3\).

Inconsistency with provisions on children’s wellbeing

9. The Bill proposes duties, in relation to wellbeing, for children’s services planning (s.9) and an individual child’s plan (s.31). This sets up a potential conflict and a lack of coherence between parts of the Bill, unhelpfully suggesting that the children’s rights and children’s wellbeing agendas are separate. This is underlined by a proposal for two separate reporting duties in s.2(1) and s.9 (albeit recognising that they could be coordinated).

10. The Scottish Government decided not to go forward with the separate Rights of Children and Young People Bill, with the following reasoning:

   Therefore, the Scottish Government feels that it would be sensible to secure and reinforce delivery of the rights of children and young people as part of a single integrated Children and Young People Bill that will also include measures to improve children’s services, rather than in separate legislation\(^4\).

11. The proposed Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill indeed does provide an opportunity to embed children’s rights across children’s services, so that children’s rights can be realised in their daily experiences. To achieve this:

   - children’s rights should be set out as the overarching principles for the Bill

• the definition of ‘wellbeing’ should be set within the children’s rights framework
• the proposed duties on public bodies to work together should be focused on improving children and young people’s rights

12. Various claims have been made in the academic literature connecting children’s wellbeing and children’s rights: from the UNCRC being the ‘normative framework’ to understand children’s wellbeing, to the monitoring, promotion of, and protection of children’s wellbeing being central to realising children’s rights. But in these connections, there is a clear logic that one or the other is the dominant one.

13. Children’s wellbeing fits well with Scotland’s outcome based approach, as children’s wellbeing globally has a history of statistical development not yet achieved for children’s rights. Children’s wellbeing improves on ideas of ‘children in need’, as the former promotes a positive view of children and families, recognising their capacities and seeking to maximise wellbeing. But the idea of children’s wellbeing risks falling into a utilitarian approach focusing on ‘the greatest happiness for the greatest number’ rather than a rights-based approach that recognises both means and ends.

14. Rights, as laid out in the UNCRC, emphasise both outcomes for children and state accountability. Lundy writes about the claims of rights, which make them particularly suitable for legislation: “Suggesting that a child’s wellbeing is affected adversely is powerful but ostensibly not as powerful in practice as suggesting that their human rights have been breached.” When there are shop signs that state ‘no more than 2 children allowed a time’, when socio-economic inequalities particularly impact on children, and children’s views are still not given ‘due regard\textsuperscript{12}, the minimum thresholds of children’s rights are evidently very much needed. Process rights are important, as are the outcomes\textsuperscript{13}.

Information sharing (S. 26 and 27)

15. The threshold for information sharing is low, as described in the policy memorandum, “... to share a concern they have about the child’s well being with the Named Person” (para 77). The proposal is for a duty on a service provider or relevant authority, so if this were not done, the duty would be breached.

16. The value of information sharing needs to be balanced with confidentiality. CRFR participated in the Roundtable Event organised by the Centre for Learning on Child Protection and ChildLine on Children’s Confidentiality in an Age of Information Sharing\textsuperscript{14}. Key points of this are relevant:

- Confidentiality is of fundamental importance to children and young people when accessing support from services or professionals\textsuperscript{15}
- ‘Confidentiality’ and ‘information sharing’ are not well understood in practice
- Professional guidance and practice differs with regards to children’s right to confidentiality; this presents specific challenges with multiagency working and may lead to unnecessary breaches of confidentiality
- There is an inherent tension in respecting children’s right to confidentiality in a process-driven child protection system

Other issues

17. As commented on CRFR’s response to the Scottish Government’s consultation:

- The ‘children in need’ category of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 will remain (see s.73). Research undertaken in 2007\textsuperscript{16} underlines its problematic implementation in Scotland, with the exception of highlighting specific attention to disabled children and children affected by disability.

\textsuperscript{13} For further elaboration, see Tisdall, E.K.M. (2013) The potential for children’s rights in Scotland: learning from the UNICEF UK report on legal implementation of the UNCRC in 12 countries, Scottish Human Rights Journal, 60.

• ‘Proofing’ the Bill, to ensure children affected by disability are duly supported by services.

• Early learning and childcare needs to meet the needs of the children involved, as well as the needs of their parents. The Bill should include a similar duty to that of the Childcare Act 2006, for England, that requires local authorities to have regard to information about young children’s views in the design, development and delivery of early childhood services. The duty has promoted productive involvement of young children, as evidenced by the NCB’s Young Children’s Voices Network. Thus, children should be consulted, along with parents, to develop early learning and childcare provision.

17 s.3. For the mandatory local authority assessment of the sufficiency of childcare provision, The Childcare Act 2006 (Local Authority Assessment) (Wales) Regulations 2008 requires local authorities to consult children, in the local authority area, as the local authority considers appropriate. This caveat as ‘appropriate’, however, is unduly open – practicability may be a better expectation, or ‘reasonable steps’ as required within equalities legislation.

Scope of evidence

1. The scope of this particular written evidence from CPAG in Scotland is limited to the proposals within the Bill for ‘Support for Kinship Care’ and in particular the importance of adequate support and how any proposed financial support might interact with support available to families from the UK benefit system. Our concern is to ensure the proposals contribute to maintenance of family income, and are consistent with the objectives set out in the Scottish Child Poverty Strategy.

Kinship care assistance

2. CPAG in Scotland welcomes the indication that kinship care assistance may include financial assistance, in addition to other forms of support such as counselling or advice. Available research points to the fact that kinship carers are likely to be experiencing financial difficulty, either as a direct result of becoming a kinship carer, or because they are already at risk of suffering disadvantage due to age, ill-health or other factors. Analysis of the 2001 census data revealed that a disproportionate number of Scottish kinship carers (of both looked after and non-looked after children) and the children they cared for lived in disadvantaged areas, 45% of children in kinship care living in the poorest 20% of areas, with 27% of kinship carers being on benefits or unemployed. Furthermore, the indications from research are that financial security within kinship care arrangements can improve the stability of the arrangement and the eventual outcomes for children within such arrangements.

The level of kinship care assistance

3. The Bill currently states that, “Kinship care assistance is assistance of such description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify” (section 64(2)). The Policy Memorandum indicates that a person with a kinship care order “will be entitled to assistance if the relevant eligibility test is met” and that the “type of assistance will be prescribed by the Scottish Ministers in secondary legislation” (paragraph 118). However, the Policy Memorandum also indicates that for certain types of support (e.g. financial assistance) local authorities may be able to take account of the means of the carer.

4. It remains unclear whether the Scottish Ministers intend, by means of secondary legislation, to oblige local authorities to provide financial assistance, or indeed to set a minimum level at which such assistance is to be paid. In the absence of this detailed information it is difficult to assess the likely impact of this development. If local authorities are enabled rather than obliged to provide financial assistance to kinship carers, there will be a strong likelihood of a ‘postcode lottery’ of support developing.

5. The Scottish Ministers have powers under section 110(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 to prescribe the level of kinship care allowances (to ‘approved kinship carers’) but have not taken up these powers. The level of allowances to approved kinship carers across the 32 local authorities remains hugely variable. This is perhaps indicative of the outcome of any new allowance system to those with kinship care orders should the level of payment, or at least a minimum level, not be prescribed by Scottish Ministers.

Interaction of kinship care assistance (financial) with the UK benefits system

6. For approved kinship carers, there are currently significant difficulties in the interaction between the system of allowances paid by local authorities and the UK benefit/tax credit system (see paragraph 6 below). The kinship care order set out in the Bill should avoid most, if not all, of these difficulties. The reason for this is that most of the complexity arises from the ‘looked after’ status of the child in approved kinship care situations. The combination of ‘looked after’ status and payment of an allowance is at the heart of the complex interaction with the UK benefit/tax credit system. Since children living with kinship carers under the proposed order will not be ‘looked after’ these complexities should not arise. The remaining issue will be the treatment of any financial assistance within the means-tested benefit/tax credit system: that is, whether any such allowance will be disregarded as income. If not disregarded, then such financial assistance, provided specifically by the local authority to support vulnerable children, might simply be clawed back. It is therefore crucial that the Scottish Ministers reach agreement at the earliest opportunity with UK Ministers regarding the disregard of any allowance.

7. It should be noted that local authorities already have powers to make payment to kinship carers of non-looked after children (e.g., under section 50 of the Children Act 1975). There is provision across the range of means-tested benefits and tax credits to disregard these types of payment, and also payments made under section 22 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.

Interaction with existing kinship care allowances

8. According to the Policy Memorandum the proposals in the Bill would not alter the existing system of allowances paid to approved kinship carers (i.e., kinship carers of looked after children), although this system is the subject of a separate review. There is a provision at section 66(2) of the Bill that:

   “An order under section 64(1) may specify assistance by reference to assistance which a person was entitled to from, or being provided with by, a local authority immediately before becoming entitled to assistance under that section.”
9. We presume that this is intended to remove any financial disincentive to apply for the new order where a kinship carer is receiving a kinship care allowance as an approved kinship carer. This suggests that financial assistance under the new system is likely to be less than the assistance currently available to approved kinship carers. It is difficult to make any meaningful assessment of this interaction without knowing what the level of financial assistance under the new system is likely to be. Furthermore, from our own contact with local authorities and advice agencies we are aware of a wide range of approaches to payment of kinship care allowances under the present system, with some authorities making payments which are on a par with fostering allowances and others making extremely low payments.

10. In general terms, it may be possible to learn some lessons from research in the English/Welsh context where many kinship carers have a Residence Order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989, or a Special Guardianship Order under section 14A of the 1989 Act. In this situation the child is not looked after by the local authority. Both these orders have associated allowances, residence order allowance and special guardianship allowance. Recent research indicates that these allowances are variable across local authorities and generally paid at a significantly lower level than allowances paid to kinship carers of looked after children. Some kinship carers feel that they are encouraged by local authorities to pursue one of these ‘non-looked after’ options because it will ultimately save the local authority money.

Current kinship care allowances and the UK benefit/tax credit system

11. Although the current system of kinship care allowances is not part of the Bill, it is useful to set out some of the difficulties which have arisen in relation to the system’s interaction with the UK benefit/tax credit system. This highlights how important it is to ensure adequate planning in the development of any new system, particularly as it relates to financial support and particularly at a time of enormous upheaval in the UK benefits system.

12. The main source of financial support to families with children is, at present, child benefit and child tax credit. Within both the child benefit and child tax credit systems there are provisions intended to prevent the benefit/tax credit being paid where a child is ‘looked after and accommodated’ by the local authority. These regulations are aimed primarily at children in foster care or living in residential accommodation. However, their somewhat tortuous nature has resulted in some Scottish kinship carers of looked after children being unable to receive state benefits in respect of the child for whom they care.

13. Crucial to this issue is not simply the fact that the child is residing with a kinship carer, but the combination of the child’s looked after status and the legal provision utilised by the local authority to make payment to the kinship carer, and what the purpose of the payment is. In short, payments made under regulation 33 of the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009 are likely to result in no award of either child benefit or child tax credit. Payments made under section 50 of the Children Act 1975 which are, by definition, in respect of the child’s maintenance, generally result in child benefit being payable, but not child tax credit. Payments made under section 22 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, providing they are not in respect of the child’s accommodation or maintenance, should not prevent child benefit or child tax credit being paid. From our contact with local authorities and advice agencies, it is clear that local authorities vary both in the level of kinship care allowance paid and the legal power utilised.

14. Together, child benefit and child tax credit can amount to around £83 per week per child, increasing by up to £81 if the child has a severe disability. Child benefit accounts for only £20.30, and sometimes less, of the total and therefore child tax credit is the most significant child-focused financial support to low income households. As a result of the above complex interaction, coupled with the existing variability both in the level of allowance paid and the legal power used, many kinship carers have to consider whether or not they are better off accepting the kinship care allowance from the local authority. It is undoubtedly the case that some are not and therefore are not able to benefit from any additional financial support from the local authority.

Child Poverty Action Group Scotland
26 July 2013
Children 1st

1. At CHILDREN 1ST, we listen, we support and we take action to secure a brighter future for Scotland’s vulnerable children. Our work is built on over 125 years experience as the RSSPCC. By working together with, and listening to children, young people, their families and communities, and by influencing public policy and opinion; we help to change the lives of vulnerable children and young people for the better. We work to safeguard children and young people, to support them within their families and to help them to recover from abuse, neglect and violence.

2. CHILDREN 1ST has 52 local services and four national services across Scotland, and we work closely with many local authorities as well as working in partnership with other organisations. All our services are child centred. The children, young people and families we support are key partners in all aspects of our work.

3. We welcome this Bill and believe it is a real opportunity to effect positive change for Scotland’s children and young people. We do, however, believe it could and should go much further.

Part 1 – Children’s rights

4. CHILDREN 1ST strongly believes that in order to achieve its policy objective to ‘make rights real’, the UNCRC must be fully incorporated into Scots Law. We fully support Together’s call to strengthen the rights provisions included in the Bill and for full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law.

5. We called for full incorporation in our response to the initial consultation on this Bill, and understand that 40% all responses from children’s organisations also did so, despite there being no question about full incorporation in the consultation paper1.

6. If the Scottish Government were to take this opportunity to fully incorporate the UNCRC into Scot’s Law, this would lead to:

   - The development of an overarching children’s rights framework that influences all areas of policy and practice – this would avoid the inconsistent implementation of the UNCRC we currently see in Scotland across local and national government and a range of public bodies. International experience shows that in countries where there has been incorporation of the UNCRC, politicians, public officials and non-governmental organisations who wanted to advance children’s rights had more leverage that helped them ensure the integration of the principles in domestic law and policy. The value of full incorporation is the message that it conveys about the status of children and the knock-on effects for implementation of children’s rights principles into domestic law and policy.

- A culture of respect for children and their rights - we know that legislation is an important factor in achieving step change in attitudes and behaviour, and full incorporation would send a clear and important message to everyone in Scotland about how we should value and respect children. This will have a very real impact on the everyday experiences of Scotland’s children and young people.

- Effective realisation of the policy objectives in the Children and Young People Bill - the policy memorandum states that ‘it is the aspiration of the Scottish Government for Scotland to be the best place to grow up in’\(^2\). This is an admirable and appropriate ambition but we believe that without full incorporation of the UNCRC this will not be possible.

- Fulfilment of the strategic objectives of the Council of Europe’s programme “Building a Europe for and with children”\(^3\), something which the Bill in its current form does not do.

7. We believe that a Child’s Rights Impact Assessment (CRIA) should be a statutory requirement to ensure that children’s rights are integral in all policy-making at local and national level. CRIAs provide a valuable tool for looking at legislation and identifying and measuring its effect on children and young people and permit impacts to be predicted, monitored and, if necessary, avoided or mitigated. CRIAs should be used across national and local government in order for policy-making to be meaningful. It is disappointing that the Scottish Government has not carried out a CRIA on this flagship Bill for children and young people.

Part 4 – Named person

8. CHILDREN 1\(^ST\) supports the idea of the named person, as we believe it could offer a way to avoid children ‘slipping through the net’ when they are at their most vulnerable, and a useful point of contact for families so they can access advice and services without having to deal with excessive delay or red tape.

9. We do, however, have concerns about how this would work in practice, and would encourage the committee to consider the following questions:

Who are the best people to be named persons, and how will the task be practicable in reality?

10. Teachers, headteachers and health visitors all experience high caseloads and significant other responsibilities. In order for the role to work, there will need to be significant extra resources allocated.

11. In addition, consideration must be given to what will happen in the school holidays if a school-based professional such as a headteacher is going to take on the role. If a named person is not available for protracted lengths of time such as the summer holidays or Christmas, when many families experience the most difficulty, this makes the role of the named person nonsensical as it would negate the purpose of creating a safety net for every child.

12. For some of Scotland’s most vulnerable children it will make little sense for a headteacher to be their named person. These children may have difficulties at school and often be in conflict with the headteacher. Some children and young people may not have a consistent school or may be in and out of secure units or residential care. Life for these children may be chaotic and there may be little consistency in terms of education. In order to be truly child centred, there must be flexibility in terms of who the named person is for each child. It may not always be suitable for this to be a member of school staff for the reasons outlined above. We know the Bill itself allows this flexibility but are keen to ensure this is understood at practice level.

13. We understand that the manager of a secure unit would be the named person for some children. This could be problematic, as many children and young people who go to secure units do not stay for one prolonged period, but move in and out throughout their lives, staying sometimes for just weeks at a time. This would result in transfers of named persons and there is a worry that some children may fall through the gaps. Frequent changes of named person would not allow the child, young person or family to build a trusting relationship with this adult. In many ways these most vulnerable children are the ones for whom the concept of the named person should be the most useful. As it stands, these children are largely ignored in the Bill.

14. Evidence presented by the Children’s Parliament highlighted concerns about the named person. Children said: “Everyone is so individual it would be difficult to look after everyone.”, “they’ll be very busy because there’s a lot of people to look after.” Children were concerned about who the named person would be, because “there is no point in picking someone you barely see.” They felt that it should be the same person throughout, and asked if it was possible to change the named person. Concerns were also highlighted about the lack of choice children would have in identifying who would be the named person, because of the private, challenging and potentially upsetting aspects of a child’s life the named person would be involved in.

How will ‘ordinary people’ understand the role?

15. If the named person is really to be the person to whom people pass on any wellbeing concerns, as is our understanding from consultation events we have been involved in, then this needs to be very clear to those who engage with children. This includes members of the community and volunteers such as sports coaches. Guidance will need to make it very clear – in a way which is accessible to everybody - what is expected of volunteers and community members in terms of liaison with the named person and, where appropriate, direct referrals to social services regarding child protection concerns.

16. We believe it is everybody’s responsibility to protect children, and several of our services work with members of the community and local organisations to encourage and enable them to deal with low level concerns about children and child protection issues in an appropriate manner. We have already been made aware of confusion among professionals and the public about which person a child protection concern should be raised with. We would be very concerned if ordinary people become confused about who to contact and when about an issue concerning a child, or felt that the role of the named person required them simply to pass on any low level concerns rather than dealing with the issue as it came up. We are very aware that in the current economic climate caseloads are unlikely to become smaller, so if individuals pass their low level concerns to the named person, the named person is unlikely to be able to act on these concerns until they become several and serious. We must ensure that ordinary members of the public understand their responsibilities and feel capable of intervening where appropriate.

17. It would be helpful when looking at the development of secondary legislation and guidance around the named person to look to where it is already working e.g. Highland for examples of good practice.

Part 4 - Information sharing

18. We understand the intention behind the information sharing provisions in the Bill, and that in order to make GIRFEC work professionals need to be sharing appropriate information. There has been no consultation on this aspect of the Bill, as it wasn’t included in the original consultation paper, which, given the radical change to existing information sharing provisions, is very concerning.

19. We have some serious concerns about the new information sharing duty for public bodies and service providers, which are outlined below:

- Impact on confidential services - many children and young people use confidential services, to explore their worries and work through their ideas about an issue before they decide to disclose formally about abuse or other problems in their lives. Without these services, many children may never disclose, or this may be delayed, during which time the child is still suffering the abuse. In addition, we know children often retract disclosures if they were not really ready to share in the first place, which puts them in further danger. If the proposed changes are made to the existing information sharing provisions, this could have major consequences for services which currently enable children to speak confidentially.

- Child rights - children have a right to privacy and the same right to confidentiality as adults. We have concerns that the provisions currently outlined in the Bill do not take these rights into account, and could lead to systems driven by compulsion to share information at all times, with very little thought or understanding of the need and reasons for maintaining or breaching confidentiality.

- Training needs - serious case reviews very often point out that relevant information was not shared appropriately, contributing to the harming or death of a child. This is a very serious problem and, in our view, not one that can be solved legislatively. This is an issue for training and staff development – current law does allow the relevant and proportionate sharing of information; the issue is not with the law, but with some professionals’ understanding of it, and willingness or otherwise to act on it.

- Family involvement - we are very concerned that there is no duty in the Bill to involve the child, young person or family concerned in decisions to share information. There is thus no balance between children’s rights and the need to share information. We feel very strongly that the involvement of children, young people and families in information-sharing decisions should be sought wherever possible.

- White noise – the current proposals would undoubtedly lead to higher levels of information sharing. Because this information would be about wellbeing concerns rather than children at risk of serious harm, there would naturally be more of it, and it would be about a wider range of children. People may want to pass information on to the named person in order to protect themselves, which we know from experience does not protect children. This could lead to ‘white noise’, whereby information shared about children at risk of harm may be lost in a maelstrom of unnecessary information. Once children realise how much is to be shared about them they may be even more reluctant to talk about ‘lower level’ concerns, further denying them the supports they need.

Part 5 – Child’s plan

20. CHILDREN 1ST supports the intention to move to a single planning approach but would suggest that by itself, it will be insufficient to improve outcomes for children. The plan is only one part of the process which is required to help deliver improved outcomes for children. We would also like to see enshrined in statute a duty on public bodies to act on recommendations in a child’s plan. Moreover, there should be a right of legal redress, creating a corporate responsibility on public bodies, for children and young people if or when public bodies do not meet their statutory requirements in terms of creating a single plan.

21. In order to achieve a real cultural change in which children really are placed at the centre, we would ask that consideration be given to embedding in legislation initial training requirements for key professionals who work with children so that they are trained in attachment theory, child development, the impact of trauma, sexual abuse and in the GIRFEC approach. A key way to begin this cultural shift is through early adoption and immersion of the ‘Common Core of Skills,
Knowledge & Understanding and Values for the Children’s Workforce in Scotland\textsuperscript{5} which was published by the Scottish Government recently.

22. CHILDREN 1\textsuperscript{ST} feels that if we are truly trying to take a child centred approach, we should be seeking and taking into account the views of children, young people and their families when putting plans together. We would like to see a duty on local authorities to involve children, young people and families in preparing the child’s plan. There should also be a corresponding duty to support families to enable them to be involved in the planning process. This could include Family Group Decision Making and other activities.

Part 6 – Early learning and child care

23. We very much welcome the inclusion of a statutory right to pre-school provision for children. We particularly welcome the inclusion of a commitment ensuring two year olds on a Kinship Care Order will be entitled to 600 hours of free early learning and childcare. We do, however, feel that there are some important factors to take into consideration.

24. We know, from the work we do with children in their early years, and their families, that the most vulnerable families often need more specific supports, including work addressing parenting skills, family relationships, attachment and child development, and substance misuse. This support needs to be flexible, delivered in the home if needs be, and available on a one to one basis. It needs to be asset based and allow the parents to learn and develop from it. For many vulnerable families, these are the kind of services which children need to continue accessing if they are to be “school ready” and just as importantly, have a better start in life.

25. This kind of more specialist and intensive early years support for vulnerable families is essential. CHILDREN 1\textsuperscript{ST} welcomes universal, increased access to early learning and childcare but this should not come at the cost of more specific services desperately needed by Scotland’s most vulnerable families.

26. Any proposals around childcare should take into account the need for a truly flexible, family focussed approach. This may well involve early learning and childcare outwith the home (for example in a state-run nursery), but for the most vulnerable families it will often also need to include support for families within their own homes.

27. In addition, parents and carers who call ParentLine Scotland tell us that the need to improve availability of age-appropriate and affordable childcare for older children is also a major issue; childcare is important throughout childhood and is not limited to early years. This also requires policy attention.

\textsuperscript{5} http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/06/5565
Part 7 – Corporate parents

28. CHILDREN 1ST welcomes this attempt to improve the standard of corporate parenting across Scotland. We do, however, feel that if the aim of corporate parenting is to ensure that looked after children have the same life chances as those who are not looked after, then the Bill does not achieve this, as it mentions nothing about safety, security, happiness, love or relationships. In short, the corporate parenting responsibilities listed in the Bill do not include many of the expectations we would hope a child should have of his or her parents. Missing from the Bill is any acknowledgement of the need to:

- help children and young people to have key reliable people in their life and develop healthy relationships
- not do things that cause children and young people harm (for example lots of unplanned moves or big changes while they are in care)
- work with children and young people to seek their views on how they are looked after, and caring about and acting on what they think
- work with birth families to ensure children and young people are given every realistic opportunity and necessary support to return home
- be aspirational and have high expectations
- promote and support the physical, emotional, social and cognitive development of a child from infancy to adulthood

29. Clearly some of these things would be for secondary legislation but we feel it is important to be clear about the definition of corporate parenting at this stage.

30. We also believe that the list of bodies considered corporate parents is too wide. Some of those on the list, such as SCRA, do not have any day-to-day responsibility for the care of looked after children, or opportunity to carry out the list of corporate parenting responsibilities included in the Bill, so their inclusion on the list makes the concept of good corporate parenting meaningless.

Part 8 – Looked After Children leaving care

31. CHILDREN 1ST welcomes the provision to extend the age to which care leaves can receive support from their local authority. However, we believe that the bill can and should go further. We would like to see the assessment process in Part 8 being removed altogether; the responsibility should not be on the young person to present as being in need, but for the local authority to provide for the vulnerable young people in its care.

32. Outcomes for looked after children are very poor in Scotland, and if this Bill is to achieve its aim of being aspirational for Scotland’s children and young people, this must include those in or leaving care. This Bill could represent an opportunity for Scotland to become a global leader in care, but current provisions do not go far enough. We support Who Cares? Scotland’s proposal which calls for the Bill to allow for children and young people who have been looked after to be able to remain in care, or to return to care, up to 26 years of age. This means that the relationships which they held whilst in care up to 16 or 18 years of age could continue, instead of them being severed abruptly in the way they are just now.

33. We therefore recommend that the inclusion of the following principle for the Bill and detailed guidance to outline what this means should be included: ‘all children and young people are supported to develop long-term, sustainable and nurturing relationships with their families and/or professionals’. We believe that this is the only way to properly tackle and redress the ridiculously poor outcomes which care leavers across Scotland experience.

Part 9 – Counselling services

34. CHILDREN 1ST welcomes the inclusion of the provision for support services for eligible families, however would like to see this section re-named as Early Intervention services. We believe that the word “counselling”, to describe the relevant services, is confusing and inappropriate. These types of services are not counselling services, but services that support families to ensure beneficial outcomes for the child, such as Family Group Decision Making. We recommend that this section would be better placed to sit in between the Named Person and the Child’s Plan section of the Bill.

Part 10 – Kinship Care

35. CHILDREN 1ST welcomes the intention of Part 10 to put kinship care on a statutory footing and legislate for the supports and services which local authorities must make available to kinship care families. We are glad that Ministers listened to the concern highlighted by the consultation process and are proposing to incorporate the kinship care order within existing s.11 legislation.

36. We know from working with and supporting kinship carers through the National Kinship Care Service that there is a need for a broad range of assistance from the local authority. Our engagement activity tells us that kinship carers need:

- Respite from caring; advice, information and support around caring for children; access to free school meals/clothing grants to ease financial pressure; access to leisure facilities; advocacy to navigate through housing, legal, health and educational systems; and advice and support around dealing with contact arrangements between the children and their parents.

- For the older grandparents in particular, knowing what will happen to the child/children should they become ill or pass away is a particular issue. Family Group Decision Making is the obvious support that could be put in place for such families to plan for the future.

37. For the children, kinship carers tell us they need:

- Counselling/therapeutic services and supports; help to understand and manage relationships with their parents; peer support from other children living in kinship care; access to mental health services; and help to understand the impacts and effects of drug and alcohol misuse.

38. One of the key issues raised by kinship carers on an ongoing basis is the need for increased and consistent access to financial support. CHILDREN 1ST is aware, through the role we played in the Financial Review of kinship care, that the Scottish Government hopes to be able to announce recommendations from this review by the end of the year. We would urge Ministers to ensure that those recommendations are considered as part of the wider Bill process and not in isolation. Kinship carers need financial support.

39. CHILDREN 1ST understands that the detail surrounding the types of support, eligibility for support and the way in which support will be provided will be contained within secondary legislation. We would urge Ministers to have due regard to the outcome of the consultation being undertaken with kinship carers and ensure that the secondary legislation places a duty on local authorities to provide universal services and supports to all kinship carer families in need across Scotland, including those who have existing s.11 residence orders.

40. We would like to draw the committee’s attention to s.65(2)(b) of the Bill. CHILDREN 1ST consider the current definition contained within this section wide and question why it differs from the working definition of kinship carer contained within Regulation 10 of the Looked After Children Regulations 2009. We urge Ministers to ensure that there is consistency across the various forms of legislation relating to kinship care.

Other concerns:

Section 30 “interpretation of Part 4”

41. CHILDREN 1ST is concerned that the bill uses the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 definition of “parent”. This definition excludes some fathers and other carers such as kinship carers. We propose that the term “parent” should be replaced with “relevant person” in accordance with the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. It must be noted that if “parent” is changed to “relevant person”, then subsequently the kinship care provision should be reviewed, as this section disqualifies parents and guardians from applying for a kinship care order.

Report on the Survey for Kinship carers on Scottish Government proposals for the Children and Young People Bill

CHILDREN 1ST was commissioned in 2011 by the Scottish Government to develop and implement a national service for kinship carers and their families. The service aims to help kinship carers find their voice, providing emotional and practical support through a free and confidential helpline (ParentLine Scotland) and training, outreach and capacity building.

Part of our role is to engage with kinship carers on policy issues, and also children and young people who live in kinship care arrangements. To help inform the Scottish Government’s development of proposals for a new children and young people bill, CHILDREN 1ST surveyed kinship carers on key proposals. This report highlights and explains the findings.

Methodology

The survey was conducted as a confidential questionnaire with an online and paper survey option. The survey was promoted via email to a wide range of kinship care contacts, including kinship carers and support groups. Paper copies of the survey were also sent to all kinship carers on our database (385), to kinship care support groups and a copy was given to every kinship carer who attended the Big Day Out in October.

Responses received were inputted into an online survey software tool to collate the findings and aid production of this report. Some questions were multiple-choice, some allowed multiple responses and some allowed space for participants to write longer more detailed responses. The questionnaire was designed in such a way as to gauge definite views on certain issues, whilst also allowing space for kinship carers to express more specific viewpoints and personal experiences. Allowing both types of responses is vital for fair and complete evaluation. The survey is attached at Appendix A.

While the questions were short, nearly all required significant explanation of the proposal for the bill. For this reason, and to ensure we had interpreted Scottish Government intentions appropriately, prior approval of the survey was sought from officials. However, doing this has the additional benefit of raising awareness of the proposed measures in the new bill among a key audience.

The percentage answers have either been rounded up or down for easier reading (therefore some may not total exactly 100%). As of 2nd November we had received 117 responses: 81 were fully completed and 36 were partially completed.

Section 1 - Children's rights

The survey explained that children have rights as set out in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) and that the Scottish Government is responsible for making sure that children’s rights in relation to devolved matters, are respected. We explained that the Scottish Government wants to do more to promote children’s rights and ensure that public sector agencies monitor and report on what they are doing to promote these rights.

We posed a set of attitudinal statements and asked respondents to indicate which one they agreed with:

The Scottish Government should be doing more to promote children’s rights – 48% of respondents agreed with this

It’s not enough to promote children’s rights – all laws and polices which affect children should comply with their rights – 52% agreed with this

This is not something the Scottish Government should be doing – 3% agreed with this

Don’t know – 3% agreed with this

While a significant number of respondents agreed with the Scottish Government’s proposed way forward on children’s rights within the bill, it is worth noting that a majority supported a stronger approach being taken.

Section 2 - Early learning and childcare

This section explained that the Scottish Government wants to give every three and four year old child and every looked after two year old 600 hours of early learning/childcare per year. An overwhelming majority – 85% - of kinship carers think this is a good idea, with only 7% considering it a bad idea. Some of the reasons for this included -

“Good only if the funding is not coming from an existing budget”

“Children should be supported more in the home”

“I can see benefits for children aged 3+ but at the age of two, early attachments are fragile and 600 hours is very significant in an infant’s life. This would support vulnerable Mother’s however, I do not believe it would support the child themselves.”

We then asked the kinship carers to reflect on children they care for or know and asked if they thought more time in nursery or childcare would be good, bad or make no difference. Nearly two thirds (64%) thought it would be good for their children with 36% saying it would make no difference, as kinship care children need other support and activities.
The survey also asked if participants thought that all two year olds in kinship care should receive an early learning or childcare place. The majority of 83% said yes, leaving 17% saying no, indicating strong support for extension of this measure beyond looked after two year olds.

We asked kinship carers about the types of service that parents and carers should be able to access from within the 600 hours, allowing them to choose up to three options. The three preferred options were pre-school nursery place, playgroups/parent and toddler groups and family support sessions, with therapy sessions for children close behind in 4th place.

Other options that were slightly less popular were: Activities to help parenting skills (23%); College or university childcare (14%); Workplace crèche (20%) and Library activities (4%).

These findings indicate strong support for traditional options for early learning, but also suggest a need for flexibility around children’s needs and also an appetite for more work and education-oriented childcare.

Section 3 - Services for Children and GIRFEC

We explained the Scottish Government’s concept of a child’s wellbeing as SHANARRI – safe, healthy, active, nurtured, achieving, respected, responsible and included.

Most participants (70%) had not heard of this definition of wellbeing, however 94% thought it was a good way to describe a child’s wellbeing. Given that kinship carers are highly likely to have had involvement with social work services and indeed, multi-agency involvement in their lives, we found the lack of recognition for SHANARRI surprising. It perhaps indicates that there is a need to raise awareness of it among key audiences and stakeholders.
What is reassuring is the very high level of support for this definition of well-being, though we also asked participants for other ways to define/describe a child’s wellbeing. Over a third of respondents thought other things should be included and most of the additional suggestions can be summarised as being loved, happiness and being heard/listened to.

“A sense of being loved and wanted”

“Belonging to a nurturing family”

“Happy and heard”

“happy and loved and settled”

The survey then explained the Scottish Government's plan to make sure that every child has a Named Person and what this means. 90% of respondents thought every child in Scotland should have a named person, and after being asked to reflect on their own situation, 78% thought that having a named person would have helped them and their family, with only 13% saying a named person would not have helped them and 11% not knowing.

We then asked who the participants thought should be the named person for children at each age and stage in their lives.

The findings suggest overwhelming support at all ages and stages for universal services’ role in providing named persons, with health predominant in a child’s early years and education predominant at school age. However, consistently, a significant minority of respondents also flagged up the role of parents and carers as “named person” in their children’s lives. Moreover, the wide range of responses suggest that rather than a fixed approach to who should be a child’s named person at any age and stage, there needs to be flexibility so that the individual needs and interests and children can be matched to the most appropriate person to be the family’s main point of contact.

Finally, we asked a question about families’ involvement in service design, planning and delivery, with a near unanimous 98% suggesting involving children, young people and families in such activity in their area was a good idea.

Section 4 – Family decision making

CHILDREN 1ST has been a pioneer of the use of family group conferencing (FGC) in Scotland since 1998. We believe that FGCs are a valuable tool to engage and involve families in decision making, with children’s interests and needs at the heart of the process. They are particularly relevant where children are at risk of moving into care or being accommodated, allowing a supported space for families to come together, with some involvement from professionals, to consider the child’s needs and interests and plan for the child’s future care, whilst also allowing the child to have his/her voice heard and views listened to. Our experience of FGCs tells us that they are a particularly useful tool in planning kinship care arrangements, so CHILDREN 1ST was interested in eliciting kinship carers’ views on them.

While we added these questions into the survey for our own use, we did so with prior knowledge of officials, so consider it worthwhile sharing the findings with the Scottish Government.

When asked if they had had an FGC or similar family meeting before a child was placed in their care, 39% confirmed this and 66% of those who had an FGC indicating that it helped decide who should look after their child.

Of the 61% who had not had an FGC or similar, 62% suggested such a meeting would have been helpful to their family when deciding where their child should live.

Turning again to all respondents, an overwhelming majority of 93% considered that all local authorities should at least have to offer an FGC to families where the child can no longer stay with their parents.

Section 5 - Looked after children

We explained the Bill proposes to make local authorities have a duty to provide help for young people who have been looked after, up until they are 25 years of age. An overwhelming majority of 96% thought this was a good idea, with only 3% thinking it wouldn't make a difference, and the rest didn’t know.

Section 6 - Kinship Care

This formed the main part of the survey and we outlined and explained the proposed kinship care order, its components and intent before asking participants for their views.

A significant majority of participants considered the kinship care order to be a good idea, with only a tiny minority thinking it a bad idea. Some – 10% - felt it would make no difference, but perhaps the most interesting finding is that over a quarter felt they could not take a view on it without knowing more about it. We note that there is a key role for CHILDREN 1ST here as providers of the national kinship care service and will discuss with the Scottish Government how they want to take forward providing information about the bill proposals specific to kinship carers to address this.

We also asked respondents if a kinship care order was available, would they apply for one; 60% said they would. A third of respondents said they would not and were asked to explain why not.

For some it was because they already had a residence order in place, while others felt that they were not seeking permanence in their family’s arrangement. For others, the age of their child was a factor, in that their child was approaching late teens, while others wanted to wait and see what the order actually does and looks like. Cost and other financial considerations were also cited by some. A full list of all the reasons given is provided at Appendix B.
We then asked whom this kinship care order should be available to, and 86% said it should be available to all kinship care families, with the rest saying that only some families should be able to apply for one. Reasons for the latter included the need to consider individual circumstances:

“Those on low income”

“Where parents are not in contact”

Because we know from our contact with kinship carers that financial issues, particularly around the kinship allowance, remain problematic for many, we wanted to use the survey to identify views on a range of linked issues. Thus, we asked respondents if there should be a national kinship care allowance with the same amount paid per child: 95% said yes.

We also asked about the practice conducted by some local authorities of deducting the value of child benefit from the kinship care allowance: 89% of respondents considered that local authorities should stop this deduction.

A huge majority of respondents (97%) also wanted the Scottish Government to set out in the bill what support kinship carers and children in kinship care should receive from local authorities.

The survey also asked kinship carers what other changes they would like to see made to the law for kinship care families. Many used this as an opportunity to tell us about the most important and pressing issues for their families. Taking these views into account is vitally important and will help identify key issues and points of concern connected with the Children and Young People’s Bill that should be explored further. The key themes emerging are highlighted here but the full range of responses is also provided at Appendix C.

1. Fair financial support for kinship care families

This was overwhelmingly the main issue identified by kinship carers, with a call for adequate and fair financial support for all kinship care families, so that they might adequately support their child or children no matter where they live in Scotland. Some expressed that funding should be “universal”, “automatic” and also in line with what foster carers receive. interestingly, those who linked kinship care support with foster care were not just referring to financial support but support more generally.

“Kinship carers should be paid the same as foster carers, we are doing the same job but we are still going out to work and the children are not being given the time that they need”

“Kinship care allowance should not be means tested; other benefits should not be affected if you accept the allowance”
2. More practical support for children and young people

Many expressed concern that their children needed more support emotionally, such as counselling/ therapy and more help practically through their school years. Some also expressed schools needed a better understanding of issues children and young people in kinship care face.

“I think that all children who are removed from their parents should be given some form of counselling and not just left until they get older and develop behavioural problems- which is when the carers have to then seek help”

“More assistance and support at school, children in kinship care require more nurturing and extra help with learning. My worry is my grandchild will go to secondary school with not enough tools to help him fit in”

Others expressed a wish for more help with after school care, and the need for other activities to be available for their children. Some also highlighted the need to provide appropriate throughcare and aftercare for young people moving on from kinship care to independent living.

3. Child centred focus

Generally, all respondents put children at the centre of their views but some made specific reference to the importance of listening to the child’s views and recognising that the child’s views should be paramount.

“That the child needs are genuinely paramount importance”

4. Social work

Some participants told us that they would like social workers to have a greater understanding of specific needs of children and young people in kinship care. Another comment was that they would like their child to have more time spent with their social worker and they would like more support and help form them. Another viewpoint reiterated the importance of social workers taking the child's view as paramount importance.
Conclusions

When we set out to engage kinship carers on the bill proposals, we were unsure how many would respond, particularly with the short timescales involved. While 117 responses can only be considered a snapshot rather than a fully representative sample, the findings will help to give a strong impression – from a key audience – of general and specific views about what is being proposed for the bill, and indeed, what is not. The fact that most respondents took time to give their views and opinions in the open-ended questions shows that most want to be engaged in the bill process and in the development of solutions to some of the issues which impact on their lives. CHILDREN 1ST will ensure as part of our remit in the national kinship care service that this happens.

On the whole, respondents were very positive about most proposals in the Bill, however there were some reservations about some measures, with many calling for more clarity.

In general, the Scottish Government can be satisfied that the proposed measures meet the aspirations of a key audience of stakeholders: many of the proposals will, after all, impact either generally or specifically on kinship carers’ lives and more especially, on the lives of the children they care for.

It is worth noting that kinship carers would like to see a stronger commitment to children’s rights put into legislation and while hugely supportive of the idea of guaranteed early learning/childcare provision, they also want real flexibility on what the 600 hours can provide for theirs, and other children, as well as the provision being extended to all two year olds in kinship care.

They also highlighted the role for parents/carers as named persons in a child’s life, as well as a more individualised approach to who named persons should be. The low level of awareness of SHANARRI indicates a need to promote the wellbeing indicators and concept with some urgency.

Moreover, there was strong support for families being involved in decision making about services generally and specifically when decisions were being made about the future care arrangements of children.

Generally, kinship carers are warmly supportive of the proposal to create a new kinship care order but it is clear that the need to address the perceived iniquities surrounding financial support have not gone away. There is also a need to clarify what the order will achieve for kinship care families and to raise awareness about the proposal. Perhaps, most importantly, once the order is created and implemented, there will be an immediate need to inform kinship care families of its existence and how they, and the children they care for, might benefit from obtaining one.

We hope the Scottish Government finds this report and its findings and conclusions helpful and constructive to the process of finalising the proposals for the children and young people bill. We are happy to discuss the findings in more detail and also, engage with kinship care families again, during the bill process, if this would be appropriate.
PARENTLINE SURVEY FOR PARENTS AND CARERS ON PROPOSALS FOR A NEW CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE BILL

1. Demographics
The survey was conducted in September and October 2012 to gain an insight into the views of parents and carers on the Scottish Government’s proposals for a new Bill which aims to create new laws in Scotland to help improve the lives of children and young people. The survey questions were all pre-determined and prepared in consultation with Scottish Government officials.

A total of 82 callers to ParentLine Scotland agreed to take part in the survey, of which 81% were parents, 15% were kinship carers, 9% were grandparents and 2% were step parents. The make up of families of callers participating in the survey is detailed in the tables below:

2. Rights
The ParentLine volunteers explained to callers that Scotland’s approach to children’s rights is based on an international agreement called the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (the Convention), which is currently implemented in Scotland through a group of independent experts, rather than being entrenched in the Scottish legal system. When asked whether Scots Law should be changed to require Scottish Ministers to take appropriate steps to further the rights set out in the Convention, 82% of those who completed this question agreed that it should.

In addition 90% believe that the Scottish Government should be required by law to improve awareness and understanding of children’s rights and the Convention across Scotland and that public bodies, such as councils and health boards, should be required by law to publish reports on what they are doing to improve the lives of children and young people.

When asked whether all laws made in Scotland and all services for children should comply with children’s rights, 89% of respondents agreed that it should, whilst 6% disagreed and 5% didn’t know.

After explaining to callers the role of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People (the Commissioner), they were asked whether they believed that the Commissioner should have the authority to carry out an investigation on behalf of individual children or young people who have concerns that their rights aren’t being respected. 91% of callers who responded to this question said the Commissioner should be able to do so, whilst 5% said they should not and 4% didn’t know. Furthermore, 87% of respondents thought that children and their families should be able to take agencies such as councils and health boards to court to have their rights respected. 10% thought that this was not a good idea.

3. Services and Planning

It was explained to participants that the Scottish Government is proposing to introduce a ‘Named Person’ for every child who would be a single point of contact for a child or parent or carer if they would like information or advice about a child’s welfare. Other professionals would be expected to contact a child’s Named Person if they had any concerns about that child’s wellbeing.

We asked whether the callers thought that every child in Scotland should be given a Named Person until they are 18 years old: 71% agreed that they should with 55% of them considering that the Named Person should be the parent or carer and 16% that it should be another family member. From the list presented to participants, 14% considered that a social worker or family support worker should fulfil the role, 9% considered that a GP would be the most appropriate Named Person, and 8% believed it should be a class or head teacher.

More than a quarter (27%) of participants did not think a Named Person should be appointed to every child. The reasons given included that it wouldn’t be necessary for every child and that the need for a Named Person should be assessed on an individual needs basis; others believed that it would be too complicated if parents were separated and there was a general concern over who would have the authority to decide who the Named Person would be.

The ParentLine volunteers then described to callers that where children and young people, especially vulnerable children, come into contact with many different professionals, services and agencies, children can often end up with a number of different plans for them, for example, from teachers, health visitors, social workers etc. As a result there are often numerous different pieces of information about a child held in different plans by different people. We asked callers whether they believed that having one single Child’s Plan, rather than lots of different plans, would help to improve the wellbeing of the child. A resounding 94% of the 79 callers who considered this, agreed that it would help improve the wellbeing of the child if they had one single Child’s Plan.

Of those who did not agree, some argued that more detail is better, another suggested that because each agency has a different role it is better if there is a portfolio of opportunity, others believe that the parent should be in control of any such plans and some suggested that if this was implemented it should only be for vulnerable children.
4. Early Learning and Childcare
   Over three quarters (77%) of callers who responded to this section agreed that the number of hours of funded early learning and childcare for all 3 and 4 year olds should be increased from 475 hours to 600 hours a year and that these should be provided in a more flexible way.

   However, reflecting the make-up of families of participants, only 18% of these respondents presently use any form of childcare with the majority using grandparents and private nursery or other private arrangements and a few using pre school nursery (with one caller commenting that they had to top up the pre school nursery with private care).

   45% of 69 respondents reported that based on their current or past experience, they found it difficult to find suitable childcare during the holidays, particularly school summer holidays.

5. Looked after Children
   As CHILDREN 1ST has conducted a separate survey specifically for kinship carers we asked only the non kinship care callers their views on the proposals of the Government to recognise and strengthen the parenting role of kinship carers in law. Of the 51 people who responded to this question, 90% agreed that it was a good idea to introduce a new kinship care order into law. 4% didn’t know and 6% did not think it was a good idea but gave no specific reasons why.

   80% of the 50 callers who completed this section of the survey believe that young people leaving care should be able to request assistance from their council up to the age of 25, rather than to the age of 21 as it currently stands.

6. What else should be in the Bill?
   At the end of the survey, ParentLine calltakers asked participants to consider whether there was anything else that a Bill for Children and Young People should be changing or doing that doesn’t happen already. Some suggested that the bill should focus on ensuring that the emotional needs of children and young people are taken into account and children’s views are properly listened to.

   One caller believed that free school meals should be implemented for all children to help create a culture of staying at school at lunchtime. A few callers suggested that more rights and support is required for grandparents and for fathers and a general clarity on benefits that should be consistently and equally applied across the country.

Children in Scotland

1. Children in Scotland is pleased to provide written evidence to the Committee on the Children & Young People (Scotland) Bill. As the national umbrella organisation incorporating 400 members across the voluntary, public and private sector we have unique perspective on the provisions of this Bill, having since the proposals’ inception worked with a wide range of partner organisations to gauge and articulate views and shape the legislation. This has included hosting a Bill sounding board for the Scottish Government, being commissioned to produce easy-read versions of consultation material in addition to member’s briefings, organising a special seminar under our Scotland’s Children’s Sector Forum banner specifically around the Bill as well as continued liaison with Ministers, officials and cross-party MSPs throughout. Enquire, our national advice service for additional support for learning has also dealt with a number of queries concerning the Bill’s provisions. As such, we would very much welcome the opportunity to also provide oral evidence to the Committee. In addition, our Independent Mediation Service, Resolve: ASL would be also be pleased to expand on the issues raised surrounding redress mechanisms.

2. In scope, this Bill represents one of the largest pieces of legislation for the children’s sector in more than a decade and we believe a crucial opportunity to take steps required to achieve the Scottish Government’s stated intention of making Scotland the best place to grow up.

3. Children in Scotland warmly welcomes the ambitious policy aspirations behind this Bill, albeit originally proposed as two separate bills. However, we believe that the Bill, as currently drafted, falls short of those aspirations set out in the consultations and other Scottish Government documents and statements in the run-up to the Bill’s publication. This is particularly true in respect of the sections pertaining to children’s rights and we are keen that the decision to merge the proposed Rights of Children & Young People Bill with the proposed Children’s Services Bill does not preclude proper scrutiny and debate of these particular aspects during the Bill’s various stages.

4. Additionally, Children in Scotland Chief Executive, Jackie Brock is among a number of signatories to a letter to Committee Members from children’s organisations led by Together (Scottish Alliance for Children’s Rights) expressing concern that the Scottish Government has ruled out a Child Right’s Impact Assessment (CRIA) being undertaken on the Bill prior to its in-depth scrutiny. We believe a CRIA would act as a vital tool providing a structured child rights focused evidence base. This would enable the Scottish Government to take forward its welcome stated policy intention to ‘make rights real’ - the commitment made in its own UNCRC Action Plan, Do the Right Thing - as well as providing a central focus through which MSPs, government bodies, the children’s sector and children and young people themselves can take full account of the rights implications of the Bill. It is of note, in this regard, that such assessments are now used as a matter of routine on policy and legislation in Wales and in other European jurisdictions. Our views on the actual proposals on children’s rights set out in the parts 1 and 2 of the Bill itself are laid out further below.

5. Many of our members will also be making individual submissions on areas of particular interest and expertise. As such, this written evidence is not intended to be exhaustive but highlights specific areas which Children in Scotland particularly welcomes, has particular concerns about or would like to see enhanced, expanded or otherwise amended in due course following widespread consultation with our members.

6. These comments are written with the caveat that the precise implications of this legislation can only be understood in conjunction with the Guidance. It would therefore be extremely helpful if Committee Members could add to our request that the draft Guidance is published at the earliest possible opportunity.

PART 1 – RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

7. Children in Scotland warmly welcomes the stated policy intentions of this section of the Bill to 'make rights real'. This includes proposals to place a duty on Scottish Ministers to promote public awareness and understanding of the rights of children. However we would echo the comments of Together (The Scottish Alliance for Children’s Rights) that the Bill is a real step back from the Scottish Government’s original commitment in the Rights of Children and Young People Bill consultation to give the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) to which the UK is a signatory, a statutory basis in Scots law by placing a legal duty on Ministers to give ‘due regard’ to the UNCRC in all their decisions. This duty was subsequently watered down in the consultation document for the current amalgamated Bill and, despite responses from a wide range of NGOs, academics and public bodies calling for a stronger duty, the wording in the published Children & Young People Bill now merely requires Ministers to 'keep under consideration' these matters and to act 'if they consider it appropriate to do so'. This is ambiguous at best, difficult to implement and could make little meaningful difference in practice. It also falls short of duties already in place, for example, by the Welsh Assembly Government under the Rights of Children and Young Persons (Wales) Measure 2011.

8. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child has twice called for the UK Government as a signatory to the Convention to fully incorporate the rights, principles and provisions of the UNCRC into domestic law. We note in this regard the speech of the Deputy First Minister in March this year which cited UNCRC in her case for an independent Scotland and possible incorporation of Article 3 particularly into the written constitution of any new state. However, as a

1 Scottish Government (2011) Rights of Children & Young People Bill consultation
4 Nicola Sturgeon, Speech to Poverty Alliance Campaign to End Child Poverty event, National Museum of Scotland, 7 March 2013
devolved area, there is no current constitutional impediment preventing the Scottish Government from implementing this with respect to Scotland through this Bill. We would therefore endorse Together’s submission for the Scottish Government to match its commitment to ‘making rights real’ by at least taking the steps it previously proposed and preferably setting a new benchmark for children’s rights in the UK by implementing the UN Committee’s recommendation in full. Not to do so through this Bill, we believe, would represent a huge missed opportunity.

PART 2 – COMMISSIONER FOR CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE IN SCOTLAND

9. Children in Scotland welcomes the Bill’s proposed extension to the Commissioner’s powers to conduct investigations into the case of individual children, assuming this is fully resourced. We would however note that, while the Bill requires a service provider to respond to the Commissioner where requested, there is no similar obligation on Ministers or Parliament should the Commissioner choose to lay any report arising before Parliament, nor any enforcement mechanism beyond the power for the Commissioner to take evidence on oath. The Financial Memorandum assumes this new power will result in between one and four investigations per year and therefore the overall effect of this new power should be kept in context. In particular it should not be viewed as a substitute for child-friendly redress mechanisms across public bodies and services.

PART 3 – CHILDREN’S SERVICES PLANNING

10. We suggest that the Scottish Government should be invited to comment on how this section of the Bill strengthens and improves existing planning provisions in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. Prima facie, the proposed new provisions and those in the 1995 Act look similar. As a general principle, we believe that the aims of the Bill, including this section, should focus on ‘improving’ outcomes and wellbeing, accompanied by appropriated benchmarking and accountability rather than simply aiming to “promote” wellbeing which seems less ambitious.

11. We are concerned about the potential for adding bureaucratic burdens, which might absorb increasingly scarce resources better directed towards supporting children and families. For example, Part 6 of the Bill introduces a new duty to consult, produce and publish early learning and childcare plans. While we certainly welcome the increased focus on early learning and childcare in the Bill, it would seem less onerous to incorporate this plan within the wider children’s services plan. This would also avoid the risk that childcare is seen as detached from wider children’s services. Part 6 also places a duty to consult “persons as appear to it to be representatives of parents of children...” on how early learning and childcare is to be available. We would hope that this consultation would reach vulnerable families most in need of support and it surely should include the views of children. There may be some overlap with duties under the Children Act 1989 in this regard.

12. Given our comments below on the need to include the provision of out of school care as a duty in the Bill, it follows that these plans should also include delivery of such services for older children.

13. The Bill is also unclear about how progress and success in delivering these plans will be evaluated and the Scottish Government should be invited to provide clarity on these issues.

14. It is disappointing that the Bill makes no links between planning for children’s services and Community Planning and Single Outcome Agreements. An example of where these links are important is childcare, where accessible, affordable and flexible services are able to support parents and carers to enter or resume work or training, to their economic benefit and to the local and national economies. Our impression is that current children’s services planning is detached and peripheral to community planning and that the Bill provides an opportunity to remedy this. Clarity around how the provisions in this part might fit with existing duties under the Local Government (Scotland) Act 2003 would be welcome.

15. We would also echo the concerns expressed by Together that there appears to be a disjoint between the provisions in Part 1 of the Bill around children’s rights and the provisions in Part 3 around children’s wellbeing and that the UNCRC should be explicitly embedded into children’s services planning.

PART 4 – PROVISION FOR NAMED PERSON

16. Children in Scotland strongly supports the principles behind the Getting it Right for Every Child approach and shares disappointment that its implementation nationwide has not been as full, quick or consistent as hoped, although our members hold a range of views regarding the extent to which change should be effected either through primary legislation or guidance. While supporting the principle of having a designated point of contact across universal services we believe greater clarity around the role, responsibilities, resourcing and how it fits with the role of the Lead Professional and Child’s Plan Co-ordinator would be helpful, particularly in light of some sensationalist coverage in sections of the press which appeared to imply the role of the Named Person is to usurp that of parents. It is clear from pathfinder and other areas of Scotland, where GIRFEC is to some extent in place, that this is not the case and the Named Person provisions are largely a formalisation of much existing practice, however, clear Guidance is required to allay concerns particularly in terms of implications for staff workloads, training duties and access to information. With respect to the duty to share information in particular, there is a pressing need for clarity to ensure an appropriate balance is struck between a child’s privacy and confidentiality and ensuring their wellbeing and safety. A CRIA would be helpful in this regard, particularly as these specific proposals were not covered in the consultations.

17. Children in Scotland is pleased to be an official endorser of the Royal College of Nursing’s Health Visitors for Scotland campaign for the Bill to (1) explicitly commit in associated regulation that the Named Person (following on from maternity services) for under 5s is a health worker, in line with the GIRFEC framework, and (2) to provide a new statutory entitlement to universal services from health visiting teams for all under 5s.
18. This would explicitly recognise the role that health visitors play in the delivery of preventative and positive healthcare to families across Scotland and identifying any problems at an early stage and would go a long way to helping to achieve the Bill’s stated objectives: particularly given the acknowledgement in its policy memorandum that “the scientific evidence is clear that the foundations for a successful society can be built in early childhood. The brains of children develop at an astonishing rate before birth and in the first few months of life” as well as the cited quote by the Chief Medical Officer for Scotland that “in insecurely attached infants are at greater risk of problems in emotional development and children with very poor attachment experiences are at greatest risk of failure to thrive in early years and behaviour problems, lowered self-esteem and schooling difficulties in childhood and early adolescence”. Whilst, undoubtedly, this has resource implications, it is an excellent example of preventative spending as recommended in the Christie Report\(^5\)\(^6\) aside from the moral imperative to ensure no child is left behind or placed at risk.

19. While supporting the SHANARRI (Safe, Healthy, Achieving, Nurtured, Active, Respected and Included) wellbeing framework indicators, CiS takes the view that ‘wellbeing’ should routinely be coupled with ‘rights’ in determining indicators, assessing outcomes and measuring progress in relation to young people. This would also help this section to dovetail better with the policy intentions set out in part 1 of the Bill around reporting of progress in relation to UNCRC. We believe it would be beneficial for central government, local authorities and other relevant bodies to develop joint measuring and reporting frameworks drawing on those already developed by the Equalities and Human Rights Commission, for example, and used to various extents in different parts of the UK. As well as helping to monitor and compare overall outcomes in the population at large, this could also be invaluable in ensuring data is consistent across local authorities and ultimately that children and young people with particular needs are able to be identified and appropriate action and monitoring is provided in line with the ethos of GIRFEC.

PART 5 – CHILD’S PLAN

20. Children in Scotland endorses the submissions by the coalition for Scotland’s Disabled Children and the Advisory Group on Additional Support for Learning at both of which, CiS is represented. We appreciate the value of a single child’s plan and benefits of all relevant agencies sharing information and planning resources around the child. We would particularly highlight the need for clarity around enforceability and redress routes, transitionary arrangements and how these provisions dovetail with the existing Additional Support for Learning Act. Again publication of Guidance in this respect would be helpful.

PART 6 – EARLY LEARNING & CHILDCARE

21. The proposal in the Bill to extend entitlement to free early learning and childcare to 600 hours per annum is welcome. However, the additional costs quoted in the

\(^5\) (June 2011) Report on the Future Delivery of Public Services by the Commission chaired by Dr Campbell Christie
Financial Memorandum to deliver this extension are substantial (rising to over £108 million in 2016-17) and we would like to see confirmation that these costs will be met in full by the Scottish Government. Given the size of the potential investment required, it is important for all concerned, particularly families and children, that best use is made of these resources.

22. The Bill offers a rather vague definition of early learning and childcare – more detail may be achieved through Orders or Guidance. It would be helpful if the Scottish Government is invited to comment on the involvement of teachers and other qualified professionals in providing high quality early services. The quality of early learning and childcare must not be compromised by use of low paid or poorly qualified staff in order to keep costs down. The development and wellbeing of young children must be the over-riding priority.

23. The Bill does not address a long-standing issue about start dates in early learning and childcare. It is likely that the current arrangement will continue that most children commence their entitlement the term after their third birthday. This means, in practice, that a child can receive much less than their full entitlement depending on their birthdate. The need for this restriction has not been satisfactorily explained and organisations and parents have campaigned for change. The Scottish Government should be asked if it intends to address this anomaly, preferably in this Bill.

24. The Bill allows for the new 600 hours entitlement to be applied to looked after 2 year olds or to those to whom kinship care orders apply. This is certainly a welcome step forward but, in our view, the extension should go further. There is evidence that under 3s, particularly those from vulnerable and deprived families, can benefit significantly from access to high quality early learning and childcare. This helps the child’s development and reduces the risk of them falling behind at later stages of their education. It is also important to avoid any perverse incentive to designate a child as looked after if they otherwise would not be.

25. Ideally, provision of early education and care to all 2 year olds should become a universal entitlement over time. We fully appreciate that cost factors including staffing and service design mean that under the current financial climate, particularly coupled with a council tax freeze, this is a long-term aspiration. For now at least, we would strongly urge the Committee to press the Scottish Government to extend the current 600 hours proposal to those living in poverty. Identification and eligibility of such children could be achieved through use of the Scottish Indices of Multiple Deprivation or other criteria. If the aim is to improve outcomes for the most vulnerable children we would also ask for consideration for the scope to include children with additional support needs and those with disabilities. These groups could potentially be captured using the definition of ‘children in need’ set out in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.

26. While we appreciate that this is not without cost, we believe that the potential benefits to vulnerable young children outweigh short-term cost factors. It is worth noting that the UK Government is proposing to extend early education to around 40% of 2 year olds (around 260,000 children) from low-income families. We would be minded to support an Amendment to this provision in the Bill to deliver a better outcome for vulnerable 2 year olds.

27. Section 45 provides for alternative arrangements to the proposed 600 hours entitlement for looked after 2 year olds, subject to assessment of the child’s needs. Recording of assessment and action should be recorded in ‘any’ child’s plan. We suggest that the Scottish Government should be asked about the potential risk that a looked after 2 year old could lose out on the 600 hours and have inferior arrangements put in place, without necessarily having a child’s plan. We believe it would be preferable if the Bill provides for all 2 year olds affected by this section to automatically have a child’s plan.

28. Section 47 and 48 outline a minimum framework for the method of delivery of early learning and childcare. The policy aspirations are to ensure that services are sufficiently flexible to meet the changing needs of parents and carers. We suggest that the Scottish Government should be invited to provide more information on how much needed flexibility will be provided locally and to consider if any associated guidance should be made mandatory. The terminology in section 48 “must have regard to the desirability of ensuring …” does not inspire confidence. Given the economic pressures facing families and the need for services to meet changing work patterns, it would be a wasted opportunity if the additional investment referred to in the Bill resulted in only marginal changes to current models and failed to deliver what parents and carers need by way of flexible and affordable childcare.

29. It is very disappointing that out of school care for school age children does not feature in the Bill. While the Scottish Government’s focus on the early years is strongly supported by Children in Scotland, the needs of primary school-aged children, in particular, must not be forgotten and the same economic arguments in terms of supporting parents and carers to enter or sustain work or training still apply.

30. Much of the out of school care in Scotland is provided by independent and third sector bodies (including many services in schools) and providers have a particularly important role to play in communities which may not be able to sustain larger, less flexible services provided by, for example, local authorities. Smaller services are often barely viable and rely on income generated in term time to subsidise the costs of holiday care.

31. The Committee may be aware of the UK Coalition’s planned changes to support from the tax credit system for parents of school age children. Children in Scotland and the Family and Childcare Trust published on 25 July 2013 a report on childcare costs in Scotland. This shows that the costs of out of school care have risen. Given that the provision of out of school care is not a legal requirement in Scotland, we fear that already limited services may be vulnerable to cuts as budgets tighten.

32. Children in Scotland would be minded to support an Amendment to the Bill, perhaps with a focus on low income families or those in poverty, but we urge the Committee to consider what we regard as a serious omission from the Bill. It is worth noting in this regard that the Parliament’s Equal Opportunities Committee recommended that out of school care should be available, on a statutory basis, for children up to the age of 15.7

PARTS 7 – 11 (CORPORATE PARENTING, AFTERCARE, COUNSELLING SERVICES, SUPPORT FOR KINSHIP CARE, SCOTLAND’S ADOPTION REGISTER)

33. Children in Scotland endorses the submission by CELCIS (Centre of Excellence for Looked After Children in Scotland) with whom we produced a joint commentary on consultation responses.

OTHER COMMENTS

34. Whilst Children in Scotland is pleased to see that the Scottish Government has now invited views on its proposed changes to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010, our feeling is that the tight consultation timescale does not afford adequate opportunity to those in the education community, including those directly impacted, to properly respond, particularly given that we are now into the school holiday season.

35. These are very important matters to pupils, parents and communities affected including many of our members with whom we would have welcomed the opportunity to carry out a full consultation. It is therefore a matter of regret that these proposed changes are being treated as an eleventh hour add-on to the Children & Young People Bill by means of proposed amendments at Stage 2.

36. We would urge the Committee to impress on the Scottish Government the need to ensure timeframes and methods of implementation allocated for matters like these, in future, are appropriate to garner careful and considered responses from all the relevant stakeholders and to allow for full scrutiny.

37. Finally, we would also urge the Committee to be particularly mindful of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) Bill, which will be working its way through Parliament at roughly the same time as this Bill. Provisions in the Public Bodies Bill allow for the integration of children’s health and social care services which could have implications for some the arrangements in the Children & Young People Bill. Joint working or dialogue between the Health and Sport Committee on this would be welcomed.

38. I hope this is helpful in the Committee’s deliberations but please do not hesitate to contact us if we can provide any further information or otherwise be of assistance to Committee Members and staff.

Children in Scotland
25 July 2013

7 Scottish Parliament Equal Opportunities Committee 4th Report, 2013 (Session 4): Women and Work
Children in Scotland is the national umbrella agency for organisations and professionals working with and for children, young people and their families. It exists to identify and promote the interests of children and their families and to ensure that policies and services and other provisions are of the highest possible quality and are able to meet the needs of a diverse society. Children in Scotland represents more than 400 members, including most of Scottish local authorities, all major voluntary, statutory and private children’s agencies, professional organisations, as well as many other smaller community groups and children’s services. It is linked with similar agencies in other parts of the UK and Europe.

The work of Children in Scotland encompasses extensive information, policy, research and practice development programmes. The agency works closely with MSPs, the Scottish Government, local authorities and practitioners. It also services groups such as the Cross Party Parliamentary Group on Children and Young People (with YouthLink Scotland). In addition, Children in Scotland hosts Enquire - the national advice service for additional support for learning, and Resolve: ASL, Scotland’s largest independent education mediation service.
Introduction

1. Children’s Hearings Scotland (CHS) is a Non-Departmental Public Body established under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, which entered into force on 24 June 2013. CHS assists the National Convener with the delivery of her functions in relation to the recruitment, selection, appointment and re-appointment, training, retention and support of volunteer panel members within the Children’s Hearings System. Further information about CHS and the National Convener can be found on our website www.chscotland.gov.uk.

2. In providing this written evidence we have focused our response on the parts of the Bill which directly impact on the work of CHS and the National Convener.

Part 1

1. CHS welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to ensuring that Scotland improves national recognition and compliance with the UNCRC at every level, including public awareness and understanding of the rights of children and young people and raising children and young people’s awareness of their rights.

2. CHS believes it is right to be included in Schedule 1 on the list of relevant public authorities to report in relation to section 2. However, we would welcome additional clarity on how the reporting framework will link in with a children’s rights centred approach to policy making and practice.

Part 3

3. CHS welcomes the strengthening of the legal framework for children’s services planning. However, at this stage we have some reservations about this duty being imposed on the National Convener. There are two reasons for this. First, children’s hearings themselves are not providing a service to children and families and panel members have no direct role in children’s lives, other than the critical role of decision makers within the care and justice tribunal for children and young people and families. Secondly, there is an additional complexity in relation to compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and the maintenance of the independence of the children’s hearing.

4. We would welcome clarity and additional guidance to ensure that specific duties and expectations of different agencies and public bodies are set out to promote a real understanding of roles and responsibilities within the children’s planning framework.

5. We also think it is disappointing that the involvement of children, young people and families is not addressed within these sections of the Bill.
Part 4

6. CHS welcomes a single point of contact who can offer a coordinated approach for children, young people and their families. However, we would welcome clarity on the interface between the duties in law of the named person and the Children’s Hearings System. For example, would they attend a children’s hearing and if so, in what capacity? Would the named person provide reports to the children’s hearing or how else would their information feed into the hearing’s decision-making?

7. In these respects we would welcome guidance to ensure correct and meaningful interaction between the named person and the Children’s Hearings System.

Part 5

8. CHS welcomes the direction provided in relation to the child’s plan and the principles underlying this part of the Bill.

9. We are encouraged by the shift from focusing on welfare to wellbeing. It is consistent with the duty placed on the National Convener by s181 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, to prepare a report for Scottish Ministers and members of the children’s panel about the implementation of compulsory supervision orders. In preparing this report the National Convener may require each local authority to provide information “about the ways in which the overall wellbeing of children who are subject to the orders has been affected by them” (s181(4)(a)(iii)).

10. We hope that the general Scottish Ministers’ Guidance outlined in s39 of the Bill will reflect the principles set out in Part 13.

Part 7

11. CHS welcomes the intention to strengthen the duties and responsibilities in relation to corporate parenting within these sections.

12. However, the National Convener and CHS have a specific role in the Children’s Hearings System to provide support for panel members in relation to their recruitment, selection, training and retention. CHS is not a direct provider of services for children and young people, and as such we do not regard ourselves as corporate parents as defined in ‘These are our Bairns: A guide for community planning partnerships on being a good corporate parent’ (Scottish Government) (2008).

13. We do not anticipate that we will routinely collect and hold data on individual children and young people and our view is that much of Sections 52, 53, 54, 55 and 56 are both in conflict with the role and functions of panel members as lay members of an independent tribunal, and with the functions and duties of the National Convener and CHS as set out in Schedules 1 and 2 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

14. Within the terms of the ECHR the children’s hearing must be perceived as an independent and impartial tribunal and we are concerned that categorising the National Convener and CHS as corporate parents may adversely affect this perception. In relation to this point we have particular reference to s58 which states that a corporate parent must comply with a direction issued by Scottish Ministers.

15. Section 54 sets out responsibilities in relation to collaborative working between corporate parents, and this section could not be applicable to CHS without significant tension, and possible challenge in relation to the independence of children’s hearings. Further there is a risk that corporate parents will be in direct conflict where a children’s hearing disagrees with the recommendation of the implementation authority or has instructed the National Convener to challenge non-implementation of a compulsory supervision order in relation to that child under sections 144 to 148 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

16. Under section 52, the duties of the corporate parent including sections 52 (b) and (e) do not relate to the National Convener, CHS and the children’s hearings functions. Panel members are trained lay tribunal members and are not service assessors, social workers, counsellors or service providers.

17. we acknowledge that the Bill does provide for agencies and bodies to be exempt from certain duties where this conflicts with other statutory functions or duties, CHS cannot really see how listing CHS and the National Convener as corporate parents is to the benefit of children and young people, given the statutory functions of CHS and the National Convener.

18. For these reasons, we suggest that it would be very difficult for CHS to prepare a report under section 53 which would be meaningful or add value to the overall picture in relation to corporate parenting.

19. The National Convener and CHS are fully committed to promoting the best interests of looked after children and young people. We suggest that some amendments could be made to these sections so that the key agencies which make up the Children's Hearings System are not listed in Schedule 3 but instead are defined separately as agencies with responsibilities to communicate with and support corporate parents as appropriate

Sections 69 and 70

20. The National Convener welcomes these sections as set out.

21. Considerable energy and resources were invested by Scottish Government, the National Convener and CHS, local authorities and the panel community over the course of a two year process from the initial meetings and consultation with stakeholders on Area Support Team (AST) boundaries and structures to the signing of 32 partnership agreements between CHS and each local authority in Scotland. 22 ASTs were established and took up some of their functions on 31 March 2013 and their full functions on 24 June 2013.

22. Securing adequate clerking, administrative and practical support for the ASTs through the partnership agreements took far longer than anyone could have anticipated at the start of the process. This was largely as a consequence of paragraph 12(3) of Schedule 1 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 which requires the National Convener to obtain the consent of each constituent authority before establishing an AST.

23. We recognise the crucial role played by local authorities in supporting panel members and within the Children’s Hearings System, as well as their wider role in working with children and families and in child protection. This support is highly valued by panel members, the National Convener and CHS.

Part 13

24. CHS welcomes the shift in focus from welfare to wellbeing and the inclusion of the SHANARRI indicators in primary legislation. However CHS believes that more needs to be done to develop the indicators. It is possible to meet all the indicators and yet not be happy. We recognise the difficulties of such a subjective approach but we feel it should be included in an outcomes-based approach to measuring children’s and young people’s achievements and attainments.

25. We welcome the introduction of a definition of wellbeing and a national framework of high level outcomes and indicators. SHANARRI will provide a common framework for measuring the impact of services which take a holistic approach to all areas of a child or young person’s life. It is important to include the views and experiences of children and young people in this reporting framework and we look forward to the consultation in relation to Guidance to accompany the Act.

26. As stated under Part 5 above, the National Convener has a duty to report to Scottish Ministers and children’s panel members on the implementation of compulsory supervision orders under s181 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. CHS is currently working to establish a mechanism for the collection of information about compulsory supervision orders from local authorities, the Scottish Government and the Scottish Children’s Reporters Administration (SCRA) to fulfil the National Convener’s duty under s181 of the 2011 Act. CHS would welcome a national set of outcomes and indicators for reporting on wellbeing which would provide a common basis for reporting on the impact of compulsory supervision orders.

27. With regard to reporting, however, CHS would like to know more about how the practicalities of linking data across sectors will be addressed.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Children’s Parliament

About Children’s Parliament

1. Children’s Parliament is Scotland's Centre for Excellence for children's participation and engagement. We demonstrate good practice by engaging children in their early years and in middle childhood (up to 14) in projects, consultations and community programmes. We inform and influence public policy and professional practice and build the capacity and skills of adults and public bodies, including Government, through reporting, publication/dissemination, modelling and training.

Children and Young People Bill consultation: our approach

2. We involved 107 children aged between 9 and 12 years old across 6 locations. The children took part in 2 full day workshops. In line with a commitment to engage with children in creative ways the workshops built on the notion of Scotland as the best place to grow up. We took the theme of Scotland as a garden and imagined children growing in the garden. Children engaged in drawing and building items for their gardens, they used drama and discussion and consulted with peers.

Rights

“Enforce children’s rights instead of just letting it be optional to people”.

“What’s the point if they don’t have to abide by them?”

“If it’s not the law then people might not give me my rights”.

4. The Bill places much focus on children’s wellbeing. But wellbeing alone is not enough; we have asked children in this most recent and in previous Scottish Government consultations what they want to see in place and they have told us they want their human rights to be enshrined in law. Incorporation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child into Scots law will provide a robust framework for the realisation of children’s rights; commitments to ‘consistency’ in policy or legislation regarding the UNCRC or using the UNCRC to ‘underpin’ legislation regarding children’s services, or the new proposal to keep children’s rights ‘under consideration’ is simply not enough to deliver on commitments to improve outcomes or make Scotland the best place to grow up.

1. Wellbeing

“Every feeling has a place in your body”.

523
5. Children intuitively consider their wellbeing in a rounded way. In this sense the concern for the GIRFEC SHANARRI indicators to take a holistic view of the child’s life is an approach children understand. Our consultation engaged with children who have experiences of a range of services, discussion with them about wellbeing made it clear that any wellbeing framework (including SHANARRI) must see all children as children first rather than to see or treat them solely as a child defined by a particular issue, problem or service approach. Our consultation evidences that children have an interest in, and the capacity to consider, what wellbeing means to them and that any discussion of their wellbeing must include them. The consultation allowed children to discuss and reflect on the relationship between rights and wellbeing. Children focused predominantly on the right to: a loving and caring family, affection and attention, friends, freedom and play, learn, a home and community free from alcohol, violence and a clean environment. These then emerge as the children’s top line indicators of a child’s wellbeing. To make rights real our commitment to wellbeing and rights can only be enshrined in law through incorporation of the UNCRC.

Raising awareness of rights: children and adults

“If adults treat children badly they should be removed until they learn how to treat children properly”.

“If adults treat children badly they should go on a course to learn about children’s rights”.

6. Our discussion with children across consultations confirms that there is a low level of awareness of children’s human rights and the UNCRC amongst Scotland’s children. Children also report that adults have a poor understanding of children’s human rights. Where there is some awareness amongst children this is often about how children in other countries lack the basics of life; when Scottish children talk about rights more often than not they simply attempt to repeat what they remember from an article of the UNCRC and recite a ‘responsibility’ that they must also bear if they are to be accorded their rights. If we are to progress at all with understanding what a duty on public bodies might look like, and what benefits it might bring to the realisation of children’s rights in Scotland, the contributions from children also evidence the urgent need to raise awareness of rights and their meaning in children’s lives every day and in every context here in Scotland. Children also clearly identified the need for adults (parents, carers and professionals) to have a better understanding of children’s human rights. Where rights were infringed by adults, children want an appropriate response; this might be further learning for the adult but certainly infringements and inappropriate adult behaviour (by parent or professional) need to be challenged.

Realising rights

7. Children identified a number of headline issues which public bodies and services must recognise and address to meaningfully improve outcomes for children and make rights real. If not in legislation Guidance must recognise childrens concerns regarding:

8. Shouting and violence toward children: “Sometimes my mum throws my dad out the house 'cos he hits me and my wee brother”; “My mum needs help with being angry and smacking me on the bum or the face. Everyone shouts at me”; “Children need parents who listen to them, that doesn't threaten you or bring a knife out”.

9. Poverty: “My mum gives us our tea but sometimes she doesn't have enough money for tea”; “My mum would always buy me or my brother's clothes first; she always has to get mine before hers. She's a single mum because my dad left”; “Families need money so that they can feed their families and have somewhere to live”.

10. Family breakdown and a loss of contact with fathers: “I want to see my dad more but my mum won't let me. I don’t know why”; “When I'm at my pal's house me and my pal pretend we're going up the park but we sneak away to my dad's work so's I can see him. Nobody knows”

Making rights real: accessing help and support

11. In the course of this consultation and other work Children’s Parliament has become aware of the high threshold in many areas before children (and families) receive meaningful support. We have been required to share concerns about children’s wellbeing and safety with host settings and have been told that there is an awareness of what we have shared, but that concerns have not reached a threshold whereby further action can/could/would be taken. It seems to us, in the context of our consultation and now with the passage of the Bill through Parliament (along with development of Guidance), that we need to reflect on concerns that commitments to early intervention and prevention are often just that, verbal or theoretical commitments, and have not resulted in genuine action and the provision of consistent, high quality and coordinated services, advice and information, delivered in time and when needed.

Named Person

“It would have to be someone you know and they would have to know each child”.

“They would put you first”.

“Everyone is so individual it would be difficult to look after everyone.”

12. This was a complex idea for the children (aged 9 – 12) to consider but going along with our Scotland as a garden theme the children discussed the role of Gardeners (all the adults in their lives) and the job of Head Gardener (the Named Person). Children identified that all adults – family members and professional people – have and share equally a duty to make sure all children are healthy, happy and safe. The overarching requirement of a Named Person (their Head Gardener) would be that this person’s key role is to keep children safe and ensure good communication between people who are interested in the child. For children who had experience of a range of services beyond universal services there was a need for the Named Person to be someone they and their family know well and who can “help people calm down”. As to who can fulfil the role of Named Person children had a broader view of this than has been suggested; so that in addition to the possibility that the Named Person might be midwife/public health nurse/head teacher they could also be a Police officer, a Lawyer, a Key worker/Professional Carer, a Coach/Tutor or a classroom teacher. In short children were interested in finding the right person for the job rather than identifying someone simply because they were to be found in what Government/Services see as the right location (midwife/public health nurse/head teacher).

13. Children identified a number of requirements and challenges the Named Person will face. In summary the Named Person needs to build a trusting relationship with the child and “fight for your rights”. The role will be challenging because they don’t have time and adults do not pay enough attention to the child’s needs (rather than their own). Children were concerned that if they did not get on with their Named Person would they have a say and be able to change this person?

The Child’s Plan

“Everyone was just getting in a muddle and we needed the plan to help each other”.

“It would help me to have one plan. Me and my grannie never sit down. We should always sit down at the kitchen table and stick to our plan. But we never do, it’s annoying. Adults don’t listen or say they can’t be bothered. Maybe they could actually sit down with me. Maybe my grannie could speak to school”.

14. The idea of a Child’s Plan was supported by children. The Plan was seen as an important tool for shared approaches as long as everyone was on board and well informed about its purpose and their responsibility to follow it. Plans were also seen as a way to engage parents and carers in understanding and meeting children’s needs. Children also identified the need to make the Plan a formal agreement, like a law, so that adults had to follow it. There was also a need to remind adults about the Plan. Reflecting our Scotland as garden theme there was also the view that Plans cannot be static, but need to continue to change and to involve children as they develop: “We would need to make the plan grow. All the different adults would need to add their own bit and the child would give their ideas too”.

15. Children also reported experiences of a poor commitment of adults to listening and involving them. If legislation and Guidance are to have impact they must impact on adult behaviour and organisational approaches and systems.

“My social worker hasn’t listened to me about visiting my dad in jail on the weekend. The adults at the Hearings weren’t listening to me properly”.
“I don’t think there is anything I can do, they’re only interested in themselves. Mum and Dad don’t listen to me when I have contact with them. They don’t listen because they want to do what they want and don’t listen to me”.

Corporate Parenting and kinship care

“Children should have a place to live that is warm and safe and secure like a sanctuary”.

16. In the spirit of the consultation (that corporate parenting should focus on what being a parent means) we are able to provide the views of children in relation to what a parent’s role and responsibilities are. In order to be a parent, the ‘corporate parent’ needs to focus on the individual child and consider they are a parent. Children identified a need for love, to be “really cared for”, to have a parent who “enjoys their children” and helps them learn, who they can trust, will be there for them, stays interested in them, who miss them. For children who are looked after at home children identified a need for professional support which helps families when they are unhappy; children recognised that sometimes a family needs “a helping hand to be responsible”. As with all family settings children want their kinship care placements to be places where they can flourish and be healthy, happy and safe. In particular one child commented on what the consultation paper described as the principle of ‘family first’ with the comment: “Children should be able to stay with a family carer before they have to go to foster care”.

Better foster care

“What I think about foster care: Give children a better life than they have had, make them forget what has happened and give them new opportunities, make sure they have contact with their family. Make sure they have a nice clean environment. Give them healthy meals. Make them happy”.

“I really want to stay with my foster carer, she’s really nice. I can’t tell my social worker ‘cos I’m frightened they’ll tell my mum. She gives me a bit paper and asks what I want so I just say ‘I don’t know’”.

17. The consultation questions were narrow; children’s views on improving foster care were broad. In summary they identified the need for improved understanding of why a child is removed from home, the need to have a say in foster care placements, to keep siblings together and maintain contact with their friends. Making rights real for children in foster care is complex; listening to children and involving them in decisions are essential. Children need to know they are at the centre of decisions. Children identified the need for improved training and support for foster carers: “Foster carers should have to take a test to make sure they are loving, caring and can be as good as the best parents”.

Public bodies and duties to report

18. Children require a full range of public bodies to work together, both in the interests of the individual child and on behalf of children collectively. A concern is where the participation of children themselves is expected to fit in this picture of joint design and planning of services. While some individual practitioners and strategic/planning bodies are already doing work to engage children this is not yet commonplace. Again legislation and Guidance on this matter must unpack what meeting any duty on joint design, planning and delivery should look like when it comes to meaningful and ethical engagement with children themselves and what support Government is envisaging will be in place to develop the capacity/skills of individual practitioners and public bodies to do so. The public services which children have identified as important in their lives, and so those on whom a duty to report must be applied include: Schools and Education services including Inspectorate, Health services (including hospitals, GPs, community health services like Midwives and psychological and therapeutic services), Social Work and Children and Families services, the Police, services for children with disabilities, Play and Leisure services, Voluntary sector agencies, Children’s Hearings and Legal services and the Scottish Government itself. A key message from our consultation is that the Government has a responsibility to “send the message about children’s rights”. A key theme for the children taking part in the consultation is about adults working together to keep them healthy, happy and safe. This requires direct communication with children and between adults so that children’s wellbeing is framed in the context of children’s human rights.

Children’s Parliament
4 July 2013
Introduction

1. This response has been submitted by the Church and Society Council of the Church of Scotland. As we stated in our response to the Scottish Government’s consultation “A Scotland for Children” in 2012, we support the intention to improve the lives of children and young people in Scotland, and the aspiration to make Scotland the best place to grow up. This sentiment is expressed in our 2009 report to the Church of Scotland General Assembly “Growing Up in Scotland Today”. However, we have some concerns about the Bill as it is currently drafted. We would also wish to underline those areas within the proposed changes that we particularly welcome. In particular, we would like to see greater emphasis on a child’s right to spiritual development.

Children’s Rights

2. We agree with the importance of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and support the Scottish Government’s intention to place children’s rights at the heart of policy-making. We are supportive of the important work done by the Scottish Commissioner for Children and Young People and many of the charities working with children in seeking to respect children’s human rights. Whilst Scottish Ministers are already implicitly subject to a requirement to promote and raise awareness and understanding of the rights of children and young people though the UNCRC, we are happy with the strengthening of this requirement through this Bill. However, placing this duty on a statutory footing will only help to solidify the place of children’s rights at the heart of decision-making if there is a robust mechanism for keeping Scottish Ministers accountable in this regard. We therefore support the requirement for a reporting cycle of five years.

Christian response to Children’s Rights

3. The Christian basis for children's rights lies in the recognition that all human beings are created in the image of God. There is an equality in all humanity which does not depend on age, understanding, maturity or mental or physical capacity. Children and young people are not isolated individuals removed from a context of family, community and relationships; there is an obligation on wider society to nurture and care for them. The Churches’ historic presence in Scottish community life, and in developing Scotland’s education system means that we are particularly aware that the State is by no means the only initiator or provider of services focused on the holistic development and wellbeing of children and their families.

A right to be free from poverty

4. This focus on children and their rights is one way of expressing our broad concern for the wellbeing of children in all respects. Central to that concern is the scandal of child poverty. Not only is child poverty a scandal in and of itself, but it is bound up with so many of the other social factors that can blight children’s lives – the health inequalities that mean dramatic differences in life expectancy at birth between children born in neighbouring communities, the higher vulnerability to crime of children in deprived areas and so on. The Church of Scotland is associated with the End Child Poverty coalition in Scotland, and at a local level, many churches across Scotland are involved not only in running projects which directly tackle poverty but also in campaigning for a more just and equal society.

A right to spiritual development

5. Most, if not all, of the international documents which define the rights of children recognise in some form a right to spiritual development. We believe that children have rights because they bear the image of God and so it is essential that the spiritual dimension of growing up is not ignored. For children who grow up in families with a belief or faith tradition, the spiritual dimension of life will be embedded into their life together. Those who do not have that kind of family background may only have the opportunity to discover the spiritual dimension of life either through engagement in church-based activities or through schools. Churches and other religious groups play a formative role in the development of many children growing up in Scotland, whether through attendance at services, involvement in faith-based activities, such as uniformed organisations, or the role played by chaplains in schools across the country. We affirm and support the role of other faith based groups providing spiritual development to young people. There is a long tradition in non-denominational schools of chaplains or chaplaincy teams offering support for pupils, staff and parents without reference to whether or not they are people of faith. This is an important support network which is provided and is available to many of Scotland’s children.

6. This right should also be borne in mind when considering paragraph 7 (Wellbeing Indicators) of our response.

Children’s Services: Named Person

7. As stated in our response to the 2012 Scottish Government consultation, we raised our concern with the Named Person approach. We recognise that the majority of respondents to the consultation were in favour of a Named Person. We, however, remain concerned about the potential that this approach has to contribute to a general diminishing of parental responsibilities. We fully recognise that for some children there is a need for additional assistance and intervention, but with those children in mind, we are concerned that the resource and training implications of designating a Named Person for every child may be counterproductive to offering heightened attention and intervention to those children who require it most.
Wellbeing Indicators

Spirituality

8. As we previously highlighted in our response to the Scottish Government’s consultation in 2012, the SHANARRI Wellbeing Indicators, listed in Part 13 section 74 (2) of the Bill, do not include spirituality. We find this to be a serious omission and would like to see this addressed as the Bill progresses through the parliamentary process. The importance of spiritual development as an integral part of being human has been acknowledged by successive Scottish administrations and has now been incorporated into the education system through the inclusion of Religious Observance in schools. The definition of Religious Observance (offered by the Religious Observance Review Group Report and ratified by Scottish Ministers) is: “community acts which aim to promote the spiritual development of all members of the school’s community and express and celebrate the shared values of the school community”\(^3\). We believe that spiritual development is crucial, not only for the individual child, but for the development of the community ties that make a good, just and equal society. We are therefore very strongly of the opinion that the commitment to including spirituality within the indicators of wellbeing is an aspect which we would value the Committee’s consideration.

1. Circle, formerly known as Family Service Unit, predominantly delivers assertive outreach, whole family, home based support. Circle works with families where there may be a number of issues to consider such as imprisonment, substance misuse, domestic abuse, poor educational prospects, poor parenting, homelessness, need for early years support and alternative care arrangements via a solution focussed, strength based approach.

2. Circle agrees with all the principles of the Bill. In our work with whole families the rights for children to be properly protected have not always been adequately considered. For example when parents are imprisoned the children who live in the community are not necessarily identified. This leaves children at risk. This is merely one reason why Circle welcomes the new duties placed on Scottish Ministers, the Public Sector and the increased powers for Scotland’s Commissioner for Children to close these gaps.

3. Circle has worked with kinship carers for a considerable period of time. We became aware this was a seriously disadvantaged and challenged group of people who benefitted from support. Circle sought funding to create a team to specifically support this group therefore Circle welcomes the fact that the Bill focusses attention on this group. Should the Committee wish to hear evidence from kinship carers Circle would be able to support our service users to provide evidence of what is helpful, especially given the impact of the recent Welfare Reforms.

4. Circle’s experience of Early Years work with families leads us to be concerned that while (LAC) 2 year olds will be entitled to nursery care our view is that whole family support may be a more helpful way to enable parents be the best they can be. It is our view this would be more beneficial for the children.

5. Circle supports every child having a named person but fear for the children who may fall through the many gaps we are aware they can fall through. Circle has found that many of the complex families we work with have, for their own reasons, avoided mainstream services.

Citizens Advice Scotland

Introduction

1. Citizens Advice Scotland (CAS) is the umbrella organisation for Scotland’s network of 81 Citizens Advice Bureau (CAB) offices. These bureaux deliver frontline advice services throughout over 250 service points across the country, from the city centres of Glasgow and Edinburgh to the Highlands, Islands and rural Borders communities.

2. In 2012/13, bureaux across Scotland helped clients to deal with 513,000 new issues. A total of 792 kinship care enquiries were brought to bureaux and the Kinship Care Service helpline over this time.

3. In September 2012, CAS submitted a written response to the consultation on the proposal for a Children and Young People Bill. We welcome the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Education and Culture Committee on the general principles of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Our comments are confined to Part 10 of the Bill, Support for Kinship Care.

The CAS Kinship Care Service

4. The CAS Kinship Care Advice and Information Service was formally launched in September 2008. The project ran under an initial agreement with the Scottish Government until September 2011, and has subsequently been granted a number of funding extensions. The Service is currently funded until March 2014.

5. The service provides:

   - advice for kinship carers through their local Citizens Advice Bureaux and a free, confidential helpline service
   - assistance for kinship carers to maximise their incomes through detailed benefits support work. For many kinship carers, an increase in disposable income can represent a financial lifeline – and improved family finances can help lead to better outcomes for children and young people
   - advice and training to local authorities on a range of issues, including the impact of allowances on kinship carers
   - information to advisers and policy makers through briefings and reference materials, designed to increase the accuracy and consistency of support received by kinship carers
   - opportunities for national and local stakeholders to come together to share information and effective practice
   - the most efficient support for kinship carers through effective partnership working at both national and local levels.
6. Direct advice to clients is delivered by Citizens Advice Bureaux and, via a helpline number, by Citizens Advice Direct (CAD). Support for bureaux and for CAD is provided by:

- two part-time national co-ordinators based at CAS in Edinburgh
- four regional officers, providing second-tier support for bureaux and working closely with local authorities.

7. The two biggest overall areas of enquiry for CAB kinship care clients are i) ‘Benefits’ and ii) ‘Relationships’. Although some may have their issues resolved during a single visit to a CAB or call to the helpline, typically the sorts of problems faced by kinship carers are complex and require a number of separate contacts.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, Part 10: Support for Kinship Care

8. CAS welcomes the creation of a new duty for local authorities to provide assistance to kinship care children who are not formally ‘looked after’. This Kinship Care Order (CKO) would require local authorities to provide assistance to ‘qualifying’ kinship carers of ‘eligible’ children. We support the policy aims of a) providing children who are not formally ‘looked after’ with a long-term, stable care environment and b) addressing some of the idiosyncrasies and complexities that exist in the current system. However, we have ongoing concerns about the ability of the proposals as they stand to meet these objectives.

The Kinship Care Order and support for kinship carers

9. Full details of the ‘support package’ available via a KCO will be defined in secondary legislation. Consequently, it is impossible at this stage to comment fully on its impact and ability to achieve the above objectives. However, the Policy Memorandum and Financial Memorandum both include some detail about what the package of support might include and how it might be implemented.

10. It appears that local authorities will not be obliged under the new legislation to include a regular, ongoing allowance (akin to the existing kinship care allowance paid to kinship carers of ‘looked after’ children) in the new package of financial support available via a KCO. Omitting ongoing financial assistance from the KCO ‘support package’ is problematic for a number of reasons.

11. Firstly, it is of significant concern given that it is well documented that kinship carers live with high levels of disadvantage and deprivation. CAS’s 2010 report on kinship care clients, Relative Value, found that more than half of the kinship carers in the study were not in employment, with many having given up their employment because of their kinship caring responsibilities. Kinship carers were also significantly more likely to be unable to work due to disability or ill health than the general population in Scotland. In addition, kinship carers are more likely to be living in social rented accommodation and, as a consequence, in areas of deprivation. These findings are supported by a number of external studies e.g. Farmer and Moyers (2008)\(^2\) found that kinship carers were significantly more disadvantaged than both unrelated foster carers and the general population.

1 Relative Value: The Experiences of Kinship Carers Using the Scottish CAB Service, CAS, October 2010

12. Secondly, omitting ongoing financial assistance from the KCO ‘support package’ extends the existing distinction between the financial support that is available for kinship carers of ‘looked after’ and not ‘looked after’ children. It gives credence to the hypothesis that ‘looked after’ and not ‘looked after’ children in kinship care fall neatly into two distinct groups, with the former having more serious care needs that require greater financial support. CAS remains unconvinced of the legitimacy of this position, and would welcome the Scottish Government’s conducting further research in this area. This would help develop a better understanding of the similarities and differences between these two groups of children, and thus ensure that policies relating to their care needs and requirements for financial support are truly evidence based.

13. Indeed, CAS case evidence shows it to be a false dichotomy. For our kinship care clients, the legal distinction between ‘looked after’ and not ‘looked after’ children does not accurately reflect the messy and overlapping nature of the groups in real life. Our 2010 research examined the circumstances that had led to the kinship care arrangement coming about, and found that non ‘looked after’ children were more likely than ‘looked after’ children to be in kinship care due to addiction problems (34% compared with 30%), prison sentences (17% compared with 8%) and neglect/abandonment (19% compared with 18%). This shows that the circumstances leading to a not ‘looked after’ arrangement are often as difficult and testing as those leading to ‘looked after’ status, and that the children affected are likely to require significant levels of care and support.

14. Thirdly, omitting ongoing financial assistance as part of the KCO package also means that the new legislation does not address the perverse incentive that currently exists, with some kinship carers seeking to ‘hold on’ to the ‘looked after’ status of the child in order to ensure the long-term financial sustainability of the placement. Allied to this is the issue of kinship carers feeling pressured by the local authority to apply for a Residence Order, without full consideration or discussion of the impact it will have on both the carer and the child for whom they are caring. Case evidence demonstrates a perception amongst some kinship carers that this pressure is being exerted because it will bring about a financial saving for the local authority. These problems are likely to continue with the introduction of the new KCO, as the legislation extends the current framework in which carers of ‘looked after’ children are guaranteed ongoing financial support but carers of not ‘looked after’ children are not.

15. Fourthly, omitting ongoing financial assistance from the KCO package fails to tackle the existing situation in which local authorities are enabled – but not obliged – to pay kinship care allowance to carers of not ‘looked after’ children. Currently, 17 local authorities choose to make discretionary payments of kinship care allowance to carers of not ‘looked after’ children. There is huge variation in the level of allowances made - as of April 2013, rates vary from £50 to just under £150 per week (averaged per local authority across all age groups of children). Without a duty to include ongoing financial support as part of the KCO, it is likely that the current inequitable situation will continue, with kinship carers in very similar circumstances receiving hugely varying levels of financial support depending on where in the country they live.

16. The financial support available to kinship carers granted a KCO (who also pass the eligibility test and means test – see paragraph 18 below) will be limited to certain one-off payments. The detail will be contained in secondary legislation, so it is impossible to comment fully, but the Financial Memorandum includes some of the support that might be provided e.g. an essential start up grant, transitional payments for those children moving from looked after to not looked after status, assistance with certain transport costs and assistance with meeting the costs of petitioning for the Residence Order. CAS has concerns about how these might work in practice. For instance, it is not clear exactly how the transitional payments will operate and how they will interact with kinship care allowance payments. CAS also looks forward to receiving more detail about the levels of financial support that kinship carers will receive from the local authority in pursuing an order, and access to legal aid. Client evidence indicates that the cost of pursuing an order can sometimes be prohibitive for kinship carers for whom this might otherwise represent the most suitable way forward.

17. Client evidence shows that the non-financial support that kinship carers currently receive from local authorities is subject to massive variations. Some describe no further contact at all from social workers after the child has been dropped off at the height of a crisis, whilst others benefit from appropriate and ongoing support which can make a very real and positive difference to both the carer and the child for whom they are caring. CAS therefore welcomes the intention to standardise non-financial support and make it available to a wider group of kinship carers than at present. In the absence of more detailed information about what this might look like, however, it is difficult to comment in more detail.

18. The Policy Memorandum indicates that both eligibility testing and means testing are likely to apply to for many elements of the package, and CAS has concerns about the impact of both of these practices. The eligibility test will be conducted by the Local Authority after the carer has been granted a KCO, and used to determine what support will be made available to them. In other words, being awarded a KCO only guarantees the carer’s right to request support from their local authority, it does not guarantee the amount or type of support they will receive. Similarly, local authorities will be allowed to take account of the means of the carer when determining what support they make available. If the legislation does not specify exactly how this is to be applied, but allows for local variation across Scotland’s 32 local authorities, then it is very likely that kinship carers in the same circumstances but living in different parts of Scotland will receive different packages of non-financial support.

19. Taken together, eligibility testing and means testing will make it impossible for a kinship carer to know in advance what support they will be entitled to if they are granted a KCO. This lack of knowledge and certainty make it very hard for carers to determine whether or not the situation will be viable and sustainable. This contrasts clearly with the situation for foster carers, who have time to plan and prepare, and know exactly how much financial and non-financial support they can expect to receive.
Local authority practice and resourcing the changes

20. Many of the issues that kinship care clients bring to bureaux relate not to kinship care policy, but to the way that the policy is being practiced by the local authority. Evidence shows us that the current kinship care policy arrangements cause problems for clients in terms of local authorities:

- giving incorrect advice
- failing to inform kinship carers of their options
- applying pressure to pursue one route over another
- communicating poorly with the kinship carer
- communicating poorly internally e.g. between social work, education and housing departments
- communicating poorly with other local authorities
- delaying payments
- not sticking to statutory guidelines about time limits for completing assessments

21. CAS is concerned that the current proposals do not tackle these issues, and they will continue to have a significant deleterious impact on the day to day lives of kinship carers and the children for whom they care. This is of particular concern given that the burden of resourcing the reforms falls to local authorities. Many local authorities are already struggling to meet the financial and staffing demands of the existing kinship care legislation. It is unclear where they will find the resources – particularly the real up-front costs associated with the transition process – to make these proposals work. We are also concerned that there are currently no safeguards in place to protect kinship carers should resources prove inadequate.

PART 1: RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

1. We are concerned about overlapping/duplicatory requirements to report. It would be helpful if reporting mechanisms were integrated so that this is not another stand-alone add on reporting cycle. There would also be a need to revisit and be explicit about the respective roles of central and local government – currently embodied in the SOA relationship. Reporting should be outcomes based.

PART 2: COMMISSIONER FOR CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE IN SCOTLAND

2. We would like to see clearer intent that the relevant rights from the United Nations Convention “hardwired” into legislation, in the same way that Article 29 was successfully placed at the heart in the Standards for Scotland’s Schools Act enshrining the child’s right to education in law. This makes the commitment of parliament tangible giving the rights a practical reality and allows children to rely on them directly.

3. The proposal to strengthen and give some teeth to the promotion and protection of Children’s Rights is welcome. However, this appears something of an add-on and it is not clear how it will work as part of an integrated system in relation to other mechanisms and processes. Given the relatively small number of cases that can be managed, what other processes would be required as a criterion for accepting a case? There will be process and resource implications at local authority level to make this work. We would welcome a focus on the provision of advocacy for children prior to issues being elevated to that level. There is a need to provide for the support of individual children (particularly under 12s) to understand and claim their rights – it is not correct to assume that this already happens. Potentially more rights-focused complaints will be coming forward from individual children/families as a consequence of the promotion of both UNCRC and the Named Person roles and responsibilities. Plans at national and local level need to take account of such an increase.

PART 3: CHILDREN’S SERVICES PLANNING

4. The extension of Children’s Services Plans to the wider set of services relevant to the wellbeing of children is consistent with Girfec. However, to be useful and realistic there does need to be some focus – it would be neither possible or helpful to include reference to everything done in our area, and there is also a danger that attempting to include everything by increasing levels of abstraction will lead to unproductive blandness. Would be helpful and efficient to bring together the new public duties in relation to UNCRC (as in Part 1) and expectations in relation to the structure and content of these plans and the current SOA guidance so that planning requirements are integrated rather than layered. It is important that this is addressed to all agencies that have an impact. on children and young people including those that impact on their opportunities and prospects as young adults.

5. Reporting duties proposed by the Bill should be accompanied by duties on public bodies, including the Scottish Government, to implement the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. Some requirement to publish funding allocated to children’s services and services for young adults would be helpful in terms of evidencing spend on a preventative agenda in line with the Christie Commission recommendations. The proposal that the Govt has power to set up joint boards is interesting – but achievable? Given the diversity of structures currently this seems to be missing some important steps in the process: ring-fencing spend and asking LAs, Health Boards and other relevant agencies such as Colleges to publicly report spend and outcomes against national targets for children, young people and young adults would potentially achieve more impact?

PART 4: PROVISION OF NAMED PERSONS

6. Information sharing: we welcome the intention, manifest in Section 26 to facilitate appropriate information sharing and overcome the real obstacles to inter-service communication. The provisions to support information sharing must be appropriate, proportionate and timely and protect the child’s right to privacy. It should also protect parents’ rights to privacy, as far as this is consistent with the best interests of the child.

7. We note that there is no reference to seeking consent or otherwise involving the family, and would be concerned that this has the potential to bypass essential communication with the family. While there are situations in which consent should not be sought, there are also many situations in which it should, and others in which informing the family that information is being shared is essential. In situations of domestic abuse, risks can be increased by sharing information without taking account of the dynamics of the abuse – awareness in this area requires training.

8. It is very concerning that the Bill does not resolve the inconsistency in the definition of a parent in education legislation and the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. This has significant implications given the proposals for information sharing between agencies and the prominent role of education practitioners as named persons. It is particularly significant given the parental rights of access as set out in the Pupils Educational Records (Scotland) Regulations 2003. People who would not be recognised as parents in the Children (Scotland) Act will potentially have access to the files held by the Named Person in school.

9. We would welcome a less unconditional approach in the legislation as well as guidance that both clearly removes barriers that reflect agency defensiveness and promotes good practice in relation to the nature of the judgments required when choosing to share information.

10. There is scope for confusion in the overlap between the wide ranging role of the Named Person and the functions of non statutory Lead Professional role (in GIRFEC practice model terms). How this might work well may have to be restated in guidance.

PART 5: CHILD’S PLAN

11. The most important requirement that should be ensured in the legislation is that there should be a single child’s plan. We note that recent guidance in relation to Individualised Educational Programmes make reference to GIRFEC only in passing on the final page – there is a need to underline the requirement to align all services planning for children including schools. The Child’s Plan under this legislation must include and subsume the legal requirements for Co-ordinated Support Plans if the ‘One Child - One Plan’ objective is to be achieved. ‘One Child One Plan’ will require amendment to other legislation if children and families are not to be perpetually engaged in different planning, review and appeal mechanisms. We would like a clear reference to the Child’s Plan (and associated paperwork) being written using the wellbeing indicators. We agree with the comments that this is the phrase that should be used rather than SHANARRI.

12. A single plan in which each agency is responsible for its contributions needs to be supported by accessible, direct and proportionate means of redress. All agencies should be equally accountable under processes of dispute resolution rather than the uneven position (with a focus on Education Services within local authorities) that currently prevails.

13. We think the term “targeted intervention” in legislation is likely to lead to a pseudo-precision and formulaic language in plans. Plans are often not about what is done to children and families and we would like to see language that emphasises partnership with families. Such terminology may be more appropriate in guidance. It would be helpful to make reference to outcome based Child’s Planning – and associated actions and evaluation of these - this would be stronger and more helpful than references to targeted interventions.

14. The attempt to write the legislation without reference to the lead professional has produced awkward text about the managing authority.

15. In paragraph 33.6, we should add the views of Kinship Carers.

16. While acknowledging the value of the holistic concept of well-being and the place of the wellbeing indicators in its definition and in the practice model, the scope of service provider duties in relation to “well-being need” seems much broader than previous duties in relation to children in need. While affirming that children should be afforded appropriately co-operative help at an early stage, there are three concerns here.

- realism/danger of false expectations
- inappropriate levels of information sharing without consent.
- the risk that crystallising expectations about “lower tariff” forms of helpful action in law may generate more time spent on writing and less on doing.
PART 6: EARLY LEARNING AND CHILDCARE

17. We welcome these developments, recognising that there is a need to make adequate financial provision. However, it is not clear that sufficient detailed attention has been given to the full implications of rolling together child care and education. The quality of experience of a young child who’s entitlement is concentrated in a few long days of care and education combined each week will be quite different to that of a child who receives shorter periods of early education throughout the week. Periods spent asleep during long days of childcare cannot equate with a stimulating experience in early education. There is a real danger that this will compound inequality.

18. There needs to be a clear basis to prevent the child’s right under Article 29 becoming obscured in the integration of education with care and both Ministers and public bodies need to be accountable for this. There needs to be clear guidance how the provisions of the ASL Act would be applied in these circumstances to delineate when school education is being provided and when it is not in order to prevent confusion and disputes over responsibilities and duties. The guidance also needs to address the potential inequity if a child’s educational entitlement is subverted by parental needs for child care.

PART 7: CORPORATE PARENTING

19. We welcome that this concept is given a statutory place and that collaborative duties between agencies are reinforced. Again it would be helpful if the reports required could be integrated with the intentions, structure and content of Children’s Services Plans and Single Outcome Agreements, reports required in relation to UNCRC implementation, inspection reports. Strategic and operational managers need to be able to readily cross correlate their programmes and evidence and there is a huge danger of creating layers of report bedding in which the sharpest findings are suffocated.

20. Reporting on Corporate Parenting through the SOA (and its monitoring processes) would place accountability for success with Community Planning Partnership reporting to the Scottish Government.

21. We note there is no direct linkage to earlier sections relating to Getting it Right – we need a consistent emphasis on one child, one plan.

PART 8: AFTERCARE

22. The intentions are positive but the structural changes needed locally to fulfil the extension of duties will be significant. The costs for provision of services to this extended age group are likely to be significant.

PART 9: COUNSELLING SERVICES

23. The intentions are positive and Edinburgh has in the recent past invested heavily already in early years and early intervention with parents, with a coherent strategy and raft of resources.
24. However the term “counselling” has specific connotations and implications in terms of costs; and may not always be the appropriate resource/intervention. For this reason it is questionable whether the term counselling is appropriately used here. A spectrum of guidance, advice, support and intervention may be appropriate depending on expressed and assessed needs. Counselling is one avenue. As well as being too narrow, the term counselling might actually be detrimental, it can carry stigma, and it doesn't reflect the kind of response that is required to achieve the systemic changes often needed in order to sustain families and sustain children in families?

PART 10: SUPPORT FOR KINSHIP CARE

25. While we recognise the intention in this part of the Bill to enhance supports for children in kinship care leading to a positive impact on families and children with comparable needs to Looked After Kinship Placements, we are concerned about the significantly increased costs.

26. There is a subtle combination of duty (to provide assistance) and discretion (to provided different forms and levels of assistance) in here which would require transparent local criteria and practice.

PART 13: GENERAL

27. We welcome the inclusion of the Assessment of Wellbeing – it is positive that this is now embedded.

28. The relationship and fit between “well-being”, “in need” and “welfare” must be thought through in guidance to avoid layering and confusion. We believe it is possible for these terms to be rendered congruent.

1. Kinship Care Allowance was introduced to give some financial support to family members (other than biological parents).

2. From Clackmannanshire Council figures there were 17 formal carers when the scheme was first introduced in 2007, there are now 38.

3. There are approximately 53 kinship carers known to the Clacks Kinship Carers Group, some of whom are informal kinship carers and some who have a formal arrangement that includes the social work and educational psychologist services in Clackmannanshire.

4. We are asking for adequately resourced central funding from the Scottish Government to be made available for kinship carers – equal to foster carers – across Scotland – not the post code lottery we are currently experiencing across council boundaries.

5. The need to extend the age of the ‘child’ to at least 25 years. This vulnerable group of ‘looked after children’ require additional support as they move from secondary school onto college and university and into work. Reference: See response from Stirling/Clackmannanshire Councils to the September 2012 Consultation on the SG Proposal for a Children and Young People Bill question 23.

6. There is a crucial need for more joined up working between social work and health services, and a recognition to ensure that ‘through and after care’ is crucial for young people, with adequately resourced respite care for both child/children and their kinship carers and encourage better multi-agency working with the ‘looked after child’ at the centre.

7. I hope this gives you some indication of the growing number of young lives affected by the loss of direct parenthood, and in their interest, the need for equity and esteem for kinship carers with foster carers.

Introduction

1. Cl@n childlaw is a unique legal advocacy service delivering free legal advice and representation to children and young people, who would otherwise have found it very difficult or impossible to access the legal help that they require. We help those up to the age of 18, or 21 if they have been looked after children. We deliver specialist training in child law and contribute to policy development in relation to the realisation of rights for children and young people across Scotland through our evidence based Policy Development Unit. In our evidence, we have concentrated on specific parts of the Bill on which we feel that we have a particular contribution to make. However, there are certain matters which we wish to comment on which are of general application throughout the Bill:

- We are extremely disappointed that no child rights impact assessment (CRIA) has been undertaken in respect of the Bill. A CRIA would identify and measure the effect of the legislation on children and young people, and would be a valuable resource to the Education and Culture Committee in their consideration of the Bill.

- The Bill does not provide sufficiently for participation and engagement of children and young people in many parts, in relation to, for example, planning and delivery of services and the role of the corporate parent. There is insufficient focus on duties to promote the rights of children and young people throughout the Bill.

- There is a lack of coherence across legislation. In many respects, for example, it is difficult to see how the provisions of the Bill mesh with those of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Part 1 – Rights of Children

2. We welcome proposed legislation which strengthens the position and heightens awareness of the UNCRC in Scotland. Reference is made to our responses to the Consultation on the Rights of Children and Young People Bill¹ and the Consultation on the Children and Young People Bill.² We wish to see further realisation of children’s rights in Scotland, and welcome the Scottish Government’s statement, that “the heart of our approach is the aim of making real the rights of children and young people.” We note the policy objectives of the current Bill include “ensuring [children’s rights] are respected across the public sector” (para 2) and that “The Scottish Ministers view the Bill as an important opportunity to make rights more ‘real’ for children and young people in Scotland. This means empowering children themselves to exercise their rights.” (para 45)

3. To date, the UNCRC has not been incorporated into UK or Scots law. Such a treaty ratified by the United Kingdom is, however, binding on the United Kingdom as a party to the treaty. Article 4 of the UNCRC is in the following terms: “States Parties shall undertake all appropriate legislative, administrative, and other measures for the implementation of the rights recognised in the present Convention.” In a letter dated 29th August 2012, the Minister of Community Safety and Legal Affairs stated: “In Scotland, we are committed to enshrining the principles of the Convention into domestic law and policy wherever possible. However, we also believe that incorporation is best achieved on a case by case basis, and are not of the view that wholesale incorporation of the UNCRC into domestic law represents the best way to progress our approach to children’s rights at this time.” Such an approach has, however, led to inconsistent implementation of the UNCRC, with correspondingly inconsistent outcomes for children and young people.

4. Against that background, we are disappointed that the proposed duties on Scottish Ministers in section 1(1), to “keep under consideration” how to secure better effect of the UNCRC, and to take appropriate steps to do so, are little more than a reflection of the existing international obligations of the state (see Article 2 UNCRC).

5. It may be thought that judicial review of Scottish Ministers’ decisions will be slightly more likely, or easier, in light of the proposed section 1(1) duties. However, our view is that it may already be possible to challenge decisions and actings of the Scottish Ministers which are not in accordance with the provisions of the UNCRC, by means of judicial review, on the basis that the UNCRC gives rise to legitimate expectations. No other means for legal redress for children and young people facing violations of their rights are proposed in the Bill. The proposals in Part 2 do not amount to legal redress. There are significant disadvantages in relying on judicial review as the only remedy. In any event, children experience difficulties generally in obtaining legal aid.

6. There is no proposal in the Bill for any systematic consideration of securing better effect of the UNCRC, leaving consideration and the taking of any steps at the Ministers’ discretion. It is not proposed that there are any duties on public authorities, other than reporting duties in section 2. Those reporting duties would allow public authorities to report that they had taken no steps towards furthering the UNCRC, without any sanction. We would welcome the use of child rights impact assessments across decision making processes.

7. In conclusion, whilst we welcome any proposal which has the effect of strengthening the position of the UNCRC in Scotland, we do not think that the duties in Part 1 go far enough. We would strongly support any proposal whereby the provisions of the UNCRC were incorporated into Scots Law and were thereby directly actionable in Scottish courts. Clan childlaw would like to see duties imposed on Scottish Ministers and on all public bodies which concentrate on both process and outcomes which will make children’s rights real in Scotland. The imposition of such duties would be clear legislative realisation of the policy objectives for the Bill, which is unlikely to be achieved by means of the current proposals.

8. We welcome the duty set out at section 1(2) of the Bill, which makes the existing duties under Article 42 of the UNCRC explicit in legislation. We would like to see some indication of how it is proposed to measure the performance of this duty. The performance of the duty could also be strengthened by a commitment to the placing of children’s rights at the heart of the school curriculum, possibly by the national adoption of the Rights Respecting Schools initiative.

9. We are of the view that the Children and Young People Bill represents a clear opportunity for the actual realisation of children’s rights in Scotland, rather than merely a restatement of international obligations which already exist. We would like to see a more ambitious programme of actual realisation of children’s rights in the proposed legislation. We would strongly support any proposal whereby the provisions of the UNCRC were implemented in Scots Law and were thereby directly actionable in Scottish courts. However, we acknowledge that some measures of realisation could be achieved through various legislative provisions, although our clear preference in the longer term is for full incorporation of the UNCRC.

10. Against that background, we would, at the minimum, like to see the core principles of the UNCRC (Non-discrimination, Protection, Development & Participation) on the face of the Bill, along with the following specific measures:

• The best interests of the child to be the paramount consideration in all actions undertaken by Scottish Ministers and public bodies concerning children, unless it is necessary to make a decision inconsistent with the paramountcy of the child’s welfare, in which case the best interests of the child should be a primary consideration rather than the paramount consideration.

• The child who is capable of forming his or her own views has the right to express those views freely in all matters affecting the child, the views of the child being given due weight in accordance with the child’s age and maturity.

• All children have the right to advocacy services to assist them in the expression of those views. We would also welcome the registration of Child Advocacy Services who are required to adhere to Minimum Standards and a Code of Practice.

• Independent complaints procedures are established to enable children whose rights have been violated to seek redress. Legal Aid is made available to children to enable them to pursue remedies in court. The restrictions on financial eligibility of children, introduced by regulations on 31st January 2011, are removed.

• A child who is not living with a parent, or who is not living with a sibling, has the right to maintain personal relations and direct contact with the parent or with the sibling on a regular basis. Where a child is looked after, the local authority has a duty to promote, on a regular basis, personal relations and direct contact between the child and the parent, or between the child and the sibling. Appropriate provision is made for the child to apply to the court or children’s hearing for an order for, or condition of contact.

• The Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 is amended to abolish Antisocial Behaviour Orders for 12 to 15 year olds. These orders are rarely used.

• Section 51 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 is repealed. Parental physical punishment is an assault. The concept of “justifiable assault” is removed from legislation. Children are given the same protection from assault as adults.

• The age of criminal responsibility is raised from 8 to 12.

Part 2 – Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland

11. We broadly welcome the proposed extension of the Commissioner’s powers. We note that the Government considers that it is “highly likely that any investigation process will be more accessible and child friendly than a judicial process”\(^\text{10}\). That may be so. However, no effective redress will be provided by means of extended powers of investigation. We would rather see the estimated extra expenditure of

\(^\text{10}\) Para 54, Policy Memorandum
£162,000 p.a.\textsuperscript{11} directed towards providing equitable access to legal redress, by making legal aid more readily available for children and young people, thereby securing better actual realisation of their rights.

\textbf{Part 4 – Provision of Named Persons}

12. The focus of the Bill appears to be more on information sharing among professionals than on the service the named person should provide to the child of young person. We would welcome a strengthening of the duties on the named person in relation to the rights of the child.

13. We have very grave concerns about the proposals on information sharing contained in the draft Bill. In the original Consultation, it was envisaged that “information sharing would occur within existing legal frameworks.”\textsuperscript{12} There has been no consultation on the proposals now contained at sections 26 and 27. Effective pre-legislative scrutiny has not taken place.\textsuperscript{13} The Privacy Impact Assessment took place before the current proposals were made.

14. A child has a right to confidentiality. That right is central to decisions to share information. Information given in confidence should not generally be shared, subject to certain limited exceptions: (1) if the child gives consent; or (2) if there is no consent, only if that lack of consent can be overridden in the public interest; or (3) if there is a legal obligation to breach confidentiality. The public interest will include where there are child protection concerns, that is, a risk of significant harm. Should the current proposals be implemented, we have the following concerns:

- Children and young people will be reluctant to access and engage with confidential services if they feel that information is likely to be shared without their consent.
- Professionals will be likely to share more information than is necessary and proportionate, in breach of children’s privacy rights under Article 8 ECHR and Article 16 UNCRC.
- Decisions about wellbeing of children and likelihood of harm or significant harm to children will be flawed, and lacking in transparency. Important information will be lost amongst the “white noise” of large quantities of information being shared. Children and their families will not be consulted fully on what information should be shared and with whom. Vulnerable children will be placed at risk.

\textsuperscript{11} Para 34, Table 7, Financial Memorandum

\textsuperscript{13} Para 2.3, Guidance on Public Bills: \url{http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S3_Bills/GuidanceonPublicBills.pdf}
• No mention is made of consideration of the child’s views or of the child being asked for consent to share.

• The proposed duties include no threshold at which information must be shared with and through the named person. Information will be shared based on a subjective consideration by the information holder that sharing is relevant in order to promote, support or safeguard the wellbeing of the young person. The current proposal might be interpreted to legislate for the sharing of any information about any child or young people.

• There is nothing in current legislation that prevents proportionate and relevant information being shared about children and young people where it is in their best interests to protect them. Problems with information sharing can be successfully addressed though training and clear practical guidance for professionals. Evaluation of GIRFEC pathfinder suggests that processes around information sharing and the named person led to improvements in consistency and quality of information shared, with no concerns arising around existing legal frameworks.

Part 8 – Aftercare

15. We are disappointed that the proposed amendments to section 29 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 do not impose stronger duties on local authorities to support previously looked after children up to the age of 26. For those under 19, they still have to be looked after at or after reaching school leaving age. The onus is still on the young person over 19 to apply to the local authority. That depends on the young person being aware of their right to apply. Much appears to be left to the discretion of the local authority, after assessment. “Eligible needs” are not yet defined. We would like to see a much stronger commitment to the support of this most vulnerable group of young people.

"In the areas in which GIRFEC is well implemented, there have been significant improvements in information sharing, and professionals are now confident about what needs to be shared with whom and how that is to be done."

Key messages:

- In considering the Stage 1 report, we urge the Education and Culture Committee to reflect on the range of written and oral evidence given on the information sharing provisions included in the Bill. This evidence highlighted that:

  Procedures followed by Scottish Government to assess the impact of clauses 26 and 27 are flawed. Clauses 26 and 27 are unnecessary and are likely to operate against their policy intentions.
  The balance between a need to share information with the child’s right to privacy is not struck.

- The Information Commissioner has stated that the Bill as currently drafted 'does not comply with [data protection] principles' and has recommended redrafting of [clause] 26 and the removal of [clause] 27.

- Good information sharing is already taking place, enabling the Named Person role to function as envisaged and improving outcomes for children and young people. The role of the Named Person has been stated to be a key element in the success of the Highland Pathfinder Project. This is taking place within existing legislation.

- There is no need for additional legislation.

The Education and Culture Committee should recommend the removal of clauses 26 and 27 from the Bill.

What makes a good law?

- It addresses a need and has a worthwhile purpose
- It is clear, sufficiently precise, coherent, so that it is readily understood
- It is enforceable and effective
- It minimises negative outcomes and unintended consequences
- Its provisions must be compatible with provisions of Article 8 ECHR

Necessity for legislation?

- There is nothing in current law that prevents proportionate and relevant information being shared about children and young people where it is in their best interests to protect them.4
- Problems with information sharing can be successfully addressed though training and clear practical guidance for professionals.
- Evaluation of GIRFEC pathfinder indicates that good information sharing enabling the Named Person to function as envisaged led to improvements in consistency and quality of information shared, with no concerns arising about existing legal frameworks.

How is Article 8 applied in relation to personal data sharing provisions?

European Court of Human Rights case about disclosure of medical records:

“In determining whether the … … measures were "necessary in a democratic society", the Court will consider whether, in the light of the case as a whole, the reasons adduced to justify them were relevant and sufficient and whether the measures were proportionate to the legitimate aims pursued…

In this connection, the Court will take into account that the protection of personal data, not least medical data, is of fundamental importance to a person's enjoyment of his or her right to respect for private and family life as guaranteed by Article 8 of the Convention. Respecting the confidentiality of health data is a vital principle in the legal systems of all the Contracting Parties to the Convention. It is crucial not only to respect the sense of privacy of a patient but also to preserve his or her confidence in the medical profession and in the health services in general…

The interests in protecting the confidentiality of such information will therefore weigh heavily in the balance in determining whether the interference was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. Such interference cannot be compatible with Article 8 of the Convention unless it is justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest.”5

Concerns raised in evidence to the Education Committee relating to clauses 26 and 27:

PROCEDURE followed by Scottish Government:

- No Consultation on Information sharing proposals
- No Child Rights Impact Assessment carried out
- No up-to-date Privacy Impact Assessment

PRINCIPLES:

The right balance between the need to share information with the child’s right to privacy under Article 16 UNCRC and Article 8 ECHR is not struck. It is doubtful that the provisions of clauses 26 and 27 are compatible with Article 8 of ECHR. What is proposed is a statutory duty (i.e., an obligation to share information, which omits certain provisions fundamental to striking the right balance:

- Consent of anyone, including child
- The views of the child
- The best interests of the child
- Proportionality
- Respect for the child’s right to confidentiality

The consequences of failing to strike the right balance include:

a. Information will be shared based on a subjective consideration by the information holder that sharing might be relevant in order to promote, support or safeguard the wellbeing of the young person, as defined using SHANARRI indicators, which is likely to result in unnecessary and disproportionate sharing of information.
"The concern that our members have is that, if a woolly approach is taken and not enough guidance is given, they will, by default and in order to cover people’s backs, end up sharing information that is not necessarily needed."

John Stevenson, UNISON

b. Children and young people will be reluctant to access and engage with confidential services if they feel that information is likely to be shared without their consent and without protection of their right to confidentiality.⁹

> "The worst section in the bill is section 27. If you manage to strike it out and leave everything else, you will have achieved quite a lot."
> Professor Kenneth Norrie, University of Strathclyde¹⁰

PRACTICALITIES:

- “White Noise”: Important information about vulnerable children will be lost due to the large quantities of information being shared. This will lead to vulnerable children being placed at risk. Already this can be a problem, where information is shared but not acted upon.

- Training of Professionals: The Scottish Government is not intending to put in place a national training programme to support the Named Person provisions. There is a need for consistent and adequate training to ensure proportionate information sharing, taking account of children’s rights.

- Lack of capacity: of public bodies if information is over-shared, especially at a time of ongoing funding cuts within bodies carrying out the Named Person role.

CONCLUSIONS

- The provisions in clauses 26 and 27 do not meet the criteria for good law.

- There is an imbalance between children’s rights and the requirement to share information.

- The performance improvements from the Highland Pathfinder show that the policy intentions of clauses 26 and 27 can be - and already have been - met within existing information sharing legislation.¹²

- There is no need for additional legislation. Clauses 26 and 27 of the Bill are not necessary.

- To meet the policy intentions of the Bill, there need to be clear guidance and training. This will give confidence to practitioners and will support them in making sound professional judgments about appropriate and proportionate information sharing.

Education and Culture Committee
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

CLIC Sargent

Introduction

1. CLIC Sargent is the UK’s leading cancer charity for children and young people, and their families. We provide clinical, practical and emotional support to help them cope with cancer and get the most out of life.

2. The Children and Young People’s Bill proposes a number of significant opportunities to improve the provision and support available for children and young people, including those with cancer. In particular, we welcome the Scottish Government’s ambition to put children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services and to promote better coordination between them.

3. CLIC Sargent believes that the Bill offers some positive opportunities for children and young people with cancer, in particular the parts that will put elements of Getting it Right for Every Child (GIRFEC) into statute; for example, the named person for every child, the Child’s Plan and the new joint services plan between local authorities and health (parts 3-5 and 13). This response will highlight CLIC Sargent’s views on these parts of the Bill.

Summary of key points

4. Uncoordinated services for children and young people with cancer can result in a lack of support when needed. It is critical that all practice affecting children and young people with cancer is joined up. CLIC Sargent therefore welcomes the proposed duties on local authorities and health boards to work together to produce, deliver and fund coordinated service planning.

5. Effective communication is a key issue for children and young people with cancer and their families. Parents have told us that where communication works well, they felt their child received the educational and emotional support they needed; where communication was poor, parents often said they felt let down by the system.

6. We welcome the duty for all children and young people to have a ‘Named Person’ to help them manage information and aid communication between different agencies; however, we seek further clarity about their exact roles and responsibilities and where accountability will lie.

7. CLIC Sargent believes all children and young people with cancer should receive the support that they need to succeed. It is important that the needs of children and young people are assessed early and that a formal plan is put in place to help them access multi-agency support. We believe that the Child’s Plan and the broad definition of wellbeing is a positive step in helping to secure this appropriate support.
Background

8. Approximately 1,600 children aged up to 15 years and 2,000 young people aged 16 to 24 are diagnosed with cancer each year in the UK.1 This includes almost 200 15-24 year olds and 120 0-14 year olds in Scotland. CLIC Sargent’s current campaign is largely focussed on the impact of cancer on children and young people’s education. Fundamental to CLIC Sargent’s work is the belief that children and young people with cancer should be enabled to achieve their potential and that quality support in education is a crucial element to achieving this.

9. With nine in 10 children telling us that their cancer diagnosis and treatment made a difference to their school life,2 we know that children and young people with cancer can face a number of barriers and challenges in keeping up with school work, feeling included in school life and fulfilling their potential.

10. Unfortunately a cancer diagnosis means that these children and young people often experience significant disruption to their family life and learning, with treatment sometimes lasting as long as two to three years. Even if a pupil has been successfully treated for cancer and has gone into remission, there are several reasons why there may still be genuine and long lasting late effects.

11. Children with cancer can face a number of barriers and challenges in keeping up with school work, maintaining friendships and feeling included in school life. Some children who return to school will need significant or permanent additional support and may not be able to return to previous attainment levels. CLIC Sargent wants to see a Scottish system of additional support that enables children diagnosed with cancer to receive the support they need quickly, and for as long as they need it, so that cancer does not unnecessarily impact on their education or their social and personal development. Unfortunately our research has shown that this support is not always put in place at present – one in three CLIC Sargent nurses told us they do not think that there is sufficient educational support for primary school aged children with cancer when returning to school.3

12. Communication was a key issue identified in our 2012 research – communication between hospitals and primary school, as well as between teachers and parents. Where communication worked well, parents said they felt their child received the educational and emotional support they needed; where communication was poor, parents often said they felt let down by the system. In many cases we found that schools and local authorities apply policies and practices in different ways, which can make navigating the system a real challenge.

13. We see the Children and Young People’s Bill, in particular parts 3-5 and 13, as an opportunity to improve the support available to children and young people in education by improving communication between agencies, and developing a more joined up approach to planning and delivering services.

3 ibid

14. The following parts of this paper highlight CLIC Sargent’s thoughts on specific areas of the Bill and the potential impact and benefits for children and young people with cancer.

Children’s services planning (Part 3)

15. All the agencies involved in supporting children and young people with cancer – including their school, hospital school and local education authority – are expected to collaborate effectively to ensure that the child experiences a joined-up service. However, CLIC Sargent research undertaken in 2012\(^4\) found that communication between hospital and home education providers and a child or young person’s home school could be much improved.

16. Our _No child with cancer left out_ report shows that improving communication between education professionals, and the family can considerably lessen the impact of cancer on a child or young person’s education. Good communication, for example, can enable a child with cancer to keep in touch with classmates when they are absent from school, allow for a smoother transition when they return to school and help parents feel empowered and informed.

17. We warmly welcome the Bill’s aim to ensure that public bodies work together to plan and deliver services to increase children and young people’s wellbeing. In particular, the proposed duties on local authorities and health boards to work together to produce, deliver and fund three year services plans. We agree that this must be focussed on improving outcomes for children and young people and welcome the recognition that a child or young person’s well-being depends on the whole spectrum of their needs being identified early. Children and young people’s cancer is rare, which makes this especially important as some agencies and professionals may not have supported the needs of young cancer patients before. This holistic approach can help ensure that they receive high quality provision and effective advice and guidance.

18. We believe the duty to cooperate and the proposal for the new joint plans to cover every children’s service, which has a significant effect on the wellbeing of children and young people, are also progressive ways forward. This will need the involvement of all the agencies involved in a child or young person’s cancer journey.

Named person service (Part 4)

19. CLIC Sargent welcomes having a Named Person for every child and young person from birth to 18 to increase accountability and ease of information sharing. Managing information and aiding communication between different agencies can be bewildering and can add to the stress and strains of a cancer diagnosis.

\(^4\) _ibid_
20. Having a Named Person could increase the level of communication between the hospital/home education provider, the parents or the young person themselves, and their school. CLIC Sargent knows that good quality communication can help build parents’ confidence when their child is absent from school and when they are preparing for their child’s return.

21. In some schools communication can be very good one parent told us: “My daughter’s school was amazing. We had a great support network throughout the school. We felt very confident when she returned I knew everyone was watching out for her.” However, this isn’t everyone’s experience. Another parent said: “It’s been a complete battle from the start with the school. I feel very bitter at the lack of understanding and support we’ve received. We had to suggest solutions every step of the way. Even when we asked about whether the local authority could supply a home teacher they denied any knowledge of such a service.”

22. 5.4 Many of the young people we spoke to told in 2013 CLIC Sargent (2013) us that their school didn’t communicate with the hospital school they went to and that there were often delays in sending appropriate work. This lack of communication meant that some young people struggled to complete test papers or work sent to them from their school because they had missed out on the relevant learning.

23. In some circumstances, missing out on learning might mean that some children and young people have to retake an academic year. Young people approaching a pivotal time in their education are very aware of the impact that cancer has had on their ability to achieve at school, and reaching their potential becomes very important to them. Our 2013 research found that some young people have been deeply affected by the impact that cancer has had on their ability to achieve the grades they were aiming for. One young person told us “I could have been so much better if I didn’t have cancer, but now I will never know.”

24. Worryingly, more than one in three parents have told us that their child had experienced bullying or teasing from their peers because of their cancer diagnosis and treatment. One parent told us “schools should educate school pupils about childhood cancer to reduce the stigma associated with it.” We hope that having a Named Person for every child and young person will mean that schools will take more responsibility for increasing awareness and understanding of childhood cancer.

25. We believe that having a Named Person to help children and young people with cancer and their families’ access services, provide information and support and to discuss and address concerns with other agencies will help young people and their families to better understand and access the support they need.

26. It is important that children and young people and their families always know about the role of the Named Person, and how to contact them. We do, however, seek greater clarity about the role and responsibility of the Named Person and how any additional demand on professionals will be resourced.

Child's Plan (Part 5)

27. It is important that the needs of children and young people are assessed early and that a formal plan is put in place to help them access the multi-agency support they need. Even if a child or young person has been successfully treated for cancer and has gone into remission, they may experience significant and long-lasting late effects. Studies show that survivors of childhood cancer may perform less well in education compared to their peers, although lower attainment is mostly found among survivors of particular cancers, for example, brain tumours and leukaemia.6

28. Young people who took part in our No teenager with cancer left out study suggested that a formal assessment of needs on a pupil’s return to school would help. Otherwise, if they appear ‘normal’ the school assumes they are fine and expects them to pick up where they left off. The question of how effectively children and young people’s needs are assessed and planned for on their return to school when they have had cancer is critical to the success of reintegration.

29. The assessment of children’s needs when they return to school – and whether they require a formal plan – was also a major issue for many of the parents and children we have spoken to. In our 2012 survey parents said they thought their child required a more rigorous assessment of their needs when they returned to school. “They need a proper assessment of their needs, rather than a ‘one size fits all’ approach,” one parent told us.

30. We therefore welcome the intention for the Bill to put a duty on local authorities to produce a coordinated, needs driven ‘Child’s Plan’ for every child and young person who needs one and that there will be a single planning process to help those children and young people who need additional support where the arrangement of a range of services is required. We would, however, like further clarification on which children will be entitled to a plan and how their needs will be assessed. We also seek further information on how the Child’s Plan will interact with the Coordinated Support Plan.

Wellbeing (Part 13 and S.73)

31. We welcome Scotland’s inclusive approach to create a holistic statutory definition of well-being to ensure that all children and young people who require it receive the support they need.

CLIC Sargent
26 July 2013

1. Key points

- Recognition of the scope of children’s services provided by the voluntary sector

- The children’s services planning proposals are welcome but should place a stronger duty on statutory partners to work collaboratively with voluntary sector providers and others

- The Bill and/or guidance needs to clarify the link between children’s services planning, and strategic and locality planning by ‘integration authorities’ proposed in the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, and with community planning partnerships

- The Bill should provide for independent scrutiny of children’s services planning by the Care Inspectorate/Health Improvement Scotland and other relevant bodies

- Information-sharing in connection with the Named Person service must recognise the differences between statutory and voluntary sector providers

- The child’s plan sections must recognise the key role of voluntary sector providers, enabling participation where appropriate in the planning, management and review process

2. CCPS is pleased to have the opportunity to provide a written submission to the Committee in connection with its Stage 1 consideration of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. We welcome the Government’s policy objectives of enhancing children’s rights and improving services, among others, and the Bill forms a significant part of the matrix of different initiatives underway to achieve these aims.

3. Many of our members will be making individual submissions to the committee with respect to their specific areas of interest, their mission and their charitable objectives. This submission, in line with the aims and objectives of CCPS, focuses on issues of importance to voluntary organisations in their capacity as providers of children’s services. In that regard, we begin by returning briefly to evidence we submitted to the Committee in June 2012 during its review of the scope of children’s services in the voluntary sector. We think this is useful background information for the Scottish Parliament to have when considering both the general principles of the Bill, as well as the practical impact.

The scope of children’s services in the voluntary sector

4. The voluntary sector makes a significant contribution to children’s services in Scotland. More than a third of all care and support services registered with the Care Inspectorate are provided by voluntary organisations; approximately 27% of all registered children’s services (excluding childminding: 11% including childminding) are provided by the voluntary sector.

5. Over 20% of the social services workforce in Scotland in respect of registered children’s services is employed by voluntary organisations (rising to 23% excluding childminding).

6. These figures show that the voluntary sector makes a particularly significant contribution, proportionally, in respect of day care, and of residential child care, fostering and adoption (in other words, care and support for looked after children). In addition, the voluntary sector is a leading provider of care and support to disabled children and their families in their own homes.

Comments on the Bill as it affects service providers

Part 3 - Children’s Services Planning

7. The proposals in the Bill for service planning build on the provisions in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 but appear to fall short of the level of collaborative strategic planning that is being developed in the context of the integration of adult health and social care. In the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, integration partnerships must establish consultation groups (that include the voluntary sector, carers and users, in addition to the statutory partners) to jointly work on strategic planning. This is a significant step up from the ‘duty to consult’ requirements in the Children’s Bill, not least because it involves a range of stakeholders (including voluntary sector providers) from the beginning of the planning process, and includes both a set of principles and a structure for the process.

The development of joint strategic commissioning in the context of adult health and social care integration is seen as having real potential for improving the involvement of voluntary sector providers in the planning and design of services, as well as reorienting investment and activity to improve outcomes for service users. We would like the Committee to consider how the children’s services planning provisions can be strengthened to reflect a similar approach.

Interestingly, while there is only a basic ‘duty to consult’ with voluntary sector service providers, there appears to be a ‘duty’ placed on voluntary and independent sector providers, social landlords and others (in s.10(6)) to ‘meet any reasonable requests to participate or to contribute to the preparation of the plan’. We clearly welcome wide participation in the planning process (as noted above), but we query the extent to which this legislation can place ‘duties’ on non-statutory bodies. Thus we would like to see clarification of the meaning of this provision in relation to both the policy aim and the legal impact. As set out above, we consider the approach taken in the context of the Joint Working Bill, (where duties are placed on statutory bodies to undertake a process of joint planning that includes voluntary sector providers and others) to be a good model.

Related to the Joint Working Bill, we think clarification is required about the relationship between the children’s services planning process and the different planning processes envisaged for integration authorities, particularly where those authorities decide to include children’s services within their partnerships, as well as in relation to community planning partnerships. This may be a matter for clarification in guidance but as it currently reads, there could be duplication of planning processes; and as noted above, there is also a significant difference in the process of involvement of voluntary sector providers and others, as between the different processes.

8. In the context of involvement in strategic planning, it is notable that the financial memorandum anticipates no extra costs as a result of these planning proposals based on the assumption that local authorities already have a duty to produce integrated children’s services plans. Unfortunately, there is no consideration given to the costs that might come with wider participation in the planning process by voluntary sector providers and others. We think that there will be potential costs to voluntary sector providers, not just from engagement with the planning process but also in connection with the duties to provide information, advice and assistance (e.g. ss.14, 26, and elsewhere in the Bill) and that this should be reflected in the financial memorandum.

9. With respect to monitoring and scrutiny, we note that the local authority and each relevant health board will have a duty (s.13) to report annually, setting out how their aims have been achieved and what the outcomes are (referring to outcomes that will be prescribed by Scottish Ministers, and linked to the idea of wellbeing and the SHANARRI indicators). We suggest that the Committee consider the advantages of including a role for the Care Inspectorate (CI) and Health Improvement Scotland (HIS), and other relevant scrutiny bodies, specifically in relation to the children’s services planning process. This would mirror similar developments in relation to the commissioning of integrated services for adults. The integration of adult health and social care proposals contained in the Joint Working Bill also include a duty on local partnerships to report annually on their strategic plans. But in addition, the policy memorandum makes it clear that the CI and HIS will be required to scrutinise the joint commissioning process (although this is not reflected in the bill itself; something that CCPS will be seeking to address during the parliamentary process). In light of recent CI/HIS joint children’s services inspection reports, which identified much room for improvement in respect of strategic planning, there is clearly a need for this kind of scrutiny/improvement support in the context of children’s services planning and in our view, this ought to be set out in legislation rather than remaining a matter of policy.

10. S.14 introduces a general duty to comply with reasonable requests for information, advice or assistance from the local authority or health board in exercising their functions under this part. This duty applies to ‘other service providers’ and also to organisations representing users, voluntary and independent sector providers, social landlords and others (as defined in s.10(1 and 2)). There is an exemption provision which allows a person to refuse if they consider it would be incompatible with any of their ‘duties’; or ‘unduly prejudice the exercise of any function.’ As noted above, we are unsure about the extent to which legislation can placed duties of this nature on independent voluntary organisations; we are also concerned that the wording appears open to wide interpretation and we believe it would benefit from tighter drafting and clear guidance so that voluntary sector providers can clearly understand the circumstances in which requests for information can be refused.

Part 4 – Named Person

11. The named person provisions will have an impact on voluntary sector providers most directly as a result of the s. 26 duty on service providers (including voluntary sector providers) to share information. This section highlights the tension between the child’s right to confidentiality and the practical necessity of sharing information between different services, including between the voluntary sector and statutory sector. As currently drafted, it appears to give power to local authorities and health boards to access a very wide spectrum of information, some of which may be commercially sensitive for providers or which might raise issues of confidentiality in relation to children or adults who are receiving services from voluntary sector providers.

12. In particular, clauses (3) and (4) appear to relate to any information which may possibly affect the wellbeing of a child, rather than to the named person. These are very broad information sharing responsibilities and could be interpreted to cover almost everything held by a voluntary sector provider.

13. We believe that this section needs to strike a careful balance between access and confidentiality, and to recognise the important differences between voluntary and statutory sector service providers. As such, we would ask the Committee to clarify its scope and to recommend the necessary drafting changes to achieve greater clarity.

Part 5 - Content of Child’s Plan

14. This part sets out the circumstances in which a responsible authority is required to produce a child’s plan, what it should contain, and how it should be developed. The plan must state the wellbeing need identified by the relevant authority which has triggered the need for a plan and contain a statement of the ‘targeted intervention’ required to be provided to the child (s.32). Targeted interventions do not appear to include non-statutory services – they are defined as a service provided by a relevant authority – which in turn is defined as the health board, local authority or directing authority (e.g. grant-aided schools).

15. In respect of the management and review of a child’s plan (s.37), there is a requirement for the managing authority to consult with other statutory providers and the child and parents. There is no mention of consultation with voluntary sector providers who may be providing the ‘targeted intervention’.
16. We suggest that it would be sensible, given the extent of voluntary sector service provision for children and young people, for the child’s plan to include services provided by the voluntary sector, where appropriate. And equally, for there to be consultation with voluntary sector providers, in the context of the management and review of the plan, where they are involved in providing a ‘targeted intervention’ set out in the child’s plan. We would ask the Committee to explore whether this could best be achieved by amending the definition of ‘targeted intervention’ in the Bill or through regulation or guidance.

17. In a similar vein, we would like to make one final point about the corporate parent sections of the Bill. Corporate parent is defined to include statutory bodies only. However, many voluntary sector providers take on a lead role in supporting children and young people in circumstances that could be considered to be the equivalent of the corporate parent role. We would welcome clarification of the position of voluntary sector providers in such circumstances.

About CCPS

18. CCPS is the coalition of care and support providers in Scotland. Its membership comprises more than 70 of the most substantial care and support organisations in the voluntary sector, including the leading sector providers of services for children, young people and their families. Collectively, CCPS children’s services members:

- support more than 150,000 children, young people and families in Scotland
- employ 5,800 staff
- manage a combined total income in Scotland of over £160 million, of which more than 80% relates to publicly-funded service provision.

19. Services provided cover the range of services to children, young people and families including early years provision; family and parenting support; residential child care and other support for looked after children; support for children and young people who have experienced abuse and neglect; support for disabled children and young people and their families; young people with mental health problems; and services for young offenders.

Introduction

1. The College of Occupational Therapists (COT) welcomes the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. We do wish to highlight some areas within the aims of the Bill and raise awareness of the role occupational therapists play particularly in relation to the following 2 aims.

2. Ensure that children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services by placing new duties on the Scottish Ministers and the public sector and by increasing the powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People;

3. Improve the way services support children and families by promoting cooperation between services, with the child at the centre.

4. At present in Scotland children and young peoples’ occupational therapy (OT) services are particularly disjointed making the lines of commissioning very difficult.

5. OTs who work with children may work in local authorities, NHS acute and community services, some specialist schools, the third sector, mental health services, criminal justice services and independent practice.

6. The College is aware that there continue to be a number of adult social care services that also provide occupational therapy assessments and arrange for support and provision of services for children, young people and their families especially in relation to equipment and adaptations.

7. Occupational therapists working in services develop specific expertise and skills. They have access to professional and management supervision that is child-focussed and ensures high quality services are available. Occupational therapists develop effective links with other children’s services in health, education, and social care, including early years, short-term breaks, and schools, in order to provide high quality support to children, young people and their families. This is more difficult if occupational therapists assessing children are provided from adult social care services.

8. Occupational therapists are the only profession where activity (task, performance and/or process focused) is the main method of intervention. Occupational therapists work holistically and are outcome focused. They have multi-dimensional training that addresses the physical, psychosocial, sensory processing, developmental levels and needs of children and young people. Occupational therapists have specific skills in activity analysis, problem-solving, orthotics, group dynamics, sensory integration, visual perception, and the impact of disability and mental illness upon occupational functioning.

9. Occupational therapists provide a range of interventions for different conditions to help improve children’s:

- Functional ability which may be cognitive, physical or emotional (or a combination).
- Co-ordination
- Physical, sensory, intellectual and or psychosocial difficulties. Interventions are focused on occupational performance areas of age-appropriate personal activities of daily living (washing, dressing, feeding, toileting, personal grooming, and mobility, seating), school access and engagement (e.g. handwriting, attention, copying from the blackboard, participation in PE); and developmental play,
- Social relationships and community living skills (e.g. road awareness, shopping, meal preparation, use of public transport).
- Environment through the provision of equipment and /or adaptations. Assessments take into account: gross motor, fine motor, visual, perceptual, cognitive, psychosocial skills, and the environment. The needs of the carer are also considered with respect to moving & handling, transportation, and safe management of the child in all their environments, including their carer’s emotional well being.
- The role of Child and Adolescent Mental Health Teams (CAMHS) within early identification is to help train the early year’s workforce and to ensure quick access to assessment and treatment / intervention when children are referred. COT believes that it is essential that occupational therapists are employed in this service.

10. COT believes that in order to deliver effectively on the Bill, it is vital that the early years workforce have the skills to detect delayed development and difficulty in a range of skills, including the ability to manage everyday tasks to an age/developmentally appropriate level. Difficulties in self-feeding, dressing, play and toileting can indicate underlying difficulties which need to be addressed. The ability to manage every day activities, such as starting to use writing implements and to manage self care, is important for school readiness. Occupational therapists have a key role in working within early years teams to help promote early year’s practitioners knowledge and understanding of how children develop these skills. (Support and aspirations a new approach to special educational needs and disability-COT 2011)

1 College of Occupational Therapists (2007 information produced by the COT specialist section for children young people and families for the workforce review team (unpublished). Support and aspiration a new approach to special educational needs and disability
11. Occupational therapists use a social rather than a medical model and work as part of multi-disciplinary teams and with parents and carers. Many service users tell us that it is occupational therapy which has made the difference to their recovery as it focuses on their everyday lives and how their strengths and difficulties affect their performance at home, in education, leisure, work/play. Also, it is the service user's own goals and interests which direct therapy, ensuring that the pace and outcomes are what the service user wants.

12. Many occupational therapy departments have long waiting lists due to overwhelming demand for their services. Schools wait too long for the advice they need to meet Special Education Needs (SEN). This capacity gap needs to be address to aid early intervention. COT affirm the need for the contribution of occupational therapists in settings and schools to be recognised through appropriate commissioning by education departments and schools, to ensure that children with SEN and disabilities who are not participating in all aspects of everyday life have access to the right support at the right time. COT also calls for the funding of health occupational therapists in child development teams and CAMHS to match demand for their services. The potential role of occupational therapists in training early years staff, undergraduate teachers, SENCOs, and other educational and early years staff should also be recognised and incorporated in training programmes.

13. As OTs working with children and young people are such a small group COT is concerned that their essential services will be overlooked both during the Children’s Services planning and the Child’s plan. There is good evidence within the CMO report 2011 that addressing the needs of children early on reduces health inequalities and ensures better outcomes for children and the adults they become. I would ask that the committee recognise the contribution that occupational therapy can make in achieving this aim.

14. The College of Occupational Therapists is the professional body for occupational therapists and represents over 29,000 occupational therapists, support workers and students from across the United Kingdom. There are approximately 3,500 occupational therapists working in Scotland. Occupational therapists work in local authority social services, the NHS, housing, schools, prisons, voluntary and independent sectors, and vocational and employment rehabilitation services.

15. Occupational therapists are regulated by the Health and Care Professions Council, and work with people of all ages with a wide range of occupational problems resulting from physical, mental, social or developmental difficulties.

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

4. Ultimately this bill appears to be motivated by a philosophy that is at odds with those that undergird a free society. Specifically, the notions that government should be limited and only intervene when necessary or provided for under objective standards, that a free people are competent to raise their own children without interference or uninvited “help” from government bureaucrats, that information about children should be protected and only shared when written consent is given by parents or legal guardians. And finally, that in a free society the rights of families and the irreplaceable relationship between parents and children must be protected and respected. The proposed Scottish legislation turns the notion that parents are responsible for their children on its head and basically says that parents can't be trusted-only government can.
Introduction

1. COSLA welcomes the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Education and Culture committee on the Children and Young People Bill. We have been pleased by the inclusive way that Scottish Government has worked with COSLA in the development of the Bill and we hope to continue this positive approach in evidence to Parliament.

2. We acknowledge that this response is longer than we would typically submit on a Bill. However, the legislation is arguably the most significant change to children’s services since devolution so we believe all sections need to be considered carefully. The Bill is positive and ambitious, and it is worth emphasising that COSLA supports the policy intentions behind much of the Bill. As a result the majority of our work on the development of the Bill has focused on practical challenges of implementation and the resources required by local authorities.

3. The Children and Young People Bill is a complex piece of legislation with significant financial implications for local authorities. The accuracy of the Scottish Government’s analysis and therefore the funding that would be made available depends on a large number of assumptions that will not be fully tested until the Bill is implemented. Councils have concerns over the future financial impact of the policies and that for this reason the financial implications to local authorities require in-depth scrutiny during the parliamentary passage of the Bill. COSLA has gained a confirmation from the Scottish Government that it is the intention to fully fund the requirements of the Bill, but with the implementation stretching beyond both the current spending review period and the end of this current parliament in 2016 then future budgetary decisions would be dependent on the result of several spending reviews. The commitment made by this administration to fully fund the Bill must be honoured in future years by whatever Government is in power and kept under on-going review. We also believe that it will be necessary for both COSLA and Scottish Government to jointly scrutinise and monitor the spend on this legislation, to ensure that local government is and continues to be sufficiently resourced to carry out the new duties that will be enacted.

Summary of Bill

4. COSLA supports the policy intentions of the Bill’s proposals on:
   - Children’s rights;
   - Children’s services planning and Getting it Right for Every Child
   - Early learning and childcare, and
   - Looked after children.
5. However, we have a number of important points to make on the implementation of Bill proposals, and the financial implications of the legislation. COSLA will be responding to the Finance Committee call for evidence in relation to the Financial Memorandum for the Bill, but we also provide summarises of comments on the financial issues in this submission of evidence. We also have a small number of concerns with specific proposals in the Bill - chiefly relating to new powers being sought by Ministers and proposed changes to the Children’s Hearings Scotland Act. These and other issues are discussed in more detail in the sections below.

Part 1 - Rights of Children

6. Children’s rights are well embedded within the practice of local government. We believe that no public sector organisation is likely to object to the proposal for realisation of children’s rights as stated in the proposals. Issues around transparency of decision making and policy implementation and scrutiny are of equal importance to local government, as other public sector organisations. COSLA has maintained since the Bill proposals were consulted upon in 2012 that we remain of the view that the duty of due regard need not extend beyond ministers when councils are already addressing children’s rights. Local authorities have already made much progress especially in the school setting, in terms of the promotion of children’s rights.

7. A number of organisations such as the Children’s Parliament are working with children on this issue. In explaining rights issues to children, it often provides clarification for adults working and caring for children and young people that the focus of the rights in the UNCRC are not about giving children the right to say no, but rather the ability to feel safe, secure and healthy with their help, guidance and support. We believe that this understanding helps and empowers children and young people.

8. COSLA remains of the view that organisations and structures such as the courts and Children’s Hearings need to acquire a clear understanding of the UNCRC in terms of their dealings and undertakings to children and young people. In that context, we are prepared to accept the proposals as set out in part 1 of the Bill.

Part 2 - Commissioner for Children and Young People

9. COSLA would be concerned if the use of the proposed additional powers as set out in Part 2 of the Bill became a “naming & shaming” exercise. Equally we would be concerned if the additional powers were to be used in a way that would duplicate both the existing complaints procedures & external inspection by Education Scotland and the Care Inspectorate. While we acknowledge that the Explanatory Notes for the Bill make reference to the Commissioner not duplicating roles of other organisations, this still leaves an opening for the Commissioner to investigate something that would be better handled by another agency.

10. It is our view that any powers should be used only as a last resort after all other avenues are exhausted.
11. Equally, we are clear that there needs to be clear guidance available to councils on what the UNCRC means for them in the delivery of children’s services, in light of Part 1 of the Bill, as well as Guidance on how and in what circumstances the Office of the Commissioner will have the scope to implement the additional powers.

Part 3 - Children’s Services Planning

12. For many years, COSLA has argued for better integration of public services locally. Whist we therefore accept the intention behind the Bill to improve integration and planning for Children’s services, COSLA believes that to be effective in practice any Bill proposals must not exist in a vacuum and should add value to other existing arrangements.

13. In particular, we want to be sure that Children’s services planning contributes to and is driven by the wider Community Planning arrangements that all partners are engaged in locally. This should be the forum through which partners should come together to develop partnership approaches to improving outcomes. For example there is an existing duty for local authorities to produce integrated children’s services plans, linked to Community Planning. Although we would argue that more needs to be done to put CPPs at the centre of reform our view is that this Bill should be an opportunity to drive that work forward in the context of children’s services, and avoid any chance of competing agendas or duplication arising.

14. It is therefore important that Committee considers how the Bill sits within this existing landscape; the activity going on to strengthen community planning, and alongside the developing Community Empowerment Bill which will set out in statute the new framework for Community Planning.

15. There are also clear links to the current proposals on the integration of adult health and social care services and it is possible that some local partnerships may wish to consider the inclusion of children’s services in those arrangements. Ultimately, it will be for individual local authorities and their health board counterparts to make that determination. We would also add that other organisations/people with an interest in children’s services within the voluntary or private sector that are not always directly connected to CPPs will also have a key to play in these tasks and should be equally covered by the proposals.

16. There is one aspect to the proposals in children’s services planning with which COSLA does not support. Part 3 paragraph 17 proposes Ministerial powers to establish joint boards, should there be concern that insufficient progress is being made in terms of integration. This was a late addition to the Bill, and one which had not been previously discussed with COSLA. Whilst we can understand the desire on the part of any Government to ensure the successful implementation of its policies, the discretionary powers taken within this section of the Bill are extensive and allow for the transfer of staff, property and functions to the new boards.
17. The powers appear also to be linked to section 16 of the Bill which concerns powers to issue direction to public bodies, including local authorities. Section 16 is a concern in itself as it allows Ministers with the broad scope to issue directions to local authorities and health boards on the exercising of their functions. We firmly believe that decisions on the operation of services, including how best to tackle outcomes, are best taken at the local level in close collaborations with partners. Taken together one interpretation of sections 16 and 17 is that local authorities and health boards could be restructured if directions of Ministers were not followed to the liking of the Government of the day.

18. This is a concern for anyone who champions local democracy, but given our good relationship with Government it is strange that Ministers feels the need to seek such strong powers. Local government has demonstrated a strong commitment to both the Bill and children’s services improvement generally and we have a strong track record of arguing for better, outcomes focused integrated services. This is consistent with our representation to the Christie Commission and our recent work to agree a vision for local government. We are also uncomfortable with notion that Parliament is being asked to grant powers to Ministers to restructure the public sector in a way that normally would require the full scrutiny afforded to primary legislation. It is possible to argue that these powers not only undermine local democracy, but national democracy too.

19. COSLA is completely opposed to the powers described in paragraph 17 and have made this point already to Government. Our principled position as agreed by our Convention is that there is no need for such powers, and that they should be removed from the Bill.

Part 4 - Provision of Named Persons

20. Scottish local government has been delivering the Getting It Right for Every Child approach for some years and recognises the value of GIRFEC in the improvement of children’s services. The proposal that the Named Person role should sit with local government, with the inference, though not expressly set out, that the role should sit with with schools in terms of their contact with children and young people from 5 to 18 years is welcome. It is clear that outside the family or care structure, children and young people have the most contact with school teaching and support staff. The Financial Memorandum provides for resources to be made available to provide GIRFEC training for senior teaching and support staff in schools and provide resources for backfill, while training is undergone. COSLA has worked with Scottish Government in testing these figures based on the current situation. As noted in the introduction this is a necessary area that will need to be monitored and scrutinised in future years to ensure funding is available for the provision to be sustainable.

Part 5 - Child’s Plan

21. The value of a Child’s Plan is already recognised since the GIRFEC approach was launched. COSLA has worked with Scottish government to promote the approach across local authorities. It is reasonable therefore that COSLA continues to support in principle, the proposals regarding a Single Child’s Plan.
The idea of a child’s plan is one that we completely support, but there is a need to consider how the plan relates to other plans. The best example is the coordinated support plan which is set out in ASL legislation. We understand that Government is looking at how coordinated support plans sit with respect to the child’s plan – with the option that a CSP could form part of the child’s plan where this is appropriate being perhaps the best solution. In an ideal world we would not require two pieces of legislation – this Bill and ASL legislation – to describe different aspect of children’s services planning, but it is the practical reality on the ground that is most important. It is therefore important that legislation and guidance makes clear how both the child’s plan and coordinate support plans will operate in practice.

22. In principle COSLA would accept that children, young people and families should be involved in the development of a Child’s Plan, where possible. However, in practical terms, while local authorities will seek to improve life chances for children and young people, managing expectations against practicality and the needs of other vulnerable members of the community will continue to be addressed by councils.

Part 6 - Early Learning and Childcare

23. COSLA supports the expansion of early learning and childcare as proposed in the Bill. The proposals in the Bill came about as a result of considerable joint discussion between COSLA, ADES and Scottish Government. This is also the most costly section of the Bill, and from the start COSLA recognised the very significant implications of the proposals on local authority resources.

24. The figures within the financial memorandum were developed through the work of COSLA with local authorities. They are the best figures we have for the implementation of this section of the Bill, and it is worth noting that local authorities have indicated that they are broadly happy that they are an accurate assessment of implementation costs in line with the agreed approach to delivering this aspect of the Bill, that is, to deliver the 600 hours in as practical a way as possible and without the additional requirement of more flexibility for parents. However, as we have already outlined the implementation of the Bill will stretch beyond the end of this spending review, which means it needs to be recognised that it is future budgets that will determine how effectively this policy can be implemented. Parliament needs to be aware that any shortfall in future funding will be felt by local government and ultimately parents and children.

25. Following discussions with Scottish Government we agreed that the Bill would require local authorities to deliver the increased hours in as practical way as possible by August 2014 with no immediate requirement for more flexibility for parents. This recognised practical challenges facing local authorities, and the short lead time to implement the additional hours in time for the start of the academic year 2014/15. In subsequent years additional flexibility will be introduced gradually, in consultation with parents, and within the overall resources made available by Scottish Government. Delivering increased flexibility is more complex and costs more money as a result, so it is important to understand that local authorities will only be able to implement what they are funded to deliver. Local authorities have the flexibility to tailor future delivery of 600 hours of early learning and childcare to meet local needs, incorporating the views of parents.

26. On the basis that these issues have been agreed with Scottish Government, we support the proposals outlined in the Bill.

Part 7 - Corporate Parenting

27. COSLA has long been an advocate of corporate parenting and has been an enthusiastic supporter of publications such as ‘These are our Bairns’. This section of the Bill is important as for the first time it will set out a legal definition of what it means to be a corporate parent, and extend this to other public bodies – the corporate family, to extend the analogy.

28. We agree that a definition of Corporate Parenting should refer to the collective responsibility of all public bodies and those acting on their behalf to provide the best possible care and protection for looked after children. In addition, it would be helpful if other public bodies or community planning partners have their roles clarified to achieve better outcomes through joint working. This will require the updating of guidance on corporate parenting.

29. We have to be clear though that the corporate parent cannot act in the same way as a birth parent. As such, any definition requires to define the parameters of the responsibility lucidly and to manage expectations in terms of the financial and human resources it would involve. However, local authorities and other public bodies can and do use their influence and weight in innovative ways to support both children in care, and those who have recently left it.

30. It is also important to note that any formalised definition of corporate parenting will have practical resource challenges in terms of on-going training/briefing sessions to ensure organisational wide commitment for councils and other community planning partners. At the same time though it should be acknowledged that there are some real examples of good practice around the country in relation to corporate parenting from councils that should be promoted.

31. One concern that we have on part 7 of the Bill again relates to powers of Scottish Ministers to issue direction to public bodies – including democratically elected local authorities. As with part 3 of the Bill we are not certain why Ministers feel they need to seek the ability to direct public bodies as set out in section 58. Local government has shown a strong commitment to the concept of corporate parenting in recent years and developed a good partnership with Government. Local and Scottish Government have a shared goal for improving lives of looked after children, so it seems disproportionate for Ministers to require the ability to issue directions. On a practical note we would also argue that the powers presuppose that Ministers somehow know better than local agencies about how to meet the needs of children in their care. We do not doubt Government’s commitment on this subject, but the experience of elected members and local professionals across all agencies and services must be respected.
Part 8 - Aftercare

32. COSLA is supportive of the policy intent of the extension of aftercare provision to young people that have previously been looked after. We understand that Government are looking for authorities to provide a level of support broadly consistent with what is provided currently on a discretionary basis for 19-21 year olds. However, paragraph 60, sub-section 8 states that Ministers will determine such types of support, the detail of eligibility will not be determined until secondary legislation. It is therefore important to emphasise that the full implications of this policy on local authorities will not be known until the secondary legislation is passed.

33. Currently, there is no equivalent legislation or statutory guidance for such type of support for 19-21 year olds. The decision on eligibility is made by the local authority, as they have the skills and expertise to assess the individual case. Potentially paragraph 60, sub-section 8 could restrict the provision local authorities can offer and could lead to a difference in the provision that is currently provided and the provision that could be provided after the legislation is implemented. It also restricts the flexibility a local authority has to amend the elements of support available to eligible kinship carers to reflect changing circumstances or the future identification of further support needs.

34. The assumptions that Government make on the number of young people leaving care and percentage of young people expected to be successful in applying for support seem reasonable and are based on national statistics and the experience of local authorities.

35. Our concern on this issue is one that we have no way of knowing what the impact of welfare reform will be on this group of young people, so there is every possibility that the numbers seeking assistance may not fall as much as expected. Early indications of the impact of welfare reform show significant increases of presentations in many authorities for this service.

36. Further, COSLA has less certainty over the accuracy of the costings of this aspect of the Bill due to the difficulties for local authorities in estimating the financial impact. In particular, we are not convinced that the Scottish Government have accurately estimated the average annual cost of support (£3142 per young person). This figure includes an estimate that the average cost for travel would be £400 per year; that emergency payments up to £200 per year could be payable and that payments to outside agencies (such as for third sector support) would be around £1500. It also includes an estimate of staffing costs required to support the young person. From discussions with local authorities we believe that these costs underestimate the actual cost of supporting a young person who has left care. In particular we are aware that some local authorities have indicated a concern that travel costs are not realistic and do not factor in cost of travel particularly in rural areas.

37. Finally, if the subsection detailed above remains in the Bill the actual cost will not be clear until secondary regulations have been passed potentially leading to a gap in funding which could undermine the intention of this section of the Bill.
Part 9 - Counselling Services

38. We believe the intention of this section of the Bill is to ensure that families in the early stages of distress are provided with support. The move towards early intervention is welcomed by COSLA however the provisions set out within Part 4 19 (5) already provide for this to happen under the functions of the “named person”. This section of the legislation may therefore duplicate the earlier section.

39. Further, if the section remains the term “counselling” used is unhelpful and should be replaced with support. Counselling is a specific form of formal support that will not be appropriate for all families. All forms of support (e.g. family group decision making, drug and alcohol support groups etc) should be considered after an assessment of need is carried out. Also, as there is no definition of ‘eligible child’ within the Bill it is difficult for local authorities to be able to assess the impact of this. As things currently stand local authorities are to provide undefined counselling services to parents or those with parental rights and responsibilities of an undefined group of children.

40. Further, it should be noted that as consequence of this provision children and families may also be brought into the care system at a far earlier stage than is currently the case.

Part 10 - Support for Kinship Care

41. The policy intention of kinship care orders is to help families become more able to deal with the issues which they face, without the need for formal care. The number of children looked after in formal kinship care arrangements has grown significantly in recent years and is projected to increase further. A mechanism that provides families with a better alternative to formal care is therefore welcome. It has also been well discussed over the last few years that the growth in kinship care and the corresponding increasing in kinship care allowances have put pressure on local government finance. By transferring parental rights to carers, the orders should allow families to better access other financial benefits from the DWP. The Government believes that this should go some way to reduce the financial pressure on local authorities, but it also, just as importantly, minimises the distinction between kinship care and the lives of other families.

42. In the end how successful orders prove to be at reducing payment of kinship care allowances will depend on how attractive the orders are to families. At this point of time it is difficult to project accurately how many families will take out a kinship care order. Uptake will depend on a number of factors such as impact of welfare reform, the support provided by authorities and the detail of how orders will operate - including eligibility and length of support – which will be set in secondary legislation. The interplay of these variables makes it difficult to know for certain whether the financial assumptions made by Government are accurate. Again, we would reiterate that local authorities will only be able to implement what they are funded to deliver.

43. The accuracy of the financial assumptions is the biggest issue that we have discussed with Scottish Government. When COSLA discussed with local authorities the financial implications of this aspect of the Bill no national picture emerged, and it is clear that local authorities have found it difficult to evaluate the future impact of the policies. With accuracy depending on the financial assumptions made, without actually implementing the legislation and testing the assumptions for real, there will always be a degree of risk for local authorities. For example, the Scottish Government predicts a 6.5% continual annual increase until 2019-20 of those applying for a kinship care order. Over the past 3 years Falkirk Council have seen around a 30% increase whilst Inverclyde has seen a 37% increase since 2011. Both Councils, in different ways, have proactively supported families to move to kinship care orders. Whilst not all local authorities have experienced such significant increases this clearly demonstrates the potential increases local authorities are likely to face if the order is popular with kinship carers (which is the intention). Further, we are aware that the recent experience of some authorities of the introduction of Adoption Orders shows that the financial costs to councils were underestimated. Additionally, the assumptions relating to estimating the take-up and level of costs per Order made by Scottish Government that underpin the figures for this complex area are numerous, increasing considerably the potential for the actual costs to differ from the estimated costs.

44. The figures which have been developed by Scottish Government are a genuine attempt to assess the cost/benefits of kinship care orders. It is our hope that kinship care orders are a success and provide an alternative to formal care for some families. However, with considerable uncertainty over how many families will take up an order, the financial risk facing local government is potentially significant. The exact size of this risk depends on how accurately Scottish Government has modelled the take up of kinship care orders. We therefore believe it is necessary that both COSLA and Scottish Government jointly scrutinise and monitor the spend on this legislation to ensure that local government is, and continues to be, sufficiently resourced to carry out the new duties that will be enacted.

Part 11 - Adoption Register

45. Local authorities always put children first and will have good reasons for currently not using the register. We are aware, for example, that some local authorities already recruit enough people who are willing to adopt to meet the needs of children in their area. Councils in this position may therefore not feel an urgent requirement to join the register. Presently, consortia arrangements work very well between local authorities in various parts of the country.

COSLA accepts that the development of the national register is a positive one and we are aware that its usage is rising. It provides local authorities with another option when trying to place vulnerable children with adoptive families across Scotland. However, the proposal to move to a national adoption register through compulsion for local authorities should only be considered where there is complete confidence that it is in the interests of children to do this.
Part 12 - Other Reforms - Children’s Hearings

46. As mentioned in the summary to this submission, the sections of the Bill which relate to amendments to Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 give us concern. During the passage of the 2011 Act through Parliament COSLA raised some real concerns about centralisation of services and the establishment of a new national body – Children’s Hearings Scotland (CHS) – to run what had been local services. In particular we were worried that the newly established office of National Convener would only have to consult local authorities when drawing up area support teams. There was no requirement to reach a mutual agreement. For COSLA it seemed inappropriate that an unelected official should have this power, and that it was actually more appropriate for the Convener to have to reach agreement with local authorities concerned. In the end Parliament agreed with our position.

47. The proposed amendment in section 69 reverses the decision taken by Parliament and reinstates the original intention of Government. This is not something that COSLA can support. Whilst we have been told by both CHS and Government officials that the Convener would listen closely to views of local authorities concerned, there is still an issue of principle about the head of national body potentially acting against a decision of a democratically elected authority.

48. We are also very concerned about the proposal in section 70 to allow the National Convener to effectively compel a local authority to deliver specific support services to area support teams. At the moment CHS has to reach agreement with councils on support services. We expect that the dialogue between CHS and individual authorities is not always easy given the financial constraints faced by the whole public sector. Nonetheless, we would argue that this dialogue is necessary and allows for mutual agreement to be reached. This has to be preferable to the potential forcible allocation of staff, property and services against the will of the local authority, and potentially to the detriment of other services.

49. We would ask that Parliament considers carefully whether it is appropriate for the National Conveners of CHS to have these powers. It is COSLA strongly held view that the 2011 Act should not be amended as proposed in the Bill.

Part 12 - Other Reforms – School Consultations

50. COSLA currently does not have any comment to make on this section. However, we have a long standing interest in this area and will be responding to the Government’s consultation on possible changes to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010. We would be happy to provide the Committee with additional evidence on any changes to the Bill that might be proposed at stage 2.

Conclusion

51. We acknowledge this is a long and complex response, but this matches the length and complexity of the Bill. COSLA has been working on the Bill for many months and would be happy to use our experience to help the Committee’s scrutiny of the legislation. We would therefore be happy to attend oral evidence sessions and to work with the Committee and individual members on all aspect of the Bill.

Education and Culture Committee
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Supplementary submission from COSLA

1. I wanted to write to you after listening to the debate at the Committee on stage 1 of the Children and Young People Bill. I felt it important not only to reinforce the points that COSLA has already on the Bill but to also reflect on the points that others have made. For this reason I am happy for you to accept this as supplementary evidence on the Bill and to make this public. I have copied this letter to all the party spokespersons for Education.

2. I want to take this opportunity to restate our support for the policy intent of the Bill. The Bill is large and complex and I have no doubt can be improved with constructive amendments, but as we approach the end of stage 1, I would not want the Committee to lose sight of what it is intending to achieve. This is particularly true on those parts of the Bill concerning data sharing and the named person that have caused a degree of controversy. I will return to this point later in this letter.

3. The first thing I wanted to say is that we welcome the scrutiny at all committees, including your own, as we want to see the best possible legislation emerge from the Parliamentary process.

4. As everyone recognises, the Bill is very complex and the financial assumptions which underpin it are equally complex. So while we welcome the Government’s guarantee of full funding there is still a risk for local government if the financial assumptions are proven to be inaccurate. I hope that this is not the case but it is worth saying that the risk to local authorities is further heightened by two other major factors - the length of time over which the Bill will be implemented, which means there can be little certainty over how much cash will be available to this or any other Government and the damaging impact of welfare reform which is already affecting families in Scotland.

5. This is why we have pushed throughout stage 1 for the highest level of scrutiny and for monitoring of the financial implications of the Bill once implemented. On this point I welcome the willingness of the Minister, stated on 8 October, to monitor the costs of implementation, but this has to be a real process which is honoured by any future administration. However, I am sure you will agree it is far more preferable to get the Bill right from the outset. For this reason the remainder of the letter reflects on some issues that have arisen during the Stage 1 discussions at your committee and highlights our thoughts on those issues.

Children’s Rights

6. We recognise that a number of strong views have been expressed on this section of the Bill. Local authorities treat rights of children extremely seriously and we view the UNCRC as a hugely beneficial framework within which to operate. However, it is vitally important that we do not allow the natural zeal to enhance rights of children to overtake good law making. COSLA supports the Bill as drafted, but it is important that if the Committee is minded to recommend significant changes, the proper level of scrutiny and consultation is applied to them. A fast moving stage 2 where there is pressure on MSPs to scrutinise all submitted amendments on what is a large Bill would not in our opinion be the best way of considering the arguments, for and against, the incorporation of the Convention within Scots Law. We have to remember that children’s rights were proposed to form a Bill on their own and not be part of a multifaceted Bill on children’s services. As I have said, local authorities are already well advanced in their handling of children’s rights and we want to ensure that the legislative framework continues to be helpful and does not lead to unintended consequences, which could be the result of rushing through significant amendments to this section.

Named Person
7. I have to say that the debate on the role of the Named Person has caused me some concern. COSLA has been supporting the implementation of the Getting it Right approach for many years. As far as we are concerned there is absolutely no intention for the Named Person role to replace, detract or dilute the role of parents as primary care givers. From our point of view the arguments suggesting that the role of named person conflicts with European Convention of Human Rights seem inflated, ill-informed and in danger of obscuring the central purpose of the Named Person. Getting it Right for Every Child is about joining services up for the good of all children – but at its core it is about identifying vulnerability at the earliest possible stage. The Named Person is therefore about providing a safety net for children, to help keep them secure by providing a recognised point of contact where concerns can be reported. We have no doubt that this section of the Bill can be improved, but we make no apology for being whole hearted supporters of the principle of the Named Person and the Getting it Right approach.

8. On a more practical note, we feel it is also worth making the point that the costs of ensuring that on-going training and support for teaching and other local authority staff to undertake the role of the Named Person and to support their understanding of appropriate information sharing may not be simply addressed by one-off funding suggested by Government.

Early Learning
9. We covered this section in some depth during our oral evidence section. However we have noted calls by some stakeholders for a standard rate for payments to partner providers to deliver the proposed 600 hours. We made the point in our evidence that the decision on rates paid for this service must fall within local decision making by councils, as they have the best understanding of the resources available to deliver all services. There are good reasons for this position. Beyond the local variation in cost of living and availability of partner providers which all impact on the market rate, we have already made the point that even with the very welcome funding guarantee from Government councils cannot be absolutely certain over how much cash they will actually receive in future years. With the other factors such as inflation and impact of policies such as benefit reform, we equally cannot be certain what level of financial support to partner providers is affordable in future years. It is for this reason that we believe that only councils can work out at the local level, with their partners, the best way of financially supporting early learning and childcare in their area.

Kinship Care

10. The penultimate point that I want to make is on kinship care. We believe that moving children and young people out of formal care can only be regarded as a good move, if the circumstance of a move into informal care is handled correctly. For this reason we are on record as supporting the policy intention of this section of the Bill. The financial memorandum sets out a number of assumptions around the predicted number of carers who may move to the kinship carer order and associated savings to local authorities. Our experience of working on the financial memorandum with Government is that the assumptions that underpin kinship care orders are the most complex of any section of the Bill. There is a substantial risk to councils that these numbers and associated savings are not realised for the following reasons:

- For those formal kinship carers that currently receive financial support, many may be (or perceive they will be) financially worse off, as part changes to the benefits system. In this circumstance few families are likely to choose to apply for an order;
- Some carers who carry out the role of a kinship carer on an informal basis and do not currently receive support from the local authority may perceive orders as an opportunity to gain further support. This could lead to a growth in the support demand for local authorities if existing formal carers do not take out orders for the reason set out in the first bullet point, and
- If a Kinship Carer does successfully gain an order but is subsequently unable to financially support the child with the assistance of the benefits system they may be forced to fall back on emergency financial assistance from councils.

11. Further, if an Order is granted and those Kinship Carers that require financial support move to the benefit system, any additional transitional financial payments made by the Council may well have a ‘knock on’ impact on the level of benefit received. This will lead to a situation where Councils are paying, in essence, part of the benefit payment. It is important that this situation is clarified before orders are passed into law.

Children’s Hearings

12. The last point I want to raise is on children’s hearings. This is a small but important section about which we have previously raised concerns. We believe that the 2011 Act as drafted represents a better way for framing the relationship between local authorities and Children’s Hearing Scotland than the one proposed by the Government’s amendments. This was previously recognised by Parliament when the Act was passed. We are under no allusions that discussions over administrative support and the makeup of area support teams are sometimes challenging, but we would argue that the requirement for CHS and authorities to reach a mutual agreement should not be disregarded in favour of an amendment that grants the National Convener sweeping powers over local authorities. Of particular worry is the section 70 of the Bill which allows the National Convener to order an authority to provide any administrative support (defined extremely widely as staff, property or other services) that is considered appropriate. This seems unnecessarily broad power for an unelected official to have, and is completely disproportionate to the challenge of delivering the hearing system in tight financial times.

13. COSLA accepts that Stages 2 and 3 of the Bill will bring the possibility of a number of amendments. It is with this in mind that we bring these issues to your attention as you begin to consider your stage 1 report.

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

4. Ultimately this bill appears to be motivated by a philosophy that is at odds with those that undergird a free society. Specifically, the notions that government should be limited and only intervene when necessary or provided for under objective standards, that a free people are competent to raise their own children without interference or uninvited “help” from government bureaucrats, that information about children should be protected and only shared when written consent is given by parents or legal guardians. And finally, that in a free society the rights of families and the irreplaceable relationship between parents and children must be protected and respected. The proposed Scottish legislation turns the notion that parents are responsible for their children on its head and basically says that parents can't be trusted-only government can.

Ensure that children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services by placing new duties on the Scottish Ministers and the public sector and by increasing the powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People;

1. It is extremely difficult in some circumstances for this to happen when the services / issues are more political by nature and a clear plan needs to be set out relating to how these more sensitive issues will be tackled in relation to children’s rights.

2. An example of this is our organisation’s consultation and pilot programme with NHS Greater Glasgow and Clyde relating to their Free Condoms initiative, in essence sexual health education. This was a needs led programme after listening to what young people require to be protected and informed about relating to the subject of health.

3. We were immediately aware that this would potentially cause issues with some parents as we know that it is a hugely contentious issue in the catholic secondary schools. As we are a voluntary service we engaged in a consultation with parents regarding the programme and outlined some of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of a Child articles to parents; children and young people have the right to ‘good quality health care’ but it also states that the government will not interfere with family matters, religion etc... ensuring parents knew as much information as possible before they made a choice for their child.

4. This is only one example but how would sensitive issues that cross over children’s / family rights such as this be handled when policies and services are being designed?

Improve the way services support children and families by promoting cooperation between services, with the child at the centre;

5. The principles of the Getting it Right for Every Child approach is clear and makes absolute sense that young people should be placed at the centre of what we do and agencies must work together to deliver a co-ordinated approach. In times when core funding is being cut and increased workload is being placed on staff, organisations are struggling to deal with these pressures. Some organisations, particularly smaller local voluntary sector organisations are finding it extremely difficult to co-ordinate their work with other agencies as mostly likely both organisations are struggling to continue to deliver the services they are funded directly to deliver.

6. In theory the approach works, practically organisations delivering work at the coal face are struggling to understand how this could be done with their limited and enormously stretched resources already.
7. Policy into practice at a local level engaging small voluntary sector organisations needs to be considered.

1. Thank you for your email letter dated 07 October; please accept my sincere apologies for the delay in responding to you on.

2. Without knowing the precise details and purpose of the financial support that will be provided to kinship carers under the new Bill, we cannot guarantee that it will have no effect on benefit entitlement. It is already the case that, for income-related benefits, we disregard kinship care payments made under regulations 33 and 51 of the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009. If the intention is that the new payments broadly replace or replicate the purpose of these existing payments, it is very likely that we would recommend to our Ministers that they too would be disregarded. However, if the new payments are significantly more generous or for a different purpose, we would need to consider whether a disregard could still be justified. Any disregard would require an amendment to our legislation.

3. Our policy aim is to ensure that there is not double provision by the state, while ensuring that the additional costs involved in having a kinship care situation are recognised in the benefit system. Assuming we can justify a disregard under these principles, we are happy to work with the Scottish Government to agree the necessary changes to the legislation.

4. With regards to Universal Credit a child or young person who is looked after by a local authority is not treated as being the responsibility of the claimant. This follows the same approach as currently taken in the rules for Child Tax Credit.

5. The structure of the Universal Credit Regulations 2013 (S.I. 2013/376) is much simpler than the approach taken in existing secondary legislation. Unearned income within the descriptions listed in Regulation 66 (What is included in unearned income) will reduce payment of Universal Credit pound for pound. Other types of unearned income are completely disregarded by virtue of falling outside the scope of this Regulation, for example a fostering allowance.

6. I hope that this helps to clarify our position.

Yours sincerely

We are appalled to learn of the proposed Scottish law that would restrict freedom in Scotland by taking away responsibility from parents and families to raise their children and instead, deeming that the government's job. This kind of law is abhorrent in a free society and is the antithesis of what government's role is. Your government should be protecting and promoting parental rights and freedoms, not encroaching on them. What you are attempting to accomplish by this law oversteps the bounds of a civilized, democratic society and resembles the first steps of what happens in a state-run, tyrannical government. Surely you have not forgotten the beginnings of Nazism in your fellow European country?

Please return to sanity and get your hands off the family. Do your job, not the job of parents.

1. Down’s Syndrome Scotland welcome the opportunity to respond to this call for evidence from the Education and Culture Committee of the Scottish Parliament. As a charity, we work to improve the quality of life for everyone in Scotland with Down’s syndrome and their families. Therefore we have a particular interest in the proposed changes outlined in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill which has the potential to improve the lives of children with Down’s syndrome by ensuring that their rights are being taken seriously.

2. Ideally Scotland should be a place where the needs of children and young people with Down’s syndrome would be systematically encompassed in any new legislation and its ensuing practice. But the reality is that their interests still need to be supported and promoted by organisations like Down’s Syndrome Scotland so that their voices can be heard by politicians across the country and practitioners reminded that children and young people with Down’s syndrome are included in the legislation.

3. Firstly, Down’s Syndrome Scotland welcome the Bill’s Policy Memorandum to put children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services and to ensure their rights are respected. We also support the duty on the Scottish Ministers and public authorities to promote awareness of the rights of children. Nevertheless we are of the view that the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) should be fully incorporated into Scots law to guarantee the protection of children’s rights throughout the country.

4. To ensure Scotland is the best place for children to grow up in, their rights should be respected and protected across the entire public sector. Whilst we recognise the duties imposed by the Bill on certain public bodies (as presented in Schedule 1 of the Bill) to promote awareness of the rights of children, we are of the view that the Bill should lay stronger emphasis on the requirement for all service providers/public authorities to effectively demonstrate that they have considered the UNCRC and responded to it by adapting support and services accordingly. Then, we fully support the Bill’s provision to increase the powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People (SCCYP) and we note the financial implications for these proposals as presented in the Financial Memorandum. However, a clear remit of this role is still needed which clearly outlines the work and new powers of the SCCYP in relation to other legal institutions (like the courts) in Scotland. Furthermore, we would seek clarification on the way the Scottish Government intends to present and promote the SCCYP’s new role to children and young people, specifically to children and young people with Down’s syndrome, and the associated costs. We would also suggest that this issue could be partially addressed by working in partnership with organisations whose constituencies include children and young people with learning disabilities.
5. As far as the Child’s Plan is concerned, we welcome the single planning approach proposed for children with additional support needs but the Bill does not outline how to actually make it work in practice. This is a concern given that at present the quality of services available to children with Down’s syndrome and their families considerably varies across Scotland. On one hand, as noted in the Analysis of Responses to the Children and Young People Bill Consultation¹, one should be aware that the provision of more services may result in services of poorer quality and it is crucial to ensure that this does not happen. On the other, we are currently dealing with significant issues with regard to the great disparity in the range of services provided by local authorities. As an example, a single mother of five children, two of whom have Down’s syndrome, is receiving 4 hours of support weekly in one local authority, while another mother with one child with Down’s syndrome is being offered 15 hours of support per week in another local authority. Furthermore, members of our Family Support Team have seen some examples of excellent practice within Education, but they are also raising serious concerns about the implementation of Coordinated Support Plans (CSPs) and Individual Educational Plans (IEPs) and the amount of support offered to children with Down’s syndrome in mainstream schools. In one local authority, parents have been told that there are not enough support workers to help a child with Down’s syndrome going into a big class (a class of 25 which is permissible in P1). Further, even if there is support available, they will not know that until the child begins school in August. This is a very difficult and upsetting situation for parents. In another area, there is no support at all in some cases, while in a fifth local authority composite classes of P1/P2/P3 make the situation of children with Down’s syndrome extremely difficult.

6. In relation to secondary school education, while we do not have information from across the country, we are aware that transition between primary and secondary remains difficult for schools to implement because of other pressures. In fact, one of our Family Support Officers was informed by the principal teacher of support in one local authority that secondary teachers are too busy to make the child a priority because they are under stress with implementing the Curriculum for Excellence! Clearly this is a worrying and stressful time for children and their parents when they should be receiving the support they need wherever they live in Scotland.

7. It is also important to note that cooperation and coordinated services are critical during transition periods for children with Down’s syndrome (e.g when a child is starting or leaving school). As already outlined by Susan Deacon in her report Joining the Dots² (http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/Doc/343337/0114216.pdf, from page 9), there is strong evidence available showing that investing in early years and early intervention is essential for a child’s development. Two years after the publication of this report, serious problems still persist with regard to early years support and we believe that legislation is now urgently needed to ensure that transitions are planned properly. In fact, transparency and accountability are key in strengthening the provision of early years support and childcare, even more so for children with Down’s syndrome. Monitoring the implementation of the proposed change will thus be crucial. Whilst we recognise the duties imposed by the Bill on local authorities and health boards to publish reports on progress on children’s services plans every year and the possibility for Scottish Ministers to act if local authorities and/or public bodies fail to carry out these duties, we feel that more provisions should be included in the Bill about the monitoring of new policies and services. We strongly believe that the views of children, parents and carers with lived-experience must be collected and assessed in order to comprehensively evaluate the work of local authorities and public bodies, and the services children and their carers are entitled to receive.

8. Then, the concept of the ‘named-person’ outlined in the Bill remains unclear and more guidance is needed on this issue. In particular, we believe that more consideration should be given as to what this role will precisely entail in relation to the Child’s Plan and whether appropriate resources will be made available for it. As a charity supporting the interests of individuals with Down’s syndrome, we are particularly concerned about the fact that a named-person could be a head teacher within a school. Being a named-person as well as a teacher would not only increase teachers’ workload but we would also question the resources available to them as a named-person for what may be large numbers of pupils. For example, we are not convinced that teachers would have time to deal with the care coordination programme appropriately. In our opinion, problems are also likely to arise during school holidays, especially over the summer, when teachers and pupils are away from school over an extensive period of time. With regard to this point, it is also worth mentioning that education is not always a positive experience for children with Down’s syndrome and we would question what alternatives would then be offered to families in need of support if their child is not going to school. Lastly, if this concept is implemented, we would suggest that a ‘named-person’ should be appointed until the age of 25 years for individuals with Down’s syndrome. Local authorities should then be made accountable for providing such a service systematically for young people with Down’s syndrome; this would ensure that individuals do not have to go through what might be a lengthy process (potentially leading to a temporary suspension of the service provided) of requesting the service to be continued after they turn 18.

9. Finally, we warmly welcome the proposed changes to offer more support to kinship carers.

Down’s Syndrome Scotland

The Educational Institute of Scotland

Introduction

1. The Educational Institute of Scotland (EIS) welcomes the opportunity to present written evidence on the general principles of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill which was introduced to the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013. The EIS represents over 80% of Scotland’s teachers, lecturers and associated professionals throughout all sectors of Scottish Education. The EIS is the largest education trade union in Scotland.

Part 3 – Children’s Services Planning

2. Teachers understand the importance of children being safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included. A child’s emotional and social wellbeing are key contributory factors to the child’s intellectual development and deficiencies can lead to underachievement.

3. The EIS believes that a duty should be placed on public bodies to work together to design, plan and deliver their policies and services jointly to ensure that they are focussed on improving children’s wellbeing. However, any duties placed on public bodies must not be constrained by the availability of limited resources. If as a society we are to improve children’s wellbeing, then as a society we must ensure that the necessary resources are available when required. These must include necessary levels of staffing to deliver education, opportunities for professional development for staff, time for collaboration and specialist provision.

5. The current financial constraints on local education services and increased workload demands on personnel are in our view barriers to effective partnership activities. This often constrains effective joint design, planning and delivery of policies and services.

Part 4 – Provision of Named Persons

6. The EIS supports the principle of a Named Person – a child or young person should have a known and consistent point of contact who can help her/him or her/his family access services, provide information and support, and discuss and address concerns with other agencies. The degree of support that the ‘Named

---

Person’ is expected to provide remains unclear as does the scope of any Child’s Plan that the Person might be required to develop.

7. The 'Named Person' must have guaranteed time and resources to carry out this highly responsible task. The availability or otherwise of time and resources should not prejudice the decision regarding who the most appropriate 'named person' is and should not lead to a default position whereby the school is expected to provide a 'named person' regardless of capacity or resources.

8. It must be recognised that the costs associated with the provision of adequate resources to schools including increased staffing and additional management time for teachers undertaking the role of 'named person' will be on-going and not 'one-off'.

9. While the EIS understands that there is an acceptance that training will be required for staff delivering the Named Person role, not only will there be costs associated with replacing staff for training days, but should teaching staff be allocated the role of Named Person there only may continue to be challenges in the future in obtaining supply staff to cover absences.

10. Costs associated with training of staff delivering the 'named person' role must be met, including the provision of supply staff to cover absence.

11. The EIS asks that further consideration be given regarding who should undertake the role of 'named person' in the pre-school sector.

Child's Plan

12. Developments to date involving children, young people and their families in the development of planning have been characterised by paperwork, audit trails, protection from future challenge and bureaucracy rather than on direct work with these participants. Children, young people and their families could be effectively involved in future in the development of the Child’s Plan if the necessary levels of staffing, specialist provision and time for collaboration were also provided.

13. One current difficulty in many schools is that teachers are spending time, in conjunction with members of Senior Management Teams, drafting plans for children and young people when they should be working with them directly in the classrooms. Duplication of paperwork in the form of a planning and reporting on the outcomes of the plans could be better spent working directly with children and young people.

Early Learning and Childcare

14. The understanding of the child as an active learner is reflected in the principles of Curriculum for Excellence which is based on broad and inclusive definitions of learning and an understanding of children’s development and learning which is common to all learners from 3-18. It is, therefore, all the more important that there are fully qualified and registered teachers planning and delivering educational opportunities to suit the particular needs of all of Scotland’s youngest learners, no matter where they live.

15. Section 44 of the Bill specifies that the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare is 600 hours in each year. If the number of hours of funded early learning and childcare is to be increased from 475 hours to 600 hours per annum, parents have a right to know how many of these hours are to be provided by qualified GTCS registered teachers. In addition, quantification is required regarding the ratio between ‘early learning’ and ‘childcare’. The current deployment of peripatetic nursery teachers has resulted in many children attending nursery classes in Scotland no longer having direct access to a qualified teacher. It is for this and other reasons that the EIS calls for the introduction of national, legally enforceable standards on access by pre-five children to a qualified GTCS registered teacher.

16. Increasing the number of hours of funded early learning and childcare will not in itself result in an increase in the quality of educational provision. Quality education represents a substantial part of the solution to the problems of Scotland’s society. Education is an investment with a substantial return. Only by proper funding can education in Scotland deliver for our young people. The EIS believes that only by guaranteeing the employment of nursery teachers can quality education be guaranteed.

17. Nursery schools and nursery classes, with qualified GTCS teachers, mean quality educational provision for our youngest learners before they move on to primary schools. This is evidenced by research undertaken by OECD, Education Scotland, the Scottish Government and the EIS which conclude that early years provision with qualified teachers gives young children the best start in their education. The benefits of nursery schools and nursery classes with qualified teachers are becoming ever more apparent.

18. Section 48 of the Bill deals with the issue of flexibility. It is unclear how ‘flexibility’ will be defined and what it may mean for early learning outwith term-time. At present it is the experience of the EIS that “flexibility” has been used by local authorities as a mechanism to avoid their responsibilities to the pre-five cohort under Curriculum for Excellence 3-18. Overall, there has been a dilution of early years education delivered by teachers in Scotland over the last 10 years and the distinctions between ‘education’, ‘early learning’ and ‘childcare’ have become blurred. Much more clarity is now required surrounding the issues of ‘early learning’ and ‘childcare’.

19. Research carried out by the EIS in 2010 highlighted that the removal in 2002 of the statutory requirement to have teachers present in nursery education ‘gave local authorities greater flexibility in deploying teachers in pre-school centres’
(HMIE, 2007, cited in Adams, 20082). The consequences of this are outlined below:

“The resultant replacement of the teachers by nursery nurses ... had some unwelcome side effects: Many establishments were left with no employees qualified to degree level; early years expertise was lost; and a number of nursery classes found themselves being nominally led by the primary head teacher, or depute, who knew little of nursery pedagogy. In these situations, the quality of nursery education became solely dependent on the practice of nursery nurses.” (p198)

20. With regard to early learning and childcare, the EIS draws attention to one of the most important pieces of research which was carried out by the Effective Provision of Pre-School Education (EPPE) Project (2004). The EIS highlights that this study also concluded:

- Trained teachers were most effective in their interactions with children, using the most ‘sustained shared thinking’ interactions.

- Staff qualified at degree level, almost all of whom were teachers, were more likely to encourage the development of language and mathematics and to encourage children to take part in activities which provided cognitive challenge.

- Having qualified trained teachers working with children in pre-school settings (for a substantial proportion of time, and most importantly as the pedagogical leader) had the greatest impact on quality, and was linked specifically with better outcomes in pre-reading and social development.

- Where there were trained teachers there was a stronger educational emphasis, with the teachers playing a lead role in curriculum planning and offering positive pedagogical role modelling to less well-qualified staff.

21. In recent years, many local authorities have reduced the number of qualified nursery teachers employed by them. Nursery schools and nursery classes with appropriately qualified teachers means quality educational provision for our youngest learners before they move on to primary schools. The provision of nursery education and a sound educational experience is a right for all Scotland’s children. The EIS would welcome the increase in pre-school hours where these hours are delivered by qualified teachers.

22. There will be consequent demands on school accommodation. It is unclear how councils will be able to meet these. There will be a need for additional staffing as well.

Concluding Evidence

23. Figures obtained from the 2012 annual census of pupils and teachers in publicly funded schools in Scotland conducted in September 2012 reported that 75.4% of children had access to a GTCS registered teacher during the census week. http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0041/00410232.pdf

24. This means that 1 child in 4 in Scotland did not have access to a GTCS registered teacher during the census week. The Scottish Government policy of pre-five children having access to a teacher is now a matter of discretion for each of Scotland’s 32 local authorities. The EIS is clear that one of the key ways to address the inequality of poverty is by providing a sound educational experience for 3 and 4 year olds through nursery education provided by fully qualified nursery teachers. Scottish education law should be amended to require local authorities to provide nursery education for 3-5 year olds with qualified teachers in the same way as they are required to provide primary and secondary education.

Educational Institute of Scotland
Executive Summary

The focus of the Faculty of Advocates’ evidence is on the legal effects of the proposed Bill and its coherence with other aspects of the law. The Faculty appreciates the commitment of the Parliament to the welfare of children and young people but has reservations about the efficacy of the proposed legislation to advance the interests of children and young people. The Bill proposes an assumption by the state of functions that have historically in Scotland been the responsibility of parents. The proposed measures place an overlay on an existing structure and measures that are already in place, without specifying how they are designed to function in relation to existing measures.

Part 1 - Rights of Children: This part of the Bill lacks coherence and seems to promote an over-complicated, uncertain and fragmented approach to ensuring that the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child is intrinsic to Scottish public life going forward. The Convention has been signed and ratified by the UK Government and so the United Kingdom is already bound in international law to comply with it. The obligation for the Scottish Ministers to lay a report before the Scottish Parliament every three years setting out how the Scottish Ministers have complied with their obligations is otiose given the existing reporting obligation under the Convention.

Part 2 - Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland: The Faculty has no overarching concerns about this part of the Bill. It seems to make sensible and coherent proposals for the protection of Scottish children. It is not clear why responsibility for the monitoring of the implementation of the provisions of the Convention has not also been given to the Commissioner rather than relying on the fragmented approach set out in Part 1 of the Bill.

Part 3 - Children’s Services Planning: If it is intended that the children’s services plan include education services provided by a local authority, the Faculty considers such intention should be clearly and expressly stated. The onerous obligations imposed on local authorities and other service providers in preparing plans every three years can only be met if there are sufficient resources both to provide the services to children and to provide the reporting on such provision. The Faculty is concerned that the terms of clause 17 are both wide and far reaching and appear to misunderstand the nature of the functions conferred on a local authority, a health board or any other service provider by Part 3 of the Bill. The Faculty considers that clause 17 purports to allow the Scottish Ministers to transfer the delivery of services to such a joint board, where the primary responsibility for delivery of services is not conferred by the Bill, but by other legislation. Clause 17 has the potential for confusion and legal challenge.

Part 4 – Named Persons: This part of the Bill dilutes the legal role of parents, whether or not there is any difficulty in the way that parents are fulfilling their statutory responsibilities. It undermines family autonomy. It provides a potential platform for interference with private and family life in a way that could violate article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights. The Faculty accepts that there may be cases where a ‘named person’ will be of assistance but the provision is not focused on the children for whom the measure would be helpful and it does not cohere with other similar measures for such children. No attempt is made in the Bill to integrate the role of a named person with similar roles when other services are provided.

Information sharing: It is not necessary to violate the right to privacy and abrogate the data protection rights of all children and families in Scotland. The open transfer of data in the manner contemplated in the Bill represents a serious intrusion on individual rights. The data protection principles set out in the Data Protection Act 1998 were developed to secure an appropriate balance between the need to process information and the need to protect the rights of the subject or source of the information. It is not clear how that balance is achieved in these proposals, which may in any event relate to matters reserved to Westminster.

Part 5 - Child’s Plan: The Faculty suggests that such a child’s plan should only be made where no other statutory plan is in place for the child. The Faculty considers the definition of “wellbeing need” to be so wide as to apply to every child in Scotland. Part 5 provides no mechanism for assessment of whether a child has a wellbeing need. Where there is no period for assessment, no provision for request for assessment and no provision for ongoing assessment of every child in Scotland, the time limiting provisions of clause 33 (2) are meaningless. The Faculty respectfully questions whether, if Part 5 is to be made law, it is necessary to exclude children who have a parent who is a member of the regular forces. Co-operation already exists between local authorities, the Reporter to the Children’s Hearing and the armed forces in cases where a prospective member of the armed forces is subject to a compulsory supervision order.

Part 6 - Early Learning and Childcare: The Faculty queries the necessity for this Part of the Bill. Section 1(1A) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 already allows the Scottish Ministers to prescribe the children for whom pre-school education must be made available. Section 1(1B) allows the amount to be prescribed. Using the Bill to achieve these objects fragments the provision over different legislation. The facility to offer alternative arrangements for pre-school children is also already met by section 27 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.

Part 7 – Corporate Parenting: Children do not need “corporate parents”. These provisions are equating parents with corporate entities. If this part of the Bill were to become law it might be thought to be an intrusion on families’ lives and on natural parenting. It is difficult on the basis of the content of the Bill to appreciate how the statutory framework proposed is going to provide a basis for the stated policy goals to be achieved. The duties of corporate parents are broadly defined. Many are vague in their terms. The policy behind the Bill appears to be diluted by the selective approach taken to identifying which public bodies are to be burdened with the corporate parenting duties. The Bill as drafted does not make clear the extent to which corporate parenting duties are enforceable by legal action. Actions for judicial review may conceivably be brought on the basis a corporate parent has failed to fulfil their duties. It is easy to conceive of a legal battleground emerging in relation to how the statutory duties are to be interpreted in the context of the qualification that the duties are to be exercised by the corporate parents “in so far as consistent with the proper exercise of its other functions”.

Part 8 – Aftercare: The extension of section 29 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 to confer a discretion to provide after-care to young persons who were formerly looked after by a local authority is extended to the age of 26. This gives formerly looked after children an advantage over children brought up by their own parents in extending the provision of assistance, potentially including financial assistance, beyond the age at which aliment provided by parents ceases (that being age 25). Unless the confusion as to which local authority is responsible (i.e. the one where the young person is present or the one which last looked after the young person) is resolved there is a risk that the new measures will be less effective than the Scottish Parliament intends.

Part 9 – Counselling Services: No definition has yet been provided of who is to be considered an “eligible child”, so it is difficult to consider in any meaningful way the impact this proposed part of the legislation will have.

Part 10 – Support for Kinship Care: In clause 65 (3), a “guardian” is excluded from being considered a “qualifying person” for the purposes of clause 65(1). The person who is a guardian, is exactly the kind of person who may benefit from access to the support being considered in this part. There is some confusion in the definition of “kinship care order”. The right in section 2(1)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 is not “free standing”, being one of a number of rights that exist in order to enable a person to fulfil parental responsibilities.

Part 11 - Adoption Register: The Faculty notes the increase in children placed for adoption in 2010/11 but opines that increase was more likely the result of the introduction of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 in 2009 and not as a direct result of the establishment of the voluntary national register. In the context of contested adoption proceedings it is unlikely that a parent will consent to their child’s details being included in the proposed statutory register as required by clause 13C(2)(a). The Faculty is concerned that delays will be caused in identifying adoption placements for such children.

Part 12 – Other Reforms: The definition of “relevant person” in clause 71 for the purposes of an appeal under section 44A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act includes persons who are “deemed” to be “relevant persons” in the children’s hearing where the child is subject to a compulsory supervision order. However it does not include the full range of persons who fall within the statutory definition of “relevant person” in section 200 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Part 13 – General: The Faculty questions whether enshrining the policy of Getting it Right for Every Child in terms of clause 74 is necessary or appropriate. The use of “wellbeing” to signify these objectives, risks detracting from the standard and well-understood test relating to welfare or best interests of children. There is a well-developed case law on welfare and best interests which is found in areas such as family law, child law and immigration law. Introducing a new, but related, concept may cause confusion.

FACULTY OF ADVOCATES RESPONSE

General

1. The Faculty of Advocates is the independent bar in Scotland. It exists, not for its own benefit, nor the benefit of its members, but to serve the public interest by securing to the people of Scotland the benefits of an independent referral bar. The Faculty has unrivalled general experience in litigation in the civil courts of Scotland and also includes members with particular experience and expertise in the law relating to children and young people. It is on the basis of that experience and expertise that the Faculty of Advocates offers written evidence to the Scottish Parliament in relation to the proposed Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. The Faculty does not comment on matters of policy, as these are for the Parliament. The focus of the Faculty’s evidence is on the legal effects of the proposed Bill and its coherence with other aspects of the law.

2. The Faculty of Advocates appreciates the commitment of the Parliament to the welfare of children and young people. The Faculty does however have reservations about the efficacy of the proposed legislation to advance the interests of children and young people. It is, of course, for the Parliament to determine policy, but policy does not require to be stated in legislation. The function of legislation is to provide a legal framework within which policy is given effect. The law requires to be certain and to be enforceable. Aspects of the present Bill are statements of policy and as such are neither certain, nor enforceable for the benefit of children.

3. While the intentions of the Bill are clearly benign, it does have some potentially insidious aspects. It proposes an assumption by the state of functions that have historically in Scotland been the responsibility of parents. State intervention in the private and family lives of its citizens should be confined to cases where this is “necessary in a democratic society” (to use the words of article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights). This means that interference in the individual case should be justified by a pressing social need and should be proportionate to the need in that case. By making indiscriminate provision for possible interference in the lives of all children, rather than providing for focused intervention when the need arises, the Bill risks enshrining a structure that has the potential to be used to undermine families.

4. This brings us to a third aspect of the Bill that causes concern. The proposed measures place an overlay on existing structure and measures that are already in place, without specifying how they are designed to function in relation to existing measures. This is particularly so in relation to parental responsibility for children, but also applies to existing provision for local authority and children’s hearing interventions under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 and the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, and the interventions in relation to additional support needs in the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 (as amended in 2009). There is a risk of confusion and inefficiency, which will be to the detriment of children and families.

Part 1 - Rights of Children

5. The Faculty does not consider that Part 1 of the Bill further develops the rights of children and young people in Scotland to a significant extent. Reference is made to the Faculty’s response of 29 November 2011 to the Consultation Paper in relation to the then proposed Rights of Children and Young People Bill. As noted in that response, the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (“UNCRC”) has been signed and ratified by the UK Government and so the United Kingdom is already bound in international law to comply with it. In relation to devolved matters, it is the responsibility of the Scottish Government to comply with the United Kingdom’s obligations in international law and where Convention rights are at issue, they may be justiciable in the Scottish Courts. The Scottish Government has already published reports on the implementation of the UNCRC in Scotland and the 2007 Report concluded that “it is the policy of the Scottish Executive to reflect the provisions of the Convention wherever possible in the development of policy and legislation”. Assuming that the Scottish Government continues in good faith to adhere to and implement that commitment, this part of the Bill should therefore be unnecessary to ensure that all decisions of the Scottish Government and its day-to-day business have regard to the Convention. Although clause 1 may provide scope for judicial review of the Scottish Ministers in some circumstances, the Faculty questions the added value which this part of the Bill would make to the rights of children and young people having regard to the following factors:

- As services for children and young people are delivered at a local level by local authorities and other public bodies, the possibility of judicial review of a Scottish Government decision is of limited value in terms of actual service delivery;

- The Scottish Government’s policy is already to reflect the provisions of the Convention in the development of policy and legislation; and

- The Scottish Government have reported and intend to continue to report on the implementation of the Convention in Scotland.

1 The Faculty notes in passing that at present, the ability or otherwise of the Scottish Ministers to take any steps to promote the “Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict” in Scotland is likely be constrained by the fact that defence is a reserved matter in terms of Schedule 5 of the Scotland Act 1998. In any event, the main thrust of the Optional Protocol is to prevent compulsory recruitment of persons under 18 into the armed forces as well as their direct involvement in hostilities. Regulation 4 of the Armed Forces (Enlistment) Regulations 2009/2057 provides that a person cannot be enlisted under the age of 16 and regulation 5 provides that a person cannot be enlisted under the age of 18 without the consent of a person with parental responsibilities. Furthermore, a person cannot be enlisted unless they ‘offer’ to do so which militates against compulsory recruitment. In practice, members of the armed forces do not see active service until they are 18 years of age.

2 See ZH (Tanzania) [2011] 2 WLR 148

6. Clause 1(3) imposes an obligation on the Scottish Ministers to lay a report before the Scottish Parliament every three years setting out in essence, how they have complied with their obligations under sub-clauses 1(1) and 1(2). There is of course already a requirement in section 10 of the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 to lay an annual report before the Scottish Parliament. That report must include a review of the steps taken to fulfil each of the functions of the Children’s Commissioner for Scotland (the “Commissioner”) (section 10(2)). The general function of the Commissioner to promote and safeguard the rights of children and young people (subsection 4(1)) is subject to particular requirements in subsection 4(2) to:

- promote awareness and understanding of the rights of children and young people;
- keep under review the law, policy and practice relating to the rights of children and young people with a view to assessing the adequacy and effectiveness of such law, policy and practice
- promote best practice by service providers; and
- promote, commission, undertake and publish research on matters relating to the rights of children and young people.

8. There would seem therefore to be a high degree of overlap between the report proposed in terms of clause 1(3) of the Bill and the report which the Commissioner is charged with laying before the Parliament.

9. Indeed, the way in which the Scottish Ministers comply with their obligations in terms of clause 1 including the very production of the triennial report proposed by the Bill, would it seems to us, also be subject to the scrutiny of the Commissioner.

10. As well as overlap there seems to be a certain circularity in these provisions and it is not immediately clear to us what mischief they seek to remedy given the role of the Children’s Commissioner.

11. Further, in terms of Article 44 of the Convention, the United Kingdom has undertaken to submit a report to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child every 5 years. That report is to inform the UN Committee on measures adopted by the United Kingdom to give effect to Convention rights and progress made on the enjoyment of those rights. That being so, to avoid duplication of effort, if there is to be any such report submitted by the Scottish Ministers, it would make sense for that report to be timed so as to feed in to the report of the United Kingdom Government to the UN Committee.

12. Clause 2 of the Bill obliges each of the authorities listed in Schedule 1 (per clause 3) to publish (separately or jointly) a report of “what steps it has taken in that period to secure better or further effect within its areas of responsibility of the UNCRC requirements."

13. In the first place, the basis for inclusion on the list in Schedule 1 as presently drafted is unclear. Secondly, the Faculty cannot understand why a Schedule 1 authority is required to publish a report on what steps it has taken to secure better or further effect of UNCRC requirements, yet there is no corresponding duty imposed to take such steps. This too seems to us to lack coherence.

14. The list of authorities in Schedule 1 may be modified by the Scottish Ministers (subclause 3(2)) to include what is described as a ‘publicly owned company’. A publicly owned company is defined as any company which is either wholly owned by the Scottish Ministers or is itself a person “listed or a person within a description listed in schedule 1” (subclause 3(5)). The categorisation of a publicly owned company as suitable for inclusion in schedule 1 by reference to the fact that it is already so included lacks coherence.

15. In addition, given the role of the Commissioner set out in subsection 4(2)(c) of the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 (supra) and having regard to the definition of ‘service providers’ therein, this provision again seems to us to create an area of overlap with and repetition of the role of the Commissioner. Instead of assuring the gradual absorption of the principles of the Convention into Scottish public policy, the Faculty is of the view that the effect of the Bill as drafted can only lead to a confusion of responsibilities which will delay or prevent its assimilation or at the very least, lead to an inconsistency of approach by different schedule 1 authorities.

16. As presently drafted, this part of the Bill is unnecessary, lacks coherence and seems instead to promote an over-complicated, uncertain and fragmented approach to ensuring that the Convention is intrinsic to Scottish public life going forward.

Part 2 - Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland

17. Part 2 of the Bill amends the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 to extend the investigative powers of the Commissioner. In terms of the Bill the Commissioner is empowered to carry out investigations into the decisions made or actions taken by service providers which affect not just children and young people in general (a “general investigation”) but also a particular child or young person (an “individual investigation”).

18. In addition, the Commissioner will now be empowered to require a response from service providers to recommendations he may make in a report to Parliament. That power is subject to a requirement on the Commissioner to publish any service provider statements made in response although that requirement is discretionary in respect of individual investigations.

19. The Faculty understands the reasons for the broadening of the Commissioner’s remit in this regard and have no overarching concerns about Part 2 of the Bill which seems to us to make sensible and coherent proposals for the protection of Scottish children. It is not clear why then, responsibility for the monitoring of the implementation of the provisions of the Convention has not also been given to the Commissioner rather than relying on the fragmented approach set out in Part 1 of the Bill.

Part 3 - Children’s Services Planning

20. The Faculty understands the aim to ensure integrated planning for all children and that such integrated planning results in children receiving a better service from all those involved in the provision of services.

21. It is understood that the provisions of Part 3 are intended to replace the existing duty on local authorities to prepare and publish a plan for children’s services contained in section 19 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 and the supporting duties in sections 20 and 21 of that Act. The services for children covered by the present duty are limited (in terms of section 19 (2)) to services provided under Part II of the 1995 Act and in terms of the enactments mentioned in section 5 (1B) of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968.

22. Clause 7 defines “children’s service” much more broadly and expressly includes services provided wholly or mainly to, or for the benefit of children with a need for additional support in learning (at sub-clause (1) (b) where (b) first occurs in that sub-clause). Services for children with such a need are provided by local authorities and health boards in a variety of ways. The primary duty for such services rests on an education authority (in terms of the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 amended in 2009). Services may be required from a local authority in exercise of functions in terms of the 1995 Act. Services may be required from a health board in terms of, for example, speech and language therapy and occupational therapy. The clause 7 definition of “children’s service” would also include all services provided by a local authority in its education function in terms of duties imposed by the said 2004 Act and by the Education (Scotland) Act 1980. If it is intended that the children’s services plan include education services provided by a local authority, the Faculty considers such intention should be clearly and expressly included.

23. Part 3 imposes a duty to prepare such a plan every three years with consultation with each of the other service providers on the content of the plan with a requirement for agreement on the content of the plan from each other service provider. In addition, an annual duty to report on provision, achievement of aims and outcomes for children is imposed. This will impose onerous obligations on the other service providers. For example, consultation will be required from each of the 32 local authorities with the Scottish Court Service on the preparation of 32 plans. Each of those 32 local authorities will require to consult with and obtain reports from the Scottish Court Service on the provision of service, whether the aims in clause 9 have been achieved by the Scottish Court Service and the outcomes for children who have used Scottish Court Service provision on an annual basis. Such onerous obligations can only be met with the provision of sufficient resources to both provide the services to children and provide the reporting on such provision.
Clause 9 provides for planning for children’s services to include the achievement of prescribed aims including the aim to provide services in a way which is most integrated from the point of view of recipients. The reviewing and reporting obligations imposed by Part 3 include reporting of the level of achievement of the aims prescribed in clause 9. This will require significant annual consultation with service users as to their perceptions of the integration of services. The Faculty considers this to be a policy aim and not one which is suitable for inclusion in legislation.

The Faculty is concerned that the terms of clause 17 are both wide and far reaching and appear to misunderstand the nature of the functions conferred on a local authority, a health board or any other service provider by Part 3 of the Bill. Part 3 imposes duties in relation to planning, publishing and reporting. Part 3 does not impose duties to provide particular services. For example Part 3 does not impose a duty on a local authority in respect of the education of children. It does not confer the education function on a local authority. That function is conferred by the Education (Scotland) Act 1980.

Clause 16 provides for the making of directions by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by Part 3. That would mean that the Scottish Ministers had the power to make directions about the planning, publishing and reporting functions conferred by Part 3.

Clause 17 applies where the Scottish Ministers consider that a local authority and each relevant health board are not exercising a function conferred on them by Part 3 of the Bill. Accordingly, clause 17 applies where the Scottish Ministers consider that a local authority is not exercising the planning, publishing and reporting functions imposed by Part 3. Clause 17 then goes on to give powers to the Scottish Ministers to make directions and then includes provision (at sub-clause 6) that the Scottish Ministers may constitute a joint board of a local authority and a health board to exercise those functions. However, sub-clause (7) provides that the Scottish Ministers may order the transfer of property, staff and the provision of services to such a joint board. The Faculty considers that clause 17 purports to allow the Scottish Ministers to transfer the delivery of services to such a joint board. As noted above the primary responsibility for delivery of services is not conferred by Part 3, but by other legislation. Clause 17 has the potential for confusion and legal challenge, which is likely to result in the expenditure of considerable public resources, thus diverting attention and funds from the primary object, namely the provision of services to children.

Part 4 – Named Persons

The persons principally responsible for carrying out the functions mentioned in clause 19(5) of the Bill are a child’s parents. They are charged with safeguarding and promoting a child’s health development and welfare and with offering direction and guidance (Children (Scotland) Act 1995, section 1(1)). It is primarily the responsibility of a parent to seek assistance if required by their child. This part of the Bill dilutes the legal role of parents, whether or not there is any difficulty in the way that parents are fulfilling their statutory responsibilities. It undermines... family autonomy. It provides a potential platform for interference with private and family life in a way that could violate article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

29. The Faculty accepts that there may be cases where a ‘named person’ will be of assistance. The difficulty with this Bill is that the provision is not focused on the children for whom the measure would be helpful and it does not cohere with other similar measures for such children.

30. As the Bill is drafted it results in duplication and risks causing confusion in the provision of services. For example there is already a person named in a co-ordinated support plan under the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004, to co-ordinate services for the child, including social work, health, or other services. When social work services are provided to children and families there will be a key worker. This will apply whether a child is subject to compulsory measures under the children’s hearing, or in receipt of services following an assessment under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. No attempt is made in the Bill to integrate the role of a named person with similar roles when other services are provided.

Information sharing

31. The issue of whether these provisions are article 8 compliant is exacerbated by clauses 26 and 27. It is understood that in the past failures to share information have resulted in failures to protect children, but this has arisen from failure to understand that there are circumstances in which data sharing is necessary, appropriate and lawful. The Information Commissioner has issued helpful guidance on 28 March 2013, indicating that where a professional believes that there is a risk to a child or young person that may lead to harm, proportionate sharing of information is unlikely to constitute a breach of the Data Protection Act 1998. It is not therefore necessary to violate the right to privacy and abrogate the data protection rights of all children and families in Scotland. The open transfer of data in the manner contemplated in the Bill represents a serious intrusion on individual rights.

32. The data protection principles set out in the Data Protection Act 1998 were developed to secure an appropriate balance between the need to process information and the need to protect the rights of the subject or source of the information. It is not clear how that balance is achieved in these proposals. For example:

- If a child or parent visits a health professional with a confidential medical query, will that be shared via the named person with all those involved with the child? Is this the end of confidential provision of birth control for a young person, or the end of confidential help for a parent seeking treatment for a mild mental illness?

- If a spurious allegation is made against a parent, how will the parent know and what will be the facility for putting the record straight? Such situations arise in connection with contact disputes between separated parents and information sharing adds the potential for a further layer of complexity to an already fraught situation.

- If a child misbehaves at school will that information be passed on to all professionals involved with the child, to his/her embarrassment and potential future detriment?
- Who will decide whether information about parents’ political or religious affiliations should be shared?

33. There is a need to ensure that if there is to be data sharing there are protections for the data subject. This applies to sharing between service providers. Also, the prohibition on passing on information in clause 27(3) does not sufficiently assert the necessity to prevent data being released to persons or organisations who are not bound by the data protection principles of the 1998 Act.

34. The Faculty notes that data protection is a reserved matter under the Scotland Act 1998. To the extent that the proposed measures interfere with protection for individuals in this area they are open to question on the basis that they fall outwith the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.

Part 5 - Child’s Plan

35. The Faculty notes that the purpose of the Bill is to ensure the integrated provision of services for children. Part 5 makes no reference to the integration of the “child’s plan” with existing plans and statutory orders which provide for both targeted intervention and are designed to meet a child’s needs including but not limited to compulsory supervision orders, Co-ordinated Support Plans, and plans arising from assessments in terms of section 23 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. The effect of the failure to anticipate that children with “wellbeing needs” may be the subject of existing plans will give rise to confusion over delivery of services to the child.

36. The Faculty suggests that such a child’s plan should only be made where no other statutory plan is in place for the child.

37. The Faculty considers the definition of “wellbeing need” to be so wide as to apply to every child in Scotland. Please see the Faculty’s comments in relation to clause 74.

38. Part 5 provides no mechanism for assessment of whether a child has a wellbeing need. Clause 33 (2) provides for the preparation of a child’s plan as soon as reasonably practicable but does not specify the event after which the plan is to be prepared as soon as reasonably practicable. Where there is no period for assessment, no provision for request for assessment and no provision for ongoing assessment of every child in Scotland, the time limiting provisions of clause 33 (2) are meaningless.

39. The Faculty respectfully questions whether, if Part 5 is to be made law, it is necessary to exclude children who have a parent who is a member of the regular forces. This appears to be to avoid serving soldiers etc. being subject to child’s plans. Co-operation already exists between local authorities, the Reporter to the Children’s Hearing and the armed forces in cases where a prospective member of the armed forces is subject to a compulsory supervision order. It should be possible for future policy and legislation to build on that existing co-operation.

Part 6 - Early Learning and Childcare

40. The Faculty respectfully queries the necessity for this Part of the Bill. Section 1(1A) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 already allows the Scottish Ministers to prescribe the children for whom pre-school education must be made available. Section 1(1B) allows the amount to be prescribed. Using the Bill to achieve these objects fragments the provision over different legislation. It has the appearance of making a political, rather than a practical, point.

41. Equally the facility to offer alternative arrangements for pre-school children is already met by section 27 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 which relates to provision of day care for children in need.

42. This part of the Bill, in common with other parts, suffers from imposing an overlay on existing legislation, without co-ordinating the provision. It results in greater complexity and less clarity about services for children.

43. The provisions in relation to children who are eligible for the various types of provision are also complex and confusing. In contrast to the provision itself, eligibility is to be established by reference to other legislation (the 1980 Act) and other parts of the Bill (Part 10 relating to kinship care). If this is designed to give greater rights to parents and children then the criteria for eligibility should be transparent, otherwise members of the public will not be able to test whether their children are receiving what is due.

Part 7 – Corporate Parenting

44. Children do not need “corporate parents”. These provisions are equating parents with corporate entities. This may be thought to be an intrusion on families’ lives and on natural parenting.

45. It is difficult on the basis of the content of the bill to appreciate how the statutory framework proposed is going to provide a basis for the stated policy goals to be achieved.

46. The duties of corporate parents are broadly defined. The specific duties corporate parents are to have are listed in clause 52 of the bill. Many are vague in their terms. An example being the duty in terms of clause 52(c) “to promote the interests of these children and young people.” It is on any view very difficult to discern in practical terms what is meant by this.

47. It is not clear how the public bodies listed have been chosen. For example, it is not clear why The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service should have any more or less of a duty towards a looked after child or young person than they have to any child or young person, or to any person.
48. There are certain bodies listed in respect of which it is at least dubious that there is a need to give a statutory reminder that they have duties to vulnerable children. Examples include The Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland and Children’s Hearing Scotland.

49. The policy behind the bill appears to be diluted by the selective approach taken to identifying which public bodies are to be burdened with the corporate parenting duties. There are many public bodies that deal with children and young people that are not included. Examples of such bodies not listed in schedule 3 include The Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, The Scottish Prison Service, The Royal Botanical Gardens, The National Museums of Scotland and The Scottish Ambulance Service Board.

50. It would appear that there is only very limited mechanism to monitor compliance by corporate parents with their sometimes nebulous duties. The bill is silent on how compliance is to be effected beyond the requirement to report.

51. The key phrase in clause 52 is that a corporate parent is to exercise its corporate parenting duties “in so far as it is consistent with the proper exercise of its other functions”. The clause identifies the tension which will be inherent at times in relation to certain public bodies. For example, it is at least conceivable that The Scottish Legal Aid Board would be limited in its promotion of the interests of those children and young people (in terms of clause 52) by the constraint of their ever-diminishing budget.

52. There is also no provision for corporate parents to have regard to the effect that measures which they might take in relation to their various duties may negatively impact upon other public bodies. These include both those public bodies which have been identified as corporate parents and those which have not. For example, it is conceivable that The Scottish Court Service, The Scottish Police Authority and The Scottish Prison Service have overlapping responsibilities for looked after children and young people which could be brought into conflict.

53. The Bill as drafted does not make clear the extent to which corporate parenting duties are enforceable by legal action. Is it intended to extend legal liability in the context of private actions or actions for judicial review? Actions for judicial review may conceivably be brought on the basis that in some particular respect in relation to an individual a corporate parent has failed to fulfil their widely framed corporate parenting duties. It is easy to conceive of a legal battleground emerging in relation to how the statutory duties are to be interpreted in the context of the qualification that the duties are to be exercised by the corporate parents “in so far as consistent with the proper exercise of its other functions”.

Part 8 – Aftercare

54. The Faculty notes that section 29 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 is extended to confer a discretion to provide after-care to young persons who were formerly looked after by a local authority to the age of 26. The duty and power to act following an assessment is also extended. This gives formerly looked after children an advantage over children brought up by their own parents in so far as it extends the provision of assistance, including potentially financial assistance beyond the age at which aliment provided by parents ceases (that being age 25).

55. The new powers and duties in the Bill do however beg the question as to which local authority has the duty and power to act. The Children (Scotland) Act 1995, section 29(2) allows an authority to provide advice, guidance and assistance to persons present in their area. Section 29(5) provides for an assessment by the authority for the area where the young person is present. The Support and Assistance of Young People Leaving Care (Scotland) Regulations 2003 (SSI 2003/608) make further provision for the exercise of these powers and duties, but assume that they are imposed on or given to the local authority that last looked after the young person. Unless the confusion as to which local authority is responsible (ie the one where the young person is present or the one which last looked after the young person) is resolved there is a risk that the new measures will be less effective than the Scottish Parliament intends.

Part 9 – Counselling Services

56. The terms of clause 61 make it an imperative for a local authority to “secure that counselling services” are made available for parents, or individuals with parental rights and responsibilities, in respect of an “eligible child”. No definition has yet been provided of who is to be considered an “eligible child”, so it is difficult to consider in any meaningful way the impact this proposed part of the legislation will have.

57. It may be a laudable aim to ensure that proper counselling services are available for parents and those with the responsibility of caring for and bringing up children. There is a concern however that where only certain types of counselling service are prescribed by order of the Scottish Ministers, the local authority in response to the imperative imposed, focusses solely on the provision of those services to the prejudice of others. That risk is particularly high when funding for local authorities is very limited, and funding for existing services is difficult.

58. The clause as presently drafted highlights the difficulty noted in the introduction where this is presently a statement of policy with indeterminate eligibility and effect.

Part 10 – Support for Kinship Care

59. The overall aim of clause 64 to 66 is to ensure that those people who are not parents, or indeed the local authority, who take on the role of looking after children, many of whom often have difficult pasts and backgrounds, receive ongoing support in that role. The same criticism applies to this part as applied to clauses 61 – 63; this is presently a statement of policy with indeterminate eligibility and effect.

60. Particular concern arises in relation to clause 65 (3), whereby a “guardian” is excluded from being considered a “qualifying person” for the purposes of clause 65(1). It seems that the person who is a guardian, is exactly the kind of person who may benefit from access to the support being considered in this part. The Faculty’s interpretation of the term “guardian” would include those people who have been asked by either close family or close friends to step into the role of parent in the event something happens to the parent. These would be appointees under section 7 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. They will, as a result of having accepted the appointment as guardian, assume parental rights and responsibilities for a child, who may be an eligible child. Their appointment would not necessitate making a formal application for a section 11 order of either type set out in clause 65(1) but they are likely to be one of the class of people identified as “qualifying persons” in clause 65(2)(a) and (b).

61. There is also some confusion in the definition of “kinship care order”. The right in section 2(1)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 is not “free standing”. It is one of a number of rights that exist in order to enable a person to fulfil parental responsibilities. A residence order confers all parental responsibilities and parental rights, other than contact (section 11(12)). If however an applicant wishes to be treated fully as a substitute parent, then one order that may be conferred (and on one view the appropriate order) is an order appointing that person as guardian under section 11(2)(h). If an application is made for a guardianship order then the carer and child will be excluded from the benefits of this part of the Act. An applicant may not realise that this is the case until it is too late, or may be deterred from applying for guardianship. If guardianship is in the interests of the child, it would be unfortunate were a choice to have to be made between an application for guardianship and eligibility for support for kinship care.

62. There are sound reasons to consider excluding from clause 65(3) the words “or guardian”.

Part 11 - Adoption Register

63. The Faculty notes the aim of the Bill in increasing the number of children placed for adoption by the enshrining in statute of a national adoption register. The Faculty notes the increase in children placed for adoption in 2010/11 but opines that increase was more likely the result of the introduction of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 in 2009 and not as a direct result of the establishment of the voluntary national register.

64. The Faculty notes the prohibition on the inclusion of children without the consent of their parent or any person with parental responsibilities or parental rights in relation to the child. A person who is not a parent but who holds parental responsibilities and parental rights is not required to consent to the adoption of a child. Their views may be relevant to the making of an adoption order but their consent is not required (see sections 31 and 83 of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007). Parental responsibilities and parental rights cover a wide range of types of involvement in the life of a child, and may be confined to some minimal contact in terms of a court order. The Faculty does not agree that the consent of a person with parental responsibilities or parental rights but who is not a parent of the child should be required before the child could be included on the register.
65. Further, the Faculty understands that adoption agencies include the details of children who they consider ought to be placed for adoption on the existing register but without identifying information. Such a practice allows for the early identification of adoption placements for children who may be the subject of contested proceedings either for an adoption order or for a permanence order with authority to adopt. In the context of such contested proceedings it is unlikely that a parent will consent to their child’s details being included in the proposed statutory register as required by clause 13C (2) (a). The Faculty is concerned that delays will be caused in identifying adoption placements for such children. The Faculty agrees that the process of placing a child for adoption requires to be conducted as quickly as possible while ensuring legal rights and obligations are protected. The placing of unnecessary barriers to the inclusion of children on the register is not conducive to minimising delay.

Part 12 – Other Reforms

Clause 71

66. The Faculty notes that the definition of “relevant person” for the purposes of an appeal under section 44A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act includes persons who are “deemed” to be “relevant persons” in the children’s hearing where the child is subject to a compulsory supervision order, but does not include the full range of persons who fall within the statutory definition of “relevant person” in section 200. This may be of material importance given the recent extension to the definition contained in article 3 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (Review of Contact Directions and Definition of Relevant Person) Order 2013/193, which includes all parents, other than those deprived of parental responsibilities and rights by court order. Also the new section 44A(6)(b) applies only when a compulsory supervision order has been made. Should it extend to cases where there is an interim compulsory supervision order, or even simply a referral to the hearing?

Part 13 - General

67. The Faculty appreciates the policy underpinning clause 74, but respectfully questions whether enshrining the policy of Getting it Right for Every Child is necessary or appropriate. There is little that can be said to be certain or enforceable about the list of objectives in clause 74(2). The important function of legislation is to put in place mechanisms through which the interests of children can be served, rather than to state objectives that are vague and uncertain.

68. Further the use of “wellbeing” to signify these objectives, risks detracting from the standard and well-understood test relating to welfare or best interests of children. There is a well-developed case law on welfare and best interests which is found in areas such as family law, child law and immigration law. Introducing a new, but related concept may cause confusion.

Faculty of Sport & Exercise Medicine

1. Having looked at the Bill as presented, it was noted that there was nothing pertaining to the promotion of physical activity in children and young people in Scotland. As the Faculty of Sport and Exercise Medicine we believe that as a Nation we should be promoting exercise in our children and young people from birth through an early age at Nursery level and following this up with continuing promotion of exercise at Primary and Secondary Schools up to the age of 18 and thereafter hoping that this leads onto an active adult life with the well publicised benefits to long-term health and well-being.

2. The evidence for the Faculty making this appeal comes from two major documents of which I am sure some of the Ministers will be aware. These documents are:

- Start Active Stay Active: A report on physical activity for health from the Four Home Countries Chief Medical Officers [2011].

3. I have attached these documents for your information.

4. The Scottish Government is obviously very keen to promote sport in our country as can be seen by the high profile events including The Commonwealth Games in Glasgow and the Ryder Cup in 2014 at Gleneagles and the unfortunate failed bid for the Youth Olympics in 2018 as well as numerous other top level events.

5. As a Faculty we feel that it is also imperative for the Scottish Parliament to introduce legislation to increase the level of physical activity from birth but also in our nurseries, primary and secondary schools.

6. The reasons behind the Faculty promoting physical activity are well documented in the reports above but in summary these include:

- In the early years, immediate and long-term benefits for physical and psychological well-being
- In children and young people, there are numerous health benefits including reduced body fat and promotion of healthy weight, enhanced bone and cardio-metabolic health and psychological well-being
- These benefits can also lead to improved physical and psychological benefits in later life and could lead to reduced morbidity and mortality from numerous well documented illnesses such as diabetes and coronary heart disease to name but two.
7. The types and amounts of physical activities are also well documented in the reports and could be relatively easily introduced and promoted at very little additional expense especially given the potential savings for the NHS burden in future years.

8. I hope that you will examine the documents as suggested and take on board the Faculty of Sport and Exercise Medicines advice to include legislation in the Children and Young Peoples Bill with regards to the promotion of Physical Activity.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Falkirk Children’s Commission

Introduction

1. Falkirk Children’s Commission continues to support the Scottish Government’s ambitions, as set out in the Children and Young People Bill, to achieve better outcomes for children and young people.

2. We welcome the Call for Evidence as this provides a further opportunity to provide views on the issues which still give us some concern.

3. It remains challenging to provide comprehensive feedback in the continuing absence of the secondary legislation and guidance as many of the practical implications of the Bill will only be clarified within the secondary legislation.

Children’s Rights (Part 1 & 2)

4. Falkirk Children’s Commission agrees that the proposals may provide improved scrutiny and transparency in relation to children’s rights as well as raising awareness and providing a higher profile. We continue to believe the duties should be extended to all public bodies.

5. Whilst the extension to the Powers of the Children’s Commissioner is welcomed, concern still remains regarding the interface between these powers and the already existing powers of redress (ASL Act; Children’s Hearing; “Who Cares?” Scotland; Care Inspectorate; Local Authority complaints procedures; Local Children’s Rights Services; Ombudsman). It is therefore critical that the guidance clarifies that this is only one of several options for redress, and clear criteria will be required to avoid duplication.

6. We noted that experience from elsewhere suggests that the Children’s Commissioner would only undertake 1 to 4 individual investigations per year. We continue to believe that such investigations should only be undertaken where an individual’s situation will have a national resonance.

7. The proposed increased resources for the office of the Children’s Commissioner seems excessive given the projected minimum level of impact and particularly in light of on-going concerns regarding potential under-funding of other parts of the Bill.

Getting it Right for Every Child

8. We continue to welcome the principle of a single point of contact for children and young people in universal services in the role of the “named person”. However concerns remain about the level of challenges this poses in relation to:

- the scale of the remit.
• the required competencies and level of decision making and the potential resulting consequences for resourcing/capacity issues. There will also be training requirements in relation to the knowledge and skills required by the workforce.

• the lack of national IT support or coherent guidance.

• the inclusion of the role of the named person in legislation but not the role of the lead professional means that the guidance will be crucial in clarifying the interface between the two roles and ensuring there is no duplication.

9. We noted that the “named person” will have a duty to undertake this role with children who are “home schooled” therefore there requires to be a mechanism to allow this to happen. The rights of the child must be a priority, and it is noted that the named person has no right of access to see the child and assess wellbeing.

10. Many children are accommodated outwith the Council area. Where this is the case and the named person is in a different geographical area from the local authority or NHS Board where the child normally resides, it will be more challenging and complex for the named person to co-ordinate roles and responsibilities from a distance. It is hoped that the guidance will clarify and simplify who has responsibility for undertaking the role of the named person, and how responsibility will transfer from named person to named person as well as the interface, communication and co-ordination with the home authority, lead professional and team around the child.

11. The legislation is giving responsibility to the named person to gather and share information and assess when a request for assistance is required. However, all of the above also seems to be included in the role of the lead professional definition and the GIRFEC website (where there is a team around the child). We are concerned, therefore, about the potential for conflict and confusion.

12. The recent ICO Statement regarding information sharing is seen as very helpful but the guidance needs to clarify mechanisms for information sharing both in relation to communication, recording and storage. We welcome the duty placed on GPs to provide information to aid discussion about a child’s well-being. The Privacy Impact Assessment Report is helpful in relation to the above.

13. It is unfortunate that existing statutory requirements to produce Children’s Plans both under the Additional Support for Learning legislation and the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 have not been repealed and replaced with a requirement for a single Child’s Plan in all circumstances and situations. This will mean that considerable integration will be required between all 3 legislative frameworks.

14. We noted that the “welfare” duty in the 1995 Children (Scotland) Act has also not been repealed and replaced by the “wellbeing” concept. This may lead to a lack of clarity and confusion with Children’s Hearings and Court processes for more vulnerable children.
Early Learning and Childcare

15. The additional priority given to “looked after” two year olds and two year olds in kinship care placements continues to be welcomed but we continue to believe that the 600 hours of early learning and childcare should be available to vulnerable children “in need”. Concerns still exist, however, that many children who are assessed as being “in need”, including children on the Child Protection Register, are neither “looked after” nor living in kinship care. This provision for ‘vulnerable’ children would either be a protective factor or assist in providing evidence of risk. The Bill gives no information regarding expected staffing skill mix.

16. We continue to believe that the flexibility in these arrangements should be aligned to the Parenting Strategy to enhance parenting capacity and support.

17. We accept that Local Authorities could decide to widen the criteria to all vulnerable children but this would lead to resourcing and capacity issues which will not have been included in the financial memorandum.

Looked After Children

18. Whilst we welcome the greater clarity that Local Authorities will be required to assess the needs of care leavers 16+, and will have a duty to provide support in relation to assessed need, nevertheless concerns remain that the Local Authority will become income maintenance providers without the necessary resources being transferred. The costs outlined in the financial memorandum do not equate to what Falkirk Council currently pays out for 16 to 18 year olds who meet the criteria; our current costs are higher. It will be crucial that “eligible needs” are clearly defined in the guidance and Local Authorities adequately financially resourced to meet these duties.

19. Whilst we agree that formal therapeutic counselling services can be beneficial, the need for this requires to be identified through assessment. It is also important to acknowledge that a range of existing professionals working with families (for example, educational psychologists, Social Workers, Health Visitors, Carers Trust) already provide counselling support.

20. The accompanying documents to the Act appear to use the words “counselling”; “intensive family therapy”; “family mediation” and “family group conferencing” as if they are all the same thing and interchangeable. We are concerned about the confusion and potential cost implications of the above.

21. We continue to welcome the policy intention to provide kinship carers with more support, and agree that the use of Section II (I) of the 1995 Act provides an avenue to take this forward without the implementation of new legislation. Although the Bill disqualifies parents and guardians from the above support, it does not define “parent” and therefore it is unclear whether this applies to “a person with parental rights and responsibilities” or only biological parents.
22. It will be crucial for the guidance to clarify the nature of expected support for kinship carers and for this to be linked to assessed need. We continue to note the cost implications.

23. We welcome the removal from the Bill of the proposals in relation to better foster care. The additional time for these proposals to be considered nationally is considered a positive way forward.

General Comments

24. We understand that Ministers are now seeking a legal power that would allow them, without further primary legislation to establish “Joint Boards” if they are dissatisfied with the joint working arrangements between Local Authorities and NHS Boards around integrated children’s services planning. We are concerned that this has the potential to place Councils and NHS Boards at risk now and in future, as this would create a situation where significant restructuring of services could take place without any further consultation or legislation.

25. We would support the COSLA position on this issue.

26. It is unfortunate that an opportunity may have been lost within the Children’s Hearing Act to review the Time Intervals performance indicators. SCRA should now be requesting integrated assessments or the Child’s Plan rather than IER’s; IAR’s and SBR’s. However the production of integrated reports takes longer. Is there an opportunity within the Children’s Bill to address both the time intervals indicators to extend them, as well as the naming of reports.

27. Concerns remain regarding the financial implications of the Bill.

28. There are several issues in connection with this:
   - “Eligibility” issues are not yet defined.
   - Future demand in several areas, for example birth rates, remains unclear.
   - Future assessed need cannot be quantified.
   - There has been an increase in the population of children within the Falkirk Council area since 2011.
   - Scale of efficiency savings to be made in 2014-2017.
   - Rising unemployment.
   - Impact of Welfare Reform.

29. There is an on-going inequality in that funding for NHS will be maintained in relation to the role of the named person but funding for Local Authorities is not. This should be rectified.
30. We acknowledge that there are funding implications for all agencies involved in implementing the Children’s Bill. We would endorse COSLA’s position on the need for full funding of all components of the Bill.

Conclusion

31. There are many aspects of the legislation which still require to be defined in the secondary legislation and guidance. We would underline the critical nature of developing and continuing to consult on the guidance in terms of implementing the provisions of the Act.

Introduction

1. Families Outside is a national independent charity that works on behalf of families affected by imprisonment in Scotland. We do this through provision of a national freephone helpline for families and for the professionals who work with them, as well as through development of policy and practice, training, and face-to-face support. Children and young people are central to our work, as the impact of a parent’s imprisonment equates with bereavement and increases a child’s risk of poverty, failure in school, victimisation, mental health issues, and subsequent offending, among other risks.

2. Families Outside broadly welcomes the Children and Young People Bill, but it raises some concerns for us, and we are grateful for the opportunity to comment. We are happy to elaborate on any of these should the Committee require additional information.

Part I: The rights of children

3. Families Outside endorses the view of Together Scotland that the current Bill is “a real step back from the original commitment made by the Scottish Government to the UN Convention on the rights of the Child (UNCRC) in the Rights of Children & Young People Bill.” As an example, we are concerned that public authorities, such as the police and Scottish courts in the event of a parent’s arrest and sentencing, currently have no obligation under domestic law to take into account the impact of their decisions on the best interest of children (as per Article 3.1 of the UNCRC).

4. The current Bill imposes no duty to comply with or act upon the terms of the UNCRC; the requirement for public authorities to report upon their compliance would be satisfied merely by reporting that they have taken no action, which does nothing to promote the rights of children and young people. Consequently we endorse the request of Together Scotland for a child rights impact assessment to be undertaken on the Bill.

5. Finally, the duty to raise awareness of the UNCRC is very welcome. However, public authorities may be fully aware of the terms of the UNCRC and still not comply with these, which again does little to promote the rights and welfare of children and young people in Scotland.

Part III: Children’s Services Planning

6. We welcome the wide inclusion of “other service providers” under the terms of the Bill and query what services would not fall under the “related service” category.
Families Outside promotes the view that adult-focused services have a significant impact on the wellbeing of children and young people. For example, we would welcome the inclusion of the Scottish Prison Service, Criminal Justice Social Work teams, additions services, and adult mental health services as “related services”.

Part IV: Provision of named persons

7. We are concerned about the provisions in relation to Information Sharing under paragraph 26 of Part IV and agree with the call from Parenting Across Scotland for further consultation on this. The Bill seems to lack the nuance required in relation to information sharing where this may conflict with a child’s or family’s right to privacy. In our work, the sharing of information relating to a family member’s imprisonment is a case in point: is it appropriate, for example, for courts or prisons to inform a school that a family member has gone to prison? We encourage families to share this information but also believe that it is their right to choose and to share the information with whom they wish. Families in this situation have lost enough power for such decisions to be taken out of their hands as well. Paragraph 27 may mitigate this in relation to the current provisions under the Data Protection Act, but this is not clear and would benefit from further discussion.

Part V: Child’s Plan

8. Families Outside welcomes the reference to and definition of child wellbeing in accordance with SHANARRI outcomes (defined under Part XIII). Reference to child protection in current practice does not go far enough, so we are pleased to see this as part of the Children & You.

Part X: Kinship Care

9. We welcome additional support for kinship carers in the Bill. However, we are concerned about the continued discretion of local authorities in this regard. We appreciate the need for discretion to some degree, but we find wide variation amongst the families we support to the extent that two families on the same street in similar circumstances receive entirely different levels of financial support. This is deeply confusing to people eligible for kinship care, and we have had to work closely with families for months at a time to help them claim the support they need. This too would benefit from further scrutiny, clearer guidance, and more consistent application.

Other considerations

10. Families Outside would welcome inclusion of the Scottish Prison Service as one of the “Relevant Authorities” listed in Schedule 2 of the Bill.
Conclusion

11. As an organisation with a very specific remit in relation to children and families affected by imprisonment, we recognise that our evidence is similarly specific. In saying this, the broader principles of the embedding of children’s rights, scrutiny of the implications of information sharing, a focus on the wellbeing of children, and extension of support for kinship carers all relate directly to the families we support. Along with Together Scotland, we urge the Education Committee to promote a child rights impact assessment to be conducted on the Bill.

12. In conclusion, Families Outside broadly welcomes the Children and Young People Bill, but we feel that it misses the opportunity to identify and promote the rights already agreed as signatories of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. Incorporation of the UNCRC would establish Scotland as a leader in children’s rights, ahead of other countries in the UK, Europe, and internationally, making Scotland truly the best place in the world to grow up.

13. We appreciate the opportunity to comment and are happy to engage in further discussion where this would be helpful.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

David Farina

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

4. Ultimately this bill appears to be motivated by a philosophy that is at odds with those that undergird a free society. Specifically, the notions that government should be limited and only intervene when necessary or provided for under objective standards, that a free people are competent to raise their own children without interference or uninvited “help” from government bureaucrats, that information about children should be protected and only shared when written consent is given by parents or legal guardians. And finally, that in a free society the rights of families and the irreplaceable relationship between parents and children must be protected and respected. The proposed Scottish legislation turns the notion that parents are responsible for their children on its head and basically says that parents can't be trusted-only government can.
1. I would be grateful if children's design and delivery of services in respect to school toilet facilities could be considered as part of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

2. Learners' toilets project an image of a school – good or bad – and have an effect on learner morale, behaviour and health. The state of the school toilets can often be of great concern to learners and their parents/carers. Local authorities have statutory responsibility for all aspects of school provision, building and maintenance. The authority has a duty of care in respect of pupils in its charge during school hours.

3. Current education and health policy in Scotland highlights the important role that schools play in promoting and supporting young people’s health and wellbeing. Research has shown that pupils learn more effectively if they are happy in their work, believe in themselves, like their teachers and feel supported at school. School is an important context for young people’s health due to the amount of time they spend within the school setting. Experiences at school are known to have a strong influence on young people’s social and emotional health and development.

4. For children and young people to stay healthy, they need to drink water regularly throughout the day. They also need to empty their bladder and bowels regularly when they need to. During term time, children spend at least half their waking hours at school (longer for those at out of hours clubs), so how much they drink and how often they go to the toilet are important. More fluids are needed in warm weather or when exercising. In addition the inability to recognise thirst may be present amongst some younger children. Pupils are more receptive to learning when they are not distracted by an uncomfortable bladder or bowel. Being able to use good quality toilets when they need to is linked to good drinking habits.

5. Unpleasant school toilets can result in
   - Children not sitting properly on the toilet or rushing. This can mean that the bladder is not fully emptied (leaving residual urine).
   - Not wanting to empty the bowels.
   - Not drinking enough in order to avoid the toilets.
   - Transmission of infections caused by not washing or drying hands properly.

6. Research has found that when we are dehydrated, we have more difficulty keeping our attention focused. Most children show no obvious visible signs of dehydration. Lethargy, irritability and lack of concentration may be considered normal during most afternoons in class. However these signs may be due, at least in part, to the effects of dehydration. Dehydration can impair short-term... memory function, the recall of long-term memory and the working memory - the ability to actively hold information in the mind needed to do complex tasks such as reasoning, comprehension, and learning.

7. The early signs of symptoms of dehydration include:
   - Thirst
   - Headaches
   - Stomach aches
   - Irritability
   - Lethargy and tiredness
   - Poorer concentration
   - Diminished sports performance

8. Going to the toilet when pupils need to promotes good bladder and bowel practices. It is quite common for children to be unable to use the toilets when there are lots of other pupils around. This is one of the reasons why pupils need to be allowed to go to the toilet during lessons - the only time that offers privacy.

9. Voluntary dehydration (not drinking appropriately in the presence of an adequate fluid supply) is a common in school-aged children and adversely affects their physical and intellectual performance. Being dehydrated on a regular basis can lead to the following bladder and bowel problems:
   - Constipation
   - Soiling
   - Increased risk of urinary tract infections
   - Overactive bladder (also known as irritable bladder)
   - Daytime wetting
   - Bedwetting

10. We are usually able to recognise bladder fullness and exercise control until we are able to visit the toilet, provided there is not undue delay. However, for some children and young people, any delay is impossible, particularly those children with an overactive bladder or an urgent need to go. These children need to urinate very suddenly, even if they have just been. If children do not drink adequately during the day, their urine becomes concentrated. This can irritate the bladder and may contribute to daytime wetting. Not drinking enough during the day can also reduce bladder capacity. Daytime wetting can often be the cause of great shame, stress and anxiety - the impact of which should not be underestimated by parents/carers and teachers.
11. Some children (particularly girls) have a problem with their bladders that result in it not emptying properly. Normally every time we go to the toilet to pass urine our bladders empty completely. Some children do not empty their bladders completely leaving behind some residual urine. Children with residual urine are at risk of developing urinary tract infections. Not drinking enough can also increase the risk of a UTI, as this allows bacteria to develop in the urine. The infection can sometimes then travel up to the kidneys where it becomes much more serious.

12. Bed wetting / nocturnal enuresis affects two or three children in a class of 30 ten year olds in the UK. The bladder adjusts its size according to how much we drink. The more a child drinks regularly throughout the day, the more the bladder capacity will improve, enabling it to hold onto more urine overnight. If children drink most of their daily fluid when they get home, their bladders may not be able to cope and this increases the risk of bed wetting. Bed wetting carries a significant burden for both the affected child and their family. It is well established that enuresis has a significant impact on self-esteem. However, there is also a social impact; these children are less likely to participate in social activities including school camps, sleepovers and family holidays for fear of wetting the bed. They may also worry that their bedroom smells of urine and therefore may be reluctant to invite friends over. This social isolation can have a negative impact on development. Bed wetting also creates an additional work load for parents in the form of washing and drying bed linen and this is associated with significant financial costs.

13. Among the most common causes of constipation in children are not going to the toilet when they need to and dehydration. If children don’t empty their bowels when they feel the need to, urge to go will disappear. If this is done frequently constipation results. As the body gets used to carrying more stools, the bowel gets less efficient at signalling it needs to empty. This leads to repeat bouts of constipation, abdominal pain, soiling and even overflow diarrhoea. Soiling may be the first symptom of constipation. When dehydrated, the body conserves the water it has by taking extra water than normal from the large bowel. This results in dry and hard stools, which are difficult to pass. Constipation may also cause urinary urgency by constipated bowel pressing on the bladder.

14. Mental health problems can occur at any. Problems with school toilets can lead to embarrassment and anxiety and even to phobias. Bodily development during puberty can exacerbate these. One severe condition that can develop as a result of problems with school toilets is Psychogenic Urinary Retention (difficulty to urinate in the presence, real or perceived, of others). A common factor in those who have Psychogenic Urinary Retention is that they may have developed it during their time at school habitually avoiding using school toilets, holding on until they got home. This behaviour may have been prompted by a single unpleasant or upsetting incident in school toilets or to events such as the state of the toilets, not being allowed to go when they needed to, or anti-social behaviour in toilets. School toilet avoidance may be sufficient to impact on attendance and may be mislabelled as school avoidance.
15. Good hand hygiene can play a significant role in helping to cut disease. After toileting some children will not wash their hands at all, some will wash their hands with water, many do not wash their hands with soap. Hand washing with soap is among the most effective and inexpensive ways to prevent diarrhoeal diseases and pneumonia. Hand washing with soap also helps to prevent the spread of viral infections, such as norovirus, rotavirus and influenza. Worldwide this simple activity could save more lives than any vaccine or medical intervention, preventing the spread of infection and keeping children in school.

16. The forming of good habits from early childhood, when culture and personal habit forming takes place, are important as there is evidence that these learned behaviours track throughout life.

17. I do not think it is unreasonable to suggest that all children should have access to clean, well-stocked and pleasant toilet facilities in schools. This would be in keeping with one of the four contexts for learning – that the ethos and life of a school should have a focus on the mental, emotional, social and physical wellbeing of staff and pupils. School toilets can be incorporated into all the Healthy School criteria of:

- Personal, social and health education
- Healthy eating
- Physical activity
- Emotional health and well-being (including bullying).

About this Written Evidence Paper:

1. This response has been prepared by ENABLE Scotland, Quarriers, and the National Autistic Society under the banner of For Scotland’s Disabled Children, bringing together the collective views and experiences of thousands of disabled children, young people, and their families, across Scotland.

2. Our response has also been shared and discussed with the Alliance, Children in Scotland, Inclusion Scotland, NDCS Scotland, and Together.

3. We welcome the opportunity to respond to this Stage 1 Call for Written Evidence. This legislation provides us with a once in a generation opportunity to improve outcomes for all children, including Scotland’s disabled children. This response focuses on the elements of the Bill which have the potential to deliver the biggest impact for disabled children and their families.

Part 1 – Rights of Children

4. We broadly welcome the intention of this section, but feel strongly that the proposed new duties on Scottish Ministers to ‘take appropriate steps to further, promote, and raise awareness and understanding of the rights of children and young people as set out in the UNCRC’ does not go far enough. Indeed, it is considerably diluted from the original policy intention of the proposed Children’s Rights Bill.

5. We encourage the Education Committee to consider the full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law. We are fully supportive of the Written Evidence submitted by Together on this issue.

6. We encourage the Education Committee to consider the need for a child’s rights impact assessment to be undertaken on the Bill. This impact assessment should include reference to the UN Convention on the Rights of People with Disabilities to ensure that the rights of children with disabilities are systematically considered across all the provisions of the Bill.

Part 2 – Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland

7. Again, we refer Committee members to the submission of Together on this issue. Specifically, whilst the proposed non-legal means of redress via the Commissioner is welcome, we believe that full incorporation of the UNCRC on the face of the Bill will provide children and young people with the opportunity to seek redress through the courts.

8. We would further ask Committee members to seek clarity on the definition of “service provider” within this section of the Bill, and indeed throughout the Bill. The SPICE briefing on this section makes clear that this builds on the existing powers of the Commissioner to investigate the extent to which a service provider has regard to the rights, interests and views of children, and that ‘this includes all in the voluntary, private, and public sector who provide a service to children’ (page 6).

9. Clarity on the expectation of voluntary sector service providers is required. Many of these providers are delivering specialist targeted support services for groups of disabled children and their families, and may or may not be commissioned directly by the public sector. We encourage Committee members to raise this with the Scottish Government with a view to securing Guidance for Voluntary Sector Organisations on the application of elements of this Bill. This is also an issue in part 3 of the Bill, where ‘service provider’ is more clearly defined as a public sector, or commissioned by public sector, but where the wider policy intention seems to be inclusive of any organisation working with children and young people.

10. Finally, in addition to the proposed new power for the Commissioner to investigate individual cases, we would encourage Committee members to consider whether there might be an appetite for the Commissioner to take direction from Scottish Ministers and investigate one particular element of the children’s rights agenda per year, for example, how well the rights of particular groups of children, e.g. disabled children, or children with additional support for learning needs, are being met, supported by a duty on public bodies to act on its recommendations.

Part 3 – Children’s Services Planning

11. We broadly welcome the intention of this section of the Bill, and our concerns relate specifically to ensuring that this translates into effective services which meet the needs of disabled children and young people, their families and of young people at the crucial transitions stage.

12. We would like to highlight to Committee members that the specific needs of disabled children and young people are not adequately addressed in this Section. Without a clear duty within the Bill which ensures that the specific needs of this vulnerable group of children and families are reflected in joint local planning and commissioning processes, there is a real danger that opportunities to develop innovative support for this group will be missed.

13. We therefore strongly suggest that Committee members consider further how local Children’s Services Plans could have specific regard to the rights and needs of disabled children and their families.

14. We are further concerned about ensuring that the needs of young people at the transitions stage are reflected in children’s services planning, and we believe that further consideration of this is required by the Committee.

15. For disabled young people, there is a further significant pressure point at the Transitions planning stage, where young people are moving from one set of eligibility criteria under the Additional Support for Learning framework to a completely different framework under social care. Many young people with less complex care needs may no longer qualify for a formal care plan, and so are likely to require access to softer community based support services. The strategic commissioning of services to provide support to young people in this group as they move into adulthood and independent living, and to provide support for those with significant needs but who still do not meet the threshold for social care, is therefore something which needs to be reflected not only in the Children’s Services Planning process proposed by this Bill, but also across the suite of new Guidance over the next 12-18 months to accompany the Self Directed Support (Scotland) Act 2013 and the Public Bodies (Joint Working) Bill, and indeed the planned revision of the Additional Support for Learning Supporting Children’s Learning Code of Practice.

16. In this regard, it would be most helpful if the Bill placed a duty on local authorities to develop and implement Children and Young People’s Services Plans, as opposed to Children’s Services Plans.

Part 4 – Provision of Named Persons

17. The Bill makes clear the expectation of a public authority to provide a named person service; however we are unclear about the expectation of the role of the named person, particularly in relation to the Child’s Plan (Section 5). For example, is the intention that the named person will assess a child’s eligibility for a child’s plan?

18. We would appreciate clarity on whether it is expected, appropriate or likely that one person could undertake both the role of a child’s Named Person and Lead Professional.

19. For disabled children with complex needs, regardless of age, there may be value in attributing the named person role to a professional outwith education, e.g. a specialist health worker, or a social care officer. We encourage the Committee to consider the possibility of exceptions dependent on the needs of the child or young person.

20. We note the Bill’s intention that every person under the age of 18 will have a named person, and that for children under school age, the duty to provide this service is on the health board, whilst for school age children and young people, the duty is with the local authority.

21. We are concerned that the Bill appears to make no provision for a named person services for young people who leave school at the age of 16. This includes a group of vulnerable young people, including disabled young people, who are at a high risk of not being in education, employment or training, or disengaging with their placements if they are.

22. We believe that the Bill should make specific reference to this group, and should ensure that all young people participating in post 16 learning, training or work should have access to the Named Person Service, perhaps through the local authority social care workforce.
Part 5 – Child’s Plan

23. FSDC members are also represented on the Scottish Government’s Advisory Group on Additional Support for Learning, and we refer Committee members to the AGASL evidence paper which considers the Child’s Plan in some detail, with a particular focus on how this Plan will integrate with the other legislative frameworks which provide statutory plans for children and young people.

24. The Bill requires a Child’s Plan to be developed for an individual child if they have a ‘wellbeing need’ that requires a targeted intervention (SPICe Briefing June 2013). More clarity is required on the process of assessment required by the Bill in terms of eligibility criteria and who assesses the child’s ‘wellbeing need’.

25. For example, is the expectation that the Named Person is responsible for assessing a child’s ‘wellbeing need’ or for making an onward referral to another professional to undertake a formal assessment? And will the process be underpinned by the principles of early intervention and take a holistic look at the wellbeing needs of the family around the child to prevent or minimise any risk to the child’s wellbeing developing?

26. In relation to families of disabled children, specific new skills and knowledge about their child’s disability and how to support them, coupled with the additional stress of caring responsibilities, strain on relationships, and perhaps having to give up work to become a full time carer, all have a significant impact on the wellbeing of the family as a whole, with the child at the centre.

27. We feel strongly that the needs of families are not particularly well reflected throughout the Bill; yet in other policy documents such as the Parenting Strategy and the Early Years Framework, Government makes clear its intentions for supporting parents as the key influencers of their child’s development and wellbeing.

28. We would like more clarity on the routes of redress around a Child’s Plan if a child, young person or parent is unhappy with its implementation or content.

29. Whilst we welcome the duty to seek and take account of the views of the child or young person, and parent or carer, in the development of the Child’s Plan, we are concerned that the Bill says that an authority should ‘take into account a child’s age and maturity’ when having regard to the views of the child, including a disabled child. We feel that the Bill should instead simply place a duty on local authorities to support a child or young person to make their views known.

Part 6 - Early Learning and Childcare

30. Local Authorities are already under a duty to provide ‘day care’ for children in need from 0-5 under s.27 of the 1995 Act; the 2013 Bill proposes a specific number of hours of ‘early learning and care’ to be provided for LAAC only. (SPICe Briefing June 2013)

31. We believe that the extension of free early learning and childcare for looked after 2 year olds should be extended further to all 2 year olds with a disability.
32. This would promote the rights of young disabled children to start formal education with the skills they need to benefit from it, and create more important respite opportunities for families of disabled children.

33. It also has the potential to deliver effective earlier interventions by increasing early opportunities for the assessment of emerging additional support for learning and/or wellbeing needs of a vulnerable group of children.

34. We recognise that there will be equally strong arguments to extend this provision for other groups of vulnerable 2 year olds, and so would urge the Committee to make a recommendation to extend the provision of additional early learning and childcare to all children in need.

35. We have contributed to the AGASL response which makes clear the importance of a skilled workforce across the public, independent and voluntary sectors to make the most of this opportunity.

Part 8 – Aftercare

36. We believe that the new right for young people leaving care to request assistance from a local authority up to the age of 25 should be extended to all young disabled people.

37. This would support the transitions process, and would be of particular benefit to those young disabled people who have less complex support needs, and for whom the adult social care assessment frameworks may mean that they fall short of being assessed for a formal care plan as they move into adulthood and independent living.

38. In addition, we know that employment rates for this group are considerably lower than national average, and that, in light of UK Government’s focus on reducing the welfare budget, the welfare reform agenda is likely to have a considerable impact on younger disabled people being transitioned into the new Personal Independence Payment from Disability Living Allowance, with some possibly losing out as a result of the loss of the lower rate care component from the system.

39. Even where a young disabled person has secured a positive destination, all too often, we see that their employment placement or college place falls apart without any right of recourse to a statutory form of support or advice.

40. We would welcome the Committee giving serious consideration to this issue and making recommendations to Government about the needs of disabled young people up to age 25 on the face of the Bill.

Part 9 – Counselling Services

41. We note with some surprise that this is the only element of the Bill which gives a specific focus on identifying and meeting the support needs of families. With that in mind, we are concerned that the intention is that it should be restricted to those families where a child is at risk of being looked after, or are in a kinship care arrangement.

42. We believe that the duty to provide counselling support should be available for other families, including families of disabled children, for whom we know that the divorce rate is higher than the national average, at key points such as diagnosis and transition.

43. We are concerned that counselling is the only identified option, and would prefer the Bill to reflect wider forms of family support services, including peer support models and targeted parenting groups, such as those which have been funded via the Early Intervention Fund throughout Scotland.

44. Such input could and should be reflected in the Child’s Plan to support the child’s achievement of the SHANARRI wellbeing indicators.

45. The logical extension of this approach would be to ensure that there is an expectation that family support services are included within the requirements of local Children’s Services Plans (Part 5) as a service which has to be provided at local level to best meet the needs of the local community.

46. This leads FSDC members to consider whether there is a need for the Bill to focus on Children, Young People and Families, and we leave that as an issue for the Committee to consider further.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Carolyn Forte

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

4. Ultimately this bill appears to be motivated by a philosophy that is at odds with those that undergird a free society. Specifically, the notions that government should be limited and only intervene when necessary or provided for under objective standards, that a free people are competent to raise their own children without interference or uninvited “help” from government bureaucrats, that information about children should be protected and only shared when written consent is given by parents or legal guardians. And finally, that in a free society the rights of families and the irreplaceable relationship between parents and children must be protected and respected. The proposed Scottish legislation turns the notion that parents are responsible for their children on its head and basically says that parents can't be trusted-only government can.
The Fostering Network Scotland

1. The Fostering Network is the UK’s leading charity for all those involved in fostering committed to raising the standards of care for children and young people who are in foster care and for those leaving foster care. The Fostering Network is a membership organisation and the membership in Scotland includes 3,900 fostering households, all local authorities and all Registered Fostering Providers.

2. During the consultation on the Children and Young People Bill, the Fostering Network consulted widely with foster carers from throughout Scotland and submitted a response. Additionally, we conducted a survey of children and young people with experience of foster care. Their responses were submitted in two responses. One submission summarised the views of children in foster care and the second summarised the views of foster carers’ own children. This second key group of children and young people have a significant impact on the success of a foster care placement and to their parents’ ongoing commitment and ability to continue fostering. The comments within each of these responses remain our view.

3. The Fostering Network believes the Children and Young People Bill is a fantastic opportunity to change foster care in Scotland for the better. We share the Scottish Government’s aspiration for Scotland to be the best place in the world for children to grow up. For the majority of Scotland’s children unable to live with their own family, foster carers will be their permanent carers and their ‘family’ as they grow into adulthood, and beyond. We firmly believe that the exclusion of the key areas relating to foster care in the Bill (which were consulted on but not included in the Bill as currently introduced) is failing Scotland’s most vulnerable children and young people and is a missed opportunity.

4. The Fostering Network understands that these areas are not included in the Bill because of the Scottish Government’s current Review of Foster Care. We recognise that their recommendations will be in subsequent regulations and guidance, however the Fostering Network has serious concerns that the issue of a minimum foster care allowance, placement limits and a national register of foster carers will not be underpinned by legislation and will perpetuate the current “two-tier” system which disadvantages Scotland’s children who are placed in foster care.

Comments on the provisions in the Bill:

5. Rights of Children (Part 1): The Fostering Network supports the proposed general duties on the Scottish Ministers to improve the effects of the UNCRC in Scotland. The Fostering Network sees the paramount right of a child who is looked after to be brought up in a loving family. Either their own if safe to do so, with family or friends or with a foster carer. There are now over 5,000 children in Scotland in foster care. This number has been steadily increasing annually and for these children a foster carer is the person who can best provide secure and loving care. For the child, it is their key right. By extension, it is their key right to be with foster carers who are subject to a national regulatory framework and code of practice. The omission of such a safeguard within the Bill is for Scotland’s most vulnerable children a significant omission.

6. Commissioner for Children and Young People: There is little to indicate the areas these individual investigations may cover. The Fostering Network is concerned that it is proposed the Commissioner will be supported by three staff and associated support staff to deal with between one and four investigations each year at a reported cost of £162,000 per annum, (SPIe Briefing, 2013). The Fostering Network believes that increased investment in mediation services and advocacy would be more effective and achieve more positive results for more children and young people than investigations.

7. Provision of Named persons: We recognise the wider advantages to a named person but are aware of the need for more detailed consideration and resourcing, particularly in respect of looked after children and young people.

- If the named person is, for example, a head teacher, he or she will potentially have more than a hundred children to support. This will significantly reduce the enhanced provision of support and services required to successfully prevent the escalation of problems, particularly during periods of crisis.

- The closure of schools for significant periods throughout the year, (festive, spring and summer break) often overlaps such periods of crisis. Children in foster care often experience significant gaps in the continuity of an education placement when they are in transition between foster placements and schools.

- The Fostering Network would like clarity on the role of the named person for a looked after child and what measures are in place to best support the child, for example, where there is conflict around the behaviour and school attendance of a looked after child. These children need and deserve an ongoing commitment even when their school base is uncertain.

- The Fostering Network recognise that for looked after children and their carers, a named person is less likely to be appropriate in that they have a designated social worker and should have the services of a designated looked after teacher within their school.

8. Child’s Plan: The Fostering Network’s Fosterline Scotland service receives a significant number of calls from foster carers who are caring for children 24 hours a day, within the foster carer’s home, yet are being denied crucial information about the child and their family. The rights of privacy for children and families should not impede foster carers from receiving essential information to most effectively provide appropriate, loving and healing care.
9. Early Learning and Child Care: As identified in our submission, provision has to be tailored to the needs of the child and what kinds of support will best help the carer to in turn help the child develop secure attachments. Other services may be far more appropriate than day care. The Bill speaks of day care as a basis for a route to employment for parents. We have serious concerns that this is not a prerequisite as we feel strongly that for children with foster carers and many children with disabilities, carers seeking employment will not be in the best interests of the child.

10. Corporate Parenting: The Scottish Government’s “Easy Read Version: A Scotland for Children” states: “If a child is looked after, the council that is responsible for their care is called their ‘corporate parent.’” In contrast, Schedule 3 in the Bill includes a number of organisations and departments with a very tangential link to many looked after children. We feel this is confusing and requires further clarity.

11. Aftercare: The Fostering Network firmly supports extending the age to 25 whereby care leavers can request an assessment of need. While we welcome the Bill’s aspirations in this area we recognise that the assessments will be meaningless if the services to meet assessed needs cannot be made available.

- For a significant number of young people, their need will be to remain with, or have the opportunity to return to, their foster carers.

- Furthermore we feel that an assessment of need should go beyond being a ‘request’ but that young people should be ‘granted’ an assessment of need, should they request one and regulations and resources will need to be in place to allow for this.

- The Fostering Network is concerned that provision in the Bill could exclude a young person who has returned home from foster care just before school leaving age.

- The significance of a trusted adult well known to care leavers should be central to decisions about where a young person will settle and to where they can return.

- When a young person is being supported as part of their throughcare or aftercare plan, it is important that the services are coordinated and joined up. Young people should not find themselves shuttled between children and adults services and particularly between CAMHS and adult mental health services.

- The Fostering Network’s “Don’t Move Me” campaign has called for amendments to the Children and Families Bill in England, currently going through Parliament, to ensure existing legislation allows young people to stay with their foster carers (if both parties were in agreement) until the age of 21. This has received wide cross-party support. For Scotland to be the best place in the world for children to grow up we want to see young people having the opportunity to stay with their foster carers until the age of 21 firmly embedded in legislation.

12. Counselling Services: The Fostering Network believes that access to counselling services should be given to the families of looked after children.

- This will ensure that families are more aware of and understanding of the reasons behind and the impact of their child being in care. Issues of grief and loss can be addressed and also give parents and young people opportunities to plan for rehabilitation where safe.

- To achieve better permanency outcomes for looked after children where there is a plan for adoption, counselling may support birth parents to relinquish the child appropriately. This in turn will reduce delays and avoid lengthy court proceedings.

13. Adoption Register: For those children in foster care who are deemed to need permanence the majority will remain with their foster carers. Legislation needs to be in place to enable foster carers to seek permanence orders; giving the child and them greater stability of placement.

- For those children who require permanence but will not remain with their foster carers, the Fostering Network believes a separate database of foster carers would ensure that children can be better matched to carers who can provide them with the loving, nurturing permanent placement they require.

- This would be distinct to a national register of foster carers which would safeguard the wellbeing of children and young people in foster care, allow for portability of foster carers, have a code of practice for foster carers and would enhance the status of foster care in Scotland by placing them firmly within the child care workforce.

14. Relevant persons: The Fostering Network would like to see every foster carer who is caring for a child who is the subject of a compulsory supervision order always being automatically deemed as a relevant person.

15. Omissions from the Bill: The Fostering Network remains very disappointed about the decision not to include key foster care issues within the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, namely: placement limits, fees and allowances, a national register of foster carers and foster carer training and development.

- While recognising that the National Review of Foster Care is addressing many of these issues we believe placement limits, parity of allowances and a national register will need firmly embedded within legislation to ensure that they are implemented, thus putting an end to the postcode lottery and two-tier system currently experienced by children in foster care.

- The Fostering Network is not confident that the recommendations of the National Review will achieve the hoped for transformation of foster care for Scotland’s children and young people. We feel it to be a missed opportunity if foster care, and particularly these aspects of foster care, are omitted from legislation.

16. For the Scottish Government’s aspiration of “Scotland being the best place in the world for children to grow up” to be realised, we need to see the 5,023 children and young people currently living in foster care having their rights and needs recognised and addressed to ensure they will grow up to aspire, achieve, and become responsible citizens.

General Medical Council

1. Thank you for the opportunity to respond to the Education & Culture Committee’s call for evidence on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Please accept my apologies for missing the official deadline for responses.

2. The General Medical Council (GMC) is the independent regulator of doctors in the UK. Our statutory purpose is to protect, promote and maintain the health and safety of the public by ensuring proper standards in the practice of medicine. We do that by controlling entry to the medical register and setting the standards for medical schools and postgraduate education and training.

3. We are responsible for advising doctors on good practice to help them provide better care for patients. Our core publication, Good medical practice sets out the principles and values on which good practice is founded and all doctors are required to be familiar with and follow the guidance in GMP and our explanatory guidance on a range of issues including seeking consent and maintaining confidentiality. If a doctor seriously or persistently breaches the guidance we act to protect patients, if necessary by removing the doctor from the register and restricting or removing their right to practise medicine.

4. Most of the provisions of the Bill are outside our remit. However, in this response we have highlighted the scope of our guidance to doctors on seeking consent and confidentiality as we believe that the proposal, at paragraph 76 of the Policy Memorandum, that every child in Scotland should have a Named Person with whom doctors would be required to share information, raises questions about whether doctors will be able to follow our guidance if they would be required to share information not just where there is a risk of significant harm - but also on ‘less critical concerns’ so that a full picture can be formed and harm prevented.

5. We believe this proposal (in particular clauses 26-27 on sharing and disclosing information) could be incompatible with our guidance to doctors on their obligations and have outlined the ways in which we believe this might be the case in the hope that the Committee will take these points into consideration in its analysis of submissions.

6. In summary, the issues we would like the Committee to consider are:

   - Our guidance to doctors on seeking informed consent for disclosing confidential information
   - Our guidance to doctors on disclosing confidential information in the public interest and how it fits with the provisions of the Bill
The definition of ‘less critical concerns’ and what information the Bill’s provisions allow to be shared with a ‘Named Person’

Storage of and access to confidential patient information

Seeking consent for disclosing confidential information

7. Our guidance, Confidentiality advises doctors to treat patient information as confidential as confidentiality is central to the trust between doctors and patients. We say that doctors should seek informed consent from patients to disclose their information to other individuals or agencies. We tell doctors that they must be satisfied that the patient has sufficient information about the scope, purpose and likely consequence of the disclosure when seeking consent (paragraph 34).

8. In our explanatory guidance, Protecting Children & Young People: the responsibilities of all doctors, we advise doctors on how to apply this advice in child protection contexts. We say that when doctors have concerns about child abuse or neglect, they should ask the child or young person for their consent to share information with an appropriate agency, if the child has the capacity to give consent, and if not should seek consent from a person with parental responsibility. We expect doctors to explain what information they will share, who it will be shared with, how the information will be used and where patients can go for advice and support (paragraph 35). This guidance would therefore apply when doctors consider whether to share information with a Named Person.

Sharing information without consent

9. If a doctor cannot get consent to disclose confidential patient information, we say that he or she can disclose that information only if it is in the public interest to do so (see paragraph 8 of Confidentiality). To make a judgement about the public interest, we advise doctors that they must weigh the probable harms of disclosing confidential information against the harms likely to arise as a result of keeping information confidential.

10. In Protecting children and young people, we have provided more detailed guidance on how to apply this advice on disclosing information in the public interest in child protection scenarios. We make clear that doctors must share information if they are concerned that a child or young person is at risk of abuse or neglect and that they do not need to be certain that there is a risk of significant harm.

32 You must tell an appropriate agency, such as your local authority children’s services, the NSPCC or the police, promptly if you are concerned that a child or young person is at risk of, or is suffering, abuse or neglect unless it is not in their best interests to do so (see paragraphs 39 and 40). You do not need to be certain that the child or young person is at risk of significant harm to take this step. If a child or young person is at risk of, or is suffering, abuse or neglect, the possible consequences of not sharing relevant information will, in the overwhelming majority of cases, outweigh any harm that sharing your concerns with an appropriate agency might cause.

33. When telling an appropriate agency about your concerns, you should provide information about both of the following:

a. the identities of the child or young person, their parents and any other person who may pose a risk to them

b. the reasons for your concerns, including information about the child’s or young person’s health, and any relevant information about their parents or carers.

11. Whilst we encourage doctors to share information where that is necessary to protect children from abuse and neglect, doctors must consider each case on its merits and use their professional judgement, taking into account our guidance, the law and any other guidance or information that is relevant. We advise doctors only to disclose confidential information without consent or other legal authority, when it is in the public interest to do so and they must be satisfied in each instance that the public interest test has been met and that the specific circumstances justify the disclosure.

12. We also tell doctors that if they decide to disclose confidential information in the public interest, they must explain to the people whose information it is why they have done so, and should explain what information they will share, who it will be shared with, how the information will be used and where they can go for advice and support, unless doing this would put a child, young person or anyone else at risk (paragraph 38).

13. In our guidance we acknowledge that risks to children or young people’s safety and welfare sometimes become apparent only when a number of people share what seem to be minor concerns. Our advice at paragraph 43 of Protecting Children & Young People, the responsibilities of all doctors on minor concerns that might be part of a wider picture says:

If a child’s or young person’s condition or behaviour leads you to consider abuse or neglect as one possible explanation but you do not think that they are at risk of significant harm, you should discuss your concerns with your named or designated professional or lead clinician or, if they are not available, an experienced colleague. If possible, you should do this without revealing the identity of the child or young person.

14. Our advice is that minor concerns should be raised initially with a colleague, if possible without revealing the identity of the child or young person. Following this, if discussions do not provide a clear view about the possibility of abuse or neglect, we advise doctors to share limited relevant information with agencies in contact with the child or young person, in order to make a judgement about whether there is a risk that would justify further disclosures. We say doctors should seek consent to do this, unless it would be in the public interest to share the information without consent (paragraph 44).

15. Given the complexity of these issues around sharing confidential patient information we would like to know more about the Government’s ideas for how ‘less critical information’ would be defined and relatedly, what the thresholds for professionals sharing this information would be. It is not fully clear from the proposals what would constitute a ‘less critical concern’ or that there would be a common understanding across different professional agencies working with children. Similarly, it is important that there is a common understanding across different professional agencies of what information about a child should be shared.

Information storage and access
16. In addition to these considerations around information sharing, the Committee may want to consider issues relating to the storage of and access to confidential patient information

17. The proposals do not make clear how confidential patient information would be collected or stored by the Named Person, or who would have rights to access it subsequently. Nor is it clear how a doctor, or other professional working with the child, would access information about the identity of the relevant child or young person’s Named Person.

It may also be worth noting that, were the scheme to require the use of a single database, it may face similar difficulties to those raised during the development of the database ContactPoint, which stored information about children in England, and which encountered challenge on issues relating to information security and access rights.

Conclusion
18. As presented, the provisions of the Bill seem to present a conflict with the advice we give doctors in our guidance on good practice in sharing information, which requires that doctors have concerns about child abuse or neglect, or otherwise judge that a disclosure would meet the public interest test, before disclosing confidential patient information without consent. The Named Person scheme appears to sanction disclosures of information without consent, which our guidance would advise remain confidential.

19. Our concern therefore would be that the proposals lead to inappropriate disclosures of confidential patient information and may undermine the public’s trust in a confidential medical service.

20. I hope that this is useful in explaining our guidance and we would be happy to provide further information and advice if that would be helpful.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

George Heriot’s School

Introduction

1. As pupils who have worked to achieve the Rights Respecting School award and raise awareness of the United Nations Convention for the Rights of the Child in our school over the past two years, we are disappointed that the UNCRC is not being incorporated in Scots law. George Heriot’s School is a traditional school with traditional values and we have worked to adapt these values to conform with the UNCRC which we feel will benefit pupils in the school.

UNCRC in a Rights Respecting School

2. We feel that both the UNCRC and the Rights Respecting School award have greatly benefited our school community. Although our school already respected pupil’s rights, it was necessary to promote awareness of the UNCRC as making it easier to incorporate it into school life and curriculum.

3. If pupils understand what their rights mean they can easily know how to use them, which means pupils are more confident to stand up for themselves as they comprehend what the rights mean for them.

4. Due to the promotion of the UNCRC there are new mechanisms in place in to ensure it is much easier for pupils to raise their voices and concerns which are more likely to be heard and taken seriously.

5. Thanks to the awareness of the UNCRC, adults and teachers in the school environment can more easily engage with pupils because there is a collective understanding of the framework of children’s rights and the issues that they deal with. This means adults are less apprehensive towards pupils who want to assert their rights.

6. Pupils now feel that their rights won’t be violated as they have a precise comprehension of the rights which affect them, showing that the UNCRC ensured safety and security to pupils.

7. It has enhanced already respectful relationships within the Heriot’s community as pupils are more willing to talk with teachers or other pupils if they have problems which they believe affect or violate their rights.

8. Thanks to the Rights Respecting School Award we are implementing a more mutual respectful language, which reflects the values of the UNCRC, into our school community and official documentation, for example the school’s Code of Conduct is being adapted to change the language. This achieves a more positive atmosphere with understanding and respect among all members within the school.
UNCRC in Wider Society

9. We feel that school is a microcosm of wider society and the impact within our school environment has been largely positive and successful. Therefore we feel that full implementation of the UNCRC in Scots law would also be beneficial for children and young people in Scotland.

10. The Rights of the Child need to be made more explicit for young people to ensure that their rights and them are valued and upheld in society.

11. The Scottish Government currently has obligations to protect and endorse young people’s rights, so it would be consistent to introduce the UNCRC into Scots law. As the Scottish Government still makes laws that are relevant to young people, it would make sense to incorporate the UNCRC, under which they already have international obligations.

12. Article 41 of the UNCRC states ‘Nothing in the present convention shall affect any provisions which are more conducive to the realisation of the rights of the child and which may be contained in: a) the law of a State Party...’ and after reading through the relevant parts of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill we feel that the UNCRC is a more thorough documentation in relation to enforcing and upholding the rights of children and young people.

13. The articles in the UNCRC should be at the forefront of legislation, as the rights included are basic necessities and human rights for children and young people. This means they are easy to relate into any outstanding and upcoming laws that the Scottish Government creates.

Conclusion

14. We achieved the Rights Respecting School Award by raising awareness of the UNCRC and incorporating it into our practice and culture at school. We now believe that it should be incorporated into Scots Law. This would guarantee, particularly for the most vulnerable members of our society, that their rights are met by all organisations. It has certainly helped build, frame and maintain positive relationships not only between young people but also between young people and staff.

1. Getting it Right for Every Midlothian Child (GIRFEMC) is a partnership within the Community Planning Partnership in Midlothian. The GIRFEMC Board includes representation from elected members, the Council, NHS, Police Scotland, Midlothian Youth Platform, voluntary sector, SCRA and the Child Protection Committee. While this submission includes some feedback from NHS Lothian, NHS Lothian and Police Scotland have submitted separate responses to the Scottish Government in line with their broader areas of responsibility.

2. The GIRFEMC Board welcomes the Scottish Government’s move to enhance the rights of the child and shift towards prevention and early intervention, through increasing early learning and childcare provision and the Named Person, as set out in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

3. We welcome the focus on furthering children’s rights, however, the Bill currently places a duty on the wider public sector to report on what they are doing to take forward realisation of the rights set out in the UNCRC (United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child). The duty does not actually require public bodies to further these rights – placing a duty on public sector to create a plan to further these rights rather than just to report on what they may (or may not) be doing would strengthen the likelihood of this area being progressed. Plans and reports should be updated and published on a publicly available website annually.

4. The legislation also provides an opportunity to broaden the type of information gathered by the Scottish Government related to the outcomes of early intervention and prevention for children and young people. Presently the statistics gathered are numbers and throughput rather than outcomes. While it is not easy to measure outcomes from early intervention and prevention work other than following individuals or trends over time, measures could be devised and introduced, provided they are not overly onerous to produce.

5. We do, however, have some areas where we would appreciate clarification:
   - Whether there will be any central funding to Councils, NHS etc. to cover the costs of implementing the legislation, including increasing the early learning and childcare provision and the named person, and if there will be, what the figures will be and the when it will be distributed
   - How the role of named person will be fulfilled during the holidays, particularly the summer holidays, when the child is of school age and the named person is school-based
   - Whether there will be a central approach to making the secure and robust organisational and technical arrangements for the transfer of information from the NHS to the Council when the child starts school
6. The documentation prepared by the Scottish Government contains a number of estimates of time and resources required to implement the Bill and of the savings that will result from the more preventative approach, however we will only find out how accurate these estimates are in due course. There is a potential risk to the Council and its partners if these estimates prove to be incorrect.

7. The resources required will include a need for more skilled and qualified staff to be recruited, for example more Health Visitors, teachers to back-fill teaching posts, childcare professionals etc. Experienced and qualified staff cannot be found overnight and creating them will take time and resources beyond the simple cost of paying people for the relevant period of time.

8. The Financial Memorandum makes the point more than once that it was difficult to estimate the numbers and cost of the extension of the support duty on Local Authorities for care leavers up to the age of 25. With Midlothian being a small local authority with a relatively high number of care leavers this has the potential to be a significant drawn on resources, both staff and financial.

9. Clarifying and improving the financial support available to Kinship Carers with the intended consequence of reducing the numbers in care is welcomed however this will increase legal costs to, and the number of kinship carer payments by, local authorities. While in the longer term there should be savings through reduced numbers in care there are also short and medium term implications from increasing the numbers of kinship carers, particularly if significant numbers of existing carers come forward to formalise their caring role.

10. Increasing the number of successful adoptions and thereby reducing the number of children and young people in care is an aim that is supported by the GIRFEMC Board. That said, putting Scotland’s Adoption Register on a statutory footing must be done in a way that allows effective and efficient use so that children and young people can be adopted without increased administrative burdens or delaying the adoption process, while also finding the most suitable adoptive parents. It must also be a transparent process and understandable to all parties involved in the process, particularly the children and young people and the prospective adoptive parents.

11. Overall there will be big challenges for organisations working with children and young people to put money and resources towards prevention and early intervention while also supporting those children and young people who have already passed this stage, particularly in this time of budget reductions. The transitional phase while priorities and service delivery are reconfigured must be funded to ensure that prevention and early intervention is delivered effectively so that the long term rewards are achieved, but not at the expense of the current generation of children and young people already receiving services.

Getting It Right for Every Midlothian Child
26 July 2013
Response to written submission from Paul Braterman, Ron McLaren and Clare Marsh—

The Scottish Education Department have repeatedly stated that RME is to be provided to/for "all pupils"/"every child."

The 1980 'conscience clause' refers to Religious Instruction, which no longer exists in non-denominational schools.

RME/RMPS (in non-denominational schools) is 'not' Religious Instruction, any more than Modern Studies is Political Instruction. I do not instruct my pupils religiously any more than my Modern Studies colleagues instruct their pupils politically and can see no reason why the children of Jehovah's Witnesses, Islamists, atheists, or any other group, should have a 'right' to opt out of my subject.

Following 'opt out' logic, we should allow (and encourage) children of ID proponents and creationists to opt out of Biology classes on evolution; children of Islamists to opt out of PSE lessons on minority sexualities; children of political fundamentalists to opt out of Modern Studies, and so on.

If any subject is being badly taught in some schools then we should be targeting the teachers concerned, the head teachers and the local authorities. No subject can legally be used to indoctrinate/propagandize pupils in non-denominational schools. Choosing instead to let a few parents 'opt out' serves only to make life easier for corrupt, biased teachers. Should parents, whose children encounter a biased, proselytising History/Modern Studies teacher, presenting his/her own political views as the correct ones, seek to just 'opt out' whilst allowing other people's children to continue to be indoctrinated without them?

On what moral or religious grounds could a parent prevent their children from learning about the beliefs and values of Jews, Hindus, Buddhists, Christians, Muslims, Sikhs, atheists and agnostics?

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Sheila Gilmore

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

4. Ultimately this bill appears to be motivated by a philosophy that is at odds with those that undergird a free society. Specifically, the notions that government should be limited and only intervene when necessary or provided for under objective standards, that a free people are competent to raise their own children without interference or uninvited “help” from government bureaucrats, that information about children should be protected and only shared when written consent is given by parents or legal guardians. And finally, that in a free society the rights of families and the irreplaceable relationship between parents and children must be protected and respected. The proposed Scottish legislation turns the notion that parents are responsible for their children on its head and basically says that parents can't be trusted-only government can.
We very much welcome this opportunity to submit written evidence on the above Bill. We would wish to reiterate our continued support for the objectives and principles of the Bill, but would wish to make a number of comments on the potential implications of its implementation.

In general terms we continue to have real concern about the funding of the Bill. Our officers were involved in work on costing the implications of the Bill. In relation to the proposal to increase available early years provision to 600 hours, we agreed that the costings from the Scottish Government were broadly accurate and have received confirmation that this section will be fully funded, although no actual figures per local authority have been provided.

Also in general terms much of the detail of the act is being left to secondary legislation so it is difficult to comment in detail on what impact the act is going to have.

A further general point is that we have some concerns regarding governance and a potential shift from local to central government governance and accountability. In particular Section 17 which relates to children’s services planning. The powers proposed in this section for Scottish Ministers to direct local authorities is a significant shift from the previous Children (Scotland) Act 1995, and is potentially much more far reaching, where Scottish Ministers could ultimately direct local authorities to provide and plan children’s services in a particular way. We would welcome further discussion on this point in relation to governance.

Glasgow is one of only two local authorities which currently provides 570 hours per year of free early years education and childcare. However, there remain challenges which will impact on staffing, accommodation and partnership contracts to enable 600 hours to be delivered.

Glasgow is already taking positive steps to embed the rights of children and young people in line with UNCRC, including our ambition to be a Child Friendly City through UNICEF UK Child Rights Partner Programme.

The concerns around funding centre on the proposals for named persons, kinship care orders and increasing duties for looked after children from 21 to 25. In relation to kinship care the Scottish Government estimate a cost of £2.6m across Scotland for implementation costs with no recurring cost. In considering the potential cost to GCC, we estimated a cost for assessment and start up if all of our carers were to apply for the new order of £0.442m, with some of this recurring dependent on the nature of ongoing support. In addition the cost of supporting carers to apply for the new order is unknown, but if we based this on costs to support Adoption orders, there would be a considerable cost to the Council. It would appear the assumption is that once carers have applied for the order and receive a start up grant then they would no longer be in receipt of payment from the Local Authority. It is difficult therefore to estimate how many kinship carers would apply for the new order. Moreover, without a definition of support the assumption that this may not include financial support could be challenged by carers.

8. In relation to the funding of the proposal to increase the age of support to care leavers from 21 to 25, the Scottish Government have estimated a national funding requirement of £3.87 in 2015/16, £4.03 in 2016/17, £4.03 in 2017/18 and £1.77m in both 2018/19 and 2019/20. We estimated the costs of providing this additional support in Glasgow to be £0.353m in 2015/16 rising to an additional annual cost of £1.4m. We based our costing on the average financial payment for young people and costs associated with additional staffing to provide an aftercare service to young people.

9. Named person – it is anticipated that further guidance on the role and function of the named person will be provided. Early indications are that NHS will take responsibility for all pre school children with Education holding lead responsibility for all children of school age. The GIRFEC strategy group in Glasgow is currently developing procedures for the universal implementation of the named person’s role in three pilot learning communities, St Rochs, Eastbank and Drumchapel. We will need reassurance that further guidance will be available. Some concern has also been raised that there may be potential confusion with the title of named person currently used in mental health services.

10. In respect of S37 regarding the child’s plan and the management of same. We remain strongly of the opinion that secondary legislation needs to ensure that the Child’s Plan replaces the current requirements for planning under Additional Support Act (2004). Unless the Bill provides this clarity we will continue to have a separate planning process and document for children and young people who have additional needs as defined under the Act. At subsection 5 there is provision to allow Scottish Ministers to make further orders regarding the management of the plan. It would be helpful to have further provisions in relation to for instance the transfer of the plan between authorities.

11. With regards to the provision of counselling services in part 9 of the act, there is no definition of 'eligible child'. This is the starting point of the obligation to provide services so the definition of this should not be left to secondary legislation. As things currently stand we are to provide undefined counselling services to parents or those with PRR (parental rights and responsibilities) of an undefined group of children. Accordingly it is difficult to know the potential impact of this section.

12. Part 10 of the Bill relates to kinship care. Section 64 makes it an absolute obligation that kinship care assistance is made available by the local authority but again there is no definition of the term “kinship care assistance”. In the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007, there was some attempt to define certain terms for instance ‘adoption support service’ and the same should reasonably apply here.

13. S65 sets out what a kinship care order is. It is encouraging that the Scottish Government made changes to the original proposals following consultation in relation to the creation of a new kinship care order. This section deems that any residence order granted in favour of a qualifying person or any order under s11(1) of the 95 Act giving the right to dictate residence to a qualifying person, is deemed to be a 'kinship care order'. Qualifying person is defined in s65(2) but further clarity is required on the definition of ‘related’. It is proposed that the interpretation is one similar to the definition of ‘relative’ in s119 of the 2007 act.

14. There needs to be some requirement for assessment by the local authority and a discretion on the local authority as to who should be able to gain assistance from them. This is also being left to secondary legislation. S66(3) and (4) allows the Scottish Ministers to make further provision about a number of matters including how or when kinship care assistance is to be provided, when a child is eligible etc. It is arguable that these issues are too important to leave to secondary legislation. It is interesting to note that in our liaison with kinship carer groups they are also looking for further clarity of these issues.

15. In conclusion, Glasgow City Council welcomes the objectives and principles of the new Bill, much of which will reinforce the ongoing multi agency work based on improving outcomes for children and families that is already underway in Glasgow. However, we remain concerned about a number of aspects of the Bill and in particular issues around governance and funding. We would very much welcome the opportunity to provide oral evidence to the Committee.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Rita Gleason

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

4. Ultimately this bill appears to be motivated by a philosophy that is at odds with those that undergird a free society. Specifically, the notions that government should be limited and only intervene when necessary or provided for under objective standards, that a free people are competent to raise their own children without interference or uninvited “help” from government bureaucrats, that information about children should be protected and only shared when written consent is given by parents or legal guardians. And finally, that in a free society the rights of families and the irreplaceable relationship between parents and children must be protected and respected. The proposed Scottish legislation turns the notion that parents are responsible for their children on its head and basically says that parents can’t be trusted-only government can.
Children’s Rights

1. Govan Law Centre supports the extension of children’s rights within the Bill to include the right to engage fully with the system which potentially affects their lives. This should include the right to exercise any dispute resolution mechanisms afforded by the Act. These rights should supplement, and not supplant, parental rights in this context.

2. Currently, children with legal capacity have the right to appeal against an exclusion in the Sheriff Court, and to bring a (legally complex) disability discrimination claim to the Additional Support Needs Tribunal but are banned from bringing a case to the same Tribunal about the additional support they require at school.

3. Govan Law Centre believes that the right of appeal belongs to the child, and has historically been held by parents as proxy for their children. We believe that, as the individual who is the subject of the actions to be taken under the legislation, the child should be able to enforce their rights by challenging decisions with which they disagree directly.

4. The Scottish Government’s commitment to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child is laudable. However, we note the Scottish Government has not yet taken any steps to comply with the recommendation of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child to “[e]nsure that children who are able to express their views have the right to appeal … to special educational need tribunals.”

5. Scottish Ministers have previously indicated that they looked favourably on proposals to grant children rights of appeal under the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 and this Bill would seem to be an ideal legislative vehicle for that amendment, and to extend the principle to include remedies available in relation to the child’s plan.

Remedies

6. Govan Law Centre agrees with the position put forward by the Advisory Group on Additional Support for Learning in recommending a single plan in which each agency is responsible for its contributions. Critically, we agree that this must be supported by accessible, direct and proportionate means of redress. All relevant agencies should be equally accountable under processes of dispute resolution.

7. An effective, independent dispute resolution mechanism must be available in the event of disagreement over the contents or delivery of the child’s plan. This could include an extension of the availability of mediation, independent adjudication and the Additional Support Needs Tribunal (for specified categories of dispute).

Privacy

8. The Bill, as drafted, proposes a significant erosion of the right to privacy for children and families with few (if any) safeguards built in. This represents a fundamental redefinition of the way in which information about children is to be treated by agencies and runs the risk of falling outwith the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.

9. Govan Law Centre is deeply concerned about the provisions within the Bill concerning the exercise of judgement on whether confidential information about a child ought to be shared and whether that decision is capable of being judicially reviewed. We are concerned with the provision in section 26(6) permitting disclosure when it is expedient as this section is not qualified in any way. Section 27(1) affords a complete exemption from any legal restriction on disclosure, but sub-sections (2) and (3) are special provisions (inconsistent with the broad exemption in paragraph 1) specifying when information may be disclosed in breach of a duty of confidence.

10. There are real concerns about whether these provisions are potentially so wide as to give rise to breaches of Article 8 of the ECHR, which would take the provisions outwith the Scottish Parliament’s legislative competence and could, in some instances, render the UK in breach of the Convention. (See para. 17, below).

11. Further, insofar as Section 27 could be seen as an attempt to exercise the rights conferred by Article 5 of the Data Protection Directive in that it "determines more precisely the conditions under which the processing of personal data is lawful", or in some other way could be said to be an implied amendment of the Data Protection Act, then the clause is outwith the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament as data protection is a reserved matter.

12. The Privacy Impact Assessment which accompanied the Bill does not demonstrate an appreciation of the purpose and requirements of data protection legislation (nor, indeed, other aspects of human rights legislation. The legislation is proposing a very significant change from the present situation where data may be shared if there is significant concern for the safety of a child to one where data must be shared if there is any concern regarding the child’s wellbeing. This concept is defined in very broad terms which will inevitably leave the matter to subjective interpretation. In any event, should a mild concern regarding any aspect of ‘wellbeing’ justify acting in breach of an obligation of confidence?

13. The Privacy Impact Assessment does not elaborate on the public interest tests for disclosing confidential information, but merely asserts that the public interest will permit disclosure in the listed cases. The assessment also asserts that there is a legitimate expectation that information will be shared between professionals. That assertion is unsupported by argument or evidence and should be challenged: do children and parents in Scotland have an expectation that confidential medical information will be shared with the school, the social work dept. and others as a matter of course? Govan Law Centre’s experience suggests that, in fact, parents expect confidential information to be kept confidential and shared only with their consent – or in circumstances where there is an imminent and serious risk to the child.

14. The Data Protection Act 1998 requires that data processing be both lawful and fair and sets out a number of criteria to determine whether processing complies with these requirements. It is entirely possible that processing might be legitimised under the Bill, but still be classed as unfair. The requirements of fair and lawful processing have to be satisfied in the context of individual acts of processing. The discretion and powers proposed in the Bill are too wide to satisfy this requirement in all cases, and thus do not provide a panacea to practitioners who share confidential data. The Privacy Impact Assessment’s section on fairness refers entirely to confidentiality. It makes no reference to fairness as a duty to the data subject and the proportionality issues that arise thereby.\textsuperscript{4} “Fairness” is essentially about individuals not being misled when information is obtained. The issue of fair processing is of pivotal importance, but this fact is not recognised in the assessment.

15. The assessment refers to the first data protection principle. However, most of the other principles are also of direct relevance and need to be considered especially in view of the proposal that all information relating to a child’s ‘wellbeing’ should be passed to the Named Person. What provisions are to be made regarding further disclosure (the 2\textsuperscript{nd} data protection principle); the period of time for which the data is to be held (the 5\textsuperscript{th} principle) or the technical and procedural security precautions that must be taken (the 8\textsuperscript{th} principle)? There is no reference to the requirement that data must be processed taking account of the rights of the data subject, including provision for subject access by or on behalf of the data subject. This is likely to be of considerable significance in respect of requests being made by parents for access to data on behalf of a child, particularly in light of the exceptionally broad definition given to the term “parent” in education legislation.

16. Sections 1.3 and 1.4 of the Privacy Impact Assessment do state the areas of risk, but there seems to be a suggestion that the impact problem is primarily one of security, which is a fundamental misunderstanding of privacy and data protection.

17. Section 2 of the assessment is superficial in its references to privacy risk – it is not at all clear that there is an understanding of privacy, its nature and significance. This is compounded by the reference in section 2.8 to "the eight data sharing principles of the Data Protection Act 1998." This description amounts to a serious and fundamental misunderstanding of data protection. The Principles apply to all aspects of data processing and are not there primarily to facilitate data sharing.

18. The risks specified in section 3 and the risk register are overwhelmingly about security matters except for the first item which concerns diminution of trust threatening effective social work. Nowhere is there any consideration of the notion that privacy is about private ‘space’ to allow the development of the personality of the individual. The European Court of Human Rights has determined that “…the guarantee afforded by Article 8 of the Convention is primarily intended to ensure the development, without outside interference, of the personality of each individual in his relations with other human beings.” Data protection is not the same as privacy; nevertheless, the Privacy Impact Assessment is flawed and incomplete without having a proper understanding of the right to private life, nor can compliance with the fairness principle be properly addressed without understanding the nature of and the need for privacy. There are, of course, circumstances where a child’s right to privacy needs to be overridden in an effort to protect them from harm but the starting position must still be that the child has a right to a private life. As presently drafted, this Bill falls far short of that position by permitting and encouraging routine data sharing on all children.

19. Govan Law Centre’s comments on privacy draw heavily on advice received by us from Professor Ian Lloyd of the Faculty of Law at University of Southhampton, to whom we are very grateful for his time and expertise.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Grandparents Apart UK

1. On the whole we agree with the contents of the Bill and believe it will improve outcomes for children if implemented properly and followed in the spirit intended. We are particularly pleased to see some specific criteria set down for what should be considered ‘child’s best interest’ as we have been highlighting for a long time that ‘child’s best interest’ is an opinion and this could vary from person to person, or area to area with unpredictable outcomes for children and families.

2. We are also extremely pleased that a lot of what is contained in the Bill follows the principle of The Charter for Grandchildren which we helped create in 2006.

Our remaining concerns are as follows -

Concerns over Social Services involvement

3. While we appreciate Social Workers have a difficult job and a high case load, we deal with some of the fall out from their decisions.

4. We were initially pleased that some processes in the original Bill were to be removed from Social Work control as we have had so many cases where there has been false reporting and family members simply shut out for no good reason other than questioning a decision or opinion. However we are extremely concerned that this doesn’t seem to have been carried through, in particular with kinship care and simplifying claiming allowances. Too many families are afraid to ask for financial support via Social Services and fear their intervention when if they worked properly in reality, they should be reassured by their involvement. Families as a whole should be confident that they will be assisted not broken apart. We have long been calling for meetings to be recorded, or minuted and signed to safeguard all parties. Training needs to be updated and attitudes changed to accommodate the requirements of this Bill, something else we have been calling for, for a long time.

5. Families must be happy to seek help earlier when they are having problems to prevent molehills becoming mountains and Social Services don’t provide that reassurance in their present form. Even children are afraid to seek help in case they are ‘taken away’ so whether a named person exists or not, the child must feel reassured of the outcome to feel confident in talking to someone about their concerns and fears. We feel it is extremely important that there is some other organisation which families can go to for help or advice earlier, without fear of losing control e.g. Children 1st. Families shouldn’t have to depend on charity helplines for advice and support. Early intervention could prevent many families being ‘in the system’ at all. Some simplified way through ‘the system’ is a must for kinship carers so that the child does not suffer hardship.
Child’s Plan

6. It is imperative to ensure transparency and honesty with justification of decisions available to all parties. There must be some way set out for professionals involved to be able to raise concerns with the performance or decision making of others involved in the children’s plan without fearing for their own position. We don’t want another NHS whistleblower situation. No one should suffer for raising concerns when a child’s future is at stake.

7. Equally there must be some way set out for family members to be able to raise their concerns and ensure they are listened to before any decision is made regarding any child. There must be clear provision for non-resident parents to be included in any decision making so that they are not excluded by default, unless of course any safety issues exist.

8. Love, stability and being included are hugely important to any child and this must be the priority, not ticking off a case and moving on to the next. The plan must be in the child’s best interest, not the parent or whatever is easiest for the planners.

9. Some independent checks on how the child is progressing following changes in their lives would be a safeguard to judge if the right decision has been made. i.e. settled in nursery/school, sleeping well, making friends etc. Perhaps something could be set up within the Children’s Commissioner’s office to do this.

Parenting Assistance - prevention

10. Some form of parental education should be provided where this would help families, as too often parents are not aware they are parenting badly. Basic consideration for others, communication skills, compromise etc. basic nutrition and cooking skills and money management. Education about how important school is and ensuring basic reading and writing skills are taught to parents where necessary. Few parents want to mistreat their children, they often just need help and support and to know it is alright to ask for help.

Kinship care

11. We believe, and research has shown that children want to stay with family members where at all possible. Therefore it would benefit children to have safeguards in place that grandparents or other family members, including non-resident parents are considered fully as carers before any arrangements are made to place the child with outside foster carers. The child must be listened to and family members assisted in any way possible to accommodate the child’s requests. Many children are removed from families due to alcohol or drug misuse and living with this will have been traumatic enough for the child without further loss of loved ones unnecessarily.

12. As stated earlier, some simplified way through ‘the system’ is a must for kinship carers so that the child does not suffer further hardship in a crisis situation.
13. There are many good prospective adoptive parents but only children who cannot be kept within their own families should be placed for adoption and better contact maintained with biological families where appropriate. It is also a fact that many adopted children seek out their natural families in later life, some to clarify feelings of rejection. It is important that children are aware of their biological family medical history and potential problems in later life due to hereditary illness. Continuity of contact or access is crucial in some families.

14. Speed of adoption is only good if the correct decision has been made.

Outcomes

15. Services provided and decision making must be on a national scale. The ‘postcode lottery’ of outcomes is not in any child’s best interest, especially when a Scottish Adoption Register is proposed with access for all local authorities. A National register should be backed by National services. There must be fair and adequate finance to provide local and national solutions to what is a national problem. Investment and proper training now will result in more secure and confident adults in the future, reducing teenage and adult offending and criminal behaviour which is often the result of a child feeling unloved and excluded for whatever reason.

16. Care levers must be better supported and protected with better information provided about where to seek help should they require it, especially if they become homeless, and better systems in place to provide that help quickly. A good foster carer would be willing to provide support and help, not necessarily financial, to youngsters leaving their care as they would do with a biological family member.

Overview

17. More effective rights for every child and young person are only as good as the adults speaking up for them. We must make sure the people speaking up for them are truthful, have common sense and put the child’s interests before their own.

18. Targets while a good idea in principle, are too often simply numbers manipulated to convince governments that goals have been reached. The only targets going forward should be happy and secure children who match the SHANARRI Wellbeing indicators and families that are happy to seek help before it’s too late.

The proposed Scottish legislation turns the notion that parents are responsible for their children on its head and basically says that parents can’t be trusted-only government can.
1. My name is Brian Haile, and together with my wife Isla, we are the owner/directors of two bespoke rural children’s nurseries in Symington and Biggar in South Lanarkshire. We can accommodate 87 children from ages 6 weeks to 11 years from 7.30am to 6pm, 50 weeks per annum providing an essential care service for working parents. Clients typically drop their children in before work and we provide care or wrap around care with the local primary schools (pick up and drop off service), parents or family collecting their children after work/late in the day, up to 5 days per week. We are also fully accredited by South Lanarkshire Council to provide Early Years (aged 3-5) funded places for 475 hours per annum, and provide that service in conjunction with local primary schools for up to 32 children in that age group.

2. Our daily rates are around £41 per day for younger children reducing to £35 per day for older ones. This falls far below that charged south of the border or in Scottish cities but is the maximum we believe parents can manage in our area. My wife is a “hands on” manager, I am everything from Janitor to Finance/Strategic Operations manager and this is typical for private providers in Scotland. Its our fourth year in business, we have 28 full and part time employees (an employment lifeline in our rural area), having turned over around £380k last financial year at 70% occupancy. Year 1 we lost £55k, year 2 lost £35k, year 3 lost £22k and now year 4 finally, an encouraging profit of £5k.

3. We have doubled turnover year on year to date and are only still in business due to loans from friends and family, the banks being less than willing to lend based on our financials (despite constant assurances from government that they are being encouraged to). With further financial investment of the order of £50-60k we could invest in renewables that will double our profitability in coming years, and half our heating and lighting bills (aswell as helping to save the planet and involving children in that); but noone will lend us the money to do it, despite the potential returns and guarantees that we can meet loan repayments. Our business rates increased by 60% 18 months ago, being our second largest outgoing, it almost ended the business.

4. The previous summary is typical of a large number of essential private providers struggling to survive in the current climate, that are key to National Government meeting their childcare objectives in the coming few years, especially 600 hours, and meeting the aims and objectives of the Children and Young People Bill.

5. I am also the South Lanarkshire secretary for the National Day Nursery Association and have also applied for the National Government funded post with the NDNA for Policy Manager Scotland, to further communicate our day to day challenges. As such, the following combines input from private providers in South Lanarkshire, all of our clients and of course my wife and I, key childcare providers, in rural South Lanarkshire. As such we feel this brings together the common feelings of a significant portion of Scotland to be served by the Bill. A voice that clearly requires some keen attention.

Issues and Concerns

Birthday Discrimination

6. In the Committee’s call for evidence the five aims of the Children and Young People’s Bill are outlined. Point 3 “Strengthen the role of early years support in children’s and families’ lives by increasing the amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare”

7. Every child in Scotland should be entitled to the same amount of “free” care regardless of age. Unfortunately this is not and will not be the case with the Bill in its current form. Simply due to the time of the year a child is born the “free” care on offer varies from 950 hours to 1108 hours under 475 hours per annum regime, which equates to £3100 to £3617; and under the proposed 600 hours regime, 1200 to 1400 hours which equates to £3916 to £4569 difference in offering/value per child (please refer to Reform Scotland NDNA presentation May 13).

8. Nursery provision in Scotland, beginning at age 3, with the new Curriculum for Excellence, is a key part of a child’s education, and at a critical key stage of learning. Nurseries play a vital role in education and social development as highlighted in numerous studies and reports, and it seems grossly unfair that children are not all equally entitled to the same basic amount of “free” nursery care simply due to the day or month in which they were born, before starting Primary school.

9. The move to 600 hours in 2014 is very welcome, but it will further increase the age discrimination differential and therefore should be corrected in amendments to the Bill.

10. This should also be taken in to consideration when dealing with “Looked after and disadvantaged two year olds” as part of the Bill, in other words there should not be any age discrimination for this sector of children either, guaranteeing a least a year of care for every child falling into this criteria.

Parental Choice and what’s best for the child.

“Local authorities will, therefore, be obliged to provide flexible patterns of early learning and childcare within a minimum framework which will meet local need as identified by consultation and published plans or local strategies.

11. Everyone agrees and the Bill outlines in its forward “make Scotland be the best place for children”. So why are we allowing local authorities to define constrained options for 600 hours. Parents want to choose what’s best for their child. In our experience that is a combination of state and private nursery care. Private providers should be working hand in hand with state nurseries. State nurseries being filled to capacity and working economically for tax payers, with private providers providing wrap around care or full care as required by parents, in a combination that helps children familiarise themselves with their peers and surroundings.

12. Questionnaires issued in South Lanarkshire didn’t even include any options for shared care and seriously limited parental choice, they weren’t issued to state and private providers at the same time, state being involved far too late in the process, and as a result parents provided an inconsistent/poor response which cannot really be analysed sensibly. SLC still intend to make use of it to define their 600 hour regime, a serious mistake in our humble opinion.

13. The solution is simple. A 600 hour voucher that can be utilised by either state or private, parental selection of hours at each prior to start of term with some flexibility, care provided by private and state working together, sharing everything from resources to, perhaps, even premises. Each being funded appropriately, again spending tax payers money effectively. Far less admin for SLC, better for everyone all round. Those nurseries being able to accept the “vouchers” should have accreditation to provide the service simply because HMIE and Care Inspectorate results are above a certain standard, not because the local authority has them on an approved list, as is currently the case. In fact is could be argued that there is a significant degree of overlap between HMIE and Care Inspectorate services and inspections, and, there could be cost savings made in that area too. In this way parents get the fullest choice and flexibility matching their working needs at the most effective cost to the tax payer.

600 hours and financial burdens that may break the backs of small private providers

14. The rates of funding provided by local authorities have not increased for over 6 years. As a result all private providers are being forced to subsidise Early Years funded places to the tune of around 6.5%, in South Lanarkshire. We receive £8.15 per session when our private charge is £8.68 per session. As the local authority can modify the advised rate specified by National Government, this could be better or worse dependent on region. Yet again, another serious issue, future funding should be ring fenced and fixed at an acceptable rate across Scotland. That rate should be the average of private provider rates across the nation taken from the results of a detailed national survey. In all cases this means that sector of care is running at a loss or break even.
