15. Additionally some local authorities fail to pay Early Year funds until up to 7 months after the child has started, and are forced to further subsidise the service due to finance charges etc. This has forced a number of private providers to charge “up front” for the “free at point of delivery service” only reimbursing parents at term end, year end or best case when they themselves receive payment. This means a large number of children are being prevented from attending private providers as they can’t afford to pay. This in turn means that with the children being forced to attend state care, parents struggle to go to work as they need to drop and collect children at unreasonable times, defined by the state nursery. The end result is, none delivery of National Government’s core objective, “free” at point of delivery care. The amendments to the Bill should stop this. All private providers should offer care “free at point of delivery”, local authorities should pay funds before the start of the term or pay interest and provide loans to cover the cost of service.

16. Most parents currently top up funded place care equal to or exceeding 600 hours. If, therefore, 600 hours is introduced without a long overdue rate increase it will force private providers to lose money. In our case, this will likely turn our small operating profit making business, back to a loss making concern, and eventually liquidation. We in fact do not intend to increase to 600 hours if this happens and will stick at 475 hours (as I understand will many others). Incredibly contractual terms signed by all SLC providers will allow for this for up to 12 months after the introduction of 600 hours (a major over-site on the part of SLC).

17. Please take these points into careful consideration at your hearing. We are more than keen to represent the interests of our “common voice” in South Lanarkshire as a witness, as and when necessary, to clarify fully any questions or concerns on the above burning key issues, essential to making a success of 600 hours and the Bill in Scotland.

Health and Social Care Alliance Scotland (the ALLIANCE)

About the ALLIANCE

1. The ALLIANCE’s vision is for a Scotland where people of all ages who are disabled or living with long term conditions, and unpaid carers, have a strong voice and enjoy their right to live well, as equal and active citizens, free from discrimination, with support and services that put them at the centre.

2. The ALLIANCE has three core aims; we seek to:
   - Ensure people are at the centre, that their voices, expertise and rights drive policy and sit at the heart of design, delivery and improvement of support and services.
   - Support transformational change, towards approaches that work with individual and community assets, helping people to stay well, supporting human rights, self management, co-production and independent living.
   - Champion and support the third sector as a vital strategic and delivery partner and foster better cross-sector understanding and partnership.

Introduction

3. The ALLIANCE offers its broad support for the Policy intentions included within the Children and Young People’s Bill. We believe that the proposals are a positive step to making Scotland a more inclusive environment for children who are disabled and have long term conditions.

UNCRC Principles

4. The ALLIANCE’s report Seen and Not Heard opens with the statement:

   “It is a basic right of disabled children and young people, and those with long term conditions, to be included and to enjoy equality of opportunity with their peers. Supporting people to develop self management skills at an early age will improve their quality of life, opportunities and help reduce future complications”

5. The ALLIANCE believes the Scottish Government has retracted upon its original intention to underpin legislation with the principles of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC). The ALLIANCE believes this Bill has retracted upon the Scottish Government’s original intention to underpin the legislative process with the principles of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. This represents a weakening of the Scottish Government’s commitment to embed the UNCRC across the legislative agenda. We are concerned that the ambition set forth in the Bill’s consultation stage will not be achieved. This is a regressive step in the progress towards the integration of the UNCRC into Scotland's legislative framework.

6. The ALLIANCE believes that the reporting of the Minister’s progress on consideration of the UNCRC should be an independent process, which is scrutinised by the Scottish Parliament and stakeholders. The ALLIANCE has serious doubts that an open, transparent account of the Government’s actions to implement the UNCRC will be fully realised. The potential for the Scottish Government to report on those aspects of their progress which exemplify their successes may not meet the desired objective of an independent report.

Investigations by the Commissioner

7. The ALLIANCE believes that the dualistic approach to investigating individual and collective infringements is a positive method to adopt. However, The ALLIANCE is cautious that such an approach may favour cases that are considered to hold public interest above those which involve less obvious infringements on the rights of more vulnerable children. It is unclear how the Commissioner will identify the abuse of children’s rights. Likewise, the process for children seeking support in instances where their rights have been infringed is not obvious within the Bill. Seen and Not Heard found that there is limited opportunity for children and young people’s views to be expressed and taken into account. By appreciating the views and opinions of children, the most effective policy can be shaped to meet their needs. This would thereby reflect the Scottish Government’s principle of active and equal partnership in policy development.

“For policy and practice to succeed in this area, children and young people’s voices must be heard at individual, local and national level” (Seen and Not Heard)

8. At the same time, the freedom afforded to the Commissioner to select which cases to investigate based upon their judgement of its ‘significance’ could be open to interpretation. The ALLIANCE would prefer a system whereby the Commissioner is requested to investigate instances where there is a concern that a child’s rights have been infringed under the responsibility of a relevant statutory body. This would ensure proper accountability of public authorities in relation to the treatment of children within their remit, and secure a role for the Commissioner as an independent arbiter of children’s rights in Scotland.

Children’s Services Planning

9. The ALLIANCE welcomes the introduction of section 7, Children’s Service Planning, with particular encouragement from the inclusion of a specific reference to identifying and planning for the needs of disabled children. The ALLIANCE strongly supports the emphasis on safeguarding children. It is essential that the planning of children’s services takes adequate consideration of the increased vulnerability of disabled children when establishing a framework to promote the wellbeing of children in their area.

10. The ALLIANCE is particularly supportive of the emphasis on partnership working between local authorities and health boards. We are conscious that there is little acknowledgement within the Bill of the establishment of Integration Joint Boards which have been created through the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill. It would seem that in an integrated framework, such as the one being proposed, Children’s Service Planning would come under the responsibility of such a board. We would therefore seek clarification regarding the role of Integration Joint Boards within the creation of the Children’s Service Plans.

11. It is our belief that the coordination of health and social care should empower children and young people to determine the support they need and that of their families. Therefore, within the context of the Social Care (Self-Directed Support) (Scotland) Act and the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, the ALLIANCE would encourage the Scottish Government to:

“Continue to develop approaches such as personalised budgets to enable children, young people and families to design holistic packages of support that best meet their needs. Children, young people and families should be reflected in the Self Directed Support Strategy currently being developed” (Seen and Not Heard Recommendation)³

12. While it is encouraging that the process includes consultation with services that are likely to provide for children and young people, we believe that there should be a wider perspective that considers the responsibility of all agencies, including, for example, transport, leisure facilities and business, to have a stake in ensuring the safety of children within their area.

13. Furthermore we believe that children and young people should be involved in the consultation process and central to the design and delivery of Children’s Service Plans. We feel that given the Scottish Government’s history and commitment to involve children in the strategic development of policy, children and young people should be encouraged to be active contributors to the Children’s Service Plans.

Named person

14. The intention behind the introduction of a named person for every child is welcomed. However there are a number of concerns regarding the current proposals to introduce a named person:

- There is insufficient detail as to the relationship between the named person, the child and their family. The ALLIANCE seeks clarification of the phrase “help in the exercise in any of the named person functions” in order to ascertain the intended role of the named person in respect to other relevant authorities.

- The ‘Duty to help named person’ section of the Bill is too weak to give the named person authority to access the necessary support from other agencies. The ability of service providers and relevant authorities to refuse requests will maintain the fractious nature of services that currently exists. We believe that the named person must hold significant authority to ensure that the interests of the child are paramount.

- There is inadequate reference to the Child’s Plan within the Bill or policy memorandum’s section on the named person. The Child’s Plan is the responsibility of the health board (pre-school) and local authority. As it is suggested that the named person is also defined to these age categories, the ALLIANCE believes the Bill should be clearer in the describing the named person’s role in the development and monitoring of the Child’s Plan.

- Section 60 increases the age at which care leavers can receive support from the local authority to 26. The ALLIANCE believes that the named person should have the same responsibility. For children with additional support needs, who often stay in formal/informal education beyond usual attendance and for whom transition is especially difficult, a named person could provide young people with crucial support during this period. This function could be continued by an identified social worker when the young person leaves school.

- There needs to be a greater emphasis on children and young people who have additional needs, as this group is often marginalised. The specific needs of children with additional support needs may require a greater level of support from the named person than that of other children and therefore we do not see the Head Teacher as being able to fulfil this role. Given that disabled children might be infrequent users of the education system, they might need access to a named person whose remit is wider than in-school support.

15. Seen and Not Heard Recommendation: “Ensure all disabled young people and those with long term conditions have access to a key worker (as defined by the CCNUK Key Worker Standards)”

The Children’s Plan

16. The proposal to introduce a Child’s Plan is welcomed but unclear. Under the Additional Support for Learning Act 2009, children who are considered to have ‘significant’ needs are eligible to receive a support plan through a duty on education, and in certain circumstances; health and social care, to ‘plan and make joint provision for children and young people with complex or multiple needs’.

4 4 Seen and Not Heard, the ALLIANCE, 2009 - http://www.alliance-scotland.org.uk/download/library/lib_4e3ab55d6ecf6/ additional support needs\textsuperscript{5}. We are concerned that there is an unclear distinction between the different assessment purposes proposed in the Bill to offer a Plan to children who are considered to have a wellbeing need that is ‘adversely affected by any matter’. The Policy Memorandum, section 82, is vague on the relationship between the Children’s Plan and the Coordinated Support Plan for example. The ALLIANCE believes the potential for multiple assessments and plans to be conducted with disabled children is confusing for families and could exacerbate the complexity of support they already experience.

Childcare

17. The ALLIANCE supports the Bill’s intention to offer 600 hours of childcare to all children aged three to four years, and 2 years for those looked after. The latter condition should be expanded to children who are disabled and with long term conditions, for whom early intervention could be crucial and beneficial to both their physical and educational development. Improving access to better quality, affordable and appropriate childcare provision needs to be addressed as it is difficult to find and maintain suitable and affordable childcare for disabled children. As a relatively high proportion of looked after children and young people are disabled, there is a need for greater provision of accessible early learning and childcare for this group.

18. The ALLIANCE urges the Bill to make a concerted effort to improve the childcare provision for all children. To meet the task of increasing the accessibility of childcare for disabled children, the Bill should include:

- A minimum requirement of additional childcare for children who have a disability or long term condition
- Introduce legislation that limits the amount that childcare providers can charge for the additional expenditure of looking after children who are disabled or have long term conditions.
- Introduce a quality measure that assesses childcare providers on their suitability to meet the needs of children who are disabled or have long term conditions.

Looked after children

19. The ALLIANCE is encouraged by the intentions laid out within section eight of the Bill to increase the age at which local authorities have a responsibility to support the needs of young people leaving care. However, the ALLIANCE is unconvinced that the Government’s well intended plans to provide assistance to care leavers up to the age of 26 will be replicated at the local level if there is no requirement on local authorities to do so.

20. The Bill suggests that a young person would have to request support if they required it. This raises concerns for young people who have difficulty comprehending their own support needs, or who have undiagnosed support needs. Whilst we recognise that there does need to be a certain amount of individual autonomy afforded to young people, the ALLIANCE would like to see safeguards put in place to ensure that such young people have access to support if they require it. A named person, for example a social worker, could continue this role up until the young person has reached 26 years of age.

21. A clear definition of the local authority’s responsibility to “provide advice, guidance and assistance” is needed within the Bill. Ideally the ALLIANCE would like to see a similar protection in place for disabled young people beyond school age. At present there is a lack of knowledge and information regarding the destination of disabled young people leaving formal education. Many young disabled people do not participate in training or employment beyond leaving school. For this reason the ALLIANCE’s report Seen and Not Heard made the recommendation to:

“Introduce a system of monitoring the outcomes of transition compared to the young person’s original aspirations. For example in relation to housing, education, employment, support services and quality of life” (Seen and Not Heard Recommendation)\(^6\)

Our Members

The ALLIANCE is the national third sector intermediary for a range of health and social care organisations. The ALLIANCE has around 300 members including large, national support providers as well as small, local volunteer-led groups. Many NHS Boards and Community Health and Care Partnerships are associate members.

The ALLIANCE’s vision is for a Scotland where people of all ages who are disabled or living with long term conditions, and unpaid carers, have a strong voice and enjoy their right to live well, as equal and active citizens, free from discrimination, with support and services that put them at the centre.

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

4. Ultimately this bill appears to be motivated by a philosophy that is at odds with those that undergird a free society. Specifically, the notions that government should be limited and only intervene when necessary or provided for under objective standards, that a free people are competent to raise their own children without interference or uninvited “help” from government bureaucrats, that information about children should be protected and only shared when written consent is given by parents or legal guardians. And finally, that in a free society the rights of families and the irreplaceable relationship between parents and children must be protected and respected. The proposed Scottish legislation turns the notion that parents are responsible for their children on its head and basically says that parents can't be trusted-only government can.
Background

1. This submission focusses on the provisions in the Children & Young People Bill, in relation to implementation of Getting it right for every child.

2. Highland was a national pathfinder for the implementation of Getting it right for every child (GIRFEC) from 2006. There was a period of around 2 years of developmental activity to confirm the key components and practice tools, and a further 18 months programme of implementation.

3. The programme of implementation required a change management plan across all local agencies, as new processes were introduced, and old processes phased out. This was supported by a communications strategy and extensive staff training programme. Implementation was completed in early 2010.

4. There was an evaluation of the process and initial outcomes of implementation by the University of Edinburgh, and evaluation has continued through internal systems.

5. The evidence is that implementation of GIRFEC will reduce bureaucracy, achieve earlier and more effective interventions, and improve outcomes for children and families, such that:

   - Children are more likely to get the help they need when they need it.
   - Practitioners spend more time with children and families.
   - Assessment defines responses - that are more likely to be appropriate, proportionate and timely.
   - There are explicit thresholds for compulsory measures.
   - There is greater support to enhance the capacity of families and communities to meet the needs of children.
   - Those working with children and young people use a more consistent and equitable approach, and are clear about their responsibility to do the right thing for each child and how they contribute to the collective responsibility to do the right thing for each child.

6. This means that needs and risks for children are likely to be responded to more quickly and are less likely to escalate. This is evidenced by reducing numbers of looked after children over the last year and a half, as GIRFEC implementation has begun to impact – first on the number of children supervised at home, and now also on the number who are accommodated away from home.
7. Evidence from The Scottish Children’s Reporters Administration confirms that the Children’s Hearing System is less likely to determine that compulsory measures are necessary to achieve positive outcomes, as plans and collaborative action with families are in place at an early stage.

8. The number of children who are referred to the Reporter continues to reduce, and the number of reported offences by young people is falling very significantly. Thus, fewer children are coming into ‘the system’.

9. Child protection registrations fell at the time of implementation, as practitioners and agencies became more confident that children would receive necessary support, without them having to escalate concerns up the system. Similarly, the number of children re-registered within the previous 12 months has steadily declined.

10. Three years after implementation, GIRFEC is mainstreamed into the practice of services for children across the authority – for children and families, and for staff in education, health, police, social work, the 3rd sector and other partner agencies. It is now simply regarded as the Highland Practice Model.

11. Implementation of the Practice Model has more recently contributed to a further significant development: the integration of children’s services through the lead agency model in April 2012. This involves children’s health and social care, and specialist additional support for learning, and will include schools and devolved additional support for learning from 2015.
The Children & Young People's Bill

12. The Bill aims to improve the way that services work to support children, young people and families, by putting key elements of GIRFEC into statute:
   - The Named Person role
   - A single planning process to support those children who require it
   - A definition of wellbeing
   - Co-ordination of the planning, design and delivery of services for children and young people with a focus on improving wellbeing outcomes.

13. The following comments are made in relation to these key elements.

Named Person role

14. The Named Person role was not included in the original set of GIRFEC components produced by Government. Instead, it developed within the pathfinder, from practice on the ground, and from good and improving relationships between practitioners and with families.

15. The role reflects the best practice that has always existed in Scotland. It reflects the Midwife or Health Visitor, who knows the families on her caseload, including who would benefit from a little extra support. It reflects the Headteacher, who takes an interest in the overall wellbeing and development of the pupils in her school.

16. Critically, the Named Person is a point of contact for families, where they can seek advice or support about issues relating to their child’s wellbeing. She will usually be someone that the family already knows, and who they feel able to approach.

17. If the family wish, the Named Person can request help from other agencies, without bureaucracy or excessive delay, and without the child and family having to try and make contact with a host of other professionals and agencies.

18. Also, if other professionals have concerns about a child’s wellbeing, rather than rushing to Social Work or Police, or a host of other agencies, the concern can be passed to the Named Person, who can take account of that information in the context of what she already knows about the child. Hence there is a clear process in place to ensure that information about the child is passed to the right person.

19. Prior to implementation of GIRFEC, such concerns - be they from health, police or the public – were often referred ineffectively and inappropriately to a range of agencies. Or, alternatively, they only reached the professionals who knew the child and family best, via the Children’s Reporter, who would then request information from a range of agencies, sometimes taking a number of weeks.

20. Hence, the Children’s Hearing system was becoming deluged and swamped by inappropriate referrals and unnecessary processes, preventing and delaying the system from responding to those children who may actually have been in need of compulsory measures.

21. The development of the Named Person role was widely welcomed in Highland and has been fully implemented since 2010. Families prefer having contact with someone they already know, and who knows the child. They don’t have to deal with bureaucratic systems if they want a little extra support.

22. Midwives, Health Visitors and Schools are informed about issues and events in children’s lives, and are able to take account of this and respond quickly, offering advice or assistance where necessary. Children and families are not taken into any new system – they are supported by their Health Visitor and their School.

23. But where any concerns may indicate that a child could be at risk of harm, there can also be swift contact with Police or Social Work, who know they are getting credible and significant information from someone who has a good understanding of a child and family’s circumstances.

24. The consequence of this, has been earlier support and more effective intervention for more children. Getting that support to a child early, usually means it is more likely to lead to a successful outcome.

25. The Highland Council has though questioned the proposal to extend the Named Person role beyond school leaving age, and to the age of 18 years. Not only has this been difficult to achieve in practice, there are doubts about the desirability and necessity of this measure.

26. Given the significance of the Named Person role within the Practice Model, it is important to address some of the concerns that appear to have arisen during the period of consultation on the Bill:

27. Concern: The Named Person role will usurp the rights and responsibilities of parents.

28. Practice: The Named Person role provides a clear point of contact for parents, to support them in the task of parenting, which has been welcomed in Highland. We do not get complaints about the Named Person role being deployed; we get complaints when parents believe it has not been deployed.

29. Concern: The Named Person role involves additional work and will require more resources.

30. Practice: The Named Person role reflects existing best practice by Health Visitors and Headteachers. It helps ensure more effective and efficient use of time, through more effective and efficient processes. It brings clarity and structure to very necessary activities, enabling more specific and less arbitrary communications, the reduced requirement for the involvement of multiple parties in communications and meetings, and more direct and enabling relationships with children and families. In simple terms, Health Visitors and Headteachers do not need to call meetings to make things happen – they simply act as Named Person.

31. The Named Person role is welcomed by Teachers and Health Visitors, because it better enables them to fulfil their full responsibilities – it supports them to do their job.

32. There is a separate case to be made about how many Health Visitors and Teachers are required to fulfil the full range of responsibilities of these tasks. Certainly, a strong case can be made for additional investment in Health Visiting to fulfil the guidance set out in Health for All 4 and to achieve the aspirations of the Early Years Collaborative – which is why Highland Council is investing an additional £2m in these services.

33. Concern: The Named Person role cannot work because schools are closed for periods of the year.

34. Practice: It is true that the contribution of the Named Person is reduced when schools are on holiday, albeit some measures are possible to mitigate this. This can mean that there may be increased risk for the 12 weeks when schools are on holiday, and this may lead to more interventionist measures being taken as a consequence.

35. It is critical though that the Named Person is based in universal services, and that she is someone who is likely to know and be trusted by the child and family.

36. It would be perverse to consider that the Named Person role should not be available for school age children for the 40 weeks that schools are open, because it is not available for the weeks that schools are closed.

37. Concern: There are likely to be reducing resources in schools and other children’s services, which means that the Named Person role will not be viable.

38. Practice: We would all welcome increased resources. Our task in managing services however, is to use the resources that we have as effectively and efficiently as possible. The Named Person role is a simple, cost effective means of supporting children, ensuring good communications, also reducing bureaucracy and duplication to achieve more helpful responses to children’s needs.

A single planning process

39. The introduction of a single planning process and single plan to support those children who require it, has achieved a transformational impact on assessment and action processes, to better support children.
40. The single planning process involves:

- a shared assessment model across professional disciplines, based on the ‘my world triangle’, addressing: the child’s development; the support available in the family; and the support in the wider community.
- an emphasis on empowering communities and families to support children.
- a shared framework for understanding and describing children’s needs, based around the SHANARRI wellbeing indicators (see section below).
- clarity that any response to children’s needs, should involve a proportionate assessment and plan.
- a single planning tool – no matter how complex a child’s needs, that builds from stage to stage, and does not start again with every new intervention.
- reduced bureaucracy, with less need for meetings and duplicate planning processes.
- clarity that the Child’s Plan should determine access to services.

41. The Child’s Plan ensures that all professionals, the child and family, work together to achieve the best possible outcomes. The shared plan ensures collective responsibility and joint ownership of the actions. No longer are there separate service plans or reports – and no longer does the child with increasing needs also have an increasing number of unrelated plans and planning processes.

42. Practitioners report that parents and children are now key partners to the plan, which has been critical to ensuring it is successful and that outcomes are met. Parents and children’s views are central to the plan – it is always expected that their views will be included.

43. The ‘my world triangle’ has been particularly important in involving parents in the assessment process and making it more accessible for them. The online version of the ‘my world triangle’ has been useful in helping to engage the child in the assessment process and eliciting their views and opinions.

44. The shared assessment helps to provide continuity for families – everybody uses the same tools. The plan encourages openness and transparency. There is less repetition of the child’s story – practitioners and families report this is a particularly positive aspect.

45. The use of the Child’s Plan as the tool to request a service from another service or agency, has resulted in less paperwork and bureaucracy in getting children the services they need at an earlier stage.

46. Accordingly, Social Workers report reduced and more manageable caseloads. Also, while the cases that Social Workers hold remain complex, the actions to address issues in the plan are also more timely, with children spending less time within ‘the system’.

47. Reporters note that there is now shared accountability, and decisions to refer to Children’s Hearings are being made more timeously by having the Child’s Plan as the referral mechanism.
48. The Child’s Plan in Highland includes the educational objectives from a Coordinated Support Plan and/or the targets within an Individualised Educational Programme, where these are in place for a child – albeit there is also a case for rationalising Additional Support Needs legislation, to provide reassurance to both practitioners and parents.

A definition of wellbeing

49. The focus on wellbeing is a welcome progression, from the deficit-orientated understanding of ‘welfare’.

50. It is critical that we have a common, shared language for understanding and describing children’s needs, and the SHANARRI wellbeing Indicators provide this. Critically, the indicators can be used to structure the information recorded about a child, and to monitor progress.

51. Scotland has developed a wellbeing model that works for children and families, and also works for the broad range of professional disciplines. It is already embedded in practice across the country.

Co-ordination of the planning, design and delivery of services for children and young people with a focus on improving wellbeing outcomes

52. It is important to reinforce the existing responsibility to produce an Integrated Children’s Services Plan, to ensure effective and collaborative planning, design and delivery of services for children and young people, with a focus on improving wellbeing outcomes.

53. The use of SHANARRI in planning and reporting on outcomes across the full child population, should enable the aggregation and understanding of need from the individual to the community planning level.

54. There must be a means of ensuring accountability for activity towards the achievement of agreed outcomes for children and young people, within the Children’s Services Plan and Community Planning Partnership. It should be a duty on community planning partners and the Partnership to collect, analyse and report individual and aggregate data, to identify the extent to which children and young people’s lives and life chances have been improved as a consequence of local actions.

55. However, Highland Council and NHS Highland have gone a stage beyond ‘joint’ planning, by establishing a single agency for the delivery of community health and social care, with a view to establishing a fully integrated service that also includes schools.
Lead Professional

56. The Children & Young People’s Bill includes provision for key elements of GIRFEC implementation – but it does omit one other key element: the Lead Professional.

57. The Lead Professional co-ordinated the Child’s Plan where more than one agency is involved. If the Plan is not complex, and the intervention is likely to be brief, the Named Person becomes the Lead Professional. In more complex and extensive interventions, the Lead Professional will be a Social Worker or other specialist practitioner.

58. The Lead Professional role therefore complements the Named Person. The effective use of the Lead professional role, is important in ensuring that Named Persons in universal services are not used inappropriately.

59. It is understood that it is more difficult to legislate for the Lead Professional role. But if we can legislate for complex child’s plans, we can (and should) also legislate for the practitioner who has responsibility for compiling them.

1. Thank you for your letter of 7 October 2013 concerning the review of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

2. Having looked at the various further explanations regarding the proposals for a Kinship care order, I have the following comments in relation to tax credits and Child Benefit. I don’t know if any consideration has been given to the income tax implications of your proposals so have copied to my tax colleagues and asked that they reply to you directly. The connection here is that tax credits follow the income tax rules to determine the level of income to be taken into account.

3. If I have understood the briefing and the additional information correctly, the proposals will move support from ‘formal’ to ‘informal’ Kinship Care and, as a consequence, Kinship Carers will no longer be entitled to the support that is required by the ‘Looked After Children’ Regulations. In addition, Local Authorities would not have the same level of responsibility because the children would no longer be ‘looked after’.

4. Currently, in relation to tax credits, Kinship Carers who receive support under the ‘Looked After Children’ regulations cannot claim Child Tax Credit (CTC). Under the ‘informal’ Kinship Care proposals, and subject to receiving details of what payments will actually be made, it appears that the children will no longer be considered to be ‘looked after’ by the Local Authority and, as a consequence, the Kinship Carer would be able to claim CTC. We would need to see your draft regulations to understand precisely what will be paid out before a final view could be given.

5. Similarly, in relation to Child Benefit, it is not yet clear from the information provided what package of support will ultimately be available. We would need to look at this again once the secondary legislation has been drafted but our initial view is that Child Benefit would continue to be available to the Kinship Carer in respect of the children being informally looked after. There is one exception to this generalisation and that is in relation to the transition from ‘formal’ to ‘informal’ Kinship Care where a top-up payment of £70 per week could be paid for up to 3 years where equivalent support is not available through the UK benefits system. We’re not certain what that means in practice and would need to understand more about these payments before a final view could be given.

6. I hope this is helpful but please come back if you require anything further.

Yours sincerely
Trevor Sanders

Dear Mr Maxwell

Children & Young People (Scotland) Bill
Kinship Care Proposals: Income Tax Implications

My colleague, Trevor Sanders, wrote to you on 1 November 2013, in response to your letter of 7 October. As mentioned in Mr Sanders’ letter, he has asked me to provide you with information on the income tax implications of the kinship care proposals. We appreciate that you have not requested this advice but hope you will find it helpful nonetheless.

I will start with a summary of the tax rules relevant to kinship carers, in particular, “qualifying care relief”. I will then comment on the consequences of these rules in the context of the kinship care proposals.

Qualifying Care Relief (QCR)

How does it apply to kinship carers?

For income tax purposes, QCR is available to individuals who provide foster care and/or “shared lives care”. The term “shared lives care” encompasses a number of statutorily defined schemes in which vulnerable children and adults are cared for in a carer’s own home as part of their family. One such scheme is kinship care, providing that the following conditions are fulfilled:

The child:
- is under 18 years of age, and
- is a ‘looked after child’ [in Scotland, to whom section 17(6) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 applies].
The carer:
- receives payment from a local authority (or health service body) for providing the care,
- is related to the child, but is not a parent or step-parent, or has a pre-existing relationship with the child,
- is regarded by the local authority as a suitable person to care for the child, and
- is not a person in respect of whom a court has made a residence order or special guardianship order in relation to the child.

If these conditions are met, then QCR is available to the kinship carer.

What does this mean?

Foster carers and shared lives carers, who receive payment for providing care, are generally regarded as carrying on a business. This means that their profits are, in principle, taxable. If there is no business, then the income may still be taxable as “miscellaneous income”, which is calculated broadly along the same lines as trading profit.

Normal business tax rules require profits to be calculated by deducting allowable expenses from income. However, as carers take in people to live with them in their own home as part of their family, it can be particularly onerous for them to distinguish allowable expenses from private household expenditure. In order to alleviate this administrative burden, the tax system provides an alternative method of calculating profits through QCR.

QCR allows payments up to a qualifying amount to be received tax free. The qualifying amount for the year is calculated by reference to the number of people looked after and the number of weeks in which care is provided for each of those individuals. Most carers have no taxable profits as a result. If payments received do exceed this amount, then the taxable profit is simply the excess over the qualifying amount.

I would emphasise that QCR is intended to simplify the tax affairs of carers, not to provide a tax incentive. In the absence of the relief, most carers would pay little or no tax on their caring income if they were to correctly claim allowable expenses against receipts as the resulting profits would not exceed the carer’s personal allowance.

Kinship care proposals

Will this be qualifying kinship care for the purposes of QCR?

My understanding is that the kinship care proposals are intended for children who are not formally ‘looked after’ (under s17(6) Children (S) Act 1995). As such, the provision of care under this type of arrangement will not be an eligible scheme for the purposes of QCR.

Does this mean that tax will be payable on financial assistance received?

The fact that the care arrangement will not fall within the definition of kinship care for QCR purposes does not necessarily mean that tax will be payable by the carer. The circumstances of each care arrangement would need to be taken into account in order to ascertain what the tax position would be.

If informal kinship care of a child is formalised through a residence order, then payments received are generally exempted from income tax altogether, so long as the recipient is not a parent or step-parent of the child.

Alternatively, the arrangement may still be eligible for QCR on a different basis. For example, if certain conditions are met, the arrangement may fall within the category of “staying put care”, which is aimed at helping previously looked after children into adulthood.
For more informal arrangements, rent-a-room relief may apply. This is available to anybody providing accommodation in their own home and allows payments of up to £4,250 a year to be received tax free.

I hope that this information is useful. We will be happy to provide further assistance if required.

Yours sincerely

Homeless Action Scotland

1. Homeless Action Scotland welcomes the opportunity to respond to the Bill. Our particular interests lie in the prevention of homelessness in young people, and as such our response focuses on the areas of the Bill that look to improve support for care leavers and extending corporate parenting across the public sector.

2. Homeless Action Scotland welcomes the extending of availability of support and assistance for formerly looked after young people up to and including 25, however has significant concerns that this proposed right to “request” help is a somewhat weak one:
   - awareness of existing rights to help and assistance are already underused;
   - several of our members have expressed a concern that current duties to assist are not being met in their areas
   - a further extension of a right to “request” assistance, rather than a duty to provide assistance could see young people in need receiving rationed help and assistance, rather than help and assistance that meets their needs;
   - unless supported by a statutory duty upon public bodies to promote and deliver wellbeing and rights outcomes the duty is unworkable

Homeless Action Scotland recommends that the “right to request” is changed to a “duty to provide” advice and assistance when a young person up to and including 25 is assessed as in need.

3. Homeless Action Scotland also welcomes the extending of corporate parenting across the public sector; however we recognise that this is something that will require considerable effort in order to reach a consensus as to which public bodies must and should be included as corporate parents that works across all local authority areas. This is particularly important when young people in care move from one local authority area to another in order that they receive equal and fair treatment across all Scotland. Members have expressed concern that the role of different public sector agencies have as corporate parents is unclear, even within a Getting It Right for Every Child framework.

Homeless Action Scotland recommends that rigorous statutory guidance is created to clarify the role and responsibilities of public sector bodies in ensuring all looked after young people are treated equally across Scotland.

4. In addition, in following the principles of GIRFEC, it seems anomalous that advice and assistance is only given as a duty to those young people who have been in care up to and including their 16th birthday. This excludes a large number of young people who have spent significant periods of their life in a residential care environment and who, on returning to the family home before their 16th birthday
(a return that is frequently, unfortunately short-lived and fraught) find themselves with fewer rights to help and assistance than other young people who have spent a shorter duration in care, but who happened to have been looked after for the preceding three months up to and including their 16\textsuperscript{th} birthday.

Homeless Action Scotland recommends extending the duty to provide advice and assistance to all young people who have spent a significant period of the life from the age of 12 being looked after by the local authority.

5. Over all, we are disappointed that the Bill makes no mention of a “right to return” to residential care environments as part of the process of preparing to live independently after having left care. As the age at which young people leave home rises, it seems incongruous that the age that young people leave care is stuck at a rather premature 16/17 - and that for any young people who wish to stay beyond 19, it is virtually impossible. Few parents would choose to evict their child because they had reached an arbitrary age: why should a corporate parent?

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

Human Rights Consortium Scotland

1. I am pleased to submit a brief response to the above consultation. In addition I can endorse the submissions of our members, CHILDREN 1ST and Together, to this consultation. I would also commend the submission of the Scottish Information Commissioner as this Bill raises freedom of information issues.

2. At the outset, we welcome the purpose of the Bill “The Scottish Ministers view the Bill as an important opportunity to make rights more —realll for children and young people in Scotland. This means empowering children themselves to exercise their rights. It also means highlighting the important role that professionals and communities must play in making this happen. “

3. However HRCS is disappointed that the provisions in the Bill do not go far enough to respect, protect and fulfil human rights and the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC). The HRCS welcomes and supports the call for the Bill to incorporate the UNCRC and firmly believes this should be a general principle of the Bill.

4. Under S29 of the Scotland Act 1998, MSPs are required to only pass legislation that is competent and one of the criteria is compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). As we fear the impact of this legislation will create an unequal enjoyment of rights across Scotland, we urge the Committee to address this problem at Stage 1 which is twofold:
   - Rightly extending the powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People but without consequent amendments to strengthen the powers of the Scottish Human Rights Commission eg it is still specifically prohibited from assisting anyone even thinking of pursuing a case under S6 of the Scottish Commission for Human Rights Act 2006.
   - Human rights are interdependent and form no hierarchy. We believe that in Scotland a general culture of respect for rights is a pre-condition for the effective implementation of UNCRC. So all people in Scotland, whether they are parents, carers or adults need to know about their human rights as well as understand their obligations to respect the rights of children. A duty on Scottish Government Ministers to promote public awareness and understanding about their human rights, is missing from the Bill.

5. We now elaborate our concerns at Stage 1 of the Bill.

1 Policy memorandum on Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill para 45

Section 1

6. Concerned that Part 1, S1(2) places a duty on Scottish Government Ministers to inform the public about children’s rights but that obligation does not extend to informing adults of their human rights:

7. “The Scottish Ministers must promote public awareness and understanding (including appropriate awareness and understanding among children) of the rights of children.”

8. Whilst this section is to be welcomed, we are concerned that there will be a perception that children have more rights than adults. The HRCS is concerned that unless adults understand they have human rights too, and what that means, then adults, parents and carers of children, as well as staff across public services and those delivering services of a public nature will be unable to effectively respect and promote children’s rights. UNCRC gives children rights as individuals but also within their family and there has to be an equal enjoyment of rights, across all ages in the family, in order for UNCRC to be respected.

9. Also note that S1(3)(b) requires Ministers to report on progress of such activity every three years. Whilst this is to be welcomed, we are concerned that without Scottish Ministers leading a public information campaign on adult human rights, then the impact which will be reported on every three years will be less impressive that could otherwise be achieved.

10. We acknowledge that this section of the Bill does give effect to the Concluding Observation of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child:

“Dissemination, training and awareness-raising

11.20. The Committee welcomes the State party’s recent efforts to train professionals on the principles and provisions of international human rights instruments, including the Convention, as well as its support to the UNICEF “Rights respecting schools” project and the collaboration with NGOs in the development and implementation of awareness-raising activities. Nonetheless, the Committee is concerned that there is no systematic awareness-raising about the Convention and that the level of knowledge about it among children, parents or professional working with children is low...

Section 4

12. We are concerned that there is no mention on the face of Bill of the Concluding Observations of the UNCRC. Given that ratification of UNCRC by the UK

2 Concluding Observations on the UK of the UN Committee on Rights of the Child, published 20th October 2008, para 20
Government leads to Periodic Reviews and Concluding Observations on our country, including specific recommendations for Scotland, we regard this as a crucial document which needs to be disseminated throughout Scotland and its contents implemented.

13. We note that in the last Concluding Observations (2008) there are specific recommendations that will be enacted by this Bill as the Government is required to...

14. “...further strengthen its efforts, to ensure that all of the provisions of the Convention are widely known and understood by adults and children alike, inter alia by including the Convention in the statutory national curriculum, and that it ensure that its principles and values are integrated into the structures and practice of all schools. It also recommends the reinforcement of adequate and systematic training of all professional groups working for and with children, in particular law enforcement officials, immigration officials, media, teachers, health personnel, social workers and personnel of child-care institutions.3

15. However such a recommendation is not confined to UNCRC. For example the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights has concluded it is:

16. “... concerned about the low level of awareness of economic, social and cultural rights not only among the public at large but also particularly among judges, public officials, police and law enforcement officials, medical practitioners, and other health care-related professionals, despite the State party’s assurances to the contrary.”

The Committee recommends that the State party take effective measures to increase awareness of economic, social and cultural rights among the public at large as well as among judges, public officials, police and law enforcement officials, medical practitioners, and other health care-related professionals, including by lending adequate support to civil society and national human rights institutions in their efforts in relation to awareness raising. It also recommends that the State party take steps to improve awareness of the Covenant rights as justiciable human rights and not merely rights as part of the "Welfare State".4

17. We urge the Committee to point out the need for amendments to the Bill which will place a duty on Scottish Government Ministers to deliver and evaluate the impact of, a systematic awareness-raising on all the Conventions ratified by the UK Government as well as ECHR, across the population in Scotland. The HRCS believes we need to embed human rights in our culture and across our public services and services of a public nature.

3 Ibid, para 21
4 Concluding Observations on the UK of the UN Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights (2009) para 15
Part 2

18.Whilst we welcome strengthening the investigative powers of the Children’s Commissioner (SCCYP), we are concerned that there will be an imbalance in Scotland. Currently the Scottish Human Rights Commission is specifically prohibited from providing advice, guidance or grants to anyone considering taking a legal case or who may have a claim (S6 of the Scottish Commission for Human Rights Act 2006)\(^5\)

19. We are concerned about the potential imbalance in the enjoyment of human rights in Scotland which goes against the purpose and detail of Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) which prohibits any discrimination in the enjoyment of rights contained in the ECHR:

20. “The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.”

21. It is relevant to also note that Article 13 of the (ECHR) accords everyone the right to an effective remedy:

22. “Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity.”

Part 3

23. In section 7 (2), we suggest the addition of the Office of the Scottish Information Commissioner under ‘other service provider’. We believe the addition is merited given the subject matter of this Bill and that the right of children to access information is specifically addressed in S69 of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002 (FoISA)\(^6\). We request that the Committee satisfies itself that this Bill complies with FoISA eg in respect of S6(3)(2).

24. We wish the Committee well in its deliberations and, given the nature of your work, commend to you the publication ‘Human Rights for Parliamentarians’ http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Publications/training13en.pdf

Introduction

1. Includem welcomes the Children and Young People’s Bill and the aim of putting children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services ensuring their rights are respected. However, we have some concerns about how effective the provisions of the Bill will be in achieving its objectives particularly for the most vulnerable young people and believe that a greater shift towards early intervention is required, and a recognition that this is not only applicable for the early years.

2. For most of Scotland’s children, family remain the most important source of support and yet are barely mentioned throughout the Bill. In order to put ‘children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services’ we strongly believe that the vital role of families should be more fully recognised. In the parts of the Bill which deal with vulnerable families, while we welcome the strengthening of the role of kinship carers and corporate parents, it is an significant omission to neither acknowledge nor support the role of parents and families, more generally. We also feel that a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment should be undertaken for this Bill.

Part 1: Rights of children

3. Includem fully supports the full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scottish domestic law and endorses Together’s evidence to Committee.

Part 3: Children’s services planning

4. Includem believes that children’s service planning should be reflected in community planning and Single Outcome Agreements.

Part 4: Provision of named person

5. In terms of the most vulnerable and excluded children and young people in society Includem is concerned that this provision as it stands will not be useful, and may even just add unnecessary additional people into young people’s lives. In particular this is based on our experience of young people who are not engaged with education and find themselves moving between different education placements or not attending any education at all. We also believe that young people should have a say in who their named person is.

Part 5: Child’s Plan

6. Generally, Includem is in agreement with the provisions set out in the Bill relating to the provision and setting up of a child’s plan, and welcome the move towards making service provision more integrated and less onerous for families. However, we feel strongly that children’s and their parents’ views must be taken into consideration in the preparation of a child’s plan. While we recognise that there may be times where on grounds of safety some parents may need to be excluded from planning around the child, as a matter of general principle, the inclusion of parents in planning for their children should be adhered to.

Part 7: Corporate parenting

7. IncludeM welcomes the Bill’s definition of corporate parenting responsibilities and the policy intention to move away from ‘corporate’ thinking to acting more like a ‘parent’ would; looked after children need family support even more than other children do. However, we would urge a note of caution here and request that the Committee scrutinise these proposals with particular attention. The parents of many looked after children still retain some parenting responsibilities, and even where they do not, many looked after children return to their parents when they leave care. The relationship between corporate parents and parents is not explicit in the Bill and there are potential tensions and required collaborations which need to be teased out and addressed in robust guidance.

8. When a child becomes looked after all those with parenting responsibilities need to be recognised and involved appropriately. It is important this includes parents and any relatives acting informally on temporary or respite basis as kinship carers, as well as all the corporate parents laid out in the bill.

9. There should be a requirement for collaboration between those with parenting responsibilities (including parents) when a child has to move placements, including leaving care, to assist with the smooth transition. Placement moves are a particularly difficult time for looked after children. Just as when a child has to move from living with one parent to another the need for collaboration is paramount. Furthermore the link between kinships carers (formal or informal) and parents is a distinct and particularly important relationship to recognise. These are the people that will remain in the young person’s life as they grow up.

10. Therefore we feel strongly that this provision must explicitly take account of parents and other individuals with parental rights or responsibilities.

Part 8: Aftercare

11. We are fully in support of the proposals that local authorities should extend their parenting responsibilities up to the age of 26; it is important that this should be a duty to provide rather than simply to request as this most vulnerable group of young people should be guaranteed the help they need.

12. We add our voice to Barnardo’s, Aberlour and others in calling for a broader definition of care leaver to include those who have been looked after, but were no longer looked after at the age they leave school and for an automatic serious case review (by amending the Looked After Children Regulations (Scotland) 2009) in the event of the death of a care leaver up till the age of 36.

13. We are also supportive of Who Cares Scotland? proposed addition to allow young people to return to being accommodated and obtain support up to the age of 26 years old.
Part 9: Counselling Services

14. A definition of counselling services is required in terms of what these interventions could consist of and who would be eligible. Counselling services must be in line with, and complement, the Child’s plan and take into account corporate parenting plans. Includem believe these services should be available where the level of support needs calls for it regardless of what placement type i.e. kinship care, foster care or at home.

15. Placement breakdowns are incredibly destructive for young people. This bill provides a golden opportunity to put in place preventative measures to help parents and carers provide these vital supportive relationships, improve the stability of placements and the quality of childhoods.

Part 10: Support for kinship care

16. Includem endorses Children 1st evidence on this provision. We are supportive of the Bill’s provisions around kinship care, but would like to see these provisions strengthened so that all local authorities will be obliged to offer a minimum level of support to kinship carers throughout Scotland.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Information Commissioner's Office

About the ICO

1. The ICO’s mission is to uphold information rights in the public interest, promoting openness by public bodies and data privacy for individuals.

2. The ICO is the UK’s independent public authority set up to uphold information rights. We do this by promoting good practice, ruling on complaints, providing information to individuals and organisations and taking appropriate action when the law is broken.

3. The ICO enforces and oversees the Data Protection Act 1998 and the Privacy and Electronic Communication Regulations 2003, as well as the UK Freedom of Information Act 2000 and the UK Environmental Information Regulations 2003, both of which apply to reserved matters in Scotland.

Introduction

4. The Information Commissioner’s Office (“the ICO”) welcomes the opportunity to respond to the consultation by the Education & Culture Committee of the Scottish Parliament’s Stage 1 consideration of the Children & Young People (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”). Along with other key stakeholders, the ICO was invited to participate in various working groups established by the Scottish Government during the drafting of the Bill. Its involvement with this piece of legislation has, therefore, been long-standing and it is encouraging to see the influence of this work within the Bill’s provisions.

5. Given the ICO’s role as regulator of the Data Protection Act 1998 (“the Act”), this response will be limited to those aspects of the proposals which relate to the processing of personal information. Most attention is therefore paid to Parts 4, 5 and 11 of the Bill but reference is made to other Parts as required.

Response

Part 1- Rights of Children

6. Article 13 of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) gives children the right to freedom of expression, including the right of freedom to seek, receive and impart information. As an independent public authority set up to uphold information rights throughout the UK, in 2012 the ICO contracted a team led by the University of Edinburgh to undertake a research study into how best to embed information rights within in the primary and secondary education systems of the United Kingdom and we have recently been piloting a set of teaching materials for use in schools.

7. The ICO therefore welcomes the duty on Scottish Ministers to promote public awareness and understanding of the rights of children proposed within section
1(2) of the Bill and we particularly welcome that this duty includes promotion of those rights amongst children.

Part 2 – Commissioner for Children & Young People

8. Part 2 of the Bill amends the power of investigation given to the Commissioner by enabling the Commissioner to undertake “individual investigations”, ie, the Commissioner can investigate to what extent a service provider had regard to the rights, interests and views of a child or young person whilst taking a form of action which directly affected that child or young person. In doing so, the Commissioner must be satisfied that the investigation does not duplicate work that is the function of another body.

9. As the sole statutory regulator of data protection in the UK, whilst also having regulatory responsibilities for freedom of information in relation to public authorities based in Scotland but covering reserved matters, the ICO welcomes this clarification. Nevertheless, by only requiring that the Commissioner be satisfied “on reasonable grounds” that there is no duplication (arguably a relatively low test), there remains the possibility of some overlap occurring between investigations undertaken by regulators and ombudsmen and those undertaken by the Commissioner. It may be more appropriate for the Bill to impose a duty on all devolved complaints handling bodies to have regard to the rights, interests and views of a child or young person whilst undertaking any investigation under their powers related to a complaint raised by or on behalf of a child or young person (thereby clearly embedding children’s rights within the operating frameworks of those bodies).

10. The ICO notes and welcomes the requirement under section 6(3)(4) that the Commissioner, as far as is reasonable and practicable, must not identify any child or young person within any statement made in response to a requirement to respond to a recommendation arising out of an investigation. This complements the existing requirement under section 13 of the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003. In doing so, the Commissioner should have due regard to the Anonymisation Code of Practice issued by the Information Commissioner in November 2012.

11. Neither the Bill nor the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 make reference to a retention period for documents relating to the investigations. Principle 5 of the Data Protection Act requires that personal data should be held for no longer than is necessary and to ensure compliance with the Act, it is recommended that a statutory retention period be introduced.

Part 4 – Provision of Named Persons

12. The ICO notes that providers of services to children as per Part 3 of the Bill must identify a named person to promote, support or safeguard the well-being of a child or young person through actions listed in section 19 (5). The ICO sees advantages arising from the creation of such a single point of contact and advice, particularly through an implicit role in ensuring consistency and accuracy of the information surrounding the child or young person. It welcomes the provisions of section 24 which assists with compliance with Principle 1 of the Act by addressing issues related to fairness of processing though the section might be strengthened by specifically stating that service providers should name those other services with which they may share the personal data of children and young people.

13. Section 26 of the Bill also assists with compliance with Principle 1 of the Act by providing a lawful basis for the sharing of information by service providers and relevant authorities. However, both section 26(2)(a) and section 26(4)(a) fail to meet the strict requirement of Principle 3 of the Act which requires that “personal data shall be adequate, relevant and not excessive in relation to the purpose or purposes for which they are processed”. Those two sections should be amended to read:

14. Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that – (a) it is relevant etc.

15. The ICO is aware of the concerns of agencies in the sector that the Bill as currently drafted may have an adverse impact on the rights of the child and deter their accessing confidential services. It is important that guidance issued to named persons is clear and unambiguous in relation to their data sharing duties and the need to comply with the data protection principles. To comply with the requirement of Principle 3 that the personal data being processed is not excessive, it is important to note that the provisions of the Bill should not be interpreted as meaning that all information pertaining to a child should be shared between named persons and agencies. Instead, it should be seen as providing a gateway for the sharing of appropriate and proportionate information where aspects of a child’s well-being may be considered to be signalling a need for intervention in the longer term.

16. The ICO also notes the provisions of section 27 which gives legal protection to those who provide information under Part 4 of the Bill. Whilst such protection exists wherever lawful sharing takes place in compliance with the data protection principles and the section therefore is strictly unnecessary, its inclusion will provide some reassurance to those professionals engaged in data sharing.

Part 5 – Child’s Plan

17. The ICO notes the proposal within section 38 of the Bill that responsible authorities have to prepare a child’s plan in a relation to any child with an identified wellbeing need that is not being addressed by general services provided by that authority. This again provides a legal basis for the sharing of personal information but, notwithstanding subsection (3), the disclosure of such information by a responsible authority must fully comply with the data protection principles. Section 38(2) provides some reassurance that Principle 3 will be adhered to but it may be appropriate to amend sub-section (1) to require that any such disclosure must be of relevant information.

18. The ICO welcomes the provisions of section 39 of the Bill and would advocate that guidance pertaining to information governance is issued by the Scottish Ministers. It recognises that provisions relating to the keeping, disclosure and destruction of plans may be made under section 37(5)(e) but separate guidance complementing any such order is advisable. The ICO is currently working with the Scottish Government in the development of draft regulations and guidance on the handling of personal information in relation to the plan.

Part 7 – Corporate Parenting

19. Section 54 of the Bill promotes collaborative working among corporate parents and subsection (2)(a) indicates such collaboration may include the sharing of information. It is not clear as to what extent (or if at all) personal information relating to the children and young people for whom the corporate parent is responsible would be shared. For the avoidance of doubt, it would be helpful to clarify whether it is envisaged that personal data would be shared and, if so, to include similar provisions relating to the handling of personal information as are included within parts 4 and 5 (and having regard to the comments made previously).

Part 11 – Adoption Register

20. The proposal to create Scotland’s Adoption Register is noted. The ICO’s main interest will lie in the nature of information to be contained within it as prescribed by Regulation. Nevertheless, the ICO welcomes that the Register will not be open to public inspection or search.

21. The ICO notes the purposes for which disclosure of information from the Register may be made and, in particular, that information may be disclosed for statistical or research purposes. The ICO suggests that consideration be given to requiring that disclosure for these purposes is made in either a fully anonymised or a pseudonymised way, thus reducing the risks to the privacy of those persons included on the Register.

Further information

Privacy Impact Assessment

22. The ICO advocates the use of Privacy Impact Assessments (PIA) at an early stage of policy development. A PIA is a process which helps assess privacy risks to individuals in the collection, use and disclosure of information and helps identify privacy risks, foresee problems and bring forward solutions. Whilst there is currently no statutory requirement to undertake a PIA, the Scottish Government has endorsed the process within its Identity Management and Privacy Principles published in 2010. For example, Principle 2.1(a) requires that a PIA or proportionate equivalent is conducted and published prior to the implementation of a project which involves the collection of personal information whilst Principle 2.9 states that wherever proposed legislation has a privacy dimension, a summary of the impacts identified in the PIA should be submitted for consideration by the lead committee in the Scottish Parliament.

23. A PIA was undertaken by the Scottish Government prior to the publication of the Bill. It is recommended that the Committee reviews the PIA and ensures that it fully addresses each element of the Bill which may impact upon the privacy of children and their families.

Anonymisation Code of Practice

24. In 2012, the Information Commissioner published a Code of Practice on Anonymisation in accordance with his duties to promote the following of good practice in data handling under section 51 of the Data Protection Act. It is recommended that any sharing or other disclosure of personal information for purposes which do not directly affect a given individual should be anonymised using techniques outlined within this Code.

Data Sharing Code of Practice

25. Section 52A of the Data Protection Act 1998 requires the Information Commissioner to publish a Code of Practice (“the Code”) containing practical guidance in relation to the sharing of personal data in accordance with the requirements of the Act. The Code must be approved by the Secretary of State and laid before the UK Parliament.

26. Whilst section 52E of the Act provides that failure to act in accordance with any provision of the data sharing code does not of itself render an organisation liable to any legal proceedings in any court or tribunal, it is admissible in evidence. Consequently, if any provision of the Code appears

27. to be relevant to any question arising in legal proceedings or in connection with the exercise of functions of a court, tribunal or of the Information Commissioner, said provision must be taken into account in determining that question.

28. Given the above, it would be appropriate that any regulations issued by the Scottish Ministers in relation to the information sharing provisions of the Bill made reference to the Code of Practice and required that those sharing the information abide by the provisions of the Code.

ICO summary of key recommendations

Part 1

29. The ICO recommends that the Bill is amended to introduce a statutory retention period for information pertaining to investigations undertaken by the Commissioner for Children and Young People.

Part 4

30. The ICO recommends that in order to ensure compliance with Principle 3 of the Data Protection Act, both section 26(2)(a) and section 26(4)(a) should be amended to read “Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that – (a) it is relevant etc.”

Part 5
31. The ICO recommends that in order to ensure compliance with Principle 3 of the Data Protection Act, section 38(1)(a) is amended to read "A relevant authority must comply with any reasonable request made of it to provide a person exercising functions under this Part with relevant information, advice or assistance for that purpose."

Part 7

32. The ICO recommends that if it is envisaged that corporate parents may share personal data under the provisions of section 54(2)(a), the sub-section should be amended to require only relevant personal information to be shared.

Part 11

33. The ICO recommends that any disclosure for statistical or research purposes made under the proposed section 13D(2)(b)(iv) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 should be required to be anonymised or pseudonymised prior to disclosure.

Privacy Impact

34. It is recommended that the Committee reviews the PIA undertaken by the Scottish Government and ensures that it fully addresses each element of the Bill which may impact upon the privacy of children and their families.

Dr Ken Macdonald
Assistant Commissioner (Scotland & Northern Ireland)
Information Commissioner's Office
1. Given the information sharing provisions of the Children and Young People’s Bill (“the Bill”), and as regulator of the Data Protection Act 1998 (“the DPA”), the (UK) Information Commissioner’s Office has been following the oral evidence sessions at Stage 1 of the Bill with interest. We were disappointed not to have been invited to give oral evidence to Committee as we would have been able to clarify many of the points raised by Members, witnesses and within written contributions. Instead, and to assist the Committee in the compilation of its Stage 1 report, I would like to take this opportunity to respond in writing to some of these matters.

Legislative Competency

2. A number of contributors have questioned the competency of information sharing aspects of the Bill on the grounds that (a) the proposals may infringe Article 8 rights and (b) data protection is a reserved matter. Compliance with human rights legislation should be considered within the Privacy Impact Assessment which is currently being updated by the Scottish Government but it would be appropriate to give it more detailed consideration with a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment as advocated by many parties including SCCYP and the SHRC.

3. With regard to data protection, the Scotland Act 1998 reserves “The subject-matter of (a) the Data Protection Act 1998, and (b) Council Directive 95/46/EC (protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data)” to Westminster. Whilst in our written evidence we have indicated where the Bill does not comply with the principles of the DPA and must be amended accordingly, the Bill does not in itself modify the DPA. In this regard, it is important to note that paragraph 133 of Schedule 2, Part 1 of The Scotland Act 1998 (Consequential Modifications) (No.2) Order 1999, amended the DPA to specifically include processing necessary for functions conferred on any person by an Act of the Scottish Parliament as a condition for processing under Schedules 2 and 3 of the DPA. In other words, sharing information as required under the provisions of the Bill and in accordance with the data protection principles, is allowed under the DPA.

Section 27

4. Section 27 of the Bill states that “The provision of information under this Part is not to be taken to breach any prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information” and in our written evidence to the Committee, we indicated that we felt this section was strictly unnecessary as legal protection would be given whenever lawful sharing was taking place under the provisions of the Bill in compliance with the data protection principles. At the same time, we recognised that it may provide some reassurance to those professionals engaged in information sharing.

5. In the light of Professor Norrie’s comments regarding the wider implications of this section given in his oral evidence to the Committee on 3 September, we have given this section further consideration and we support his view. As written, the section would override all statutory bars on the disclosure of information, many of which have been enacted in order to give children protection and it may also have implications for the independence of the judiciary where court orders prohibit disclosure. We would therefore urge that the content of this section is reconsidered.

Access to Information by Parents

6. In the oral evidence session held on 10 September, you raised a question regarding parents’ right of access to information held by the named person. One of the most important rights accorded under the DPA is an individual’s right to request copies of information held about them. In addition, section 66 of the DPA states that, in Scotland, persons under the age of 16 shall be taken to have the capacity to exercise DPA rights if they have a general understanding of what it means to exercise that right and that a person aged 12 or over should be presumed to have that capacity. Taken together, this means that there are a number of scenarios to consider in response to your question.

1) The parent requests copies of information held about themselves by the named person

   Under this scenario, the parent should normally be supplied with the information. However, because that information may also reveal something about the child, consideration has to be given to the impact on the child if disclosure took place and any duties of confidentiality owed to the child.

2) The parent requests copies of information about their child aged under 12

   Under this scenario, it is necessary first to determine if the child has the capacity to understand its rights under the DPA. Where the child has that capacity, then scenario 3 applies. Where the child does not have capacity, the parent should normally be supplied with the information whilst taking into account any duties of confidence to the child or other consequences of disclosing the information.

3) The parent requests copies of information held by the named person about their child aged 12 or over

   Under this scenario, consent to disclose should be sought from the child. If the child does not have the capacity to understand its rights under the DPA, then scenario 2 applies.

7. The ICO has recently published a Subject Access Code of Practice which provides more detail about responding to Subject Access Requests and includes further guidance on the disclosure of third-party personal information. In addition, you should be aware that parents have separate rights of access to their child’s educational records under The Pupils’ Educational Records (Scotland) Regulations 2003 but these Regulations are outwith the jurisdiction of the ICO.

Information Sharing

8. In our written evidence, we stated that it is important to note that the provisions of the Bill should not be interpreted as meaning that all information should be shared between the named person and agencies. We also note that several witnesses are concerned that such an interpretation may be held by some parties. We would therefore reiterate the need to have strong data-sharing protocols adopted by the relevant agencies and it may be appropriate to include a section within Part 4 of the Bill requiring such protocols to be prepared. These protocols should be supported by Regulation and/or guidance as appropriate.

9. Finally, some evidence has been submitted expressing concern over our guidance to practitioners which stated if professionals believe that there is a risk to children which may lead to harm then that information should be shared proportionately. In giving that advice, which has been welcomed in oral evidence by practitioners such as Martin Crewe (17 Sept) and Bill Alexander (24 Sept), we stressed the need to have procedures in place that clarify circumstances which may necessitate processing without consent. In relation to the Bill, we must reiterate the need to ensure that all information sharing takes place in accordance with the data protection principles (as we stated in our written evidence and others have implied, the Bill as currently drafted does not comply with these principles, particularly in relation to the relevancy of information being shared). Whilst guidance may assist practitioners in determining what is relevant, it is still necessary to amend the Bill to ensure its compliance with the DPA.

10. I trust that the above is of assistance to you but please do not hesitate to contact me if you require further clarification of those or any other issues raised during the passage of the Bill.

Ken Macdonald
Assistant Commissioner (Scotland & Northern Ireland)
Information Commissioner’s Office

I qualified as a solicitor in 1960 and after 14 years in private practice I was appointed as a sheriff and served as such until 2007. In 2007-2008 I was Temporary Sheriff Principal of South Strathclyde Dumfries and Galloway. I was a member of the Child Care Law Review Group (reported 1990). I presided over the Inquiry into Child Care Policies in Fife (reported 1992). I was a founder member of the Judicial Studies Committee (now the Judicial Institute of Scotland). I have addressed many conferences and panel members' training sessions. My publications include: An Introduction to Civil Procedure in the Sheriff Court (1982), Children's Hearings and the Sheriff Court (1987 and 2000), The Scottish Children's Hearings System in Action (2007), and the section on Children's Hearings in Butterworths’ Scottish Family Law Service. I gave evidence to the Parliamentary committee considering the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. I had several meetings with Scottish Government officials on the drafting of the Children's Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. I am writing up-dates taking account of the new legislation.

I am a member of the group considering Legal Representation of Vulnerable Children, including Separated Children and a signatory of their submission. The undernoted are my suggestions for resolution of the issue identified in paragraph 1 of our recommendations – 'Establishing an independent system for age assessment.' We have discussed these suggestions and are in agreement that they should be regarded as part of our submission.

1. The legislation

Section 124 of the Children's Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 provides

'124 Requirement to establish child's age

a) This section applies where a children's hearing is held by virtue of this Act.

b) The chairing member of the children's hearing must ask the person in respect of whom the hearing has been arranged to declare the person’s age.

c) The person may make another declaration as to the person's age at any time.

d) The chairing member need not comply with the requirement in subsection (2) if the chairing member considers that the person would not be capable of understanding the question.

e) Any children’s hearing may make a determination of age of a person who is the subject of the hearing.

f) A person is taken for the purposes of this Act to be of the age–
i. worked out on the basis of the person’s most recent declaration, or
ii. if a determination of age by a children’s hearing is in effect, worked out in accordance with that determination.

g) Nothing done by a children’s hearing in relation to a person is invalidated if it is subsequently proved that the age of the person is not that worked out under subsection (6).'

2. This section echoes, with some refinements, s 47 of the 1995 Act. So far as I know there is no case-law on this section, but there are decisions bearing upon the ascertainment of age by Lord Stewart in L v Angus Council 2012 SLT 304, issued on 25th November 2011, ISA v Angus Council [2012] CSOH 134, 2012 GWD 29-605 and ALA v Angus Council [2012] CSOH 135, 2012 GWD 29-606, both issued on 24th August 2012. These were decisions in relation to Petitions for Judicial Review of the local authority’s determination as to the age of children in the context of the local authority’s obligations to a ‘child’ under s 25 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.

3. In the foregoing cases Lord Stewart was invited to hold that the Supreme Court case of R(A) v Croydon London Borough Council [2009] UKSC 8, [2009] 1 WLR 2558, which authorise a fact-finding judicial review, was binding in Scotland and he decided that it was not. In the event Lord Stewart dealt with the cases as action for declarator.

4. In the case of ISA Lord Stewart observed at §[31]: ‘Thinking specifically about Scottish child-care legislation, namely the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, and coming back to the in rem question, I have difficulty in being persuaded that the legislature, which by section 47 conferred an express power on children’s hearings to make age determinations, should be thought to have conferred a power to make age determinations merely by implication for section 47 purposes “good against the whole world”.

5. Section 47(2) of the 1995 Act provides: ‘The age declared to, or determined by, a children’s hearing to be the age of a person shall, for the purposes of this Part of this Act, be deemed to be the true age of that person’. The words ‘for the purposes of this Part of the Act’ support Lord Stewart’s opinion that the determination of the children’s hearing is not a decision in rem: apart from anything else, the inquiries a children’s hearing can make are limited and (very important) the lack of entitlement of the Reporter to appeal would mean that often enough the matter could not be made the subject of a potentially binding decision of a sheriff, sheriff principal, or the Court of Session. In most cases the limitation of the effect of the children’s hearing’s decisions to Part II of the 1995 Act and, nowadays, to the provisions of the 2011 Act, will not matter, but in the case of where the position of migrant ‘children’ is in issue it could be argued that, where
6. I would therefore suggest:

(a) Where a question as to age ascertainment arises it should be for the Reporter to consider if a ‘wider issues’ question is involved. It should also be the entitlement of parties and the members of the children's hearing to move the Reporter to consider this.

(b) Where the Reporter decides that no ‘wider issues’ question arises, then the children's hearing should decide the age issue in the normal way.

(c) Where the Reporter decides, either ex proprio motu, or on the motion of a party or hearing member, that such ‘wider issues’ arise, the Reporter should grant a ‘wider issues certificate’.

(d) Where a ‘wider issues certificate’ is granted the Reporter should be required to refer the child’s case to the sheriff for a proof hearing.

(e) The fixing of this hearing should be intimated to the Lord Advocate, who would have the right to be represented at it in the public interest.

(f) At the proof hearing the sheriff should be entitled to hear evidence adduced by parties and to call for whatever specialised evidence she or he might consider appropriate.

(g) The decision of the sheriff should be appealable (without leave) by any party.

(h) Owing to the importance of the ‘wider issues’ an appeal to the Sheriff Principal against the sheriff’s determination would be inappropriate since what is required is a decision, binding throughout Scotland and accordingly any appeal from the sheriff should be to the Court of Session.

(i) In the event of protracted procedure there should be provision for a remit to the children's hearing to regulate the position of the child ad interim.

(j) Having regard to the importance of the ‘wider issues’ and having regard to the observations of Lord Stewart on the applicability in Scotland of R(A) v Croydon London Borough Council, consideration should be given to providing for an appeal to the Supreme Court.

(k) Any decision of a court under this procedure should be accorded the status of a decision in rem.

(l) Consideration should be given for the expeditious consideration of the granting of Legal Aid for the child.

(m) The introduction of procedures along these lines would require primary legislation. This could be achieved by using the powers to modify primary legislation conferred on Scottish Ministers by section 195 of the Children's Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, but in the interests of full debate and transparency it would be preferable to use full primary legislation such as the pending Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

(n) The foregoing proposals refer to children who have come to the notice of the Principal Reporter. We also had to consider those children who had not come to the attention of the Reporter.

(o) Section 66(1)(a) of the Children's Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (as amended by Children's Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (Modification of Primary Legislation) Order 2013 (SSI 2013/211), in paragraph (7) of schedule 1, under the heading ‘Children's Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011’) maintains the essentially re-active role of the Reporter.

(p) In our principal submission we propose a pro-active rôle for a specified person or office-holder such as the Children's Commissioner in relation to identifying vulnerable persons who may be ‘children’. The circumstances of many persons thus identified will, if they were ‘children’ within the meaning of the Children's Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, be such that a ground for referral could be stated, but some will not. Different considerations will apply to each category.

(q) In relation to those persons apparently eligible for a ground or grounds for referral, I would suggest that the specified person referred to in '(p)' should be empowered to give the relevant information to the Reporter. As the law stands any ‘person’ (and that would include the Children's Commissioner), is entitled, under s 64 of the 2011 Act, to give information to the Reporter, but I would suggest that it would be more fitting and effective if a specific entitlement were accorded to the specified person/Children's Commissioner to pass information to the Reporter. This could be effected by a provision within sections 60 to 65 of the Act and the addition of 'information from (the “specified person”)’ to the list within s 66(1)(a) of the Act.

(r) As to persons not apparently eligible for any ground for referral, the ‘specified person’, such as the Children's Commissioner, should, where the age of the person in relation to her or his status as a ‘child’ was in question, be empowered independently to make a 'wider issues' type application to the sheriff along the lines suggested above.

7. I would be very happy to explain and expand on these suggestions in writing or in person should the Committee so request.

Sheriff Brian Kearney
22 July 2013
1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

Introduction

1. The Law Society of Scotland aims to lead and support a successful and respected Scottish legal profession. Not only do we act in the interests of our solicitor members but we also have a clear responsibility to work in the public interest. That is why we actively engage and seek to assist in the legislative and public policy decision making processes. The Family Law sub-committee ("the committee") has examined the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and has the following comments to make.

General Comments

2. While the policy aims are undoubtedly laudable, the committee does not think that this legislation is the best way to achieve them. In order to be effective, legislation must be clear, proportionate and enforceable. It must also be future-proofed as far as possible, which is difficult when trying to reflect a multi-faceted policy agenda.

3. As the policy memorandum sets out, the Scottish Government is already pursuing a range of policy initiatives and alternative approaches as part of its agenda to improve the lives of children and young people. These have the benefit of being tailored to the needs and level of understanding of the groups to which they apply. Tying various strands together in legislation runs the risk of producing a bill that is unclear in its overall intent and its intended audience.

Part 1: Rights of children

4. Turning specifically to the provisions in the bill, we support the aim of raising the profile of the UNCRC however the committee is still of the view that the duty placed on Ministers in respect of the UNCRC is a diluted version of the existing obligations that they have currently, namely:

- to respect and ensure rights under the Convention by virtue of the United Kingdom having ratified it; and

- to promote and raise awareness of children’s rights in terms of article 42 of the UN Convention.

5. That is not to say that the government should not provide guidance to Scottish Ministers to help them identify ways in which to meet these obligations but primary legislation is not the appropriate place for this.

6. We are also of the view that if Scottish Ministers are to be placed under a duty to report on their UNCRC-related activities, the duty should correspond with the existing reporting duty under the UNCRC (i.e. to report every 5 years instead of 3) to allow coordination of effort and to assist the Children’s Commissioner.
Part 2: Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland

7. We have no comments to make on this part, other than to say that we support the extension of the Commissioner’s role.

Part 3: Children’s Services Planning

8. The correlation between “wellbeing” in the bill and “welfare” as contained in existing child and family legislation is unclear. “Welfare” is a necessarily flexible term that if defined (as it is in some other jurisdictions) will still usually incorporate a catch-all (such as ‘and all other relevant circumstances’) in recognition of the fact that factors affecting a child’s welfare are going to be different in each case.

9. Again, for the sake of the overall consistency of reporting obligations, we would suggest that Children’s Services Plans are prepared every 5 years.

10. There is a “the” missing at the beginning of section 10(5) (page 8 line 28).

Part 4: Provision of Named Persons

11. The committee has a number of concerns about the proposal to introduce a named person for every child in Scotland.

12. There is a lack of specification in section 19 in relation to who can be identified as a named person, which includes a very wide discretionary power for Scottish Ministers.

13. Despite how widely this section is framed, the policy memorandum explains that the named person will usually be a practitioner from a health board or an education authority, and someone whose job will mean they are already working with the child. Leaving aside the fact that this is not clear from the legislation, the committee has the following concerns:

- it will add an additional layer of responsibility to people who already have full-time jobs in sectors that are notoriously under-resourced.

- It could present a considerable dilemma where a named person might feel obliged to point out a failure on the part of his/her employing local authority in relation to a child.

- It runs the risk of diverting services away from where they are needed most, as the role of named person is going to be more onerous in some parts of the country than in others, resulting in potential gaps in provision.

- In relation to the information-sharing provisions, the policy memorandum explains that these provisions potentially engage Article 8. Leaving aside the EU implications, we would point out that data protection is reserved to the UK parliament and that legislation affecting data protection rights is outwith the competence of the Scottish Parliament.

- In practice, although the government considers that the provisions are compliant with the ECHR as they have a legitimate aim, children and young people are entitled to confidentiality and may seek the services of a service provider on the basis that their right to confidentiality will be respected. We are concerned that widening the scope of information-sharing could affect the level of trust between older children and young people and their named person, undermining the function of the role.

14. The committee is also concerned that article 8 could be engaged in respect of the parent’s right to respect for private and family life, as there is scope for interference between the role of the named person and the exercise of a parent’s rights and responsibilities.

15. The committee would also point out that there is the potential for gaps in named person provision in respect of home-schooled children, looked-after children who are placed in accommodation in other parts of the UK and children who are in secure accommodation.

16. Overall, while the committee does not think that the purpose of the named person provisions is to grant control to the state over the development of children in a manner that is intrusive; taking the bill out of context, we think it could be interpreted as disproportionate state interference.

Part 5: Child’s Plan

17. The Policy Memorandum references the Highland Pathfinder and reports some success in its use of the single planning approach, as well as the use of the GIRFEC approach in both the Highland Council and Fife and Forth Valley. The proposals represent a considerable commitment both in terms of time and resources, and given the differences between local authority areas, the committee would ask whether it might be better to continue to trial this good work across Scotland before committing it to legislation, based on the limited evaluation of a few areas.

18. If not, the committee would suggest that a review is built into the legislation to monitor the progress of the proposals once they are implemented.

Part 6: Early learning and childcare

19. The committee questions whether this part of the bill is necessary. The power to prescribe the children for whom pre-school education is required and the amount of such education is already in s 1(1A) and (1B) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980, and the power to offer alternative arrangements for pre-school children is already to be found in s 27 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.

20. Otherwise, in relation to the proposal to increase the amount and flexibility of free early learning and childcare from 475 hours a year to a minimum of 600 hours for 3 and 4 year olds; and for 2 year olds who are, or have been at any time since turning 2, looked after or subject to a kinship care order, this has clear resourcing issues, which we assume will be considered further in the financial memorandum.

21. In general, we would reiterate a concern expressed in response to the preceding consultation that disproportionate focus on early intervention might lead to insufficient assistance being provided to the many Scottish children who, through no fault of their own, have already received inadequate support and help from the system.

Part 7: Corporate Parenting

22. The committee is concerned that by identifying the fulfilment of duties by public authorities with the role of personal parenting risks overstating the level of responsibility that public authorities have in respect of children and young people, while diluting the parental responsibilities of those who have them.

23. Moreover the proposed duties of the corporate parents as set out in section 52 lack specification and consequently would be difficult to enforce, although public authorities may find themselves faced with challenges over perceived failures nonetheless.

Part 8: Aftercare

24. The committee has previously pointed out that in relation to aftercare there is conflicting legislation over which local authority is responsible for its provision.

25. Section 29 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 places the obligation on the local authority where the young person is present while the Support and Assistance of Young People Leaving Care (Scotland) Regulations 2003 (SSI 2003/608) places the obligation on the authority that last looked after the young person. This confusion needs to be resolved if the proposed extension of aftercare is to be effective.

Part 9: Counselling Services

26. A lot of the detail in this Part is left to secondary legislation but the framework as set out in the bill places a considerable responsibility on Scottish Ministers in terms of defining appropriate counselling services and identifying those who are eligible to receive them. This would seem to be quite an onerous task and the resulting service potentially very resource-intensive. Furthermore, the policy memorandum provides that this service is intended for families in the “early stages of distress”. This intention is not reflected at all in the legislation. The committee is therefore of the view that some more detail on the face of the bill would help to clarify the purpose of this Part.

Part 10: Support for Kinship Care

27. Section 65(3) provides that a qualifying person is not a parent or guardian for the purposes of subsection (1). The exclusion of guardians from kinship care assistance bars persons who would merit support on the basis that they have taken on a parenting role for a child whose parents have died, or have taken on guardianship by virtue of a court order, to act in place of parents who are incapable of acting or unsuitable to do so. If this is the intention, the committee would ask for clarification that alternative support is (or will be made) available for guardians on whom parental rights and responsibilities have been conferred.
Part 12: Other Reforms

28. In relation to section 73, the committee would reiterate its comments about the correlation between ‘welfare’ and ‘wellbeing’ (see comments under Part 3 above). Given that the 1995 Act provides that the welfare of the child should be the paramount concern, further clarification of the relationship between these two concepts would be useful.

Part 13: General

29. In the committee’s view, the SHANARRI indicators as set out in section 74(2) (namely Safe, Healthy, Achieving, Nurtured, Active, Respected, Responsible, and Included) which together define “wellbeing” – while clearly desirable attributes for Scotland’s children and young people to have – do not offer a tool with which to make a clear assessment and in the committee’s view are not appropriate for enshrinement in primary legislation.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Carmen Lewis

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

Introduction

1. LGBT Youth Scotland is the largest youth and community-based organisation for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender young people in Scotland. Our mission is to ‘empower lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender young people and the wider LGBT community so that they are embraced as full members of the Scottish family at home, school and in every community’.

2. The evidence within this document comes from the organisation’s experience working with LGBT young people for over 21 years and from direct consultation with LGBT young people.

General comments

3. We welcome and support the intention of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and the potential it has for improving outcomes for children and young people, particularly for LGBT young people whose rights are often not afforded to them in basic service provision. In order to achieve the goals of the Bill, there are several areas that we would like to see strengthened and clarified.

The UNCRC and Children’s Rights Impact Assessment

4. As discussed in previous consultation responses, incorporating the UNCRC into Scots law would enable the Bill to provide a clear framework to protecting and promote rights. The ministerial duty to promote awareness and understanding of rights to young people does not go far enough to provide the legal framework for a rights and wellbeing based approach to including young people in services. A Children’s Rights Impact Assessment should also be undertaken and may highlight areas of potential conflict between the interpretation of the Bill and the rights within the UNCRC, some of which are highlighted below. Further detail is outlined in Together’s member briefing\(^1\), which we endorse.

Valuing the opinions and wishes of children and young people

5. Three articles within the UNCRC are particularly relevant to the areas of concern within the introduced version of the Bill: Article 12—states that children and young people have the right to have a say in decisions that affect them and to have their opinions taken into account; Article 13—children and young people have the right to get and share information insofar as it is not harmful to them or others; and, Article 16—children and young people have the right to privacy.

6. Without full incorporation of the UNCRC, and as written within the Bill, we are concerned that the voices and opinions of young people will continue to be excluded from important decisions. There are several instances in which privileging adult voices and opinions over children and young people may result in poorer outcomes and increased propensity for risk. We believe that young people’s welfare and rights should be paramount and that their views should be taken into consideration in any decision that affects them.

\(^1\) Harris, Juliet (July 2013). Incorporation of the UNCRC and the Children and Young People’s (Scotland) Bill. Together.

4.1 Creating a child’s or young person’s plan

7. Section 33 (subsections 6 and 7) states that an authority must have regard to the views of the child as far as is ‘reasonably practicable’ and to consider the child or young person’s age and maturity. The Explanatory Notes seem to place ‘taking account of the child’s age and maturity’ as conditions for having regard to the views of the child (pp14). This leaves the Bill open to the interpretation that it is appropriate to dismiss the opinions and wishes of the child or young person based on the perceived ‘maturity’ of the child or young person. We therefore suggest that the Bill be changed to ‘an authority is to ascertain and have regard to the views of’ children and young people, by removing ‘reasonably practicably’.

8. Further, children and young people should be consulted in ways that are appropriate to their age and maturity levels and these should not be used as ways to exclude the individual’s input. It is important to obtain the views of the child or young person in age appropriate ways in all instances before creating a plan that will affect them; the very intention of the Bill is to improve the way services support children, young people and families and without a child or young person’s input they are neither Respected, Responsible, nor Included. These principles should be applied throughout the Bill, particularly in regards to discussions and decisions made by the named person.

4.2 Privileging the opinions of parents and carers

9. This is another area of concern for creating a child’s plan and for interactions with the named person. It should be made clear that the opinions of parents and carers must not automatically override the opinions and wishes of children and young people. Working with LGBT young people, we know that in instances where parents and carers are unsupportive of a young person’s sexual orientation or gender identity, young people experience increased difficulty in accessing information and support services.

10. For instance, a lesbian, gay, bisexual or transgender young person may miss out on sexual health information if adults remove them from classes that are inclusive of same-sex relationships or a transgender young person may not receive the support needed to attend a gender specialist service. Not being able to access crucial support services or information can result in poor mental health for the young person.

11. We have great concern over the wording in the Bill around information sharing. As stated in Section 26, both service providers or relevant authorities and named persons ‘must provide’ information to one another if ‘it might be relevant’ to the functions of the named person or service provider/relevant authority. This mandate undermines children and young people’s right to privacy (Article 16). LGBT young people regularly have their confidentiality and privacy breached by professionals and services working with them and Section 26 will not only fail to address this but could also exacerbate the situation.

12. In our experience working with services, particularly education, we have encountered a widespread misunderstanding that being LGB or T is a cause for concern to be reported to other professionals or the child or young person’s family. This ranges from a belief that parents and other services have the ‘right’ or ‘need’ to know about a young person’s sexual orientation or gender identity to a belief that parents and carers must be informed if a child or young person is experiencing bullying and the circumstances surrounding this. Both practices invalidate the needs and opinions of young people, cause emotional distress, and place them at risk of harm.

13. Example A: A young person experiencing homophobic bullying sought support from a guidance teacher. The guidance teacher told the young person that she would have to tell his parents not only about the bullying, but the form of bullying. We advised the Education Authority against this and provided 1:1 support to the young person. The young person was not yet ready to come out to his family but was worried about being outing by the school. In the end, he came out to his family against his wishes so that he could maintain some control over his own personal information.

14. Although sexual orientation may be a motivating factor in bullying incidents and should influence a school’s response, it should not be shared with parents and carers unless the young person wishes. In addition to emotional and psychological stress from being forced to share personal information in a circumstance beyond their control, being ‘outed’ by professionals can also place young people at risk of homophobic, biphobic or transphobic abuse, discrimination or exclusion in the home.

15. Example B: A young person with supportive family came out to his school as transgender and wished to transition. When the young person was due to undertake his work placement, the school felt that it was appropriate and necessary to inform the business of his transgender identity. They cited both health and safety concerns and the desire to maintain good relations with the work placement should it become apparent that the school had known and not informed the work placement of the young person’s transgender background. The young person’s gender identity was irrelevant and did not affect his ability to undertake the placement. In both school actions, disclosing the young person’s transgender identity without his consent was contrary to the Equality Act 2010.

16. Confidentiality is important for all young people and, where no child protection concerns exist, builds trust between young people and the professionals with whom they are working as it satisfies not only their right to privacy (UNCRC Article 16) but also their right to have a say in matters that affect them (Article 12). Coming out to parents and professionals is an on-going process in the lives of LGBT young people and can cause anxiety for those who are unsure of the impending response. If a young person has come out to a service provider it is because they provide the information in relation to their service need or are confident that the service will maintain confidentiality. Both instances are crucial reminders that sexual orientation and gender identity should not be considered issues that ‘might be relevant’ for sharing between professionals unless they are central to the service provision and prior consent is secured from a young person.

17. It is also worth stressing that the named person must not share information on a young person’s sexual orientation or gender identity with their parent or carer without consent, regardless of the wishes of the parents and carers involved.

Named Person.

18. There should be provision for allowing young people to have a say in who their named person is with clear routes to change their named person if they do not feel comfortable with them. These procedures must make it an accessible process that protects the young person from unnecessary stress.

6.1 Named Person provision for school leavers

19. The Bill places a duty on local authorities to provide a named person to all young people up to the age of 18. The provision should clarify how young people no longer in education, or who have disengaged with education, will receive adequate support if the named person function is primarily conducted through education.

20. Many LGBT young people play truant or stop attending school in order to avoid discrimination. Recent research with LGBT young people on education found that:

21. 10% of all LGBT young people had left education as a result of homophobia, biphobia or transphobia in the educational establishment.

22. 14.3% of young people left as a result of direct homophobic and biphobic bullying; 42.3% for those who had experienced transphobic bullying.²

Role of the voluntary sector

23. We recognise that the current exclusion of charities as written in the Bill is a result of legal protection by restricting named persons and children’s services plans to public services, yet believe that there should be clear mention of involving voluntary sector organisations in the planning discussion. The voluntary sector also provides services that ‘represent the interest of persons who use or are likely to use any children’s service or related service in the area of the local authority’: the criteria listed in Section 10, subsection 2 as organisations which should be provided the opportunity to contribute to the preparation of the plan. Many young people only engage with voluntary organisations, particularly youth work charities. This is particularly true of LGBT young people who have experienced negative responses from public services and mainstream youth groups in the past\(^3\). If charities are not named in subsection 2, then they will be excluded from contributing their expertise of specific groups of young people. This is particularly a concern when all LGBT-specific organisations working for the rights of LGBT people are within the voluntary sector.

The proposed Scottish legislation turns the notion that parents are responsible for their children on its head and basically says that parents can’t be trusted-only government can.
1. I am a civil liberties campaigner and I live in the Isle of Man – a self governing Crown Dependency with a population of circa 85,000 including 17,000 children. I campaign on a range of issues relating to personal privacy and the use of data by public authorities. I am answering this call for written evidence because the 'Getting it Right for Every Child' – GIRFEC policy contained in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is very similar to the 'Every Child Matters' (ECM) policy introduced in the Isle of Man several years ago. That policy had adverse consequences for both the local community and children's & families social services.

2. The adverse consequences for the proposed 'Named Person' with wider statutory powers to share sensitive and personal information are not, I believe, fully appreciated. I will first discuss the adverse consequences of the ECM policy in the Isle of Man on both the local community and children's & families social services. I will then propose that the GIRFEC policy will have the same effect in Scotland.

3. The Isle of Man Government Children Bill 2010 consultation ¹ proposed contentious legislation to introduce a new, much broader, statutory remit to override parental consent to compulsorily intervene in a child’s life. The statutory child protection threshold of 'a child is suffering, or likely to suffer, significant harm' was to be broadened out to include 5 new statutory outcomes: 'Being healthy, Staying Safe, Enjoying and Achieving, Making a positive contribution and Economic well-being' based on New Labour's ECM policy. Also proposed was a universal database flagging all children not meeting the 5 outcomes together with statutory information sharing information between public authorities. This would allow compulsory intervention for a threshold as low as a concern that a child apparently might not be 'enjoying' life.

4. After extensively researching the ECM policy I gave 4 public presentations ² in the Isle of Man to stimulate interest in the public consultation and also gave a private presentation to the Minister for Education & Children. There were 76 responses to the consultation and, as a result of public opposition, the Government withdrew the Children Bill ³. The public were concerned with two main issues arising with the ECM policy. Firstly, Government had not justified a case for universal surveillance of children. I.e. evidence was not produced to convince the public that there were systemic problems with local children and families requiring a broad interventionist policy. Secondly, the public were concerned about harmful intrusion into family life that might result from the policy.

5. Despite withdrawing the Children Bill, the Government proceeded with the ECM policy. Analysis of Government documentation and Tynwald records shows how the policy caused over referral to children's social services, staff turnover and increased expenditure.

6. First indications that ECM was causing problems were in July 2011 when the Government had to ask the Tynwald for £498,000 additional funding for a further 10 children’s social workers. The Minister stated that due to new policies ‘workloads for new cases and for support to the Courts have risen by approximately 500% in the last year’. Fierce debate ensued in Tynwald and a back bench politician complained of the ‘damage inflicted on the lives of a number of children and families during the time the (children’s social) service has been dysfunctional’. He raised concern about the ‘massive increase in referrals’ to children's social services.

7. Tynwald was told that referrals to children social services had increased as follows:

<thead>
<tr>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Increase</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>A log of a concern re a child or children from an agency or member of the public</td>
<td>20%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A contact resulting in a referral to Social Services</td>
<td>497%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A referral warranting a more detailed investigation</td>
<td>1560%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>An Initial Assessment warranting a more detailed investigation</td>
<td>560%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

8. And referrals were elevated to enquiries for 2010/11 as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Number</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Referrals to children's social care</td>
<td>959</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child abuse enquiries</td>
<td>263</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child identified as being in need</td>
<td>210</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Entries on the child protection register</td>
<td>60</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>False referrals (959-(210+60))</td>
<td>689</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

9. The statistics are startling because there are just under 1000 children born per year in the Isle of Man. So, with circa 959 referrals to children's social services per year, it is likely that most children will be the subject of a referral before they are 18 – with at least 70% of the referrals being utterly unnecessary. In plain terms, nearly three quarters of all children will be the subject of intrusive enquiries by social services at some stage in their childhood. This hugely intrusive policy is a direct consequence of over broad referral criteria.

10. A further adverse consequence of ECM is the high turnover of social workers. Such a high rate of referral caused the system to become overloaded. Recent statistics 9 show that, in addition to recruiting ten extra social workers to handle extra case loads, children's social services then spent £2,027,538 employing a further 51 locum social workers after ECM was introduced. 28 of these locums failed to complete their employment. Such a high turnover of staff does indicate a problem within the system. Quite simply, the over referral to children's social services has stretched the service to the point that it cannot now be managed effectively.

11. The overload of children's social services is one side of the problem. But the effect of such intrusive intervention on families and children also has to be considered. Evidence presented to the Westminster Education Committee 10 cited a range of adverse consequences and public health issues resulting from over involvement with children's social services. These include including fear of accessing medical care, distrust of health visitors, concealment of post natal illness, more marital separations and breakdowns and lack of help for those in need. The point being that parents, entirely understandably, fear needless involvement with children's social services and, consequently, avoid contact with public authorities.

12. The central point of my argument is this. GIRFEC and ECM are very similar in ethos. Both are founded on statutory outcomes for children with wider powers for public authorities to share sensitive and personal information without parental consent. In the case of GIRFEC it is not '5 outcomes' but '8 outcomes': 'Safe, Healthy, Achieving, Nurtured, Active, Respected, Responsible & Included.' But the proposed GIRFEC statutory outcomes are even broader than the ECM outcomes and are designed to create the lowest possible threshold for intervention.

13. GIRFEC makes further deep inroads into the sanctity of family life. For example, the National Risk Framework 11 says a child is at risk if he/she is under 5 years, has more than 3 siblings, is adopted or a step-child, has a 'difficult temperament', parents are contesting contact, does not speak English, has a parent aged under 21, or a parent whose partner is not a biological parent, is a child that lacks trust towards 'workers' or shows culturally inappropriate behaviours. These risk indicators are over broad. I would question how, for example, a statutory definition of 'difficult temperament' might be legally constructed.

14. Just as the Isle of Man lacked a remit for the ECM policy I ask what is the pressing need for the GIRFEC programme. Great play is made of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child\textsuperscript{12}. But the UNCRC is about the child’s right to have universal services available. But only in the sense that the State is obliged to create those services so they are available. There is no obligation to enforce those services under the Convention. And universal services cannot be enforced because that would breach Article 8 of the Convention which enshrines the right to respect for private and family life.

15. Furthermore, the proposal that Scottish parents require a more intrusive intervention policy than the rest of the UK is flawed. The Office for National Statistics ‘\textit{Measuring National Well-being Programme}’\textsuperscript{13}, found that nearly ‘nine in ten children said that they were relatively happy with their lives overall and only 4% reported being relatively unhappy. Children were most positive about their friends (96% relatively happy) and family (95% relatively happy) and least positive about their appearance (75% relatively happy)’.

16. If 96% of children in the UK are relatively happy then what is the justification for GIRFEC? Where is the pressing need, or convincing evidence, showing that Scottish parenting is so poor that Scotland requires such intrusive measures? Do Scottish parents love their children less than English, Welsh or Irish parents?

17. National child protection statistics are also worth comparing. They average 38 children per 10,000 on the child protection register in England\textsuperscript{14}, 35 per 10,000 in the Isle of Man but only 27 per 10,000 in Scotland\textsuperscript{15}. Thus, on the core issue of children at risk, Scottish children are already better provided for by their families.

18. In accordance with ECM dogma the core advice\textsuperscript{16} to public authorities in the Isle of Man is ‘\textit{The rule must always be ‘If in doubt – refer’ to Social Services.}’ Thus the onus is on staff in public authorities to reduce their individual liability by elevating any concern to further enquiry. Similar dogma underlines the concept of the GIRFEC Named Person. Clause 24 (4) (a) of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill provides for information to be shared with the Named Person about the ‘well-being’ of a child. ‘Well-being’ is a universal concept aligned with the ‘8 outcomes’ of the GIRFEC policy. Thus the onus will be on public authorities to over refer children to the Named Person.

19. Broadly, the settled position in Britain is that the threshold for compulsory intervention, and breach of family privacy, is when a child is at risk of, or suffering from, significant harm. Policing that necessary threshold, on its own, is fraught with difficulty. But if that threshold is broadened out to 'well-being' then achieving justice will be practically impossible. An assessment of 'well-being' could be no more than a subjective view of individual parenting style. How, for example, is it proposed to police a family subject to investigation because someone thinks their child has a 'difficult temperament'? How can parents trust a system that authorises discrete reports when someone thinks a child is being 'clingy'? And what happens to families who decide that the help arranged by the Named Person is completely inappropriate for their child? What are their rights under the proposed legislation?

20. There is also the question as to whether compulsory assessments of a child's 'well-being' are legal under the Human Rights and Data Protection Acts. The recent Haringey case law Judgement found that Article 8 was breached when a public authority commenced investigations into a family before the 'significant harm' threshold had been reached. This means that compulsory 'well-being' assessments are also a breach of Article 8.

21. The Data Protection Directive is a reserved matter for Westminster under the Scotland Act 1998. It therefore follows that the UK Parliament would need to fundamentally change Data Protection law in order for Scotland to proceed with the information sharing provisions in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. The Bill therefore engages interests outside Scotland – hence this submission from the Isle of Man.

22. The cost of the GIRFEC policy will also be an issue. When Isle of Man children's social care broadened their investigations from the 'significant harm' threshold to the ECM '5 outcomes' the requirement for social workers to handle the volume of referrals rose dramatically at an additional cost, over 2 years, of over £2 million. 70% of this cost is spent on false referrals.

23. Therefore, before commissioning in law the GIRFEC policy and the statutory provision for every child to have a Named Person, the Isle of Man experience should be considered. It should be possible to estimate the extra cost to the public purse of the demands on public authorities in Scotland of all the needless referrals and inquiries that will result from the policy. More difficult to estimate, but no less important, are the public health costs of families who will avoid services for fear of intrusive interventions.

24. But what is not financially quantifiable, and is even more important, is the social and emotional cost to Scottish families of being under the microscope of a universal surveillance policy. The over broad referral criteria in the Bill, with consequent widespread breach of family privacy, will in itself, cause distress and upset to the very children the legislation proposes to help.

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

My name is Janet McDermott and I’m writing in regards to the GIRFEC bill and also the sharing of private data without consent. I have already been affected by interfering authorities i.e.: Health visits, for no reasons at all and for a while they persisted to come out to my home without appointments, they kept to interfere and think they know best when I haven’t asked for their advice or gave them cause to think I’m not capable of looking after my children on my own. I also disagree with a named person for every child in Scotland and the sharing of private data without consent. I think this is a violation to private rights and also family rights. I also think the named person should be an opt out service for families that don’t require the help from these services. I also believe that if a child is in care then they are the ones that need to be taking care of by extra help i.e.: named person. My children already have a named person and that is me they do not require another.

I am writing to oppose the Orwellian idea, now being proposed by the Scottish Parliament, to assign a government social worker to each child. The family, not the government, is the foundation of society and culture. Government, while having legitimate functions, is not equipped to replace the family. The authority of parents to raise their own children must be preserved for society to remain intact, except in cases of abuse and neglect. The abuse and neglect of a small number of parents does not justify the government destroying the family or even monitoring every family. Indeed, abuse and neglect of children at the hands of government is as common as abuse and neglect by family members. Please do not destroy your society and threaten ours with this reckless and overbearing legislation.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Muir Maxwell Trust

Introduction

1. The Muir Maxwell Trust (MMT) welcomes the opportunity to contribute to the Committee’s scrutiny of this Bill.

2. The MMT is the UK’s leading paediatric epilepsy charity, focusing on the care and treatment of those with complex forms of epilepsy.

3. Established in 2003, we aim to make a difference by providing profoundly learning disabled children and their families with practical support while raising awareness and understanding of their conditions.

What the Bill means for profoundly learning disabled children

4. We are encouraged by the general framework of this Bill and the structure it proposes to put in place across all areas of children’s services.

5. MMT works on behalf of children who are profoundly learning disabled by one or more neurological disorders and these children typically need constant 24/7 supervision and care, much of it on a one-to-one basis. The task of safeguarding their wellbeing, therefore, doesn’t fall neatly to just one branch or level of Government. Their care instead demands joined-up working between Scotland’s local and national health, social care and education services.

6. It is therefore encouraging to see the Scottish Government commit to restructuring children’s services in such a way as to put the needs of children and young people at the heart of service delivery and planning.

7. From our standpoint, we have consistently argued that there needs to be a better service delivery pathway for these profoundly learning disabled children. For example, local authorities must undertake a Section 23 assessment, as mandated by the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, to establish the needs of children with disabilities. In many cases, however, these assessments are simply not being undertaken adequately, if at all. Getting this process right is therefore extremely important for local authorities, families and children and is an area in which this Bill can have a significant impact.

8. We have long argued that:

- A clear point of entry needs to be created so when special needs are identified, someone is accountable for informing parents about the Section 23 assessment and carrying it out.

- Section 23 arrangements need to be rigorously enforced with consequences for local authorities failing to follow the correct procedures.
• Clear timescales for assessment and subsequent delivery of care to ensure no child has to wait unnecessarily for help.

• New assessments should be conducted on a regular basis so that the evolving needs of these children continue to be met as they grow.

• Performance by local authorities on delivery of outcomes should be monitored on an on-going basis.

9. These points in the context of the Bill’s provisions are explored in more detail below.

Children’s service planning

10. Plans for local authorities and health boards to develop joint children’s services plans will be a notable improvement over the existing children’s services plans currently required of local authorities. These new plans will aid greatly in the strategic planning of services and will help to tighten up the existing system.

11. Importantly, the requirement to develop plans every three years and report on progress every year is a vast improvement over the current duty to review plans ‘from time to time’ and will hopefully help to avoid the breakdowns in service provision that can sometimes occur between different public bodies.

Child’s plans

12. What is likely to be of greater relevance and importance to families with children with profound learning disabilities are to be the new child’s plans detailed in Part 5 of the legislation. The children that the Trust works with are the very children that require targeted intervention from an array of public services required for a child’s plan.

13. In the context of Section 23 assessments, we are pleased to see that these plans would mandate the type of information that would help guard against some of the pitfalls of the current system. This includes detailing the child’s wellbeing need; the targeted intervention which requires to be provided; the relevant authority which is to provide the targeted intervention; the manner in which the targeted intervention is to be provided; and the outcome in relation to the child’s wellbeing need which the targeted intervention is intended to achieve.

14. Unfortunately, there is almost no detail as to the specific content and final form these child’s plans will take in the Bill, with much of the final guidance to be determined in the future.

15. This has important implications in terms of how effective child’s plans will be in actual practice. For example, though the Bill also mandates the managing authority of the plan to review the effectiveness of individual children’s plans, there is no guidance as to the timescales for assessment or how frequently it will need to be reviewed.
16. Further detail around timescales is something that is needed if we are to fully gauge the likely effectiveness of these measures. In fact, it is hard to underestimate just how important defined timeframes are in terms of the provision of care for profoundly learning disabled children. It is crucial that provisions are included mandating a maximum timescale in which to conduct the assessment in addition to a strict timeframe within which to actually deliver the necessary care package. Without such timelines, children and families risk waiting an agonisingly long time for a proper care package.

17. We would consider it to be a major oversight if there wasn’t a stipulation in child’s plans to allow for the creation of such timetables. Unfortunately, as we lack the necessary detail around the child’s plans we simply don’t know whether the Bill would meet these requirements.

Enforcement

18. There is a subsequent issue around the enforcement of these provisions. There is no guidance as to the sanctions for any public body or individual if they are found to be in breach of any statutory duties. A risk exists, therefore, that we merely replicate the situation faced by those children and families who feel let down by the current system.

19. Related to this, there is also a huge gap in the legislation in that there is no clear right of appeal given to parents who are unhappy with the care provision that the Section 23 assessment has awarded them.

20. This is hugely disempowering for parents and means that for some, the system simply will not function in their best interests. However, if there were timeframes applied to Section 23 assessments, as we describe above, any failure to undertake a proper assessment or provide care within a given period of time would then be in breach of statutory obligations. This would act as an efficient enforcement mechanism and open a right to appeal for families.

21. Having such recourse when a Section 23 assessment fails families is simply vital.
Parents must be confident that they will receive the proper help they need as well as have the ability to ask formally to review and amend their care package to make it more effective and responsive to their individual needs.

22. If there is no allowance made for a clearly defined appeal process, local authorities risk continuing to fail some of the most vulnerable children in Scotland and their families.

The ‘named person’ provision

23. The Bill’s requirements for a ‘named person’ are very promising from the standpoint of profoundly learning disabled children and their families. Having a named person would help families through the assessment and service provision process and would avoid the situation of families being cast adrift when dealing with the care system.
24. However, the fact that the Bill does not legislate for a lead professional is unfortunate. This is despite the idea of a lead professional taking over where there are complex needs or where different agencies need to work together being an integral component of the Scottish Government’s Getting it Right for Every Child (GIRFEC) approach.

25. According to the Scottish Government’s own definition, the lead professional is the individual best placed to provide coordinated and specialised support for children with complex needs. The named person, as defined in this legislation, may simply not have the knowledge or breadth of experience needed to effectively handle the needs of children with profound learning disabilities.

26. Because the children we work with have extremely complex needs that demand different public services to work in partnership with one another, it is going to be these children and families that threaten to lose out.

Will this Bill lead to other care improvements?

27. With respect to the profoundly learning disabled children we work with, our other main concerns centre around better and more focused delivery of care and fostering a more responsive system of residential care.

28. We feel specifically that the profoundly learning disabled should be identified and removed from the current system as too much time tends to be spent on inappropriate contact and assessment designed for children with greater abilities.

29. Dedicated funding is also required to meet the needs of the profoundly learning disabled as we have concerns that local authorities are not prioritising their spend on this extremely vulnerable group.

30. There also needs to be greater recognition that profoundly learning disabled children cannot always live at home. Though existing residential provision is of good quality, there is not enough of it and too much of it is far away from families. It is crucial that this situation is addressed going forward, especially for the extremely vulnerable young adults with profound learning disabilities for whom there is no suitable residential care in Scotland.

31. While we wait to see how this Bill sits within the post-Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill world of integrated health and social care systems, with the new rights and responsibilities accorded to public services, families and children in the Children and Young People legislation, we believe the Scottish Government will have more than enough impetus to begin moving on these other aspects of the care system that are in desperate need of improvement.

Conclusion

32. On the whole, this is a Bill to be welcomed. As ever, though, the devil is in the final detail of the proposals, which is not something we are likely to find out until well after the passage of this legislation.
33. I would welcome the opportunity to expand upon this submission in one of the Committee's upcoming oral evidence sessions.

About us

1. National Day Nurseries Association (NDNA) is the charity and membership association promoting quality care and early learning for children in nurseries across the UK.

2. NDNA supports its members to develop their quality of care and to run a healthy sustainable business by providing members with information, training and support. NDNA works closely with its members to represent the sector to government, local authorities and the media. NDNA Scotland has a thriving membership base representing over a third of private day nurseries, with active provider networks in local authority areas across the country and an office in Edinburgh.

3. Our member nurseries are independent, private and third sector organisations who deliver early learning and childcare in partnership with local authorities. Some 60,000 children, approximately half of all children taking up nursery places, do so in the independent, private or third sector. For under-threes this rises to 60% of children, with nearly 40,000 under-threes in care and early learning in private nurseries alone.

Our response

[The questions included below are taken from the Scottish Government’s Consultation on the Children and Young People Bill, which was issued on 4 July 2012.]

Better service planning and delivery

Do you agree that a duty be placed on public bodies to work together to jointly design, plan and deliver their policies and services to ensure that they are focused on improving children’s wellbeing?

4. Yes.

5. Public bodies also need to work effectively with private and voluntary sector partners, who are central to delivering for children at the frontline. Whilst it would not be appropriate or feasible for a legal duty to be placed on private or voluntary sector partners, an understanding of the need for effective engagement of these partners should underpin the work of public bodies, particularly local authorities. Strong partnership working between private and voluntary partners and local authorities is essential in early years with some 60,000 children, approximately half of all children taking up nursery places, doing so in the private or voluntary sector. For under-threes this rises to 60% of children, with nearly 40,000 under-threes in care and early learning in private nurseries alone. To achieve the ambitions of the Bill, it is vital that all services work together and are included in design, planning and delivery. Approaches that use the expertise of all partners, including the private and voluntary sector, should be taken to maximise support for families and the return on use of public funds in a time of austerity.

6. Given the direction of the Bill around integrated early learning and childcare, consideration should also be given as to how regulatory bodies work together. Nurseries providing for 0-5s are inspected by both Care Inspectorate and Education Scotland, which can be seen as working against an understanding of integrated provision.

How might such a duty relate to the broader Community Planning framework within which key service providers are expected to work together?

7. It is vital that service providers in the private and voluntary sector are included in the remit of the Community Planning framework. These providers are key to delivery at the frontline for children and need to be engaged in planning so local areas can work in partnership to map and develop services according to need.

Improving access to high quality, flexible and integrated early learning childcare

Do you agree that the Scottish Government should increase the number of hours of funded early learning and childcare?

8. Yes.

9. We wholeheartedly welcome the recognition by the Scottish Government of the impact of high quality early learning and childcare and the commitment to extend this to a minimum of 600 hours per child per year.

10. Feedback to us from nursery members is that access to funded early learning and childcare varies locally, with children and families benefitting from different amounts of provision according to the policy of their local authority. We believe that as hours are extended, legislation should set out a clear right to 600 hours for every three and four year old with a duty on local authorities to ensure that these hours are available and accessible to families through a mix of provision, with true parental choice. This should be widely publicised to parents so that they are aware of their child’s right to these hours and can hold their local authority to account.

11. Feedback from our most recent survey of nurseries in Scotland published in our NDNA Insight Report August 2012 ‘The Nursery Sector in Scotland’ suggested that a majority of nurseries are underfunded for free early learning and childcare places. Ninety-two percent of respondents reported making losses on the places, with an average loss of over £500 per child per year. This is a financially unsustainable position for nurseries and must be addressed if they are to be able to offer 600 hours. Funding levels also work against the objectives of a high quality professional workforce, as nurseries are unable to provide salaries commensurate with a profession.
12. Local authorities must direct sufficient funding to nurseries so that they are funded at a viable level that enables them to deliver the high-quality provision that makes a difference to children. The Scottish Government should assess the level of funding needed centrally and explore mechanisms to protect that investment at local level so that the significant financial commitment that will be made by government achieves the impact intended by the Bill. One option might be to reintroduce an advisory floor minimum level of funding and review this annually – in some local authorities funding to private nurseries has remained static since the advisory floor was removed several years ago. There is also a need for greater transparency on how local authorities direct funding and what funding is retained by the local authority and measures should be taken to make this information available to their local communities. NDNA would be happy to be involved in further discussions on solutions to funding issues.

Do you agree that the Scottish Government should increase the flexibility of delivery of early learning and childcare?

13. Yes.

14. NDNA believes that parental choice in early years is vital in ensuring families can access the flexible mix of services that meets the needs of their child and helps them balance family life with work or training commitments. As identified in the consultation document, many private and voluntary nurseries already provide seamlessly integrated early learning and childcare for extended hours.

15. We believe the drive for flexibility could be supported by moving to a model where funding for early learning and childcare is child led, rather than allocated to settings at local authorities’ discretion according to location, sector or other local criteria. Legislation should enshrine this principle so that a parent can choose to access their child’s early learning and childcare at any provider of their choice, subject to that provision being properly registered and meeting the nationally-required standards. This measure would enhance choice for parents, and make them more likely to be able to opt for patterns of childcare that would enable them to sustain their place in work or training by finding the right balance between work and family life. It would also promote continuity for children, so that, if their parents choose they can be in a single setting all day that meets their care and learning needs in an integrated approach, rather than have a ‘patchwork’ of provision that combines wraparound care with a separate setting for education. Protection for parental choice would also provide support for families in rural areas where the widest choice of provision should be facilitated to reduce long, expensive journeys commuting to pre-school settings, as well as the workplace.

16. Feedback from our survey showed that 20% of nurseries surveyed are not involved in the delivery of pre-school places. This snapshot suggests that as many as one fifth of parents may have to move their child to a different setting at age three in order to take up their free pre-school place.
17. The case studies below illustrate some of the experiences of nurseries and parents at local level. Feedback to NDNA from voluntary sector settings indicates that they and their parents and children are also are affected by exclusion from partnership.

18. Nursery A

19. Nursery A is in the South West and has been established for many years. It has always been successful in receiving partnership funding from its local council. It is a large nursery within school grounds.

20. Currently the private nursery has 80 three to five year olds and, like other settings in this local authority area, is given an allocated number of funded places each year. This particular nursery guarantees funding to four and five year olds and then the remainder of the funding is allocated to the three year olds according to their start date at the nursery. If all allocated funding is covered by the older age group, then this results in none of the three year olds having funding for that year. This naturally causes upset among some parents, and means that there is inequity of funding with not all three year olds receiving their full pre-school entitlement.

21. Nursery B

22. Nursery B is a private nursery in the South East established in 2005. It has capacity for 59 children, 29 of these in pre-school. For three years, 20 of the pre-school places had partnership funding. After three successful years, with a teacher in place in the nursery, when it was time to re-tender, with no changes since the previous year, and a sound inspection report, the tender application was not successful. As a result the nursery lost partnership funding which they believe was due to the expansion of the local state nursery by 60 places. This expansion also had repercussions for the local voluntary pre-school group who used the school premises and had to move out to make way for the expanding state nursery.

23. Out of the three private nurseries in the area, one did get partnership funding and the other three settings in the area that parents can access for funding are all council run nurseries, which only offer places for 2.5 hours per day.

24. Nursery B was given notice of the decision to remove it from partnership just three days before the end of term. The impact on parents and children has been significant. Parents had to leave their chosen nursery and apply for a funded place at another setting and then add on wraparound care. Nursery B now drops off and picks up children who access their funded places at council nurseries. The children experience a patchwork of provision rather than fully integrated care and education.

25. Nursery C

26. Nursery C is in a rural area in Central Scotland. It was established in 2007 with a £12,000 grant from the local council to the private nursery provider in recognition of a lack of provision in the area. The setting has a Care Inspectorate grading of 5 and provides 54 places.

27. After one year’s operation, Nursery C applied for partnership, having understood when it set up in 2007 that the lack of provision in the area meant there would be a strong case for pre-school funded places to meet the needs of parents. The nursery went through over a year of discussions and correspondence with the council, repeatedly presenting substantial evidence of need, backed up by parents themselves, however, partnership was refused on the grounds that sufficient places were available and funds were limited. The two nearest partner providers in this rural area are 7 and 15 miles away. Rural families have been significantly disadvantaged by this decision, some missing out on their funded place as they are unable to travel to other partner settings and still meet their work commitments, others having taken their children to partner settings and now facing very long days with the three and four year olds experiencing three different early years settings within one day.

Do you think local authorities should all be required to offer the same range of options? What do you think those options should be?

28. No. Prescribing a national range of options needs careful consideration. Local communities’ needs and patterns of provision will vary, and any required offer must be deliverable at local level.

29. Alongside this, flexibility to support parents and employers must not override the importance of delivering early learning and childcare in a way that promotes the best outcomes for the child.

30. Going down the route of nationally-prescribed patterns of days and hours that all early learning and childcare providers must offer risks working against local flexibility to respond to communities’ needs. Rather than prescribing a fixed pattern, government could set out some very broad parameters of what is allowable and require local authorities to promote through partnership working with private, voluntary and public sector providers, a pattern that meets the needs of parents in their area.

31. The restriction of funded hours to term time only does not fit with the needs of many families who would prefer the consistency that year round provision brings for their child and their need to balance work/family responsibilities. Term-time only funding can also be difficult to manage financially and operationally for nurseries that are open year round. We would therefore support the intention behind the proposal to extend provision over 40 or 48 weeks. This could be covered in legislation by explicitly requiring local authorities to allow provision to be extended up to year round where parents require this. A similar approach could be taken to compressing hours over fewer days which will also support parents to attend work or training – however this must be balanced with the needs of children.
32. We would not support the model of five days per fortnight – we believe this is overly prescriptive and would make it difficult to ensure consistency of staffing for children to promote quality childcare and early learning.

How do you think the issue of cross-boundary placements should be managed, including whether this might be through primary or secondary legislation or guidance?

33. As discussed above, we believe that provision of early learning and childcare should be child-led and not depend upon local policy. Parents will need to access provision out of their home local authority area, for example if they commute to a city and their child attends nursery close to their workplace. To achieve a consistent national offer for every child, there must be a route to funding with either the home local authority obliged to fund children taking up places out of their home area, or the local authority where the provision is based required to fund all children taking up places in its area. Funding mechanisms could either include cross border arrangements, or take account of cross-border uptake.

34. Member nurseries on the border with England have advised us that they may have children from across the border in their nurseries and consideration needs to be given to policy in these instances.

Do you agree with the additional priority for 2 - year olds who are ‘looked after’? What might need to be delivered differently to meet the needs of those children?

35. Yes.

36. The stable environment, development support and social inclusion of access to early learning and childcare will bring significant benefit to these vulnerable children.

37. Looked after children will benefit most from free early learning and childcare if their needs are met in an holistic and integrated way. Early years practitioners must have the skills and resources to meet the needs of looked after children. They must also be included by other agencies in planning for and delivering strategies to support the child’s needs. As discussed above, provision must be properly funded to enable it to be of high quality. This is even more critical for vulnerable children in greater need where for example, a higher staff to child ratio or investment in training and resources may be needed.

The named person

Do you agree with the proposal to provide a point of contact for children, young people and families through a universal approach to the Named Person role?

38. Yes. We welcome the streamlining of the process for children with additional support needs and believe it should improve the service to families.

39. It is important to understand that many nurseries will spend significant time with a child and to recognise that relationship. There needs to be a close partnership between the child’s nursery and the named person and information fully shared.

The Child’s Plan

How do you think that children, young people and their families could be effectively involved in the development of the Child’s Plan?

40. Nurseries already have ‘care plans’ relating to the child’s care and development in the centre and any additional support needs. Where a child has additional support needs identified, these should be immediately communicated to the nursery and the named person must include the nursery in the planning, promotion and delivery of support.

Assessing Impact

In relation to the Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment, please tell us about any potential economic or regulatory impacts, either positive or negative; you feel the legislative proposals in this consultation document may have, particularly on businesses?

41. NDNA and its members welcome plans to extend funded early learning and childcare and the recognition by government of the positive impact it has on children’s outcomes. The Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment notes that private sector nurseries may be impacted by the Bill’s proposals. The opportunity to provide for additional hours may be seen as a benefit for nurseries, however, if funded hours are delivered at a loss, and replace what would have formerly been paid for hours, then the extension will become a threat and make businesses less sustainable, potentially reducing availability of flexible places.

42. In our recent survey, respondents delivering free hours were losing on average £584 per child per year. If hours are extended to 600 per year, this loss would become £738. With nurseries operating on low margins, and the sector already feeling the impact of recession, then increased losses could risk overall business sustainability and potentially lead to nursery closures.

43. There is capacity in the private and voluntary sector, with a vacancy rate of around 25% according to our survey, and so there is opportunity for local authorities to work with partner providers rapidly and cost effectively to scale up provision that is flexible and meets parents’ needs. The duty on local authorities should focus on securing places, rather than using government funds to duplicate existing provision in the private and voluntary sector.

44. The Bill’s ambitions for an integrated approach to working with children will require effective involvement of private and voluntary sector partners by public agencies, for example in the child’s plan. To promote the best outcomes for children, the workforce in nurseries will need to have the right skills and knowledge and nurseries will need to be able to resource the support needed for individual children. One of the greatest challenges highlighted by nurseries in our survey was the cost of staff wages, with feedback on the difficulty of appropriately rewarding staff at all levels. Nurseries also fed back that they are seeing reductions in local authority support, with 50% seeing reductions in support for training and 40% seeing reductions in support for quality. Local authorities must have clear duties to provide accessible and meaningful support to all settings in their area. To ensure we have the right workforce to deliver this vision for children, greater investment is needed, otherwise we will see upward pressure on fees for parents.

Introduction

1. The National Deaf Children’s Society (NDCS) is the national charity dedicated to creating a world without barriers for deaf children and young people. NDCS Scotland estimates there are 3500 deaf children and young people in Scotland, 90% of whom have hearing parents or carers.

2. We use the term deaf to refer to all levels of childhood deafness including hearing loss in one ear, temporary hearing loss such as glue ear and also to refer to all types of communication methods, including British Sign Language.

Context

3. NDCS Scotland welcomes the introduction of the Children and Young People’s (Scotland) Bill. This legislation presents us with the opportunity to create significant positive impact for this generation of children and young people and beyond. NDCS Scotland is keen to support the process of maximising these opportunities, particularly in relation to deaf and other disabled children and young people. We welcome the opportunity to submit evidence to the Education and Culture Committee.

4. We welcome the general principles of the proposed Bill, its overall aims and the opportunity to make all services equally accountable for delivering services to meet the needs of deaf children and young people through a single plan.

5. However we are disappointed that the rights and needs of disabled children and young people have not been consistently considered throughout the Bill. We note the focus on enhanced provisions for Looked After and Accommodated children and young people and we urge the Committee to consider the needs of other vulnerable children, such as disabled children. NDCS Scotland believes disabled children and young people are currently set to miss out on benefitting from many of the opportunities within this legislation.

Sections 1 - 4: The rights of children and young people

6. NDCS Scotland welcomes the Bill’s intention to legislate for children’s rights in Scotland and to “ensure that children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services”\(^1\). However we feel strongly that the current provisions do not go far enough to meet the Scottish Government’s aspiration of “making rights real” for children and young people.

7. NDCS Scotland firmly believes that this Bill presents the opportunity for the Scottish Government to prove its genuine commitment to children’s rights by fully incorporating the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) into Scots Law. We feel the proposed duty on Scottish Ministers to “keep under consideration whether there are any steps which might secure better effect of the rights set out in the UNCRC; and to take any steps they believe to be appropriate in consequence of that consideration” is weak and does not go far enough to ensure the “effective realisation of children’s rights where possible.”² NDCS Scotland fully endorses calls from Together and the Scottish Commissioner for Children and Young People (SCCYP) on this matter.

8. NDCS Scotland also urges consideration of how children’s rights will be realised for all children, including disabled children. NDCS Scotland believes this should be included within the Ministers’ responsibility to review their approach to implementing the UNCRC, ensuring this approach is advancing the rights of disabled children. NDCS Scotland strongly believes this could be achieved by taking advantage of the opportunity to explicitly reference elements of the United Nations Charter for the Rights of Persons with Disabilities within the Bill.

9. NDCS Scotland welcomes the duty on Ministers to “promote public awareness and understanding” of the rights of children. Our consultation with children and young people revealed that 70% of deaf children surveyed said that they ‘don’t know anything’ or only know ‘a little bit’ about the UNCRC. Similarly, 83% of parents of deaf children surveyed said that they ‘don’t know anything’ or only know ‘a little bit’ about the UNCRC.³ While legislation is essential, it is clear we must go beyond this by ensuring that children, young people and their families are empowered to understand and advance their rights. This is particularly the case for disabled children and their families who may require additional support to do so.

10. NDCS Scotland firmly believes a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment (CRIA) should be carried out on the Bill. NDCS Scotland is disappointed to see the Scottish Government has deemed this to be an unnecessary step in making children’s rights real, despite the likelihood of this work revealing possible positive and negative consequences of the legislation. We fully endorse calls from Together and SCCYP on this matter.

11. NDCS Scotland welcomes the proposed extension of SCCYP powers to investigate cases or complaints brought by or on behalf of individual children and young people. However we believe it is essential that SCCYP is adequately resourced to undertake this significant new role and we welcome further information regards how the Scottish Government envisions this will work in practice including examples of cases that the will be investigated as a result of the new proposed power.

Sections 7 – 41: Getting it Right for Every Child

Children’s services planning

² Pg. 12, S 44. Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, Policy Memorandum
³ NDCS Scotland, September 2012, A Consultation Response on Proposal for Children and Young People’s Bill
12. NDCS Scotland welcomes the duties on public bodies to prepare, review, implement and report on children’s services plans. NDCS Scotland agrees it is essential that public bodies work together to plan and deliver their services in partnership, ensuring the wellbeing of children and young people is advanced. It is clear that full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots Law will facilitate the process of children’s rights underpinning this planning.

13. We urge the Scottish Government to consider how the Bill will ensure that Children’s services planning will meet the needs of disabled children. The Bill should seek to ensure that during these planning processes the needs of disabled children are considered when services are working at the local level to design, plan and delivery services jointly.

14. NDCS Scotland recommends that provisions are made to create scope for children’s services planning to occur across local authorities boundaries where appropriate. To encourage equitable support for low incidence needs such as childhood deafness smaller local authorities may be encouraged to plan across boundaries in order to meet projected need while following a child centred approach.

Provision of Named Person

15. The introduction of a single point of contact, a Named Person is welcomed by our membership generally, but only if there is common understanding about the role of that Named Person and it is universally adopted in every local authority.

16. The roll out of the Named Person process will require significant resourcing, particularly with regards to the health visitor service and NDCS Scotland is concerned that the proposals’ aspirations in this regard are not currently matched with adequate resourcing.

17. It is clear that flexibility is required with regards to the introduction of Named Persons. This must address the need to include specialist expertise within planning processes for disabled children. In some circumstances for example, the Head of a Sensory Support Service may be a more appropriate Named Person for a deaf child than a Head Teacher. In some instances where a child’s needs are more complex, having a Named Person out with education may also be more appropriate. NDCS Scotland firmly endorses For Scotland’s Disabled Children’s (FSDC) response on this matter.

18. Crucial to Named Persons successfully completing their role is the assumption that they will be in a position to coordinate information from across different services and act in the best interests of a child or young person. Information-sharing across services is therefore crucial. There is a need to address the technical and cultural barriers which often inhibit information-sharing between statutory and non-statutory services and can impact negatively on service delivery.
19. The Bill's information sharing duty\(^4\) however, threatens the balance of promoting children’s rights and wellbeing and infringing on a child’s right to privacy. NDCS Scotland urges the Committee to consider the possible unintended consequences of this duty, and the need for it to be accompanied by extensive training in child protection and confidentiality among professionals in statutory services, to ensure a clear understanding of appropriate and relevant information to share.

20. NDCS Scotland believes the Bill does not fully address the issue of parents’ empowerment and the importance of the home environment for advancing children and young people’s rights and wellbeing. Alongside proposals for the roll out of the Named Person and Child’s Plan must be a strong emphasis on how parents’ will be informed about these processes and be enabled to become fully engaged partners within them. For example, what routes of redress will exist for parents and young people who are dissatisfied with their allocated Named Person or with progress on their Child’s Plan, how will parents be empowered to challenge these issues and what will be the routes of redress through which to do so? NDCS Scotland fully supports FSDC’s recommendation that these issues be clarified and we suggest this is on the face of the Bill.

21. NDCS Scotland feels the position of the family within this Bill is in conflict with other key policies including the Parenting Strategy and the Early Years Framework. NDCS Scotland endorses FSDC views on this matter and we believe further work is needed to bring the Bill in line with Scotland’s wider policy framework.

22. NDCS Scotland recommends that the Bill strengthens provisions around post 16 transitions, which are particularly challenging for young disabled people. Hearing impaired school leavers are less than half as likely than their hearing peers to be qualified to enter Higher Education\(^5\) and are therefore at greater risk of being Not in Education Employment or Training. This Bill presents an opportunity to improve outcomes for this group by extending access to the Named Person service to those who leave school at the age of 16. NDCS Scotland endorses FSDC’s recommendations on this matter and also recognises that families and parents should also be considered in these provisions.

Child’s Plan

23. NDCS Scotland welcomes a single Child’s Plan where this will facilitate the coordination of services working together to improve a child or young person’s wellbeing through targeted interventions. Currently NDCS Scotland is concerned that many deaf children and young people are not involved in statutory planning processes and we recommend that all children in need, including deaf children and young people, are legally entitled to a Child’s Plan.

---

24. NDCS Scotland also recommends the Bill be strengthened with regard to how it will ensure that the views of children, young people and their parents are fully involved in the process of developing, implementing and reviewing a Child’s Plan. In having regard to the views of the child, and their parents or carers, it is essential that their language and communication needs are fully considered. Similarly, it is crucial that deaf children and their families have full access to accessible information to ensure they are fully engaged in planning processes.

25. NDCS Scotland believes the proposed Bill creates a number of opportunities to fill the gaps in national guidance on specialist issues. As recommended in the Doran Review, further guidance is needed in Scotland on how best to implement GIRFEC for children with additional support needs, including deaf children and young people.

26. Similarly, specialist guidance on implementation of Child’s Plan for children with sensory impairments should be included in accompanying guidance to the Children and Young People’s Bill, reflecting existing requirements in the Teaching (Scotland) 2005 regulations which required a specialist workforce for this group of children. This guidance should consider proposals in Scottish Government’s Sensory Impairment Strategy and ensure the policies reflected are complementary.

Sections 42 – 49: Early Learning and Childcare

27. NDCS Scotland welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to “improving and increasing high quality, flexible and integrated early learning and childcare which is accessible and affordable for all.”

28. NDCS Scotland welcomes the Bill’s proposals to increase the number of funded early learning and childcare from 475 hours to a minimum of 600 for 3 and 4 year olds. We further welcome the extension of 600 hours of provision to looked after 2 year olds, and acknowledge that looked after children make up a particularly vulnerable group of children in society.

29. However we are seriously concerned that in highlighting one group of vulnerable children, the Bill fails to address the similar needs of other vulnerable groups, such as disabled children. NDCS Scotland urges the Committee to scrutinise these proposals and extend the extension of free early learning and childcare for 2-year olds to all children with a disability. We fully endorse FSDC’s proposals in this regard.

30. As mentioned, NDCS Scotland feels further consider must be given to the importance of the home environment and family support within the Bill. For many children the provision of early learning and childcare occurs within the home and it is essential that the Scottish Government’s aspirations in this area are met with appropriate provision and resourcing within the Bill. In particular NDCS Scotland recommends further investment of professional time within the home, in particular that of health visitors.

31. It is essential that this is coupled with provision for diverse options for families to obtain support and accessible information which allows them to develop the skills and knowledge required to advance their children’s rights and wellbeing. This is particularly important for deaf children and young people’s families which face a number of additional challenges. 90% of deaf children are born to hearing parents meaning there are often serious challenges to nurturing speech and language and achieving positive outcomes for deaf children within the early years.

32. This can have serious impact on how deaf young people develop, with mental health being an area of concern. Government statistics reveal that 40% of deaf children and young people suffer from mental ill health, significantly above the average for all young people.8 NDCS Scotland is keen to see the Bill make more provision for family support in acknowledgment of these important issues.

33. NDCS Scotland welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to ensure Scotland has a care system capable of providing effective and rapid support for children and young people. NDCS Scotland notes the enhanced provision for this group around the extension of the age to which care leavers can receive support from their local authority from 21 up to and including 25.

34. While NDCS Scotland welcomes the intention of this proposal, we urge the Committee to consider the absence of any focus on other vulnerable groups. As such we endorse FSDC’s recommendation that the new right for young people leaving care to request assistance from a local authority up to the age of 25 should be extended to all disabled young people. NDCS Scotland would welcome the opportunity to provide further information to the Committee about any of the matters raised in this response and/or present oral evidence in September 2013.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Ensure that children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services by placing new duties on the Scottish Ministers and the public sector and by increasing the powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People

1. NHS Boards will require, in strategy, policy and performance to make explicit children’s rights and steps taken to comply with this section of the legislation. This will require a culture shift across health services and whilst it is welcomed, it poses certain challenges. Guidance on implementation and monitoring performance would be welcome and this would also help to support a consistent approach across the country. It is suggested there will be particular challenges for those who work in services where the adult is the primary receiver of care and their understanding as to compliance with children’s rights in practice is crucial to the implementation of the legislation. In addition, health practitioners may face conflict in balancing the rights of adults receiving care with those of the adult’s children.

2. We welcome the focus being on a child’s “Well Being”, however, we are concerned that many health professionals, in particular those caring for adults, will not have the required knowledge to recognise where a presenting situation may be a risk to a child’s “Well Being”. However, we are confident they can recognise a safeguarding or child protection situation as we have extensive training to support this area of activity.

3. The focus on “Well Being” is likely to present challenges in staff having the confidence and willingness to share information even where risk to “Well Being” has been identified.

4. We would suggest that consideration is given to some type of national initiative to raise aware of the issue of “Well Being” and also to develop a national training package for staff. The role of Public Health we would suggest is critical to this process raising awareness of the multiple factors that need to be considered and the methodology we need to share to fully evaluate the contribution Health and its partners can make.

5. The Bill proposes NHS Boards will be responsible for ensuring every child from birth to school age has a Named Person. This leaves the legislation open to interpretation in allocating such a role. It is requested that the final legislation or guidance explicitly states this should be the role of the health visitor, who is the best placed professional to fulfil the responsibilities of the role and produce the best outcomes for children in the age group.

6. We ask that clear and explicit national guidance is provided on the role and responsibilities for the named person to ensure consistency across Scotland. We would invite the National GIRFEC Team to provide this along with training and education materials.

7. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill sets out a requirement of professionals to share information with the child’s named person when there is a concern for a child’s safety or a presenting situation which may be a risk to their “Well Being”.

8. The Bill proposes Health Boards will provide the role of named person for those children from birth to school entry and the local authority to do so for children from school entry until they have attained the age of 18 years. As previously suggested we support this division and would like Health Visitors to assume the role of the named person for children from birth to school age.

9. For children of school age it is commonly considered likely that education will assume the role.

10. Custom and practice across NHS Boards is that when a child attends a health service and this generates actual or potential concern about their wellbeing, this is communicated to the health visitor for pre-school children and the school nurse for school age. In addition, even those attendances that may not be of concern are also shared, such as attendances at Accident and Emergency Departments or sexual health services. This practice enables the collation of chronologies which are important in highlighting concern arising from an accumulation of health issues.

11. Whilst for preschool children the proposed legislation will not change this practice, for school aged children this will require health services to share health information out with the NHS i.e. with the local authority/education.

12. We would like consideration and clarity to be given with regards to the potential conflict between the proposed legislation and that pertaining to medical confidentiality. We feel guidance on sharing information with regards to risk to “Well Being” and information sharing to support the continuity of health care is required.

13. Without clarification on the above, the well being of children and young people will potentially be at greater risk than is currently the case.

Information sharing between services in respect of Children and Young People or Parent’s Rights vs. the Rights of Children and Young People:

14. In situations where child protection is an issue, this has been recognised, and the response from adult services is cooperative. In circumstances where the child could or will be at risk of harm due, for example, to the parent or carer’s alcohol or substance misuse, mental health, Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorders (FASD), the impact of the treatment programme, or out with health service issues such as criminal behaviour or the consequences of that behaviour, need to be considered. There is some distance to go before there are effective communication systems in place. National guidance would be welcome and would assist the process.

15. We would argue that this legislation should be supportive of parents and families, the nature of the support offered may not have the impact sought as to achieve this we need to work more directly with parents to enable them to become better parents. The proposal seems to supplement poor parenting.

Ensure better permanence planning for looked after children by improving support for kinship carers, families and care leavers, extending corporate parenting across the public sector, and putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing;

16. NHS Boards will require clarity on the role of the corporate parent and the implications of this. Consideration will need to be given to the role of adult health services in particular in relation to those 16-25 years and action taken to ensure they understand the legislation and the interface with vulnerable adult legislation.

Strengthen existing legislation that affects children and young people by making procedural and technical changes in the areas of children’s hearings support arrangements, secure accommodation placements, and school closures;

17. Nil response

Relevant issues:

18. The solution to improved decision making and outcomes for children where there are wellbeing concerns (including those who are looked after), is via embedding the Getting It Right For Every Child (GIRFEC) approach in all services associated with children, young people and families. This includes adult services. GIRFEC provides a consistent way for all practitioners to work with all children and young people and also promotes as a core component, the views of children, young people and families in assessment, planning and intervention. GIRFEC provides a co-ordinated and unified approach to identifying concerns, assessing needs, and agreeing actions and outcomes for children. Therefore in embedding the Getting It Right For Every Child (GIRFEC) approach we expect to see improved responsiveness, communication, information sharing, assessment, analysis, planning, decision making and therefore the achievement of timeous, stable and permanent solutions for children and young people who have care needs.

19. To embed the approach in a consistent and sustainable way will require changes in culture, systems and practice across all agencies including adult services that support parents and carers who have contact with children. Where resources are significantly constrained the transition to a new state is challenging within a timescale that is acceptable for our children and young people. Using the mechanisms in place through guidance, policy and scrutiny we can ensure that the implementation of this approach is being prioritised and strengthened by including key elements of the GIRFEC approach in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Here there is an opportunity not only to put key elements of GIRFEC in primary legislation, but also to develop secondary legislation and guidance to ensure that the approach is sustainably delivered across all aspects of services impacting on children, young people and families in Scotland.

20. Scotland needs to move to a position that ensures all children have a full health needs assessment in place and we would suggest that this needs to come from and be owned by the originating health board. Ideally Health Boards would like to keep our children and young people within the board area but where that is not possible there is an obvious disconnect between the Corporate Parenting agenda / GIRFEC and everything else Scotland is trying to achieve in this area. If the originating health board worked with the receiving health board to commission the appropriate services then it would retain ownership and is more likely to facilitate a child coming home. Discussions should take place from the basis of what would be the most effective service and then design the support structures: both financial and operational.

21. Paediatricians who deliver Comprehensive Medical assessments can feel by the time they see children for assessment of neglect that there has been months or years of delays in moving to permanence. This is caused by difficulties in gathering relevant health information and summarising the evidence of impact of neglect, caused by the cumulative significant harm.

22. Decision making regarding removal of children is often left until significant harm is clearly evident and the delay can be lengthy. Social work records for example can show ample evidence of failure by parents to exercise their responsibilities. Health visitor notes show lack of engagement in preventive health, e.g. immunizations and dental health, and hospital and GP notes may show failure to attend for chronic health problems. The NHS could make far more effective use of the available information to predict and perhaps prevent issues from escalating. Effective sharing of information can demonstrate or highlight the significance of the problem.

23. There are also major problems in ensuring that the health service is able to maintain an effective input as it may not be told where children are residing: placements often change with little notice and out of region placements are particularly challenging. Children arriving in an area having been placed in a residential unit from another authority are often unknown to the “host” area. Health records should be in place early enough in the process to inform the care plan and these records should go with the child rather than following some weeks or months later. These children often have complex needs that remain unmet until the process catches up. A more robust procedure for notifying Health and arranging assessments would help. This could be backed up by a more uniform approach to what is expected during such assessments.

24. Health services should develop IT systems that are able to easily share information across primary and secondary care. Enabling any part of the health service to assess the level of neglect by accessing data from across the system, for example immunisation and child health surveillance data, dental records, and A/E attendances to check for level of engagement in preventive programmes. There are pockets of good practice across Scotland, such as AyrSHARE, Ayrshire and Arran’s system, where for example A/E staff can access systems to check the status and concerns about children attending; they can also send information electronically to the Named Person. This level of IT provision is essential to collating information and can help to identify cumulative neglect early. Examples of good practice such as AyrShare could be adopted by other Health Boards rather than investing in similar systems independently of each other.

25. The question about at what stage of the assessment and decision-making process health is involved also requires clarification. The local authority from where the child originated has a duty to notify the NHS Board where the child is going to live; this includes out of area placements. The guidance implies that the NHS Board the child is living in is then responsible for the child’s health care, which means for any child from another NHS Board/Local Authority in Scotland who moves into a Health Board area, that Health Board has responsibility for that child’s health care and vice versa. Current provision of LAAC health services is often not compliant with both of these; Health Boards are not notified by other LAs of their LAAC children in their area and therefore are unable to routinely provide LAAC health care to them.

26. Discharge / Through Care: In general health services and partner agencies tend to assume an individual reaches adulthood by looking at their calendar age. By comparison, parents assume that their own children are supported to look after themselves by a strong family network, until they are at least in their early twenties. Yet for this group of vulnerable children who are potentially least able to maintain their own household, the support to make the transition from childhood into adulthood brings many additional challenges. Better supports need to be put in place and minimum expectations for all agencies involved should be clearly established. Ensuring consideration is given to neglect in the context of additional needs for children with disability or chronic disease, particularly when the parent has their own difficulties or a disability and is being expected to cope with more than the average level of care is critical. The hesitation to consider the parent unable to meet the needs of the child, while nevertheless caring deeply for that child in the emotional sense, is often a barrier to decision making or a situation where the solutions that aim to address parental choice and to provide the practical help needed for the child’s care result in delay to permanence decisions, so staff need to be better equipped to make such decisions?

Early intervention and predictive factors:

27. The following outlines examples of issues that are in the main entirely preventable, but are lifelong conditions, that may be disproportionately represented within this group. If these conditions are not known or have not been diagnosed then it is likely that the current methods of intervention are not going to be effective. “Because we now understand the importance of the 0-2 period in creating solid psychological and neurological foundations to optimise lifelong social, emotional and physical health, education and economic achievement, we believe policy emphasis needs to shift to reflect this” Ensuring the health of prospective parents and parents is critical to ensuring that a child reaches its full potential. It is a combination of lack of support to prevent or reduce these problems that increases any individual’s chance of being received into care.
Parental attachment and the provision of a nurturing environment are critical: the impact of a parent’s poor physical and or mental health has a clear impact on a child’s behaviour, yet we often fail to take a holistic approach to the family’s health often treating the child or young person in the absence of this information. The need to improve the exchange of information, for the benefit of the child or young person and their parents, between adult services - be this criminal justice, health, social work the third sector or other services there are a range of factors which we know are critical to ensuring a child is able to reach his full potential. These include: Good health in the parents and prospective parents, parental attachment and the provision of a nurturing environment, the health of the wider family (holistic approach), Improving the exchange of information for the benefit of the child or young person and their parents, between adult services - be this criminal justice, health, social work the third sector or other services, needs to be captured within the legislation.

1. Thank you for the opportunity to respond to the Consultation.

2. As you will be aware the issue of child safety remains a concern in relation to childhood morbidity and mortality.

   - Every year in Scotland, it is estimated that one child in five attends A&E departments following an unintentional injury—approximately 200,000 visits annually.

   - The child death rate from unintentional injuries in Scotland is 30% higher than in England and Wales

   - Every year in Scotland, children’s accidents cost the NHS an estimated £40 million and society generally around £400 million.

Child Safety Strategy: Preventing Unintentional Injuries To Children and Young People in Scotland. 2007

3. The challenge for Public Health is to ensure that injuries are neither life-threatening nor disabling. It would therefore be helpful to strengthen and expand the reference to children’s safety within the Bill in line with the current evidence base and more explicitly develop roles and responsibilities for those working with children in relation to safety of children at home, on the road and at play in line with The UNCRC, Article 3 (3) states that those responsible for children’s care “shall conform with the standards established by competent authorities, particularly in areas of safety, health and competent supervision”. 2

4. Please find attached a copy of NHS Greater Glasgow and Clyde’s Preventing Unintentional Injuries To Children strategy document and a copy of a chapter from: The Right to a Safe Environment by Professor David Stone and Colin Moodie which further expand the issues associated with child safety ¹.

5. We will be happy to provide further information should it be necessary or required.

Education and Culture Committee
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
NHS Lothian

Introduction

1. NHS Lothian welcomes the opportunity to give evidence to the Education and Culture Committee on the provision and possible impact of The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. We also welcome the Scottish Government’s move to enhance the rights of children and young people and the shift towards prevention and early intervention, through increasing early learning and childcare provision and the Named Person, as set out in the Bill.

2. The Key Challenges for NHS Lothian are:
   - Future Governance Arrangements - How progress will be monitored and reported by NHS Boards.
   - Capacity & Demand within current Health Visiting and Maternity Services to implement the named person role.
   - Development of a robust case supervision model for Health Visiting which does not currently exist in Health Visiting other than for Child Protection.
   - Joint I.T. infrastructure and information sharing: Good communication is key to enabling this shift in working practices and culture amongst staff and society as a whole.
   - Resources for, and development of a skilled and competent NHS early years workforce with the capacity to ensure delivery of the Bill’s ambition.

The Rights of Children and Young People, paragraphs 41 to 43 Policy Memorandum (PM)

3. We welcome the positive steps to make children’s rights real, but feel that a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment (CRIA) should be carried out on the Bill as soon as possible. CRIA’s are an essential tool, as they allow planning and monitoring around the predicted impacts and if necessary enable these to be avoided or mitigated. We are in the process of incorporating CRIA’s into policy development throughout NHS Lothian, as we believe that this will help to embed children’s rights into children’s services planning across Lothian.

Duty on Scottish Ministers, paragraphs 44 to 46 PM

4. The Duty on Scottish Ministers to take into consideration the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) does not seem robust enough. We would encourage steps towards incorporation of the General Principles of the UNCRC, on the grounds that this will provide consistency and accountability across local and national government and all public services.
A Reporting Duty on Scottish Ministers and the Wider Public Sector, paragraphs 47, 48, 51 to 53 PM

5. To ensure this is an outcomes driven process, we feel that Scottish Ministers and Public Services should have to report on the outcomes achieved from setting out the steps they have taken to further the rights set out in the Convention. It would be less onerous on Public Services if we could produce one report on these aspects of the Bill. This would enable us to embed children’s rights into children’s services planning throughout Scotland. These reports should include a requirement to provide awareness training on the UNCRC across all public sector staff.

New powers for Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, paragraphs 49, 50 and 54 PM

6. With regard to the extension of the Children’s Commissioners Powers, when we consulted with some young people in Lothian they expressed a wish to have someone with local knowledge that they could report violations to who could then liaise with SCCYP. We therefore propose independent advocacy is in place for children and families, as the only legislation we currently have for advocacy is for people with a mental disorder under the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003. We are also currently working on a children and young people friendly complaints process and would be happy to share this work with others.

A Focus on Wellbeing, paragraphs 58 to 60 PM

7. We need to ensure that the language used around the Wellbeing Indicators (SHANARRI) fits with both children and young people’s and parent/carers understanding of it. There have been some concerns raised in relation to the “Included” indicator. The current phrasing suggests that services should help individuals overcome social, educational, physical and economic inequalities, where in fact society should be protecting children and young people from these inequalities. This has been picked up by parents who have children with complex disabilities and or exceptional healthcare needs and usually needs explained further to parents.

8. Given that for Scotland to be “the best place in the world for children to grow up” it is important to think about wellbeing as more than just meeting basic needs. We know that access to high quality education and rewarding employment, creativity and the arts, play and sport have a huge impact on health and wellbeing, both for individuals and society. Access to safe places to meet and socialise is also limited for many young people, and the consequences are also clear, in substance use, alcohol use and sexual health statistics as evidenced in local, national and international school-based surveys.

Getting it Right for Every Child - The Named Person, paragraphs 55 to 57 and 66 to 72 PM

1. For the first time we have legislation to provide a named person for every child. There is a necessity for robust guidance for the implementation of this coordination role. Whilst we welcome this, it does have a number of implications for Health Boards.

2. The Scottish Government has estimated the additional resource implications of introducing the named person to routine Midwifery & Health Visiting Services and that this equates to over £16 million for Scotland. An estimated number of additional hours as a result of introducing the named person have also been estimated per child, per year.

3. Using this methodology, NHS Lothian estimate, based on live births (9,794) and numbers of 0-5 year old children (48,980) in the 2011 census, that an additional 20 Midwives and 49 Health Visitors would be required. This equates to a total cost of £2,853,060. This appears to be more than what would be NHS Lothian’s share of the overall costs to NHS Scotland, as outlined in the Financial Memorandum.

4. While it is recognised that these costs would not come into effect until 2016, there are two main challenges facing the NHS, namely:
   - Funding this additional capacity recognised within the Bill and
   - Recruitment at this scale in Lothian (never mind Scotland) will be near impossible on the short term due to the number of midwives and health visitors able to recruit to.

5. The Child Health Commissioner and Chief Nurses are currently exploring more creative ways of ensuring how the requirements of the Bill are met, e.g. through skill mix and delegating some of the admin functions to other staff, freeing up health visitors and midwives to undertake the necessary face-to-face assessment, co-ordination, early intervention and care planning work.

The Child’s Plan, paragraphs 78 and 87 PM

6. Examination of the past 20 serious case reviews in Scotland have highlighted that a number of individuals involved with families had concern, but that these concerns were not always shared or analysed and therefore care and intervention was not planned effectively or coordinated resulting in a negative outcome for the child.

7. In NHS Lothian we have adopted the National Practice Model into the Child Health Record into TRAK. Each child has a plan from birth often referred to as the “Child Health Plan”. It essentially details the assessed needs of the child and is the basis for analysis and assignation of the health plan indicator that will be core or additional as described within the policy Refreshed Health for All Children (Hall 4) 2011. This plan is outcome focussed and will detail core and additional early intervention across a range of domains. This approach ensures that children and young people are involved in the planning of their care and identifying outcomes and should be rolled out nationally. It is essential that we are able to not only record, but evaluate these outcomes.

8. We understand that it will be difficult to legislate for the Lead Professional as this person may not be working within a universal service. However, it would be useful to have some guidance on the relationship between the named person and lead professional, in order to highlight the differences in the roles and how they interlink with each other. Public Education Campaigns, Public consultation/service user involvement, focus groups involving service users and full User involvement through universal service user stories / user perspective need to be used in order to fully publicise the need for child/young person and family involvement in the development of the Child’s Plan.

Information Sharing, paragraphs 70 to 73 Explanatory Notes (EN)

9. We are pleased to note the emphasis on safe and effective sharing of child related information within the Bill. We are also pleased that the challenges of achieving this are acknowledged. There is a need for further development of national infrastructure to support the timely, safe, effective and appropriate sharing of this information across the care continuum. There is also a need for analysis of the capability of the infrastructure to support the delivery of the legislation. Currently the transition of care between the named person at school entry, does not have effective electronic information flows to allow this to happen, without paper transfer and/or duplication of information into ‘different’ IT systems. The work current being undertaken by the newly formed Information Sharing Board will be central to this.

10. The emerging work from the National GIRFEC team on nationally agreed guidance on information sharing in the context of the Children and Young People’s Bill, Data Protection Act and Human Rights Act is also welcomed. Our interagency services are repeatedly recognising a need for clarity on age relevant information sharing (e.g. the intrinsic relationship of the family unit within the early years moving to the young adult with right to confidentiality, and sharing of 3rd party information). The Lothian and Borders GIRFEC Implementation Board are developing Frequently Asked Questions and local guidance which will support this work.

11. We are pleased that the findings from the Highland Pathfinder Evaluation around information sharing and consent between agencies have been used to inform this work.

12. There is a need to clarify the interface between this Bill and other key legislation, such as the Additional Support for Learning (Scotland) Act 2004, Self Directed Support (SDS) (Scotland) Act 2013 and The Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. Other groups of vulnerable children e.g. young carers and children with complex healthcare needs should be included.

13. We feel there is a role for Scottish Government to ensure that the named person in Independent schools are required to share appropriate information, with all agencies, but particularly with health. The young people we consulted with expressed a wish to be able to access the named person even if they had left school.

Early Learning and Childcare, paragraphs 90 to 102 PM

14. We welcome the proposal to increase flexibility in early learning and childcare services. However, we need to ensure that flexibility for provision of childcare does not affect the quality of childcare and early learning needs. This needs to be accompanied by a robust workforce development plan. There also needs to be a link with adult services to support and improve parenting. There lacks clarity as to whether consideration has been given to the option of parents and carers using the forthcoming Self Directed Support legislation in relation to child care hours/entitlement in order to organise the input that best suits the particular needs of their family circumstances?

Corporate Parenting, paragraphs 104 to 107 PM

15. The provisions proposed should strengthen collective responsibility and the reporting requirements will assist in demonstrating progress. We would recommend that a Single National Responsible Commissioning Guidance for Health, Social Work and Education is required to ensure synergy across these services in relation to cross boundary placements. A more child centred approach would be if the money followed the child. This should help to eradicate the issues caused by separate budgets.

Kinship Care Order, paragraph 123 PM

16. We welcome the duty on local authorities to support families at early stages of distress where children are at risk of becoming looked after. We would like clarity on how these proposals will be resourced.

Right for Care Leavers to Request Assistance, paragraphs 108 to 115 PM

17. We welcome this part to the Bill as it strengthens the right for care leavers to request assistance by requiring local authorities to respond by carrying out an assessment of need. However, the concerns around significant resource implications do not appear to be addressed.

National Adoption Register, paragraphs 131 to 136 PM

18. As with a number of responses from other agencies NHS Lothian expressed some ambiguity regarding the proposal to put Scotland’s Adoption Register on a statutory footing. We hope the outcome of this proposal is to speed up the adoption process and that this would be kept under review. We need to ensure that the register adds value and efficiency and does not delay the effective processes that are currently used in some council’s.

Transition, paragraphs 109 and 122 PM

19. Although the Bill specifically mentions the transition to independence for care leavers, we also need to be planning transitions for other groups including children with additional needs such as young carers or those with multiple healthcare needs. Transitions need to be planned at the earliest possible time and children and young people need to be fully involved.

Counselling Services, paragraphs, 103, 123 to 125 PM

20. We welcome the focus on early intervention and prevention but would like the emphasis to be redirected away from just counselling to evidence based counselling interventions and/or support. This will enable other evidence based psychological interventions, not just individual and group based Cognitive Behaviour Therapy and for primary school children evidence based parenting interventions such as incredible years and Triple P to be included. It is important to remember that the NHS will provide these services through Child and Adult Mental Health Services. Therefore we need a local monitoring approach that allows both the Local Authority and NHS to provide shared governance structures and to report collectively on progress in this area. We would welcome the opportunity to be involved in creating the guidance as we have expertise locally that could be drawn on.

Better Service Planning and Delivery and Reporting on Outcomes

21. Community planning Partnerships need to develop strong governance arrangements with clear joint and collective accountability for delivery of integrated children’s services. The principles of the UNCRC need to be visible in local Single Outcome Agreements and there needs to be robust reporting mechanisms to ensure delivery of the key strategic priorities within these.

22. A Scottish Government Report cites that “Children and young people frequently felt that they did not have enough opportunities to express their views and influence decisions affecting their lives”. CRIA’s will enable us to demonstrate positive outcomes for children and young people. Barriers to communication and information sharing will need to be overcome to ensure that communities, parents/carers and children and young people can be involved.

23. There should be development work undertaken nationally to ensure that reporting on outcomes are child friendly e.g. using social media will help further the participation of children and young people’s involvement in service planning.

24. The Bill does not specifically seek to address the learning needs of those children and parents where the child has complex or exceptional healthcare needs. We also need to take into account the needs of children and parents with learning and physical disabilities to ensure equity for all children.

Definition of “Child”

2. The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) defines “child” for its purposes as follows: “a child means every human being below the age of eighteen years unless under the law applicable to the child, majority is attained earlier”. 18 is rather later than, traditionally, the law of Scotland has regarded childhood coming to an end. For the purposes of UNCRC, it is unclear what is understood by “majority” – though we do of course have the Age of Majority (Scotland) Act 1969 which sets the “age of majority” at 18, that has little practical effect. Since 1995 it has been clear that (virtually all) parental responsibilities and (all) parental rights cease when the child attains the age of 16, and from that age we have traditionally referred to “young persons” (as in, for example, the Children and Young Persons (Scotland) Act 1937). 16 (roughly) is the school leaving age, and the age of marriage/civil partnership (a definitional feature of adulthood – you can’t, for example, adopt a person who has been married or civilly empartnered). Notice also that while England, Wales and Northern Ireland each have a “Children’s Commissioner”, in Scotland we have a “Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People”). Children in Scotland have a veto over adoption from age 12 and can make wills from that age (unlike children in England in both respects). Our effective age of adulthood is probably 16 and not 18.

3. The point is that defining a person as a “child” increases the protections that the law offers them, but decreases their own personal freedoms. Section 75 of the Bill defines “child” as a person who has not attained the age of 18 years. I should have been more comfortable if the limit of childhood were set at 16, with the Bill imposing whatever duty it imposes on authorities and agencies on “children and young people” (as the title rather suggests). I accept, however, that “young people” in the Bill might be people between 18 and 26, over whom lesser duties are appropriate.

4. In a sense contrary to what I have argued above (that childhood should not be extended beyond 16 because of its infantilising effect), – and entirely understanding that this is a reserved matter – I am made very uncomfortable to read (for example in sections 21 and 31) that the duties owed to “children” are not to be applied to “children” in the armed forces. Children should not be serving in the armed forces. Article 38 of the UNCRC, of course, prohibits anyone under 15 from serving in the armed forces, so there is no breach of UNCRC for the UK to continue to enlist at an earlier age than most other western countries, but it does illustrate that the very concept of “child” is an artificial construct which we as a society are happy to change when it suits us (when they become soldiers, or when they marry).

Why the Decision not to Incorporate UNCRC into Scots Domestic Law is Good Thing

5. I strongly support the policy decision of the Scottish Government not to seek to incorporate UNCRC into Scots domestic law, for the following reasons:

(i) The UN Convention was not drafted as enforceable law – unlike the European Convention on Human Rights which has a whole judicial process behind it to tell us what it means, how to resolve its ambiguities and how to balance its conflicting principles. There are enormous dangers in taking a document designed for one purpose and using it for a purpose as powerful as legal regulation. The ECHR only works because the guidance given by the Court can be applied throughout the member states. Yet without any such court, we are left without any guidance as to what some of the more aspirational statements in the UNCRC actually mean. Take Article 4, for example: “With regard to economic, social and cultural rights, States Parties shall undertake such measures to the maximum extent of their available resources and, where needed, within the framework of international cooperation.” There are at least two problems with that. First, what are “economic, social and cultural rights”? Secondly, do we really want judges to be determining “the maximum extent of [states’] available resources”?

(ii) Many of the rights in UNCRC are simply not within domestic law’s competence. Take Article 10, for example, which provides that a child in a different state from their parent shall have the right to leave any country and enter any other. That is fine as an international aspiration, but the domestic law of the UK (far less of Scotland) cannot – is not competent to – require that a child be allowed to enter any other country in the world – again, the Article was not drafted as an enforceable domestic right, and it would not be sensible to attempt to convert it into one.

(iii) Many of the rights in UNCRC are simply not justiciable (ie it is not appropriate for judges to make the decision as opposed to policymakers). Take Article 24, for example, which imposes a duty on states to take appropriate measures to reduce infant mortality, and to develop primary health care. All good and well, and important aspirations, but who would you allow to sue the state if the state fails to reduce infant mortality? And once reduced, but not to zero, is there a breach when no further efforts are taken? This may sound all very pedantic, but it is in the nature of law to be pedantic – at least hard law contained in domestic legislation. Soft law, such as UNCRC does not need to be pedantic because it is not designed to raise justiciable issues, but to give guidance to states as to the social policies they should be adopting. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill contains statements of policy and is designed to create a cultural mindset far more than it is designed to provide hard legal rules that judges can rule upon: it reflects the approach of UNCRC more than incorporation would.

(iv) In any case, while UNCRC as policy aspirations may be unchallengeable, not all of its implications are necessarily good. A “child” under the UN Convention is a person under the age of 18, and “incorporating” childhood until 18 in our domestic law will have a number of unexpected and probably unwanted consequences, including raising the age of marriage, because of course we don’t like child-marriages, and increasing the age of lawful sexual activity, because we don’t want children having sex – and the Parliament recently decided with the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2009 that when they do they should both be criminalised, with all the problems of Disclosure that go with that. Another thing that we would do well to remember is that incorporating UNCRC will actually downgrade the place of welfare. Our law says that, in children cases before courts and children’s hearings, the welfare of the child is to be the paramount consideration. This is reflected in Article 21 of UNCRC in adoption proceedings, but in any other matter Article 3 states that welfare is merely a primary consideration. Incorporation would therefore actually weaken at least some aspects of the protections we currently give children.

Rights of Children

6. Part 1 of the Bill (sections 1 – 4) is headed “Rights of Children” and it defines that phrase to “include the rights and obligations set out in” UNCRC and its protocols. Scottish legislation has traditionally (if unfortunately) been very reticent about setting out the “rights” that children have, though since devolution the concept has been given rather more teeth. So while the Education (Scotland) Acts 1980 and 1981 impose duties to educate children, it is only since the Standards in Scotland’s Schools etc Act 2000 that children have had a statutory “right” to be educated. There are no “rights” for children (as opposed to parents) in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, though there are rather more in the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. The fact that the definition in section 4 of the present Bill “includes” UNCRC rights implies that other “rights” are covered but it gives no indication of what these rights are. It might be more accurate to change the definition in section 4 to read “‘rights’ ... means” instead of “‘rights’ ... includes”.

7. The word “right” is in itself ambiguous, as is clear from an examination of the rights contained in UNCRC. Some are aspirational but have no legally enforceable content (such as in art 24, the right to the highest attainable standard of health); some reflect general human rights as contained in the ECHR (such as in arts 14 – 16: freedom of thought, of association and from arbitrary arrest); some are directed to particular circumstances (such as arts 22 and 23: refugees and disabled children); some provide general principles that have long since been given effect to in our law (such as art 12: right of the child to express views).

8. Part 1, in fact, notwithstanding its heading does not confer rights on children: rather, it imposes duties on public bodies. Now, few duties imposed on public bodies will give any individual a right in the sense of an action to sue the body that fails in its duties. There have been a series of cases in the Supreme Court (involving English law) in which the nature of the public duty is explored and the very limited circumstances in which an individual acquires a statutory “right” are identified. Part 1 does not confer rights of that nature.

9. The language of “rights” may reflect that in the UNCRC, but in legal terms it may well be regarded as being misrepresentative. Part 1 of the Bill would be more accurate – and less open to the charge that it promises more than it delivers – if it were headed something like: “Duties in Relation to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child”.

General Principles

10. In 1995, both public law and private law matters relating to children were embodied in a single Act, the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. This allowed the legislation to set out general principles (which are often called “the three overarching principles”). Section 11(7) for private law matters and section 16 for public law matters require the child to be given the opportunity to express views; require welfare to be the paramount consideration; and require that minimum (or proportionate) state intervention be preferred over disproportionate intervention in family life. Child law is now much more disjointed than it was in 1995, with Part 1 of the 1995 Act surviving intact, much of Part 2 now being contained in the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, and adoption and permanence contained in the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. Each of these Acts contains (if sometimes hidden) a restatement of the three overarching principles. This does not appear in the Children and Young People Bill. Most noticeable is the absence of any general requirement to consult with children about the services that are to be provided them. Absent too is a clear declaration that in determining how to fulfil their duties children’s welfare should be public authorities’ paramount consideration – or even the lesser obligation in UNCRC, that children’s welfare be a primary consideration. The nearest we get is an obligation in section 74 to assess whether the child’s wellbeing is being safeguarded. It is no answer to say that the Bill requires planning to be informed by UNCRC, since that does not make welfare paramount (and neither, as explained above, does UNCRC). A statutory statement of principle would be far stronger and should be considered. The three overarching principles might appear usefully, for example, in section 19 which sets out the “named person functions”: in carrying out these functions children should be consulted, their welfare should be paramount, and any intervention (however early) should be the minimum that is necessary. See further my comments on section 31 below.
COMMENTS ON PARTICULAR SECTIONS

11. Section 1(1)(b). Section 1(1)(a) imposes an obligation on Scottish Ministers to keep under consideration what they might do to further secure UNCRC in Scotland. Good. Section 1(1)(b) imposes an obligation on them to take steps, but only if they “consider it appropriate to do so”. That qualification to their duty is so great and unlimited in its scope that it renders the duty effectively a discretion. The subsection gives and then immediately takes away.

12. Section 12(3): I am very unclear that is in mind here. When will implementing a child’s services plan adversely affect the wellbeing of a child? And does the section allow the whole plan to fall when one child may be adversely affected when all other children would benefit? I suggest tightening the wording to ensure that the plan is not implemented in respect only of the child adversely affected.

13. Section 26: “might be relevant” seems a tad loose and, combined with the defence in section 27, this might give rise to ECHR issues of proportionality. Article 8 of the ECHR (right to private life) is not absolute and state action that interferes with the right is legitimate if “proportionate”, that is to say (a) is done in pursuit of a legitimate aim and (b) goes no further than is necessary to achieve that legitimate aim. The aim of sharing information is clearly legitimate – to allow early identification of potential problems in order to put support mechanisms in place to minimise the risk of greater interference in the child’s family life. So long as the sharing of information is limited to service providers and other responsible persons this is probably proportionate, but only if the information needs to be passed. The risk is that article 8 is breached if the law allows more information than is necessary to allow the service provider to make the judgment is to be shared. Section 26 imposes an obligation to share information whenever that information “might” be relevant. This sounds like an absolute obligation to share virtually everything known about the child with all service providers – for anything “might” be relevant, just as it might not be. It may be, however, that the problem is resolved by section 26(2)(b) which restricts the obligation to when a service provider thinks the information “ought to be” provided. Service providers will need proper training on how to keep that judgment within the bounds of proportionality. I suggest amending section 26(2)(a) to read “it is likely to be relevant” (instead of “it might be”). (The same applies to section 23(3) and section 26(4)).

14. Section 27: this provides a blanket defence to the prohibition on disclosing information, and given the wideness of the obligation to share information in section 26 might be seen as going too far. For example, there are prohibitions in section 182 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 on any person publishing information that can identify a child (or his or her school) if the information concerns any children’s hearing or associated court process; there are similar prohibitions in relation to the court process for exclusion orders being created in the Bill under Schedule 4 para (3). While sharing information amongst service providers might not usually amount to “publishing” the information, the strength of the defence created significantly weakens the prohibition recently enacted in the 2011 Act (and extended to exclusion orders in the present Bill).
15. Section 31(5): in deciding whether a child needs a child’s plan, the views of the child need to be taken into account. This seems to me to be in the wrong place. The determination of whether a children’s plan is necessary is a professional judgment over which the views of the child can have little real effect. The contents of the plan and its implications are where a child’s views need to be heard (as indeed is required in section 33(6) and section 37(2)).

16. Section 51: Corporate parenting is to apply to young people up until the age of 26. So too is section 29 of the 1995 Act extended to 26. This is good (and especially so in relation to the aftercare provisions in section 29 of the 1995 Act). The draft bill that was earlier consulted upon set the age at 25 (to reflect, I think, the alimentary obligations of parents, which can last until 25). I am unclear why (but support) the added year, though to keep the law consistent the alimentary age might also be raised from 25 to 26 – bearing in mind the increased number of young people who stay with their parents as compared with 1985 (when the alimentary age was laid down).

17. Section 52: These duties read like general duties applicable to looked after children as a class. It would be better, in my view, if it were made clear that the duties are owed to each individual looked after child. Instead of saying “the wellbeing of children and young people” in para (a) it should read “the wellbeing of each child and young person”. Similarly in (for example) para (c) it should read “to promote the interests of each child and young person to whom this Part applies”, etc.

18. Section 73: this adds to the existing provisions in that part of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 that deals with local authority duties towards children in their areas. It introduces a new concept into the law: “wellbeing”. This is to be compared with the existing concept that has appeared very commonly in our legislation since the Guardianship of Infants Act 1925: the “welfare” of the child. At first glance, the concept of “wellbeing” is little different from “welfare” as it presently appears, for example, in sections 11(7) and 16(1) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, sections 14(3) and 84(4) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007, and section 25 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. If the intent is that the meaning of “wellbeing” is to be the same as the meaning of “welfare”, then it would normally be better that the same word is to be used, because courts assume that Parliament means the same thing when it uses the same words and means different things when it uses different words. Section 25 of the 2011 Act talks of the paramountcy of the need to safeguard and promote the child’s welfare; section 74 of the Bill talks of the child’s “wellbeing” being promoted or safeguarded. So there are clear similarities in intent. Nevertheless, it seems to me that the two concepts are different and that it is therefore appropriate to use the two different words. The “welfare” test applies in the various pieces of legislation mentioned above when the state is interfering in family life: it is compulsorily stepping in and imposing an order over the child which is (usually) opposed by the parent. This is a big step and needs to be proportionate. In the case of permanent removal of the child such as by adoption then “welfare” takes on the tone of an imperative (said the Supreme Court in S v N, a Scottish decision last year). But the Bill, and especially the “wellbeing” provisions, is not about compulsory intervention but about seeking to avoid the need for compulsory intervention. It is about ensuring that the child’s wellbeing is protected and enhanced to such an extent – by processes that do not interfere with family life and which do not require a legal order over the child – that the child’s welfare is not so compromised that compulsory intervention becomes required. We may talk about “early intervention”, but it is not early compulsion. So in my view it is helpful for the legislation to choose a different word from “welfare” to describe the processes that the Bill is establishing. The state needs to enhance all children’s wellbeing by statutory means that will nearly always be co-operative with parents; and the state needs to step in to protect children’s welfare when co-operation is not enough and compulsion is required. The distinction in terminology is, in my view, helpful.

19. Section 65(1): “Kinship care orders” are defined to be one of two orders, either (a) an order giving “qualifying persons” (as defined in s.65(2)) the right to have the child living with them or to determine the child’s residence or (b) “a residence order” the effect of which is that the child is to live with a qualifying person. The distinction between (a) and (b) is not immediately obvious (because (a) will usually be contained within (b)), but seems to be that (a) concerns a right held by the qualifying person while (b) refers to the fact of residence regulated by a residence order that does not confer a “right”. In any case “residence order” is not defined. Under the 1995 Act a residence order is defined as an order made under s.11(2)(c), so that reference could usefully be added into the Bill’s section 65(1)(b), to reflect the reference to s.11(1) in section 65(1)(a).

20. Section 65(3): Neither “parent” nor “guardian” is defined in the Bill (other than ss.30 and 63 which do not apply to part 10). Neither of these words is without ambiguity and they should both follow the definitions contained in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 (as section 30 defines “parent” for the purposes of Part 4 and section 63 does for Part 9).

21. Section 65(4): I am disconcerted that a draftsman today would include a reference to marriage without also including a reference to civil partnership. (Almost certainly an oversight, but a disturbing one in this day and age).

22. Section 68: To put Scotland’s Adoption Register on a statutory basis is a very good idea, but there is some dreadful language used. In the new section 13A(2)(a)(i) there is a reference to children who “ought” to be adopted. This is an entirely inappropriate way of putting it: no child in Scotland “ought” to be adopted. Rather, a child might be described as being “suitable for adoption”, or (following s.13D(2)(a)(iii)) as a “child who is appropriate for adoption”. Far less is it for any government to make the judgment – as s.13C(1)(a) requires – that any child or class of child “ought” to be placed for adoption. And the language of “type” of child in s.13C(2)(a) is not appropriate either.

in the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. There is however a problem with title to appeal. The right of appeal in the 2011 Act vests in the child and “any relevant person” and a HUGE issue in the 2011 Act is how “relevant person” is defined: the 2011 Act definition is very different from its predecessor in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 and includes a new “deeming” procedure. Section 71 of the Bill gives title to appeal to the child and “a relevant person”, and the new s.44A(6) gives a definition of “relevant person”. I consider it highly unfortunate and needlessly complicated to give here a different definition of the person who can appeal against a decision to detain a child in secure accommodation from the definition used throughout the 2011 Act: it is made especially complicated by the use of the same phrase “relevant person” to identify who has title. Secondary legislation under the 2011 Act has already amended the 2011 definition of “relevant person” and Scottish Ministers have the power to do so again. To avoid unnecessary complexities title to appeal a secure accommodation decision ought to be the same irrespective of the Act under which the decision is made. Unless the definition of “relevant person” in section 44A(6) is amended, then a parent, who is now within the definition in s. 200 of the 2011 Act, and will not therefore be “deemed” to be a relevant person, may be excluded from s.44A for no rational reason – a parent without parental responsibilities (the unmarried father of a child born before the coming into force of the Family Law (Scotland) Act 2006) will be able to appeal his child’s detention under the 2011 Act but will not have title to appeal his detention under this new s.44A. So I suggest the new section 46A(6) defining who has title to appeal, as it appears in s.71 of the Bill, should be explicitly tied to the definition of the same phrase in the 2011 Act and read as follows:

(a) a relevant person as defined in section 200 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011; and

(b) any person who is deemed to be a relevant person in relation to the child by virtue of section 81(3), 160(4)(b) or 164(6) of the Children’s

Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 or Rule 55 of the Children’s Hearings

Rules 2013”.

24. Even if this is not accepted, the reference to the 2013 Rules should be added to the new s.44A.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

North Ayrshire Council

1. It will be important to recognise that the key drivers for children’s rights are cultural and attitudinal. Although legislation will support this, there is a broader agenda of promoting children’s rights and providing genuine opportunities for having their individual and collective voices heard in all decisions which affect them.

2. While welcoming the focus on children’s rights we require greater clarity on what is meant by ‘give better or further effect to children’s rights’. This duty appears to be a duty to report on steps taken rather than a verification that policies are compliant with UNCRC or that they are having an impact on the lives of children. A three year timeframe to ensure that authorities are implementing UNCRC in full would give a sharper focus.

3. There is already a range of scrutiny and audit activities in place ie Children’s Services Inspections, Audit Scotland CPP Audits, which could be used to provide a picture of how authorities are progressing. We do not believe that an additional reporting mechanism is required.

Part 2 – Investigation by the Commissioner

4. While we welcome the ability of the Commissioner to undertake general or individual investigations and note that this would only be if it did not duplicate work that is the function of another person, this is in the context of an already crowded and confusing landscape. The ASN Act (Scotland) 2004 Revised 2009, offers parents and young people opportunities to challenge providers about their education, care and welfare and includes dispute resolution, mediation as well as the ASN Tribunal. The Children’s Hearing System in Scotland offers children and families the opportunity to have their voice heard within that context and legally binding decisions can be made that will ensure effective provision is implemented. Local authorities also have well established complaints procedures which are available to parents, children and young people. It may have been helpful to consider how a single protection of rights based on GIRFEC could ease some of the complexities inherent in the current system rather than adding to them.

Part 3 – Children’s Services Planning

5. We support the requirement, the aims and the process indicated for the Children’s Services Plan. However, in section 13, we believe that the primary aim should be to focus on the outcomes for children and young people.

6. In relation to guidance in Children’s Services Planning, it would be important to ensure that there are long term evaluations rather than reportable short term proxy measures which may divert attention from the long term aims of the legislation. We have significant concerns around section 17 and the default powers of the Scottish Ministers. This appears to be focussed on the role of Scottish Ministers to change structures and to direct resources rather than a consultative and mediation role where they feel that Councils and Health Boards are not achieving the outcomes required for children.

7. We believe this has significant implications for local government which were no clear in the consultation process. We understand that this legislation would give Scottish Ministers the power to intervene in local government and health service functions without further primary legislation. We believe this would be fully discussed with the relevant stakeholders and welcome the government’s decision to undertake specific consultation on this aspect of the Bill.

Part 4 – Provision of Named Person

8. We agree with the named person function as defined, however, we believe that this should be for the service to identify an appropriate person with appropriate qualifications and not to be directed by the Scottish Ministers as outlined in 58, subsection 2 and 3. However in the majority of circumstances a named person would be an education professional. The duty for them would be to be aware of risks, assess needs and identify concerns as well as co-ordinate and seek the views of others, plan and record are significant. The core function of education professionals is to teach children and while the profession recognises their responsibilities to provide pastoral support and ensure that within this proposed legislative framework children’s well-being is paramount, issues of capacity to undertake the role and responsibility of the named person remain.

9. In relation to pre-school children, it would seem more appropriate that where children are taking up their entitlement to early education and care provision, which will increase, that this service should provide the named person for children aged three years and over. This makes more sense as over 90% of children take up their full entitlement and are seen on a daily basis by professional staff. Where this is not the case it would be appropriate for the named person to remain the Health Visitor.

10. We are concerned that in terms of allocating a named person, despite the fact that the Bill is quite clear that the named person function cannot be carried out by the parent of the child or young person, that the Bill remains silent on who the named person for children educated at home may be. It would be helpful to have clear direction for this.

11. We particularly welcome the duty to help the named person placed on a wider range of organisations.

Part 5 Child’s Plan

12. We fully support the development of a Child’s Plan where a wellbeing need has been identified. We recognise that paragraph 83, sub section 1, it is important that the Child’s Plan includes a statement of the child’s wellbeing and that the targeted intervention which requires to be provided in relation to the child to address the wellbeing need. It will be important that the guidance recognises and supports this straightforward and practical approach to the development of a Child’s Plan and they do not become too bureaucratic or onerous. Our concerns remain that the opportunity has not been taken to appropriately simplify planning in relation to the additional support for learning legislation and care planning.

Part 6 – Early Learning and Childcare

13. We welcome the extension of universal early education and care provision. We would wish to see greater flexibility in how this is delivered but believe that the parameters of a minimum of 2.5 hours and a maximum of 8 hours are appropriate. While greater flexibility and choice may be able to be delivered in the large urban areas with large private sector providers this could be challenging in rural areas or areas where partner nurseries are mainly in the voluntary sector. Many local enterprise and voluntary early years providers have ceased trading over the last year which means that local authorities are picking up greater costs for this.

14. Concern has also been expressed by private sector providers regarding the loss of income from top up payments made by parents. This may impact on costs to local authorities.

15. A key issue will be increasing the provision whilst maintaining the quality.

Part 7 – Corporate Parenting

16. We support the clarification of the concept of corporate parenting. It is helpful that this is more directly specified and the authorities to which it applies identified clearly. It is also important that these groups are planning together to ensure that all services are focussed on the wellbeing of these children who are our responsibility. However, it is a concern that yet another plan is required for this and there should be greater emphasis on this being an integrated part of the Children’s Services Plan.

Part 10 – Support for Kinship Care

17. 64 (2) The Bill specifies “kinship care assistance” as a duty upon local authorities to make available for those who are deemed eligible.

18. “Kinship care assistance” is noted as being:-

- Counselling, advice or information
- Financial support – or support in kind

19. Currently North Ayrshire Council do make provision under the areas above for those who are eligible under our kinship care arrangements and indeed have extended our provision as the need has increased.

20. However, the Bill also indicates:-

- The provision of any service provided by the local authority on a subsidised basis
21. This would appear to suggest that any and indeed every service provided by the local authority is to be provided on a subsidised basis. Further clarity is required in relation to this.

22. In terms of who would constitute an “eligible child” currently North Ayrshire Council would deem this as a child whose situation has been highlighted to Social Services and that a kinship placement has been sought as an alternative to either residential or foster care. Therefore Social Services have been involved in the making of the kinship care placement and the carers have been vetted to indicate their suitability for the task in terms of for example, medical and disclosure checks.

23. The current wording within the Bill does not specify what is meant by an “eligible child” and notes that it is a “child who is of such description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.” Therefore this area of eligibility is not exactly clear and may be wider than our current policy and procedures.

24. The Bill specifies that as well as a Residence Order there will be a “Kinship Care Order”. There has been a great deal of discussion in relation to the Kinship Care Order as it is not clear as to when the Kinship Care Order should be applied for as opposed to the Residence Order. Both Orders appear to give the qualifying person the right to regulate the child’s residence or to have the child predominately with the qualifying person.

25. The new Kinship Care Order will cover both formal and informal kinship arrangements.

26. Currently only formal kinship care arrangements which are an alternative to residential or foster care, are supported via the local authority. The Bill now indicates that a kinship care order can be applied for by those within informal kinship care arrangements where there has been no or limited intervention by Social Services.

27. This would then increase the numbers of those requesting support including financial support from the local authority in relation to Kinship Care.

28. Additional assistance within the new Kinship Care Order is noted as being:

- A start up grant of £500
- Counselling support – which will be referred to in the next section
- Transitional support for a period of 3 years. Given the situation in terms of poverty and deprivation within North Ayrshire as well as the implications of Welfare Reform, many families will not be able to manage if financial support is only provided over a three year period. Therefore would current kinship carers wish to apply for this new order.
- Assistance with essential transport
• Assistance with kinship care order petition – which could be financial. The costs of supporting carers to apply for the new order, for example, legal costs, could also be substantial. If however carers will only receive a start up grant and thereafter no other payments from the Local Authority then again, it is felt that very few current kinship carers will apply for this new order.

29. However, given that currently we do not provide support to informal kinship carers, we may see an increase in the numbers of informal carers who will apply for the new Order as this will give them access to support mechanisms they currently have not had access to.

30. The Bill also specifies a general "qualifying test, linked to current or projected risk that a child may need to become formally looked after which would apply only once with periodic reviews. It is felt that further information requires to be provided in relation to this “at risk” test.

61 – 67 Counselling Services

31. It is noted that a duty is to be placed on local authorities to assess children who are at risk of coming into care or who are already on a “relevant order” for access to counselling services such as family mediation or family group conferencing support. However there is no details in relation to what such a “relevant order” would be.

32. While it is fully appreciated that early intervention and prevention are crucial and that such input before critical situations arise can prevent children being looked after, there is concern in relation to the lack of clarity in terms of counselling, for example, such as costs for the local authority, staff training, and “eligible child”.

33. 65 (2) In terms of the “qualifying person” the criteria is that of:-

34. Is related to the child

35. Is a friend or acquaintance of a person related to the child

36. There is concern in relation to these definitions as currently in terms of a “qualifying person” the criteria relates to a person who has a significant existing relationship with that child and that is considered in the first instance.

37. However in terms of the proposals under the Bill there does not appear to be any mention of any “existing relationship” but that the child could be cared for by an “acquaintance” who is termed as someone who is “known slightly to the relative, where the relationship does not necessarily have the same depth or intimacy as a friendship, for example, a neighbour.”

38. Such criteria causes a great deal of concern and is not felt to be in the best interests of any child and it is felt that that the Bill requires to re-inset that the “qualifying person” is required to have a significant existing relationship with the child regardless of whether they are related or known to the child or not and that they are required to meet certain criteria, such as satisfactory Disclosure and Medical checks.
66 Kinship care assistance – further provision

39. Within this section – ie 66 (3) and (4) there is a list of areas where Scottish Ministers may make further provision, for example, in relation to when and how kinship care assistance is to be provided, whether a child is an eligible child, when and how the local authority is to review whether a child continues to be an eligible child and any other matters in relation to the provision of kinship assistance.

40. While it is appreciated that this does allow for further provision to be considered and added at a later date if felt to be appropriate, it would appear that there are a number of areas where there could be a number of additions or alterations which could have implications for local authorities, for example in relation to:-

- Children who are eligible
- Reviews of eligibility criteria
- Details of kinship care assistance

41. In relation to the above concern has also been expressed in the amount of aspects of the Bill which remain to be defined in secondary legislation and again these could have implications for local authorities, such as financial, staffing and services, which are therefore unknown and cannot be taken into account in terms of service planning.

North Ayrshire Council
Introduction

1. We welcome the opportunity to submit written evidence on the Bill and would wish to state our support for the objectives and principles of the Bill. We will draw attention to a number of concerns regarding some of the potential implications of its implementation.

2. Given the current levels of deprivation as evidenced by NLC’s position in the Scottish Index of Multiple Deprivation, significant investment will continue to be required to counter the impact of the prevailing economic downturn, including the implications of Welfare Reform. The needs of communities are growing and significant investment in this priority area would potentially improve long term employability and community regeneration across our most vulnerable communities.

3. Our response is informed by our experience of implementing GIRFEC in the Lanarkshire area. Following the Highland Pathfinder Project, Lanarkshire became the first ‘Getting It Right for Every Child’ (GIRFEC) learning partners in June 2008.

4. The two Councils, along with partner agencies have fully embedded GIRFEC into our culture, processes and practice. We will refer to our learning at various points in our submission.

Rights of Children

5. As a Council, we are already taking positive steps to embed the rights of children and young people in line with UNCRC, and the development and launch in October 2012 of our Getting it Right for Every Child practice guidance supports the cultural and system change required to implement practice change.

Children’s Services Planning

6. We are concerned about the proposed powers in the Bill, particularly around Section 17, which would allow Scottish Ministers to direct Local Authorities where they may be dissatisfied with the joint planning arrangements between a Local Authority and the NHS.

7. This proposal raises concerns regarding a potential shift from local to central government, governance and accountability. We believe that this would be a threat to our vision of being proactive and responsive to resolving local needs and issues for our children and families through our local multi agency partnerships.

8. We have a long established multi agency planning structure for children’s services. Our GIRFEC arrangements have allowed more defined common pathways and local decision making structures which allow children to get help when they need it. This is evidenced in our past external inspections of children’s services in North Lanarkshire.

9. We would welcome further discussion on this aspect of the Bill.
Provision of Named Person

10. We anticipate that further guidance on the role and function of the named person will be provided. Early indications are that the NHS will take responsibility for all pre-school children with Education holding lead responsibility for all children of school age. This is currently the case within North Lanarkshire and as previously outlined, as one of four learning partners we have developed and launched our GIRFEC practice guidance for the implementation of the named person’s role within Health and Education. This role has been fully embraced by all practitioners and managers alike. Within the independent review it was highlighted that cultural change has made the most significant difference to the implementation of the principles. The GIRFEC practice model and core components improved understanding, co-operation and joint working across professional boundaries.

11. To summarise it has been the hearts and minds of the professionals involved within children services in Lanarkshire that has made the difference to implementing the principles of GIRFEC and the well being indicators. It is difficult to see what added value legislation will bring to the changes that have been already been made within North Lanarkshire.

12. The Children (Scotland) Act 1995 outlines the responsibilities of parents and carers and the rights that come from this undertaking, in particular, the responsibility as a parent to look after their child’s health, development and welfare. The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) which influences the principles of the Bill are specific under Article 5 that Governments should respect the rights and responsibilities of families to direct and guide their children so that, as they grow, they learn to use their rights properly. To strengthen this principle Article 5 encourages parents to deal with rights issues "in a manner consistent with the evolving capacities of the child". The Convention does not take responsibility for children away from their parents and give more authority to Governments. Adopting a universal approach for every child within Scotland to have a named person should be carefully considered and requires to recognise Article 5. Within North Lanarkshire, when implementing the named person, consideration of this matter has been taken and the focus continues to be on encouraging and supporting all parents to deal with aspects of their child’s well-being.

Child’s Plan

13. In respect of Section 37 regarding the child’s plan and the plan management, we hold the view that secondary legislation needs to be introduced to ensure that there is harmony between planning in respect of the Child’s Plan and planning requirements for children and young people with additional support needs as required by the Additional Support for Learning legislation. Clarity in this area would be welcomed. Subsection 5 of the Bill makes provision to allow Scottish Ministers to make further orders regarding the management of the plan. It would be helpful to have further provisions in relation to, for instance, the transfer of the plan between authorities.
North Lanarkshire Council’s aspiration is to deliver the highest quality services to our preschool children and their families. In the context of the Early Years Collaborative, we will be required to take a holistic approach to the delivery of services.

The Council has estimated that to deliver the 600 hours and the required level of flexibility could potentially cost up to £4.7 million. Whilst the Scottish Government has provided Scotland-wide indicative funding, clarification is required on individual authority allocations. There is a sense of urgency in relation to this, to allow planning and implementation for the commencement of enhanced services by August 2014.

There continue to be challenges that will impact on staffing, accommodation and partnership contracts to enable 600 hours to be delivered including:

- Staffing- additional recruitment and training to maintain and improve standards
- Accommodation- in light of the ongoing work on the Early Years collaborative, the Council will be required to invest further in providing facilities and accommodation that will meet the needs of 21st century early learning and childcare. Clarity is required in relation to the availability of capital resources
- Partnerships- the nature of delivery of early years services in this authority is characterised by multiagency working. The continued success of this approach will depend upon clarity of resources, including funding, that will be available to the partnership.

The proposal within the Bill, to provide early years placement for all looked after two year olds (including those in kinship care arrangements) will inevitably impact on places required and available. This in turn will impact on availability of provision for other vulnerable groups.

Aftercare

In principle, we agree with the requirements to support young care leavers up until the age of 25 but remain concerned about the funding for this. We recognise that the Scottish Government have estimated a national funding requirement of £3.87m in 2015/16, £4.03m in 2016/17, £4.03m in 2017/18 and £1.77m in both 2018/19 and 2019/20. If proposed changes to Section 29 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 extends the right for a young person to remain with a supported carer until the age of 25 this will incur an additional cost of £55,723 per placement. Some of these young people will be eligible for Section 29 payments if attending further/higher education courses prior to their 21st birthday.

Counselling Services

Part 9 of the Bill, makes provision for counselling services but there is no definition of ‘eligible child’. This should be central to the obligation to provide services so the definition of this should not be left to secondary legislation. As outlined in the Bill, Local Authorities are to provide undefined counselling services to parents or those with parental rights and responsibilities of an undefined group of children. It is difficult to comment on the potential impact of this on the Council. The Bill also makes reference to specific types of counselling support but this is not all encompassing considering the range of difficulties children and their parents encounter and some of the counselling that may be required are of a more specialist nature and are provided by Health. Given the undefined nature of this responsibility it is difficult to determine its potential impact.

Support for Kinship Care

20. With reference to kinship care, the Scottish Government estimates a cost of £2.6m across Scotland for implementation costs with no recurring costs. In considering the potential cost to North Lanarkshire we currently have 295 kinship carers who have been assessed, the majority of whom receive allowances. It is currently unknown how many informal kinship arrangements are in place within the area. It is therefore difficult to predict the additional demand that the proposed kinship order will create. Currently we pay 50% of the fostering rate to kinship carers, this is approved after an assessment is agreed by the Kinship Care Panel. Within North Lanarkshire it would be reasonable to predict a significant increase in the demand for payments considering that the balance of care for children being cared for by extended family members, many of whom will currently not be known to Social Work Services.

21. Section 65 outlines what a kinship care order is. This section deems that any residence order granted in favour of a qualifying person or any order under Section 11 (1) of the ‘95 Act giving the right to dictate residence to a qualifying person, is deemed to be a 'kinship care order'. Qualifying person is defined in Section 65 (2) but further clarity is required on the definition of ‘related’. It is proposed that the interpretation is one similar to the definition of 'relative' in Section 119 of the 2007 act. There needs to be some requirement for assessment by the Local Authority and discretion on the Local Authority as who should be able to gain assistance from them. This is also being left to secondary legislation.

22. The Bill suggests that once carers have applied for the order and receive a start up grant then they would no longer be in receipt of payment from the Local Authority. To date this has not been our experience as through our Kinship Care Panel- a multi-agency decision making forum- consideration is given to a wide range of supports for kinship carers which include one off payments/start up costs. Many carers seek or go onto require regular payments from the Council. It is difficult to estimate or predict how many kinship carers would apply for the new order. Moreover, without a definition of support within the Bill the assumption being made is that this does not always have to include financial assistance which could be challenged by carers.

23. The cost of supporting carers to apply for the new order is unknown. Based on work that has already taken place within North Lanarkshire comparing this to costs to support Adoption orders, there would be a considerable cost for the Local Authority. On these costings, we have estimated that the cost of seven new orders per year to be approximately £28,000. Again this is a very conservative estimate and may not mirror the true demand that currently is being managed within children’s extended family networks by “informal” kinship carers.

24. Section 64 makes it an absolute obligation that kinship care assistance is made available by the Local Authority but again there is no definition of the term “kinship care assistance”. In the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007, there was some attempt to define certain terms for instance ‘adoption support service’ and the same should reasonably apply here.

25. Section 66(3) and (4) allow Scottish Ministers to make further provision about a number of matters including how or when kinship care assistance is to be provided, when a child is eligible etc. It is arguable that these issues are too important to leave to secondary legislation but the financial memorandum suggests that there will be a qualifying test which will be linked to the current or projected risk that a child may need to become formally looked after. More guidance on this will be required. It may cause confusion or become a point of contention for kinship carers if this is determined by their capacity to manage any current or future risk for the child, as not every kinship carer applying for a Section 11 order will therefore be eligible for assistance.

26. We remain extremely concerned about the potential financial, staffing and other resource implications of this part of the Bill on the Authority.

Summary

27. We understand the vision of the Scottish Government to implement the objectives and principles of the new Bill consistently throughout Scotland. The Bill will assist in reinforcing the existing strong partnerships and joint planning arrangements through the children services structures that already exist in the North Lanarkshire area. These are key to the strategic and operational delivery arrangements to improve outcomes for children and families and as such much progress has been already been made in implementing the proposals contained within the Bill concerning the named person, kinship and corporate parenting. We remain concerned about a number of aspects of the Bill and in particular issues around governance, (in particular the stronger focus on centralisation as opposed to local delivery) our ability to meet funding requirements and that much of the detail is being left to secondary legislation.

28. We would welcome the opportunity to provide oral evidence to the Committee.

North Lanarkshire Council
12 August 2013
North Lanarkshire Council Psychological Service

1. North Lanarkshire Psychological Service welcomes the opportunity to contribute to this consultation. We endorse the ASPEP response but wish to add comments from the perspective of a local authority psychological service and to include comments not contained in their response. The ASPEP response highlights the key role and significant contribution that educational psychologists make to many aspects of the delivery of services to children, young people, their families and the other staff supporting them. We share the concern expressed about capacity of educational psychology services to meet these demands and expectations: our establishment has and will be further reduced. Also, we have major concerns because the training of educational psychologists has been compromised and these changes have significant implications for the future of the service and the profession as a whole.

Part 1

2. With ASPEP, we support the commitment to the rights of children and young people. We agree with their concern about the extent of incorporation of UNCRC into this legislation and the lack of detail about issues regarding poor or non-compliance.

Part 2

3. It is difficult to determine what criteria would be used for a referral to the Commissioner and how this involvement fits the activities of other national investigating bodies.

4. We have concern that this new power carries the risk of encouraging and solidifying an adversarial approach. For example this has been the experience of psychologists involved in some ASN Tribunals.

Part 3

5. In North Lanarkshire, integrated planning is in place, with psychologists integral to this process. For example, members of the Service have developed a Resilience Framework and Assessment and Planning tool which will be routinely used across the authority.

6. Well-being is a more aspirational, positive, proactive and useful concept in terms of Getting It Right For Every Child. By comparison, welfare is perceived more negatively and narrowly, focusing on ‘problems’ and on child protection and the benefits system.

7. We suggest that the rights of children and young people should be more explicit in Children’s Services planning.

8. We welcome the requirement to report to Scottish ministers on councils’ promotion of children’s rights.

Part 4 – Named Person

9. In addition to the points raised by ASPEP, we wish to pose the following:

10. Public Health Nurses (PHN) may not always be in the best position to act as named person if there are no significant health needs and child attends a nursery establishment.
The manager of an early years establishment would be a more appropriate named person as the functions of the role are already being undertaken by nursery heads.

11. If children attend primary school at 4½ years old, who is the named person when those children are in school? It is suggested that school management is in a better position to fulfil this role.

12. Who will ensure that all PHNs are fully aware of their duties as a Named Person?

13. In North Lanarkshire, in the current ‘birth to three’ process, the Senior Educational Psychologist has the role of named person when putting together the holistic assessment. Is an implication of the Bill that this 0-3 process should be taken over by the PHN, given the definition of Named Person?

14. The ASPEP response covers all points.

15. There is a need for considerable integration between the various legislative frameworks and non-statutory plans (as mentioned in SPICe briefing document, page14).

16. The integration of multi-agency planning and intervention is dependent on the development of children’s service within the local authority context and should be directed towards achieving systems which do not necessitate additional layers of planning.

Part 6 – Early Learning and Childcare

17. The increased emphasis on the needs of 2 year olds is welcomed but nursery placements should not be regarded as the most appropriate intervention for all children. There is a need to adopt a more flexible approach in meeting the needs of families and children.

18. A change perception of nursery is suggested, with a move toward a proactive learning environment to support and build on parenting skills and involvement.

19. We support the idea of ‘stay and play’ where nurseries offer a session for parents and their child(ren) to attend stay and play in the establishment, as a way of helping parents develop their own skills.

Part 7 – Corporate Parenting

20. There should be a differentiation of the roles and responsibilities of the bodies listed in schedule 3, detailing the enhanced corporate parenting duties of e.g. local authorities.

Part 8 – Aftercare

21. Clarification is required on how aftercare is requested and by whom. Would more direct responsibility of the Named Person help with this?

22. Aftercare is only available and applies to young people who are ‘looked after’ when they turn 16. Clarity is required on what is meant by ‘looked after’ in this context.

23. What provisions are in place to ensure young people are still eligible for Aftercare, given requirement is based on need rather than age?
Part 9 – Duty to Some

24. How is ‘intensive family therapy’ defined? Will this be left to authorities to interpret? If this is the case, it has to be acknowledged that the range of counselling provision is likely to vary greatly across Scotland.

25. If ‘level of risk’ is the principal tool used to assign intensive family therapy, will practitioners still have the opportunity, without fear of prosecution, to identify when families are/are not ‘counselling ready’ and suggest an alternative to intensive family therapy?

Part 10 – Kinship

26. This Service agrees with the widening of support to kinship carers to improve outcomes and decrease chances of number of looked after placements for young people.

Section 11 – Adoption Register

27. The register could offer a more consistent approach and the access to national information could benefit the permanence of children and young people.

28. However, what would be the statutory duty regarding information required for each child’s entry?

1. The North of Scotland Planning Group (NoSPG) is a collaboration of six NHS Boards – NHS Grampian, NHS Highland, NHS Orkney, NHS Shetland, NHS Tayside and NHS Western Isles. It has a role in supporting collaborative working between Health Boards where this adds value to patient care.

2. The North of Scotland Child Health Clinical Planning Group has been mandated by NoSPG to develop a regional model for planning the delivery of children’s services as locally as possible, where it is safe and sustainable to do so.

3. A recent review of the sustainability of paediatric services in the north of Scotland has recommended that Health Boards co-operate by developing a common template for their Child Health Strategy.

4. In Scotland there are 32 Local Authorities and 14 Territorial Health Boards. Within each Health Board area there may be a number of local authorities and particularly in more remote and rural areas not all children’s services will be available locally.

5. The North of Scotland Planning Group strongly supports the need for Local Authorities and Health Boards to work closely together in all areas of Children’s Services Planning (Part 3 of bill).

6. Within health services for children in the north of Scotland, there is an acknowledgement that for some services, planning and sustaining these services requires cooperation between Health Boards. The same is likely to be true for Local Authorities and we would recommend that where there is interdependence between Local Authorities and between Health Boards for the provision of children’s services, particularly in remote and rural areas, that this should be an obligation on these organisations to collaborate in Children’s Service Planning.

7. We would like to thank you for the opportunity to respond to this bill.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

NSPCC Scotland

Introduction

1. NSPCC Scotland welcomes the opportunity to respond to the Committee’s call for evidence to inform Stage One of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. We fully support the commendable aspirations of the Bill, particularly those around early intervention and prevention, and welcome efforts to entrench children’s rights in public service provision in Scotland. However, we believe that there are areas where the Bill could be strengthened in order to meet better the stated ambitions.

About NSPCC Scotland

2. The NSPCC aims to end cruelty to children. Our vision is of a society where all children are loved, valued and able to fulfill their potential. We are working with partners to introduce new child protection services to help some of the most vulnerable and at-risk children in Scotland. We are testing the very best intervention models from around the world, alongside our universal services such as ChildLine, the ChildLine Schools Service and our adult Helpline. Based on the learning from all of our services we seek to achieve cultural, social and political change – influencing legislation, policy, practice, attitudes and behaviours so that all children in Scotland have the best protection from cruelty.

NSPCC Scotland evidence

3. We welcome the Scottish Government’s stated intention to ensure that children’s rights underpin service design and delivery. However, we have concerns about the extent to which relevant provisions in the Bill will achieve this aim.

4. The proposed duty on Ministers “to keep under consideration” how to secure better effect of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) [s1(1)(a)] is a regression from the original ‘due regard’ duty proposed by the Scottish Government in the original consultation¹.

5. NSPCC Scotland joins Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People (SCCYP), Together and others in believing that full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law would be the most effective mechanism for fulfilling the Scottish Government’s commitment to ‘make rights real’ for all children in Scotland. Full incorporation would embed children’s rights into the planning, implementation and monitoring of all policies and services, and would provide comprehensive accountability mechanisms including legal redress for children and young people.

6. Although we are committed to achieving full incorporation of the UNCRC, at the very least the proposed duty on Scottish Ministers should be reworded to strengthen the obligation. The Bill should require that Ministers ‘act compatibly’ with the UNCRC, or give ‘due regard’ to the UNCRC, as was initially proposed. Similarly, the duty on public bodies is insufficient (s2). As currently worded, public bodies are required to report on the steps they have taken to secure better effect of the UNCRC, but there is no direct legal duty for them to take such steps. For the purposes of legal clarity, it would be better if a direct duty on public bodies to act compatibly or have due regard featured on the face of the Bill. Again, this is notwithstanding our belief that full incorporation of the UNCRC would be the most effective mechanism.

7. We also support calls from SCCYP, Together and others for a Child Rights Impact Assessment to be undertaken. This would enable a systematic consideration of the impact of the Bill on children’s rights – the very principles it seeks to promote. This would help to highlight where provisions could be strengthened (e.g. the duty on Ministers and public bodies, as above) and where there may be potential negative impact (e.g. information sharing [ss25-27], discussed below).

8. The Bill and supporting documents make few, if any, connections with other pieces of legislation that will impact on children, young people and their families.

9. While the Bill seeks to create a framework for joint planning of children’s services, this will also be impacted by a number of legislative provisions. In particular, the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, currently being considered by the Health and Sport Committee, seeks to integrate adult health and social care, while allowing local partners discretion about whether to include children’s services in the new processes. Similarly, the recent Social Care (Self Directed Support) (Scotland) Act 2012\(^2\) and the planned Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill\(^3\) will also have implications for the planning and delivery of children’s services. It is unclear whether all of these developments have been considered in the round. There appears to have been little strategic thinking about the position of children’s services and we are concerned that this might lead to confusion and fragmentation.

10. The impact of this broader legislative landscape on children’s lived experiences must be a central consideration of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. It is arguable whether the disparate nature of the various pieces of legislation which

\(^2\) This Act aims to give services users greater choice and control over the support they receive. See http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Health/Support-Social-Care/Support/Self-Directed-Support/Bill

\(^3\) This Bill will seek to strengthen community participation and development. See http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/People/engage/cer affect children’s services suggests a lack of coherent vision for how the whole range of services meet the needs of children and young people in Scotland.

11. To gain a fuller picture of developments and enable a more thorough consideration of proposals, we suggest that the Education and Culture Committee considers holding a joint evidence session with the Health and Sport Committee to consider the interaction of relevant provisions contained in both the Children and Young People and the Public Bodies Bills, and their implications for services for children and families.

Part 4: Provision of Named Persons

12. NSPCC Scotland supports the intention behind the Named Person approach which, if clearly defined and properly resourced, could improve the likelihood of early intervention for children and young people; and thus improve their outcomes.

13. It is suggested that the Named Person should be the responsibility of the health board (Health Visitor) for children aged 0-5. However, the evidence is that the staff who work with infants and parents are stretched to the limit; concerns about excessive health visitor caseloads continue to be highlighted. Such resource constraints may affect the operation of the Named Person function in practice. While the Financial Memorandum which accompanies the Bill outlines a required investment of £16m in health visiting, this does not apply until 2016-17.

14. In addition, we would welcome more detail on the perceived parameters of the Named Person role, including the prescriptive nature of the role as an assigned key point of contact for children seeking support. We would also welcome clarity on how the Named Person function is intended to interact with the role of Lead Professional; the latter being a central feature of the GIRFEC approach which does not feature in the Bill. There is a great deal of uncertainty surrounding the nature of the Named Person function and how it is intended to operate in practice.

Information sharing

15. The Bill also proposes a new information sharing duty for service providers which would introduce a radical new change in the existing information sharing provision (ss25-27).

16. As currently drafted, information must be shared with the Named Person where it might be relevant to the exercise of their functions [s26(2)(a)]. As we understand it, this significantly lowers current accepted information-sharing thresholds. The proposed duty to share information is not linked to a ‘risk of harm’ but instead would appear to apply to anything considered relevant to promoting, supporting or safeguarding the wellbeing of the young person, as defined using SHANARRI indicators. On the face of the Bill, there are no proposals to link information-sharing requirements to consideration of the best interests of the child or young person, nor any consideration of their views, nor seeking their consent. The proposals do not offer a balance between children and young people’s rights and the need to share information.

17. Children and young people have a right to privacy and confidentiality under the UNCRC and the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). Confidentiality is of fundamental importance to children and young people. For example, in the year 2012/2013, volunteer counsellors at ChildLine conducted approximately 3,500 counselling interactions with children and young people where confidentiality was a key concern.

18. We are very concerned the information-sharing duty as it stands is too broadly drawn. Sharing information that is relevant and proportionate about children who are at risk of harm, is fundamental to keeping children safe. However, we are concerned that the current proposals do not achieve sufficient balance and so risk breaching children and young people’s rights and may deter them from accessing confidential services, potentially leaving them more at risk.

19. Quite apart from a lack of balance between the requirement to share information and the child’s right to privacy and involvement, there is also arguably a risk that the proposed new legislative framework on information sharing may lead to disproportionate sharing and subsequently to Named Persons gathering and/or struggling to assess increasing amounts of information about increasing numbers of children – not just those at risk. This may undermine the effective operation of the Named Person function and could result in information about children at risk of harm being lost in a deluge of inappropriate information.

20. In addition, the Scottish Government has not consulted on these proposals. It is vitally important that we ensure that the voices of children and young people are heard, listened to and respected throughout the Bill process.

21. Given the complexity of this issue, it is vital that the potential conflict between the information-sharing provisions in the Bill, and children and young people’s right to privacy and confidentiality, are given full and thorough consideration by the

7 Safe, Healthy, Achieving, Nurtured, Active, Respected, Responsible, Included.
Committee during Stage One. We would be keen to discuss this issue further with the Committee and would be happy to provide oral evidence if the Committee would find that helpful.

Part 6: Early learning and childcare

22. In addition to the universal extension of pre-school education for 3-5s, the Bill proposes an extension of early learning and childcare to looked-after two year olds. Child care services for looked after children require high-quality therapeutic input to set children on a healthy trajectory for life. However, our research indicates that there is a limited evidence-base on which approaches work effectively with attachment difficulties in looked after children.10

23. There is a relatively small number of looked-after two year olds in Scotland. It is not clear why the threshold of two years has been identified as the entry point for services as two years may be too late for children who have experienced significant trauma in their very earliest months and years. It is vital that an extension does not preclude babies and infants from accessing the therapeutic support they need.

24. In addition, the same arguments for additional priority for looked after two year olds may also be valid for other groups, such as children ‘in need’ [s22, Children (Scotland) Act 1995]. Therefore we would like to see consideration given to extending the duty, for example to all two year olds living in poverty. This would assist in meeting the Bill’s policy objective to “increase the universal provision of early learning and childcare to improve outcomes for children, in particular those from disadvantaged backgrounds; to support parents to work, provide economic security for their families and routes out of unemployment and poverty; and to support parents with the costs of early learning and childcare.”11

25. It is vital that child care services for looked-after children are flexible and responsive to the often considerable adversities experienced by this particularly vulnerable group and reflect this by providing high quality, therapeutic care which addresses the significant degree of distress so often experienced in their early lives.

Part 11: Adoption Register

26. NSPCC Scotland welcomes the Scottish Government’s emphasis on early intervention and the increasing focus on the importance of achieving early permanent care arrangements for maltreated children. However, the main aim of the national register is to improve process efficiency, defined in terms of timescales, whereas, in our view, the main source of delay relates to the detail of decision-making about permanence arrangements. The assumption that systems need to be more efficient rather than adapted are not uncommon among relevant stakeholders but efforts to improve efficiency alone, defined in these terms, have not yet been shown to lead to better outcomes for children in the care system, or improved services for birth families.

27. To inform and improve decision-making about permanence, we are piloting the New Orleans Intervention Model, in partnership with Glasgow City Council and NHS Greater Glasgow & Clyde, to provide tailored family support on the basis of assessments of attachment relationships, for children who have been maltreated.

28. It is vital that we balance the efficiency of decision making with the therapeutic and support needs of children, parents and carers. Together these measures can integrate more fully the reality of the child’s situation and can potentially lead to healthier outcomes in later life.

29. We hope that recommendations from the final report of the Committee’s inquiry into decision-making for looked after children will inform Members’ consideration of these provisions.

Additional comments

30. NSPCC Scotland believes that any initiative to protect and promote children’s rights must seek to provide children with the same protections as adults under the law against physical abuse. We believe the Children & Young People’s Bill presents a real opportunity for the Scottish Government to reconsider full legal protection for children from physical chastisement in the home, or any other setting. This would fulfil the recommendation made by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child\(^\text{12}\).

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Monica O’Connor

1. I am writing to protest at Part iv of the above Bill. It sounds like an unwarranted intrusion into family life. I am a foster carer in the Republic of Ireland and know what children can suffer and that sometimes the State has to step in when parents are unable to care for children. But this Bill is not the way to address parental failures.

Profound and Multiple Learning Disabilities

1. Persons described as having profound and multiple learning disabilities (PMLD) have one or more of the following disabilities:

2. A profound learning disability plus a physical disability that seriously limits their ability to undertake everyday tasks and usually restricts their mobility. The majority are therefore life-long wheelchair users. Sensory impairments are prevalent with vision and/or hearing affected. Their communication is typically non-verbal, though some will have very limited speech. However, all have the capacity to communicate in a variety of non-verbal ways.

3. Healthcare needs are extensive and complex and may be life threatening. Areas of particular difficulty relate to epilepsy, respiration, eating and drinking (dysphagia) and cerebral palsy. Some will also have challenging behaviour. All, however, have the capacity to benefit from good health care and are able in various ways to communicate their satisfaction or otherwise with their quality of life.

4. The causes of PMLD are many and varied. They include genetic disorders, acquired brain injury or brain damage as a result of infection. Causation may be ante-, peri- or post natal. For many there is no known causation. It is estimated that the prevalence of PMLD in the general population is 0.05 per 1,000. This figure is derived from a survey undertaken in Scotland and would lead to a figure of 2,600 people with PMLD in the country. This is possibly an underestimate and a useful working figure would be 3,000. These numbers will increase with better survival rates, not only in the neonatal period but into childhood and adulthood, due to advances in medical care.

PAMIS – Supporting people with PMLD and their families

5. PAMIS is a charity which supports people with PMLD and their families. We work in many areas of Scotland including Dundee, Fife, Tayside, Grampian, South Lanarkshire, and Greater Glasgow and Clyde. The following are some of main the issues for the children and young people with PMLD, and their families, whom PAMIS supports:

Co-ordinated working

6. There needs to be more joined up working between the health services, social and the voluntary organisations which support people with PMLD and their families – with the needs of the child always at the centre. Information about the needs of the child with PMLD has to be shared appropriately so that everyone providing support is aware of how best to do so. There are still services around which do not seem to consider the importance of staff continuity, and appropriately trained staff, when supporting someone with PMLD. Additional difficulties can arise when a child has PMLD plus a diagnosis of autism. There have also been issues around restraint, with question marks over the appropriateness of using restraint to ensure the safety of the person with PMLD, or the manner with which it has been done.

7. The benefits of early intervention for children with disabilities and particularly those with PMLD are well documented\(^1\)\(^2\)\(^3\). Whilst there are some examples of good practice in place throughout Scotland we still have a long way to go for this to be a reality for all children and young people with PMLD. Examples of good practice of early intervention policies and practice are: TAC Interconnections' Team around the Child initiatives, developed by Peter Limbrick – see http://www.teamaroundthechild.com/ and Scotland's Getting it Right For Every Child (GIRFEC) approach. In local authorities where these approaches are in place they are viewed as highly beneficial but they need to be implemented fully throughout Scotland.

8. There are a number of voluntary organisations that can offer support to families caring for a child with complex disabilities in the early years, however, it is very difficult to get information on such organisations to the families, due to the ‘gate keeping’ practices used by many pre-school services, particularly those that are run by or involve paediatric medical professionals. Once the families gain access to such support they have frequently expressed their concerns about the lack of transfer of information of such sources of help and support. We need more open and transparent referral systems and parents should be given the opportunity to make the decision whether or not to access these sources of help.

Education

9. The design principles of the Curriculum for Excellence are challenge and enjoyment, breadth, depth, progression, relevance, coherence, personalisation and choice for learners. These design features should underpin the development of all school curriculums but challenges to achieving this for children with PMLD within both special and mainstream schools remain. More training is required for teachers in the use of proactive support, in understanding the function of challenging behaviour in order to reduce the need for physical intervention. Better support for teachers in mainstream schools to enable them to deliver more personalised support for learning. There also needs to be an improved transition process that makes better use of the Co-ordinated Support Plan for individual children. Currently the information provided in the support plans is often not used to help design future support plans for children moving into adult services. Better use of information sharing at this crucial time should be encouraged and a process that allows meaningful use of this information needs to be part of the transition process. Ongoing training for teachers in communication and the use of multi-sensory techniques will ensure that the design principles of the Curriculum for Excellence are accessible to all pupils with PMLD.

Invasive Procedures

10. Many children and young people with PMLD have care needs which require invasive procedures - such as feeding by gastrostomy tube, suctioning, and the regular administration of oxygen. PAMIS is aware of at least one family whose child was not able to attend school because he/she required oxygen.

11. Example of Good Practice: A research study commissioned by the Scottish Government from PAMIS into current practice in the delivery of invasive procedures to people with PMLD led to the establishment of a Government Short Life Working Group to develop a Scottish quality framework for the delivery of invasive procedures. In addition, to the framework, a toolkit will be developed to support statutory and third sector organisations in all service settings.

Residential respite

12. There is clearly a shortage of appropriate residential respite services. These are vital to families caring for a child with PMLD who needs 24 hour care. Creative short breaks can be particularly difficult for these families due to a number of barriers eg staffing levels, appropriate accessible accommodation, appropriately trained staff able to support someone with invasive procedures such as gastrostomy feeding, rescue medication for epilepsy, and increased costs to meet these. We are also aware of situations where families with younger children have been discouraged from applying, or initially even turned down, for residential respite because of their child’s young age, when in fact the family – and the child – have gone on to benefit greatly from residential respite.

Postural Management

13. When caring for a person who uses a wheelchair, and who has limited physical movement throughout the day and night, good body posture needs to be maintained to avoid body distortions like scoliosis. Much can be done to avoid problems happening in the first place, but also to reduce or resolve problems if they have already started – but only if family carers are aware of what to look for and the best night-time (and day time) positioning for their relative. While physiotherapists are trained in postural management, family carers are not. The importance of families receiving this training cannot be over-emphasised, as postural damage to their relative can cause severe health problems, and even reduce their life expectancy.

Examples of good practice

14. PAMIS is a partner in the National Postural Care Action Group\(^4\) and have run a number of training courses for trainers and paid carers. Additionally a number of PAMIS family carers have undertaken the Postural Care Management Course, Level 1 and a member of staff and 2 physiotherapists have undertaken the full course and are accredited trainers and run courses across Grampian. PAMIS is now rolling out this programme in other areas and it is an excellent example of supporting people to self-manage long term conditions.

15. Moving and Handling for Family Carers: A Fife-wide interagency partnership including Fife Carers Centre and PAMIS, together with Moving and Handling trainers and professionals from Fife Council Social Work and NHS Fife, won the top award in the Health & Well-being in the community category of the Fife Partnership Excellence Awards 2012. This project is designed to deliver home-based moving and handling training for family carers. This ongoing work should be developed within other local authorities as a priority. This project group was also involved in updating A Carer’s Guide to Safer Moving and Handling.5

16. People with profound and multiple learning disabilities go through a number of transitions during their lifetime. Most problematic of these being the transitions from child to adult services and from the family home to supported living.

Transition from child to adult services

17. Moving from child to adult services is often described by family carers as ‘the black hole of transition’. During their school years all of the need of people with PMLD, that is education, social and health, are generally met. Regrettably, this is not always the case once they move to adult services. Planning is not started early enough. The Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 - Code of Practice (Scottish Government 2010) states that such planning should take place no later than 12 months before a child leaves education. Mansell (2010)6 notes that there is a marked reduction in the availability of services, eg speech and language therapy, short-breaks, home nursing etc. once the person leaves full time education. Recommendation 11 of the Scottish Government’s Response to the Doran Review (2012) acknowledges the need to consider the adequacy of existing legislation to ensure the transition from child to adult services for young people with complex support needs is properly coordinated, managed and delivered.

18. There is also a need for independent advice and support for families whose daughter/son with PMLD is going through this transition. The introduction of Self Directed Support (SDS), the impact of the current financial situation resulting in reduced care packages, and the fact that many local authorities are closing traditional day services is causing considerable concern to families. It is important that whatever day opportunities are on offer have a local base where the service users can have their personal and intimate care needs met safely and with dignity. Such a base enables the person to access activities in their local community while at the same time ensuring they also have available centre based activities such as multi-sensory storytelling, music and relaxation and most importantly, a place to rest.

19. PAMIS Future Choices Project: This project provides independent advice and support to the person with PMLD and their family through the process of transition from child to adult services. A Transition Planner and a Personal Communication Passport have been developed by PAMIS for each young person. These documents are person centred and record all their specific needs and aspirations. The project collates information from education, social work and social care staff who are involved in the transition process to enable new health and social care professionals to get to know the individual. The project provides support to the whole family before, during and after the transition process.

Transition and future planning – a case study:

20. During transition planning, it is extremely important to consider the assessment framework being used to determine future funding allocation. It is useful to ensure that any future planning tool includes a physical care pathway. Whatever person centred plan or outcomes focused assessment tool is used in planning future planning for children with PMLD, it is crucial that it includes appropriate consideration for the provision of specialist equipment to support functional movement.

21. PAMIS is aware of one young woman with PMLD approaching her final year at community school. She would like to attend college on leaving school and plans are underway to enable her to undertake a one day a week transition placement at the college. To ensure she gains maximum benefit from her transition year at college her future planning documents include a physical healthcare pathway that highlights the specialist equipment that she needs to enable her to maintain good physical health, and the support required to access that equipment.

22. At school this young woman currently requires to be supported by two Support for Learning Assistants for personal care and moving and handling to facilitate transfers to her standing frame, Samson chair or ladderback walking frame. She also has access to adaptive technology such as ‘Big Mack’ switches, switch adapted food mixer and touch screen monitor for PC. This equipment ensures that she has maximum opportunity to achieve both physical and intellectual access to appropriate learning opportunities. Including a physical care pathway in her outcomes-based planning process for transition means that the benefits this young women gains from using the equipment is recorded and the support she requires to access it is also recorded. The inclusion of the physical and intellectual benefits she gains from the use of this equipment is transparent. The recording of the support she requires to benefit from access to this equipment ensures that any future financial impact on adult service provision is also transparent. Including a detailed physical care pathway in transition planning documents that clearly identifies the benefits of the use of specialist equipment and the support required to access the equipment, will help ensure that someone with PMLD continues to benefit from physical and intellectual access to opportunities for further development entering adult services.

Introduction

1. Parenting across Scotland welcomes the Children and Young People’s Bill and its aspirations to make ‘Scotland to be the best place to grow up in’. The Scottish Government intends to make this ambition real ‘by putting children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services and ensuring their rights are respected across the public sector.’ However, we have some reservations about how effective the provisions of the Bill will be in achieving its objectives and believe that in order to accomplish transformational change for Scotland’s children and families the Bill needs to scale up its ambition.

2. For most of Scotland’s children, family remain the most important source of support and yet are barely mentioned throughout the Bill. The Government’s policy memorandum states that it will put ‘children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services’; in order, to ensure that children have the best start in life, we would suggest that their families should also be very much at the heart of this process. In the parts of the Bill which deal with vulnerable families, the role of family is acknowledged and respected, strengthening the role of kinship carers and corporate parents, (which is a welcome inclusion), while the role of the more general population of families is neither acknowledged nor supported.

3. Parenting across Scotland fully supports the full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scottish domestic law and endorses Together’s evidence to Committee. Currently, Scotland has signed up to the UNCRC and is bound by its obligations; incorporating the UNCRC would be a formal recognition of Scotland’s commitment to children’s rights. If Scotland is serious about becoming the best place in the world to grow up, then it needs to be a country with children’s rights at the heart of its legal framework.

4. As a parenting organisation, we are supportive of the UNCRC and its incorporation into Scottish law because we believe that the UNCRC encapsulates what parents want for their children, and because while it is a parent’s responsibility to ensure their child’s wellbeing, under the UNCRC the state has the responsibility to support them in this. The Scottish Government through its parenting strategy has already recognised the crucial role that parents play in bringing up Scotland’s children and the state’s role in supporting them; full incorporation is the logical next step.

Part 4: Provision of named person

5. PAS believes that meaningful implementation of the Named Person part of the Bill can only be achieved with significant investment of resources, especially towards the provision of a properly resourced universal health visiting service. However, we believe supporting families in the early years of their child’s life through this preventative and early intervention approach will amply repay this investment by improving children’s outcomes. We urge the Committee to scrutinise the resource allocation for this part of the Bill to make sure that its provisions are sufficient to achieve its policy objectives.

Information sharing

6. PAS believes that putting services around the family and ensuring that services are talking to each other and sharing information is desirable, so that families do not have to repeat their stories to a number of agencies, and appropriate services work together for the benefit of the family.

7. We would support the extension of the duty on adult services to share information where it is pertinent to the child’s well being; for example, where a parent is attending a service and concerns about the parent’s substance misuse or mental health impact on the parent’s ability to parent.

8. However, having said that, we are also concerned that information sharing should be appropriate, respectful and proportionate. Currently, there has been no consultation around the specific information sharing proposals of the Bill, though this is undoubtedly a complex area which requires the views and experiences of practitioners to ensure it works as it is intended to do for the benefit of families. Widespread sharing of information may mean that information overload will result in important information being missed, as well as raising issues of data safety. There are also services where the requirement to share information may impair the ability of the service to operate without having any concomitant beneficial outcome for children, for example, services for survivors of abuse.

9. We believe that further specific consultation is required on these proposals, and that guidance should be issued based on the response to consultation which sets out clearly which information needs to be shared in what circumstances.

Part 5: Child’s Plan

10. Generally, we are in agreement with the provisions set out in the Bill relating to the provision and setting up of a child’s plan, and welcome the move towards making service provision more integrated and less onerous for families. However, where the Bill lists who must be involved in the preparation of a child’s plan, the duty to consult parents (section 31) is only ‘so far as reasonably practicable’. While we recognise that there may be times where on grounds of safety some parents may need to be excluded from planning around the child, as a matter of general principle, the inclusion of parents in planning for their children should be adhered to. We are concerned that this phrase may allow the responsible authority a ‘get-out’ in relation to seeking parents’ views and recommend that this phrase be deleted.
11. Given the move towards integration of services and the role of Community Planning Partnerships in taking this forward, we would like to see the Children's Services Plan explicitly referred to and developed through Single Outcome Agreements. This should be enshrined within legislation to ensure that children’s outcomes are considered in what remains local government’s principal strategic planning document.

Part 6: Early Years and Childcare

12. Parenting across Scotland welcomes the Bill’s inclusion of a minimum of 600 publicly subsidised early childhood education and care for three and four year olds. We believe that this has the potential to make a real and lasting difference to children and their parents – evidence shows that early education results in real and lasting difference to children’s long-term outcomes, and that subsidising childcare can enable parents, particularly mothers, to return to work thereby helping to alleviate poverty and contribute to economic growth.

13. While supporting the existing provisions of the Bill, we believe that the Scottish Government needs to go further in order to realise its vision of making a transformational change in childcare provision. We have been working with a number of other organisations around childcare, and would recommend Save the Children’s evidence on this part of the Bill to the Committee.

PAS urges the Parliament to strengthen the Bill by:

a. Setting out a commitment to development of high quality affordable childcare as a long term strategy with an obligation to report to Parliament on a regular basis on progress.

b. Making early education and childcare a right for all children from the age of three.

c. Extend the provision of early education and childcare for two year olds to those living in poverty. It is well evidenced that children from disadvantaged backgrounds are falling behind their peers by the age of three and that the contribution of early education and childcare has a significant impact on redressing that balance. Extending the provision to two year olds living in poverty would assist in meeting the bill’s policy objective of improving outcomes for children ‘in particular, those from the most disadvantaged backgrounds’.

d. Where childcare is provided because of disadvantage, providing parenting support to parents to enhance their parenting ability. Here, we refer the Committee to the Financial Memorandum on potential capital spend, and suggest that where new childcare provision is planned, parents’ space ought to be included as part of this.

e. Ensuring that the Bill’s provision of flexibility for parents is maintained, and does not consist solely of adding an additional 0.5 hours to nursery education which would not, for the most part, accommodate working parents’ requirement for flexibility.

f. Extending the duty to consult parents beyond the early years to include out of school provision and to include demographic information to ensure that the needs of future parents are met and accounted for.

g. Recognising the importance of out of school care and ensuring its inclusion within the Bill.

Part 7: Corporate parenting

14. PAS welcomes the Bill’s definition of corporate parenting responsibilities and the policy intention to move away from ‘corporate’ thinking to acting more like a ‘parent’ would; looked after children need family support even more than other children do. However, we would urge a note of caution here and request that the Committee scrutinise these proposals with particular attention. The parents of many looked after children still retain some parenting responsibilities, and even where they do not, many looked after children return to their parents when they leave care. The relationship between corporate parents and parents is not explicit in the Bill and there are potential tensions and a need to collaborate which need to be teased out and addressed in robust guidance.

Part 8: Aftercare

15. We are fully in support of the proposals that local authorities should extend their parenting responsibilities up to the age of 26; it is important that this should be a duty to provide rather than simply to request as this most vulnerable group of young people should be guaranteed the help they need. The Bill sets out its policy intention that corporate parents should as far as possible behave as a natural parent would do; with this in mind, extending the aftercare duty up to the age of 26 is entirely compatible with the parents’ experiences of today where parenting support continues well in children’s twenties, and the average age of leaving home is now 26.

16. We would add our voice to Barnardo’s, Aberlour and others in calling for an automatic serious case review (by amending the Looked After Children Regulations (Scotland) 2009) in the event of the death of a care leaver up till the age of 36.

Part 10: Support for kinship care

17. PAS is supportive of the Bill’s provisions around kinship care, but would like to see these provisions strengthened so that all local authorities will be obliged to offer a minimum level of support to kinship carers, so that throughout Scotland, wherever they live, kinship carers are entitled to the same supports rather than the postcode lottery that currently exists. One of PAS partners, CHILDREN1st, has a specialist kinship care service, and we fully endorse their evidence which has been directly gleaned from their experience of working with kinship carers.
Part 11: Scotland’s Adoption Register

18. We are fully supportive of the Bill’s proposals to put the Adoption Register on a statutory footing. An increasing number of local authorities are using the Register with a resultant increase in placements and permanence. For those children who urgently require a loving family to give them a better start in life, and for those families wishing to give children a fresh start, the Adoption Register offers an improved chance to do so.

Parenting Across Scotland
19 August 2013
1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

Dear Sir

I am writing in my capacity as Chair of the GIRFEC Strategic Group in Perth and Kinross to highlight progress which is being made in respect of implementing the role of Named Person.

In August 2013, I provided a response to the questionnaire, distributed across all council areas by the GIRFEC National Implementation Support Group (chaired by Bernadette Malone, Chief Executive, Perth and Kinross Council) on progress in implementing GIRFEC at that date. This provides a context to work being undertaken on the Named Person and an extract is included below.

I indicated at that time, that GIRFEC has been identified as one of 4 Corporate Priority areas which have been the subject of on-going discussion with all staff within the Community Planning Partnership over the last two years. The ‘underpinning principles’ relate closely to good practice which has been recognised in Perth and Kinross in the “Protecting Children and Young People and Meeting their Needs”, Joint Inspection of Services (2011).

In general terms I was also able to report that:

- Our revised GIRFEC Strategic Group encompasses representation from all partners including the major voluntary sector agencies, and those commissioned through Service Level Agreements. However further awareness and training is on-going to engage the wider voluntary sector;
- Work is on-going at NHS Tayside, at CHP and operational level on all aspects of Children, Young People and Families Services. This has included a restructuring to form a Children Young People and Families focused service;
- Integrated working is well established across partners and at all levels (e.g. Children and Young People’s Strategic Partnership; Early Years Strategy; Youth Justice Partnership; GIRFEC Strategic Group; Child Protection Committee and Subgroups plus a range of operational groups) and actions are on-going to strengthen interagency assessment across all partner agencies; and
- A GIRFEC e-learning programme to support Joint Multi-Agency training is being rolled out with plans to develop a further module on Named Person and Lead Professional roles.
Clerk to Education and Culture Committee
4 October 2013

In respect, particularly to your interest in the role of Named person, I was able to report on the basis of Self - Evaluations which had been undertaken, that:

- Principles are understood by staff across main agencies but further embedding in practice is required. Good understanding in some schools but further training for school staff ongoing on role and duties of Named Person;
- 'Family Health Needs Assessments' have been redesigned to take account of Named Person Role;
- The Lead Professional role as it relates to Looked After, Child Protection and Coordinated Support Plans is understood and implemented. Terminology is increasingly used with families and young people; and
- There is engagement across a Tayside GIRFEC Group to ensure consistency for partner agencies within the 3 Local Authorities in respect of core components. In particular this has included agreed Named Person / Lead Professional Guidance.

Since that response, we have continued to undertake work to embed the role of Named Person and there is a currently a short life working group focussing on this particular aspect of the GIRFEC agenda. This group also helpfully includes representation from the Independent schools sector, of which there a number in Perth and Kinross.

Agreement has been reached in Perth and Kinross as to who will be the nominated Named Person as follows:

'Within Education, in session 2011-12 all staff whose role indicates they are likely to act as Named Persons were engaged in one day multi-agency training sessions, exploring the wider GIRFEC agenda and, in particular, the positive impact of the role of Named Person and Lead Professional in meeting the needs of children, young people and their families. Subsequent to that, the GIRFEC principles, values and components, with associated duties and opportunities, have been explored at Senior Management development days across both sectors, with more focused follow up with specific groups.

Secondary Depute Headteachers (Support) have together considered the implications for their own individual school contexts; their response has been positive and encouraging. We have also promoted the Named Person role with colleagues in the independent sector, with Early Years Partner Providers (some of whom have engaged in GIRFEC approaches and tools both enthusiastically and effectively) and with partners in the voluntary sector.

Within Education, in session 2012-13 all primary Headteachers, and Senior Managers from associated secondary schools, were involved in Named Person training. This training, devised and delivered by our Child Protection Training Coordinator and an Educational Development Officer, was delivered to Local Management Groups of Headteachers, and explored the role and responsibilities associated with Named Person. It was well received.

Across the sectors in Education we have maintained a focus on the fact that the Named Person role will not, for almost all children, involve a significant increase in workload for Senior Managers in their schools. As a result of the Named Person role, schools are increasingly moving towards early intervention, responding to minimise and prevent harm to the wellbeing of a child. Any associated increase in workload however, allows the school more influence in the timing and impact of decision making; many Headteachers welcome that fact. In addition it is expected that the shift in intervention should reduce workloads in the longer term as we become more effective at responding earlier to the needs of children and young people.

Colleagues in Health have made similar progress; all Health Visitors in Perth and Kinross have undertaken Named Person training, and all midwives will also have experienced this training by the end of December 2013.

At the multi-agency short life working group held in September 2013, Named Person colleagues representing Midwives, Health Visitors, Primary, Secondary and Independent Schools met to agree processes within Perth and Kinross for the transfer of Named Person information and concerns. This includes the method of transfer; level of detail shared, action taken; clarification of responsibilities at the point of transfer. It will also consider whether a ‘nil’ return should be made to confirm that there are no on-going concerns.

We have agreed further meetings to establish in detail the processes for transfer of Named Person responsibility from primary to secondary sectors, from either of those to the Independent School sector, and from Health to Education at entry to P1.

We are already seeing schools in both sectors engage very positively with the Wellbeing Wheel. Large Perth and Kinross versions, produced specifically for school use, are used by many schools in evaluating progress and planning next steps for children with Additional Support Needs. The wheel is also proving to be effective as a focus in agreeing how best professionals and parents/carers can work in partnership to meet the needs of a child. A few schools have also begun to use a Perth and Kinross version of My World Triangle to further focus the engagement of professionals.
Specific examples of use made of the Wellbeing Wheel by Named Persons include:

- At a return to school meeting with a young person and their parent to identify what is going well and where support needs to be provided to allow for a positive return;
- At a meeting with a parent and young person to help identify differences between home and school expectations leading to a shared plan;
- At a multi-agency meeting about a child with high level needs where different support is important to sustain time in school and provide appropriate support at home;
- At a Partner Provider Centre as a tool for recording children’s experiences as ‘I can’ statements across the eight indicators and then sharing this with parents in the child’s folder; and
- As a planning tool for staff working with parents at a Partner Provider Centre to discuss and plan learning using the eight wellbeing indicators.

Over the past few months since Named Person training was rolled out, we have also noted an increase in the number of Professionals Meetings called by Named Persons in education suggesting an increasingly pro-active approach to addressing emerging concerns. Informal discussions with Headteachers and Senior Managers in schools and centres indicate that the duties associated with the Named Person role is giving Headteachers, certainly in primary, an increased confidence that it is appropriate to press for the immediate engagement of partner agencies where minor concerns accumulate or where a concern emerges at a high level. I am attaching a summary of training which has been undertaken so far.

Discussion is on-going to ensure that a concern raised by a member of the public is communicated to the Named Person. Currently all Police Child Concern reports and Unborn Baby Referral’s, are subject to a twice weekly multi agency screening process to which the relevant Named Person contributes any additional concerns, and receives in return, feedback in respect of any new concern. ‘Named persons’ are indicating that this is a very positive step enabling them to respond more appropriately to the needs of a child within their universal service.

Implementing the role of Named Person for children who are Home Educated is also under consideration.

I hope that this is helpful in informing Committee members of the progress being made in Perth and Kinross, which so far has been undertaken from within existing resources. We are confident that we are making progress in embedding this key element of the GIRFEC agenda and that the role is beginning to impact on the wellbeing of children and young people, supporting both earlier intervention and a more integrated approach to meeting the needs of our children.

Yours sincerely

Training in 2013

Education
Education and Development Officer and Child Protection Training Officer have delivered 7 twilight sessions during 2013 to those who will be taking on the Role of the Named Person within Education.

The training comprised of:
The GIRFEC values and principals
The changes in culture, systems and practice necessary to fulfil that role
The role of the Named Person,
The child concerns folders and paperwork for the Named Person Information Sharing and Chronologies

Health
The Professional and Practice Development Nurse for Children and Young People, and the Child Protection Nurse Advisor delivered Named Person Training - a 1 day training delivered 3 times in May 2013 to 59 Health Workers, including a full complement of Health Visitors who will be taking on the role of Named Person, school Nurses and 1 Midwife.

The training consisted of:
Role of Named Person
GIRFEC Child Health Assessment
Child Health Chronology
Impact of trauma on brain Development

Independent Schools Child Protection Training Officer has delivered a briefing to the Independent schools forum on the Role of the Named Person and the child concern folders and paperwork.

General and Specific Workforce (National framework for Child Protection Learning and Development in Scotland 2012)
The Role of the Named Person is also included in the Child Protection Basic Awareness and the Child Protection Inter-agency course to ensure that the key knowledge required of the specific workforce on understanding the role of the Named Person is met.
About Place2Be

1. Place2Be is a leading UK provider of school-based emotional and mental health services operating in Scotland, England and Wales. Founded in 1994 (and operational in Scotland since 2001). Place2Be has school-based teams, comprising of over 150 paid clinicians and over 800 trained counsellors who volunteer their time in 200 schools, supporting 75,000 children. It offers a flexible menu of services that extend its reach to a further 369 schools. Place2Be seeks to improve the prospects of children aged 4-14 years, by tackling the complex social, psychological and emotional challenges that result in educational disadvantage.

2. In addition to its therapeutic work with children, Place2Be works with parents to enhance their emotional wellbeing, resourcefulness and resilience, leading to sustainable improvements in their relationships with their children. Place2Be is also a leading provider of specialist training and university-validated professional qualifications to those who work with children, helping to build capacity in families, schools and local communities.

3. Place2Be ensures there is a strong multi-agency approach to its service delivery (developing strong relationships with school nurses, educational psychologists, CAMHS (Children and Adolescent Mental Health Services) professionals, social workers and other specialist staff) in order that a joined-up package of care is in place and onward referrals to specialist agencies, such as CAMHS can be made as and when appropriate.

4. For more information on Place2Be: www.place2be.org.uk

General Comments

5. Place2Be believes there is a need for the bill to require Local Authorities to make arrangements for both child and parent/carer given its central objective of putting children at the heart of planning and delivery. A provision of counselling to both child and parent/carer will further support the Scottish Government’s focus on early intervention and on the focus on the early years of a child’s life.

6. Furthermore we would recommend that this counselling provision needs to include access to school-based counselling (or school or nursery school in the case of parent counselling) to improve take-up and efficacy. Basing the counselling within education settings supports the Government’s strategy in building the role of education services to support and co-ordinate services and interventions to create the most positive outcomes for children and young people.
Part 9 – Counselling Services

Parent Counselling

7. Place2Be agrees with the requirement that the Bill places on Local Authorities to make arrangements for counselling services for parents. We recognise the crucial influence of parents and carers on children’s experiences and achievements and that positive parenting has a major impact on a child’s life chances. Our experience has shown that strong relationships with parents and carers, and parental interest and involvement in our work with their children, are linked to better and more sustained outcomes for children.

8. Place2Be provides counselling of this kind, delivering the following support to parents and carers (including kinship carers)
   - Parent/Carer Partnership model - consultative support for parents and carers whose children are receiving one-to-one counselling within the school environment; and
   - Place for Parents – a school-based Parent/Carer Counselling service

9. The central aims of our work with parents and carers are to:
   - Support positive parenting and help parents/carers in understanding and addressing their child’s needs and behaviours
   - Help parents/carers build on their confidence, resourcefulness and resilience so that they are better able to manage their circumstances and to be more at ease in their parenting roles
   - Provide therapeutic services to address issues which often include drug and/or alcohol-related issues, mental health issues, domestic violence, depression, relationship or marital difficulties, bereavement and low self-esteem

10. Place2Be believes that the effectiveness of counselling for parents is maximised by offering the service within a school or nursery school setting. We have found that providing therapeutic services in these safe environments of children’s centres and schools overcomes the stigma attached to statutory mental health provision and the practical difficulties in accessing statutory support. Our Parent Counsellor provides a ‘front line’ emotional and practical support service that is immediate, effective and discreet and can provide a bridge to more specialised services if required. The confidence that parents have in the service is reflected in the high attendance rates which A Place for Parents achieves (74%).

11. The outcomes of our parent support are measured with a variety of tools. These include a comprehensive range of service monitoring tools, as well as clinical and functional measurements such as the Clinical Outcomes in Routine Evaluation-Outcome Measure (CORE–OM) to monitor the impact of the service we provide to inform intervention approaches and measure overall outcomes of involvement. After receiving support from Place2Be:

- 99% of parents had improved Total Global distress scores.
- 67% of the parents who had mental health disorders prior to the intervention no longer showed any symptoms post-intervention and had achieved clinical recovery.

Counselling for Children and Young People

12. Place2Be believes that the Bill should require Local Authorities to ensure that all children have access to school-based counselling services. The children we see face multiple risks – as well as known risks of social deprivation. Many describe neglect, living in conflict-ridden households or with parents suffering from mental illnesses, addictions or family breakup; or encountering serious difficulties with peers - bullying. We strongly believe that these children must be supported and that intervening early is key to achieving cost-effective and sustainable outcomes

13. Place2Be is unique in being placed within schools, our team of clinicians being based permanently on-site, and is designed to be easily accessible. Unlike other services that are not always able to respond quickly or adequately enough (largely due to the high demand for specialist help), Place2Be is readily available to the whole school and brings a wide range of mental health and emotional resilience services right to the very heart of the local community and to those most in need. Our school based model includes:

- One-to-one counselling sessions - children receive a weekly session with a trained counsellor for a school term or whole school year

- Group work - weekly sessions with groups of children, focusing on specific topics, such as bereavement, bullying or transition to secondary school.

- Place2Talk – children are able to refer themselves to Place2Be’s 15-minute lunchtime sessions. They can come alone, or with their friends.

14. Of the 352 children who attended one-to-one and group counselling in Scotland in 2011-2012

- 59% of children were receiving FSM compared to 20% of children registered for free meals in primary schools in Scotland.

- 41% were from lone parent families compared with 27% of households with dependent children in Scotland.

- 48% of children had Special Educational Needs – much higher than the 5.4% of children with Additional Support Needs in Scotland.
• Many children were facing difficult circumstances in their home lives: 7% were the subject of a child protection plan, compared to 0.28% in Scotland.

15. Of the children who attended one-to-one counselling in 2011-2012.

• 60% of children had improved difficulties after counselling according to teachers and 66% improved according to parents.

• 69% of children with the highest needs (in the SDQ abnormal clinical category) had improved difficulties according to teachers and 71% improved according to parents.

Introduction

1. Planning Aid for Scotland (PAS) is a national charity operating on social enterprise principles, working across Scotland to improve the way people engage with the land-use planning system and so create places where people will enjoy living, working and playing.

2. Planning Aid for Scotland believes in a plan-led system which gives clear direction to everyone. PAS is actively involved in raising awareness of the opportunities for all people, including children and young people to engage in a transparent and equitable way with the planning system.

3. Through educational resources, training programmes and mentoring service, and planning advice helpline, PAS is actively involved in raising awareness of the opportunities for all people to be involved in the planning system, and welcomes the opportunity to comment on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

Comments

4. Planning is a public service which impacts on everyone – now and for future generations. It offers greater opportunity than any other public services for people to be involved at the earliest stage, with effective engagement offering the opportunity for people to be involved in designing and shaping the future of their places.

5. However, the Scottish Government Consultation on the Modernisation of the Planning System with ‘Seldom Heard’ Groups’ (Feb 2009), which PAS was involved in researching, identified that young people as a group are particularly excluded from the planning system.

6. In comments submitted in September 2012 to the Scottish Government consultation on the proposed bill PAS noted that in Norway, a legal framework is provided to involve children in planning and the built environment as part of promoting active citizenship from an early age.

7. PAS occupies a unique position in Scotland as an impartial organisation focused primarily on helping people engage with the planning system; and believes that it is essential that all sectors of society have the opportunity to be involved – this kind of active citizenship requires knowledge and opportunity to ensure effective and meaningful engagement. To become an active citizen opportunities have to be created for participation.

8. With moves towards co-production of public services in Scotland, there is now an excellent opportunity for children and young people to be involved in the planning system at the earliest opportunity and to align that involvement with community planning.

9. Sparking interest from an early age is likely to lead children to feel more connected, thinking about how and why their neighbourhood is changing, how to adapt to climate change and, most importantly, involving children in decision-making. As children progress towards adulthood, and potentially taking on adult responsibilities at the age of 16, being informed about the planning system will mean that they are more likely to take an interest in what is happening in their communities, diversity within communities, and making those communities better places in which to live. Early engagement with young people will prepare them for active citizenship.

10. The profile of the planning process is relatively low – it is not a topic discussed regularly within the school environment and this is something that requires to change if the next generation is going to act upon its right to be involved, to be heard and to help shape Scotland’s future.

11. PAS’s experience of working with young people – most recently in our Charretteplus pilot project - tells us that given the opportunity, they have a keen interest in built and natural environment matters, and a unique perspective to be tapped into.

12. PAS notes that Part 1 (sections 1a and 1b) of the bill state that Scottish Ministers must:

- keep under consideration whether there are any steps which they could take which would or might secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC requirements, and

- if they consider it appropriate to do so, take any of the steps identified by that consideration.

13. PAS’s comments above are submitted with this in mind.

Planning Aid for Scotland’s Work to Engage Children & Young People

14. PAS has developed a series of innovative resources to inform young people in the 8-25 year age range about the importance of the planning system, and their rights to be involved. All PAS education programmes are aligned to the Curriculum for Excellence and are intended to set in process a journey through which young people will be able to become active citizens, and for this to continue throughout their lives.

15. IMBY™ (In My Back Yard) is aimed at primary school children aged 8-11. The title turns around a common planning term NIMBY (Not In My Back Yard), suggesting someone with negative attitude towards any change, into a positive message encouraging young people to look around them and understand the importance of having influence over what they see and understand how and why things change (or sometimes do not change).

16. Utilising the perspective of an cartoon alien character visiting earth for the first time, children are engaged in learning about their local area from a planning perspective. The programme encourages active citizenship by asking the children to think about their surroundings and to focus on topical planning issues, such as waste/recycling, or the historic built environment.

17. YEP!™ (Youth Engagement in Planning) aims to support young people aged 16-24 in learning about the planning system, and how to get involved, in the context of their local communities. The programme aims to introduce young people to the role of community councils and other decision making structures. It also equips them with the knowledge, skills and confidence necessary to get more involved in civil engagement in their area, and have their say in how their local community develops.

18. Young Placemakers is a programme which will create a network of motivated young community leaders (16-20 years old) who will champion active citizenship and create a stronger voice for young people. Each Young Placemaker will be assigned a planning mentor to support them through the programme. The position will be held for three years and all Young Placemakers will be trained in facilitation, presentation and communication skills which will equip them to deliver peer learning throughout Scotland.

19. The project was launched in May 2013 with the support of Derek Mackay MSP, Minister for Local Government and Planning as well as the following organisations: Royal Town Planning Institute, CoSLA, Scottish Youth Parliament, Young Scot, YouthLink Scotland, Council of Ethnic Minority Voluntary Sector Organisations, Capability Scotland, LGBT Scotland and The Gypsy and Traveller Law Reform Coalition.

Contacts

20. Planning Aid for Scotland would be pleased to respond to any queries with regard to these representations and is always willing to consider a joint venture with the promoters of the consultation document to take forward further research or training on any aspect of the subject which relates to the core business of PAS.

25 July 2013

Planning Aid for Scotland

Unique

Planning Aid for Scotland (PAS) is an charity operating on social enterprise principles, working across Scotland to help people shape their communities and improve the way people engage with the planning system. Planning is a vital public service and everyone in Scotland should be able to participate. PAS aims to provide everyone with the skills and information to engage positively with planning.

Reforms in 2009 to the Scottish planning system aim to make the system more inclusive and efficient. Everyone in Scotland should be able to participate in planning - but not everyone has the understanding and tools to do so. This is where PAS can help.

Impartial

As an independent organisation, impartiality is PAS’s most important guiding principle – one that will not be compromised. PAS delivers all its products with a professional and impartial approach.

Volunteer-based

PAS’s services are delivered by a network of more than 350 volunteers (all of whom are planning or built environment professionals). PAS also works with legal experts, communications specialists, community artists and others, who offer their time and specialist knowledge to enable everyone to gain the skills and confidence to engage with Scotland’s planning system.

Volunteering is at the heart of the way PAS does business. Volunteer time and energy is not a cheap way of delivering products – on the contrary, it represents an investment which then generates added value to our unique products.

For Everyone

PAS provides a wide range of products and services – from a free planning advice service to tailored training products. PAS has developed services for everyone – planning professionals, local authorities, elected members, community councils, young people, and for members of the public who are simply interested in how their town or city is changing.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Play Scotland

Introduction

1. Play is crucial for the wellbeing of all our children in Scotland. The Right to Play reflects fully the Right to be a Child here and now. We need to ensure that local physical and social environments are supportive of play, and we must ensure that play is not dismissed as frivolous or marginalised. Play underpins the four principles of the Convention of the Rights of the Child – non-discrimination, survival and development, the best interest of the child and participation. We want child-friendly communities in Scotland supported by play-friendly neighbourhoods where children can

- Meet friends and play
- Walk safely in the streets on their own
- Have green spaces for plants and animals
- Participate in family, community and social life

Background

2. Play Scotland gave evidence to the Petitions Committee in September 2012 in support of a statutory duty being placed on local authorities to provide sufficient quality, accessible and challenging play opportunities for all children and young people. The draft Children and Young People’s Bill fails to explicitly address play. Play Scotland understands that it is the intention to cover play in the guidance relating to Health and Wellbeing in the Bill. This is wholly inadequate because the GIRFEC and SHANARRI principles do not fully recognise the importance of play in children’s development and play is only referenced in SHANARRI (Safe Happy Achieving Nurtured Active Respected Responsible Included) under the Active principle.

Current Position

3. The Scottish Government has launched a Play Strategy Vision for Scotland with an action plan due out at the end of September. There has been no committed engagement from COSLA in this process and there is nothing to ensure local authorities pay any attention to it whatsoever. The implementation of the strategy will rely heavily on local authorities to deliver including carrying out an audit of play provision and play space. Without a statutory duty the strategy will fail. It is clear that play is becoming less of a priority in many local authority areas in times of budget constraints. However the attitudinal change towards play and the strategic planning across departments that is required, combined with the benefits of play, could result in significant efficiencies in budgets.
Outcomes From A Statutory Duty For Play

4. A strategic approach to play across the local authority area with the full involvement of children, local communities, Community Planning Partnerships and the third sector. This will fully realise the Child’s Right to Play including that of disabled children and young people.

5. Empowered communities delivering play opportunities including intergenerational activities and community led improvement schemes and play street initiatives.

6. Improved health, with a range of interventions to establish strong links eg between play space, active travel and health. Proactive service planners can use the evidence of investment in health infrastructure, children’s play and child friendly public space to deliver high level outcomes in urban and rural settings. Simple actions like supporting community play streets and ensuring 20’s Plenty is fully enforced and extended where practicable can deliver play opportunities in and around where children live.

7. Improved wellbeing and sustainable development. Children benefit from being able to play in natural environments: they tend to be more active and research shows contact with natural environments can support positive mental health.

8. Alleviation of some of the effects of Child Poverty. Children in deprived communities can often lack safe spaces to socialise and play. This can have detrimental effects on a child’s cognitive development, communication skills, health, and their attainment. The Growing up in Scotland survey shows the links between poor quality local green spaces and children having high screen time at age six. In addition, low child friendliness of the neighbourhood was identified as a risk factor for unhealthy weight. (The Welsh Assembly Government places a Play Sufficiency duty on their local authorities through their anti-poverty legislation.)

9. The potential of the school estate is fully realised and accessible to communities. A play space audit should include school grounds where many children experience much of their outdoor play.

10. Well designed and maintained play opportunities become an integral part of the planning process. It would be beneficial to have a designated organisation with statutory consultee status to comment on the removal of open spaces and informal recreation places for play.

11. Challenging and exciting play opportunities encourage children to develop essential life skills. The Health and Safety Executive high level statement: Children’s Play and Leisure: Promoting a Balanced Approach, needs to be fully interpreted by local authorities to ensure that risk management includes weighing up risks and benefits so that the benefits of play are experienced to the full. Training in the benefits of play needs to be provided for regulatory officers, inspectors and play providers. Health and safety laws and regulations are sometimes presented as a reason why certain play and leisure activities undertaken by children and young people should be discouraged. Such decisions are often based on misunderstandings about what the law requires. The HSE has worked with the Play Safety Forum to produce a joint high-level statement that gives clear messages tackling these misunderstandings. However agencies are reluctant to adopt a risk benefit approach to risk management in play. The joint statement makes clear that:

- Play is important for children’s well-being and development
- When planning and providing play opportunities, the goal is not to eliminate risk, but to weigh up the risks and benefits.
- Those providing play opportunities should focus on controlling the real risks, while securing or increasing the benefits – not on the paperwork.
- Accidents and mistakes happen during play – but fear of litigation and prosecution has been blown out of proportion.

Conclusion

12. On the basis of the above submission, Play Scotland asks the Government to look again at the treatment of play in the draft Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Inter alia Play Scotland asserts that the more explicit inclusion of play and the formal requirement of local authorities to prioritise play will provide multiple benefits across many sectors.

Play Scotland
Introduction

1. Youth charity The Prince’s Trust helps disadvantaged young people to get their lives on track. It supports 13 to 30 year-olds who are unemployed and those struggling at school and at risk of exclusion. Many of the 6,000 young people helped by The Trust in Scotland each year are in or leaving care, facing issues such as homelessness or mental health problems, or they have been in trouble with the law.

2. The Trust’s programmes, many of which are delivered in partnership with local authorities and other public sector service providers, give vulnerable young people the practical and financial support needed to stabilise their lives, helping develop self-esteem and skills for work. Three in four young people supported by The Prince’s Trust move into work, education or training.

3. The Prince’s Trust broadly welcomes the general provisions of the bill. The comments and reflections below are limited to an appraisal of how the legislation may affect our role as a delivery partner for programmes that improve outcomes for young people in Scotland.

Partnering Service Provision

4. While The Prince’s Trust Scotland is not contracted by local authorities as a primary children’s service provider, it works closely in partnership with them to deliver programmes as part of a matrix of local children’s services in many local authority areas. Smooth and successful referral pathways are crucial to securing successful outcomes for the young people whom we assist. Because those young people are often from the hardest to reach socio-economic groups and the most disengaged from mainstream education, it is vital that they know how and when they can turn to us for support.

5. Practical information on the availability of Trust programmes is already provided to young people through a diverse variety of means; for example some may be referred through partners like Jobcentre Plus, while others will hear about opportunities like our Fairbridge Programme directly through local authority social work departments who are consistently in touch with those who are most in need of support. It is therefore important that the bill improves opportunities for third sector organisations like The Prince’s Trust to be effective providers of support that improves outcomes for children and young people.

Children’s Services Planning

6. We acknowledge that under the terms of the bill, public bodies will have primary responsibility for children’s services planning. However, we share concerns expressed by other third sector groups that the term ‘service providers’ is used inconsistently across the bill, and suggest that further clarification is needed to ensure that third sector organisations like the Prince’s Trust, which deliver programmes in partnership with local authorities, understand their roles and responsibilities at all times going forward.

7. As discussed above, our delivery of programmes for young people is carried out in partnership with a variety of public sector organisations. We believe that there is scope within the legislation to clarify the extent to which service providers like the Trust will be formally involved in the drafting of children’s services plans and under which circumstances.

Named Person

8. The Prince’s Trust Scotland welcomes, in principle, the provision of a Named Person for every child and young person.

9. The Named Person has the capacity to act as a further point of contact for third sector service providers like The Prince’s Trust seeking referrals among young people. We are particularly pleased that steps will be taken to ensure that 16-18 year-olds not in training or education will be given a Named Person responsible for meeting their needs.

10. However, we have a number of reservations about the Named Person provisions under the draft bill. Firstly, while the Named Person for each child or young person has the capacity to be a key guiding influence in a young person’s life, we are concerned about the caseload that each Named Person will have. The bill should therefore include capacity for Third Sector resources of staff and volunteers to ensure that each Named Person has a caseload that allows them to focus sufficient time and energy on the individual needs of each young person.

11. We are also conscious of the fact that the Named Person service will only work effectively if young people have confidence and faith in the individual assigned to protect their interest. In our view there should be provisions within the legislation to allow young people a say in who their Named Person is, so that crucial interpersonal problems can be overcome if they arise.

12. Moreover, we note that the draft bill is not entirely clear on who the Named Person should be in all cases. While the financial memorandum suggests that in the majority of cases for school-aged children up to the age of 16 this would be a teacher, further clarity is needed. We would recommend that the legislation should state that there is an option for the Named Person to be a representative of a third sector organisation if that is what suits the interests of the child or young person.

13. In practice, not all third sector organisations will have the capacity to deliver Named Person Services. However, we would anticipate certain Trust-delivered programmes like Fairbridge would have the scope to advise on the allocation of Named Persons who would give participating young people confidence in the system. In some instances, there could be capacity for youth workers from a programme like Fairbridge to hold the role of ‘Named Person’ themselves.

14. We would therefore urge the Scottish Government to consider widening the scope of Named Person service delivery to include third sector partners, under appropriate circumstances, if doing so is likely to improve outcomes for the child or young person concerned.
15. In addition, we would recommend that the bill should put in place simple, robust methodology to assist Named Persons to be fully aware of all of the support available to young people locally and nationally from third sector organisations like The Prince’s Trust.

Named Professional

16. The inclusion of the capacity to nominate third sector representatives (e.g. a youth worker) as a Named Person may be particularly helpful in light of the decision not to include a ‘Named Professional’ service within the legislation. It is likely that some of the Young People with complex needs supported by The Prince’s Trust would benefit from a statutory guarantee of support from a Named Professional to assist them to access and navigate public service support.

17. We would therefore recommend that if the government does not intend to legislate for a Named Professional service, it should take steps to ensure that third sector providers have additional statutory capacity to support young people, particularly in cases where it becomes clear – in dialogue with the young person affected - that their Named Person is not best placed to continue providing support.

Provision for 16-18 year-olds

18. We note that under the terms of the draft bill it appears to be unclear whether 16-18 year olds who have left school will have access to the Named Person service.

19. Because there is a high chance that young people in this age group will not be in education, employment or training (NEET), it would seem sensible to ensure that, under certain circumstance, they have a Named Person to look out for their welfare.

20. In our view, there could be considerable scope among third sector organisations like The Prince’s Trust to assist public authorities in providing a Named Person service for young NEETs in the 16-18 age group. However, further consultation with the third sector would be required on how best to make that happen in the interests of young people.

Child’s Plan

21. In some circumstances, third sector organisations providing services to local authorities already have difficulties in ensuring that they are included in service planning from the first stage. We would suggest that the bill should make clear reference to the desirability of the Child’s Plans including third sector-delivered interventions where appropriate.

22. We would also argue that the bill should go further to ensure that each child or young person subject to a Child Plan is fully consulted on it and has the opportunity to effect and shape it for themselves.

23. Moreover, there should be recourse within the legislation to a review process that would allow each Young Person or their family to ask formally to review and amend the Child Plan to make it more effective and responsive to their individual needs.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Reform Scotland

1. In the Committee’s call for evidence, the five aims of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill are set out. Reform Scotland’s evidence specifically deals with point three, namely:

BIRTHDAY DISCRIMINATION

2. In January 2013, we published our report “An Equal Start: Fair Access to Nursery Provision”. In this report, we highlighted that while at present all children are legally entitled to the same amount of primary or secondary school education, a child’s legal entitlement to government-funded nursery provision depended on when a child’s birthday fell. In Table 1 below, we illustrate the current difference in entitlement and an approximation of the difference following the expansion from 475 hours to 600 hours

⁴ We have used the figures from Edinburgh Council’s pre-school funding for 3 and 4 year olds of £1,550 per year/£516.65 per term for 475 hours, which works out at £3.26 per hour to estimate figures of £1,958 per year/ £652.67 per term
3. For children already receiving nursery education through partnership providers, it means that their parents do not receive as much money towards the costs of their nursery provision as others. However, children attending local authority nurseries who are born between August and February and will start school when they are four, will receive less nursery education.

4. Indeed, some children can end up only receiving one year’s provision since many local authority nurseries, especially those linked to schools, fill-up with the August intake and there are no places available for subsequent in-takes. As a result, parents may choose to wait until the following August to ensure their child’s place at the chosen nursery rather than take up a place elsewhere. While it can be argued that this is parental choice, it is worth pointing out the practical difficulties of taking up a place elsewhere if the parent has another child attending the school.

5. From the child’s point of view, they are also expected to join a peer group which has been established and together for at least six months before they are entitled to join.

6. Despite this different level of entitlement, all these children will start school together at the same time.

7. Nursery provision, especially with the new Curriculum for Excellence beginning at age 3, plays a key role within the education system. Indeed, nurseries have a vital role to play not just with early years’ education but also with social development of children. This has been highlighted in a number of reports such as ‘Thrive at Five’ and the ‘Scottish Childcare Lottery’. Therefore, it seems grossly unfair that all children are not equally entitled to the same basic amount of government-funded nursery care.

8. The Scottish government’s commitment to extend government-funded provision from 475 hours to 600 hours is welcome. However, unless this anomaly is addressed it will widen the entitlement gap, as illustrated in Table 1, and lead to a difference of up to approximately 400 hours or £1,305.

9. Reform Scotland believes that all children should be given an equal entitlement to government-funded nursery provision, regardless of when their birthday falls.
10. We believe that to correct the current situation, provision for all children should start at a fixed point in the year, just as it does for primary school. We think this should probably be the August two years before they are due to start school.

11. When we published our report, Children in Scotland Chief Executive Jackie Brock commented:

   “We fully support Reform Scotland’s call for fair and equal access to nursery provision for all children in Scotland, and urge the Scottish government to pay heed that ‘two years should mean two years’.”

12. And a Scottish government spokesman said: “We are aware of this particular issue and it is part of our wider considerations around the forthcoming Bill.”

13. Given the Scottish government were aware of this problem, we were disappointed that they did not take the opportunity to correct it in the Children and Young People Bill. However, we hope that this anomaly can be addressed through amendments to the legislation.

LOOKED AFTER AND DISADVANTAGED TWO-YEAR OLDS

14. Reform Scotland is aware that there is a great deal of debate over the issue of expanding government-funded nursery provision for certain two-year olds to help try and close developmental gaps before children start school. While we would agree with such policies, we would warn that by picking an age, rather than a set period of time the problem of birthday discrimination will be extended, as illustrated by the examples below.

15. For example, under the current system, some looked-after two-year olds would only end up receiving 3 months or roughly 200 hours additional provision rather than the 600 hours which appears to be the Scottish government’s aim.

16. Reform Scotland would, therefore, strongly recommend that for looked-after two year olds, who are dealt with in the bill, and if it is extended to disadvantaged two-year olds, the extension should start in the August three before they are due to start school, rather in the term after a child turns two. This is the only way to guarantee an additional year’s provision of 600 hours and to ensure that the policy adequately deals with the problems it seeks to address.

7 We have approximated the hours based on each of the three terms being equal, therefore 200 hours per term
| Looked-after two-year olds (and disadvantaged two-year-olds if amendments added): 1 March to 28 Feb | August/ Autumn Term 3 years prior to starting school | 3 years | 1,800 hours |
| Looked-after two-year olds (and disadvantaged two-year-olds if amendments added): Are born between 1 Jan and 28 Feb and choose to defer and start school at 5. | August/ Autumn Term 4 years prior to starting school | 4 years | 2,400 hours |

17. Under our proposals, parents of children born between 1 January and 28 February would, as currently, be able to access additional provision should they choose to defer their child. This is the case to fit in with the current system of starting school which allows for greater parental choice over this period and parents generally are encouraged not to decide upon whether their child should defer until they are at nursery.

Parents to choose nursery, not local authority

18. Parents can currently only choose to take their child’s entitlement through a private or independent nursery if the local authority designates a nursery as a partnership provider. This can mean that even if a nursery meets standards and passes inspection by both Education Scotland (responsible for inspecting the education side of a nursery) and the Care Inspectorate (responsible for the care side) and meets the needs of parents, parents may still be unable to send the child to the nursery of their choice.

19. Reform Scotland believes that if a nursery provider meets necessary standards and passes inspection by both organisations and parents wish to take up their funded place at that nursery, they should be able to do so. Parents should be able to choose the nursery which suits them best, rather than have their choice restricted by the council.

20. Using a partnership provider is not about a parent choosing the private sector over the state one, but can be a matter of necessity. With most local authorities offering the minimum 2.5 hours a day five days a week at local authority-run nurseries, it is virtually impossible for parents to take up these placements if they work or undertake training, unless they also rely on relatives or other options such as wrap around care, if they are available. While some state nurseries may allow parents to pay for additional care, most don’t. Therefore, for many parents they have no option but to use a partnership provider to take up their child’s entitlement.

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

Education and Culture Committee

roshni

1. roshni is a national charity working extensively with minority ethnic (ME) communities across Scotland. We ensure the safety and wellbeing of children and young people from ME communities by addressing a number of key issues including child abuse and neglect; children’s rights; forced marriage; and FGM. Through our culturally sensitive and multi-lingual approach we have developed strong community links, offering us a unique insight into the lives of Scotland’s ME children and young people. We view this submission as a vital opportunity for us to highlight the potential effects of this Bill on ME children and young people and their families.

General

2. We fully support the Scottish Government’s vision that Scotland should be the ‘best place in the world for children to grow up.’ We emphasise that this is not only the responsibility of the Government, but of everyone who works with children and young people. We are concerned that the role of the third sector is not sufficiently emphasised in the Bill. The role of the third sector should be clarified and we believe the vital role of the ME voluntary sector should be highlighted.

3. In order to engage effectively with ME communities we believe that public bodies and other third sector agencies must work with specialist ME organisations, such as roshni, to advance the rights of ME children and young people. This is the best means of ensuring that planning, design and delivery of services meet the needs of all communities and the specific needs of ME communities. Our grassroots work and research with Scotland’s ME communities has taught us that there are particular ME attitudes and barriers surrounding children’s rights and wellbeing which must be tackled with sensitivity. Our research into perceptions of child abuse in ME communities showed that only 27% of individuals felt mainstream services are culturally sensitive and that cultural barriers such as honour and shame negatively impact on their ability to discuss difficult subjects such as children’s rights, forced marriage and child abuse. Tackling these problems is not a task which every organisation is suited to. In order to address deep-rooted cultural problems community trust and sensitivity are essential. We believe that through working in partnership with public bodies and other third sector organisations, we can ensure that all our children and young people, regardless of background, are fully enjoying their rights and childhood. This belief has influenced our assessment of the Bill and we would urge the Committee to consider adding a provision to the Bill which promotes this form of collaborative working.

4. We are disappointed that the Bill does not seek to fully incorporate the UNCRC into domestic law. We fully support the stance of Together Scotland on this issue and would urge the Committee to reconsider the possibility of full incorporation.

5. Within the Bill more concrete obligations need to be established in relation to children’s rights. For example, the Bill only requires Ministers to ‘keep under consideration’ steps to further secure the UNCRC. This duty is weak and lacking in substance. A potential means of strengthening this has already been mentioned – the incorporation of the UNCRC into domestic law. We also believe that the Bill should require public bodies to act in accordance with the UNCRC. These bodies are directly involved in working with children and young people and should therefore have regard to the UNCRC in their work. We believe that by placing a duty on public bodies to work in accordance with the UNCRC this will require them to consider how their work could improve outcomes for ME children and young people and will encourage them to liaise with specialist organisations in order to improve their services. This provision would ensure that ME children’s rights are never side-lined due to budgetary or operational barriers. Children’s rights would become a high priority issue and we believe this would advance the realisation of rights for ME children and young people.

6. We fully recognise that it is important that more is done to raise awareness of rights amongst all children, young people and their families and therefore welcome the requirement for Ministers to promote public awareness and understanding of the rights of children and young people. However, through our own experience we know that there is a general lack of awareness and understanding of children’s rights in ME communities. Through research we conducted with ME children and young people, we learned that they lack an awareness of the UNCRC and require materials to be made available which explain their rights in a language they understand and which they feel is representative of them. In research we undertook with ME parents and families we discovered a reluctance to accept children’s rights as a positive force, as we were told that ‘rights can be abused by children’ and that ‘It is not always positive, sometimes children use it against their parents.’ We were also told in our research into perceptions of abuse that ‘many parents find it very difficult to adjust to the new rules of a new country’ as ‘they only know what they know, what they’ve been taught.’ This can explain why there is a lack of engagement with the concept of children’s rights among ME communities as many parents come from countries where children’s rights are not promoted in the same manner. We feel that this is emblematic of a lack of understanding of UK norms. Barriers such as a lack of understanding; fear of the unknown; generation gaps and different cultural norms concerning children’s rights all play a role. Any strategy to raise awareness of children’s rights needs to take account of these cultural barriers and attitudes. This has been supported by the Equality Impact Assessment in relation to the Bill\(^5\) where it was noted that there is a ‘lack of a “rights” culture in some minority ethnic communities.’ We are therefore disappointed that more is not being done by the Bill to ensure promotion amongst this particular group. We believe that the Bill should explicitly state that promotion must ensure the inclusion of all parents, children and young people and should be multi-lingual and culturally sensitive.

7. The Bill should also contain more explicit detail on how awareness-raising will take place. Any strategy ought to involve ME organisations promoting children’s rights in ME communities. This would allow the Government to deploy the expertise of specialist ME organisations to engage with those often termed ‘hard to reach’. In order to successfully engage with ME communities a nuanced approach is required which takes account of cultural barriers and attitudes. This can be provided by ME organisations and the Bill should emphasise the importance role these organisations have in promoting children’s rights in ME communities.

Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland

8. We welcome these proposals to extend the powers of investigation for the Commissioner. The Government must ensure that this new role is adequately resourced so that the Commissioner can engage with all children and young people, including those from ME backgrounds. This is significant as our research for the Commissioner showed that only 9% of ME children and young people we engaged with knew who the Commissioner was and what he does.\(^6\) This will allow the Commissioner to better pursue investigations on behalf of ME children and young people. We would also suggest that the Commissioner takes account of ME barriers and attitudes when pursuing any investigations involving ME communities and suggest that he liaises with specialist ME organisations in order to advance children’s rights in these communities.

Children’s Services Planning

9. We welcome this new planning model but have concerns as to the role of the third sector and particularly specialist ME organisations. As stated above, the role of specialist organisations is vital in ensuring positive outcomes for ME children and young people. As our research into perceptions of child abuse showed, ME communities do not feel that mainstream services are culturally sensitive and 48% feel cultural barriers such as honour and shame affect their ability to respond effectively to child abuse.\(^7\) It is evident that considerable work is required to ensure ME communities are fully supported in terms of children’s services. If the needs of ME children and young people are to be truly met then there ought to be a duty on public agencies to liaise with specialist third sector organisations to ensure a holistic, culturally sensitive approach to children’s services planning. In terms of strategic planning and policy development, it is crucial that local authorities ensure input from specialist ME organisations.

Named Persons

10. The role of a Named Person is crucial in order to ensure that the child’s needs are at the centre of the process. However, we are concerned by research we have undertaken within ME communities which has indicated a reluctance to discuss problems outwith the family and to engage with statutory organisations, including health visitors and teachers. For example, one respondent in our research with ME parents and families told us that ‘I was left feeling very vulnerable when my daughter first started school due to the lack of cultural and religious understanding with the class teacher.’ This research also demonstrated that, when asked where they would go for support with parenting issues, only 11% of ME parents said they would visit their GP or doctor. In our research into perceptions of child abuse, we found that only 27% of ME individuals felt support services, including teachers, doctors and health visitors, are culturally sensitive. This was then cited as a reason why they tend not to feel comfortable liaising with these professionals and avoid interaction with them. Similarly, 76% of professionals we spoke to wanted to receive more cultural sensitivity training as they currently felt they were lacking an understanding of cultural and religious issues.

8 This concerns us as we fear that the Named Person may find it difficult to breakdown these attitudes and barriers and ME children and young people may therefore receive less support. Professionals may also lack an understanding of cultural and religious issues and how they can negatively impact on wellbeing and therefore may fail to identify children who are at risk.

11. We believe the Bill should be amended to ensure that the Named Person is trained in cultural sensitivity and ME issues which may impact on the welfare of ME children and young people. In addition, the Named Person should be obliged to communicate with the child or young person and their family in a manner which they can fully understand and which they feel comfortable with. ME families may find it difficult to relate to non-ME professionals; may feel uncomfortable discussing certain issues; may lack trust in authorities; and may believe that the professional does not understand their culture, religion or lifestyle. Therefore, the Named Person should be explicitly required to work with specialist ME organisations, when appropriate, to ensure that the child and their family can be supported.

12. In relation to the need for multi-lingual communication, the duty to communicate information about the role of named persons should state that the service provider must provide the child or young person and the parents of the child or young person with information about the arrangements for contacting the named person for the child or young person in a language they can understand. This is particularly important for ME parents who may speak English as a second language. It may also be beneficial in practice to ensure that the workforce is more diverse and that Named Persons represent the wider community.

13. It is also vital to clarify how the system will operate in relation to children and young people who are disengaged from the formal education system. If a teacher is to be their Named Person, this is clearly impractical. This is particularly important in relation to travelling and Roma communities. The Bill should also clarify how the Named Person system will operate during school holidays. This is highly significant as ME children and young people may be at greater risk of certain forms of harm, such as forced marriage or FGM, during the summer holidays. Greater clarity within the Bill is required.

Child’s Plan

14. Again, we welcome the introduction of a Child’s Plan as we believe that this will foster a more child-centric model for children with wellbeing needs. We believe that this one reference point (SHANARRI) will allow for consistent practice. However, in relation to wellbeing we believe that it is important that consideration is given to all aspects of a child’s life, including issues around religion, ethnicity and culture. We would like to see it specifically stated in the Bill that assessment of wellbeing should consider all aspects of the child’s life, including religion, ethnicity and culture.

15. We do not believe that children from different ethnic or religious backgrounds require support which is substantially different to that of other children. However, we do believe that there are certain additional barriers which these communities face and we want to ensure that professionals take these into account when working with these families to ensure high quality care for all our children. For example, in some ME cultures, there is ‘shame’ associated with discussing abuse. There are also negative repercussions for families who report abuse, who are then isolated from the community with the abused child becoming stigmatised and ‘unmarriageable.’ We need to guarantee that service providers are considering these attitudes and barriers when assessing the needs of a child and that they are aware that such cultural factors may affect an ME child’s wellbeing.

Early Learning and Childcare

16. We welcome the increase in flexible early learning and childcare. As discussed in the Equality Impact Assessment on this Bill, parents from non-white ethnic backgrounds were least likely to say they were satisfied with their childcare arrangements and 84% of children from ME communities who received childcare received informal childcare only. This was said to be linked to concerns that providers are not sensitive to cultural and religious differences; cost; lack of information in community languages; and a lack of diversity amongst the workforce. We would support this as, in our own research with ME parents and families it was revealed that 90% of parents had never used a parenting service and that 59% felt there would be barriers in using these services, including linguistic barriers and a lack of cultural sensitivity. Therefore, we would ask for the Bill to be amended to require that when an education authority consults with representatives of parents and children, these representatives should be appropriately ethnically diverse and the opinions of minorities must be fed into plans for provision. We believe that this would encourage ME parents to access services and would help foster dialogue between these communities and early years education providers.

Counselling Services

17. We are concerned that counselling seems only to be available for families in distress. The Bill needs to be clearer on who is entitled to support and ensure help is provided before a level of ‘distress’ is reached. If early intervention is to be a reality then early family and parenting support is required to avoid crisis. This is why at roshni we are developing a culturally sensitive family support service tailor-made to the needs of ME parents and with the intention of improving outcomes for ME children and young people through avoiding crisis. We would like to highlight the need to make all services fully inclusive. In our research into perceptions of abuse in ME communities, only 27% of individuals felt support services are culturally sensitive.¹⁰ We understand that it is the policy of the Scottish Government to ensure all services are culturally sensitive. However, it may be helpful to state this in legislation as this makes a clear statement to ME communities and may assist in alleviating their concerns. Working with specialist ME organisations would also improve cultural sensitivity.

1. The Royal College of Nursing is pleased to respond to the Scottish Parliament’s Education and Culture Committee’s call for written evidence on the general principles of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. The Royal College of Nursing (RCN) is the UK’s largest professional association and union for nurses with around 400,000 members, of which around 39,000 are in Scotland. Nurses and health care support workers make up the majority of those working in health services and their contribution is vital to delivery of the Scottish Government’s policy objectives.

2. The Royal College of Nursing welcomes the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and the opportunities it presents to make a positive difference to children’s rights and children’s services in Scotland. The Bill presents the Scottish Government with an opportunity to invest in the lives of children in the early years; supporting all families through a well resourced, statutory, universal health visiting service and targeting additional support in a timely way, which could lead to positive change for a whole generation.

3. In our evidence, we have chosen to focus on two parts of the Bill: part 3, the provision for children’s services planning and part 4, the provision of named persons. Our evidence then goes on to outline the proposal that an additional entitlement to health visiting services should be added to the Bill.

RCN views on provisions within the Bill and their possible impact

Part 3 - Children’s Services Planning

4. A key policy objective of the Children and Young People Bill is to ‘improve the way services support children and families by promoting cooperation between services’. In our responses to consultations on this Bill and the Adult Health and Social Care Integration Bill, the RCN raised concerns that the two separate legislative proposals would set up different approaches to the planning, delivery and governance of integrated services for different age groups. At a time when frontline practitioners will be expected to deliver seamless integrated services for whole families and communities, we questioned the effectiveness of having two different approaches rather than offering one simple, streamlined approach to support staff in their efforts to deliver integrated services. We are still concerned that the proposed planning and governance systems within the two published Bills are not connected and could therefore fail to improve the way services support both children and adults. The complexity in running two parallel systems risks complicating, rather than promoting, cooperation.

5. Along with other organisations, the RCN proposed that the adult integration Bill be renamed, without reference to age groups so that all approaches to delivering integrated care and support could be focused through a single piece of joined-up legislation. The Scottish Government subsequently changed the title of the original adult Bill to the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, which we believe could give the necessary freedom to expand the scope of integrated services across whole families and communities. However, Part 3 of the Children and Young People’s Bill sets out a separate approach to the planning of children’s services, so we continue to query the need for two separate Bills addressing the planning of services.

Part 4 – Provision of Named Persons

6. The RCN welcomes the role of named person in relation to pre-school children as set out in Section 20 of the Bill, which states that the health board is the service provider to take the lead for pre-school children.

7. We believe, however, that the regulations associated with the Bill should clearly and specifically state that the Named Person (following on from maternity services) for under 5s is a health visitor (a nurse on the specialist community public health nurse part of the Nursing and Midwifery Council register). Health visitors are trusted by the public\(^1\) and have a unique role in supporting and assessing the development of all children in the early years and ensuring they are referred to specialist colleagues in a timely way.

8. To continue to provide this vital preventative support in the early years, health visiting capacity across Scotland needs to be reviewed. The number of health visitors must reflect the workload associated with the Named Person role, including the coordination of a team approach to early intervention. Workforce planning must take into account local need and be based on robust workforce plans using agreed caseload weighting tools which are put in place at both local and national level. This will ensure the ongoing sustainability of the health visiting workforce across Scotland and, crucially, enable the Scottish Government and health boards to plan the necessary workforce based on community need.

9. The financial memorandum to the Bill makes it clear that there will be additional resource required for the implementation of the Named Person service across Scotland. These additional costs are associated with freeing health visiting staff for training around their new duties as Named Person and the additional time associated with the creation of a Child’s Plan where needed.

Relevant issues which are not currently included within the Bill

10. The RCN fully supports the need to fundamentally reform children’s services in line with the report of the Christie Commission, which highlighted the importance of early years and prevention. We recognise that the Scottish Government is pursuing a range of policy initiatives and alternative approaches as part of its agenda to improve the lives of young people. Yet we remain convinced that within Part 3 of the Bill, the fundamental role of health visitors in providing a universal service to children and families in the early years should be enshrined in legislation.

11. Parents tell us that they value the role of health visitors as a point of contact and someone to turn to for advice and support. Two surveys have been undertaken by Ipsos Mori on behalf of Parenting across Scotland which showed that depending on the specific issue they are facing, parents rely on health visitors, for information and advice on parenting issues.2

12. A recent comprehensive review of the research evidence on health visiting concluded that the benefits of health visiting interventions can be “hard to gauge because of the complex situations in which families exist. Nonetheless some apparently small changes (such as more relaxed mothering, improved mother-child interactions or early identification of post-natal depression) have been found to translate into immediate and long-term benefits, either later in an infant’s life, or through improved parental confidence in services, leading to their better use.”3 The research team recommendation for policy was that “Health visitors can make the difference expected . . . if they have appropriate skill sets and services, delivered using specific programmes and interventions, (and) are organised in a way that enable appropriate use of those skills in practice.”4

13. This important study, when put together with a wealth of other evidence, suggests that health visiting interventions, when well planned and co-ordinated, reduce problems in later childhood, promote self-care and resilience, and prevent ill health throughout life. It is for these reasons that the RCN believes that the proposed Children and Young People Bill should include a statutory entitlement to universal services from health visiting teams for all under-fives.

14. This prioritises prevention at a time when health visitors on the ground are experiencing a high degree of pressure to focus on complex child protection cases and there is considerable variation in the contact time that parents have with health visitors within and across areas of Scotland.. An emphasis on early intervention is at the heart of the Children and Young People Bill proposals and we believe that giving children a right to consistent early years support from health visiting within the bill is the only way to ensure that universal preventative care is provided.

15. This is in line with the priorities of the Scottish Draft Budget 2013-14 that is clear about the importance of early intervention, which can only happen as a result of universal screening and assessment: “Evidence shows that a failure to intervene effectively to address the complex needs in the early years of an individual’s life can result in a nine-fold increase in direct public costs over the long term.\(^5\)

16. The RCN has launched a major campaign with Children in Scotland, Parenting across Scotland, Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, the Community Practitioners and Health Visitors Association (CPHVA), the Royal College of General Practitioners, the Queens Nursing Institute Scotland and the Institute of Health Visiting. All these organisations are campaigning for a new statutory entitlement to universal services from health visiting teams for all under-fives to be added within the Bill.

17. As demonstrated by the partners within our campaign alliance, the nursing profession is not alone in the view that investment in health visiting services and making this a legal right for families is key to the Scottish Government’s approach to primary prevention. For example, John Carnochan, Former Chief Superintendent with Strathclyde Police and Co-Director and one of the founders of the Violence Reduction Unit has written:

18. “The need for primary prevention strategies that focus on the Early Years are now accepted by the Scottish Government, who are working hard to make the shift to prevention possible. . . . Health visitors are a profession that currently work in this crucial area of public service, delivering significant positive outcomes for children and families in every community in Scotland. . . . . . . I have said publicly that to deliver primary prevention Scotland it would be better to invest in extra health visitors even at the expense of other public services, including the police; I still believe this. It is my personal view that their suitability for fulfilling the key role in delivering an Early Years strategy for Scotland is without equal. I fully support and commend the suggested inclusions in the Bill that would facilitate and enable health visitors to play the pivotal professional role in children’s lives.\(^6\)

19. It is our view that a statutory entitlement within the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill will protect health visiting services for children in the early years and their families and this will pay dividends for future generations. This builds on existing cross party commitment within Scottish Parliament to prioritise preventative services.

1. In advance of taking evidence from the Minister for Children and Young People and officials at your next Committee meeting, I’m writing to clarify some points regarding health visiting made during the Education and Culture Committee’s considerations of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, and the Finance Committee’s considerations of the Financial Memorandum.

2. Firstly, I would like to build on a figure provided to the Finance Committee during their evidence session on 18 September 2013. Our Policy Advisor said that, based on the assumptions made by the Scottish Government regarding the number of additional health visitor hours required to deliver the Named Person function for aged 0 – 5, we have calculated that around 450 new health visitors would be required. The figure of 450 takes into account the need for annual leave, sickness etc, which equates to 22.5% - the standard figure used by the Scottish Government to calculate workforce numbers.

3. However, this does not mean we think that Scotland only requires an extra 450 health visitors. This figure is based purely on the Scottish Government’s health visitor hours estimate for Named Person duties and does not take into account the fact there is already a shortage of health visitors in many parts of the country, and that many health visitors are already overburdened with existing duties and caseloads. Also, the health visitor workforce is ageing and there are insufficient numbers of health visitors in training to replace those who will be retiring in the next few years.

4. Secondly, there is nothing in the Financial Memorandum that sets out the cost for training nurses to become qualified health visitors, nor is it clear where funding for this would come from. This would be a significant cost which needs to be addressed by the Scottish Government, both in relation to the additional health visitors required to deliver Named Person duties, and in relation to the current more general shortage of health visitors.

5. Finally, I would like to reiterate our call for health visitors to be the Named Person for children aged 0 – 5 (following discharge from maternity services), and that this, together with a commitment to a universal health visiting service, should be made explicit in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. This is the position of all of our health visiting campaign partners: Scotland’s Commissioner for Children & Young People, Children in Scotland, Parenting across Scotland, Queen’s Nursing Institute Scotland, Royal College of General Practitioners, Community Practitioners and Health Visitors Association/Unite, and the Centre for Confidence and Wellbeing.

The Royal College of Psychiatrists in Scotland has consulted the Faculty of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry on this Bill, overall the Bill appears very sensible and evidence based. It takes forward the Early years agenda very positively and raises the profile of children’s rights. The Faculty are in full support of the Bill.

PART 1: RCSLT BILL RESPONSE

1. The advice

1.1 The Royal College of Speech and Language Therapists (RCSLT) support the aspiration to make Scotland the best place grow up and to do this by putting children at the heart of planning and delivery of services.

1.2 RCSLT advises MSPs and Ministers that, if Scotland is to become the best place to grow up, Scotland needs to be the best at optimising all children and young people’s (CYP) speech, language and communication (SLC) development.

1.3 Unlike other parts of the UK Scotland currently has no comprehensive, strategic focus on developing all CYP SLC and local services targeting SLC development are currently being closed down or significantly reduced year on year.

1.4 The Bill offers Scotland a strategic opportunity to make a step change in CYP SLC development - a change which could impact on outcomes for individuals, families, communities and the nation for generations to come – as well as stemming the tide of short term, ill-informed cuts today for higher costs tomorrow.

1.5 RCSLT calls for three fundamental outcomes from the enactment of the Bill:

i) That it places a duty on Ministers, relevant and responsible authorities (or leads to directions or guidance) to optimise the speech, language and communication (SLC) development of every CYP in Scotland.

ii) Where SLC is an area of difficulty, the Act also makes it a duty (or leads to directions or guidance) for these same persons to identify, recognise and adapt their service communications effectively to CYP individual SLC in the delivery of all public services. That is it establishes a duty to apply quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout public services responsible for applying the Act.

iii) That it leads to orders, directions or guidance on training and qualification standards for all those working with children which include developing competences in understanding the wellbeing risks associated with SLC difficulties; optimising the SLC development of all CYP; informing and engaging parents in supporting their child’s SLC development, identifying SLC needs in CYP and parents and responding effectively to the SLC needs of CYP and parents.
2. The case for action - SLC outcomes and making Scotland the best place to grow up

2.1 The majority of young people in crisis have SLC difficulties. For example, more than 60% of children referred to psychiatric services, 88% of young unemployed men and 26%-70% of young men in Polmont Young Offenders Institute have SLC difficulties.

2.2 The European Union’s Employment, Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council noted that communication difficulties put children unnecessarily at risk. It has invited member states to strengthen efforts in raising public awareness of communication disorders in young people (Council of the European Union 2011).

2.3 Communication capacity underpins realisation of Rights. For example Article 12 (respect for the views of the child) states “Every child has the right to say what they think in all matters affecting them, and to have their views taken seriously.” To enjoy equal rights children need to be able to express themselves to the best of their ability.

2.4 Communication ability underpins any realisation of well-being through the ‘SHANARRI’ indicators of safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included. ‘SHANARRI’ refers directly to factors that require communication capacity, for example, “respected” (R) is defined as “Having the opportunity, along with carers, to be heard and involved in decisions which affect them”. Communication is frequently cited as a feature of the symptomatology of abuse and neglect, with the evidence pointing clearly to the effects on expressive ability. This would inform the “Safe” (S) indicator. In comparison with the general population, people with communication support needs (CSN) are more likely to experience negative communication within education, healthcare, criminal justice system and other public services; have difficulty accessing information required in order to utilise services; be misjudged in terms of cognitive and educational level; be unemployed or employed at an inappropriately low level and live in socially deprived areas. This clearly informs the “Included” (I) indicator.

2.5 Communication capacity underpins “Getting it Right for Every Child” (GIRFEC). For example, the Scottish Government’s guide to GIRFEC (June 2012) outlines what GIRFEC means for CYP and their families, for example saying “They understand what is happening and why”. Further Values and Principles of GIRFEC include “Putting the child at the centre: Children and young people should have their views listened to and they should be involved in decisions that affect them”. GIRFEC The Resilience Matrix refers to the ability to “Talk to other people about the things that frighten or bother me.”

2.6 Communication is a key strand of the Early Years Framework. Early Years Outcome Indicator Number 16 measures the percentage of children displaying age-appropriate communication skills. The Development of Optimal SLC in CYP requires the early development of fundamental skills that underpin all lifelong learning.

2.7 Communication capacity underpins good parenting, care and corporate parenting. Parents’ own SLC competence directly affects their ability to interact positively and establish good relationships with their child (the basis of positive attachment and bonding); access and benefit from parenting support and other services; and is a risk factor for social and economic disadvantage and “model” language and communication for their child to learn from.

2.8 Common Core Skills allude to speech, language and communication capacity. The first of two “context” of the essential characteristics of those working with CYP and families is “Relationships with children, young people and families”. Positive relationships are founded on effective communication between parties.

2.9 Around half of CYP from deprived communities have SLC difficulties and they are the most common difficulty experienced by CYP - two in every classroom. At universal level there are large but un-quantified gaps in the CYP workforce, SLC development and support competences and no comprehensive plan to develop these. It is widely recognised that skilled staff are essential to the development of the child’s language and communication. The last review (2003) of services for CYP with SLCN expressed concern about the limited knowledge and confidence of staff to deal with SLC and called for more professional development opportunities.

2.11 Awareness and understanding of communication capacity, including the ability to identify difficulties and their impact, is varied at best but often low. For example, the GIRFEC tool “My world triangle” includes “Being able to communicate” as important but omits comprehension as the essential first aspect.

of the communication dyad. Children cannot express themselves meaningfully (or learn) without comprehension.

2.12 Targeted SLC services (i.e. targeted at vulnerable groups) are currently non-existent, geographically patchy, under threat or being terminated. For example, the award winning Speech and Language Therapist (SLT) led “Communication Help and Awareness Team” (CHAT) in Forth Valley has been effective in enhancing the language skills of pre-school children and has been shown to be more advantageous than nursery education alone\(^\text{xi}\). CHAT funding ceases as of 1st August 2013. The unique SLT led ‘Before Words’ project in Moray produces accessible parent information (reading age 9) to support SLC development from pre-birth to sentence building stages. Materials emphasise the relationship between attachment and developing communication in children and help parents to use everyday tasks as opportunities to develop communication. ‘Before Words’ reaches all parents but particularly targets vulnerable families.

2.13 Scotland is witnessing a diminishing pool of professional experts in SLC development – specifically qualified to develop and/or deliver universal, targeted and specialist SLC services. The Allied Health Professions Waiting Times Census (2012) showed that in one week in February 2012, 95% of CYP referred waited 27 – 81 weeks to see a SLT\(^\text{xii}\). 577 whole time equivalent\(^\text{xiii}\) or 60% of SLTs working in Scotland work for CYP. SLT capacity in Scotland has decreased by 2.4% since 2008\(^\text{xiv}\). Funding for SLT services have been cut in the majority (6/9) of health boards and at least 50% (5/10) of local authorities (who responded to an FOI) since 2011\(^\text{xv}\). One service has reported a 100% funding cut over 2 years from their local authority. Current SLT capacity issues create a significant challenge to meeting the universal early intervention and prevention agenda of the Early Years Collaboration.

2.14 Literacy difficulties can mask more fundamental speech, language and communication difficulties but don’t get the same strategic attention. To learn the 3Rs individuals first need to have more basic speech, language and communication skills\(^\text{xvi}\). Reading and writing difficulties are the publicly observable symptoms of more fundamental, underlying SLC difficulties. There is no SLC strategy like the Literacy Action Plan.

2.15 Inclusive Communication best practice is inconsistent across communication needs groups and communities across Scotland. The Scottish Government Equalities Unit has commissioned several SLT led projects producing guidelines and practical toolkits to support implementation of inclusive communication good practice in Scotland\textsuperscript{xvii}. These toolkits and guidelines are not universally applied. Further, there are no regulatory checks on the inclusion of communication disadvantaged groups or “communication inequality” in Scotland – unlike checks on inclusion of physically disadvantaged groups.

2.16 A strategic focus on speech, language and communication capacity makes a difference. The ‘Bercow Review’ (2008)\textsuperscript{xviii} (England) set out 40 recommendations to improve services across five themes and led the UK Government to invest around £55 million over three years in “Better Communication: An Action Plan to Improve Services for Children and Young People with Speech, Language and Communication Needs”\textsuperscript{xix}. Communications Champion Jean Gross reported that, in two years, the “Better Communication Action Plan” led to;

  \item [i)] Increased awareness of the centrality of good communication skills to children’s learning, wellbeing and life chances. Activity has provided practical support to those front-line workers and to parents.
  \item [ii)] Measurable improvements in the percentage of 5 yr olds achieving age appropriate levels in the ‘Language for Thinking’ early years foundation stage profile \item [iii)] A reduction from 23% to 18% of parents who were concerned about their child’s SLC development reporting that they did not receive any help \item [iv)] Increasing recognition of communication skills as a priority in local strategic planning leading several local areas to develop a community-wide strategy to promote improved communication skills for all children. For example the ‘Stoke Speaks Out’ early years campaign reduced the % of 3-4 year-olds with language delay from 64% in 2004 to 39% in 2010.
  \item [v)] Some helpful policy developments at government level such as the joint work of the departments of education and health to establish communication and language as a prime area of children’s learning.

2.17 Quality SLT Services prevent spending and poor outcomes. Independent economic evaluation showed quality universal, targeted and specialist SLT services can deliver an annual net benefit of at least £58 million to the Scottish economy. Every £1 invested in enhanced SLT generates £6.40, derived from improved communication leading to improved educational achievement and inclusion.

2.18 Recent mass surveys tell us parents and the children’s workforce need help to ensure optimum development of communication capacity. Learning from the English SLC strategy “Better Communication Action Plan”\(^{xx}\), (reported by Jean Gross, England’s Communication Champion (2012) showed 82% of 3,000 parents believed that more information on how children develop speech, language and communication would be helpful. The Scottish survey commissioned by NHS Health Scotland, ‘Exploration of the information support needs of parents’, found that these parents as a group identified “speech and language as a priority child development issue”\(^{xxi}\). Gross suggests several good practice success factors including:

i) Approaches which build capacity in the children’s workforce - sustained professional development that changes adults’ interactions with children and helps them provide communication-supportive environments

ii) Approaches for children, young people and adults which build on their strengths rather than focusing on their weaknesses

Part 1: Rights of Children

3.1 Subsection 1. Duties of Scottish Ministers in relation to the rights of the child
(1) RCSLT fully supports the establishment of duties for Scottish Ministers and authorities as described.
(1) (a) and (b): If and when the Bill becomes an Act RCSLT would implore Scottish Ministers to make early consideration of whether CYP with SLC enjoy their rights under the UNCRC.
(2): It would be helpful to ensure Ministers have a duty to promote public awareness and understanding among ALL children – this is to include CYP and parents (for example) with SLC.
The Bill could achieve this by establishing a duty to apply quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout public services responsible for applying the Act.

3.2 Subsection 3: Authorities to which section 2 applies:
(1): Given the Scottish Prison Service (SPS) provides services to young people at Polmont Young Offenders Institute it would be helpful to include the SPS in the initial list of Children’s Services to which duties in the Bill apply.

Part 2: Commissioner for Children and Young people in Scotland

3.3 Subsection 5: Investigations by the Commissioner
(2): RCSLT fully supports the extension of the powers of the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland (SCCYP) to carry out individual and general investigations; to make recommendations and require response to these and to publish statements provided in response as described.

RCSLT would wish the Bill to ensure all CYP, regardless of SLC capacity, have equal access to the offices of the SCCYP.

The Bill could achieve this by establishing a duty to apply quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout public services responsible for applying the Act.

RCSLT believe that many CYP may wish the SCCYP to investigate their experience of services. For example CYP with SLC difficulties may wish to raise the issue of communication exclusion from many community facilities, prompting an investigation into how service providers match the SLC level of CYP while having “regards to rights, interests and views of child”.

There is potential therefore for the there to be high demand on the resources of the Commissioner.

RCSLT ask how the powers of the SCCYP will be matched by resource to enact those powers.

Part 3: Children’s Services Planning

3.4 Subsection 7: Introductory
(3): RCSLT would wish SLT to be included among CYP services specified by order by Scottish Ministers.
(6): RCSLT welcome the joint exercise of functions by local authorities and relevant health boards.

3.4 Subsection 10: Children’s services plan process
(1)(a): SLT (and AHPs more generally) are not currently directly represented on NHS Boards. RCSLT are concerned therefore that consultation on these important Children’s Service Plans - which will have significant impact on SLT as the most common AHP delivering services to CYP- with “health boards” will potentially fail to recognise the value and impact of SLTs specifically and AHPs more generally on CYP outcomes.

RCSLT hope Scottish Ministers will specify by direction (under 10, (1), (b) (iii) the need to consult specifically with key health staff groups.

3.5 (8) (and Subsection 13 (1)): The manner of publication of plans should ideally be consistent across Scotland to better enable service users, the public, providers and Ministers to share learning and hold authorities and health boards to account.

3.6 Subsection 12: Implementation of Children’s Services plans:
(2) The option to implement plans “as far as is reasonably practicable” could leave many CYP without services which best safeguard, support and promote well being.

(3) Service providers ideally should be required to provide evidence of why they consider a plan may reasonably adversely affect the well being of a child.

3.7 Subsection 15: Guidance in relation to children’s services planning and Subsection 16: Directions in relation to children’s service planning

RCSLT welcomes the Scottish Ministers powers to issue Guidance. And Directions in relation to Children’s Services plans.

If the Bill declines to place a duty on Ministers, relevant and responsible authorities, RCSLT would wish early direction or guidance to:
- ensure local authorities and relevant health boards incorporate strategic action to optimise SLC development of every CYP in Scotland in to joint children’s service plans;
- require these same persons to identify, recognise and adapt their service communications effectively to CYP and parents individual SLC needs in the delivery of all public services. That it is to establish and apply quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout the public services responsible for applying the Act and
- to training all those working with children so that they are competent in optimising the SLC development of all CYP; identifying SLC needs in CYP and parents and responding effectively to the SLC needs of CYP and parents.

Part 4: Provision of Named Persons:

3.8 Subsection 19: Named Person Services

RCSLT welcomes the establishment of the role of a “Named Person”.

(3) RCSLT welcomes the broad flexibility offered by the Bill in respect of who the named person might be.

RCSLT hope the Minister will take advice from a broad spectrum of CYP workforce professional bodies (including AHPs) with regards to who among the workforce already has relevant training, qualification, experience or position to “qualify” as a named person. Further RCSLT would hope that as the most common AHP working with CYP from early years in to primary and with extensive undergraduate training in general CYP development that SLTs could fulfil the role of named person with appropriate resources.

(3) (b) RCSLT welcomes Scottish Ministers power to specify training, qualification, experience or position of individuals who might be named persons.

RCSLT advise that the training and qualification standards for named person services include developing competences in optimising the SLC development of all CYP; identifying SLC needs in CYP and parents and responding effectively to the SLC needs of CYP and parents.

(5) RCSLT agree the functions described for the named person services are the right functions.

RCSLT highlight however that in order to fulfil these functions effectively named person services will need to be comprehensively informed of all services available and how they impact on well being etc.

RCSLT also highlight that good practice (including many professional codes of practice, standards etc.) dictates that every member of the CYP workforce has an advocacy role implied in the functions of the named person. It would be a loss were this role for all CYP practitioners to be constrained, even by implication, by the Bill.

RCSLT recommends an addition to the Bill to the effect that all CYP practitioners will continue to be expected to fulfil the same or similar functions to the named person as dictated by good practice guidelines, professional codes of practice etc.

3.9 Subsection 23: Communication in relation to movement of children and young people and Subsection 25: Duty to help named person

RCSLT recognise and support the intention of establishing named person services to ensure CYP and their parents get access to all the services they can benefit from.

RCSLT are concerned however about the power given to named person services by these two clauses, particularly in light of point 3.8 above and related evidence on awareness of SLT development, impact of SLC difficulties and the role and value of SLT services.

23 (3) (a) (i) for example leaves it up to the named person service to judge if information on a CYP or parent “might be relevant” to “the incoming service provider”.

25 (1) and (2) also empower the named service provider to make critical decisions about whether a child would or would not benefit from an intervention and even what that intervention should be. Further, the other service provider or relevant authority is under a duty to comply with requests for help.

The evidence base on how SLT services can best develop a CYP SLC tells us that SLT services should be delivered at “universal”, “targeted” and “specialist” levels.
Universal and targeted levels involve everyone around a CYP and effectively applying strategies as a team (learned via SLT advice, guidance and training) to boost CYP SLC development and / or to enable them to communicate (and therefore learn etc.) effectively despite a SLC difficulty. Universal and targeted levels of SLT are helpful to 80% of CYP. These levels, however, don’t involve specialist 1:1 or group SLT where the SLT takes the CYP away from their environment and then delivers them back “cured”.

Unfortunately the poorly informed popular understanding (even among experienced teachers etc.) is that SLTs do and should only work at a specialist level; that solving a SLC difficulty is “their job” - not everyone’s job.

This misunderstanding or lack of knowledge of the evidence base on SLC development is a significant source of tension between SLTs and colleagues, SLTs and some parents and even parties who negotiate service level agreements in many parts of Scotland.

In light of above RCSLT ask that the Bill acts to ensure named person services (in the course of making decisions about relevant information to pass on to “incoming service providers” and applying duties to help named persons) demonstrate they have consulted with and reached agreement with the active parties in “the outgoing service providers” and service providers practically providing the intervention.

23: RCSLT highlight that effective transfer between service providers, although very welcome, could prove administratively challenging.

RCSLT would recommend early guidance or an order from Scottish Ministers, laying out a standard process including forms etc. would be very helpful.

3.10 24: Duty to communicate information about the role of named persons

(1) and (2): RCSLT highlight it is important that information reaches all CYP and parents including those with SLC and that it is not made incumbent on CYP and parents to tell services they have SLC (including literacy difficulties) before they get access to information which they might not know exists if they can’t read.

To this end, RCSLT would advise that the Bill requires all service providers to publish all general and individualised information in communication accessible format – as standard and not just “on request”.

The Bill could achieve this by establishing a duty to apply quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout public services responsible for applying the Act.

3.11 26: Information Sharing:
RCSLT supports information sharing between authorities.

3.12 28: Guidance in relation to named person services and 29: Directions in relation to named person services
RCSLT welcome the Scottish Ministers power to issue guidance and directions in relation to named people.

If the Bill declines to place a duty on Ministers and relevant and responsible authorities RCSLT would wish early direction or guidance to
- ensure named person services take action to optimise SLC development of every CYP in Scotland;
- require these same persons to identify, recognise and adapt their service communications effectively to CYP and parents individual SLC needs in the delivery of all public services. That is it establish apply quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout public services responsible for applying the Act and
- ensure named persons receive training so that they have competences in optimising the SLC development of all CYP; identifying SLC needs in CYP and parents and responding effectively to the SLC needs of CYP and parents.

Part 5: Child’s Plan

3.13 31: Child’s plan requirement and 32: Content of Child’s Plan

RCSLT generally support Child’s Plans in principle.

The Child’s Plan appears to have a similar function to Co-ordinated Support Plans (CSPs) issued under the Additional Support for Learning Act.

RCSLT seek clarification of the relationship between Child’s Plans and CSPs in the Bill.

3.14 31 (2), (3), (4), 32 (1): RCSLT are concerned that responsible authorities are not currently consistently identifying well being needs or necessarily well informed to make reliable judgements as to
- whether a targeted intervention is required or
- informed about the nature of intervention required or
- the manner in which it should be provided or
- realistic outcomes which might be expected from an intervention.

To be effective RCSLT would wish the Bill to require responsible authorities to draw on expert knowledge and the evidence base concerning these judgements.

The Bill (or subsequent orders, guidance or directions) could help to ensure this by securing appropriate professional advisory structures in (or shared by) relevant responsible authorities. Given the evidence presented on incidence of SLC needs and impact on well being, RCSLT would hope SLTs (and other relevant AHPs) would be directly represented on these professional advisory structures – by guidance etc.

3.15 31 (5): Ascertaining and having regard to CYP and parents views “as far as reasonably practicable to ascertain” should explicitly not exclude CYP or parents with SLC difficulties where those difficulties can be overcome by use of quality inclusive communication practice.
RCSLT recommend that rather than a subjective and potentially inconsistent and erroneous view of a child’s maturity it would be more helpful here to specify the child’s optimum capacity to understand and express their views (with the aid of augmentative and alternative commutation aids if required). This, like age, can be objectively determined by skilled assessment (by an SLT) where any dispute of maturity might arise.

RCSLT would also wish the Bill to ensure in making decisions about whether a plan was necessary that responsible authorities were also be required to ascertain views of other service providers.

3.17 33: Preparation of child’s plan

(3): RCSLT has concerns regarding the phrase “as soon as is reasonably practicable” as it could mean some CYP could wait a very long time for a Child’s Plan at significant detriment to them.

RCSLT suggest Scottish Ministers should be empowered to set maximum time limits by order, guidance or direction.

(4): RCSLT ask for clarification around how this clause is compatible with section 25: Duty to help the named person. If it does in fact mean requests by a named person need only be complied with – with agreement of the service provider it would be helpful to make this clearer in section 25.

(5): It would be helpful for the Bill to require responsible and relevant authorities to publish data on unresolved agreements between each on an annual basis. This would make public where relationships and understanding between boards and local authorities were an ongoing source of difficulty in relation to provision of targeted interventions such as SLT. Requirement to publish dispute figures may have the effect of encouraging parties to review and build better relationships as described in Scottish Governments “Working in Partnership” guidance.

(1) Delivery of targeted interventions for the majority of CYP with SLC needs are currently paid for by service level agreements (SLAs) between education authorities and health boards. There is widespread year on year reductions in the value of these SLAs leading in some cases to complete cessation or withdrawal of SLT services to CYP with known need.

RCSLT seek clarification as to the status and continuation of these SLAs in light of the CYP Bill and in particular this section. Bluntly – will funds still transfer to pay for SLT for CYP with SLC needs from local authorities to health boards?
Without clarity the Bill could unintentionally lead to a situation where NHS Boards are required to provide SLT with no funds to provide that service to the severe detriment of CYP with or at risk of developing SLC.

The difficulty of where funds come from could be resolved by placing a duty on Ministers, relevant and responsible authorities (or directions or guidance) to optimise the speech and language and communication (SLC) development of every CYP in Scotland.

RCSLT are concerned by the use of the phrase “so far as reasonably practicable”. This “get out” could disadvantage CYP who benefit from essential services which, for a variety of reasons, have a low data or profile locally and nationally such as SLT. Currently, for example, there are no statistics regularly gathered on SLT (or other AHP) waiting times. Unmet needs in these areas can go unnoticed.

It would be helpful for the Bill to require responsible and relevant authorities to publish data on all unmet targeted interventions and reasons why these were unmet on an annual basis. This could expose where for example boards and local authorities were repeatedly failing to meet the well being needs of CYP.

3.19 37: Child’s Plan Management and review:

(1) Similar to comments in relation to subsection (25) above, RCSLT have concerns regarding managing authorities determining if the manner of targeted intervention - or manner of provision - is still appropriate. RCSLT query a managing authorities capacity to make this judgement.

(2) and (5) RCSLT are pleased managing authorities will be required to consult with those providing services on management plans and reviews and that Scottish Ministers will be empowered to make orders on when and how these are to be carried out. Would wish the Bill to ensure managing authorities must agree any changes to plan - after review - with responsible authorities similar to 33 (4).

3.20 39: Guidance and child’s plan and 40: Directions in relation to child’s plans

RCSLT welcomes the Scottish Ministers capacity to issue Guidance and Directions in relation to Child’s Plans.

If the Bill declines to place a duty on Ministers and relevant and responsible authorities RCSLT would wish early direction or guidance to:

- ensure child’s plans include action to optimise SLC development of the CYP;
- require managing and responsible authorities to identify, recognise and adapt their service communications effectively to CYP and parents individual SLC needs in the delivery of all public services. That is it should establish application of quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout public services and
- ensure those developing, delivering and reviewing child’s plans receive training so that they have competences in understanding the risks to well being associated with SLC needs; optimising the SLC development of all CYOP including determining appropriate targeted interventions; identifying SLC needs in CYP and parents and responding effectively to the SLC needs of CYP and parents.

Part 6: Early Learning and Childcare

3.21 42: Early learning and childcare:

This is a crucial part of the Bill for children with SLC needs given “early learning and childcare” is specifically defined as “a service, consisting of education and care... with regard being had to the importance of interactions and other experiences which support learning and development in a caring and nurturing setting.”.

“Interactions” are communication exchanges between the child and those around them.

RCSLT are very pleased that the Bill specifically identifies “interactions” as important in early years.

RCSLT note that in the Explanatory Notes to the Bill “Guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers under section 34 of the Standards in Scotland’s Schools Act 2000 (the 2000 Act) ... will be used to provide more detail as to what those types of interactions and experiences will encapsulate.”

RCSLT would be very keen to contribute the development of that guidance and recommend that the guidance sets out actions for early years providers specifically geared to optimising CYP SLC development.

3.22 43: Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare and 44: Mandatory amount of provision:

While supporting in principle a minimum provision of early years education to all children RCSLT are concerned the Bill, as is, focuses solely on amount of provision without similar focus on quality of that provision.

Exposure to quality communication environments in early years is a key determinant of SLC and other areas of development (as the Chief Medical Officer relates in the Explanatory notes).

We might assume that parents from poorer backgrounds will be unlikely to “top up” 600 hours statutory provision. The quality of the statutory provision their CYP access will therefore be absolutely crucial to closing well being inequalities among CYP and communities generally.

Education authorities may therefore be driven to attend to quantity irrespective of quality particularly if it is only the comparatively weaker guidance (issued under Section 34 of Scotland’s Schools Act) which describes aspects of quality of early years education and childcare.

RCSLT would recommend the Bill empowers Scottish Ministers to issue orders in respect of quality of early years education and childcare as well as quantity.

3.23 45: Looked after children: alternative arrangements to meet well being needs

Evidence shows that looked after children are at higher risk of delayed or disordered SLC development than their peers.

RCSLT would recommend the Bill empowers Scottish Ministers to issue orders in respect of quality of early years education and childcare – including in circumstances where alternative arrangements were made.

3.23 46: Duty to consult and plan delivery of early learning and childcare:

(1) (a) and (b) SLTs and more generally health boards will be responsible (under provisions for example related to children’s service plans, named person services and child plans) at least in part for quality of early years education and childcare.

It would be helpful, therefore, if education authorities were also required to consult with these parties about “how it should make early learning and childcare available, and after having regard to views expressed, prepare and publish a plan ... etc”

3.24 47: Method of delivery of early learning and childcare and 48: Flexibility in way in which early learning and childcare is made available

Similar to above, while welcoming the above provisions in principle RCSLT would wish the Bill to require education authorities to provide early learning and childcare services in a way which optimises working with partner agencies.

Part 7: Corporate Parenting

3.25 50: Corporate Parents:

The Scottish Prison Service has responsibility for the day to day care of vulnerable young people, a disproportionately high number of whom have been through the care system.

RCSLT ask whether the SPS should be added to schedule 3 as corporate parents.

3.26 52: Corporate Parenting Responsibilities

Evidence shows that looked after children are at higher risk of delayed or disordered SLC development.

RCSLT welcomes the responsibilities of corporate parents laid out in the Bill.
To fulfil these responsibilities (e.g. to be alert to matters which could adversely affect the wellbeing of CYP; to assess the needs of those CYP for support and services it provides; to seek to provide those CYP with opportunities to participate in activities etc.) corporate parents will need to have themselves – or have access to - appropriate knowledge, skills and personnel capacity. See comments RE: subsections 57 and 58 below.

3.27 52 (d) and (e) (i) and (ii): RCSLT highlight that given the SLC needs of CYP who are looked after, early guidance or directions issued by Scottish Ministers (subsection 57 and 58) should ensure corporate parents take particular action to ensure provision of activities designed to promote their well being that are communication accessible.

3.28 53: Planning by corporate parents:

(2) RCSLT supports the requirement for corporate parents to consult with other corporate parents. RCSLT would wish corporate parents to be required to have regard for the views expressed by other corporate parents.

3.29 54: Collaborative working among corporate parents:

(1) RCSLT welcome the requirement for corporate parents to work collaboratively however we are concerned by the phrase “as far as is reasonably practicable”.

As described above this “get out” could disadvantage CYP who could benefit from essential services which, for a variety of reasons, have a low profile locally and nationally such as SLT. There are currently very few SLT services for secondary school or older CYP in Scotland (despite the evidence showing SLC difficulties can follow CYP in to adulthood) and few, if any, dedicated services for looked after CYP despite the known high need in this group.

3.30 55: Reports by Corporate Parents:

(3) It would be helpful if corporate parents working collaboratively at a local level were required to report jointly on joint corporate parent related activity and outcomes. This would encourage joint working, enable full parental overview and support transfer of lessons learned between corporate parents at a local and national level.

3.31 57: Guidance on corporate parenting and 58: Directions to corporate parents

RCSLT welcome the Bills proposals that Scottish Ministers will be empowered to issue guidance and directions in relation the complex and important task of corporate parenting.

RCSLT would hope early guidance or direction ensures corporate parents take particular action to meet the disproportionately high SLC needs among looked after children.
If the Bill declines to place a duty on Ministers and relevant and responsible authorities RCSLT would wish early direction or guidance to

- ensure corporate parents take action to optimise SLC development of CYP in their care;
- require corporate parents to identify, recognise and adapt their service communications effectively to CYP individual SLC needs in the delivery of all public services. That is apply quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout services and
- ensure relevant personnel working on behalf of corporate parents receive training so that they have competences in understanding the well being risks associated with SLC difficulties; optimising the SLC development of all CYP; identifying SLC needs in CYP and responding effectively to the SLC needs of CYP.

Part 8: Aftercare

3.32 60: Provision of aftercare to young people
(2) (c): Given that many young people leaving care have SLC needs, RCSLT would wish the Bill to ensure any advice, guidance and assistance offered to care leavers by local authorities is optimally communication accessible. That is, apply quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout aftercare services.

Part 9: Counselling services

3.33 61: Provision of counselling services to parents and others

RCSLT welcomes provision of counselling services to parents of eligible children and others and the Scottish Ministers right to make orders in respect of that provision.

RCSLT highlights that parents, particularly vulnerable parents, have SLC needs which could impair their ability to benefit from this provision in the Bill.

RCSLT would hope an early order from Scottish Ministers would ensure all parents, regardless of SLC capacity, were enabled to access these counselling services.

Alternatively communication accessibility of counselling services could be assured by establishing a duty to apply quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout public services responsible for applying the Act.

3.34 74: Assessment of wellbeing

(2): RCSLT welcome the stipulation of the assessment of well being in respect of SHANARRI measures and further welcomes the requirement on Scottish Ministers to issue guidance on how these aspects of well being are to be “used” to assess well being – although use of the word “used” is not particularly clear here.
Given the evidence presented (see appendix) on the link between SLCN and SHANARRI outcomes RCSLT would hope that early Ministerial Guidance alerts persons to these links and provides guidance on how to optimise the SLC development and capacity of all CYP.

If the Bill declines to place a duty on Ministers and relevant and responsible authorities to optimise SLC development of all CYP RCSLT would wish early direction or guidance to

- ensure services take action to optimise SLC development of every CYP in Scotland;
- require these same persons to identify, recognise and adapt their service communications effectively to CYP and parents individual SLC needs in the delivery of all public services. That is establish application of quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout public services responsible for applying the Act and
- ensure the CYP workforce receives training so that they have competences in understanding the wellbeing risks associated with SLC difficulties; optimising the SLC development of all CYP; identifying SLC needs in CYP and parents and responding effectively to the SLC needs of CYP and parents.

Reference / Evidence summary:

1. In December 2011, the EU's Employment, Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council noted that communication difficulties put children unnecessarily at risk of poor educational, social and economic progress, and that prevention, early detection, follow up and appropriate intervention could be very effective in avoiding or minimising the consequences of such problems. It has invited member states to strengthen efforts in raising public awareness of communication disorders in young people (Council of the European Union 2011).

2. No national strategy after “Play, Talk, Read”

   Although communication capacity is central to most, if not all of the policies related to the Bill (see below), there remains only a diffuse or implicit reference to communication capacities in policy.

   To illustrate - although “Play, Talk, Read” is a very welcome strategy which encourages parents to create a good environment for speech, language and communication development from an early age – there are no strategies to;
   - ensure optimum communication capacity development for children who’s parents themselves have communication capacity difficulties (i.e. vulnerable parents, parents with mental health or learning difficulties, parents in prison, or those of low socioeconomic status with disproportionately high literacy difficulties) or
   - to follow up on CYP or parents who don’t manage to develop normal speech, language and communication (SLC) either in the early years or once CYP reach school.
3. Communication capacity underpins realisation of Rights.

Article 12 (respect for the views of the child)
Every child has the right to say what they think in all matters affecting them, and to have their views taken seriously.

To enjoy equal rights children need to be able to express themselves to the best of their ability.

Article 13 (freedom of expression)
Every child must be free to say what they think and to seek and receive information of any kind as long as it is within the law.

To enjoy equal rights children need to be able to understand information to the best of their ability.

Therefore to enjoy, as much as possible, their rights under the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) every CYP needs to have the opportunity to develop the best possible speech, language and communication skills and, where this is an area of difficulty, society needs to recognise and adapt effectively to their individual speech, language and communication needs (SLCN).

4. Communication capacity underpins realisation of well-being (SHANARRI)

The “headline” definition of well being – SHANARRI – refers directly to factors that require communication capacity. Aspects of communication capacity are explicitly recognised for example in descriptors of...

RESPECTED (R) = Having the opportunity, along with carers, to be heard and involved in decisions which affect them

RESPONSIBLE (R) = Having opportunities and encouragement to play active and responsible roles in their schools and communities and where necessary, having appropriate guidance and supervision and being involved in decisions that affect them.

However even although communication capacities are explicitly recognised as being essential to well being, the final “INCLUDED” descriptor fails to list “communication inequality” as a barrier to well being – although “physical” inequalities are recognised.

There is strong evidence of the links between well being factors in SHANARRI and SLC needs.

Given the explicit recognition of communication capacities as key to well being, and the evidence linking SLC difficulties and poor outcomes - RCSLT argue to achieve the best possible well being for every child or young person every CYP needs to have the opportunity to develop the best possible speech, language and communication skills and, where this is an area of difficulty, society needs to recognise and adapt effectively to their individual speech, language and communication needs.

5. Communication capacity underpins Getting it Right for Every Child (GIRFEC)

Scottish Government’s guide to GIRFEC (June 2012) outlines what GIRFEC means for CYP and their families, for example;
- They understand what is happening and why
- They have been listened to carefully and their wishes have been heard and understood
- They are appropriately involved in discussions and decisions that affect them

Core components of GIRFEC includes;
- A common approach to gaining consent and to sharing information where appropriate

Consent requires people to understand what’s on offer and to express agreement or otherwise.

Values and Principles of GIRFEC include;
- Putting the child at the centre: Children and young people should have their views listened to and they should be involved in decisions that affect them
- Supporting informed choice: Supporting children, young people and families in understanding what help is possible and what their choices may be

“My world triangle “includes under “How I grow and develop”... “Being able to communicate”.

The Resilience Matrix refers to the ability to “Talk to other people about the things that frighten or bother me”

xiii Mouridsen and Hauschild 2008
People of all ages with communication support needs have higher incidence of “Adversity” and “Vulnerability” characteristics set out in the “Resistance / vulnerability” matrix which informs GIRFEC.

Evidence shows, in comparison with the general population people with SLC needs (or communication support needs) are more likely to:
- be unemployed or employed at an inappropriately low level
- be victims of crime
- be convicted of crime
- have difficulty accessing information required in order to utilise services
- live in socially deprived areas.
- experience negative communication within education, healthcare, criminal justice system and other public services
- be misjudged in terms of cognitive and educational level

RCSLT argue therefore that to deliver on GIRFEC every CYP needs to have the opportunity to develop the best possible speech, language and communication skills and, where this is an area of difficulty, society needs to recognise and adapt effectively to their individual SLC needs.

6. Communication is a key strand of the Early Years Framework

Early Years Outcome Indicator no. 16. measures the percentage of children displaying age-appropriate communication skills.

The short term outcomes under this indicator is
- Awareness of what constitutes age-appropriate communication skills

In the medium terms outcomes are:
- Identifying children who have speech, language and communication needs (SLCN)
- Intervening early to enable them to communicate and engage more effectively with others and in an education environment.

This is a very welcome strategic driver as it promotes focus and action on children’s communication capacity.

This driver however needs a comprehensive strategy behind it to enable parents and services across Scotland to effectively and efficiently deliver the best early years “Outcome 16” results. The profile of the importance of SLC development also needs to be extended beyond early years and beyond policy – to legislation, regulation or national guidance.

7. Communication capacity underpins the good parenting xvi Early Years Outcomes; This Outcomes Framework lays out the short, medium and long-term outcomes associated with the indicators identified for the Early Years Framework. For further information on The National Outcomes see: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/scotPerforms/outcomes Parents' own SLC competence directly affects their ability to

- interact positively and establish good relationships with their child (or establish strong attachment),
- access and benefit from parenting support and other services and is a risk factor for social and economic disadvantage and
- “model” language and communication for their child to learn from.

Unfortunately the Early Years Framework gives little or no mention of the communication barriers which might be faced by parents – which in turn impact on their ability to provide appropriate “well being” environments for their children.

To ensure every parent can be the best parent they can be RCSLT argues that every parent and family needs to enjoy equal access to information, advice and support across public services – regardless of their own communication capacities.

Parenting programmes – and all other advice, information and services should demonstrate quality inclusive communication practice.

Strategies to raise parents understanding of SLC development, how they can support it (beyond “Play, Talk Read”) and how to identify problems early etc. should also be put in place.

8. Common Core Skills allude to speech, language and communication capacity

The first of two “context” of the essential characteristics of those working with CYP and families is “Relationships with children, young people and families”. Positive relationships are founded on effective communication between parties.

Within this “context” non-discriminatory practice requires all members of the children’s workforce to
- Understand your impact on children, young people and families and how they might perceive you. Adapt your tone, language and behaviour to suit the circumstances

Respecting the views of the child requires all members of the children’s workforce to
- Include children, young people and families as active participants, listening to them, offering choices

- Explain decisions and ensure children, young people and families fully understand them and their implications, especially if the final decision isn’t what they hoped for

xvii See “Scotland – the best place to bring up children”, A collection of essays o Parenting; Parenting across Scotland (2012); 40-44; http://www.parentingacrossscotland.org/media/253972/pas-the-best-place.pdf

The second “context” for the essential characteristics of those working with CYP and families is “Relationships between workers” which requires all members of the children’s workforce to;

- Be aware of who can help when you cannot communicate effectively with children, young people or families for any reason

Common values of those working with CYP and families in Scotland include;

- Putting the child at the centre: children and young people should have their views listened to and they should be involved in decisions

- Supporting informed choice: supporting children, young people and families in understanding what help is possible and what their choices may be

RCSLT argue that to deliver the objectives of “Common Core Skills” every member of the CYP workforce needs quality assured training in

- optimising the speech, language and communication (SLC) development of all CYP.

- identifying SLC needs in children and parents

- responding effectively at least at a basic and up to an advanced level to the SLC needs of CYP and parents

9. 50% of CYP from deprived communities have SLC difficulties and they are the most common difficulty experienced by CYP

- Communication difficulties are the most common difficulties children have.

- 6% of the total population of children have SLC difficulties equal to 2 children per classroom.

- Over 50% of children from deprived communities enter school with SLC delay or disorder.

10. Children and young people in crisis today clearly indicate what we have been doing until now is not enough

- At Polmont Young Offenders Institute 26% of young men have clinically significant communication impairment and 70% have difficulties with literacy and numeracy\(^{xx}\)

- A study of young unemployed men found that over 88% were described as presenting with language impairment, having some degree of difficulty with language\(^{xx}\).

- A study into young people not in education, employment or training (NEET) showed that 100% of the individuals who completed the speech and language therapy assessments presented with some degree of SLCN, of which 50% had severe difficulties i.e. language levels more than 2 years below their chronological age. Over half (54%) of the young people assessed had a severe communication disability. Only 21% had previously been referred for speech and language therapy\textsuperscript{\textit{xiii}}

- 38% of children referred to child psychiatric services met one or more criteria for previously identified language impairment while 41% met criterion for unsuspected language impairment. In total 63.6% of children referred had a language impairment\textsuperscript{\textit{xiii}}

11. Awareness and understanding of communication capacity, identifying difficulties, their impact etc. is varied at best but often low.

For example although the national guidelines on GIRFEC (June 2012) “My world triangle” includes “Being able to communicate” as important the further description of “communication” omits to mention comprehension / understanding capacity. Even it only refers to one half of communication, i.e. expressive communication capacity. Children are not able to express themselves meaningfully or with relevance without comprehension.

12. Recent mass surveys tell us parents and the children's workforce need help to ensure optimum development of communication capacity.

Learning from the English strategy “Better Communication Action Plan”\textsuperscript{\textit{xlv}}, reported by Communication Champion Jean Gross earlier in 2012 records both a high need and a high demand for information by parents about how they can support their child’s language.

In 2011, a survey of 3,000 parents commissioned by Gross found that 82% believed that more information on how children develop speech, language and communication would be helpful. The survey also exposed widespread lack of knowledge about children’s speech and language development. For example, only a quarter of parents knew that, on average babies, say their first words between 12 and 18 months.

A similar survey by the National Literacy Trust in 2011 found a fifth of parents-to-be believe it is only beneficial to communicate with their baby from the age of three months and one in 20 believes that communicating with their baby is only necessary when they are six months or older.

Gross concludes that ‘much remains to be done to help parents become as aware of when children should be talking as when they should be walking’. She suggests several good practice success factors including:

- Approaches which build capacity in the children’s workforce - sustained professional development that changes adults’ interactions with children and helps them provide communication-supportive environments
- Approaches for children, young people and adults which build on their strengths rather than focusing on their weaknesses

13. At universal level there are large but un-quantified gaps in CYP workforce SLC development and support competences and no comprehensive plan to develop these.

It is widely recognised that skilled staff are essential to the development of the child’s language and communication\textsuperscript{xlvi}

SLTs services, working in both statutory and independent sectors (e.g. I CAN) deliver training to parents and colleagues to optimise all children’s communication capacity – as well as that of children at risk.

Training to develop these competences across Scotland and the CYP workforce varies widely.

The last review (2003) of services for CYP with SLCN expressed concern about the limited knowledge and confidence of staff to deal with SLC \textsuperscript{xlv} and called for more professional development opportunities\textsuperscript{xlvii}.

Scotland has no standards and collects no clear data on this competency within the CYP workforce – even although competences in this area are crucial to delivery of the Bill.

14. Targeted level SLC services (i.e. targeted at vulnerable groups) are non-existent, geographically patchy, under threat or short term.

SLTs across Scotland lead award winning initiatives targeting communication capacities of vulnerable CYP and parents. For example;

- The “Communication Help and Awareness Team” (CHAT) in Forth Valley has been effective in enhancing the language skills of pre-school children and has been shown to be more advantageous than nursery education alone\textsuperscript{xlviii}.

- The ‘Before Words’3 project in Moray, developed in response to health visitor requests for parent information, has produced accessible, illustrated parent information with captions at a reading age of nine covering ante-natal to word-joining stages. Materials emphasise the relationship between attachment and developing communication in children. The illustrations depict a range of family situations and focus on everyday tasks as opportunities to communicate. The project has two strands – universal distribution throughout Moray and targeted intervention with more vulnerable families. Experience shows that parents like the resources; identify with the illustrations; use them to reassure and inform; and work with the advice. Professionals find them easy to access and use; use the resources as a talking point or programme structure; and appreciate them as part of information in training.

Both of these projects though and other SLT led projects focussed on the particular needs of older “at risk” groups (e.g. secondary school and looked after CYP) are generally short term or vulnerable to year by year funding cuts. CHAT funding has been stopped as of August 2013.

An SLT interpretation of the very successful Family Nurse Partnership approach identifies the crucial element of success as good person-centred communication between nurse and mother.

Getting communication right between service providers and parents clearly pays off.

RCSLT suggest that “getting communication right between service providers and parents” more universally (and with a skilled, targeted approach for disadvantaged parents) could achieve at least some of the benefits of the Family Nurse Partnership with a much wider population of parents and children, at a fraction of the cost.

A strategic drive behind SLC development could help establish sustained, best practice SLC targeted level services across Scotland. Making it a duty to apply quality Inclusive Communication standards throughout public services would help services, universally and at a targeted level, to “get the communication right” between service providers and more users more often.

15. Scotland is witnessing a diminishing pool of professional experts in SLC development – specifically qualified to develop and / or deliver universal, targeted and specialist level SLC services

The Allied Health Professions (AHP) Waiting Times Census in Scotland (2012) showed that in one week in February 2012, 95% of CYP referred wait 27 weeks to see a SLT and some up to 81 weeks

SLT capacity in Scotland has decreased by 2.4% since 2008

SLT services funding has been cut in the majority (6/9) of health boards and at least 50% (5/10) of local authorities (who responded to an FOI) since 2011.

These statistics mean Scotland is witnessing a diminishing pool of professional experts in SLC development at the same time as identifying SLC development as crucial to delivery of all the policies listed above.

Reductions in SLC development and communication equality enhancing knowledge, skills, experience and expertise is wholly contrary to delivery of a Scotland for Children.

16. Literacy difficulties can mask more fundamental speech, language and communication difficulties but don’t get the same strategic attention.

Reading and writing difficulties are often the publicly observable symptoms of more fundamental, underlying speech, language and communication difficulties. Problems in these underlying key skills are not as easily observable or known about and don’t attract the same strategic attention – unlike the observable difficulties targeted by the Literacy Action Plan.

Competences in oral language are however vital to subsequent transition to literacy.

To learn the 3Rs individuals first need to have more basic speech, language and communication skills

Scotland needs a comprehensive strategy to enable parents – and services – across Scotland to effectively and efficiently deliver the best speech, language and communication outcomes for all CYP to maximise their reading, writing and numeracy potential.

17. Inclusive Communication best practice is inconsistent across communication needs groups and communities across Scotland.

Evidence shows in comparison with the general population people with communication support needs are more likely to experience negative communication within education, healthcare, criminal justice system and other public services and have difficulty accessing information required in order to utilise services.

The Scottish Government Equalities Unit has over the years sponsored and / or published several guidelines and practical toolkits to support implementation of inclusive communication good practice in Scotland.

Although these toolkits and guidelines are available they are by no means universally applied. Further there are no regulatory checks on the inclusion of communication disadvantaged groups or “communication inequality” in Scotland – unlike checks on inclusion of physically disadvantaged groups. Without strategic leadership and regulation implementation remains patchy and of widely varying quality.

xiii For example: Scottish Government commissioned and / or published Principles of Inclusive Communication; “Talk for Scotland Toolkit”
The absence of universally available, quality, communication accessible information, advice and support services will impede delivery of the Bill’s objectives.

The Bill provides more impetus, if any were needed, to introduce statutory guidance on inclusive, communication accessible publicly produced information.

18. A strategic focus on speech, language and communication capacity makes a difference.

Parts of the UK have taken strategic action to optimise the SLC development of CYP, both universal to support all parents and targeted support for vulnerable parents.

The ‘Bercow Review’ (2008) set out 40 recommendations to improve services across five themes:

- Communication is crucial - a key life skill at the heart of every social interaction and vital to children’s successful development
- Early identification and intervention is essential to maximise each child’s chance of overcoming their communication need and succeeding
- A continuum of services designed around the family for children with communication support needs
- Joint working is critical to deliver services that provide effective support
- The current system is characterised by high variability and a lack of equity

The review led the UK Government to invest around £55 million over three years in “Better Communication: An Action Plan to Improve Services for Children and Young People with Speech, Language and Communication Needs”.

Reports from 30 “Pathfinder” projects are due to be published in October 2012.

Gross reported that, in two years, the “Better Communication Action Plan” led to;

- Increased awareness of the centrality of good communication skills to children’s learning, wellbeing and life chances. Activity has... provided practical support to those front-line workers and to parents.

xxxv Two Years On: final report of the Communication Champion for children; Jean Gross, Communication Champion December 2011http://www.thecommunicationtrust.org.uk/media/9683/nwm_final_jean_gross_two_years_on_report.pdf
• Some measurable improvements in the percentage of five-year-olds achieving age appropriate levels in the ‘Language for Thinking’ early years foundation stage profile
• A reduction from 23% to 18% of parents who were concerned about their child’s SLC development reporting that they did not receive any help
• Increasing recognition of communication skills as a priority in local strategic planning leading several local areas to develop a community-wide strategy to promote improved communication skills for all children. For example the ‘Stoke Speaks Out’ early years campaign which has reduced the percentage of three to four-year-olds with language delay from 64% in 2004 to 39% in 2010.
• Some helpful policy developments at government level such as the joint work of the departments of education and health to establish communication and language as a prime area of children’s learning

19. Quality SLC Services – led by SLTs - save money

There is strong evidence\textsuperscript{lvii} to show the health and social care cost savings, quality of life, and productivity gains generated by SLT exceed their costs.

Quality universal, targeted and specialist SLT services can deliver an annual net benefit of at least £58 million to the Scottish economy. Every £1 invested in enhanced SLT for children with specific language impairment generates £6.40, derived from improved communication leading to improved educational achievement.

\textsuperscript{lvii} Marsh, K., Bertranou, E., Suominen, H. and Venkatachalam, M. (2010). An economic evaluation of speech and language therapy. Matrix Evidence RoSPA Scotland welcomes the opportunity to supply further information to the Education and Culture Committee in respect of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill especially to highlight its views on relevant issues that should be included.

2. The Scottish Government’s aspiration for Scotland to be the best place to grow up in is one which should receive the support of all Scotland’s residents – from the children themselves, to their parents and carers, practitioners and policy makers. This response specifically relates to the Bill’s aim to ‘ensure that children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services.......’.

3. The Bill is about taking forward the ‘Getting it right for every child’ (GIRFEC) principles and this policy claims it has the United Nations Convention on the Right of the Child (UNCRC) at its core. However, although GIRFEC’s “values and principles stress the promotion of children’s well-being by keeping them safe...” the reference in GIRFEC to Article 24 (which states at Section 2 (e): To ensure that all segments of society, in particular parents and children, are informed, have access to education and are supported in the use of basic knowledge of child health and nutrition, the advantages of breastfeeding, hygiene and environmental sanitation and the prevention of accidents) appears to exclude the last point from the indicators or relate to any relevant policy links. This does not support the mention in the Scottish Government’s response to the UN Committee’s 2008 concluding observations which declare at Point 87: “accident prevention needs to be run alongside health promotion especially in areas of deprivation in efforts to reduce health inequalities.”

4. It is a missed opportunity that the Bill does not have the same emphasis on preventative spend and early intervention as that included in the Christie Commission Report (the future delivery of public services). For example the Report lists, as a key object of reform, “All public services need to reduce demand in the system through prevention and early intervention to tackle the root causes of problems and negative outcomes” and one of the Report’s four key objectives is “prioritising prevention, reducing inequalities and promoting equality”. The Bill provides the ideal opportunity for the inclusion of accident prevention. Indeed, Professor Yvonne Doyle, director of Public Health, NHS South of England) states in her foreword to RoSPA’s Big Book of Accident Prevention that “Accidental injury prevention is low cost and high impact. It is easy to deliver (there is a well-worn pathway of best practice) and it is broadly welcomed by the people it helps. Because it affects the young so much, our new research shows that this is also the principal cause of premature, preventable mortality (measured in Preventable Years of Life Lost or PrYLL) for most of a person’s life. We believe it should be the No. 1 priority for public health”.

Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents Scotland
5. Investing in prevention will reduce both dependency on and cost to services as a child grows up. This is well documented in current Scottish Government thinking. RoSPA in Scotland can demonstrate examples of relatively low-cost initiatives that, along with saving lives and preventing serious injuries, will save the cost of public services in the long run. For example, a recent campaign to distribute blind cord cleats (to wind loose blind cords around to prevent the strangulation of young children) cost £8,000 to reach 8,000 families - £1 per family. The current liquitabs campaign being piloted in NHS Greater Glasgow and Clyde will see all families with newborns in a one year period being supplied with advice and cupboard catches (to ensure safe storage of cleaning materials) at a cost of less than £1 per child. These amounts compare with the Transport Research Laboratory research that shows the average cost of a non-fatal home accident is £16,900 per victim and the cost of a fatality is estimated at £1.61 million.

6. RoSPA Scotland believes that investing in parents’ ability to prevent their children from suffering accidental injury is paramount. They inevitably have the key role in the wellbeing of their child. The emphasis on providing support to parents to allow them to develop skills to take responsibility for the safety of their children is missing from the Bill.

7. With reference to the role of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young and Young People – The European Child Safety Alliance has indicated the extension of the rights of the Commissioner to include the ability to undertake investigations on behalf of individual children as an indicator of how ‘safe’ Scotland is. RoSPA Scotland would welcome this extension as it will bring Scotland into line with the other countries of the UK and with Article 12 of UNCRC outlining the right of children to be heard.

8. RoSPA Scotland supports the European Child Safety Alliance’s recommendation contained within the latest edition of Scotland’s Child Safety Report Card that “Scotland’s national government can do much to support a culture of good practice by not only integrating evidence-based good practice strategies into national public health programmes but by also ensuring that child safety is addressed in all policies”. The Bill should provide the opportunity to ensure this happens.

9. The Report Card for Child Safety in Scotland goes on to state “In addition, in these time of reduced resources it is key to look for solutions that provide co-benefits to other issues in addition to injury prevention. For example, strengthening road safety infrastructure to increase the safety of child pedestrians and cyclists can encourage increased physical activity, which in turn can help address child obesity. Strategic investments in child and adolescent injury prevention will ensure a co-ordinated and evidence-based approach to protecting Scotland’s most precious resource - their children and adolescents”. RoSPA Scotland agrees and would like to have seen the Bill used as a strategic investment in this way.

10. RoSPA Scotland is indebted to the Scottish Government for the funding it has received to enable its home, road and water safety prevention activities. RoSPA Scotland is positioned at the heart of Scotland’s health safety and accident prevention community and deploy our limited resources towards raising awareness of the issues and the positive benefits of an injury prevention agenda. Good partnership working does exist in specific areas around the country but a Bill that emphasises the fundamental importance of accident prevention and associated preventative spend is crucial to raising the profile of this issue to ensure it is given sufficient priority at local level.

11. The latest figures available show that unintentional injuries accounted for approximately 1 in 7 emergency hospital admissions for children in Scotland in 2011/2012. This amounted to almost 8,000 children under the age of 15. There were 16 children who died of unintentional injuries in the year 2011. The Bill should reflect the enormity of the consequences of this, particularly referring to the essential role of parents and carers in taking responsibility to reduce these numbers.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

William Ruggles

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

INTRODUCTION

1. Save the Children welcomes the opportunity to submit written evidence to the Education and Culture Committee on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Our evidence concentrates on the children’s rights duties in part 1, the extension of the powers of the Children’s Commissioner in part 2 and the early learning and childcare duties in part 6 of the Bill. These are the areas of the Bill that most directly relate to Save the Children’s work in Scotland. We are committed to working with the Scottish Government, the Committee and other stakeholders to realise the policy ambitions set out in the Bill. We hope that our evidence will assist the Committee in scrutinising the Bill and would be happy to provide further written and/or oral evidence on any of the issues raised.

2. Save the Children welcomes the overarching aim of the Bill to take forward legislative reforms that support the Scottish Government’s aims of ‘making Scotland the best place in the world to grow up’. We agree that the Bill offers a key opportunity to take strides towards these aims. We strongly support the ambitious policy objectives that underpin the Bill. However we are disappointed that the Bill does not go further in many areas to deliver on these laudable aims. Our evidence puts forward a number of suggestions for how provisions could be strengthened to deliver on the aims of the Bill more effectively. If the legislation is to be successful, it must deliver positive outcomes for children and their families at the core.

3. Save the Children welcomes Scottish Government’s intention to "make rights real" for children and commend the leadership Scottish Government has demonstrated in seeking to take steps to achieve this through the Bill. The reality is that many children in Scotland remain unable to realise the full extent of their rights. We believe that for Scottish Government to improve children’s wellbeing and outcomes, children’s rights must consistently inform decision-making processes at every level. We agree with Scottish Government that, ‘legislative steps are essential’ if the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) is to continue to influence legislation, policy and practice in Scotland¹.

The implementation of children’s rights in Scotland currently follows a gradual ‘stage by stage’ approach. This has led to inconsistencies in the realisation of children’s rights. This approach has been highlighted as problematic and routinely criticised by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, NGOs and other bodies. We believe that to achieve the policy ambitions of the Bill a shift is needed to a more consistent and systematic approach and that legislative steps could deliver this.

4. A comprehensive legislative framework would ensure children's rights influence the planning, implementation and monitoring of legislation, policy and practice that affects children and young people. Save the Children believes that such duties should serve to embed the provisions and principles of the UNCRC in Scots law, ensure consistent and systematic processes for embedding children’s rights in decision making, increase transparency and accountability and provide an avenue of support for children when their rights are violated (including legal channels where necessary) and promote the culture change necessary for children to enjoy their rights.

5. To deliver this framework and the policy intentions, the Bill must place clear and robust duties on both government Ministers and public bodies to routinely consider and apply children’s rights in exercising all their functions. Save the Children welcomes the priority that the measures in parts 1 and 2 of the Bill give to children’s rights and Scottish Government’s intention to ‘ensure children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policy and services’ across all parts of government and the public sector. When taken together we believe many of the measures set out in Parts 1 and 2 of the Bill offer a step forward in Scotland’s implementation of the UNCRC. However, we do not believe they go far enough to deliver the framework that needs to be in place to meet the policy objectives. We are disappointed that the opportunity has not been taken in the Bill – following broad support from civil society – to place stronger duties on Scottish Ministers or public authorities to systematically consider, promote and respect children’s rights, and that the Bill will not create genuinely enforceable rights for children in Scotland.

6. Save the Children is clear that the most effective way to meet the child rights objectives of the Bill is to incorporate the UNCRC into Scots law. There are different ways in which this can be achieved. However, we believe that full and direct incorporation of the UNCRC (whatever form that takes) would establish the comprehensive legislative child rights framework that is needed in Scotland. International evidence suggests that incorporation provides the strongest context for implementation². For further information on the benefits of incorporation we refer the Committee to Together’s submission to the call for evidence.

7. We are concerned that Scottish Government has so far overestimated the ‘emphasis on courts and on legal processes’ that incorporation might present. It was suggested by officials presenting oral evidence to the Committee at Stage 1 that this underpins its decision not to undertake incorporation at this point in time³. However, examples from States that have incorporated the UNCRC into their domestic legal systems suggests that whilst full and direct incorporation enhances accountability to children through providing opportunities for strategic litigation, the main value of the measure is its ability to raise awareness of children’s rights in Government and civil society; ‘the strong message it convey[s]...

about the status of children and children’s rights, and the knock-on effects for implementation of children’s rights principles into domestic law and policy⁴. This indicates that – as well as providing a strong legislative platform - the process of incorporation itself could initiate the ‘shift’ in ‘culture in how children and young people are helped to achieve their potential’⁵ that the Scottish Government intends the Bill to facilitate.

8. Committing to full incorporation would further enable Scottish Government to demonstrate leadership within the UK in progressing children’s rights. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child has twice recommended to the UK Government it take measures to bring domestic legislation in line with the UNCRC⁶. In the absence of commitment to incorporation we urge the Committee to seek a commitment from Scottish Government to set out its long term vision for the incorporation and implementation of the UNCRC’s principles and provisions in Scottish legislation and policy. In addition, we urge the Committee to consider the following issues to ensure the provisions in the Bill are robust enough to progress the realisation of children’s rights in Scotland and make a practical difference to children’s lives.

9. Save the Children urges the Committee to consider strengthening the ‘consideration’ duty on Ministers. Save the Children has serious questions about whether the proposed duty on Ministers ‘to keep under consideration whether there are any steps that might be taken to secure further effect of the UNCRC, and to take those steps only if they consider it appropriate to do so’, is sufficient to deliver progress and achieve the desired policy aims. The wording of the duty does not suggest a comprehensive approach that would ensure children’s rights are considered systematically across Ministerial decision making. We are concerned that this duty will lead to the continuation of the selective approach to the application of children’s rights in which certain rights, settings and children are prioritised to the exclusion of others. Further, the duty appears to represent a significant step back from Scottish Government’s initial commitment in 2011 to give the UNCRC a statutory basis in Scots law through a legal duty on Ministers to have ‘due regard’ to the UNCRC in all of their decisions⁷. There are alternatives that would provide a stronger duty on Ministers. Save the Children urges the Committee to seek clarity from Ministers on why they believe the ‘consideration’ duty is the most effective duty in achieving their policy objectives.

10. We urge the Committee to scrutinise the detail of the duty with respect to its practical application by Scottish Ministers. We are concerned that the duty does not place Ministers under any obligation to demonstrate how they have fulfilled the duty. Therefore we seek clarity on how it will achieve the increased accountability and transparency in reviewing the government’s approach to implementing the UNCRC that is desired. For example, what process will Ministers follow to assess if they 'consider it appropriate' to take steps to further the UNCRC? The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, which monitors implementation of the UNCRC globally, considers Child Rights Impact Assessments (CRIA) as an essential part of the policy development process. We believe that CRIA would provide Ministers with a helpful mechanism to support a stronger duty. We believe that routine assessment of the child rights implications of decisions Ministers undertake would provide Ministers with a more rigorous process to consider and comply with the UNCRC. We recommend that the Committee explore a duty on Ministers to undertake a CRIA when undertaking all legal and policy related developments.

11. We support an accompanying duty on Ministers to report to the Scottish Parliament steps they have taken to secure further effect to the UNCRC in principle. However, we are concerned that the reporting duty does not place Ministers under any obligation to set out why they have decided not to take steps that may have been identified to further implement the UNCRC. We recommend that the reporting duty includes this obligation on Ministers.

12. Save the Children supports the proposed duty on Scottish Ministers to promote public awareness and understanding of the rights of children. We support this provision as an important means by which Scottish Government can instigate the culture ‘shift’ necessary to progress children’s rights in Scotland. Save the Children’s research has found that there is very limited knowledge of the UNCRC in Scotland, amongst children, parents and the general public. In addition, our research found that despite some training for professionals this does not always translate into practice\(^8\). The value of the UNCRC as a framework to guide policy and practice depends on securing public awareness of its principles and provisions and informed understanding of the ways in which they might be effectively applied or – for children and young people how they might be claimed.

13. To ensure this duty is effective at achieving this outcome we urge Scottish Government to ensure that it is adequately resourced. We seek further clarification from Scottish Government on how this duty would be implemented to better understand what the duty aims to achieve. If delivered appropriately it could effectively incorporate Article 42 of the UNCRC and address a 2008 recommendation to Scottish Government from the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child\(^9\). We believe that this duty will only be discharged effectively if supported by a comprehensive and robust, long term, strategy to promote knowledge and understanding of children’s rights. As recommended by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Children this should include appropriate training.

for all professionals working with or for children, Ministers’ and civil servants to ensure that they have the capacity to exercise this function to its full potential.

14. In principle, Save the Children welcomes the duty on public bodies to report on progress they have made to secure better or further effect to the UNCRC. Many of the decision-making processes that affect children on a day to day basis take place at a local level. We are therefore encouraged that they will be expected to evidence efforts to progress children’s rights in discharging their duties. We recognise this as a key part of Scottish Government’s approach to embedding the UNCRC across the wider policy and practice contexts that impact on children’s lives in Scotland. However, we are concerned that the Bill does not require public bodies to take further steps to implement the UNCRC. We are concerned that a duty to report on its own will not drive the progress required at local level. We believe that the duty to report would be strengthened by an additional duty on public bodies (whose functions affect children and families) to advance children’s rights. We recommend that the Committee consider a duty on public bodies to further implement the UNCRC.

15. We recommend that an additional duty be included in Part 1 of the Bill to compel Ministers to produce - and lay before the Scottish Parliament for scrutiny - an implementation scheme for new duties placed on them by the Bill. This would ensure that the duties on Ministers and public bodies are discharged in accordance with Scottish Government’s intentions. The Rights of Children and Young Persons (Wales) Measure compels Welsh Ministers to set out the plans they have put in place to deliver their child rights duties. The development of the plan has to include consultation with key stakeholders including children and young people and the Children’s Commissioner. The plan has to be approved by the Welsh Assembly. We believe that this approach would assist in driving progress and would support Scottish Government to deliver on the objectives in the Bill.

Part 2 – Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People

16. Save the Children supports the proposal for an additional mechanism through which children can raise and resolve concerns where they feel their rights, views and interests have not been properly taken into account. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child advises state parties to establish mechanisms that enable the investigation of individual cases brought by children and young people or on their behalf. We are clear that the value of the extension of the Children’s Commissioners’ powers is its potential to create a mode of redress for violations of children’s rights that is both ‘child-friendly’ and robust. This provision can offer a safety net for all children and unprecedented levels of accountability for children’s rights in Scotland. We understand this provision as an additional mechanism that will complement and sit alongside public bodies existing complaints procedures. We believe this duty should be exercised as a 'last resort’ to support children where other systems of redress have failed to secure appropriate recourse to justice. The UN Committee is clear that this mechanism should be provided for children in addition to access to the courts opposed to an alternative. We recommend that this duty be adequately resourced to ensure that it can fulfil its potential.

Part 3 – Children’s Services Planning

17. Save the Children welcomes duties on public bodies to prepare, review, implement and report on children’s services. However, if Scottish Government is to meet its policy aim for children’s rights to ‘properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services’ there needs to be an overarching child rights framework that embeds the UNCRC into the planning, implementation and monitoring of children’s services. At present there is a disconnection between children’s rights provisions in part 1 of the bill and provisions in Part 3 relating to children’s wellbeing. We believe that the inclusion of a rights framework in children’s services planning processes would ensure that rights are comprehensively influencing decision-making that directly affects children. It would also assist in ensuring that children’s services are provided in such a way as to safeguard and support both children’s rights requirements and the wellbeing of children. We believe that there are a number of ways that this could be achieved through the duties in part 3 of the Bill. We recommend that the Bill embeds a child rights framework within children’s service planning.

EARLY LEARNING AND CHILDCARE (PART 6)

18. Save the Children welcomes Scottish Government’s policy aim to increase the amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare. We support the aims of this part of the Bill because of the potential for high quality early learning and childcare services to deliver a number of positive outcomes for children and their families. This includes improving developmental, educational and other critical outcomes for children - particularly children living in poverty; supporting parents to access work and provide economic security for their families; supporting parents with the costs of early learning and childcare and supporting broader efforts to tackle poverty. In addition, we support the provisions as a further step towards delivering a comprehensive and sustainable system of high quality childcare in Scotland that is affordable and available to all. We acknowledge that Scottish Government sees the provisions in the Bill as ‘setting the stage’ for more comprehensive change.

19. However, we are disappointed that provisions and ambitions in the Bill relating to early learning and childcare are not more ambitious. Whilst welcome, the provisions in the Bill only go so far. We recognise that there are challenging resource implications, yet we are disappointed that the Bill – given the well documented issues in relation to childcare - does not go further to drive the fundamental transformation in Scotland’s childcare infrastructure that is required to support children and families’. We acknowledge Scottish Government’s intention to extend existing universal provision for three and four year olds as a first step and that this has significant resource implications. However, it is of concern that the Bill fails to drive reform in this area for the vast majority of children in Scotland.

20. The extension of early learning and childcare should not detract from the need to provide support to families with very young children and children of school age. Of particular concern, the provisions fall short of supporting the vast majority of children under three. This is despite compelling evidence of the first three years in a child’s life being the most important to their development and of the role early learning and childcare can play in improving children’s outcomes and tackling disadvantage. Further, the Bill fails to address support for out of school care, despite the role that these services can play in supporting families through improving outcomes for children and enabling parents to take-up opportunities to work – the same arguments and benefits used to justify the provisions in the Bill to young children. Parents are particularly concerned about the lack of affordable and flexible provision of out of school care at local level. Reports also suggest shortages in relation to out of school care in local areas.

21. We urge the Scottish Government to set out its long term vision and a timetable for delivering a universal and comprehensive system of early learning and childcare, including out of school care, that improves outcomes for children, meets the needs of families and forms part of Scotland’s infrastructure. A priority for legislative and policy consideration must be how best to support families living on the lowest incomes to access affordable, flexible childcare that benefits children and helps to move families out of poverty. In addition, we urge the Scottish Government to commit to reporting to Parliament on progress on a regular basis.

22. Save the Children believes that consideration should be given to establish a statutory right to childcare for all, with a clear timetable for how and when this right will be realised over the next decade. This was a key recommendation of the Scottish Parliament’s Equal Opportunities Committee’s recent report into women and work. We believe this could be delivered incrementally. In line with Scottish Government’s policy objectives to prioritise children from disadvantaged backgrounds, a first step could be to consider a statutory entitlement to out of school care for children living in poverty. We urge the Committee to consider this issue.

23. Save the Children welcomes the intention to define in statute early learning and childcare services. We support the explanation in the policy memorandum that the term emphasises the ‘holistic and seamless provision of nurture, care and development of social, emotional, physical and cognitive skills, abilities and wellbeing’ and the Scottish Government’s approach to the ‘learning journey’. However, we believe that further clarification is required to ensure the purpose of these services is well understood and quality is maintained. The learning and developmental aspects of this provision are essential to improving outcomes for children. These aspects and the quality of services should not be compromised in extending the hours and flexibility of services. The development and wellbeing of young children must be the primary priority. Whilst guidance may provide some clarity, we believe that this approach could be strengthened through the Bill. Save the Children recommends that consideration is given to clarifying the aims of such services in the Bill.

24. Save the Children welcomes inclusion in the Bill of provision to secure a mandatory amount of early learning and childcare and extending this to 600 hours per annum for three and four year olds and some ‘vulnerable’ two year olds. As outlined above we support this as a further step forward and as part of longer term strategy. Although incremental this will help families to access quality early learning and care services and help to reduce the cost of childcare for young children. We urge the Committee to seek clarification that the costs of the increase in hours and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare will be met in full by the Scottish Government.

25. We strongly recommend that the Bill extends the entitlement to a mandatory amount of funded early learning and childcare to all two year olds living in poverty. In the long term we would like to see universal entitlement for all 2 year olds to early learning and childcare. However, we recognise the resource implications and support an incremental approach to achieving this aim. Further, we believe that the evidence is clear and that the benefits of this provision would far outweigh the costs in the long term. We urge the Committee to recommend that Scottish Government amends the Bill to deliver on this recommendation.

26. The policy objective is to focus on those from disadvantaged backgrounds in the first instance and there is a strong case to ensure that children growing up in poverty are included in this group. There is compelling evidence that highlights that the provision of high quality early year’s education and care after age two has a significant impact on a child’s learning and development.\(^\text{16}\) Further, the evidence suggests that the benefits of early learning and childcare are particularly profound for children living in poverty. The EPPSE study has consistently shown that early year’s provision can “…alleviate the effects of social disadvantage and can provide children with a better start to school.”

27. We welcome the intention to set a minimum framework for the method of delivery and increase flexibility of early learning and childcare to meet parents’ needs. Save the Children welcomes Scottish Government making increased flexibility of nursery provision a key aim of the legislation. There is strong evidence from parents that the way that nursery provision is currently provided – generally 2.5 hours per day – is not flexible enough to meet their needs to enable them to balance employment or training with caring for their children\textsuperscript{17}. This lack of flexibility in the current delivery of nursery education presents significant challenges for parents, particularly those living on low incomes. Increased flexibility needs to go hand in hand with increased hours and quality provision.

28. \textbf{However, we question whether the proposed duty on education authorities to ‘have regard’ to increasing the degree of choice in how these services are accessed is sufficient to meet the policy intentions in the Bill.} There will be no compulsion on local authorities to increase the flexibility of the free nursery hours they provide. Whilst we acknowledge the need for local flexibility, there is a risk of continued local inconsistencies and more “postcode lotteries” for childcare. We urge the Committee to seek further clarity on how much flexibility will be built into delivering services through the Bill. The Bill must ensure that existing barriers are removed and services are delivered in a way that meets parents and families’ needs. If the additional investment does not achieve this it will be a missed opportunity to improve the way families are supported. \textit{Save the Children urges the Committee to seek further clarity on how flexibility will be delivered in local services. Further, we believe consideration should be given to the need for guidance to be placed on a statutory footing to deliver the flexibility required.}

29. \textit{Save the Children welcomes the duty to consult with parents about early learning and childcare needs and to have regard to these views to prepare and publish plans to make early learning and childcare available.} We support consultation with parents as a key part of preparing plans in local areas. We would like to see further clarity on what is meant by ‘representative of parents…in the area’ and how consultation with parents will be undertaken. This must be done in a way that enables the views of all parents to take part, particularly the most disadvantaged. We are concerned that the duty in the Bill to have ‘regard to’ parents’ views in developing local plans is not robust enough to ensure that parents views \textit{inform} local planning and delivery. The duty suggests that parents’ views could be overlooked in favour of other considerations, such as budgetary decisions.

30. \textbf{In addition, Save the Children believes that the duties to consult and plan should be extended beyond the early years.} This would assist in providing information on the demand for out of school care services at local level and whether these are meeting the needs of families. We believe that this would assist in developing longer term strategies for delivering childcare at local level. In addition, it could also highlight key issues that need to be addressed at national level. Evidence suggests that a significant number of local authorities in Scotland do not know if they have sufficient childcare. Those that do have knowledge about the supply of childcare in their local area, report shortages in relation to childcare for older children and for parents who work full time.\textsuperscript{18}

Extending the duty to include childcare for children of all ages would help address this issue. Consideration should also be given to extending the duty to consult and ‘have regard’ to children’s views in the planning and design of local childcare services. Whilst consultation with families is key, guidance must ensure that the development of local plans is also based on other necessary information, for example trends in demographic data. Save the Children urges the Committee to seek clarification from Scottish Government on what additional information is required to produce robust plans at local level.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

1. I am writing as a concerned citizen of another free nation to express my strong opposition to and concern about Part IV of the Children and Young People Bill. By transferring the rights and authority of parents to government monitors, this bill permits an unprecedented invasion of every family and undermines the presumption of innocence by presuming parents will become guilty of breaking the law at some unspecified future date. It paints all families with the same brush, whether deserving or not.

2. The philosophy and motivation behind this bill appears at odds with the basic philosophy behind all free societies: e.g. a limited government that intervenes only when necessary and as provided for by strict standards, that free people are competent to raise their own families without government interference, that the rights of families and the relationship between parents and children must be respected and protected by the laws of a free society, and that information about private citizens (i.e., children) should be protected and shared only when parents or legal guardians give written consent.

3. This proposed legislation implies that parents cannot be trusted to raise their children; rather, only government bureaucrats can. However, thousands of years of history declare that parents are the ones who know their children best and who act in the best interest of those children. I understand that certain policies relating to the "named person" provision of this bill have already been implemented, resulting in the harassment of families, interference in family matters without legitimate reasons, and officials misleading parents about their choices. If this bill is passed, such conflicts will only increase, and parents' rights will continue to erode. In fact, you can expect many families to actively avoid contact with services.

4. Please protect the fundamental right of Scottish parents to direct the care, upbringing, and education of their children by rejecting the Children and Young People Bill. At the very least, please reject all measures contained therein that oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. For example, the "named person" provision should be an opt in / opt out service rather than mandatory; personal data should never be gathered or shared without express consent (a violation of the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR) based on a child protection, not a "wellbeing," concern; and parents need an available legal redress against any professional who acts wrongly regarding a child.

5. Thank you for taking the time to consider my concerns. I pray you can see their validity and act accordingly.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Schoolhouse Home Education Association

Introduction

1. The Scottish Government has brought forward legislative proposals in its Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, which include legislative underpinning for its policy of Getting It Right For Every Child (“GIRFEC”). This proposal has given rise to a call for written evidence. This response is made in response to that invitation.

2. I am instructed in this matter by Schoolhouse Home Education Association. I am a solicitor practising in England and a social worker registered in England. I qualified as a social worker 23 years ago, and as a solicitor 13 years ago. I have a niche practice, specialising in the law relating to the practice of social work. I am also a visiting lecturer at a number of universities, teaching and examining in social work law.

3. I am the solicitor who brought the case of AB and CD versus Haringey Council on behalf of the successful Claimants. The Claimants were granted both Data Protection Act remedies and Human Rights Act damages when Social Services intervened on the basis of a referral which did not meet the threshold of “significant harm”. In relation to data protection, the Court held that there was no legal basis for the information sharing. The Human Rights Act damages were awarded in respect of a breach of the right to respect for private and family life – Article 8. I am aware that Schoolhouse HEA have instructed me in the light of my role in that case, and will make appropriate reference to it.

4. I am invited specifically to answer the question whether the legislative proposals – and in particular those in relation to a “named person” for every child – are compatible with European law. The short answer is that they are not, and I set out why below. Since I also practise as a social worker, and as a visiting lecturer, I also comment upon the compatibility of the proposals with professional obligations, and upon their utility.

European Law

5. There are two strands of over-arching law emanating from Europe. This law derives from European Treaty and Convention obligations, and UK legislatures must act compatibly with it. The first strand is the law of European Union, or EU law. The second strand is human rights law. Both are relevant.

Data Protection – Consent and Necessity

6. The Data Protection Act is an Act that was passed to give effect to the UK’s obligations under EU law. That is an important point because it means that it is simply not open to UK legislatures to change it if they do not like it.

7. Although data protection laws are complex, the underpinning principles are in fact very simple indeed. The Act sets out a complete list of the circumstances in which the processing of data – which includes information sharing – is permitted. Ultimately, information sharing is permitted in two situations:

- with consent; and
- where it is necessary.

8. To be clear, while there are several alternatives to consent, every one of the alternatives has a requirement of necessity. This should be neither surprising nor objectionable: you can share information when you need to, and whether or not you need to, you can share information with permission. But the Data Protection Act simply does not allow – anywhere – for information to be shared without consent when it is not necessary to do so.

9. It follows that any legislative provision which purports to allow information sharing which is neither consensual nor necessary, will fall foul of the Data Protection Act and the EU directive from which the Data Protection Act derives.

10. Of course, the concerns about GIRFEC are that it does precisely that. There is no objection to the involvement of a named person where they are involved with consent. There is no objection to the involvement of a named person where their involvement is necessary. The objection is to the automatic involvement without consent or necessity.

11. It might be argued that information-sharing becomes “necessary” either to comply with the legislation once enacted in Scotland, or more generally to safeguard children. To address this, I think it is helpful to consider the Haringey case. In that case, the local authority received a safeguarding concern and made routine enquiries of other agencies without seeking consent. In its Defence, it sought to argue that it was acting under an enactment, believing that the child protection threshold of “significant harm” was met.

12. This argument was rejected. The Court did not accept that the child was at risk of significant harm. But in any case, and separately, it did not accept that it was necessary to share information without consent. Once again, this conclusion seems both unsurprising and unobjectionable. Since the alternatives to consent require that information sharing is both lawful and necessary, it is hardly surprising that pointing to a piece of legislation which allows for information sharing is not enough. Information sharing is not necessary because it is lawful; it is lawful when it is necessary.

4 This derives not from the EU, but from our membership of the Council of Europe, and our obligations under the European Convention on Human Rights. The relevant court is the European Court of Human Rights.
5 Specifically Directive 95/46/EC
6 Schedule 2 ‘Conditions relevant for purposes of the first principle: processing of any personal data’

13. My attention has been drawn, in this regard, to statements by the Assistant Information Commissioner for Scotland, Ken Macdonald. He is quoted as saying\(^7\),

> “Where consent isn’t appropriate – for example, where an assessment under the SHANARRI principles raises concerns, then the Act provides conditions to allow sharing of this information… While it is important to protect the rights of individuals, it is equally important to ensure that children are protected from risk of harm.”

14. I make four observations in response to that statement, a statement which strikes me as seriously misconceived in respect of the fundamental principles the Commissioner is supposed to protect.

15. Firstly, I draw attention to these words of the Information Commissioner himself, commenting on similar issues in relation to the Every Child Matters agenda in England\(^8\):

> “The Every Child Matters agenda extends social care from protection to welfare. Although there are overlaps, this shift means that substantially more information will be collected and shared about substantially more children for different reasons. These different purposes raise different considerations from a data protection perspective. It is important that approaches used in the context of protection are not assumed to be transferable to the welfare context.”

16. The Information Commissioner (as distinct from the Assistant Commissioner in Scotland) here distinguishes, correctly, between information shared for the purposes of protection and that shared for the purposes of welfare. The Assistant Commissioner in Scotland, by suggesting that SHANARRI concerns may be shared without consent, has blurred the important distinction.

17. Secondly, Assistant Commissioner in Scotland explicitly says here that “consent isn’t appropriate”. His guidance seems to suggest this is his reason\(^9\):

> “the issue of obtaining consent can be difficult and it should only be sought when the individual has real choice over the matter”

\(^7\) GIRFEC Bulletin Issue 1: Information sharing
\(^8\) Protecting Children’s Personal Information: ICO Issues Paper, Information Commissioner’s Office
\(^9\) Information Sharing Between Services in Respect of Children and Young People – Information Commissioner’s Office, Scotland
18. This is an extraordinary statement in terms of its implications for professional practice. It purports to exclude attempts to work with families co-operatively in any case where that attempt may fail. It is hardly surprising if such an approach results in deep suspicion and hostility between families and named persons. Professionals generally seek to work with consent in all but the most limited circumstances, and do so because it is more likely to be effective.

19. Once again, the argument is reminiscent of issues that were explored in the Haringey case. The relevant test for seeking consent there was not whether the individual has real choice over the matter but whether seeking consent would result in “increased risk of suffering significant harm”\(^{10}\). To put it another way, even if a child is considered at risk of significant harm, consent should be sought unless the process of doing so would result in additional harm. The approach of the Assistant Commissioner in Scotland to trying to work co-operatively with families could not be more at odds with this threshold test for consent!

20. Thirdly, the use of the term “harm” in the Assistant Commissioner’s statement is curious, and reflects a blurring of hitherto clear legal concepts. The threshold for compulsory state intervention has hitherto been “significant harm”, a threshold test higher than “harm”, and clearly distinguishable from “well-being concerns”. But the Assistant Information Commissioner here suggests some link between well-being concerns and harm and that that is enough: “a risk to wellbeing can be a strong indication that a child or young person could be at risk of harm”\(^{11}\). That is, frankly, a very casual approach to statutory thresholds, suggesting that an associative link between two measures may suffice for a legal threshold. It shouldn’t.

21. Finally, I observe that the Assistant Commissioner mentions alternatives to consent “The Act provides several conditions/justifications for processing, only the first of which rely on consent”\(^{12}\). No mention is made, as I have pointed out, that every alternative to consent includes the word “necessary”; by creating the impression that consent is a minority approach to information sharing, it seems to me the Assistant Commissioner fails to promote the spirit of the Act.

22. To be very clear: whenever there are significant child protection concerns, there are no legal problems. No-one can reasonably object to protecting children from significant harm. Doing so is lawful and necessary. It is the compulsory intervention to impose contested well-being outcomes that will fall foul of data protection principles and the EU directive.

Human Rights – the citizen and the State

23. The human right to respect for private and family life has, in recent years, been one of the most contentious human rights. Before considering its application to

\(^{12}\) Ibid
GIRFEC, it is useful to set the scene with some reminders about the wider human rights context – and, to dispel some myths.

24. Human rights are concerned with the relationship between the citizen and the State, rather than the relationship of human beings one to another. In modern form, they can be traced back very directly to the experience of the second World War, giving rise to the belief that it was necessary to give rights to the citizen to protect them from an over-bearing State:

“Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind… whereas it is essential if man is not to be compelled to have recourse as a last resort to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law…”

25. That being the case, it is important to recognise that the GIRFEC legislative proposal represents a fundamental reconfiguring of the relationship between the citizen and the State – and therefore automatically engages human rights.

26. It was interesting to note these words from the Minister for Children and Young People, Aileen Campbell, in her evidence to the Education and Culture Committee on 25th June:

“Everything that we do and all our policies are underpinned by GIRFEC—getting it right for every child—and making sure that the child is at the centre of decisions. Of course we recognise that parents also have a role…”

27. These words carry two flaws. Firstly, they fail to make explicit the role of the State. The named person, performing statutory functions, is going to be an agent of the State. The named person’s functions are defined with reference to the State’s view of the welfare of the child. Secondly, they reveal a perception that the role of parents is residual and secondary.

28. In both respects, I am reminded of the powerful words of the United Kingdom House of Lords giving judgment in B (a Child), Re [2013] UKSC 33 (12 June 2013):

“In a totalitarian society, uniformity and conformity are valued. Hence the totalitarian state tries to separate the child from her family and mould her to its own design. Families in all their subversive variety are the breeding ground of diversity and individuality. In a free and democratic society we value diversity and individuality. Hence the family is given special protection in all the modern human rights instruments including the European Convention on Human Rights (art 8), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (art 23) and throughout the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. As Justice McReynolds famously said in Pierce v Society of Sisters 268 US 510 (1925), at 535, "The child is not the mere creature of the State".”

13 preamble to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights
29. The critical issue here is, whose view of the welfare and best interests of the child is embodied in GIRFEC? I have drawn down the powerful and emotive language used by the United Kingdom’s highest court, the language of a totalitarian state moulding children to its own design, as a stark reminder that what Scotland is seeking to embody into legislation is something startling: pre-eminence to the State’s view of what childhood should look like.

30. That cannot be said to reflect the approach taken by human rights law to the welfare of a child. On the contrary, human rights law gives pre-eminence to the family in relation to the welfare of children. Each party to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child affirms they are 15 “…convinced that the family, as the fundamental group of society and the natural environment for the growth and well-being of all its members and particularly children, should be afforded the necessary protection and assistance so that it can fully assume its responsibilities within the community.”

31. In recent years, the United Kingdom has been diverging from much of Europe in this area. It has developed an approach which suggests that where the child’s welfare is in issue, the human rights of the child are in conflict with the human rights of the parent, and the State ought to intervene on behalf of the child against the parent. The European Court emphasises, however, the child’s rights are embedded within the child’s family context; any State intervention should so far as possible be in support of the family role.

32. It is important to appreciate that the principle of necessity, already discussed in relation to human rights, is also embedded in Article 8. Article 8 of course allows for intervention. But, as with data protection, any interference in private and family life has to be “necessary” and not simply desirable.

33. It has been established that necessity in data protection law and in Article 8 have a shared meaning: if interference with family life is not necessary, then interference with data protection rights cannot be necessary either 16.

34. Since the imposition of a “named person” under the GIRFEC proposal has to amount to an interference with private and family life, it can be permitted under human rights law only if it is necessary. This then brings us back to the same position as in relation to data protection: the interference is necessary to protect children from harm, but routine surveillance is not.

35. In the case of Marper and S 17, the European Court had to consider the lawfulness of the police DNA database. The European Court considered that it was unlawful

15 Preamble to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child 16 In England, see Southampton City Council v Information Commissioner (Data Protection Act 1998) [2013] UKFTT 2012_0171 (GRC) (19 February 2013) “it is common ground that if Art 8 is infringed by the policy, [it] will not be “lawful” for the purposes of the first data protection principle by virtue of the Human Rights Act 1998 and, furthermore, that none of the conditions we have identified as potentially relevant will be satisfied, in that the processing will not be “necessary” for any of purposes set out therein any more than it will be “necessary” for the analogous purposes set out in Art 8(2).”
because its extent was unnecessary. The DNA database was not even a universal database. It seems self-evident that universal surveillance is going to be considered unlawful because it is unnecessary. Indeed, proposals in England for a universal children's database were dropped subsequent to the Marper and S case. It is worth observing that Scotland is singled out in Marper and S for commendation by the European Court for applying a reasonable and proportionate approach that is in contrast to the rest of the United Kingdom.

And turning to research…

36. Putting aside my lawyer’s hat and putting on my social worker’s hat, I find myself asking different questions about GIRFEC. Not, is it lawful, but will it work?

37. The rationale for the surveillance approach to child protection and safeguarding can be stated thus: concerns can emerge from a pattern of low level concerns as well as from high level concerns, so a mechanism is needed to monitor low level concerns; and to avoid concerning families “slipping under the RADAR”, it needs to be universal.

38. I make three observations in response (quite apart from the observations about its lawfulness already made). The first is about the sheer inefficiency of this approach. The second is about the opportunity-cost. The third represents a vision of a better alternative.

39. Universal systems, such as that envisaged by GIRFEC, necessarily generate significant amounts of data which has to be processed. In England, before the children’s database was abandoned, there was a systems process manual that at 202 pages long dwarfed the statutory guidance:

40. Trying to extract significant information from this deluge of largely low-level irrelevant information was not an improvement. Essentially, it was more difficult to filter out the information that mattered.

41. Indeed there is a wealth of research into the failed children’s database in England that it seems to me that Scotland, looking to embed GIRFEC some years later, should be aware of:

“We concentrate on the aspiration of the ICS towards ‘integration’ and ‘systematization’ of services within children’s services, at local and national levels… The evidence suggests substantial problems in accomplishing government policy aspirations in each of these areas. We review the likely reasons for these problems, and recommend a review of the ICS on the grounds that the difficulties are inherent rather than transitory…”

42. Moreover, ‘intervention’ was at the expense of actually working with families. Simply put, the resources could have been better spent on services that reached and benefited families as the end-user. If those services were perceived to be both genuinely helpful and not under compulsion, that would maximise confidence in the services. That principle underpins the recent call by leading social work academics for recognition of 20 “the moral legitimacy of support and its difference from intervention and the need to engage with and develop a family support project for the twenty-first century. We call for a debate on the current settlement between the state and family life and for a recognition that a perfect storm has ensued from the unholy alliance of early intervention and child protection.”

43. In my review of the relevant law relating to both data protection and human rights, I critiqued GIRFEC insofar as it proceeds without consent or necessity, but also suggested that it was lawful and unobjectionable to proceed on the basis of consent or necessity. I go further. It is not only lawful and unobjectionable, consent-and-necessity could properly underpin a completely different vision for children’s services in Scotland, one that would not only address lawfulness, but also command respect:

- The consent-element of services to promote the well-being of children in Scotland being provided in the form of services that are perceived as beneficial by service users, so likely to be taken up without any element of compulsion;

- The necessity-element of services to protect children from significant harm being delivered within a specialist child protection framework, with no blurring of child protection and well-being issues.

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

Scotland’s Adoption Register

1. Scotland’s Adoption Register (the Register) was launched on 1 April 2011. Funded by the Scottish Government and operated by the British Association for Fostering and Adoption (BAAF) Scotland, the primary task for the Register is to facilitate the sharing of adoption resources across Scotland to increase the number of children who are adopted and to contribute to a reduction in the time children wait.

2. This is achieved through the provision of three main services:

   - We are working with all Scottish local authorities and voluntary adoption agencies to operate the National Linking Service. This is a database of children with a plan for adoption and approved adopters. Software is used to generate potential links between the two on the basis of certain matching criteria.

   - Alongside the linking service, the Register produces the uniquely Scottish family finding publication, Scottish Children Waiting, where children who are referred to the Register linking service can be featured with photographs and written information. Copies of the publication are sent to adoption agencies who are asked to share them with their adoptive families.

   - The Register has developed and facilitated a number of innovative and dynamic family finding events providing opportunities for adopters to have direct access to information about some of the children we know will wait longest for families. By hosting national events such as Adoption Exchange Days and Film Featuring Evenings, a number of children have been matched to new families.

Comments on the Provisions of the Bill

3. This written evidence is concerned solely with Part 11, Adoption Register, s.68. This section of the Bill is proposed as an amendment of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 and would effectively insert six sections (ss.13A to 13F).

4. The Register welcomes the careful attention being afforded to permanence for children by the Scottish Government. We recognise the support of the Government for the work of the Register and its important contribution to adoption in Scotland.

5. The proposed s.13A(2) introduces mandatory referral to the Register. It is our understanding that regulations will set out how this will operate. It is our experience that the vast majority of adoption agencies in Scotland are making use of existing Register services. In the year 2012 to 2013, 94% of adoption agencies in Scotland made use of some or all Register services. We do not therefore believe that compulsion on agencies is necessary.

6. The Register is still a relatively new addition to family finding practice. We do not fully understand the implications of all agencies regularly using the Register. Practice across Scotland is not uniform and some agencies are at the beginning of a process to implement policies and procedures around: making inter-agency placements; charging of inter-agency fees; and agreeing post adoption support. The provision of post adoption support whilst enshrined in the 2007 Act is still a developing feature of adoption practice in Scotland. Enforced use of the Register as opposed to an evolutionary process may create unexpected and unpredicted problems in other areas of the process.

7. We do recognise that there may be some benefits to mandatory referral in relation to the availability of adoptive families as a resource for all children waiting for a new family. We are aware that some local authorities have not been keen to allow their waiting adopters to access opportunities afforded them through Register services preferring to hold on to them 'just in case' they need them for a local child.

8. We have some concerns about s.13A(3) which states that the Register should not be open to public inspection or search. We have no plans to allow the public direct access to the linking service data base. However, we are currently looking to provide an online version of Scottish Children Waiting. This will be a secure section within the Register website which approved prospective adopters will be able to access by logging on. Local Authorities will post photographs, DVD’s and written profiles of some of the children for whom they are family finding. Approved adopters will be able to search the site and follow up on children. This means that there may be certain circumstances under which information held by the Register is searched by, and open to, members of the public but only in restricted circumstances. It will be important to ensure that any legislation is future proof in terms of developing technology and a changing culture whereby adopters are being empowered to be more proactive in searching for the child/ren who will join their family.

9. Our main concern relates to the proposed s.13C(2)(a). We are gravely worried that the effect of this section will be to seriously reduce the numbers of children referred to the Register linking service. This section prevents referral of children to the Register without the explicit permission of the child’s parents or anyone else with parental responsibilities and rights. If parents’ consent is required for referral and parents are not in favour of plans for adoption, they will usually and understandably not be willing to consent to such a disclosure/referral. In other situations, the whereabouts of parents may be unknown, and therefore no consent will be obtainable.

10. The vast majority of children who are referred to the linking service are subject to compulsory supervision orders under the children’s hearing system and in such circumstances local authorities have no parental responsibilities and rights in respect of the children. In a small number of cases parental consent to referral will have been gained – usually where the child has been relinquished for adoption by the birth parents. In the vast majority however the local authority make the referral as part of their statutory duty to plan for when the children will no longer be looked after, under s.17 of the 1995 Act, also as adoption agencies under their statutory duties for planning under the 2007 Act. Therefore, the consent of the parents is not essential, as Condition 5 in Schedule 2 of the Data Protection Act 1998, which allows for sharing of data for the purpose of exercising statutory functions, may be used instead.

11. We would suggest that there is, in any case, no need for specific consent provisions in the Bill. The 1998 Act will apply anyway. There are no equivalent provisions about consent in the Adoption and Children Act 2002 or the Children and Families Bill currently under consideration at Westminster, both dealing with Adoption Registers for other parts of the UK.

12. In addition, the proposed s.13C(2)(a) requires consent from parents or any other person with parental responsibilities and rights, and such other person as may be prescribed in regulations made under s.13A(2) - this is a wider group of people than those whose consent to adoption must be given or dispensed with under s.31 of the 2007 Act.

13. We are absolutely convinced that the inclusion of the need for parental consent as primary legislation will have a dramatic and negative effect on the numbers of children referred to the Register and would seriously undermine the effectiveness of the services we offer.

14. We are also concerned about the proposed s.13E which introduces the possibility of charging for Register services. We do not think that a charge should be made for the Register.

Education and Culture Committee
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People

1. I welcome the introduction of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and the Scottish Government’s stated commitment to children’s rights, and I am delighted to assist the Committee in its scrutiny of the Bill.

2. In my view, this Bill offers a real chance to make a lasting difference to the lives of children and young people in Scotland and meaningful progress towards full implementation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC). I believe, however, that the Bill as introduced should be more ambitious in this regard and that the Scottish Government should do more to fully grasp the opportunity to bring about a step change for children’s rights.

UNCRC incorporation and the Bill: the need for real action

3. The UK Government ratified the UNCRC in 1991, thereby voluntarily accepting the obligation in international law to give effect to all the rights set out in the Convention. All levels of government and public authorities are therefore already obliged to ensure the full realisation of all UNCRC rights for all children in the jurisdiction. Against this background, the Bill does no more than ‘reflect’ existing obligations.

4. A genuine commitment to children’s rights requires the incorporation of the Convention into domestic law, giving it full and direct legal effect in Scotland, in policy and law-making, in the practice of public services, through the courts, and through culture change. At a minimum, the Government should give a commitment to incorporation with a clear timescale, coupled with meaningful legislative measures to ensure real progress in the meantime. I note that the Scottish Government has informed the Committee it has had to ‘weigh up the benefits against the potential risks’ of incorporation. I would encourage Committee members to request the details of that risk/benefit analysis to inform the Committee’s scrutiny of the Government’s arguments in this respect.

5. I share the Scottish Government’s ambition for Scotland to be the best place in the world for children and young people. It is time to move beyond rhetoric and largely declaratory provisions. We should listen to the demands of children and young people and those working with and for them and take the steps required to honour our international obligations by incorporating the UNCRC into Scots Law. This is the most effective measure to ensure that the rights of children in Scotland are fully respected, protected and fulfilled. I would be happy to provide the Committee with further evidence on the benefits of incorporation ahead of my oral evidence on 1 October.

Children’s Rights Impact Assessment

6. It is disappointing that the Scottish Government has not carried out a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment (CRIA)\(^5\) on the Bill prior to its introduction in Parliament, despite repeated calls and offers of technical support for this process from the children’s sector. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, which monitors implementation of the UNCRC globally, considers CRIA an essential part of policy development, a long-held position recently restated in its interpretative guidance on the UNCRC\(^6\).

7. A CRIA would have highlighted the likely positive and negative impacts including any unintended consequences of the Bill’s provisions from a children’s rights perspective, as opposed to the more limited compliance-focused perspective offered by the Government’s Privacy and Equality Impact Assessments. This would have allowed for improvements to the Bill to be made. A CRIA on the whole Bill remains necessary, and I would urge the Committee to commission one now to inform its scrutiny of the Bill.

Comments on Specific Provisions

Part 1: Rights of Children and Young People

8. Short of incorporation, a strong ministerial duty is key to effective leadership on children’s rights and to ensure that children’s rights are an integral part of legislation, policy and guidance originating from central government. However, the duty on Scottish Ministers in s. 1 (1) of the Bill to ‘keep under consideration whether there are any steps which they could take to give better or further effect to the UNCRC requirements’ would not bring meaningful progress towards ensuring the Convention’s full legal effect in Scotland. The duty appears to be concerned with ‘keeping under review’ the Government’s overall ‘approach to implementing the UNCRC’\(^7\), as nothing in s. 1 (1) indicates that Ministers would be required to consider children’s rights in everything they do which affects children. This is not a practical and effective measure to advance children’s rights, and it contains numerous qualifiers granting Ministers ample discretion. It is difficult to imagine an effective legal challenge to the exercise of the duty, which underlines the weakness of this provision. This is also a step back from the duty first consulted upon in 2011 and indeed from the key provision of the Welsh Measure that the Government has cited in support of a duty on Ministers\(^8\).

9. As most actions and decisions directly affecting children and families are taken at the local level, it is essential that a duty on Ministers is matched by a duty that would help develop an effective approach to children’s rights closer to ‘frontline’ service provision. In s. 2 (1), the Bill provides a duty on other listed public authorities to report every three years on the ‘steps…taken [by them] in that period to secure better or further effect within its areas of responsibility of the UNCRC requirements’. I welcome this provision in principle, although it should be accompanied by a duty to take action and clarity is required as what mechanisms for accountability would be put into place in respect of these periodical reports.

10. In order to come closer to meeting the Scottish Government’s stated objective to ‘make rights real’\(^9\), I would urge that:

- Ministers be pressed to make a commitment to incorporating the UNCRC into Scots Law, and specify a timescale in which they will do so;

- the duty on Ministers in s. 1 (1) be significantly strengthened through the parliamentary process;

- the reporting duty on other public authorities (s. 2) be augmented with a duty requiring action to advance children’s rights by a comprehensive range of bodies whose functions affect children and families.

11. I welcome the duty on Ministers to promote awareness and understanding of the rights of children in s. 1 (2), which in effect transposes article 42 of the Convention into Scots Law, and I believe that this could have a significant positive effect. I would suggest that the financial provision in respect of this duty be scrutinised in order to ensure that it enables the comprehensive effort that is required to achieve a sound understanding of children’s rights among children and young people and adults, including all professionals whose work affects children and young people.

Part 2: Commissioner’s Powers of Investigation

12. I welcome the Scottish Government’s proposal to amend my office’s power of investigation to extend to individual cases brought by children and young people or on their behalf (s. 5). An individual investigation mechanism through the Commissioner’s office could be a useful addition for children and young people in Scotland. Indeed, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child advises state parties to set up such mechanisms\(^10\), although in addition to access to the courts rather than as an alternative\(^11\). At present, litigation is expensive, inaccessible and mostly unavailable as the UNCRC rights cannot currently be relied upon directly in the courts. As a result, there is no meaningful mechanism for children and young people to seek redress for violations of their UNCRC rights. The Government aims to provide one such limited mechanism through the Commissioner’s office.

13. The extension of my investigatory power would necessitate the setting up of a casework function, capable of dealing with a significant number of complaints. Of those complaints a small number may turn into larger scale investigations, but I anticipate that the bulk of my office’s workload under this new function would be dealing with cases that fall short of a full investigation, as specifically provided for in what would be new s. 7 (5). It is important to emphasise, however, that these cases would also provide vital evidence, helping to build up a picture of rights issues arising for children and young people across Scotland. Given the broad range of children’s rights in the UNCRC, and the national remit of my office, it would be misleading to suggest that the work involved in handling these complaints at any level short of an investigation is likely to be ‘marginal’.

14. This new mechanism would be additional to my existing statutory functions and I envisage that it would require significant changes to the way in which my office operates. The operation of a complaints function as described above would have been unjustified hitherto, given the nature, purpose and statutory framing of my existing power of investigation as one that is to be used exceptionally and in a manner not dissimilar to a public inquiry rather than a means of ‘redress’. Numerous respondents to the Government’s consultation who supported this proposal made clear that such a function requires sufficient resources. I share that view and consider that adequate resourcing of this new function is critical to delivering the quality of service that children and young people have a right to expect.

15. I am aware that the current costs in the Financial Memorandum are speculative and I am in discussion with Scottish Government regarding a realistic appraisal of the costs to ensure that the Scottish Parliament are reassured that sufficient resources are available to support this new function.

16. In the meantime, I would also wish to welcome the procedural changes in s. 6, and will continue to work with the Scottish Government and others to ensure that the legislative framework in Part 2 is further improved and strengthened.

Part 4: Getting It Right for Every Child (GIRFEC)

17. I continue to support the principles of GIRFEC and the Bill’s proposal to roll out the Named Person role. However, my view is that full implementation of the Named Person requires significant investment of resources especially in the provision of a universal health visitor service. I welcome the provision in the Financial Memorandum for additional resources for Health Visitors, but they are insufficient and are required now, rather than later. For these reasons, I urge the Committee to closely scrutinise this aspect of the Bill to ensure that the aspirations for early years developments are matched by the resource allocation.

18. I am concerned about the introduction of the new information sharing duty on public authorities and service providers at s. 26, which has not been consulted upon. My understanding is that the new test requiring information sharing where information ‘might be relevant’ to the exercise of the named person functions (s. 26 (2)(a)) would significantly lower the current thresholds for information sharing and substantially broaden the grounds on which such information sharing would occur. This is a shift from sharing relevant information where there are concerns about the ‘risk of harm’ to sharing information where there are concerns about the ‘well-being of individual children and young people’ – where ‘well-being’ is very broadly defined in terms of children being: Safe, Healthy, Achieving, Nurtured, Active, Respected, Responsible and Included (SHANARRI). This would appear to be a radical change to existing information sharing frameworks relating to children and young people.

19. It is crucial that the right balance is struck between the need to share information to protect and promote the child’s wellbeing and the child’s right to privacy (art. 16 UNCRC; art. 8 ECHR), taking account of the UNCRC’s general principles including the best interest principle (art. 3) and children’s right to be heard (art. 12). This has to be made clear in the Bill, with guidance reinforcing this point in practice. Where information is shared, such disclosure of personal information must be proportionate, appropriate and relevant.

20. Children value their privacy and confidential services, as is clear from numerous reports and recognition has to be taken of this fact. I believe this is a clear example of the need for a CRIA to be carried out on all of the Bill’s provisions.

Part 8: Young People Leaving Care

21. The Bill proposes an extension of the powers for local authorities to support young people leaving care up to and including the age of 25 years, which I support although I feel that the provision in s. 60 should be strengthened. However, I am concerned for those young people who leave care at age 16/17 and who subsequently experience difficulties, often becoming homeless and on occasion imprisoned. In my view, the Bill should give young people who leave care aged 16-17 years and who subsequently become homeless a right to be looked after and accommodated by the local authority.

18 Indeed, A Scotland for Children stated in this context: ‘the intention is that such information sharing would occur within existing legal frameworks’ (para 120).

Tam Baillie
Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People
22 July 2013
1. In my written evidence on the Bill, I suggested that I provide further evidence to the Committee on the benefits of incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots Law (para 5). I do so in this short paper and look forward to engaging further with the Committee at its meeting on 1 October.

2. By ratification of the UNCRC in 1991, the UK has accepted the obligation in international law to give effect to the Convention's provisions. In dualist legal systems like those of the UK, the principal method of giving direct legal effect to international law is incorporation of treaties into domestic law by passing legislation that creates enforceable rights which mirror those in the treaty, for example the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA).

3. The principal effects of incorporation of the UNCRC would be likely to be:

   - Ministers and other public authorities would be under a duty to act compatibly with the UNCRC. A failure to consistently do so would render any such action unlawful.
   - Compliance would be achieved by applying Children’s Rights Impact Assessments (CRIA) and similar processes to policy-making and implementation as well as budgeting.
   - Children and those acting on their behalf would be able to seek redress through a range of accessible remedies if they consider that their rights have been breached.
   - The courts’ jurisprudence would be informed by the UNCRC and all other law interpreted in light of its provisions. The courts could declare unlawful legislation that is incompatible with UNCRC rights.

4. Crucially, the international evidence shows that incorporation, and to some extent public and political debate about incorporation, contributes significantly to building a culture where children are seen as rights-holders who are entitled to be treated with dignity and respect, and to play an active role in their lives, gradually assuming increased autonomy as they mature.

5. Incorporation is a complex area and there are different approaches by which it can be achieved. The wording of the statute would have to ensure that its rights guarantees are true to the UNCRC’s provisions and enforceable by the courts. Remedies would have to be accessible to children and might include non-court mechanisms such as advocacy, complaints processes, Commissioner investigations and ultimately, although in practice rarely, litigation.

Examples where incorporation would be likely to make a difference

6. In Sweet 16? The Age of Leaving Care in Scotland, my predecessor highlighted a long-standing concern that young people leaving care aged 16-17, often before they are ready, face multiple adverse outcomes including homelessness and isolation. In contrast, young people who are not in care are now staying at home for longer. Were the UNCRC part of Scots Law, young people and those supporting them would be in a stronger position to ensure that young people have substantial say in decisions about them, and that these are made in their best interests, ensuring their rights in respect of continuing high quality care were fulfilled. Relevant legislation and its implementation would at least reach the minimum standards set by the UNCRC, or would be challengeable.

7. My recent report It Always Comes Down to Money highlights cuts to services for disabled children and young people as well as changes to local authorities’ charges for services. Children value play and recreational services, yet these are subject to cuts and the most likely to be charged for. This increases disabled children’s isolation, further excludes them from the social and cultural life of their communities, and decreases their quality of life. The report also revealed a lack of consultation with children and parents by service providers. UNCRC incorporation would enable robust challenges to such decisions and how they are made using articles 31 (right to play, recreation and participation in cultural life), 2 (non-discrimination), 3 (best interests principle) and 12 (right to be heard).

8. The UK Government’s policy of routinely detaining children whose asylum claims ‘failed’, often for lengthy periods, was officially ended in 2010 after years of campaigning. It contravened UNCRC rights, including the best interest principle, and the prohibition of such detention save in exceptional circumstances, as a last resort and for the shortest possible time. A Ministerial duty to have regard to the welfare of children in this context made no difference. Had the UNCRC been part of UK law, children’s rights arguments made by campaigners, including MSPs, would have been much more difficult to resist. While having regard to the need for effective immigration control, the courts would have been likely to find that child detention violated UNCRC protections and was therefore unlawful.

9. Incorporation is not a panacea to immediately address every aspect of adversity facing children and young people. However, it does fundamentally change the terms of the conversation about children’s rights, status and place in society. I believe it would over time lead to major changes in law, policy and practice, which would benefit children and support challenges even to intractable breaches of children’s rights. This would truly enable Scotland to become the best place for children to be children and to grow up, and so bring huge benefit to children, families, and society as a whole.

10. I am aware that the Scottish Government has stated that it does not intend to progress incorporation through this Bill. I would reiterate my previous call on Ministers to at least set out a ‘road map’ towards incorporation, detailing concrete steps it will take to make good the promise made to children by accepting the obligations under the UNCRC in a more consistent manner. In the absence of incorporation, I suggest that the Committee recommend that article 3 (child’s best interests a primary consideration in all matters affecting the child) and article 12 (child’s view on all matters affecting them given due weight in decision-making) be given effect through this Bill in the first instance.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Scottish Association of Social Work

Introduction

1. The Scottish Association of Social Work represents social workers, many offering frontline services throughout Scotland. They work in both rural and urban communities, local government and voluntary sector services and often are the gateway to local government and third sector services. SASW members are daily involved in the direct decision making about children for whom there may be concerns about their well-being. Assessing such situations is a highly complex task and will be different for each child as we seek to identify what is in the child’s best interest. Not only do we have to assess and meet the child’s needs, we have to assess and help manage risk and we have to do this in the context of often competing human rights issues for the child, siblings and their parents. Critical to the work is the trust that can be established between all parties to ensure the best interest of the child.

UNCRC

2. Families trying to provide for their children are being adversely affected by low wages, welfare reform and poor provision of affordable housing. The lack of mention of families and focus on providing support for them in this legislation leans to a bias towards thinking about provision being provided by others rather than meeting the key requirements of the UNCRC to support children being brought up in their own families. Members are very clear that a lead could have been given by the government in this Bill, by incorporating the UNCRC into Scots Law, to support children being brought up in their own families. They further argue that a Child Impact Assessment for this Bill would support this need for more concrete action. SASW is a member of the TOGETHER coalition and supports all the comments, particularly in respect of UNCRC.

3. Monitoring and promoting children’s rights are key to the role of the Children’s Commissioner and SASW welcomes the extension of the Children’s Commissioners powers. However whilst we have brought to the attention of the Government the Hillingdon judgement in respect of children who apply for asylum we would still argue that the needs of these children should be explicitly covered in this legislation.

4. It is important that all services working to promote children and young peoples’ well-being. This is a matter of good practice and SASW members have expressed concern about how this can be promoted through legislation. Investment in helping people work together is achieved through cultural change and respect for what everyone, including the child/young person brings to the table.
5. Co-ordinated multi-disciplinary assessments have been around in social work for over 40 years. They are important to getting early intervention and good resources for children only if the resources are there to meet their needs. Good assessment practice has to be supported by flexible and creative solutions for meeting need. The concern from SASW members is how far primary legislation can be used for ensuring good practice, not just in the assessment stage but at the point of implementation. Social Workers would welcome more help with ensuring appropriate availability of resources than further underfunded legislation.

6. The child and family are critical to any plan working. They have to feel empowered, they have to own the plan and they have to feel supported by the professionals. They also need to know that their privacy in family life is respected and only information that needs to be shared with multiple professionals is done. They need to be treated with dignity and respect.

7. In Sec 26: Appropriate information sharing between agencies/ partners is a good working principle to include a duty on adult care providers to share info if affecting a child (mental health, illness) but there needs to be sensitivity to safeguard a child’s privacy.

8. In Sec 33: The Child’s Plan: “In having regard to child’s view maturity must be considered..” This should be strengthened to ensure an overall strong message in that a child’s view must be included.

9. Another concern is the number of people that often get involved in the planning and review processes for people where social work and other services are involved. This has been a very clear message from young people involved in Who Cares? and SASW members can confirm this from their own practice. We are concerned for example by the notion of the universal element of the ‘named person’ in that this may add an unnecessary layer of bureaucracy to more children than it will help. We can identify no research that would support this new role in complex cases and leads to confusion with the role of the Lead Professional. Social Workers are also concerned that this may be seen as undermining the role of parents who in the majority are well able to keep focussed on their children’s well-being.

Strengthening the role of early years support in children’s and families’ lives by increasing the amount and flexibility of funded early learning and childcare

10. The concern that has been raised is how will this affect some of our most vulnerable young children at a time of economic austerity? Will it take resources away from supporting some of our more critical supports in favour of a universal provision? SASW would seek reassurance that resources will not be taken away where they are most needed to prevent harm.
Ensuring better permanence planning for looked after children by improving support for kinship carers, families and care leavers, extending corporate parenting across the public sector, and putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing

11. SASW is pleased to see the proposals for strengthening the support for kinship care. The postcode lottery of whether a young person or child has to be in public care before a kinship care allowance can even be considered has to be ended. The principle of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 was one of minimal intervention and it is important that when extended families are able to offer that love, care and support to children unable to live with their birth parents, it is done in a positive way, rather than through a series of hurdles that are off-putting to families willing to take on these additional responsibilities. For example a recent issue that has arisen since proposals for this Bill were put forward. The changes to the welfare benefits system include changes to the previous universal child benefit – these should be considered when looking at the availability of financial support.

12. An important part of the Bill that we fully support is the duty of support from local Authorities for young people who are in public care to the age of 26. Evidence from the UK and internationally suggests that when this has been provided young people can make positive growth from childhood to adult life. However there needs to be an avenue for redress if assistance is refused.

13. There is growing concern about the number of young people who have been in public care who die either through suicide, substance misuse or as victims of violence when they are still young. SASW would urge Parliament to include an automatic Serious Case Review when a young person who has left care dies.

14. In respect of the proposed National Adoption Register SASW would support the observations from BAAF that to make a real difference in helping fond appropriate families for children there needs to be much more promotion, public education and financial assistance where children have complex needs.

Strengthen existing legislation that affects children and young people by making procedural and technical changes in the areas of children’s hearings support arrangements, secure accommodation placements, and school closures.

15. There comes from the equality impact assessment of this proposed legislation, in the formal decision making of bodies like the Children’s Hearings, issues about competing rights, whether between parents and children or between siblings, before even considering the potential role of the wider family like grandparents, aunts and uncles.

16. One illustration is the scenario where a mother has mental health issues where an MHO and others are considering detention in a hospital and the children’s social worker is considering a Child Protection Order application to protect the children. The outcomes of each of these processes of decision making can be quite profound on the child and parents. This has been illustrated in the recent Mental Welfare Commission Report on Parents who are Detained. The same issues arise when parents are remanded into or sentenced to custody.

17. The second scenario is that a Court or Hearing is considering the best interest of one child but does not take into account the best interest of siblings – for example their contact with each other or the right to live together as part of the same family.

18. SASW members are concerned about another group of vulnerable young people who are becoming increasingly marginalised and who could have been included in this Bill. The suggest that a “Right of refuge” for young runaways who ask for it would also be a welcome addition- This proposed change strengthens the 95 Act, by changing the power to provide refuge to young runaways that ask for it, into a duty to provide. Very few local authorities currently act on this power and provide refuge under section 38.

19. Finally, Family Group Conferences have an increasing body of research demonstrating success in achieving support for children and young people continuing to live within their families when difficulties arise. It is suggested that before any life changing decisions are made about a child that an FGC is put in place to explore thoroughly whether or not that child’s needs can be met within their family.

Conclusion

20. SASW members have discussed this proposed legislation at great length and whilst welcoming some of the recommendations have also voiced concern that there have been some key issues that could have been included and see some missed opportunities. We hope that our observations are helpful to the Committee deliberations and we are available if we can be of further assistance

INTRODUCTION

1. The Scottish Child Law Centre (SCLC or the Centre) is an independent charity, based in Edinburgh which provides services to the whole of Scotland. The aim of the Centre is to promote knowledge and use of Scots law and children’s rights for the benefit of children and young people in Scotland. SCLC provides free legal advice and support on all aspects of Scots law relating to children and young people. In addition the Centre provides publications on a range of subjects as well as providing training, conferences and seminars. SCLC also has a consultative and advisory function for local and central government and through this seeks to improve the content and practice of the law as it relates to and affects children. The Centre employs qualified solicitors to carry out its legal work.

RESPONSE

2. The SCLC has had the opportunity to read the response by the Family Law Committee of the Law Society of Scotland and adopts that response. We have only brief additions to that response.

3. While the Centre supports the government’s aim to ensure the best possible services and outcomes for Scotland’s children, we are concerned that much of this Bill attempts to make policy into statute. For legislation to be effective it must be clear, unambiguous and enforceable. We are concerned that significant parts of this Bill do not meet those criteria.

4. Over recent years Scotland has seen a significant amount of new legislation introduced which concerns children and young people. Where there are a number of statutes which must work together it is essential that the language be consistent. Inconsistencies lead to confusion, and can have unforeseen consequences.

Rights of children and young people

5. We support the government’s aim of promoting the UNCRC, but are concerned that the duties proposed in the Bill are actually weaker than existing obligations under the UNCRC. To introduce a weaker duty will have the opposite effect of that intended. We agree with the LSS that the reporting duty should be consistent with that under the existing duty under the UNCRC.

Commissioner of Children and Young People in Scotland

6. We support the proposals for the extension of the powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People to include investigations in individual cases. This is entirely appropriate and very welcome.
Wellbeing and Getting it Right for Every Child (GIRFEC)

7. The SCLC shares the concerns of the LSS with regard to the introduction of the term “wellbeing”. Welfare is the term used throughout child law in Scotland and in the UNCRC. It is well understood in legal terms and has a consistent use and application. To introduce a new and less clearly defined concept which is not consistent is not likely to contribute positively to this important area of law.

8. The SCLC is concerned that the Bill would introduce the assessment tool SHANARRI into law. SHANARRI is a useful practical tool for practitioners, but it is inappropriate to enshrine it in statute. The constituent parts of SHANARRI (safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible, included) are not easily given clear statutory definitions. As we stated above, legislation must be clearly applied and including SHANARRI in legislation is not appropriate. We are also concerned that tools such as SHANARRI tend to be replaced fairly quickly and if enshrined in law, are not easily changed as practice and policy evolve.

9. We share the serious concerns of the Law Society of Scotland with regard to the named person and adopt their response here.

10. A child who has multi-agency involvement would benefit from a named person, and the SCLC supports the provision of a named person for such children. However, to require that every child in Scotland has a named person risks unwarranted and unjustified intrusion into the private life of that child and family. We are also concerned that there are serious implications under the provisions of the Data Protection Act for children who do not have multi agency involvement or a need for a child’s plan. We share the concerns of the LSS. We recommend that consideration be given to the following:

- there appears to be no provision for the child to object to the choice of named person, or to nominate a preferred person

- the requirement that information be shared with the named person for all children risks a serious article 8 breach. It is likely to place serious constraints on agencies and organisations who work in sensitive areas; for example sexual health. Children are entitled to protection with regard to the sharing of personal and sensitive information under the provisions of the Data Protection Act. Exemption is made where there are child protection concerns. This does not in any way justify the sharing of sensitive information with a named person as a routine measure.

- if the named person is to be a head teacher or other person at a school, school staff are not normally available 12 months of the year and there are questions as to the availability of help during the holidays
Aftercare

11. The SCLC welcomes the extension of the right to request assistance to the age of 25.

Other Reforms

12. We share the concerns of the LSS. The SCLC is concerned that the insertion of “wellbeing” into Scottish Child Law, will introduce a lack of consistency and will risk weakening existing law.

Ensure that children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services by placing new duties on the Scottish Ministers and the public sector and by increasing the powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People;

1. NHS Boards will require, in strategy, policy and performance to make explicit children’s rights and steps taken to comply with this section of the legislation.

2. This will require a culture shift across health services and whilst it is welcomed, it poses certain challenges. Guidance on implementation and monitoring performance would be welcome and this would also help to support a consistent approach across the country.

3. It is suggested there will be particular challenges for those who work in services where the adult is the primary receiver of care and their understanding as compliance with children’s rights in practice is crucial to the implementation of the legislation. In addition, health practitioners may face conflict in balancing the rights of adults receiving care with those of the adult’s children.

Improve the way services support children and families by promoting cooperation between services, with the child at the centre;

4. We welcome the focus being on a child’s “Well Being”, however, feel many health staff, in particular those caring for adults, will not have the required knowledge to recognise where a presenting situation may be a risk to a child’s “Well Being”. However, we are confident they can recognise a safeguarding or child protection situation.

5. The focus on “Well Being” is likely to present challenges in staff having the confidence and willingness to share information even where risk to “Well Being” has been identified.

6. We would suggest that consideration is given to some type of national initiative to raise aware of the issue of “Well Being”.

7. The Bill proposes NHS Boards will be responsible for ensuring every child from birth to school age has a Named Person. This leaves the legislation open to interpretation in allocating such a role. It is requested that the final legislation explicitly states this should be the role of the midwife from birth to 10 days and thereafter until school age the health visitor. These professionals are best placed professional to fulfil the responsibilities of the role and produce the best outcomes for children in the age group.

8. We ask that clear and explicit national guidance is provided on the role and responsibilities for the named person to ensure consistency across Scotland. We would invite the National Girfec Team to provide this along with training and education materials.
9. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill sets out a requirement of professionals to share information with the child’s named person when there is a concern for a child’s safety or a presenting situation which may be a risk to their “Well Being”.

10. The Bill proposes Health Boards will provide the role of named person for those children birth to school entry and the Local authority that for children from school entry until they have attained the age of 18 years.

11. As previously suggested we would like Health Visitors to assume the role of the named person for children from birth to school age.

12. For children of school age it is commonly considered likely that education will assume the role.

13. Custom and practice across NHS Boards is that when a child attends a health service and this generates actual or potential concern about their wellbeing, this is communicated to the health visitor for pre-school children and the school nurse for school age. In addition, even those attendances that may not be of concern are also shared, such as attendances at Accident and Emergency Departments or sexual health services. This practice enables the collation of chronologies which are important in highlighting concern arising from an accumulation of health issues.

14. Whilst for preschool children the proposed legislation will not change this practice, for school aged children this will require health services to share health information outwith the NHS i.e with the local authority/education.

15. We would like consideration and clarity to be given with regards to the potential conflict between the proposed legislation and that pertaining to medical confidentiality. We feel guidance on sharing information with regards to risk to “Well Being” and information sharing to support the continuity of health Care is required.

16. Without clarification on the above, the well being of children and young people will potentially be at greater risk than is currently the case.

Ensure better permanence planning for looked after children by improving support for kinship carers, families and care leavers, extending corporate parenting across the public sector, and putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing;

17. NHS Boards will require clarity on the role of the corporate parent and the implications of this. Consideration will need to be given to the role of adult health services in particular in relation to those 16-25 years and action taken to ensure they understand the legislation and the interface with vulnerable adult legislation.

Education and Culture Committee
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Scottish Childminding Association

Overview
1. Scottish Childminding Association (SCMA) welcomes the introduction of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. While we have an interest in other parts of the Bill, we are restricting our evidence to Part 6, Early Learning and Childcare.

2. Our over-riding feeling is that the purpose of Part 6 of the Bill must be to improve outcomes for children. This needs to be balanced with the need to improve outcomes for families and communities. Part 6 concentrates on education authorities and this tends to focus views on currently restricted methods of service delivery of pre-school education. Our hope is that this will begin the expansion of services to children and families in a more holistic way. Care must be taken to evaluate and monitor what happens in practice in order for the spirit of this part of the Bill not to be lost.

3. SCMA hopes that this part of the Bill is part of a longer term vision to extend support for access to universal services to a wider age range of children. This will include our youngest children where support to ensure successful early development is so important and to older children where the importance of access to good quality out of school care services is often overlooked.

42 – Early learning and childcare
4. We welcome the definition of early learning and childcare and expect that this will be explained further in guidance.

5. We know that many of our childminder members do provide a service which educates young children and helps them to learn as well as caring for their social and emotional needs. They are currently inspected against this by the Care Inspectorate and evidence of their grades show that they outperform may other types of day care service.

6. We hope this Bill will start to help reduce the simplistic divide between education and care that we consider are inseparable. However, given that the Bill aims to extend provision to some 2 year olds, we would expect that the definition is clearer about the need for different types of services for these very young children rather than simply saying a caring and nurturing setting.

43 – Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare
7. SCMA would hope that the “eligible pre-school child” definition would be extended to have a broader definition for 2 year olds rather than just those defined as ‘looked after’ or ‘the subject of a kinship care order’.
8. The Bill is asking education authorities to provide a service that combines education and care. If the definition is extended to include a broader definition of vulnerable 2's then consideration must be given to the type of service offered. It must not be the case that these children are provided services in large group care nurseries that were never designed to meet their needs. Their needs are better met in small family settings where they can mix with a variety of children and that support is also given to the family. SCMA has been providing services for vulnerable children and families through its Community Childminding Service and evaluations show that vulnerable young children quickly thrive.

44 – Mandatory amount of early learning and childcare

9. SCMA would hope that the mandatory amount is seen as part of a wider vision and that the extension to 600 hours is just a start and that the longer term vision is for this to be expanded as appropriate. In particular consideration must be given to the needs of out of school care services. These are vital to the wellbeing of school age children and particularly important for children in poverty. We are concerned that as new UK welfare arrangements begin to take effect that families will not be able to cover the cost of these services.

45 – Looked after 2 year olds: alternative arrangements to meet wellbeing needs

10. SCMA trusts that this section should encourage authorities to be more creative in meeting the education and care needs of looked after 2's. This would include providing family support as well as services directly for the child.

11. It will be important in 45 (5) that the children’s service plan gives a clear indication of the intent to provide this range of services as well as the insistence on the assessment of need to be recorded and for the child’s plan to record improvements.

12. We know that disadvantaged children benefit most from being part of a mixed ability group rather than simply being with other disadvantaged children. They learn from the examples set by other children and so local authority planning will need to take this into account. Our evidence from children in a mixed group with a community childminder shows their marked improvements against the SHANARRI wellbeing indicators. The outcomes of research will soon be available from Dr Christine Stephen at Stirling University.

46 – Duty to consult and plan on delivery of early learning and childcare

13. SCMA would like to see the duty to consult and plan extended to a duty to evaluate an education authority’s success in providing a range of services requested. The duty should require that this information should be included as part of the children’s services plans.

14. The duty should also be extended to include consulting with pre-school children in order to ensure that services meet outcomes for children and not just the needs of their parents.
15. It is already the case that services registered by the care inspectorate must consult with children as well as their parents in order to have a clear idea of where improvements can be made. This will be possible for the local authority and will add considerably to the usefulness of their consultation.

47 – Method of delivery of early learning and childcare.

16. SCMA agree that clear parameters must be put on the method of delivery. It would certainly not be in the best interests of many children to have too long in large group care.

17. This outline though allows education authorities to have a similar method to the one they currently deliver and simply extend the hours available. We would hope over time that authorities will become more creative in the services available. This will need to be evidenced in the children’s services plans.

48 - Flexibility in way in which early learning and childcare is made available

18. In having to secure availability of early learning and care in section 43(1) and having to ensure flexibility, local authorities should look to include services provided by appropriate childminding services in their area as well as other private and third sector service providers. Guidance can decide on how the quality of partner providers is ensured.

19. SCMA is concerned that education authorities only appear to need to have the views of parents when deciding on flexibility. We would want equal emphasis to be given to the needs of the child.

20. Consideration must also be given to working to ensure that employers adopt more family friendly policies. Flexibility is not just about the availability of childcare but also of simple measures including working hours that fit where possible with school and childcare times.

21. SCMA evidence to the Parliament’s Equal Opportunities Committee stressed the importance of the whole package that will help parents into work. The recommendations of the committee called for a statutory right to childcare for children up to the age of 15 years. We would hope that this Bill is the start of that road.

Scottish Childminding Association

Background

1. The Children's Hearings System is Scotland’s distinct system of child protection and youth justice. Among its fundamental principles are:
   - whether concerns relate to their welfare or behaviour, the needs of children or young people in trouble should be met through a single holistic and integrated system
   - a preventative approach, involving early identification and diagnosis of problems, is essential
   - the welfare of the child remains at the centre of all decision making and the child’s best interests are paramount throughout
   - the child’s engagement and participation is crucial to good decision making

2. SCRA operates the Reporter service which sits at the heart of the system. SCRA employs Children's Reporters who are located throughout Scotland, working in close partnership with panel members and other professionals such as social work, education, the police, the health service, the legal profession and the courts system.

3. SCRA’s vision is that vulnerable children and young people in Scotland are safe, protected and offered positive futures. We will seek to achieve this by adhering to the following key values:
   - The voice of the child must be heard
   - Our hopes and dreams for the children of Scotland are what unite us
   - Children and young people’s experiences and opinions guide us
   - We are approachable and open
   - We bring the best of the past with us into the future to meet new challenges

Response

4. SCRA welcomes the opportunity to comment on the Scottish Government’s Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. We have set out our comments in line with the Bill’s sections but suggest that there are opportunities to consider the legislation in a more holistic way and promote better links between the different parts of the Bill, in particular between Part 1 (Children’s Rights), Part 3 (Children’s Services Planning), Part 4 (Named Person) and Part 7 (Corporate Parenting), in order to more effectively deliver the policy goals.
Children’s rights

5. Children’s rights are at the heart of the Children’s Hearings System and much emphasis is placed on giving effect to Article 12 of the UNCRC by facilitating the child’s effective participation in the Hearings process. SCRA is fully committed to protecting and enshrining children’s rights in everything that we do. Our internal Participation Group has done some excellent work over the last two years to improve the ways in which children and young people can participate, both in their own hearings, and in driving improvements to the system as a whole. The involvement of our Modern Apprentices has had a hugely positive impact on this area of work, allowing the voices of children and young people to directly impact and influence policy and practice. We therefore agree wholeheartedly with the Policy Memorandum, which sets out the Scottish Government’s aspiration to ensure that children’s rights are respected across the public sector.

6. However, we are disappointed that the proposals in this section do not appear to give full effect to that aspiration. In particular, we are unclear as to why the provisions have been diluted to such an extent over the course of the two formal consultations, despite there being apparently clear support at each stage for enshrining a stronger commitment to children’s rights in the legislation, including by placing duties on public bodies.

7. SCRA’s Equality Network, a staff group that is charged with ensuring that the organisation complies with its responsibilities under the equalities legislation, has begun to consider how a children’s rights approach could be incorporated more fully into our own strategic decision making. For example, it does not seem impossible when performing an Equalities Impact Assessment, to include consideration of the effect of any policy on children’s rights in that assessment. While these discussions are at an early stage, we do not believe that a requirement to more actively consider and take action in relation to children’s rights should be seen as a significantly onerous burden on the public sector.

Children’s Services Planning

8. We are supportive of the proposals to place duties on public bodies to work together to design, plan and deliver jointly their policies and services to ensure that they focus on improving children’s and young people’s wellbeing. SCRA sees itself having an important role locally and nationally in supporting the planning and delivery of services. We can also see that the duty might have the potential to help move the Lead Professional role out of social work and into other agencies, such as health, where appropriate. It would be helpful however for this section to link with other parts of the Bill. Please see our response to the Corporate Parenting section for more detail on how this could be achieved.

Provision of Named Person

9. We recognise that the Named Person role is considered to have worked well in Highland, where it has driven a shift in culture and practice, resulting in people being more aware of their (and others’) responsibilities. Our understanding is that the Named Person role works very much in tandem with that of the Lead.
Professional as they have complementary roles (albeit very distinct responsibilities) and as such it will also be necessary to ensure that there is clarity of differentiation between the Named Person and Lead Professional roles, and the responsibilities of other professionals, in particular the Chief Social Work Officer.

10. It is critical for the role of the Named Person to be meaningful in terms of the benefits that it provides for children. It should not, in our view, simply be an administrative exercise that results in a child having a Named Person that they have no meaningful contact or relationship with. We would suggest that there is a need for clear guidance for professionals in terms of what is expected of the Named Person, and also for clear and concise information for children which tells them what they have a right to expect from that individual. We would also suggest that the Highland experience be utilised to establish which aspects of the role have been particularly valued by children and young people so that good practice can be identified and built into the national model. Finally, we note the issues raised by other agencies (e.g. teachers) about the potential impact of this responsibility on their ‘day job’ and are concerned that unless these are properly addressed, the role may not achieve all that is intended.

Child’s Plan

11. Again, we recognise the broadly positive experience in Highland, where increasingly Child’s Plans have come to reflect multi-agency contributions and have been put in place at an earlier stage, which can often provide a better basis for consideration of referral to the Reporter.

12. SCRA (as a national body) is aware of significant differences across the country in the way such plans are put together and populated. There is an opportunity off the back of this legislation to clearly identify best practice in terms of what a single Child’s Plan should contain and to ensure that this is rolled out across Scotland. We do not believe that there is any compelling argument that individual Local Authorities require significantly different content in their Plans and consider that sufficient flexibility could be built into a standard Child’s Plan. We understand that the Highland Child Protection Committee (CPC) has agreed to develop a revised and simplified version of the single Plan and suggest that this could be used as a basis for an agreed national Child’s Plan.

13. Within that context, we would strongly support the provision of a specific section covering consideration of referral to the Reporter and outlining what is intended to be achieved by compulsory measures of supervision if such are considered necessary. We would also be strongly supportive of a section clearly stating the child’s views, both at the stage of assessment of need and agreement of action. A critical consideration must be that the Plan is simple, straightforward and usable, not just for professionals (including children’s panel members), but also for children and families.

14. We also believe, based on our professional experience, that it is essential for the Child’s Plan to be set out in a way that allows it to be used within the legal process, for example by Reporters when seeking to establish grounds for referral.
This may for example require sections where the evidence or views of individual agencies is explicitly marked out. Sufficient information needs to be included to allow effective decision making and a good chronology is one key aspect.

Corporate parenting

15. We are fully supportive of the concept of corporate parenting, and of the need to legislate for a clear definition. In particular, we agree that there is a lack of shared understanding about the definition of corporate parenting and consider that this particularly applies to looked after children themselves. One of the aims of this Bill should, in our view, be to allow children to be clear about who their corporate parents are and what they can expect from them. However, we do not believe that this has been achieved.

16. We note that the concept of corporate parenting originally came about to explain that local authorities had particular responsibilities towards children for whom they were acting (to one degree or another) in loco parentis. It recognised the poor outcomes experienced by looked after children and attempted to remedy this by encouraging local authorities to act towards the children in their care in the way that a parent would. The concept applies to local authorities precisely because they have those legal responsibilities in relation to looked after children.

17. We recognise that there may be a superficial attraction in defining large numbers of public sector organisations as “corporate parents”, with the laudable aim of improving permanence planning and ensuring that the needs of looked after children are prioritised and accorded due weight in all decision-making. However, the majority of the organisations listed in Schedule 3 are not exercising any of the duties or responsibilities of a parent (corporate or otherwise). This then has an impact on the drafting of the duties in section 52, many of which do not apply to various of the organisations listed in Schedule 3, including SCRA. This is likely to lead to confusion and a lack of clarity over what is expected from these “corporate parents”. We are particularly concerned that by expanding the scope of the definition of “corporate parenting”, the Bill risks diluting the core concept to the point that it loses all meaning, risking undermining the good work that has been done by the Scottish Government, CELCIS and Who Cares? Scotland to ensure that local authorities understand their particular responsibilities towards looked after children.

18. There are of course specific issues in relation to corporate parenting and the Children’s Hearings System, which requires a degree of independence and separation of functions from those organisations delivering universal services. The Hearings System has a role in holding local authorities to account in relation to the delivery of statutory supports and interventions for children on supervision and we would not want to risk blurring that clear delineation and independence of function. Placing corporate parenting responsibilities on SCRA or on Children’s Hearings Scotland would risk the Hearings System being seen as a gateway to services, rather than allowing it to maintain its focus on determining whether children are in need of compulsory measures of supervision. It is significant that the Scottish Government guidance - “These are our Bairns” – clearly does not envisage that the Children’s Hearings System is exercising a corporate parenting role.

19. It is critically important however not to miss the opportunity to ensure that the wider public sector attaches appropriate weight to the needs of looked after children and young people and prioritises them in decision making. SCRA recognises that it has a legitimate role in seeking to improve the life chances of children, both through the decisions made by Reporters in relation to referrals and in terms of organisational policy and strategic decision-making. We believe that other organisations throughout the public sector would share those aspirations. However, we do not believe that this is best expressed in corporate parenting terms. We believe that there are other, more effective, ways of more capturing that contribution and ensuring that all relevant public sector organisations work with corporate parents to deliver better outcomes.

20. We would suggest therefore that a three-tiered approach be adopted. The first tier would be made up of corporate parents, with the statutory definition of corporate parenting being drafted more tightly and restricted to those organisations from whom the Named Person could be drawn. This would ensure that the concept was linked appropriately to GIRFEC, while protecting the core corporate parenting definition and allowing the duties imposed on corporate parents to be clearer and more meaningful, both for those organisations exercising them and for looked after children themselves. The second tier (including SCRA and CHS) would consist of the children’s services planning partners, who would be under a duty to ensure that the children’s services plan demonstrated clearly how the wider children’s services community would support corporate parents in the performance of their duties. The third tier would include the rest of the public sector, and we would suggest that their responsibilities could be best defined by imposing duties within the children’s rights section of the Bill, perhaps framed similarly to the existing equalities duties or around a “best interests” requirement in relation to decision making. We believe that this would ensure that the different sections of the Bill are linked together in a more effective and holistic way and would allow everyone (public sector organisations and children alike) to be clear about roles, responsibilities and expectations.

Aftercare

21. We recognise that the transition points in a child’s life can be particularly challenging. For children who are ceasing to be looked after, loss of support and security can render them particularly vulnerable. It is crucial therefore to ensure that continuing supports are provided and can be easily accessed to see children and young people safely through this stage of their lives.

Support for Kinship Care

22. We are supportive of the policy intent of these provisions, and the desire to bring security of placement to some children who are residing with kinship carers. We would caution however, that residence is often only one of a number of significant issues that may result in a child becoming looked after. It should not therefore be assumed that a successful application for this order will automatically result in the child not requiring to be subject to a Compulsory Supervision Order. Many children will continue to need compulsory measures of supervision to address other needs in their lives.

Other Reforms – Children’s Hearings

23. We are entirely supportive of the proposals in this section. We recognise that Local Authorities have a crucial role to play within the Children’s Hearings System and that the support they provide is highly valued by panel members and by other partners, including SCRA. It is important to acknowledge that this role goes beyond provision of support to panel members and encompasses involvement with children and families, engagement in community planning processes and a wider role within the child protection system.

24. SCRA has a clear and legitimate interest in the efficient and effective operation of the Children’s Hearings System and we are fully supportive of the proposals, which provide the National Convener with the power to determine the structure of Area Support Teams (ASTs) and place a duty on local authorities to continue to provide support to those ASTs.

25. The purpose of an AST is to provide high quality and consistent levels of support to members of the national children’s panel. It is right, in our view, that it is those who directly represent the panel community, and who will be held accountable to Ministers and to the Parliament over the successful discharge of their statutory responsibilities, who should have ultimate decision making authority. It is hard to see how the Convener and CHS can be held accountable for the discharge of their statutory functions if they do not have the final say over what the AST structure should look like.

26. Similarly, the Convener needs to have the ability to review and redefine the AST structure in order to maximise its ability to deliver the kinds of improvements to the system, to the experience of children and families and ultimately to outcomes, that were envisaged by the Parliament when the legislation was passed. This will enable the Convener and CHS to respond quickly to emerging issues and learning as the new structures bed in.

27. Given the important role that Local Authorities play, it will clearly remain important for the Convener to seek to engage with them and, wherever possible, to get their agreement to her preferred AST structure. However, we consider that ultimately the Convener needs to have the authority to determine that structure herself in the knowledge that local authorities are required to provide the same levels of support as they always have done. We note that Local Authorities will still be represented on the AST and will be guaranteed a voice.

Conclusion

28. While we are supportive of the majority of the Bill’s proposals, we do believe that there is scope for improvement to more effectively deliver the policy intentions by considering the legislation in a more holistic and joined-up way.

Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration, 26 July 2013
Introduction

1. The Scottish Children’s Services Coalition (SCSC) is a policy-focused collaboration bringing together leading third and independent sector children’s services providers. The members deliver residential care, specialist education and direct help and support for children with complex needs, including learning difficulties and learning disabilities. They also provide independent advocacy, advice and representation for children and young people and their parents or carers.

2. Members provide tailored support to children with complex needs from a diverse range of backgrounds and social circumstances. Many have social, emotional and behavioural difficulties, sometimes brought on by being a victim of neglect or abuse, and/or complex developmental disabilities, such as:
   - Autism Spectrum Disorders (ASD): can include behavioural, medical and psychological interventions, counselling and psychotherapy, complementary therapies and dietary support, to name a few.
   - Aspergers Syndrome (AS): Support may include communication-based interventions, behavioural therapy and dietary changes.
   - Attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD): depending on the severity, the condition can be managed through a combination of medication and psychological, educational and social therapies.
   - Social, Emotional and Behavioural Difficulties (SEBD): requires one to one counselling and support.

3. As highlighted above, children with complex needs often need dedicated, specialist care from the highest quality of providers who are attuned to their requirements and able to better equip these vulnerable individuals for the challenges of life.

Provision of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

4. The Bill’s Policy Memorandum states that:

5. This is a Bill that SCSC is pleased to see coming forward. However, it has some issues and observations that require to be addressed if it is to realise its full potential.
General Observations

6. We know that prevention is much better than cure and yet the Bill contains not one single mention of prevention, or of families and local services providing support, instead it focuses on the demands of failure.

7. We naturally spend heavily in meeting the costs of failure, but need to try and prioritise preventative spend, which the societal costs of failure far outweigh. However, instead of prioritising measures that would reduce the harm of broken families, for example, the Bill is concerned with picking up the pieces rather than providing vital cost-effective support in the first place.

Specific Comments

Children’s Rights

8. Full incorporation of UNCRC

10. Public bodies should also have duty to raise awareness and understanding of UNCRC

11. Lack of Children’s Rights Impact Assessment

Commissioner for Children and Young People

12. Agree SCCYP should have powers to investigate the violation of rights of individual children but that this must be adequately resourced.

13. Clarification of the definition of “service provider” in this and other parts of the legislation.

Children’s services planning

14. Duty to jointly plan across services should apply to all public bodies including grant aided schools and NHS National Services

15. Bill should seek to remove barriers to data sharing across agencies

16. Allow for children’s services planning across local authorities where appropriate

17. Suggest that the Scottish Government ensure clear timescales in which local authorities must conduct assessments and deliver required support to ensure that no child has to wait an agonising long time for help. As an example, members of the SCSC can cite examples of families waiting in excess of 18 months for autism assessments and longer for other assessments.

Provision of Named Person

18. The Named Person role should be clarified and universally adopted throughout Scotland, with no technical barriers between services and role of empowered parents made clear in the guidance
19. There should be flexibility to allow for specialist input into the Named Person role

Child’s Plan

20. Greater clarity around respective roles of Named Person and Lead Professional in proposed Child’s Plan

21. More detail on the face of the Bill about the nature of Child’s Plan and statutory duties to implement the Plan

22. Possible amendment of ASL Act regards different planning and review processes

23. That a Child’s Plan be a legal entitlement for all children

24. Clarity on how voices of parents and children will be sought and reflected in the plan. Duty on local authority to support ALL children to make their views known

Other comments on achieving consistent and full implementation of GIRFEC—

25. SHANARRI wellbeing indicators should be coupled with rights based indicators and embedded in the Child’s Plan

26. As recommended in the Doran Review, further guidance needed on how best to implement GIRFEC for children with additional support needs

27. Clarification of routes to redress for parents /carers who feel their Child’s plan does not meet the SHANARRI indicators (in line with ASN Tribunals for CSP failures)

Early Learning and Childcare

28. Increased provision should not be restricted to LAAC 2 year olds – this should apply to all children who have a disability or need.

29. Further guidance is needed to address the issue of the inconsistencies in the amount paid to ‘partner providers’ at local level – often voluntary sector providers.

Learning difficulties/learning disabilities

30. The proposal in the Bill (Part 8) to extend access to support for looked after young people up to 26 should also include those young people with learning difficulties or learning disabilities, allowing them the same rights as care leavers. It is unfair to focus solely on care leavers and not expand the rights in the Bill to other vulnerable young people requiring assistance.

Care Leavers

31. SCSC would like to take this opportunity to support the sentiment in the Bill Part 8 (Aftercare), which proposes to introduce a legislative requirement to increase the age which a local authority can provide support (provision of aftercare) for a care leaver from 21 years old up to 26. However, it has highlighted a number of areas of concern and measures to address this.
Areas of concern—

- How the level of support for the care leaver is going to be measured / assessed (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2)

- The responsibility implied seems to lie with the care leaver to seek this support (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2)

- The assessment process which will be applied to determine ‘eligible needs’ of the care leaver (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2, Sub-section C); where ‘eligible needs’ is to be determined by Scottish Ministers in relation to a care leaver’s ‘care, attention or support’ needs (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2 Sub-section E)

- The options available to the local authority to transfer the responsibility to support the care leaver onto another departments / legislative provisions, if it deems appropriate as a result of the assessment process (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2, Sub-section C)

- Ambiguity around the terms ‘advice, guidance and assistance as it considers appropriate having regard to the person’s welfare’ (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2, Sub-section C)

Main risks of this approach—

32. Assessment process will assess need on priority, where priority determinant will likely be based on a normative criteria as set by Scottish Minister’s (similar to the Homelessness etc. (Scotland) Act 2003 assessment’s process)

33. Care leavers only likely to seek this assessment where they are approaching or in crisis; impacting heavily on the potential to intervene early and put solutions into place to prevent care leaver getting anywhere near the crisis point. Likelihood that the service via Part 8 of Bill will predominantly be focussed on redressing the crisis / impending crisis, which is both costly and least effective in facilitating medium to long-term service planning strategies for the care leaver.

35. The potential for the local authority to effectively ‘discharge’ their duty to provide the ‘support, advice and guidance’ necessary to meet the needs and welfare of the care leaver seems high. For instance, in relation to housing options for the care leaver, what legal safeguards are there in the Bill, to prevent this discharge of duty to the Homelessness legislation and the Housing Department, which in effect would actually provide support to the care leaver via temporary accommodation of some sort, to ensure they are housed?

36. The complexities of creating an assessment process which accurately and routinely (very important), determines both the current point in time need of the care leaver (i.e. today as they present), along with the medium to longer term needs of the care leaver (i.e. next month, next year and so on). The focus on point in time need creates a huge risk in itself, of again, only ever ‘fire-fighting’ and crisis managing a care leaver’s current situation. This in itself is a costly and resource intensive process.

37. The assessment process in Part 8 needs to be removed / revised to eradicate the responsibility being on the young person to present as being in need; and instead for the responsible LA to hold this duty. This ensures that they monitor and review their need on an on-going basis up to 26-years of age. The current provisions also need to be removed / revised to ensure the following duties are in place / fulfilled for children and young people who have been looked after for a continuous period of 13 weeks up to and including 16 years of age:

- An application made by a person under section 29, subsection (2) [of the Children Scotland Act 1995], to continue to be accommodated, or to return to being accommodated with their current or former placing local authority should be accepted. This will have an associated cost, but it is well established that care leavers have a higher instance of substance abuse, homelessness, unemployment and involvement with the youth justice system. The cost to society of these impacts far outweighs the cost of allowing a young person the stability afforded through returning to or remaining in care.

- The duty to provide advice, guidance and assistance to this person (to the age of 26 years old) continues as required and as appropriate with regards to the person’s welfare and their needs in relation to their care, attention or support levels.

- This duty is not discharged where the person under section 29, subsection (2) [of the Children Scotland Act 1995] leaves their accommodated status before reaching 26 years of age; leaves and then returns to their accommodated status before reaching 26 years of age once or multiple times; remains in their accommodated status continuously to 26 years of age.

38. Putting the above provisions into place is the only way to ensure that young people in care between 16 and 26 years of age are probably supported, have their individual pathways both tracked and reported on and to put in place the safeguards they need to eliminate and reduce the levels of crisis or impending crisis which they face routinely between the ages of 16 and 26 years of age. The duty to ‘return to care’ would mean that the responsible local authority would ensure they are accommodated appropriately and with the relevant supports and relationships around them – and would remove the need for a care leaver to negotiate with a range of other professionals and undertake various associated assessment processes to be both accommodated and supported. It is envisaged that the Lead Professional appointed for the young person whilst they were formally looked after, would continue their role up to the age of 26 years of age for these young people.
Counselling Services

39. The Bill refers to provision of “counselling services” to parents and children. SCSC would welcome a definition of “counselling”.

40. SCSC also raises concerns over why this is restricted to LAAC and/or Kinship Care. We would suggest that further discussion is needed and consideration given to extending this to any challenging family situation.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Scottish Council of Independent Schools

1. The schools in membership of SCIS welcome the provisions outlined in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and are pleased to see that more specific responsibilities have been prescribed for independent schools. It was initially felt that more information was needed to understand how some provisions would work in practice. As many of the provisions outlined in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill relate largely to duties on the public sector, SCIS is not in a position to comment on these. We have limited our responses to sections where we feel in a position to comment on the impact of the proposals on children and young people in independent schools.

Better service planning and delivery

2. Section 10(1-2) & Section 14 SCIS welcomes the duty placed on local authorities and health boards to “give each of the other service providers an effective opportunity […] to participate in or contribute to the preparation of the plan and consult such organisations […]” This will help clarify the responsibilities of other agencies in relation to meeting a child’s needs and it will be particularly beneficial to independent additional support needs schools as they fall within a range of different services.

3. The importance of communication in relation to a child’s welfare has been brought to light recently by the catch up campaign for those who did not receive two doses of the MMR (Measles, Mumps and Rubella) vaccine. In the majority of cases, communication between relevant organisations has not proved a problem. However in some it has been difficult to get Local Authorities and Health Boards to work together with independent schools. Guidance to ensure consistent and smooth delivery of services in all cases across Scotland would be beneficial.

The Named Person

4. Section 21 (2) SCIS is pleased that clear detail has been provided as to how a Named Person should be allocated for independent school pupils.

5. Section 21 (5) SCIS believes the duty whereby directing authorities must “make the arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to the child” may be a cause for concern during school holidays. It is unclear whether directing authorities would continue to provide a Named Person, or whether they would appoint someone outwith the school. If they were to do the former, a Head Teacher (the most likely candidate to be a Named Person in an independent school) would not have contact with the child over the school holidays. However, if the directing authority is to appoint outwith the school, then it is not clear what the protocol for this would be, and it would presumably differ from Local Authority methods (if they defer the responsibility to other public sector organisations).
6. Section 23 (2) SCIS members are interested to know which provisions will be in place to ensure the duty to “inform any other person which has become […] the service provider” will be upheld. When a child moves between a local authority school and an independent school, the smooth transition is dependent on liaison between schools and the passing on of school records, but this is dependent on local relationships. E.g., when a child leaves an independent school at age 16, how will the transfer to the responsibility of the local authority be managed? As there is no public record of school attendance maintained for a child attending an independent school, will it be the duty of the independent school to alert the Local Authority?

7. There is also a concern that the role of the Lead Professional is not mentioned in the Bill. As mentioned previously in the SCIS consultation response, in most cases the named person in an independent school would not be in the best position to coordinate work with multiple agencies nor to oversee a Child’s Plan, as it would require knowledge, expertise and time beyond their role. Although, as the SPICe document highlights, the Bill itself does not give the named person specific duties in relation to the child’s plan, the financial memorandum implies that they will have such a role in practice: “The functions of a named person will […] involve the holistic assessment based on information received and observed, any preparation towards the creation of a Child’s Plan where needed and management of the plan through on-going involvement with the child and family as required” (para 58, Scottish Parliament 2013b). SCIS would welcome clearer duties for the named person to be outlined in the Bill.

8. Another major concern that SCIS has in relation to the named person is the inclusion of independent schools in the process of training named persons. SCIS raised this point with the Scottish Government at a Working Group meeting, in which members agreed on the need for consistent and high quality training. To ensure that the Scotland is getting it right for every child, SCIS believes that training would need to be provided for the independent sector as well as for Local Authorities. Children at independent schools live within Local Authorities where they are entitled to use services for which their parents pay through income and council tax. If independent schools are to provide separate training for Named Persons then it is not clear how consistent practice would be established. Our member schools fear that without this national and inclusive level of training it may create exactly what the duty has been created to prevent: “inconsistent and patchy implementation of the GIRFEC approach, with different experiences for children and families dependant on where they live” except, in this case, it may be where they are educated.

9. Another point in the policy memorandum giving cause for concern is the duty to ensure that children with a less typical pattern of involvement with health and educational services are provided with a named person. The policy memorandum states that the Bill makes provisions to include “children and young persons who attend school outside Scotland”, however, in previous correspondence with the Scottish Government SCIS has been informed, “The Bill cannot place duties on public services and agencies outwith Scotland so for children who attend schools across borders, it will be up to schools to agree how they link and exchange information with the child’s home authority/services”. Clear guidance on whether foreign pupils, who return home in school holidays, would require a named person would be appreciated. This is a very important subject to us, as our schools would need to know when they have a duty to provide a named person for the 1289 international students\(^3\) who attend independent schools.

10. Section 43 (1) The statement that the duty of an education authority to “secure that the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare is made available for each eligible pre-school child” is of concern to SCIS as it includes partnership pre-school providers such as independent schools. Although this partnership approach has worked previously, the additional mandatory hours and increased flexibility required may affect how many private nurseries are able to cater to these new requirements. Since 2005 the number of centres providing pre-school education in Scotland has been steadily decreasing\(^4\) which will increase the pressure already felt by the existing centres providing these services.

11. Section 46 (1) SCIS supports this development but questions how education authorities will “consult such persons as appear to be representative of parents and children under school age in its area” in practice. Will there be guidance to ensure that the group consulted is truly representative? E.g. in Renfrewshire where 49.6% of childcare centres are private\(^5\), more parents may need to be consulted with from this sector than normal (the number of private nurseries across Scotland is a much smaller figure at 30%).\(^6\)

12. Section 47 (1) SCIS is apprehensive of the move away from embedding childcare within the school term time system. While there is acceptance that a more flexible service will prove more useful for families, the concern is that there are not enough resources to support this in practice. Current legislation, although allowing pre-school education to be available outwith school term time, does not utilise this in normal practice\(^7\). If this duty were to be implemented, resources might be stretched beyond their capacity, as it is believed that they can already support this type of flexibility. Our member schools have voiced concerns regarding staffing, as many private nurseries are staffed by qualified teachers who could not work throughout the holidays in addition to the school year. If they are to be expected to hire new staff to support the increased flexibility of this provision, what would be the level of training/qualifications required? There is a concern that increasing the quantity of mandatory hours would lead to a decrease in the quality of childcare offered.

Summary

13. The introduction of the Bill is a step forward for children and young people in Scotland and SCIS welcomes its provisions. However, SCIS schools ask for more detail to be provided in the aforementioned sections. SCIS looks forward to working with the Scottish Government on further guidance and with the Scottish Parliament on the implementation of this Bill.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Scottish Court Service

1. I refer to the call for evidence in relation to the above, to which I respond on behalf of the Scottish Court Service (“the SCS”). In particular, I would wish to comment on the provisions contained in Part 7 of the Bill in relation to Corporate Parenting.

2. The Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008 created the SCS as a judicially-led body responsible for the provision of administrative support to the Scottish courts and the judiciary. The inclusion of the SCS as a corporate parent in Schedule 3 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and the requirement contained in section 58 for corporate parents to comply with the directions of Scottish Ministers appears to be inconsistent with the independence of the SCS as provided by the 2008 Act.

3. It is our understanding that the concept of corporate parenting is not extended to individual judicial office holders who are the persons responsible for making decisions in Scottish courts which affect the lives of looked after children. We think this is the correct approach and have considered the inclusion of the SCS as relating purely to the corporate body of the SCS charged with administrative functions. However, we would suggest that the responsibilities of corporate parents, as set out in section 52 of the bill, are inconsistent with the independence of this administrative function. I would further note that the responsibilities of the SCS in engaging with children and young people are restricted to its functions of providing administrative support for the courts and the judiciary, including providing a suitable environment and accommodation for cases coming to court.

4. Notwithstanding this, the SCS will continue to collaborate with local authorities under Part 3 of the Bill in the provision of a suitable court environment for children and young people who attend.

5. I hope these views are of assistance to you. If you require any further information at this stage, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Scottish Court Service
1. Thank you for the opportunity to provide written evidence to support the committee in its examination of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. I write to provide comments on the Bill from the Scottish Directors of Public Health. This letter sets out a synopsis of the issues raised at the level of policy analysis.

2. We support the aspirations of the Bill and the desire to ensure that the current gaps in our ability to uphold children’s rights are addressed. The Bill has many strengths but we believe that there are some important omissions and that the current provisions risk some unintended but foreseeable consequences which could be addressed through further deliberation.

Early Years Education

3. We support the extension of early education as there is evidence that access to high quality education can improve outcomes for children. We note however, that European States have a wide variety of approaches to the age at which formal education begins and that this does not seem to be the main factor determining child wellbeing, with all of these States having better outcomes for children than is the case in Scotland.

4. UNICEF reports on Child Health and Wellbeing in Developed Countries (2007) concluded that the main factors affecting the wellbeing of children were poor relationships within the family; risk-taking behaviours; and the position of the child in society. The follow-up work published by UNICEF in 2011 concluded that UK children’s wellbeing was adversely affected by time-poor parenting, and a pervasive negative impact of materialism. These themes were linked, with limited family generosity policy restricting child and family freedom to participate in play and leisure activities, requiring parents to work when they could and parents working ever-harder to substitute with things, including food, when their children needed more of their time to develop. Some voices have raised the concern that given the time-poor parenting identified in the UNICEF reports, that a universal extension of early education may have the unintended consequence of worsening child wellbeing at the level of the population when more targeted, and arguably, earlier and more sophisticated interventions, might do more to improve outcomes. Therefore, whilst we support the increased provision of early education, we believe that the provision must be more closely linked to the delivery of information about parenting support and that it should promote improved access to parenting support at a local level.

5. In addition to the issues raised by the UNICEF report in relation to child wellbeing, we regard the scale of inequalities across Scottish society in terms of income, opportunity and health as a major threat to child health and wellbeing. Moreover, there is a consensus that these inequalities are present for children even in the antenatal period. The Marmot Review of health inequalities in 2010\(^3\) set out a need to create proportionate universalism, or the need to ensure that universal services were tailored to individuals’ needs, delivering proportionate inputs, in order to both improve health and reduce inequalities in health across the population. We see universal early education as the basis for such a proportionate universal system.

6. Given the need to tackle inequalities, we believe that more vulnerable children and families should receive proportionately more support in terms of early education. From a population perspective, the problem is greatest for the significant proportion of children and families with mild/moderate levels of vulnerability, who currently have limited access to services other than those provided universally. We would support clear responsibilities for early education establishments to assess and provide tailored support packages for this group in order to offset the impact of vulnerabilities such as time-poor parenting and other associated risk factors.

7. Marmot describes the central roles of communities, access to recreation and to culture as critical elements which are required in addition to the provision of universal services in order to tackle health inequalities. A number of schemes designed to widen access to culture have been put in place across Scotland.\(^4\) Therefore, whilst we support an increase in universal provision of early education, we believe that this should be tied to clear regulations which set out the quality of provision, ensuring that this provision takes account of the role of communities, and that it ensures greater access to leisure and cultural facilities for children and their families.

Rights of Children and Young People

8. We are supportive of the emphasis placed upon rights by acting to further embed the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) in Scottish life, although we note that a rights-based approach may be challenging for Scots law. Our main concern is that there is little evidence that an approach which is almost exclusively focussed upon public services will deliver significant improvements. Our view is that health and social care providers working with children already have the rights of children and advocacy for them at their core but are hampered by the gaps in the current statutory framework and lack of attention to family generosity policy as a determinant of low infant mortality and higher levels of child and family health and wellbeing.

9. We believe that there are other areas of Scottish life which could be targeted to improve the rights of children and that in particular children’s rights must be articulated via parents and employers. We would reiterate our concerns about work-life balance and time-poor parenting as being linked to child wellbeing and outcomes. We appreciate that approaches to further embed the rights of children and parents in employment would be difficult for a number of practical and political reasons, but European States with significantly higher levels of child wellbeing are characterised by children’s rights being articulated in the workplace, ensuring a better balance for parenting and an expectation that men and women will share childcare responsibility. We acknowledge that much has been done within child protection arrangements to improve advocacy on behalf of the child, but we wonder if a rights-based approach might be extended into civil law relating to child custody. A further area where the child’s rights could be expanded in line with the UNCRC is that of community planning. We believe that there should be a duty for planning partners to consider the rights of children and young people in relation to a wide range of areas such as education, housing, building, transport, and leisure.

10. In the previous consultation to the Children’s Rights Bill, we reflected on the strength of evidence suggesting that there were specific rights for children which were more amenable to legislation. We would reiterate that specific legislation to ensure freedom from physical assault and violence including corporal punishment would be our main priority despite the political sensitivity with which this is associated. In addition, it would be possible to articulate rights to shelter and rights to nutritionally appropriate food and drink through legislation and standards. Although we accept that this also raises political difficulties, it has been introduced in countries that are our peers and whose child health outcome targets we have adopted. A further specific right could include the right to a minimum household income, guaranteeing the resources required to support healthy living. Tackling child poverty and social deprivation are likely to be the most effective methods of protecting the rights of children and young people and improving their outcomes.

11. Given our view that parents and employers are likely to be most influential in articulating and improving the rights of children, we do not believe that three-yearly reporting from all the organisations listed in the annex on their respective attempts to promote the rights of children and young people is proportionate or necessary. Instead, we suggest that public sector reporting should be done at the level of Community Planning Partnerships, acknowledging that these are likely to be the implementation bodies for most joint working around the early years in the future. We would offer the Scottish Directors of Public Health as advisors to the development and analysis of the core data sets.

Care System changes

12. We welcomed the care system changes which were well-argued and seem likely to improve outcomes for this group.
Wellbeing: definition, planning and reporting

13. We were supportive of the definition of children and young person’s wellbeing in legislation, and accept that although SHANARRI (Safe, Healthy, etc) definition has weaknesses, given existing investment in the rollout of GIRFEC (Getting It Right For Every Child), that the definition can be adapted via guidance and believe that this approach will be necessary to reduce the impact of unintended consequences.

14. As a group we are keen to engage and provide expertise around the development of outcome indicators at the level of the population which would add value to the definition of wellbeing, and which would then provide consistent, standardised reporting across Scotland. We feel that embedding valid measures such as the Index of Child Wellbeing would clearly link actions with outcomes. We would argue for the adoption of clear, objective measurable national outcomes and indicators for children and young people, based upon the wellbeing definition, set out in regulations. The expectation that the actions required to deliver the internationally agreed reductions in child death, avoidable illness and improved child and family well being will be delivered must be placed explicitly on accountable bodies. Only this level of rigour will facilitate consistent reporting of child health and wellbeing across Scotland at the level of the population. This approach would also facilitate quality improvement across integrated services for children.

15. A general statement in legislation regarding responsibilities to deliver against intergovernmental agreements (to cover UN, World Health Assembly and EU agreements) would enable delivery against agreed objectives and would permit improvement measures to be monitored. In addition, there are several national frameworks around maternity care and nutrition which might usefully sit underneath this Bill and be referenced through it or via linked guidance.

16. We believe that, as with our previous comments, reporting should be a function which occurs at the level of Community Planning Partnerships, clarifying joint outcomes for children through integrated delivery approaches.

17. We are supportive of the overall aims laid out for the development of children’s services plans which should safeguard, support and promote the health and wellbeing of children and young people in an area in an integrated, efficient and co-ordinated manner.\(^5\) However, we believe that the plan should be explicit in the requirement to reduce health and wellbeing inequalities and in the actions being undertaken to address this.

GIRFEC and the named person

18. We support formalisation of the role of the named person within legislation and acknowledge the proposed division of responsibilities between health and local authorities on the basis of the child moving to full-time education. We believe that this will require significant investment across public services. However, we have reservations about the implementation of this given the latitude being suggested in the legislation.

19. There are difficulties which must be overcome with widening the public health role of midwives which might be better addressed through mandatory guidance, providing a clear solution to issues of boundaries of professional responsibility across Scotland. In a similar vein, we are concerned about the implementation of the named person within a school environment. Our belief is that the named person should have the skills to act on behalf of the child, but must also have a close relationship with the child and parent/carer. We are uncertain that this role can be fulfilled by education staff currently in managerial and promoted posts and believe that this should be a specific role as already occurs in some schools.

20. We believe that provision of the named person for Gypsy or Traveller children requires clarification through a duty on organisations and that this should be clarified in statute, ensuring that public sector organisations regard this as the child’s right. This will place an increasing burden on health and education, but we feel that this is a proportionate solution given the clear evidence around health needs and outcomes for this group. This could be framed as a more general requirement for a named person to act as a trusted third party for those children additional action is required to ensure compliance with equalities legislation. Refugee, asylum seeker and children in immigrant detention centres would be another group.

Future-proofing

21. We believe that whilst there are elements of the proposed Bill which should be retained in perpetuity or modified via guidance, that some parts of the Bill are ‘of the moment’, addressing current issues between organisations. We would therefore support the development of clauses to modify elements through guidance, or the creation of ‘sunset clauses’ to future-proof the Bill and assure ongoing compliance with all aspects of the of the United Nations Conventions on the Rights of the Child and its successor conventions.

Professor Alison McCallum
Chair, Scottish Directors of Public Health
23 July 2013
Dear Terry,

Thank you for the letter from the Education and Culture Committee on 2 October about the Children and Young people (Scotland) Bill. Responses to each of the questions are below:

Part 1 – Rights of children

What parts of the UNCRC could not be incorporated into Scots law because they are outwith devolved competence?

The Scottish Government considers that the following provisions of the UNCRC (‘the Convention’) fall within the category of provisions that are outwith devolved competence:-

(i) article 2 – equalities/equal opportunities
(ii) article 3 – insofar as the actions concerning children relate to reserved matters;
(iii) article 7 – insofar as relating to nationality;
(iv) article 8 – insofar as relating to nationality;
(v) article 10 – entry to/exit from a State;
(vi) article 11 - insofar as this provision relates to the establishment of bilateral or multilateral agreements;
(vii) article 17 – in part;
(viii) article 22 - insofar as concerned with the granting of refugee status. It would be competent to take certain measures in relation to individuals who are seeking asylum;
(ix) article 26 – social security;
(x) article 35 – insofar as this provision concerns the establishment of national, bilateral or multilateral measures;
(xi) article 38 – insofar as the issues concern membership of the armed forces.
The Scottish Government is of the view that the terms of the Convention do not readily translate into legal obligations that are directly enforceable in the domestic courts but recognises that insofar as within devolved competence it would be possible to pass legislation that gives effect to the principles outlined in the Convention.

The obligations imposed upon State Parties in terms of Part II of the Convention do not appear to the Scottish Government to be compatible with the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament hence the limited definition of the term "the UNCRC requirements" which focuses on only Part I of the Convention, not Parts II or III.

Which parts of the UNCRC are not in Scots law but could be incorporated within devolved competence? For each part, why has the Scottish Government chosen not to incorporate?

Insofar as the provisions of the Convention relate to matters falling within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament, it is the Scottish Government’s view that Scots law is compatible with the principles underlying the Convention. However, it must be remembered that domestic legislation does not, in our view, always necessarily represent the best way to further the Convention’s principles and that is why our approach to implementation focuses not only on changes to the law where that is appropriate but also on changes in policy as well as improvements in frontline practice.

How will the reports produced under Part 1 of the Bill differ from the reports that the Scottish Government already provides as part of the UN committee process?

The reports prepared under Part 1 of the Bill will be prepared by Scottish Ministers and the authorities listed in Schedule 1 to the Bill. The report by Scottish Ministers will be submitted to the Scottish Parliament and will specify what steps the Scottish Ministers have taken to secure in Scotland better or further effect of “the UNCRC requirements”. The report by other authorities will contain similar provisions. Scottish Ministers must also report on what they have done to promote public awareness and understanding of the rights of children. There is a requirement to report every 3 years. The Scottish Ministers, and in practice also the relevant authorities, will be answerable to the Scottish Parliament for the fulfilment of the duties specified in the report.

Article 44 of the UNCRC places an obligation on State parties, which in this case means the United Kingdom, to report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child, on the measures adopted in the relevant State to give effect to the rights recognised in the UNCRC, and the progress made on the enjoyment of these rights. Such a report is made to the UN Committee, not the Scottish Parliament, and concerns measures adopted in the United Kingdom, either by the UK Government or the relevant Devolved Administrations where appropriate. This report is therefore broader in scope, covering both devolved and reserved matters, than what is proposed in Part I of the Bill. Although Devolved Administrations contribute for their interests to the UK report, and may seek to influence its content, it is the United Kingdom Government in its capacity as the State party that determines the final terms of the Report.

Part 2 – SCCYP

Whether the Scottish Government agrees that section 5(2) (regarding 7(5)) would allow the Commissioner to undertake a general complaints handling function in the manner described by Tam Baillie on 1 October, or whether it should be interpreted more narrowly?

The Scottish Government has consistently stated that the new powers being extended to the Children’s Commissioner are not intended to replace or duplicate the function of any other organisation involved in responding to concerns raised by or on behalf of a child, whether at local or national level.

In terms of current practice, we know through our discussions with the Children’s Commissioner that approximately 400 enquiries for support are made to his office each year, most of which are dealt with through the provision of information, guidance and signposting to the relevant complaints process. On occasion, the Commissioner may also support the child in raising their issue with a local service provider. It is then for the service provider to work with the child and their family to respond to the issue raised. Clearly, it is in the best interests of children if such issues can be resolved swiftly through relevant local complaints processes.

We accept that the proposed new power linked to individual investigations is likely to result in an increase in this type of enquiry and we agree it is important that this service continues to be delivered to those children and families who approach the Commissioner’s office. We must also recognise the resource implications associated with an increase in enquiries.

I am aware that the Children’s Commissioner has shared with the Committee his view that the Bill provides new powers to intervene in cases prior to local complaints processes being exhausted. In his evidence, Mr Baillie cited section 5(2)(c) of the Bill as being of relevance in this respect. The explanatory notes which accompany the Bill describe the purpose of section 5(2)(c) as follows:

Subsection 2(c) amends section 7 of the 2003 Act to provide for the Commissioner to resolve a matter which could properly form the basis of an individual investigation without the need for a formal investigation. Such a step might be taken by the Commissioner where it is felt that an issue can be addressed satisfactorily without having to exhaust the investigatory process.

This provision is designed to offer the Commissioner some flexibility in dealing with a case which could otherwise be dealt with through an investigation. Paragraph 16 of the Explanatory Notes makes clear that the Commissioner may not undertake such an investigation where that would duplicate the work of any another complaint handling body. We would therefore not foresee there being a role for the Commissioner to have extensive, ongoing involvement in a case prior to local processes being exhausted and it is not our view that the Commissioner should take on any mediation-type role.
With regards to the types of cases which might reasonably be covered by an individual investigation, we understand that this is still the subject of some consideration by the Commissioner and his office. However, we have been assured by the Commissioner and other complaints handling bodies that there are instances where the new power could usefully add value. Our own view, as stated in the Financial Memorandum, is that investigations will be relatively few and far between. They may consider aspects of practice in the public, private and third sector so long as this would not duplicate the functions of another body. Whilst difficult to predict in the abstract, we would suggest that there may be scope for the Commissioner to intervene in instances where, for example:

- A public authority is under no statutory obligation to take account of a child’s views and has failed to do so when reaching a decision that will affect them. It may be reasonable for the Commissioner to highlight in such circumstances that, as a matter of best practice, the child’s views should be heard and taken account of in all decisions affecting them. Such an investigation could set a useful precedent for future practice.
- A private company delivering services to the public (perhaps for profit) has failed to take account of a child’s rights. One example may be a company involved in the delivery of public transport services.
- A third sector organisation which is delivering an independent, unregulated service to children or families in the community has failed to take account of a child’s rights. A service could cover, for example, parenting and family support, advice and information services, substance misuse projects, advocacy and a wide range of other community based initiatives.

Ultimately it will be left to the Commissioner to determine the matters which require investigation. The Parliament will of course have oversight of investigations as part of their sponsorship responsibilities in respect of the Commissioner.

Whilst the financial estimates linked to these provisions may seem disproportionate to the number of investigations, it is important to remember that the outcome of such investigations could potentially influence broader practice and ultimately prevent other children from having their rights infringed in future.

Part 3 – Children’s services planning

The Committee has received a petition (PE1440) calling for the Bill to place a duty on local authorities to provide sufficient and satisfying play opportunities for children of all ages and abilities. Could Part 3 of the Bill be used to take the provision of play opportunities into account?

‘Play’ is a key part of a child’s wellbeing, and the Scottish Government would see it covered by the definition of wellbeing set out in the Bill. This includes reference to ‘Active’, ‘Achieving’ and ‘Inclusive’, all issues that involve ‘play’ and so remain at the heart of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Moreover, we would anticipate that the children’s services planning duties, set out in Part 3 of the Bill, would encompass the contributions that Local Authorities, Health Boards and other relevant service providers can make to supporting play opportunities for children.
This will be addressed in the guidance associated with the planning duties, particularly in the description of the ‘children's services’ to be covered by the Bill.

Part 4 – Provision of named persons

In the course of its two previous inquiries, the Committee has heard considerable concerns about the ability of different public bodies to share information electronically. What plans does the Scottish Government have to improve electronic sharing of information across all those services relevant to GIRFEC?

The Scottish Government has encouraged and supported Local Authorities, Health Boards and other partners to form the Information Sharing Board. The Board’s priorities include supporting the Children and Young People Bill and Getting it Right for Every Child.

The Board is funding local information sharing initiatives to help improve the sharing of information across services delivering GIRFEC. The budget is in excess of £1.5m in 2013-14 and £2m in 2014-15. It is also funding a project specifically to deal with sharing information across partnership boundaries.

National minimum data sets for a child’s plan are currently being agreed to improve consistency in recording and storing information.

Can you clarify whether, under section 19(3), a named person could be drawn from the voluntary and private sector on the basis that they provide a function on behalf of the health board or local authority?

Section 19(3) means that an individual can be identified to act as Named Person if they are an employee of a person who exercises any function on behalf of the service provider (i.e. Health Board, Local Authority or directing authority). That could include voluntary/private sector organisations who exercise such functions. This provision is necessary because, for example, in the Highland Council area, where the Named Person service is already operating, the Health Visitor service is now provided by the Local Authority, rather than the Health Board. Health Visitors are normally the Named Person in respect of pre-school children. But the duty to provide the Named Person service in respect of pre-school children lies with the Health Board, who remains the “service provider” for such children. As such, it is necessary to have a specific provision in the Bill which allows the Named Person to be someone other than a direct employee of the service provider. In addition, there are instances where private midwives and nurses are contracted to provide health services and the provision is also required to cover this situation.

If so, how does this connect with section 26, which appears only to allow information to be provided to the service provider by a service provider or relevant authority – would this mean that if a named person was in a contracted-out service then there would be no duty to share information with them?

Section 26(7) of the Bill caters for such circumstances:
“References in this section to a service provider or a relevant authority include any person exercising a function on behalf of a service provider or relevant authority.”

Section 26(7) aims to ensure that, where provision of the Named Person service is contracted out, the provisions related to information sharing which apply in respect of Local Authorities, Health Boards and directing authorities would also apply to contracted-out bodies exercising functions on their behalf.

One of the stated advantages of having a named person is that it would be much clearer who needs to be contacted where there is a concern about a child. How will that advantage be ensured if the named person changes during the school holidays?

When the Named Person is not contactable during the school holidays, the Local Authority will be required to make arrangements for the Named Person service to be provided. This means that there will always be a member of Education Services staff available to deal with any concerns from families or others.

For example, the process for handling concerns during school holidays in Highland is:

Where there are child protection concerns during the school holidays, the person with the concern should alert the Social Work department or the Police, who will then take action as appropriate.

Where new concerns for a child’s wellbeing arise during the school holidays, these can be passed on to a member of staff in the Area Education Office who will note the concern, access the child’s education record and consider whether immediate action is required. If no immediate action is required, the information relating to the wellbeing concern will be passed to the Named Person on their return.

For those children who have an Education single agency plan, a discussion will be held at the last review before the school holiday about how the plan will be continued after the holiday. Education plans will relate to concerns that exist in the Education setting, and there will not usually be a need for contact with the Named Person during the school holidays.

How is the named person an improvement on the current situation where a lack of continuity exists for families that have frequent home moves?

Section 23 of the Bill applies to the movement of children and young people. Section 23(2) places a duty on the outgoing service provider (i.e. the Health Board or Local Authority in the original area) to inform the incoming service provider (i.e. the new Health Board or Local Authority) with information that is relevant to enable the new Health Board or Local Authority to provide a service, including the Named Person service. Moving from one Local Authority to another and one Health Board to another would therefore initiate the appointment of a new Named Person. This would not require the parents’ consent but they would be informed that they have a new Named Person, and how to contact them. Good practice would be that the outgoing Named Person would discuss with the parents the information that they plan to share with the new Named Person. The effect of this provision will be that the new Named Person will be given relevant information about the child that will enable them to support the transition to the new area. Where a child has a Child’s Plan, the plan will be shared with the new Named Person and Lead Professional, and will be reviewed following the move.

What is the rationale for providing for a named person for each child/young person after school-leaving age?

Most young people who have left school will have the skills and knowledge to express their views and reach decisions. Some, especially those with complex needs, will still require help and support. The Bill will ensure that appropriate arrangements are in place at Local Authority level for children who have left school before the age of 18. The role of the Named Person in these circumstances will be a point of contact for the young person; to provide information and advice; and where appropriate, link the young person into resources and support networks which currently exist for those young people who have left school but need further assistance.

In evidence to the Committee, Bill Alexander suggested that “the named person would support early interventions but as soon as more than one agency got involved the co-ordinating role would move to a lead professional”. What would be the criteria for when a lead professional would be expected to take over responsibility from the named person?

Where concerns about a child or young person’s wellbeing require to be addressed by co-ordinated intervention from more than one service or agency, then a Lead Professional can be identified to take on that co-ordinating role. The Named Person will either take on the role of Lead Professional themselves, or will agree with the partners involved in supporting the child/young person, who is most appropriate to take on the lead professional role to manage the multi-agency Child’s Plan. The Lead Professional may be drawn from any of the services or agencies who are partners to the Child’s Plan. The choice of Lead Professional will be dependent on the needs of the child and the interventions and outcomes identified within the child’s plan.

Bill Alexander also stated that “if we are legislating for the child’s plan why can we not legislate for the lead professional who prepares the more complex child’s plans?” Why has the role of the lead professional not been included in the Bill?

The Named Person is located within the universal services of health and education and we can place a statutory responsibility on those bodies to make arrangements to provide a Named Person. The Lead Professional will the person who is best placed to address the more complex needs the child, and so can be drawn from any service; they will not necessarily be located within health or education. It is, therefore, difficult to place a duty on an individual body to make the arrangements for the Lead Professional.
The duty to cooperate and arrangements around the Child’s Plan provides a statutory backing to sort out protocols across agencies in a Community Planning Partnership to ensure local arrangements are agreed. What is important is that public bodies agree the arrangements and make sure they work well. This is an area where guidance is more appropriate alongside legislation.

Part 5 – Child’s plan

A targeted intervention is defined as an intervention provided by a relevant authority (section 31(4)). Does this mean that the child’s plan will not be able to provide for support that is delivered by third sector organisations?

Third parties will be able to deliver targeted interventions where these are part of arrangements entered into with either the Local Authority, Health Board or directing authority (as it is technically that body that is ‘providing’ the targeted intervention, albeit through commissioned arrangements).

In relation to the child’s plan, how will any disputes between families and professionals be resolved?

Disputes between professionals should be resolved locally whenever possible using existing Health Board and Local Authority dispute resolution procedures. Guidance will set out the need to have these in place and the requirement that they are visible and accessible to children and parents.

If disputes cannot be resolved locally, we want redress for children/young people and families to be accessible, clear and quick and are currently considering how best to achieve that. Using legislation is one of the ways that may be appropriate.

Part 6 – Early learning and childcare

It has been suggested, for example by Children in Scotland, that the commencement of three year olds entitlement for free childcare means, in practice, that a child can receive less than their full entitlement depending on their birthdate. Can you respond to these concerns and indicate whether the Scottish Government intends to take any action on the matter?

Current entitlement to pre-school education is set out in the Provision of School Education for Children under School Age (Prescribed Children) (Scotland) Order 2002 (SSI 2002/90). This Order prescribes the starting points for entitlement as the Autumn, Spring or Summer term following a child’s third birthday until the end of the term immediately before they are first eligible to attend primary school. Children starting their first year of pre-school education will therefore receive one, two or three terms depending upon when their birthday falls. All children will receive 3 terms during their second year of pre-school education.

Those children born in January or February (who may only receive one term in their first year of pre-school education) will remain entitled to an extra year after their second year of pre-school education if their parents wish. Those children will generally be starting primary school younger (around 4 1/2) than others without this extra year.

Those children born between September to December and who start their pre-school education in the Spring term following their third birthday will potentially receive two terms in their first year of pre-school education. Those children will be closer to 5 years in age at the time of starting school (4 ¾ to 4 years and 11 months) and it is unlikely that those children would want to be held back from starting primary school with an extra year of pre-school education following their second year of pre-school education.

The policy intention is to continue this entitlement through secondary legislation made under the Bill. Local Authorities can and do deliver beyond the minimum statutory hours and the minimum eligible children. Some Local Authorities already commence entitlement closer to the child’s third birthday, e.g. from their third birthday; or, within a month of the child’s third birthday. Even where a child receives their entitlement closer to their third birthday, there will be slight variations in the amount.

We would encourage Local Authorities to use this power to commence closer to the child’s third birthday where they have the capacity to do so; or, where expansion or increased flexibility within the system allows. The immediate priority of this Bill is to build on the high quality system of early learning and childcare that we have; expand those hours and improve flexibility; and introduce an entitlement for our most vulnerable 2 year olds. This is a first step towards the development of a wider early learning and childcare system that meets the needs of all children, parents and families; and, provides a consistent learning journey through early learning and childcare, primary school and beyond.

Can the Scottish Government explain the interaction between the corporate parenting duties of the local authority under section 52 of the Bill with their duties to looked after children under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 and the duty in section 73 of the Bill to promote the wellbeing of looked after children?

Section 73 of the Bill seeks to insert a new section 23A into the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 ("the 1995 Act") so that where a Local Authority is exercising a function under or by virtue of section 17 of the 1995 Act (in relation to looked after children) or section 22 of that Act (in relation to children in need) they must have regard to the general principle that those functions should be exercised in a way which is designed to safeguard, support and promote the children’s wellbeing.

The Corporate Parenting duties set out in the Bill are wholly complementary to existing provisions in the 1995 Act and new section 23A to be inserted by the Bill. They strengthen the existing person-centred approach to address concerns quickly and effectively to improve the wellbeing of looked after children and formerly looked after young people. The provisions clarify the role and empower the wider public sector to provide looked after children and formerly looked after young people with support that closes the gap in outcomes between them and their non-looked after peers. It further underpins the objective of having a single system of service planning and delivery across children’s services. At the heart of this is the responsibility of all corporate parents to collaborate.

All measures setting out corporate parenting duties are consistent with the GIRFEC approach; with the child at the centre, encouraging streamlining and cooperation to eliminate unsatisfactory delays that can occur when services work in isolation from each other.

Schedule 4 sets out a wide range of public bodies that would become corporate parents. Why has the list of bodies been drawn so widely, and is there a risk that, as the Scottish Children’s Reporter Association suggests, this could dilute the concept of corporate parenting and the role of local authorities in its delivery?

Schedule 3 sets out the list of corporate parents, which was purposely drawn widely from the public sector to encompass as many organisations as possible that have a key role in the decision making processes that affect our looked after children and formerly looked after young people. The policy preference is not to create different tiers of corporate parent but to unify the level of responsibility placed on these organisations - no matter what their role is - in collaborating to ensure the highest level of service planning and delivery is attained by all corporate parents and the third sector organisations who deliver services for them.

We have confidence in the organisations currently identified in schedule 3 to effectively discharge their responsibilities under the provisions in the Bill without compromising their core statutory functions. Section 52 states that these duties are to be exercised by corporate parents “in so far as consistent with the proper exercise of its other functions”. We continue to engage with all organisations who have feedback to offer on the corporate parenting duties as the Bill progresses through Parliament.

Section 50(2) of the Bill allows the Scottish Ministers to, by order, modify schedule 3 to add, remove or vary the entries listed so that, for example, if it turns out that an organisation no longer has a legitimate role as a corporate parent then they can be removed from the schedule. We hope all Corporate Parents can be reassured in this regard.

The use of the term counselling has been said to refer to specific professional practices. Why has this term been used, and what is it taken to include?

‘Counselling’ means helping people to adjust or deal with personal problems, etc, by enabling them to discover for themselves the solution to the problems while receiving sympathetic attention from the counsellor. The Scottish Government does not consider that this is limited to counselling by those holding particular professional qualifications. The types of services that will be available will be set out in secondary legislation, following consultation with stakeholders and will make it clear the range of services that will be made available to families and the Scottish Government will also publish guidance on the subject. The Scottish Government is of course happy to reflect on any concerns that there are services which should be capable of being included within Part 9 but which might not properly fall within the term ‘counselling’.

Is it the Scottish Government’s intention that the regulations under this Part of the Bill will restrict the eligibility to counselling services to situations where kinship care is a possibility?

No. The intention of counselling services is to ensure families in the early stages of distress who seek help are provided with appropriate forms of counselling. This will be available where a child’s wellbeing would be at risk of being impaired – in particular where the child is at risk of coming into care. It is intended to act as an early and effective intervention to support parents and where appropriate, can promote the role of a kinship carer.

Part 10 – Support for kinship care

Can you respond to the concerns raised by kinship carer organisations in evidence to the Committee on 24 October that the provisions in the Bill will not adequately support kinship carers?

The kinship proposals within the Bill are intended to support a specific group of kinship carers who have, or go on to, obtain existing residence and parental responsibilities and rights orders, where the child is eligible. The Kinship Care Order provides an additional option in terms of securing permanence for children who can’t live with their birth parents and for the first time, makes statutory provision in relation to support, thereby offering more support than is currently available in these circumstances.

The precise balance of new rights and needs-based support will be determined in secondary legislation following consultation with key stakeholders including Local Authorities and groups representing kinship carers of which the Scottish Kinship Care Alliance is one. We consulted on the following forms of assistance:

- Financial and practical support with the court petition;
- A start-up grant of £500;
- Transitional support where a kinship care order leads to a child ceasing to be looked after and financial, practical or in-kind support to meet the requirements of a section 11 Contact Order;
- Free Early Learning and Childcare provision for any 2 year old subject to a kinship care order.

Support for kinship carers of looked after children is being looked at separately through the Kinship Care Financial Review, which is looking at tailoring support and tackling inconsistencies in the provision of support across Scotland. Recommendations from this review are likely to be announced by the end of the year.
Much of the detail in Part 10 will be provided in regulations. Are you able to provide details of what would constitute an eligible child, and the type of assistance that will be prescribed under regulations? What are the Government’s plans for consulting on the regulations?

Engagement with stakeholders on secondary legislation for Parts 9 & 10 has already started. Kinship carers, kinship care groups and other key stakeholders such as Local Authorities and third sector organisations have an opportunity to feed into shaping this secondary legislation. The intention is that an eligible child will be one whose wellbeing would be at risk of being impaired – in particular where they are at risk of coming into care, if the kinship care assistance is not made available. We anticipate that assistance will include financial & practical support with court applications, start-up grants, transitional support for children coming out of a care setting and Early Learning and Childcare from the age of 2.

Will families who currently have a section 11 order automatically receive a kinship care order, or will they need to reapply?

Kinship carers that currently have a section 11(1) order, which gives them the right to have the child living with them & those who have a residence order, if they are a qualifying person (i.e. related to the child, a friend or acquaintance of a person related to the child or such other relationship as may be specified by order), will automatically have a Kinship Care Order. Assistance will then need to be sought from the Local Authority by the kinship carer and will be provided if the child is an eligible child.

Could you clarify what support would be available under the regulations to a kinship carer who already has a section 11 order?

Currently there is no specific statutory support for kinship carers with an existing section 11 order. However, kinship carers with existing residence orders and parental responsibilities and rights orders (section 11 orders) will automatically be deemed to have a Kinship Care Order and will be able to access support from their Local Authority as any other kinship carer who applies for a Kinship Care Order would.

Support available under the Kinship Care Order for those with existing section 11 orders will be set out in Secondary Legislation, consultation for which has already started. We anticipate that support will include access to help and support from social work services, who will be able to determine the best form of therapeutic intervention for the circumstances of the family, Early Learning and Childcare from the age of 2 and access to counselling services, if the child is an eligible child.

Can you clarify whether local authorities will be expected to continue to make payments under current discretionary routes (s.22 and s.50) and, if so, could this provide an ongoing financial allowance irrespective of any support provided under this Bill?

There is no specific expectation that local authorities will make payments to kinship carers under s22 or s50. The Kinship Care Order provides the carer with some or all parental responsibilities and rights and will be recognised as any parent would be within the benefits system. Therefore, the kinship carer can claim the same benefits such as Child Benefit and Child Tax Credit as any parent would.

However, s22 and s50 place a duty on a Local Authority to safeguard, promote and maintain a child, regardless of legal status, within their area who is in need. Assistance from s22 and s50 can also include goods and services, as well as discretionary payments. Therefore, assistance may be provided through s22 and s50 to eligible children under a kinship care order irrespective of any other support being provided.

The Kinship Care Order does not alter formal carers’ existing entitlements to allowances – these are subject of a separate review by the Scottish Government.

Will there be a requirement placed on local authorities to provide financial support for families with a kinship care order or will that be based on an assessment? If so, how will that assessment take place?

There will be a requirement on Local Authorities to make sure kinship care assistance is made available for kinship carers in their area if the child they are caring for is eligible. Secondary legislation will specify the description of the child that is eligible, it will specify when or how a Local Authority is to consider whether a child is eligible and it will specify the types of assistance that will be available.

It is anticipated that transitional support, including financial support, will be provided for a period 3 years to kinship carers when the child they care for ceases to be looked after and they move onto a kinship care order. After the 3 year transitional period, the kinship carer can continue to seek assistance under their kinship care order from the Local Authority if the child remains an eligible child.

What evidence is there for the need for an element of compulsion in the statutory adoption register?

Whilst the Scottish Government is pleased with the initial progress of the current non-statutory adoption register, we are clear that it must be designed and built to help find the maximum number of opportunities for every child for whom adoption is in their best interest. If a child cannot be matched locally, it is important to ensure that there is no unnecessary drift and delay in a child being potentially matched to adopters outside the Local Authority. This means every adoption agency must refer both children and approved adopters in a timely way.

We are aware from engagement with adoption agencies, BAAF and other stakeholders that some adoption agencies are reluctant to refer their prospective adopters to the Register (even though they cannot currently match them with any children locally). This was explicitly recognised by BAAF (in their Scotland’s Adoption Register’s submission) where they recognised that “there may be some benefits to mandatory referral in relation to the availability of adoptive families as a resource for all children waiting for a new family” and they acknowledged they were aware that “some local authorities have not been keen to allow their waiting adopters to access opportunities afforded them through Register services preferring to hold on to them ‘just in case’ they need them for a local child”. We envisage that the statutory requirement on adoption agencies to use the Register will address this issue and increase the Register’s effectiveness.

Both England and Wales are also currently pursuing separate legislative routes for establishing their respective Adoption Registers in statute in recognition that this will help to increase their Registers’ effectiveness.

I hope this response fully answers the questions from Committee. Please let me know if there is any further information required.

Yours sincerely,

Elisabeth Campbell
Bill Team Leader
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
28 October 2013

Dear Stewart,

Thank you for the letter from the Education and Culture Committee of the 10 October 2013. Please find a response to each of the questions below:

The Committee would be interested to receive your response to the points made by the Commissioner and, specifically, in relation to his comments on section 27 (see Official Report, Cols 2952-3).

The Assistant Information Commissioner has made a number of points which are helpful and which we will consider. In his initial written evidence, he commented on section 26 and expressed a view that the use of the words 'might be relevant' in that section fail to comply with the data protection principles under the Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA), which provides that personal data must be adequate, relevant and not excessive in relation to the purpose for which it is processed. It is important that section 26(2) is read in its entirety since there are 3 limbs to the test specified there, not one as might be inferred from Mr Macdonald's evidence. We believe that the second limb to the test (that the information "ought to be provided for that purpose") in section 26(2) provides the additional test that the information sharing is proportionate, relevant and necessary, thus meeting the requirements of the DPA. Any legislation that is passed by the Scottish Parliament, and any powers conferred, must be read in the context of being constrained by the ECHR and reserved legislation such as the DPA.

Mr Macdonald also wishes Section 27 to be re-considered, as stated in his supplementary written evidence. Section 27 deals with the situation where a person provides information in circumstances where there is a prohibition or restriction on disclosure. We have some sympathy with the view that there is no absolute right to confidentiality and that where a child is in a position of risk, then relevant information should be shared, proportionately and appropriately. However, we also note the views of the Information Commissioner's Office and Professor Norrie regarding the perceived wider implications of this section and will give this matter further consideration.
It was always our intention to provide further detail on these sections of the Bill in statutory guidance accompanying the Bill and to publish such guidance.

In relation to these sections we are continuing discussions with stakeholders, partners and colleagues. This has included a session with members of Together (Scotland’s Alliance for Children’s Rights), GP’s, Health Visitors, Head Teachers and Parent groups on 16th October, which specifically looked at confidentiality and Section 27. We are also engaging with relevant organisations on the update of the Privacy Impact Assessment, which includes exploring the potential impact of these sections. The evidence that the Education and Culture Committee has received on information sharing, together with our ongoing discussions outlined above, will enable us to fully consider all views on Sections 26 and 27. We are keen to listen and understand concerns, as we wish to get this right.

Issues Raised by the Finance Committee

Named Person Role

The Committee notes that there were a number of concerns from witnesses with regard to the training costs in relation to the formal creation of "Named Persons". The Committee invites the lead committee to raise the following issues with the Cabinet Secretary -

- That staff other than those listed in the FM may require training and costs have not been provided for this;

- To provide details of the consultation with stakeholders on integrating training within existing CPD courses;

In the Financial Memorandum, training costs were provided for with regards to Local Authorities and Health Boards in taking forward the duties relating to the Named Person and the Child’s Plan. The costs entailed:

- For Local Authorities: costs in 2015-16 to cover backfilling of relevant educational staff for 2 days equivalent of dedicated training, at backfilling rates set out in paragraph 47 and Table 8; and

- For Health Boards: costs in 2014-15 to develop materials for training health staff and costs in 2015-16 to cover backfilling of relevant health staff for 2 days equivalent of dedicated training, at backfilling rates set out in paragraph 58.

For both sets of bodies, it is expected that training would be delivered in-house, building on existing practice.

Training costs have been calculated on the basis that comprehensive, initial training would be needed for those individuals who would have direct responsibility for carrying out the role of the Named Person: head teachers, deputy head teachers and principal teachers in the case of Local Authorities; and midwives, Health Visitors and other public health nurses in the case of health services. Costs have not been calculated for any other additional training, as it is not anticipated that there would be other statutory requirements to be fulfilled that would need such training.
In this, we would distinguish between training – what is required to fulfil the duties of the Named Person – and awareness-raising – what is required to ensure that other professionals can effectively support the Named Person. In this respect, we are mindful that awareness-raising has been subject to intensive work over the last 5 years. It has benefited from the £7.8 million already invested by the Scottish Government in supporting the implementation of Getting it right for every child (GIRFEC) by Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) since 2008, as well as the clear requirements to raise awareness of GIRFEC through the refresh of Hall 4 (www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2011/01/11133654/0) and the letter to Health Boards on GIRFEC (CEL 29).

In a study commissioned by the GIRFEC Programme Board, completed in September this year, all CPPs reported that they were advancing implementation of GIRFEC, including knowledge and understanding of its core components among relevant staff. As the Financial Memorandum focuses on additional costs, in light of the extensive work of the last few years, we do not believe that such awareness-raising would be required as an extra significant cost.

The Financial Memorandum assumes that in the second year of implementation - for both Local Authorities and Health Boards - the required training for the Named Person and Child’s Plan duties would be incorporated into existing CPD training, rather than supplanting or remaining additional to existing training. These assumptions have been based on consultation with those local areas furthest advanced in implementing GIRFEC - and consequently, those areas with the most experience in addressing training issues. These are, notably, Highland and the City of Edinburgh, but also including Falkirk, Fife, South Ayrshire and Perth and Kinross. Some areas have already advised that they are moving rapidly towards the full mainstreaming of GIRFEC into educational training, such as the GIRFEC group of south-east Scotland CPPs.

Costs for Local Authorities in Relation to the Delivery of Named Person Duties

The Committee is concerned that the FM does not provide any details at paragraphs 53 and 54 of the financial savings from the benefits of implementing GIRFEC and invites the lead committee to seek this information from Ministers.

The Financial Memorandum sets out the savings noted by a range of bodies from the implementation of GIRFEC, notably by Highland in paragraph 53. This is set out in the evaluation of the Pathfinder, particularly The Impact on Services and Agencies Part 2 (which can be found here: www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/People/Young-People/gettingitright/publications/highland-report/impact-services-agencies2).

Paragraph 54 also sets out savings for Falkirk and Fife. However, these savings have been set out as benefits accruing to relevant services in terms of reduction in time and bureaucracy, rather than monetized financial savings.

The non-cashable savings relate to direct savings – through, for example, reductions in social work caseload, time spent in meetings relating to particular children and young people and documentation – as well as indirect savings – through, for example, reductions in the number of children and young people on the Child Protection Register. This is in addition to the clear benefits experienced by children, young people and their families, not least the reduced demand on services at the more complex end as a result of early intervention over the medium to long term, as set out in the Pathfinder evaluation study.
As with other preventative approaches, financial savings cannot be easily calculated. As the Pathfinder evaluation study concluded in the case of Highland: "The changes that have been introduced are enabling staff to achieve more for the children and young people allocated to them with the same level of resources... It is also more difficult to identify significant non-cashable savings within universal services. This is partly because it is not always possible to isolate the getting it right effect from other changes being introduced." Bill Alexander, Director of Health and Social Care in Highland Council, confirmed this when he gave evidence before the Education and Culture Committee on 24 September: "Financial savings are a complex issue. The bottom line is that our policy has been not to take financial savings out of children's services because of the implementation of getting it right for every child, but that does not mean that we could not have done so. We reinvested the money in early intervention and preventative services. For example, the case loads of social workers have been significantly reduced. We could have reduced the number of social workers, but we did not. We invested in front-line workers who can undertake preventative work. We are about to invest in additional health visitors. We believe that such investment not only makes good professional sense because it means better outcomes for children and families, but is the long game in terms of financial savings. The number of child protection registrations and looked-after children is already going down, so there will be savings from there being fewer children with higher-level needs."

For this reason it has not been possible to translate the savings noted by areas implementing GIRFEC into cash terms.

The Committee is also concerned that no margins of uncertainty appear to have been provided for the assumption that 10% of children and young people would require additional support of 3.5 hours per year and invites the lead committee to seek this information from Ministers.

With respect to the costs to Local Authorities in implementing the duties of the Named Person and the Child’s Plan, the Financial Memorandum sets out assumptions with respect to the additional demand that this is likely to cause for relevant educational staff (paragraph 51). It is assumed that additional activity would be required for 10% of children and young people in Local Authority education, requiring an average of 3.5 hours of additional activity in the first year of implementing these duties. The number of additional hours required has been averaged – clearly some children will require fewer hours, and some more.

The assumptions are based on consultation with those local areas which are furthest advanced in implementing GIRFEC, notably Highland and the City of Edinburgh. As the numbers were relatively consistent across this consultation, a margin of uncertainty was not felt to be required in costs estimate. The Scottish Government notes that in its evidence to the Finance Committee, the City of Edinburgh Council stated: “The Council believes that the costs for... GIRFEC... are accurately reflected based on our understanding of the requirements of the legislation.”

The assumptions are also in line with those made for younger children with respect to the duties of Named Persons and Child’s Plans on Health Boards. For example, in the second year of implementing these duties, it is assumed that relevant health professionals would need to spend an annual average of 4 hours for those children with particular concerns (as set out in Table 11 of the Financial Memorandum).
Costs for Health Boards in Relation to the Delivery of Named Persons Duties

The Committee is concerned about the extent of the disparity between the evidence from health bodies and the Bill team in relation to the estimated costs and savings to health boards arising from the delivery of the Named Person role. In particular, the Committee invites the lead committee to seek the following information from Ministers:

- The view of NHS Lothian that the assumed hourly rate for midwives and health visitors should be in the region of £21 per hour;

In the Financial Memorandum, the Scottish Government has applied an effective hourly rate of £19.04 in calculating the staff costs associated with the duties of the Named Person and the Child's Plan. With regards to the above point made by the NHS Lothian representative in evidence before the Finance Committee:

- The Financial Memorandum sets out costs for the next 5 years based on the mid-point of the relevant salary scale, not the higher point in the scale cited by the NHS Lothian representative;
- The Financial Memorandum factors in the impact of annual leave into the actual number of additional service hours required to carry out these duties; and
- In addressing the additional hours required to fulfil these duties, it is anticipated that some new staff would need to be recruited, and would typically be brought in at the lower end of the relevant scale.

- A detailed explanation as to why the time horizons for the savings to be made from preventative measures are much shorter in the FM than that predicted by many of the health professionals who gave evidence to the Committee;

- A detailed breakdown of the financial savings which have been made by those NHS bodies who have begun to implement GIRFEC and against which the Bill team tested the assumptions in the FM;

The Financial Memorandum sets out a range of assumptions – derived from discussions with, amongst others, the CEL 29 GIRFEC managers' group and the cross-Scotland Children and Young People Nursing Advisory Group – for determining the costs impact of the Named Person and Child’s Plan duties on health services over the first 5 years of implementation. In paragraph 60 and Table 11, these assumptions detail the average time to be spent supporting those children with emerging and significant concerns from birth up to the age of 5. With regards to these assumptions, it is important to note that:

- These are additional costs to health professionals, and do not include the existing time and support that Health Visitors and midwives would normally provide children requiring additional support, particularly in their first year;
- Over time, as individual children grow older, it is assumed that they will require less support from the Named Person as a result of earlier support – so, for example, the individual newborn requiring 10 hours of support in 2016-17 would, on average, require less intensive support in 2017-18 and beyond because of that level of support in her first year;
- The embedding of the GIRFEC approach through a 'big bang' of intensive investment, building on the years of preparatory work through Hall 4 and the response to the CEL 29 letter, should result in a reduction in the intensity of support required by newborns over time; and • Investment in the firstborn child in a family should mean less intervention required for subsequent children because of the knowledge of the family circumstances that Named Persons will have developed.

To date, no Health Board, as compared to Local Authorities such as Highland and the City of Edinburgh, have yet taken a ‘Big Bang’ approach to GIRFEC investment, so it is not possible to test the Financial Memorandum assumptions with real-world experience in the same way as has been possible for Local Authorities. Where there has been investment in training, development and increased staff capacity, Health Boards have not identified dedicated savings that can be easily linked directly to the implementation of GIRFEC but recognise that GIRFEC is one of a series of contributing factors to supporting a wider focus of public health on the early years. The study on progress of all Scottish CPPs towards implementing GIRFEC, carried out earlier this year, noted that all CPPs – including their participating Health Boards – were advancing in their implementation of GIRFEC.

The Scottish Government will continue to work with stakeholders in resource profiling and workforce planning to support the implementation of the Named Person and Child’s Plan duties across Health Boards.

Early learning and childcare

Partner Provider Uprating

The Committee invites the lead committee to ask why the 2007 figure is being used to allocate additional funding and whether this means that the Government now supports an advisory floor of £4.09 per hour. Further, the Committee invites the lead committee to question whether the funding being provided is sufficient to enable local authorities to pay this rate and whether this rate is considered to be sustainable.

The Committee invites the lead committee to ask Ministers whether the funding for partner provider payments will be reduced in future years if some local authorities continue to pay considerably less than £4.09 per hour.

The Committee recommends that the Government requires local authorities to report annually on spending in relation to pre-school provision, in order that it can ensure that the anticipated levels of investment are being achieved. This should include details of expenditure on partner providers, including hourly rates paid. This information should be published.

The Scottish Government is aware that not all Local Authorities have consistently uprated their partner provider payments since the advisory floor was removed in 2007, although some have and to differing rates. The rate in 2007 was £3.73 per hour. We therefore felt that it was fair to include in the Financial Memorandum an estimate for uprating partner provider payments, based on an inflationary linked increase from 2007. On this basis an increase of £0.36 per hour was estimated, taking the rate to £4.09 per hour.

It is entirely the responsibility of Local Authorities to decide what they pay partner providers for the 475 hours (or additional hours where Local Authorities have delivered beyond the statutory minimum). Within the annual local government financial returns there is no breakdown of costs for partner providers, so we assume those partner provided hours to be covered by staff costs. In estimating staff costs for the additional 125 hours Local Authority estimates collated by COSLA were used.
Again these costs were not broken down into partner provider costs and the assumption is that these costs are covered by the estimated staff costs for the additional 125 hours.

Financial Memoranda typically do not build in forward inflation. Partner provider payments for the 475 hours and the additional 125 hours when introduced, will remain the responsibility of Local Authorities. It is for Local Authorities to determine local settlements with partner providers that are fair and sustainable. It is in the interests of the Local Authorities, who have a responsibility to secure provision and to seek to improve quality, that their partner providers are high quality and stable. This will be part of their considerations in establishing local settlements.

We will cover this issue in statutory guidance which we are developing in partnership with COSLA, ADES, NDNA and other key partners, but we will not monitor and micro manage Local Authority statutory responsibilities within the block grant they receive from the Scottish Government.

Additional provision for looked after/kinship care 2 year olds
The Committee would welcome further detail from the Government on the rationale underlying the increased funding for two years olds as announced on 12 September 2013, and clarification of whether any of the assumptions underlying the FM have been revised in order to arrive at the new figure.

The Financial Memorandum includes an estimate of £1.1 million for the costs of an additional 125 hours of provision for looked after 2 year olds. Separately, the Early Years Change Fund currently includes £1.5 million per annum to support local authorities to provide non-statutory provision of early learning and childcare for looked after 2 year olds. Ministers have decided that the full costs of all 600 hours of care should be centrally funded. This means the full cost of the existing 475 hours has been added to the additional costs of the 125 hours and integrated with existing funds which came from the Early Year Change Fund, resulting in a total allocation of £4.5 million. The assumptions in the Financial Memorandum have not been revised.

Capital costs
The Committee notes that the FM states that while the estimate is necessarily limited “it has been tested with a number of local authorities.” The Committee invites the lead committee to seek further details as to how this estimate has been tested.

The additional capital costs were discussed with Local Authorities through ADES and with the Care Inspectorate, with reference to adapting existing infrastructure and/or adding additional accommodation. The capital costs are based on the current Scottish Futures Trust metrics which have been used in the Schools for the Future programme. We used the primary school metric which is an allowance of 7.5 square metres per child at a cost of £2,350 per square metre. If you apply this to a new unit for 40 children (full time or morning/afternoon sessions) that would equate to around £700,000. If you applied this to a small unit for 80 children (around the size of a small primary school) this would equate to around £1.5 million. Integrating units with existing schools or other local authority resources would costs less, as would adapting or adding rooms. We discussed and agreed these figures with Scottish Futures Trust and other Scottish Government officials leading on Infrastructure Investment and the Scottish Futures Trust initiative.

1 Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, Financial Memorandum, paragraph 83
We also cross checked these figures against a recently built nursery for 40 children which included a parent room, staff room, and outdoor play area. The full cost of this nursery was around £900,000 including all contingencies, professional fees and development costs.

Looked After Children

Extending throughcare and aftercare support
The Committee invites the lead committee to raise the following issues with the Minister -

- The view of some local authorities that the demand for throughcare and aftercare support is likely to be higher than indicated in the FM;

The figures for young people applying for support are based on the limited information available to us from Local Authorities and COSLA. Most Local Authorities do not routinely collect data on how long care leavers have been out of care at the time they are granted support, how many were not considered eligible for support or the length of time someone received support for.

For that reason it has been difficult to ascertain exactly how many young people may come forward for support. Over the last 3 years the number of care leavers has been fairly stable and the numbers in the Financial Memorandum are based on the assumption that this trend will continue.

It is also expected that the numbers of care leavers in the upper age range will be less due to their increased ability to manage independently.

- Why the administrative costs are nearly half of the support costs;

The administrative costs are based on the cost of a worker completing the necessary assessment to ascertain how best to support the care leaver. This may include a number of meetings with the young person and others involved in the life and community of the care leaver. It also involves writing an appropriate care plan. Once this has been completed there is likely to be less intensive and direct work with the young person over a longer period.

- On what basis the costings for support were arrived at given the lack of detail in the Bill regarding the type and timescale of support to be provided.

As the support required by a care leaver can vary enormously an average cost has been calculated. This cost is based on the average caseload of the worker and an assumption that a care leaver – on average - would receive support for a 3 year period. Some care leavers will require much less than this estimate of support for three years and this support is likely to decrease with increasing age and maturity.

Kinship Care
The Committee recommends that the lead committee invites the Government to provide further detailed costings of the estimated avoided costs from the diversion of children from formal kinship care.

The Kinship Care Order will not result in the elimination of formal kinship care, but will provide an attractive alternative to families whose impact is expected to be a reduction in the numbers in formal care.
This is very difficult to model, because of the complex behaviour of children going in and out of care, so the conservative assumption is that the Kinship Care Order diverts an individual child from going into formal care for a single year only.

Kinship carers with a Kinship Care Order will be primarily supported from the benefits system in keeping with their parenting role. Therefore, the Local Authority will not be required to provide the full financial support as they do with a formal kinship carer. The net impact of this is a set of savings to local government. The savings arise from Local Authorities no longer paying a kinship care allowance, at an annual average rate of £5,331 per child and from social worker costs of around £3,667 per child (this has been tested with Local Authorities). However, as there is anticipated to be transitional costs in establishing the kinship care order, the Financial Memorandum shows a net additional cost, arising from these transitional costs in year 1.

The avoided costs modelled were taken as averages and the ranges are driven mainly by uptake (low and high) of the Kinship Care Order. In all scenarios there is a saving because the unit cost of supporting a family under a Kinship Care Order is less than if a child is in formal care, and savings materialise immediately.

The costs of diverting children from formal care are summarised in Table 28 of the Financial Memorandum, and is presented as having upper and lower bands, depending on the assumptions used. The 'avoided' costs are estimated to be £3.3-15 million in 2015-16, rising to £10.3-28.2 million in 2019-20. The total impact of both the Kinship Care Order and Counselling Services is modelled in Table 32. The savings are regarded as a conservative estimate.

I hope this response fully answers the questions the Education and Culture Committee have on the Bill. I would be more than happy to provide any further information required.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Scottish Human Rights Commission

About

1. The Scottish Human Rights Commission is a statutory body created by the Scottish Commission for Human Rights Act 2006. The Commission is a national human rights institution (NHRI) and is accredited with ‘A’ status by the International Co-ordinating Committee of NHRI at the United Nations. The Commission is the Chair of the European Network of NHRI. The Commission has general functions, including promoting human rights in Scotland, in particular to encourage best practice; monitoring of law, policies and practice; conducting inquiries into the policies and practices of Scottish public authorities; intervening in civil proceedings and providing guidance, information and education.

Introduction

2. The Scottish Human Rights Commission (the Commission) welcomes the opportunity to contribute to the Education and Culture Committee Stage 1 consideration of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (the Bill). The Commission welcomes the policy intentions behind the Bill.

3. The Commission makes three recommendations to ensure the best possible outcome for children and young people in Scotland:

   • That the Scottish Government recommit to the full and direct incorporation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) into Scots law and looks to develop a timetable for incorporation.

   • That Section 1 is considerably strengthened and extended to all Scottish public authorities.

   • That the Committee ask the Scottish Government to demonstrate how the impact of the Bill on children’s human rights has been assessed, and consider whether the Bill represents an opportunity to promote the use of human rights impact assessment, including child rights impact assessment.

4. The Commission also highlights a range of key issues of concern that relate to the full realisation of the rights of children and young people in Scotland, which has been raised during the development of Getting it Right? research project and the subsequent participation process to develop Scotland’s National Action Plan for Human Rights (SNAP).¹

¹ For a brief explanation of these see section 5 of this submission.

5. The UNCRC guarantees the full range of human rights—civil, cultural, economic, political and social rights for children. It has achieved almost universal ratification, with the exception of Somalia, South Sudan and the United States of America.

6. The UK voluntarily undertook to respect, protect and fulfill all of the rights in the UNCRC through the formal process of ratification in 1991. The UK Government, together with the devolved administrations have responsibility for implementing the UNCRC in the UK. As yet, the UK has not fully incorporated the UNCRC into domestic legal systems. The Welsh Assembly, while not incorporating the UNCRC, has adopted a measure requiring “due regard” to be given to the UNCRC and the Scottish Government has pledged to look at options for progressing incorporation.²

7. Article 4 of the UNCRC sets out the general obligations of States Parties with regard to implementation. It requires States Parties to, inter alia:

“undertake all appropriate legislative, administrative, and other measures for the implementation of the rights recognised in the present CRC.”

8. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child in its authoritative interpretation of this obligation clarifies that:

“States parties need to ensure, by all appropriate means, that the provisions of the Convention are given legal effect within their domestic legal systems.”³

The Committee welcomes incorporation as the approach to achieve this. As the Committee clarifies:

9. The Committee has repeatedly called on the UK to incorporate the UNCRC fully into domestic laws,⁵ a call repeated during the Universal Periodic Review of the UK in 2008 and 2012. It has also expressed concern that a number of areas of national law remain inconsistent with the UN CRC, including the low age of criminal responsibility and the law related to corporal punishment of children.⁶ Along with a range of international, regional and national human rights bodies and civil society organisations, the Commission too has repeatedly echoed the calls for incorporation of this (and other) international human rights treaty into the Scottish legal system.\textsuperscript{7}

10. Incorporation provides comprehensive and consistent legal protection and would significantly enhance awareness of children’s rights in Scotland. Incorporation would also aid Scottish Ministers in ensuring compliance with the principles and provisions of the UNCRC and their legal duties under the Scotland Act 1998.\textsuperscript{8} However, the Scottish Government has clearly stated that it does not intend to incorporate the UNCRC through this legislation. Incorporation of the UNCRC, and its Optional Protocols, is long overdue in Scots law.

11. In a recent Study on the legal implementation of the UNCRC, UNICEF found that:

\textit{In countries where there has been incorporation (Belgium, Norway, Spain), interviewees felt that children were more likely to be perceived as rights holders and that there was a culture of respect for children’s rights.}\textsuperscript{9}

12. This Bill provides an opportunity to give statutory expression to the UNCRC in Scots law to enhance the effective realisation of children’s rights.

13. The Commission recommends that the Scottish Government recommit to the full and direct incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law and looks to develop a timetable for incorporation.

Section 1 of the Bill: Duties of Scottish Ministers in relation to the rights of children

14. Section 1 of the Bill places a duty on Ministers to:

\textit{‘keep under consideration whether there are any steps which they could take which would or might secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC requirements’} and \textit{‘if they consider it appropriate to do so, take any steps identified by that consideration’}.

15. This represents a weaker duty than that first consulted upon in 2011.\textsuperscript{10} The current provision also falls below the duty contained in the Rights of Children and Young Persons (Wales) Measure 2011 and arguably represents a lesser obligation than that already placed on Scottish Ministers under the Scotland Act 1998 to “observe and implement” international obligations.

16. The wording of this provision does not reflect the requirements of Article 3 of the UNCRC, which states that \textit{‘…in all actions concerning children, whether undertaken by public or private social welfare institutions, courts of law, administrative authorities or...’} \textsuperscript{8} Under the Scotland Act 1998 it would be possible for Scotland to incorporate the CRC in relation to devolved matters. Schedule 5 section 7.

\textsuperscript{9} Op cit 2.

\textsuperscript{10} Scottish Government (2011), \textit{Consultation on Rights of Children and Young People Bill}.
legislative bodies, the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration’

17. The Commission considers that the language contained in this provision is too weak and gives too much discretion to the Ministers to ensure compliance. As a consequence both the policy aim and government accountability are likely to be unsuccessful.

18. Section 1 is one of the key provisions of the Bill. In the absence of full and direct incorporation of the UNCRC this Section should be considerably strengthened and extended to all Scottish public authorities.

19. Further, Section 6 of the Rights of Children and Young Persons (Wales) Measure 2011 provides a power to amend legislation by order where it is within legislative competence and where it relates to an issue raised through regular reports from Welsh Ministers on the due regard duty. A similar provision may be considered for inclusion in the present Bill. It would be crucial to ensure that any powers to amend legislation were subject to the appropriate level of Parliamentary scrutiny.

20. The Commission recommends that Section 1 is considerably strengthened and extended to all Scottish public authorities.

Human Rights Impact Assessments (HRIA)

21. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child has made clear in its General Comments that effective implementation of the UNCRC cannot be achieved by legislative measures alone.\textsuperscript{11} There a number of additional measures which are required for effective protection and fulfilment of children’ rights. Key tools to ensure children’s human rights are respected, protected and fulfilled in practice include HRIA and budgetary analysis in legislation, policy and practice related to children.

22. HRIA is one of the key approaches to achieve the systematic integration of human rights into the policies, practices, procedures and priorities of government, public and private bodies. Following a review of international and national best practice, the Commission promotes an integrated approach to impact assessment and is currently piloting an integrated equality and human rights impact assessment process with Fife and Renfrewshire Councils.\textsuperscript{12} Human rights impact assessment is inclusive and draws on the range of international human rights obligations undertaken by the State, including the UNCRC, which should be at the heart of decisions which affect children.

23. Ensuring that children’s rights are respected in policy and law demands a continuous process of child rights impact assessment to consider the impact of any proposed law, policy or budgetary allocation on children’s rights. This process should be built into all levels of governance. In this respect, we understand that the Scottish Government has not carried out a HRIA on the Bill.

prior to its introduction in Parliament. The Commission notes that a number of children’s rights organisations including UNICEF UK have also recommended that a child rights impact assessment be included on the face of the Bill. This would have provided a valuable resource to the Education & Culture Committee in their consideration of the Bill through the Parliamentary process.

24. There are good examples of HRIA, focused on child rights, being introduced in the legislative review process. Sweden, in particular, has had a system of child impact assessment for some years, as part of its wider national child rights strategy. The Flemish Parliament in Belgium requires all draft legislation affecting children to be accompanied by a child impact assessment when presented to Parliament since 1997. Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People has developed a comprehensive model of a stand-alone human rights impact assessment focus on children rights.

25. The Commission recommends that the Committee ask the Scottish Government to demonstrate how the impact of the Bill on children’s human rights has been assessed, and consider whether the Bill represents an opportunity to promote the use of human rights impact assessment, including child rights impact assessment.

Scotland’s National Action Plan for Human Rights

26. On 10 December 2013, Scotland’s first National Action Plan for Human Rights (SNAP) will be launched. Its purpose is to focus and coordinate action by public, private, voluntary bodies and individuals to achieve human dignity for all through the realisation of internationally recognised human rights. The evidence base for this action plan has been drawn from a three-year research project and subsequent national participation process to identify the key injustices as well as good practices in human rights realisation in Scotland.

27. This research has highlighted a range of key issues of concern that relate to the full realisation of the rights of children and young people in Scotland. Particular concern was raised about the rights of looked after children, kinship children and care leavers; children with parent/s in prison; children with disabilities, learning disabilities, mental health problems and those with Autistic Spectrum Disorders; children living in poverty, children with additional educational needs; Scottish Gypsy/ Traveller children; and LGBTI young people.

28. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill provides a timely opportunity to address many of the issues relating to children and young people that are raised within Getting it Right? and the Commission strongly recommends that further consideration is given to the issues. The Commission also wishes to emphasise the importance of participation in the reshaping of this Bill. It is critical that participation goes beyond ‘consultation’ and that the voices of those concerned are not just heard but are actively and constructively engaged in reshaping the Bill.

29. The Commission trusts that these comments will be of assistance to the Committee.

Scottish Independent Advocacy Alliance

1. Independent advocacy has an important role to play in supporting this clearly stated aspiration.

2. The value of advocacy has been recognised for many years, playing a major role in helping people have their voices heard, putting people who use services at the heart of their design and delivery and ensuring their rights are respected. Independent advocacy supports people to gain access to information and to explore options and consider possible outcomes. Most importantly it helps ensure views, opinions and wishes are listened to and taken into account when decisions are made about their lives.

3. It is usual for children to have quite limited control over their lives and limited ability to influence their own situations and decisions about children will largely be made by others in the child’s best interests. However, these decisions may not always coincide with what the child wants, possibly for very good reasons, but a positive outcome is more likely if the child feels, and is, as fully involved in the decision making process as possible. This is most likely if the child has been properly supported to consider all the issues and available information, to think about different courses of action and the possible outcomes arising from those and they believe that their view and wishes have been given proper consideration when decisions are made.

4. There may be several people in a child’s life who will advocate for them - family members, friends, teachers, support workers and others - however this may at times create some conflict of interest between the decision maker and the child. In such circumstances the child’s views and wishes may not be listened to or may be dismissed without full consideration.

5. Some children in certain circumstances will be very happy to have their family member, friend or known professional be there to advocate for them and it is important that the child has the opportunity to make that choice. However there will be times and certain circumstances when a child will want someone who is there to be wholly on their side with no other agenda, who will help them to speak up. This is when they should have access to independent advocacy.

6. Access to independent collective advocacy is important to provide a forum for groups with a common issue or agenda to come together to influence change to services and the way that they are treated. Being a part of a collective advocacy group helps build confidence, self-esteem and self-awareness for individuals involved. Groups can also help planners and commissioners of services through their contribution to the planning, design, delivery and monitoring and review of those services. Collective advocacy groups are of particular importance in residential or secure services where individuals may be isolated, away from family and friends and may not always have their voice heard. It is vital that such groups be completely free from any possibility of conflict of interest.

7. Throughout history some children’s voices have not been heard and their wishes have not been considered. Much has and is being done in Scotland and elsewhere to redress this imbalance of power. Scots laws on mental health\(^1\) and on children’s hearings\(^2\) reflect this and entitle the majority of Scotland’s most vulnerable children and young people to use advocacy services.

8. Independent advocacy’s function is to ensure that the child is at the centre in all decision making. This is a fundamental principle of Getting it right for every child (GIRFEC)\(^3\) however, there is no mention of independent advocacy in the key bill for GIRFEC, the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill 2013 5.

9. We believe that the inclusion of a right of access to independent advocacy (as defined within the Mental Health (Care & Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003) will be vital to ensure the underpinning principles of GIRFEC, the UNCRC and the Bill are achieved.

10. The Scottish Independent Advocacy Alliance (SIAA) is Scotland’s national membership body for advocacy organisations. The SIAA promotes, supports and defends independent advocacy in Scotland. It aims to ensure that independent advocacy is available to any person who needs it in Scotland.

1. Thank you for inviting my views about the children’s rights provisions (Part 1) and the named person duties (Part 4) in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

2. The Bill contains several references to the publication of new information by the bodies concerned:

In Part 1:
   - S1(3) will require Scottish Ministers to publish information about the steps they have undertaken to secure better, or further, effect in Scotland of the ENCRC requirements and to promote public (including children’s) awareness of the rights of the child.
   - S2(1) will require all bodies subject to the new legislation to publish a similar report every three years.

In Part 3:
   - S10(8)(b) will require authorities to produce and publish children’s services plans.

In Part 4:
   - S24 will require relevant authorities to publish information about the named person who will counsel and advocate for individual children.

3. In each case, the Bill leaves it to the authority to decide the manner in which the information should be made available. The Committee will doubtless be reassured to note that all of the bodies listed in Schedule 1 of the Bill are also subject to the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002 (FOISA) and therefore have an obligation to produce and maintain a publication scheme which has my approval. This will ensure that the required information in the new Bill will be made proactively available in a form and format accessible to the public and that any applicable charges will be marginal and pre-advertised. My guidance to authorities includes an extensive list of the information I would expect them to publish – this will be updated to reflect the new requirements of the Bill, if passed.

4. There are other information provisions in the Bill which relate to data sharing (s26) and disclosure of information (s27). These matters are outwith my jurisdiction and I would therefore suggest that these could be referred to the (UK) Information Commissioner’s Office which has responsibility for enforcement of the Data Protection Act 1998 and other related privacy legislation.

1. The Scottish Kinship Care Alliance is the national network of Kinship Care support groups across Scotland. We represent groups from Dundee to Dumfries and are rapidly expanding. This response refers only to the sections of the Bill relevant to Kinship Care.

Executive Summary

2. We question the rationale of the Bill to reduce the number of formal Kinship Care placements, and Social Work support for them.

3. The Kinship Care Order is not fit for its stated purpose of supporting more people to become Kinship Carers.

4. Discrimination between the support offered to children in Kinship, and other forms of care, is a violation of the European Convention on Human Rights.

5. We are concerned that the views of Kinship Carers have not been adequately considered during this consultation.

6. Current legislation (section 11) is not fully utilized due to (largely financial) barriers at local authority level. These barriers may prevent proper use of the Kinship Care Order.

7. The current review of financial allowances for Kinship Care must not be decoupled from proposals in this Bill to ensure that overall support increases, and does not decrease.

8. The Kinship Care Order should place a duty on local authorities to primarily provide priority access to specialist psychological and educational services, at minimum as currently available to Looked After Children.

9. Kinship Carers should be closely involved alongside local authorities in prioritising the 'package of entitlements' to be offered under a Kinship Care Order.

10. We applaud the moves of the Kinship Care Order to reconcile the current artificial distinction between formal and informal Kinship Carers. Support offered under the Kinship Care Order should be centred on the needs of the child rather than the previous legal status of the Kinship Carer.

11. We do not agree with the eligibility criteria for support under the new Order. Support should be given to placements to enable them to remain stable, not only when they become unstable.

12. Support should last longer than three years if it is to encourage permanence and respond to the needs of the child.

13. Much clarification is needed on the interplay between the Kinship Care Order and current section 11 Residence Orders.

14. The costs of obtaining a petition (court order) should be covered in all cases, otherwise it would be a significant deterrent to Kinship Carers wishing to apply for the Order.

15. Access to children’s therapeutic and educational services are the priority in terms of support for Kinship Care placements. Social work support is also required by most Kinship Carers.

16. Transport costs, start up grants, and financial allowance should be available to a higher percentage of recipients of a Kinship Care Order than projected.

17. The cross-boundary issue, when a Kinship Care placement moved to a different local authority and support stops, must be addressed in this legislation.

18. Kinship Care is a hidden and under-recognised form of care for some of Scotland’s most vulnerable children. Resourcing of the Kinship Care Order must be increased for it to increase necessary support for Kinship Care children.

19. Kinship Carers are not foster carers and do not require an equal financial allowance to foster carers. However, financial allowances based on the needs of the child, and taking benefit clawbacks into account, must be available under either the new, or old legislation.

20. In future the SNP may want to consider making Kinship Care allowances a Scottish benefit.

21. Kinship Care children should be able to access the same through-care services as other Looked After young people.

Full Response

Rationale for the Bill

22. We refer to the SPICE briefing on the Bill by Camilla Kidner (p.25 & 26) which points out that there are three different stated aims of the Kinship Care Order:

23. One purpose of introducing the kinship care order in the Bill is: “to reduce unchecked growth in formal kinship care” (financial memorandum para 128). The policy memorandum explains the rationale somewhat differently at para 117 as: “to encourage more individuals to become kinship carers for those children who do not require regular supervision or corporate parenting and whose long term welfare is best served by being cared for in such a way.” The consultation described the policy intention as: “to provide an alternative to being in care (for those children at risk of becoming looked after or already looked after in kinship care) and, in so doing, improve the support available for kinship carers” (para 151, Scottish Government 2012a).

24. We question the Policy memorandum’s rationale for the Kinship Care Order. It is our experience that regular supervision and Social Work input is crucial for most Kinship Care families, facilitating contact with the child's parents, and supporting the Kinship Carer in dealing with difficult behaviour, issues in school etc. Though we have sometimes been concerned by the attitudes or approach to Kinship Care placements by certain Social Workers or Social Work departments, there are very few families in our network who want less Social Work involvement.
25. We agree that more people should be encouraged to become Kinship Carers, but this will only happen if there is increased support for Kinship placements, many of which are currently under-supported, or not supported at all by the Local Authority.

26. Regarding the Bill's rationale “to reduce the unchecked growth in formal kinship care” It is true that the numbers of Looked After Children in Kinship Care are growing, but this is a reflection of the growth of children in Kinship Care and their need for support. We note evidence in the SPICe briefing and also from Citizen's Advice Scotland, CELCIS and others that, as quoted from the SPICe report:

27. "it is interesting to note findings (eg Selwyn et al, 2013) of striking similarities between kinship and foster care placements. There tended to be similar issues creating the need for the placement, similar levels of need, and children tended to make similar levels of progress whilst there. The main difference was that kinship carers tended to persist with a difficult placement for longer than an unrelated foster carer."

28. In other words Kinship Care placements have the same level of need for support as foster care placements. If Kinship Care placements are to be taken off Looked After status they must be provided with equivalent support in terms of corporate parenting from the Local Authority, priority access to specialist services such as psychological and educational help, and financial assistance.

29. We are concerned that the Bill is attempting to save money and improve statistics by taking Kinship Care placements off Looked After Status, rather than aiming to increase the support for, and therefore effectiveness of, Kinship Care placements.

30. We believe the Kinship Care Order is not fit for it's stated purpose of supporting more Kinship Carers, or increasing permanence in Kinship Care placements. Primarily this is because there is no guarantee of additional support as part of the proposed Kinship Care Order, and the Financial Memorandum makes it clear that there will be no additional resourcing to increase services and support. Secondly, since the proposed Order will only last three years it will not give Kinship Care placements stability or permanence. More details are below.

Human Rights Issue

31. It is important to note that the difference in levels of support offered to children of comparable need in Kinship and foster care placements is a violation of articles 8 and 14 of the European Convention of Human Rights on discrimination. This has been proven in a number of test cases in England, Northern Ireland and Wales. Most recently in a high profile case in Tower Hamlets in London.

32. If the Scottish Government's aspiration, as stated in the Bill, is to make Scotland 'the best place for children to grow up in', it should be keen to avoid violating the Human Rights of vulnerable children.

Concern regarding the consultation process

33. We are aware that a number of agencies including the Poverty Truth Commission, Kinship care groups in Glasgow and Clackmannanshire, The Scottish Human Rights Commission and Glasgow Social Work opposed the proposed Kinship Care Order in the September consultation on the Bill suggesting that the existing Section 11 legislation could deliver the support and permanence by which the new Order was justified. Many also argued that resourcing for Kinship Care placements would need to be increased to enable increased support, since the tight financial budget is one of the reasons that many section 11 placements do not receive the support and permanence which they are legally able to deliver.

34. We are very concerned that these views have not been taken into account and the Kinship Care Order has gone ahead without addressing these key concerns. We are also concerned that despite two recent meetings with the Bill team, the views of the Scottish Kinship Care Alliance – the main body representing Kinship Carers in Scotland – on the Bill, have not been taken into account, and the Kinship Care Order may in fact reduce, rather than increase, the support offered to Kinship Care placements.

Detailed response to the Kinship Care Order

35. Since we accept that the Kinship Care Order is now going ahead despite a majority of responses against it, we have a number of detailed suggestions to make it as effective as possible.

36. Our principle concern is that existing legislation (section 11) is not fully utilized for kinship carers, due to barriers at local authority level. We are concerned that the same barriers will exist for any new legislation unless resourcing is increased and essential support becomes a 'duty' on local authorities.

37. As per the section on Rationale for the Bill above we question the stated rationale in para 117 of the Policy Memorandum, “to encourage more individuals to become kinship carers for those children who do not require regular supervision or corporate parenting and whose long term welfare is best served by being cared for in such a way.” We would suggest an alternative rationale as “to encourage more individuals to become kinship carers, and make kinship care placements more effective for the child, by improving the support and permanence available to 'informal' kinship care placements.”

38. In Para 118 it is stated that the type of assistance provided to those eligible carers with a Kinship Care Order 'will be prescribed by the Scottish Ministers in secondary legislation.' We would like to know what this 'assistance' is likely to entail. We would suggest that the Bill places a duty on Local Authorities to primarily provide priority access to specialist psychological and educational services, at minimum as currently available to Looked After Children, to those in receipt of a Kinship Care Order.

39. There is also a need for financial allowances to support Kinship Care placements. We understand that there is a separate review of financial allowances for Kinship Care placements being carried out and assert that this process should not be decoupled from the Bill. This is necessary to ensure that overall financial support for Kinship Care placements (as part of the Kinship Care Order and/or under existing section 11 and LAC financial support in various Local Authorities across Scotland) does not decrease, but increases in line with the need of Kinship families in poverty whom we are aware are struggling to cope financially.
40. We are pleased that support will also be offered to 16 year olds who have been subject to a Kinship Care Order.

41. Para 119. - We are pleased that early learning and childcare will be offered to children who have been subject to a Kinship Care Order. However, we would suggest that this is not a priority for Kinship Carers, and that funding for child-care could be more effectively used for specialist services such as educational and psychological support for Kinship children, or a Kinship Care allowance.

42. We also applaud that Kinship Carers will be supported in applying for a Kinship Care Order. The type of support offered, and the extent to which this will be duty on local authorities (to be detailed in secondary legislation) will be crucial.

43. We note that by transferring Kinship Care placements away from Looked After status to the Kinship Care Order they may also lose a number of passported benefits (school meals, uniform allowance etc). Most importantly they would no longer be entitled to important through-care or after-care services. We suggest the Kinship Care Order also acts as a passport to these benefits.

44. In para 120 the Policy Memorandum states that the 'package of entitlements' under the Kinship Care Order 'might need to be adjusted following further discussion with local authorities and kinship carers. We would suggest this wording be changed to 'will be adjusted..' and that Kinship Carers are closely involved in designing a suitable package of support, recognising their lived expertise in what is most effective, and also what represents the most efficient use of funds.

Formal and informal Kinship Care

45. We applaud the steps taken under the Kinship Care Order to reconcile the artificial distinction between formal and informal Kinship Carers, by making the Kinship Care Order available for both. This goes some way to recognising that the current distinction between 'formal' and 'informal' Kinship Care (as stated in Financial Memorandum paras 107 – 109) is in many cases arbitrary. We assert that many children in these placements have comparable needs, and the distinction has been made based on social work's involvement in the placement, or other factors relating to the carer and not the child. This is important as support is then awarded accordingly.

46. However, under the new Kinship Care Order it is crucial that those Kinship Care placements coming through either path are offered the same level of support, centred on the needs of the child rather than the previous legal status of the Kinship Carer.

Eligibility criteria for support

47. Para 120 – We are concerned with the eligibility criteria for receiving support. The Bill suggests that eligibility will be based on the risk that the child may become Looked After (ie at risk) in the near future.

48. Firstly we want to note that many Kinship Carers currently try to gain Looked After status, as it is the only way to get social work support, services (psychological, educational and respite) and financial allowance which they desperately require.
Though from a statistical point of view it may appear beneficial to reduce the number of Looked After Children, from a Kinship Carer's perspective this would be very destructive unless the same level of support was offered.

49. This criteria for eligibility creates a perverse incentive to appear to have an unstable placement in order to receive support. On the contrary, if stable placements are well supported they will remain so, whereas by not supporting those who appear stable, you risk de-stabilising them and creating a greater future demand for Looked After status.

50. Eligibility for support should be based on the need of the child, not on the legal status of the carer or the stability of the placement. We note again that Kinship children have comparable needs to those in foster or residential care (who are in some cases their brothers or sisters). Access to services (psychological and educational) to deal with trauma and resultant emotional/behavioural issues, and support to enable their carer to give them stability and attention (such as respite and financial allowance) should be evaluated based on the needs of the child and to support their development.

51. The Financial Memorandum makes it clear that support will only be available to a percentage of those who receive a Kinship Care Order. (e.g some transport costs are expected to only be available for 10% of those who obtain a Kinship Care Order, a means tested start up grant of up to £500 will only be available to 50%, and help with the legal costs of obtaining the order to 66%). These projections clearly demonstrate that the eligibility criteria are intended to be set at a high level, making support unattainable for many children in Kinship Care or comparable need.

52. In para 148 the Financial Memorandum suggests that 'to facilitate properly an earlier intervention approach that is attractive to families and kinship carers and does not stigmatise, local authorities will likely need to develop or commission an alternative type of assessment which provides early parenting support and encouragement'. We agree with the statement, and would be interested to be involved in designing such an assessment.

Three years is not enough

53. Paragraph 122 of the Policy Memorandum states that support under a Kinship Care Order would last 'no longer than three years in most circumstances'. One of the stated rationales for the Kinship Care Order is to increase the permanence of Kinship Care placements, giving Kinship Carers more parental rights and responsibilities. We assert that if the Kinship Care Order only lasts three years it will not provide any stability for Kinship Carers. Evidence (from Buttle UK, Citizens Advice Scotland, CELCIS and our own networks) shows that children in Kinship Care generally require support for the majority of their placement, and their needs may not drastically change after three years or more.

54. We would suggest that there is an annual, or less frequent, review of the needs of the child, and support can be altered accordingly.

What will happen to those not on a Kinship Care Order, or after the Kinship Care Order has expired?
55. It is unclear what will happen to the existing financial allowances and support services provided by Local Authorities. In paragraph 121 of the Policy Memorandum it is stated that 'the Bill will not alter carers' existing entitlements to allowances'. We have a number of questions relating to this statement:

56. If a Kinship Care placement is transferred from LAC status to a Kinship Care Order will they only receive the 'transitional' support offered after an eligibility test (plus any welfare benefits they are entitled to of course), or will they also be entitled to support and financial allowance currently offered to those on a section 11 (which varies between Local Authorities)?

57. Will a Kinship Carer currently on a section 11 be able to chose not to apply for the Kinship Care Order and still receive the existing support offered to section 11 placements?

58. If a Kinship Carer on a section 11 applies for, and is granted, the Kinship Care Order will they continue to receive the existing section 11 support, plus any additional support under the Kinship Care Order? Or will they ONLY receive the new support?

59. If a new Kinship Carer wants to apply for a section 11 will they automatically be directed to the new Kinship Care Order? In which case will they be eligible for the existing support allocated to section 11 placements as well as the new support under the Kinship Care Order (following eligibility test)?

60. Will Kinship Carers currently holding a section 11 Residence Order be automatically transferred to a Kinship Care Order or will they need to apply?

61. Does that mean that those in receipt of a Kinship Care Order will be entitled to the existing support offered under section 11 (which varies in different Local Authorities), as well as any additional support following the Kinship Care Order eligibility test?

62. Also, once the three years of a Kinship Care Order are up, can the Kinship Carer go back to a section 11 status and continue to receive the existing support? If not what support will be offered once the three years has expired?

63. Clarification on these questions is crucial for us to assess the outcomes of the proposals in the Bill.

What support will be available?

64. We applaud the intention of para 123 and 124 of the Policy Memorandum to place a duty will on Local Authorities to assist Kinship Care families with 'distress' such as that related to family conflicts or substance misuse. However, we would add a duty on Local Authorities to provide access to therapeutic and educational support services for children in Kinship Care, according to their need. This is the main concern of Kinship Carers in our network, many of whom are struggling to cope with the behavioural difficulties and health problems of the children in their care, caused by their early years traumas.

65. We would also again note evidence that some local authorities are failing to implement their existing duties to support children in Looked After Kinship Care placements. Barriers to the proper use of existing legislation should be examined in the context of duties placed under the new Kinship Care Order.

66. We are also concerned that the Kinship Care Order will not provide appropriate social work support, such as that currently offered to Looked After Children. Social Work support is crucial to facilitate contact with the child's parents and other serious issues with behavioural difficulties and referral to appropriate services. There is evidence that Social Work departments are already struggling with high case loads (see Glasgow Social Work's previous response) and many 'Looked After' Kinship Care placements already receive very infrequent visits.

67. The onus will be on Social Work departments to carry out the Kinship Care provisions laid out in the Bill. Significant investment in Social Work departments will be needed to make this possible.

68. We agree with the other types of support available as part of the Kinship Care order (legal aid with getting the Order, transport costs, start up grants, and some financial allowance), though we are concerned about how many carers will be eligible for this support, as stated in the section on eligibility.

69. In particular, we are concerned that the costs of obtaining a petition (court order) for a Kinship Care Order should be covered in all cases, otherwise it would be a significant deterrent to Kinship Carers wishing to apply for the Order. We are concerned that increased funding for Legal Aid will be required to make this possible, as many carers already have difficulty obtaining court actions for Residency Orders (section 11) due to cuts to Legal Aid.

70. We would also note that paragraph 114 of the Financial Memorandum states that many Kinship Carers can use a bus pass and would therefore not be entitled to transport costs. We would again assert that assistance should be based on the needs of the child and not the carer. In many cases Kinship Carers need to use taxis to take distressed children to hospitals, doctors, school and other services. Help with transport costs should be available to a much higher percentage of Kinship Care placements.

The cross boundary issue

71. A common problem for Kinship Carers arises when they take care of a child who's parents live in a different local authority, or move to a new local authority themselves. This can lead to a total freeze on support as the local authorities argue about who is responsible for the child, and neither authority takes responsibility for their care. This issue must be resolved in any new legislation. Support should be allocated via the authority in which the Kinship placement is made and, and should move with the child to wherever they currently live in that placement.

Resourcing more support for Kinship Care placements

72. The Financial Memorandum states that rather than investing more in resourcing Kinship Care placements the Bill will actually save money over the coming years by reducing the support offered to Kinship Carers overall (mainly by taking them off Looked After status).
73. The only increase in spending necessary by Local Authorities will be a total of £2.6 million across Scotland to account for the transition to a new legal framework. There will be no increase in funding for financial allowances, psychological or educational services, respite, or any other form of support for Kinship Care children or their carers. This can only mean less support overall.

74. We assert that more support (primarily services, and also financial allowance) is desperately required for children in many Kinship Care placements. In their September response to the Bill consultation COSLA has also made it clear that the barrier to increasing the support for Kinship Care placements is finance. Local Authorities are already struggling to fulfil their duties to Looked After and section 11 Kinship placements, and have been unable to fulfil the Scottish Government’s 2007 concordat agreement to pay Kinship Care placements an equal rate to foster carers because of inadequate resourcing.

75. The Scottish Government must put considerable financial resources behind the Kinship Care Order if it is to be effective in increasing and improving Kinship Care placements. We would suggest that resourcing of services (psychological and educational support for the child, and respite for the carer) is a priority here, and financial allowance secondary in importance. This should be seen as a perfect fit with Scottish Government priorities on early intervention and preventative spend. Clinical evidence has clearly shown that early years traumas such as foetal alcohol and methadone syndrome, and separation anxiety, commonly experienced by Kinship children, must be treated as early as possible to prevent them becoming ingrained patterns which are likely to disturb their development. If left untreated this will ultimately cost the NHS and other services more in the future. Para 126 and 127 of the Policy Memorandum agree that Kinship Care placements have the best outcomes for children who would have gone into the care system. We assert that unless Kinship placements are better supported more children will end up in formal care, costing the government much more than a well supported Kinship placement.

Financial allowances

76. We note that very little financial support will be provided as part of the current Kinship Care Order. 'Transitional' allowance will only be available for those transferring from Looked After Status, and only 75% are expected to be eligible, for a limited three year period. We note again that children in Kinship Care have the same needs as those in the foster or residential care system, and many Kinship Carers struggle on pensions and basic benefits, and are unable to work due to the demands of the child in their care.

77. We are also concerned that the Bill is relying heavily on the UK benefits system to supplement the finances of Kinship Carers. We are worried that the Bill has not taken account of the UK welfare reforms currently taking effect. These benefit changes will leave many Kinship Carers worse off and in more desperate need of support.

additional finances, which the Kinship Care Order could provide.

78. We suggest that the Kinship Care Order entitles any successful applicant to a financial allowance. We would be willing to discuss the appropriate level for this allowance with the Scottish Government. It should be noted that many authorities currently pay Kinship Carers of Looked After children considerably more than £70/week, while some also pay those on a section 11. This needs to be discussed and negotiated with Kinship Carers rather than an arbitrary amount designated at this stage.

79. We note that the questions on what would happen to the existing financial entitlements under section 11 are very relevant here.

80. The conclusions of the review of financial allowances for Kinship Care placements which is currently being carried out will also be very important and cannot be decoupled from this Bill. COSLA have stated in their September response that they do not want to be an 'income maintenance' agency, and also note that they are struggling to achieve parity of allowance with foster carers (for Looked After Children in kinship care). Firstly, we again assert that financial allowances should be based on the needs of the child not the legal status of the carer, and should therefore also be available to section 11 (or new Kinship Care Order) Kinship Carers. On this point we want to clearly state that Kinship Carers are not foster carers and do not require a wage from the state for their parenting role. They do however require a basic allowance to enable them to provide for the children in their care in old age. Many Kinship Carers are in poverty and struggling on a pension, and basic child benefits (see evidence from Citizens Advice Scotland). That allowance should take benefit claw-backs into account. Kinship Carers mostly do not, and cannot work, due to their age and the high needs of the children in their care. Some Kinship carers have given up paid employment to enable them to care full time for their children. We look forward to contributing to the review on financial allowances in the near future.

81. Secondly, this raises the question of how the SNP Scottish Government sees financial support for Kinship Care placements in the event of an independent Scotland. Would this be a benefit paid by the Scottish Government? This should be considered with regard to the financial review and the Kinship Care Order.

82. We are also clear that we do not want any increase in support for Kinship Care placements to come from a cut to other parts of children's services (for example increasing social worker's case-loads which will impact on others). A genuine investment in the sector is needed.

83. We are aware that we are asking for a significant financial input, but assert that Kinship Care has been a hidden and unrecognised form of care, which desperately needs recognition and resourcing. Kinship Carers should be rewarded for the high quality and stable caring they give to Scotland's vulnerable children, and for their role in keeping kids out of the expensive care system, not penalised for being a family member.

Through-care services

84. We would also like to respond to the section of the Bill on the provision of After-care to young people leaving the care system. We agree with CELCIS’s submission to the September consultation:

85. We suggest that if the Scottish Government goes ahead with the plans to introduce a kinship care order, it further legislates to ensure that young people subject to a kinship care order are able to access the same through-care and after-care services as young people who have been formally looked after by the local authority. This would acknowledge the fact that, were it not for the kinship care option, many young people in this situation would be looked after by the local authority and may have similar needs and vulnerabilities as young people who have been looked after by the local authority.

86. We also agree with CELCIS and others that the legal duty should be on local authorities to provide assistance, not on the young person to have to request it. Also, that there should be appropriate mechanisms in place to allow young people to challenge the outcome of their requests for support.

87. Through and after-care services have historically been under-resourced and perhaps seen as a privilege by the Scottish Government. But evidence shows that through-care has a strong determining effect on a young person’s life chances after care. We would urge greater resourcing in this area.

Scottish Out of School Care Network

Introduction

1. The Scottish Out of School Care Network (SOSCN) is a Scottish registered charity (SC020520), established in 1991 and is the national infrastructure umbrella organisation providing support, mentoring, training, information and resources to the nearly 1,000 school-aged childcare services in Scotland, which provide childcare, play and learning to over 45,000 children.

2. All of our work is underpinned by a commitment to supporting and promoting the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC), in particular Articles 31; the right to culture leisure, rest and play; Article 12, the right to consultation and Article 18; states parties to develop appropriate services to support families, including assistance with childcare for working parents. We also have a particular focus on children in need or on poverty (Article 22) and support the provision of care for children with disabilities (article 23).

3. As a general introduction: our Benefits of Out of School Care Video (SOSCN, 2011) http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=jlDMi4u5k3Q includes parent’s views on both the economic and social support they receive; as well as, of course, children’s voices.

Out of School Care

4. The out of school care (OSC) sector is the second largest provider of childcare within Scotland and is a vital resource for parents (of school-age children) who are in employment, training or looking to return to the workforce. Currently there a total of 994 out of school care services in Scotland, providing places for a total of 45,620 children (Care Inspectorate, 2012).

5. While many out of school childcare services are co-located in schools, they are not managed by the school, but operate completely independently. In fact only a few local authority areas, in particular: Fife, and Perth & Kinross, directly provide school age childcare. The majority of services in Scotland are managed by parent committees, charitable or independent organisations (Care Inspectorate, 2012).

6. There is no, explicit, statutory duty to map the need for, and ensure the provision of school age childcare in Scotland, thus making such services quite vulnerable when cuts have to be made by local authorities. (However, see Annexes 1 and 2 and previous guidance such as “Schools Out”, 2003). This is in contrast to the English “extended schools” legislation which legislates both for the mapping of need and then ensuring provision of services.

7. While, at first sight, this seems to be a policy advantage over what we have here in Scotland for school aged childcare; there are a number of negative aspects of provision in England, including deregulation proposals for the future development of school age childcare there.

8. It is worth, briefly, comparing the quite different directions here, as this is very relevant to the CYP Bill.

Regulation, quality and qualifications

9. All childcare services for children up to the age of 16 in Scotland have to be registered with the Care Inspectorate, whilst providers in England only need to register with Ofsted for children aged less than 8. A recent proposal by the UK government, (DoE, 2013) proposes even lighter touch regulation of school age childcare services and removing any requirement for staff/child ratios or staff qualifications. They also propose to extend from two hours to three the threshold for any childcare provider to register with Ofsted (DoE, 2013).

10. SOSCN does not support this potential diminution of quality and oversight of care for children in other parts of the UK. We also do not support importing the extended schools blueprint into Scotland, with our very different education, social work and integrated children’s services policies, at national and local levels. While we do support the need for out of school care to be put on a more explicit statutory basis, the long tradition of community run and managed services in Scotland should be integrated, not replaced, into any statutory framework.

11. In complete contrast to the low or no qualifications requirement in England, in Scotland workers in school age childcare have to register with the Scottish Social Services Council, with specific set qualification levels, including degree level qualifications for lead practitioners of services. The workforce in school age childcare is predominately female (92%) with the average pay of a lead practitioner less than £11 an hour for an average 27 hour week (SOSCN, 2012a). For now, with services dependent mainly on fee income to run, it is unlikely, despite increased qualification levels that the pay and conditions will improve.

12. SOSCN also provides Aiming High Scotland quality assurance, based on the UNCRC principles; we do this as strong supporters of children’s rights in Scotland. We support a professional workforce educated to levels which match their peers in education, health, social work etc., and for their roles to be recognised as supporters of children's wider social learning and development, especially through play. Out of school care is not just “babysitting” and it should not be viewed as requiring fewer skills and knowledge as teaching. Indeed professional play care staff in out of school care could help teachers develop more play based practice and help schools develop better play grounds and resources for children.

Costs to parents

13. On our 2013 membership figures the average costs of a full five evenings after school place is just under £50 a week, while holiday all day care for five days is just over £100 a week. Current UK government reforms and proposals have reduced the amount and eligibility of childcare tax credits, and a proposed radical overhaul of the childcare voucher scheme initially will not include support for childcare costs of children of five or over, unlike the present scheme: this indicates a real threat to the existence of many current providers of out of school care.

14. If parental subsidies for childcare are reduced, or removed, then the out of school care sector will likely lose a large number of users and become less sustainable to the extent many services will close down, especially small rural services and those operating in areas of need. The majority of services receive no direct grant support but some do access “in kind” support such as free or low cost school lets.

Children in Need

15. Scottish councils are able, under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, to support placements of children in need (see Annexes 1 and 2), in school age day care services, and, even prior to 1995, subsidised social work places have always been a hidden feature of school age childcare in Scotland, with about 20% of such places reported in surveys of the sector (Scottish Executive, 2003; SOSCN, 2013a). This aspect of support for children in need of care is one which has common ground with the aspirations for vulnerable 2 year old children in the Bill, and, is a starting point for our recommendations here.

International Evidence

16. The recent Scottish Government international review on the best practice of other European countries (Scottish Government, 2013b), includes as examples, such measures as generous parental leave, linked seamlessly with subsidised and well provisioned early education and childcare. Support for school age childcare is a major feature of such best practice in the countries studied (e.g. the Swedish and Danish “Leisure time services” for school age children). The support for childcare and parents, in the best of these countries, ensures that the proportion of women able to work is consistently higher than here in the UK, and that within quality childcare, learning though play is highly valued.

17. Other European wide research emphasises the value of school age childcare in addressing poverty and deprivation (Reid and White, 2007) where the provision of such care can facilitate women entering and remaining in the workforce and make a substantial contribution to children’s welfare. In disadvantaged areas, out-of-school care can contribute to tackling poverty and problem behaviour.

The Children and Young People Bill (CYP) Bill, 2013

18. SOSCN welcomes the CYP Bill and we are involved on Scottish government-led working groups in relation to the CYP Bill. Our invited involvement, we hope, reflects the wider and longer term agenda in terms of the Scottish government’s stated aim to “make Scotland the best place in the world for a child to grow up” (Scottish Government, 2013a). The out of school care sector we support does indeed also cater for children aged 4 and many services are combined care and education services for under-fives and out of school age. Nevertheless the Bill ignores the need for out of school care and this is a significant omission.

19. We argued in our consultation response to the CYP Bill for greater flexibility in the proposed extended 600 hours so that parents could, for example, purchase holiday care with an out of school care provider to help with the transition from nursery to school for 4-5 year olds due to start school, and, indeed, as many children start school before they are 5, to allow this to be used also for before and after school care (SOSCN, 2012b). Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People also backed this proposal (SCCYP, 2012).

20. We want to see a firmer commitment in the Bill to include childcare for school age children and a useful starting point is to build on the legislation contained in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, Part 11, Chapter 1, Section 27:

21. “(3) Each local authority shall provide for children in need within their area who are in attendance at a school such care—

- outside school hours; or
- during school holidays,

as is appropriate; and they may provide such care for children within their area who are in such attendance but are not in need. “Our italics (see Annex 1).

22. This seems to be a little known piece of legislation, yet as we noted in the introduction, a very few councils do directly provide out of school care while around 20% of places are subsidised for children in need of extra support. Some further examples of how this is done through the GIRFEC approach are contained in our Expert Symposium report (2013b), which has case studies and examples of subsidised places for children in need.

23. In common with other children and family organisations we also support proposals to extend the Bill in terms of vulnerable two year old children. One way to do this would be to apply the 600 hours provision to all 2 year olds in need, as defined in the 1995 Act (see Annex 2). We would argue that this definition should apply also to children in need, in terms of school age childcare.

24. There are a number of current concerns about children in need, especially in poverty and/or with disabilities, often about continuity of care and support over school holidays. This includes such practical support such as free school meals, but also is a question which arises often in terms of the named person (usually the head teacher) and the child’s plan, as proposed in Getting it Right for Every Child (Scottish Government, 2013c). Supporting school age childcare places would address some of these gaps in continuity of care and support.

25. The CYP Bill should include a reiteration and strengthening of the powers of local authorities to enable provision for children in need as defined above, for support to access any registered, regulated and good quality service for children up to the age of 16, and second to build into this a commitment towards enactment of statutory provision for school age childcare over a specific timescale.
26. We recommend that the Early Years Collaborative approach be extended to include children of school age and this links in clearly with other national policies such as GIRFEC, The Early Years Framework and The Curriculum for Excellence (Cfe).

27. SOSCN believes in terms of the UNCRC that children have a right to play, cultural, leisure, recreational and rest services, provided by out of school care (Article 31) and their parents have a right to support in raising their children (Article 18). Furthermore the UNCRC also requires support for children in need or in poverty (Article 22) with disabilities (Article 23) or refugees (Article 26). Therefore, if the CYP Bill is to fully engage with the UNCRC as the foundation of this legislation, the policy drivers are already there in terms of children’s rights to statutory care, which also links and builds on previous legislation.

28. Of particular relevance to our views on the Children and Young People Bill is that we fully support the comments made by “Together” in their submission and evidence briefing paper for this committee (Together, 2013) in that the proposals do not yet go far enough in embedding the UNCRC. In light of our comments on the UNCRC underpinning articles above, we agree that:

- “The provisions around children's rights in Part 1-3 of the Bill fall short of providing the overarching child rights framework needed to fulfil the Scottish Government's policy intentions.

- Together urges the Education Committee to consider the full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law. Incorporation is the way for the Scottish Government to realise its ambition to make Scotland 'the best place to grow up’

- Together urges the Education Committee to consider the need for a child rights impact assessment to be undertaken on the Bill. This would ensure there is an informed and systematic approach to considering children's rights across the Bill." (Together, 2013).

29. SOSCN supports using the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and Getting It Right For Every Child as the fundamental, underlying, principles of the CYP Bill. We note that this is in marked contrast to childcare policy development in England which suggests a market-led, and not a child-centred approach, to the care of children. We therefore believe Scotland is already going in a positive and very different direction, which has the potential to be truly transformational for children and young people in Scotland. This potential must be fulfilled but it cannot happen without including out of school care as a statutory measure, providing for all children in need, and ensuring that children’s rights are fully embedded in our culture.

Annexe 1: Children (Scotland) Act 1995 extract

1995 c. 36 Part II Chapter 1 Provision of services

Section 27

27. Day care for pre-school and other children.

(1) Each local authority shall provide such day care for children in need within their area who—

(a) are aged five or under; and

(b) have not yet commenced attendance at a school, as is appropriate; and they may provide such day care for children within their area who satisfy the conditions mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b) but are not in need.

(2) A local authority may provide facilities (including training, advice, guidance and counselling) for those—

(a) caring for children in day care; or

(b) who at any time accompany such children while they are in day care.

(3) Each local authority shall provide for children in need within their area who are in attendance at a school such care—

(a) outside school hours; or

(b) during school holidays,

as is appropriate; and they may provide such care for children within their area who are in such attendance but are not in need.

(4) In this section—

- “day care” means any form of care provided for children during the day, whether or not it is provided on a regular basis; and

- “school” has the meaning given by section 135(1) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980.
Annex 2: Definition of Children in Need

Children (Scotland) Act 1995

A child is in need if he or she is in need of care and attention because:

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Scottish Parent Teacher Council

Background

1. SPTC is pleased to respond to the Scottish Parliament’s Education and Culture Committee’s Call for Evidence regarding the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

2. SPTC is a membership organisation for parent groups in schools all over Scotland. We also provide information and advice to parents and carers on every aspect of their child’s schooling and the education system as a whole.

3. In our response to this consultation we seek to present a parental perspective and to give balanced feedback on the Bill. At the consultation stage, as now, the questions at the forefront of our mind were simple ones: ‘What problem is this proposal trying to resolve?’ and ‘Will it make a real difference to the lives of children and young people?’

Children’s rights or children’s services?

4. We have been very challenged by the premise in the Bill that there is a comfortable fit between the areas of children’s services and children’s rights. We are not convinced this is true and feel the Bill attempts to straddle both horses, suffering as a result.

5. On the one hand the bill seeks to place obligations on those providing services to families (both parents/carers and young people) and on the other it seeks to strengthen the rights framework (UNCRC) for children and young people, though without full incorporation of the convention into Scots law. We believe this is a missed opportunity and urge the Government to address this obvious issue.

6. We are fully supportive of the proposed changes to the role and remit of the SCCYP, based on the assumption that the resources are provided to ensure the Commissioner can adequately fulfil this extended role.

Universal services versus targeted support

7. From our perspective, the vast majority of children and families require nothing more complicated than high quality universal services provided by motivated and skilled professionals, with parents and carers as advocates when required.

8. What we have witnessed throughout the journey of this Bill is a situation where – understandably – the organisations and individuals engaged in the debate around the Bill come to it with a world view which is focused on the needs of children and families who are facing particularly difficult circumstances.

9. The perspective of the 90% of typical families who ‘get through’ without additional support from social work, health, education or other services has as a result been largely unheard in the debate. We are therefore concerned that in its attempt to support those children and young people who are experiencing difficulties, this Bill has the potential to draw families into the system unnecessarily, expending time and expensive resources needlessly and potentially detrimentally.

Named person

10. We believe the concept of a Named Person for every child is ill thought through and offers no benefit to the majority of children, whose ‘named person’ is already in place – their parent or carer.

11. For most children in receipt of universal services, their parent or carer is the person who has most interest in their wellbeing, knows them best, is committed, has staying power and is most motivated to ensure the health, education and other services they come into contact with deliver for them. This proposal completely fails to recognise that significant relationship and effectively seeks to usurp the role of the parent.

12. We are opposed to this proposal on this ground alone. In addition:

- The Named Person is not defined sufficiently. There is no clarity of thinking within the bill around the role of Named Person as opposed to Lead Professional and, indeed, the significant roles and responsibilities of other professionals. This role will demand that an individual has an oversight of all of a child’s support, plays an active role in ensuring that is delivered and carries the gravitas to influence other professionals. We do not believe such an individual exists at present within the system, with the capacity to take forward such a significant role. The resource implications alone in the creation of this role are enormous and we believe are underestimated in the Bill.

- The pressure on the capacity of the Named Person (eg a guidance teacher with a case load of circa 200 children) has the potential to lead to increased workload and the escalation of issues which may previously have been resolved having taken their natural course without intervention.

- The implications of the Bill’s Section 26 on Information Sharing are a matter of great concern as information regarding a parent which is currently confidential (eg work-related stress which leads to a GP visit) could be shared. We believe such sharing of information is inappropriate and counter to the rights of individuals to confidentiality. By bringing such information to the attention of the Named Person, as suggested in 4.1 above, matters which are by rights confidential could be escalated, drawing families into services.

- This adds to workload across services, breaks trust and disrupts family life.

- We question where the rights of the child are in this proposal as there seems to be no mechanism for the child’s view to be taken into account in the selection/allocation of the Named Person.
• There is potential for disagreement between the Named Person and the parent or carer where they fail to agree on the support or objectives for a child. This would be both destructive and resource-intensive. We query what systems would be required to avoid and deal with this situation, and whose view would take priority. This has not been addressed in the Bill.

Increased childcare hours

13. We have previously argued that increasing the hours of childcare for most children is undermining their right to the care of their parent/primary carer and that we should be cautious about the implications of this move. Is it actually driven by economic considerations (ie releasing more parents for paid employment)? Further, the proposal has the potential to increase pressure on parents to return to the workplace when their preferred option would be to be care-givers for their children.

14. We recognise early learning and childcare are of great importance to many children and can lead to improved outcomes as they move through school and beyond. However, this benefit has to be balanced against the rights of parents and children to spend time together, because we also know that strong bonds between child and parent/carer are critical for the development and wellbeing of children.

15. We are concerned the additional hours of funded childcare are more likely to be accessed by families who are already economically active and for whom additional hours reduce the need for them to ‘juggle’ their working lives and childcare; it is arguable that few of these additional hours will in fact be accessed by those families for whom this intervention will make a substantial difference to educational or social outcomes.

16. In relation to childcare provision for looked-after children (particularly those who are looked after at home) we have specific concerns that local authority provision requires to be stable and consistent, not subject to change and withdrawal in response to funding issues. For these children in particular, stability is a fundamental right which effective use of GIRFEC principles should ensure.

17. We agree with the principle of consultation as to the nature of the childcare and education to be provided, however we do not agree that this consultation should be with ‘such persons as appear to ....be representative of parents’. The consultation must specifically be with a cross-section of parents of children who are of pre-school age.

18. We believe the Bill should also include an obligation on local authorities to provide ‘wrap-around’ childcare options for children of all ages, including those with disabilities and other additional support needs.

19. In relation to placement of children, we are well aware of how difficult it is for both parents and children where a placing request is made within authority and so it is a significant concern that pre-school placements might enter the same labyrinth.
It is to be anticipated that only economically active and confident parents would consider this option for a pre-school child.

Single child’s plan

20. We believe a single planning approach should be just that: what appears to be proposed is the creation of a further plan which would ‘sit on top of’ existing plans. We would argue there are already too many plans, too many layers for children and their parents to navigate.

21. A child or young person at school could have a PLP, an IEP, and CSP. They may also have a care plan and other plans in relation to their care and support.

22. We would support a single planning approach and a single plan which brings together and simplifies the planning process for both families and professionals working with them. Such a plan requires the active involvement of the young person and their family. A statutory duty should be placed on all the public bodies needed to make the planning and implementation robust and co-ordinated.

Kinship Carers

23. We recognise that kinship carers provide parental care to many children in Scotland with little or no support in their role. We believe their care provides continuity of care and sustains family life for many children and young people. We also believe these formal and informal arrangements reduce the financial burden on public services by keeping children out of care. We therefore support the proposals as outlined.

Conclusion

24. We support many aspects of the Bill as outlined above.

25. We welcome the Government’s effort in this Bill to strengthen the support of public services around children who need that support, but we oppose strenuously the introduction of the Named Person as it currently stands.

26. We are cautious about the way in which extended hours of childcare will be designed and delivered, and to whom, and urge careful consideration as to how this element of the Bill is drafted.

27. We urge the Government to be bold by enshrining the UNCRC in Scots law as part of this Bill.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Scottish Public Services Ombudsman

Background

1. The Scottish Public Services Ombudsman (SPSO) is the independent organisation that handles complaints from members of the public about devolved public services in Scotland. This includes almost all of the organisations listed in the schedules of the Bill. Under the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, the SPSO was also given a lead role in improving the handling of complaints by public sector organisations in Scotland.

2. In responding to this consultation, I have concentrated on the section of the Bill which provides Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People (SCCYP) with an increased role in complaints handling. I also highlight that there is a need to consider how best to deal with complaints about the new obligations on public organisations in the bill.

Children and complaints – the SPSO experience

3. I would like to say a little about our experience of children, young people and complaints. In the last 18 months, amongst other issues, we have considered complaints about failures to protect children from bullying; to provide a teenager with appropriate psychiatric care for an eating disorder; decisions to remove respite care; and failures to properly investigate child protection concerns. We have looked at school admission arrangements and we have also had complaints from those unhappy that their involvement in their child’s life has been limited in some way. As the organisation who looks at complaints from prisoners and about prisons, we can also take complaints from young offenders and have received complaints about how children visiting prison have been treated.

4. While these examples show they can be significant in content, the numbers we receive from children and young people are low. Child and early adulthood are similar to old age in that these are times of our lives when we are more reliant on public services. Care of the elderly and services provided to older people, particularly in the health service, remain a regular source of complaints to the SPSO. It is notable that we hear much less often about the services provided to and which impact on children. Almost without exception, complaints are brought, not directly by children and young people, but by parents and carers.

5. The question of why these groups, despite being significant users of public service, have such different rates of complaint to us is not one to which there is a simple answer. There will be positive reasons, for example, children and young people who receive high quality and appropriate service provision will not need to complain. However, it is notable that in 2012/13 only 5% of people who completed our equality monitoring form identified themselves as being under 24.

Barriers to children and young people complaining

6. I consider there are specific barriers in place which make it difficult for children and young people to complain. Some of this relates to age. It can take both confidence and experience to make a complaint about someone who has power over some aspect of our lives and while this is difficult for adults, it is likely to be more difficult for the young. Access to complaints systems is often designed with adults in mind and can prove intimidating and difficult for the young. The Children’s Commissioner for England recently published a very interesting report on complaints from the point of view of young people. It highlights the problems faced and improvements that could be made to make the process more accessible. However, it is also the case that in terms of services most likely to be used by children and young people, health, education and social work, the complaints landscape is not straightforward. There are multiple complaints routes and agencies with an interest in those complaints. The level of complexity of the system itself is likely to provide an additional barrier.

Multi-agency working and complaints

7. Since the publication of the Crerar and Sinclair reviews, significant work has been undertaken both by the SPSO and others to standardise complaints and streamline processes. Complexity remains. One driver of complexity is a direct result of multi-agency working. Multi-agency cooperation is essential to provide joined-up services focusing on the user rather than the needs of the organisations. However, when someone wants to raise a concern they may need to go through a number of different complaints processes because, while care may have been provided jointly, each organisation may still retain their own complaints process for their own area of responsibility. In November 2010, I wrote an article for Children in Scotland magazine and concluded: “Joint working provides many opportunities. A complaint dealt with well by an integrated service can result in improvements for the child concerned and for other children in a more holistic way than if different parts of the complaint had been dealt with by different agencies. Put simply, the opportunities for learning are greater if the responsibility is shared. For this to happen, the approach to multi-agency complaints should be integrated into the service at the design stage so that procedures – and the right culture – are embedded long before any problems arise.”

8. This benefit has not yet been achieved. Complaints are often thought about not at the design stage but far too late in the process, sometimes only at the point when a complaint is made. The benefits set out in the bill of working together to support children will not be fully realised if we do not also accept that there need to be easy and accessible routes to raise complaints.

The new role of the SCCYP to pursue individual complaints

9. Having set out our concerns about complexity, it may now seem odd that I responded positively to the Scottish Government when they consulted about

2 http://www.childrenscommissioner.gov.uk/content/publications/content_585 extending the role of SCCYP to include the ability of individual complaint. In my response to that consultation, I set out the administrative justice principles that should inform any system. These includes accessibility. I will simply refer the Committee to the points I made in detail. In summary, while I was unable to comment fully because it was unclear at that stage what the role would be, I highlighted my concern at the low numbers of children and young people using complaints procedures and suggested this new role -- because of the visibility of the SCCYP amongst children and the skills they have developed in communicating with and representing children -- may help with that particular problem. While there are issues around a potential overlap with other complaints-handling organisations and how we work together, giving the SCCYP this role will hopefully allow them to investigate some significant individual issues; to highlight that children and young people can and should complain; and to develop the role they already undertake in providing information and support to those who would like to know how best to complain.

Resourcing the role

10. It should be clear that taking on a complaints-handling role will have a wider impact on SCCYP than may appear from the number of full investigations set out in the policy document. SCCYP will decide themselves what complaints it is appropriate for them to take forward. However, this new role will increase expectations of what the SCCYP will be able to do for individuals. People will see them as a place to go to pursue complaints. SCCYP will need to be able to explain why they will not deal with certain complaints and our experience is that this is not always an easy task. The role will also provide them with a clearer mandate to support children and young people who wish to complain. It is this aspect of the role that I feel may be particularly beneficial. It is important to note that this role will not be completely new. SCCYP staff already regularly provide helpful and timely information and advice to callers. However, their new role in investigating individual complaints will highlight this and drive demand for this advice and support role. This is a critical part of the role of all complaints-handling organisations and it is important that it is resourced as well as resource provided to actually take forward individual complaints.

Dealing with the overlap

11. The legislation currently says that SCCYP should not look at any issues which are "properly the function" of another person. This may be difficult to identify in practice. Their particular role is around failures to appropriately consider the rights, interests and views of children. In the consultation response to the Scottish Government we explained in more detail how we consider rights and apply that to cases. I do not repeat that here but it is the case that such failings would likely amount to service failure or maladministration, the categories which are the categories we judge complaints by. Our remit is broad and does cover most, though not all of the public sector.

0Bill%20all%20docs.pdf
12. SCCYP’s role will not be limited to the organisations under our jurisdiction and they will have a particular focus. However, it has to be accepted that it is not immediately clear from the legislation where the boundaries between their and our role will be. To be fair, this is not something that is easy to draft for and drafting too narrowly would restrict the role to the point where it may become impossible to use. It is likely the best approach is a pragmatic one. We have already been in discussion with SCCYP and other complaints-handling organisations and we all agreed on a need to work together to prevent as far as possible any confusion and to make sure we are signposting children and young people to the best and most appropriate organisations. We have had early discussions about how to do this in practice and I look forward to this continuing. As I have said above, complexity can be a barrier. However, we feel there may be benefits for improving accessibility for young people. It will be incumbent on complaints-handling organisations to work together to prevent the problems this could cause. This does not mean there will not be difficult cases or this will not cause certain problems. The final decision on how to weigh the benefits and disadvantages will lie with the Parliament. We are committed to working with others to make whatever system emerges as easy as possible for users.

Technical legislative issues

13. I would like to provide a few comments on the wording of the legislation itself. I am aware that organisations may have pockets of discrete information which when put together may indicate significant systemic failings but that there may be no clear structured way of sharing this information. We have agreements with regulators and others around information sharing and put as much information as we can in the public domain. We have made this searchable to allow anyone to access this. We are though, for very good reasons, subject to specific limitations on what information we can share. It is important that the public feel their complaints are treated confidentially. We are privy to significant amounts of personal information and know there need to be limits. For example, we have taken the very unusual step in a very small number of cases involving children and young people of either not publishing any information or not identifying the public organisation in the published information. In some council areas for example, simply identifying some characteristics of a school in that area would identify a child.

14. The following thoughts are reflections based on our legislation about how to balance the need to share information with the need to protect the interests of individuals.

Flexibility on reporting

15. The legislation as worded provides the SCCYP with the ability to publish some reports of completed investigations. There may be some benefit in giving them the ability, at their discretion, to share information from cases they received and considered but did not take further, subject of course to the need to protect the anonymity of the complainant(s).
Sharing information between organisations

16. In terms of sharing information, there are two sections under which we operate that balance sharing information and restrictions in interesting ways. At present, section 21 of our legislation the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman Act 2002 puts us under an obligation to consult with other UK ombudsman if we consider we have received a complaint which includes matters which could be under their jurisdiction. This was designed to deal with cross-border issues. These have not occurred to the extent that was anticipated so this section has not been much used. It could though be a model for a similar obligation on SCCYP and/or others to consult with each other when complaints may overlap to make sure the appropriate organisation is taking this forward. We would suggest an obligation should not be mandatory as this may be disproportionate but a positive indication that they may do so would likely help with some of the overlap issues mentioned above.

17. Another section which has been little used but may be a helpful model in this context is section 20 of our Act. Section 19 significantly restricts what information we may release and says that we can only do so for specified purposes. Section 20 allows us to release information to certain organisations if we consider there may be evidence which suggests that we are aware of information of particular importance to them because they have specific enforcement powers. At present, this section is limited to a very small number of organisations and circumstances. Our powers of gathering information appear to be more significant than those currently suggested for the SCCYP and I know there are general information sharing provisions in the legislation but would suggest these models merit some consideration. This may, in future, provide models for broader sharing within Scotland between complaints-handling and scrutiny organisations which balance the need to protect confidentiality while allowing important information to be shared.

Dealing with complaints about the duties on public organisations brought in by the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

18. The Bill creates a new role, the named person and there are new obligations on public organisations notably around creating a child support plan and co-operation. Any new duties placed on organisations raises the question of what do people do if they are unhappy with the way they are carried out. Many of the organisations are already under our jurisdiction and this may lead to complaints being brought to us. As noted above, the current landscape of complaint-handling provision means multi-agency working can be complex. This is particularly the case around interactions between social work, social care and health.4

19. We have been discussing the implications for us and the organisations under our jurisdiction with the Scottish Government. It may also be worth noting that there is also currently a working group looking at social work complaints the outcome of which may be relevant.

Response from the Scottish Social Services Council

1. The Scottish Social Services Council (SSSC) is the statutory Non-Departmental Public Body responsible for registering people who work in social services in Scotland, regulating their education, learning and development and generating workforce information for the sector, including the publication of Official Statistics. The SSSC is also one of the partners of Skills for Care and Development, the Sector Skills Council for the social service workforce in the UK.

2. There are approximately 195,000 workers in the social service workforce in Scotland, over 40 per cent of whom are employed by the private sector. The SSSC’s role is to raise standards of practice in social services, to strengthen and support the workforce and to increase the protection of people who use the services. Our vision is a competent, confident workforce, capable of delivering high quality services that has the confidence of the public, those who use services, and their carers.

Response

3. We responded to the Scottish Government consultation on its proposals for a Children and Young People Bill on 24 September 2012. We have nothing further to add to our views as expressed in this response, which we attach for reference.

A SCOTLAND FOR EVERY CHILD

More effective rights for children and young people

1. Do you feel that the legislative proposals will provide for improved transparency and scrutiny of the steps being taken by Scottish Ministers and relevant public bodies to ensure the progressive realisation of children’s rights?
   - We welcome the proposals.

2. On which public bodies should a duty to report on implementing children’s rights be applied?
   - We have nothing to add to the list of public bodies identified in Annex B.

3. Do you agree that the extension of the Children’s Commissioner’s role will result in more effective support for those children and young people who wish to address violations of their rights?
   - The SSSC aims to protect people who use services and their carers by promoting high standards of conduct and by taking action where the public are at risk. Our role is about investigating allegations which may amount to misconduct of individual registered workers. This may include misconduct relating to children’s rights.
   - We support in principle the proposals to extend the Children’s Commissioner’s role. There is a possibility of potential overlap between the Children’s Commissioner’s role and the functions of other public bodies such as the SSSC. We will require significantly more detail to enable us to assess the possible implications for the SSSC in relation to our regulatory function. For example, a potential overlap may occur where the Commissioner conducts an investigation which relates to a registered worker. There will be a need to be clear about the parameters and triggers for investigations. An unintended consequence may arise where a decision relating to a registrant’s suitability on our Register can not only be subject to the normal appeal to the sheriff, but also subject to additional scrutiny by the Children’s Commissioner. In the interests of clarity and the integrity of the adjudication process, this should be avoided.
   - We make a point later in this response about the changing nature of the social services workforce. The majority of social services workers are now employed by the private and voluntary sector while there has been a recent trend (as part of the Self Directed Support agenda) for some service users to take control of their budgets and make their own choices about the people providing their care. It will be important to ensure that the Commissioner’s new powers take account of these arrangements. It is also worth noting that there are a substantial number of social services workers who are required to register with the SSSC while there are a significant number of additional workers who are required to registered with other regulatory bodies such as the Care Inspectorate. Social service workers are required to comply with the relevant code of practice.

- We would also question whether the Commissioner will share information about registered workers with the SSSC. A final question would be to clarify what the Commissioner’s role would be in the event of a finding that a child’s right has been breached.

- We have other questions about how the revised role will work in practice but we will wait for further detail about the implementation. If the Commissioner’s role is extended we would welcome the ongoing opportunities to share experiences from our work with them.

A new focus on wellbeing

4. Do you agree with the definition of the wellbeing of a child - or young person - based on the SHANARRI Wellbeing Indicators, as set out in the consultation document?

   - We welcome moves to have shared outcomes across services.

5. Do you agree that a wider understanding of a child or young person’s wellbeing should underpin our proposals?

   - We have no comment to make on this question.

Better service planning and delivery

6. Do you agree that a duty be placed on public bodies to work together to jointly design, plan and deliver their policies and services to ensure that they are focussed on improving children’s wellbeing?

   - We welcome the proposals to place a duty on public bodies to work together on this agenda. One point we would make is that there a range of bodies which have a remit in this area, as illustrated by Annex B of the consultation document. Extending the duty should strengthen and support collaborative working, and should include the duty to share relevant information. There may be a need for guidance to support situations where partnership working may be problematic or where mediation is required.

7. Which bodies should be covered by the duties on joint design, planning and delivery of services for children and young people?

   - We have no comment to make on this question.

8. How might such a duty relate to the broader Community Planning framework within which key service providers are expected to work together?

   - We have no comment to make on this question.

Improved reporting on outcomes
9. Do you agree that we should put in place reporting arrangements making a direct link for the public between local services and outcomes for children and young people?

- We welcome the proposals to promote the link between local services and outcomes for children and young people. We welcome the moves to place a duty on public bodies to assist the local authority in reporting on a common set of high level outcomes for children and young people, but would extend that duty to private or voluntary sector bodies providing publicly funded services to children. We would welcome further guidance on the implications and the level of support that would be required by local authorities. As an example: The SSSC could provide information about the numbers of referrals by local authorities which led to unsuitable workers being removed from the Register. A key point for us would be to ensure that these reporting arrangements are meaningful; consistent across individual local areas; and can highlight the impact and improvement for those who need the most support. The purpose of the reporting, and therefore the nature of the information gathered, must be useful and directly relate to improving the outcomes and experience of children and young people.

10. Do you think that these reporting arrangements should be based on the SHANARRI Wellbeing Indicators as set out in this consultation paper?

- Yes. This may require definition as different people and organisations will have different interpretations of the terminology. For example, what does “safe” mean? It would be expected that ongoing work on GIRFEC will have paved the way for this.

11. On what public bodies should the duty for reporting on outcomes be placed?

- The SSSC agrees in principle to being included as one of the public bodies to assist in reporting outcomes, however we would like further information about the extent of the duty in order to consider this more fully. We would also suggest that the public bodies which are required to report to local authorities are required to collaborate to prevent overlap or duplication, especially around information collected from third parties.

A SCOTLAND FOR EACH CHILD

Improving access to high quality, flexible and integrated early learning childcare

12. Do you agree that the Scottish Government should increase the number of hours of funded early learning and childcare?

- We welcome the intention to increase the number of hours of funded early learning and childcare. We welcome any moves to increase the provision of care both during and outwith school hours. The social service workforce has a vital role to play in the delivery of these services and it has been a requirement since December 2011 that all lead practitioners and managers of day care services for children are required to either hold or be working towards a level 9 Childhood Practice qualification. Evidence shows that the best experiences for children come from qualified staff. It will be vital to ensure that providers can maintain appropriate numbers of qualified staff at all times, and that learning and development opportunities exist to meet that need.

13. Do you agree that the Scottish Government should increase the flexibility of delivery of early learning and childcare?

- We welcome any moves to increase the flexibility of delivery of learning and childcare. Decisions about the needs of parents and local demand should be taken at local authority level. We note the increasing role of the private and voluntary sector in the delivery of these services. The SSSC’s workforce data shows that the majority of day care of children workers and childminders are now employed by these two sectors. The growth in the number of non-statutory services may present specific challenges both in terms of the delivery of these flexible services and ensuring a qualified workforce is available to provide early learning and childcare services. It may be difficult for some small services to find the time and resources to allow staff to undertake learning and development. Similarly there may also be implications for the work patterns or contracts for some staff. It is vital that the resource implications of learning and development is factored in by those commissioning services.

14. Do you think local authorities should all be required to offer the same range of options? What do you think those options should be?

- We believe that this is an issue for local authorities and relevant partnerships to decide.

15. How do you think the issue of cross-boundary placements should be managed, including whether this might be through primary or secondary legislation or guidance?

- We would recommend the use of guidance to support this. It is very important that any arrangements suit the needs of the child, not the needs of organisations.

- We welcome the proposals to provide additional resources to support the needs of 2 year olds who are Looked After. One question we have is about the implications for children who are not Looked After but are vulnerable and may at risk of becoming so. They may require and benefit from similar support. We suggest that further flexibility may be required where, for example, a Looked After child would benefit from this support prior to their second birthday. We look forward to reading the detailed guidance in relation to this. We would also note, that there may be additional workforce development issues for staff who are providing early learning to particularly vulnerable children, and the SSSC would be happy to do further work on this.

The Named Person

17. Do you agree with the proposal to provide a point of contact for children, young people and families through a universal approach to the Named Person role?

- We agree with this proposal. There will be challenges in ensuring that those undertaking the named person role have the requisite skills and capabilities to undertake the task and would suggest that there needs to be substantial investment in this in order to change both culture and practice. There may be a need for further resources and tools to support these proposals. The SSSC would be able to provide support and knowledge to develop these resources.

18. Are the responsibilities of the Named Person the right ones? Are there any additional responsibilities that should be placed on the Named Person?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

19. Do you agree with the proposed allocation of responsibilities for ensuring that there is a Named Person for a child at different stages in their lives set out in the consultation paper?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

20. Do you think that the arrangements for certain groups of school-aged children as set out in the consultation paper are the right ones? What, if any, other arrangements should be made? Have any groups been missed out?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

The Child’s Plan

21. Do you think a single planning approach as described in the consultation paper will help improve outcomes for children?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

22. How do you think that children, young people and their families could be effectively involved in the development of the Child’s Plan?

- The implementation and spirit of the single planning approach requires workers from all disciplines to work collaboratively with families, placing them at the centre of the planning process. We suggest that there are learning and development issues that will need to be addressed in order for practice to be effective. Some of these issues will be shared and can be addressed on a multi-agency basis and some will be sector specific. We would be able to develop tools and resources to support this for social services workers.
Right to support for looked-after children

23. Do you agree that care-leavers should be able to request assistance from their local authority up to and including the age of 25 (instead of 21 as now)?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

Corporate Parenting

24. Do you agree that it would be helpful to define Corporate Parenting, and to clarify the public bodies to which this definition applies? If not, why not?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

25. We believe that a definition of Corporate Parenting should refer to the collective responsibility of all public bodies to provide the best possible care and protection for looked-after children and to act in the same way as a birth parent would. Do you agree with this definition?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

Kinship care

26. Do you agree that a new order for kinship carers is a helpful additional option to provide children with a long-term, stable care environment without having to become looked after?

- We have no comment to make on the order. The SSSC and the National Health Service Education for Scotland (NES) are currently working together on the implementation of the Carers and Young Carers Strategies for Scotland. These strategies highlight the need for learning and development opportunities for kinship carers.

27. Can you think of ways to enhance the order, or anything that might prevent it from working effectively?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

Adoption and permanence

28. Do you agree that local authorities should be required to match adoptive children and families through Scotland’s Adoption Register?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

Better foster care

29. Do you agree that fixing maximum limits for fostering placements would result in better care for children in foster care? Why?

- We have no comment to make on this question.
30. Do you agree foster carers should be required to attain minimum qualifications in care?

- There is evidence that children growing up in a household where parents have qualifications tend to get a better start in life. Foster carers typically support children with complex care needs, so it would be reasonable to expect that it would be of benefit to children if foster carers were expected to have an appropriate qualification. However, foster carers are not part of a regulated workforce and are caring for children in their own homes, as part of their own families. Is it therefore compatible with the ethos of foster care to require qualifications? A final point that we would make here is that there may be specific safeguarding issues which have to be considered.

- When these fundamental questions are answered, the SSSC would be able to advise on a way forward based on our experiences of regulating more than 50,000 social services workers. We would also be able to offer advice based on our experiences of developing and promoting the Codes of Practice for social services workers and employers. We are aware that there are plans to hold further discussions about these proposals later this year and we welcome the opportunity to contribute to that debate.

31. Would a foster care register, as described, help improve the matching by a local authority (or foster agency)? Could it be used for other purposes to enhance foster care?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

32. Do you think minimum fostering allowances should be determined and set by the Scottish Government? What is the best way to determine what rate to pay foster carers for their role – for example, qualifications of the carer, the type of ‘service’ they provide, the age of child?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

Assessing Impact

33. In relation to the Equality Impact Assessment, please tell us about any potential impacts, either positive or negative; you feel the legislative proposals in this consultation document may have on any particular groups of people?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

34. In relation to the Equality Impact Assessment, please tell us what potential there may be within these legislative proposals to advance equality of opportunity between different groups and to foster good relations between different groups?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

35. In relation to the Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment, please tell us about any potential economic or regulatory impacts, either positive or negative;
you feel the legislative proposals in this consultation document may have, particularly on businesses?

- We have no comment to make on this question.

Education and Culture Committee
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Scottish Women’s Aid

General comments

1. Scottish Women’s Aid (SWA) welcomes the Children and Young People’s Bill and the Scottish Government’s intention to promote and protect the rights of children and young people in Scotland. The government should take credit for this important piece of legislation and the intention behind it. However, we remain unconvinced that the initial intentions behind this legislation will be realised unless the UNCRC is incorporated into Scots Law.

2. Promoting and protecting children and young people’s rights in a real and transparent way could go some way towards genuinely tackling domestic abuse and is a goal SWA wholeheartedly support. Domestic abuse will continue to blight the lives of far too many of Scotland’s citizens unless we fully understand and address the way in which their rights are undermined and eroded and there is a proper will to address this. There is a wealth of research that demonstrates that children’s rights to be protected, to education, health care, a home, associations with others, leisure, play and to having their views taken account of are all severely compromised as a result of living with domestic abuse (Humphries & Mullender 2000; Hester et al 2006).

3. While we welcome the intention to strengthen existing children’s policy approach through legislation; we are very concerned that some of what is being proposed around information sharing in particular could inadvertently increase risk and further undermine children and young people’s rights.

Specific comments in relation to Part 1

4. SWA supports full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots Law and would like the Scottish Government to follow the lead of other countries and introduce legislation that truly can be seen as ‘landmark’. In addition to this, in light of the strong commitment demonstrated by government towards tackling domestic abuse, we would like a strong message from the Scottish Government that domestic abuse is a significant rights issue and there is an expectation that this should be recognised in the design and delivery of children’s services.

Specific comments in relation to Part 2

5. SWA welcome the intention to increase powers for The Commissioner for Children and Young People; however, we do not believe that this can be effected without increased resources to carry out this duty.

Specific comments in relation to Part 3

6. It is clear that the needs and rights of children and young people living with domestic abuse cut across many areas. There is some evidence of Community Planning Partnerships and Child Protection Committees working more closely... with Multi-agency Violence Against Women partnerships which has improved responses. While the GIRFEC approach has gone some way towards encouraging a more consistent and unified approach, there is still a lack of direction and consistency in response to domestic abuse. There is a need to mainstream this issue within all relevant services while at the same time keeping specialist services which offer an invaluable safety net to vulnerable families and can advise practitioners who are working with them.

7. In 2009 the remit of Single Outcome Agreements was widened to become a strategic plan at Community Planning Partnership level, therefore providing a real opportunity to develop coordinated work to tackle domestic abuse. However, SWA carried out an analysis of SOAs in 2008 and 2009 http://www.scottishwomensaid.org.uk/assets/files/publications/research_reports/SWA%20SOA%20Report%202009.pdf and our subsequent report documented the lack of priority given to domestic abuse within the majority of SOAs. Our analysis showed that only 5 out of the 32 local authorities in Scotland make specific reference to addressing domestic abuse as a priority in their areas. This despite the fact that the Scottish Government has consistently made this a priority area in recognition of the high numbers of children who are referred to social services and who appear on the child protection register.

8. In attempting to address the lack of consistent outcomes and coordinated approaches to eradicating domestic abuse and its impact on society, the Scottish Government has adopted the Violence Against Women Outcomes Framework. This framework was developed through a consultation process with VAW multi-agency partnerships and piloted within two local authority areas. It illustrates how we can achieve National Priorities (as outlined in the National Performance Framework) through Single Outcome Agreements that promote a shared understanding of domestic abuse and its impact on women, children, and young people as well as a range of joined-up approaches to preventing it. Further work is needed to integrate the VAW Outcomes Framework within local planning structures in order to ensure that the needs and rights of children experiencing domestic abuse are fully recognised and addressed.

9. This is the area of the Bill that is causing the most concern for SWA, primarily because despite good guidance in relation to GIRFEC our members and children and young people using our services continue to contact us stating that their safety, confidentiality and right to privacy is often compromised. We are clearly not getting it right for children and young people living with domestic abuse and we see no real evidence that the introduction of this Bill will significantly change anything; in fact we are concerned that the introduction of named persons and the lowering of information sharing thresholds could increase risk for this group and undermine rights rather than strengthen them. Sharing information inappropriately and without due care can lead to those fleeing or living with domestic abuse suffering injury or death.
10. There is a lack of clarity around thresholds at which information must be shared; which may mean that the current proposal will be interpreted as legislation for the sharing of any information about any child or young person, their family and family life and personal circumstances even where they are not considered to be at risk. While we do need to identify, support and protect children and young people who are living with domestic abuse we find the lack of clarity around how this should be managed without increasing risk and undermining the right to privacy and confidentiality quite alarming. This could be a huge backward step with regard to a more consistent response to domestic abuse if families are too afraid to come forward and seek help leaving them feeling even more vulnerable and without support.

11. Robust and explicit guidance on responding to domestic abuse and a commitment towards learning and development for all practitioners must be a priority in order to address these risks and increase confidence. Making good decisions about sharing information depends on a good level of awareness and understanding about the dynamics of domestic abuse. A sketchy and prejudiced response is dangerous and contributes to service-enhanced risk.

12. While we are in agreement with the provisions set out in the Bill relating to the provision and setting up of a child’s plan we remain concerned for all of the reasons stated above in relation to levels of awareness of domestic abuse. Domestic abuse can often be the cause of huge difficulties for families i.e. truanting, absconding, self-harming behaviours etc. and yet is often the hidden issue and one that everyone can be reluctant to address. Efforts to put plans in place that do not address the real problem will inevitably fail. It takes skill, knowledge and expertise to get this right and we would like to see plans that take this into account.

13. One of the most frustrating examples of where risk is often exacerbated for women and their children attempting to flee domestic abuse is the contradictions played out in public and private law proceedings. There are huge tensions and contradictions across work with perpetrators; child protection and child contact arrangements. These three areas of work all involve children and yet do not make for a cohesive and co-ordinated approach. Responding more effectively to domestic abuse as it impacts on adults and children, requires both a unified approach across all of these areas and acknowledgement of the processes of gendering that are situating women as culpable victims. It requires much closer and coherent practices across the three areas of work, with acknowledgement and understanding of professional assumptions and practices of different professional groups.

Introduction and Context of Evidence

1. The Scottish Youth Parliament (SYP) welcomes the opportunity to give evidence on the Bill. As an organisation inspired by Article 12 of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC), our vision is of a stronger more inclusive Scotland that empowers young people by truly involving them in the decision-making process. We welcome the Scottish Government’s ambitions to ‘make Scotland the best place to grow up’ and to make ‘children and young people’s rights real’. This Bill represents a golden opportunity to make this vision a reality.

2. Our evidence is directly shaped by extensive consultation in partnership with Young Scot on the draft Bill\(^1\); consultation on the preceding proposals for a Rights of Children and Young People Bill\(^2\); as well as our Youth Manifesto ‘Change the Picture’ which was shaped by 42,804 responses from young people and includes a number of statements directly relevant to young people’s rights and the Bill\(^3\).

Rights of Children

3. The Scottish Youth Parliament recommends that the Bill be used to fully incorporate the UNCRC into Scots Law.

4. As part of the mass consultation which shaped ‘Change the Picture’, 85% of young respondents agreed with the statement “Young people should be entitled to as much protection of their human rights as the law can give them. This means that the UNCRC should be given more force in Scots Law”. Subsequently, a clear majority of our elected Members (MSYPs) supported full incorporation (64%) with just 23% supporting requiring the Government to have ‘due regard’ to the UNCRC at our October 2011 National Sitting.

5. The reasons for young people’s support for full incorporation relate to the potential to make their rights real by making them legally enforceable with clear channels of redress for breaches. Many were aware of the rights the UNCRC affords them and raised instances of where they felt their rights had not been respected, but felt that there were no channels of redress to enforce their rights. The Bill’s proposals to require Ministers to ‘keep under consideration’ children and young people’s rights would not provide any redress for breaches of the UNCRC, and as such represent a missed opportunity to make young people’s rights real.

6. Fully incorporating the UNCRC would enable action to be taken on issues that young people deem to be priorities for a better Scotland, and allow breaches of their rights to be dealt with suitably. An example of the benefits full incorporation would bring can be seen through issues raised in the Public Petitions Committee’s consideration of ‘Ban Mosquito devices now’ from Andrew Deans on behalf of SYP⁴. Despite use of the device, which targets those under the age of 25 with a loud, unpleasant, high-pitched noise, being recommended for reconsideration amongst the UN Committee Concluding Observations 2008⁵, and in breach of five separate UNCRC Articles in the view of the Children’s Commissioner⁶, the device remains legal to own and operate without restriction in Scotland. Full incorporation of the UNCRC through the Bill would create a basis to end the use of the discriminatory device without having to create additional legislation or to identify long-term health risks, which the Scottish Government suggested were barriers to the device being banned.⁷

7. In addition to the statements relating to the UNCRC and the Mosquito device, 12 of the other issues covered by Concluding Observations were highlighted by young people as amongst their biggest priorities in the Youth Manifesto, including tackling bullying, greater involvement in decision-making, preventing negative stereotyping in the media and ensuring effective PSE in schools.⁸ Full incorporation could bring welcome progress on a range of issues that young people have identified as changes that would make Scotland the best place to grow up.

8. The Scottish Youth Parliament supports the introduction of a duty on Scottish Ministers to promote public awareness and understanding of the rights of children. In our consultation with young people on ‘A Scotland for Children’, 61% of survey respondents supported this proposition. With a majority of respondents rating their current knowledge and awareness of their rights as low, including 39% who had ‘never heard of the UNCRC’ before taking part in the survey, this duty is likely to have a positive impact. However, this duty would be made even more meaningful if it were clear to children and young people how they can report instances of their rights not being respected and have remedial action taken if a breach were proven.

9. The Scottish Youth Parliament supports the extension of the investigatory powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People (SCCYP). This function must be suitably resourced to enable it to meet demand, and caution must be taken when promoting the function to children and young people to ensure that unrealistic expectations of what is likely to happen as a result are not created.

10. As part of our consultation on ‘A Scotland for Children’, 62% of respondents supported the extension of SCCYP’s powers as proposed by the Bill, with just 6% opposed. To meet demand and manage expectations suitable resources must be provided to enable SCCYP to receive complaints and carry out investigations. In promoting the service to children and young people it is important to be clear about the possibilities and limitations of this service. Caution should be exerted to avoid young people being led to believe that SCCYP will carry out a full scale investigation into each and every complaint, and that the Commissioner could compel organisations or individuals to take action to rectify a proven breach.

11. The Scottish Youth Parliament recommends that a requirement be placed on Parliament to debate the findings of SCCYP’s investigations. To ensure that proven rights breaches are taken seriously, we would recommend that the Bill require the full Scottish Parliament or one of its Committees to debate the Commissioner’s report. We would also recommend that the Commissioner is empowered to investigate potential rights violations relating to reserved matters as well as devolved. Young people concerned about their rights not being respected would be extremely disappointed if no investigation could be carried out because of the terms of the devolution settlement. This would enable SCCYP to investigate complaints from young asylum seekers and refugees, or areas where it is not immediately obvious whether an issue is devolved or reserved, such as the Mosquito device.

Provision of Named Persons

12. The Scottish Youth Parliament supports the inclusion of a provision of a point of contact for children, young people and families through an appointed Named Person. However, we recommend that the focus of the function should be as a first point of contact for children, young people and their families looking for information and advice about their wellbeing and ensure that their views are being taken into account when decisions regarding their wellbeing are being made; rather than the Bill’s focus on the role serving as an information sharing hub for agencies.

13. A majority of respondents (51%) supported a requirement for a Named Person for every child. However, when asked what the Named Person should be responsible for, their clear preference was for a young person’s first point of contact if they are looking for advice or information about their wellbeing (chosen by 46% of respondents); being their parents’ or carer’s first point of contact for advice or information about their wellbeing (35%); to make sure their views are being taken into account when decisions about your wellbeing are made (34%) and to work with them, their parents and other agencies to co-ordinate and plan any support they might require (29%).

14. Significantly, the options of the Named Person being responsible for being a point of contact for other professionals who might have concerns about the young person’s wellbeing (26%) and deciding what information needs to be shared, balancing up a need to protect their wellbeing and respect their privacy (24%) received much lower support than the other options including fictional options we included for comparison. Young people’s support for this role being created appears to depend on its purpose, and we would recommend the focus be placed on the point of contact aspect of the role.

15. The Scottish Youth Parliament recommends that the circumstances in which information about a young person can be shared between agencies without their permission should be made clear in the Bill as well as accompanying guidance. Young people’s right to privacy and confidentiality should be respected unless they are at substantial and immediate risk of harm.

16. In the Dialogue Groups we ran with young people, a number of concerns were raised about confidentiality. These included situations where personal information had been shared between agencies without notifying them; private information being discussed in front of family members at meetings and certain information remaining on their case notes without their permission which they felt to be unacceptable. Whilst recognising the need for information being shared in situations where they might be at risk, there was a clear view that a Named Person should be trustworthy and should not share personal information unless it was absolutely necessary. We note that concerns have also been raised by a number of agencies regarding the information sharing duty going further than current guidance, tipping the balance towards sharing information in many situations rather than respecting young people’s right to privacy. We would not support this situation.

17. The Scottish Youth Parliament recommends that the Bill should include provision for children and young people to have a say in who their Named Person is, and request a change if their working relationship has broken down.

18. When asked about what personal qualities their Named Person should have, participants in Dialogue Groups emphasised that they should be trustworthy, a strong advocate for their rights and interests and that would not judge them on their past. There was a desire from young people to have a say in who their Named Person should be. There was also support for a right for young people to be able to request a different Named Person if their working relationship has broken down. Some participants felt that other professionals, such as a youth worker or a social worker, may be a better option as a Named Person for certain young people.

19. Additionally, given the information-sharing duties of a Named Person as proposed in the Bill, and the suggestion in ‘A Scotland for Children’ of a first point of contact for young people about their rights and wellbeing, the role appears to be more than a nominal administrative one. It would also appear to be consistent with children and young people’s right to have a say and have their views taken into account on all matters affecting them, that they should have the ability to influence the identity of their Named Person.

Other Aspects of the Bill

20. The Scottish Youth Parliament supports the provisions in the Bill in principle related to Children’s Services Planning, the Child’s Plan, Aftercare, Corporate Parenting and Support for Kinship Care.

21. Our consultation with young people on ‘A Scotland for Children’ saw majority support for the principle of joint working between public bodies (64%); a requirement for public bodies to publish reports on how children’s wellbeing is taken into account when delivering services (53%) and a single Child’s Plan for those who need it (77%). There was support, particularly in Dialogue Groups for raising the age of entitlement to aftercare support. In specific questions to young people who indicated they had experience of being in care or looked-after, there was support for defining corporate parenting in law, provision for kinship carers to be recognised as having the same rights and responsibilities as birth parents, a new Kinship Care Order and for matching adoptive children and families through Scotland’s Adoption Register.

A Bill for Young People?

22. A general observation on the Bill as a whole is that in the main is that, despite its name, for the most part it applies to under 18s. For instance, in section 75 (1), no definition of “young person” is provided. Consideration should be given to the extent the Bill can apply to young people aged 18 – 25. Examples of how this may be done could include extending the rights provisions of the Bill to them, or by including an entitlement to youth work opportunities in the Bill.

Shakti Women’s Aid

General

1. Our response to A Scotland for Children: A Consultation on the Children & Young People (Scotland) is informed and led by our knowledge and experience over 25 years of working directly with Black Minority Ethnic children and young people affected by domestic abuse, forced marriage, honour-based violence and other issues of gender-based abuse, issues which deny children and young people of numerous rights as outlined in the UNCRC.

2. We’re also responding as an affiliate and partner to Scottish Women’s Aid and fully support their consultation response, particularly recognising how comprehensively domestic abuse undermines the rights of young people. We, too, recommend a much stronger commitment to training all sectors to these issues and share Scottish Women’s Aid’s concerns around information sharing; domestic abuse and connected gender-based violence situations present real, dangerously complex situations for survivors that are easily exacerbated by indelicate or irresponsible handling of information.

3. We’re pleased the Scottish Government is, with this bill and consultation process, continuing to focus and debate on children’s rights.

Lost Opportunities

4. We’re disappointed however at the continued omission of a duty to give “due regard” to the UNCRC (now a Minister’s requirement to “keep under consideration”); this, and the loss of a specific dedicated bill for children’s services, stops short of the current potential of embedding UNCRC in Scots law. The wording of the Bill considering Minister’s and Public Bodies’ duties lacks clarity as to exact requirements, allowing room for interpretation, inconsistency and potential undermining of purpose.

Commitment to All Children & Young People

5. Any subsequent Act needs to fully to commit to all children and young people in Scotland, ensuring meaningful recourse under the law for denial of such rights, with clear steps for those affected to highlight rights’ infringements, and extended powers for the Children’s Commissioner to act on behalf of groups and individuals.

6. Reflecting the principles of the UNCRC, the Act itself and duties therein contained should also be made clear and accessible for young people. This should include providing information in all languages (including BSL and Easy Read materials) required by children in, and travelling to, Scotland.
7. “The Scottish Ministers must promote public awareness and understanding (including appropriate awareness and understanding among children) of the rights of children.”

8. There needs to be courage and a will to protect all young people’s rights to realise their wishes and voice their ideas and not be silenced by the wants of adults around them. While Shakti has a distinct advantage of working in an impartial space with both young people and adults from many ethnic and faith backgrounds and while supporting the whole person, we are not prescriptive. Other than provide information on rights, options and the law (or act where we are duty-bound to do so) we do not advise what anyone should do according to ‘faith’ or ‘culture’, both concepts being subjective. We believe, particularly in supporting recovery from abuse, in allowing each person to consider aspects of their identity including religious ones, where possible, in a manner of their choosing. Whilst we understand that faith can and has been used as an element of control by perpetrators, creating great anxiety and confusion for survivors (including those we have supported), we’re also sharply aware that ‘cultural’ or faith advice has been sought, by professionals, from adults in a young person’s family or community before, instead of, or with more seriousness than the young person themselves. This advice has then been used to ‘tailor’ services for those young people without considering their own relationship with their faith: basically assuming that young person’s ‘culture’. Note: such enquiries are not often asked, if ever in regard to young people who are white, who also have their own ‘culture’ and possibly faith.

The Central Importance of Training

9. Adults, particularly those making decisions for children and young people need to have knowledge of children’s rights under the UNCRC and issues that serve to deny these rights, in order to be able to ask the right questions when determining whether any action or policy is indeed “rights respecting”.

10. The major problem is lack of training: one example is the current lack of any requirement for Children’s Reporters to be trained in domestic abuse issues, which should be central in making any recommendations for children during court proceedings where abuse is a concern. It is still not common practice for a reporter to fully consider the impact of domestic abuse when presenting recommendations for child contact or custody. As well as our clients’ direct experience, supporting evidence of this includes Dr Kirsteen Mackay’s exploration of the treatment of views of children involved in contact disputes, reflecting a majority of reporters, being from a legal background, still do not require or have specialist training or relevant experience of working with children. The study goes on to show that despite 48% of children stating a wish for no contact, contact is routinely granted in a majority of cases; for a third of children in the study, the outcome did not resemble their wishes. (Also see Dr Gillian Macdonald’s “Domestic Violence & Private Family Court Proceedings: Promoting Child Welfare or Promoting Contact?”).
11. Training is key for all involved in keeping children safe, including those responsible for fostering and adoption, and named persons. Too many professionals likely to be either named person or called to assist named persons still possess little or no knowledge on domestic abuse, honour-related violence, FGM and other abuses of children’s rights especially black minority ethnic children and young people. This lack of knowledge can lead to inaction, apathy, panic or other inappropriate responses, presenting greater risks to those affected.

Article 6: Children and young people have a right to survive and develop and the Government should give as much help as is needed.

12. Lack of knowledge perpetuates varying levels of service and protection for different children and sustains misinformed culturally-relativist thinking of what is ‘appropriate’ for different communities, including issues of abuse. A recent example we have is of being asked by officers involved in a child protection case whether that instance of forced marriage of a minor may be ‘cultural’ and therefore not an issue for intervention. Examples persist despite updated grounds for referral under the Children’s Hearing (Scotland) Act 2011, the Forced Marriage (Protection & Jurisdiction)(Scotland) Act 2011 and all subsequent legal, statutory and multi-agency guidance.

Article 2: You have the right to protection against discrimination.

13. Specialist support services, playing a vital role for many children and young people, should be able to feel confident that contacting or assisting a named person where required and sharing information about a young person (also with, where practical, a regard to Article 16: Right to a private life) will not put that child or young person at further risk or alienate them from engaging with services.

The Named Person

“An individual does not fall within subsection (3) if the individual is a parent of the child or the young person.”

14. Where children or young people’s issues include Honour-based violence or domestic abuse involving extended family members, consideration needs be given as to whether any family members (not just a parent) as ‘named person’ is appropriate. To address risks to children where other community members are part of Honour abuse, or where adults seek to abuse their power as named person, there have to be effective methods of monitoring and clear, accessible ways children or young people can safely voice concerns with a ‘named person’ and have those concerns heard and acted upon.

Adoption Register

15. Any concerns regarding an adoption register focuses on our hope that ‘matching’ pays heed first to specific support needs of those children or young people. Those with experience of abuse, regardless of ethnicity or ‘culture’, should be matched with carers experienced in working with such children or at the very least with sufficient knowledge of the affects of abuse on children, rather than ethnicity automatically assumed as the most important shared element with suitable carers. Where the creation of an adoption register may seek to better safeguard young people’s details and ensure better monitoring of registered carers (so any bad practice is highlighted and avoided) we can understand the benefits of such a system.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Erin Sithibandith

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

Skills Development Scotland

Introduction

1. Skills Development Scotland (SDS) is Scotland’s skills body, focused on contributing to the delivery of the Scottish Government’s Economic and Skills Strategies. Our services are further shaped in response to the Scottish Government’s Career Information, Advice and Guidance (CIAG) Strategy and more recently, the Youth Employment Strategy. We set out our vision and future development and delivery plans in our Corporate Strategy (2012-15) and annual Operating Plan (2013-14). This submission provides an overview of our position in relation to the introduction of the Children and Young Peoples (Scotland) Bill.

Targeted Career Information, Advice and Guidance Support

2. SDS welcomes the overall aims of the Bill, particularly the recognition that young people need support at all ages and at different stages of development. We offer a universal Career Information Advice and Guidance and target resource at children and young people who need the most support. SDS services to children and young people are underpinned by the principles and values of Getting it Right for Every Child (GIRFEC).

Part 3 – Children Services Planning

3. Provisions in Part 3, which require local authorities and health boards to develop joint children’s services plans every three years and to report on progress every year, will have a positive impact on areas identified by the Doran Review as requiring improvement for more effective post 16 transitions e.g. stronger partnership working, improved transitions between children and adult services. SDS is supportive of extending the existing range of bodies that have a duty to co-operate within the new children’s services plan as it will mean services provided specifically for children and young people must be planned with the aim of being integrated and represent an efficient use of resources.

Part 4 – Named Person Service

4. SDS is supportive of the proposal for every person under 18 years of age in Scotland to have a ‘named person’ as this will ensure young people get access to the right services at the right time. For children of school age and over, the ‘named person’ duty lies with the local authority. As there is no recommendation in the Bill as to who within a local authority might perform the ‘named person’ role for those who either leave school at 16 who are in secure accommodation or attending an independent school, SDS would welcome clarification of this point. This cohort will include very vulnerable young people who are at a high risk of not moving into education, employment or training and who require targeted support from SDS advisers and other partners. SDS therefore agrees that all young people participating in post-16 learning, training or work should have access to a “named person”.

Part 5 – Child’s Plan

5. SDS is supportive of the provision for a child’s plan to be developed for an individual child if they have a “wellbeing need” that requires a targeted intervention. The duty to prepare the child’s plan lies with the responsible authority and SDS would welcome the opportunity to feed into a young person’s plan where career development planning is required.

6. Child’s plans will importantly cover those leaving school and those who have left school and have a well being need. As mentioned above, SDS’s CIAG service model ensures those at risk of not making a successful post school transition receive targeted one to one support. This specific group of young people are identified in partnership with the school and support is offered to help this group plan their career path, gain career management skills and access opportunities available to them. It is therefore important that career development planning compliments other plans being developed for young people who require targeted interventions.

7. Sections 50-59 create a statutory definition of ‘corporate parenting’ and define the requirements of ‘corporate parenting’ duties for organisations, such as SDS.

8. SDS welcomes collaboration between ‘corporate parents’ where they consider that doing so would safeguard or promote the wellbeing of children or young people. The ‘corporate parenting’ provision would provide SDS with a legislative framework within which to continue to actively contribute to relevant activity in relation to children and young people and work collaboratively with local authorities, colleges, training providers and other strategic partners to support improved learning and employment outcomes for this group.

9. The specific provisions in relation to ‘corporate parenting’ in the Bill are compatible with SDS’s aims and objectives and will be helpful in achieving better outcomes for this group of young people. Arrangements for the preparation of a ‘corporate parenting plan’ is also compatible in relation to SDS’s annual planning process which has a specific focus on improving outcomes for vulnerable groups.

Conclusion

10. SDS continues to be keen to work collaboratively with partners to support the wellbeing of young people and achieve better learning and employment outcomes for the most vulnerable groups of young people. The specific provisions outlined above will provide a framework for SDS to collaborate more effectively in joint planning with partners, which will enable SDS to deliver its services more effectively and target those who need the most support.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Diane Smith

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

1. I'm writing to express my opinion regarding the Children and Young People Bill under consideration for the people of Scotland.

2. While this plan claims to ensure the rights of children and improve support services for youth, the plan seems extremely intrusive and onerous. Simply put, it is downright big-brother-ish.

3. How is a plan to assign every single child a special worker to oversee their home life, education, and all other aspects of the child's world actually implemented in a free society, and after the reformation and Age of Enlightenment? Are we now to return to the Dark Ages, the Inquisitions, or perhaps a Nazi style world wherein the government thinks it owns the children rather than the natural parents that the children were born to?

4. As a teacher, former journalist, and parent living in the United States of America, I am very concerned for the parents and children, for the citizens of Scotland. If these are the kinds of laws under consideration there, I would warn anyone I know never to visit, let alone live in Scotland or anywhere in the UK.

5. I am sorry if my words are offensive, but this is an offensive subject. If my country were taking on such a law, I would be terrified. Not because I have anything to fear, since I am not a criminal, but because this is such an over reach of power, it is repulsive to any lover of freedom and liberty and would mean the end of living in a free society, in my opinion.

6. May God help you with your decision regarding this issue.

SUMMARY

MISCONCEPTIONS AND MYTHS

- It is incorrect to assert that "the UN Convention was not drafted or worded to create directly enforceable legal rights in the domestic legal system"
- The claim that “Only a tiny number of countries—three or four at most—have incorporated the convention into their law” is misleading
- Beware of unfounded spectres and fears
  - The UN Convention is a sophisticated document, with the place of parents and child’s own evolving capacity lying at its core
  - Incorporation would not reduce existing children’s rights, like the paramountcy of the child’s welfare
  - Incorporation would not require changes on matters like the age of marriage or consent to sexual activity
- Incorporation would not be alien to the Scottish legal culture
- Reserved matters do not pose an insurmountable obstacle to incorporation

REASONS TO INCORPORATE

- Incorporation would signal that child-specific human rights are taken seriously in Scotland
- Child-specific rights would become enforceable in Scotland
- Incorporation would get closer to achieving the goal of making Scotland “the best place in the world to grow up in”

* Professor of Child and Family Law, Stirling Law School, University of Stirling, Scotland, (elaine.sutherland@stir.ac.uk) and Professor of Law, Lewis and Clark Law School, Portland, Oregon (es@lclark.edu).

I have taught child and family law for over thirty years in Scotland, at the Universities of Edinburgh, Glasgow and Stirling, and abroad and am the author of numerous scholarly articles and books on the subject. I respond regularly to consultations on law reform and social policy by the Scottish Parliament, the Scottish Government and other relevant bodies and have served on the Family Law Committee of the Law Society of Scotland for many years.
Background

1. In considering the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, one of the many important issues being addressed by the Education and Culture Committee of the Scottish Parliament is whether the legislation should incorporate the United Nations Convention on the Right of the Child (the UN Convention) into the law of Scotland.

2. In my written submissions made during the consultation process on the draft Bill, I argued in favour of incorporation¹ and this supplementary evidence relates to that topic only. Since I am currently out of the country, it was not possible for me to give oral evidence to the Committee, but it has become apparent that the issue of incorporation is a matter on which the Committee has received conflicting evidence. My concern is that misconceptions and myths have emerged in the course of the Committee’s deliberations and that the Minister for Children and Young People appears to be accepting some of them as accurate.² This written submission addresses them, before reiterating the reasons why much of the UN Convention should be incorporated into Scottish law. It is my hope that my evidence will be of assistance to the Committee.

3. The Committee has received evidence from a wide variety of sources, but some of that evidence is inaccurate or misleading and is challenged here.

   • It is incorrect to assert that “the UN Convention was not drafted or worded to create directly enforceable legal rights in the domestic legal system”

4. In his oral evidence to the Committee, my colleague, Professor Kenneth Norrie, asserted that, “the UN Convention was not drafted or worded to create directly enforceable legal rights in the domestic legal system”³ and his written evidence contains a similar statement.⁴

5. That is simply not true in respect of much of the Convention. The dedicated experts from almost all nations who, at the behest of the United Nations, devoted ten years to drafting the UN Convention had every intention that their work would lead to substantive rights for children and young people around the world. How these rights are implemented in individual countries is a matter for each country, of course, but the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child (UN Committee), the body that monitors compliance with the UN Convention, made clear its unequivocal support for incorporation of the Convention’s key provisions when it noted:

6. The UN Committee has repeatedly called on the United Kingdom to incorporate the UN Convention into domestic law.

7. Two points are worth noting in this context. First, it is not suggested that every article of the Convention should be incorporated. Parts of the Convention relate to administrative and housekeeping matters and it is simply not necessary to incorporate them. Those articles aside, other provisions may not be appropriate for incorporation. Then there is the issue of Convention rights dealing with matters reserved to Westminster which is addressed separately (see page 7, below). The Human Rights Act 1998 did not incorporate every article of the European Convention on Human Rights into the law in the various parts of the United Kingdom. Yet the 1998 Act has had an enormous impact in promoting human rights in Scotland and experience of incorporating the European Convention provides something of a model for how we might move forward on incorporating the UN Convention.

8. Secondly, drafting a statute incorporating the UN Convention would require considered reflection, something from which the Human Rights Act 1998 benefitted. It is my belief that there is a wealth of talent in Scotland more than able to undertake the task.

- The claim that “Only a tiny number of countries—three or four at most—have incorporated the convention into their law” is misleading.

9. In his oral evidence to the Committee, Professor Norrie asserted that “only a tiny number of countries—three or four at most—have incorporated the convention into their law.”

10. That statement is misleading, not only in terms of number, but, rather more significantly, because it fails to take account of the very different mechanisms countries employ in implementing treaty obligations. In 2007, the UNICEF Innocenti Research Centre reported that two-thirds of countries of the 52 in its study, chosen for geographic distribution, had incorporated the Convention into domestic law.\textsuperscript{9} More recent research by a number of respected academics, published by UNICEF in 2012, examined 12 countries and found that the UN Convention had been formally incorporated into the law in three of them: Belgium, Norway, Spain.\textsuperscript{10}

11. The 2007 study gives greater insight into what is really happening. In some 22 of the 52 countries it examined,\textsuperscript{11} treaty obligations are not only incorporated into national law automatically, they take precedence over it. Thus, formal incorporation is unnecessary. In a further 10 countries,\textsuperscript{12} treaty obligations form part of domestic law, but do not prevail over it. In addition, some countries, like South Africa, have incorporated parts of the Convention into the domestic constitution.

12. So much for the numbers game. Perhaps the real point is made in the 2012 UNICEF study which found:

CRC incorporation in and of itself is significant. The very process of incorporation raises awareness of children’s rights and the CRC in government and civil society. In countries where there has been incorporation, interviewees felt that children were more likely to be perceived as rights holders and that there was a culture of respect for children’s rights. Whilst incorporation provided opportunities for strategic litigation given that the CRC was part of the domestic legal system, its main value was thought to be in the strong message it conveyed about the status of children and children’s rights, and the knock-on effects for implementation of children’s rights principles into domestic law and policy.\textsuperscript{13}

13. Even if only three or four countries had incorporated the UN Convention into domestic law – and as has been demonstrated that is not the case – it would be no reason for Scotland to hang back. The real question is whether we want the country to be a leader or a follower in terms of respecting children’ rights. Given the benefits of incorporation, it is submitted that Scotland should be grasping the opportunity to incorporate with both hands.

• Beware of unfounded spectres and fears

14. In his written evidence to the Committee, Professor Norrie highlighted a number of dire and unintended consequences that he claimed would result from incorporation of the UN Convention into Scottish law and he cited the examples of the downgrading of the place of the welfare of the child and of the raising of the age of marriage and consent to sexual activity.\textsuperscript{14} This introduces spectres and fears that, in reality, are unfounded.

15. The UN Convention is a sophisticated document. It does not simply lay out a list of human rights for children. Rather, it sets them in the context of an appreciation of the importance of parents and other caregivers in guiding children and is permeated by the concept of the “evolving capacity” of the child or young person.\textsuperscript{15} Grasping the significance and nature of this evolving capacity is crucial to understanding the whole structure and import of the Convention.

16. It is stating the obvious, perhaps, to note that the term “children and young people” covers a wide range of individuals with very different needs and capabilities. In response to that, the Convention is premised on the notion that the child’s capacity to exercise rights responsibly will develop over time. By recognising the child as a rights-holder from birth, the Convention allows for that process of development to begin, with the protective role of parents being greatest in respect of young children and the young person’s own capacity expanding with age. In short, the Convention provides for rights that operate differently in different contexts.

17. The suggestion that incorporating the Convention would downgrade welfare because it makes it “a primary consideration”, when Scots law accords it the status of “the paramount consideration”, is unfounded. Any difference between the two terms is the sort of things with which academics like to amuse ourselves, but any practical difference is minimal.\textsuperscript{16} In any event, where domestic law accords the child more rights than the Convention, then these greater rights prevail, something made perfectly clear in the UN Convention itself when it provides, in article 41, that: “Nothing in the present Convention shall affect any provisions which are more conductive to the realization of the rights of the child and which may be contained in:

(a) The law of the State Party; or \textsuperscript{14} Written Evidence of Professor Kenneth McK Norrie to the Education and Culture Committee, 3 August 2013, above, para 5(iv).

\textsuperscript{15} See, for example, article 5 which provides: “States Parties shall respect the responsibilities, rights and duties of parents or, where applicable, the members of the extended family or community as provided for by local custom, legal guardians or other persons legally responsible for the child, to provide, in a manner consistent with the evolving capacities of the child, appropriate direction and guidance in the exercise by the child of the rights recognized in the present Convention.”

\textsuperscript{16} Take, for example, the case of divorce. There is ample evidence that parental divorce can have an adverse impact on children. It could be argued that, if the welfare of the child is accorded “paramount” status, then parents of children under 18 would simply not be permitted to divorce. If the child’s welfare is only a “primary” consideration, then the interests of others, like parents wishing to divorce, would also carry weight, rendering it more likely that divorce would be available to them. Yet, as we know, the paramountcy of welfare in Scottish law has not precluded parental divorce.
18. It is no part of the scheme under the UN Convention to set fixed age limits on marriage or sexual consent. Nor does the UN Committee seek to dictate to countries what age limits should be set. When commenting on the progress made in implementing the Convention in the United Kingdom (and, thereby, Scotland), the Committee has never raised concern over the age of marriage or sexual consent.

19. Certainly, the Committee sometimes offers general guidance to all states in its General Comments. However, even there, it couches its guidance in diplomatic, advisory language. Thus, for example, when commenting on the age of criminal responsibility, it noted the wide range of ages of criminal responsibility adopted in different states, “from a very low level of age 7 or 8 to the commendably high level of 14 or 16”.

- Incorporation would not be alien to the Scottish legal culture

20. The idea, again advanced by Professor Norrie, that incorporation would be alien to the Scottish legal culture is inaccurate. Scots law has its roots in the civilian legal systems of Europe. Common law has been overlaid on these roots, with the result that Scotland is one of a small number of mixed jurisdictions, drawing on the traditions of both legal families. The Scottish judiciary has long experience of interpreting statutory and non-statutory concepts. So, for example, a whole body of case law has developed interpreting the subtle concept “the welfare of the child”. Similarly, the courts have long experience of addressing the, sometimes conflicting, rights of different stakeholders. I have no doubt that the Scottish legal system is operated by individuals with the talents necessary to deal with the rights under the UN Convention.

21. While the UN Convention embodies some rights that are fairly straightforward, others are more aspirational. The fundamental point to bear in mind, however, is that it is not anticipated that every article of the Convention would be incorporated and it will be for those drafting the statute to distinguish the solid from the aspirations and to find the appropriate means of incorporation. Even in the context of more aspirational rights, there is abundant guidance on how the right should be implemented in the form of reports from the United Nations Committee.

17 The definition of “child” aside, the only place where a fixed age limits appears in the context of the UN Convention is in relation child soldiers. Article 38(2) of the Convention requires states to “take all feasible measures to ensure” that persons under the age of 15 do not take direct part in hostilities. Later, an Optional Protocol, ratified by the United Kingdom in 2003, was added to the Convention prohibiting compulsory recruitment of persons under the age of 18 into the armed forces and urging states to raise the age for voluntary recruitment: Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Involvement of Children in Armed Conflict (2000), General Assembly resolution 54/263. Arguably, the special case of child soldiers justifies a more directive approach.

on the Rights of the Child, including its highly-informative General Comments.\textsuperscript{21} A Scottish court would not be bound by these sources, of course, but it could use them in appropriate cases just as it used other resources, like reports from the Scottish Law Commission and academic texts.

- Reserved matters do not pose an insurmountable obstacle to incorporation

22. As a matter of principle, it would be highly desirable for the UN Convention to be incorporated into all of the legal systems across the United Kingdom. Given the current constitutional framework, there would be practical benefits. That, however, is unlikely to happen in the foreseeable future, but inaction by Westminster is no reason for the Scottish Parliament to do nothing.

23. The issue of reserved matters must be addressed, of course, and any incorporating statute would have to exclude matters reserved to the Westminster Parliament (at least for the time being). Again, this is not an insurmountable obstacle to the Scottish Parliament incorporating such parts of the UN Convention into Scottish law as are within its competence.

REASONS TO INCORPORATE

- Incorporation would signal that child-specific human rights are taken seriously in Scotland

24. Children in Scotland already have rights under the European Convention on Human Rights so, in that sense, the first step has been taken to acknowledge them as rights-holders. It is important to remember, however, that the European Convention is primarily adult-focused and was drafted at a time when the concept of children’s rights was barely recognised. The UN Convention, in contrast, is child-centred, its primary focus being the rights of children.

25. Incorporating the UN Convention into Scots law would acknowledge that the child-specific human rights of children and young people are as deserving of recognition as are the human rights available to all under the European Convention. It would amount to taking children’s rights seriously – showing that, in Scotland, their rights have the full force of the law and are considered in all contexts.

- Child-specific rights would become enforceable in Scotland

26. Having rights is something of an empty concept if one cannot enforce them. With the coming into force of the Human Rights Act 1998, the substantive rights set out in Section I of the European Convention, along with the Protocols which have been ratified by the United Kingdom,\textsuperscript{22} became part of the domestic law of the various parts of the country.\textsuperscript{23} Proposed legislation is now subject to pre-scrutiny to determine its compatibility with the Convention; the courts may issue a “declaration of incompatibility” in respect of Westminster legislation,\textsuperscript{24} while Acts of the Scottish Parliament will be declared unlawful if they are inconsistent with the provisions of the Convention;\textsuperscript{25} and acts of public authorities may be challenged and declared unlawful where they violate the Convention.\textsuperscript{26} In addition, wherever possible, all legislation must be read so as to be compatible with the European Convention\textsuperscript{27} and Convention rights must be interpreted with full regard to the interpretation of the European organs, particularly the European Court of Human Rights.\textsuperscript{28}

27. The UN Convention, in contrast, has a lesser status. It is no more than a treaty obligation and, as such, every effort is made to honour the obligations under it. So, for example, where a statute is ambiguous, it will be interpreted in a way that will lead to compliance with the UN Convention.\textsuperscript{29} However, where a provision of Scottish law is clear, the fact that it is unambiguously inconsistent with the UN Convention means that the statute, rather than the Convention, will prevail.\textsuperscript{30} There is no pre-scrutiny of proposed legislation to check whether it complies with the UN Convention and acts of public authorities are not open to challenge simply because they violate it.

28. By incorporating the UN Convention into Scottish law, the child-specific rights it contains would become enforceable through a process that is as accessible and available as is the process for enforcing rights under the European Convention. This becomes particularly important when one remembers that a party who is unhappy with a domestic court’s decision on European Convention rights can, ultimately, take the case to the European Court of Human Rights. A party who is dissatisfied with the decision of a Scottish court on a matter governed by the UN Convention has no such “last resort” since there is no Court of the Rights of the Child.\textsuperscript{31}

- Incorporation would get closer to achieving the goal of making Scotland “the best place in the world to grow up in”

29. Referring to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, the Minister for Children and Young People expressed the view that, “With the bill, we have set out our ambition to make Scotland the best place in the world to grow up in.”\[^{32}\] In many respects much fine work has already been done in Scotland in implementing the obligations under the UN Convention. So, for example, children’s participation rights are facilitated at various levels of government\[^{33}\] and legislation requires that children’s views are heard when decisions affecting them are taken by courts and tribunals in both the “private law” and “public law” spheres.\[^{34}\] Thus, incorporating the UN Convention would not effect a sea-change in the country but, rather, would be the continuation of a process already begun.

30. Yet the Minister’s goal remains just that: a goal. There is much room for improvement in terms of respecting children’s rights. So, for example, there remains concern over both the hearing of children’s views and their impact on outcomes in the court setting\[^{35}\] and the defence of “justifiable assault”, available to parents who hit their children (within the permitted parameters),\[^{36}\] is a continuing embarrassment on the world stage.

31. By incorporating the UN Convention into Scottish law, Scotland would join that band of world-leaders that have already done so, whether by specific legislation or otherwise. Certainly, Scotland will not become “the best place in the world to grow up in” as long as we lag behind the more proactive nations of the world.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Connie Threlkeld

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

Introduction

1. Together welcomes the opportunity to respond to this Stage 1 Call for Evidence on the Children & Young People (Scotland) Bill. This response specifically focuses on the extent to which the provisions in the Bill will succeed in achieving the Scottish Government’s policy aim of ‘making rights real’ for children and young people. In producing this response, Together has consulted widely with its membership through seminars, meetings and ongoing face-to-face consultation.

2. Together recognises that the Bill provides a crucial opportunity to ensure that that the principles of the UNCRC become a reality for all children and young people in Scotland. We warmly welcome the policy intentions behind the Bill and particularly endorse the intention to ‘ensure children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services by placing new duties on Scottish Ministers and the public sector’. However, Together is disappointed that the Bill does not provide the strong duties on Ministers and public bodies needed to fulfil this policy intention. Together’s key messages to the Education & Culture Committee are that:

- The provisions around children's rights in Part 1-3 of the Bill fall short of providing the overarching child rights framework needed to fulfil the Scottish Government's policy intentions.

- Together urges the Education Committee to consider the full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law. Incorporation is the best way for the Scottish Government to realise its ambition to make Scotland ‘the best place to grow up’.

- Together urges the Education Committee to consider the need for a child rights impact assessment (CRIA) to be undertaken on the Bill. Some provisions included in the Bill may actually violate children's rights (particularly around information sharing) and be contrary to the Scottish Government's intentions. A CRIA would ensure there is an informed and systematic approach to considering children's rights across the Bill.

Incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law

3. Together is clear that the Scottish Government’s policy intentions would be best realised through the full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots Law. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child has twice recommended that the

2 Para. 2 Scottish Government (2013) Children & Young People (Scotland) Bill Policy Memorandum
UK Government takes measures to bring its legislation in line with the UNCRC. Incorporation would provide the overarching legislative framework that is needed. It provides strong, clear and robust duties for Ministers and public bodies that systematically embed children's rights into policy-making and service delivery. It brings about comprehensive accountability mechanisms including legal redress for children. Full incorporation would embed children's rights into the planning, implementation and monitoring of all policies and services, providing the legislative and culture change needed to truly 'make rights real' to children.

4. Incorporation would create a culture of respect for children and their rights. An important consequence of incorporation would be the culture it would help to create. It would provide a strong signal from the Scottish Government that all levels of government - and society at large - must take the UNCRC seriously. A recent UNICEF UK study revealed that incorporation of the UNCRC not only influences the development and implementation of legislation, but is also crucial in fostering a children's rights culture. The study concludes that incorporation 'increases the likelihood that children are perceived as rights holders, and over time generates a culture of respect for children’s rights.' It showed that incorporation gave politicians, public officials and non-governmental organisations who wanted to advance the cause of children’s rights a 'hook' or 'leverage' that was particularly influential when it came to ensuring integration of the principles of the UNCRC in domestic law and policy.

5. The Scottish Government themselves recognise the fundamental role of legislation in inspiring a step-change in Scotland's ambition for its children, stating in the Policy Memorandum of the Bill that: 'While there is no one policy or initiative that can bring about the kind of change required, there is a fundamental role for legislation: to accelerate the progress that has already been made and to ensure a consistent structure within which services operate; [...] and to inspire renewed debate and ambition for what Scotland’s children and young people can expect.'

6. An example of this in practice is the development of equality law in Scotland and across the UK. This has effected real cultural change through the introduction of legal liability for public bodies, private bodies and individuals. Inclusion, equality of opportunity and anti-discrimination are now central principles of government policy and have been welcomed by Scotland at large. The Welsh Government reflects that the duty placed on Ministers to have 'due regard' to the UNCRC has already resulted in a culture change and is having positive outcomes for children. Since the introduction of the duty in 2012, there has been more commonplace participation of children in developing policy across the Welsh Government, and a shift in the way Ministers consider children’s rights alongside budgets.\textsuperscript{7}

7. The gradual reform of legislation in Scotland in different areas has led to inconsistent implementation of the UNCRC across local and national government and across a range of public bodies. In turn, this has led to uneven and inconsistent outcomes for different groups of children. Examples of this include children with a disability being disproportionately affected by funding cuts within local authorities and inconsistent access to advocacy for looked after children.\textsuperscript{8}

8. Support for incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law continues to be widespread. This was reflected in responses to the Rights of Children and Young People Bill consultation in December 2011.\textsuperscript{9} Despite there being no question in the consultation paper around the incorporation of the UNCRC into domestic law, 40% of all responses from children’s organisations and 25% of all responses from public bodies (including several local authorities and NHS Boards) voiced their support for the full incorporation of the UNCRC into law. Only 6% of children’s organisations and 4% of public bodies specifically expressed an opinion against full incorporation.\textsuperscript{10} 86% of children taking part in the Children’s Parliament’s consultation on the Bill said that the UNCRC should ‘be like a law that people have to obey’.\textsuperscript{11}

9. Very many countries have either directly incorporated the UNCRC or given it a prominent place in their domestic law. This includes European countries such as Belgium, France, Norway and Spain through to those more far afield such as Japan and Argentina.\textsuperscript{12} Many other countries that have ratified the UNCRC do not need to incorporate it into domestic law as their international treaty obligations automatically form part of their domestic law or are otherwise applicable and can be invoked in domestic courts. This is not the case in Scotland.

10. Incorporation is possible in Scotland. A legal opinion from Aidan O’Neill QC commissioned by UNICEF UK is clear that it is within the powers of the Scottish Government and Scottish Parliament to directly and fully incorporate the UNCRC into Scots law in relation to devolved issues.\textsuperscript{13}

11. Together agrees with the Scottish Government that legislation is needed to ensure the UNCRC influences future legislation, policy and practice and welcomes the recognition that the articles of the UNCRC ‘form a framework against which to evaluate legislation, policy and decision-making structures’. Together also welcomes the intention to place a duty on Ministers to recognise their responsibility to implement the UNCRC.

12. An essential mechanism needed to achieve these policy intentions is the routine use of child rights impact assessments (CRIA). The Welsh Government reports that the Welsh Measure introduced in 2012 has had a positive impact on children's rights across policy, legislation and practice and that CRIAs are now used to systematically consider the UNCRC. CRIAs have been routinely conducted on policy and legislation including the Climate Change Commission, Housing White Paper and End Violence and Domestic Abuse Against Women White Paper. As a result, more guidance documents are making reference to the UNCRC and influencing how public bodies comply with the guidance issued. The Welsh Government believes that children, young people and their families will soon see the positive impact this is making, as organisations and those working with and for children become more aware of the UNCRC and its implications in their work. In order to ensure the UNCRC influences future legislation, policy and practice, the routine use of Child Rights Impact Assessments to inform government decision-making must be included on the face of the Bill.

13. The duty on Ministers to ‘keep under consideration’ lacks transparency and provides no mechanism through which Ministers are accountable in their decision-making. Ministers would be under no obligation to demonstrate how they have fulfilled the duty, nor outline how they assess if they ‘consider it appropriate’ to take steps to further the UNCRC. The Scottish Government has disregarded responses from NGOs, academics and public bodies to the Bill consultation in which they called for a stronger duty on Ministers and one that is extended to include public bodies. Incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law would place strong, meaningful duties on Ministers and public bodies that would systematically embed the UNCRC into policy and practice.

14. Together welcomes the intention to promote a greater understanding of children's rights and recognises the impact the duty on Ministers could have if properly implemented. Together welcomes the Scottish Government's assertion that this duty is ‘providing a mechanism in domestic law’\textsuperscript{18} to ensure future governments continue to recognise what is already an existing international obligation. If this duty is to achieve its policy intention, it must be included within a stronger, overarching child rights framework. Together recommends that the Education Committee considers placing an implementation scheme on the face of the Bill that provides a strategic and comprehensive approach to executing and resourcing all duties on Ministers and public bodies in relation to the rights of children.

15. Together welcomes the duty on Scottish Ministers to report to the Scottish Parliament every three years. It is questionable whether placing a duty on public bodies to report without an accompanying implementation duty will make any tangible difference. A public body would be able to fulfil this duty by reporting that no steps were taken to further its responsibility of the UNCRC requirements. This would make no difference to the lives of children and is a very long way from the Scottish Government’s policy intention. To make reporting duties meaningful, they must be matched by strong, clear and robust children’s rights duties as detailed above. Incorporation of the UNCRC would embed clear and robust measures of accountability and provide the transparency needed to ensure key bodies understand the impact their work is having on protecting and promoting children’s rights.

Part 2 - Commissioner for Children & Young People

16. Together welcomes the Bill’s proposed extension to the Commissioner’s powers. This will serve as a useful and important tool to examine alleged violations of children’s rights and must be resourced adequately. It will not address all instances where children may wish to seek redress and should not be viewed as a substitute for child-friendly redress mechanisms across public bodies and services. In order to fully meet the intention of ‘empowering children to exercise their rights’\textsuperscript{19} the UNCRC must be incorporated into Scots law. The proposed extension to the Commissioner’s powers is welcomed. Incorporation of the UNCRC would complement this non-legal means of redress for children by providing a means of legal redress when obligations under the UNCRC are not met and progress cannot be made through other means.

Part 3 - Children’s Services Planning

17. Together welcomes the duties on public bodies to prepare, review, implement and report on children’s services plans. However, there is a disjoint between the provisions in Part 1 around children’s rights and those in Part 3 around children’s wellbeing. To successfully realise the policy intention of ensuring ‘children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services’\textsuperscript{20} there needs to be an overarching framework that explicitly embeds the UNCRC into the planning, implementation and monitoring of children’s services. This would ensure services are provided in a way that best safeguards, support and promotes both the UNCRC requirements and the wellbeing of children. Incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law would provide an overarching legislative child rights framework that embeds the UNCRC into the planning, implementation and monitoring of children's services.

Part 4 - Provision of Named Person

18. The Bill proposes a new information sharing duty for public bodies and service providers which would introduce a radical change in the existing information sharing provisions. It would involve significantly lowering current accepted information sharing thresholds and broadening the grounds for such information sharing to concerns in all areas of a child’s wellbeing. The Scottish Government has not consulted on this new duty. If the current proposals for information sharing are implemented in legislation, professionals will be likely to share more information than is necessary and proportionate and important information will be lost amongst large quantities of information being shared. There is also a risk that children will be less likely to engage fully with confidential services which could in turn put vulnerable children at risk. Any proposals around information sharing must take consideration of the best interests of the child, consideration of the child’s views and involve the child’s consent. The current proposals do not offer a balance between children's rights and the need to share information.

Child Rights Impact Assessment

19. Together has already written to the Convenor to urge the Education & Culture Committee to consider the need for a Child Rights Impact Assessment (CRIA) to be undertaken on the Children & Young People (Scotland) Bill to inform the Committee's gathering of evidence at Stage 1. Such an impact assessment would provide a valuable tool to support the scrutiny of evidence presented to the Committee at Stage 1 and ensure that there is an informed and uniform approach to considering children's rights across the entire Bill. The measures already taken to assess the impact of the Bill on children are welcome and provide a solid foundation from which a CRIA can be started. However, they do not currently equate to a full CRIA and do not systematically consider children's rights across the entire Bill. Both the Privacy Impact Assessment and human rights considerations included in the Policy Memorandum are out-of-date and there has been no systematic analysis of the Bill's provisions against the rights enshrined in the UNCRC. Unless a full child rights impacts assessment is undertaken on the Bill, there is a real danger that its provisions could bring a patchy and inconsistent approach to considering children’s rights across government, resulting in some violations of children’s rights being embedded in legislation.

About Together

20. Together (Scottish Alliance for Children’s Rights) is an alliance of children's charities that works to improve the awareness, understanding and implementation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) in Scotland. We have 232 members including large international and national non-governmental organisations (NGOs) such as UNICEF UK, Save the Children, Barnardo's and CHILDREN 1st through to volunteer-led playgroups and after school clubs. Our activities include:

- Collating an annual State of Children’s Rights report to set out the progress made to implement the UNCRC in Scotland.

- Working in partnership with the Scottish Government and Scotland's Commissioner for Children and Young People (SCCYP) on the Scottish Children's Rights Implementation Monitoring Group to develop a common understanding on progressing the UNCRC.

- Submitting the NGO alternative report to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child to provide an independent NGO perspective on the extent to which Scotland is meeting its UNCRC obligations.

Together (Scottish Alliance for Children’s Rights)

26 July 2013
Overview

1. UNICEF UK advocates for the protection and promotion of children’s rights. UNICEF has a specific role under the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) to give advice and assistance to States Parties in implementing children’s rights. This submission concentrates primarily on Parts 1 and 2 of the Bill (the rights measures and the Children’s Commissioner); however, we recognise that there are significant (and potentially negative) rights implications for children within other provisions in the Bill, particularly around new proposals for information sharing.

2. UNICEF UK welcomes the leadership shown by successive governments in Scotland in implementing the UNCRC, and commends the intention of the current government to make rights a reality for children. We welcome the focus the rights measures – when taken together – will give to children’s rights in Scotland, but are disappointed they do not amount to a stronger imperative on Ministers and public authorities to respect and protect children’s rights.

3. The measures to implement the UNCRC in the Bill fall significantly short of incorporation, neither enshrining the rights in the UNCRC into Scots law nor providing any new avenues of legal redress for children. UNICEF UK research (presented at an event in the Scottish Parliament earlier this year) shows that the strongest formulation of children’s rights and the most powerful force for implementation within a nation comes through the direct incorporation of the UNCRC into domestic law. This approach is the most effective and immediate way of achieving the sustained cultural change\(^1\) that will put “children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services and [ensure] their rights are respected across the public sector”.\(^2\) As such, we would like to see a far more ambitious approach from Scottish Government in its legislative implementation of the UNCRC.

4. With this in mind, we urge the Committee to consider the following overarching issues in its examination and analysis of the Bill:

- Perhaps as a result of the amalgamation of two Bills into one, the Bill fails to create a consistent children’s rights framework for Scotland, within which both government decision-making and local service delivery will sit. This cultural and legal disconnect must be addressed through amendments to the Bill (with a particular focus on Parts 1 and 3, among others) but also through a review of existing legislation to ensure a joined-up approach to legislation, policy and services affecting children.

\(^2\) Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Policy Memorandum, paragraph 2
• Stronger duties on those whose decisions and actions affect children – including both Ministers and public authorities – are necessary to give fuller effect to the UNCRC.

• Mechanisms to ensure transparency and achieve the systematic consideration of children’s rights (such as routine child rights impact assessment and an implementation scheme) are missing from the face of the Bill – their absence will compromise the effective implementation of the proposed duties.

• Scottish Government must set out its longer-term vision for children’s rights in Scotland and the steps it proposes to take to achieve this.

Incorporation of the UN Convention of the Rights of the Child

5. UNICEF UK’s experience and research shows legislative steps are essential to embed the UNCRC within legislation, policy, practice and attitudes towards children. The direct incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law is UNICEF UK’s preferred model and would, with immediate effect, make the principles and provisions of the UNCRC a reality for children in Scotland. This would place duties on public authorities to respect and protect children’s rights, and allow children to challenge violations of their rights in the courts. In essence, it would serve to build a sustainable culture of children’s rights, and enable children to be secure in the enjoyment of their rights.

6. We recognise that it is the current government’s policy to take a step-by-step approach to implementing the UNCRC, and that Ministers ‘are not of the view that wholesale incorporation...represents the best way [forward]...’. Yet this approach has led to inconsistency in the way the UNCRC is implemented across Scotland, and the reality that many children remain unable to realise the full extent of their rights, or to seek appropriate help when those rights are violated. Direct incorporation of the UNCRC would enable gaps in the coverage of current legislation affecting children’s rights to be closed and would embed the overarching principles of the UNCRC (non-discrimination in the application of rights; the best interests of the child; the right to life, survival and development; and the right to express views and be heard) into Scots law for all children.

7. Our comparative research in 2012 found that incorporation is, in and of itself, significant in raising the status of children within society. Certain countries (including Norway, Belgium and Spain) have already incorporated the UNCRC, and there is strong evidence that this has given new life to and a positive outlook on the implementation of children’s rights. A renewed focus and commitment is also evident in Wales as a result of the Rights of Children and Young Persons Measure 2011 (which places a due regard duty on Welsh Ministers in the exercise of all their functions). Although the Measure falls short of incorporation, it clearly demonstrates the value of child rights legislation in achieving the systematic consideration of children’s rights.

3 Transposing the UNCRC into Scots law in the same way that the European Convention on Human Rights was transposed into UK law through the Human Rights Act 1998. This is within the power of Scottish Government and Scottish Parliament, see Aidan O’Neill QC (2012), Legal opinion for UNICEF UK.

8. There are of course a range of steps the Scottish Government can take in light of its strong commitment to enshrining the UNCRC in statute that fall short of direct incorporation. Children’s rights duties on Ministers and public authorities are important; considering also how to give legal force to the four general principles of the UNCRC (see paragraph 6 above) would be another important step. One example of how this could be achieved would be the extension of the best interests paramountcy principle in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 to all children; another could be an administrative approach that gives additional weight to the best interests of the child (Article 3, UNCRC) in the consideration of whether it is appropriate for Ministers to take steps that could give better or further effect to the UNCRC in Scotland.

9. For more information on the benefits and effects of incorporation, we refer the Committee both to the submission from Together and to our aforementioned research on the legal implementation of the UNCRC.

Part 1 – the Rights of Children

10. Political and administrative duties can play a fundamental role in securing respect and protection for children’s rights, and in changing attitudes towards children within society. To do this however, such duties must be strong, transparent, and supported by robust accountability measures including, but not limited to, child rights impact assessment. The Bill provides for a duty on Ministers to keep under consideration the ways in which they might achieve better or further implementation of children’s rights. While a statutory provision on children’s rights and the additional emphasis it places on existing duties on Ministers under international law and the Scotland Act 1998 is welcome, we are very concerned that the proposed duty may do no more than enshrine the status quo in statute if its meaning and intent are not further clarified. This is a particular concern with regard to the test of appropriateness through which Ministers will decide whether or not to take steps to further the UNCRC requirements. UNICEF UK has sought legal advice from a prominent QC on the application and limitations of the rights duties in the Bill; we would be happy to elaborate on these areas in more detail during our oral evidence session with the Committee.

11. An important deficiency of the consideration duty as drafted is that Ministers are under no obligation to demonstrate how they have fulfilled their duty to consider the UNCRC, nor to outline any steps they have identified but decided not to take, nor provide reasons for not taking such steps. They must only report on the steps they have taken to secure better or further effect of the UNCRC requirements. This lack of transparency and accountability will make it extremely difficult to hold Ministers to account either politically or legally, thus fundamentally undermining the effectiveness of the duty. It is also clear that a consideration duty will not, in itself, entitle an individual to challenge acts or decisions of Scottish Government or public authorities on the ground that those acts or decisions are not compatible with the UNCRC. There are stronger duties – such as requiring Ministers to act compatibly with children’s rights – that would be more effective in protecting children, promoting cultural change, and achieving Scottish Government’s specific policy goals.

12. Child rights impact assessment (CRIA) is an important mechanism for ensuring consistent and systematic scrutiny of government decision-making against the UNCRC. As well as being essential to enable Ministers and officials to keep the UNCRC genuinely under consideration in relevant matters, a CRIA will ensure Ministers can be held accountable for the actions they choose – or choose not – to take to further the requirements of the UNCRC. CRIA mechanisms are in place in countries such as Wales, Sweden and Belgium, and have also been used to a more limited degree elsewhere (such as Australia, Canada, Ireland and New Zealand).8 CRIA – broadly, initial screening based on an understanding of the UNCRC rights and the obligations of duty bearers; more detailed analysis of the impact of proposed action on those rights; the use of data (including children’s views) to inform that analysis; the development of alternative solutions to better implement the UNCRC requirements; and appropriate follow-up – has found to be effective in the development of rights-respecting legislation and policy. The added value that a CRIA can bring to existing impact assessment requirements is clear through the Welsh experience (see, for example, the development of the Human Transplantation Bill).9 Above and beyond the need for CRIA to be included on the face of the Bill to ensure consistency, transparency and accountability, we remain concerned that a full CRIA has not, to date, been undertaken on the Bill, particularly given the implications of many of its provisions for the rights of children in Scotland.

13. The Bill must provide for an implementation scheme to be developed in order to support, develop and roll out the various rights measures within the Bill. This will support Scottish Government to meet its aspirations for children through the legislation. Under the Rights of Children and Young Persons (Wales) Measure, Welsh Ministers must set out the arrangements they have put in place to deliver the child rights duty they are under, and consult on the scheme with children, the Children’s Commissioner and other relevant stakeholders. Moreover, the scheme must be approved by a resolution of the Welsh Assembly. This approach has been effective in driving progress and in supporting officials and practitioners to develop a child rights approach to their work, and has meant that, even with a change in government, the commitment and impetus to the implementation of the Measure and to children’s rights more generally has continued. It seems to us that such an approach is essential to the effective discharge of a Ministerial duty on children’s rights.

9 Welsh Government (2013), Children’s Rights Scheme: Report on the compliance with the duty under Section 1 of the Rights of Children and Young Persons (Wales) Measure 2011

14. UNICEF UK’s research has shown that achieving the right balance of legal and non-legal measures when implementing children’s rights is crucial. We strongly support the new duty on Ministers to promote awareness and — importantly — understanding of the UNCRC. We would like further clarification from Ministers on how this duty will be delivered (and resourced), with particular attention to addressing the recommendation made by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child in 2008 that “systematic training” be given to “all professional groups working with or for children, in particular law enforcement officials, immigration officials, media, teachers, health personnel, social workers and personnel of childcare institutions”, as well as to government officials. Significant thought will also need to be given to how knowledge and understanding of children’s rights will be institutionalised across government and the public sector, ideally within a broader implementation scheme (see paragraph 13). UNICEF UK’s research and experience in developing rights-respecting programmes at a local level, evidence from the Welsh experience, and learning from the roll-out of GIRFEC to date all underline the importance of training and capacity-building on the application of children’s rights in order to improve outcomes for children.

15. UNICEF UK welcomes, in principle, the duty on Scottish Ministers to report on the steps they have taken to secure better or further effect of the UNCRC and to raise awareness of children’s rights. However, as dealt with in paragraph 11, this duty must include a duty to report on action they have identified but decided not to take. The three-year reporting cycle adds a valuable domestic dimension to the international child rights reporting process (which takes place every five years). An interim report at the end of the first year following the duties coming into force may be a useful mechanism to ensure momentum is retained at a time of significant political and economic change.

16. UNICEF UK welcomes the greater focus the duty on public authorities to report steps they have taken to implement children’s rights will put on the UNCRC at a local level. However, this reporting duty is not accompanied by any obligation on public authorities to act to better implement the UNCRC, important because it is often at a local level that children will experience rights violations. This omission will have a serious impact on the extent to which a rights culture can truly be developed in Scotland — without a children’s rights duty on public authorities to reflect any duty on Ministers, the legal machinery for promoting and securing children’s rights is weaker than it otherwise could be. We would like to see public authorities placed under a duty to implement the UNCRC to ensure that children’s rights can genuinely become the framework for services and decisions that affect children and young people in Scotland. Such duties would also provide consistency across public functions both geographically but also no matter

11 UNICEF UK’s programmes in Scotland comprise the Baby Friendly Initiative, Rights Respecting Schools, and Child Rights Partners (the latter currently in development)
whether those functions are delivered by local authorities, the private sector or the voluntary sector.12

Part 2 – Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People

17. UNICEF UK welcomes the proposed extension of the powers of the Commissioner for Children and Young People to include handling individual complaints from children. This is an important function of a children’s ombudsman and one which provides a valuable mechanism of last resort for children who have not been able to seek justice for a particular rights violation. UNICEF’s recent global study on the role and impact of children’s commissioners found that a strong mandate to respond to individual complaints was “essential”, and that the complaints mechanism “operates as a remedy for specific cases of rights violations affecting an individual child…and also serves to reveal broader, systemic problems in the realisation of child rights”. A strong, independent national champion such as this is a fundamental cornerstone of efforts to improve outcomes for children.13 It is important that adequate and secure resources are guaranteed for the delivery of both the new and existing functions of the Commissioner.

18. It is important that the Commissioner’s new powers to investigate individual cases are seen as complementary to existing complaints procedures and advocacy services that children may use. Scottish Government must continue to place emphasis on the development and improvement of other child-friendly advocacy and complaints procedures at the local and national level.

Part 3 – Children’s Services Planning

19. One of the notable challenges in the Children and Young People Bill has been to join up the GIRFEC approach to children’s services with the broader children’s rights framework Scottish Government aspires to. This Bill offers the rare opportunity to embed children’s rights across the design and delivery of law, policy and services impacting on children and young people. To do this effectively, a child rights framework needs to be introduced within children’s services planning, through which public bodies can safeguard, support and promote the rights and well-being of children in their area. There are many opportunities to do this within the existing clauses in the Bill, not least of which is looking creatively at how comparable duties on well-being, planning and reporting may be broadened in scope to include explicit duties on child rights implementation. This would also aid in reducing the reporting burden on local authorities by (rightly) bringing together their responsibilities for children’s rights with those for child well-being.

1. UNICEF UK was pleased to be invited by the Education and Culture Committee to give oral evidence on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill on 1 October. This paper provides supplementary written evidence following that session, in order to clarify and expand upon a number of points arising from Committee members. It builds upon and should be read in light of our written submission to the Committee dated July 2013.

2. The strongest formulation of children’s rights and the most powerful force for implementation within a nation comes through the direct incorporation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) into domestic law. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child explicitly stated in its General Comment on the implementation of the UNCRC that it “welcomes the incorporation of the Convention into domestic law, which is the traditional approach to the implementation of international human rights instruments in some but not all States. Incorporation should mean that the provisions of the Convention can be directly invoked before the courts and applied by national authorities and that the Convention will prevail where there is a conflict with domestic legislation or common practice.” The UN Committee’s preference for incorporation was reiterated in its concluding observations on the UK in both 2002 and 2008.

3. International comparative research undertaken by UNICEF UK in 2012 looked at different legal approaches to implementing the UNCRC. We found a number of useful models from the countries we explored that provide a foundation for Scotland to build on. For instance, Norway added the UNCRC to its Human Rights Act in 2003 to sit alongside the European Convention on Human Rights – this was a critical point in the implementation of the CRC in Norway and prompted the further integration of children’s rights principles across other legislation. In Belgium, while the UNCRC became part of their domestic law on ratification and sits above statute law, more recently a decision was taken to formally incorporate children’s rights into the constitution and support this through a comprehensive process of child rights impact assessment. In Spain, although the 1978 constitution gave protection to children’s rights and the ratification of the UNCRC in 1990 made it part of domestic law, an additional law in 1996 established legal rights for children in accordance with the UNCRC. This enshrined certain civil rights and the primacy of best interests in Spanish law. There are also examples in other countries of legislative approaches to implementing the UNCRC, with regional constitutions in German Länders enshrining child rights, a constitutional amendment in Ireland to incorporate Article 3 (best interests), the introduction of key features of the UNCRC into the South African Constitution and, nearer to home, the introduction of a duty on Welsh Ministers to give due regard to the UNCRC when exercising all of their functions.

4. One of the challenges often referred to in debates on giving legal expression to the UNCRC is the perceived difficulty of enshrining economic, social and cultural rights into law given their “aspirational” nature. However, these rights in the UNCRC are substantial and well-articulated, governed by the principle of progressive realisation – an expectation that governments will implement these rights to the maximum extent of their available resources while ensuring a minimum standard is met for all children. Economic, social and cultural rights are also critical in addressing inequalities that disproportionately impact on children. The UN human rights system recognises all rights – whether civil and political, or economic, social and cultural – as universal, indivisible and interdependent. The UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights is clear that certain rights are capable of immediate judicial protection (for example, non-discrimination, equal rights, and free and compulsory primary education provision), and it is our experience that others can be made so with sensible drafting. Judges already deal with resource and reasonableness principles on a daily basis in Scotland and the UK; in other countries, South African judges are already adjudicating on economic, social and cultural rights to prescribed limitations due to changes in the written constitution. And in practical drafting terms, the UK Child Poverty Act 2010 offers a good example of where such rights are already part of our legislative order.

5. UNICEF UK has welcomed the way in which Parliamentarians have engaged in the debate over incorporation during Stage 1 of the Bill, and we have been pleased to see the level of support for children’s rights across all sectors in Scotland. Going forward, and with a view to achieving a sustained and meaningful change for every child, we would like to see a detailed roadmap from Scottish Government on the further implementation of the UNCRC – through both legal and non-legal measures. This could include, short of direct incorporation, progress on strengthening the proposed Ministerial duties (to require compatibility or, at the very least, due regard), the incorporation of the general principles of the UNCRC into Scots law for all children, duties on public authorities to implement the UNCRC to give children’s rights real strength at the local level, and an explicit constitutional recognition of children’s rights.

6. Returning to the Children and Young People Bill itself, it is essential that the proposed Ministerial duties and the GIRFEC child rights framework are underpinned by mechanisms that will support those making decisions affecting children to systematically consider (and therefore better implement) the UNCRC. We urge the Committee to consider how the experience in Wales of rolling out a mandatory child rights impact assessment process (CRIA) and of creating an implementation scheme to drive the delivery of the due regard duty across Welsh Government can be usefully adapted to the Scottish context. Since the Rights of Children and Young Persons (Wales) Measure was passed in 2011, Welsh Government has reported increased engagement of children in shaping and developing both policy and legislation; more accessible information being produced for children, including on the Welsh Government Budget; specific changes to policy and legislation as a result of child rights impact assessment; and the beginnings of a cascading effect of the duty at local level through policy, guidance and cultural change. That this momentum has

3 The general principles of the UNCRC - non-discrimination in the application of rights; the best interests of the child; the right to life, survival and development; and the right to express views and be heard – are substantive rights as well as overarching principles through which other rights should be interpreted.

4 CRIA are in place in a range of countries - nationally, in Wales, Sweden, Norway and Belgium, and locally/regionally in Australia (Melbourne), Canada (New Brunswick – on all policies and legislation since early 2013), Ireland, and New Zealand. CRIA is also a tool recognised and used by the World Bank in its Child Focused Analyses related to its Poverty Strategy Impact Assessment, and the EU is now using a CRIA in relation to overseas development aid (supported by UNICEF).
continued apace for several years and shows little sign of slowing is as much the result of the strong legal framework and implementation scheme in place as the genuine political and public commitment to respecting and protecting children’s rights.

7. In closing, we refer the Committee to legal opinions commissioned by UNICEF UK from Aidan O’Neill QC on the relationship between the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Scotland Act 1998, and from James Wolffe QC on the relative merits of the rights provisions in Part 1 of the Children and Young People Bill. We also support the points made by Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People in his supplementary written evidence setting out the benefits of incorporation.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

UNISON Scotland

1. In its response to the initial consultation, UNISON Scotland stated that it had supported the principles of Getting it Right for Every Child (GIRFEC) since its inception and we believed that many of the measures contained in the proposed Bill could strengthen joint working to improve the welfare of children.

2. However, we also noted that the biggest block to staff being able to deliver on ‘Getting it Right’ is the pressure of high workloads and limited and reducing resources. The Government needs to recognise this if it is to turn the aims of the Bill into a reality for children in Scotland.

Resources

3. The projections about savings arising from the new systems are quite optimistic and will take time to realise. We pointed out in our original submission that we might see an initial surge in the number of children becoming looked after because of better information highlighting intractable parenting difficulties at an earlier stage.

4. Recent research in London has shown that a ‘well-resourced stable and confident’ frontline social work workforce had a bigger impact in reducing the number of children becoming looked after than services labelled as ‘early intervention’ had. There is also anecdotal evidence of this in some areas of Scotland with a correlation between fully staffed frontline social work teams, for example, reduced child protection registrations.

5. We have looked at the Financial Memorandum, but are not quite sure how all the figures will be allocated, but clearly health resources will need to be increased heavily to account for the additional workload on health visitors, etc. for the birth to 5 years – we believe there will need to be a major increase in staffing levels.

6. We are also aware that there will need to be an increase in child development officers/early years staff, to account for the additional hours, and need assurances that sufficient resources will be able to cope with this, as we do not yet know how the extra childcare hours will introduced.

Information sharing

7. We are detecting a move towards lawyers and courts individualising issues in terms of front line professionals. This gives us concern about the continuing lack of clarity as to what the thresholds are for sharing information in terms of data protection legislation. Our members are anxious that a culture of staff feeling the need to cover their backs can lead to routine sharing of confidential information with no consistent safeguards regarding how this is stored or used.
8. Information sharing without consent based on risk to well-being rather than risk of harm is therefore a contentious area. Different agencies have different thresholds for what they believe justifies intervention in children’s and families’ lives and these are not always informed by a rights context. The SHANARRI indicators could result in lower and blurred thresholds of information sharing which compromise the rights of children and their families to “privacy” and will leave practitioners vulnerable too.

Children’s Rights

9. We welcome the accent on the rights of children in line with the UNCRC but we are disappointed that the measures appear weaker than first intended. In any case the challenge is to translate rights into reality at service delivery level and, most importantly, in the court and children’s hearings system. Our members are still encountering instances, despite the intentions of legislation, where the emphasis is on adults’ rights over children at the expense of the rights of children. Monitoring of the impact of measures intended to improve children’s rights is needed to assess whether legislation is having the intended impact.

UNISON Scotland

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Voice

1. The aims of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill are admirable. However, care must be taken to ensure that the principles of the Bill are in fact able to be applied in practice to ensure success. We would not wish for the aims of the Bill to merely be aspirational, in practice. In our view it will therefore be essential for the matters within the Bill to be explored in greater detail and for the appropriate resources to be ring-fenced to enable the proposals to be realised.

2. Our particular comments are as follows:

3. It is noted that the Bill makes no mention of out of school care, which is currently a non-statutory service. It is our organisation’s view that the cost of out of school care also requires to be addressed.

4. It is noted that the Commissioner can investigate the extent to which a service provider has regard to the rights, interests and views of children. Further detail on this procedure is required. For example, would such an investigation be carried out jointly with other bodies? Would there be a right to review previous investigation outcomes? Would there be a right of appeal?

5. With regards to the GIRFEC key element: “a lead professional where there are particularly complex needs or where different agencies need to work together”, with the CAF model in mind, the question arises as to whether legislation is in fact required.

6. We would agree that staff training is a key requirement in the successful implementation of the GIRFEC approach. It is of concern that to date there has been no systematic, on-going and development opportunities for education staff in this respect. CPD is an area which tends to suffer in terms of funding when budgets are tight. It is our view that investment in training, for all professionals working with children, is essential for success in the GIRFEC approach. Detail of how this training would be delivered is required. For example, would there be shared, single, basic training in relation to the principles and purpose of GIRFEC, with individual local authorities providing a second stage of training regarding their own local approach?

7. With regards to the proposed statutory duties in relation to GIRFEC, particularly the role of the named person, there is a danger that planning and reporting takes precedent over “doing” or carrying out actions which may be required. Our organisation considers that workload pressures would be a concern and would impact upon the effectiveness of GIRFEC in practice. Workload issues therefore need to be identified and addressed; a working group to consider workload and avoidance of bureaucracy for those working with children may be beneficial in this respect.
8. With regards to the plan relating to services in the local authority area, it is noted that health boards could be involved in more than one plan. It is essential that support for health boards in undertaking a co-ordination role is provided. The question also arises as to how health boards can align priorities with all local authorities within their boundary areas. This will require particular consideration in line with the extended duty to co-operate.

9. We agree with the view expressed that, with regards to Single Outcome Agreements, there is a mis-match with the Bill’s proposals. This now needs to be addressed. Additionally, consideration must be given to what issues this will highlight, operationally. For example, duplication of effort needs to be avoided.

10. Details of how a particular single child’s plan is to be managed, in the event that they move between local authorities, needs to be provided.

11. With regards to the named person service, further detail is required regarding the maximum upper age. For example, in relation to those individuals with special needs. The position of teenage parents also requires consideration. Would three separate named people be involved, for each of the parents and child, and how would they liaise with one another?

12. With regards to children in secure accommodation, it is noted from the statistics that a minority remain in such accommodation after six months. We would therefore submit that there may be a case for there being an externally named person, rather than the manager of the secured accommodation, for continuity purposes.

13. Consultation responses to date had suggested that a nursery manager might be a more appropriate named person for children attending pre-school education. Consideration will also require to be given to the role of private day care managers and child minders as named persons.

14. With regards to the involvement of a named person and concerns regarding the position of parents, it is our organisation’s view that the role of the named person should not extend to representation of a child’s best interests in potential conflicts with different agencies and parents/corporate parents.

15. Care will need to be taken to ensure that assumptions are not made about who will require intervention or the circumstances where children will require the intervention of a named person. How inclusive is this?

16. With regards to the financial memorandum, clarification of how this was calculated would be helpful. It is essential that the potential costs of implementation of the proposals are considered in full.

17. We agree with the proposal that school attendance at Hearings will be facilitated and that information on a child’s education is available for Childrens’ Panel members. School and nursery staff may have the greatest insight in this respect, due to their level of contact with children and young people on a daily basis. However, workload demands will require to be considered to ensure that this can operate in practice.

18. With regards to Section 45(1)(b) of the Bill, with regards to an education authority assessing whether a 2 year old requires an alternative to early learning and childcare, any potential conflict with the responsibilities of the health boards requires consideration.

19. Staff will require clarity upon sharing requirements when concerns exist at a lower level, to ensure that staff are confident in their approach in such circumstances. I.e. how is the test of proportionality to be applied in practice? It is essential in our organisation’s view that the guidance to be provided covers this aspect in detail.

20. With regards to page 21 of the SPICe briefing, we note reference to the specific grant in England, within the Standards Fund. We would note that this was not the amount paid to most parents. The position is variable across England and varies according to provider type. There is now a single funding formula within each local authority.

21. With regards to kinship care specifically, we would be interested to hear of any plans to clarify who would be disqualified from kinship care support because they are a “parent”.

Introduction

1. Within critical sociology attempts to understand and explain changes in social policy often focus upon the socio-economic changes that have taken place. What is in essence a left wing critique of modern capitalism, this approach often emphasises the issue of power and inequality, focusing on structural questions like poverty to explain the ‘real’ problems in society. This paper in contrast focuses less on these socio-economic issues than upon the nature of institutions today and the expanding nature of state and professional intervention and colonisation of everyday life – a form of colonisation that is arguably impacting upon every adult child relationship – and undermining the socialisation of the young.

2. This is a process that has been identified, particularly in the United States, since at least the 1950s, but which has become more systematic and qualitatively problematic in the last two decades in the UK – not least of all, because of the collapse of political life. In this regard this paper, unlike those that focus on the ‘neo-liberal’ nature of society, suggests that many of the problems discussed below have developed less because of the enforcement of any right wing agenda, but rather, because today there is no agenda.

The Problematisation of Behaviour

3. In the 1990s as the social and political imagination shrank ‘big’ outlooks, whether national or international declined, while smaller things, like ‘community’ (Bauman, 2001) and the ‘individual’ (Beck and Beck-Gernsheim, 2002) emerged as the focus for government and state attention. Ironically, as Hobsbawm notes however, this focus on community did not reflect a new vibrancy in community life but actually emerged at a time ‘when communities in a sociological sense became hard to find in real life’ (Hobsbawm 1994: 428). Likewise, the new focus in social policy on the individual reflected something quite different from the individual of previous times. The moral and political subject of the past is today far more likely to be understood and engaged with through a fragmented psychosocial lens, one that is increasingly preoccupied with how we behave and react, rather than what we believe and how we consciously act (Waiton 2008).

4. As the understanding of social problems moved away from structural questions an increased gaze was set upon the behaviour of individuals within politics, schools, communities and families. Within the realm of politics, the Labour MP Frank Field, for example, argues that we have entered a period where the 'politics of behaviour' is central (Field, 2003). The government has helped to make the problem of antisocial behaviour into a national issue and in schools the behaviour of pupils has become of great concern for education authorities and teacher's unions alike. Meanwhile behaviour in the home and the issue of parenting has become problematised and understood as a relatively new 'skills' based issue necessitating expert intervention (Furedi, 2001).

5. Consequently, the 'management of behaviour' has become a growth industry, something that is at times imposed, but is perhaps more often demanded or seen as a necessary form of support in our more individuated world.

6. If the telecommunications advert is correct and we really are the product of 'every one to one we've ever had', it increasingly appears that these one to ones should be carried out with the assistance of a third party, or at least by following a form of awareness training that helps us to understand the correct way to act and react to one another in our daily lives.

7. It is this emerging and professionalised framework through which everyday interactions occur which is the focus of this paper. Interactions that were often informal, or were informed by the specific nature of a professional relationship with a young person – like that of a teacher and pupil – have been transformed in recent years. Through the problematisation of relationships, a form of colonisation of the 'lifeworld' has emerged, a process that is arguably undermining the spontaneous and autonomous relationships between people – and especially between adults and children. This is a process that despite its intentions should be understood as a form of antisocialisation.

Introduction

1. Who Cares? Scotland has a vision of a Scotland where all children and young people with experience of care are understood, believed in and given every opportunity to thrive. We are committed to working across Scotland with children and young people with experience of care, to help them speak out, secure their rights and ensure their qualities and successes are recognised across society. We seek to do this by influencing the people, cultures and systems that will positively affect their quality of life. Given this, we are pleased to answer the call for evidence from the Scottish Parliament’s Education and Culture Committee, on the general principles of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, which was introduced to Parliament on 17 April 2013.

The aspiration of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

2. The Bill’s Policy Memorandum states that:

"It is the aspiration of the Scottish Government for Scotland to be the best place to grow up in. The objective of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is to make real this ambition by putting children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services and ensuring their rights are respected across the public sector”.

3. Who Cares? Scotland (WCS) welcomes this Bill and indeed the intentions of it; however we believe that for it to truly realise its own stated aspiration, then the Bill needs to address one key short-fall in order to make Scotland the best place to grow up for young people who come from a care background.

Care Leavers (Extension of aftercare support for care leavers up to 26 years of age)

4. 87% of the LAC&YP consulted with for our initial consultation response in Autumn 2012 to the Bill’s proposals, supported the proposal to increase the age to which they can access support from their Local Authority to 26 years of age. As well as feeling that this support should be there, they felt it was specifically required in key areas such as housing, advocacy provision, in seeking employment and education, and for having someone to go to / talk to. Given this, WCS and LCT supports the sentiment in the Bill Part 8 (Aftercare) - however, it there are a number of areas of concern for us in relation to this proposal which need strengthened

Areas of concern

5. How the level of support for the care leaver is going to be measured / assessed (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2)
6. The responsibility implied seems to lie with the care leaver to seek this support (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2)

7. The assessment process which will be applied to determine ‘eligible needs’ of the care leaver (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2, Sub-section C); where ‘eligible needs’ is to be determined by Scottish Ministers in relation to a care leaver’s ‘care, attention or support’ needs (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2 Sub-section E)

8. The options available to the local authority to transfer the responsibility to support the care leaver onto another departments / legislative provisions, if it deems appropriate as a result of the assessment process (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2, Sub-section C)

9. Ambiguity around the terms ‘advice, guidance and assistance as it considers appropriate having regard to the person’s welfare’ (Part 8, Paragraph 60, Section 2, Sub-section C)

Main risks of this approach

10. Assessment process will assess need on priority, where priority determinant will likely be based on a normative criteria as set by Scottish Minister’s (similar to the Homelessness etc. (Scotland) Act 2003 assessment’s process)

11. Care leavers only likely to seek this assessment where they are approaching or in crisis; impacting heavily on the potential to intervene early and put solutions into place to prevent care leaver getting anywhere near the crisis point. Likelihood that the service via Part 8 of Bill will predominantly be focussed on redressing the crisis / impending crisis, which is both costly and least effective in facilitating medium to long-term service planning strategies for the care leaver.

13. The potential for the local authority to effectively ‘discharge’ their duty to provide the ‘support, advice and guidance’ necessary to meet the needs and welfare of the care leaver seems high. For instance, in relation to housing options for the care leaver, what legal safeguards are there in the Bill, to prevent this discharge of duty to the Homelessness legislation and the Housing Department, which in effect would actually provide support to the care leaver via temporary accommodation of some sort, to ensure they are housed?

14. The complexities of creating an assessment process which accurately and routinely (very important), determines both the current point in time need of the care leaver (i.e. today as they present), along with the medium to longer term needs of the care leaver (i.e. next month, next year and so on). The focus on point in time need creates a huge risk in itself, of again, only ever ‘fire-fighting’ and crisis managing a care leaver’s current situation. This in itself is a costly and resource intensive process.
Proposed insertions / amendments

15. The assessment process in Part 8 needs removed altogether. We want this so that the responsibility is not on the young person to present as being in need. We want young people up to the age of 26 to be able to return to care. This will place the responsibility of recognising and meeting the need of young people on the Local Authority.

16. We also want the current provisions to allow for children and young people who have been looked after for a continuous period of 13 weeks up to and including 16 years of age to be able to remain in care up to 26 years of age. To realise this, the following proposed amendments are suggested:

- An application made by a person under section 29, subsection (2) [of the Children Scotland Act 1995], to continue to be accommodated, or to return to being accommodated with their current or former placing local authority should be accepted.

- The duty to provide advice, guidance and assistance to this person (to the age of 26 years old) continues as required and as appropriate with regards to the person’s welfare and their needs in relation to their care, attention or support levels.

- This duty is not discharged where the person under section 29, subsection (2) [of the Children Scotland Act 1995] leaves their accommodated status before reaching 26 years of age; leaves and then returns to their accommodated status before reaching 26 years of age once or multiple times; remains in their accommodated status continuously to 26 years of age.

17. In addition to this, this would mean that the trusting and often loving relationships which these young people held whilst in care could continue, instead of them being severed abruptly in the way they are just now. Legislation which facilitates this is the key to the solution. This would also remove the need for a care leaver to negotiate with a range of other - and in most cases new - professionals to then undergo various associated assessment processes to be both accommodated and supported. We therefore recommend that the inclusion of the following principle for the Bill and detailed guidance to outline what this means should be included:

- All children and young people are supported to develop long-term, sustainable and loving relationships with their families and/or professionals.

18. We are adamant that this is the only way to properly tackle and redress the ridiculously poor outcomes which care leavers across Scotland experience. By doing this, the Local Authority would also be able to regularly monitor and review young people’s need on an on-going basis up to 26-years of age. The data gathered in this way, for young people from care up to 26 years of age, would therefore help local and national government better understand the issues and outcomes over time. This would help to inform services for future generations of young people in the care system in Scotland. It would also go some way to redress the poor longitudinal pathway data which currently exists for young people from care.

19. We envisage that these amendments would take 5-years to implement in practice from the enactment of the Bill and that they would make Scotland a global leader in care provision for children and young people. We have achieved this with our Homelessness Legislation in 2003 – and we believe that a similar vision and commitment should also be realised here. In addition, legislating for this, completely embraces the preventative spend and early intervention agenda which GIRFEC, the Bill and this Government have as its cornerstones.

20. Given the significance of the Children and Young People Bill, legislating for young people from care to be able to stay in, or return to care up to 26 years of age is vital to giving them a chance to live a life which isn’t rooted in poverty, disappointment and the prospect of premature death. It is time for Scotland’s young people from care to be given the chance to succeed in their lives; to be happy, to be understood and accepted and to be in control of what paths they take.

Why this amendment matters to Scotland’s care leavers

21. Scotland’s 1,300 or so care leavers each year, face bleak futures; and in many cases futures which they have little or no real control over. At 16 years of age, most young people in care need to go on a journey which most parents would never want for their own children. Not only are they forced to say good-bye to the placement which they called home for however many years – but they also have to say good-bye to the people in their lives which they built up trust and loving relationships with. In fact, for most young people who leave care, this is the biggest trauma of all. Young people who leave care (mostly at 16-years of age) are then expected to take care of themselves. Yes there are organisations and professionals which they can get help and support from; yes there is welfare support which they can access; yes they can access education and employment opportunities; yes they can access housing and yes they can dream and look forward to their future in the same way as other young people. However without someone by their side who they know and trust, guiding them through thick and thin; pointing them in the right direction and helping to get them back on track where they take a wrong turn, then chances are, these young people won’t even know where to start with planning for their future. Resilience alone won’t help them achieve this and the thought of having to do it alone or with people who are ‘new’ to them… is probably the most daunting of all.

22. Right now, it is up to the discretion of a Local Authority as to whether they provide support to a care leaver after they leave care, and this links into their economic status - i.e. if they are in employment, education or training(1). This current

1 See table 3.5 for LA and national overview on the provision of aftercare services based on economic status - support does not go far enough to provide the support they need and deserve and the biggest risk with the current Part 8 proposals is that these issues will still continue. In addition to this, a positive economic status at 16 or 18 years of age is quite an ask for a young person from care and the range of social and well-being indices and outcomes which surround them, are not encouraging and is precise evidence of just how vulnerable they are.

- Education: The number of looked after children who leave care and enter and sustain a positive destination (i.e. are in education, employment or training) is also lower when compared to non-looked after peers - 64% of looked after children who left school during 2010/11 were in a positive destination at the time of the initial destination survey, compared with 89% of all school leavers. Six months after entering their positive destination, this percentage dropped to 55% for looked after children – so sustaining their positive destination is an issue(2).

- Housing: A young person from care should never have to present as homeless to be accommodated and it is estimated that around 1/3 of the current care leaver population have had to present as homeless to be housed.

- Criminal Justice: 50% of Scottish prisoners have been in care(3) and the Polmont prisoner population is estimated at up to 80% from a care background.

- Mental Health: 45% of those aged between 5 to 17 years of age were assessed as having a mental disorder(4).

23. We believe that our recommended proposed amendments to Part 8 would help to secure more positive destinations for young people from care; and most importantly, that these positive destinations could be sustained due to the support they have surrounding them, provided by the people which they hold trusting and nurturing relationships with.

Corporate Parenting

24. LAC&YP still have a very limited knowledge of what corporate parenting (CP) is and what it means for them. Whilst WCS and LCT support the expansion of CP duties to a wider range of public bodies, it is vital that new CPs are given detailed guidance and understanding on what this role means to them. Without this, the current ambiguity surrounding the role of CPs, and the lack of understanding amongst LAC&YP on this, is at risk of continuing. We recommend that the Bill considers LAC&YP as a specific socio-economic / equalities group, for the purpose of Part 7. This would then allow all CPs to consider how they deliver services and include LAC&YP in their strategic plans and outcomes setting more specifically than the provisions – as they as they currently stand – allow for. This would also help CPs to both demonstrate how they are considering LAC&YP and the progress they have made / or are making on that.

1. I am writing to express my strong opposition to Part IV, the “Provision of Named Persons,” of the Children and Young People Bill. This bill proposes a massive invasion of every family and transfers the authority and the rights of parents to government monitors. Parents are the ones who act in the best interests of their children. Please reject all measures contained in the Children and Young People Bill that directly oppose the rights of parents protected in international law. Specifically,

   a. The “named person” should be an opt in/opt out service, not mandatory.

   b. Personal data should never be gathered or shared without consent, as it breaches both the UK Data Protection Act and Article 8 of the ECHR. There must be a child protection concern to necessitate sharing this data, not merely a “wellbeing” concern which falls short of the data protection sharing threshold.

   c. The proposals will result in many families actively avoiding contact with services.

   d. There is a need for legal redress to be available against any professional who “gets it wrong” for a child.

2. It is my understanding from the Schoolhouse Home Education Association that officials are already implementing policy related to the named person provision, resulting in a number families in Scotland experiencing issues related to this bill. Families have been hounded by professionals who refuse to go away, interfere into family life without legitimate reasons, and seek to mislead families about their parenting choices. Parents’ rights will continue to be damaged if the bill is passed and fully implemented.

3. Please act to protect the fundamental human right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children and reject the Children and Young People Bill.

1. I am writing as an experienced practising GP with an academic interest in child health. I am currently professor of primary care and rural health at the University of Aberdeen, and my previous academic post was senior lecturer in Infant Mental Health in the University of Glasgow. As well as writing on the basis of substantial clinical experience, I have published a large number of research papers and reports on the subject of preventive child health. These can be provided if required.

2. I welcome the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and support its general aspirations. Specific areas that are valuable include improvements in permanency planning for looked after children and the provision of better early learning and childcare. I do, nevertheless, have some concerns about the lack of specificity in the draft bill in relation to provision of services to children under three years of age.

3. The only universal services used by almost all parents of children under three years are midwifery, health visiting\(^1\) and general practice\(^2\). Each of these professions has a specific role in supporting parents, and in recent years a range of well-intentioned but ultimately misguided policies has led to a fragmentation both of the services that each is able to offer and to inter-professional communication. Examples include: recent failures of communication between midwives and GPs since the Refreshed Maternity Services Framework; the abolition of universal preventive child health contacts between six weeks and school entry in 2005\(^3\) (partially reversed this year); the ending of the training of health visitors in child developmental assessment since 2001\(^4\); the introduction of corporate caseloads and skill mix teams in health visiting, leading to loss of personal continuity of care; the disengagement of health visitors from general practices; and a progressive disengagement of GPs from the delivery of preventive child health services\(^5\). Effective preventive spending could substantially reverse these trends\(^6\).

4. My specific recommendations are as follows:

   - That the named person for preschool children should always be a qualified health visitor
   - That the professional title ‘health visitor’ be restored to its former statutory status, with specific reference to training and expertise in child development and parenting support
   - That all those working with preschool children should have a duty to report concerns about those children’s health, wellbeing and development to the named health visitor
   - That health visitors should have a statutory duty to communicate concerns about child wellbeing and development to general practitioners and to others as required
   - That general practices should have a named, attached health visitor.
• That health visitors should have a maximum caseload of 200 children under five years, with smaller caseloads being allocated to those working in areas of deprivation or those working with high risk groups.

• That each child should have the right to an annual assessment of developmental progress before the age of five years by a qualified health visitor or in exceptional cases by a general practitioner. These assessments should include investigation of language development, motor function, social behaviours, capacity for attention and of the parent's relationship with the child. We know that developmental vulnerability cannot be adequately predicted on the basis of pre-existing risk factors. Furthermore there is now substantial evidence that many children with remediable problems have failed to have these problems addressed since the introduction of Scotland's bold policy of abolishing its universal child health surveillance programme. This policy, at variance with practice in all other developed nations, should be reversed.

• These assessments should be considered as a child's right: parents and carers should not be considered to have an automatic right to refuse on behalf of their child. There is some evidence that children who are not seen at preventive care contacts are more likely to have problems. Failure to find ways to include all children in a universal child health programme (there are, for example, good systems for ensuring universal coverage in the Netherlands), thus risks increasing social inequity.

5. I have given evidence to government committees on these matters in the past and would be happy to give evidence in person if this would be helpful.

1. Even in country Australia I have heard of this, I find what is proposed by the Scottish government in the children and young persons bill part IV, unbelievable. With Scottish blood in my veins, it is boiling. Please reconsider this outrageous bill and throw it out on the rubbish dump where it belongs. Who in the world do you think you are to send social workers into people’s homes to supervise the life of a child from when they are born, usurping the authority of the parents and giving that authority to yourselves. Government has no right whatsoever in this area, pull your heads in and get on with what you are supposed to be doing, and keep your devilish lust for power away from interfering where you have no business being. I remind you, you are not parents and have no right too even consider taking over the role of father and mother.

And finally, that in a free society the rights of families and the irreplaceable relationship between parents and children must be protected and respected. The proposed Scottish legislation turns the notion that parents are responsible for their children on its head and basically says that parents can’t be trusted-only government can.
1. The Bill's proposal to increase provision of free pre-school education to 600 hours is to be welcomed. Previous research has shown that whether sessions were full day or half day did not influence child outcomes (Sylva et al, 2004) so assuming appropriately trained staff and high quality provision, the proposed plans for five half day sessions a week should allow three year old children sufficient access to educational and social experiences to assist in promoting early development.

2. The increased number of hours of free preschool education proposed by the Bill not only helps parental availability for employment, but in addition such programmes can also provide much needed parental support and feedback about their children’s development for parents in disadvantaged communities. Our pilot study (Woolfson & King, 2008) showed improved parenting capacity in parents whose vulnerable two year olds participated in an early education programme compared to those who had not. Furthermore these parents showed better adjustment to the daily hassles of situations with their children that challenge parents than comparison group parents. Participating parents also gained valuable new insights and understanding into their children’s behaviour and their role as parents. Parents learned from informal experiences including casual observation of their children interacting with children/staff and undertaking activities in the education programme, talking to other parents, as well from more formal experiences such as direct advice from staff in meetings with their keyworker and parent support groups. Pre-school staff therefore should be trained, not only in how to promote children’s development themselves, but in how to help parents in a supportive, non-judgmental, non-didactic manner.

3. The issue of access to free pre-school education for disadvantaged and vulnerable two year olds is however one which requires further consideration. Notably, the UK Effective Provision of Pre-School Education (EPPE) project found age of attendance to be important, with those attending pre-school before age three demonstrating higher cognitive and peer sociability gains than those beginning at three years (Sylva et al, 2004).

4. The importance of investing in the early years is well recognised by public health professionals, development psychologists and economists (Heckman, 2006; Marmot, 2010; Woolfson et al, submitted). US Head Start, Early Head Start, Smart Start and the Abecedarian projects as well the (EPPE) project have all shown the importance of early education for IQ, cognitive, social and emotional development, language skills, concentration and school attainments (Campbell & Ramey, 1995; Abbott-Shim et al, 2003; Barnett, 1995; Kazimirski et al, 2008; Love et al, 2005; Sylva et al, 2004).

5. We (Woolfson et al, submitted) recently carried out a Scottish pilot of the Early Development Instrument (EDI), an extensively internationally validated tool that measures how well local communities prepare their children for transition to school. Our analysis of vulnerabilities in different developmental domains for our local authority sample showed that 15.4% children were vulnerable (i.e., concerningly low) in their development in two or more domains. We do not know whether these local data represent national developmental vulnerabilities for Scotland as a whole, but it is worth noting that lower figures of 12.4% and 11.8% developmental vulnerability in two or more domains were reported for the Canadian national sample and the Australian national sample respectively.

6. In our local Scottish EDI pilot we also observed socio-economic gradients in readiness for school, with children in the most deprived socio-economic quintile 3.36 times more likely to be vulnerable in two or more domains than those in the most affluent quintile.

7. Addressing these EDI findings has important implications for planning and delivery of services for disadvantaged and vulnerable children. Collecting EDI data nationally in Scotland on a triennial basis as currently carried out across Australia can provide holistic, community-level data that can be used both prospectively for early years service planning as well as retrospectively for evaluation purposes.

8. Not only is evidence accumulating for the influence of early development on these proximal school factors, but longitudinal research has also demonstrated positive effects on outcomes much later in life such as economic productivity, social participation, family relationships, criminality, and mental health (Irwin et al., 2007; Schweinhart et al., 2005; Kuh & Ben-Shlomo, 2004). Returns to society over the lifespan are therefore expected to more than repay initial investment in early education (Ludwig & Phillips, 2007).

9. The above findings suggest that the Scottish Government might consider extending these plans to include all vulnerable or disadvantaged two year olds in order to achieve its aim of ‘strengthen(ing) the role of early years’ support in children’s and families' lives’.

The Issue

1. There are children in Scotland whose needs are not met, and whose voices are not heard, because of difficulties in accessing the legal processes that could protect them. This is not primarily a resource issue: it is about taking steps to ease their access to resources that already exist. The Children and Young People Bill could be a vehicle for safeguarding these children and their rights.

This Submission

2. This paper has been written by a short-life working group of professionals united by their concern that gaps in legal structures mean that vulnerable children, in particular those separated from their families\(^1\), are unable to (i) access or properly instruct legal representatives and/or (ii) ensure that their best interests are met within the legal processes that they are involved with.

3. The issue was identified in the course of the work that some members of the group were undertaking in relation to the pilot Scottish Guardianship Service which is funded by the Scottish Government and was recently applauded by the House of Lords and House of Commons Joint Committee in Human Rights\(^2\) but it has implications for a wider group of children and young people in Scotland.

4. This paper aims to highlight key issues particularly relevant to this small but extremely vulnerable group of children. It will then discuss potential solutions that we would respectfully ask the Committee to consider in their discussions around the Bill.

Some Particular Points

5. The following scenarios have been identified by the group:-
   a. Where 16 and 17 year old separated children cannot access legal structures or protections in Scotland because of differing treatment, both in law and in practice, related solely to their age;
   b. Where children do not have the capacity because of their age to instruct legal representation to put forward their views and secure their

\(^1\) ‘Separated children’ is the term used in most countries to describe those children who are outside their country of origin and separated from their parents or legal or customary care giver. In some cases they arrive in their own. In other cases they may be accompanied by an adult who is not their parent or legal or customary carer. In some cases, they may be removed from their legal or customary care giver through legal proceedings in the UK.
asylum, refugee or immigration status and no-one else has the authority to do this for them. In Scotland, children have full legal capacity at the age of 16, and may be judged to have legal capacity at an earlier age;
c. Where children do not have anyone with the responsibility and authority to pursue their best interests in legal proceedings. This is regardless of whether a child has the capacity to instruct their own legal representative.

6. These issues raise concerns about Scotland’s compliance with the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and other international instruments which:
- Define a child as anyone under 18;
- Require account to be taken of both the views and interests of children when decisions are made about them; and
- Prohibit discrimination on any grounds, including age.

Case Studies

7. The following are case studies. Each case study does not reflect an actual client but includes a combination of issues that has arisen from actual and current cases in order to demonstrate the matters set out in this paper.

Scenario 1 – Lucy

8. Lucy is a seven year old girl born in Tanzania. She has one older sibling who is 16 years old. Lucy’s parents are from Tanzania and have lived in the UK for six years, but they do not have permission to stay in the UK. For this reason, the children are also Tanzanian nationals and they do not have permission to stay in the UK.

9. Lucy and her older sibling were removed from the care of their parents by the local authority six years ago because of severe physical abuse. Each child has a different social worker and has been placed with a separate foster family in a separate local authority area. The children have little contact with one another.

10. The local authority is seeking permanence orders for the siblings which are contested by their parents. Her elder sibling has an immigration solicitor, but Lucy is too young to instruct a solicitor herself.

3 There is a presumption that a child of 12 or more will be able to instruct a solicitor in any civil matter, as s/he will be presumed to be of sufficient age and maturity to have a general understanding of what it means to do so; Section 2(4A) of Legal Capacity (Scotland) Act 1991. This presumption can, however, be rebutted if a solicitor thinks a younger child has a general understanding of what it means to instruct a solicitor, or if a solicitor does not think a child of 12 or more has the general understanding required.
Issues from Scenario 1

11. The local authority and Lucy’s foster carer wish to instruct a solicitor to regularise Lucy’s residence in the UK. Neither of these individuals, however, have the automatic right to do so as this is a parental right still held by Lucy’s parents until such time as it is removed, either in the interim or permanently, by way of an order by the court.\(^4\)

12. Since Lucy’s best interests are likely to conflict with her parent’s interests, a solicitor could not take instructions from Lucy’s parents on her behalf. This is the case, in part, because the immigration position of the parents may depend on remaining in the UK only to contest the permanence orders.

13. Since Lucy cannot obtain legal representation, she remains illegally resident in the UK. There is no realistic prospect that she would be returned alone to Tanzania by the Home Office, yet she has no means of communicating with the Home Office to regularise her status unlike her elder sibling. She is therefore being denied access to a practical and effective remedy to her immigration position.

14. Lucy may also suffer disadvantage in other ways as she has no document to confirm her right to reside in the UK. She is likely to lose out on certain entitlements which flow from having permission to stay in the UK, for instance lawful access to healthcare,\(^5\) the ability to take a summer job at the relevant age, the ability to travel in and out of the UK with her foster family on holiday and delay in being able to register as a British national child as she requires to permanently reside in the UK in order to do so. It is likely that these issues will become more prevalent as Lucy becomes older thus affecting her health, welfare and development and integration into Scottish society all of which potentially compounds her vulnerability.

Scenario 2 – Hung

15. Hung was located by police on a raid on a cannabis cultivation farm. He was arrested, charged with an offence under the Misuse of Drugs Act and is currently in a Young Offenders Institution.

16. Hung is from Vietnam and states that he is 16 years old. Police and Social work believe him to be over the age of 18 and he is treated as such. Social work have \(^4\)In England and Wales, the local authority automatically obtains parental responsibilities when a child comes into their care (Section 33(3) of the Children Act 1989). The position is not automatic in Scotland. The Children (Scotland) Act 1995 ensures that parental rights and responsibilities remain with a parent until such time as a court order expressly removes them even if a child is taken into the care of a local authority (Section 11 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 and Section 42 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011).

\(^5\) There is a gap within the NHS Scottish Regulations for this type of situation and technically these children would need to pay in order to utilise the NHS. It is accepted that this situation would be unlikely to occur in Lucy’s case and in practice she would gain access to the NHS. She may, however, find it more difficult as she gets older.
stated that even if Hung were 16, he would not be treated as looked after by them as per their practice with separated children over the age of 16.

17. Hung narrates an account to his immigration lawyer that would suggest he may have been the victim of human trafficking. He also states that he has been sexually exploited by the people who brought him to the UK. He furthermore has information which may suggest that he is 16. He is not sleeping and states that he cannot think straight. He is scared.

18. Hung’s instructions to both his criminal and civil solicitors continuously change. He tells his criminal solicitor that he thinks that he wishes to plead guilty to the offence he has been charged with. He wants to get out prison and believes that this will be the quickest way of doing so as he will get a shorter sentence.

19. Hung keeps changing his advice to his civil solicitor. His instructions to his civil solicitor depend on his mood. When frustrated and upset he is clear that he does not wish his civil solicitor (i) to contest the determination regarding his age, (ii) to provide information to the relevant authorities regarding human trafficking; or (iii) to make a claim for asylum. Hung however keeps changing his mind on all 3 points.

Issues from Scenario 2

20. At age 16, Hung has full legal capacity in Scots Law and his solicitors accept instructions on that basis representing Hung in order to give effect to his views and wishes.

21. In a situation like Hung, however, a child’s views may conflict with what is in his best interests. A child might, for example, in a moment of frustration, say they want to return to their country of origin. They may well change their minds later, but the system will have acted on their expressed wish. Or a trafficked child might want to plead guilty to an offence such as cannabis cultivation, just to get it over with and avoid identification as a victim of trafficking, thus evading the protection from criminalisation and other care that should be extended to them under national and European law.

22. A 16 year old is still a child in terms of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child as well as definitions related to trafficking so his best interests should be represented and taken into account in any decision but it is not clear in Hung’s case who has the legal right and responsibility to do so.

23. There are certain legal proceedings where individuals can be appointed by a Children’s Hearing and court to put forward the views and best interests of a child if it is necessary to do so.\textsuperscript{8} These individuals enter the proceedings in order to protect the legal rights of the child allowing the child to participate and be represented. Both individuals will prepare reports on what outcome would best safeguard the child’s interests. They will take account of the child’s views, but do not need to follow them (unlike the child’s legal representative who has to take instructions from the child where that child has the capacity to give them\textsuperscript{9}). The asylum/immigration and criminal processes that Hung is involved in do not make provision for this kind of person who could promote his interests. In order to protect Hung’s interests, someone needs to be able to act to promote and protect his interests both before and during these legal proceedings.

24. Hung has a legal representative to put forward his views but there is no individual appointed to ensure his best interests are also taken into account. This is because he is not a participant in the type of process or procedure where one could be appointed and in any event his interests require to be promoted at the earliest opportunity.

25. The situation becomes more complex in the case of Hung as professionals have not accepted his self-declared age. This leads to a process of age assessment undertaken by a local authority social worker. If the individual is deemed to be a child, the local authority will have greater responsibilities than if they were an adult.

26. In Hung’s case, even if his stated age were to be accepted and he were to be released from detention, he has been told that he will not access full support and services as a “looked after child”\textsuperscript{10}. This determination is made on the basis of his age alone rather than on an assessment of need\textsuperscript{11}. Social workers therefore can have a conflict of interest which means they cannot always effectively advocate for the child’s best interests.

27. There is therefore a need to ensure that the child’s views and best interests are taken into account. The ‘interests’ dimension may be lacking where a child’s \textsuperscript{8} If a child is within the Children’s Hearing System in Scotland then it is likely that a Safeguarder would be appointed. In other civil proceedings, such as a divorce action, a Curator Ad Litem would be appointed.

\textsuperscript{9} However, where there is a clear conflict between the duty to act on instructions and the duty to act in the client’s best interests, a solicitor may need to withdraw from the case which is clearly not a satisfactory conclusion.

\textsuperscript{11} A difference in treatment based on age alone, and not an assessment of an individual’s needs, may be a breach of Article 2 of the UN Convention of the Rights of the Child. R (on the application of HC (A CHILD BY HIS LITIGATION FRIEND CC) v (1) SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (2) COMMISSIONER OF POLICE OF THE METROPOLIS (2013) judgement is impaired due to their personal history and current stress, and/ or the child is over 16 years of age\textsuperscript{12}.

How these matters could be addressed

28. The group has been exploring ways of using current law more imaginatively, in particular by utilising some of the provisions in Part I of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 as well as the Children’s Hearings process. For instance the utilisation of Section 11 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 in order to request a court to make an order appointing a suitable person to act as guardian and to invest in them the necessary parental rights and responsibilities to do so. This would include the right and responsibility to instruct a solicitor and/or to promote the child’s best interests.

29. It is not yet clear how successful these approaches will be. However, even if successful, there will remain gaps as an order under section 11 is reliant on the identification of an appropriate individual who is willing to act as a guardian in this context. Problems arise for separated children because:-

a. By definition, there may be no family member who could act as guardian.

b. Lucy's foster carer may be such an appropriate person. However, most separated children are not placed in foster care.

c. The relevant legislation notes that the guardian must be an individual and therefore cannot be a local authority.\textsuperscript{13}

d. More often than not, such as in the case of Hung, the child will not have access to a suitable individual that would be willing to act in place of their parent in this context.

30. Furthermore, as the law currently stands, Section 11 cannot apply to children who are 16 and 17.

Recommendations

31. There are therefore a number of legal changes that could make it easier to protect the rights of these children, and these are what we would like the Committee to consider:

a) Review of how Scotland identifies a child by establishing an independent system for age assessment. Currently this is carried out by local authority social workers with challenge undertaken by judicial review. Because it \textsuperscript{12} The EU Anti-Trafficking Directive on Human Trafficking states that a guardian and/or representative shall be appointed for child victims of human trafficking when the holders of parental responsibility are, as a result of a conflict of interest, precluded from ensuring the child’s best interests and/or from representing the child (Art 14(2). Where appropriate, a guardian shall be appointed for unaccompanied asylum seeking children who are victims of human trafficking (Art 16(3), and in criminal matters, a representative be appointed (Article 16(4). These roles may be performed by the same person, legal person, institution or an authority (Recital 24).

\textsuperscript{13} Sections 11(5) and 15(4) of the Children (Scotland) Act.
has such significant consequences for a child, it may best be undertaken within a court setting through an action of declarator of age, operating under prescribed time limits. Such an option is not, however, seen as child friendly and little used (if at all). Another option would be the proposal set out by Sheriff Brian Kearney in his paper on Age Ascertainment which is fully endorsed by this group.

b) Review of how Scotland thereafter treats a child in its legislation and practice, for instance:-

i. Extending the responsibility and right of legal representation and promotion of a child’s welfare to age 18. It is currently 16\textsuperscript{14}. This would give more options for those separated children who, while not legally incapacitated from instructing a solicitor, might be practically incapacitated due to trauma and disorientation. Such an amendment would not diminsh young people’s autonomy because this is already protected by the Age of Legal Capacity (Scotland) Act 1991, and preserved through the definition of “legal representative” set out in the 1995 Act\textsuperscript{15}. Extending the age to 18 would be consistent with the age limits set out in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

ii. Review of a 16/17 year old separated child’s access to the children’s hearings system under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

iii. Adding child trafficking to the offences listed in Schedule 1 to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. This would help protect children in a number of ways, including easing access to the Children’s Hearings system.

iv. Clear and unequivocal guidance to local authorities regarding 16/17 year old separated children and how they should be looked after by local authorities in line with the position in England and Wales\textsuperscript{16}.

c) Identifying a person or body with authority to take action to protect a child’s rights in a situation of last resort when no-one else can\textsuperscript{17}. Traditionally in Scotland, the “ultimate parent” or parens patriae role has been located within the Court of Session. It would be simpler and more accessible to nominate a specified person as the holder of this responsibility (in addition to, rather than instead of, the Court). They would need to be able to

\textsuperscript{15} Section 15(5) and (6) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.
\textsuperscript{16} Where support to separated children is based on a needs assessment and that for the majority of such children, they should be supported under the equivalent to section 25 of the Children (Scotland) Act 2005. This position is as a result of case law later clarified by the Department for Children, School and Families.
ensure that a child has access to their own legal representation and/or promote the child’s best interests. This is key in Scotland as a local authority does not automatically obtain rights and responsibilities when a child is in their care and there is no solicitor of last resort in Scotland as there is in England and Wales. One option would be to extend the role and power of the Children’s Commissioner but further discussion as to how this would operate in practice would be required. This kind of mechanism would have benefits for a wider range of children, including those for whom the local authority holds parental responsibility, where there may be no outside check on how they exercise it.

Conclusion

WAVE Trust

Stage 1 Submission to the Scottish Parliament’s Education Committee on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill 2013

1. WAVE Trust is an independent UK-wide charity with an office in Scotland. WAVE is a recognised leader in the early years’ arena. It particularly focuses and has expertise on the primary prevention of child maltreatment (abuse, neglect and living with domestic violence). WAVE’s Founder/CEO (George Hosking) and its Scotland Director (Dr Jonathan Sher) have had the privilege of testifying before Committees of the Scottish Parliament several times in recent years – and would be pleased to do so again.

2. WAVE welcomes the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and supports both its overall direction of travel and the great majority of its specific provisions. Our extensive international evidence base and practical experience across the UK (including Scotland) confirms the importance and value of this Bill’s intentions to:
   a) deepen the extent to which children’s rights are understood and made real;
   b) develop and implement a single, holistic, integrated plan for each child;
   c) enhance the positive impacts of ‘Getting it right for every child’ (GIRFEC);
   d) embed the SHANNARI model/definition of ‘wellbeing’ in Scots law;
   e) reduce the delays and difficulties in permanence planning;
   f) provide additional, and more flexible, early learning and childcare; and,
   g) make adult services to parents more helpful in relation to affected children.

3. However, WAVE Trust thinks that this Bill, as introduced, does not fully reflect the analysis – and is not sufficiently robust to achieve the aspirations – articulated so well in the Scottish Government’s accompanying Policy Memorandum. Consequently, WAVE Trust encourages the Scottish Parliament to take greater advantage of the historic ‘window of opportunity’ available now by strengthening several key elements of this proposed legislation. Doing so will keep Scotland at the forefront of UK policy and practice in relation to the youngest generation of our citizenry.

4. Because of the space limitations noted in the invitation to submit evidence pertinent to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, WAVE’s contribution here will only include the ‘headline’ points and brief explanations. The body of the evidence supporting all the points made here can be found in our latest major report – Conception to age 2: the age of opportunity – launched in March 2013. A hard copy of this report has now been sent to every member of the Education Committee and its staff, as well as to the most relevant Cabinet Secretaries and Scottish Ministers. Although jointly authored with England’s Department for Education, the international evidence and basic messages are applicable in the Scottish context, too.

5. WAVE Trust’s main recommendations for improving this Bill are to:
   - Make ‘preventing harm from happening in the first place’ a cornerstone of this legislation’s approach and provisions
   - Ensure that ‘preventative spending’ is reinforced by, and made accountable through, this Bill
   - Accord the earliest years of life (pre-birth to age 3) far more direct and meaningful attention/action ➢ Meet the need for both more health visitors and improved professional development/support for this group of Named Persons ➢ Incorporate the entire UN Convention on the Rights of the Child into Scots law

6. Make ‘preventing harm from happening in the first place’ a cornerstone of this legislation’s approach and provisions. The Scottish Government’s original consultation about this Bill, and the latest Policy Memorandum that accompanies it, offers an accurate and compelling case – in harmony with the Christie Commission’s findings and recommendations – for “a decisive (later cited as a “fundamental”) shift toward prevention.”
In fact, it states that: “The Bill is founded upon this preventative approach.”

7. And yet, while the words ‘prevention’ and ‘preventative’ appear nineteen times in the Policy Memorandum, they are not used even once in the actual Bill. This is not merely a point about language. The Bill’s provisions are weighted heavily toward reacting once harm to a child has occurred, i.e. when wellbeing needs are identified; children’s problems become apparent outwith the family; and, ‘targeted interventions’ are triggered by meeting agency/professional thresholds. WAVE completely agrees with the necessity of responding as early, fully and effectively as possible to children experiencing significant harm or adversity. But, reacting is not the only option.

8. One weakness of the proposed Bill can be found in the lack of a healthy balance between policies, practices and approaches that prevent such needs, problems and harm from compromising children’s lives and life chances – and those that are basically about limiting the damage, cleaning up the mess and preventing further harm from happening.
Both are vital, but the balance between them must become much more equal in order for the good intentions about – and the enormous potential savings and benefits of – preventative spending to be realised in practice.

9. One potential way to improve the balance would be to amend Part 3 of the Bill (on the aims and implementation of children’s services planning) to include provisions that give equal weight and responsibility to primary prevention. WAVE Trust would be happy to assist in the development of such a refinement to this part of the Bill.

10. Ensure that ‘preventative spending’ is reinforced by, and made accountable through this Bill. Effective primary prevention would predictably reduce the need for some current children’s services (and the planning/resourcing of them). It has been repeatedly observed that the Scottish Parliament and Scottish Government publicly giving priority to ‘preventative spending’ resulted in a significant amount of ‘rebranding’ of existing public and voluntary activities, programmes and resource allocations as now being ‘preventative’.

11. This Bill creates an opportunity to provide meaningful definitions of, and greater clarity about, what does (and does not) constitute ‘preventative spending’. Provisions could be added to the Bill that create a regularly occurring process that makes categorising, analysing and reporting public expenditures as ‘preventative’ more accurate, transparent and accountable.

12. Accord the earliest years of life (pre-birth to age 3) far more direct and meaningful attention/action. Paragraphs 15-21 of this Policy Memorandum clearly, succinctly and accurately make the case in favour of governmental action on, and investment in, child wellbeing from the antenatal period through the first months and years of life. It rightly cites the innovative and promising work currently underway in Scotland – from the Early Years Collaborative, through refreshed maternity and infant nutrition frameworks, to the expansion of Family Nurse Partnerships.

13. And yet, as was the case with prevention, there is a wide gap between the excellent analysis/conclusions about the importance of the earliest years of childhood found in the Policy Memorandum and the actual content of this proposed legislation. In practical terms, this Bill treats early learning and care as beginning at the age of 3 (or 2, if the child is looked after) when public investment is increased from 475 to 600 hours per annum. There is silence about any new statutory duty in relation to the healthy development, preventative spending or the enhancement of child wellbeing during the years between the end of parental leave and the start of pre-school.

14. The point is not that every worthwhile public investment in, or governmental support for, the earliest years of children’s lives must have a statutory foundation. That would be exaggerating what primary legislation is intended to do or should be expected to accomplish. Nevertheless, especially during periods of economic adversity and financial constraints, a statutory duty establishes a clear line between what the public sector must do and what are merely good ideas to consider when resources are more plentiful. WAVE Trust strongly supports Scotland’s public sector investing more robustly and wisely in the earliest years of life as a matter meriting an additional statutory foundation (as is also true of children’s rights and GIRFEC). WAVE’s Age of opportunity report offers a detailed set of findings and recommendations that could be a source of improvements to this Bill.

15. WAVE’s international evidence gathering on, and analysis of, child maltreatment – i.e. abuse, neglect and living with domestic violence – reveals that most such harm to children begins during the earliest years of life (pre-birth to pre-school). This has led WAVE to create the 70/30 initiative to reduce child maltreatment by 70% by 2030. While ambitious, we also believe it to be an intensely practical and achievable commitment.

16. The foundations upon which the 70/30 work is being built are: ‘Every baby wanted and nurtured’ and ‘Every parent prepared and supported’. It should be noted that WAVE explicitly uses the term ‘parents’ to include mothers, fathers, kinship carers, step-parents, foster/adoptive parents and other de facto parents. We encourage this Bill to be equally explicit in its inclusiveness to ensure that it does not inadvertently establish a hierarchy among adults in the parenting role, in terms of their preparation and support. Young children rarely have any say in who will act as their parent, but all of them need those adults to be the best parents that they are capable of becoming.

17. There are elements of WAVE’s 70/30 initiative that might be worth considering for inclusion in the Bill, if the Scottish Parliament desires a stronger focus on prevention and the earliest years. For example, 70/30 is undertaking work around: preconception health; foetal alcohol harm; infant social/emotional development (e.g. attunement and attachment); parental mental health; informed choices and explicit planning about parenthood (rather than ‘falling pregnant’); and, formal and informal education about parenthood and child development for students (most of whom are prospective parents). This is a primary prevention approach that could complement and extend the existing aims of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Again, WAVE Trust is available to assist the Education Committee and/or the Scottish Government in considering how such elements could also become part of this legislation.

18. Meet the need for both more health visitors and improved professional development/support for this group of Named Persons. Within GIRFEC, the Bill emphasises the Named Person element. WAVE agrees (as the Scottish Government’s accompanying documents state) that midwives should be first Named Persons and that there should be an overlap during the antenatal period with the health visitor who will become the Named Person upon that baby’s birth. WAVE suggests that health visitors be explicitly recognised as the Named Person for pre-school children in this Bill.

19. Equally important, WAVE recommends that this legislation ensure there will be a sufficient number of health visitors to properly carry out the responsibilities envisaged for them. Unlike the assumptions made in the Financial Memorandum accompanying this Bill, this will require more health visitors, lower caseloads and significant new pre-service and continuing education for this group of Named Persons. The relevant research is very clear and persuasive about the need not only for more health visitors, but also for this workforce to be better prepared, knowledgeable and skilled in both building positive, trusting relationships with mothers/fathers/carers and promoting/assessing the social/emotional development of young children.

20. Incorporate the entire UN Convention on the Rights of the Child into Scots law. WAVE supports going beyond the Bill’s limited approach. This will help ensure that all parties are likely to better understand all children’s rights and to take them seriously. For example, while Article 12 about the right of children and young people to have a say in decisions affecting them is well-known, others of particular relevance to child protection and preventing child maltreatment (such as Article 19) are rarely referenced or employed.

21. There is a window of opportunity open now in Scotland – particularly in relation to prevention and early years – that did not exist a decade ago and is not guaranteed still to exist a decade from now. Strong cross party agreement has been repeatedly expressed by the Scottish Parliament in favour of: preventative spending; anticipating and precluding child maltreatment from happening in the first place; and, giving priority to the earliest years of life.

22. Since the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is the most major piece of legislation likely to be considered by this Parliament, it represents an unequalled chance for these cross party agreements and priorities to be tangibly reflected in the laws of the nation. Truly ‘making Scotland the best place in which to grow up’ should start at the very beginning of every child’s life – and will be (and be perceived as) true, if and when Scotland becomes the least likely place in which to ever become burdened by child maltreatment. No legislation can guarantee that goal, but this legislation can still become even stronger in ways that significantly increase Scotland’s chances of success.

July 2013
Collective supplemental evidence to the Scottish Parliament about the Children and Young People Bill

Putting the Baby in the Bath Water:
Give priority to prevention and first 1,001 days

1. This document offers the shared views and recommendations of a wide variety of organisations and individuals (listed at the end). All the signatories appreciate the Scottish Parliament and Scottish Government’s desire to enact legislation that will move our nation closer to becoming ‘the best place to grow up’. We all share that goal and understand that the Children and Young People Bill is the one major legislative proposal since the Scottish Parliament was created that directly focuses on children’s rights, children’s services and the wellbeing of children and young people. It represents a crucial and welcome window of opportunity. We propose five additional ways to make the most of this opportunity.

2. It is a complex Bill of many parts. Our view is that when seen as a ‘jigsaw puzzle’, one fundamental piece is missing. The Bill does not provide a robust statutory foundation for positive action during the first 1,001 days of life (from pre-birth to age 2).

3. There is a disconnect between the case made for the Bill in its accompanying Policy Memorandum and actual provisions proposed within the Bill. We think this Bill, as introduced, should be amended to connect the dots between its Policy Memorandum and the Bill itself. Its excellent analysis of the wisdom of investing in the earliest years through preventative spending is not reflected in what this legislation actually proposes to do.

4. We do not believe that primary legislation is the only, or always the best, way of advancing policy, practice and positive results. However, this Bill is premised upon the belief that a statutory foundation is required for Getting It Right For Every Child (GIRFEC), children’s rights, early learning and childcare, as well as the care system for looked after children and young people. If this premise is correct, then it should apply equally to creating a strong statutory basis for positive, practical, prevention-oriented policies and practices that enhance the earliest months and years of childhood. Not to do so will predictably lead (over time) to the earliest years receiving lower priority and less support than other areas enjoying ‘must do’ status within public agendas and budgets.

5. Crafting the specific language is a task for MSPs, parliamentary staff and the Bill team. We strongly recommend five areas for improvement within this Bill:

- Government involvement in the initial training and continuing education of those working with the mothers/fathers/carers during the first 1,001 days of every child’s life should give priority to developing effective, positive, relationship-based support. The Government should also ensure that sufficient numbers of very skilled, knowledgeable, relationship-focused supporters for mothers/fathers/carers are available and sustained for at least these first 1,001 days. More and better support is necessary.

- Public bodies should be required to promote, and accord priority to, effective policies and actions that result in positive/secure attachment between very young children and their mothers/fathers/carers. Universal services and supports, supplemented and extended as needed, should be designed and delivered in ways that result in the healthy emotional, social, intellectual and physical development of all children from pre-birth to age 2 throughout Scotland.

- This Bill should require robust assessments/measures of the extent to which – and reasons why – positive/secure attachment and other key dimensions of healthy emotional, social, intellectual and physical development are (or are not) being achieved with all children (pre-birth to age 2) in Scotland. These assessments should create the evidence base that generates effective interventions benefitting young children and their families swiftly and fully.

- The Scottish Parliament should integrate prevention explicitly into the aims of children’s services planning already listed in the Bill. This should lead to meaningful planning for, and regular reporting of progress toward, a better balance between prevention and reaction by public bodies. Priority should be accorded to ‘primary prevention’, which keeps harm to young children in Scotland from happening in the first place.

- MSPs should act upon this unique chance to reinvent and reinvigorate the health visiting profession as an indispensable part of Scotland’s early years workforce.

6. None of these significant steps toward Scotland really becoming ‘the best place to grow up’ have been included in the Children and Young People Bill, as introduced. These are major omissions that could, and should, be corrected before this legislation is enacted.

7. These five recommended substantive improvements to the Bill are not just good ideas. There is an ever-expanding national and international body of evidence proving the case that what happens (or fails to happen) during the first 1,001 days of life has a powerful and enduring influence not only on the rest of every child’s life – but also on the wellbeing of our families, schools, communities, economy and society.

8. Put simply, there now is compelling evidence that: a) beyond genetics, parent/child relationships, in general, and the quality of attachment, in particular, shape brain development; b) such brain and central nervous development in very early childhood shapes lifelong attitudes and behaviours; and, c) these attitudes and behaviours shape everything from school success to criminality – and from employability to mental health problems or substance abuse.

9. Many of the signatories to this supplemental evidence have already provided such data and research findings to the Education Committee. Upon request, we can provide additional information – as well as specific suggestions about how and where to build our recommendations into this Bill. Prevention, preparation and support for the earliest years of life are matters that should no longer be subject to the changing preferences of, and pressures upon, successive national and local governments. Only as part of Scots law can these cornerstones of a healthy, fair and successful Scotland take their rightful place on the ‘must do’ list for public policy and governmental action.

10. In summary, we, collectively and individually, encourage the Scottish Parliament to literally ‘put the baby in the bath water’ by adding these missing elements to this Bill. Doing so will make preventative spending and pragmatic, positive action during the first 1,001 days of life a reality, rather than remaining a good intention outwith its boundaries.

September 2013
Summary of Young Scot and Scottish Youth Parliament Consultation Activity
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Introduction and Background

Young Scot and the Scottish Youth Parliament (SYP) were approached by the Scottish Government to undertake a large scale consultation with young people aged 11-25 on the issues raised in ‘A Scotland for Children’. We undertook the following activities:

- A National Survey to gauge quantitative views and opinions from young people, based on the issues identified in ‘A Scotland for Children’. The survey received a total of 1,445 responses, both online and offline between 8th August and 17th September 2012.
- Seven Dialogue Groups between 31st August and 2nd October to gather qualitative views from specific groups of young people, including young homeless, young people in secure accommodation, young people with life-limiting medical conditions, LGBT young people, young Muslim females and young mums.

Prior to this, SYP and Young Scot conducted consultation activity on the draft Rights of Children and Young people Bill in autumn 2011. This included the following activity:

- Consultation session with Members of the Scottish Youth Parliament (MSYPs) at the October 2011 SYP National Sitting.
- An online survey and three local workshops on issues contained in the consultation, which saw a total of 94 responses.

The 2011 SYP Youth Manifesto ‘Change the Picture’, created following a mass consultation which saw 42,804 responses from young people, included a statement relevant to the Committee’s consideration of the Bill. This document summarises the findings of these consultation activities.

‘A Scotland for Children’ consultation activities

To enable analysis and comparison of the findings from the National Survey and the Dialogue Groups, the proposals in ‘A Scotland for Children’ were grouped into four themes.

Theme 1: Rights and Wellbeing of Children and Young People

- 53.2% of survey respondents had little or no awareness of the rights given to them by the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, with 38.9% reporting that they had ‘never heard of the UNCRC before now’. Almost all participants in Dialogue Groups had not heard of the UNCRC.
- 60.8% of survey respondents agreed that the Scottish Government should ‘be required by law to make sure that children and young people are aware of the rights given to them by the UNCRC’.
• 62.1% of respondents thought that SCCYP should ‘be able to carry out an investigation on behalf of individual children and young people who contact him if their rights aren’t being respected.’
• 90.2% thought that the SHANARRI Wellbeing Indicators were a good definition of children and young people’s wellbeing.

Theme 2: Wellbeing and Public Bodies

• 63.9% agreed that ‘public bodies in a local area should be required by law to work together to ensure that children and young people’s wellbeing is improved’
• 53.3% thought that ‘public bodies should be required to put together and publish reports on how they’re making sure that they’re taking into account children and young people’s wellbeing when delivering services.’
• In the Dialogue Groups there was support for a duty for joint working between public bodies, but a mixed reaction to the requirement to publish a report. Some participants felt that it would require agencies to demonstrate how they are planning services with young people in mind, whilst others felt that public bodies reporting on their own activities would lie, would begrudge writing the report and would treat it as a ‘box-ticking’ exercise.

Theme 3: Caring for Children and Young People

• 50.9% thought that ‘changing the law to make sure there is a Named Person for every child and young person [was] a good idea.’
• When asked about the responsibilities a Named Person should have, the most options which were most popular with young people were: being the young person’s first point of contact if they are looking for advice or information about their wellbeing (chosen by 45.7% of respondents); being their parents’ or carer’s first point of contact for advice or information about their wellbeing (35.2%); to make sure their views are being taken into account when decisions about their wellbeing are made (33.9%) and to work with them, their parents and other agencies to co-ordinate and plan any support they might require (29%).
• The options of the Named Person being responsible for being a point of contact for other professionals who might have concerns about the young person’s wellbeing (25.6%) and deciding what information needs to be shared, balancing up a need to protect their wellbeing and respect their privacy (24.3%) were chosen by fewer participants than fictional options we included for comparison.
• Concerns were expressed in some of the Dialogue Groups regarding confidentiality and information-sharing. A number of participants had experience of situations where personal information had been shared between agencies and services or retained without their permission and discussions about private information taking place in the presence of their family members.
• The majority of the Dialogue Groups agreed that it was important that young people have the right and ability to influence the identity of their Named Person. One group in particular felt strongly that young people should have the right to request a different Named Person if they don’t like working with the one they have been assigned.

Theme 4: Looked-After and In Need Young People

- 77% of survey respondents thought that having one single Child’s Plan would make at least some difference ‘in improving things for young people who are in need or looked after’.
- When asked what the most effective ways of involvement in the Plan’s development would be, the most effective option in the view of survey participants was to give young people and their families the right to be asked for their views, with a majority of all participants (53%) selecting this option. The next most popular options related to the plan being clear and easy to understand (‘have the right to ask for the information in a format or a way that they can understand’ with 38.3% and ‘be given a copy of the plan in a format of their choice’ with 33.5%).
- There was some evidence from the online survey of a balance of responsibilities being best, which was also raised by one of the Dialogue Groups. The group agreed that ideally the plan “should be 50/50 between professionals and the child and their family. Everyone should work together.”
- Survey respondents were roughly evenly split between those who thought the care leaving age should stay at 21 (36.4%) and those who thought it should be older (26.5% for 25, and a number of others choosing a range of ages older than 22, including a number who thought it should be available up to the age of 30 or ‘until it is no longer required’.)
- In the Dialogue Groups, there was strong support for the age of after-care support being raised to 25, with participants in one group commenting that they had been ‘dropped like a hot potato at the age of 21’.

Specific questions for young people with experience of being in care.

We asked online survey participants who indicated that they were in care or looked-after, how much difference defining corporate parenting, as described in ‘A Scotland for Children’, in law would make to the services they receive. In total, this represented just over 450 participants, although this may be slightly inflated by some participants misunderstanding ‘looked after at home’ which had a particularly high number of respondents (32.6% of the total). A further indicator of this may the high proportion of respondents declaring themselves to be ‘not sure’ (45% of those answering the question). To try and account for this, the percentages displayed below include the total of all answering the question, and the percentage of those selecting an answer other than ‘not sure’.

- The largest group felt that including the definition of corporate parenting, as set out in ‘A Scotland for Children’ in law would ‘make a big difference to the services I receive’ (21.4% of all answering, 39% of those with an answer other than ‘not sure’.) The next largest group felt it would be a good idea, but with a different definition (12.1% or 22.1%), with 8.8% (or 16.1%) feeling it would make a small difference.
- We asked respondents which public bodies or agencies they thought this might apply to personally. The most popular options were the NHS or Health Board (29.1%), their local authority (28.3%), the Scottish Government (25.4%). Other options with some support included Children’s Hearing’s Scotland (15.2%), the Scottish Social Service Council (13.7%) and the Care Inspectorate (11.3%). 6.4% of respondents thought none of the options would apply to them personally, with a significant percentage ‘not sure’ (48.1%). On the whole, there seems to be a reasonable degree of support for including the definition proposed in ‘A Scotland for Children’ in law as a definition of corporate parenting. Given the range of agencies young people felt would apply to them personally, the list in the consultation document would seem appropriate.

- We asked those online survey respondents that indicated that they were in kinship care (29 respondents) whether there was a need for a change in the law so that a family member that cares for them is seen as having the same rights and responsibilities as their parents whilst they’re living with them. 45% felt that it should be with just 7% disagreeing. 48% were not sure.
- When we asked respondents whether there should be a change to help kinship carers access support from local authorities or other agencies, 48% were in favour with 10% opposed. 41% were unsure.

Rights of Children and Young People Bill consultation activities

Scottish Youth Parliament National Sitting

SYP ran a consultation session based on the proposals in the Rights of Children and Young People Bill with our MSYPs at our October 2011 National Sitting. 92 MSYPs took part in a discussion on the proposals, before answering a series of questions as follows:

- When asked how well they thought children and young people’s rights were respected in Scotland, 48% thought the current situation was ‘OK’, 24% thought they were well-respected and 28% thought children and young people’s rights were not well respected.
- 64% thought the law should ‘fully incorporate the UNCRC’, with 23% thinking it should ‘require the Scottish Government to have due regard to the UNCRC’.
- When asked what age the proposals should cover, 39% thought they should cover children and young people up to the age of 18; 14% up to ‘21 if they had been looked after’; 17% up to ‘21 even if they haven’t been looked after’; and 26% ‘another age older than 21’ (25 was commonly mentioned in open discussion).
- 54% thought the proposals would make ‘a small difference’ to the lives of children and young people in general, with 21% thinking they would make ‘a major difference’ and 26% ‘no difference at all’.
- 48% thought the proposals would make ‘a small difference’ the way Children’s Services were delivered; 13% thought they would make ‘a major difference’ and 26% ‘no difference at all’.

Survey and Workshops
Young Scot and SYP also devised questions for an online inquiry on the Rights of Children and Young People Bill. Young Scot hosted the survey and carried out three participative workshops, engaging a total of 94 young people. The findings included:

- Many of the young people who took part were unaware of what the United Nations Convention of the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) is, which is a large focus of this Bill. Therefore it made it difficult for them to fully understand how the Bill could make a difference and have a positive impact on their lives.
- Many young people did feel that this Bill could make some difference to how Children’s Services are delivered and how young people receive them but the workshop participants (young people from minority ethnic backgrounds, those who are looked after or accommodated, have a disability or have additional learning needs) did not see this.
- The concept of ‘due regard’ was something that they found hard to understand, especially as it only related to Scottish Ministers and not staff in public services. Rather than the UNCRC being given ‘due regard’ they felt that it should be fully incorporated by the Scottish Government as this will have more of an impact on the lives of children and young people.
- The Scottish Government propose to raise the age of young people covered under this Bill to 21 if they have been in care. There was agreement that it was important to support those who need it most but that it was desirable for all young people up to the age of 21 to be covered.

SYP Youth Manifesto

The Scottish Youth Parliament’s Youth Manifesto 2011-16, ‘Change the Picture’ was created by direct consultation with young people on a series of policy statements. The Youth Manifesto, which saw a total of 42,804 responses from young people shapes SYP’s policy and campaigning activity. Though several of the statements have some relevance to the issues raises, the following statement is of direct relevance to the Bill:

“Young people are entitled to as much protection of their human rights as the law can give them. This means the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) should be given more force in Scots law.” 85% of respondents agreed with the statement, 6% disagreed with 9% ‘not sure’.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Your Voice

1. This submission proposes a right of access to Independent Advocacy for Scotland’s looked after and accommodated children and young people.

2. Your Voice provides Independent Advocacy to vulnerable children and young people from North Lanarkshire, and is a member of the Scottish Government’s National Steering Group on Advocacy for Children and Young People.

3. The Scottish Government recently said that Independent Advocacy ‘is vital in…effectively supporting people to ensure their views are taken into account and that they are heard’ and is ‘a crucial element in achieving social justice’\(^1\). Scots laws on mental health\(^2\) and on children’s hearings\(^3\) reflect the importance of advocacy and entitle the majority of Scotland’s most vulnerable children and young people to use advocacy services.

4. Independent Advocacy’s function is to ensure that the child is at the centre in all decision making, a fundamental principle of Getting it right for every child\(^4\). Independent Advocacy is key to the wellbeing of vulnerable children and young people, and to the culture change that Getting it right requires. However, there is no mention of Independent Advocacy in the main bill for Getting it right, the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

5. This Bill proposes a duty on Ministers to raise awareness and understanding of children’s rights. The provision of Independent Advocacy is a highly effective, practical means of raising this awareness and understanding.

6. Scotland’s flagship children’s rights legislation could easily incorporate a right to Independent Advocacy as a practice-level mechanism for safeguarding children’s rights. The majority of Scotland’s most vulnerable children already have access to independent advocacy\(^5\).

7. In Scots law, children and young people with learning disability or mental ill health have a right of access to Independent Advocacy\(^6\). There is reason to believe that the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act could incorporate a right of access to Independent Advocacy for looked after and accommodated children and young people within existing budgets. Across Scotland, advocacy was available to looked after and accommodated children and young people in 30 of Scotland’s 32 local authority areas in 2011-12, and in 29 of these authorities that advocacy was independent\textsuperscript{7}. There is no evidence of a general cost difference between independent and non-independent advocacy.

8. For this new right to take effect, one local authority would need to move from non-independent to independent advocacy provision (based on 2011-12 data). The two local authority areas which had no advocacy provision for looked-after and accommodated children and young people did have spend on Independent Advocacy in 2011-12, for adults\textsuperscript{8}.

9. Recommissioning of advocacy services tends to take place routinely and in quite short cycles. The required changes could take effect within a short timeframe, at no additional cost, and with no new requirement on most of Scotland’s health boards and local authorities.

Introduction

1. YouthLink Scotland is the national agency for youth work. It is a membership organisation and is in the unique position of representing the interests and aspirations of the whole of the sector, both voluntary and statutory. This evidence does not claim to be the position of any one individual member organisation, or of all member organisations. Individual organisations may hold views which differ from the opinions presented here. We have consulted with our membership on this evidence, in line with our consultation response protocol, and the submission incorporates the views of those members who responded to the request for feedback.

General comments

2. Overall we welcome the Scottish Government’s commitment to furthering the rights and wellbeing of children and young people. However, the decision not to undertake a Child Rights Impact Assessment (CRIA) on the Bill should be reconsidered. A CRIA would help to ensure that children and young people’s rights underpin all aspects of the Bill. Moreover, it would help to identify provisions which could potentially infringe children’s rights.

3. The children’s services provisions do not consistently reference young people’s rights, which suggests that rights are being compartmentalised rather than seen as an over-arching framework. The Bill should include more about awareness-raising on its provisions and the considerable impact these are likely to have on the children’s and young people’s sectors.

4. We have some concerns around the role of the third sector, as the term ‘service providers’ is used inconsistently. When the Bill talks about planning and design, it seems to exclude voluntary sector organisations who do not deliver services under contract to a local authority, and only specifically includes them when discussing the delivery of services.

UNCRC

5. The Bill only requires Ministers to ‘keep under consideration whether there are any steps which they could take which would or might secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC’ As currently worded, this duty is too weak and could create loopholes, and as such is unlikely to fulfil the Scottish Government’s policy objective of furthering the UNCRC and giving it a firmer basis in legislation.

6. Instead, we believe that the Bill should incorporate the UNCRC into Scots Law. This would provide the best means of supporting the wellbeing and rights of young people and their families, and would provide an overarching, consistent approach to ensure that rights inform all areas of policy and practice. It would also send out a strong message about the importance that Scotland places on children and young people and their rights. We support the views of Together, the Scottish Alliance for Children’s Rights, in relation to this section of the Bill, and refer to their evidence for further detail.

7. Incorporation would also have the benefit of strengthening young people’s right to access educational, cultural and leisure activities which meet their needs (Articles 29 and 31). This would provide a basis for equal access to youth work opportunities across Scotland. All young people should be able to access a range of opportunities, regardless of where they live, but this is not currently the case, as noted in the Scottish Government’s evidence to the UK’s forthcoming report on the implementation of the UNCRC. Young people highlight youth work as a priority, yet the evidence shows that the availability of opportunities is inconsistent.¹

8. Regardless of the level of regard that is decided upon, the Bill should extend the duty on UNCRC to public bodies, not just Ministers. It is public bodies who deliver the services that directly affect young people’s lives – e.g. housing, transport, education – and this is where the opportunity to ‘make rights real’ lies.

Scotland’s Commissioner for Children & Young People (SCCYP)

9. We welcome the extension of SCCYP’s powers so that it can undertake investigations on behalf of individual young people. However, there are concerns over whether SCCYP has the capacity and resources to undertake such investigations. Moreover, this is a reasonably high-level means of resolving problems, and it is essential that young people also have access to means of redress that are local and less formal. There are also broader issues around young people’s ability to access Legal Aid and the availability of advocacy services which are suited to their needs.

10. The Bill only requires service providers to respond to SCCYP’s recommendations, which lacks teeth. Rights need to be enforced, otherwise there is a risk that they will become meaningless. At the very least, Parliament should be required to consider the Commissioner’s investigative reports.

Shared planning

11. It is unclear how the shared planning provisions will link to the Public Bodies (Joint Working) Bill. This Bill requires adult health and social care services to integrate, and also makes it possible to integrate children’s services. In some areas of Scotland, children’s services could end up being integrated, but not in others. This means that the shared children’s service planning provisions will have to link up to these new models – which could be complex as areas will take varying approaches to integration.

12. We are also uncertain as to how the Bill will link to Community Planning Partnerships and Single Outcome Agreements (SOAs). Community Planning Partnerships should ensure that SOAs are compatible with the children’s services plan, and that the plan is reflected in the defined outcomes and indicators of the SOA. The Bill requires local authorities and health boards to agree the children’s services plan. If shared children’s services planning is integrated with CPPs, however, then other organisations will also need to be involved in the planning. We welcome this, but the Bill will need to address this inconsistency.

13. Shared planning must also be linked to the Requirements for Community Learning and Development (Scotland) Regulations 2013. These regulations require education authorities to undertake an assessment of community learning and development needs in their area, and to publish three year plans accordingly. It is imperative that these assessments and plans take full account of children and young people’s needs, and that, in turn, children’s services planning takes full cognisance of the role and contribution of community learning and development.

14. The Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill aims to improve community engagement in community planning processes. If, as argued above, shared children’s service planning is to be part of community planning processes, then that will need to be reflected in this Bill.

Named Person

15. A much clearer understanding of how the Lead Professional and the Named Person roles will work together is required. In section 28, there is a need for a new clause which clearly sets out the relationship, underpinned by statutory guidance defining each role.

16. Young people should be made aware of who their Named Person is, and how to contact them. They should be able to have a say about who the Named Person is, and to challenge the allocation if they so wish. This is particularly important where there is a breakdown in the relationship. However, there needs to be a balance, and the guidance accompanying the Bill should provide clarity for both parties regarding the nature of the relationship.

17. There should be a set limit on the number of children and young people that any one Named Person is responsible for. Otherwise, caseloads could become unmanageable and the relationship rendered meaningless.

18. The financial memorandum assumes that for children and young people of school age, the Named Person will be a teacher. However, this is not explicitly stated in the Bill, which only requires the Named Person to be an employee of the ‘service provider’ (defined as the local authority). The legislation could be clarified so that voluntary sector organisations are included in the definition of service provider, and so that there is the option for professionals working with young people but who are not teachers to undertake the Named Person role, if appropriate and wanted by both parties. There also needs to be clarity over the arrangements for providing the Named Person service during the school holidays when teachers may be unavailable.

19. This section does not take full account of the position of vulnerable young people who are disengaged from the formal education system, as provision for continuation of the Named Person service is only made for young people who have reached 18 and are still attending school or are in secure accommodation. What about young people who leave school at 16 and are not in education, employment or training? These young people would still benefit from a Named Person service. However it would not be appropriate for a school teacher to be the Named Person for a young person in this position. This is why the issue of which professionals can deliver the Named Person service needs to be more clearly addressed in the Bill. There should also be greater clarity over who would provide the Named Person service for young people from Travelling Communities.

Child’s Plan

20. Redress mechanisms are lacking from these provisions. If it is decided that a Child’s Plan is not needed for an individual young person, can they challenge this so that they can access the support they need? Review mechanisms are also needed in order to ascertain whether the Plan is working and what impact it is having in relation to the young person’s outcomes.

21. The Bill only makes provision for seeking young people’s views on their Plan ‘where reasonably practicable’, which does not go far enough, and is not the same as acting in line with those views. Instead, authorities should be required to obtain the child or young person’s views, in a manner that is appropriate for their age and maturity (although maturity should not be used as an excuse to disregard young people’s views).

22. The Child’s Plan must address transition. It should take full account of how service providers intend to support young people through transition periods, and should start to look at transition arrangements at an early stage, as this is more likely to result in positive outcomes.

Information sharing

23. The Named Person and Child’s Plan provisions require extensive information-sharing between service providers where a child or young person is assessed as having a ‘wellbeing need’. This is a significant lowering of the previous threshold, which requires the sharing of information when there is a risk of ‘significant harm’. The Privacy Impact Assessment identifies a number of high-level risks in relation to these provisions, including the possibility that information could be shared with the wrong people or disclosed/accessed inappropriately, and that inappropriate or incorrect information could be recorded and shared. There are also questions regarding how long this information will ‘follow’ a young person around. It would be inappropriate for this information to extend into adulthood. How and when files on individual young people will be closed and disposed of? Will this be after a set period of time, or after the young person reaches a specified age, or will it be at the Named Person or Lead Professional’s discretion?

24. The Bill must do more to protect young people’s right to confidentiality and privacy, which they have under the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) in addition to the UNCRC. The views of young people and their families on information sharing must be sought and taken into account, and their consent given. The guidance accompanying these provisions must be clear and robust, and complaint mechanisms must be accessible and young-person friendly so that there is an appropriate means of redress. We support the views expressed by SCCYP, NSPCC Scotland, cl@n childlaw and CELCIS in their briefing on confidentiality and information sharing, which provides further detail on this issue.

Early learning and childcare

25. We support the provisions, but would argue that children and young people need support and access to suitable opportunities at all ages and stages of development, not just in the early years. It is crucial that non-statutory services such as youth work do not see their budgets cut in order to fund the early learning and childcare provisions.

26. Under the UNCRC, young people have the right to access educational, cultural and leisure activities which meet their needs (Articles 29 and 31). Youth work enhances learning and development and is highly valued by young people, who deem it a priority. However, the availability of opportunities for young people is inconsistent and patchy. Equal access to youth work opportunities across Scotland would strengthen this part of the Bill, as it would further young people’s rights while at the same time supporting parents by providing safe and appropriate activities for young people outside of school hours. The level of provision could be determined through statutory guidance.

Aftercare

27. The provisions on aftercare are to be welcomed as they place a duty on local authorities to provide support to care leavers up until their 26th birthday; however, we would seek to strengthen the provisions by amending the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, so that local authorities are required to offer through-care and aftercare to young people who have been looked-after at any point. Aftercare supports young people through transition periods and can help them to reach a positive destination. At present, if a young person is no longer being looked-after when they turn 16, there is no duty on the local authority to provide aftercare, even if the young person was removed from a care order only a few days before their 16th birthday. Given the extremely poor outcomes for care leavers, it is vitally important that we do all we can to support young people in this position.

Counselling

28. Evidence suggests a real demand for this type of support, especially from parents of teenagers. However it would appear from the financial memorandum that this measure will only apply to families ‘with children in distress’. The legislation needs to be clearer about the eligibility criteria. Furthermore, we would argue that support is needed much earlier in the process before a child or young person gets to the stage of distress.

Wellbeing

29. We welcome the decision to place wellbeing on a more formal footing and to define wellbeing in relation to the SHANARRI indicators. However, the term ‘wellbeing needs’, which is used in the Bill in relation to the Child’s Plan, could be interpreted in a number of different ways by service providers. All children and young people could be considered to have ‘wellbeing needs’. It is also unclear as to how wellbeing needs could enforced in the way that rights can, and we have concerns that the term could effectively be meaningless.

Committee Memorandum on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and the Public Bodies (Joint Working) Scotland Bill

INTRODUCTION

The Committee reports to the Education and Culture Committee and the Health and Sport Committee as follows—

1. The Local Government and Regeneration Committee agreed to take evidence at Stage 1 on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill in relation to the delivery of local government services. Both bills include proposals for joint working between local government and public bodies. Our main focus of interest in the Bills is the proposals for integrating and sharing public services. The proposals for the integration of public services are inextricably linked to issues covered in recent and ongoing inquiry work, particularly the public service reform inquiry.

COMMITTEE INTEREST

Introduction

2. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (“the CYP Bill”), aims to put children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services and ensure that their rights are respected across the public sector. Part 3 of the CYP Bill aims to improve the way in which services support children and families by promoting cooperation between planning children’s services, placing the child at the centre of this process.

3. The Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill (“the PBJW Bill”), provides the framework which will support improvement of the quality and consistency of health and social care services through the integrated delivery of health and social care in Scotland. This framework permits integration of other local authority services with health services.

4. Our interested is in how the Bills, with related key aims, complement each other and work together to help deliver and support the Public Service Reform agenda.

Approach

5. We agreed to consider those parts of the Bills relevant to its remit. We did not issue its own call for evidence but included questions in the Health and Sport Committee call for evidence, as lead committee for the PBJW Bill. For the CYP Bill, we considered evidence submissions received by the Education and Culture Committee, the lead committee for this Bill.
6. We targeted specific organisations to supply written evidence given the Bills may have an impact on them. Written submissions were received from—

- Association on Directors of Education in Scotland;
- Argyll and Bute Council;
- Audit Scotland on behalf of the Auditor General for Scotland and the Accounts Commission;
- Coalition of Care and Support Providers (CCPS);
- Children in Scotland;
- Children’s Hearings Scotland;
- COSLA;
- GPs at the Deep End;
- Housing Coordinating Group;
- Midlothian Community Planning Partnership;
- NHS Ayrshire and Arran;
- Police Scotland;
- Royal College of General Practitioners;
- Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (SFRS);
- UNICEF UK, and
- West Lothian Community Planning Partnership.

7. We took oral evidence from relevant witnesses in a single evidence session on Wednesday 4 September 2013—

- NHS Ayrshire and Arran;
- GPs at the Deep End;
- East Ayrshire Council;
- North Ayrshire Council, and
- Housing Coordinating Group.

8. Finally, we then took oral evidence from the Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing, Alex Neil MSP (“the Cabinet Secretary”) and the Minister for Children and Young People, Aileen Campbell MSP (“the Minister”) jointly, on both Bills.

9. Our findings and recommendations are reported to the respective lead committees, and to the Parliament, in this memorandum.

FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Is there a consistency of approach across legislation?

10. Our recent inquiry into Public Services Reform in Scotland\(^1\) had a strong focus on partnership, joint working and shared services in line with the Christie Commission recommendations. A significant part of that work was looking at Community Planning Partnerships (“CPPs”) which are a key delivery agent in driving forward public service reform. During that inquiry we were informed that the forthcoming Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill (“CER Bill”) will include provisions strengthening relationships and responsibilities of partners in CPPs in order to improve accountability and ultimately enhance joint working.

11. We expect to be the lead committee for consideration of the forthcoming CER Bill and have noted that the provisions requiring joint or integrated working in the PBJW Bill and the CYP Bill are inextricably linked. They all share the overarching purpose of public sector reform.

12. Evidence taken by us generally acknowledges the desirability of better integration of services while ensuring that the approaches taken to integration across the public sector remain compatible. Evidence highlighted actions that need to be undertaken to ensure that links and relationships between the new partnerships, CPPs and Single Outcome Agreements work.

13. Consultation responses on Part 3 of the CYP Bill referred to the need for a linkage to other legislation, in particular the PBJW Bill, the forthcoming CER Bill and recent legislation on self-directed support. There was concern that between the CYP Bill and the PBJW Bill, two processes for service planning were being established. The Royal College of Nursing suggested that this showed 'little strategic thinking' 2. Disability groups highlighted their particular concern for well integrated systems of service provision across age groups, policy areas and geographical areas.

14. Both the Cabinet Secretary and the Minster in evidence stated similar aims for their Bills, principally ‘improving outcomes for service user’ while recognising that the approach taken differed. The Bills, we were told, “complement one another” 3 and “will streamline structures and make it easier to see the focus for partnership working” 4.

15. The Cabinet Secretary in evidence told us that—

“...the umbrella for all of this is the Government’s guiding principles and strategic objectives, which include not only community empowerment and renewal but public sector reform, to ensure that better-quality services are delivered more cost effectively and timeously; patient-centred healthcare and social care; and, indeed, person-centred education. Those underlying principles are not restricted to my bill, Aileen Campbell’s bill or Derek Mackay’s community empowerment bill; they are universal and part and parcel of our broad principled agenda for changing Scotland for the better.” 5

16. COSLA noted clear links between the PBJW and the integration of adult health and social care services and suggested that it was possible “some local partnerships may wish to consider the inclusion of children’s services in those arrangements.” 6

6 COSLA written submission:
17. We support the drive for public services reform and recognise the desirability of taking a flexible approach, endeavouring to identify an approach which fits the particular policy.

18. Argyll and Bute Council noted—

“…implementation of joint working will require a major culture change for both the Local Authority and our NHS colleagues, there will need to be changes in behaviours and attitudes and a willingness to overcome obstacles, driven by strong and enthusiastic leadership. We need to improve on staff and community involvement and overcome risk aversion to achieve truly customer-led service delivery. We also face financial and logistical challenges, particularly given the rurality of our environment; however it is clear that unless we achieve both economies of scale and economies of skill, through this opportunity for joint working, we will not be able to meet the demographic-demand challenges of the future.”

19. We agree with the sentiments expressed in that comment. We would like to see a mechanism put in place to monitor and review the approaches taken to ensure that lessons can be learned across portfolios and best practice identified across the boards. We note the submission by Audit Scotland which states that “it is essential that services are able to work well together to respond to needs whilst making the best use of existing resources and delivering high quality services.”

20. In the following section we consider specific system issues raised in evidence.

System issues

21. A number of ‘system’ issues were raised in evidence which were categorised by one witness as “strategic planning systems”. These included the necessity for processes to communicate well with each other and about duplication of statutory frameworks requiring multiple plans for children.

22. We heard from NHS Ayrshire and Arran that—

23. In our recent work we have increasingly been hearing about benefits accruing from co-location of buildings and people. East Ayrshire indicated that “co-location of certain services has been a really positive move”.\textsuperscript{11} Although it was made clear that while co-location is helpful, the key is improved information sharing. This is true for both electronic communications, but better yet, and more simple, by professionals talking to one another. Co-location can of course assist this process, but is not a prerequisite for conversations and information sharing to take place.

24. Written evidence from GP’s at the Deep End noted that—

25. Collaboration between GPs and other partners exists on many different levels. Working collaboratively promotes a collective determination to reach objectives where sharing information and experiences contributes to a more detailed local knowledge of individual patients and their families. This is vital to planning effective support services for patients, addressing their unmet health needs and anticipating when they will need to access specialized services.\textsuperscript{13}

26. The Cabinet Secretary indicated that he “would not like to prescribe that co-location is always a prerequisite to approving any delivery plan” before adding that “in the examples that I have seen, co-location is definitely very advantageous.”\textsuperscript{14}

27. \textbf{We welcome all moves towards co-location of services recognising local solutions are required to meet local needs.} We agree with the evidence of NHS Ayrshire and Arran that—

“good communication and professionals talking to professionals to ensure that we are talking the same language and that we understand the issues will be critical to the whole process.”\textsuperscript{15}

The role of GPs

28. The evidence we received from GPs at the Deep End highlighted the central and critical role that doctors can, and do, have with those affected by these Bills—

“General practice is the main public service that is in regular contact with virtually the whole of the general population, with substantial cumulative knowledge and experience of people’s problems and consistently reported high levels of public trust. These intrinsic features make General Practices the natural hubs around which integrated care should be based, with groups of General Practices supported, within the context of local service

\textsuperscript{13} Ibid.
planning, to deliver integrated care in partnership with secondary care, area-based NHS services, social work and community organisations.”

29. In evidence the Cabinet Secretary was keen to stress the role that the health sector will play under the PBJW Bill and referenced work that had been commissioned by government to look at where the public health function would sit in future. We encourage this approach and urge that the role of GPs as key partners is embedded into development, planning and delivery under both Bills.

Role for the Housing Sector [Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill]

30. In evidence to us the Housing Coordinating Group made an eloquent plea for greater recognition and inclusion on the face of the PBJW Bill as a partner within integrated authorities. Suggesting that the success of the new integrated authorities—

“…will largely depend on effective joint strategic commissioning to which the housing sector can make a crucial contribution. The current arrangements for involving the housing sector have not produced a consistent nor adequate approach and the Bill, as it stands, could result in an ‘integrated authority’ deciding not to involve the housing sector as a partner. To ensure that housing issues, and the housing sector, form an integral part of contributing to the delivery of national outcomes, the HCG urges that the contribution of the housing sector be recognised within the legislation, urging the new ‘integrated authorities’ to involve their strategic housing partners.”

31. Going on to say that—

“Housing providers offer varying levels of care and/or support to vulnerable adults and older people, and have long been committed to working with colleagues in health and social care to enable people to continue living in the community rather than institutional settings. There are examples where this has happened already and the Bill could promote this approach more widely across the country. The housing sector has much to contribute to this agenda.”

32. The Housing Coordinating Group expressed concerns that they may not be involved by new integrated authorities at the strategic level stating that “proper engagement with the housing sector in both planning and delivery will be required.”

20 Ibid.
33. The Cabinet Secretary agreed it was essential that the housing sector be involved, noting that there is a stream of work ongoing—

“…to best ensure that the housing function is involved at grass-roots level in the partnerships. It may not necessarily be the case that housing bodies are separately represented on partnership boards, but I think that the most important element is what happens in the localities underneath the partnership board area. That is where the close working relationship between health, social work and housing is vital.”

34. The Minister also emphasised the specific requirement to consult social landlords at section 10 of the CYP Bill when preparing a children’s plan.

35. We agree that the housing sector need not be represented on partnership boards in all cases, but would expect that in situations when housing is likely to be central to the delivery of successful partnership working, they are involved at board level.

Measuring outcomes, costs and benefits

36. Both Bills seek to set in place policies which have the aim of improving outcomes for users, carers and their families. The PBJW Bill seeks to plan and deliver quality and sustainable care services. Similarly the CYP Bill through early intervention and preventative spend is also intended to produce benefits both in the short and also increasingly the long term.

37. This has challenges in measuring outcomes and benefits as Jim Carle eloquently described—“Public organisations are quite used to looking for short-term gains over one, two or three years, but we are not used to looking at someone who will be born today and the benefits for them or the reduction in their uptake of services in later life.”

38. Children in Scotland suggested “that current performance and reporting requirements are linked to earlier, specific policies and strategies and they may not reflect the shift of focus towards prevention, early intervention and the early years.”

39. Audit Scotland in their submission on behalf of the Auditor General for Scotland and the Accounts Commission suggested that looking ahead—

“Any outcome measures must be transparently reported and available to the public and this information should be used to drive improvement. National measures are useful but partners also need a mechanism for ensuring local needs and priorities are met and for measuring the difference that specific services are making to the individual.”

40. We explored how outcomes and benefits can be measured. Witnesses agreed that numbers are available but that they focus on costs, are generally short term measuring the impacts of existing services. It is “harder to look at less tangible issues such as wellbeing in communities and longitudinal things”.

41. The Cabinet Secretary in response noted that outcomes are not on the face of the PBJW Bill for two reasons—

“One is that outcomes change. The outcomes that you would set today would be very different from the outcomes that you would have set, say, five years ago. I suspect that they would also be very different from what they would be in five or 10 years’ time as service provision changes—how we do things in these fields changes continually. Therefore, if you put the outcomes in the bill, you would need to introduce primary legislation every time you wanted to amend them. The national outcomes will be set out in secondary legislation.”

42. We are content that outcomes should not be placed on the face of either Bill for the reasons given. We draw the Scottish Government’s attention to the Audit Scotland submission and we will, as part of our ongoing work in scrutinising benchmarking by local authorities, look closely at the measures introduced and crucially how they are used to learn from others and improve performance.

The role of CPPs

43. Since we published our original report on Public Services Reform the Scottish Government have advised that community planning has been significantly strengthened. Recent review work by the Accounts Commission for Scotland and Auditor General for Scotland, together with internal quality assurance processes, have identified a range of key strengths as well as some key areas for development which chime with some of our findings.

44. CPPs will have key roles to play if the overarching aims of these Bills are to be realised. We note the views of Audit Scotland, on behalf of the Auditor General for Scotland and the Accounts Commission for Scotland in their submission that—27 Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 4 Sept 2013 Col 2533.

“There is a need for a clear articulation of how these new arrangements fit with CPPs given the significant leadership and co-ordinating role for local public services that the Scottish Government/COSLA see for CPPs in their Statement of Ambition for Community Planning and Single Outcome Agreements.”

45. We heard in evidence how well the North Ayrshire Council CPP works with their integrated children’s services partnership. We note that the forthcoming CER Bill will seek to strengthen further the roles and responsibilities of partners in CPPs. In the meantime we consider it important that the Scottish Government provide clarity around implementation of the Bills and how they fit with the role of CPPs in the new partnerships and arrangements.

Consultation with service users and role of third sector

46. In our recent work we have taken a close interest in the extent to which service users are consulted and the methods used to engage them. We have been critical of engagement practices, in particular tendencies towards doing things to people as opposed to undertaking meaningful consultation. We note that neither Bill requires consultation at the level of individual service users although we were told by the Cabinet Secretary that for the PBJW Bill—

“The planning and delivery principles in the bill encapsulate the Christie commission’s principles by putting the person at the centre of service planning and delivery and require a focus on prevention and anticipatory care planning.”

47. We acknowledge that both Bills require levels of consultation and were pleased to be told that “it is essential that we have real engagement with local communities” and of the need “for communities to inform professional practice”.

48. The Minister indicated that guidance will make the role of the child and family “explicitly clear”.

49. The Cabinet Secretary responded to criticisms we received from the third sector, for example the Coalition of Care and Support Providers in Scotland, about the lack of community involvement in the PBJW Bill at the planning, design and delivery stages. He indicated that he envisaged the third and independent sector being represented on boards in every case. Adding that involvement in service redesign and consultation exercises “will be required”.

50. We note the determination of the Scottish Government to involve service users and the third sector at every stage, we recognise this need not be set out on the face of the Bills and expect guidance to make the roles of all parties clear. We are interested in what role the National Community Planning Group will have in the preparation of guidance.

Transition arrangements for children to adult services

51. Consultation responses on the CYP Bill from both Capability Scotland and For Scotland's Disabled Children highlighted the need for good planning when young people move from children's services to adult services, or move between local authority boundaries. Young disabled people will use services planned under the CYP Bill and under the PBJW Bill.

52. We asked the Minister how the quite different mechanisms for integrating services will improve children’s transition to adult services. In response she suggested that the transition will in future be “far smoother” adding—

“I believe that there are two big differences between dealing with children and dealing with adults. First, there is the very crucial role that the education system plays with children and for which there is no equivalent for adults, particularly older people. Secondly, children by definition do not legally have the capacity to make decisions for themselves. However, adults do and I note that there are special arrangements for adults with incapacity. The fact that these two bills cross-reference each other means that we are singing from the same hymn sheet—and that is very important.” 37

Named Person provision [Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill]

53. Although not a matter falling within our remit, we received evidence in relation to Part 4 of the CYP Bill, the Named Persons provision. We draw to the attention of the Education and Culture Committee the exchanges which took place on the Named Persons provision at our meeting on 4 September. 38 In particular we highlight the concerns raised around time, burdens and resources on both health and education professionals in undertaking this role as well as questions around continuity of provision. We also draw attention to the outstanding issue of who should be the named person for children being home educated.

54. In drawing this to attention we are not expressing any view on the substantive issue.

ANNEXE A: EXTRACT OF MINUTES

19th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4), Wednesday 12 June 2013

Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered its approach to the scrutiny of the Bill at Stage 1, and agreed that it wished to consider those parts of the Bill relevant to its remit. The Committee also agreed not to issue its own call for written evidence, but to ask to include questions in the call for evidence being issued by the Health and Sport Committee, as the lead committee for Bill. Furthermore, the Committee agreed to take oral evidence on the Bill, after the summer recess, and to report its findings and recommendations to the lead committee, by way of a memorandum.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered its approach to the scrutiny of the Bill at Stage 1, and agreed that it wished to consider those parts of the Bill relevant to its remit. The Committee also agreed not to issue its own call for written evidence, but to consider relevant submissions received by the Education and Culture Committee, as the lead committee for Bill, in response to that committee's call for written evidence. Furthermore, the Committee agreed to take oral evidence on the Bill, after the summer recess. Given the parallels in policy between the Bill and the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill - in relation to issues such as joint working and the development of shared services - the Committee agreed to take oral evidence from relevant witnesses, jointly, on both Bills. Finally, the Committee agreed to take evidence from the relevant Scottish Ministers on both Bills, and to report its findings and recommendations to the lead committee, by way of a memorandum.

22nd Meeting, 2013 (Session 4), Wednesday 4 September 2013

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bills from—

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: Agenda item 5 is an oral evidence-taking session on two bills that are currently undergoing parliamentary consideration: the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill and the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. The bills are being considered by the Health and Sport Committee and the Education and Culture Committee, respectively.

Although this committee is not a formal secondary committee for the consideration of the bills, each of the bills might have a significant impact on the functions of local government in Scotland in relation to the delivery of adult and children’s services. In keeping with the Presiding Officer’s agenda for more focused and joined-up working by committees, we have decided to hold this one-off evidence-taking session on both bills with some key witnesses and to report our findings to the lead committees.

The aim of the session is to ensure that the bills are scrutinised from a local government perspective as well as to deliver joined-up scrutiny of cross-cutting legislation by the committees of the Parliament. This session will also inform the committee’s on-going work on the implementation of the Christie commission principles across the public sector in Scotland.

The witnesses have made written submissions, which members have before them. We have also received a further 13 written submissions from other organisations, and we have had regard to the written submissions that were given to the lead committees.

I welcome Jim Carle, the child health commissioner with NHS Ayrshire and Arran; Dr Anne Mullin, from the general practitioners at the deep end group; Eddie Fraser, the head of community care in East Ayrshire Council; Carol Kirk, the corporate director for education and skills at North Ayrshire Council; and Mary Taylor, the chief executive of the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations and a member of the housing co-ordinating group.

We are rather short of time, but do any of our witnesses wish to make a short statement?
Mary Taylor (Scottish Federation of Housing Associations and Member of Housing Co-ordinating Group): I would welcome the opportunity to do so. I will try to be brief.

It is clear that housing seems to be absent from the debate about the integration of health and social care, so we are delighted to have an opportunity to speak to the committee today. The housing sector—on whose behalf I am speaking; I am not here solely on behalf of the SFHA—supports the broad aims of joined-up working and improved outcomes in relation to health and wellbeing. We see ourselves as already making significant contributions to outcomes around healthy living and independent living, and positive outcomes for individuals and communities.

We support the broad thrust of what is happening, but the focus on the institutional and structural aspects of integration without reference to housing creates a risk that, in our view, this committee could do something to address. For example, in the papers for today’s meeting, there is virtually no mention of housing, other than in the paper from the housing co-ordinating group. That might be what you would expect, but I am here to make the case for revising the proposals as they stand in order to allow better strategic engagement with the housing sector, from strategic commissioning down to locality planning at whatever scale that turns out to be.

Unless the housing sector, which has experience of strategic planning and has the practical capacity and appetite to make a contribution on the ground, is involved, there is a risk that there will be poorer-quality and more expensive outcomes than might have been achieved with housing involvement at an earlier stage. That is not what we want for ourselves or for our older generations and relatives.

The Convener: That was an extremely useful contribution, so I will begin by following it up.

In the past, there were moves to create homes for life. However, we have seen various welfare reform changes, with more to come, which kind of impede that ambition—I am thinking of the bedroom tax and so on. Of course, this Parliament does not have powers to address those issues at the moment, which is probably an impediment to what you would like to see. Do you wish to comment on that?

Mary Taylor: I am not going to elaborate on the bedroom tax, in the interests of time. I could go on at great length, but all that I would say is that it does not completely undermine the sector’s capacity, although it certainly erodes it and we are working to address that.

There are all sorts of issues, particularly in the engagement of the housing sector in strategic planning through the local housing strategy and housing contribution statements, and, as I said earlier, it would be a risk to the objectives and goals of the integration exercise to miss the opportunity to involve housing in those things.

The Convener: Would it be fair to say that those changes do away with the concept of homes for life?

Mary Taylor: Not necessarily. There are a number of people affected by the bedroom tax, but there are also a number of people who are not affected by it, and there is no requirement on anybody to move as such. The English regime for housing policy is quite different from the Scottish one, and Alex Neil, when he was Minister for Housing and Communities, made it quite clear that there was no suggestion that the homes for life notion was going to be done away with.

I point out that, in speaking for the housing sector, I am speaking not only for social housing providers. Our housing co-ordinating group involves people who work right across the spectrum, including care and repair projects that help elderly owner-occupiers to undertake repairs to their homes and to engage the services that they need to keep them living independently in their homes. This is not just about social housing.

The Convener: Thank you. There are obviously high expectations for both bills and for what services can be expected to achieve. People are obviously looking for improvements once the bills come into place. When do you think that the benefits will start to be demonstrated?

Jim Carle (NHS Ayrshire and Arran): I believe that the benefits are already becoming manifest and have been for some time. Children’s services, in the broadest sense, have been working towards a similar integration agenda, understanding that by working together we can produce better outcomes for children and young people.

The challenge for us is measuring the impact of, for example, the early years collaborative over a longer period of time. Public organisations are quite used to looking for short-term gains over one, two or three years, but we are not used to looking at someone who will be born today and the benefits for them or the reduction in their uptake of services in later life. Children’s services have been working hard on that agenda, and we hope that the two new bills will go some way to supporting that new process.

Dr Anne Mullin (GPs at the Deep End): From a general practice perspective, working in deprived areas we have not seen benefits yet.

We are looking from a slightly different standpoint from other services that are represented on the panel. The deep end group thinks that there is potential in the legislation, and we would like to explore some of that potential with the Scottish Government. We have outlined specific proposals in areas where we feel we could and should make a difference, but that needs to be supported with all the things that we have suggested in our proposals, such as the additional time for consultations that we need when working with very comorbid people in deprived areas; support for serial encounters in general practice, which are key to people’s holistic and long-term care; attached staff who are specifically named social workers, addiction workers and health visitors; and a nationally enhanced service for vulnerable children. The list goes on.

We have outlined those proposals, and members can access those documents. If the proposals are incorporated and recognised, we feel that general practice can play its part with our other partners in primary care.

The Convener: Having visited some doctors’ surgeries during the recess—everybody thinks that we take long holidays, but it is actually more work—I am aware of the need for increased consultation times. Surgeries that I visited made a plea for that, but I believe that your contract is governed by a deal with the UK Government. Is that correct?

Dr Mullin: There is perhaps some scope for that now. I am not involved in contract negotiations, which are for the British Medical Association, but there is some appetite to revisit the contract and consider what could be more appropriate for the national health service up here. The primary care services in Scotland and England bear no resemblance to each other any more. We feel that primary care is far more protected up here and we want to develop the role of general practice, particularly in the equalities agenda. We feel that it is very important for us to get involved.

The Convener: You would say that it would be best for the BMA to negotiate with the Scottish Government rather than the Westminster Government over many of these things.

Dr Mullin: That is my opinion, yes.

Carol Kirk (North Ayrshire Council): I concur with Jim Carle that we are already seeing a lot of the benefits. I chair our integrated children’s services partnership, which has representatives from the police, health, social services, housing and the voluntary sector. Over the years—particularly the past two years—we have seen a significant coming together in specific actions in relation to children. Before that, we would come together much more around a project.

The situation has now changed and we are looking at significantly different ways of working together. We are considering the co-location of health visitors within our early years establishments and we have established a multi-agency domestic abuse team, which is having a major impact on the number of children who are referred to the children’s panel. There is a lot of good joined-up working on specific issues such as those, and it is beginning to bear fruit.

Within the North Ayrshire community planning partnership, we are considering putting our children’s services into the health and social care partnership along with adult services. With my other hat on, I am the director of education and skills, and it does not cause me anxiety that health is no longer going to be part of the council as such. I think that the networks and the work on the ground are solid enough that it does not matter what headings we have on the management structures. If there is working together in an integrated and effective way, it matters less where the budget sits and where the managers and the reporting structures are.

Our partnership reports directly to the CPP, which takes a very active role—as does the chief officers group—in monitoring the outcomes for children. As Jim Carle said, that proves a challenge, as some of the short-term measures are not easy to define. In some of the work that we are doing, particularly with our youngest children, we are seeking long-term societal change and there is a challenge in that. I am happy to see the focus on integrated children’s services in the bill, but we need to be careful that we are not creating additional planning structures instead of refining the planning structures that we have both at the corporate level and at the level of the individual child.

The Convener: Thank you. It is refreshing to hear that a CPP seems to be working well in that regard. Getting it right for every child has played a part. Can you outline the importance of what that programme has achieved? Has there been any resistance within the CPP to a move to preventative spend?

Carol Kirk: GIRFEC has been a catalyst in changing a lot of the thinking. We have established local resourcing groups, which have been in place for four or five years. That has meant that multi-agency teams can provide a very quick response for children who need additional support but who are not at the level at which the reporter is approached and compulsory measures of care are sought. That has served us well both in keeping children out of compulsory care and in preventing situations whereby they are either out of school or out of the local authority. We have seen significant change around that.
A significant piece of work around GIRFEC has been carried out across the three Ayrshire councils. The information-sharing project, which is called AYRshare, started in South Ayrshire and has been rolled out to North Ayrshire. In essence, the three integrated children’s services planning groups came together to take things forward. We think that the approach will help all the agencies that are involved to get a handle on issues much more quickly and to be able to share information at that level.

GIRFEC has significant strengths and I think that people are signed up to it. There are issues to do with the planning around GIRFEC. We still have additional support needs planning, so there is sometimes an issue for us and for people in health about which plan to have for a child. There is still a bit of a cluttered landscape, but that will probably change over time.

I have not detected a reluctance in relation to preventative spend. However, there is significant difficulty in disengaging in relation to costs that are incurred for children who require a residential placement or intensive support, in order to invest in support further down in the early years.

Our joint chief officers and the CPP have made significant investment. We have put more than £1 million into preventative spend for young children, which meant that hard decisions had to be made elsewhere. There is not an unwillingness to spend in that way; it is just that there are groups of young people at the upper end of the spectrum who need continuing support, and it is difficult to disengage the money that is being spent on them so that it can be diverted elsewhere.

The message is beginning to get out that preventative spend is having an impact. It is having an impact on the number of exclusions from school and the number of young people whom we place outwith the authority, and there are fewer referrals to the reporter. There is hard evidence that spend is effecting change.

Mary Taylor: The convener asked when the benefits will materialise. As other people said, to some extent the benefits are already materialising.

That is true even in relation to housing planning and the development of new services that are preventive in essence and that aim to be low cost. That can happen where there are good relationships such as my colleagues on the panel have described. However, for every area where there are good working relationships there is an area—if not many areas—where working relationships are not necessarily good.

In particular, I cite the experience of the reshaping care change fund. Change fund plans have often been developed without reference to housing and without recognition that housing can achieve a huge amount upstream, at costs that are relatively low in the context of health budgets. Until relatively recently, people had not even got to the point at which they had the opportunity to sign off change fund plans—and that has happened only after a lot of pushing.

That is part of the argument for stronger recognition of the role that housing can play and for not leaving things to chance and the accident of good relationships.

Eddie Fraser (East Ayrshire Council): As members might have anticipated, I concur with most of what other witnesses have said. I emphasise the need for continued partnership working with housing in the new health and social care partnerships. We all know that there will be demographic change and that the number of older people will grow. Older people need appropriate housing so that they can continue to live in the community.

In my area, the focus of the council house building programme has been on houses for older people and how we can build houses that can support adults who have complex needs—that is the other area in which close partnership working with housing is needed.

We absolutely support de-institutionalisation and people living in their communities, but the fact is that we have individual support packages costing £200,000 dotted all over a town instead of some way of delivering them effectively through a type of core and cluster model. The issue is very much to do with the link between care and housing, and we in East Ayrshire have been able to deliver some successes in that respect.

I also agree that through housing we can get some early wins not just for organisations but for individuals. If by working through care and repair we can get simple things such as handrails installed without the need for elaborate assessment processes, people get what they need quickly and it proves cost effective. Indeed, one of our major successes has been the ability to put money into such areas through the change fund.

We have also been able to give money to the voluntary sector in order to give people practical support. Older people get depressed if they have to sit and look at an overgrown garden, and providing money to certain voluntary organisations that get young people into work and to do Scottish vocational qualifications while, at the same time, giving older people some practical support has proved to be a big success for us.

As for other early wins, co-location of certain services has been a really positive move. We have a number of good examples where such co-location has helped to increase communication. For example, the co-location of all our mental health and learning disability services has given us immediate wins.

We have also been able to develop our intermediate care and enablement services to support early discharge from hospital and prevent admissions. Indeed, our statistics show how successful we have been in consistently improving the delayed discharge situation and, most important, in helping older people stay at home.

One of the positives of the proposed changes is that everyone will be clearer about how to access services. It will certainly help if, instead of general practitioners making referrals to a whole range of different people, we have clarity about who they can refer to. Having quicker decision making instead of decision making by committee will also make things clearer for us.

We also have to look at locality working, because we cannot have separate approaches to that issue in the various bills that are around at the moment. We have single communities, and we have to consult those communities together; after all, the priorities for those communities and how they want some of the national priorities to be implemented should come from them.

In that respect, it is essential that we have real engagement with local communities and that our local GPs are involved in that process. With the development of community health partnerships, we have lost the engagement of GPs in local healthcare co-operatives. We need GPs to come back into the process in a meaningful way that allows them to see the changes that are being made and to influence what is going on in communities.

The bills contain many opportunities, but it only makes sense to do this together on the front line at community level.

Anne McTaggart: Do our health colleagues foresee any practical issues for local authorities and health boards in trying to implement both bills together?

Jim Carle: Yes, there are a number of issues. Aligning both processes will be problematic and what could be regarded as strategic planning systems will give us issues. However, we are not going to run away from them; instead, we are going to grab and make the best of them.

There will be problems in ensuring that the two processes communicate well with each other. In planning for the implementation of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, we need to be conscious of actions that are being taken on the other side. The recognition of the need to work better together did not come as early in the process as we would have wished, but it is now there and we are starting to build from that basis.

However, the fact that we are dealing with two separate processes that come from slightly different perspectives has been problematic, and it would have been much more helpful had they been brought together much earlier in the process.

An awful lot more could have been learned from the experience of children and young people’s services under GIRFEC and the processes that we have had to go through. Carol Kirk mentioned a number of gains. Under GIRFEC, we have had to look at culture, systems and practice. What we have done well is to change our culture and move away from our silo working practices towards having, on occasion, large meetings at which we work through all of our issues, recognise that we have more than one audience for anything that we are trying to deal with and move forward from that. However, we see the potential hurdles and are working towards dealing with them.

Dr Mullin: We could have a long discussion on where things could again go very badly wrong in Glasgow, as happened last time, so it is important to get it right this time. Purely from a GP perspective, one of the biggest lessons is on the need to engage directly with general practice. There are different models in Glasgow’s community health partnerships but, in Glasgow south, where I am from, we have a large established GP committee that engages with senior management to discuss policy and to consider local initiatives. That committee has minuted meetings, we report back to local colleagues and we have set up learning events and so on, so the situation is progressing. We feel that that should be built on, because it is a good way of implementing stuff that comes to us that sometimes seems very hierarchical and full of bureaucratic speech.

For example, we just want to know whether, if a GP identifies that someone has an unmet need, there is actually a service that the patient can be put into. At the moment, there is a mismatch. In our anticipatory care planning, we go out and visit housebound elderly people, who were traditionally chipped out of the QOF, or quality and outcomes framework. We now identify a lot of unmet need, but we do not have the resources to match the need. The discussion needs to be linked into the views of those experienced professionals who can inform the process about what needs to happen in parallel as the work progresses. We realise that that is not quick work—it is slow work—but it has to be a two-way thing.

Carol Kirk: There have been particular issues for health colleagues, who have some very complex arrangements. For example, I know that health representatives on our group often have complex reporting arrangements that they need to go through. The two chief officers in the CPP have managed to cut through some of that, but a considerable amount of work is required. Therefore, there is potential to simplify a lot of what we do. We need to learn from the work on integrated children’s services in taking forward integration of health and social care, but we also need to learn from the work that has been done in adult services on how we create the momentum to make some of the changes. Perhaps a bit of joined-up learning still has to happen on that.

The Convener: Ms Taylor, do you want to comment?

Mary Taylor: We did not comment on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill at all. All that I would say is that, in the consultation on the integration of health and social care, children’s services and housing services were lumped together. Given that, in this committee, a focus on children’s services tends to exclude a focus on housing services, my only plea is that, in the absence of housing provisions in the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, the committee should still pay attention to the housing dimension of the argument.

The Convener: I think that you have got that message across, Ms Taylor.

Eddie Fraser: We need to be careful that we do not lose anything in the changes. Community health partnerships currently have a responsibility for people from cradle to grave—for children, adults and older people. If we move to health and social care partnership committees that have a responsibility only for adults and older people, we need to be careful that children’s services are not left sitting without an easy strategic voice in community planning partners such as councils and health boards. In taking the agenda forward together and planning across both bills, we need to ensure that the change is for betterment and that there is no loss of strategic planning.

The Convener: Does Anne McTaggart want to respond to any of those comments?

Anne McTaggart: No, that is fine. Thank you.

Margaret Mitchell: Dr Mullin mentioned that GPs are doing good things but they sometimes run out of resources. One way of addressing that—I put this point to all the panel—would be to ensure that positive outcomes are assessed and logged. Particularly for local authorities, will the new requirements be integrated into benchmarking? How do you assess the outcomes—both positive and negative, as you can learn from the negatives, too—and then do things differently? Perhaps we can go round the panel and ask people about that.

We have heard positive things this morning about how people are sharing and integrating services, which is welcome news. Equally, we have heard good things from CPPs in the past that have not then materialised in local communities. It would be helpful to have a little more detail on how you will pin this down.

Eddie Fraser: We can evidence that through numbers. Sometimes, that is about the number of hospital admissions for people over 75. We can also evidence it through measures such as the number and proportion of our elderly population who stay at home. It is much harder to look at less tangible issues such as wellbeing in communities and longitudinal things. If we do preventative spend, we need to do it so that people do not need certain health and social care services in 20 years’ time. That applies to everything from the 50-year-old male with an alcohol problem to unborn children. We must look at how we do that, but it is sometimes difficult to do and it will be longitudinal.

We can use indicators. One issue is the extent to which we put together anticipatory care plans. I accept that, unless we follow those up, we have gone through a process without improving someone’s life but, if we can put such plans in place, we can show that we have improved someone’s life. We currently have indicators that show what the situation is, but it is much harder to capture the positive and tangible things that we will see as we take the approach forward.

Mary Taylor: First, some of our colleagues in the housing co-ordinating group are actively working with the outcomes group on the definition of the outcomes and on the targets and indicators that go with all of that. Our general view is that wellbeing is not sufficiently addressed and that there is still too much focus on the costs and impacts of existing services rather than on the services that there might be in future, but I do not want to rehearse that in greater detail now.

Secondly, some members of the SFHA have undertaken social return on investment studies into the impact of the benefit of services and those have shown the value of the services concerned. I can send you details of a project done by Link Housing Association, which showed that, for every pound that it invested in an advice and information service, it got £27 of value back. A study by Hanover (Scotland) Housing Association, Bield Housing Association and Trust Housing Association looks at the value of adaptations for older people. I can send you details of those studies.

The Convener: I think that we have seen them before, but we would be happy to see them again.

Carol Kirk: An issue with benchmarking is that it tends to be done against individual services and individual parts of the service. For example, it is easy for me to benchmark in education and we are benchmarked to the hilt across other services. Schools benchmark against other schools and benchmarking is embedded in the system.

We are also good at benchmarking against children at the acute end, if you like. We are good at benchmarking around looked-after children and children who come into the child protection world. Benchmarking around children when there are issues of wellbeing or neglect is quite difficult and we tend to rely on input measures—on what we are doing to address the issue—as there is a conceptual difficulty in benchmarking the impact that we have. However, we have done quite a lot of work to try to identify indicators and we think that we are getting there by looking at the stretch aims of the early years collaborative. We are working back to establish how we get there and which measures tell us that we are getting there.

We have taken forward an investment in the Solihull approach to parenting jointly with East Ayrshire Council, South Ayrshire Council and NHS Ayrshire and Arran. We can measure how many people are using the approach and what impact they feel that it is having on their clients or the families that they deal with, but it is difficult to develop hard measures of what it is saving us and what difference it makes to the wellbeing of children. A lot of work is going on in that area, but it is still in its infancy.

Margaret Mitchell: Previously, you gave us a good example of something tangible when you referred to the number of exclusions from school going down, but I take the point that it is not always possible to give such examples.

Dr Mullin: We could look at the epidemiology of the statistics that are being collected on issues such as unscheduled admissions to hospitals and the number of days that elderly people spend in hospital before they get moved to a nursing bed. I agree that some of the more qualitative outcomes take longer to develop, because we often need to involve the patient or client in the research agenda, and that work requires commitment.

There are a lot of short-term measure outcomes, but there are not a lot of long-term measure outcomes. A lot of our evidence on early interventions comes from the Olds study, which is on-going. We have nothing similar to that here, but we were prepared to look 20 years down the line at what happened earlier, and how we prevented something from happening. Social return on investment was mentioned. Action for Children published an interesting report about a family intervention project in Northampton and the money that was saved if it intervened early on.

There are ways of pulling together research strands into an integrated proposal. The GPs at the deep end group is working on that. We are very keen to do that research, but it would need to be resourced to give us the staff and the ability. At the moment, there is very little evidence to show for all the work that is going on.

Jim Carle: The question is excellent and quite difficult to answer for a number of reasons, but I agree with what my colleagues have said.

GIRFEC gives us the model for change and a common language so that we can communicate with one another. However, we need to develop a number of areas in a much more integrated way. We need to develop better systems for looking at contribution and developing the contribution analysis that looks at all the different systems that contribute to the wellbeing of a child, at how we measure or quantify the benefits that those systems can bring together and the impact that they have on the child.

We need to move away from looking at children in the sense of talking about what we do with a five-year-old, for example, and pick up on the life-course approach. What do we do when we are preparing young people for parenthood? What do we do to help new parents to develop? How can the issues that were identified during the early years be carried forward into primary and secondary school? How do we measure that across the life course of the child? There needs to be some sort of longitudinal analysis of the benefits of the different contributions that are made across the different systems.

One key benefit of joint working is that we all come to the table with a number of different skills. A public health approach to the issues would be extremely beneficial and helpful. As a science, public health has the skills to enable us to develop a proper contribution analysis. We need to ensure that, once we have established an agreed way forward, we stick to it over a long enough period of time to see the benefits coming from the process in which we engage just now. For example, the early years framework is helpful and positive. It gives us a good focus on prevention and the early identification of issues and it gives us the opportunity to engage positively with parents.

One of the key things that has been missing from our discussion so far is the contribution that communities can make to the process. How many of the answers to the questions that the professionals are asking lie within communities? They can inform professional practice.

The combination of approaches from the different disciplines and sciences that are involved will help to take us forward. However, we do not yet have systems that can measure the total contribution to an individual child over their life course, and that is very much what we want to have a look at and start to develop.

Margaret Mitchell: Finally, I want to ask about the implications of the provision in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill that every child should have a named person. Do the witnesses have concerns about that? Is it necessary? Sadly, some children have chaotic lifestyles, so many different public bodies might have to share information. It would be helpful if you could give us your views on that.

Jim Carle: In Ayrshire and Arran, systems are well advanced. We know that our health visiting team will pick up the role of named person for the under-fives. Our midwifery service will be working hard to take that forward.

If we are to do more than just implement the wording of the bill and instead try to achieve the bill’s aim of a much better society in Scotland, and if we are to improve our culture, we have to consider the amount of time that it will take to engage with more difficult families. We believe that that is a significant burden that will, I admit, build up over a period of time for our midwifery and health visiting services.

We have time to meet our statutory obligations and we are doing that fairly well, but if we are to have a conversation with a new mum around alcohol, how it relates to foetal alcohol syndrome and the impact that that could have on her, her children and her family over the later life course, that requires the development of a relationship. The current systems do not allow for that on every occasion. That approach also requires the development of good communication skills and the ability to raise difficult issues and agendas, which will be problematic.

We are asking the health visitor, as the named person, to co-ordinate all the information that comes from a number of services and pull it together to adopt a basic analysis to identify whether there are issues for the particular family, and then to pass on those issues. However, that will take a significant time, and we are not confident at present that the resources are there in those services to enable that.

We will be able to perform our services according to the word of the legislation, but that is not our issue. If you really want us to get behind the issues that exist and find resolutions for them, that will take time and resources, and at present they are not there. We expect to see investment being recycled, if you like, from the money that is being put into the early years collaborative later in the life course. We hope to see a reduction in the number of children who are looked after and accommodated, for example. However, we do not have systems that can identify where those savings have been made, because that will perhaps happen 10 to 15 years later. Then there are questions about how to recycle that funding back into the early years to continue the process and build on it.

There are a number of challenges in the issue that Margaret Mitchell asked about.

Dr Mullin: I agree with a lot of what Mr Carle has said. For the under-fives—pre-schoolers—it is logical to have health visitors as the named person. For schoolchildren, there is a massive gap. If a child becomes vulnerable at four or five, they will probably still be vulnerable at six, seven and eight, but I do not believe that there is enough capacity for that work to be on-going in a meaningful way in the education system.

I am quite relaxed about the named person idea. Most people have a named general practitioner, and GPs are often the source of referral for many different agencies that are looking for bits of information or have something to tell us about a family or individual. I would like the GPs—and GPs at the deep end have stated this desire strongly—to have far more involvement with vulnerable children and families. There needs to be something more substantive in general practice.

Carol Kirk: There is a challenge for a lot of services. We have discussed whether, given that probably more than 98 per cent of three to five-year-olds are in early years provision where they are seen every day by nursery practitioners, the named person would have been better situated in that place. We have raised that on a number of occasions.

We have been operating with GIRFEC and the GIRFEC guidance for some time, but it is not easy. In primary schools, the headteacher or the additional support needs co-ordinator, who is often either a depute or a principal teacher, usually gathers information from a range of agencies. That can be quite complex and time consuming, even before the information is looked at. The issue is not that there is a lack of willingness but that the capacity that is required to do that is a strain on the system.

However, that is perhaps not as much of an issue as that of looking at a young person with more complex needs and the transfer from that approach to someone being the lead professional. That tends to sit with social services, but that is not necessarily where it should sit. In some cases, it would be better for it to sit with the school or with a health professional. A bit more work is needed on that to free up the time for the appropriate professionals to take that role.

In our consultation on the issue with parents, we had quite a kickback about the term “named person”. A number of our parent councils expressed significant concern about it, with people saying, “I should be my child’s named person.” When we explained the concept behind it, they were fine with it, but their initial reaction to the name was not one of unqualified approval. That is a challenge. We need to be explicit about what the role is and how it will be implemented. Some of the things around information sharing and the shared systems that will be used will make the process less onerous, but there is still an issue about how that comes together.

We are also concerned about the issue of who the named person is for children who are home educated. Local government education departments have no locus in that regard. With regard to health, who would take that forward for young people of primary and secondary school age? That is not explicit in the legislation. If we want to have a net to catch every child, we should be aware that there is a group of children that could slip through that net.

The Convener: Miss Taylor, this is not really your field.

Mary Taylor: That is correct. I have nothing to add.

Eddie Fraser: I concur with Carol Kirk. There is a difference between the most vulnerable children, who have a lead professional and multi-agency involvement, and the wider population of children, in relation to whom the concept involves allowing easy, named access to that world and enabling proportionate access to professionals rather than having people who are involved with them every day of their lives and who take over some of the role of parents.

Margaret Mitchell: Miss Taylor, do you have no locus in this? Some information about housing and what is going on in a home can be very pertinent. I would imagine the SFHA might have something to say in that regard.

Mary Taylor: A social landlord might have an understanding of what is going on in a home—that occurred to me as I listened to the responses. However, we have opted not to make any formal comment in that regard, and I do not want to simply react to things today. I think that the important point is that the landlord’s relationship is primarily with the householder, who will always be an adult, even if they are 16, 17 or 18.

The Convener: It would be fair to say that housing assistants throughout the country play a major role in finding difficulties and pointing them out, but they are unlikely to be the named person in this regard. That is the key thing. That is why I said that this was not really your field. I am sure that housing assistants and housing visitors will continue to do what they have been doing in this regard for many years.

Mary Taylor: It is not because we are not aware of chaotic lifestyles or whatever. I could elaborate on that, but this is not the place.

Richard Baker: Carol Kirk said that there was a potential to simplify structures to benefit services, which is something that we would all support. She also said that we need to be careful that we do not just create additional structures rather than simplify the structures in a way that will make the process easier.

Will the Scottish Government get that balance right? Obviously, we are also considering the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill. Is the balance right as the proposals stand, or does it need to be worked on further?

Carol Kirk: It possibly needs to be worked on further. Even in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill there is much more of a statutory imperative around children’s services planning, which I think that people would welcome, but I would ask why we need a plan on corporate parenting that sits outwith that. I cannot see why that would not be merged into the same plan, given that the plan is concerned with a range of vulnerable children.

With regard to issues around the individual children, there is a complex framework, not only for local government but for parents. GIRFEC provides a structured and helpful way of planning for a child, in the round, and I am supportive of that. However, it crosses over with, for example, a co-ordinated support plan for a child who has complex needs. The additional support needs legislation does not sit entirely comfortably with the guidance around GIRFEC. It is possible to merge them, but it would still involve having two statutory frameworks, which does not make sense to professionals working in the area and probably makes less sense to parents.

The Convener: I return to a point about GIRFEC. I mentioned that I visited some doctors’ surgeries during the recess. I am interested in systems that do not talk to one another and which complicate the spread of information. What are your experiences of that? Could a bit of common sense and a bit of gumption be applied to deal with some of that? Do we overly complicate such systems?

Jim Carle: Yes, it is a real issue. The professionals are good at communicating with one another, but if we want to deal with the issues that are on the table, we need to have a better look at that issue. I will pronounce this really carefully, but the Scottish Government needs to GIRFEC itself; it needs to look at the interrelationship between different bits of legislation, how they cut across each other and the number of demands that have been put on different aspects of professional organisations.

We do not need conflicting legislation. We do not need legislation that tells us to report to 16 different organisations, all on the same subject. A number of issues that we are dealing with in local authority and health board areas come from that source.

A significant amount of work needs to be done to resolve the systems that we have and to ensure that we are working to a common system and a common language. In Ayrshire and Arran we have AYRshare; we hope that that will take us some way down that road, but there is still a need for the organisations that we work with—education, social work and health—to have their own systems underneath all of that. That is an industry in itself and they all have different reporting mechanisms that work within that.

Somebody who sits in my position frequently answers the same questions to a number of different aspects of the Scottish Government. Again, that is about public money and public time that could be used better and more effectively on the issues that we have to deal with—issues that the other members of the panel have outlined so well.

The Convener: The term GIRFEC has to be said very carefully—I nearly did not say it the right way there.

Dr Mullin: Sensitive data sharing is a real issue for general practice and other agencies: how you filter what you talk about informally, in corridor chat and various other ways, and what you are prepared to put down on paper.

With child protection issues, it is fairly straightforward. I do not think that many GPs wring their hands over that. If they suspected anything, they would divulge that information quite readily. However, we are talking about the majority of vulnerable children in this country—probably about 20 per cent of 1 million children—who have unmet needs. The sharing of information around the subtleties of parenting and all the issues around deprivation and so on is a big piece of work that still needs to go on because some parents are very reluctant—naturally enough—for you to speak to other agencies about their own personal, private lives because that impacts on their parenting skills.

The only way round that is for extensive work to be done between the front-line GPs and social work, which is probably the main referral agency if you are talking about catapulting into the child protection system or legislative intervention. Otherwise, the majority of children who are vulnerable in general practice will just be signposted to other services for support; they are not being signposted into prosecuting the parents because they are battering their children. We are talking about parents who are not coping, for whatever reason.

A lot of such information comes into the consultation and the issue is how that is filtered. It is about experience—having experienced GPs who have met a lot of children and families in their lifetime—but it is also about having the work supported within the GP contract.

The Convener: I ask everyone to be brief, because I am hoping to get another question in. Ms Kirk, please.

Carol Kirk: That is right. The particular issue is not at the child protection end; it is the very large group of children for whom poverty and difficult home circumstances are impacting. We need to get much better at direct communication around that issue that possibly does not involve social services.

With AYRshare, one thing that we have considered—in fact, we had a meeting about it yesterday—is how GPs can have automatic access to the system. They might have a wee concern because they do not feel that some information can be shared of its own right but, if they have access to what other professionals have put on the system, that maybe builds a picture and allows them to say that they have a real concern. Achieving that level of shared information as easily as we can is a real issue for us.

Eddie Fraser: One of my responsibilities is to run out-of-hours social work services across Ayrshire. Working with three social work systems and trying to get out-of-hours health information is a difficult challenge. Improved information sharing, whether it be electronic or, better still, just talking to each other, would be a real move forward. That is where co-location comes in. I mentioned some of the services that we have co-located, such as mental health and learning disability services. In that situation, a social worker will just go along to the learning disability nurse and say, “Will you come out with me today and see this?” That communication happens and it works. On another level, we need to consider how to develop electronic information systems. I know that, through the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, some money is being made available to move that on, but that has been a challenge for us for at least the past decade.
John Wilson: I want to follow up on a point that Mr Fraser made earlier, although my question has been partly answered in the previous round of answers. Mr Fraser referred to the fact that GPs are not as actively involved in the community health partnerships as they could be. My concern about the named person and protecting vulnerable young people is about how we ensure a smooth transition from pre-school to the school period and that the appropriate professional is the named person. For pre-school, that person could be the health visitor, but when the child starts school, it could be a social worker, a teacher or someone else. Might that give rise to issues? We must ensure that every child has a named person who can not only gather information but give it to other professionals to ensure that the child is protected.

Eddie Fraser: At a very basic level, one measure of success is that the child and family know who the named person is. Sometimes, in my service, when someone is asked whether they have a social worker, the answer will be yes, but they will give the name of somebody who left two years ago. Sometimes, the answer will be no, but we know that the person has a social worker. There are real issues about whether the role of named person will fulfil its function. You are right that children move through systems. If the approach is to be successful, who the named person is must be clearly communicated to the child and family. Families continually tell us that the lack of continuity in the people who support them is a real issue. I know that GP colleagues will say that, a lot of the time, the continuity comes through their practice.

Carol Kirk: The key to the issue is good relationships between early years establishments and health visitors. Health visitors will have a huge case load of children for whom they are the named person. When those children transit from the early years establishments to school, the named person will become someone in the school although, if the child is very vulnerable, the health visitor might retain that role until an appropriate time for handover. The key issue is to ensure that transition meetings take place and transition plans are produced for any children about whom a health visitor has a concern. Linking the health visitors directly to the early years establishments and involving them in the transition to primary 1 is the key way of ensuring that that happens. Another key issue is ensuring that, when a child moves into primary 1, the parents know who the named person is.

Mary Taylor: I wanted to come back on the previous question, but I am happy to wait until the end if you want.

The Convener: Fine. Dr Mullin?

Dr Mullin: I do not want to go into too much detail about the named person for over-fives. That is still something that has to be worked out. We are still often the referral point for older children, because agencies have withdrawn for whatever reason, because they do not need help any more, or because they have become vulnerable again. Because most people have a named GP, services or people will come to the GP. There is a big schism between education and general practice; there is not enough dialogue there.

The deep end has talked about integrated working and attached workers, but the only way to make any of the systems work is to have integration of communication. It is about professionals being able to communicate with and understand one another, and child health in general practice has been peripheral to many of those developments, although we are often the central point of referral for many agencies. The deep end has a clear view on that, which is outlined in our proposals.

Jim Carle: I agree 100 per cent with what Carol Kirk said. We need to align health visitors carefully with early years establishments, and a good relationship needs to be built and maintained in that process. My concern for health visitors is about the resource requirements and the additional burden that that will bring. GPs are the critical partners in most of what we do in children’s and young people’s services. They are the pivotal point around which families revolve, so communication systems must be developed well to support their practice. If there is a hierarchy within the system, they are among the most valuable partners.

Our difficulty is in assessing what happens with health visitors beyond the age of five, when the burden of being the named person is placed on our education colleagues, who must have good support systems in place. We are new to the whole process. We do not yet have a huge amount of experience of those transition arrangements, but good communication and professionals talking to professionals to ensure that we are talking the same language and that we understand the issues will be critical to the whole process. The strength behind that is that we have well-established communication frameworks where we can raise those issues, and we will find shared resolutions. However, the problems should not be underestimated, either in terms of the additional resource required or in terms of the critical nature of the relationship between health visitors and early years establishments.

The Convener: Miss Taylor, I shall let you come back very briefly.

Mary Taylor: On the general issue about systems not talking to one another, there is an
With regard to the other side of the operational information, I know that there are projects in Glasgow where housing associations are actively working with police and fire services to ensure that they get effective data sharing, information sharing and knowledge sharing at a local scale, so that they can tackle problems on a preventive basis. They have been able to document the extent to which they have saved lives and extensive budgets on vandalism, fire damage and other things.

However, I return to the point that I made at the beginning, about strategic information. There is a whole lot of information around strategic planning that relies on decent data sharing and integration of practice around strategy, and that is where housing can make a significant contribution—but only if it is required.

John Wilson: I have no further questions.

The Convener: I thank the witnesses for their evidence, which has been useful.

On resuming—

The Convener: We move to our final panel. I welcome from the Scottish Government Alex Neil, the Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing; Aileen Campbell, the Minister for Children and Young People; Kathleen Bessos, deputy director for integration and reshaping care; John Paterson, divisional solicitor for food, health and community care; Alison Taylor, team leader for integration and reshaping care; Philip Raines, head of child protection and children’s legislation; and Magdalene Boyd, solicitor for communities and education.

I ask the cabinet secretary to make opening remarks.

The Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing (Alex Neil): Thank you for inviting Aileen Campbell and me to make statements and answer questions. I will confine my remarks to the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, which deals with the integration of adult health and social care. The bill’s purpose is to provide a framework for the integration of health and social care, with the aim of improving outcomes for service users, carers and their families. That is at the heart of our policy.

We are legislating for national health and wellbeing outcomes that will underpin the requirement for health boards and local authorities to plan effectively together to deliver quality and sustainable care services for their constituent populations. It is important that the bill aims to bring together the substantial resources of health and social care to deliver joined-up, effective and efficient services for the increasing number of people with longer-term and often complex needs, many of whom are older.

The bill requires health boards and local authorities to establish integrated arrangements through partnership working and it requires statutory partners to integrate via one of two models—delegation to a body corporate that is established as a joint board, or delegation to each other as a lead agency, which involves three possible models. Health boards and local authorities will be required to delegate functions and budgets to the integrated partnerships, and secondary legislation will set out such matters and will cover adult primary care and community care, adult social care and aspects of acute hospital services.

Integrated partnerships will be able to include other services, such as children’s services, when a local arrangement is made to do so. That already works well in areas across Scotland, such as West Lothian and Highland.

Each partnership will be required to establish locality planning arrangements, which will provide a forum for local professional leadership of service planning. Integrated partnerships will also be required to prepare and implement strategic commissioning plans that will use the totality of resources that are available across health and social care to plan for local populations’ needs. It is important that professionals, service users, GPs and the third and independent sectors will be embedded in that process as key decision makers.

The bill is in the context of public service reform. Alongside the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, which Aileen Campbell is leading, it is part of the Government’s broader agenda to deliver public services that better meet the needs of people and our communities. The Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill provides a legislative framework for partnership working at strategic and local levels that involves professionals, service users and partners. The planning and delivery principles in the bill encapsulate the Christie commission’s principles by putting the person at the centre of service planning and delivery and require a focus on prevention and anticipatory care planning.

As for why we need to legislate, my predecessor, the Deputy First Minister, proposed to Parliament in December 2011 the introduction of the bill, which had cross-party consensus. We are all aware of attempts in the past to integrate the services, with greater or lesser success. Underpinning the process with a legislative requirement is essential to achieving our objective.

We are not starting with a blank sheet. In many areas across Scotland, bodies are already working in partnership to deliver integrated services. We have considered the evidence from across the UK and we are mindful about applying it in Scotland. However, I am clear that, to achieve consistent progress, it is necessary to set out in legislation a framework that is not too prescriptive and will deliver the necessary changes to meet the future demand on services. I welcome the opportunity to provide further clarity on the bill to the committee.

The Convener: Does the minister have anything to add?

The Minister for Children and Young People (Aileen Campbell): Yes. Good morning and thank you for inviting me to give evidence on part 3 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill—on children’s services planning—which was introduced in Parliament on 17 April. The bill is fundamental to securing the Scottish Government’s aim of making Scotland the best place in the world to grow up in. Through the bill, the Scottish Government aims to ensure that children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policies and services. The bill aims to improve how services support children and families, to strengthen the role of early years support in children’s and families’ lives and to ensure better permanence planning for children and their families.

The report of the Christie commission on the future delivery of Scotland’s public services highlighted that services must better meet the needs of the people and communities that they serve. In welcoming the report, we set out a vision of reform through early intervention and preventative spending, greater integration and partnership locally, workforce development and a sharper and more transparent focus on performance.

The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill will be fundamental to our achieving those ambitions on rights and services. It aims to put Scotland at the forefront of providing services that give children, young people and their families what they need and deserve, and find better ways of offering better life chances to each and every child in Scotland.

I am delighted to have an opportunity to speak to the committee about part 3 of the bill, which is on children’s services planning. In recent years, there has been increasing integration in how public bodies develop, plan and operate services to support children and young people. However, unless services work together, there is a danger that something important will be missed and a child or young person’s wellbeing will suffer. Children and young people need not just coordinated services but services that share an holistic approach to wellbeing and early intervention. Children deserve services that routinely and consistently consider the full spectrum of their needs.

Part 3 sets out the duty of local authorities and health boards, with the assistance of other public bodies and third sector organisations, to work together to develop joint children’s services plans every three years. The intention is that bodies that are responsible for expenditure and for planning and delivering services will work together to improve the wellbeing of all children and young people in their area.

Currently there is no requirement for public bodies to report collectively on how the lives of children and young people are improving. To give the public and children and young people a full picture of how wellbeing is being promoted, supported and safeguarded, local authorities and health boards will report each year on the extent to which they have achieved the aims of their children’s services plan. That will enhance the implementation of getting it right for every child and make a direct and accountable link for the public between local services and outcomes for children and young people.

I hope that I have given the committee some useful background information. I will be happy to take questions from the committee on part 3.

The Convener: Thank you, minister. The evidence that we heard today on the difference that GIRFEC has made was mainly positive. However, a few things cropped up, one of which was the perennial question about communication and systems that do not talk to one another. How will we tackle the issue, which causes great difficulty sometimes?

Another interesting issue that was raised was how we deal with named persons for children who are home educated, given that an educationist would normally be the named person for a child of school age. Will you respond to those points, minister?

Aileen Campbell: It is good to hear that you had such a positive session on GIRFEC. As you know, GIRFEC has been around for a while. The bill provides the opportunity to embed the approach further, putting the child at the heart of the design and delivery of services.

You asked about communication. Part 3 is about ensuring that joint working happens. I think that this morning the committee heard good examples of joint working and the strong relationships and good communication that are crucial to the delivery of services that a child or family needs.

There is the joint services element of the bill, and we want a reporting mechanism that brings together local authorities and health boards. We will ensure that such an approach is standardised and embedded in the bill, to ensure that there is an holistic approach that reflects the child’s holistic needs and promotes the child’s wellbeing.

As the bill progresses through the Parliament, I know that the Education and Culture Committee, which is the lead committee, will take a strong interest in the named person aspect, because of the issues that have arisen in that regard. From our point of view, the named person is a big part of the GIRFEC approach. It is about ensuring that services are delivered consistently, that families have a point of contact and that support is in place.

We are well aware of the issues that have arisen in relation to home-educated children. We are working with stakeholders to ensure that, through guidance for example, procedures are put in place to reflect the parental choice to educate a child at home—it is right that there is such a choice, because the parent is the person who knows the child best. We will ensure that that is reflected in the bill and in the guidance.

The Convener: Mary Taylor, the chief executive of the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations, told us this morning that the housing sector is not really taken into account in either bill. She thinks that the sector has a major part to play in integration. Will you comment on that, cabinet secretary?

Alex Neil: Absolutely. I agree with Mary Taylor that it is essential to involve the housing sector, particularly the social housing sector. Many of the issues that we are dealing with, whether delayed discharge, aids and adaptations or a range of other issues, clearly require the involvement of housing associations and local authority housing departments. We have a stream of work going on, which I commissioned a few months ago, to see how we can best ensure that the housing function is involved at grass-roots level in the partnerships. It may not necessarily be the case that housing bodies are separately represented on partnership boards, but I think that the most important element is what happens in the localities underneath the partnership board area. That is where the close working relationship between health, social work and housing is vital. Both the ministerial steering group and the bill steering group are looking at how best to achieve that.

The Convener: Minister, do you want to follow up on that?

Aileen Campbell: Yes. Section 10(1)(b)(ii) in part 3 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill explicitly refers to consulting “such social landlords as appear to provide housing in the area of the local authority”.

when the local authority is preparing a children’s services plan, so there is explicit recognition of the role that housing can play in a child’s wellbeing.

The Convener: Thank you.

Margaret Mitchell: Good morning. It is clear from the very comprehensive opening statements from the cabinet secretary and the minister that both bills contain provisions that require consultation on their respective shared services provision. Section 6(2)(a) of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill requires consultation to be with “such persons or groups of persons appearing to the Scottish Ministers to have an interest”.

Section 10(2)(a) of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill requires consultation with organisations that “represent the interests of persons who use or are likely to use any children’s service”.

However, neither bill appears to require consultation with individual service users.

Despite your emphasising that the provisions are based on the Christie commission recommendations and that we are putting children at the heart of the process, the fact of the matter is that, as you have explained it so far, there does not seem to be a requirement to consult the child or the young person.

Aileen Campbell: As Margaret Mitchell correctly notes, the ethos of the bill is getting it right for every child and putting the child at the centre of service design and delivery. The bill mentions setting out guidance on how consultation might take place on potentially bringing into the planning process third sector providers and whoever else is appropriate, which will include the child and the families. However, as we develop the guidance, we can certainly make it explicitly clear that consultation should recognise the role of the child and the family and ensure that they have a full and active role in the service design and delivery that is going on around them.

Margaret Mitchell: May I put a specific, quite technical question to you, minister? You will be aware that the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 drew everything affecting children into a single act. The act had three overarching principles, but the key one was to require the child to be given the opportunity to express their views. Obviously, their welfare is required to be a paramount consideration and there is the requirement that the minimum proportion of state intervention be preferred over disproportionate intervention in family life. Subsequent legislation affecting children and young people—for example, on children’s hearings and adoption—has ensured that those requirements are incorporated, but that is not the case with the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Why is that?

Aileen Campbell: Again, the bill takes appropriate account of the child and the family. That is the ethos of GIRFEC, which is about ensuring that services provide support to families when they need it and that such intervention is appropriate and timely, and is delivered at the right point to avoid crises, given that intervention is most effective when it is done as early as possible.

It is worth recognising that the 1995 act is still in place and that our aim is to ensure that we make the bill as good as it can be, that we can work things through in consultation with stakeholders and that our guidance reflects the points that you have raised as much as it can.

Philip, do you have anything to add?

Philip Raines (Scottish Government): Section 9, which relates to the aims of the children’s services plan and sets out many of the principles that we want to underpin the planning of children’s services—and, by extension, the way in which children’s services are carried out—makes it clear that planning should take place in a way that “best safeguards, supports and promotes the wellbeing of children in the area concerned ... is most integrated from the point of view of recipients, and ... constitutes the most efficient use of available resources”.

We wanted to make many of those principles explicit in the bill to ensure that they underpin the planning that takes place. As the minister has said, we will work with stakeholders on the detail of that and how that will work in practice as we develop guidance.

Margaret Mitchell: The fact that the issue is not implicit in the bill as it has been in other bills has led some to comment that this is a duty on public services rather than anything in particular to do with the rights of the child. That, I think, is the technical point.

Do you wish to comment on the suggestion made by an earlier witness that, in view of this legislation and potentially competing legislation, the Scottish Government should GIRFEC itself?

Aileen Campbell: Should what itself?

The Convener: GIRFEC itself.

Margaret Mitchell: They were referring to getting it right for every child. The suggestion was that the Scottish Government should look at the various bits of legislation that might compete with, conflict with or duplicate one another.

Aileen Campbell: The bills complement one another; in fact, a lot of work has been done to ensure that not just these two bills but all the bills that we introduce complement one another. From my point of view, the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is about ensuring that the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child is taken far more into account in the work that we as a Government do. That applies not just to this bill but to all our work across Government, regardless of whether we are talking about legislation. The Government has been working in a joined-up way to ensure that the bills are complementary and that the work of Government in future dovetails and provides the good outcomes that we expect to emerge from the bills that we are presenting today.

Margaret Mitchell: Did you hear the previous panel’s evidence?

Aileen Campbell: I did not catch it all. Did you wish to raise a specific issue?

Margaret Mitchell: I simply refer you back to the specific examples of conflicting legislation and duplication that were highlighted and suggest that the previous panel’s evidence on that specific point might be worth looking at.

The Convener: I am sure that, as per usual, the minister will do so.

Richard Baker: Although the previous panel was very enthusiastic about the potential for integrating and improving services through legislation, the witnesses asked that, in pursuing this agenda, we were careful not to create new and additional structures instead of simplifying things. How would you allay such concerns?

Alex Neil: To some extent, the legislation will streamline structures and make it easier to see the focus for partnership working. We have clearly specified that one of two models must be adopted:
the lead agency model that has been adopted in the Highland area or the joint corporate body model, which I think will be adopted in most if not by all of the rest of Scotland. As a result, there is scope for many existing committees to be streamlined. For example, one of the consequences of the enactment of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill will be that there will be no need for separate CHPs because their work will in effect be incorporated into the partnership. Moreover, with the introduction of a much more formal structure, the many formal and informal organisations involving health boards and local authorities at local level can be collapsed. In that way, the legislation will simplify the structure.

The role of the chief officer in the partnership will also be crucial because they will do two things: first, report to the partnership board—or the lead agency, if a lead agency model has been adopted—but, secondly, report to the respective chief executives of the local authorities. For example, such an approach has been up and running very successfully in West Lothian for eight years now and integration and co-ordination at parent organisation level have been substantially enhanced as a result of the partnership’s work.

I should stress that, from day 1, we want the acute health sector to be actively involved in the partnerships. When we involve acute care in the community, many of the barriers that exist between the primary care sector and social care, and between the primary and secondary care sectors, start to get broken down. A good example of that is the hospital at home programme that NHS Lanarkshire initiated, which is now being rolled out across the country. I think that that will remove barriers and bureaucracy, cut red tape and lead to much more localised provision.

In addition, we have commissioned—jointly with our colleagues in the local authorities—some work to look at where the public health function would sit in future. In the post-war situation, the public health responsibilities were given exclusively to local authorities. Under Ted Heath, they were transferred exclusively to the new health boards. South of the border, they have been split up between the health boards or their equivalents and the local authorities. My view is that a successful public health policy requires the health boards and the local authorities, with their respective remits, to work in an integrated fashion. I think that an opportunity exists, particularly in public health, not just to enhance the service, but to break down the barriers that have traditionally existed between the different sectors and to streamline the entire process.

Richard Baker: That is helpful, but there is still a concern about the details of what is proposed and how it will work in practice. In its submission to the committee on the two bills, Audit Scotland said:

“Significantly, the relationship between CHPs and the new integrated health and social care arrangements ... and changes to children’s services ... are not clear.”

Will greater clarity be provided on some of the working arrangements before the bills are finalised?

Alex Neil: I am surprised by that comment, because I believe that Audit Scotland is represented on the group that is chaired by Pat Watters, the former leader of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, which is looking specifically at enhancing the role of the CHPs in relation not just to health and local authorities, but to the entire public sector operation at local level.

It is likely that the output from that group, which includes representatives from a wide range of organisations including COSLA and the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives and Senior Managers, will take forward in a substantial way greater co-ordination and integration of services across the board at local level. In particular, I know—because I am a member of the group—that it has had serious and in-depth discussions about the need for bodies such as health boards and local authorities, and others, to discuss annually their strategic budget proposals before they agree to implement those proposals, in an effort to ensure that across the public sector, in each local authority area, we maximise the impact of the public pound. Therefore, I am surprised that Audit Scotland has made that comment.

Richard Baker: Well, it has made it, so—

Alex Neil: I draw your attention to the work of the group that is chaired by Pat Watters.

Richard Baker: I am sure that you and Pat will discuss the matter—

Alex Neil: Absolutely.

Richard Baker: I do not want to labour the point, but it is worth reflecting on the fact that Audit Scotland raised the issue specifically in relation to CHPs.

Alex Neil: Pat’s group is looking specifically at the role of CHPs and how there can be much greater integration and co-ordination across the public sector in each local authority area.

The Convener: I am sure that the committee will talk to Mr Watters again shortly, because we said that we would.

Stuart McMillan: Good morning, panel.

My question is directed mainly at the cabinet secretary. The Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill is, obviously, about public bodies; it is not about other organisations. Prior to the summer recess, the committee concluded the latest instalment of its inquiry into public services reform. An issue that came up in all three of the stages of the inquiry that we undertook was community and third sector involvement in the shaping and delivery of public services.

During one of the visits that I undertook over the summer, a council of voluntary services made the point that the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill appears to make no mention of community involvement. Now, I accept that the bill is about public bodies rather than about communities per se, but it appeared to that CVS that the bill is about something that is being done to people rather than in conjunction with the community. Should there be a wider discussion with communities to provide that involvement?

Alex Neil: Let me make it clear that, as should be evident from the policy memorandum and from the bill itself, we see the third and independent sectors as having a very important role not just in the delivery of services but in the design and architecture of services.

I think that there is a bit of a misconception here, and let me explain why. Because the health board and the local authority are the public fund holders, only they have a vote on the partnership board. However, as we have seen in West Lothian and elsewhere, the third and independent sectors are represented on the boards. We would envisage that happening in every case because the third and independent sectors clearly have a major role to play. Obviously, we need to ensure that there is no conflict of interests, because we cannot have people who are competing in a tender for service delivery simultaneously sitting on the board. However, those governance issues are not new and have been with us for a long time.

You just need to look at West Lothian, which is a kind of exemplar for the joint corporate body model in Scotland, to see that the third and independent sectors have a role not only in terms of board membership but—more important, actually—in designing and delivering services at the locality level. They are heavily involved in that. Also, where there are any proposals for service redesign, the third and independent sectors are involved in the process and in the consultations on the redesign of services. I would take West Lothian as a very good example. We would expect that kind of standard of consultation with, and standard of involvement of, the third and independent sectors to be followed. Indeed, we will require that, and we will incentivise the use of the third and independent sectors where that is appropriate.

Stuart McMillan: That is helpful, thank you.

The Convener: Cabinet secretary, you have mentioned that West Lothian is probably the exemplar for this kind of work. In the evidence from East Ayrshire Council earlier today, we heard that co-location can help a lot in that regard. Obviously, West Lothian Council has its new civic building, where teams from across the public sector can work side by side at desks next to one another. That seems to make joint working easier. In your opinion, is co-location required to ensure that all these things work properly?

Alex Neil: I would not like to prescribe that co-location is always a prerequisite to approving any delivery plan, but I must say that, in the examples that I have seen, co-location is definitely very advantageous. In the East Ayrshire Council headquarters building on London Road in Kilmarnock, the co-location of services there is definitely a huge advantage in providing for integrated delivery.

I draw your attention to a pilot project that is being run in the mining village of Dalmellington in East Ayrshire. That joint project, which involves the third sector as well as the local authority and the health board, is using telehealth to help older people with co-morbidities. Over the 21 months that the pilot has been running, the GP in charge says that, for the 20 older people with co-morbidities who are involved in the pilot, there has been a reduction in hospitalisation of that cohort group that has been of the order of 70 per cent. That is a very practical example.

Similarly, in your part of the world, convener, in Aberdeen and Aberdeenshire, social workers are co-located in some of the NHS Grampian community hospitals. In Fife, although the partnership boards have not yet been set up formally—they are still prototypes—there is already co-location of health and social workers, for example in Dunfermline, and there is no doubt that it adds great value to the quality and efficiency of service delivery.

The Convener: We have heard your Dalmellington story before, cabinet secretary, and I am glad to hear it again, as I have been telling it elsewhere.

Minister, do you have anything to add on co-location?

Aileen Campbell: The cabinet secretary said that co-location is not a prerequisite for greater integration, but the anecdotal evidence from the service user's point of view is convincing. If someone needs a bit of extra support, they can go to a service that is co-located with social workers, GPs or whoever and they do not face the stigma that is attached to seeking help from that service because they are entering a building in which a variety of different services are provided. People can be a bit more proactive in seeking help and can feel reassured that there will not be any stigma attached to that and that people will not start talking about them. The anecdotal evidence from the point of view of the service user is compelling regarding how they feel when they enter a place where different services are co-located. They find that a good experience for them.

The Convener: Thank you very much.

John Wilson: Good afternoon, cabinet secretary and minister. Cabinet secretary, you have spoken about integration measures. According to our Scottish Parliament information centre briefing, there will be two broad models of integration, which will be broken down into four different models. The first model is the body corporate model, under which local authorities and health boards will come together to form a joint board that will be separate from the local authorities and health boards and will be led by a chief officer. Do you see that chief officer being separate from the health board and the local authority, and will that require the creation of a new post?

Alex Neil: It will be a statutory post after the bill has been passed. That said, we must be pragmatic. Again I refer to West Lothian, where the chief officer has come from a health board background but is on the senior management team of both the local authority and the health board. The important thing is that the chief officer reports primarily to his or her own board but also has a line of responsibility to the chief executive of the local authority and to the health board. In West Lothian—and, indeed, in other areas where it is earlier days than in West Lothian—that arrangement has worked very well.

John Wilson: What I am trying to get at is whether we will see the creation of a new administrative structure for the delivery of services. If we create a new administrative structure, how will that be paid for?

Alex Neil: By definition, the partnership board is a new administrative structure because such boards do not exist at present, and the role of the chief officer is a new position in that sense. The important thing in paying for that is the integrated budget. I will give you a good example. I have been encouraging local authorities and health boards up and down the country to follow the example of West Lothian and establish a step-up, step-down centre as one way of improving the transition from hospital back into the community. The centre has also contributed to the elimination of delayed discharges in West Lothian. If West Lothian did not have a partnership board, the health board’s and the local authority’s respective shares of the funding for the project would have to go through separate decision-making processes within both the local authority and the health board, through the committee structure and all the rest of it.

When you have integrated budgets, that is decided internally, within the partnership board. The decisions can be made quicker but, more important, they will be taken in the context of the strategic plan that is laid down and agreed by the partnership board, which would obviously have to be endorsed by both the health board and the local authority. You get much quicker decision making and much more co-ordinated and integrated approaches. The evidence from north and south of the border—from Torbay, for example—is that the quality of the decision making is far better. Most important, not only do you end up with far better outcomes, but those outcomes are delivered far more cost effectively, which is a big prize.

John Wilson: I welcome what you said about West Lothian, but you are not promoting the West Lothian model throughout Scotland; four different models of integration can be taken from the proposals that are before local authorities and health boards. Would it not have been better to have applied the West Lothian model of integration throughout Scotland, so that a uniform model would be adopted by all local authorities and health boards?

Alex Neil: From day 1, including under my predecessor, Nicola Sturgeon, this has been an iterative process of discussion between us, the local authorities, which have been represented by COSLA and SOLACE, and the third and independent sectors. My approach to the development of the models, and indeed to the whole bill, has been to try to get consensus among the local authorities, the health sector, the Scottish Government and the third and independent sectors. On the basis of those bodies’ experience, track record and expertise in delivering the services, they are all pretty much of the opinion that there should be a degree of choice so that each area can decide how best to deliver in their area. Highland has decided on a particular variation of the lead-agency model and all the indications are that it is beginning to work well and to deliver substantially improved services and outcomes.

We have said all along that it would be inappropriate for us to sit in Edinburgh and prescribe every detail of the arrangement in each of the 32 local authority areas. How you would structure services in Glasgow, where you have one health board and six local authorities, is completely different from how you would structure them in the Borders, where you have one local authority and one health board with coterminous boundaries.

We are saying that the principles that matter to us are that there is a statutory underpinning to the integration of adult health and social care and that there is an integrated board, budget and strategic plan. That is why the bill sets out the framework. Within that framework, we are saying to local people, “You decide what’s best for your area, because politicians and civil servants sitting in Edinburgh don’t know enough about what’s happening in your local area to dictate to you how all the i’s are dotted and all the t’s are stroked.”

John Wilson: Having said that, can you assure us that the reporting and monitoring regime carried out by the Scottish Government will be consistent across all models of integration used by health boards and local authorities?

Alex Neil: Absolutely. We have said clearly that, in measuring success, the key thing that we are interested in is the national outcomes. You might ask why the outcomes are not on the face of the bill. They are not there for two reasons. One is that outcomes change. The outcomes that you would set today would be very different from the outcomes that you would have set, say, five years ago. I suspect that they would also be very different from what they would be in five or 10 years’ time as service provision changes—how we do things in these fields changes continually. Therefore, if you put the outcomes in the bill, you would need to introduce primary legislation every time you wanted to amend them. The national outcomes will be set out in secondary legislation.

Secondly, I am not going to take a unilateral decision on what those outcomes will be. All along, we have proceeded on a partnership basis with our friends in the local authorities and the third and independent sectors, and I think that this will work much better if we can get agreement on what the national outcomes should be and on how we measure success. We are more likely to achieve success if from day 1 everyone is signed up to what has been defined as success.

John Wilson: I am well aware that outcomes should not be set out in the bill. After all, you will know from your own constituency, cabinet secretary, that things can change dramatically with one report.

Alex Neil: They have improved enormously in the past two years.

John Wilson: I am glad that you have friends in local government throughout Scotland.

Anne McTaggart: Now that we are into the afternoon, I wish the cabinet secretary and minister good afternoon.

I have two quick questions. How will the quite different mechanisms for integrating services that are set out in each bill improve children’s transition to adult services?

Alex Neil: I will let Aileen Campbell take the lead on this question, but I point out that the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, which deals with adult health and social care, does not make a statutory requirement with regard to the integration of health and social care per se. However, coming back to the examples of the Highlands and West Lothian, I note that, in both cases, even with their different administrative arrangements it was agreed almost from day 1 that they needed to integrate their children’s health and social care services.

I believe that there are two big differences between dealing with children and dealing with adults. First, there is the very crucial role that the education system plays with children and for which there is no equivalent for adults, particularly older people. Secondly, children by definition do not legally have the capacity to make decisions for themselves. However, adults do and I note that there are special arrangements for adults with incapacity. The fact that these two bills cross-reference each other means that we are singing from the same hymn sheet—and that is very important.

Aileen Campbell: Some of the consultation responses to the lead committee have acknowledged that the transition from children’s to adult services can be challenging. The two bills allow for greater planning in both services; the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill will help to provide far more planning in adult services, while the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill will require improvements in children’s services to recognise the breadth of different people and services involved in a child’s life. The fact that the two systems will improve planning will give us the ability to make the transition far smoother than might have been the case in the past. Indeed, that is the benefit of having these two approaches; greater emphasis on planning and improvement from children’s point of view to reflect the breadth of services involved in a child’s life will enable a better transition to adult services, which will also be improved through better planning.

Anne McTaggart: With regard to CPPs, how do these bills tie into the proposed community empowerment and renewal bill?

Alex Neil: Obviously, the community empowerment and renewal bill has a wider remit; it is not entirely about, but very much has an emphasis on, physical assets, how the community obtains such assets and such matters. However, the umbrella for all of this is the Government’s guiding principles and strategic objectives, which include not only community empowerment and renewal but public sector reform, to ensure that better-quality services are delivered more cost effectively and timeously; patient-centred healthcare and social care; and, indeed, person-centred education. Those underlying principles are not restricted to my bill, Aileen Campbell’s bill or Derek Mackay’s community empowerment bill; they are universal and part and parcel of our broad principled agenda for changing Scotland for the better.

Aileen Campbell: I echo the cabinet secretary’s comments. When we seek to help families and children, we must ensure that we build from an asset-based approach—indeed, the chief medical officer is keen to promote approaches that build from a family’s strengths—and I think that that dovetails very nicely with the community empowerment work that Derek Mackay will be taking forward.

Local authorities already publish children’s services plans and West Lothian, for example, sets out very clearly how such plans integrate with the wider CPP family. The fact that structures are already in place to reflect community planning needs will also be reflected in how we move forward on this issue, with CPPs no doubt playing a crucial role in making the improvements that we expect to emerge from the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. I also imagine that our approach will reflect the single outcome agreements that local authorities will be finalising.

I hope that that covers your question.

The Convener: Thank you very much for that useful evidence.

Before I move the meeting into private session, I ask for everyone’s co-operation in clearing the room quite quickly. We need to get through a lot of business before we meet the European commissioner at 1 o’clock.

Submission from NHS Ayrshire and Arran – Paper 1

1. The potential benefits which might accrue from shared working arrangements, both for the organisations involved and for those in receipt of services;

In June 2013 Ayrshire and Arran NHS Board approved the following:

- The adoption of the body corporate model for the integration of health and social care, between Ayrshire and Arran Health Board and each of the three Ayrshire Local Authorities
- The creation of a Transition Integration Board and thereafter a Shadow Integration Board in each Local Authority area to plan for the establishment of formal Health and Social Care Partnerships in North, South and East Ayrshire under the direction of Integration Joint Boards
- The establishment of the post of Chief Officer for the North, South and East Ayrshire Health and Social Care Partnerships
- The appointment process for the Chief Officer to each Health & Social Care Partnership.

This process was mirrored by each of our Local Authority Partners through their own systems. It should be noted that Ayrshire and Arran Health Board has three Councils within its boundaries.

A requirement of this model is the establishment of an Integration Joint Board in each partnership area. To progress this, arrangements are being made for a Transition Integration Board to be in place as soon as practicable followed by a Shadow Integration Board from 1 April 2014 with the Integration Joint Board being established by 1 April 2015, or in line with the timetabling as set out in the final legislation.

As we progress we will continue to build upon our positive and well established relationships with our Local Authority partners. We anticipate that the establishment of the joint management teams will result in a number of benefits.

Efficiencies and benefits are anticipated to arise as follows:

- The focus on outcomes (providing this is reflected in performance regimes)
- The introduction of locality planning – this should streamline community engagement across the four sectors and maximise the opportunities for an assets based approach while engaging local users, carers and professionals in an agenda which is real for them. It should also bring a sharper focus on tackling health inequalities

- The principle of joint and equal responsibility – this should help reduce “hand offs” between the statutory agencies
- The engagement of the third and independent sectors as strategic partners – this is already helping to shape effective plans in services for older people
- A logical framework reflected in the flow of the Bill from the model of integration to the integration plan to the strategic plan with consistent integration planning principles throughout – this will bring a much higher level of consistency and focus to joint endeavour
- Stronger working relationships with adult services resulting in a more family focused approach
- Enhanced working relationships with our third sector partners
- Improved information sharing.

2. The rationale for having a separate approach in both Bills to establishing joint working arrangements.

Although the subject matter of the Bills is different, there are significant similarities in the approach taken to achieve the underlying aim of integrated or shared services. Both Bills have implications for the development of shared services involving local government, the health service and other parts of the public service. We would accept that it is necessary to have two separate Bills given the subject matter but it would have had a number of advantages if the approaches could have been more closely aligned.

3. In what area potential savings might arise?

It is difficult to offer a definitive statement as children’s services in implementing GIRFEC (Getting It Right for Every Child) and the Early Years Collaborative have had a clear focus on integration and better joint working for a number of years, and we would anticipate that the implementation of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill would further enhance this process. We can however reasonably anticipate that savings would result from the following:

- An improved approach to making investment and disinvestment decisions based on a clear process and evidence base and best use of integrated resources
- Greater potential to reduce costs through a joint strategic commissioning process which is based on improving outcomes at both a strategic and individual level, supports effective service change and views issues from a user’s perspective.

- Enhanced processes for early identification and intervention for example:

  Effective and secure sharing of information within and between agencies is fundamental to the protection of children. AYRshare is a mechanism for sharing information across partner agencies will lead to a more effective integrated approach to assessment, single child’s plan and common chronology ensuring we are compliant with the GIRFEC transformational change programme. It will link current computer systems and support business processes. Enabling coordinated and efficient support, well informed personnel working in partnership, enhancing our ability to achieve appropriate and timely interventions leading to improved outcomes.

- Better outcomes for our Children and Young People

  - Enhanced information sharing (Specifically between Adult and Children’s services)

  - A more integrated strategic approach

  - More effective use of current resources (reducing any overlap in service delivery)

  - Significant potential to streamline services that are currently delivered by both the LA and Health.

4. Whether there are any issues around the proposals covering consultation on, and development of, strategic plans/service plans between the respective areas involved?

There is a need to ensure that staff are fully engaged and consulted in the decision making process leading to implementation, with regard to both Bills. A consistence of approach across all staff groups is critical as is gaining commitment from staff which should be regarded as a marker for success.

NHS Boards will require, in strategy, policy and performance to make explicit children’s rights and steps taken to comply with this section of the legislation. This will require a culture shift across health services and whilst it is welcomed, it poses certain challenges. Further guidance on implementation and monitoring performance would be welcome and this would also help to support a consistent approach across the country.
It is suggested there will be particular challenges for those who work in services where the adult is the primary receiver of care and their understanding as to compliance with children’s rights in practice is crucial to the implementation of the legislation. In addition, health practitioners may face conflict in balancing the rights of adults receiving care with those of the adult’s children.

NHS Boards will require clarity on the role of the corporate parent and the implications of this. Consideration will need to be given to the role of adult health services in particular in relation to those 16-25 years and action taken to ensure they understand the legislation and the interface with vulnerable adult legislation.

Concern about possible duplication of effort e.g., preparing a children’s services plan and a corporate parenting plan. We will be required under the new bill to produce individual children’s plans which will bring together all of the relevant information and resulting actions but we still have a requirement under the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 for individual support plans.

The Children and Young People’s Health Strategy for Ayrshire and Arran, sets out the broad vision for improving and promoting health, developing health services and addressing inequalities for children and young people in Ayrshire and Arran. This document forms the health chapter of each of our Local Authority partners Integrated Children’s Services Plans. This supports an equitable approach to meeting and addressing the health needs of our children and young people. Our plan for the establishment of three Health and Social Care Partnership’s in North, South and East Ayrshire has the potential to result in a significant variance in agreed priorities which may result in an inequitable approach.

<td>To what extent do you believe that the approach being proposed in the Bill will achieve its stated policy objectives?</td>

<td>The Bill sets out a coherent framework within which integration can be progressed but leaves room for local partnerships to develop “best fit” solutions within statutory boundaries. It is felt that this strikes a good balance and it is believed will help to achieve the stated policy objectives. The extent to which the stated policy objectives will be achieved will be largely determined by two factors: (1) moving from a focus on outcomes at a high strategic level to personal outcomes for individuals to ensure seamlessness at point of service delivery (2) effective locality plans which link to, and heavily influence the Integration Authority strategic plans.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3.</td>
<td>Please indicate which, if any, aspects of the Bill’s policy objectives you would consider as key strengths.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
|   | The coherence of the policy objectives is a key strength. They will have to be followed through at a personal and locality level supported by an approach which values enablement and coproduction.
Aspects of the policy memorandum are welcome reminders:
- “Integration is not an end in itself – it will only improve the experience of people using services when partner organisations work together to ensure that services are being integrated as an effective means for achieving better outcomes”;
- “legislation alone will not achieve the scale or improvement that is required . . . Leadership is key, locally and nationally . . .” |
4. Please provide details of any areas in which you feel the Bill’s provisions could be strengthened.

It may be that the following will be picked up in regulations etc but as it stands, the Bill could be strengthened in the following areas:

a) public accountability arrangements – section 33 mentions a performance report. It may be helpful to link this to a focus on outcomes for avoidance of doubt;

b) statutory public engagement responsibilities – for instance it would be helpful to clarify the position of Public Partnership Forums (PPFs). In Ayrshire, the PPFs have proven to be very effective support to public engagement arrangements across the totality of health provision;

c) consultation arrangements – various references are made to issues such as the preparation of the integration plan but there is a substantive issue to be addressed concerning any implications for consultation arrangements in relation to proposals for service change made by the Integration Authority;

d) following on from this, it may be helpful to clarify approval processes in instances where a strategic plan proposes major service change. In particular whether the Cabinet Secretary will continue to hold what would effectively be veto powers over the Integration Authority’s plans;

e) whilst it is helpful that the Bill makes consistent reference to integration planning principles these are silent on the need to ensure effective clinical / care governance;

f) staff governance is a statutory requirement of NHS Boards and the Bill is fairly silent on what arrangements (if any) Integration Authorities will be required to put in place.

 g) there is a need to be more explicit about how the Integration Authority will be scrutinised jointly, by external scrutiny agencies;

h) in terms of analytical review of the Bill as a whole, there may be a case for considering whether the balance between what is on the face of the Bill and what will be in regulations could be improved. For instance while regulations will define the scope of integration, it is on the face of the Bill that the responsibilities of a Chief Officer are subject to the agreement of Scottish Ministers.
5. What are the efficiencies and benefits that you anticipate will arise from your organisation from the delivery of integration plans?

Efficiencies and benefits are anticipated to arise as follows:

- the focus on outcomes (providing this is reflected in performance regimes);

- the introduction of locality planning – this should streamline community engagement across the four sectors and maximise the opportunities for an assets based approach while engaging local users, carers and professionals in an agenda which is real for them. It should also bring a sharper focus on tackling health inequalities;

- the principle of joint and equal responsibility – this should help reduce “hand offs” between the statutory agencies;

- the engagement of the third and independent sectors as strategic partners – this is already helping to shape effective plans in services for older people;

- a logical framework reflected in the flow of the Bill from the model of integration to the integration plan to the strategic plan with consistent integration planning principles throughout – this will bring a much higher level of consistency and focus to joint endeavours;

- an improved approach to making investment and disinvestment decisions based on a clear process and evidence base and best use of integrated resources;

- greater potential for a joint strategic commissioning process which is based on improving outcomes at both a strategic and individual level, supports effective service change and views issues from a user’s perspective.

6. What effect do you anticipate integration plans will have on outcomes for those receiving services?

Integration plans will bring a rigour to setting out what the Partnership is responsible for and how it will be funded. Coupled with the strategic plan setting out how the Partnership will deliver its responsibilities it will give greater transparency to how all of this directly relates to improving outcomes. Crucially, however, it must also link to effective locality plans which should capture how refreshed relationships between the statutory, third and independent sectors and local communities can also improve outcomes.

General comments concerning General Practice and the Two Bills from A Deep End Perspective

As a GP the barriers that prevent me working more closely in partnership are excessive workload, uncertainty and anxiety over job security, high turnover of staff, short life span of community projects, bewildering array of services and pathways, lack of time and difficulty in getting hold of people, dysfunctional and overly large planning committees, incomprehensible and verbose communications from on high, abstract rationalist planning that disparages experience and organically developed systems, a remorseless rise in demand and expectations, a self-defeating emphasis on measurable factors that undermines the quality of interpersonal relationships and care.

Deep End GP

General practice is the main public service that is in regular contact with virtually the whole of the general population, with substantial cumulative knowledge and experience of people’s problems and consistently reported high levels of public trust. These intrinsic features make General Practices the natural hubs around which integrated care should be based, with groups of General Practices supported, within the context of local service planning, to deliver integrated care in partnership with secondary care, area-based NHS services, social work and community organisations.

The Deep End Report 18 on Integrated Care (Annex A) lists the essential ingredients of an integrated care approach. Attached workers, lay link workers and protected time are keys to joint working. Local leadership needs respect, support and representation (not consultation) within locality planning and acknowledgement of practitioners’ experiential knowledge to develop an ‘ecology of practice’ (Fisher & Owen, 2008).
In front line care the two main barriers to integrated care are firstly, the inverse care law, whereby practices serving the most deprived areas are insufficiently resourced to meet patients’ needs, and secondly, poor links between general practices and many other area-based health and social services. These challenges are clearly stated in Deep End Report 12 on Vulnerable Children and Families (Annex B). This report highlights the frustration of practice teams who remain limited in their ability to deal with children with unmet needs in vulnerable family settings. Current policies aimed at family support unfortunately often fail to explicitly outline the contribution of General Practice to child safeguarding.

The policy memorandum for the Children and Young People Bill makes no reference to General Practice, while the memorandum for the Public Bodies only refers to General Practitioners as a group to be consulted. There is no recognition of general practice as the natural hub of local health systems, based on its intrinsic features of population contact and coverage, continuity, cumulative knowledge and trust.

Although many services are involved in caring for children, practice teams often have additional substantial contact with and knowledge of a child’s family, including the health of parents and carers, which is relevant to understanding child well-being on a case by case basis. Most GPs recognize and value the continuity with families and possible opportunities for early intervention that should define universal child health care within the primary care structure. This remains an unrealized aspiration at present because the system does not support the full potential of General Practice’s contribution towards safeguarding children.

General Practitioners at the Deep End address this concern in Report 20 What can NHS Scotland do to prevent and reduce health inequalities?, which advocates for a National Enhanced Service for Vulnerable Families (Annex C), providing a more explicit role and additional pro rata support for general practices serving vulnerable families in very deprived areas.

Working Outside A Managerialist Framework

Locality planning is not just about commissioning and budgetary planning but about organically growing trust, relationships and local systems that make integrated working and smoother decision-making possible. Front line staff and volunteers are the people who will or will not work as partners to make services more integrated and seamless for patients. However, they need to be given the resources to be able to do this, and not loaded with endless targets developed remotely. I hope this legislation will not be another missed opportunity to create the kind of organisational environment which makes it possible to grow this kind of trust and people-based system of care that patients expect and deserve.

Deep End GP

General Practitioners at the Deep End welcome the different approach in Scotland, from the rest of the UK, which encourages localism, favouring less central control and trusting professionals to work with and shape policy development (Greer, 2005). However, the Joint Bodies Bill appears concerned mainly with a second attempt at the structural integration of current local health and social care organizations. Policy consolidation is not a linear process, as the recent attempt at Community Health Partnerships has shown, resulting in ineffective integrated care for patients and widespread professional scepticism about the new arrangements.

General Practitioners at the Deep End question any assumption that the budgetary and accounting arrangements of senior managers are the key factors in enabling or preventing partnerships. In reality this superstructure rests on a foundation of human factors that are not given sufficient weight in these proposals.

The Joint Bodies Bill only mentions general practice in terms of how general practices working in localities should be represented within the new joint working arrangements. It is also important to consider the essential ingredients of care arrangements providing integrated continuity of care for large numbers of people. At present the opportunities for GPs to engage directly with locality planning arrangements are limited, patchy and inconsistent.

Specific Questions

Q1. What benefits which might accrue from shared working arrangements, both for the organisations involved and for those in receipt of services?

- It is important to acknowledge that despite the consensus that collaboration within health and social care is more effective than single agency approaches there are substantial problems associated with the adoption of this principle.

- Documented problems include a lack of definitional clarity surrounding partnership, endless organisational restructuring and barriers between core and third sector agencies. A general lack of valid evidence of improvement to service delivery and user outcomes means that we know ‘relatively little about what works’ (Glasby & Dickinson, 2008, p.38)

- It is imperative to acknowledge that policy imperatives can lead to unintended consequences in the delivery of services. The increasing bureaucratisation of managerial systems has resulted, we believe, in fragmentation of health service provision.

- Services that Deep End GPs regard as attached and intrinsic to effective universal and targeted health provision (e.g midwifery services, pact teams and health visitors) are now professionally and strategically removed from General Practice, resulting in less opportunity to provide a coherent effective health service. There are additional barriers to effective working between primary and secondary that Deep End Report 18 on Integrated Care (Annex A) highlights, especially in relation to the provision of seamless care for the frail elderly population. Within the hospital setting, perverse waiting time targets and financial penalties result in difficulties for vulnerable children who often miss hospital appointments and are not offered second appointments.

- The Deep End Project has outlined how general practice can contribute to the conceptual and theoretical coherence of partnership working, by developing community based solutions, better use of support services and increased patient participation in their own health and well-being.

- Our proposals build on the work already taking place in General Practice where the serial encounter is key to developing holistic unconditional healthcare and where General Practice may be the most suitable setting to promote resilience in communities and empower patients and their carers in managing their health needs (Mola, 2013).

- Collaboration between GPs and other partners exists on many different levels. Working collaboratively promotes a collective determination to reach objectives where sharing information and experiences contributes to a more detailed local knowledge of individual patients and their families. This is vital to planning effective support services for patients, addressing their unmet health needs and anticipating when they will need to access specialized services.
The complexity of health issues that are a consequence of multimorbidity, beginning earlier in Deep End practice patients, requires informational continuity and continuity of care to ensure that services are best matched to the patient’s requirements. The Deep End believes that General Practice is the natural hub of such a health care system partly because of the serial encounter between GPs and their patients and the detailed health information that is held in patient records. If the ethical considerations to sharing sensitive information are explored at the outset of the integration agenda then it is more likely that professionals will be able to better plan patient care that is acceptable to patients.

We know a great deal about the psychosocial consequences of adverse early years experiences. We also know that a robust primary care health system is important to improving the wellbeing of vulnerable children and their families (Klevens & Whitaker, 2007; Scribano 2010). Given that almost all children and families have a named GP and will consult with their GP regularly we need to promote the role of general practice in supporting vulnerable children. The Deep End has provided a detailed proposal that both clarifies the role of GPs in child safeguarding and describes the structural process to allow this. The legislation if interpreted appropriately, can underpin this process and ultimately General Practice can contribute to better outcomes for vulnerable children.

If we are allowed to maintain organizational autonomy but promote mutuality between professionals then reciprocity and trust will become embedded into the process. This will build effective teamwork as professionals begin to mutually understand the concepts of ‘unmet needs’ and ‘vulnerability’. The principle underlying collaboration is to improve patient care. In order to do this requires a framework that provides the time required to develop formal and informal means of interaction between professional groups strengthens and stabilizes team working and also makes the lines of responsibility clearer when planning health and social care provision.

Q2 What is the rationale for having a separate approach in both bills to establishing joint working arrangements?

From a GP perspective this is not relevant. In GP consultations in practice or during houses visits we are presented with dilemmas that are resolved pragmatically with practical solutions. What is valuable is having an extensive network of readily accessible interagency contacts when planning the support of vulnerable patients and time to co-ordinate the support package. This may be required immediately or developed over time depending on the patient’s circumstances. Joint planning arrangements are strategic processes that should be guided by the frontline professionals and remain patient centred if we are to achieve the aims of the integration agenda.

Within the context of vulnerable children and families the strategic planning aspect of joint working arrangements should ensure that the options to GPs are multifaceted. This should be encapsulated within the Children’s Plan and recognise that vulnerable children are often sign-posted by general practitioners to supportive services. Most vulnerable children do not reach thresholds of intervention that would trigger involvement of statutory services. The ‘targeted’ intervention is frequently embedded within the universal provision of child health care in general practice. It is incumbent on the relevant health authority to recognise this important gatekeeper role for general practice as it establishes its role as a ‘corporate parent’. The mechanism for GPs to inform this process as it is developed would require the contractual arrangement that the Deep End has suggested in its report.

- In respect of adult services the newly formed ‘Integration Authority’ must be prepared to canvas GP views widely on the implementation and evaluation of the integration agenda. There should be very direct lines of communication between this body and general practice, other professionals and patients as the changes are implemented.

Q3 In what areas might potential savings arise?

- The compelling arguments for greater integration of health are driven by rising demand for service and the need to reduce public expenditure. However, there is a lack of economic evaluation of cost effectiveness across studies (Ellis et al, 2006) therefore the savings remain theoretical and are yet to be realised.

- There are potential savings in adult services for example, if pooled budgets in health and social care genuinely result in less time spent in hospital for elderly patients who can be discharged into nursing homes. It remains unclear however how barriers to transferring savings in secondary into primary care will be removed.

- In children’s services savings may result from minimising the consequences of adverse childhood experiences that persist into adulthood. These might include time lost at work through illness and injury, absent school attendance in the short and long term, indirect costs of special education, adult mental health and other healthcare services and the costs to judicial system. Many of these costs savings would be indirectly related to interventions in childhood which would include the proactive identification of vulnerable children in a primary care setting. This would require a different approach to the economic evaluation of such interventions.

- There are not only potential economic savings through the integration of health and social care services. There are intangible savings for example reducing mental anguish and social stigma and are applicable to both adult and children’s services.
Q4 What other issues are there around the proposals covering consultation on, and development of, strategic plans/service plans between the respective areas involved?

- In adult services irrespective of how the ‘integration authority’ is realised there should be robust mechanisms that ensure the engagement with frontline professionals who are tasked with implementing the policy. This is challenging to achieve in General Practice but having a GP lead for each locality/practice and an infrastructure to engage widely with colleagues through for example, protected learning events, would ensure that policy directives are meaningfully guided and influenced by local population needs.

- Governance and accountability processes need to be widely understood and transparent to uphold the integrity of the integration agenda and discourage professional scepticism about the contribution of integration of health and social care. There should be clarity about individual and collective accountability at all levels of strategic planning and during each stage of the implementation of the integration agenda.

- Integration of health and social care and its evaluation are long term processes. Both should be evaluated using a robust research approach specifically because there is a lack of a convincing evidence base for integration of health and social care (Cameron & Lart et al 2013). The Deep End in collaboration with the South Glasgow CHP has proposed such a project but this requires a sustained commitment from Government to support the work and allow frontline professionals and patients to participate in the development of the integration agenda.

- Well intentioned reforms must not exacerbate the margin of error when dealing with the complexity of family circumstances with respect to safeguarding children which are often attributed to deficient interagency working and a failure to share information. Standardisation and micromanagement of decision making in situations where evidence can often be ambiguous and contradictory defeats the purpose of having an integrated system because it cannot support complex decision making in its human, social and organisational context. The Deep End believes that a ‘light-touch’ system design is required whose purpose is not to intensify the bureaucracy of professional working but to free up time, support flexibility and intelligent professional discretion to cope with the contingencies of situations as they arise on a case by case basis. The professionals and patient experience should be driving the development of integrated services, not the system.

- Our faith in the instrumental efficacy of technology and proliferation of process-orientated tasks should not displace what is essential to effective integration working practices, namely sustained professional relationships that are built on mutuality and trust. The Deep End research proposal outlines very clearly the importance of acknowledging the multifaceted aspects of vulnerability and how this maybe inculcated into an agenda that supports professional involvement in vulnerable patient groups in a meaningful way. For example biological, neurological and psychosocial factors may be relevant to the definition of the vulnerable adult or child but in the context of knowledge sharing between professionals this process is ‘slippery’ (difficult to codify) and ‘sticky’ (difficult to share across boundaries) (Reder & Duncan, 2003). Furthermore, acknowledging that non-electronic communication is a component of reaching sound inter-professional agreement (Saario, Hall & Peckover, 2012) is vital to avoid fallacious circular reasoning in complex decision making. If we are to achieve the aims of the integration agenda time must be given to professionals to have regular face-to-face meetings to discuss their own anxieties and share professional opinion in often emotionally and morally charged cases to sustain confidence in their decision making.

This report and recommendations draw on research evidence, previous Deep End reports and discussion groups at the second national Deep End conference at Erskine on 15 May 2012.

- To avoid widening inequalities in health, the NHS must be at its best where it is needed most.
- The arrangements and resources for integrated care should reflect the epidemiology of multimorbidity in Scotland, including its earlier onset in deprived areas.
- Better integrated care for patients with multiple morbidity and complex social problems can prevent or postpone emergencies, improve health and prolong independent living.
- Policies to provide more integrated care must address the inverse care law, whereby general practitioners serving very deprived areas have insufficient time to address patients' problems.
- Patients should be supported to become more knowledgeable and confident in living with their conditions and in making use of available resources, for routine and emergency care.
- The key delivery mechanism for integrated care is the serial encounter, mostly with a small team whom patients know and trust, but also involving other professions, services and resources as needs dictate.
- The intrinsic features of general practice in the NHS, which make practices the natural hubs of local health systems, include patient contact, population coverage, continuity of care, long term relationships, cumulative shared knowledge, flexibility, sustainability and trust.
- Health and social care professionals working in area-based organisations (e.g. mental health, addiction and social work services) should be attached to practices, or groups of practices, on a named basis.
- Practices should be supported to make more use of community assets for health via a new lay link worker role.
- The quality and timeliness of hospital discharge information should be a consultant responsibility and audited as a key component of the quality of hospital care.
- Practices needed protected time to share experience, views and activities, to connect more effectively with other professions, services and community organisations, to develop a collective approach and to be represented effectively.
- Collective working between general practices is best achieved with groups of 5/6 practices, as shown by the Primary Care Collaborative and Links Project. Larger groupings are less likely to achieve common purpose.
- Locality planning arrangements should be based on representation (not consultation), mutual respect and shared responsibility.
Practitioners and managers agree that there are not enough resources to respond to need, resulting in a focus on fire fighting, raised thresholds for engagement and missed opportunities for early intervention.

Local teams are often aware of vulnerable children and families before serious problems develop, but lack the resources to intervene and to make a difference. Investments are needed in home support, free nursery places and other ways of supporting families.

The many suggestions made in this report can result in greater efficiency, especially via better joint working, but do not address the fundamental problem of resources.

Hundreds of professional teams are involved in providing care for vulnerable children and families, and all need to work well, both individually and as components of an integrated system.

The system needs accurate information on the numbers and distribution of vulnerable children and families, including but not restricted to children on child protection registers, as a basis for resource distribution, audit and review.

Effective joint working depends on colleagues being well informed concerning each others’ roles, how they may be contacted locally and the constraints under which they work.

Information about the progress of particular cases needs to be shared between professions and services, so that each is aware of what is happening. There is an urgent need for bespoke IT which links systems and professionals.

Pregnancy is an important opportunity to demonstrate the integration of professionals and services working to identify and help vulnerable mothers and their families.

Professionals and services should be accountable not only for their own contribution but also how this connects with the contributions of others. The “connectedness” of care should be a major policy, management and practitioner objective, concerned not only with joint working around crises, but also continuity of care as required throughout childhood.

Professionals acquire local knowledge and develop trusted relationships with families that are crucial for long term preventive care. There is a need to support and retain such staff, to value the relationships they have developed and to use the information they acquire, via regular multidisciplinary meetings.
ANNEX C : From Deep End Report 20

WHAT CAN NHS SCOTLAND DO TO PREVENT AND REDUCE INEQUALITIES IN HEALTH?

Vulnerable children and families

Current thinking
It is uncontested that vulnerability in early years and beyond impacts adversely on child and adult physical and psychological dimensions of well-being. [1–2] A conservative estimate of the economic cost of the vulnerable child to society in the UK is £735 million annually [3].

Where is general practice?
The Deep End manifesto and reports on vulnerable families [4–5] clearly outlined the contribution that general practice can make to safeguarding children and families. GPs contribute to the process of ongoing family assessment and support [6–7] and are well placed to understand the specific challenges that result in the vulnerable family and the vulnerable child [8].
A skilled and long term professional relationship, built on trust, that provides a low-level of inquiry into the circumstances of the vulnerable family [9] is key because vulnerable parents are often avoidant and suspicious of supportive services [10]. Furthermore, the majority of vulnerable children will not meet sufficient thresholds of harm or endangerment that will trigger formal child protection proceedings [11]. The Deep End has consistently highlighted the ‘multiple jeopardy’ that economically poor and disadvantaged families face [12] with poverty an enduring characteristic of families who would be considered vulnerable. The Deep End recognises the clear association between disadvantage with social class and adverse effects on child health in the first 10 years of life [13] with increased mortality rates [14]. The impact of poverty and the accumulative effect of negative factors on health outcomes of vulnerable children are highlighted in the Deep End Austerity Report [15]. This publication contextualises current research concerns to real-life narratives of vulnerable families who are living within the constraints of swingeing cuts across health and social care budgets.
That said, knowing and stating our contribution to supporting children and families is of limited value if general practice does not have the strategic support within policy directives and contractual obligations to undertake this challenging area of health care.

Current policy – is it collective and inclusive?
Whilst we welcome the acknowledgement of the role of the GP in Scotland’s national child protection framework [16] and the RCGP child health strategy [17] this is not replicated in other important policy directives. For example GIRFEC, whose ethos is at the heart of government policy in ensuring that all children in Scotland are ‘safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included’ [18–19] and the National Parenting Strategy [20], do not mention GPs. This is disappointing given that the newly instated 30-month child development check will address issues of ‘child development and physical health, parenting capacity and family matters including domestic abuse and parent-child relationships, along wider parental health such as smoking, alcohol or drug abuse, and mental and physical health’ [20]. It is obvious to the Deep End group where the obligation to general practice provision lies in addressing this agenda.

Given that there has been a noticeable decline in preventative child health care in general practice since the implementation of ‘Hall 4’ [21], the Deep End have advocated for a National Enhanced Service for Vulnerable Families (NES). This approach will not diminish the reach of a universal child health care system but recognises the need to reduce disadvantage in vulnerable families by developing services according to the needs of the community.

How would the proposal work, both internally within practices, and externally in practices’ relationships with others?

The NES is a collaborative model that promotes organisational learning where all involved professionals meet regularly to discuss their vulnerable children caseloads. It is hypothesised there would be immediate gains in terms of improved health outcomes and consistent support for vulnerable children.

The NES would build on the work that is already done in some GP practices where GPs have regular and minuted meetings with their health visitors but it remains ‘unofficial’ as there is no contractual requirement to do so. Across practices the NES could be the basis of a protected learning event to disseminate results (similar to the COPD pilot in the South Glasgow CHP) and would include other relevant professionals in the learning agenda.

The attached social worker is not a new idea for general practice and many practices have positive experiences of working with a named social worker across health and social care domains. It would seem axiomatic that the unmet needs of vulnerable children and families require that both professions collaborate but there is a paucity of evidence of effective practices in complex families where health and social care professionals have intervened [22].

The NES provides the mechanism to improve a positive working environment where professional roles are clarified and shared understanding of the language of vulnerability is achievable. It also begins to address a pressing need to meaningfully research the complexity of child welfare outcomes in ‘real world’ situations [23].

How would progress be consolidated, with practices learning from each other?

A rolling programme of protected learning events funded through the CHP structure. There is a learning coordinator within each CHP (these appear to be new posts but are welcome if they have this remit). Of equal importance is recording the long term outcomes of vulnerable children that would require substantial investment in preventative health care and would provide a robust research database.
How would individual practices and groups of practices be accountable for the additional resource?

At present there is no mechanism for GPs within CHPs to be directly responsible for monies spent. Financial sector spending would have to be carefully evaluated with appropriate management support and would require robust accountability and governance structures.

Is the proposal for all practices, with each being resourced pro rata according to need, which could be taken forward within local areas; or something for Deep End practices only, requiring a network approach?

This would not be exclusive to Deep End practices as the NES is embedded within the principles of universal health care for children. Realistically, it would be anticipated that the strong influence of poverty on child health outcomes and vulnerability would ensure a greater proportion of vulnerable children would be identified within Deep End practices. Nonetheless, the NES would be relevant to all practices in Scotland.

Who are the significant partners/funders and how can they be influenced?

SG, HBs, health and social care professions. There is an expectation that SGPC and the BMA will acknowledge the call for greater emphasis on child health matters within the forthcoming contract negotiations. This would reflect the profession’s aspiration for an improvement to the structure of child health care provision in general practice and primary care. This is envisaged under a broader approach of child safeguarding that at present remains patchy and inconsistent.

1. The potential benefits which might accrue from shared working arrangements, both for the organisations involved and for those in receipt of services;

The Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill requires local authorities and health boards to adopt formal partnership arrangements. In June 2013 the Council and the Health Board approved proposals to move forward with a “Body Corporate” model. A Chief Officer for the partnership will be jointly appointed in the Autumn, and a joint committee will be established to oversee the development of the partnership with a view to this taking operational responsibility from April 2014. We envisage there will be a joint management team established before this date. The immediate benefits will relate to shared management and accommodation. As we progress with our strategic plan we expect to identify agreed priorities for the partnership in relation to joint service delivery. This will result in the identification of further benefits for both organisations.

Public Sector and Third Sector partners should work together at a local level with the aim of realising an increased share of public sector expenditure for the Third Sector through engagement in service design, commissioning and procurement activities.

Strategic commissioning provides the basis for assessing and forecasting needs, agreeing desired outcomes, considering options, planning the nature, range and quality of future services and working in partnership to put these in place.

By bringing other partners resources into the mix in a more meaningful way, this could improve CPPs more widely and would help pave the way for the Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill.

Within the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, the proposal is to strengthen children’s planning and to reinforce the development of integrated service delivery across the range of partners. While we welcome an approach that streamlines planning for children we are concerned about possible duplication of effort e.g., preparing a children’s services plan and a corporate parenting plan (rather than incorporating the latter into the former). We are also concerned that any crossover with the ASN legislation needs to be dealt with if the landscape is to be clarified especially around the need for a separate child’s plan.

In terms of the benefits to those in receipt of service, we are clear that this is the main driver behind both pieces of legislation. In North Ayrshire we intend to place our Social Services children and families service within the Health and Social Care Partnership and we believe this will strengthen our service delivery to vulnerable children by working closely with services provided to their parents/carers e.g., mental health and substance misuse. At the same time we will ensure that the links between the universal services within health and education are strengthened and we have a programme to deliver prevention and early intervention initiatives across the children’s services partnership. This involves social work and health staff being located with early years staff. We already have co-located services with Police Scotland.

We have identified a range of outcomes across all care groups and would intend to identify our priorities for development and implementation within both our HSCP integration plan and our Children’s Services Plan. For example,

Older People
- Through integrated teams working locally.

Outcomes
- Prevent hospital admissions
- Sustain people safely at home
- Maximise independence.
- Reduce social isolation.
- Support Carers.

Vulnerable Children
- Through co-located teams including social workers/health visitors/early years staff/teachers.
- Through specific joint initiatives.

Outcomes
- Sustain more children at home.
- Improve outcomes for children who are neglected.
- Reduce admissions to residential schools.
- Maximise independence for children with disabilities.
- Improve transition between child and adult services.
- Improve support to families and carers.

These are two examples of our current considerations. The key aspect will be how we implement our redesigned services to reduce barriers from the point of view of those who use the services.

2. The rationale for having a separate approach in both Bills to establishing joint working arrangements.

Presumably the difference in approach relates to the difference in the range of partners involved in adult and children’s services. There are particular issues about the need for clear partnership agreements between the universal services of health and education. The HSCP shares a common client/patient group within adult services and a common client/patient group of vulnerable children.

3. In what area potential savings might arise?

In relation to the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, this is a difficult question to answer at this stage and is one of the difficulties within integration. Local authorities have made substantial savings over the past four years, while the NHS has been protected. This is likely to mean the level of savings available without affecting operational capacity will be less for local authorities. It will be a challenge to maintain costs within existing budgets. Therefore our key benefit must come from integration through i) reducing duplication at the point of service delivery and streamlining some senior management, but mostly middle management; ii) improved deployment of resources as a result of better planning; iii) implementation of the neighbourhood planning approach so that services are focused on the areas where they will have the biggest impact; and iv) common priorities.

We are also considering how the range of ‘support services’ required by health and social services would be best delivered. At this stage it is not possible to say if this will lead to efficiencies or if in fact some may require additional initial investment. ‘Support services’ include; Finance; Human Resources; Legal Services; IT and Property; Facilities Management.

Further savings or investment redirection will be achieved as the partnerships progress.

We have developed a range of initiatives to improve services to elderly people through the Older People’s Change Fund.

For the past two years we have also been funding a range of prevention and early intervention initiatives for children which we are tracking in relation immediate impact and efficiencies down the line.

We would be happy to provide further information if the committee was interested.

4. Whether there are any issues around the proposals covering consultation on, and development of, strategic plans/service plans between the respective areas involved?

The main issue in relation to consultation and development of plans will be around timing to ensure we do not duplicate effort or create consultation fatigue. There will be clear structures established within the HSCP to involve the full range of stakeholders and we will need to utilise these as far as possible. We have developed a “neighbourhood planning approach” within North Ayrshire which brings together all the Community Planning partners. We would see this as a key way of reducing disruption and maximising synergy. We believe this approach fits with the requirements of both Bills.
1 Introduction

1.1 The Housing Coordinating Group (HCG) welcomes this opportunity to contribute to the Committee’s stage 1 scrutiny of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) Scotland Bill.

1.2 The HCG consists of the Association of Local Authority Chief Housing Officers (ALACHO); the Chartered Institute of Housing in Scotland; the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations (SFHA); Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations (GWSF); the Housing Support Enabling Unit (HSEU); and Care and Repair Scotland. Thus, this evidence comes from representative bodies of strategic housing authorities, social housing providers (councils, housing associations and co-operatives), the housing profession, and many third sector providers particularly Care and Repair services.¹ To reflect our common views, in this response we use the collective term “the housing sector”.

1.3 Together we make a very significant contribution to national outcomes on health and well-being by:

- Co-ordinated strategic planning of the supply and quality of housing and related services across tenures and stages of life;
- Providing individuals with information and advice on housing options;
- Directly providing or facilitating, ‘fit for purpose’ housing for rent and for sale / part sale, that gives people choice and a suitable home environment;
- Providing local, personal, preventative services such as aids and adaptations, and care and repair or “handyperson” schemes;
- Building capacity in local communities.

This paper sets out a response to each of the committee’s questions.

1.4 In summary, the housing sector supports the principles of integration for improved outcomes set out in the Bill and understands the need for legislation to promote joint working to pursue these principles. The success of the new ‘integrated authorities’ will largely depend on effective joint strategic commissioning to which the housing sector can make a crucial contribution. The current arrangements for involving the housing sector have not produced a consistent nor adequate approach and the Bill, as it stands, could result in an ‘integrated authority’ deciding not to involve the housing sector as a partner. To ensure that housing issues, and the housing sector, form an integral part of contributing to the delivery of national outcomes, the HCG urges that the contribution of the housing sector be recognised within the legislation, urging the new ‘integrated authorities’ to involve their strategic housing partners.

¹ The Joint Improvement Team has provided support and assistance to the Housing Coordinating Group

2 How will the proposed legislation affect the ‘housing sector’?

2.1 Housing planning and housing services already play a fundamental role in providing ‘homes or a homely setting’ for those using health and social care services particularly as people face long term conditions.

2.2 Housing providers offer varying levels of care and or / support to vulnerable adults and older people, and have long been committed to working with colleagues in health and social care to enable people to continue living in the community rather than institutional settings. There are examples where this has happened already and the Bill could promote this approach more widely across the country. The housing sector has much to contribute to this agenda.

2.3 The Bill sets out a requirement on local authorities and health boards to set up new integrated authorities’ but leaves it to local areas to decide whether and how to involve the housing sector. The possibility that any ‘integrated authority’ could lack the involvement of the housing sector at a strategic level is of some concern. Whilst the need to maintain a focus on housing issues in order to achieve the outcomes of integration has been acknowledged, proper engagement with the housing sector in both planning and delivery will be required.

3 What do you see as benefits that can accrue from the proposed legislation?

3.1 The main efficiencies and benefits potentially arising from integration plans are likely to be improved living conditions for our tenants and residents rather than benefits accruing directly to housing organisations themselves. There is increasing recognition of the preventative benefits of housing investment such as keeping people safe at home longer through the timely provision of appropriate housing adaptations, or the reduction of respiratory illness through efficient modern central heating systems. The housing sector argues for an investment dividend arising from an established link between housing investment and a consequential reduction in other more expensive forms of provision such as hospital treatment or long term stays in care homes.

3.2 The ‘housing sector’ has much to contribute to achieving the objectives of integration but its contribution would be put on a more secure footing through a continued commitment to the Housing Contribution Statements (HCSs) and through Community Planning Partnership arrangements to ensure that housing issues and housing sector are properly tied in with Joint Strategic Commissioning plans (JSCPs) and the delivery of the national outcomes.
being developed – the first three of which are particularly pertinent to housing: Healthier Living; Independent Living and Positive Experiences and Outcomes.

3.3 The development of a set of national outcomes will be fundamental in pursuing this objective and we look forward to further opportunities to reflect on the way housing related issues are reflected in the national outcomes and indicators.

3.4 There are also efficiencies and benefits to be had for the housing sector to work with integrated authorities rather than separately with social care and health. Equally, it is important that integrated authorities work with the housing sector otherwise the opportunity joint working presents will be lost in some areas. One way to ensure that this joint working occurs is to require the new partnerships engage formally with the strategic function of housing in local authorities and delivery of housing more generally. This is too important to leave to chance.

3.5 A central policy objective of the Bill is to provide ‘joined up quality health and social care services in order to care for people in their homes or a homely setting where it is safe to do so’. The requirement that integration authorities share a budget and that they develop JSCPs mark a real step change from previous aspirations about joint working and are key strengths of the Bill. The housing sector has much to contribute to the overall policy objective but its role and contribution needs to be strengthened, as set out below.

3.6 The policy memorandum (para 9) states, and we agree, that an aim of the legislation is to deal with the variations in quality across the country. The forthcoming review of National Care Standards provides a significant opportunity to explore the scope to align regulatory standards with the principles of the Bill and the associated national outcomes being currently being developed.

3.7 The policy memorandum, which suggests (paras 98 onwards) that the scope of Bill should extend to adults of all ages, creates an opportunity to offer more consistent approaches to people with similar conditions or situations irrespective of their age. This may particularly assist those living in areas of deprivation, especially those with long term conditions, who are likely to face poorer health outcomes.

3.8 The Bill requires an integration authority to consult with service users where it decides to change the arrangements for carrying out of integration functions. Consultation is required where an authority wants to make changes ‘significantly affecting provision of service in an area’. This could be interpreted to include large tendering exercises, in which case this new duty might provide a means of ensuring that there is a process of consultation with service users in relation to such exercises. This is to be welcomed in order to achieve better outcomes for those using services.

4 Are there any concerns that you have around the proposed legislation?
4.1 The success of the new partnerships will largely depend on effective joint strategic commissioning plans (JSCP). It has already been acknowledged that housing plays a part in effective planning and Housing Contribution Statements (HCS) were introduced in 2012/13 as a way of highlighting the potential housing contribution to existing JSCPs. This first round of HCSs has been reviewed by the Joint Improvement Team and various issues have been highlighted. Whilst we acknowledge the challenge that local partnerships faced in developing and agreeing HCSs within a short timescale we nevertheless think it important to take the opportunity to learn lessons from the exercise.

4.2 The review found that although HCSs were submitted with partnerships’ JSCPs, only a minority actually integrated issues around improving housing and housing related services into the body of the JSCP. There was a tendency for the HCS to appear as a “bolt on”. HCS could be the key mechanism for linking Local Housing Strategies with JSCPs, and will be vital for the housing sector to play a strategic role in meeting the national outcomes associated with integration of health and social care. The housing dimension of integrated planning needs to be dealt with within the JSCP rather than sitting on the margins. In other words, we believe the best place for housing to demonstrate its actual and potential contribution to improving outcomes for people within the health and social care system is through proper integration of housing issues within JSCPs.

4.3 To further the integration of housing issues in JSCPs there needs to be a shared understanding of data relating to housing, health and social care, and a shared commitment to producing meaningful information from such datasets for planning purposes. We note that a review of the guidance relating to Housing Need and Demand Assessment (HNDA)\(^2\) is currently underway. This will consider explicitly improvements needed to aid our collective understanding of the housing needs of vulnerable groups such as older people and those with particular needs, and we propose that revised HNDAS be regarded as part of the toolkit required for JSCPs.

4.4 Together with ALACHO and SFHA, the JIT is currently surveying the sector to extend understanding of the housing sector’s experience of the first round of HCS. The review of HCSs submitted in March 2013 identified that these tended to consider housing with care and adaptations, but there was concern about a lack of focus on housing advice, lower level housing support services and other housing related services. The sector, working with the Scottish Government will use the information obtained to provide feedback and advice to practitioners across the housing health and social care sectors on how the housing contribution to JSCPs might be improved.

4.5 The Bill sets out integration across all adult age groups rather than simply older adults and this seems appropriate given the experience of housing providers in deprived areas where the onset of long term conditions tends to happen at a lower age. We note, however, that much of the Bill continues to focus solely on the needs of older people and suggest this should be addressed if the principles set out in the Bill are to be pursued effectively.

\(^2\) Housing Need and Demand Assessments are undertaken to assess local housing need and demand to inform the development of local housing strategies and development plans.

4.7 Effective leadership at a local level will be crucial if the required change is to be implemented. The role of social landlords as a community anchor at a local level could be fundamental to helping to link leaders within public bodies with local people and leaders in the voluntary sector and in community based organisations. The Bill could be strengthened by requiring integration authorities to work with housing and the third sector as partners rather than simply adhering to principles to engage with ‘community and local professionals’. As a comparison, there is currently in place a requirement that Reshaping Care for Older People Change Fund plans are signed off by four signatories: the NHS Board, the local authority, the third sector and the private sector. We would urge that the housing sector be given formal recognition as a signatory for future integration plans in addition to the third sector.

4.8 There is a lack of clarity about the elements of funding which will go into integrated budgets and the extent to which local authority budgets currently directed at housing related services, such as housing support for homeless people, will be expected to be part of this. If each integration authority is left to decide this there is a risk that the financial context within which housing related services operate will become increasingly complex, to the detriment of the individuals who currently benefit from such services, with an increased risk that the policy objectives set out in the Bill will not be achieved.

4.9 Social landlords and many of the individuals they serve are already dealing with financial uncertainty resulting from welfare reform. It will be important that the financial arrangements introduced under the Bill do not destabilise housing related services further.

4.10 The HCG agrees with the planning and delivery principles as set out in the Bill (sections 4 and 25). These are in line with those originally set out in the consultation document and have gained the support of housing professionals across the sector. The ‘housing sector’ has much to contribute to the objectives of integration and the opportunity to put this on a more secure footing should not be missed.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Submission from Association on Directors of Education in Scotland

Part 3 Children's Services Planning

1. We support the requirement, the aims and the process indicated for the Children’s Services Plan. However, in section 13, we believe that the prime aim should be to focus on the outcomes for children and young people rather than the mechanisms for planning.

2. In relation to guidance in Children’s Services Planning, it would be important to ensure that there are long term evaluations of the impact on children and families rather than reportable short term proxy measures which may divert attention from the long term aims of the legislation.

3. We have significant concerns around section 17 and the default powers of the Scottish Ministers. This appears to be focussed almost entirely on the role of Scottish Ministers to change structures and to direct resources rather than a consultative and meditative role where they feel that Councils and Health Boards are not achieving best outcomes required for children. This has significant implications for local authorities which were not made explicit during the consultation period.

4. There is no suggestion anywhere else in the document that joint boards are a prerequisite for effective Children’s Service Planning. As an organisation with particular interest in education we would have concerns that decisions could be made to divert resources from this function to support underfunded pressures in other areas of children’s services. This would appear to be increased centralisation of decision making which does not sit comfortably with local democratic responsibility for services.

Public Bodies (Joint Working) Bill

Submission from Argyll and Bute Council

1. I refer to your letter of 26th June and would offer the following comments which have not been formally considered by the Council given the timescale for reply but nevertheless I trust that it will be helpful.

2. Argyll & Bute Council welcomes the introduction of the Bill, whilst recognising the challenges, going forward, that are inevitable during a period of transformational change.

3. The key objectives identified by the Christie Commission and the intent of the Bill provide us with the impetus to make the changes required to deliver our vision for the people of Argyll & Bute. The remote and rural nature of this area means that we have already, of necessity, developed a strong Health and Care Strategic Partnership that supports many excellent, and some award winning, integrated services. Through Reshaping Care for Older People (RCOP) and the move to Joint Commissioning we have further enhanced that partnership by fully involving the Third and Independent sectors as equal partners on the RCOP Project Board and in all of the associated workstreams.

4. Over the last 4 years we have developed a comprehensive joint reporting framework for adult care services, with monthly reporting that both informs strategic decision making and supports pro-active operational management.

5. We recognise that both service delivery and performance reporting need to continue to move towards an outcome-focused approach, going forward. We have recently hosted presenters from the Swedish Esther Network and we are considering how we can implement that model in Argyll & Bute.

6. Implementation of joint working will require a major culture change for both the Local Authority and our NHS colleagues, there will need to be changes in behaviours and attitudes and a willingness to overcome obstacles, driven by strong and enthusiastic leadership. We need to improve on staff and community involvement and overcome risk aversion to achieve truly customer-led service delivery. We also face financial and logistical challenges, particularly given the rurality of our environment; however, it is clear that unless we achieve both economies of scale and economies of skill, through this opportunity for joint working, we will not be able to meet the demographic-demand challenges of the future.

7. At present we are looking towards a Body Corporate model of implementation. We have appointed a project team to scope the Council’s position and inform our Elected Members and we look towards commencing joint planning for integration, with our NHS colleagues, in the early autumn.

8. The Argyll and Bute Council has supported the Children and Young People Bill through the COSLA consultations. In particular the Council welcomes the:

- Emphasise on Children and Young People’s Rights
- Promotion of GIRFEC principles (child’s plan and named professional)
- Extension of early years support (minimum 600 hours for 3 and 4 year olds)
- Improving permanence planning and LAC outcomes (right of care leavers to be assessed for support until their 25th year)
- Defining of corporate parenting and the duties of the corporate parent

9. The Council are, however, cautious as to the accuracy of the take up assumptions and the actual cost of implementation. The position taken by CoSLA in subsequent negotiations with the Scottish Government in respect of the financial arrangements reflects these concerns in detail and highlights discrepancies in funding for local government in comparison with recurring funding arrangements for the NHS. The Council are also concerned that there are proposals similar those in the recent Bill on Health and Social Care integration to give Ministers powers to establish Joint Boards, including the transfer of staff and functions from councils and Health Boards, if both sides fail to deliver integrated children’s services planning as set out in the Bill.

10. I would highlight the following link to further detail of the council’s position in relation to the Children and Young Persons Bill:

Roddy McCuish
Leader
Introduction

1. Audit Scotland is the public sector audit agency undertaking the external audit of the majority of public sector bodies in Scotland. We do this on behalf of the Auditor General for Scotland (for the NHS and central government) and the Accounts Commission (for local government). We provide this written evidence to assist the Local Government and Regeneration Committee with its interest in the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill and the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and their potential impact on local authority functions and partnership/joint working.

2. The Auditor General and the Accounts Commission welcome the opportunity to comment on the implications of the Bills and how the joint working arrangements established by them will link with the work of Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs).

Issues highlighted in audit work

3. This response draws on a wide range of audit work, in particular our report on Improving Community Planning in Scotland (March 2013). This report highlights that there is now a renewed focus on community planning which provides a clear opportunity to deliver a step change in performance. This will require strong and sustained shared leadership. There are many examples where joint working is making a difference for specific communities and groups across Scotland. However, our report concluded that overall, and ten years after community planning was given a statutory basis, CPPs are not able to show that they have had a significant impact in delivering improved outcomes across Scotland.

4. Over a number of years, Audit Scotland has highlighted the need to improve how public services work together to meet the needs of the people of Scotland and make the best use of available resources. We have highlighted in several reports the need for barriers to partnership working to be addressed. It is encouraging that both the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill and the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill seek to address these problems. However, questions remain about the implications for CPPs and the responsibilities of local government from the introduction of these Bills.

5. There are a series of key issues not addressed within the Bills or the associated documents, and further information is needed to understand how these changes will work in practice. Significantly, the relationship between CPPs and the new integrated health and social care arrangements (through the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill) and changes to children’s services (through the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill) are not clear.

6. There is a need for a clear articulation of how these new arrangements fit with CPPs. We noted in Improving Community Planning in Scotland that:

   “There is a risk that wide-ranging reforms of public services in Scotland creates tensions between national and local priorities for change. Significant changes are under way aimed at integrating health and social care services, creating national police and fire services and regionalising colleges, all of which are important..."
community planning partners. It is essential that those who lead and manage local public services work together to ensure that they are providing public services in ways that make sense locally, while delivering the stated intention of the reforms. Equally, the Scottish Government has a key role to play by:

- ensuring ‘joined-up’ approaches to reform across government
- clearly and consistently setting out how it expects services to be provided in an integrated way
- streamlining policy guidance and arrangements for measuring performance across different parts of the public sector, and making sure they are consistent with each other.

At present, it is not clear how important aspects of the community planning review and health and social care integration developments are being integrated. For example, how policy guidance on governance and accountability arrangements is being coordinated and how performance reporting requirements will be aligned.”

7. It is still unclear, now the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill has been published, how some of these tensions will be resolved. There are similar issues with the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, for example, how the requirement to produce a children’s services plan will fit with the work of the CPP in each local area.

8. It essential that sound governance and accountability arrangements are in place, that organisations are able to respond flexibly to local needs and that there is some national monitoring of progress in improving services in line with policy intentions. Any new governance and accountability arrangements should be effectively aligned with existing arrangements.

9. The new integrated arrangements will be responsible for directing significant resources, representing a significant proportion of local government services. Under the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, the new integrated partnerships may opt to include other services, such as services for children. Given the potential scale of these integrated arrangements, in terms of both the resources involved and the policy areas covered, it is even more important that the links to CPPs are clear and fully understood. There are also tensions between the introduction of a statutory partnership for health and social care services and the non-statutory CPPs. We have provided more detailed written evidence to the Health and Sport Committee to assist its scrutiny of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill which you might find helpful. (Full submission set out in appendix 1). In relation to the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, it is unclear how the external audit function will be funded and arranged and how it will work in practice. In taking forward the new arrangements, consideration will need to be given to audit committee and scrutiny arrangements, alongside the external audit issues we have raised.

10. The Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill gives Ministers powers to make certain decisions about how services are planned and delivered locally, including powers to issue directions to local authorities, health boards or integration joint boards, about the functions related to the Bill, or in the integration plan. These powers are significant and need to be carefully considered given the unique position of local government as democratically accountable to their local communities.

11. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill covers a wide range of services for children. The Bill includes provisions for enforcement, which state that if a local authority or health board do not comply with the planning requirements or with Ministerial guidance about these plans then Scottish Ministers can transfer their children’s services planning function to other health boards or local authorities or require joint boards to be established to plan services. This has significant implications for local authority services and needs to be considered further in taking forward the new arrangements. We note that the extent of the proposed ministerial powers set out in the Bills are different, with the powers in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill greater than those indicated in the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill.

12. There is significant overlap between the agencies involved in CPPs and those who will need to be involved in the arrangements set out in the Bills. This is another reason why there needs to be clarity about the role of various organisations in these joint working arrangements, their focus and how their performance will be measured, in order to make best use of resources in the local area. There is a risk that this may lead to duplication and a cluttered partnership landscape if this is not fully addressed.

13. Links between various performance management and reporting arrangements are unclear, for example, how the children’s services plan will link to the Single Outcome Agreement for each CPP. There are lessons to be learned from other partnership arrangements. When commenting on Community Justice Authorities in An Overview of Scotland’s Criminal Justice System, we noted:

“Although CJAs were established in 2007, there are no agreed measures to assess their performance or impact. As a result, CJAs use a range of different performance indicators developed locally with different systems for reporting and presenting data. CJAs have recently agreed to improve information sharing and to look at developing a common set of core measures and associated information requirements.

The lack of agreed performance indicators across the range of services designed to reduce reoffending means the cost-effectiveness of different local projects cannot be compared.”

14. Any outcome measures must be transparently reported and available to the public and this information should be used to drive improvement. National measures are useful but partners also need a mechanism for ensuring local needs and priorities are met and for measuring the difference that specific services are making to the individual.

15. Finally, the Committee is interested in views about the impact on local authority functions. It is difficult to be specific about the potential impact from the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, given the needed for further details in key areas (see appendix 1). The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill will potentially have a significant impact on local authority services. This includes specific changes, such as increasing early learning and childcare, but also the potential for a major change in how services are controlled, through the ministerial powers noted above.

Appendix 1

SCOTTISH PARLIAMENT HEALTH AND SPORT COMMITTEE

PUBLIC BODIES (JOINT WORKING) (SCOTLAND) BILL

WRITTEN SUBMISSION BY AUDIT SCOTLAND ON BEHALF OF THE AUDITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND AND THE ACCOUNTS COMMISSION

Introduction
1. Audit Scotland is the public sector audit agency undertaking the external audit of the majority of public sector bodies in Scotland. We do this on behalf of the Auditor General for Scotland (for the NHS and central government) and the Accounts Commission (for local government). We provide this written evidence to assist the Health and Sport Committee’s scrutiny of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill.

Background
2. The Auditor General and the Accounts Commission welcome the opportunity to comment on the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill and to contribute to the future integration of adult health and social care in Scotland. This submission refers to the experience and audit evidence gathered through the work Audit Scotland has carried out on our behalf. This response draws on a wide range of audit work, but in particular Audit Scotland’s reports on Review of Community Health Partnerships (June 2011) and Commissioning social care (March 2012).

3. The Committee invites comments on a number of questions and we have focused our response around them.

Question 1: Do you agree with the general principles of the Bill and its provisions?
4. We support the principle that public services should be designed around the needs of the service user, and that public bodies should seek to overcome the organisational barriers that get in the way of delivering seamless integrated health and social care. Over a number of years, Audit Scotland has highlighted the need to improve how health and social care services work together to meet the needs of the people of Scotland. It is essential that services are able to work well together to respond to needs whilst making the best use of existing resources and delivering high quality services. We have highlighted in several reports the need for barriers to partnership working to be addressed and the importance of having a joint vision and clear priorities for the use of shared resources. It is encouraging that the Bill seeks to address these problems.

5. In our previous report on Community Health Partnerships (CHPs), we highlighted that a more systematic and joined-up approach to planning and resourcing health and care services is needed to ensure that health and social care resources are used efficiently. We saw few examples of good joint planning underpinned by a comprehensive understanding of the shared resources available. This message was echoed strongly in our work on Commissioning social care where we found slow progress with strategic commissioning and limited joint working. One of our concerns about CHPs related to their lack of strategic influence over how resources were used... in the local area. The principles in the Bill aim to improve these issues, however, the change needed is significant and this is a challenging agenda.
Question 2: To what extent do you believe that the approach being proposed in the Bill will achieve its stated policy objectives?

6. The Bill requires NHS boards and councils to work together to meet the needs of the people in the local area. There are specific aspects of the Bill that should address some of the concerns we have raised in previous audit work and help to achieve the stated policy objectives. In particular, the obligation to prepare, publish, monitor and report against a local integration plan, and involve and consult with service users and carers in developing the plan, should provide a focus for driving forward the policy intention of the legislation. The extent to which this will be effective will be dependent at least in part on the quality and effectiveness of local leadership and the commitment of local partners to the plan and to the delegation and sharing of resources. Similarly, the role of the Integration Joint Monitoring Committee will be important in providing oversight and challenge.

7. However, the change needed is significant and there are some areas of the Bill where more detail is needed.
   - It is not clear from the Bill how local people will be engaged in the changes proposed, whether the new partnerships will be central or local government bodies and how audit arrangements will operate.
   - To date, GPs, clinical professionals and social care staff have not been fully involved in service planning and resource allocation for health and social care services. The lack of influence that CHPs have had over overall resources has been a barrier to professional staff engaging with CHPs. This needs to be addressed because these professional staff influence a large proportion of the health and care budget as a result of their decisions. The role of professionals is unclear in the Bill.
   - The Bill provides little detail about how locality arrangements might work in practice. There needs to be a real contribution from professional staff groups to informing how resources are used and services improved.

8. In our report on Community Health Partnerships, we highlighted that partnership working between one or more organisations is challenging due to the differences in accountability arrangements and differences in organisational cultures, planning and performance and financial management. The proposals set out in the consultation appear to address some of these challenges but greater clarity is needed in some areas, include how acute NHS resources will be affected and how funds will flow via the new arrangements. The real test will be how the partnerships work in practice.

9. There are lessons to be learned from other partnership arrangements. When commenting on Community Justice Authorities in An Overview of Scotland’s Criminal Justice System, we noted:

   “Although CJAs were established in 2007, there are no agreed measures to assess their performance or impact. As a result, CJAs use a range of different performance indicators developed locally with different systems for reporting and presenting data. CJAs have recently agreed to improve information sharing and to look at developing a common set of core measures and associated information requirements.

   The lack of agreed performance indicators across the range of services designed to reduce reoffending means the cost-effectiveness of different local projects cannot be compared.”
10. The proposals set out in the Bill seek to avoid some of the above limitations, for example, the expectation that the local strategic plan will have regard to national health and well-being outcomes should ensure a greater focus on performance expectations.
Question 3: Please indicate which, if any, aspects of the Bill’s policy objectives you would consider as key strengths

11. Our reports on CHPs and Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) highlight the importance of applying certain key principles to underpin successful partnership working. It is encouraging that the Bill recognises the importance of these key issues, including the need for leadership, vision, clear roles and responsibilities and for risks to be identified and managed. Accountability arrangements and processes also need to be clear. Partners should have a shared understanding about what success looks like and that there are arrangements in place to monitor and publically report on progress. Although these issues are identified in the Bill, this needs to be an area of focus when the Bill is implemented.

12. We have commented in a number of our reports about the lack of joined-up, transparent and comparable performance measures for health and social care services. This makes it very difficult to build a clear picture of relative performance and does not help the public or the Scottish Parliament to be assured about the quality and efficiency of the service. Therefore, we welcome the proposal for a set of nationally agreed outcome measures. When taking the Bill forward, it is important to be clear how these new measures will fit with existing frameworks such as Single Outcome Agreements (SOAs) and HEAT.

Question 4: Please provide details of any areas in which you feel the Bill’s provisions could be strengthened

13. There are a number of key issues not addressed within the Bill or associated documents, and further information is needed to understand how these changes will work in practice. If these issues are not addressed in the Bill, they need to feature in subsequent implementation guidance. These issues fall into six main areas:

- Resources. In previous audit work we have highlighted that, for successful partnership working, it is essential that budgets and resources are clearly set out and agreed by all partners. The partners should be clear about the rationale for how money is allocated and spent, and efficiencies should be sought through sharing of resources and improved ways of working. There needs to be transparency about how devolved budgets have been determined and what resources are included in the devolved budget. Our work has shown that these key principles have not been applied fully in partnerships in Scotland to date.

From the information in the Bill, there are clear potential risks and tensions around how organisations will determine which budgets will be included in the integrated budget and the implications of this for their own governance and accountability arrangements. It is essential that there is clarity at a local level about governance and accountability arrangements and how risks will be identified and managed, and that there are effective dispute resolution arrangements in place. There is no minimum requirement for resources or services to be included in the new arrangements. This creates a risk of significant differences of approach across the country.

Linked to this point, it is unclear from the Bill the role that other policy areas will play, specifically housing. It is important that the new arrangements maximise the valuable contribution that housing can play in improving care and support for older people. More details on how self-directed support and personalisation of care will be addressed through the new partnerships would also be useful.
• Links between health and social care integration and Community Planning.

The relationship between the new partnerships and the existing Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) is not clear from the Bill. There is a need for a clear articulation of how these new arrangements fit with CPPs given the significant leadership and co-ordinating role for local public services that the Scottish Government/COSLA see for CPPs in their Statement of Ambition for Community Planning and Single Outcome Agreements. That document identifies community planning arrangements as being at the core of public service reform and ‘providing the foundation for effective partnership working within which wider reform initiatives, such as the integration of health and adult social care… will happen.’ Specifically it is not clear how accountability and outcomes/performance management will link between CPPs and the new health and social care partnerships. It essential that sound governance and accountability arrangements are in place. Any new governance and accountability arrangements should be effectively aligned with existing arrangements to avoid further complicating approaches to governance and accountability - we noted in our report on Community Health Partnerships that:

“Approaches to partnership working have been incremental and there is a cluttered partnership landscape. CHPs were set up in addition to existing health and social care partnership arrangements in many areas. This has contributed to duplication and a lack of clarity of the role of the CHP and other partnerships in place in a local area. There is scope to achieve efficiencies by reducing the number of partnership working arrangements”

Given that the new integrated arrangements will be responsible for significant resources, and may opt to include other services, such as services for children, it is even more important that the links to CPPs are clear and fully understood.

• Implications for audit and scrutiny arrangements. The Bill does not set out whether the corporate body will be a local government or central government body. This has significant implications for financial arrangements and for the audit function. There are other potential issues for auditing and other scrutiny arrangements because of these changes. Specifically, if local partners opt to establish a body corporate there will be implications for internal and external audit arrangements. For example, the VAT status of the new body will need to be clarified. These issues have implications for audit and inspection arrangements as well as Parliamentary scrutiny. Furthermore, there are different budgeting cycles for NHS and Local Government bodies. It is also unclear from the Bill and associated documents, how the external audit function will be funded and arranged and how it will work in practice. In taking forward the new arrangements, consideration will need to be given to audit committee and scrutiny arrangements, alongside the external audit issues we have raised. There is a need for more detail on how these integrated services will be regulated and inspected through the work of Healthcare Improvement Scotland and the Care Inspectorate to ensure that there is appropriate independent public assurance about the performance of the new partnerships.

• Governance arrangements. The Bill sets out plans for a Chief Officer. This addresses one of our concerns that the existing CHP model was not given sufficient powers and authority to lead on key decisions about how resources are used in the local area. However, there are challenges and tensions with this proposed approach and the role and remit of the Board of the NHS board and the council elected members. There needs to be clear arrangements for any disagreements between the partners, including disagreements about finances, services, performance, and leadership to be resolved. The Chief Officer may be accountable for significant resources; therefore, the leadership dynamic within both the NHS board and the Local Authority will be shifted by this arrangement. It is essential that there is more clarity about how the Chief Officer will report into the NHS board and into the Local Authority, and that clear performance management and accountability arrangements are put in place.

- The role of health and care professionals. The Bill recognises the importance of health and social care professionals being at the heart of making the partnerships a success. However, there is a lack of detail on how this will work in practice. We recognise the need for a degree of local flexibility to allow partnerships to respond to local needs, but we have noted in previous audits that historically these professional groups, such as GPs, have not played a key role in partnership working to date. Their involvement will be critical to the success of the new arrangements.

- Ministerial powers. The Bill gives Ministers wide-ranging powers to make certain decisions about how services are planned and delivered locally, including powers to issue directions to local authorities, health boards or integration joint boards, about the functions related to the Bill, or in the integration plan. These powers are potentially significant, in particular in relation to the role and responsibility of local government. For that reason, more information on the circumstances in which Ministers might seek to exercise these wide-ranging powers would be useful.

Question 5: What are the efficiencies and benefits that you anticipate will arise for your organisation from the delivery of integration plans?

14. The new arrangements will require NHS boards and councils to improve and share information on how resources are used locally for specific groups within the local community. Audit Scotland has highlighted a number of gaps in information which could be addressed through this approach. Specifically, we have highlighted previously a lack of information on community services to inform how best to use shared resources for the local area. The new arrangements may make it easier for health and social care providers to see their services as part of a single system of care, making it easier to reduce overlaps and to ensure that people receive the care they need, while best use is made of existing resources.

15. We recognise the major challenge in integrating health and social care services. We have previously commented that there has been no large-scale shift in the balance of care to community services and on the lack of joint resourcing in Scotland, and consider that many partnerships will find agreeing on the resources to devolve to the integrated budget difficult. Our recent report on Commissioning social care found that there was a way to go to develop how services are planned and commissioned within a single agency, not least between partners. This will be a major change for partners and require strong leadership, investment and support to make the change.

Question 6: What effect do you anticipate integration plans will have on outcomes for those receiving services?

16. The intention from the Bill is for a clear change to how services are planned and managed as a result of the proposals. The Scottish Government, and local agencies, will need to consider the potential cost implication of these changes and the impact on professional staff who deliver frontline services. The focus should be on improving outcomes for local people as well as on integrating systems and services. The introduction of a core set of national outcome measures and the requirement on partners to jointly plan and use their resources to best meet local needs are welcome. The Bill provides the opportunity for better coordination of services and making better use of available resources at a local level.

17. Any outcome measures must be transparently reported and available to the public and this information should be used to drive improvement. National measures are useful but partners also need a mechanism for ensuring local needs and priorities are met and for measuring the difference that specific services are making to the individual.

18. The Scottish Government, together with NHS boards and councils, will need to ensure there is minimum disruption to existing services and service users during the move to better integration. NHS boards and councils need to continue to deliver services to those who need them during this period of change and must ensure that people are not adversely affected. Whilst these changes are under way, it will be important to maintain the progress made by CHPs at a local level.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Submission from Children in Scotland

1. Children in Scotland is the national umbrella agency for organisations and professionals working with and for children, young people and families, with around 400 members. We welcome the opportunity to respond to the Finance Committee’s call for evidence on the National Performance Framework, as part of the process of scrutinising the Scottish Government’s draft Budget for 2014-15.

2. Our comments in this submission reflect our remit to support and promote improved outcomes for children, young people and their parents/carers, so our contribution focuses on these aspects of the NPF.

General Observations.

3. The National Performance Framework project was always going to be a major challenge to deliver and the Scottish Government is to be commended for its ambition in drawing together a hierarchy of strategic objectives, supported by national outcomes and key indicators. The shift of focus towards measuring outcomes, rather than inputs and processes was also a positive development. However, while we welcomed the inclusion of some outcomes and indicators in the NPF directly related to children and young people, they only represent around 16% of the 50 indicators in the Framework and only two indicators relate directly to pre-school children.

4. Children in Scotland has also welcomed the major shift of policy towards the principles of prevention, early intervention and a strong focus on the early years. As we note below, however, we consider that it is too early to come to a reasoned view as to whether resources are following the shift of policy to any significant extent.

The NPF as a means of measuring improved outcomes for children, young people and families.

5. Life chances and outcomes for children and young people are directly affected by a whole range of environments and issues covered by the NPF eg deprivation, housing, play and recreational space, health and other inequalities, public safety etc. We suggest, therefore, that scrutiny of only the few indicators which refer to children and young people would present a seriously incomplete and potentially misleading picture of progress in dealing with the many aspects of Scottish life which affect children.
6. Rather than focus solely on the specific outcomes and indicators relating to children and young people, we recommend, therefore, that the Scottish Government must take a broader overview across all relevant elements of the NPF to ensure that it can present a full picture of progress in improving outcomes in a positive and sustainable way for the youngest members of Scottish society.

Choice of outcomes and indicators.

7. We are aware that the Scottish Government is not directly responsible for day to day delivery of the services which will, in reality, determine whether improved outcomes are generated for our children, young people and their families. Therefore, identifying available and consistent data and information from a wide range of service providers, notably local government and the NHS Boards, was always going to be a major challenge.

8. There was always unease, however, that the indicators directly affecting children and young people were dictated by what information was readily available, rather than what would be the optimum measures to show that the lives and opportunities for our children and young people are being improved. While the limited national outcomes aimed directly at children and young people are laudable, we have significant reservations as to whether the related national indicators are sufficient to show if they are being delivered.

9. For example, the indicator “improving children’s services” seems focused entirely on child protection inspection results. It is clearly important to know that child protection services are scrutinised and improved where needed, but we suggest that this indicator either needs to be retitled “improving child protection services” or the range of services covered by the indicator needs to be widened. The Care Inspectorate’s new methodology goes beyond child protection services, so there is perhaps an opportunity to realign this indicator to cover a wider range of services which, we believe, would be the more desirable and meaningful option.

10. Inspection reports are essentially retrospective audits on the performance of services, rather than measurement of sustained and improved outcomes for those who use them. This contention applies to the indicators around positive inspections of schools and pre-school settings. These are valuable in reassuring parents and funders that providers are offering high quality services, but we would argue that they say little about the experiences of children and young people and whether outcomes for them are actually improving and thus contributing to meeting the associated national outcomes.

11. The national indicators around healthy birth weight, dental health, weight and physical activity are certainly useful as quantifiable ways of looking at the health and development of children but they are effectively proxy measures. We are not convinced that what are statistical snapshots tell us nearly enough for anyone to take a reasoned view on whether outcomes for our children are improving, particularly in respect of the early years.
Proposals for improvement.

12. Children in Scotland accepts that, in the current financial environment, developing expensive and extensive new data collection systems may not be a viable option and we recognise the benefits of using existing and consistent data sources wherever possible. Our question remains, however, as to whether the national indicators which are directly aimed at children and young people really provide the right and right amount of information to show progress in meeting the associated national outcomes.

13. Children in Scotland also questions whether advances in Scottish Government policy priorities aimed at children, young people and parents/carers (and their associated measures) have resulted in the NPF being overtaken and sidelined as far as looking at progress in improving outcomes for children and young people. In suggesting this, we see considerable and positive scope to create a more meaningful and streamlined framework and better alignment between the Framework and other current and developing measures of improved outcomes for children and young people.

14. The current planning and policy environments relating to children and young people are very complex. In our view, they do not link up well, thus adding to bureaucracy and lack of clarity for practitioners, planners, policy makers and families. Children in Scotland has been concerned for some time that planning for children’s services, a legal requirement under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, is largely peripheral to wider Community Planning and the associated Single Outcome Agreement (SOA) process. As we indicate earlier in this submission, outcomes for children and young people are affected by a wide range of environmental and societal factors and we firmly believe that plans for direct support to children and young people should not be seen as separate from wider community development.

15. The duty on local authorities to produce and publish children’s services plans is augmented in the Children and Young People Bill, currently at Stage 1 in Parliament. Children in Scotland’s evidence to the Education Committee suggests that there should be formal links between Community Plans, SOAs and Children’s Services Plans. In our view, the Bill provides an opportunity to make these much needed links and for the Scottish Government to look again at whether SOA targets/outcomes adequately cover the interests of children and young people.

16. The Bill also describes a “wellbeing framework” based on the Getting It Right for Every Child (GIRFEC) principles of Safe, Healthy, Achieving, Nurtured, Active, Respected, Responsible and Included (SHANARRI). Our understanding is that there is to be a suite of indicators and measures to help demonstrate progress, based on SHANARRI principles and that these should be included in progress reports on delivery of children’s services plans.

17. Children in Scotland considers that it would both sensible and feasible to use measures and indicators, based on the SHANARRI framework, as a foundation for reporting at locality level, aggregate such information to Community Planning Partnership level and then include it in national reporting, eg through SOAs, which, ultimately, would feed into the National Performance Framework. This would provide "bottom up" performance information to aid direct service providers at locality level, local policy and planning partnerships, national government and Parliament in respect of assessing successful delivery of national outcomes, policy priorities and resource allocation.

18. If the SHANARRI indicators are well designed and measured consistently, this would ultimately provide the National Performance Framework with a wider range of more meaningful and relevant information on how children and young people are faring in Scotland.

19. Children in Scotland also believes that the Growing Up in Scotland research outcomes could serve as a useful input to the national outcomes set out in the NPF, again making better use of existing sources of information.

20. Growing Up in Scotland (GUS) is a large-scale and ongoing longitudinal research project aimed at tracking the lives of several cohorts of Scottish children from the early years, through childhood and beyond. The research covers key domains which are very relevant to the national outcomes in the NPF, including cognitive, social, emotional and behavioural development, physical and mental health and wellbeing, childcare, education and employment, home, family, community and social networks, involvement in offending and risky behaviour.

Opportunity to rationalise and streamline indicators.

21. We suspect that many current performance and reporting requirements are linked to earlier, specific policies and strategies and they may not reflect the shift of focus towards prevention, early intervention and the early years.

22. We suggest, therefore, that the Scottish Government should take the opportunity to review the plethora of performance and other reporting information it currently gathers (and plans to gather in future) in respect of improving outcomes for children and young people. As matters stand, Children in Scotland would contend that there is a need for greater cohesion and scope for significant rationalisation which could save scarce human and financial resources that could be better used to support front line services and improve outcomes.

23. For example, we understand that an ongoing project, the Early Years Collaborative, is developing a new suite of stretch aims and targets, based around a quality improvement model. While Children in Scotland has always welcomed greater emphasis on the early years, we suggest that the Scottish Government should be invited to set out in detail how these new measures fit with GIRFEC/SHANARRI indicators, the indicators which underpin the Early Years Framework and the reporting requirements in the Children and Young People Bill. Our hope is that these could be rationalised and streamlined, rather than creating additional burdens on hard-pressed service providers.
24. There is also a major issue around the availability of robust baseline data to form the foundations from which progress can be monitored and the Scottish Government should ensure that it has sufficient baseline information to support improved indicators and measures in respect of improving outcomes for children and young people.

Links between NPF priorities and spending decisions.

25. Children in Scotland welcomes the policy intentions and rationale behind shifting resources towards prevention, early intervention and the early years, including the prospects of generating savings to the public purse in the short, medium and long terms. However, it seems to us that there is no consistent understanding or definition of what prevention and early intervention mean in practice, so we question how effective any attempt to categorise and quantify the allocation of resources would be.

26. In addition, it is very difficult to obtain information on how much is spent in Scotland on supporting children's services and to track trends. Local authority financial returns are one complex, source of information. Our understanding is that NHS spend on children and young people is almost impossible to identify, due to the way in which budgets are structured. Against this backdrop (coupled with the virtual removal of ring fenced budgets for local government), we suspect that it will be difficult for the Scottish Government and for Parliament to measure from a meaningful baseline whether there is a shift of resources towards the prevention and early intervention priorities.

27. Another factor which will conspire against shifting resources is that this initiative has come about at a time of severe pressures on public sector budgets and we know that local authorities and other providers are already struggling to meet their existing legal obligations to children and families. We consider that there is very little in the way of “slack” in the financial system which would allow a major shift of resources, while still ensuring that current statutory duties are met.

28. While the Scottish Government’s Change Fund is a useful incentive, our partners have pointed out to us the dilemma they face in transferring increasingly scarce resources to meet revised priorities, particularly identification of the budgets which might be reduced and the consequences of doing so. For example, existing children and families with multiple, complex and challenging needs will still require extensive and expensive support over time and reduction or withdrawal of support could have very serious consequences for all concerned.

29. Given the serious financial conditions facing the public sector in Scotland, we suggest that policy makers, planners and practitioners need to take careful stock of current activities to ensure that they are delivering improved outcomes for children and families and value for money. Where there is spending on provision that is clearly failing to deliver, shutting down such activities and transferring resources into services and actions that have been proven to work, may be another option to free up human and financial capital. Diverting resources into prevention and early intervention priorities would certainly be welcome, but it is equally important to have common definitions, measures and indicators to ensure that such resources are delivering genuine and sustainable improvements to outcomes.

30. The desired transitions in resource terms will, in our view, take much longer to emerge and progress is likely to be slow and variable across Scotland. The consequence of this is likely to be that the improvement in outcomes for children and young people envisioned by the Scottish Government, and supported by Children in Scotland, will take longer to emerge. We are not advocating a shift away from the policy aims of prevention, early identification of problems and early intervention from the earliest years in a child’s life, but offering something of a “reality check” in managing expectations.

Conclusion.

31. In conclusion, Children in Scotland supports the rationale and aims which underpin the National Performance Framework, but we can see considerable scope to enhance the range and quality of information on children and young people that feeds into it. In this submission, we offer suggestions which, we hope, might provide more relevant and comprehensive information, while streamlining the means of reporting at local and national levels.

32. While we believe that it is too early to respond in detail to all the questions posed by the Finance Committee, we wish the Scottish Government, Scottish Parliament and the key national and local agencies who plan and deliver services for children and young people every success in making these ambitious and laudable changes to the ways in which services for children, young people and families are planned, provided and funded.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Submission from Children’s Hearings Scotland

Introduction

1. Children’s Hearings Scotland (CHS) is a Non-Departmental Public Body established under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, which entered into force on 24 June 2013. CHS assists the National Convener with the delivery of her functions in relation to the recruitment, selection, appointment and re-appointment, training, retention and support of volunteer panel members within the Children’s Hearings System. Further information about CHS and the National Convener can be found on our website www.chscotland.gov.uk.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Part 3

2. CHS welcomes the strengthening of the legal framework for children’s services planning. However, at this stage we have some reservations about the duty being imposed on the National Convener. There are two reasons for this. First, children’s hearings themselves are not providing a service to children and families and panel members have no direct role in children’s lives, other than the critical role of decision makers within the care and justice tribunal for children and young people and families. Secondly, there is an additional complexity in relation to compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and the need to maintain the independence of the children’s hearing.

3. We would welcome clarity and additional guidance to ensure that specific duties and expectations of different agencies and public bodies are set out to promote a real understanding of roles and responsibilities within the children’s planning framework.

4. We also think it is disappointing that the involvement of children, young people and families is not addressed within these sections of the Bill.

Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill: s44

5. CHS welcomes the proposal contained in s44 to allow the Common Services Agency to enter into arrangements to provide legal, technical and administrative services with, amongst others, public authorities. In relation to this, we strongly welcome the statement in para 138 of the Policy Memorandum that the delivery of shared services by the Common Services Agency will “not be mandatory and it will remain a matter for these bodies themselves to determine the benefits of engaging with the Common Services Agency.” We consider it essential that the use of the services provided by Common Services Agency be optional. For example, in relation to legal services we would welcome the opportunity to discuss the provision of assistance with employment, property or contractual issues but in relation to legal advice and assistance on matters relating to the Children’s Hearings System, the specific expertise required could not be provided by the Common Services Agency. If it became mandatory to use the Common Services Agency to provide shared legal services CHS and the National Convener would be at a significant disadvantage to the current position in this respect.

6. CHS currently has agreements with the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration (SCRA) for the provision of human resources, procurement, payroll and transactional finance services, with National Records of Scotland (NRS) for procurement services and with the Scottish Government Information Service and Information Systems (ISIS) department for IT services. Based on this experience we think it is essential that the basis on which the shared service operates is crucial. In particular it is essential that the service provided is flexible, responsive, and is capable of being tailored to individual public authorities. Public authorities are a diverse group and have different needs depending on their size and the area in which they operate. It is important, therefore, that the service provided by the Common Services Agency is capable of being customised to the needs of the particular public body.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Submission from Coalition of Care and Support Providers

1. CCPS welcomes the opportunity to contribute to the Committee’s consideration of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill (the ‘Joint Working Bill’) and the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (the ‘Children’s Bill’), in relation to the proposals relating to children’s services planning and shared services that they respectively contain. We have provided some initial feedback to both the Health and Sport Committee and the Education and Culture Committee on these two bills. The following points are drawn from those submissions and focus on the benefits and concerns for care and support providers, in relation to service planning.

Re Joint Working Bill

2. We have three points to note in relation to the proposals for service planning: firstly, the need to strengthen the role of the third sector in strategic planning; secondly, to make specific provision for the independent scrutiny of planning processes; and thirdly, the need to clarify the links between planning processes elsewhere (e.g. existing community planning via the CPP, and proposals for service planning in the Children’s Bill).

3. We very much welcome the emphasis in the Joint Working Bill on ‘strategic planning’. Ss. 23-30 provide for a framework for joint strategic planning, based on a set of integration delivery principles and include the establishment of a ‘consultation group’ to develop and agree the strategic plan.

4. While we strongly support the requirement for joint strategic commissioning, the involvement of non-statutory partners needs to be significantly strengthened. We are concerned that the Bill does not adequately reflect the policy intentions set out in the policy memorandum, which says: ‘... the full involvement of the third and independent sectors, service users and carers, will be embedded as a mandatory feature of the commissioning and planning process. This will strengthen the cross-sector arrangements that have been established during the first two years of the Change Fund.’

5. The Joint Working Bill places duties on integration authorities to consult the third sector (and, in certain sections, to consult third sector service providers specifically). In our view this duty is not strong enough. The third sector, and providers specifically, should be treated not as consultees, but as full partners in the planning and delivery of care and support. Otherwise, the effect of the Bill will be to ‘downgrade’ the third sector (and indeed the private sector) from the status it has already been accorded in respect of similar processes for Reshaping Care for Older People and the Change Fund, where relevant plans must be signed off by four partners equally: the NHS Board, the local authority, the third and the private sectors. To underline this point, we note that the Financial Memorandum identifies the costs of clinical involvement in locality planning (estimated at £3 million, points 88 and 89) but no cost is identified for involvement of the third sector in either locality or strategic planning, which perhaps tells its own story.

6. We have also argued that there needs to be a level of independent scrutiny of the strategic planning process. However, the Joint Working Bill makes no reference to any requirement for independent scrutiny of integration authorities in respect of quality, performance or the achievement of national outcomes. The Health and Sport Committee has supported CCPS in promoting the view that poorly commissioned care poses as much of a risk as poorly delivered care: it is therefore a major disappointment that whilst the policy memorandum is specific on the need for independent scrutiny of strategic commissioning\(^2\), the Bill itself makes no reference to it.

7. Linked to the above point, the Bill’s requirements for integration and strategic planning do not appear to be sufficiently co-ordinated with related legislative instruments (both existing and proposed). We are aware, for example, that the Joint Improvement Team (JIT)’s recent survey of progress on integration indicated that a fair number of partnerships are considering including children’s services in their integration plans. This raises a question about how integration plans in these areas should interact with the requirements set out in the Children’s Bill with respect to children’s services planning, and/or to requirements regarding community planning more generally. There is a risk that these various pieces of legislation will lead to a multi-layered, yet unco-ordinated, set of planning requirements for public authorities.

Re Children’s Bill

8. There are two principal issues we have raised in connection with the proposals in Part 3 of the Children’s Bill, which reflect similar concerns raised in respect of the Joint Working Bill. The first is that we would like to see the engagement of the third sector more clearly embedded in the joint services planning; and second, related to this, we would like to see greater consistency between the joint planning proposals in the Children’s Bill and the Joint Working Bill, as well as greater clarity about how the different planning processes will relate to each other.

9. The proposals in the Children’s Bill for service planning build on the provisions in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 but appear to fall short of the level of collaborative strategic planning that is being developed in the context of the integration of adult health and social care noted above. The Joint Working Bill provisions on strategic planning, while not going as far as we would like, appear to be a significant step up from the more basic ‘duty to consult’ requirements in Part 3 of the Children’s Bill, not least because they require the involvement of a range of stakeholders (including voluntary sector service providers) from the beginning of the planning process, and include both a set of principles and a structure for the process.

10. Interestingly, while there is only a basic ‘duty to consult’ with voluntary sector service providers in the Children’s Bill, there appears to be a ‘duty’ placed on voluntary and independent sector providers, social landlords and others (in s.10(6)) to ‘meet any reasonable requests to participate or to contribute to the preparation of the plan’.

11. We welcome wide participation in the planning process, but we query the extent to which this legislation can place ‘duties’ on non-statutory bodies. Thus we would like to see clarification of the meaning of this provision in relation to both the policy aim and the legal impact. As set out above, we consider the approach taken in the context of the Joint Working Bill, (where duties are placed on statutory bodies to undertake a process of joint planning that includes voluntary sector providers and others) to be a better model.

12. In the context of involvement in strategic planning, it is notable that the financial memorandum for the Children’s Bill anticipates no extra costs as a result of these planning proposals based on the assumption that local authorities already have a duty to produce integrated children’s services plans. As with the Joint Working Bill, there is no consideration given to the costs that might come with wider participation in the planning process by voluntary sector providers and others. However, we think that there will be potential costs to voluntary sector providers, not just from engagement with the planning process but also in connection with the duties to provide information, advice and assistance (e.g. ss.14, 26, and elsewhere in the Bill) and that this should be reflected in the financial memorandum.

CCPS August 2013

About CCPS
CCPS is the coalition of care and support providers in Scotland. Its membership comprises more than 70 of the most substantial third sector providers of care and support, supporting approximately 270,000 people and their families, employing over 45,000 staff, and managing a combined total annual income in 2009-2010 of over £1.2 billion, of which an average of 73% per member organisation relates to publicly funded service provision.
Care and support in the third sector

The third sector is at the forefront of quality care and support in Scotland. More than a third of all care and support services registered with the Care Inspectorate are provided by third sector organisations. In many areas of care and support for adults and older people – including care home provision, care at home and housing support – third sector services receive a higher proportion of ‘very good’ and ‘excellent’ quality gradings from the Care Inspectorate than their counterparts in either the public or the private sector.
Introduction

1. COSLA welcomes the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Education and Culture committee on the Children and Young People Bill. We have been pleased by the inclusive way that Scottish Government has worked with COSLA in the development of the Bill and we hope to continue this positive approach in evidence to Parliament.

2. We acknowledge that this response is longer than we would typically submit on a Bill. However, the legislation is arguably the most significant change to children’s services since devolution so we believe all sections need to be considered carefully. The Bill is positive and ambitious, and it is worth emphasising that COSLA supports the policy intentions behind much of the Bill. As a result the majority of our work on the development of the Bill has focused on practical challenges of implementation and the resources required by local authorities.

3. The Children and Young People Bill is a complex piece of legislation with significant financial implications for local authorities. The accuracy of the Scottish Government’s analysis and therefore the funding that would be made available depends on a large number of assumptions that will not be fully tested until the Bill is implemented. Councils have concerns over the future financial impact of the policies and that for this reason the financial implications to local authorities require in-depth scrutiny during the parliamentary passage of the Bill. COSLA has gained a confirmation from the Scottish Government that it is the intention to fully fund the requirements of the Bill, but with the implementation stretching beyond both the current spending review period and the end of this current parliament in 2016 then future budgetary decisions would be dependent on the result of several spending reviews. The commitment made by this administration to fully fund the Bill must be honoured in future years by whatever Government is in power and kept under on-going review. We also believe that it will be necessary for both COSLA and Scottish Government to jointly scrutinise and monitor the spend on this legislation, to ensure that local government is and continues to be sufficiently resourced to carry out the new duties that will be enacted.

Summary of Bill

4. COSLA supports the policy intentions of the Bill’s proposals on:
   - Children’s rights;
   - Children’s services planning and Getting it Right for Every Child
   - Early learning and childcare, and
   - Looked after children.

5. However, we have a number of important points to make on the implementation of Bill proposals, and the financial implications of the legislation. COSLA will be responding to the Finance Committee call for evidence in relation to the Financial Memorandum for the Bill, but we also provide summaries of comments on the financial issues in this submission of evidence. We also have a small number of concerns with specific proposals in the Bill - chiefly relating to new powers being sought by Ministers and proposed changes to the Children’s Hearings Scotland Act. These and other issues are discussed in more detail in the sections below.

Part 1 - Rights of Children
6. Children’s rights are well embedded within the practice of local government. We believe that no public sector organisation is likely to object to the proposal for realisation of children’s rights as stated in the proposals. Issues around transparency of decision making and policy implementation and scrutiny are of equal importance to local government, as other public sector organisations. COSLA has maintained since the Bill proposals were consulted upon in 2012 that we remain of the view that the duty of due regard need not extend beyond ministers when councils are already addressing children’s rights. Local authorities have already made much progress especially in the school setting, in terms of the promotion of children’s rights.

7. A number of organisations such as the Children’s Parliament are working with children on this issue. In explaining rights issues to children, it often provides clarification for adults working and caring for children and young people that the focus of the rights in the UNCRC are not about giving children the right to say no, but rather the ability to feel safe, secure and healthy with their help, guidance and support. We believe that this understanding helps and empowers children and young people.

8. COSLA remains of the view that organisations and structures such as the courts and Children’s Hearings need to acquire a clear understanding of the UNCRC in terms of their dealings and undertakings to children and young people. In that context, we are prepared to accept the proposals as set out in part 1 of the Bill

Part 2 - Commissioner for Children and Young People
9. COSLA would be concerned if the use of the proposed additional powers as set out in Part 2 of the Bill became a “naming & shaming” exercise. Equally we would be concerned if the additional powers were to be used in a way that would duplicate both the existing complaints procedures & external inspection by Education Scotland and the Care Inspectorate. While we acknowledge that the Explanatory Notes for the Bill make reference to the Commissioner not duplicating roles of other organisations, this still leaves an opening for the Commissioner to investigate something that would be better handled by another agency.

10. It is our view that any powers should be used only as a last resort after all other avenues are exhausted.

11. Equally, we are clear that there needs to be clear guidance available to councils on what the UNCRC means for them in the delivery of children’s services, in light of Part 1 of the Bill, as well as Guidance on how and in what circumstances the Office of the Commissioner will have the scope to implement the additional powers.

Part 3 - Children’s Services Planning

12. For many years, COSLA has argued for better integration of public services locally. Whist we therefore accept the intention behind the Bill to improve integration and planning for Children's services, COSLA believes that to be effective in practice any Bill proposals must not exist in a vacuum and should add value to other existing arrangements.

13. In particular, we want to be sure that Children’s services planning contributes to and is driven by the wider Community Planning arrangements that all partners are engaged in locally. This should be the forum through which partners should come together to develop partnership approaches to improving outcomes. For example there is an existing duty for local authorities to produce integrated children’s services plans, linked to Community Planning. Although we would argue that more needs to be done to put CPPs at the centre of reform our view is that this Bill should be an opportunity to drive that work forward in the context of children’s services, and avoid any chance of competing agendas or duplication arising.

14. It is therefore important that Committee considers how the Bill sits within this existing landscape; the activity going on to strengthen community planning, and alongside the developing Community Empowerment Bill which will set out in statute the new framework for Community Planning.

15. There are also clear links to the current proposals on the integration of adult health and social care services and it is possible that some local partnerships may wish to consider the inclusion of children’s services in those arrangements. Ultimately, it will be for individual local authorities and their health board counterparts to make that determination. We would also add that other organisations/people with an interest in children’s services within the voluntary or private sector that are not always directly connected to CPPs will also have a key to play in these tasks and should be equally covered by the proposals.

16. There is one aspect to the proposals in children’s services planning with which COSLA does not support. Part 3 paragraph 17 proposes Ministerial powers to establish joint boards, should there be concern that insufficient progress is being made in terms of integration. This was a late addition to the Bill, and one which had not been previously discussed with COSLA. Whilst we can understand the desire on the part of any Government to ensure the successful implementation of its policies, the discretionary powers taken within this section of the Bill are extensive and allow for the transfer of staff, property and functions to the new boards.

17. The powers appear also to be linked to section 16 of the Bill which concerns powers to issue direction to public bodies, including local authorities. Section 16 is a concern in itself as it allows Ministers with the broad scope to issue directions to local authorities and health boards on the exercising of their functions. We firmly believe that decisions on the operation of services, including how best to tackle outcomes, are best taken at the local level in close collaborations with partners. Taken together one interpretation of sections 16 and 17 is that local authorities and health boards could be restructured if directions of Ministers were not followed to the liking of the Government of the day.

18. This is a concern for anyone who champions local democracy, but given our good relationship with Government it is strange that Ministers feels the need to seek such strong powers. Local government has demonstrated a strong commitment to both the Bill and children’s services improvement generally and we have a strong track record of arguing for better, outcomes focused integrated services. This is consistent with our representation to the Christie Commission and our recent work to agree a vision for local government. We are also uncomfortable with notion that Parliament is being asked to grant powers to Ministers to restructure the public sector in a way that normally would require the full scrutiny afforded to primary legislation. It is possible to argue that these powers not only undermine local democracy, but national democracy too.

19. COSLA is completely opposed to the powers described in paragraph 17 and have made this point already to Government. Our principled position as agreed by our Convention is that there is no need for such powers, and that they should be removed from the Bill.

Part 4 - Provision of Named Persons

20. Scottish local government has been delivering the Getting It Right for Every Child approach for some years and recognises the value of GIRFEC in the improvement of children’s services. The proposal that the Named Person role should sit with local government, with the inference, though not expressly set out, that the role should sit with with schools in terms of their contact with children and young people from 5 to 18 years is welcome. It is clear that outside the family or care structure, children and young people have the most contact with school teaching and support staff. The Financial Memorandum provides for resources to be made available to provide GIRFEC training for senior teaching and support staff in schools and provide resources for backfill, while training is undergone. COSLA has worked with Scottish Government in testing these figures based on the current situation. As noted in the introduction this is a necessary area that will need to be monitored and scrutinised in future years to ensure funding is available for the provision to be sustainable.

Part 5 - Child’s Plan

21. The value of a Child’s Plan is already recognised since the GIRFEC approach was launched. COSLA has worked with Scottish government to promote the approach across local authorities. It is reasonable therefore that COSLA continues to support in principle, the proposals regarding a Single Child’s Plan. The idea of a child’s plan is one that we completely support, but there is a need to consider how the plan relates to other plans. The best example is the coordinated support plan which is set out in ASL legislation. We understand that Government is looking at how coordinated support plans sit with respect to the child’s plan – with the option that a CSP could form part of the child’s plan where this is appropriate being perhaps the best solution. In an ideal world we would not require two pieces of legislation – this Bill and ASL legislation – to describe different aspect of children’s services planning, but it is the practical reality on the ground that is most important. It is therefore important that legislation and guidance makes clear how both the child’s plan and coordinate support plans will operate in practice.

22. In principle COSLA would accept that children, young people and families should be involved in the development of a Child’s Plan, where possible. However, in practical terms, while local authorities will seek to improve life chances for children and young people, managing expectations against practicality and the needs of other vulnerable members of the community will continue to be addressed by councils.

Part 6 - Early Learning and Childcare
23. COSLA supports the expansion of early learning and childcare as proposed in the Bill. The proposals in the Bill came about as a result of considerable joint discussion between COSLA, ADES and Scottish Government. This is also the most costly section of the Bill, and from the start COSLA recognised the very significant implications of the proposals on local authority resources.

24. The figures within the financial memorandum were developed through the work of COSLA with local authorities. They are the best figures we have for the implementation of this section of the Bill, and it is worth noting that local authorities have indicated that they are broadly happy that they are an accurate assessment of implementation costs in line with the agreed approach to delivering this aspect of the Bill, that is, to deliver the 600 hours in as practical a way as possible and without the additional requirement of more flexibility for parents. However, as we have already outlined the implementation of the Bill will stretch beyond the end of this spending review, which means it needs to be recognised that it is future budgets that will determine how effectively this policy can be implemented. Parliament needs to be aware that any shortfall in future funding will be felt by local government and ultimately parents and children.

25. Following discussions with Scottish Government we agreed that the Bill would require local authorities to deliver the increased hours in as practical way as possible by August 2014 with no immediate requirement for more flexibility for parents. This recognised practical challenges facing local authorities, and the short lead time to implement the additional hours in time for the start of the academic year 2014/15. In subsequent years additional flexibility will be introduced gradually, in consultation with parents, and within the overall resources made available by Scottish Government. Delivering increased flexibility is more complex and costs more money as a result, so it is important to understand that local authorities will only be able to implement what they are funded to deliver. Local authorities have the flexibility to tailor future delivery of 600 hours of early learning and childcare to meet local needs, incorporating the views of parents.

26. On the basis that these issues have been agreed with Scottish Government, we support the proposals outlined in the Bill.

Part 7 - Corporate Parenting
27. COSLA has long been an advocate of corporate parenting and has been an enthusiastic supporter of publications such as ‘These are our Bairns’. This section of the Bill is important as for the first time it will set out a legal definition of what it means to be a corporate parent, and extend this to other public bodies – the corporate family, to extend the analogy.

28. We agree that a definition of Corporate Parenting should refer to the collective responsibility of all public bodies and those acting on their behalf to provide the best possible care and protection for looked after children. In addition, it would be helpful if other public bodies or community planning partners have their roles clarified to achieve better outcomes through joint working. This will require the updating of guidance on corporate parenting.

29. We have to be clear though that the corporate parent cannot act in the same way as a birth parent. As such, any definition requires to define the parameters of the responsibility lucidly and to manage expectations in terms of the financial and human resources it would involve. However, local authorities and other public bodies can and do use their influence and weight in innovative ways to support both children in care, and those who have recently left it.

30. It is also important to note that any formalised definition of corporate parenting will have practical resource challenges in terms of on-going training/briefing sessions to ensure organisational wide commitment for councils and other community planning partners. At the same time though it should be acknowledged that there are some real examples of good practice around the country in relation to corporate parenting from councils that should be promoted.

31. One concern that we have on part 7 of the Bill again relates to powers of Scottish Ministers to issue direction to public bodies – including democratically elected local authorities. As with part 3 of the Bill we are not certain why Ministers feel they need to seek the ability to direct public bodies as set out in section 58. Local government has shown a strong commitment to the concept of corporate parenting in recent years and developed a good partnership with Government. Local and Scottish Government have a shared goal for improving lives of looked after children, so it seems disproportionate for Ministers to require the ability to issue directions. On a practical note we would also argue that the powers presuppose that Ministers somehow know better than local agencies about how to meet the needs of children in their care. We do not doubt Government’s commitment on this subject, but the experience of elected members and local professionals across all agencies and services must be respected.

Part 8 - Aftercare
32. COSLA is supportive of the policy intent of the extension of aftercare provision to young people that have previously been looked after. We understand that Government are looking for authorities to provide a level of support broadly consistent with what is provided currently on a discretionary basis for 19-21 year olds. However, paragraph 60, sub-section 8 states that Ministers will determine such types of support, the detail of eligibility will not be determined until secondary legislation. It is therefore important to emphasise that the full implications of this policy on local authorities will not be known until the secondary legislation is passed.

33. Currently, there is no equivalent legislation or statutory guidance for such type of support for 19-21 year olds. The decision on eligibility is made by the local authority, as they have the skills and expertise to assess the individual case. Potentially paragraph 60, sub-section 8 could restrict the provision local authorities can offer and could lead to a difference in the provision that is currently provided and the provision that could be provided after the legislation is implemented. It also restricts the flexibility a local authority has to amend the elements of support available to eligible kinship carers to reflect changing circumstances or the future identification of further support needs.

34. The assumptions that Government make on the number of young people leaving care and percentage of young people expected to be successful in applying for support seem reasonable and are based on national statistics and the experience of local authorities.

35. Our concern on this issue is one that we have no way of knowing what the impact of welfare reform will be on this group of young people, so there is every possibility that the numbers seeking assistance may not fall as much as expected. Early indications of the impact of welfare reform show significant increases of presentations in many authorities for this service.

36. Further, COSLA has less certainty over the accuracy of the costings of this aspect of the Bill due to the difficulties for local authorities in estimating the financial impact. In particular, we are not convinced that the Scottish Government have accurately estimated the average annual cost of support (£3142 per young person). This figure includes an estimate that the average cost for travel would be £400 per year; that emergency payments up to £200 per year could be payable and that payments to outside agencies (such as for third sector support) would be around £1500. It also includes an estimate of staffing costs required to support the young person. From discussions with local authorities we believe that these costs underestimate the actual cost of supporting a young person who has left care. In particular we are aware that some local authorities have indicated a concern that travel costs are not realistic and do not factor in cost of travel particularly in rural areas.

37. Finally, if the subsection detailed above remains in the Bill the actual cost will not be clear until secondary regulations have been passed potentially leading to a gap in funding which could undermine the intention of this section of the Bill.

Part 9 - Counselling Services

38. We believe the intention of this section of the Bill is to ensure that families in the early stages of distress are provided with support. The move towards early intervention is welcomed by COSLA however the provisions set out within Part 4 19 (5) already provide for this to happen under the functions of the “named person”. This section of the legislation may therefore duplicate the earlier section.
39. Further, if the section remains the term “counselling” used is unhelpful and should be replaced with support. Counselling is a specific form of formal support that will not be appropriate for all families. All forms of support (e.g. family group decision making, drug and alcohol support groups etc) should be considered after an assessment of need is carried out. Also, as there is no definition of ‘eligible child’ within the Bill it is difficult for local authorities to be able to assess the impact of this. As things currently stand local authorities are to provide undefined counselling services to parents or those with parental rights and responsibilities of an undefined group of children.

40. Further, it should be noted that as consequence of this provision children and families may also be brought into the care system at a far earlier stage than is currently the case.

Part 10 - Support for Kinship Care
41. The policy intention of kinship care orders is to help families become more able to deal with the issues which they face, without the need for formal care. The number of children looked after in formal kinship care arrangements has grown significantly in recent years and is projected to increase further. A mechanism that provides families with a better alternative to formal care is therefore welcome. It has also been well discussed over the last few years that the growth in kinship care and the corresponding increasing in kinship care allowances have put pressure on local government finance. By transferring parental rights to carers, the orders should allow families to better access other financial benefits from the DWP. The Government believes that this should go some way to reduce the financial pressure on local authorities, but it also, just as importantly, minimises the distinction between kinship care and the lives of other families.

42. In the end how successful orders prove to be at reducing payment of kinship care allowances will depend on how attractive the orders are to families. At this point of time it is difficult to project accurately how many families will take out a kinship care order. Uptake will depend on a number of factors such as impact of welfare reform, the support provided by authorities and the detail of how orders will operate - including eligibility and length of support – which will be set in secondary legislation. The interplay of these variables makes it difficult to know for certain whether the financial assumptions made by Government are accurate. Again, we would reiterate that local authorities will only be able to implement what they are funded to deliver.

43. The accuracy of the financial assumptions is the biggest issue that we have discussed with Scottish Government. When COSLA discussed with local authorities the financial implications of this aspect of the Bill no national picture emerged, and it is clear that local authorities have found it difficult to evaluate the future impact of the policies. With accuracy depending on the financial assumptions made, without actually implementing the legislation and testing the assumptions for real, there will always be a degree of risk for local authorities. For example, the Scottish Government predicts a 6.5% continual annual increase until 2019-20 of those applying for a kinship care order. Over the past 3 years Falkirk Council have seen around a 30% increase whilst Inverclyde has seen a 37% increase since 2011. Both Councils, in different ways, have proactively... supported families to move to kinship care orders. Whilst not all local authorities have experienced such significant increases this clearly demonstrates the potential increases local authorities are likely to face if the order is popular with kinship carers (which is the intention). Further, we are aware that the recent experience of some authorities of the introduction of Adoption Orders shows that the financial costs to councils were underestimated. Additionally, the assumptions relating to estimating the take-up and level of costs per Order made by Scottish Government that underpin the figures for this complex area are numerous, increasing considerably the potential for the actual costs to differ from the estimated costs.

44. The figures which have been developed by Scottish Government are a genuine attempt to assess the cost/benefits of kinship care orders. It is our hope that kinship care orders are a success and provide an alternative to formal care for some families. However, with considerable uncertainty over how many families will take up an order, the financial risk facing local government is potentially significant. The exact size of this risk depends on how accurately Scottish Government has modelled the take up of kinship care orders. We therefore believe it is necessary that both COSLA and Scottish Government jointly scrutinise and monitor the spend on this legislation to ensure that local government is, and continues to be, sufficiently resourced to carry out the new duties that will be enacted.

Part 11 - Adoption Register
45. Local authorities always put children first and will have good reasons for currently not using the register. We are aware, for example, that some local authorities already recruit enough people who are willing to adopt to meet the needs of children in their area. Councils in this position may therefore not feel an urgent requirement to join the register. Presently, consortia arrangements work very well between local authorities in various parts of the country.

46. COSLA accepts that the development of the national register is a positive one and we are aware that its usage is rising. It provides local authorities with another option when trying to place vulnerable children with adoptive families across Scotland. However, the proposal to move to a national adoption register through compulsion for local authorities should only be considered where there is complete confidence that it is in the interests of children to do this.

Part 12 - Other Reforms - Children’s Hearings 47. As mentioned in the summary to this submission, the sections of the Bill which relate to amendments to Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 give us concern. During the passage of the 2011 Act through Parliament COSLA raised some real concerns about centralisation of services and the establishment of a new national body – Children’s Hearings Scotland (CHS) – to run what had been local services. In particular we were worried that the newly established office of National Convener would only have to consult local authorities when drawing up area support teams. There was no requirement to reach a mutual agreement. For COSLA it seemed inappropriate that an unelected official should have this power, and that it was actually more appropriate for the Convener to have to reach agreement with local authorities concerned. In the end Parliament agreed with our position.

48. The proposed amendment in section 69 reverses the decision taken by Parliament and reinstates the original intention of Government. This is not something that COSLA can support. Whilst we have been told by both CHS and Government officials that the Convener would listen closely to views of local authorities concerned, there is still an issue of principle about the head of national body potentially acting against a decision of a democratically elected authority.

49. We are also very concerned about the proposal in section 70 to allow the National Convener to effectively compel a local authority to deliver specific support services to area support teams. At the moment CHS has to reach agreement with councils on support services. We expect that the dialogue between CHS and individual authorities is not always easy given the financial constraints faced by the whole public sector. Nonetheless, we would argue that this dialogue is necessary and allows for mutual agreement to be reached. This has to be preferable to the potential forcible allocation of staff, property and services against the will of the local authority, and potentially to the detriment of other services.

50. We would ask that Parliament considers carefully whether it is appropriate for the National Conveners of CHS to have these powers. It is COSLA strongly held view that the 2011 Act should not be amended as proposed in the Bill.

Part 12 - Other Reforms – School Consultations
51. COSLA currently does not have any comment to make on this section. However, we have a long standing interest in this area and will be responding to the Government’s consultation on possible changes to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010. We would be happy to provide the Committee with additional evidence on any changes to the Bill that might be proposed at stage 2.

Conclusion
52. We acknowledge this is a long and complex response, but this matches the length and complexity of the Bill. COSLA has been working on the Bill for many months and would be happy to use our experience to help the Committee’s scrutiny of the legislation. We would therefore be happy to attend oral evidence sessions and to work with the Committee and individual members on all aspect of the Bill.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Submission from Midlothian Community Planning Partnership (Getting It For Every Midlothian Child Response)

1. Getting it Right for Every Midlothian Child (GIRFEMC) is a partnership within the Community Planning Partnership in Midlothian. The GIRFEMC Board includes representation from elected members, the Council, NHS, Police Scotland, Midlothian Youth Platform, voluntary sector, SCRA and the Child Protection Committee.

2. The GIRFEMC Board welcomes the Scottish Government’s request for our views as to how the proposed joint working arrangements established in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill will link with the work of the Midlothian Community Planning Partnership.

3. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is founded on the key principles of early intervention and prevention that are designed to deliver better outcomes, more efficient use of public funds and sustainable economic growth.

4. For 2013/14 Midlothian took the opportunity to review its Community Planning process and have amalgamated the Single Outcome Agreement and Midlothian Community Plan which is known as the Single Midlothian Plan. Midlothian Council made clear its commitment to and civic leadership role for community planning by ceasing to have a separate corporate strategy, instead agreeing to adopt the Single Midlothian Plan as the Council’s strategic document. This places community planning at the centre of the ‘way forward’ for council services and requires each service plan within the Council to demonstrate how it will support the delivery of shared outcomes. Public sector partners have also agreed to use the Single Midlothian Plan as the strategic context for their service planning in the area and a Chief Finance Officers’ Group has been established, reporting to the board, to align budgets with priorities and support the planning cycle. This is work in progress and the current year’s plan does not yet reflect a shared budgeting approach.

5. The Community Planning Partnership structure includes service users in a variety of ways, from formal user groups in community care, to seeking the views of young people on specific topics through the Midlothian Youth Platform, including supporting these young people to undertake their own consultations with their peers. We recognise that the views of services users and the public is a vital part of the process and acknowledge that further work needs to be carried out in this area.
6. Each year we carry out a strategic assessment of the priorities in the Single Midlothian Plan and invite members of the public to have input. The responses received are incorporated into our strategic planning event where we discuss and agree our priorities for the forthcoming year. The GIRFEMC thematic group carries out consultation with service users and their families throughout the year and the introduction of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill will require additional consultation.

7. Midlothian is working closely with Colin Mair of the Improvement Services in relation to the Single Midlothian Plan and in his feedback he has said that he is pleased with our plan but we need to concentrate on fewer priorities to enable us to do them better.

8. There is an expectation that each Community Planning Partnership will demonstrate how it is giving priority to six of the 16 national outcomes. Midlothian has decided that it will focus on: -

- Economic recovery and growth
- Employment
- Early Years
- Safer and stronger communities and reducing reoffending
- Health inequalities and physical activity
- Outcomes for older people.

Midlothian has set Economic recovery and growth, Early Years and Positive destinations for young people leaving school as its key priorities.

9. In December 2012 the Council agreed to adopt the following principles across all Council services: -

- Communities are partners in service design and delivery
- Services are targeted and focused
- Best value outcomes are delivered through partnership working

For the Midlothian to achieve its aspirations significant and transformational change is required. The public have confirmed that they wish to be actively involved as partners in decision making and local service development and that resources should be redirected towards preventative approaches and to reduce inequality, even if this means the reduction of other services.

10. Throughout all priority setting exercises we ensure that our partner organisations are included with joint working at the heart of our successes in delivery of the Single Midlothian Plan’s priorities and we propose to continue to develop this when the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is introduced.
I refer to the above and provide the following comment on behalf of Police Scotland.

I note at the outset that the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill has provided guidance on wellbeing within section 74 whilst there would appear to be no such clarity in the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill. I would ask for clarity as to whether this is a deliberate position, to leave the matter silent in the latter, or if the terms set out in section 74 are intended to be a precedent applicable to both Bills.

I have hereafter provided comments related to both Bills.

The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Police Scotland welcome this legislation and the clarity related to children’s rights, children's services planning, the provision of a named person service and the guidance on information sharing; all of which will promote, support or safeguard the wellbeing of the child or young person. The Bill seems entirely consistent with a drive to improve outcomes for our communities through improved joint working.

As discussed above, the provision set out in sections 74(1) and 74(2) assist greatly when advising Officers and Staff as to how we may best assess when a child is in need of support and provides a framework on which we can relay this information to partner agencies.

In particular, the role of the named person will substantially benefit and support cases where we engage with children and young people and have concerns related to their wellbeing. This opportunity for early and effective intervention, through appropriate and measured steps, will assist to prevent any escalation of concerns and minimise the opportunities for harm.

The proposals arising from this Bill affect Police Scotland as follows;

1. As a single service we have opportunities to consistently apply the principles of the Bill across the country, whilst allowing for local arrangements and engagement with partner agencies.
2. Application of the Indicators as set out in sections 74(1) and (2) supports our national training strategy and how we instruct our Officers and Staff to recognise, record, assess and share concerns appropriately.
3. The provision of a named person provides clarity on notification processes for low level concerns; and will support existing arrangements in place for child protection cases where an immediate investigation is required.
4. The duty to help the named person also provides clarity and an avenue for appropriate support to be sought when required.
5. The provision of a child’s plan will assist the Police to work more effectively with partners.

The Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill

Whilst the Police Service of Scotland is not specifically mentioned in the Bill, we acknowledge that through our functions we have a clear role to play in supporting the health and wellbeing of our communities. It is a fact of Policing that we are called to attend at many varied scenarios, and our Officers and Staff are frequently the first point of contact where concerns are identified and provide opportunity for early intervention.

As indicated in the opening paragraphs above, we note the strong reference to wellbeing and would welcome consideration of the clarity provided by the above Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill being provided in this respect also.

Clearly, the Police Service of Scotland work across and with all Local Authorities and Health Board areas hence we would appreciate being involved in any consultations locally related to the development of integration plans.

Observations

The main focus of expenditure within the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill is clearly aimed at adult services. There may be value in some provision and comment being provided on impact, if any, against universal provision.

There may also be value in considering how this Bill links with the Adult Support and Protection (Scotland) Act 2007, which sets out a threshold for notifications of concerns to Local Authorities with a duty to investigate. There are many situations where the Police come across concerns, which do not meet that threshold, however uncover circumstances of concern related to a multiple of factors. As discussed above, clear definitions and understanding of ‘wellbeing’ would greatly assist in this regard.

Submission from the Royal College of General Practitioners

The Royal College of General Practitioners (RCGP) is the academic organisation in the UK for general practitioners. Its aim is to encourage and maintain the highest standards of general medical practice and act as the ‘voice’ of general practitioners on education, training and issues around standards of care for patients.

The College in Scotland came into existence in 1953 (one year after the UK College), when a Scottish Council was created to take forward the College’s interests within the Scottish Health Service. We currently represent over 4750 GP members and Associates in Training throughout Scotland. In addition to a base in Edinburgh, the College in Scotland is represented through five regional faculty offices in Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Inverness, Dundee and Glasgow.

Comments

Advocating children’s rights and the ability to hold organisations and services to account is important. It will be interesting to see how it works out and what legal challenges are made. We very much hope that it improves outcomes for all children and young people and especially the most vulnerable.

1. We welcome the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and support its general aspirations. Specific areas that are valuable include clarification of the ‘named person’ role, improvements in permanency planning for looked after children and the provision of better early learning and childcare. We do, nevertheless, have some concerns about the lack of specificity in the draft bill in relation to provision of services to children under three years of age.

2. The only universal services used by almost all parents of children under three years are midwifery, health visiting1 and general practice2. Each of these professions has a specific role in supporting parents, and in recent years a range of well-intentioned but ultimately misguided policies has led to a fragmentation both of the services that each is able to offer and to inter-professional communication. Examples include: recent failures of communication between midwives and GPs since the Refreshed Maternity Services Framework; the abolition of universal preventive child health contacts between six weeks and school entry in 20053 (partially reversed this year); the ending of the training of health visitors in child developmental assessment since 20014; the introduction of corporate caseloads and skill mix teams in health visiting, leading to loss of continuity of care; the disengagement of health visitors from general practices; and a progressive disengagement of GPs from the delivery of preventive child health services\textsuperscript{5}. Effective preventive spending could substantially reverse these trends\textsuperscript{6}

3. Our specific recommendations are as follows:
- That the named person for preschool children should always be a qualified health visitor
- That the professional title ‘health visitor’ be restored to its former statutory status, with specific reference to training and expertise in child development and parenting support
- That all those working with preschool children should have a duty to report concerns about those children’s health, wellbeing and development to the named health visitor
- That health visitors should have a statutory duty to communicate concerns about child wellbeing and development to general practitioners and to others as required
- That general practices should have a named, attached health visitor.
- That health visitors should have a maximum caseload of 200 children under five years, with smaller caseloads being allocated to those working in areas of deprivation or those working with high risk groups.
- That each child should have the right to an annual assessment of developmental progress before the age of five years by a qualified health visitor or in exceptional cases by a general practitioner. These assessments should include investigation of language development, motor function, social behaviours, capacity for attention and of the parent’s relationship with the child. We know that developmental vulnerability cannot be adequately predicted on the basis of pre-existing risk factors\textsuperscript{7}. Furthermore there is now substantial evidence that many children with remediable problems have failed to have these problems addressed since the introduction of Scotland’s bold policy of abolishing its universal child health surveillance programme\textsuperscript{8;9}. This policy, at variance with practice in all other developed nations, should be reversed.
- These assessments should be considered as a child’s right: parents and carers should not be considered to have an automatic right to refuse on behalf of their child. There is some evidence that children who are not seen at preventive care contacts are more likely to have problems. Failure to find ways to include all children in a universal child health programme (there are, for example, good systems for ensuring universal coverage in the Netherlands), thus risks increasing social inequity.

Specific Details within the proposals

4. SPICE document

P13 5\textsuperscript{th} para re the NHS: The proposals are likely to involve at least 1 extra hour/year per child of GP work in assessing and report writing (at present often done as a goodwill gesture, but with increased level of accountability needed and increased interagency co-operation, more GP work is envisaged. To make it sustainable, costs and GP capacity needs to be factored in)\textsuperscript{10}.
“Well-being” is defined by the child being safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included. “Well-being” examples would help compare one case with another so we know where the threshold is. Many children in “normal” families go through times of life when their well-being is compromised so help in knowing when to signal this would be of value. We agree we should include “Welfare” as well as well-being.

Information Sharing – It would be helpful for GPs to include something from the GMC’s “Protecting Children and Young People” 2011 document. Once information has been shared without the permission of the parents or child or young person, it is difficult to keep track of what they don’t know has been shared so we would recommend that in most cases the child or young person or parent is informed when information is shared (except where it poses more risk). We attach a useful Information Sharing summary by Jonathon Leach, an RCGP member.

Early Years provision
We support good quality Early Years’ provision, but it has to be more than a crèche facility. Early identification of learning and developmental issues through proper play and learning facilities, supervision, teaching and reporting from the Early Years to the parents and GPs should be encouraged.

Looked After Children and Care Leavers
We support the proposals aimed at supporting the transition from care to independent adult life which has been sadly lacking. We support stability of placements, registration with a GP and communication with GPs on a regular basis.

P23 Counselling
Although it is clarified in the text that this means Family Mediation therapy or group therapy for those families listed. We would question the evidence of effectiveness of this expensive and potentially time-wasting exercise unless clear targets, time frames and penalties are used. Too often children and young people are returned to abusive families because of feigned compliance with “counselling”. The ones who are shown to respond are generally the milder, more straightforward cases (such as Domestic Abuse where the abused partner separates and institutes effective exclusion).

P25 Kinship care
Kinship care is challenging and the carers are often silent about their difficulties except to the GP. Those taking on kinship care need ongoing support. The children or young people have extra needs and their well-being has already been compromised.

Adoption
The proposals appear to shorten delays and unnecessary bureaucracy which very often occur in the adoption process so we hope these lead to better outcomes for those children and young people.
Reports on Corporate Parenting and Children’s Rights
Having to make regular reports on children’s and young people’s rights should keep the issue at the forefront of the corporate mind which is welcome but will involve ongoing costs.

5. Policy Memorandum

The aims of the policy are admirable.
We note that those being home-schooled are not mentioned. Concerns over this group of children should prompt their inclusion in these excellent plans to improve the welfare and well-being of children and young people.

Section 1.43 Respecting, recognising, children’s rights. RCGP has many contacts in the third sector and regularly comments and supports publications connected with improving care pathways for children and young people and responding to feedback and complaints. Examples include the Contact a Family leaflet on accessing GPs, the Meningitis Trust “Yellow Book”, the Foetal Alcohol Disorders charity educational materials for GPs. RCGP is working with the National Children’s Bureau after their report (2013) “Opening the door to accessing GPs”.

Conclusion

Providing a lot of support in early years is most likely to have long lasting benefit, the evidence supports this and this is emphasised in the document. What is missing for us is supporting young adults who are out of work. GPs routinely spend a great deal of time writing letters of support for people who, due to ongoing health conditions, would have great difficulty in obtaining and maintaining work. There appears to be no organisation or person that we can refer these individuals to for support and training. We need to invest in these young people who should have a personal responsibility to contribute to society but in return society should have a responsibility to offer opportunity and training for all young people so that they have a future. The cost of this would be offset by later savings in social, medical and societal costs.

Requests for access to Medical Records for Safeguarding Reasons
PCCSF documents © Jonathan Leach 29/05/2013

1. General Practice is increasingly being requested to supply clinical information for safeguarding reasons. On most occasions the decision to divulge information is straightforward, however it can become problematic and especially when third party information is requested (for example when it relates to the medical care of parents or carers).

2. Requests for information are usually made by social care colleagues who are governed by very similar professional guidances to health professionals. Both nationally and locally, reviews of cases reveal that frequently it is failing to pass on information that leads to harm. Whilst health professionals correctly are sometimes concerned about divulging sensitive clinical information, guidance from the General Medical Council (and others) is that a doctor is more likely to be criticised for not passing on relevant information.

3. Guidance on when and how information is to be divulged is available from a range of Organisations these include:

   1. The General Medical Council

      Confidentiality is important and information sharing should be proportionate to the risk of harm. You may share some limited information, with consent if possible, to decide if there is a risk that would justify further disclosures. A risk might only become apparent when a number of people with niggling concerns share them. If in any doubt about whether to share information, you should seek advice from an experienced colleague, a named or designated doctor for child protection, or a Caldicott Guardian. You can also seek advice from a professional body, defence organisation or the GMC. You will be able to justify raising a concern, even if it turns out to be groundless, if you have done so honestly, promptly, on the basis of reasonable belief, and through the appropriate channels.

      Your first concern must be the safety of children and young people. You must inform an appropriate person or authority promptly of any reasonable concern that children or young people are at risk of abuse or neglect, when that is in a child’s best interests or necessary to protect other children or young people.

      You must be able to justify a decision not to share such a concern, having taken advice from a named or designated doctor for child protection or an experienced colleague, or a defence or professional body. You should record your concerns, discussions and reasons for not sharing information in these circumstances.

Additionally, the GMC provides the following guidance:

Ask for consent to share information unless there is a compelling reason for not doing so. Information can be shared without consent if it is justified in the public interest or required by law. Do not delay disclosing information to obtain consent if that might put children or young people at risk of significant harm.

Tell your patient what information has been shared, with whom and why, unless doing this would put the child, young person or anyone else at increased risk.

Get advice if you are not sure what information to share, who to share it with or how best to manage any risk associated with sharing information.

2. Working Together to Safeguard Children 2013 provides the following guidance:

Effective sharing of information between professionals and local agencies is essential for effective identification, assessment and service provision.

Early sharing of information is the key to providing effective early help where there are emerging problems. At the other end of the continuum, sharing information can be essential to put in place effective child protection services. Serious Case Reviews (SCRs) have shown how poor information sharing has contributed to the deaths or serious injuries of children.

Fears about sharing information cannot be allowed to stand in the way of the need to promote the welfare and protect the safety of children.

What to do if a request for information is received

4. Given the very clear advice on the requirement to share information the following process is recommended with the clear understanding that there would need to be good reasons not to share relevant information.

Upon receipt for a request for information:

1. Confirm the identity of the requestor and bona fide nature of the information requested. This should usually be in writing and should include some information on why request is being made.
2. Confirm whether you hold any information on the patient
3. Consider whether consent to release information can be sought and if possible, gain consent. In some cases this is possible, whereas in others (for example when

---

4 Working Together to Safeguard Children - Department for Education 2013 a Police investigation is taking place), it maybe inappropriate and/or potentially unsafe.
4. If releasing information without consent, document your reasoning.
5. If not releasing information, document any advice sought and your reasoning.
6. Reply in a timely manner to the requestor providing relevant information.
7. If in doubt seek advice - this is available from local child protection specialists (such as the Named GP for Safeguarding or Named Nurse) or from Defense Organisations.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Submission from Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (SFRS)

How the proposals will affect the Service

The proposals will have a number of implications for the SFRS; the Service seems to fit the definition of an “other service provider” of “children’s services”.

In terms of the proposals, the SFRS may be consulted and have an opportunity to participate in or contribute to the preparation of the children’s services plan and agree the plan. These requirements would apply to any subsequent review of the plan. The SFRS would then be responsible for providing any services or related services in accordance with the plan.

If the SFRS participated it would require to have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers after having responded to any related consultation about the guidance and additionally would be required to comply with any direction issued by Scottish Ministers.

The SFRS facilitates children’s participation in projects such as young firefighter programmes, fire reach, etc., albeit subject to the availability of funding which was previously sourced externally. Such children’s projects could potentially fall within the definition of children’s service or related service (i.e. service or support) in that it would be capable of having a significant effect on the wellbeing of children. Certainly, if not available to children generally then on occasion such projects are introduced with the stated aims and objectives of addressing children with needs of a particular type e.g. awareness of fire risks and home fire safety; deterring fire setting; deterring fire hydrant vandalism etc., although such projects are not in themselves an SFRS function at this time. The Scottish Government’s 2009 report entitled “Scotland Together”, acknowledged the importance of Fire and Rescue Service safety programmes for children and young people.

The perceived benefits that can accrue

The proposals should promote a standardised, multi-agency approach to the delivery of children’s services and it is anticipated that such action would deliver better outcomes for children and young people across Scotland.

Concerns that the Service has around the proposed legislation

Participation in inter-agency (emergency services and charity) sports projects, such as street football to deter anti-social behaviour does not appear to be caught by the definitions.
Does the Bill fit with the reform process

It is anticipated that the proposals will support a standard, formalised approach to planning and service delivery. As such it is expected that the Bill will assist the SFRS to achieve the aims of fire reform; in particular the proposals will assist to improve local services and strengthen the connection between fire services, communities and local authorities.

The Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill

The role of the SFRS in the joint boards and any role the SFRS expects to have in future

It is anticipated that effective partnership working between the SFRS, local authorities and health services will continue to take place through Community Planning Partnerships.

It would be beneficial for the SFRS to be appropriately involved in planning and decision making in line with its role as a Community Planning partner agency.

With respect to Part 2 Shared Services, would the SFRS as a non-departmental body of Scottish Government fall within the definition of “persons” as currently provided for at Section 44(2)? If not, it should be included as it may wish to partake of the services narrated at Section 44(3) if these were to prove best value for public monies. The SFRS appears to fall within the definition of “Scottish public authority” provided for at Section 126 of the Scotland Act 1988 but this position is not confirmed.

Anticipated efficiencies and benefits that will arise for the SFRS from the delivery of integration plans

It is intended that integration plans will support the effective delivery of the National Performance Framework and Single Outcome Agreements. The SFRS corporate planning framework and associated key performance indicators reflect these aims and objectives. As such there are perceived benefits for the SFRS, for example more effective management of individuals who are in receipt of services and are at specific risk from fire for some reason; perhaps people suffering poor health including mental health, or addiction for example. The Scottish Government’s 2009 report entitled “Scotland Together”, acknowledged the link between house fires and casualties, and a range of health and other factors.

Anticipated effect that integration plans will have on outcomes for those receiving services

Integration should achieve a standard, formalised approach to planning and service delivery and such action should deliver better outcomes for service users.

Does the Bill fit with the reform process
It is expected that the Bill will assist the SFRS to achieve the aims of fire reform, specifically in relation to improving local services and integration with community planning partnerships.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Submission from UNICEF UK

Overview
1. UNICEF UK advocates for the protection and promotion of children’s rights, and UNICEF has a specific role under the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) to give advice and assistance to States Parties in implementing children’s rights. This brief submission is intended to support the Local Government and Regeneration Committee to consider Part 3 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill in light of related legislation. It focuses primarily on how obligations under the UNCRC can be effectively mainstreamed through children’s services planning and delivery.

2. UNICEF UK welcomes the leadership shown by successive Scottish governments in implementing the UNCRC, and commends the intention of the Bill to make rights a reality for children. We recognise that the rights measures in the Bill – when taken together – give new focus to children’s rights in Scotland, but are disappointed they do not amount to a stronger imperative for Ministers and public authorities to respect and protect children’s rights.

3. It is fundamentally important that the Children and Young People provide a clear and robust child rights framework for the delivery of children’s services across Scotland. This is not only to reflect the evolution of a child rights focus at a national level but also to ensure all children, regardless of their circumstances or geographical location, have the opportunity to develop to their full potential. With this in mind, we urge the Committee to actively consider the following issues in its scrutiny of Part 3 of the Bill:

   i. The Bill fails to create a systematic children’s rights framework for Scotland, within which both government decision-making and local service delivery will sit. This cultural and legal disconnect can be addressed through better integrating the rights and well-being provisions in Parts 1 and 3 of the Bill.

   ii. Complementary duties on those whose decisions and actions affect children and young people – namely public authorities – to act to give better effect to the UNCRC, rather than simply to report on what they have done to implement it.

   iii. Bringing together duties on children’s rights and children’s services reporting in order to put children’s rights at the heart of children’s services planning and delivery, improve the effectiveness of local reporting mechanisms, and to reduce the burden on public authorities.

Incorporating the UNCRC into Scots law
4. As the Committee will be aware, the UNCRC was adopted by the United Nations in 1989 and ratified by the UK Government in 1991. It was the first internationally binding human rights treaty to comprise the full range of civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights. It is a unique instrument in that it focuses on these rights in the context of the particular needs of children. The UNCRC contains 42 substantive rights for every child under the age of 18, and places corresponding duties on governments to support children to realise those rights and develop to their full potential.

5. UNICEF UK’s experience and recent research shows that legislative steps are essential for embedding the UNCRC within legislation, policy, practice and attitudes towards children. The step-by-step approach taken by successive governments to child rights implementation has led to significant inconsistency and gaps in the extent to which children are able to enjoy the full extent of their rights. The direct incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law would make its principles and provisions a reality for children, placing duties on Ministers and public authorities to respect and protect children’s rights, and allowing children to challenge violations of their rights. This approach would provide not only the foundation for a sustainable culture of children’s rights in Scotland but also the most effective and immediate way of putting “children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services and [ensuring] their rights are respected across the public sector”.

6. For more detail on the case for incorporation and UNICEF UK’s analysis of the child rights duties on Ministers in Part 1 of the Bill, see our submission to the Education and Culture Committee dated July 2013.

Building a child rights framework for local government

7. Part 3 of the Children and Young People Bill sets out a series of duties related to children’s services planning to achieve the full implementation of GIRFEC across Scotland and improve the well-being of children. These duties inter alia require local authorities and health boards (hereafter referred to as public authorities) to prepare children’s services plans every three years and report annually on their implementation. The aim of a children’s services plan is to safeguard, support and promote the well-being of children in a local area.

8. Clearly, one of the notable challenges in drafting the Children and Young People Bill has been in joining up a well-being approach to children’s services with the broader children’s rights framework Scottish Government aspires to. This disconnect risks undermining attempts to “make rights real” for children and young people in Scotland. The Bill could successfully embed children’s rights across the design and delivery of law, policy and services impacting on children and young people, but to achieve this a child rights framework needs to be introduced within children’s services planning, through which public authorities can safeguard, support and promote the rights and well-being of children in their area.

4 Transposing the UNCRC into Scots law in the same way that the European Convention on Human Rights was transposed into UK law through the Human Rights Act 1998. This is within the power of Scottish Government and Scottish Parliament, see Aidan O’Neill QC (2012), Legal opinion for UNICEF UK.
5 Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Policy Memorandum, paragraph 2
9. There are many opportunities to do this within the existing clauses in the Bill, not least of which is looking creatively at how comparable duties on well-being, planning and reporting can be broadened in scope to embed a child rights based approach and include explicit duties on child rights implementation⁷, and also at how these reporting duties can be streamlined to enable a more efficient, effective and coherent picture of local service provision for children across local authority areas. It is also important that these duties, in and of themselves, reflect the principles of the UNCRC. For example, the planning duty in Clause 10 should explicitly reference children as a group that should participate in the development of the children’s services plan.

10. Although we welcome the greater focus that the duty on public authorities in Clause 1 (2) to report steps they have taken to implement children’s rights will put on the UNCRC at local level, it is important to recognise that the duty is not yet accompanied by any obligation on public authorities to act to better implement the UNCRC. This is important because it is often at the local level that children experience rights violations. This omission will have a serious impact on the extent to which a rights culture can truly be developed in Scotland – without a children’s rights duty on public authorities to reflect a duty on Ministers, the legal machinery for promoting and securing children’s rights is weaker than it otherwise could be.

11. We would like to see public authorities placed under a positive duty to implement the UNCRC to ensure that children’s rights genuinely become the framework for services and decisions that affect children and young people in Scotland. Such duties would also provide consistency across public functions both geographically but also no matter by whom those functions are delivered – local authorities, health boards, the private sector or the voluntary sector.⁸

12. The systematic consideration of children’s rights, and the use of a child rights based approach to delivering services for children, is essential to ensuring children’s rights are respected, protected and realised, no matter who the child is or what their personal circumstances are. UNICEF UK’s experience in developing rights-respecting programmes at a local level⁹, evidence from the national implementation of the Rights of Children and Young Persons (Wales) Measure 2011, and learning from the roll-out of GIRFEC to date all underline the importance of training and capacity-building on the application of children’s rights in order to improve outcomes for children. With this in mind, we strongly support the new duty on Ministers to promote awareness and – importantly – understanding of the UNCRC in Part 1 of the Bill. However, from a local implementation perspective, we would like further clarification from Ministers on

10 UN Committee on the Rights of the Child (2008), Concluding observations: United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, paragraph 21
Thank you very much for the opportunity to contribute to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s examination of both the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, and the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill1 in terms of their implications for local authority functions and partnership/joint working.

West Lothian Community Planning Partnership has considered these pieces of legislation, and how the proposed joint working arrangements established by them will link with the development work of our partnership and are pleased to offer the following comment, “West Lothian Community Planning Partnership is a mature, strategic alliance with well established arrangements for joint working and achieving partnership outcomes. We have recently completed the draft version of our new Single Outcome Agreement – to be titled Achieving Positive Outcomes – which focuses on ‘tackling inequality’. The development of the new SOA has been guided and informed by forthcoming legislations and concurrent and independent reform processes and builds on an already well advanced governance structure and partnership understanding of key emerging issues such as prevention, early intervention and outcomes approaches.

The emerging agendas and proposed new legislation likely to relate to the development of the new Bills mentioned are unlikely to be against the direction of travel already agreed by the CPP Board and underpinning structures. The processes already underway to review the CPP governance structure and performance management arrangements are being developed with these potential changes in mind. The visions within these proposed legislation fit with our own ambitions for the wider community of West Lothian.”

I hope this response is useful,

50th Report, 2013 (Session 4)

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

The Committee reports to the Parliament as follows—

1. At its meetings on 10 September and 1 October 2013 the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee considered the delegated powers provisions in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill at stage 1 ("the Bill")¹. The Committee submits this report to the lead committee for the Bill under Rule 9.6.2 of Standing Orders.

2. The Scottish Government provided the Parliament with a memorandum on the delegated powers provisions in the Bill ("the DPM")².

OVERVIEW OF BILL

3. This Bill was introduced by the Scottish Government on 17 April 2013. The Education and Culture Committee is the lead Committee.

4. In broad outline, the Bill concerns the rights and wellbeing of children and young people, and the duties of public authorities to support children, young people and their families. It places duties on the Scottish Ministers and other public authorities in line with the requirements of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, and amends the powers of the Children’s Commissioner to enable investigations to be conducted in relation to individual children and young people.

5. The Bill also makes provision about the way public services work to support children and young people, by providing for a single planning approach for children who need additional support from services ("child’s plans") and creating a single point of contact around every child or young person (the “named person service”).

It also requires authorities which provide children’s services to have a coordinated approach to planning and delivery of those services, and makes provision about the approach to assessing the wellbeing of children and young people.

6. The Bill also extends the duties of local authorities to provide early learning and childcare for pre-school age children and extends the support available to looked after children and young people leaving care. It makes provision for counselling services and other forms of assistance to be made available to parents and kinship carers, and creates a statutory adoption register for Scotland.

7. Finally, the Bill amends existing legislation which affects children and young people by creating a new right to appeal a local authority decision to place a child in secure accommodation, and by making procedural and technical arrangements in the areas of children’s hearings support arrangements and school closures.

DELEGATED POWERS PROVISIONS

8. The Committee considered each of the delegated powers in the Bill.

9. At its first consideration of the Bill, the Committee determined that it did not need to draw the attention of the Parliament to the following delegated powers:

   - Section 3(2) – Authorities to which section 2 (duties in relation to the UNCRC) applies
   - Section 4(4) – Interpretation of Part 1
   - Section 7(3) – Children’s services planning: power to specify services which are to be included in or excluded from the definition of “children’s service” or “related service”
   - Section 7(5) – Children’s services planning: power to modify the definition of “other service provider”
   - Section 8(2) – Requirement to prepare children’s services plan
   - Section 10(1)(b) – Children’s services plan: process
   - Section 15(1) – Guidance in relation to children’s services planning
   - Section 16(1) – Directions in relation to children’s services planning
   - Section 17(2)(b) – Children’s services planning: default powers of Scottish Ministers
   - Section 19(3)(b) – Named person service
   - Section 32(2)(b) – Content of a child’s plan
   - Section 33(8) – Preparation of a child’s plan
   - Section 35(5) – Responsible authority: special cases
Section 44(2) – Mandatory amount of early learning and childcare

Section 46(2) – Duty to consult and plan on delivery of early learning and childcare

Section 47(2) – Method of delivery of early learning and childcare

Section 50(2) – Corporate parents

Section 57(1) – Guidance on corporate parenting

Section 58(1) – Directions to corporate parents

Section 60(2)(e) – Provision of aftercare to young people

Section 60 - Consequential amendment to regulation-making power in the Regulation of Care (Scotland) Act 2001

Section 61(1) – Provision of counselling services to parents and others

Section 62(1) – Counselling services: further provision

Section 64(2) – Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

Section 65(2)(c) – Orders which are kinship care orders

Section 66(3) – Kinship care assistance: further provision

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register
Inserting section 13B(2) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 – Power of direction

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register
Inserting section 13E(2) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 – Power of direction

Section 71 – Appeal against detention of child in secure accommodation
Inserting section 44A(3) into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995

Section 74(6) – Assessment of wellbeing

Section 77(1)(b) – Subordinate legislation

Section 78(a) – Ancillary provision

10. At its meeting of 10 September the Committee agreed to write to Scottish Government officials to raise questions on the remaining delegated powers in the Bill. This correspondence is reproduced at Annexes A and B.
11. In light of the written responses received by the Committee, it agreed that it did not need to draw the Parliament’s attention to the following delegated powers:

- Section 13(1)(b)(ii) – Reporting on children’s services plan
- Section 17(6) – Children’s services planning: default powers of Scottish Ministers
- Section 30(2) – Interpretation of Part 4 (provision of named persons)
- Section 32(2) – Content of a child’s plan
- Section 37(5) – Child’s plan: management
- Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register
- Inserting section 13E(1) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 – Power to make regulations
- Section 78(b) – Ancillary provision
- Section 79(2) - Commencement

12. The Committee’s comments and, where appropriate, recommendations on the other delegated powers in the Bill are detailed below.

Section 28(1) – Guidance in relation to named person service

- Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Guidance
- Parliamentary procedure: None

Section 29(1) – Directions in relation to named person service

- Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Direction
- Parliamentary procedure: None

Provision

13. Sections 28(1) and 29(1) confer power on the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance and directions to service providers about the exercise of named person service functions under the Bill. Service providers are health boards, local authorities and the directing authorities of independent or grant-aided schools. The principal function of service providers is to make an identified individual (a named person) available in relation to every child or young person. That individual will have responsibilities in relation to the wellbeing of the child or young person.
Comment

14. The Committee asked the Scottish Government whether it considers that it would be appropriate to publish guidance or directions issued under these powers, in light of the potential impact of the named person service on children or young people and their families.

15. The Scottish Government responded that it does consider it appropriate and therefore intends to publish guidance and, if relevant, directions under the powers in sections 28(1) and 29(1) of the Bill.

16. The Committee welcomes the commitment to publication given by the Scottish Government. However, in addition to the intentions of the current administration as regards use of delegated powers, the Committee requires to consider how those powers might be exercised from time to time by future administrations. In that light, the Committee concludes that it would be appropriate for the Bill to impose a duty on the Scottish Ministers to publish guidance and directions under sections 28(1) and 29(1).

17. The Committee therefore asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to require publication of any guidance or directions issued by the Scottish Ministers under the powers contained in sections 28(1) and 29(1).

18. The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.

Section 39(1) – Guidance on child’s plans

- Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Guidance
- Parliamentary procedure: None

Section 40(1) – Directions in relation to child’s plans

- Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Direction
- Parliamentary procedure: None

Provisions

19. Section 39(1) enables the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance to any person in connection with that person’s functions under Part 5 of the Bill, while section 40(1) enables Ministers to issue directions to local authorities, health boards and directing authorities.

20. Part 5 of the Bill provides for a child’s plan to be created for every child with a wellbeing need which is considered to require targeted intervention. The child’s plan will set out an overview of the young person’s needs, the actions which require to be provided to meet the assessed needs, who will undertake those actions, and the desired outcomes. A child’s plan is to be prepared and managed by the responsible authority. Depending on circumstances, that authority will be a local authority, health board or the directing authority of an independent or grant-aided school.

Comments

21. The powers in sections 39(1) and 40(1) raise similar issues to those raised by sections 28(1) and 29(1), discussed above. The Committee accordingly asked the Scottish Government whether it considers that it would be appropriate to publish guidance or directions issued under these powers, in light of the potential impact of the exercise of functions relating to child’s plans on children and their families.

22. The Scottish Government responded that it does consider it appropriate and therefore intends to publish guidance and, if relevant, directions under the powers in sections 39(1) and 40(1) of the Bill.

23. The Committee welcomes the commitment to publication given by the Scottish Government. However, as above, the Committee requires to consider how delegated powers might be exercised from time to time by future administrations. In that light, the Committee concludes that it would be appropriate for the Bill to impose a duty on the Scottish Ministers to publish guidance and directions under sections 39(1) and 40(1).

24. The Committee therefore asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to require publication of any guidance or directions issued by the Scottish Ministers under the powers contained in sections 39(1) and 40(1).

25. The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.

Section 43(2)(c)(ii) – Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

26. Section 43(2)(c)(ii) enables the Scottish Ministers by order to prescribe additional categories of children who are eligible for the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare. (Section 43 itself specifies one category of child eligible for such childcare, being a child aged 2 or over who is, or has been at any time since their 2nd birthday, looked after or subject to a kinship care order).

27. The Explanatory Notes to the Bill and the DPM state that it is likely that the power will be used to specify that 3 and 4 year olds will be eligible for early learning and childcare from the first term after their 3rd birthday in a similar way in which the current law does by virtue of the order made under section 1(1A) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 (which the Bill amends).

Comment

28. The Committee asked the Scottish Government to explain why it considers it appropriate that an order setting the eligibility criteria for early learning and childcare is subject to the negative procedure.

29. The Scottish Government explained that the power is part of a longer term ambition to increase and improve early learning and childcare for all children, and that there is pressure to increase the categories of eligible children in a number of directions. The power in its current form offers maximum flexibility to enable work towards that longer term ambition.

30. The Scottish Government stated that it agrees with the Committee that the setting of eligibility criteria for early learning and childcare is a matter of substance with a significant impact on children. However, in its view that does not necessarily mean that it is appropriate to make the power subject to the affirmative procedure. The Scottish Government considers that the circumstances are such in this case that the negative procedure is appropriate.

31. The reason the Scottish Government gives in support of that view is that the power will not modify the provision made about eligibility in the primary legislation. The Committee notes however that this is simply because a choice has been made not to include the eligibility criteria on the face of the Bill (other than in relation to children aged 2 or over who are, or have been, looked after or subject to a kinship care order). That in the Committee’s view is not a good reason to avoid detailed Parliamentary scrutiny. In carrying out its scrutiny of delegated powers, the Committee considers the substance of the provision to be made, as well as whether it involves modification of primary legislation.

32. The Committee also notes that, in contrast, the power in section 44(2) of the Bill to modify the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare (i.e. the annual number of hours to be provided) is subject to the affirmative procedure, as is the power in section 47(2) to modify the way in which an education authority must deliver early learning and childcare. The initial mandatory amount of early learning and childcare, and the method of providing it, are set out on the face of the Bill in sections 44 and 47 respectively.

33. The Scottish Government explains that “the potential effect of [the powers in sections 44(2) and 47(2)] could mean a significant change to the infrastructure and funding of early learning and childcare and therefore it is appropriate that those powers are afforded a more detailed level of scrutiny in the form of affirmative procedure”. It appears to the Committee however that an increase in the numbers of children eligible for early learning and childcare by virtue of specifying additional categories of eligible children under the power in section 43(2)(c)(ii) could have a similarly significant effect on education authority infrastructure and funding. Accordingly the explanation given does not appear to provide a strong basis for distinguishing between the various powers.
34. More generally, it is not clear to the Committee that amending the number of hours of early learning and childcare to which eligible children are entitled is any more significant than setting and amending the categories of children who may access that entitlement. The setting of eligibility criteria might be thought to be of equal, if not greater, significance.

35. The Committee concludes that specifying categories of children who are entitled to early learning and childcare is in the nature of a substantive matter which might be expected to attract the affirmative procedure. While the current policy intention is that the power will be used to specify 3 and 4 year olds, it may of course be used to make different provision in the future. The Scottish Government response refers to pressure to increase the categories of eligible children to include, for example, 2 year olds living in deprivation, 2 year olds who have a disability or additional support needs, or all 2 year olds. These appear to be significant matters which it is anticipated Parliament may wish the ability to debate in full.

36. The Committee therefore asks the Scottish Government to consider in advance of Stage 2 of the Bill whether the significance of setting eligibility criteria by order under this power is such that the affirmative procedure is a more suitable level of Parliamentary scrutiny of the exercise of this power than the negative procedure.

37. The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.

Section 61(3) – Provision of counselling services to parents and others

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>The Scottish Ministers</th>

<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>Order</td>
</tr>
<tr>

Provision
38. Section 61(3) enables the Scottish Ministers by order to specify the description of “eligible child” for the purposes of section 61(2). That section provides that the parents of, or persons with parental rights and responsibilities in relation to, an eligible child will be eligible for counselling services.

Comment
39. On considering the power, the Committee was content in principle with the exercise of the power by subordinate legislation. However, it sought further explanation of the choice of the negative procedure.

40. The Scottish Government explains that, in its view, changes to the description of “eligible child” are unlikely to be controversial and consequently it would not be good use of Parliamentary time to initiate a debate on each occasion the power is used. It states that any change to eligibility would most likely be to extend eligibility rather than narrow it, therefore improving the provision of counselling services to parents and others and ensuring the Government continues to meet the needs of children and families in need.

41. The Scottish Government’s response also explains that, given the nature of the counselling services provided in each area, no change to provision could be effected without substantial consultation and engagement with the service providers and users across each local authority area, which would be undertaken by the Scottish Government. The Committee notes however that there is no requirement on the face of the Bill for such consultation or engagement.

42. The Committee also notes that the Scottish Government’s response overlooks the fact that the power enables the Scottish Ministers not merely to change or extend the eligibility criteria, but to set down the initial eligibility criteria. “Eligible child” is not defined on the face of the Bill, so the power, if used, will be used to specify the initial eligibility criteria. The Committee is prepared to accept that if changes to the criteria are unlikely to be controversial, then the initial setting of the eligibility criteria may also be uncontroversial. However it does not consider that the Government has fully explained why the matter is unlikely to be controversial.

43. Moreover, while the current policy intention is to use the power to set and then potentially extend eligibility, rather than narrow it, the Committee requires to consider the use to which the power could potentially be put in the future. While it accepts the Government's explanation (in paragraph 26 of Annex B) that the eligibility of the parents or carers of certain children for counselling services is not perhaps as fundamental as the provision of aftercare to formerly looked-after children (which is enabled by provision made in section 60(2) of the Bill), it is clearly a matter which may be of significance to the affected individuals. That suggests that the affirmative procedure may be appropriate for the exercise of the power in section 61(3). It is not the sort of power to make operational or technical provision which the Committee might normally expect to attract the negative procedure.

44. The Committee therefore asks the Scottish Government to consider in advance of Stage 2 of the Bill whether the significance of setting eligibility criteria by order under this power is such that the affirmative procedure is a more suitable level of Parliamentary scrutiny of the exercise of this power than the negative procedure.

45. The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.
Section 64(4) – Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision
46. Section 64(4) enables the Scottish Ministers by order to specify the description of an “eligible child” for the purposes of the kinship care assistance provisions.

Comment
47. On considering the power, the Committee was content in principle with the exercise of the power by subordinate legislation. However, it sought further explanation of the choice of the negative procedure.

48. As in relation to the power at section 61(2) discussed above (provision of counselling services for parents and carers of eligible children), the Scottish Government’s view is that changes to the description of “eligible child” are unlikely to be controversial and consequently it would not be good use of Parliamentary time to initiate a debate on each occasion the power is used. It states again that any change to eligibility would most likely be to extend eligibility rather than narrow it, therefore ensuring the Scottish Government continues to meet the needs of children living in kinship arrangements.

49. Again, the Scottish Government’s response also explains that no change to the eligibility description specified would be effected without substantial consultation and engagement with the service providers and users across each local authority area, which would be undertaken by the Scottish Government. The Committee notes however that there is no requirement on the face of the Bill for such consultation or engagement.

50. The Committee notes again that the Government response overlooks the fact that the power enables the Scottish Ministers not merely to change or extend the eligibility criteria, but to set down the initial eligibility criteria. The Committee is prepared to accept that if changes to the criteria are unlikely to be controversial, then the initial setting of the eligibility criteria may also be uncontroversial. However it does not consider that the Government has fully explained why it considers that the matter is unlikely to be controversial.

51. Moreover, while the current policy intention is to use the power to set and then potentially extend eligibility, rather than narrow it, the Committee requires to consider the use to which the power could potentially be put in the future, and the impact which eligibility, or lack of eligibility, for certain assistance would have on those affected. While it accepts the Scottish Government’s explanation (in paragraph 28 of Annex B) that the eligibility of children, young people or their carers for kinship care assistance may not be as fundamental as the provision of aftercare to formerly looked-after children (which is enabled by provision made in section 60(2) of the Bill), it is clearly a matter of significance. Depending on how it is specified in an order under section 64(2) of the Bill, kinship care assistance will potentially confer significant benefits on those entitled to it, and may include the provision of counselling, advice, financial support and access to council services.

52. The Committee is accordingly of the view that the issue of eligibility is a substantive matter which Parliament would expect to have the opportunity to debate. In its view, the Scottish Government has not explained why it considers eligibility for kinship care assistance to be of a technical, administrative or other non-controversial nature, such that the negative procedure might be appropriate. From the information available to the Committee, it appears to be a matter for which Parliament’s approval should be required.

53. The Committee therefore asks the Scottish Government to consider in advance of Stage 2 of the Bill whether the significance of setting eligibility criteria by order under this power is such that the affirmative procedure is a more suitable level of Parliamentary scrutiny of the exercise of this power than the negative procedure.

54. The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register

Inserting section 13A(1) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Arrangement
Parliamentary procedure: None

Provision

55. Section 68 of the Bill inserts section 13A(1) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. It requires the Scottish Ministers to make arrangements for the establishment and maintenance of Scotland’s Adoption Register. Section 13B(1) provides that such arrangements may in particular authorise an organisation (a “registration organisation”) to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register, and provide for payments to be made to that organisation.

Comment

56. The Committee asked the Scottish Government why it is considered appropriate to authorise a registration organisation to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register, and to provide for payments to be made to that organisation, by way of arrangements rather than in subordinate legislation.

57. The Scottish Government explained that there is an organisation which currently operates a non-statutory adoption register in Scotland and the Scottish Ministers may consider it appropriate to authorise this organisation to carry out their functions in relation to the Register once the Bill is enacted, given that the organisation has the relevant skills and experience which may be required. For this reason, it is considered that it would be more appropriate to make the authorisation by arrangement as opposed to in subordinate legislation. The Scottish Government’s response does not say, but the Committee presumes that this is considered to be a more appropriate way of delegating authority because the organisation is not a statutory body or other public authority. The Committee notes that it would nevertheless be possible for subordinate legislation to delegate functions to an organisation such as a charity or private company.

58. The Scottish Government adds that funding arrangements are already in place for this non-statutory register and that these may be used as a basis for the arrangements for the funding of the new register. It is not therefore considered appropriate to provide for payments to the registration organisation by way of subordinate legislation. Again, the Committee accepts this explanation but considers that it would have been possible to replicate the existing funding arrangements in subordinate legislation, if considered appropriate.

59. As regards publication of the arrangements once they have been made by the Scottish Ministers, the Scottish Government states it expects that the details will be made available on the website of Scotland’s Adoption Register.

60. The Committee notes that it appears that the power in section 13A(1) as read with section 13B(1)(b) would enable arrangements to be made requiring payments to the registration organisation by third parties as well as by the Scottish Ministers. If an arrangement is to be capable of imposing liability to make payments on persons other than the Scottish Ministers, the Committee considers that the arrangements should be clear and accessible to those who may be affected.

61. More generally, the Committee notes that any arrangements made under the power will potentially authorise the registration organisation to perform all the Scottish Ministers’ statutory functions relating to the Register (other than the function of making subordinate legislation). This will include the potentially significant functions of receiving information for inclusion in the Register, and disclosing information from it. The exercise of those functions has the potential to substantially affect those individuals concerned.

62. In the interests of transparency and accountability therefore, the Committee would have expected at the very least that a duty be imposed on the Scottish Ministers to publish details of the arrangements once made.

63. The Committee accordingly draws the attention of the lead committee to the power in section 13A(1) as read with section 13B. This power proposes to enable the Scottish Ministers, by arrangements, to delegate their functions in respect of the Register (other than their function of making subordinate legislation) to a registration organisation. It also proposes to enable the Ministers, by arrangements, to provide for payments to be made to such an organisation, which may include payments by persons other than the Scottish Ministers. The Committee considers that any arrangements which impose liability for payment should be clear and accessible to those affected by them.
64. The proposal is that this delegation of functions and the making of provision about payments to the organisation be achieved without the need for subordinate legislation or parliamentary procedure, and without any requirement for publication of the arrangements entered into.

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register

Inserting section 13A(2) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

65. As referred to above, section 68 inserts section 13A into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 (the 2007 Act), which requires the Scottish Ministers to make arrangements for the establishment and maintenance of a register to be known as Scotland’s Adoption Register. Section 13A(2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe information or types of information to be included in the Register. Examples are given of the types of information which may be included. The power also enables the Scottish Ministers to provide for how information is to be retained in the Register, and to make such further provision in relation to the Register as they consider appropriate.

66. Section 13C expands the purposes for which regulations under section 13A(2) may be made. It enables provision to be made in connection with the supply of information for the Register from adoption agencies to the Scottish Ministers or to a registration organisation authorised on the Ministers’ behalf. It also enables further provision to be made in connection with specified matters relating to the supply of such information.

67. Section 13D provides that regulations under section 13A(2) may also make provision about the disclosure of information from the Register. Information may be disclosed to adoption agencies or to other persons specified in the regulations, for certain specified purposes (including any purpose relating to adoption). The power also enables further provision to be made in connection with specified matters relating to the disclosure of such information.

Comment

68. The Committee asked the Scottish Government why the Bill does not define what information the Register is to contain or make provision about what it is to be used for, and why the wide powers taken in section 13A(2) to make provision about the Register are not limited or defined in any way.

69. It also asked for further explanation regarding in what way it is currently anticipated the Register may alter and extend beyond containing information about children and adopters, as referred to in the DPM.
70. The Scottish Government submits that although the Bill does not define the information which the Register is to contain, it is clear from the types of information which may be included in the Register (as provided for in subparagraphs (i) to (v) of section 13A(2)(a)) that the information will all relate in some way to children who are considered suitable for adoption, or to prospective adoptive parents. The Committee notes however that the list of types of information referred to is an illustrative list of examples only, and that the power is wider than that and may be used to prescribe other information or types of information.

71. Moreover, the Committee considers that the Scottish Government has not explained what the Register is to be used for. It appears that the purpose of the Register is likely to be to facilitate adoption in some way, but this is not made clear on the face of the Bill. Were section 13A to define or make provision about the purpose or intended use of the Register, the Committee considers that that would go some way to limit the very broad powers in section 13A(2) to make regulations about the Register.

72. The Scottish Government also considers that paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of section 13A(2) limit or restrict the power to a certain extent (see paragraphs 29 and 30 of Annex B). As stated above, paragraph (a) provides a non-exhaustive list of information which might require to be included in the Register. The Committee accepts that this provides a guide to the intended use of the power, but not a limitation or restriction on its use. Given that the policy intention is that the information to be provided will relate in some way to children who are considered suitable for adoption, or to prospective adoptive parents, the Committee considers that the power conferred by paragraph (a) should be restricted to that extent.

73. As regards paragraph (b), the Committee accepts that paragraph is limited to enabling provision to be made about how information is to be stored. The Committee disagrees however with the Scottish Government's view that it is clear from paragraph (c) that regulations will be restricted to making provision about “other administrative matters associated with the operation of the Register”. Paragraph (c) confers a broad power to make such further provision in relation to the Register as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate. If the intention in taking the power is, as stated, to enable provision to be made about administrative matters associated with the operation of the Register, then the Committee considers that the power has been drawn too widely. Its terms should be restricted to give effect to the more limited policy intention.

74. As regards the intention that the Register may alter and extend beyond containing information relating to children and adopters, as referred to in the DPM, the Scottish Government explains that there are no current plans for such an extension (although the type of information required about children and adopters may be extended in future). The Committee welcomes this clarification regarding the current intention, but considers that the power in section 13A(2)(a) as currently drafted would allow information to be prescribed for inclusion in the register which goes beyond information concerning children suitable for adoption and potential adopters. It therefore repeats its conclusion above that the power should be restricted to the prescribing of information concerning children considered suitable for adoption and prospective adopters, if that is the policy intention.

75. The Committee also asked the Scottish Government to provide reasons for taking powers in section 13C to make provision about the supply of information to the Register, and in section 13D about the disclosure of information, in regulations under section 13A(2).

76. The Committee welcomes the explanation of these powers which the Scottish Government has provided. The reason given in relation to the power to make provision about the supply of information under section 13C is to enable the Scottish Ministers to prescribe the detailed processes for operating the Register. The Committee accepts that much of the information which may be prescribed under section 13C relates to operation of the Register. However it considers that prescribing the information which an adoption agency must disclose to the Scottish Ministers or to a registration organisation (section 13C(1)), and prescribing persons other than parents or carers whose consent may be required to the disclosure of information (section 13C(2)(a)(ii)) are substantive rather than operational matters. Nonetheless, it notes that the regulations will be subject to the affirmative procedure and considers that this confers a sufficient degree of scrutiny on the Parliament in relation to the more substantive matters.

77. The reason given in relation to the power to authorise disclosure of information under section 13D is that the power will be used to prescribe detailed information which it is not considered appropriate to make provision for in the Bill. In light of the fact that the purposes for which information may be disclosed under those regulations is, for the most part, set out on the face of the Bill, the Committee considers that explanation to be acceptable.

78. The Committee therefore accepts in principle the power under section 13A(2), as supplemented by sections 13C and 13D, to make regulations in relation to Scotland’s Adoption Register. It is also content with the choice of the affirmative procedure for those regulations. However, it asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments to section 13A at Stage 2 to make provision about the purpose or intended use of the Register, in order to inform the broad power in section 13A(2) to make regulations about the Register and the information which it is to contain.

79. The Committee also asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to restrict the terms of the power in section 13A(2)(a) to reflect the stated intention in taking the power, which is to enable information or types of information relating to children considered suitable for adoption, or to prospective adopters, to be prescribed for inclusion in the Register.

80. The Committee also asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to restrict the terms of the power in section 13A(2)(c) to reflect the stated intention in taking the power, which is to enable provision to be made about other administrative matters associated with the operation of the Register.
81. The Committee asks for further comment on these matters in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.

Section 74(3) – Assessment of wellbeing

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Guidance
Parliamentary procedure: None

Provision

82. Section 74(2) contains a list of indicators with reference to which a person required by the Bill to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person is to carry out such an assessment. Section 74(3) requires the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance on how those indicators are to be used to assess wellbeing.

Comment

83. Once again, this power to issue guidance raises similar issues to those discussed earlier in this report in relation to sections 28(1) and 29(1), and 39(1) and 40(1). The Committee asked the Scottish Government whether it considers that it would be appropriate to publish guidance on how the wellbeing indicators are to be used by those with functions under the Bill to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person.

84. The Scottish Government responded that it does consider guidance on wellbeing indicators an appropriate mechanism to set out further detail, therefore it is the intention for guidance to be published.

85. For the reasons discussed earlier in this report in relation to the powers in sections 28(1) and 29(1), and 39(1) and 40(1), the Committee concludes that it would be appropriate for the Bill to impose a duty on the Scottish Ministers to publish guidance issued under section 74(3).

86. The Committee therefore asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to require publication of any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers under the power contained in section 74(3).

87. The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.
ANNEX A

Correspondence with the Scottish Government

On 10 September 2013, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee wrote to the Scottish Government as follows:

Section 13(1)(b)(ii) – Reporting on children’s services plan

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Negative

1. Section 13(1)(b)(ii) confers a power on the Scottish Ministers to prescribe, by order, outcomes in relation to the wellbeing of children in a local authority area. Section 13(1)(b) requires a local authority and each relevant health board to publish a report every year on the extent to which the provision of services in accordance with the children’s services plan has achieved certain defined aims and any outcomes prescribed using the power in sections 13(1)(b)(ii).

2. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- Given that section 13(1)(b) enables the Scottish Ministers to prescribe outcomes in relation to wellbeing of the children in an area, as regards assessment of the children’s services plan for that area, how will the power achieve its stated aim of allowing the reports to reflect any changes in children’s services or related services?

- How will the power be used to achieve its stated aim of reflecting “changes in the measures of wellbeing” when it is a power to prescribe outcomes in relation to wellbeing”?

- What are the reasons for taking the power?

- Given the significance of the matters to which the power relates why it considers that the negative procedure is appropriate and that more detailed parliamentary scrutiny is not required?

Section 17(6) – Children’s services planning: default powers of Scottish Ministers

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative

3. Section 17(6) enables the Scottish Ministers, by order, to constitute a joint board of the local authority and relevant health board(s) for an area, to exercise a function relating to children’s services planning under the Bill. The power is available where the Scottish Ministers consider that making a direction under section 17(2) regarding the exercise of the function has been insufficient or would be insufficient.

4. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- To clarify whether the power is to constitute a joint board comprising the local authority and health boards which are failing to exercise the function, or the local authority and health boards which have been directed to exercise the function or would be so directed were such a direction considered likely to be sufficient, or either or both of the above, and whether it considers the meaning to be sufficiently clear from the wording of section 17(6)?

Section 30(2) – Interpretation of Part 4 (provision of named persons)

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

5. Section 30(2) confers power on the Scottish Ministers by order to modify schedule 2 of the Bill to add a person or description of persons, remove an entry in it or vary an entry in it. Schedule 2 contains a list of “relevant authorities”. Persons or bodies which are relevant authorities are subject to the duties in Part 4 to help named persons and to share information with named person service providers.

6. The Delegated Powers Memorandum states that the reason for taking the power is “so that the service providers in schedule 2 can be modified in the future should new relevant authorities be created, or current service providers’ names changed”. This explanation appears to confuse the role of service providers in Part 4 with the role of relevant authorities. “Service provider” is defined in section 30(1) as a health board, local authority or directing authority. Service providers have the function under the Bill of providing a named person service to children and young people. “Relevant authority” is defined in section 30(1) as a person listed, or within a description listed, in schedule 2. Relevant authorities are required to help named persons and to share information with service providers.

7. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- Whether, as stated in the Delegated Powers Memorandum, the power is sought to enable changes to be made to the definition of service providers, or whether it is instead intended that the power is being taken to enable schedule 2 to be modified in the future should new relevant authorities be created, or current relevant authorities’ names changed?

Section 32(2) – Content of a child’s plan

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

8. Section 32(2) confers power on the Scottish Ministers by order to make provision as to information that is or is not to be contained in a child’s plan, and the form of a child’s plan.

9. The Delegated Powers Memorandum states it is important that the Scottish Ministers have the ability and flexibility “to amend what should be included in the plan”.

10. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- Whether it agrees that the power at section 32(2) does not enable Ministers to add to, modify or remove any of the matters listed in section 32(1)?

- To explain the reasons for taking the power, and give an example of the sort of information which might be required to be contained, or not to be contained, in a child’s plan?

- Why does the Government consider that the negative procedure is appropriate and that more detailed parliamentary scrutiny is not required?

Section 37(5) – Child’s plan: management

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

11. Section 37(5) confers power on the Scottish Ministers by order to make provision about the management of child’s plans, including provision about when and how a child’s plan is to be reviewed in accordance with section 37(1); who is to be the managing authority of a child’s plan; when and to whom management of a child’s plan is to or may transfer under section 37(4)(b); when and how a new targeted intervention may be included in a child’s plan; and the keeping, disclosure and destruction of child’s plans.
12. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- To explain why the negative procedure is considered to be appropriate, given the breadth of the power and the potential scope to use it to make substantive, as opposed to procedural, changes to the management of child’s plans, which changes may impact on children subject to child’s plans, and on their families?

Section 43(2)(c)(ii) – Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

13. Section 43(2)(c)(ii) enables the Scottish Ministers by order to specify additional categories of children who are eligible for the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare. Children may be specified by age range or other description.

14. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- To explain further the choice of negative procedure, given that:
  - setting the eligibility criteria for early learning and childcare may be considered a matter of substance with a potentially significant impact on children and families; and
  - provision in relation to the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare (section 44) and the way in which an education authority must deliver early learning and childcare (section 47) is set out on the face of the Bill, with power to modify that provision being subject to the affirmative procedure in each case.

Section 61(3) – Provision of counselling services to parents and others

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

15. Section 61(3) enables the Scottish Ministers by order to specify the description of “eligible child” for the purposes of section 61(2). That section provides that the parents of, or persons with parental rights and responsibilities in relation to, an eligible child will be eligible for counselling services.

16. The reason given in the Delegated Powers Memorandum for the choice of parliamentary procedure is that the eligibility test is likely to require to be amended from time to time. The Committee notes that the affirmative procedure would also enable amendment from time to time, and considers that the matter of eligibility for counselling may be thought to be a matter of significance for affected individuals.
The Committee asks the Scottish Government whether there are further reasons for the choice of negative procedure.

17. Section 60(2) of the Bill amends the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 to confer power by regulations to specify “eligible needs” in relation to the provision of aftercare to young people. That power is subject to the affirmative procedure.

The Committee asks the Scottish Government in what respect does the power in section 61(3) to specify eligibility for counselling services differ from the power in section 60(2), so as to make negative procedure more appropriate?

Section 64(4) – Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

18. Similarly to Section 61(3), Section 64(4) enables the Scottish Ministers by order to specify the description of an “eligible child” for the purposes of the kinship care assistance provisions.

19. The reason given in the Delegated Powers Memorandum for the choice of parliamentary procedure does not accurately describe the scope of the order-making power, given that it may be used to specify the initial eligibility criteria for kinship care assistance, in addition to adding to or amending those criteria. The Committee considers that the matter of eligibility for assistance may be thought to be a matter of significance for affected individuals.

The Committee asks the Scottish Government what the reasons are for the choice of negative procedure.

The Committee asks the Scottish Government in what respect does the power in section 64(4) to specify eligibility for kinship care assistance differ from the power in section 60(2) power, so as to make negative procedure more appropriate?

21. Section 68 inserts section 13A into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 (the 2007 Act). Section 13A(2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe information or types of information to be included in the Register. This may include information relating to children who adoption agencies consider ought to be placed for adoption, persons considered by adoption agencies as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption, matters relating to such children or persons which arise after information about them is included in the Register, or children or prospective adopters outwith Scotland. The Scottish Ministers may also by regulations provide for how information is to be retained in the Register, and make such further provision in relation to the Register as they consider appropriate.

22. The Committee notes the Bill does not define what information the Register is to contain, or make provision about what it may be used for. Instead it grants extremely wide powers to Ministers to establish to do so in regulations.

23. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- To explain why that is the case, and why the wide powers taken in section 13A(2) to make provision about the Register are not limited or defined in any way?

- To give the reasons for taking powers in section 13C(1), (2)(a)(ii) and (3) to use regulations under section 13A(2) to make provision about the supply of information for the Register, as no explanation of these powers is provided in the Delegated powers Memorandum?

- To explain the reasons for taking powers in section 13D(2) and (3) to use regulations under section 13A(2) to make provision about disclosure of information, as again no explanation of these powers is provided in the Delegated Powers Memorandum?

- To explain further in what way it is currently anticipated the Register may alter and extend beyond containing information about children and adopters, and what sort of information might be included in it?

24. Regulations under section 13E(1) of the 2007 Act may authorise a registration organisation to act as agent for the payment or receipt of sums payable by adoption agencies to other adoption agencies, and may require adoption agencies to pay or receive such sums through the registration organisation.

25. The reason given in the Delegated Powers Memorandum does not appear to describe the effect of the power taken accurately. New section 13E appears to be a power to give a registration organisation or other person specific functions in relation to payments by adoption agencies. It does not appear to be a power to amend the registration organisation authorised to act on Ministers’ behalf. Such a power appears to be contained in section 13B, which is a power to make arrangements to authorise an organisation to carry out functions on Ministers’ behalf.

- The Committee therefore asks the Scottish Government to explain the reasons for taking the power.
Section 78(b) – Ancillary provision

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Generally negative but affirmative procedure if making textual changes to an Act.

26. Section 78(b) enables the Scottish Ministers to make such transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of any provision of the Act. The Delegated Powers Memorandum states that the power will be subject to the negative procedure and provides justification for that choice. However, it appears from the face of the Bill that the power is subject to the affirmative procedure where it is used to amend primary legislation.

27. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- To confirm that the power is subject to negative procedure other than where it makes textual amendment of the Bill or any other Act, in which case it is subject to affirmative procedure notwithstanding the alternative statement and justification provided in the Delegated Powers Memorandum?

Section 79(2) - Commencement

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Laid in accordance with section 30(2) of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010

28. Section 79(2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may appoint days on which the provisions in the Bill come into force by commencement order if they are not commenced by the Bill. Subsection (3) provides that a commencement order may include transitional, transitory or saving provision.

29. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- Whether it considers that section 79(3) enables the same transitional, transitory or saving provision to be made in a commencement order under section 79(2) as could be made in an ancillary order under section 78(b)?
• If so, why is it considered that both powers are necessary, and what considerations are likely to determine which power is used to make provision in any individual case?

30. An order under section 78(b) is subject to negative procedure (except where textual amendment of an Act is proposed, in which case affirmative procedure will apply). However, an order under section 79(2) containing transitional, transitory or saving provision would be laid only and not subject to further parliamentary procedure.

• The Committee asks the Scottish Government to explain why the difference in Parliamentary procedure is thought appropriate?

Section 28(1) – Guidance in relation to named person service

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Guidance
Parliamentary procedure: None

Section 29(1) – Directions in relation to named person service

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Direction
Parliamentary procedure: None

31. Part 4 of the Bill provides for a named person service to be made available to all children and young people, and confers various functions on service providers in connection with the provision of such a service.

32. Sections 28(1) and 29(1) confer power on the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance and directions to service providers about the exercise of those functions.

33. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

• Whether it considers that it would be appropriate to publish guidance or directions issued under the powers in sections 28(1) and 29(1), in light of the potential impact of the named person service on children or young people, and their families?

Section 39(1) – Guidance on child’s plans

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Guidance
Parliamentary procedure: None

Section 40(1) – Directions in relation to child’s plans

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
34. Part 5 of the Bill provides for a child’s plan to be created for every child with a wellbeing need which is considered to require targeted intervention. Section 39(1) enables the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance to any person in connection with that person’s functions under this Part of the Bill, while section 40(1) enables Ministers to issue directions to local authorities, health boards and directing authorities.

35. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- Whether it considers that it would be appropriate to publish guidance or directions issued under the powers in sections 39(1) and 40(1), in light of the potential impact of the exercise of functions relating to child’s plans on children and their families?

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register

Inserting section 13A(1) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007

36. New section 13A(1) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 inserted by section 68 of the Bill requires the Scottish Ministers to make arrangements for the establishment and maintenance of Scotland’s Adoption Register. Section 13B(1) provides that such arrangements may in particular authorise an organisation to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register, and provide for payments to be made to that organisation.

37. Does the Committee agree to ask the Scottish Government:

- Why it is considered appropriate to authorise a registration organisation to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register, and to provide for payments to be made to that organisation, by way of arrangements rather than in subordinate legislation?

- In what respect the power differs from the power in section 13E(1) of the 2007 Act to authorise a registration organisation or any other person to act as agent in respect of payments by adoption agencies, which power is to be exercised by way of regulations subject to the affirmative procedure?

- What the intentions are regarding publication of the proposed arrangements?

Section 74(3) – Assessment of wellbeing
38. Section 74(2) contains a list of indicators with reference to which a person required by the Bill to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person is to carry out such an assessment. Section 74(3) requires the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance on how those indicators are to be used to assess wellbeing.

- The Committee asks the Scottish Government whether it considers that it would be appropriate to publish guidance on how the wellbeing indicators are to be used by those with functions under the Bill to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person?
ANNEX B

On 17 September, the Scottish Government responded as follows:

1. This letter sets out the Scottish Government’s response to the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s letter of 10 September. The Scottish Government thanks the Committee for their comments and the opportunity to consider these matters. In doing so, this letter seeks to provide an explanation of the following matters:

Section 13(1)(b)(ii) – Reporting on children’s services plan

Given that section 13(1)(b) enables the Scottish Ministers to prescribe outcomes in relation to wellbeing of the children in an area, as regards assessment of the children’s services plan for that area, how will the power achieve its stated aim of allowing the reports to reflect any changes in children’s services or related services?

2. The Scottish Government considers that section 13(1) requires to be read in its entirety. Each local authority and health board has to prepare a report setting out the extent to which services have been provided in accordance with the children’s services plan (section 13(1)(a)) and the extent to which that provision has achieved the aims listed in section 9(2) and outcomes prescribed by Ministers by Order (section 13(1)(b)).

3. This allows the Scottish Ministers to broaden the scope of the report to cover additional material regarding outcomes to be achieved that they consider should be taken into consideration. In that respect the power to prescribe additional outcomes will reflect changes in children’s services, related services or the measures of well-being as stated in the Delegated Powers Memorandum.

How will the power be used to achieve its stated aim of reflecting “changes in the measures of wellbeing” when it is a power to prescribe outcomes in relation to wellbeing”?

4. If over time the measures of wellbeing change the order making power can be used to ensure that the report prepared under section 13(1) takes these into account. These changes can be reflected in the report.

What are the reasons for taking the power?

5. To support effective reporting on children’s services planning across Scotland, the Scottish Government believes it to be advantageous to set a series of common indicators, developed with stakeholders, that should feature in the preparation, and subsequent reporting on, children’s services plans as set out in this part of the Bill. This would build on the extensive work that has already taken place, both within Scottish Government through the National Performance Framework, and among stakeholders, particularly SOLACE, to develop common indicators that enable a national picture of the wellbeing of children and young people to be developed on a consistent basis across Scotland. The powers set out in section 13(1)(b) are intended to enable such indicators to be developed, in consultation with local authorities, health boards and other key stakeholders, as part of the preparation for the new children’s services plans under this part of the Bill.

6. While a set of indicators have not yet been defined, they would need to draw upon existing datasets, be widely recognised as being able to capture the different dimensions of ‘wellbeing’, as defined as SHANARRI in the Bill, and allow for changes to be measured over time. This would be a minimum dataset; as part of wider community planning processes, and building on the good practice already in place for local authorities developing Integrated Children’s Services Plan under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, we would anticipate that a wider set of measures would be used by local partnerships in developing the new children’s services plans. By using a common framework for considering the wellbeing of children and young people, the planning around children’s services in different parts of Scotland will have a common, but not identical, basis. How the indicators will be used specifically in the development of the plans and the proposed annual reporting against those plans will be set out in guidance through discussion with stakeholders, but it is anticipated that the measures would enable progress to be considered in each local area over the period of the children’s services plan and beyond.

7. As the power relates to the development of a common set of measures with local stakeholders, building on the existing technical work that has already been done in this area, a negative procedure has been considered more appropriate.

Given the significance of the matters to which the power relates why it considers that the negative procedure is appropriate and that more detailed parliamentary scrutiny is not required?

8. The Scottish Government considers that it is appropriate for the power to prescribe outcomes to be exercised by negative procedure. The Scottish Government does not consider that there should be a requirement to debate every Order made under this subsection given that the purpose of the Order is to add to a list of outcomes. Clearly use of negative procedure does not prevent the Order being subject to Parliamentary debate should Members have difficulties or concerns with regard to what is proposed on any occasion that the power is used.

Section 17(6) – Children’s services planning: default powers of Scottish Ministers

- Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Order
- Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative
To clarify whether the power is to constitute a joint board comprising the local authority and health boards which are failing to exercise the function, or the local authority and health boards which have been directed to exercise the function or would be so directed were such a direction considered likely to be sufficient, or either or both of the above, and whether it considers the meaning to be sufficiently clear from the wording of section 17(6)?

9. Following further discussion with COSLA, the Scottish Government now intends to seek the removal of the joint board powers from section 17 (i.e. 17(6)-(9)) by Stage 2 amendment. As a result, the power will no longer be required.

Whether, as stated in the Delegated Powers Memorandum, the power is sought to enable changes to be made to the definition of service providers, or whether it is instead intended that the power is being taken to enable schedule 2 to be modified in the future should new relevant authorities be created, or current relevant authorities’ names changed?

10. The Scottish Government confirms that this power is being taken to enable Schedule 2 to be modified in the future should new relevant authorities be created, or current relevant authorities’ names be changed.

Committee asks whether it agrees that the power at section 32(2) does not enable Ministers to add to, modify or remove any of the matters listed in section 32(1)?

11. The Scottish Government agrees that the power at section 32(2) does not enable the Scottish Ministers to add to, modify or remove any of the matters listed in section 32(1) of the Bill. The intention in taking this power is to allow additional information to that described in section 32(1) to be added to the child’s plan as appropriate, and to allow for the format of the plan to be changed as required.

To explain the reasons for taking the power, and give an example of the sort of information which might be required to be contained, or not to be contained, in a child’s plan?

12. The Scottish Government advises that this power is being taken because the information which may require to be contained in a child’s plan may change over time. There are other existing legislative requirements relating to plans for children, which may affect the information to be included in a child’s plan – for example, in respect of children who have or require a co-ordinated support plan in terms of the Education (Additional Support For Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004, or children who are “looked after” in terms of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 and, as such, who have or require a “child’s plan” in terms of the Looked After Children Regulations 2009. This power is intended to be used to specify the minimum data set in a way which takes account of these existing requirements. It also allows for changes to the child’s plan to be made in response to changes in the legislation governing these other plans.

Why does the Government consider that the negative procedure is appropriate and that more detailed parliamentary scrutiny is not required?

13. An order made under this section will allow for detail to be provided as to the content and format of a child’s plan. As noted above, the information required to be contained in a child’s plan may change over time, for example to reflect future changes in other pieces of secondary legislation. These matters relate to operational issues, and are considered too detailed to be on the face of the Bill. As noted above, an order made under this section will not allow the primary content of a child’s plan, as set out in section 32(1), to be amended. They will not change policy.

14. Additionally, there is a precedent for this type of power being subject to the negative resolution procedure, as the provisions relating to co-ordinated support plans in the Education (Additional Support For Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 allow the Scottish Ministers to make regulations as to the form and content of such plans and the relevant enabling power, at section 11(8) of the 2004 Act, is subject to the negative resolution procedure.

15. For these reasons, the Scottish Government considers that it is appropriate that the power in section 32(2) be subject to the negative procedure.

Section 37(5) – Child’s plan: management

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>The Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>Order</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary Procedure:</td>

</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

To explain why the negative procedure is considered to be appropriate, given the breadth of the power and the potential scope to use it to make substantive, as opposed to procedural, changes to the management of child’s plans, which changes may impact on children subject to child’s plans, and on their families?

16. This procedure allows the Scottish Ministers to make provision about the management of a child’s plan, including when and how a child’s plan is to be reviewed and the keeping, disclosure and destruction of child’s plans. This power is being taken in order to make provision about the detailed operational systems... which underpin the policy position as set out in the Bill. These matters are considered too detailed to be on the face of the Bill. They will not change policy. They will not amend primary legislation.

17. Additionally, there is a precedent for this type of power being subject to the negative resolution procedure, as the provisions relating to co-ordinated support plans in the Education (Additional Support For Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 allow the Scottish Ministers to make regulations as to the procedures for the review of such plans and the keeping, disclosure and destruction of such plans - the relevant enabling power, at section 11(8) of the 2004 Act, is subject to the negative resolution procedure.

18. For these reasons, the Scottish Government considers that it is appropriate that the power in section 37(5) be subject to the negative procedure.

Section 43(2)(c)(ii) – Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>The Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>Order</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary Procedure:</td>
<td>Negative</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

To explain further the choice of negative procedure, given that:

- setting the eligibility criteria for early learning and childcare may be considered a matter of substance with a potentially significant impact on children and families; and

- provision in relation to the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare (section 44) and the way in which an education authority must deliver early learning and childcare (section 47) is set out on the face of the Bill, with power to modify that provision being subject to affirmative procedure in each case.

19. The Scottish Government comments that the current policy of securing early learning and childcare for eligible children is part of a longer term ambition to increase and improve early learning and childcare for all children. There is a strong consensus and wide support for this ambition, with pressure to increase the categories of eligible children, e.g. 2 year olds living in deprivation; 2 year olds who have a disability or additional support needs; all 2 year olds.

20. The power will allow the Scottish Ministers to specify additional categories of “eligible pre-school child” in the future, which provides maximum flexibility and enables work towards this longer term ambition. The Scottish Government agrees that the setting of eligibility criteria for early learning and childcare is a matter of substance with a significant impact on children. However, that does not necessarily mean that it is appropriate to make the power subject to affirmative procedure, but it is considered that negative procedure is appropriate in the circumstances.
21. The power in section 43(2)(c)(ii) of the Bill contrasts with the powers in section 44 and 47 of the Bill. The potential effect of these powers could mean a significant change to the infrastructure and funding of early learning and childcare and therefore it is appropriate that those powers are afforded a more detailed level of scrutiny in the form of affirmative procedure.

22. In contrast, the power in section 43(2)(c)(ii) will not modify primary legislation. The power cannot be used to modify the categories of "eligible pre-school child" already listed in section 43(2)(a), (b) and (3) of the Bill; instead the power will either (i) add to the categories of eligible pre-school child as part of the longer term ambition discussed above, or (ii) provide more detail about the age range or description of such eligible pre-school children. The power therefore will be used to put more meat on the bones of the fundamental longer term policy ambition to increase and improve early learning and childcare for all children.

23. The Scottish Government would also add that there is precedent for this type of power being subject to negative resolution procedure as the precursor to the power contained in section 43(2)(c)(ii) of the Bill which was contained in section 1(1A) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 (the 1980 Act) was also subject to negative procedure (in terms of section 1(4A) of the 1980 Act).

24. For these reasons, the Scottish Government would submit that it is appropriate that the power in section 43(2)(c)(ii) be subject to negative procedure.

Section 61(3) – Provision of counselling services to parents and others

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>The Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>Order</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary Procedure:</td>
<td>Negative</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The Committee asks the Scottish Government whether there are further reasons for the choice of negative procedure.

25. When deciding on whether to use affirmative or negative procedures, the Scottish Government has sought to strike a balance between making proper use of valuable Parliamentary time and focusing a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny where appropriate. The Scottish Government’s view is that changes to the description of "eligible child" are unlikely to be controversial and consequently it would not be good use of Parliamentary time to initiate a debate on each occasion the power is used. Any change to eligibility would most likely be to extend eligibility rather than narrow it – therefore improving the provision of counselling services to parents and others and ensuring we continue to meet the needs of children and families in need. In addition, given the nature of the counselling services provided in each area, no change to provision could be effected without substantial consultation and engagement with the service providers and users across each local authority area, which would be undertaken by the Scottish Government.
The Committee asks the Scottish Government in what respect does the power in section 61(3) to specify eligibility for counselling services differ from the power in section 60(2), so as to make negative procedure more appropriate?

26. The Scottish Government’s view is that given the high level of interest in what might constitute the eligible needs of those requiring aftercare by a wide range of stakeholders (including the Scottish Parliament) and the fact that eligible needs are not otherwise defined in our Bill amendments to section 29 of the Children (Scotland) 1995 Act (as amended by Bill section 60), the affirmative Parliamentary procedure is more appropriate. The legal definition of “eligible needs” in an order made under section 29(8) of the Children (Scotland) 1995 Act will have such a large bearing on whether or not a young person will receive aftercare, it is felt that Parliamentary debate would constitute appropriate use of valuable Parliamentary time and that Parliamentary scrutiny would be useful here.

Section 64(4) – Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

The Committee asks the Scottish Government what the reasons are for the choice of negative procedure.

27. As above, the Scottish Government’s view is that changes to the description of “eligible child” are unlikely to be controversial and consequently it may not be good use of Parliamentary time to initiate a debate on each occasion the power is used. The reasons for this would be that any change would likely be to extend rather than narrow terms of eligibility – ensuring we continue to meet the needs of children living in kinship arrangements. No change to the eligibility description specified would be effected without substantial consultation and engagement with the service providers and users across each local authority area, which would be undertaken by the Scottish Government.

The Committee asks the Scottish Government in what respect does the power in section 64(4) to specify eligibility for kinship care assistance differ from the power in section 60(2) power, so as to make negative procedure more appropriate?

28. As previously noted, the Scottish Government’s view is that the changes effected by the power in 64(4) are unlikely to be controversial and would be subject of thorough consultation with the sector therefore negative procedure is felt to be most appropriate. However, given the legal definition of “eligible needs” in section 60(2) of the Bill will have such a large bearing on whether or not a young person will receive aftercare it is felt that greater Parliamentary scrutiny would be useful here making the affirmative parliamentary procedure more appropriate.
Adoption Register

The Committee notes that the Bill does not define what information the Register is to contain or make provision about what it is to be used for and asks for an explanation as to why that is the case, and why the wide powers taken in section 13A(2) to make provision about the Register are not limited or defined in any way?

29. As stated in the Delegated Powers Memorandum, given that this is likely to be a lengthy list of very detailed information, and given the information which is prescribed is likely to be amended from time to time as the adoption process changes, it is considered to be more appropriate for it to be provided for in regulations than the Bill. Although the Bill does not contain a definition as such of what information the Register is to contain, it is submitted that it is clear from the examples of the types of information which may be included in the Register which are provided for in subparagraphs (i) to (v) of section 13A(2)(a) that the information will all relate in some way to the children who are considered suitable for adoption, or to the prospective adoptive parents.

30. As to limitations on the power, we think that paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of section 13A(2) do go some way to limit the power. As stated above, it is submitted that it is clear from the examples provided for in paragraph (a) that the information which is likely to be included in the Register will be restricted to information which is relevant to adoption. It is also the Scottish Government’s view that it is clear from paragraphs (b) and (c) that the regulations will be limited to or restricted to making provision for how this information is to be stored and to other administrative matters associated with the operation of the Register.

To give the reasons for taking powers in section 13C(1), (2)(a)(ii) and (3) to use regulations under section 13A(2) to make provision about the supply of information for the Register, as no explanation of these powers is provided in the Delegated powers Memorandum?

31. Section 13C(1) provides that regulations under section 13A(2) may prescribe the information which must be provided to the Scottish Ministers by an adoption agency about children who it considers ought to be placed for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such children and persons who it considers as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such persons.

32. The reason for providing that regulations under section 13A(2) may also prescribe this information, is to enable the Scottish Ministers to specify what information must be supplied by adoption agencies for entry in the Register. As with section 13A(2) above, this will be a lengthy list of detailed information which may be amended from time to time, therefore it is considered more appropriate to provide for this in regulations as opposed to in the Bill.

33. Section 13C(2)(a)(ii) provides that regulations under section 13A(2) may also prescribe those persons whose consent must also be obtained before an adoption agency may pass information in relation to a child to the Scottish Ministers for entry in the Register.

34. The reason for providing that regulations under section 13A(2) may also prescribe this information, is to give the Scottish Ministers the flexibility to amend the list of those persons whose consent has to be obtained before information is shared with Ministers should this be required, without having to amend primary legislation.

35. Section 13C(3) provides that regulations under 13A(2) may (a) provide that information is to be provided to a registration organisation instead of to the Scottish Ministers, (b) provide for how and by when information is to be provided, (c) prescribe a fee which is to be paid by an adoption agency when providing that information and (d) prescribe the form in which consent is to be given for the purposes of subsection (2).

36. The reason for providing that regulations under section 13A(2) may also provide for the above is to enable the Scottish Ministers to prescribe the detailed processes for operating the Register and to allow changes to be made to the processes if required (without the need to amend primary legislation).

37. The procedure in relation to all of the above is affirmative, as the power to make the regulations is in section 13A(2). This allows Parliament a more detailed level of scrutiny which is considered appropriate given it relates to the establishment of a new statutory Register and how it will develop to meet any changes in the adoption process.

To explain the reasons for taking powers in section 13D(2) and (3) to use regulations under section 13A(2) to make provision about disclosure of information, as again no explanation of these powers is provided in the Delegated Powers Memorandum?

38. Section 13D(2) provides that regulations under section 13A(2) may authorise Ministers or a registration organisation to disclose information derived from the register to an adoption agency for the purposes set out in subparagraphs (i) and (ii) of paragraph (a) or to any person (whether or not established or operating in Scotland) specified in the regulations for the purposes set out in subparagraphs (i) to (v) of paragraph (b).

39. The reason for providing that regulations under section 13A(2) may also provide for the above, is to enable the Scottish Ministers to authorise disclosure of information from the Register to adoption agencies for the purposes set out in subsection (2)(a), to specify any other person that this information may be disclosed to provided it is disclosed for the purposes set out in subsection (2)(b), to set out the detailed terms and conditions for such disclosures, the detailed steps to be taken by adoption agencies receiving this information and to allow the Scottish Ministers to prescribe a fee in respect of a disclosure of information. As above, this will be detailed information which may need to be amended or added to from time to time and therefore it is not considered appropriate to make provision for this in the Bill.
To explain further in what way it is currently anticipated the Register may alter and extend beyond containing information about children and adopters, and what sort of information might be included in it?

40. There are no current plans to extend the Register beyond containing information about children and adopters (though the type of information about children and adopters required may be extended in future)

Inserting section 13E(1) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

The Committee therefore asks the Scottish Government to explain the reasons for taking the power.

41. This power enables the Scottish Ministers to authorise a registration organisation or any other person to act as an agent for the payment or receipt of sums payable by adoption agencies to other adoption agencies and may require adoption agencies to pay or receive such sums through the organisation.

42. The reason for providing that regulations under section 13A(2) may also enable the Scottish Ministers to authorise a registration organisation or other person to act as agent is because the Scottish Ministers may or may not choose to make such an authorisation (hence it is not provided for in the Bill). Further, if the Scottish Ministers do choose to exercise the power to authorise either a registration organisation or some other person to act as agent, they may wish to exercise the power subsequently to amend this authorisation and this power would then allow them to choose a different person to act as agent for the payment.

43. However it is appreciated that the power in section 13E differs from the power in section 13B(1), which is a power to make arrangements to authorise an organisation to carry out the Scottish Ministers functions relative to the Register.

Section 78(b) – Ancillary provision

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Generally negative but affirmative procedure if making textual changes to an Act.

To confirm that the power is subject to negative procedure other than where it makes textual amendment of the Bill or any other Act, in which case it is subject to affirmative procedure notwithstanding the alternative statement and justification provided in the Delegated Powers Memorandum?
44. The Scottish Government confirms that the power in section 78(b) is subject to negative procedure (by virtue of section 77(4)) other than where it makes textual amendment of the Bill or any other Act, in which case it is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 77(3)) notwithstanding the alternative statement and justification provided in the Delegated Powers Memorandum.

Whether it considers that section 79(3) enables the same transitional, transitory or saving provision to be made in a commencement order under section 79(2) as could be made in an ancillary order under section 78(b)?

45. The Scottish Government considers that whilst there is some degree of overlap between the two powers, in practical terms the power in section 79(3) is more likely to be used for simple transitional, transitory or savings provisions whilst the power in section 78(b) is more likely to be used for more complex transitional, transitory or savings provisions.

If so, why is it considered that both powers are necessary, and what considerations are likely to determine which power is used to make provision in any individual case?

46. The Scottish Government considers that it is necessary and appropriate that there should be two mechanisms for the making of transitional, transitory or savings provisions for the purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of the Bill. The commencement order power under section 79(2) and (3) of the Bill would likely be used to make simple transitional, transitory or saving provision, whilst the power in section 78(b) would be used for more complex transitional, transitory or savings provisions.

The Committee asks the Scottish Government to explain why the difference in Parliamentary procedure is thought appropriate?

47. The Scottish Government considers that, in light of our comments above, where a commencement order made under section 79 of the Bill contains simple transitional, transitory or savings provisions then it is appropriate that the order is simply laid and not subject to any further Parliamentary procedure. However, where an order is made under section 78(b) and which as mentioned above is likely to contain more complex transitional, transitory or savings provisions then it is appropriate that such an order be subject to more detailed Parliamentary scrutiny.
Section 28(1) – Guidance in relation to named person service

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Guidance
Parliamentary procedure: None

Section 29(1) – Directions in relation to named person service

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Direction
Parliamentary procedure: None

Whether it considers that it would be appropriate to publish guidance or directions issued under the powers in sections 28(1) and 29(1), in light of the potential impact of the named person service on children or young people, and their families?

48. The Scottish Government confirms that it does consider it appropriate and therefore intends to publish guidance and, if relevant, directions under the powers in sections 28(1) and 29(1) of the Bill.

Section 39(1) – Guidance on child’s plans

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Guidance
Parliamentary procedure: None

Section 40(1) – Directions in relation to child’s plans

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Direction
Parliamentary procedure: None

Whether it considers that it would be appropriate to publish guidance or directions issued under the powers in sections 39(1) and 40(1), in light of the potential impact of the exercise of functions relating to child’s plans on children and their families?

49. The Scottish Government confirms that it does consider it appropriate and as such intends to publish guidance and, if relevant, directions under the powers in sections 39(1) and 40(1) of the Bill.

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register

Inserting section 13A(1) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Arrangement
Parliamentary procedure: None
Why it is considered appropriate to authorise a registration organisation to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register, and to provide for payments to be made to that organisation, by way of arrangements rather than in subordinate legislation?

50. There is an organisation which currently operates a non-statutory adoption register in Scotland and the Scottish Ministers may consider it to be appropriate to authorise this organisation to carry out their functions in relation to the Register going forward, given the organisation has the relevant skills and experience which may be required. For this reason, it is considered that this authorisation would be more appropriate to be made by arrangement as opposed to by subordinate legislation.

51. It is not considered appropriate to provide for payments to the registration organisation to be in subordinate legislation given that funding arrangements are already in place for the non-statutory register and therefore that these may be used as a basis for the arrangements for the funding of the new register.

In what respect the power differs from the power in section 13E(1) of the 2007 Act to authorise a registration organisation or any other person to act as agent in respect of payments by adoption agencies, which power is to be exercised by way of regulations subject to the affirmative procedure?

52. At present there is no requirement for adoption agencies to use the non-statutory adoption register and there is no organisation or person which currently acts as agent in relation to payments by adoption agencies. Once use of the statutory register becomes a requirement, there may or may not be a need for the Scottish Ministers to authorise an organisation or person to act as agent, although it is not currently envisaged that this power will be used. If it is used, as previously noted, the Scottish Ministers may subsequently seek to amend the person acting as agent.

What the intentions are regarding publication of the proposed arrangements?

53. It is expected that the details will be made available on the website of Scotland's Adoption Register.

Section 74(3) – Assessment of wellbeing

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Guidance
Parliamentary procedure: None

The Committee asks the Scottish Government whether it considers that it would be appropriate to publish guidance on how the wellbeing indicators are to be used by those with functions under the Bill to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person?

54. The Scottish Government confirms that it does consider guidance on wellbeing indicators an appropriate mechanism to set out further detail, therefore it is the intention for guidance to be published.
Finance Committee

Report on The Financial Memorandum of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

The Committee reports to the Education and Culture Committee as follows—

INTRODUCTION

1. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”) was introduced in the Parliament on 17 April 2013.

2. The Policy Memorandum (PM) states that the Bill’s intention is to make Scotland the best place for children to grow up in by “putting children and young people at the heart of planning and delivery of services and ensuring their rights are respected across the public sector.”

3. Under Standing Orders Rule 9.6, the lead committee at Stage 1 is required, among other things, to consider and report on the Bill’s Financial Memorandum (FM). In doing so, it is required to consider any views submitted to it by the Finance Committee (“the Committee”).

4. Rule 9.3.2 of the Standing Orders sets out the requirements for the FM accompanying a Bill. It states that—

“A Bill shall on introduction be accompanied by a Financial Memorandum which shall set out the best estimates of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the provisions of the Bill would give rise, best estimates of the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise, and an indication of the margins of uncertainty in such estimates.”

5. In June 2013, the Committee agreed to seek written evidence on the FM (available at page 36 of the Explanatory Notes) from a range of organisations potentially affected by the Bill.

6. A total of 24 submissions were received and these can be accessed on the Committee’s website via the following link: Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill - Written Evidence on FM.

1 Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Policy Memorandum, paragraph 2
7. At its meeting on 18 September 2013 the Committee took evidence on the FM from three separate panels of witnesses and the Official Report of the evidence session can be found on the Parliament’s website here: Finance Committee, Official Report, 18 September 2013

Overview

8. The FM states that the Bill’s primary purpose is to “address the challenges faced by children and young people who experience poor outcomes throughout their lives.” A table providing an overview of the Bill’s provisions can be found on pages 36 - 38 of the FM.

9. The FM states that “there have been methodological challenges in estimating the costs of some provisions,” explaining that “these challenges in large part relate to estimating how the preventative approach set out here will result in future avoided costs.”

10. The majority of costs are expected to fall on local authorities. Total costs in the first year of implementation of the Bill’s provisions are estimated at £79.1m, peaking at £138.9m in 2016-17 then falling back to £108.9m by 2019-20. However, the Government subsequently informed the Committee, in a letter from the Minister for Children and Young People dated 12 September 2013, that it intended to provide funding over and above that indicated in the FM in respect of certain provisions within the Bill.

11. The Bill’s estimated costs largely relate to two particular proposals, the provision of a “Named Person” for every child in Scotland and the extension of early learning and childcare provision for three and four year olds and some two year olds. Net savings are also anticipated as a result of proposals relating to kinship care, family therapy and counselling services.

12. In written evidence COSLA stated that the Bill was “a complex piece of legislation with significant implications for local authorities. The accuracy of the Scottish Government’s analysis and therefore the funding that would be made available depends on a large number of assumptions that will not be fully tested until the Bill is implemented.”

13. COSLA further stated that, in its view, there were “several areas” of the Bill for which the Government’s assumptions (and therefore the financial implications for local authorities) were “not robust enough.”

14. When asked to explain how it had arrived at its assumptions, the Bill team acknowledged “that the availability of base evidence is quite variable across the range of policy areas covered in the Bill.” It explained that it had “tried to get the best estimates that we could and tested them quite extensively\textsuperscript{8} with COSLA and with other stakeholders. However, it also noted that the best available evidence was “patchy in some places and non-existent in others.”\textsuperscript{9} It therefore stated that those estimates “could of course be looked at again in the light of further evidence from authorities and health boards as they prepare for and implement the provisions.”\textsuperscript{10}

15. The Bill team went on to explain that it had tested the assumptions relating to different parts of the Bill in different ways and highlighted that, as it had had to estimate averages over Scotland as a whole, “you would not expect every area to fit in with the national average.”\textsuperscript{11}

16. COSLA noted that it had received confirmation from the Government that it intended to “fully fund the requirements of the Bill”.\textsuperscript{12} However, COSLA also pointed out that the Bill’s implementation period was expected to stretch beyond the current spending review period and beyond the life of the current parliament stating that “the commitment made by this administration to fully fund the Bill must be honoured in future years by whatever Government is in power and kept under on-going review.”\textsuperscript{13}

17. When asked by the Committee to confirm that the Government would fully fund the costs of the Bill to local authorities, and whether it would commit to doing so in circumstances where they might exceed those figures in the FM, the Bill Team stated—

“The Government has promised to fully fund the additional costs. The financial memorandum represents our estimate of additional costs as at earlier this year. Of course, more information will come out, now and as we proceed towards implementation of the measures, and the Government is committed to ensuring that additional costs are properly assessed as they arise and are funded as appropriate.”\textsuperscript{14}

18. It should be noted that both the Committee and the respondents to its call for evidence were generally supportive of the principles underlying the Bill\textsuperscript{15}. Indeed, the Committee’s predecessor in the third session stated in its Report on Preventative Spending—

“The Committee agrees...that the focus for all decision makers, including the Scottish Parliament and the Scottish Government, should be on the more effective implementation of early years policy. The Committee recommends that both the Scottish Government and the Scottish Parliament take the lead in delivering a radical step change in the existing approach to early years intervention.”\textsuperscript{16}

19. However, the Committee has a number of concerns in relation to the robustness of the estimates and assumptions upon which the FM is predicated and these are discussed below.

GETTING IT RIGHT FOR EVERY CHILD (GIRFEC)

Named Person Role

20. The Bill formally creates a “Named Person” for every child in Scotland from birth until they leave school and the PM states that he or she “will usually be a practitioner from a health board or an education authority, and someone whose job will mean they are already working with the child.”\textsuperscript{17}

Costs in Relation to Training

21. In order to deliver the Named Person role, education and health service staff will require training, creating a requirement to backfill staff while this training takes place.

22. In order to estimate training costs, the FM assumes that the Named Person role for school age children would be undertaken by senior staff within schools (although the Bill itself does not specify that this should be the case). This assumption has implications for the backfilling costs as senior staff have lower frontline teaching commitments. The FM estimates that the total cost of providing teaching backfill for two days’ of training to all Head Teachers, Deputy Head Teachers and Principal Teachers in Scotland would total £398,097.

23. The FM states that health boards would incur “similar costs”\textsuperscript{18} to those incurred by local authorities for school-age children for children aged between 0 and 5. It estimates that the development of training materials would cost approximately £300,000 in 2014-15 and that backfill costs covering two days’ training for all midwives, health visitors and public health nurses would result in a total cost of £1,088,949 (based on an estimated average hourly rate of £19.04).

24. In written evidence, the RCN suggested that staff other than those listed in the FM would also require training, stating that “the figures must reflect the needs of the wider team of staff nurses, nursery nurses, health care support workers and administrative staff who will also require protected time for training.”\textsuperscript{19} Similarly, the City of Edinburgh Council stated that it “would expect staff other than teachers to also require training which will incur additional costs.”\textsuperscript{20}

25. The FM assumes that the costs detailed above relating to training for both local authority and health board staff would be one-off costs falling in 2015-16. Whilst it acknowledges that such training would also be required in future years, it states that

\textsuperscript{16} Scottish Parliament Finance Committee. 1st Report, 2011 (Session 4), paragraph 36

\textsuperscript{20} City of Edinburgh Council. Written submission, paragraph 25
“going forward this training will then form part of standard Continued Professional Development (CPD), and be absorbed as part of the on-going training requirements of these organisations.”

26. However, some respondents questioned this assumption in written evidence with COSLA, for example, stating that “the suggestion that the on-going training can be absorbed into CPD is unrealistic” as it would displace other training on CPD days and require additional time.

27. In oral evidence, the City of Edinburgh Council stated—

“The one training issue that arises for the council is that funding to train the named person on GIRFEC is focused purely on education staff and, in addition, is not recurring; there is an assumption that it will be absorbed into overall continuous professional development activity across the council after the first year.”

28. The RCN stated that “NHS Education for Scotland needs to come up with a proper costed education and training strategy, which might last a number of years.”

29. NHS Lothian stated “the big issue for us is backfill, which has a cost implication, for freeing up staff to undertake the training, especially as we do not have the people to backfill with. Again, it is not just about the money, but about having capacity within the system.”

30. When asked whether the FM’s assumption that the costs of training backfill within the NHS was likely to be subsumed after one year, NHS Lothian responded—

“there will always be on-going training costs, as we have staff turnover. Perhaps the training will not be as intensive as the initial training, depending on how the bill pans out and what is required. We try to build training costs into our workforce planning as part of NHS Lothian’s financial plan, but I do not think that the training costs will go away. We will always have to do multi-agency training, and I think that it will be in a menu of wider training.”

31. Commenting on the evidence, the Bill Team explained its assumption was that a specific roll-out of training would be required in the first year. It then stated, “for every year thereafter, we assume that - and we have tested this with a number of stakeholders - it will be integrated into existing continuing professional development, as is the case with training for additional support for learning needs under the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004.”

32. The Bill Team went on to describe how it expected that existing CPD courses for education staff would need to change in order to integrate the way in which the Named Person should work rather than the training being undertaken in addition to their existing CPD. (3002) It also commented with regard to NHS staff, “it is not as though a lot of this is new; there should already be a significant awareness of GIRFEC and its issues.”

33. When questioned about evidence submitted to the lead committee by the Association of Headteachers and Deputies in Scotland which stated “we are unconvinced that the training costs identified are adequate for successful implementation of this legislation,” the Bill Team suggested that it would “go back to people who had implemented GIRFEC” noting that the City of Edinburgh Council had implemented the approach and “did not seem to have issues about a recurring significant additional cost.” It went on to suggest “I imagine that a national body is required to reflect the diversity of views that come forward, some of which are from folk who do not necessarily know how the GIRFEC training will be put into practice. Other views come from people who have had experience in implementing GIRFEC, so they can say how it works.”

34. The Committee notes that there were a number of concerns from witnesses with regard to the training costs in relation to the formal creation of “Named Persons”. The Committee invites the lead committee to raise the following issues with the Cabinet Secretary—

- That staff other than those listed in the FM may require training and costs have not been provided for this;
- To provide details of the consultation with stakeholders on integrating training within existing CPD courses;
- COSLA’s view that the suggestion that on-going training can be absorbed into CPD is unrealistic;
- Whether, given the evidence received by the Finance Committee, the Government remains content that the training costs identified in the FM are adequate.

Costs for Local Authorities in Relation to the Delivery of Named Person Duties

35. With regard to local authorities, the FM notes that “there will be costs in carrying out these duties as part of a system change.” It assumes that additional costs would be non-recurring (once the system has “bedded in”), suggesting that the additional hours would be accommodated through efficiency savings. It predicts that such costs would be incurred by schools in relation to an estimated 10% of children and young people who would require additional support from local authority services over and above that already provided (estimated at an additional 3.5 hours per year).

36. The FM estimates that this would amount to a total additional cost in teacher staffing time in the first year of £7,814,691 before giving examples of the efficiencies and benefits that have arisen from the adaptation of the GIRFEC approach by certain local authorities, including Highland and Fife in paragraphs 53 - 54. The Committee notes, however, that the FM does not provide any details of the financial savings arising from these efficiencies.

32 Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 51

37. The costings are based on the assumption that 10% of school age children would require an additional 3.5 hours of support per year. It should be noted that the costings would vary considerably should the actual number of hours differ from the 3.5 hours assumed. The FM does not appear to provide any indication of the margins of uncertainty in respect of these estimates as required by Rule 9.3.2 of the Standing Orders (although in relation to some other provisions within the Bill, ranges of costs based on alternative assumptions have been provided).

38. The costs noted above are only applied in 2016-17, as it is assumed that they would be off-set by savings resulting from the early intervention approach in subsequent years. The FM cites evidence from the Highland Pathfinder evaluation which found tangible benefits as a result of the GIRFEC approach. However, these appear to relate to the GIRFEC approach as a whole, rather than to the Named Person role specifically. Also, they are not presented in financial terms, so it is difficult to assess how they might compare to the costs presented for the Named Person role. A number of local authorities questioned this assumption in written evidence with Scottish Borders Council, for example, stating that in its view—

“additional funding to support the Named Person needs to be available for more than one fiscal year. The Highland Pathfinder showed it took several years to implement the cultural changes required within and across organisations in order to implement GIRFEC. Scottish Borders Council believes funding requires to be available over three consecutive years starting in 2014/15 to ensure the successful establishment of the Named Person role.”

39. Similarly, COSLA commented that: “the assumption…that some form of system change will accommodate these costs for years 2 onwards is speculative and basically assumes that £7.8m can be saved from elsewhere in the system to accommodate this”. It further stated that it was “not the experience of some local authorities that implementing GIRFEC is reducing the number of meetings or administration.”

40. In response to questioning on this point the Bill Team stated that COSLA had admitted in evidence to the Education and Culture Committee “that the area is difficult and complex, so there is no suggestion that there is an alternate methodology or better way of doing it - COSLA recognises that there is a lot of uncertainty.”

41. The Bill Team then pointed towards its work with areas that have already been implementing GIRFEC such as Highland Council. It noted the evidence from City of Edinburgh Council which was broadly in agreement with it and stated that it had

---

33 Scottish Borders Council. Written submission, paragraph 7
34 COSLA. Written submission, paragraph 7
35 COSLA. Written submission, paragraph 8 tested its estimates with other local authorities including Fife, Angus and South Ayrshire. It further pointed out that written evidence had been received from Falkirk, Fife and South Ayrshire Councils and contended that none of them had “necessarily contested the underlying assumption about the way in which the savings kick in relatively quickly.”

42. Whilst the City of Edinburgh Council had explained in oral evidence that, as it had already largely implemented the Named Person provisions, it did not consider it a major issue, it expressed “some concern” that the funding was not recurring.

43. When asked whether it would be willing to review its estimates in the face of opinions contesting its estimates, the Bill Team explained that it had to—“draw the estimates that we have made from a logical basis. If councils are able to put forward a series of arguments that clearly undermine that basis, as opposed to just saying “We don’t agree” - I think they have to say something a lot more substantive than that - we will want to look back at the assumptions.

A number of the areas are difficult to estimate, so we certainly remain open to having such discussions. We would want to test all suggestions with people who have real experience in implementing GIRFEC, as opposed to people who have a speculative - if I may put it that way - concern about what things might be like in their area and what they think implementation might involve.”

44. It expanded on this point, stating—

“We would not want to change assumptions on financial assessments on the basis of submissions without a good deal of appropriate evidence to demonstrate where the costs are rising...The Government has said that it will fund fully the cost to local authorities. That will have to be kept under review as we implement the provisions. We should get a lot more information as we get closer to the implementation of the bill, not just through the GIRFEC implementation programme board but through developing the regulations. It is a constantly changing picture. Funding decisions will obviously have to depend on the information that is available at the time. That information will move us on from the point at which the financial memorandum was produced.”

45. The Committee is concerned that the FM does not provide any details at paragraphs 53 and 54 of the financial savings from the benefits of implementing GIRFEC and invites the lead committee to seek this information from Ministers.

46. The Committee is surprised that the FM anticipates local authority costs relating to the “Named Person” provisions to be incurred for one year only and that no net costs are predicted from the second year after implementation onwards, and invites the lead committee to raise this with Ministers.

38 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee. Official Report, 18 September 2013, Col 2949
41 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee. Official Report, 18 September 2013, Col 3004

47. The Committee notes that these efficiency savings would appear to relate to the implementation of GIRFEC as a whole and invites the lead committee to seek clarification as to what savings have been realised specifically in relation to the Named Person role.

48. The Committee is also concerned that no margins of uncertainty appear to have been provided for the assumption that 10% of children and young people would require additional support of 3.5 hours per year and invites the lead committee to seek this information from Ministers.

Costs for Health Boards in Relation to the Delivery of Named Persons Duties

49. With regard to the NHS, the FM states that the functions of a Named Person “will require some additional activity for midwives, health visitors and public health nurses.”\(^{42}\) The estimates as to how much additional time would be required are based on the assumption that 80% of children would require “marginal support”, 2% would have complex needs and would already be receiving significant support (thereby incurring no additional costs in relation to the named person), with 18% having emerging or significant needs resulting in an additional 10 hours support per child per year, reducing to between three and eight hours as the system beds in. These costings assume that the preventative approach will result in reducing resource requirements over time (falling from £16.3m in 2016-17 to £10.8m by 2019-20). In the case of the NHS, the costs are assumed to be ongoing (in contrast to the approach taken for local authority costs) as they are not expected to be fully offset by efficiency savings.

50. The FM also estimates that a further £1,949,519 would be required during the first year only for “additional administrative support” costs arising to local authorities from the “handling of any additional information sharing between the Named Person and other practitioners...as well as administration relating to the Child’s Plan”\(^{43}\). As noted by the RCN in written evidence, the FM adopts a different approach with regard to NHS staff, whom it does not consider would require additional administrative support.

51. In written evidence, NHS Lothian stated that it estimated that the actual cost of the Named Person service would be greater than was stated in the FM. It also suggested that additional recruitment would be required in order to fully deliver the role and that the assumed hourly rate of £19.04 for midwives and health visitors on which the estimated costs were based was an underestimate which should be “more in the region of £21 per hour.”\(^{44}\)

52. The RCN expressed concerns relating to the FM’s expected rapid reduction in additional hours required to address the needs of children with emerging or significant concerns, stating “if the approach is effective there may be a small reduction over time, but currently health visitors have no capacity to engage

\(^{42}\) Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 59
\(^{43}\) Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 55
\(^{44}\) NHS Lothian. Written submission, paragraph 28 effectively with families and communities in a way that models the preventative approach.”

53. In oral evidence, the RCN expanded on this point, stating that it was—

“based on an assumption that by 2018-19 some children will be being born into families with whom the named person is familiar, which will lead to a significant reduction in additional work. We think that that considerably overstates the efficiencies that will be achieved in that way. Another assumption is that less time will be spent dealing with families who are in crisis. It is a huge assumption that within two years there will be far fewer families in crisis. There will be families in crisis for many years to come.”

54. Whilst NHS Lothian expressed confidence that the approach would achieve savings, it stated that “they are more likely to occur in services for later in the life course. To truly change the culture and achieve the savings later in the life course, we think that we need to invest more heavily in midwifery services and health visitor services.”

55. NHS Lothian went on to suggest that the estimated savings set out in the FM might be realised over a longer time scale stating, “perhaps in 10 to 15 years, when we have been really effective with our early intervention and with our adult programmes to address substance misuse et cetera, we will see a changing picture, and health visitors will need to do less. However, the assumption is a bit flawed and the more we have discussed it following the publication of the policy memorandum, the more we have picked up that view from our peers throughout Scotland.”

56. When questioned by the Committee on its predictions that the costs to the NHS of working with the 20% of children with significant issues would reduce from £10.2m in 2016-17 to £5.3m in 2018-19, the Bill Team explained its belief that “that will be a reflection of the impact of early intervention and the intensive work that will be put in at the start of the roll-out of the named person role. For example, the zero to one-year-olds will receive quite intensive support in 2016-17, but we estimate that by 2019-20 they will not require as much intensive support. That is reflected in the tapering of the costs.”

57. In response to further questioning on this point from the Committee, the Bill team defended its predictions, explaining that as the figures contained in the FM related to additional hours spent with such children, it “would expect that to bear some fruit in the following year...as those kids become one-year olds.” When asked why it anticipated a reduction in the amount of time that would require to be spent with new-borns in this category, from an average of ten to eight hours within two years of implementation, it explained that its expectation was that, as the role “gets bedded-in over time” and as midwives have a more active role pre-birth, savings would develop and such “intensive involvement” would no longer be required.

49 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee. Official Report, 18 September 2013, Col 2998
50 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee. Official Report, 18 September 2013, Col 2991

58. The Bill Team went on to explain that “the impact of getting in early is in ensuring that the problems - this is the whole principle of having the named person - that people would not necessarily have spotted previously can be recognised and addressed quickly. We would expect that impact to be reflected pretty immediately. On average, we would expect to see benefits for those kids in successive years as they get older.”

59. Pointing towards the evidence from the Highland pathfinder initiative, the Bill Team stated “We tested our assumptions in areas that have gone very far forward with GIRFEC, such as Highland, which has developed it in pathfinder. We believe that our assumptions are reasonable. We tested them with managers who are responsible for taking forward the implementation of GIRFEC across NHS boards. The feedback that we got from them is that they are not unreasonable assumptions.”

60. When asked for further examples of bodies on which its estimates were based, the Bill Team referred to NHS managers with responsibility for the implementation of GIRFEC. It went on to acknowledge, in response to the point that evidence from the NHS witnesses appeared to contradict this position, that there would be contrary views on what was a complex issue before stating—

“I come back to talking about the basis on which we drew the estimates, which was largely the experience of those areas that have pioneered GIRFEC, and assumptions on the way in which early intervention would kick in. I have not heard evidence today that specifically challenges that; the earlier witnesses just said that they would see gains being developed during seven or 15 years, which was one of the expressions used earlier. I would find that surprising for an individual child’s life. We tested those assumptions out with a specific group that was responsible for implementing GIRFEC. That is the basis on which we have derived those costs.”

61. NHS Lothian stated in oral evidence that in order for its health visitors to truly capture the needs of individual families, “it will require a significant amount of their time; we estimate about five hours per family”. It went on to express concerns that it was not sufficiently staffed to meet current demand and predicted, “we think that we will, as we improve our intervention in early years, require more staff in order to be more effective in that intervention.” Referring to investment in aspects of the health visitor system, it went on to state that “even that additionality will not be enough to enable full implementation of the named person approach in the timeline that is envisaged.”

57 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee. Official Report, 18 September 2013, Col 2972
62. Highlighting the importance of adequate resourcing in order to achieve the Bill’s aims, the RCN stated in oral evidence—

“Proper resourcing is absolutely essential because if we are raising expectations with families to the effect that they will have the support of a named midwife, health visitor or teacher, we have to put in place the resources to support the professionals who deliver that service, or we are setting them up to fail. That is why the resources behind the bill are so important.”

63. When questioned on this point, the Bill team explained that, as health boards will be at different stages of implementation—

“it is difficult to be able to say exactly how health boards will move forward on this, the areas where significant expansion might be needed in the number of health visitors and the areas where, because they have already implemented the named person service to a significant extent, changeover might not be as major an issue as it will be for others.”

64. The Bill team further stated that the Government was “engaging with stakeholders to get a sense of the issues or problems that might be emerging” and that it had set up a programme board to monitor implementation and feedback information, including “where the problems are emerging and, indeed, what the resource implications are going to be.”

65. The Committee is concerned about the extent of the disparity between the evidence from health bodies and the Bill team in relation to the estimated costs and savings to health boards arising from the delivery of the Named Person role. In particular, the Committee invites the lead committee to seek the following information from Ministers—

- The view of NHS Lothian that the assumed hourly rate for midwives and health visitors should be in the region of £21 per hour;

- A detailed explanation as to why the time horizons for the savings to be made from preventative measures are much shorter in the FM than that predicted by many of the health professionals who gave evidence to the Committee;

- A detailed breakdown of the financial savings which have been made by those NHS bodies who have begun to implement GIRFEC and against which the bill team tested the assumptions in the FM;

- Details of the extent to which the Named Person role is already being implemented in different areas and how/whether this will be taken into account in the funding provided for implementation.
66. The most costly of the Bill’s proposals are the plans relating to early learning and childcare. The Bill proposes to increase the statutory provision of pre-school education from the current 475 hours per year to 600 hours per year for 3 and 4 year olds and for 2 year olds who are (or have been since turning 2) looked after or subject to a kinship care order. The estimated costs, which fall solely to local authorities, peak at £108.1m in 2016-17, falling back to £96.2m in 2018-19.

67. On 12 September 2013, the Minister for Children and Young People wrote to the Convener of the Finance Committee outlining plans to increase funding in respect of the extension of early learning and childcare provision. The letter set out plans to increase funding by £4.2m per year. The additional funding relates to the costs of providing early learning/childcare to two year olds who are looked after or subject to a kinship care order (additional £3.4m), and to the costs of uprating payments to partner providers (additional £0.8m). However, details of how the revised figures related to the original calculations set out in the FM or why this additional funding is required were not provided.

68. All costs in the FM relate to estimated additional costs over and above the costs currently incurred by local authorities in the delivery of 475 hours of pre-school provision. This section of the FM specifically states that all costs are shown at 2011-12 prices. As the basis for costs elsewhere in the FM is not explicitly stated it is unclear whether this approach has been taken consistently across all aspects of the FM.

69. The FM states that “local authorities will have full flexibility to develop and re-configure services and provision to meet local needs and circumstances” and that the range of approaches will be “reflected in incrementally increasing revenue costs, front loaded in the first three years with capital to adapt or expand accommodation in response to local consultations.” It goes on to state that “the main additional costs arising…will be staff costs.” Once the capital costs end in 2017-18, staff costs account for around three-quarters of the total costs.

70. The FM states that “working closely with COSLA and individual local authorities, the additional staff costs associated with a range of patterns of delivery have been estimated.” It goes on to note, however, that “the incremental increase in flexibility is more complex to estimate than just additional hours” and points out “that models of flexibility used have been indicative examples developed by local authorities in advance of consultation with local populations” before stating that it had had “sought to mitigate this uncertainty by working closely with COSLA and others on their models and estimates of anticipated costs, and by building in an incremental approach which allows re-configuration of services in response to consultation which is planned and manageable.”

62 Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 76
63 Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 76
64 Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 75
71. The FM further states that “these models are only examples and, therefore, costs are indicative,” as “the final models developed by local authorities will vary according to locally identified need and cannot be anticipated in advance of consultation.” However, it does not provide details of the basis for the costings presented or present any alternative scenarios. It does state, however, that five different models “were analysed for staff implications and costs” although limited detail is provided on these models other than to say that local authorities were asked to cost five different options (reflecting the options set out in the consultation paper, A Scotland for Children, paragraph 101). East Renfrewshire Council acknowledged that “it was inevitably going to be a difficult exercise to cost” but also noted that “Given the range of models, it would have been thought that a range of costs per year would also have been determined”.

72. Staff costs increase over time and this appears to be the reflection of an “incremental” approach as more costly, flexible models are introduced over time (or a combination of model is offered). However, it is not clear from the FM what assumptions have been made in respect of implementation, or what effect different implementation options might have on the costs. It is unclear whether the modelling takes into account population projections over the period concerned.

73. In its written submission, GIRFEMCP commented that: “Midlothian Council is in the process of carrying out an options appraisal, including costing, for the increase in early learning and childcare hours and these estimates come in significantly below the figures in the FM (once they have been extrapolated using the population aged under five in Midlothian as a proportion of the Scottish population).” Scottish Borders Council “anticipated that the figures quoted in the FM (based on this council’s proportionate share of the national Grant Aided Expenditure) will be sufficient to cover additional costs”, but noted that it had “not agreed their delivery model so it is difficult to give a definitive response at this stage”. The City of Edinburgh Council stated that the costs for early learning/childcare were “accurately reflected based on our understanding of the requirements of the legislation” but cautioned that any requirement for greater flexibility for parents could have implications for delivery costs.

Partner Provider Uprating

74. The FM notes that “broadly, local authorities secure around 40% of provision through independent, private and third sector partners” and anticipates similar levels of usage in the future. It goes on to estimate the hourly costs for such facilities to be £4.09 per hour per child although this does not appear to reflect actual payments to providers at present and the FM refers to a lack of consistency of approach across local authorities. The £4.09 figure is based on a recommended floor level for payments to providers set in 2007, uprated to reflect inflation over the period since 2007. However, the NDNA noted in its written submission that its most recent survey of nurseries had found that: “the mean hourly rate nurseries receive for funded pre-school places from their local authority is £3.28.”

75. In oral evidence the NDNA stated—

“the cost of the service is £4.09 an hour for the 500 hours. Edinburgh is currently being given £3.26 an hour for the 500 hours. Glasgow, which now contractually has to provide 600 hours, receives £2.72 per child. The figure of £4.09 has evidently been based on the advisory floor, which ceased to exist several years ago, with an inflationary link added into it.”

76. Pointing towards increased overheads the NDNA went on to express concerns that these levels of funding would impact on the sustainability of some businesses within the sector. This point had been acknowledged in the FM which stated that the NDNA “and some partner providers have raised the issue of unsustainable funding levels for the majority of partner providers placements, especially if the patterns of placements change to full or half days.”

77. In a letter from the Minister for Children and Young People to the Convener of the Finance Committee on 12 September 2013, the Scottish Government set out its intention to provide £2m rather than £1.2m in respect of the costs of partner provider uprating (Scottish Government, 2013). This appears to reflect a change in assumptions about the levels of payments to partner providers currently in place, although no further details were provided. It is unclear how the Scottish Government would intend to ensure that this additional funding is passed on to partner providers.

78. In response to questioning on this point, the NDNA welcomed the increase but suggested that the Government should take steps to ensure that any additional funding to local authorities in respect of partner provision is distributed to partner providers, suggesting that the reintroduction of the advisory floor would be the recommended way of achieving this. However, it went on to clarify in response to further questioning, that it did not advocate the reintroduction of an advisory floor of £4.09 but that a figure of £4.51 (uprated annually in line with inflation) would be more reasonable on condition that the funds were “delivered to partner providers equally and fairly.”

79. The Bill team, however, explained that the Bill contained no mechanism to ring-fence funding to ensure it was passed on to partner providers by local authorities stating, that at present, “Government policy is not to dictate to local authorities how they should spend their money but to provide money within the overall envelope of their single outcome agreement.” In response to further questioning on this theme it stated that “it is a matter for local authorities between them to arrange for the provision of early learning and childcare, so it is not something that we are getting involved in.”

80. When asked to expand on this the Bill team explained that the Government was “putting an obligation on local authorities to ensure that there is provision” for 600 hours of early learning/childcare stating “it is up to local authorities to decide how they will deliver on that obligation, but we expect them to deliver on it properly and we will provide the funding to help them to do that.”

81. It also pointed out that a duty would be placed on local authorities to report on how they had delivered all their children’s services.

81. The Committee would welcome further details from the Government on the rationale underlying the increased funding for partner provider uprating as announced on 12 September 2013 and whether any of the assumptions underlying the FM have been altered in order to arrive at the new figure.

82. The Committee is surprised that the funding for uprating partner provider payments is based on the level of an advisory floor from 2007 updated in line with inflation rather than the actual amounts paid by local authorities to partner providers. The NDNA has provided figures which suggest that the nurseries are paid an average of £3.28 rather than £4.09 and that Glasgow pays only £2.72 per hour.

83. The Committee invites the lead committee to ask why the 2007 figure is being used to allocate additional funding and whether this means that the Government now supports an advisory floor of £4.09 per hour. Further, the Committee invites the lead committee to question whether the funding being provided is sufficient to enable local authorities to pay this rate and whether this rate is considered to be sustainable.

84. The Committee invites the lead committee to ask Ministers whether the funding for partner provider payments will be reduced in future years if some local authorities continue to pay considerably less than £4.09 per hour.

85. The Committee recommends that the Government requires local authorities to report annually on spending in relation to pre-school provision, in order that it can ensure that the anticipated levels of investment are being achieved. This should include details of expenditure on partner providers, including hourly rates paid. This information should be published.

Additional provision for looked after/kinship care 2 year olds
86. The FM provides for an additional £1.1m per year to fund the extra provision for two year olds who are looked after or in kinship care. The Minister for Children and Young People subsequently wrote to the Committee stating:

“Following helpful discussions with COSLA we have decided to increase the amount allocated to local government for this priority area by £3.4 million to a total of £4.5 million. This is to reflect the importance we place on the early learning and childcare agenda and to integrate monies previously provided to support looked after 2 year olds via the Early Years Change Fund.\textsuperscript{82}

87. Whilst welcoming this increase funding in oral evidence, GIRFEMCP suggested that it was “quite concerning”, stating “if one element of costs can go up fourfold after they have been thought about more, can other elements of costs do the same? If they could, the shortfall would be significant.”\textsuperscript{83}

88. When asked to clarify the reasons for this increase, the Bill team explained that the original estimate related to additional hours for looked-after two-year-olds whilst the figure in the letter related to “the overall funding position for looked-after two-year-olds in its entirety.” It went on to explain that—

“At the moment, there is an element of funding that flows to local government through the early years change fund. In arriving at the figure of £4.5 million, ministers sought to address overall costing issues with the provision for looked-after two-year-olds in its entirety, rather than the additional hours that are set out in the financial memorandum.”\textsuperscript{84}

89. The Committee invites the lead committee to seek clarification as to why the £3.4m which appears to have been previously allocated to local authorities through the Early Years Change Fund is now being added to the £1.1m provided for in the FM.

90. The Committee also invites the lead committee to seek clarification as to whether the £3.4m represents additional funding, or just a realignment of existing funding.

91. The Committee would welcome further detail from the Government on the rationale underlying the increased funding for two years olds as announced on 12 September 2013, and clarification of whether any of the assumptions underlying the FM have been revised in order to arrive at the new figure.

Capital costs
92. The FM states that “capital costs will be required to adapt existing provision for additional hours and associated accommodation needs” and that its “estimates are based on Scottish Futures Trust metrics for primary schools” specifying “an allowance of 7.5 square metres per child at a cost of £2,350 per square metre.”\textsuperscript{85}

93. In written evidence, East Renfrewshire Council commented, “There is not much detail on how the total capital of £30m per year for 2014-2017 has been determined”\textsuperscript{86} and that “the starting point for each authority will be different based on existing capacity, potential development, availability of partnership provider places and model of delivery to implement the flexible 600 hours of provision agreed with stakeholders. It is therefore difficult to ascertain at a local level if the allocation of this will be sufficient to meet local needs.”

94. When asked to expand upon how the predicted costs had been arrived at, the Bill team stated “we do not have a baseline survey of what infrastructure is currently in place; nor do we know how local authorities will decide to increase capacity” (i.e. whether this would be done through new build or by extending existing buildings). (3006) As its assumptions had not been based on “a thorough and detailed assessment”, the Bill team accepted that “this is one area in which the estimate represents a best guess.”

95. The Committee notes that the FM states that while the estimate is necessarily limited “it has been tested with a number of local authorities.”

The Committee invites the lead committee to seek further details as to how this estimate has been tested.

LOOKED AFTER CHILDREN

Extending throughcare and aftercare support

96. The Bill makes provision for local authorities to provide financial support and assistance to eligible care leavers up to and including the age of 25 (rising from the current cut-off age of 21). The FM estimates that the extension of throughcare and aftercare support will result in additional costs to local authorities of £3,871,515 in 2015-16, rising to £4,033,640 in 2016-17 and 2017-18 before falling to £1,777,046 from 2018-19. The numbers eligible (and the resulting costs) decline after the initial increase reflecting the change in eligibility rules.

97. The FM provides a detailed explanation of the methodology used to arrive at these estimates which is based on a number of key assumptions as follows—

- 65% of care leavers aged 19-25 will be granted support.
- Average support costs are £2,100 a year per young person.
- The average cost of dealing with an application is £1,042.
- One-off support of £2,000 will be available to 25% of applicants

98. These assumptions form the basis for the estimated costs. No analysis is presented to indicate the effect that alternative assumptions would have on the costs, despite a number of references to limited data availability. COSLA has raised concerns over the accuracy of the estimates, commenting—

“COSLA has less certainty over the accuracy of the costings of this aspect of the Bill due to the difficulties for local authorities in estimating the financial impact. In particular, we are not convinced that the Scottish Government have accurately assessed the average annual cost of support, estimated at £3142

87 East Renfrewshire Council. Written submission, paragraph 10
89 Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 83 per young person in the FM...from experience a figure nearer £6,000 per person is considered more realistic by some local authorities.”

99. West Dunbartonshire Council also commented in its written submission that the FM’s assumptions relating to thoroughcare and aftercare were—

“speculative and generate an indicative demand that reduces by 1,000 cases by 2019/20. There is clearly a risk that this reduction in demand won’t occur and therefore the costs to local authorities are under-costed. In addition the assumption that the increase in successful applicants will increase to 65% is not evidenced and there is a risk that the success rate could be higher than this – again resulting in costs to local authorities.”

100. Whilst the City of Edinburgh Council’s written evidence stated—

“In relation to thoroughcare and aftercare the estimates of the numbers taking advantage of the legislation and the number that would cease to receive support as their age increased also differed, with the Council believing the numbers taking advantage to be higher and the number ceasing to be lower.”

101. In oral evidence, the City of Edinburgh Council welcomed the provisions but stated that, whilst it would not quibble with the FM’s estimates of the specific costs relating to aftercare, “we think from our experience that more young people would take up the opportunities than the financial memorandum estimates.”

102. It went on to state “if training, the kinship care measures and thoroughcare and aftercare are not properly funded, the risk is that money will be diverted from earlier intervention into supporting the other aspects of the bill and, actually, it will become counterproductive. That is my greatest concern.”

103. Falkirk Council suggested that the FM’s estimated costs relating to aftercare were “unrealistic” in its experience and underestimated the likely costs to it of providing such support.

104. The Committee also questioned witnesses on the estimated average cost of processing and assessing thoroughcare and aftercare applications. The FM estimates this to be £1,042 (almost exactly half of the average estimated costs for the provision of aftercare support of £2,100 per individual per year) and states that this estimate is “based on average caseloads and average worker salaries” without providing any further information.

105. The City of Edinburgh Council explained that care leavers would undergo an iterative process of assessments but stated that “the way in which those figures are separated out does not make a lot of sense to me either.” GIRFEMCP also expressed uncertainty about the basis for this figure, which, it stated “seems very high,” before speculating that it might refer to the cost of the througcare and aftercare teams divided by the number of young people whom they support.

106. The Bill team explained in oral evidence that regulations setting out the types and timescales of support available along with its eligibility criteria had yet to be developed but that the process of developing them would provide an opportunity for local government and other key stakeholders to provide continuing feedback to the Government.

107. The Committee invites the lead committee to raise the following issues with the Minister—

- The view of some local authorities that the demand for throughcare and aftercare support is likely to be higher than indicated in the FM;
- Why the administrative costs are nearly half of the support costs;
- On what basis the costings for support were arrived at given the lack of detail in the Bill regarding the type and timescale of support to be provided.

Kinship Care

108. The FM predicts that the provisions in relation to kinship care will lead to a reduced dependency on formal care (with less formal care providing a less costly model) resulting in estimated gross savings of between £8 and £20m by 2019-20. Transitional costs of £2.6m in 2015-16 are included in the estimates but ongoing costs are not provided as any such costs are assumed to be offset by savings. GIRFEMCP questioned this assumption in its written submission noting that “in some cases the FM offsets… savings in the short term, where in fact it may be many years, and in some cases a generation or longer, before the provision of, and funding for, some services can be reduced.”

109. The FM states that the associated costs “can be broken down into different categories; the cost of formal carers obtaining a kinship care order, the cost of informal carers obtaining a kinship care order; the transitional costs for local authorities; and the avoided costs of formal care.”

110. The FM predicts that from 2017-18 between 6% and 11% of formal carers would apply for kinship care orders. It states that these estimates are based on numbers already applying for section 11 orders under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 and “assumptions tested with some local authorities.”

111. COSLA, however, stated that “there is a concern…that this new order will not be embraced by families and therefore not free up monies as assumed. The potential loss of income to families during this period of economic pressure may well play a significant part in decision making by families considering this option."\footnote{102}

112. The City of Edinburgh Council also cast doubt on the assumption that many families who currently have a child who is looked after by kinship carers would wish to seek a new kinship care order, stating—

“That order has to be made attractive to families, but there is no evidence at the moment that it will be particularly attractive to them. We do not think that there is robust evidence that families will move from a position in which their child is looked after and they get a set of resources to support that situation, to the new kinship care order. The underlying financial assumptions in the modelling are not consistent with the experience of the City of Edinburgh Council.”\footnote{103}

113. The FM also predicts that between 1.5% and 3.5% of current informal carers would apply for kinship care orders, thereby becoming eligible for a range of support at the expense of the local authority.

114. In oral evidence the City of Edinburgh Council stated that in its view—

“the assumptions of potential savings…are exaggerated. We also think that there are potential additional costs, because the estimate in the memorandum that only between 1.5 and 3.5 per cent of informal kinship carers will come forward for the new kinship care order is an underestimate…Basically, our conclusion is that there is a great deal of financial risk for local authorities. Certainly, the City of Edinburgh Council does not believe that that element of the bill is funded, given the proposals as they stand. I know that it is the Government’s intent to fully fund the bill but, in respect of kinship care, we do not think that that will be the case.”\footnote{104}

115. The Council went on to comment that, as far as it could tell, the FM’s estimate that between 1.5% and 3.5% of informal kinship carers might come forward to be assessed for a formal order “has just come out of the air.”\footnote{105} In its view, many more families were likely to come forward for an assessment as it could entitle them to future financial support. GIRFEMCP supported this assessment stating that “the figure for kinship carers could be many times what is estimated, depending on the circumstances.”\footnote{106}

116. Acknowledging that it was impossible for exact figures to be provided in the FM, GIRFEMCP also suggested that more than 3.5% might come forward and stated—

“The point is that there is a significant risk that the costs will increase beyond what is included in the memorandum and beyond any funding that is provided. How will those costs be met? Will there be an on-going review by the Scottish Government of the costs inherent in the bill, with changes in the funding as we move forward? Alternatively, will the charges be fixed early on, with authorities being told, “That is the settlement” and that they will have to provide for any additional costs?”

117. With regard to its estimates of the numbers it expected to apply for formal kinship care orders, the Bill team stated “it would seem reasonable, given that we are looking at something that is a variation of an existing instrument - a section 11 order - to look at how section 11 orders have been taken up to date. We can derive estimates from that about the number of kinship carers and informal carers who will come forward. The estimates suggest that the numbers are, relatively speaking, quite low.”

118. In relation to the avoided costs resulting from the overall package of kinship care measures, a number of councils expressed concerns relating to the assumptions made in the FM. Falkirk Council noted that: “there is no substance behind the estimated avoided costs [from diverting children from formal kinship care] and the margin for error is significant”. The City of Edinburgh Council noted that—

“There was also a significant difference in the assumptions of value of savings, or avoided costs that would be delivered to the Council as a result of the new legislation. The difference was due to a view, by the Council, that the stated aim of the legislation itself would not lead to the reduction of Looked After Children entering kinship care and therefore the level of savings is significantly over estimated.”

119. When asked whether the FM’s estimate that avoided future costs for 2015-16 would be between £3.5 and £15m, the City of Edinburgh Council replied “I think that even the lower estimate is potentially exaggerated. The difficulty is that the estimates are not based on any firm evidence.”

120. When asked to expand upon its suggestion that savings related to kinship care were exaggerated in the FM, it explained that “it is very difficult to make these kinds of future estimates. We are being asked to accept that the kinship care element of the bill is fully funded on the basis of speculative savings - and they are completely speculative savings - so the bill is not fully funded in that respect”

121. It went on to explain that—

“the council does not believe that the number of looked-after children entering kinship placements will reduce by the levels that are estimated. That is because the modelling that has been done in the financial memorandum is based on the increase in the number of looked-after children in kinship placements between 2007 and 2011 across the country, which grew by 87 per cent. In the City of Edinburgh Council area, the equivalent growth was only 29 per cent, so, projecting ahead, there is not the same growth for us to make that saving from - it is just not there. That is the biggest number. 113

122. Edinburgh Council also pointed out that many of the details of how kinship care orders would work remained to be set out in secondary legislation and that it therefore did “not know what will be available to families, how the orders will operate and what expectations there will be on local authorities around how long families should get support for, the nature of the support and what it might cost.” 114

123. In response to questioning on this point, the Bill team stated that “the process of developing those regulations will enable feedback to be made, and that feedback will continue as the relevant teams in the Scottish Government work with stakeholders in implementing them.” 115

124. The Bill team acknowledged the challenges it had faced stating, “there is no real precedent for kinship care, so we are having to give our best guess and make assumptions in working out when the savings kick in”. It went on to state, however, that it “stood by the logic and proxies” from which its estimates had been drawn, explaining that it operated on “the very simple principle that if you can get one child out of kinship care for one year, you can save about £9,000.” 116

125. The Committee is again concerned about the significant disparity between the estimates provided in the FM and the views of local authorities.

126. The Committee recommends that the lead committee invites the Government to provide further detailed costings of the estimated avoided costs from the diversion of children from formal kinship care.

CONCLUSION

127. The Committee has a number of concerns in relation to some of the costings within this FM and notes that there is a lack of evidence to support the figures provided for some aspects of the Bill. In particular, the Committee makes the general point that the Government needs to develop a more robust methodology for forecasting potential savings from preventative policy initiatives. There is also a need to develop measures to ensure that the actual savings are effectively monitored and reported. The Committee intends to raise this issue as part of its budget scrutiny.

128. The Committee recommends that the actual spending and savings arising from this Bill are reported on annually as part of the draft budget.

EXTRACT FROM THE MINUTES

22nd Meeting, 2013 (Session 4)

Wednesday 18 September 2013

Present:

Gavin Brown Malcolm Chisholm
Kenneth Gibson (Convener) Jamie Hepburn
John Mason (Deputy Convener) Michael McMahon

Apologies were received from Jean Urquhart.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Financial Memorandum from—

Alistair Gaw, Head of Support to Children and Young People, City of Edinburgh Council;

Magnus Inglis, Performance and Planning Officer, Getting it Right for Every Midlothian Child Partnership;

Inez Murray, Chair, National Day Nurseries Association, Glasgow Network;

Jim Carle, Child Health Commissioner, NHS Ayrshire & Arran;

Sally Egan, Associate Director and Child Health Commissioner, NHS Lothian;

Clare Mayo, Policy Advisor, Royal College of Nursing;

The Deputy Convener: Agenda item 2 is to take evidence as part of our scrutiny of the financial memorandum for the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. We will hear from two panels of witnesses who have submitted written evidence to the committee, and then put questions to Scottish Government officials. If any of the participants would like to respond to a question or make a point, please indicate to me or to the clerk.

I welcome our first panel of witnesses, who are Alistair Gaw from the City of Edinburgh Council, Magnus Inglis from Midlothian Council, and Inez Murray from the National Day Nurseries Association. The process is that committee members will ask questions. We are aiming for about one hour for the session. Normally, the convener starts but, for a change, we will start with questions from committee members.

Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh Northern and Leith) (Lab): There are several interesting aspects of the bill, from a policy and a financial point of view. I will start with kinship care arrangements, which are probably the main concern in the City of Edinburgh Council’s submission.

There is a fairly complex underlying policy change. I ask the representative from the City of Edinburgh Council to explain the basis of its concerns. Obviously, the other witnesses can comment, but the City of Edinburgh Council highlighted the issue. I think that, mainly, the council is sceptical about the potential savings that will result from the kinship care changes. It would be helpful if Mr Gaw and others could start by explaining their views on that.

Alistair Gaw (City of Edinburgh Council): I am happy to do that. Obviously, we support kinship care. Whenever a child needs to live with alternative carers because the parents cannot care for them, the first port of call is always the extended family. Those arrangements are made in a number of ways and often do not involve the local authority at all. Nevertheless, when the local authority is involved and, in particular, when a child is looked after with a kinship carer, the local authority has substantial duties and financial commitments.

The concerns that are expressed in our written submission are based on the fact that the assumptions of potential savings—the avoided costs that are set out in table 28 in the financial memorandum—are exaggerated. We also think that there are potential additional costs, because the estimate in the memorandum that only between 1.5 and 3.5 per cent of informal kinship carers will come forward for the new kinship care order is an underestimate. That is based on our experience and on the numbers that we have at present.

Basically, our conclusion is that there is a great deal of financial risk for local authorities. Certainly, the City of Edinburgh Council does not believe that that element of the bill is funded, given the proposals as they stand. I know that it is the Government’s intent to fully fund the bill but, in respect of kinship care, we do not think that that will be the case. Our position is consistent with that of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, and we want to ensure that, as the bill proceeds, we have the opportunity to ensure that the funding for the measures is realistic.

There are a number of unknowns in relation to the pressures on local authorities on kinship care. In part, that stems from the modelling of the numbers, which is not consistent with our experience. There is also the impact of welfare reform across the United Kingdom, which could have an impact on the benefits that are available to carers. A third issue relates to—sorry, it has gone for a second, but I will come back to that.

We do not think that the estimates in the financial memorandum are consistent with our experience. Before I conclude and allow further questions, I will give one example of that. The overall avoided costs are based on figures for the growth in the number of kinship carers in Scotland from 2007 to 2011. Over that period, the number of looked-after children in kinship care grew by 87 per cent. However, in Edinburgh, the growth was only 29 per cent. Therefore, the model is based on a false premise, because the avoided costs in the financial memorandum are nothing like the costs that we will avoid.

Malcolm Chisholm: Will the avoided costs arise because children will not become looked-after children? Is it the idea that the kinship care order will cost less than the looked-after children arrangements? Is that what the projected savings are based on?

Alistair Gaw: That is right. An assumption is being made that many families who currently have a child who is looked after with kinship carers will seek to have the new kinship care order, which is a private law measure and a variation on an order under section 11 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.

That order has to be made attractive to families, but there is no evidence at the moment that it will be particularly attractive to them. We do not think that there is robust evidence that families will move from a position in which their child is looked after and they get a set of resources to support that situation, to the new kinship care order. The underlying financial assumptions in the modelling are not consistent with the experience of the City of Edinburgh Council.

Malcolm Chisholm: That is helpful. I am sure that those policy issues will be taken up by the lead committee. Does anyone else want to comment on the issue?

Inez Murray (National Day Nurseries Association): Kinship care, when it comes to looked-after children, is only relevant to the private, voluntary and independent sector in relation to the funding that will come for two-year-olds.

Malcolm Chisholm: The biggest cost in the bill is the 600 hours of early learning and childcare going through local authorities. In a way, that is the centrepiece of the bill. Are people confident about the estimates around that? What steps will local authorities have to take, as the planners and commissioners, to ensure that the 600 hours is delivered? Put another way, is most of the additional money for extra staffing? If so, is the funding being presented for that adequate?

Magnus Inglis (Getting it Right for Every Midlothian Child Partnership): Midlothian Council has considered how we could deliver the minimum 600 hours through additional early years and childcare provision. The projections that we are looking at are quite different from the figures that are in the financial memorandum. We are still in the early stages yet. We are looking at projections, and we are working out costs with the accountant, but the figures that we are coming out with are substantially lower than the estimates in the bill.

Other complications could emerge but, in the current financial situation, without having absolute certainty that the provision will be funded or by how much it will be funded, local authorities are looking to achieve the best way forward for the provision with the least cost attached for councils.

Inez Murray: The PVI sector provides about 40 per cent of the provision for three to five-year-old children. We provide the flexibility that is required by working parents and those parents who are accessing training prior to going back into the workplace.

Partners are crucial to local authorities. They allow them to meet their statutory requirements in making the provision for three to five-year-olds. As we said in our submission, there is currently a funding shortfall, which will only increase with the extended hours.

The NDNA did a survey recently. Respondents said that, on average, they were losing £584 per child per year with funding costs. If we extend the provision to 600 hours—which we are already doing in Glasgow—the loss will be in the region of £738 per child per year. We therefore have issues of sustainability.

Malcolm Chisholm: Does Edinburgh have a view on that?

Alistair Gaw: It has been covered by my colleagues.

Malcolm Chisholm: The last area that I wish to ask about, among the headline or salient issues that people are talking about in relation to the bill, is the named person issue. There are policy controversies around that, but what about the cost? I am told that Edinburgh already implements the measure, more or less, but I am not sure whether that is true when it comes to the detail. I wonder whether the cost estimates are accurate or adequate.

Alistair Gaw: Because the provision is largely implemented already, we do not consider it to be a major issue as far as the council is concerned. There are still some concerns about the funding of named persons for under-fives, where the responsibility rests with health visitors—I think that you will hear more evidence on that later this morning—but, because our authority has implemented a lot of the measures already, the three and a half hours provision is viewed as adequate.

We have some concern that the funding is not recurring. The funding for the health service and for health visitors and their training and development is recurring, but that is not the case for local authorities. That has been pointed out already. Colleagues such as Magnus Inglis might wish add something on this. I know that some other councils have concerns that the funding for the named person is not adequate to cover their needs, particularly if they have a longer journey to go on in order to implement getting it right for every child.

There are also some issues that are still to be negotiated with the education unions regarding what the named person approach means overall for job sizing for staff—in particular, for primary headteachers.

Magnus Inglis: There are certainly concerns about how the named person requirement can be implemented in practice within Midlothian. It will be useful to learn from Edinburgh how it has proceeded with it. For example, if the onus is on the education side to provide the named person, there are significant holidays through the course of the year—in particular, seven weeks during the summer—and we need to look at how we cover them. How do we arrange circumstances so that referrals are handled, there is somebody who can deal with them and they are flagged up to the appropriate person? I can imagine what would happen if you went to teaching unions to say, “Right, we would like you to do this over the summer holidays for however many hours every week.” I am not sure that that would go down well with them.

Malcolm Chisholm: Okay. That is enough information for me. Thank you.

The Convener (Kenneth Gibson): I apologise to our guests and my colleagues for my lateness. I am afraid that I thought that the committee started at our usual time of 10.00. I was just sitting upstairs in my office, scratching myself and waiting to come down. I thank the deputy convener, John Mason, for holding the fort in my absence. Gavin Brown will ask the next questions.

Gavin Brown (Lothian) (Con): I want to go through the written submissions that each of the witnesses has helpfully submitted to the committee. I will start with Alistair Gaw from the City of Edinburgh Council.

Mr Gaw, if I heard you correctly, you said that, in relation to the kinship care element of the bill, Edinburgh’s view is that the savings that are laid out in the financial memorandum are exaggerated. Did I write down correctly what your view is?

Alistair Gaw: Yes.

Gavin Brown: Can you expand on that for the public record? Looking specifically at the memorandum, to what degree are those savings exaggerated: are they out marginally or are they out enormously? It would be helpful to get a rough idea of what sort of figures we are talking about.

Alistair Gaw: The first point is that it is very difficult to make these kinds of future estimates. We are being asked to accept that the kinship care element of the bill is fully funded on the basis of speculative savings—and they are completely speculative savings—so the bill is not fully funded in that respect.

The main issue has two elements to it. First, as regards savings, the council does not believe that the number of looked-after children entering kinship placements will reduce by the levels that are estimated. That is because the modelling that has been done in the financial memorandum is based on the increase in the number of looked-after children in kinship placements between 2007 and 2011 across the country, which grew by 87 per cent. In the City of Edinburgh Council area, the equivalent growth was only 29 per cent, so, projecting ahead, there is not the same growth for us to make that saving from—it is just not there. That is the biggest number.

There is also a distinction in respect of informal kinship carers—this is fiendishly complicated and I apologise to members. I think that everybody wrestles with the number of different types of kinship carer arrangements that exist, but that is the reality of the landscape that we are working in. Formal kinship carers are carers of children who are looked after by the local authority on a statutory basis, and it is estimated that, across the country, there are about 3,000 such children. There is also an estimate that there are about 16,000 informal kinship care arrangements in the country, where wider families are caring for children—although nobody really knows.

The financial memorandum estimates that between 1.5 and 3.5 per cent of informal kinship carers may come forward for an assessment for a kinship care order. There is no substance to that estimate or reference to where it came from; as far as we can see, it has just come out of the air. We think that many more families who are in informal kinship care arrangements will come forward for an assessment because attached to that assessment is support for those families in the future.

Gavin Brown: You obviously cannot speak for other councils—some of them have submitted evidence—but I assume that you have spoken informally to other councils. Is your sense that Edinburgh is alone in this respect, or do you get a feeling that your view is shared?

Alistair Gaw: If you examine the submissions from other local authorities—Dundee City Council, Falkirk Council and others—you will see that the concerns are consistent.

Magnus Inglis: I agree. The estimated range of 1.5 to 3.5 per cent will depend on the circumstances and the support made available to kinship carers through the order. However, the figure for kinship carers could be many times what is estimated, depending on the circumstances.

Gavin Brown: Mr Gaw, in response to Mr Chisholm’s questions, you referred specifically to table 28 in the financial memorandum. I wonder whether you could say more, now or later, about the table—in particular, the bottom two sections of the table on lower and upper estimates for avoided future costs for each of the financial years from 2015-16 to 2019-20.

Let us take 2015-16, just because it is the first one. The lower estimate for avoided future costs touches £3.5 million and the upper estimate is just over £15 million. Is it your view that the lower estimate is more likely, or do you think that that estimate is a little optimistic? I take your point that you feel that the savings are exaggerated, but I am just trying to get a feel for where you think the savings might lie if we take 2015-16 as the example.

Alistair Gaw: I think that even the lower estimate is potentially exaggerated. The difficulty is that the estimates are not based on any firm evidence.

I have a couple of other reasons for my view of the estimates. I was going to say earlier when my mind went blank that the other issue is that much of how kinship orders will operate will be determined in secondary legislation. We therefore do not know what will be available to families, how the orders will operate and what expectations there will be on local authorities around how long families should get support for, the nature of the support and what it might cost. That is one issue.

In addition, the estimates are premised on the assumption that, if kinship care orders are made and some initial work is completed with families, they will no longer need any on-going support of the type that is provided. However, that is not the case in reality. Even some families who do not have any formal involvement through a legal statutory order—for example, some children are on section 11 orders, which is an informal kinship care arrangement whereby the extended family have parental rights—need quite high levels of support from local authorities, although other families will not need any support. Some of the assumptions on which the estimates are modelled must therefore be looked at more closely.

Gavin Brown: That is helpful. Thank you.

I will move on to the getting it right for every Midlothian child partnership submission. Mr Inglis, you state in your submission that it will be very difficult to find funds and resources to meet the additional duties in the bill, and I think that you have touched on that in your comments here. However, you commented specifically in your submission on having a named person service, presumably for those aged five to 18, over school holiday periods. I guess that that would not apply to those aged zero to five. Can you expand on what you think the difficulties are going to be with that? Have you had any feedback or response from those in charge of the bill about how that might be managed?

Magnus Inglis: It is not so much that there is a difficulty but that arrangements need to be made to provide cover for school holiday periods. One proposal that Midlothian considered was extending the ability of the call centre to deal with referrals through putting in place staff who will deal with them, record their details and put them into the system, which then needs to flag that up as something to be dealt with by somebody. The question is whether over the holiday period that responsibility falls to a social worker or somebody else. Who takes on the responsibility as named person when the education service is not available because of the school holidays?

As I said, it is not necessarily a difficulty; it is just about finding the resources and staff and making arrangements. Also, in order to provide the named person service when the schools are in, we need to ensure that the relevant information is available. If a referral comes in, they need to have access to appropriate systems. For example, we have a social work system and we are looking at the potential for putting that into schools so that headteachers and so on have access to it. However, that comes with set-up costs, and there must be arrangements to ensure that the information is kept in a secure manner and does not get out. A lot of detail still needs to be worked out for the implementation of the named person service on the ground.

Gavin Brown: Am I right in thinking that you said that the named person will not undertake that role during the school holidays and that there will be a temporary named person arrangement?

Magnus Inglis: My recollection is that the bill does not specifically say who the named person is intended to be, but it is assumed to be part of the education remit of the council. Given that education staff have substantial holidays, we do not want to be in a situation in which someone calls up in the first week of the summer holidays with information about a child that they are looking to put to the named person and then nothing happens for six or seven weeks. Something has to be in place. That may not mean that the nominated named person changes at that point in time, but somebody needs to step in and fill that role, even if there is no sheet of paper that says that they are the named person for that child during that time.

Gavin Brown: In paragraph 5 of your submission, you say that, when the child turns five, the named person stops being from the NHS and starts being from the school, under the auspices of the council. There does not appear to be any formal budget line or cost set out for that. Is that an easy process, with no costs involved?

Magnus Inglis: Some work is being done in that regard. There is a pan-Lothian protocol, and information is already shared among local authorities, health boards and so on. At this point, we need to get a bit more information about exactly what will be involved, what information will be recorded and how that will be transferred from one place to the next. Will it all be recorded on a computer system? Will the information be taken from one computer system to another? Will that work be funded? Information technology staff in the councils and the NHS will need to get that all arranged and ensure that that information can be retained securely.

Gavin Brown: I have a question for the NDNA. We have a letter from the minister dated 12 September. I do not know whether you have seen it.

Inez Murray: I have seen it, but I do not have it with me.

Gavin Brown: I will read out to the part that is relevant to you:

"The Financial Memorandum includes an estimate of £1.2 million for uprating partner provider payments in line with inflation from 2007."

Does that change your submission to this committee?

Inez Murray: I think that that specifically refers to two-year-olds. It does not refer to three to five-year-olds. It refers to the new provision that is being put in place.

Gavin Brown: It does not specifically say what it refers to. You may or may not be right.

Paragraph 14 of your submission says that you believe that "the assumptions made around early learning and childcare are flawed and therefore the projections will also need reconsideration."

Can you expand on that?

Inez Murray: At present, local authorities give a variety of different levels of funding to partner providers. As I have already stated, partner providers are crucial to the statutory requirements. I am sure that my colleagues who are here will agree that local authorities cannot provide the level of education for three and five-year-olds that is necessary, so they need to partner with the private, voluntary and independent sectors.

At present, the cost of the service is £4.09 an hour for the 500 hours. Edinburgh is currently being given £3.26 an hour for the 500 hours. Glasgow, which now contractually has to provide 600 hours, receives £2.72 per child. The figure of £4.09 has evidently been based on the advisory floor, which ceased to exist several years ago, with an inflationary link added into it.

Our feeling is that that is not a sufficient level of funding, when you take into consideration the staffing costs. Nowadays, we are, quite rightly, upskilling our workforce and ensuring that they have an appropriate level of education to care for and educate these children, which means that our staffing costs are increasing dramatically. Business rates are increasing, as are the costs of rent, resources, utilities, food and consumables. The costs that are inherent in caring for and educating children are rising considerably. Getting the right amount of funding is crucial. In real terms, it is very difficult to look after a child for 600 hours at a rate of £4.09 per hour.

If we look further on, the NDNA’s big issue is sustainability. If the funding is so low that it is not worth a business’s while to operate, because it is losing money, nurseries will cease to exist or will come out of partnership, which will create concerns for local authorities.

Gavin Brown: Am I right in thinking from paragraph 10 of your submission that you think that the break-even point is £4.51 per child per hour? Your submission does not say that, but you say that there is a shortfall.

Inez Murray: I am sorry; I am a nursery owner from Glasgow. I chair the NDNA’s Glasgow network, but I am not the NDNA’s chief executive or director of communications, who would normally attend but cannot be here today. In all honesty, I cannot answer your question.

Gavin Brown: That is fair enough. I gave that figure because you said that £4.09 would leave a shortfall of 42p per child per hour. I added together those figures.

Inez Murray: My policy manager is sitting behind me, so she will take notes and come back to the committee.

Gavin Brown: It would be useful and helpful to have the figure confirmed.

Jamie Hepburn (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (SNP): This is one of the most important bills that the Parliament can consider. We could have an interesting discussion about the policy implications, but we are here only to look at the financial memorandum. Before I get into the nuts and bolts of that, can I take it as our starting perspective that we all welcome the bill and the idea that we will embed children’s rights and do more to support the most vulnerable children?

Alistair Gaw: Absolutely.

Inez Murray: Absolutely.

Jamie Hepburn: It is useful to know that we all agree.

In its submission on the financial memorandum, the City of Edinburgh Council says:

“The Council believes that the costs and any savings for Children’s Rights, GIRFEC, Early Learning/Childcare and Other Proposals are accurately reflected based on our understanding of the requirements of the legislation.”

Is that still the case?

Alistair Gaw: That is the position that the council has taken. We have particular concerns about the modelling of the bill’s costs in relation to kinship care, throughcare and aftercare, and about the impact on vulnerable children. However, we have no major issues with the other provisions overall.

Jamie Hepburn: I will put a similar question to the getting it right for every Midlothian child partnership. Your submission says:

“The notes and details of the methodology used to calculate the estimates in the FM are welcomed and have been very useful”.

Is that still the case?

Magnus Inglis: Yes. As Alistair Gaw said, there can be concerns about how some figures have been arrived at, but it has been useful to have the information about how many of the figures were calculated.

Gavin Brown mentioned the letter that talks about the change in estimated costs—I believe that they are for the additional childcare hours for looked-after two-year-olds. There has been a fourfold increase in those projected costs—from £1.1 million to £4.5 million—on the basis of negotiations with COSLA. That is quite concerning. If one element of costs can go up fourfold after they have been thought about more, can other elements of costs do the same? If they could, the shortfall would be significant.

Jamie Hepburn: You are the first person from a local authority whom I have ever heard say that a fourfold increase in an element of local authority funding might be concerning. That is an interesting perspective.

Magnus Inglis: I am referring not to that individual element but to the general application of the point to other elements of the bill.

Jamie Hepburn: So you do not think that the increase is concerning; I presume that you welcome it.

Magnus Inglis: I welcome anything that helps the council to achieve the savings that it needs to achieve.

Jamie Hepburn: I think that we are talking a little at cross-purposes, because the letter has two elements. One aspect applies across the board to three and four-year-olds, whereas the other aspect concerns two-year-olds.

The letter states—I will not necessarily quote it all, but I will get things clear—that the initial financial memorandum put in
"£1.1 million for extending funded early learning and childcare to two year olds who are looked after or subject to a kinship care order."

The letter goes on to say that the figure will increase by £3.4 million to £4.5 million. I understand that Midlothian welcomes that, but can the other witnesses set out their position? I presume that you also welcome it.

Alistair Gaw: Yes.

Inez Murray: Absolutely. We welcome any funding for the children. As you rightly say, this is all about the children of Scotland.

Jamie Hepburn: Gavin Brown read out another part of the letter and I will read it out again. It states:

“The Financial Memorandum also includes an estimate of £1.2 million for uprating partner provider payments in line with inflation from 2007.”

I presume, Ms Murray, that the £4.09 figure comes from that estimate. However, Gavin Brown did not add that the letter goes on to say:

“We now think this figure should be in the region of £2 million to more accurately reflect the financial pressures on local authorities and partner providers, and this too has been reflected in the Budget.”

The figure has been increased from £1.2 million to £2 million. I presume that you also welcome that.

Inez Murray: Yes.

We would also recommend that, when the money comes to local authorities, it gets to the partner providers in the way that the Government anticipates. We recommend that the bill reintroduces the advisory floor, because that is a very good way of ensuring that the money from the Government that comes through the local authorities goes to the partner providers.

Jamie Hepburn: Clearly, that will be a matter for the lead committee, but it is on the record and I am sure that that committee will pick up on it. However, the fundamental point is that this is a significant increase—

Inez Murray: As long as it is a relevant and robust funding package that is going to meet the needs of the providers to provide the high-quality education that our children require.

Jamie Hepburn: Essentially—you can tell me if I am correct—your point is that the funding increase is welcome, so long as it comes to the partners as appropriate.

Inez Murray: Yes.

Jamie Hepburn: I have one final question. Obviously, I have an interest in the issue as the deputy convener of the Welfare Reform Committee, because it has focused on the matter. Mr Gaw spoke about the challenge of welfare reform. Could you say a little bit more about how welfare reform interacts with the bill and, specifically, its financial provisions?

Alistair Gaw: I am no expert on welfare reform—

Jamie Hepburn: Neither is the UK Government, but that is another matter.

Alistair Gaw: There is no doubt that if you look at the potential for throughcare and aftercare provision, for example, a lot of the work that we do with young people who leave the care system is about trying to ensure that they are in employment, have decent accommodation and have a chance to get on with their lives. If, for example, what is colloquially known as the bedroom tax affects their income, that could have an impact on their overall level of income.

Similarly, kinship carers may or may not fall into a category that is exempt from these measures. We do not yet know what their position will be, but there are undoubtedly risks for them in some of the potential consequences of welfare reform and how that might impact on their responsibilities. If the same levels of benefits are not available to them as have been in the past, any better-off assessment that a council does will inevitably mean that the council will have to put in more money to top up their income. There are a number of ways in which the interplay between the Department for Work and Pensions and the benefits system, and what we try to do with kinship carers, can have unintended effects.

The Convener: The now-deposed deputy convener has some questions.

John Mason (Glasgow Shettleston) (SNP): Thank you. I waited two years to chair the committee for five minutes, so that was good.

We have covered a lot of ground already. I will come back to Ms Murray on a few of the figures, although I realise that that is maybe not your specialist area.

You suggested that nurseries are losing money. How does that work? Is cross-subsidy taking place? What is happening?

Inez Murray: The survey showed that when we look at the real costs that are involved—this is across the whole of Scotland; also there is funding for two and a half or three hours of education provision for three to five-year-olds, depending on the local authority—the costs are probably subsidised by the daily rate and things that parents have to pay for their child’s place.
John Mason: So parents or whoever are paying slightly more, in effect to subsidise the lower rate—

Inez Murray: Yes, because of the inherent costs that I talked about.

John Mason: Am I right in saying that, as your numbers increase, the marginal cost per extra child is not great, because you already have your heating, lighting and so on?

Inez Murray: I accept that. That leads me to another point. Some local authority areas will not partner with a high-quality nursery in an area where there is a nursery that is perhaps not of such good quality. Parents then choose to send their children not to the local authority nursery but to the non-partner nursery, because of the quality of provision. Parental choice is an issue. It is important that local authorities partner with good-quality provision.

John Mason: Are the local authorities transparent about how much it costs to have a child in one of their facilities?

Inez Murray: No. It costs far more—

John Mason: You reckon that it costs far more.

Inez Murray: Oh, yes.

John Mason: Is that the feeling of local authorities? Do their facilities cost a lot more than facilities in the private sector cost?

Magnus Inglis: I am not in a position to comment on that, I am afraid.

John Mason: Fair enough. Let me go over some of the ground that we have covered. The NDNA would like a floor, which would be higher than £2.72—perhaps around £4.

Inez Murray: Yes, or as much as—well, we understand that money is tight, but if we want high-quality provision for our three to five-year-olds, in partnership with nurseries, we must have relevant and appropriate funding.

John Mason: Thank you.

I want to ask about looked-after children and throughcare and aftercare. Various figures have come up. It says in the financial memorandum:

“annual support costs have been estimated at an average annual cost of £3,142 per young person”.

However, COSLA suggested a figure of £6,000. I was quite surprised by that. I accept that it is hard to project figures, but when we consider current costs, how can there be such a difference between what the FM says and what COSLA says?

In addition, it says in the FM that the estimated cost of the assessment and application process is £1,042. It seems strange that the assessment should account for half the cost of support. Will you comment on that, Mr Gaw?

Alistair Gaw: I think that the assessment is separate from the provision of services. Edinburgh does not have a particular issue with the levels in the financial memorandum, but some colleagues across the country think that an estimate of overall costs of up to £6,000—I stress “up to”—is more accurate. We are talking about resources to deal with crisis or emergency situations that young people find themselves in and to pay for advice, training and counselling.

Young people’s needs as they leave the care system and become more independent vary enormously, so it is quite misleading to try to put a single figure on that. The figures are very rough averages—you will notice that the phrase “up to” is used quite a lot in the financial memorandum—which is why Edinburgh did not have a particular issue with them.

John Mason: Costs are more predictable for younger children but vary more for the older age group. Is that right?

Alistair Gaw: It is, absolutely. We hugely welcome the fact that there is potential for support of and provision for very vulnerable young people up to the age of 25. It is clear that young adults can go to many other avenues for support without having to go back to the local authority as the corporate parent to support them but, nevertheless, we said in our submission that, although we would not quibble with the figures in the financial memorandum—the potential £200 for emergency payments, the £1,200 for a counselling course or whatever—we think from our experience that more young people would take up the opportunities than the financial memorandum estimates. That is to do with the work that we put in to keep in touch with young people as they become young adults.

It is clear that good practice in what we would like to promote across the country is really good engagement, particularly for young people who do not have any extended family, so that they have somewhere to fall back on and they can go out, make a mistake, come back and get support. Those services are critical for their long-term health benefits and for long-term positive outcomes, which can, of course, save the taxpayer a huge amount of money.

John Mason: Okay. Your answer is good.

In comparison with the level of support that somebody receives, the £1,000 for dealing with an application seems quite heavy, but perhaps that Alistair Gaw: Will you point to the part of the financial memorandum to which you are referring, please, Mr Mason, as I am not completely sure of that?

John Mason: I refer to table 19 on page 63 and paragraph 101, which refers to “estimated application/process costs at £1,042 (based on average caseloads and average worker salaries).”

It jumped out at me that, if we are spending half as much on assessing somebody as we are on supporting them, it would be better if we just gave them £1,000.

Alistair Gaw: If a young person is going through the care leaving process, they will have a pathway plan and there will be an assessment. All that work is done, and it is an iterative process. They do not have to come back in and get a completely new assessment with a whole load of administration around that. The way in which those figures are separated out does not make a lot of sense to me, either.

John Mason: Okay. Thanks very much.

Magnus Inglis: I was not sure whether that was the cost of the throughcare and aftercare teams divided by the number of young people whom they support. I agree with Alistair Gaw and John Mason. The figure seems very high. There is not a formal application process involved that would cost that amount of money. My speculation was therefore that that was the cost of those teams divided by the number of children whom they support.

John Mason: Thanks very much. [Interruption.]

The Convener: It is good that the children next door in the crèche are so keen to make a contribution to our deliberations.

Jamie Hepburn has a wee supplementary question.

Jamie Hepburn: I do not have a question, convener, although I thank you for allowing me the chance to ask one. It occurred to me that I should have declared an interest in questioning Ms Murray, as my children attend a nursery that is in partnership with the local authority. I thought that I should put that on the record.

The Convener: Thank you for that.

I will wind up with some questions, as committee members have exhausted theirs. I usually kick off the questions, but decided to let the committee charge ahead, for obvious reasons. That was interesting, as committee members often complain that I take all the juicy questions and they have the ones that are left over. There has been a wee bit of a reversal of roles.

I want to get clarification from Ms Murray of issues that came up in the NDNA submission. Obviously, we have discussed much of that. Paragraph 9 of that submission talks about the advisory floor. It says: “uprating this figure is inappropriate and forms a weak basis for estimating future costs.”

However, the appendix, which talks about directing “sufficient funding to nurseries”, says: “One option might be to reintroduce an advisory floor minimum level of funding and review this annually—in some local authorities funding ... has remained static since the advisory floor was removed several years ago.”

Will you clarify exactly what your position is on the advisory floor?

Inez Murray: The advisory floor that we recommended would be introduced so that all local authorities would know what was there for children. Money is now coming through grant-aided expenditure and is not being distributed equally among providers. Was the second bit of the question about the advisory floor?

The Convener: The submission says that uprating the advisory floor “is inappropriate and forms a weak basis for estimating future costs”, but it goes on to say that perhaps it should be reintroduced. I am wondering why there is a contradiction in saying that it is “inappropriate and forms a weak basis for estimating future costs”, and then saying that it should perhaps be introduced but reviewed annually.

Inez Murray: That refers, I think, to what the advisory floor was previously and the fact that the figure of £4.09 is based on the advisory floor that was discontinued.

The Convener: Okay.

Although the figure is supposedly £4.09 a child, given that staff ratios are moving from 1:10 to 1:8, that will mean £32.72 per hour, because there will be one member of staff looking after eight children. It is not a one-to-one service. We were all thinking, “£4 an hour?”, but looking at the issue from that perspective puts a different complexion on things.

In paragraph 15 of your submission, you say: “We are not confident that partner providers of early learning and childcare can meet the costs associated with the Bill unless measures are taken ... to ensure sufficient funding is allocated to local authorities and actually reaches providers in the form of a viable hourly rate.”
Can you provide us with details of how much that should be? If the Government is to increase funding, what would a viable hourly rate be?

Inez Murray: What we are saying is that the £4.09 plus the 42p that Gavin Brown mentioned makes it a much more viable unit. As ever, we would accept as much money as possible—everyone does. You say that the staff ratio is 1:10 or 1:8 but, as has been discussed, there are different elements of cost that have to be taken into account.

If we want our children to grow up in such a way that we do not incur the costs of care later on in life that we have had to meet, all the research shows that good-quality early years education from the ages of three to five is the best way to go, because it gives children the stability of a good start in life. Naturally, the more funding that we have in place, the better the provision that we can make. The level of qualification of the staff is crucial in that regard.

The Convener: We would all fully agree with that; the issue is that funding is always limited and that, when it comes to what you have suggested, we have to strike a balance between the public purse and—

Inez Murray: Absolutely; I am sorry to interrupt.

The Convener: Not at all.

Inez Murray: The most important thing is that the funding that the Parliament decides on is delivered to the partner providers equally and fairly.

The Convener: So, are you suggesting that the figure of £4.51 that you have mentioned would be a reasonable amount if it were uprated annually, to take account of inflation?

Inez Murray: I suppose that I would have to say yes to that. I have not done figures on the back of that but, compared with the £2.72 that I receive at the moment, that would make a huge difference.

The Convener: Of course—comparatively, it would be almost like a lottery win.

Incidentally, why is there such variation?

Inez Murray: In Glasgow, it is because we are contracted to provide 600 hours. The funding was not upped at all because of a lack of money, but we were told to provide 600 hours.

The Convener: You are expected to provide an extra 125 hours for nothing.

Inez Murray: I think that we included the average figure in our submission. The advisory floor would even that out and make things fairer.

The Convener: It would at least ensure that you were resourced for those extra 125 hours.

I have one more question. Paragraph 17 of your submission is quite interesting. In it, you say:

“There is presently an inequity in the number of hours of preschool education to which a child is entitled, depending on their birthdate”.

You say that the report “An Equal Start”

“highlighted that this can mean a funding gap to families of £1,000 per child, depending on their birthdate.”

Can you tell us a bit more about that?

Inez Murray: That is because the cut-off date for a child to be able to go to school is 28 February. A child can go to school if they reach school age before that date.

The other issue is that the local authorities will not pay for the extra—I am sorry, but I am not getting this right; I will need to rethink what I am saying.

The Convener: Sure—take your time.

Inez Murray: The fact is that a child who goes into nursery school in May will not get any funding for that last term; they will not get funding until the term following the child’s third birthday.

We are talking about nursery-age children, at pre-school, not school-age children. The children who are three after that, or before that, get extra terms of funding. Does that make sense?

10:30

The Convener: Yes—so, because of the fairly arbitrary—

Inez Murray: It is just an age-related thing. That is what happens in most local authorities—they do not get funding until the term following the child’s third birthday.

The Convener: You feel that that should be addressed, I am sure.

Inez Murray: It is an issue.

The Convener: It seems somewhat unjust to me—although all my children were born in the summer months, and my youngest is 15.

Mr Inglis, you say in paragraph 6 of your submission:

“The Bill will require more midwives, health visitors, teachers and school administration staff, childcare staff, family counsellors etc.”

However, you do not specify how many for a local authority such as Midlothian. We will be producing a report, with some recommendations to the minister, so we want to tie down some of the figures. If Midlothian had robust information on that, we could perhaps extrapolate some data across Scotland. What figures do you have for your local authority?
Magnus Inglis: I am just checking.

The Convener: I was quoting from paragraph 6, about halfway down.

Magnus Inglis: I did some estimates based on the additional hours that would be needed for a named person in the teaching or education role. In Midlothian, that would work out as about 2.2 full-time-equivalent teaching posts. That is based on a very rough estimate. I see that I have taken out the figure for additional administrative support, and I do not have the figures for the other roles in front of me. I also considered the numbers of additional support assistants for administration in primary and secondary schools—but I do not have a note of those with me, unfortunately.

The Convener: It would be good if you could provide us with any of that information.

In paragraph 11, you talk about the “resources to meet the additional duties of the Bill.”

You state:

“This may be most severe regarding the additional hours of childcare/early learning which, based on the figures in FM, are estimated at up to £1.8 million per year for Midlothian Council.”

You say “up to £1.8 million”. How close to £1.8 million are we talking about? Over how many years? Is that something that would go on for one, two, three or four years, or is it a permanent additional burden on the council?

Magnus Inglis: I looked at the estimated costs of the provision in the bill across the whole of Scotland, and I then considered the population of Scotland from zero to five years, as well as the population of Midlothian from zero to five years. I then worked out the figures between them. On that basis, the costs provided in the financial memorandum extrapolated to Midlothian Council would be £1.3 million in 2014-15, £1.7 million in 2015-16 and £1.8 million in 2016-17, and they would then level out at £1.6 million per year thereafter.

The Convener: Thank you for providing that clarification.

In paragraph 9, you say:

“It is noted that the FM has an extremely wide range of estimates, with the savings in the upper estimate coming in at up to nine times that of the lower estimate.”

What impact do such differentials have on the council’s ability to plan ahead?

Magnus Inglis: All local authorities are currently under significant financial pressure; Midlothian Council is by no means alone in that. We are looking to achieve savings. We have achieved savings of £13.5 million over the past three years, and we are looking to achieve similar savings in the near future. It will depend on how funding for the provisions in the bill is arranged. If the actual cost of delivering the measures on the ground comes out at the top level of the estimates in the financial memorandum, there will be a significant funding shortfall for Midlothian Council, which would be unsustainable in the long term.

The Convener: You talk about a significant shortfall. What are we talking about?

Magnus Inglis: If the estimates of the savings vary by up to nine times—in the letter that was released recently, the funding was quadrupled and, by extension, so were the expected costs—the costs for the council could easily be another £1 million a year. The costs for the additional early learning and childcare are estimated to be £1.8 million a year, but if that comes out as the wrong figure, and the amount is significantly more than that, it would be a massive financial commitment for the council.

The Convener: Obviously, the Scottish Government has to consider the estimates that it has produced when it is drafting the legislation. However, it seems that your local authority is not completely au fait with its own estimates. How do we square the circle if a local authority does not know exactly how much implementation will cost? How can we expect the Scottish Government to cover all the bases in estimating the cost for all of Scotland?

Magnus Inglis: I completely agree: it is impossible for the Scottish Government to come up with exact figures. To return to some of the earlier comments, we do not know until we deliver the implementation how much it will cost.

For example, 1.5 per cent to 3.5 per cent of current informal kinship carers will come forward and claim under the new kinship care order. When word of what is available and what is supported goes round kinship carers throughout Scotland, the scheme could become very popular and a significant proportion of people could come forward. It is very difficult for local authorities and community planning partnerships to estimate what the costs will be, and it is equally difficult for the Scottish Government to do so.

The point is that there is a significant risk that the costs will increase beyond what is included in the memorandum and beyond any funding that is provided. How will those costs be met? Will there be an on-going review by the Scottish Government of the costs inherent in the bill, with changes in the funding as we move forward? Alternatively, will the charges be fixed early on, with authorities being told, “That is the settlement” and that they will have to provide for any additional costs?

The Convener: Would you be looking for some kind of contingency funding for the first two or three years, in case there are costs that no one has foreseen or the costs are significantly higher than you or the Scottish Government have considered?

Magnus Inglis: That would be a prudent step. The budgetary and financial pressures on local authorities are significant. As we have mentioned, the bill is welcome and contains a lot of good work, but we do not want to have started providing services or changed the way in which we deliver things before we discover that there is a shortfall in funding because we have been too successful.

It could be some years before some of the savings from the prevention agenda are realised, so there is currently a short-term, transition period in which we have to fund what we are currently doing for all the people who are already involved in the system, while also funding the preventative steps such as the additional hours for early learning and childcare.

However, until that period has passed and we have reaped the benefits of those prevention measures, there is a big funding requirement.

The Convener: Mr Gaw, much of your submission relates to areas that colleagues—one of whom represents Edinburgh and one of whom represents Lothian, including Edinburgh—have covered. We have discussed kinship care, throughcare and aftercare in detail. Your submission also raises wider issues. On those, will you say a wee bit about the impact of training costs on City of Edinburgh Council?

Alistair Gaw: With regard to GIRFEC in particular, and the named person—

The Convener: With regard to the whole bill. We are looking at the financial memorandum as it relates to the entire bill.

Alistair Gaw: Yes. We do not see training costs as a major concern; we are much more concerned about whether the modelling of the costs around kinship care, throughcare and aftercare is realistic, as we think that there may be unintended consequences.

The one training issue that arises for the council is that funding to train the named person on GIRFEC is focused purely on education staff and, in addition, is not recurring; there is an assumption that it will be absorbed into overall continuous professional development activity across the council after the first year. A completely different approach has been taken in respect of health visitors, and there is recurring money for health boards to ensure that health visitors maintain their skills. We see that as a bit of an inconsistency.

The Convener: Is that something that irks the council? I was going to ask you about it.

Alistair Gaw: Overall, if it is implemented properly, the bill has the potential to be revolutionary in shifting the balance of care and supporting early intervention and prevention, and training is part of that. If training, the kinship care measures and throughcare and aftercare are not properly funded, the risk is that money will be diverted from earlier intervention into supporting the other aspects of the bill and, actually, it will become counterproductive. That is my greatest concern.

The Convener: I am going to wind up the session in a moment, but do any of our guests have any further points that they feel the committee has not covered and that they wish to touch on?

Magnus Inglis: One query that I have is about the statement in the Scottish Parliament information centre briefing on the financial memorandum that COSLA has confirmed that the Government has confirmed that the bill will be fully funded. Alistair Gaw mentioned that issue previously. However, there is still a degree of uncertainty among local authorities, and certainly in Midlothian Council, about exactly what funding will be forthcoming to support the bill. We are doing a lot of work on how early years care and childcare will be put in place and on the costs involved in that, but we are trying to do so without quite knowing how much money we will get. From our perspective, it would certainly be useful to know how much money we will get, so that we can say how we will allocate it and provide the final details on how we will proceed. I am not sure whether the same applies in Edinburgh.

Alistair Gaw: As my colleague Magnus Inglis said, it would be prudent to have some contingency for the bill, and that would be my plea. We fully support the measures in the bill and we think that it absolutely heads in the right direction, but the reality is that there has been enormous difficulty in trying to model the costs of the measures, particularly those on looked-after children. We do not think that the estimated costs are robust. If the money comes out of the GAE in the next spending review, there will be major problems for us. It is important that, as COSLA has asked, we maintain an overview and ensure that, as the measures unfold and we get the details of the secondary legislation, sufficient resource is in place to enable the objectives of the bill to be met.

The Convener: Ms Murray, do you have any further points?

Inez Murray: No—I just stress how important it is to get it right.

The Convener: If we recall that the bill’s primary purpose is to "address the challenges faced by children and young people who experience poor outcomes throughout their lives", it is clear that we have to get it right. Mr Inglis makes a good point that I was going to raise directly with the bill team—I had noted that in the SPICe briefing.

I thank the witnesses for responding so well to our questions, and I thank members for their questions. We will now have a five-minute suspension to allow for the changeover of witnesses.

10:42

Meeting suspended.

On resuming—

The Convener: We continue our scrutiny of the financial memorandum for the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. I welcome our second panel of witnesses, who are Jim Carle of NHS Ayrshire and Arran, Sally Egan of NHS Lothian, and Clare Mayo of the Royal College of Nursing. We will go straight to questions. As usual, the first question will be from me. Normally, I ask a question of a specific witness—sometimes the whole panel—so if other panel members wish to add anything, please feel free to do so.

As I am an Ayrshire MSP, my first question is for Mr Carle. In paragraph 4 of your submission, you state:

"the financial implications were not well represented or discussed at the events" that your colleagues attended. In paragraph 11, you say:

"The expressed views suggest that NHS Boards will not be able to meet the financial costs incurred by the Bill."

Will you elaborate a wee bit on that?

Jim Carle (NHS Ayrshire and Arran): In the process that we went through, people were entirely focused on health and social care integration and the consequences of the new bill. We had lots of interesting discussion, but very little information was provided at the meetings to outline the financial implications or, indeed, how those implications were to be assessed.

We very much welcome the bill and have no issues with its content. We also welcome the support that has been given to the GIRFEC process in reaching full implementation. However, we are concerned that, to achieve not just the letter of the bill but the cultural change that we hope for, we will need to invest more heavily in early intervention and prevention.

We believe that the current system is effective, but if midwives and health visitors, in taking up the role of named person, are truly to capture the needs of individual families, it will require a significant amount of their time; we estimate about five hours per family, depending on the nature of the family and the nature of the intervention that is required. Our concern is that we do not have the necessary numbers of staff to meet current demand and we think that we will, as we improve our intervention in early years, require more staff in order to be more effective in that intervention.

We are confident that savings will be made through integration of systems. Alignment of our systems locally with the systems of local authorities and so on will achieve savings, but they will not be apparent within midwifery services or health visitor services; they are more likely to occur in services for later in the life course. To truly change the culture and achieve the savings later in the life course, we think that we need to invest more heavily in midwifery services and health visitor services.

The Convener: NHS Ayrshire and Arran covers about a third of a million people, so it offers quite a good snapshot of Scotland and we could possibly extrapolate from it to a reasonable extent. What additional health visiting staff would you require? What additional support staff would you require? What resource would you need to make this bill work in Ayrshire and Arran?

Jim Carle: I would love to be in a position to give you accurate figures on that—

The Convener: Ballpark figures would help. Would you need £1 million? Perhaps £10 million? Anything that you can give us would help the committee in its deliberations.

Jim Carle: We made some crude estimates of the additional health visiting staff and midwives that we would need and came up with a figure of about 10 additional midwives and 15 to 20 additional health visitors, at a cost of £21 an hour. The bill, I think, says £19.40—

The Convener: It says £19.40, actually.

Jim Carle: Yes—that is the estimated average across Scotland, which is perfectly appropriate and reasonable, given the figures that the Government had to work with. In Ayrshire and Arran, most of our health visiting staff are in the higher pay bands and the higher age groups, and we are conscious that that will make a significant difference to organisations that are as large as ours.

The Convener: Ms Egan, what is the position in Lothian, which is a much larger health board? Do you agree with what has been said?
Sally Egan (NHS Lothian): We have done quite a bit of financial modelling in relation to the early years change fund and in response to the implications of the bill. Across Lothian, we have just short of 50,000 children under five and around 9,500 to 10,000 children in the making in the midwifery case loads. We modelled on that assumption.

I was on the GIRFEC working group that informed the financial memorandum from a health perspective, and we considered the additionality for midwifery at the various stages in the child’s development, pre-birth and post-birth. Based on those assumptions, we came to the conclusion that the sum would be around £21 an hour. The £19.04 that the financial memorandum group came up with was based on a midpoint—band 6—health visitor and midwifery grading.

We looked at our age profile across the workforce and reckoned that, if we costed on that basis, we would be facing incremental drift very quickly, because most of our staff are fairly high up the increment scale. Therefore, our costings are based on the midpoint plus two incremental points above that, which brought us to the figure of £21. Factoring in our known birth rate and health visiting case loads, we concluded that we would need an additional 49 health visitors and 20 midwives. Again, as with Jim Carle’s figures, those calculations are fairly crude. They are based on a lot of discussion with staff on the front line and on what we know from our early implementation of GIRFEC in Edinburgh.

Edinburgh was a learning partner and is probably a bit further down the road of taking on the named person approach in health visiting. That requires additional work, so we spoke to a lot of people before we worked out the financial implications.

The Convener: In paragraph 29 of your submission you say:

“We do not think we can meet these costs”.

You go on to say:

“Nor do we think there is the capacity within the Health Visiting workforce in Scotland to respond within the timeline”.

It is not only about money, but the people who deliver the service.

Sally Egan: Yes—it is about human resources.

There is a general feeling in Scotland that we have not developed our health visiting workforce to meet the growing needs and demands of our population of vulnerable children. I was chief nurse in Edinburgh for a number of years, and I know that health visitors in Lothian were having to support more and more high-level child protection work, which in their opinion meant that the universal services did not get the attention that they would have liked them to have had. Health visitors were having to prioritise.

I cannot speak for other health boards, but in Lothian we recognised the issue some five to seven years ago and we have tried to grow our health visiting workforce and the infrastructure to support it. For example, we normally fully fund and train six health visitors through the Queen Margaret University postgraduate training programme, but this year we are training 12 health visitors. That is really in response to projections on retirement across Lothian. We have an ageing workforce and we need to attract young and enthusiastic people into nursing and midwifery.

We have started to grow the number of health visitors who graduate from Queen Margaret University. We cannot guarantee that we will keep them in NHS Lothian—they are free to take up jobs elsewhere—but we are trying to make the job as attractive as possible by ensuring that the support infrastructure is in place.

We also invested significantly to enable health visitors to take on the 27 to 30-month review this year. We are further investing to enable them to support the assessment of looked-after children this year. However, even that additionality will not be enough to enable full implementation of the named person approach in the timeline that is envisaged.

The Convener: The RCN says in paragraph 7 of its submission that health visiting would require another 355 whole-time equivalent posts to deliver what is envisaged in the bill. Paragraph 15 states:

“Nearly half (45%) of the NHS Scotland health visiting workforce is aged 50 or above.”

There are clearly concerns about staff capacity. Ms Mayo, how confident are you that we will be able to recruit the additional people who are needed to carry out the work, if we assume that the funding is put in place to pay them?

Clare Mayo (Royal College of Nursing): If action is taken rapidly and funding is put in place, we can do it. However, there are two issues. First, on getting it right for every child and the named person approach in the bill, it is great that the Scottish Government costed the additional hours, with the committee’s help, but our concern is that the costings do not take into account the normal workforce planning allowances. If we were to factor in the additional 22.5 per cent that the Scottish Government agrees is needed to cover annual leave, maternity leave and so on, the required number of additional whole-time equivalent posts would be closer to 450.

Secondly, the ageing workforce gives us an additional issue, as Sally Egan said. Additional posts are required to implement the bill, and additional posts are required to replace the existing workforce as many staff retire.

Our concern is that there are different approaches to health visitor training across Scotland. We would like the Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing to take action and to commission NHS Education for Scotland to develop health visiting programmes rapidly with national funding, so that training is consistent throughout Scotland.

NHS Lothian has led the way, but in other health board areas people are expected to do health visitor training on a bursary, with no guarantee of a job at the end of the training, rather than being seconded to do the training on a salary. There needs to be equity of educational provision throughout Scotland, with equity of terms and conditions in how people can undertake those education opportunities. That needs to happen now.

The Convener: On additional staffing, it is clear that Scotland is not uniform—some areas will have severe pressure and others will have less pressure. What should the Scottish Government do to address geographic issues?

Clare Mayo: The Scottish Government is undertaking a number of pieces of work under the chairmanship of Rosemary Lyness, who is NHS Lanarkshire’s director of nursing. A significant review of capacity is going on. We need to find out the number of health visitors across Scotland—the Information Services Division is doing that work.

Work is also going on on robust workforce planning and case loads, which are weighted according to need, geography, rurality and the significant deprivation issues that many areas face. Once we have robust ways of deciding how many health visitors we need and where we need them, every health board will be in a position to look closely at its particular needs, with the support of robust evidence-based approaches.

The Convener: My next question is to whoever wishes to answer, although it relates to Ms Mayo’s submission. Earlier, local government colleagues expressed concern that the financial memorandum considered training only in the NHS and not in local authorities. The RCN’s submission says that “office space, travel expenses, administrative support and consumables” are not included, and that “Paragraph 55 of the Financial Memorandum makes the case for administrative support in schools”, but

“The same administrative support for the Named Person approach and developing and implementing a Child’s Plan is required in the NHS.”

It is odd that funding for training in local government and for administrative support in the NHS seems to be lacking. I have no doubt that we will put that to the bill team, who will follow the current witnesses. What is the impact of the requirement for additional resources?

Clare Mayo: The financial memorandum allocates a one-off sum to NHS Education for Scotland to develop a training package. We feel that more detail behind that is needed. NHS Education for Scotland needs to come up with a proper costed education and training strategy, which might last a number of years. National resources are needed, but no provision is made for face-to-face training or the cost of delivering that training across Scotland.

We have asked for a properly costed education and development plan to be behind the sum that is to go to NHS Education for Scotland, and for the wider team to be included in the training programme. The success of getting it right for every child, as it has been implemented, is that it is a multiprofessional, multi-agency approach for every child and family. Delivery of the training in that way is powerful.

We should not divide off the health service and say, “There’s the health bit.” We should look at everybody who is involved in a child’s plan and everybody who is involved as a named person—that includes the wider teams and not just those who play the named person roles. The wider training for the whole of the workforce who are involved with children needs to be looked at and costed robustly.

Sally Egan: I support everything that Clare Mayo said. Various things are going on locally, but the question is whether that training is sufficient for the future role. Given the wider implications of being a named person under the bill, we will need to up our game on training. We need to make our staff really aware of the importance of information sharing and we need to support our information-sharing processes but, at the moment, we do not have the infrastructure to do that. How staff handle data and share information is an important part of the training.

For NHS Lothian, we have a Lothian and Borders partners group, and we are trying to develop training modules across the partners so that there is some consistency. The big issue for us is backfill, which has a cost implication, for freeing up staff to undertake the training, especially as we do not have the people to backfill with. Again, it is not just about the money, but about having capacity within the system.
Another part of our work in Lothian and Borders is that our GIRFEC development manager—she works for the five local authorities in our area, the two health boards and the police—will work with Queen Margaret University on the postgraduate health visitor course to ensure that the newly qualified health visitors have an understanding of what the named person role entails. That aspect is not really covered in any depth in the current curriculum, because it was not part of the previous review. So, as well as working with NES, we need to work with higher education institutions to ensure that our courses cover the named person role as part of the core competences.

Jim Carle: I fully endorse what my colleagues have said, so I would not want to repeat it. However, I just note that the bill’s costings for the health sector are predicated mainly on the named person function, which will require significant investment in terms of information and developing appropriate systems to take it forward. In NHS Ayrshire and Arran, we have developed Ayrshare, which is an online system that allows the development of a single child’s plan and the single chronology under GIRFEC. The system is inputted by, and shared jointly with, our local authority colleagues, and it will eventually be widened.

There will also be significant costs for the health sector from implementing the bill’s provisions for looked-after and accommodated children. If the health sector is to perform fully its function for that group of children, that will involve additional costs because we must make far more robust and effective the initial health needs assessment for looked-after and accommodated children. We will also have to develop systems by which we can support our local authority colleagues in deciding on the most effective place for the children and young people. We want to ensure that those places are as close to children’s homes as possible.

There are therefore a number of issues in the bill that might not have an obvious impact on the health sector but which we believe will have impacts over time. I support strongly the view that we need joint training on implementing the bill’s provisions. Further, we must take on board the burden for effective monitoring and evaluation of the different systems and the costs that will be associated with that, although it is extremely difficult to say at this point in time what those costs will be. We would argue for keeping under review, for at least the next two to three years, the financial implications of the bill’s implementation so that we can feed back much more accurate information to committees such as this, which would give you a sound basis on which to make decisions for the future.

We strongly feel, though, that we are not in a position to tell you what the additional burden will be. We are clear that we will make savings, but there will also be costs. The task is to strike the right balance between savings and the requirements for additional investment.

The Convener: Thank you for that. I open up the session to committee colleagues, and the first to ask questions will be Malcolm Chisholm, followed by Jamie Hepburn.

Malcolm Chisholm: It will probably be only one question, because most of what I was going to ask about has been covered. I was particularly interested in the costs of the named person role, and Mr Carle gave a comprehensive answer on that.

However, I am also interested in two of the RCN’s policy proposals, which might have financial implications. In fact, that is certainly the case for the health visitor proposal. The RCN has strongly emphasised that the named person should always be a health visitor and believes that there should be a statutory entitlement to universal health visiting services, which I find an attractive proposal. I am also interested in NHS Lothian’s discussion about health visitors and midwives, so my question is perhaps more for NHS Lothian and Sally Egan. Is your choice in that regard a policy or financial one? Would it make any difference financially whether the named person was a health visitor or a midwife?

In the interests of saving time, I will roll it all up in one question to the RCN. Obviously, you have a big focus in your initial submissions to this bill and to the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill on your concern about two legislative proposals that are likely to lead to two different approaches to the planning, delivery and governance of integrated care. Again, I suppose that we should not stray too much into the wider policy implications, but I am interested in whether you think there are financial consequences of that policy decision. I suppose that that is two questions.

First, I am interested in hearing from Sally Egan on NHS Lothian’s view on midwives, as distinct from health visitors.

Sally Egan: Within NHS Lothian, we have agreed that the midwife will be the named person for the mother and for the unborn child. The child does not have legal status until it is born, but our midwives are—and have been for a number of years—very involved in early detection around vulnerability and child protection, so we are not starting from scratch with our midwives.

We have also refreshed the maternity framework in Scotland and we have a policy on reducing antenatal inequalities, so the role of the midwife is recognised within the GIRFEC policy context, as you know. We have been training our midwives to take on the named person role, but with a recognition that there will be co-ordination, an administration support function and so on.

We see the midwife being the named person up until the child is born and then until the 10th day after they are born. Obviously, when the baby is born they may come out of hospital very quickly after birth, but the baby could go to a neonatal unit, so there are a lot of discussions going on about who the named person would be for children who are not discharged home with the mother. Within our universal pathway, the midwife would hand over to the health visitor around the 10th day, but where there was vulnerability, they would start planning together for that child’s needs and that family’s needs as early as possible with a recognition that that would involve people other than the midwife.

One of the things that we are trying to do is to embed some of the earlier recommendations in “Health for all children”, which was about midwives and health visitors working more proactively together during the antenatal period. That work has started.

Within our pathway, we see the midwife taking on the named person role, provided that they have the infrastructure to support them. We would not see them taking on the lead professional role. We have not spoken about that role and it is not within the legislation. However, the midwife would certainly take on the named person co-ordinating role because they would be looking after the mother and the unborn child. On the 10th day, we see the health visitor taking over. Currently, we have a model in which a qualified registered nurse or health visitor would see a child and family at least four times in the home setting, unless there were reasons why they could not gain access, so we see the health visitor as being the one who takes over the named person role.

For our teenage pregnant population, where they are part of the family nurse partnership programme, we see the family nurse as being the named person for that family. We also see that the health visitors and the family nurses cannot do it all, so there will be support from a mix of other professionals. We have a lot of that at present—support from nursery nurses, children and family centres and so on. Increasingly, our health visitors have staff nurses specialising in children and early years within their skill-mix establishment, but essentially we see the named person role being taken by the midwife, health visitor and FNP nurse in the main for that prebirth to preschool population.

Clare Mayo: As Mr Chisholm said, we believe that the bill should clearly state that the named person for the under-fives—following on from the midwife—should be a health visitor. That really confirms what is already happening in practice, but the statutory entitlement to a universal service will give consistency across Scotland. It will have financial implications, but we believe that it is necessary in order to deliver the named person service that matches the vision in getting it right for every child.

Proper resourcing is absolutely essential because if we are raising expectations with families to the effect that they will have the support of a named midwife, health visitor or teacher, we have to put in place the resources to support the professionals who deliver that service, or we are setting them up to fail. That is why the resources behind the bill are so important.

On the policy question about the bill going through Parliament at the same time as the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, there appear to be anomalies between the two bills. However, we are greatly reassured that the Local Government and Regeneration Committee is examining the two bills side by side. We hope that, as a result of consideration being given to the governance processes in the children’s services planning part of the bill, and the similar issues on joint working in the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, the two bills will work in a way that does not have negative financial consequences and the two sets of planning proposals will blend coherently. It is important that the committees that are responsible for those bills ensure that that is the case.

Malcolm Chisholm: If your favourite model was adopted, irrespective of whether it is good in policy terms, would that provide cost savings—or is that not really the main point?

Clare Mayo: That is not really the main point although, whichever model is proposed, it needs to be effective from a financial point of view as well as a governance and service delivery point of view.

Jamie Hepburn: I have not looked at the bill in great detail, but it is probably fair to say from the coverage that it has been fairly controversial, perhaps more because it is misunderstood than anything else.

Today, we are hearing concerns about the financial implications. Is it not the point that, as Sally Egan said, we are not starting from scratch? Given that midwives and health visitors have a role in the early part of a child’s life, there is already a de facto named person. That perhaps reflects the point that Ms Mayo made. The approach already happens in practice because, I
It is a case of looking at things holistically and looking at the whole pathway for children. Our modelling has been based on the assumption that health visitors are doing a lot of work at the moment, but the bill is asking for more than that. If we look at things in the wider context of the early years framework, there has to be more early intervention. The size of an average health visitor case load ranges from 250 to 350 nought to five-year-olds. How can the health visitor be the named person for that number of children, whose ratio of need extends from the highly vulnerable end—the additional needs end—to the universal end? How can health visitors be all things to all people, given their case loads?

Jamie Hepburn: I have a final question, which is specifically for Ms Egan. It is on an entirely different area of the bill—the duty that it will place on public bodies to report on the steps that they have taken to further the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child—which you address in paragraph 35 of your submission. It is important to put on record what you say:

“NHS Lothian recognises that undertaking more robust assessments will result in unidentified needs having to be met. While NHS Lothian staff agree with this in principle, it is expected that additional resources will be required to implement the plans. Lothian has a diverse population with around 19% of the population from ethnic minority backgrounds, and in Edinburgh it is much higher at around 26%. Although not all of these children and young people will have additional needs, there will be a number who will require interpreters (consultations take much longer), who may be socially isolated and have increased mental health needs. Therefore additional resources will be needed to ensure that these children and young people’s needs are identified and met that have not been outlined in the current Financial Memorandum.”

However, the fact that Lothian—particularly Edinburgh—has a diverse population and may have groups of young people who require interpreters has not come about as a consequence of the bill, so the question is: what happens at the moment? I presume that interpreters are provided.

Sally Egan: That does happen, but we need to prioritise. Getting interpretation services is a huge burden, particularly in antenatal care, when women need know what is happening, particularly during labour. The bill and the financial memorandum outline what has to happen for GIRFEC and the named person to be implemented, but we in NHS Lothian have been trying to address the growing requirement to meet the needs of our early years population, which is a highly diverse population. The same is true of additional learning in schools—we need to work out how we can meet the needs of children in that context.

We must recognise the issue. It is not associated with the bill per se, but it is something that we feel very strongly about. Our parent groups, which we consulted on the bill, felt that we had to get across the point about our minority ethnic population. We have a very high population of people from Poland and eastern Europe, as you know, but we have all sorts of other populations, too.

Jamie Hepburn: You say that the issue is not related to the bill, but in your submission you said that it was related to the bill. That clarification is helpful.

Sally Egan: As a consequence, we need to ensure that account is taken of those populations when the named person proposal is implemented.

Jamie Hepburn: Of course—I do not doubt that, but my point is that the circumstances that you identify in your submission do not arise as a consequence of the bill. You have agreed with that, which is helpful.

Gavin Brown: The largest cost that will fall on the NHS as a consequence of the bill is the cost of health visitors and public health nurses for what the financial memorandum refers to as the 20 per cent of children about whom there will be emerging or significant concerns. In 2016-17, which I suppose will be the first full year of implementation, £10 million of the £16 million cost to the NHS is attributed to health visitors and public health nurses for that cohort. The cost is shown as £10.2 million in 2016-17, but two years later, in 2018-19, it has fallen to £5.3 million. That is a drop of almost—but not quite—50 per cent in a two-year period. Is that credible?

Clare Mayo: Our written submission states that if the approach is effective there may be a small reduction over time, but that health visitors currently have little capacity to engage effectively with families and communities in a way that models the preventative approach.

As we have just heard from Sally Egan, most health visiting time is tied up in working with the families who need the most support. Health visitors do not currently have the capacity to undertake the preventative approach that is at the heart of the getting it right for every child agenda. The development of a child’s plan requires significant time and co-ordination, and at the centre is a relationship with a child and their family. Meetings need to be arranged, for example, and such demands are not going to reduce year on year at the rate that the modelling in the financial memorandum suggests. If we are going to make a real—and lasting—difference to families, that additional health visiting capacity needs to be sustained.

Sally Egan: I agree with Clare Mayo. I do not think that the cost will reduce significantly, because every year another 10,000 kids are born or come into Lothian, with the same percentage ratios for those who have vulnerabilities and additional needs.

Perhaps in 10 to 15 years, when we have been really effective with our early intervention and with our adult programmes to address substance misuse et cetera, we will see a changing picture, and health visitors will need to do less. However, the assumption is a bit flawed, and the more we have discussed it following the publication of the policy memorandum, the more we have picked up that view from our peers throughout Scotland.

I am the chair of the Scottish child health commissioners group, and I am also a member of the group—to which Clare Mayo referred—that Rosemary Lyness is about to kick off in Scotland to address various workstreams. The general consensus among the child health commissioners and the public health nursing advisory group is that the financial model in that part of the bill is a bit off-course. We will not see a difference that quickly.

Jim Carle: I fully support what has been said. The presumption that such a reduction in funding will be appropriate at that time in the process is flawed. We need to accept that we have to take what is very much a generational approach to try to turn the situation around. We will not see—if I can put it rather crudely—better parents until we have been undertaking the process for 10 to 15 years or thereabouts. At that point, we may be turning the situation around entirely, which we anticipate being able to do.

Where we are struggling is that we do not anticipate that the reduction in the percentage of families who require intensive intervention will come into play until much later in the life course. We are looking at seven years, perhaps, before we see any great impact. If we look at the birth pattern of the average family in Scotland, we see that most children, from the oldest to the youngest, happen to be born within a seven-year period, and we have to accept that the need for intervention in families will remain for a significant period of time.

Gavin Brown: Can you clarify the two figures that you mentioned, Mr Carle? You talked about 10 to 15 years, and towards the end of your answer you mentioned seven years. What will happen in 10 or 15 years that will not happen in seven years? Is it just a gradual process, or is there something significant about the seven years?

Jim Carle: It is a gradual process, but we expect to see individual families turning around and being healthier—if I can put it that way—within a seven-year period because that roughly corresponds with the birth profile that we are dealing with. When I was talking about a 15-year approach, I was thinking about the timescale in which the young people who are born today, for example, will be heading towards parenthood. We hope that early intervention will mean that people are better parents in future.

Gavin Brown: That is helpful.

Clare Mayo: I will make a couple of specific points. The figures in paragraph 60 of the financial memorandum are based on an assumption that by 2018-19 some children will be being born into families with whom the named person is familiar, which will lead to a significant reduction in additional work. We think that that considerably overstates the efficiencies that will be achieved in that way.

Another assumption is that less time will be spent dealing with families who are in crisis. It is a huge assumption that within two years there will be far fewer families in crisis. There will be families in crisis for many years to come.

Table 11 gives estimated additional midwife, health visitor and public health nurse hours for the coming years. However, a new 27 to 30-month check is being introduced, to identify toddlers who need additional support, and to reflect the new approach the figure for three-year-olds needs to remain at 10 hours for each year until the cohort of children who are in the zero to one age group in 2016-17 reach the age of three. That would reflect that we are picking up toddlers with additional needs now. Table 11 shows a fairly steep reduction in hours over the next four years, but we question those assumptions.

Gavin Brown: According to table 11, in 2016-17 a four-year-old will need 10 hours of additional work but by 2017-18 a four-year-old will need only four hours of additional work. That strikes me as an extremely large drop in a single year. What are your views on that?

Sally Egan: Some of this is to do with the idea that if everyone intervenes earlier and more intensive work is done, by the time a two-year-old is four they might need less intensive intervention than might be needed in year 1 of full implementation.

As I said, the working around this was fairly crude and was based on what we knew and what our staff were telling us, which we fed back to the GIRFEC team in the Government. We really do not know—it is an unknown quantity. People need to realise that assumptions are based on the best anecdotal evidence and data—we looked at our numbers at the time—but on-going review will be needed to ensure that we are making a difference.

The early years collaborative has three workstreams, which will look at the periods from pre-birth to a year old, a year to three years old and three years to five years old. There are high-level targets in there. We need to consider whether we are improving outcomes—it is not just about reducing hours. If we are not improving outcomes, we might find that we need more hours. That is a real possibility.

Everything is interrelated. If the health visitors find need that has not previously been identified, they will need resources so that they can support those families. Will we have enough early years provision for children who are not looked after? There will be additionality for looked-after two-year olds, but a child should not have to become looked after to secure additional intervention. It worries health visitors that they might pick up a lot of need for early intervention and then have to intervene without support from other people. It is all tied up with the wider picture about the resources that will be available to help health visitors to deliver the agenda.

Gavin Brown: We have considered the additional hours that might be required; another factor that affects the cost is the hourly rate that applies. The financial memorandum applies an hourly rate of £19.04 for midwives, health visitors and public health nurses. Clare Mayo, do you think that the accurate figure would be £19.04 plus the 22.5 per cent to which you referred in your submission, or should a figure higher than £19.04 apply? What is the official RCN position?

Clare Mayo: I think that the £19.04 was calculated on the basis of the mid-point of the scale, with national insurance added. Given that 47 per cent of the workforce are over 50 and most of them are on the upper end of the pay band, £19.04 per hour does not accurately reflect what the current workforce is paid. Sally Egan said in her submission that that certainly does not reflect what the current Lothian workforce is on. We took into account the fact that we are looking to recruit rapidly a significant number of newly qualified health visitors, which would take the average figure down, and perhaps the mid-point would be reasonable going forward. However, I certainly agree with Sally Egan. The figure does not reflect the salary bill for the current health visiting workforce, as most of them are at the upper end of the pay spine.

Gavin Brown: Is it fair to say that, in the early years of the policy, taking the mid-point will not be correct, whereas down the line it might be?

Clare Mayo: The £21 an hour figure is more accurate for the current postholders in the health visiting workforce.

Gavin Brown: For clarity, if the £21 an hour figure is accurate, is it the RCN’s view that the actual cost is £21 an hour plus 22.5 per cent, or does the £21 encapsulate that?

Clare Mayo: No. The 22.5 per cent is critical, because health visiting hours cannot be bought. Those hours have to be translated into posts. That is what the 22.5 per cent is about: it is about turning hours into posts. That is a separate calculation.

Gavin Brown: I get that, but what I am trying to establish is whether, if we take £21 as the figure, we need to add 22.5 per cent to that to get an accurate reflection of the costs.

Clare Mayo: Yes.

Gavin Brown: Thank you. That is helpful.

I have a final question. Another cost in table 13 is described as “Training backfill”. In 2015-16, around £1 million is allocated to training backfill. In 2016-17, there is approximately zero pounds, and the figure is zero pounds for every year after that. The financial memorandum says that training costs will be “subsumed” in future years. Is that a fair assumption, or is it likely that there will be some training costs after the initial year?

Sally Egan: There will always be on-going training costs, as we have staff turnover. Perhaps the training will not be as intensive as the initial training, depending on how the bill pans out and what is required. We try to build training costs into our workforce planning as part of NHS Lothian’s financial plan, but I do not think that the training costs will go away. We will always have to do multi-agency training, and I think that it will be in a menu of wider training.

I think that our Midlothian colleague spoke earlier about the children affected by parental substance misuse training for working with parents who have drug and alcohol problems. I think that it will be part of a wider training package for the whole early years delivery, not specifically for the named person. We are already developing modules through LearnPro that staff in both adult and children’s services can use, which will give them the basis of what getting it right for every child is about and what the roles of the named person, the lead professional and so on are.

The Convener: That has exhausted the committee’s questions. Are there any further points that the witnesses feel the committee has not covered and on which they wish to comment? You do not have to do so, but please feel free to do so if you want to.

Sally Egan: This is a simple point. In response to your questions to our Midlothian colleague earlier, we have a breakdown of the additionality in midwifery and health visiting by the community health partnerships in Lothian. For Midlothian, the breakdown is an additional six health visitors and two and a half midwives. That might help the committee to get a perspective on what things mean in respect of the staffing population in Midlothian. We have the same information for the other local authorities, which I can give the committee if it wants it.

The Convener: That is very helpful. Does Ms Mayo or Mr Carle wish to add anything?

Jim Carle: I would like to reinforce a couple of points. We are strongly of the view that the situation needs to be kept under review. We would fully accept the need to take on board the burden of ensuring that we have effective monitoring and evaluation systems in place so that we can feed back accurate information to you, but if we are truly to change the culture in Scotland and grasp this opportunity, in which we strongly believe, we need to consider the need for on-going investment in the early years to achieve the outcomes that we are trying to achieve.

Clare Mayo: Similarly, I think that there is a huge opportunity in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill to resource a universal health visiting service so that every family in Scotland has a named health visitor who can support people in their roles as new parents. There is a huge opportunity, but it must be properly resourced. I urge the Finance Committee to look carefully at the figures and ensure that there are the resources behind the bill to make a difference for families.

The Convener: Thank you. I do not know whether we can ensure that the resources are there, but we can certainly lobby for them to be there.

Thank you very much. I appreciate the questions from the committee and, most important, of course, the evidence from our witnesses.

There will be another brief suspension of five minutes or so to allow the bill team to get into position.
Meeting suspended.

On resuming—

The Convener: We still have a lot to get through today, and colleagues have loads of questions that they are keen to ask. We will therefore get into them more or less straight away.

I welcome our third panel of witnesses on the financial memorandum to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. They are Mr Tim Barraclough, Mr Scott Mackay and Mr Phil Raines, who are from the Scottish Government’s bill team. You are all very welcome. I understand that there will be a short opening statement.

Tim Barraclough (Scottish Government): Good morning. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill forms part of the Government’s programme to meet ministers’ ambition to make Scotland the best place in the world to grow up. As members are already well aware, the bill’s provisions are many and detailed. The key principles that thread through the bill are early intervention and prevention; the rights of children and young people; putting the child or young person at the centre of services and ensuring that services are designed around them to meet their needs; and the most efficient and effective deployment of public services, focused on achieving outcomes.

The bill builds on the ever-growing body of expertise, knowledge, understanding and experience relating to the wellbeing of children and young people. It is a broad-ranging bill and covers a number of related policy areas, some of which are large and complex. As members know, those include measures around children’s rights; the getting it right for every child approach, which is designed to help services to co-operate and collaborate to meet children’s needs; a substantial extension of the free provision of early learning and childcare; and a number of measures to provide further support to looked-after children and those in kinship care.

The financial memorandum sets out the Government’s best estimates, at the time of the bill’s introduction earlier this year, of the costs of all those measures. In formulating the estimates, we drew on evidence from a wide range of stakeholders, who each brought their own different perspectives to the task. Accommodating all that evidence, taking into account the uncertainties that exist and then projecting the future impact of what are complex measures on a national basis—a Scotland-wide basis—meant that we had to make a number of assumptions in developing the estimates. As members have already heard, the only true test of those assumptions will come with the implementation of the bill’s provisions.

As I said, the bill builds on approaches and good practice that have been developed in previous years. Scottish ministers have already made a significant investment in services for children and young people, confident in the long-term benefits—tangible and intangible—that that will bring. Ministers intend to continue with that investment and, as part of the discussions on the funding settlement for future years, they have committed to fully fund the additional costs to local authorities that arise from the bill.

The team are happy to take any questions that members may have on the bill and its financial memorandum.

The Convener: Thank you very much for that opening statement. As is normally the case, I will start with a few questions; I will then open out the session to colleagues.

First, I take you to the SPICe briefing’s executive summary, which says:

“The majority of costs (around 90% on average) fall on local authorities. According to COSLA, the Scottish Government has committed to fully funding the requirements of the Bill in respect of their impact on local authorities.”

Does that remain the case? In a number of circumstances, costs could go beyond what is in the financial memorandum. Are there contingencies to ensure that what has been stated is indeed the case?

Tim Barraclough: The Government has promised to fully fund the additional costs. The financial memorandum represents our estimate of additional costs as at earlier this year. Of course, more information will come out, now and as we proceed towards implementation of the measures, and the Government is committed to ensuring that additional costs are properly assessed as they arise and are funded as appropriate.

Scott Mackay (Scottish Government): That will be taken forward as part of the continuing discussions between ministers and local government in negotiating settlements.

The Convener: We received a letter from the minister, Aileen Campbell, who spoke about additional moneys “for extending funded early learning and childcare to two year olds”, with an additional £3.4 million giving “a total of £4.5 million.”

There is also an estimate of £1.2 million for uprating partner provider payments”.

which will become £2 million.

Why is there such a differential, for example between £1.1 million in the original estimate and £4.5 million? That seems quite a difference.

Scott Mackay: The original estimate sets out our assessment of the additional hours required for looked-after two-year-olds. The letter that you received refers to the overall funding position for looked-after two-year-olds in its entirety.

At the moment, there is an element of funding that flows to local government through the early years change fund. In arriving at the figure of £4.5 million, ministers sought to address overall costing issues with the provision for looked-after two-year-olds in its entirety, rather than the additional hours that are set out in the financial memorandum.

The Convener: On the methodology, it has been suggested that the basis for many of the assumptions in the financial memorandum is unclear. A number of organisations, including COSLA and individual local authorities, have questioned that.

Can you talk us through how some of the assumptions were derived? As you will have heard from this morning’s evidence, there is quite a difference of opinion around how the assumptions will work in reality.

Tim Barraclough: It is fair to say that the availability of base evidence is quite variable across the range of policy areas covered in the bill. We tried to get the best estimates that we could and tested them quite extensively, not only with COSLA but with other stakeholders. We had a series of meetings at which we went through our cost assumptions and tested them against the information that the stakeholders could provide at the time.

Phil Raines (Scottish Government): It might be helpful to pick up on specific assumptions, because we will have arrived at and tested each set of assumptions in different ways. At the end of the day, however, we have to provide a cost estimate, so we use the best information that we have to develop a national picture—and I stress the word “national”. Clearly, given some of the assumptions and costs used in developing national averages, you would not expect every local area to fit exactly with the national average. You heard earlier from Alistair Gaw—I am sure that we will discuss the kinship care order in due course—and although his position might reflect what goes on in Edinburgh we have to take the evidence that suggests what the national picture might be. There is a question about how that funding goes to local areas, but that is a subsequent issue that I am sure we can also discuss.

The Convener: Why, then, have costs highlighted by the RCN for “office space, travel expenses, administrative support and consumables”

not been included? Moreover, what consideration has been given to capacity with regard to health visitor numbers, which is an issue that we discussed with the previous panel?

Phil Raines: I guess that there are two sets of issues with regard to the development of health visitor numbers and indeed health visitor capacity: first, our assumptions about additional workloads; and, secondly, our assumptions about current experience. We have to test out those assumptions, particularly in respect of GIRFEC, because, as has often been said at this committee and elsewhere, there is a significant tradition of implementing GIRFEC and therefore experience to draw on.

Traditionally, in many of the calculations for health visitors’ administrative costs, those costs are subsumed within their general costs; indeed, that distinction has arisen from the way in which local authority costs are provided. I have to say that with regard to consumables and accommodation I am not sure what sort of costs we would be talking about. However, the key cost with regard to health visitors and the way in which NHS would carry out its GIRFEC duties arises with regard to the 18 to 20 per cent of children with particular concerns.

The Convener: What is your response to NHS Lothian’s comment that

“We do not think we can meet these costs within our current financial allocation. Nor do we think there is the capacity within the Health Visiting workforce in Scotland to respond within the timeline” and that the bill’s assumptions in that regard are wholly unrealistic?

Phil Raines: You raise a couple of sets of issues. On the question whether the health board can meet the costs within its existing capacity or financial settlement, the financial memorandum is testament to our view that there is a need for some form of additional capacity and therefore a need to meet certain additional costs. The question of how those costs are to be met will have to be discussed with NHS boards, taking account of the capacity of the current health visitor workforce and how that might need to expand over time.

We are happy to go through the specific assumptions that underlie the costings in the bill but I can tell the committee that a lot of time and work have gone into devising them and thinking them through. The underlying principle of those assumptions is early intervention—intervening in the life of a child or a family at an early stage when trouble might be starting to happen saves costs further down the line.

I noticed that some of the discussion with the previous panel revolved around table 11. I am happy to go through that, but many of the assumptions around it work on the basis that, if there is more intensive intervention than currently exists with nought to one-year-olds, the same level of intervention will not necessarily be required in the following years, as they get older, because we will have intervened early and taken the necessary steps to prevent problems from arising. We would expect that that early intervention will lead to less time being spent year on year.

The Convener: Indeed we would, but we would not expect a precipitous reduction. People who work at the coalface and deal with those children say that there will be significant improvements, but that that will happen not over a couple of years or three years but over a much longer period. Their concern is that, given their experience, the figures, in terms of delivering the savings that you are talking about over a short period, are not realistic, and that that would lead, two or three years after the bill has been passed, to significant funding shortfalls.

Phil Raines: I am a bit surprised by that. If you look at table 11, you will see that we have put in an additional 10 hours for the nought to one-year-olds in the first year that is listed, which is 2016-17. That is not the time that every health visitor should be spending on kids with emerging significant concerns at present, but what we expect to be put in additionally. We would expect that to bear some fruit in the following year—2017-18—as those kids become one-year-olds. The assumption is that the 10 hours that we invest on average, because some will require far more intensive work than others—will bear fruit and that such an intensive investment of health visitor time will not be needed as we go forward.

The Convener: In table 11, why do the 10 hours for nought to one-year-olds in 2016-17 and 2017-18 then go down to eight hours? Why is there assumed to be a 20 per cent reduction in need for newborn children?

Phil Raines: We would expect that, as the health visitor role gets bedded in over time and in particular as midwives have a much more active role at the pre-birth stage, savings will develop. As GIRFEC becomes, if I can use the expression, the air that services breathe, which is what all the provisions in the bill aim to ensure, we expect that, over a couple of years, we will not need such intensive involvement from the early stages, although we will still require significant involvement, and that is reflected in the provision of eight hours from 2018-19 onwards.

The Convener: I will allow my colleagues to come in in a minute because they are all keen, but I want first to ask the panel a further question about nursery provision. You will have seen the comments that Inez Murray makes in the National Day Nurseries Association submission, paragraph 15 of which states:

“We are not confident that partner providers of early learning and childcare can meet the costs associated with the Bill unless measures are taken by government to ensure sufficient funding is allocated to local authorities and actually reaches providers in the form of a viable hourly rate for high-quality provision for children.”

You will have heard that some authorities have been quite naughty about passing on funding. What will you do to ensure that the funding is realistic and that it is delivered directly by local authorities to partner nurseries?

Tim Barraclough: The bill does not provide a mechanism for local authorities to pass on funding to partner providers. Ultimately, there are different arrangements in different areas between local authorities and their partner providers. At the moment, Government policy is not to dictate to local authorities exactly how they should spend their money but to provide money within the overall envelope of their single outcome agreement. There is no specific proposal that we can put forward or would have in place to say that there will be some kind of ring fencing that will force local authorities to pass on funding to partner providers.

The Convener: Indeed, so you cannot guarantee that what you are trying to achieve through the bill will be achieved. Local authorities might not pass on the money to those who will have to deliver at the sharp end.

Tim Barraclough: We are putting an obligation on local authorities to ensure that there is provision and that the 600 hours of early learning and childcare are available. Again, it is up to local authorities to decide how they will deliver on that obligation, but we expect them to deliver on it properly and we will provide the funding to help them to do that.
The Convener: Without further duties, is it not the case that some local authorities are more likely than others to be—let me try to put this diplomatically—much more supportive of the bill’s aims? We might find significant differences in delivery across the country.

Tim Barraclough: Local authorities will also be under a duty to report on how they have delivered all their children’s services, so such matters will then become part of public information. I do not think that we are in a position to say what position local authorities might take in implementing the bill. All that we can say is that the bill will require them to undertake a number of duties, including the provision of the early learning and childcare hours, and we expect them to deliver that.

The Convener: I will now open out the discussion to colleagues.

Michael McMahon (Uddingston and Bellshill) (Lab): My question is, similarly, on the assumptions that have been made in the financial memorandum. Mr Barraclough, in your opening comments you said that the only true test of those assumptions will come with implementation. That is a given, as we will not entirely know until then. However, best estimates and educated guesses, as well as evidence from abroad, suggest that investment in prevention involves an initial cost that needs to be met if we are to achieve the desired outcomes that we ultimately want to see. The submissions to the committee and the evidence that I have received from talking to people about their perceptions of the bill suggest that the assumptions that you are working on do not meet with the general concept of preventative spend.

For example, the provision of foster care is currently so far behind the curve that, even if we invest more in that, we will still fall way short of what would be required to achieve the outcomes that you are predicting in the financial memorandum. If the assumptions that you are working on are flawed from the outset, you cannot possibly achieve the predictions that are in the financial memorandum. Is that not the case?

Tim Barraclough: All that I can say is that, as some of the evidence that we have seen says, the Scottish Government has provided the best estimates that were available at the time of the introduction of the bill for the provisions that are in the bill. There are wider issues about whether we can achieve all the policy aims of ministers, but the bill is only one part of a much wider policy programme to deliver better outcomes for children and young people. A range of other measures might need to be undertaken to support what the bill is contributing to achieve.

We went through a rigorous process of finding the best available evidence, which is patchy in some places and non-existent in others. We have made some assumptions on how the measures will play out over time, but those estimates could of course be looked at again in the light of further evidence from authorities and health boards as they prepare for and implement the provisions. These are the best estimates that we could put together at the time.

Michael McMahon: From the evidence that we have received, the best estimates from NHS boards, children’s charities, local government bodies and foster care organisations all say that your best estimates are wrong. Somebody is getting it wrong, so why are you right and all those other organisations wrong? Those organisations are looking at good evidence that comes from their experience and from comparable investments in other jurisdictions. Why is it that all those organisations are wrong and your best estimate is right?

Tim Barraclough: I am not saying that all those organisations are wrong. As I said in my opening statement, we received a wide range of submissions from a wide range of stakeholders, some of whom were saying quite different things. We had to make our best judgment on which of those needed to be incorporated into an estimate for the additional costs of the bill and which needed to be thought about or looked at in future in the light of further evidence.

As I said, at the moment we have gathered together evidence—this is not just evidence generated internally within the Scottish Government—from consultation with a number of stakeholders. In particular, with COSLA we had a very intensive going through of all the provisions that relate to local authorities. Some of the evidence that we have seen has suggested that our estimates are as good as they can be in the light of the evidence available.

Scott Mackay: We have taken the steps that we can to test our assumptions with key stakeholders prior to arriving at the figures that we have put in the financial memorandum.

Michael McMahon: Is all the evidence to substantiate your position available?

Tim Barraclough: The financial memorandum sets out where the Government has placed its judgment. Some evidence was gathered from meetings and from the submissions that the Government received as part of the consultation process. Some of that information will be available, but some of it came from sitting down with organisations such as COSLA to work through the estimates.
Phil Raines: I add that it is not as if all this is new. Michael McMahon refers to the approach that has been taken to preventative spend. Some areas of the bill are new. For example, there is no real precedent for kinship care, so we are having to give our best guess and make assumptions in working out when the savings kick in. However, there is a lot of experience with GIRFEC, so we can draw on the experience of people who have gone a long way down that road. We therefore understand the kind of savings that will be made, the kind of experience that staff will have in developing GIRFEC and taking it forward and the timescale within which that might take place.

Michael McMahon: It is therefore strange that organisations that are involved in GIRFEC say that your estimates are all wrong.

Phil Raines: Not the City of Edinburgh Council nor Highland Council, which are among the local authorities that have perhaps been taking forward GIRFEC most actively. Authorities that have not taken it forward as actively will obviously have more concerns and more uncertainty about how it might operate in their areas.

The Convener: Jamie Hepburn has a question.

Jamie Hepburn: Actually, convener, you have already covered the area that I wanted to explore, so I have no questions at this time.

The Convener: Okay. John Mason has a question.

John Mason: My questions follow on from what Michael McMahon said. A number of phrases such as “best estimates” and “best guess” were used in the previous answer. This is a major bill and I think that everybody welcomes its intentions. Is it fair to say that we are going into largely unknown territory, for example on kinship care, and that neither you nor the previous witnesses have a great idea of the needs, the costs, the demand or any of that? Is that not basically where we are at?

Phil Raines: If we take the example of kinship care, I am not sure that that is the case. The figures are a best-guess estimate, because it is a new policy area and we do not have any obvious precedents. It is not like the throughcare and aftercare proposals, because in that case we have some understanding of how the system operates now for 19 to 21-year-olds, so we can make some assumptions that can be reasonably tested about how that approach will be applied up to the age of 25 or 26, although there may be differences of opinion about how the policies are applied.

Kinship care is different, but we stand by the logic of the kinship care model and the proxies—if I can use that term—from which we have drawn the estimates. The kinship care order operates on the very simple principle that if you can get one child out of kinship care for one year, you can save about £9,000. The bill tries to do that in three ways. It does it through the kinship care order, which is in effect an existing instrument—a section 11 order under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 with some modifications—to entice people in kinship care to move across to a less expensive way of achieving permanence for children. The bill also tries to achieve it by diverting children who might be in informal care and children in families where a crisis might be emerging through family counselling measures to avoid them going into care. We have drawn the estimates from the best evidence that is available.

I know that Alistair Gaw and others talked about the assumptions that went into trying to predict the numbers. It is a tricky business to try to work out what the numbers will be, but it would seem reasonable, given that we are looking at something that is a variation of an existing instrument—a section 11 order—to look at how section 11 orders have been taken up to date. We can derive estimates from that about the number of kinship carers and informal carers who will come forward. The estimates suggest that the numbers are, relatively speaking, quite low.

We have therefore added to those estimates and suggested that a higher percentage of those people might well come forward. I point out, however, that we have drawn on the available national data and the experience of people who have tried to seek permanence through the existing instruments.

John Mason: I do not disagree with you, but I have to say that my worries increase whenever you use phrases such as “best available”.

The Convener: How long is a piece of string?

John Mason: Exactly.

You have argued the case for how this will be better for one child, but I think that we are all convinced of that. Our questions are actually more about the number of children who are out there and the number in informal kinship care, and the only impression that I have had from the witnesses we have taken evidence from is that such information is extremely uncertain and very vague. Given that I am past being convinced that there are any certain numbers out there, my next question has to be about the review process that is in place. If a local authority, the local NHS board or whoever finds things to be quite different from what had been expected, how quickly will that be fed through to Government and how quickly will the figures be reviewed?
Phil Raines: It all depends on the different provisions in the bill. With regard to looked-after children, a key element of liaison between the Scottish Government, local government and key stakeholders will be the development of the regulations on this issue. Those regulations will be key to how the kinship care order and throughcare and aftercare are taken forward, because they will set out the types of support that might be available, the timespan over which that support might legitimately be offered and the tests that will apply to people who wish to be considered for the kinship care order or throughcare and aftercare. The process of developing those regulations will enable feedback to be made, and that feedback will continue as the relevant teams in the Scottish Government work with stakeholders in implementing them.

As for GIRFEC, the Scottish Government and the relevant team has for years now been very actively engaged in implementing the approach across the country. I am saying this off the top of my head—the figure is certainly in the financial memorandum—but the Scottish Government is putting something like £7.8 million to £8 million into engaging with stakeholders to get a sense of the issues or problems that might be emerging. We have also set up a programme board comprising the Scottish Government and stakeholders to monitor and keep an eye on the assessment of implementation. In short, the mechanisms for feeding back information on how the policy is being put into practice, where the problems are emerging and, indeed, what the resource implications are going to be are already in place, but they are different for different parts of the bill.

John Mason: Mr Raines—I think—said in a previous response that meeting the need for more health visitors was a matter for health boards. Again, I am concerned by the uncertainty over this issue. We have, for example, heard evidence about the number of health visitors that will be needed, adding on cover for holidays and all that kind of thing, and whether they can be trained in time.

Phil Raines: I note, first of all, that these provisions will be implemented by 2016-17 and that we have costed and indeed put together timescales for implementation.

I have two comments on this matter. First of all, this is established practice in the NHS. Chief executive letter 29, I believe, made it very clear that GIRFEC should be implemented across the NHS while health for all children 4—or HALL 4—made it clear that this was to be a very important part of the roles of health visitors and key health staff. It is not as though a lot of this is new; there should already be a significant awareness of GIRFEC and its issues.

As for calculating what might be required, we can calculate where the gap is and what additionally will be required to take these duties forward. How health boards choose to do that is partly a discussion that they need to have with national Government anyway, but the issue is also how each individual health board can take these things forward. After all, they will all be in different places and starting from different points in implementing GIRFEC. At the moment, therefore, it is difficult to be able to say exactly how health boards will move forward on this, the areas where significant expansion might be needed in the number of health visitors and the areas where, because they have already implemented the named person service to a significant extent, changeover might not be as major an issue as it will be for others.

John Mason: I have a question on staff costs in nurseries. A rate of £4.09 per hour was suggested in evidence, but we heard that Glasgow was paying £2.72 per hour and that the actual costs may be about £4.51 or thereabouts. Is there no involvement from the Government in that? Is how that works left entirely to local authorities so that if, say, nurseries were to close, that would just be one of those things?

Tim Barraclough: At the moment, it is a matter for local authorities between them to arrange for the provision of early learning and childcare, so it is not something that we are getting involved in.

John Mason: Thank you.

Gavin Brown: In the previous evidence session, we focused on the cost to the NHS. We heard evidence from representatives of two health boards and the Royal College of Nursing who, when asked whether the cost estimates were credible, said no. The estimated cost for working with the 20 per cent of children with significant concerns is £10.2 million in 2016-17, dropping to £5.3 million in 2018-19. How did you arrive at a figure that is close to a 50 per cent drop over a two-year period?

Phil Raines: I think that the majority of that will be from the reduction in staff costs, but I need to look at the table in question.

Gavin Brown: It is the bottom line in table 13.

Phil Raines: The most significant reduction is clearly to do with the role of health visitors with the children who have the most needs. The information in table 13 is based on table 11: it is our estimate of the reduction in the number of hours that the health visitors would need to spend with the zero to five-year-olds. We believe that that will be a reflection of the impact of early intervention and the intensive work that will be put in at the start of the roll-out of the named person role. For example, the zero to one-year-olds will receive quite intensive support in 2016-17, but we estimate that by 2019-20 they will not require as much intensive support. That is reflected in the tapering of the costs.

Gavin Brown: The evidence that we heard from health organisations was that that was simply incorrect and that we would not get anywhere like that drop in two years; they suggested that it would take seven years or, in some cases, 10 to 15 years. How did you reach your view that the costs would drop so dramatically and quickly?

Phil Raines: I refer to the answer that I gave the convener earlier, which is that table 11 is based on the assumption that, if there is significantly more intensive support for zero to one-year-olds in year 1 of the roll-out of the bill’s provisions, they will not require as much investment, on average, as they become older and become the one-year-olds of the following year and the two-year-olds of the year after that. Clearly, though, some will require quite intensive investment all the way through. However, the impact of getting in early is in ensuring that the problems—this is the whole principle of having the named person—that people would not necessarily have spotted previously can be recognised and addressed quickly. We would expect that impact to be reflected pretty immediately. On average, we would expect to see benefits for those kids in successive years as they get older.

It might be true for some children that the intensive intervention in their lives when they are one-year-olds is still going on when they are five or six. However, if that were true for all the children in the 18 to 20 per cent group, that would suggest that the operation of the named person and the whole ethos of early intervention are questionable. As the child gets older, we would expect there to be some gain from intervening in their first couple of years.

Gavin Brown: The experts from whom we heard said that they would expect gains but that they would be small initially and become larger over time. Do you think that those experts did not understand table 11?

Phil Raines: They may well have understood table 11. We tested our assumptions in areas that have gone very far forward with GIRFEC, such as Highland, which has developed it as a pathfinder. We believe that our assumptions are reasonable. We tested them with managers who are responsible for taking forward the implementation of GIRFEC across NHS boards. The feedback that we got from them is that they are not unreasonable assumptions.

Gavin Brown: You have taken it up with health boards, but the health boards that spoke to us said that you were wrong. Who are the stakeholders who disagree with what we have heard this morning?

Phil Raines: Those people who are furthest forward in implementing GIRFEC, which are areas such as the Highlands, and those groups that have been most closely associated with the roll-out of GIRFEC within each of the individual health boards—the GIRFEC implementation groups, which I believe are called CEL 29 managers groups.

Gavin Brown: Your view is that Highland would agree with you. Which other key stakeholders would agree with you?

Phil Raines: I have set out the areas that we have spoken to.

Gavin Brown: Just for clarity, was the Highland example based on 100 children?

Phil Raines: Was the Highland example based on 100 children?

Gavin Brown: Yes.

Phil Raines: The Highland example is based on the 2006 to 2009 pathfinder, which was developed and rolled out across the region as a whole.

Gavin Brown: Okay, we will leave that point but, for the sake of clarity, the only stakeholder that you can name that agrees with you is Highland.

Phil Raines: And those managers who are responsible for implementing GIRFEC across NHS boards.

Gavin Brown: Okay, but we heard a contrary view from NHS boards earlier, so where is the evidence from the managers who you describe?

Phil Raines: There will be contrary views about this.

Gavin Brown: That is what I am saying.

Phil Raines: We are drawing on the experience of those people who have implemented GIRFEC or are closely associated with GIRFEC. Other views will come to bear.

Gavin Brown: This is quite important. You are saying to the committee that the views that we heard from NHS boards—the official NHS board Phil Raines: I am not sure that what you heard would count as the official NHS view. I imagine that there is a range of different views about implementing GIRFEC because, as has often been pointed out, it is quite a complex area that requires looking at assumptions and, to a large extent, testing it on the way that it has been rolled out by those who, if you will, are pioneering the approach across Scotland.

Gavin Brown: I do not want to dwell on the point, but do you see my issue? This parliamentary committee has received formal written submissions from NHS boards, which we then questioned. In my view, therefore, that is the official NHS view. You are saying to me that you have evidence from others within the NHS who disagree. As a parliamentary committee, we cannot just take the word of someone who says, “This is what other people think.” The process is that we look at the evidence, analyse it and make decisions on it, so my question is this: where is the evidence that supports the view that you have just given?

Phil Raines: I come back to talking about the basis on which we drew the estimates, which was largely the experience of those areas that have pioneered GIRFEC, and assumptions on the way in which early intervention would kick in. I have not heard evidence today that specifically challenges that; the earlier witnesses just said that they would see gains being developed during seven or 15 years, which was one of the expressions used earlier. I would find that surprising for an individual child’s life. We tested those assumptions out with a specific group that was responsible for implementing GIRFEC. That is the basis on which we have derived those costs.

Gavin Brown: I am not satisfied with that response, but I will not dwell on it because we are not getting anywhere.

The other issue that I wanted to focus on was the cost of GIRFEC for local authorities. The Government view is that the cost in additional teacher staffing time in the first year will be £7.84 million but, for every year after that, the cost will be nil—there will be no cost at all for any local authority. How did you reach that conclusion?

Phil Raines: The assumption is that, for the first year, there will need to be a specific roll-out of training around the named person and the child’s plan. The financial memorandum sets out the number of staff that will be involved and the backfilling ratios, as well as the costs for how we think the development of materials might take place, and what have you. For every year thereafter, we assume that—and we have tested this with a number of stakeholders—it will be integrated into existing continuing professional development, as is the case with training for additional support for learning needs under the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004.

Some of the training that teachers are required to do annually, such as child protection training, will change significantly when the named person system is in place, because the way in which child protection is dealt with will change significantly. We imagine that, rather than the named person training being added to the existing complement of continuing professional development that local authority staff and, in particular, education staff require, the existing CPD courses will need to change to integrate the way in which the named person system should operate. The named person is not a role that stands separately from what teachers or health visitors do. A lot of it—in fact, the heart of it—is based on the way in which things should be done at present. For example, a lot of it is based on ideas of child protection. So the way in which child protection training is provided should take into account that named person training.

Gavin Brown: Okay, but let us forget about training for a minute and think instead about the implementation of the additional 3.5 hours that will be required for the 10 per cent cohort. You say that that will cost £7.8 million in year 1 but will not cost anything in year 2, and you say that you have tested that with stakeholders.

The stakeholder that has had the most mentions from the Government bill team is COSLA. You have road tested your assumptions with it—I think that the expression that was used was that you have done “intensive” work with COSLA. However, on the issue of staff costs, the COSLA submission says that the assumption that there will be no costs in year 2 is “speculative” and basically assumes that the money “can be saved from elsewhere in the system to accommodate this.”

The submission continues:

“COSLA is of the view that the ... cost identified for staff time should be funded on a recurring basis.”

It goes on to say:

“It is not the experience of some local authorities that implementing GIRFEC is reducing the number of meetings or administration.”

You have relied heavily on COSLA in reaching your assumptions, but it has reached a polar opposite view from the bill team—COSLA says that the funding should be recurring, whereas you say that it should be nil.

Phil Raines: I would not say that we relied heavily on COSLA for the assumptions; I think that we said that we had intensive discussion with COSLA about the issue.

We worked with COSLA on whether we could develop a methodology or way of calculating the costs and benefits that arise from GIRFEC. I believe that, in statements to the Education and Culture Committee yesterday, COSLA admitted that the area is difficult and complex, so there is no suggestion that there is an alternate methodology or better way of doing it—COSLA recognises that there is a lot of uncertainty.

I am certain that some of COSLA’s members would challenge the basis on which the figures have been derived. We have derived the estimates on the basis of areas that have been implementing GIRFEC. That necessarily means a smaller number of areas. In particular, we have worked with Highland Council and the City of Edinburgh Council. Members will have noticed that Alistair Gaw, who works in an area that has been fairly active in taking forward GIRFEC, did not seem to have significant concerns about the assumptions. We have tested the estimates with other areas such as Fife, Angus and South Ayrshire.

Gavin Brown: Do all those areas agree that the cost will be nil from year 2 onwards?

Scott Mackay: I draw your attention to the written submission from the City of Edinburgh Council, which states:

“The Council believes that the costs for Children’s Rights, GIRFEC, Early Learning/Childcare and Other Proposals are accurately reflected based on our understanding of the requirements of the legislation.”

Gavin Brown: One council says that, but COSLA, which represents all the councils, takes the polar opposite view. Which other councils say that the cost will be nil, which seems counterintuitive?

Phil Raines: I believe that the committee has received submissions from Falkirk, Fife and South Ayrshire councils. I am not sure whether you have one from Angus Council, but it was one of the councils that we spoke to. Certainly, if memory serves, although I believe that Falkirk might have drawn attention to our estimate with regard to the number of hours per child on average—the 3.5 hour figure—I do not believe that the other three councils necessarily contested the underlying assumption about the way in which the savings kick in relatively quickly.

Gavin Brown: So, you are saying that all the other councils that have submitted evidence think that a cost of zero for year 2 onwards is accurate.

Phil Raines: We would give significant weight to the views of people who have had experience in implementing GIRFEC in the ways that the bill proposes, because they have been at the front line and have seen how GIRFEC works in practice. We would naturally take a line from their experience.

Gavin Brown: If a majority of councils held the opposite view, would you change your assumptions and the funding that would flow through the bill?

Phil Raines: We have to draw the estimates that we have made from a logical basis. If councils are able to put forward a series of arguments that clearly undermine that basis, as opposed to just saying “We don’t agree”—I think they have to say something a lot more substantive than that—we will want to look back at the assumptions.

A number of the areas are difficult to estimate, so we certainly remain open to having such discussions. We would want to test all suggestions with people who have real experience in implementing GIRFEC, as opposed to people who have a speculative—if I may put it that way—concern about what things might be like in their area and what they think implementation might involve.

Tim Barraclough: GIRFEC is already being rolled out across the country. As Mr Raines said, there is a GIRFEC implementation programme board, which is monitoring the implementation and trying to assess what is involved. It will get back evidence on how everything is working across the country. We would not want to change assumptions on financial assessments on the basis of submissions without a good deal of appropriate evidence to demonstrate where the costs are rising.

As I said right at the beginning, the Government has said that it will fund fully the cost to local authorities. That will have to be kept under review as we implement the provisions. We should get a lot more information as we get closer to the implementation of the bill, not just through the GIRFEC implementation programme board but through developing the regulations. It is a constantly changing picture. Funding decisions will obviously have to depend on the information that is available at the time. That information will move us on from the point at which the financial memorandum was produced.

The Convener: Thank you. That concludes questions from committee members, but I still have a few to ask.
I will start by following up Gavin Brown’s questions. On the one-off costs that Gavin Brown touched on, the Association of Headteachers and Deputes in Scotland said:

“We are unconvinced that the training costs identified are adequate for successful implementation of this legislation.”

COSLA commented that the suggestion that the on-going training can be absorbed into continuing professional development is “unrealistic.” Those bodies are saying that to go from £7.8 million to zero just cannot happen. Surely the Association of Headteachers and Deputes in Scotland and COSLA are significant bodies.

Phil Raines: We would go back to the people who have implemented GIRFEC. Alistair Gaw did not seem to have issues about a recurring significant additional cost, and the City of Edinburgh Council has taken this approach forward.

I imagine that a national body is required to reflect the diversity of views that come forward, some of which are from folk who do not necessarily know how the GIRFEC training will be put into practice. Other views come from people who have had experience in implementing GIRFEC, so they can say how it works.

The Convener: As Gavin Brown said, it seems counterintuitive that this training can just be squeezed into existing training with absolutely no cost, including materials, time or other expense. I just cannot see how the figure can be zero. If you had said that it was going from £7.8 million down to £2 million or £1 million, people might have thought, “Okay, fair enough”, but it is very difficult for me to accept that zero is a realistic sum of money as we go from one year to the next.

Phil Raines: The materials have largely been developed, so I think that we would just be tweaking them in-house—

The Convener: Materials get upgraded and replaced. They do not last for ever. There has to be a budget for that.

Phil Raines: That is true for any training that is being taken forward.

The Convener: A lot of eggs have been put into the Highland basket. I understand that things are working well there, but how can you extrapolate from what is happening in Highland to predict what will happen in Glasgow, where the socioeconomic difficulties are on a much more massive scale? Glasgow has some very deprived communities, and there is not deprivation on the same scale in Highland, so we would expect Glasgow to be much more difficult to tackle.

Phil Raines: That is a fair point, and it is one of the reasons why the assumptions have been tested in a variety of areas, which represent communities in which the make-up of the population of children and young people is quite different, such as Edinburgh city, Falkirk, Fife and South Ayrshire. We included a mix of rural and urban areas, areas that experience significant deprivation and areas that do not generate the same level of concern. Glasgow might not necessarily be the same, but we tested assumptions in areas that face many of the issues that Glasgow faces in implementing GIRFEC.

The Convener: Capital costs did not come up in evidence this morning, so I will raise the issue before we round off our deliberations. Capital costs have been estimated at £30 million each year over three years. I am always suspicious of such round figures. When people say the estimated cost is £7.8135 million, I think, “Oh, work’s been done there”, but when they give a figure like £20 million or £30 million I think that they have guessed.

East Renfrewshire Council noted the issue and said in its submission:

“There is not much detail on how the total capital of £30m per year for 2014-2017 has been determined.”

Will you give us a wee bit of information about how the capital costs were arrived at?

Tim Barcalaough: Yes. The starting point is that there is very little evidence from which we can draw assumptions about the increase that will be needed for infrastructure as a result of the bill.

The capital costs are based on the Scottish Futures Trust metrics that are currently used for the Scotland’s schools for the future programme. Our assumption about the additional infrastructure that might be needed is based on those metrics. We do not have a baseline survey of what infrastructure is currently in place, nor do we know how local authorities will decide to increase capacity, where that is needed. Will they do so through new build or through additions or adjustments to existing capital assets?

We talked to the people who are responsible for the Scottish Futures Trust initiative, to get a relatively rough-and-ready proxy for the capital infrastructure that might be needed. The primary school metric gives an allowance of 7.5m² per child, at a cost of £2,350 per square metre. If we apply the metric to a new unit for 40 children, we get a cost of about £700,000, but that can vary depending on the size of the unit. If we double demand to 80 children, we are talking about £1.4 million. A sum of £30 million would enable up to 60 new stand-alone units—if that was how local authorities chose to increase capacity—to be provided nationally.
As I said, the assumption is not based on a thorough and detailed assessment, authority by authority, of what currently exists and what authorities might want to put in place. That evidence is simply not available. Therefore, you are probably right, in that this is one area in which the estimate represents a best guess.

The Convener: Will councils bid for the funding or will they have an allocation?

Phil Raines: They will have an allocation.

The Convener: Does the early years change fund come into play in this context?

Tim Barraclough: The element of the early years change fund that relates to provision of childcare for two-year-olds is being transferred across to the overall envelope for early learning and childcare in future years—I think that the minister alluded to that in her letter to the committee.

The Convener: Thank you for providing that clarification. I have—you will be glad to hear—just one last question.

What further detailed work will be carried out to flesh out the resource implications of the bill? You have talked about reviews in the evidence that you have given us, but what on-going work will be done to ensure that we hone the figures prior to implementation so that we get a much more accurate reflection of what the costs will be from 2016?

Tim Barraclough: It is often easier to come up with more accurate estimates of what provisions will cost once the detail is clearer. As we have developed the bill, people have said that they need more clarity about what it will mean in practice. At the moment, we are going through the process of thinking about what will go in secondary legislation to flesh out the requirements. On the basis of that, we will continue to discuss with all the stakeholders who are affected what it will mean in terms of resourcing for them.

Phil Raines: The work will be different for different parts of the bill. Under GIRFEC, there is already a programme board and it has active monitoring and engagement work under way. That will continue to look at what we might call the implementation requirements and any resource requirements from the bill.

A lot of the work on early learning and childcare will come through the hub of COSLA, but there will be a lot of discussions going on between the relevant teams in the Scottish Government and COSLA—not least on issues such as distribution, which you raised—and also with the NDNA and other key players about how the funding requirements may start to look over time.

There will also have to be a lot of engagement on looked-after children, again through COSLA but also through the Association of Directors of Social Work and with some of the key stakeholders who have actively engaged in the issues that are involved in things such as the kinship care order, throughcare and aftercare, to see what they might start to look like in practice, not least as part of the development of secondary legislation.

The Convener: I thank the bill team for their robust responses to our questions, and I thank colleagues round the table for their questions.

At the start of the meeting, the committee agreed to take the next item in private. I therefore close the public part of the meeting.

12:47

Meeting continued in private until 12:50.

Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. The Council took part in the consultation exercises and provided estimates of the possible financial impacts on the Council using the information provided. The Council subsequently provided comments on the assumptions being made by the Scottish Government for the estimated client numbers, costs and savings and the overall financial impacts of these assumptions.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

2. The Council does not believe that its comments have resulted in any change to the original assumptions made by the Scottish Government, particularly in relation to kinship carers.

3. There was a significant difference in opinion in potential additional costs due to the Council believing that the number of informal kinship carers taking advantage of the new legislation would be significantly higher than the Government estimates.

4. There was also a significant difference in the assumptions of value of savings, or avoided costs that would be delivered to the Council as a result of the new legislation. The difference was due to a view, by the Council, that the stated aim of the legislation itself would not lead to the reduction of Looked After Children entering kinship care and therefore the level of savings is significantly over estimated.

5. The FM does, however, acknowledge ‘that there have been methodological challenges in estimating the costs of some provisions, particularly with respect to the duties relating to……kinship carers…… These challenges in large part relate to estimating how the preventative approach set out here will result in future avoided costs….’

6. In relation to throughcare and aftercare the estimates of the numbers taking advantage of the legislation and the number that would cease to receive support as their age increased also differed, with the Council believing the numbers taking advantage to be higher and the number ceased to be lower.

7. See answer to question 4 below for further details.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

8. The Council had sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise.
Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details.

9. The Council believes that the costs for Children’s Rights, GIRFEC, Early Learning / Childcare and Other Proposals are accurately reflected based on our understanding of the requirements of the legislation.

10. However, we do not believe the financial implications of Looked After Children are accurately reflected:

11. Throughcare and Aftercare
We estimate that for Edinburgh the numbers becoming eligible for support would be approximately double the number estimated in the FM based on known care leavers that would become eligible for further years of support. We also do not believe there will be a significant reduction in numbers eligible from 2018-19 as estimated in the FM.

12. The Council’s estimate of additional funding required was £763K per year for 2015/16 and 2016/17 which is approximately £500K greater than the amount we believe Edinburgh would receive. This would increase to approximately £600K per year from 2017/18 as we do not believe the numbers eligible for support will reduce as assumed in the FM.

13. Kinship care
In terms of costs the major difference between the Council’s assumptions and those in the FM are around the number of potential informal kinship carers that will come forward to be assessed. The FM estimates between 1.5% and 3.5% will come forward, whereas, the Council believes this will be significantly higher.

14. The Council estimates there to be approximately 800 informal kinship arrangements in place in Edinburgh and is of the view that significantly more carers than 3.5% will come forward for an assessment. The number ultimately ‘successful’ in receiving support will be less than the number that come forward for assessment but as it costs £1,500 for every assessment should the number be 10% not 3.5% there would be an additional cost of £78K a year in assessments. The Council feels the number coming forward will be significantly greater than 10% however.

15. In terms of savings the Council does not believe the number of Looked After Children entering kinship placements will reduce by the levels estimated, and therefore, does not generate the level of savings to cover the increased costs. The FM estimates the number would increase by 29% from 2015/16 to 2019/20 using the national increase from 2007 to 2011 of 87% as the basis for arriving at this estimate.

16. However, for Edinburgh the rate of growth for this period was significantly lower at 28%, and therefore, we are not anticipating the rate of future growth and by implication the level of potential savings the FM assumes can be delivered.
17. The Council also believes that the informal kinship arrangements deemed to be ‘at risk’, and eligible for support, will be greater than the number that would ever become ‘Looked After’ from the breakdown of such arrangements and therefore costs will be incurred supporting informal kinship placements that would never have become costs as a Looked After child. Therefore, there is not a direct link between the costs incurred and the costs saved/avoided.

18. In summary:
the costs will be greater due to the number requiring an assessment being significantly greater than 1.5% - 3.5%, the value of potential savings / avoided costs being significantly lower due to the size of forecast growth forecast in the FM being too high for Edinburgh and the link between all ‘at risk’ placements that will receive support and the savings from breakdown in informal kinship care placements not becoming LAC is not valid.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

19. The Council believes that the costs and any savings for Children’s Rights, GIRFEC, Early Learning / Childcare and Other Proposals are accurately reflected based on our understanding of the requirements of the legislation.

20. As described in question 4 above we do not believe the costs and savings / avoided costs in relation to throughcare and aftercare and kinship care are reasonable and accurate as they under estimate the potential costs and over estimate the potential savings.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

21. With the funding made available for Children’s Rights, GIRFEC, Early Learning / Childcare and Other Proposals the Council is confident it can meet the financial costs of implementation.

22. In the case of Looked After Children the funding the Council would receive through the FM is insufficient. It would have to divert resources from other early intervention and preventative measures, such as those funded through the Early Years Change Fund, to match increased costs or lower than forecast savings.

23. Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise? The Council believes that the margins of uncertainty are accurately reflected for Children’s Rights, GIRFEC, Early Learning / Childcare and Other Proposals.

24. However, as previously described we do not believe the margins of uncertainty in relation to throughcare and aftercare and kinship care accurately reflect what we believe will be the impact on Edinburgh.
Wider Issues

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

25. The Council believes it can meet the requirements of the GIRFEC legislation, however, the costs are based purely on teachers requiring training and the costs of back filling them. We would expect staff other than teachers to also require training which will incur additional costs.

26. Other than the issues around throughcare and aftercare and kinship care already stated we believe the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

27. Should there be any subordinate legislation in relation to the rate of allowances paid to foster carers or kinship carers, which was originally suggested in the consultation, this would incur additional costs to the Council. Also, case management of throughcare and aftercare to age 25 and support to kinship carers from any subordinate legislation would generate additional costs. Any estimate of additional cost could only be provided once the details of the proposed legislation were provided.
1. CCPS is pleased to provide a brief submission to the Committee in connection with its scrutiny of the financial memorandum accompanying the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. We welcome the Government’s policy objectives of enhancing children’s rights and improving services, among others, and support the general principles in the Bill.

2. This brief submission focuses on Part 3 of the Bill which introduces new arrangements for the planning of children’s services. These arrangements are of particular interest to our members in their capacity as providers of children’s services. In that regard, we would like to highlight the scope of provision of children’s services by the voluntary sector. Approximately 27% of all registered children’s services (excluding childminding; 11% including childminding) are provided by the voluntary sector. The voluntary sector makes a particularly significant contribution, proportionally, in respect of day care, and of residential child care, fostering and adoption (in other words, care and support for looked after children). In addition, the voluntary sector is a leading provider of care and support to disabled children and their families in their own homes.

3. Part 3 of the Bill places new duties on local authorities and health boards to jointly plan children’s services in their area. This includes a duty to consult with voluntary sector service providers, among others (s. 10(1)). In addition, it appears to place duties on third sector providers to participate in the preparation of children’s services plans (s.10(6)) upon reasonable request, as well as to provide information, advice or assistance in relation to services planning (s.14). While we have questions about whether it is appropriate or even possible to place duties on non-statutory bodies, we obviously support the policy intention of wide participation in the planning process. We have expanded on this point in our evidence to the Education Committee which is available on our website.

4. However, for the purposes of the Finance Committee scrutiny, the point we want to raise is that the financial memorandum anticipates no extra costs as a result of these planning proposals. This is based on the assumption that local authorities already have a statutory duty to produce integrated children’s services plans. Unfortunately, there is no consideration given to the costs that might come with wider participation in the planning process by voluntary sector service providers and other non-statutory partners, as anticipated in the ‘duty to meet reasonable requests to participate’ laid out in s.10(6), or in the ‘duty to provide information, advice or assistance in connection with the planning functions of Part 3’ contained in s.14. We think this is a worrying gap in the analysis of the financial implications of the Bill and believe that some additional resource will be required in order for the participation of non-statutory partners to be effective and sustainable.

5. CCPS members have also raised concerns about the scope of the information sharing provisions in s.26, and in particular s.26(3) and (4), which appear to propose very wide ranging duties that extend beyond the functions of the named person, and that would, by virtue of s.26(7), apply to voluntary sector providers. We have asked the Scottish Government and the Education Committee for clarification of the policy intention behind these provisions and raise it here because we believe there may be resource implications for voluntary sector providers should the provisions be interpreted and applied in their broadest sense. The financial memorandum is silent on this. While further clarification of these duties, either by amending the bill or through guidance and regulation may allay fears about resources, we suggest that, in the meantime, there should be some consideration of these potential costs as part of the overall financial impact analysis.

6. It is worth noting that the financial memorandum in connection with the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill provisions on joint strategic planning contains no consideration of the resource implications for engagement of voluntary sector providers in the integration planning process, despite indicating that ‘the full involvement of the third and independent sectors, service users and carers, will be embedded as a mandatory feature of the commissioning and planning process.’ We raise this here not because we disagree with the principle of engagement - on the contrary, we support it and are advocating for it to be strengthened. But it will take some resource, and doubly so, given the proliferation of planning processes being developed across a range of proposed and existing legislation (e.g. community planning partnerships) and the expectation (and indeed hope) that community engagement in planning (including service providers) will contribute to the transformational change that public service reform needs to achieve.

About CCPS
CCPS is the coalition of care and support providers in Scotland. Its membership comprises more than 70 of the most substantial care and support organisations in the voluntary sector, including the leading sector providers of services for children, young people and their families. Collectively, CCPS children’s services members:
• support more than 150,000 children, young people and families in Scotland
• employ 5,800 staff
• manage a combined total income in Scotland of over £160 million, of which more than 80% relates to publicly-funded service provision.

Services provided cover the range of services to children, young people and families including early years provision; family and parenting support; residential child care and other support for looked after children; support for children and young people who have experienced abuse and neglect; support for disabled children and young people and their families; young people with mental health problems; and services for young offenders.
FINANCE COMMITTEE CALL FOR EVIDENCE
CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL: FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

SUBMISSION FROM COSLA

Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
COSLA, which is the representative voice for all 32 Scottish local authorities, responded to the consultation that preceded the Bill, including commenting on the financial assumptions. COSLA supports the policy intent of the Bill and has also worked with Scottish Government officers over a prolonged period to try and understand the financial implications for local authorities from the requirements of the Bill.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
COSLA is of the view that not all the issues raised as concerns have been addressed by the Financial Memorandum (FM).

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
COSLA needed to collate responses from 32 local authorities and therefore the time allowed was challenging. This was exacerbated by the lack of detail in the Bill requiring much of the data to be indicative and underpinned by a number of assumptions. There is still a lack of detail in many areas.

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
COSLA is of the view that there are several areas covered by the Bill for which the financial assumptions made are not robust enough and therefore the financial implications for local authorities may not be accurately reflected. Examples of these areas as set out below.

GIRFEC – Named Person
The duties placed on councils will have a financial impact, primarily the cost of training teaching staff and undertaking the new duties as Named Person. Although transitional funding is included in the FM, there is also anticipated to be on-going costs which have not been built into the FM and which cannot be met from within existing resources.

Training
The costs for the initial 2 days training seems reasonable, however the suggestion that the on-going training can be absorbed into CPD is unrealistic. Such on-going training will displace other training on CPD days and actually require additional time on a regular basis. In order to complete the training it will require a degree of backfilling and this will be substantial given numbers of staff involved, particularly in education services. In primary schools it is likely that the best placed person to be the Named Person will be the head teacher, but the class teacher will certainly require to have a role in the process and be involved with the Named Person in delivering that role. This will have training costs and as noted above it is viewed that this will displace other training on CPD days and will therefore require an element of backfilling. There should also be an additional allowance for each authority to cover other related costs incurred e.g. venue costs, travel and subsistence.

Staff Costs
The calculation of the first year's additional costs at 3.5 hours for 10% of all children appears to be reasonable, although the complex nature of the role needs to be recognised and this assumption tested against experience. However the assumption at paragraph 52 that some form of system change will accommodate these costs for years 2 onwards is speculative and basically assumes that £7.8m can be saved from elsewhere in the system to accommodate this. COSLA is of the view that the £7.8m cost identified for staff time should be funded on a recurring basis. By not passing the funding on to local government, the Government are affectively taking the savings which this policy may deliver centrally. This stops local government from reinvesting the savings in other service areas, which in our view actively works against the policy initiative around Early Years and Preventative work as supported and encouraged by the early years Collaborative.

In relation to paragraph 52, it is equally likely that the early intervention approach of the Named Person will increase awareness of more children who will require additional support. It is not the experience of some local authorities that implementing GIRFEC is reducing the number of meetings or administration.

Administrative Costs
For the same reasons identified above the costs identified of £1.95m should be funded on a recurring basis.

The FM assumptions regarding the lack of on-going additional funding for staff and administrative costs for local authorities is inconsistent with the assumptions identified at paragraphs 60 and 61 of the FM which sees on-going recurring costs for the NHS. Whilst we understand that NHS and local government are different and will have different financial pressures, we question why the NHS is being funded on an on-going basis while, as we have identified, local government is not.

Early Learning and Childcare
COSLA supports the expansion of early learning and childcare as proposed in the Bill. Whilst COSLA is more comfortable with the robustness of the cost estimates for the extension of the early learning and childcare, as local authorities have indicated they are broadly happy that they are an accurate assessment of implementation costs, the data has been provided on the assumption that the 600 hours is delivered in as practical a way as possible and without the additional requirement of more flexibility for parents. COSLA has worked closely with Scottish Government in trying to identify the appropriate costs for the expansion of early learning and childcare provisions of the Act. COSLA sought costs from each local authority and these identified the least cost option and the most cost option for the implementation of the 600 hours by one of the five suggested models identified in the consultation document on the Bill i.e. without offering flexibility to parents. This therefore provided a range of costs for each local authority to implement the extension to the early learning and childcare provisions by the method best suited locally. There is more difficulty in estimating costs in relation to offering greater choice and a range of options, particularly if that range of options is prescriptive. This is an area where the robustness of the assumptions on costs needs monitoring as the policy is implemented. Flexibility can be introduced gradually in future years, although it is important for Scottish Government to understand that local authorities can only introduce this increased flexibility within the overall resources made available by Scottish Government.

With regard capital costs, the FM highlights the very limited basis of the assumptions, and costs to individual local authorities will depend on local circumstances and current pre-school estate. This is an area where close monitoring of the actual costs against the costs identified in the FM is recommended.

Corporate Parenting
COSLA has long been an advocate of corporate parenting and has been an enthusiastic supporter of publications such as ‘These are our Bairns’. This section of the Bill is important as for the first time it will set out a legal definition of what it means to be a corporate parent.

It is, however, important to note that any formalised definition of corporate parenting will have practical resource challenges in terms of on-going training/briefing sessions to ensure organisational wide commitment for councils and other community planning partners.

Extending Throughcare and Aftercare Support
COSLA is supportive of the policy intent of the extension of aftercare provision to young people that have previously been looked after, although the full extent of the impacts of this policy and any potential funding gap as a result will not be known until the secondary regulations are in force.

COSLA has less certainty over the accuracy of the costings of this aspect of the Bill due to the difficulties for local authorities in estimating the financial impact. In particular, we are not convinced that the Scottish Government have accurately assessed the average annual cost of support, estimated at £3142 per young person in the FM. This figure includes an estimate that the average cost for travel would be £400 per year; that emergency payments up to £200 per year could be payable and that payments to outside agencies (such as for third sector support) would be around £1500. It also includes an estimate of staffing costs required to support the young person. From discussions with local authorities we believe that these costs underestimate the actual cost of supporting a young person who has left care; it is important for the Committee to realise that there is variation in the opinion as to the costs involved, which will depend on the assumptions made, but from experience a figure nearer £6,000 per person is considered more realistic by some local authorities. In particular we are aware that some local authorities have indicated a concern that travel costs are not realistic and do not factor in cost of travel particularly in rural areas.

Another key concern that COSLA has on this issue is that we have no way of knowing what the impact of the extensive welfare reform programme currently underway will be on this group of young people, so there is every possibility that the numbers seeking assistance may not fall as much as expected. Early indications of the impact of welfare reform show significant increases of presentations in many local authorities for this service.

Counselling Services

The move towards early intervention is welcomed by COSLA, provided it does not represent a duplication of other provisions within the Bill. However, the key point which we have made in our submission to the Education Committee is that this section should not specify counselling service over and above other support that could be provided to families. Counselling is a specific form of support, and would not be appropriate in all situations. We have argued that this section should be amended to remove its specific reference to counselling and replace it with a more general reference to support service.

In terms of the financial memorandum, COSLA has concerns that the potential estimated cost for provision of counselling is underestimated. Current experience is that commissioning parenting capacity assessments from third sector organisations is an average of £2,500 per assessment. There appears to be no substance behind the estimated avoided costs and the margin for error would be significant. In addition, there is no provision in the FM to invest new funding in this key service area that currently has limited extent and availability.

Kinship Care

COSLA would welcome a mechanism that provides families with a better alternative to formal care and it is our hope that kinship care orders are a success and provide an alternative for some families. It has also been well discussed over the last few years that the growth in kinship care and the corresponding increase in kinship care allowances have put pressure on local government finance. By transferring parental rights to carers, the orders should allow families to better access other financial benefits from the DWP.

In the end how successful orders prove to be at reducing payment of kinship care allowances will depend on how attractive the orders are to families. At this point of time it is difficult to project accurately how many families will take out a kinship care order. Uptake will depend on a number of factors such as impact of welfare reform, the support provided by local authorities and the detail of how orders will operate (including eligibility and length and type of support), all of which will only be known when set out in secondary legislation. The interplay of these variables makes it difficult to know for certain whether the financial assumptions made by Government are accurate.
When COSLA discussed with local authorities the financial implications of this aspect of the Bill no national picture emerged, and it is clear that local authorities have found it difficult to evaluate the future impact of the policies. The assumptions relating to estimating the take-up and level of costs per order made by Scottish Government that underpin the figures for this complex area are numerous, increasing considerably the potential for the actual costs to differ from the estimated costs. There is a concern from within Council that this new order will not be embraced by families and therefore not free up monies as assumed. The potential loss of income to families during this period of economic pressure may well play a significant part in decision making by families considering this option. If only a small number of formal and informal kinship carers apply for a kinship care order then it is unlikely that any savings would be achieved in the first few years as the cost of the various elements of support would outweigh any savings. We would reiterate that local authorities will only be able to implement what they are funded to deliver.

With considerable uncertainty over how many families will take up an order, the financial risk facing local government is potentially significant. The exact size of this risk depends on how accurately Scottish Government has modelled the take up of kinship care orders. We therefore believe it is necessary that both COSLA and Scottish Government jointly scrutinise and monitor the spend on this legislation to ensure that local government is, and continues to be, sufficiently resourced to carry out the new duties that will be enacted.

Examples of uncertainty in the assumptions include:

In tables 24 and 25 in the FM there are a range of percentage assumptions as to eligibility and uptake, but it is not clear that these assumptions are robust. At paragraph 125 there is an assumption that of the estimated 15,668 children in informal kinship care only between 1.5% and 3.5% per year would apply for a kinship care order, but there is no rationale for using these figures and, of course, there is a risk that the uptake could be significantly higher than this.

The projected avoided costs shown at table 28 suggest that by 2019/20 a minimum of £10.347m can be saved by reducing the number of formal kinship care arrangements. Of this sum around £4.2m is based on reduced demand on social workers but it is debatable as to whether this would free up transferrable resources. The underlying assumption in relation to the potential for avoided social worker costs is that demand for formal Kinship Care orders continues to rise at recently experienced rates and therefore local authorities would need to spend an additional £4.2m (lower end cost) on additional Social Worker time. This is a very broad assumption as to future demand and also that local authorities would actually be able to afford the projected increased numbers of social workers. An alternative scenario is that existing social workers are diverted from other work.
Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?
The Children and Young People Bill is a complex piece of legislation with significant financial implications for local authorities. The accuracy of the Scottish Government’s analysis and therefore the funding that would be made available depends on a large number of assumptions that will not be fully tested until the Bill is implemented. Councils have concerns over the future financial impact of the policies and that for this reason the financial implications to local authorities require in-depth scrutiny.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?
COSLA has gained a confirmation from the Scottish Government that it is the intention to fully fund the requirements of the Bill, but with the implementation stretching beyond both the current spending review period and the end of this current parliament in 2016 then future budgetary decisions would be dependent on the result of several spending reviews. The commitment made by this administration to fully fund the Bill must be honoured in future years by whatever Government is in power and kept under on-going review. We also believe that it will be necessary for both COSLA and Scottish Government to jointly scrutinise and monitor the spending on this legislation, to ensure that local government is and continues to be sufficiently resourced to carry out the new duties that will be enacted.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?
In some areas the FM would appear to reflect the margins of uncertainty but others, for example, kinship care, seem more optimistic that savings will cover the costs, particularly in the shorter term.

Wider Issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?
The main issue in overall terms is the financial commitment this Bill brings at a time of declining resources generally and increasing demand for other local authority services. The Committee will want to be confident that the potential benefits of the Bill can be afforded over the long term despite the challenging financial circumstances.
Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?
This cannot be quantified until work commences on implementing the various parts of the Bill and more is known on the level of flexibility being afforded to the local authority.
Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. Yes. Our comments on the financial assumptions were more comprehensive at the earlier stages of the bill consultation.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

2. The Financial Memorandum does not appear to reflect the additional costs associated with the implementation of GIRFEC and the named person. There is a turnover of teachers each year and there will be a requirement to raise their awareness of their statutory responsibilities in terms of the named person element.

3. There will also be costs associated with establishing the named person responsible for those young people who are aged between 16-18 who have left school but not progressed to college or university. Dundee City Council will need to commission voluntary sector services to undertake this statutory duty which will result in additional costs that do not appear to be reflected in the Financial Memorandum.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

4. Whilst we did respond to the consultation exercise by the deadline, more time would have been appreciated to provide a more comprehensive response within the timescales allowed. In addition, more clarity around the implications of the changes would have been useful particularly in relation to kinship care.

Costs

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?

5. GIRFEC – as stated in question 2, there will be an on-going responsibility for training in terms of staff statutory responsibility for named person. There will also be a requirement to commission additional services from the voluntary sector for those young people who have left school and are not in Education aged 16-18.

6. Early Learning and childcare – there is now an obligation for LA’s to offer flexibility in terms of how the Early Learning and Childcare is to be delivered. This is difficult to quantify until the consultation has been undertaken. Our estimates based on the range of patterns of service delivery in October 2012 highlight a potential funding shortfall compared to the notional additional funding allocations included in the Financial Memorandum.

7. Early Learning and childcare capital costs – there potentially will be a requirement to expand the number of places on offer in certain of our nurseries but not sure what the financial implications will be of this at this stage.

8. In relation to the proposed Kinship Care arrangements the Financial Memorandum assumes that the “avoided costs” will more than offset the additional costs associated with the introduction of additional duties to local authorities in supporting kinship carers resulting in a zero direct recurring cost arising from the Bill. However the FM does not take cognisance of the various and distinct Kinship Care and Residence arrangements in place across Scotland and it is argued that the avoided costs have been overestimated. At paragraph 130 of the Financial Memorandum it states “because the kinship care order acts to prevent a child becoming looked after unnecessarily, this would give rise to future avoided costs compared with the expenditure local authorities would need to make otherwise”. It is difficult to determine how this will arise – for example Dundee City Council currently makes weekly allowance payments to both kinship carers and those subject to residence orders and would continue to do so under the new arrangements. Therefore the assumption that further Social Work interventions and expenditure would no longer be required as a result of these arrangements is unrealistic. We have concerns that a number of informal kinship care arrangements not currently known to Social Work will become eligible for enhanced support resulting in additional costs to the authority.

9. It is difficult to know exactly what the potential additional costs will be for the additional duties associated with the new arrangements for Kinship care and family therapy given the types of assistance are yet to be prescribed by Scottish Ministers in secondary legislation.

10. The additional costs associated with extending through care and aftercare support appear to be based on reasonable assumptions.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

11. For all areas please see comments as stated in question 4. We assume this question relates to 5 years rather than 15.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

12. As stated in question 4 there are elements of the Bill which are difficult to quantify at this stage. In the current financial situation being experienced by local authorities, all costs associated with the implementation of the Bill should be met by the Scottish Government.
Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

13. Early Learning and Childcare – it is not possible at this stage to determine whether the increase in staff costs associated with offering flexibility is reasonable or not. The Financial Memorandum indicated that they took account of different flexible options set out in the consultation document and assumed this would be the range of options from 2018-19. Three of these options were estimated to be in-excess of Dundee City Council’s GAE share from the Financial Memorandum.

14. Kinship Care – as in 4 above, it is difficult to comment on the reasonableness of the assumptions when not all additional responsibilities have yet been defined. There are concerns regarding the projected level of “avoidable costs” reflected in the Financial Memorandum. This leads to the assumption that the new arrangements will result in substantial longer term “savings” and can therefore be delivered at no additional cost to local authorities.

Wider Issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

15. Questions 2, 4, 6 and 7 reflect Dundee City Council's position.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

16. Again this is difficult to answer until more details emerge.
CONSULTATION

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which proceeded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. The local authority and the Community Health Partnership Officer Locality Group for Children and Young People took part in the consultation exercises which proceeded the Bill. Reference was made in the Council’s response to potential financial implications, at that stage not quantified.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the ESM?

2. In relation to the 600 hrs of early learning and childcare for three and four year olds and vulnerable two year olds, the financial assumptions sit somewhere in the middle of the local authority costings based on the potential models of delivery. Comments made in relation to Kinship Care are less well reflected given the complexity of trying to put accurate financial planning assumptions in place based on the information available.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

3. Yes.

COSTS

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM, if not, please provide details?

4. The costs in relation to the establishment of the development of 600 hrs of early learning and care will allow the local authority to develop models of provision but will not meet the government’s aspiration of a fully flexible service. Local authorities have different provision and therefore it is difficult to start from a common baseline.

5. It is difficult to be fully confident in relation to funding for early learning and care for 2 year old children on kinship care orders as uptake is unknown.

6. The costs set out in the financial memorandum in respect of the named person are clear in their financial assumptions which are made. However, there is concern that there is not a recognised ongoing cost to local authorities in the same way that there is an ongoing cost recognised for the NHS.

7. It has been very difficult for local authorities to accurately estimate what the costs will be in relation to Kinship Care and support for young people leaving care.
8. This has been an issue across local authorities and recognised in COSLA’s discussions with Scottish Government representatives. It particularly relates to being able to accurately estimate the number of kinship care orders.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

9. Similar comments to 4 above. The added dimension is the potential impact of welfare reform and the recession on an additional range of families who might otherwise not require assistance.

10. Although it is believed a genuine attempt has been made by the Scottish Government to assess costs/benefits, the financial risk to local authorities is the accuracy of the financial model.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

11. The overall policy direction in respect of the Bill is commendable and there are many aspects of the legislation which are to be welcomed. However, the Bill is being presented to Parliament at a time of significant reduction in public resources coupled with additional pressures demographically, economically and socially.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

12. The fact that the FM notes that the incremental increase in flexibility is more complex to estimate than just additional hours, as well as the fact that there is recognition that models developed by individual authorities will vary due to local need suggests that allowance is included for these margins of uncertainty.

WIDER ISSUES
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, what other costs might be incurred and by whom?

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

13. Not possible to comment without further clarification.
Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. Yes

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

2. Financial assumptions have been included in the FM, although it is not possible to assess the opinion of every Council’s individual comment. Whilst there is recognition that a number of areas within the Bill will lead to the requirement of additional funding, it is not possible to quantify the accuracy of the assumptions on the actual costs of implementation and delivery.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

3. Yes

Costs

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?

4. We are concerned about the apparent lack of clarity regarding the expected costs of Kinship Care and Family Therapy, particularly in light of the inclusion of “avoided future costs”. There does not appear to be inclusion of costs associated with Kinship Care Orders, National Foster Care Rates or Minimum Qualifications for Foster Carers.

5. In relation to GIRFEC, the document states that all authorities are at different stages in implementation. Accordingly, it is difficult to apply a rationale that provides an accurate outcome of costs. One area that is not considered is the ongoing operational costs, particularly for named persons. If trade unions take a view that the introduction of the named person will have workload implications, there may be further pressure on services sustaining delivery within current job sized remits.

6. Additionally, there is still great uncertainty around the provision of 600 hours, particularly with regard to current Early Years staff and teachers conditions of service. This area of uncertainty will have financial implications that are currently not known.
Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

7. We are not sure that our concerns as stated at 4 above have been accurately reflected.

If relevant, are you content that your organization can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organization will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

8. I think it will be exceptionally challenging for our local authority to meet the financial challenges of the Bill unless there is significant support from central Government. This will apply, not to the whole proposal, but to individual component aspects.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

9. See 4 above.

Wider Issues

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

10. I do not think the FM can reasonably capture the costs associated with the Bill, due to the uncertainties previously mentioned. In addition, see 4 above.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

11. Yes, I believe there will be future costs associated with the Bill through subordinate legislation. Principally, this will arise, as through ASN experience, from particular groups as they apply their rights to services that have not been legislated for previously.

12. In addition some examples:

Kinship Care Orders: £284,000
National Foster Care Rate: £60,000
Minimum Qualifications for Foster Carers: £40,000
Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. Yes and comment was made regarding additional expenditure.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. It is difficult to tell, given the necessarily summarised national picture as described in the FM. Where authorities may have atypical issues, such as a greater need to establish new provision to accommodate flexibility as required for providing 600 hours of early education and childcare, it is not possible to ascertain how this has been captured and ultimately will be addressed when allocating resources.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
3. Yes.

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details.
4. Please see response to 2 above. In addition it is unclear which 5 models as noted in paragraph 76 were used for costing the 600 hours of early education and childcare, and so whether these would be relevant/meet the needs of our education authority. The original consultation exercise undertaken via COSLA referenced more than 5 models and councils were invited to provide alternatives.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?
5. Difficult to ascertain given reasons noted above. However there are a few particular points we wish to note as follows: We suggest that it is better to use the number of pupils (school roll) as the basis of the calculation rather than the number of schools when determining the extent of additional administrative resources required (paragraph 55 with regards named person). There are many primary schools with larger rolls than secondary schools and needs should be better reflected.

6. In costing the 600 hours of early education and childcare the LFR returns have been used. It is noted that this will be based on the varying current position across authorities. It is not clear how the staff and other revenue additional costs noted in table 17 paragraph 70 have been determined other than as noted in paragraph 71 that a range of exemplar models have been used for an increase of 125 hours.

7. Given the range of models, it would have been thought that a range of costs per year would also have been determined, but there is only one estimate per year provided. Has for example the average or maximum been used?

8. An assumption has been made that by local authorities secure around 40% of provision through independent, private and third sector partners. Again this will vary locally and for example is much lower in our authority.

9. There is not yet any information on proposed models of distribution of additional funding ultimately agreed, which councils would then be better able to assess if this meets their local needs in taking matters forward.

10. There is not much detail on how the total capital of £30m per year for 2014-2017 has been determined. Paragraph 83 notes some base metrics, but the starting point for each authority will be different based on existing capacity, potential development, availability of partnership provider places and model of delivery to implement the flexible 600 hours of provision agreed with stakeholders. It is therefore difficult to ascertain at a local level if the allocation of this will be sufficient to meet local needs.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

11. As noted above, until the allocation of resources is made to councils it is difficult to comment.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

12. Please refer to above comments.

Wider Issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

13. It is acknowledged that it was inevitably going to be a difficult exercise to cost. In general it captures the main headline costs. It is the agreement of the distribution of additional resources that will require finer detail.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

14. This is difficult to comment until the nature and details of any subordinate legislation is known.
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. Yes, we took part and commented on the financial assumptions.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

2. Partly. The financial implications of providing additional childcare hours appear to have been taken into account but there are still a number of concerns regarding the other elements of the Bill.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

3. Yes.

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details.

4. Partly. There are still some concerns:

   - Whilst the overall funding for additional childcare hours appears to have taken account of national estimates, there doesn’t appear to be a common approach to models of implementation across Scotland. If a prescriptive approach is adopted then the costs for some Councils might be different from their original assumptions.

   - The estimates for relating to back filling posts for GIRFEC training would seem reasonable but we would contend there should also be an additional allowance to cover costs in year 1 whilst Councils embed this in to their CPD programmes e.g. venue costs, travel and subsistence.

   - The allocation of 3.5 hours mentioned in paragraph 51 underestimates the potential complexity of the role. There is also the potential problem of non-availability of teachers during school holidays and other periods when they are contractually unavailable.

   - In relation to extending through care and aftercare support, the estimate of £2,000 for furnishing is unrealistic and our experience is that this is closer to £3,000. Our experience also suggests that emergency payments are more likely to be £1,000 per annum as opposed to £200.
The estimate of £2,100 per annum for support costs is also less than we are experiencing and again the figure is closer to £3,000.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

5. Estimating the potential costs and savings is clearly a difficult task and we have the following concerns:

- See comments in the answer to question 4.
- There is no substance behind the estimated avoided costs shown in table 28 and the margin for error is significant.
- For Kinship Care, there is a concern that some aspects of the Bill may generate a demand that is difficult to quantify until guidance is produced and the cost of supporting carers to apply for the new order is known.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

6. Not entirely. Given all of the uncertainties above, we have concerns about how some of the potential costs associated with the Bill would be met.

7. In the current climate of limited resources and increasing demand, it is important that any costs arising from implementing new requirements are met by the Scottish Government.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

8. There are concerns about the estimated avoided costs in table 28 and the margin for error is considerable. In relation to paragraph 52, it is equally likely that the early intervention approach of the Named Person will increase awareness of more children who will require additional support. Please also see the responses to earlier questions regarding our concerns. Under the circumstances, it would give greater comfort if there was an undertaking to review costs in the light of experience and that any increase would be funded by the Scottish Government.

9. Please see the answers to previous questions. The costs identified are wide ranging but there are significant concerns regarding some of the estimates which have been provided.

10. Future costs could be significantly affected by the outcome of the National Foster Care Review and they could also be affected by anything included in the guidance which we don't know about as the guidance has still to be produced. Concerns also remain regarding the potential costs for provision of counselling as our current experience is that commissioning parenting capacity assessments from third sector organisations costs an average of £2,500 per assessment.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

11. See comments in the answer to question 8.
Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. The Council provided cost estimates as part of the CoSLA response to the Scottish Government consultation exercise in October 2012.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

2. Some but not all.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

3. No - We did not have enough details and it would have been beneficial to have specific details at the outset. eg the percentage of grant each Local Authority will receive. This would have given us ample time to make constructive comments based on facts rather than making assumptions eg whether or not the costs are top up or will substitute current payments. Parental consultation around provision of 600 hours of early learning and childcare has not yet been undertaken and potential models to afford parental choice and flexibility has not been developed in sufficient detail. The main issue around the provision of cost information was not having sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise, but that parental consultation around provision of 600 hours of early learning and childcare had not yet been undertaken and potential models to afford parental choice and flexibility had not been developed in sufficient detail.

Costs

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?

4. No – please refer to attached workings and comments. The additional £71 per week will definitely have a negative impact on our overspend budgets. There are a number of models which could be put in place to deliver on the Government’s commitment of 600 hours of early learning and childcare. The estimated amount of funding allocated to Fife Council would not fund all of the models for which cost estimates were provided as part of the consultation exercise.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

5. No, the costs do not give a reasonable and accurate projection. 15 years is a long time period and a lot could change. There are a number of assumptions made regarding the proportion of marginal operational and support costs which are difficult to confirm conclusively, but overall the additional costs of early learning and childcare from 2014-15 to 2019-20 look to be broadly in line with the indicative costs prepared for the consultation exercise. As above, one of the models for which indicative costs were provided for the consultation exercise would not be viable based on the estimated additional funding available to Fife Council.

6. No - The Social Work budget is already overspent and over stretched due to various factors eg growth in Looked after Children (LAC) and savings required. Any additional expenditure which if not fully funded by the SG will have detrimental effects on our services. The financial costs associated with provision of 600 hours of flexible early learning and childcare can be met only if fully funded.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

7. No - Uncertainty is usually around numbers of LAC. There is no reflection for rising costs and the increased number of Children going into care. With regard to the provision of 600 hours of early learning and childcare, the requirement to carry out consultation with local populations of parents every 2 years will result in a certain amount of uncertainty. Models of service delivery may require to be altered to reflect the results of these consultations. However, the amount of funding will inform how much flexibility can be offered to parents.

Wider Issues

8. No – please refer to attached workings and comments. It is possible that legal costs could arise from parents who are not able to obtain the flexibility they prefer in their local nursery and use legal routes to challenge these decisions.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

9. Yes – please refer to attached workings and comments for each strata.

Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. Yes, the Getting it Right for Every Midlothian Child Partnership responded to the September 2012 consultation. We asked how the extension of the responsibility for care leavers would be funded and also requested clarification of where the resources would come from to fulfil the new order for kinship carers.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

2. These have not been addressed in the FM, although clarifying the source of funding for implementing the Bill’s measures was perhaps not in the remit of the FM.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

Costs

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?

3. Nil or minimal additional costs are included for planning and reporting under the various provisions of the bill and this may be the case, provided that the requirements are satisfied by the current plans and reports that are prepared. If planning and reporting is required to be carried out in a particular way or using particular templates or in line with specific guidance then, especially if they must be done in addition to existing arrangements, the costs could be greater than those estimated.

4. The arrangements that will need to be made to fulfil the Named Person role will be complex and will require reorganisation of duties and/or recruitment of staff within Local Authorities in order to put in place a robust referral and response system that works both during term time and also during school holidays, in order to ensure that referrals are dealt with throughout the year, not just during school term time. The FM looks at the costs of training teaching and school support staff and for backfilling posts, but not at this wider perspective.

5. There is a task to be carried out to set up secure arrangements for transferring children’s records between the NHS and Councils (and thence to schools) when the Named Person responsibility moves as the child starts school. This will require staff time from the NHS and all local authorities to agree protocols, devise and test procedures, train staff etc. It is not clear from the FM whether this will be done centrally or be the responsibility of the regional NHS Boards and Local Authorities.

6. It is also not clear from the FM whether it takes account of the need to recruit trained staff and the likelihood of having to recruit untrained staff and train them as there will not be a pool of unemployed people with the necessary specialised training, qualifications and experience. It refers to staff costs provided by a local authority but does not clarify whether this is ongoing staff or reflects the additional cost of recruiting new staff. The Bill will require more midwives, health visitors, teachers and school administration staff, childcare staff, family counsellors etc. In some cases it may take years before staff are fully trained but in the mean time quality of services must be maintained and deadlines met, otherwise there is the risk of poor inspection reports or judicial review, or even Scottish Ministers exercising their enforcement powers – which includes the power to transfer assets and staff.

7. Potentially more support will be required from local authorities to childcare and early learning providers to assist them in expanding to meet the additional provision and the complexities that result, such as additional staff, more hours for staff, compliance with employment, health and safety regulations, building work to expand premises.

8. Midlothian Council is in the process of carrying out an options appraisal, including costing, for the increase in early learning and childcare hours and these estimates come in significantly below the figures in the FM (once they have been extrapolated using the population aged under five in Midlothian as a proportion of the Scottish population).

9. Local characteristics such as high proportion of care leavers/kinship carers etc could lead to disproportionate costs (rather than savings), particularly for small local authorities and those where kinship care is promoted rather than residential care. It is noted that the FM has an extremely wide range of estimates, with the savings in the upper estimate coming in at up to nine times that of the lower estimate. The extension of the support provided to care leavers in practice could be very costly to local authorities.

10. The references to case studies and the work of local authorities in the costings is useful, however there is no guarantee that the savings that are estimated in the FM will be applicable in each local authority’s local context and if the expected savings as a result of the shift to prevention and early intervention do not materialise or are less than expected organisations could be left with unsustainable services. In some cases the FM offsets these savings in the short term, where in fact it may be many years, and in some case a generation or longer, before the provision of, and funding for, some services can be reduced. This transitional period where existing services must be continued and new, preventative, services put in place will be extremely tough to fund unless there is provision from central government.
If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

11. Many of the organisations in the Getting it Right for Every Midlothian Child Partnership, and in particular Midlothian Council, are already under financial pressure and it will be very difficult to find funds and resources to meet the additional duties of the Bill. This may be most severe regarding the additional hours of childcare/early learning which, based on the figures in FM, are estimated at up to £1.8 million per year for Midlothian Council.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

12. The notes and details of the methodology used to calculate the estimates in the FM are welcomed and have been very useful in considering the implications of the Bill and the risks that come from it.

13. It has been noted, however, that some costs are likely to accrue earlier, for example the Children Affected by Parental Substance Misuse guidance has been adopted from June 2013 in the Lothians, far earlier than the dates in the Bill. This will result in the planning, restructuring, changes to procedures and practices and staff training taking place years in advance of the timescales in the FM.

14. There is also a necessarily wide range in figures provided for certain provisions, reflecting the uncertainty in the projections but this does make it difficult for organisations and the partnership to plan for the Bill.

Wider Issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

15. The FM takes account of various costs, for example the costs of training and backfilling posts in Education as a result of the Named Person, however systems must be devised and put into place and additional people trained in order to provide the Named Person service over the holiday periods. This may require quite a lot of resource and reorganisation within local authorities.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

16. The final costs will not be apparent until after all the legislation has been finalised and passed. There could yet be changes in many things, such as the definition of support to be provided to care leavers, kinship carers etc that could have a significant impact on the limited monies available.
FINANCE COMMITTEE CALL FOR EVIDENCE

CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL: FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

SUBMISSION FROM NATIONAL DAY NURSERIES ASSOCIATION

About us
1. National Day Nurseries Association (NDNA) is the charity and membership association promoting quality care and early learning for children in nurseries across the UK.

2. NDNA supports its members to develop their quality of care and to run a healthy sustainable business by providing members with information, training and support. NDNA works closely with its members to represent the sector to government, local authorities and the media. NDNA Scotland has a thriving membership base representing over a third of private day nurseries, with active provider networks in local authority areas across the country and an office in Edinburgh.

3. Our member nurseries are independent, private and third sector organisations who deliver early learning and childcare in partnership with local authorities. Some 60,000 children, approximately half of all children taking up nursery places, do so in the independent, private or third sector. For under-threes this rises to 60% of children, with nearly 40,000 under-threes in care and early learning in private nurseries alone.

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
4. Yes. NDNA submitted formal responses to the September 2012 consultation on the Children and Young People Bill and to the 2011 consultation on the Rights of Children and Young People. We attended government consultation events and, with a delegation of nursery members, met with government officials to inform the Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment. We have also met with Ministers Aileen Campbell MSP and Angela Constance MSP and discussed issues around the Bill and policy direction.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
5. Not fully. The comments we have made verbally in meetings and formally in our written response to the September 2012 consultation have not been fully reflected. In particular the level of funding shortfalls for early learning and childcare partner providers is not fully taken account of and has not been fully addressed in the FM – see comments in response to questions 4 and 5.
Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
6. Yes. The consultation exercise was well publicised, allowed a reasonable timescale and the investment in consultation events and meetings was particularly welcome.

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
7. NDNA is the representative body for children’s nurseries. The comments we have made here, and in response to the consultations, relate to the implications of the Bill for our nursery members, rather than the charity itself. The primary impact on our members is in relation to the Bill’s content on early learning and childcare.

8. The FM states that the commitments on early learning and childcare are the most significant costs within the Bill. The FM goes on to consider in detail the implications for local authorities, and notes that ‘local authorities secure around 40% of provision through independent, private or third sector partners’, and briefly (paragraph 82) acknowledges implications for these partners where it includes the following:

‘National Day Nurseries Association’ and some partner providers have raised the issue of unsustainable funding levels for the majority of partner provider placements.’

9. The FM (paragraph 82) uses an inflationary linked estimate of costs of funding partner providers based on the ‘advisory floor’ hourly rate that was in place until 2007. The advisory floor was issued by Scottish Executive until 2007 as a minimum rate that local authorities should not go below when funding providers. There is an uncertain history of how the advisory floor’s original level was decided, but we do not believe it was calculated on a basis of the real costs of delivery for partner providers. It was also intended as a ‘floor’ rate, below which funding should not fall, rather than a recommended rate for all partner providers which seems to be the assumption of the FM. We therefore believe that uprating this figure is inappropriate and forms a weak basis for estimating future costs.

10. The uprated estimate used by the FM is £4.09 per hour. In our most recent survey www.ndna.org.uk/scotland-nursery-report nurseries reported average funding rates of £3.28, giving them an average shortfall of £1.23 per child per hour. Therefore, even if rates were increased to a £4.09, this would still incur an average shortfall of £0.42 per child per hour, equivalent to £252 per child per year for 600 hours of provision. Shortfalls will be significantly greater than this in higher cost areas.

11. If funding went ahead on the basis outlined by the FM, then partner providers would still be experiencing funding shortfalls and the implications for them have not been considered – paragraph 84 Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses states ‘There are no further costs anticipated for others’.
12. The FM notes the impact on staffing costs of the increase to 600 hours and more flexible delivery as staff ratios increase from 1:10 to 1:8 when children attend for more than 4 hours (paragraph 72). In practice, full day care nurseries must always operate at a 1:8 ratio, due to the extended, flexible hours they offer parents. Extension to 600 hours also means that children taking up places are also more likely to be in nursery for lunches which will incur additional costs. However, the FM does not fully take account of the impact of requirements to invest in and develop the skills and qualifications of the early years workforce to meet the wider agenda of the Children and Young People Bill around GIRFEC and integrated working and the level of funding that will be needed to support partner providers properly to reward this workforce.

13. Relevant sections of the evidence we submitted in our September 2012 response are copied below for reference – appendix 1.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

14. As discussed above, we believe the assumptions made around early learning and childcare are flawed and therefore the projections will also need reconsideration.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

15. No. We are not confident that partner providers of early learning and childcare can meet the costs associated with the Bill unless measures are taken by government to ensure sufficient funding is allocated to local authorities and actually reaches providers in the form of a viable hourly rate for high-quality provision for children. As suggested in our response to the consultation, one option might be to reintroduce an advisory floor minimum level of funding that properly reflects real costs of delivery and review this annually. Survey evidence to NDNA shows that 45% of nurseries expect to make a loss or only break even; this is not a sustainable position and continued underfunding of the provision of a public service is a threat to the flexibility and availability of high-quality early learning and childcare. Funding needs to reflect the additional costs faced by partner providers outside the maintained sector, such as business rates, in which nurseries have suffered significant increases in recent years.

16. In addition, to ensure that there is sufficient capacity to meet demand for increase numbers of places and increased hours, local authorities’ capital funding should be available for investment, subject to appropriate terms and conditions, by partner providers. Historically this approach has been successful in some local authority areas. The assumption of the Bill and FM appears to be that capital will be used solely for maintained provision, but there is an opportunity for cost-effective development in private and third sector partner provision that can provide value for money, meet parents’ needs for flexible childcare and avoid duplication of existing services.
Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

Wider issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

17. There is presently an inequity in the number of hours of preschool education to which a child is entitled, depending on their birthdate. NDNA input to the report by Reform, ‘An Equal Start’ which highlighted that this can mean funding gap to families of £1,000 per child, depending on their birthdate
If action is taken by government in future to address this birthday discrimination, then additional costs would be incurred.
Appendix 1

Extracts from NDNA response to consultation on Children and Young People Bill, September 2012

We wholeheartedly welcome the recognition by the Scottish Government of the impact of high quality early learning and childcare and the commitment to extend this to a minimum of 600 hours per child per year.

Feedback to us from nursery members is that access to funded early learning and childcare varies locally, with children and families benefitting from different amounts of provision according to the policy of their local authority. We believe that as hours are extended, legislation should set out a clear right to 600 hours for every three and four year old with a duty on local authorities to ensure that these hours are available and accessible to families through a mix of provision, with true parental choice. This should be widely publicised to parents so that they are aware of their child’s right to these hours and can hold their local authority to account.

Feedback from our most recent survey of nurseries in Scotland published in our NDNA Insight Report August 2012 ‘The Nursery Sector in Scotland’ www.ndna.org.uk/scotland-nursery-report suggested that a majority of nurseries are underfunded for free early learning and childcare places. Ninety-two percent of respondents reported making losses on the places, with an average loss of over £500 per child per year. This is a financially unsustainable position for nurseries and must be addressed if they are to be able to offer 600 hours. Funding levels also work against the objectives of a high quality professional workforce, as nurseries are unable to provide salaries commensurate with a profession.

Local authorities must direct sufficient funding to nurseries so that they are funded at a viable level that enables them to deliver the high-quality provision that makes a difference to children. The Scottish Government should assess the level of funding needed centrally and explore mechanisms to protect that investment at local level so that the significant financial commitment that will be made by government achieves the impact intended by the Bill. One option might be to reintroduce an advisory floor minimum level of funding and review this annually – in some local authorities funding to private nurseries has remained static since the advisory floor was removed several years ago. There is also a need for greater transparency on how local authorities direct funding and what funding is retained by the local authority and measures should be taken to make this information available to their local communities. NDNA would be happy to be involved in further discussions on solutions to funding issues.

NDNA and its members welcome plans to extend funded early learning and childcare and the recognition by government of the positive impact it has on children’s outcomes. The Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment notes that private sector nurseries may be impacted by the Bill’s proposals. The opportunity to provide for additional hours may be seen as a benefit for nurseries, however, if funded hours are delivered at a loss, and replace what would have formerly been paid for hours, then the extension will become a threat and make businesses less sustainable, potentially reducing availability of flexible places.

In our recent survey, respondents delivering free hours were losing on average £584 per child per year. If hours are extended to 600 per year, this loss would become £738. With nurseries operating on low margins, and the sector already feeling the impact of recession, then increased losses could risk overall business sustainability and potentially lead to nursery closures.

There is capacity in the private and voluntary sector, with a vacancy rate of around 25% according to our survey, and so there is opportunity for local authorities to work with partner providers rapidly and cost effectively to scale up provision that is flexible and meets parents’ needs. The duty on local authorities should focus on securing places, rather than using government funds to duplicate existing provision in the private and voluntary sector.

The Bill’s ambitions for an integrated approach to working with children will require effective involvement of private and voluntary sector partners by public agencies, for example in the child’s plan. To promote the best outcomes for children, the workforce in nurseries will need to have the right skills and knowledge and nurseries will need to be able to resource the support needed for individual children. One of the greatest challenges highlighted by nurseries in our survey was the cost of staff wages, with feedback on the difficulty of appropriately rewarding staff at all levels. Nurseries also fed back that they are seeing reductions in local authority support, with 50% seeing reductions in support for training and 40% seeing reductions in support for quality. Local authorities must have clear duties to provide accessible and meaningful support to all settings in their area. To ensure we have the right workforce to deliver this vision for children, greater investment is needed, otherwise we will see upward pressure on fees for parents.
Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. Yes, a number of managers attended stakeholder events, however any discussion around the financial assumptions were general, not detailed at the events attended. General concerns were raised as the limited discussion seemed to be based on current culture systems and practice and did not take in to account changes that will have to be implemented.

2. An example given was the additional time midwives would have to allocate pre-birth in considering the broader social issues. Within current practice for example, the question of alcohol consumption is not holistically discussed with parents at this stage, but if we are to prevent fetal alcohol harm and looking forward, support the implementation of the fetal alcohol care pathway, thereby preventing harm and reducing costs to mainstream services - later in the life course (studies for which suggest that the number of children who are currently accommodated or adults who are incarcerated, indicate that this is both an issue and a contributory factor, and affects between 40 and 60% of these populations) then additional time (we would estimate five hours per pregnancy) and significant additional investment will be require if we are to reduced costs later in the life course.

3. A second example offered was that the additional time which would be required to be allocated to Health Visiting given the increase in expectation of role of Named Person on the Health Visitor, there will be greater emphasis on sharing information with Named Person and as such an increased level of co-ordination, assessment and analysis of this information in relation to impact on child health and well being.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

4. Respondents felt that they could not comment with accuracy as the financial implications were not well represented or discussed at the events they attended.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

5. Yes, but it would have been more helpful if the financial assumptions had been made more explicit and core to the discussion.
Costs

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?

6. In general respondents would agree with the issues raised in the financial memorandum; however we they did not agree that the full breadth of the costs required to fully implement the bill had been considered specifically around prevention and effective interagency communication.

7. The financial implications to NHS Boards in supporting the Named Person, as Lead Professional, with the requirements under the Bill for children and young people with additional, complex/exceptional health needs are not represented or adequately reflected in the FM. There are some assumptions made regarding cost neutral activities for example:

8. In the light of the Integrated Health and Social Care Partnerships (IHSCPs), there will be an expectation that information systems which provide for all partners and information sharing will become core. This will most certainly not be cost neutral! The discussion that has been taking place around a common data set for children arising from the Bill really sets the scene for the problems that will arise - a lack of a common system across Scotland, little 'hole in the wall' systems developed to address specific problems rather than considering an integration agenda and massive issues over data definitions and common language.

9. Interagency training, development of joint information systems under the IHSCP(s), the complexity and additional costs to Health Boards that have two or more Local Authority Partners are not well considered and may result in an inequitable process/ allocation.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

10. Respondents consider that this is difficult for the FM to accurately predict due to the inconsistent and unpredictable nature of the Health and Social Care landscape. There are some assumptions made regarding cost neutral activities, we would not agree that these costs are cost neutral. To fully implement the Bill and achieve the anticipated savings later in the life course more consideration needs to be given to the prevention agenda.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

11. The expressed views suggest that NHS Boards will not be able to meet the financial costs incurred by the Bill.
Scoping the extent of the impact of the Bill to meet the needs of children and young people with additional, complex/exceptional needs should be undertaken.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

12. The FM reflects the issues that would be expected to arise. Respondents did not feel that they have the expertise to assess if the margins stated would be accurate. It is suggested that a robust cost benefit analysis is considered and that the financial memorandum is reviewed on this basis.

Wider Issues

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

13. I reiterate the points made above about the costs of Health Visiting Staff with current workloads ability to support all pre 5 children as the Named Person, in addition to Health Staff supporting the role as Lead Professional, to meet the needs of children and young people with additional, complex/exceptional health needs.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

14. I believe there may be through as yet unidentified, unintentional consequences. To deliver better interagency planning, support and corporate parenting?

Additional comments?

15. Robust models of professional supervision of practice is required to be funded and implemented across Health Visitors (like Family Nurse Partnership and Social Workers) as given the increased level of accountability and decision making this is essential and not currently built into workforce in terms of capacity to release for supervision or funding for a supervisor model. Family Nurse Partnership evidence base should be looked at.
Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. Yes, Sally Egan, Child Health Commissioner/Associate Director was a member of the GIRFEC (CEL 29) Health Group that informed the Financial Memorandum.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. The views of the NHS Lothian Child Health Commissioner have been accurately reflected in the FM.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
3. Yes.

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
4. We do not believe that the financial implications for Lothian NHS Board have been fully reflected in the Financial Memorandum on three broad grounds:

5. Table 5 on Page 41 presents a global estimate of costs to the NHS. This is not broken down by each NHS Board to acknowledge the size of the Board or the nature of the population it serves.

6. Table 5 only identifies costs associated with GIRFEC, and does not indicate any further costs to the NHS arising from other parts of the Bill.

7. We estimate that the actual costs of the Named Person service is greater than is stated in the FM.

Part 2 Rights of Children
8. Section 2 of the Bill requires public authorities to report what they have done with respect to the UNCRC every 3 years. Paragraphs 22 – 26 of the FM indicate that the costs are marginal. However, it does not take into account the costs to public authorities of actually taking the steps to further these rights. Given the Duty on Scottish Ministers (Section 1), and that Health Boards are accountable to Scottish Ministers, it is foreseeable that the costs of this section goes beyond producing a report.
9. The responsibility falls to the Health Board itself, and consequently the whole process will require the usual level of governance and scrutiny with the Board needing to approve the report.

10. The Bill extends the powers of the Commissioner to undertake investigations. Clearly all service providers will need to support the conduct of any such investigations, and will be required to respond to any recommendations. It is difficult to estimate what the resource implications for the service providers will be, but it is another source of external scrutiny.

Part 3 Children’s Service Planning
11. The Financial Memorandum assumes that Boards will work through their existing structures and resources to do this, so there will be no additional cost.

12. Part 3 includes a range of matters that the Board must address with the local authority – it is not simply about producing a plan every 3 years. Section 13 requires the Board and the local authority to produce an annual report on the delivery of the plans and what has been achieved.

Part 5 – Child’s Plan
13. The Health Board is the “responsible authority” under Part 5 for pre-school children (Section 34 of the Bill). The Board will therefore have to have a process to ensure that a Child’s Plan is prepared for any pre-school child who has a “wellbeing need” (Section 31).

14. The Board may also be the “relevant authority” under this Part, responsible for delivering a “targeted intervention”.

15. In addition to the various cost estimates that are set out in the Financial Memorandum, Health Boards and their management will need to establish governance and managerial systems to oversee and be assured on all of this.

Part 7 – Corporate Parenting
16. The Bill makes Health Boards “corporate parents”. As such the Health Board must discharge certain responsibilities (Section 52), prepare and publish its plan to do so (Section 53), and report how it has discharged those responsibilities (Section 55). The Health Board will also be required to observe any directions the Scottish Ministers issue.

17. The Financial Memorandum estimates that the costs are very small, as corporate parents are encouraged to use existing planning and reporting processes. However if the Bill confers responsibilities, then it is likely that any board of governance will require assurance that they are in fact being discharged.
18. For all of the above Parts, there are clearly defined corporate governance responsibilities assigned to Health Boards. It is difficult at this point to specifically identify what the marginal financial costs will be of discharging them, in comparison to what Health Boards do now. However, it should not be assumed that the cost will be zero. In any case the impact needs to be considered against the context of:

19. A general reduction in the resources available to the public sector;
   - A reduction in the number of managers, and consequently management capacity; and
   - The opportunity cost of diverting existing resources to attend to these new responsibilities.

GIRFEC and Named Person Service

20. The Financial Memorandum acknowledges the difficulties in preparing a definitive costing for the implementation of these duties.

21. Section 19 (3) (b) identifies a condition of an identified individual for the “named person service” is:
   “the individual meets such requirements as to training, qualifications, experience or position as may be specified by the Scottish Ministers by order.”

22. Paragraph 68 of the Policy Memorandum describes the role as follows:

   “68. The Named Person will usually be a practitioner from a health board or an education authority, and someone whose job will mean they are already working with the child. They can monitor what children and young people need, within the context of their professional responsibilities, link with the relevant services that can help them, and be a single point of contact for services that children and families can use, if they wish. The Named Person is in a position to intervene early to prevent difficulties escalating. The role offers a way for children and young people to make sense of a complicated service environment as well as a way to prevent any problems or challenges they are facing in their lives remaining unaddressed due to professional service boundaries. Their job is to understand what children and young people need and quickly make the connection to those services that can help when extra help is needed.”

23. The costing model in the Financial Memorandum has referred to midwives, health visitors, and public health nurses in order to arrive at a financial impact.

24. In our view, Health Boards will need to be innovative in order to implement a robust and sustainable Named Person service. The key reasons for this are:

25. In Lothian, an individual health visitor’s case load will range from 250-350 children. The additional responsibilities associated with Named Person and Child Plans cannot entirely be allocated to health visitors.

26. It is generally recognised that it is difficult to recruit and retain health visitors. Even if health boards wish to increase the numbers to manage the increased workload, it does not follow that the staff are actually there to employ.
Additional responsibilities do increase the workload of individual members of staff, and can impact on the quality of service/care given to each person. If the introduction of the Named Person service is not carefully managed it could increase stress, sickness absence levels and staff turnover. This will simply exacerbate the problem and magnify the cost of implementation.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 5 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

27. We do not think that the estimated costs of implementing the Bill are fully accurate.

Estimated Resource Implications of Introducing the Named Person to routine Midwifery and Health Visiting Services.

NHS Lothian Calculations

28. The following table outlines the expected additional costs to NHS Lothian of implementing the Named Person duties. Para 61 of the FM explains that the hourly rate used to calculate the costs for Midwives and Health Visitors is £19.04. NHS Lothian believes that the actual hourly rate would be more in the region of £21 per hour.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

Maternity and Health Visitors

29. We do not think we can meet these costs within our current financial allocation. Nor do we think there is the capacity within the Health Visiting workforce in Scotland to respond within the timeline as there is currently a shortage of Health Visitors in Scotland.

30. NHS Lothian estimate, based on live births (9,794) and numbers of 0-5 year old children (48,980) in the 2011 census, that an additional 20 Midwives and 49 Health Visitors would be required in Lothian to undertake the additional duties as outlined in the Bill. NHS Lothian has invested in the region of £300,000 to train an additional six Health Visitors during 2013 – 14. The additional costs of training Health Visitors has not been considered within the FM and has significant impact on NHS
Lothian’s ability to recruit the staff required to undertake the duties outlined in the Bill. This equates to a total cost of over £2.8 million. This appears to be more than what would be NHS Lothian’s share of the overall costs to NHS Scotland as a whole.

31. Recognising the increasing population locally, NHS Lothian has been reviewing the Midwifery and Health Visiting workforce. The increase in vulnerable babies born will ultimately increase the length of stay in maternity services, as Mothers/Babies will not be able to be discharged until robust care plans are in place.

Looked After Children

32. Table 18 in the FM supplies numbers of Looked After Children in Scotland eligible for throughcare and aftercare. We are surprised that Table 5 in the FM pays no consideration to the impact on health in terms of implementing the requirements outlined in CEL16. NHS Lothian have already invested additional monies, in excess of £500,000 into the Health Assessment. We raised the issue during the consultation period, given the significant additional healthcare resources required to fulfil this duty. We would recommend that a Single National Responsible Commissioning Guidance for Health and Social Work and Education is required to ensure synergy across the services in relation to cross boundary placements. A more child centred approach would be if the funding followed the child.

33. We would therefore suggest that there are more creative ways of ensuring that the requirements of the Bill are met, for example thinking about skill mix and (for e.g.) delegating some of the administrative functions to other staff, freeing up health visitors and midwives to undertake the necessary face-to-face /care plan work. This would also be a more cost-effective model to implement.

34. There is considerable uncertainty in the figures, which is acknowledged in the Financial Memorandum. Further detailed work is required to fully comprehend the resource implications of this Bill.

Wider Issues

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

Financial Memorandum pg 44

Section 2 – Duty on public bodies to report on steps taken to further UNCRC

35. NHS Lothian recognises that undertaking more robust assessments will result in unidentified needs having to be met. While NHS Lothian staff agree with this in principle, it is expected that additional resources will be required to implement the plans. Lothian has a diverse population with around 19% of the population from ethnic minority backgrounds, and in Edinburgh it is much higher at around 26%. Although not all of these children and young people will have additional needs, there will be a number who will require interpreters (consultations take much longer), who may be socially isolated and have increased mental health needs. Therefore additional resources will be needed to ensure that these children and young people’s needs are identified and met that have not been outlined in the current Financial Memorandum.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?
36. No comment.
Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. Yes, North Ayrshire submitted a response to CoSLA, modelling a number of options around the increase to child care hours and made general comments on the uncertainties around the wider financial implications of the Bill.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

2. A degree of clarity has been provided in certain aspects, in particular the additional child care hours; however uncertainty remains in respect of other aspects of the Bill and other elements of proposed change only became clear on publication of the current Financial Memorandum.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

3. Yes.

Costs

4. There continues to be a level of uncertainty around the sufficiency of funding for the increase in childcare hours. Delivery of the anticipated outcomes can be achieved if sufficient local flexibility is permitted on the service model.

5. The FM concludes there will be no overall additional direct costs to LAs arising from the support associated with Getting it Right for Looked After Children. The Bill assumes that any additional costs in some aspects of the Bill will be offset by savings in other areas. The FM provides details for the first time around additional potential costs which had not been previously considered – i.e. extension of provisions around kinship care orders to “informal carers”; potential requirement to provide up to three years transitional support to “formal carers” and potential costs of family therapy.

6. Given the demographic profile in North Ayrshire it is anticipated that the elements of the Bill, outlined below, will result in an overall additional cost;

   • North Ayrshire does not anticipate the switch to kinship care orders; as the assumption that any immediate savings associated with the move of a small number of formal carers to a kinship care order (i.e. reduced kinship payments) will offset the cost of transitional support for up to three years at £70 per week is not realistic.

• The costs associated with the requirement to provide assistance to “informal carers” in respect of the kinship care order.
• The costs associated with the provision of family therapy to both formal and informal care.
• The costs associated with family group conferencing.
• The extension of throughcare from either 19 or 21 to 25.

7. Funding is also required to support the promotion of the Bill and training.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

8. The range of assumptions in respect of kinship care is too broad; as such it is difficult to make an accurate assessment of the anticipated financial impact of the Bill.

9. The assumptions in respect of additional child care hours appear reasonable for the 6 years outlined in the Bill – significant uncertainty exists beyond this.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

10. No. There are significant financial implications emerging from the Bill, in particular the extension to child, care hours and the additional costs associated with the activity identified in section 4. It is North Ayrshire’s expectation that additional costs as a result of the Bill will be met through additional Scottish Government funding.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

11. As noted at the response in section 5 – a wide range of options has been outlined in the Financial Memorandum; as such high degrees of uncertainty remain around the anticipated actual cost.

Wider Issues

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

12. The FM captures the breadth of costs associated with the Bill, however high levels of uncertainty on the financial implications remain.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?
Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. Yes and commented on the financial assumptions.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. No it is felt that areas highlighted as concerns have not been built into the financial assumptions.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
3. Yes although the lack of detail in the bill has made estimating very difficult.

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
4. No; again lack of detail and not sufficient allowance for infrastructure/administration costs for example – Children’s Rights for systems to record monitoring and evidence, or direct costs for example ongoing training costs for staff taking on the Named Person role due to staff turnover, providing a range of options for delivery of 600 hours flexible early learning & childcare etc.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?
5. No we have estimated PKC share as 2.5% (Based on GAE) and we estimate there could be shortfalls in funding however it has been difficult to predict costs due to the lack of detail in the bill. Also only see figures for the next 5 years not 15 in the FM?

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?
6. No not content; Scottish Government should fully fund all aspects of the Bill, otherwise the Council will have to implement further savings at a very challenging financial time.
Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

7. No again due to lack of detailed guidance it is unclear what the actual affect will be once implemented at a local level.

Wider Issues

8. No again the actual implementation of various sections of the Bill for example Named Person and Corporate Parent may put additional responsibilities on to individual staff. This increased workload will have an effect on their ability to carry out other duties within their remit. This may affect other staff in the organisation who may have to take on more duties to compensate, this could have a financial cost or opportunity cost for PKC.

9. Yes; unable to quantify them at this time but an example would be 21 – 25 year olds former Looked After Children and Kinship Carers
1. As your Committee is aware the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland (CCYPS) is an SPCB supported body. Under the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 (2003 Act), as amended by the Scottish Parliamentary Commissions and Commissioners etc. Act 2010 (2010 Act) the SPCB has a number of powers relating to the governance of the CCYPS. This includes the power to provide and approve the Commissioner’s budget for each financial year. The SPCB therefore has a direct interest in any financial implications for the Commissioner as it is the SPCB that will have to fund any additional costs.

2. In respect of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, we note that additional costs are expected to arise as a result of the extension of the powers of the Commissioner to investigate the extent to which service providers have had regard to the rights, views and interests of individual children and young people. We note that the Scottish Government has stated that the costs included in the Financial Memorandum are speculative at this stage, but are estimated to increase the Commissioner’s annual budget by about £162K per annum, with an additional £62K start-up costs in 2015-16. This would have a considerable impact on the SPCB’s budget.

3. In the call for evidence, the Committee has asked a number of questions. In respect of the role of the SPCB we are limiting our answers to the questions on costs (questions 4-7).

If the bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?

4. The SPCB funds the CCYPS and therefore any additional costs would have to be met out of the SPCB’s budget. We note that additional costs will arise in extending the Commissioner’s powers to investigate issues relating to individual children and young people.

5. It is difficult to say if the estimated additional costs are accurate. We note that the Scottish Government has said that the costs are speculative as it is difficult, at this stage, to say with any assurance how many investigations will be undertaken in each financial year. We also note that the Commissioner considers the costs to have been underestimated. We therefore consider that the Government has had to balance a number of issues without any certainty of the future position. The SPCB sees the estimated figures as the maximum which would be appropriate in the current financial climate.
Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

6. The SPCB is limiting its comments to the extension of the Commissioner’s powers to investigate.

7. The SPCB is sceptical that undertaking an estimated 4 investigations over the year will require 3 additional staff and cost an extra £162,109. We note from the accompanying documents that the government has consulted other key complaints handling bodies which have indicated the existence of robust processes for handling complaints in a wide range of circumstances. The Commissioner’s powers to investigate may therefore only be required in a few instances.

8. We therefore see the additional costs as the maximum for the number of investigations that are estimated and we would expect to see from the Commissioner a sound business case when putting forward the budget submission for 2016-17 to support the additional funding. We consider that there might be merit in starting off with fewer staff and making a case for contingency funding if circumstances dictate that there are insufficient funds for the Commissioner for the first year.

9. We are concerned that if the estimated number of investigations does not materialise there will be no role for the additional staff. We would not expect to see the Commissioner’s staffing compliment increase from its present rate if no investigations were undertaken.

10. In other areas, it is likely that we will be able to reduce the accommodation costs. The SPCB is aware that there is a break clause in the lease arrangements of the Commissioner’s existing accommodation. The SPCB is actively looking to collocate as many of its supported bodies as it can in the future to make savings on the current accommodation expenditure. As part of this, the Commissioner may be moving office in 2014, possibly to accommodation which should be cheaper than the current costs. We would ensure that any additional staff would be included in any negotiations on future accommodation costs.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

11. The costs will be met out of the SPCB’s budget which is scrutinised on an annual basis by the Finance Committee and is included in the Budget Bill each year.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

12. We accept that in preparing the FM, the Scottish Government has had to strike a balance between differing views on what the costs of any investigations could be.

13. Finally, the SPCB also considers that it has a duty to ensure that, in the present economic climate, the budgets of all the SPCB supported bodies are in line with public sector spending in Scotland, and we consider that there would need to be a robust case made for any additional funding.
1. The Royal College of Nursing welcomes the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and the opportunities it presents to make a positive difference to children’s rights and children’s services in Scotland. The Bill presents the Scottish Government with an opportunity to invest in the lives of children in the early years; to support all families; and to target additional support in a way which could make a step change for a whole generation. Paragraphs 7-11 of the financial memorandum set out a powerful economic case for early intervention and is an opportunity for Scottish Government, to show its commitment to a preventative approach by investing in a universal health visiting service which is greatly appreciated by parents. Yet the RCN is concerned that the level of investment set out in the section on ‘costs to the NHS’ significantly underestimates what is required to realise the benefits of the preventative approach set out.

2. Our evidence therefore centres on the role of the health visitor as Named Person for children under five, which corresponds to Bill sections 19-41, and Financial Memorandum paragraph numbers 40-65.

Assumptions made within Financial Memorandum

3. The implementation of the Named Person and the Child’s Plan, as set out in the Bill, requires funding which enables the Named Person to form meaningful relationships with families and their children. That requires time. And while we recognise the challenges in estimating the time required and acknowledge the advice taken in preparing the figures set out in the Financial Memorandum, we are concerned at some of the assumptions made. In this section of our evidence we question the following six assumptions in the Financial Memorandum on which the costs set out are based:

- Training costs within the NHS only apply to health visitors and midwives;
- There are no implementation costs to the NHS until 2016-17;
- All professional time is calculated on an hourly basis, ignoring all associated employment costs;
- Costs will decrease significantly year-on-year, as the GIRFEC approach beds in;
- No additional administrative support will be required in the NHS;
- Any salary uplifts will be absorbed by health boards.

Training costs within the NHS only apply to health visitors and midwives

4. The amount of money allocated for Named Person training to take on new duties is allocated as backfill costs for midwives and health visitors only. Whilst the Named Person role only applies to qualified health visitors, there are training issues for the wider team who also deliver the Getting it Right for Every Child (GIRFEC) approach. The figures must reflect the needs of the wider team of staff nurses, nursery nurses, health care support workers and administrative staff who will also require protected time for training.

5. The costs allocated for training need to be linked to a robust education plan from NHS Education for Scotland. The training budget, which is to develop materials, is only for 2016. There is no training budget to deliver the training which NES has developed. It is important that within a costed education plan there is consideration of ongoing induction for new staff and ongoing development and refresher training for all those involved in GIRFEC.

There are no implementation costs to the NHS until 2016-17

6. The Getting it Right for Every Child (GIRFEC) approach has been well tested and now needs to become embedded across Scotland. The Financial Memorandum points out that there is currently a range of different stages of implementation of GIRFEC but the money which is identified for implementation does not become available to service providers until 2016-17. The money is needed now as implementation has started without adequate resource. If implementation continues without adequate funding, the approach will be diluted and inconsistent within and between areas, and children and families will not see the benefits of this child centred way of working across agencies.

All professional time is calculated on an hourly basis, ignoring all associated employment costs

7. The Financial Memorandum sets out the number of additional hours of professional time required to deliver the Named Person service. In 2016-17 the Financial Memorandum estimates 691,223 hours of additional health visiting time will be required. On the basis that a full time health visitor works 1950 hours per year we have calculated that this equates to 355 whole time equivalent posts.

8. For health visitors across Scotland to be able to take up their role as Named Person, there must be more health visitors to provide this additional time. The Financial Memorandum has taken into account the standard employer costs of Employer Superannuation and National Insurance but there are other associated costs which must also considered i.e. office space, travel expenses, administrative support and consumables.

9. In addition, when calculating posts for workforce planning purposes, significant allowances are made for predicted absence to cover maternity leave, annual leave, sickness, continuing professional development. This is currently accepted by Scottish Government to be 22.5% . This must be taken into account within the discussion between the Finance Committee and Scottish Government.

10. As the GIRFEC approach beds in, costs will decrease significantly year-on-year The RCN is concerned at the assumption that the additional hours required to address the needs of children with emerging or significant concerns are expected to reduce rapidly over the period set out in the Financial Memorandum. If the approach is effective there may be a small reduction over time, but currently health visitors have no capacity to engage effectively with families and communities in a way that models the preventative approach.

11. The development of a Child’s Plan requires significant time and coordination. At its heart is the relationship with a family and a reasonable estimate for this is an average of ten hours per health visitor per child per year for a family where there are significant concerns. Meetings must also be arranged, minutes written up and circulated. There are no short cuts and it will be many years before less time is spent dealing with families in crisis. Whilst we accept that by 2018-19 there may be some children being born to families with whom the Named Person is familiar, leading to some efficiencies (FM Para 60), we believe the Financial Memorandum considerably overstates the level of efficiencies that will be achieved in this way.

12. As the new 27-30 month check is introduced there will be many children being identified as toddlers who need additional support. We consider that to reflect this, the figure for three year olds should remain at 10 hours each year until the cohort who are 0-1 in 2016-17 reach the age of 3 (i.e. until 2019-20).

No additional administrative support will be required in the NHS

13. Paragraph 55 of the Financial Memorandum makes the case for administrative support in schools. The same administrative support for the Named Person approach and developing and implementing a Child’s Plan are required in the NHS. Currently health visitors have minimal administrative support. This means that, for example, health visitors are taking minutes at meetings around a Child’s Plan and typing them up (usually in their own time) sometimes to hand deliver to partners in other agencies as secure email is not possible across agency boundaries. To maximise the expertise of health visitors, adequate administrative support to the NHS must be funded.

Any salary uplifts will be absorbed by health boards

14. The RCN understands that HMT economic appraisal guidance requires that calculations do not factor in forward inflation when calculating costs and benefits of policies. However, the Finance Committee is asked to note that the calculations to date were undertaken using 2012 salary figures. There has since been 1% NHS pay increase and even if there were no cost of living increases between now and 2019-20 there would be incremental ‘drift’ as individual practitioners progress up a pay scale. If new posts are established to support the implementation of the Bill it is important to recognize that any salary uplift would have to be met by health boards from within existing budgets if no allowance is made.

The wider context of the health visitor workforce

15. The Financial Memorandum sets out its estimate of the additional costs to the NHS of implementing Named Person including additional hours of health visiting. This needs to be seen in the context of a wider review of the health visitor workforce across Scotland. Health visiting is an aging workforce. Nearly half (45%) of the NHS Scotland health visiting workforce is aged 50 or above. This compares with a third (33%) of the total NHS nursing and midwifery workforce. An additional 41% of the health visiting workforce is aged 40-49 compared with 36% of the wider NHS nursing and midwifery workforce. There are insufficient health visitors in training to replace those who will be retiring in the next few years.

16. Given that the implementation of the Named Person requires significant additional health visitors this must be planned for and money made available for new health visitor training as a matter of urgency. Currently health boards across Scotland have different policies as to how health visitor training is offered to registered nurses. Some offer secondment opportunities where staff are enabled to undertake training on full salary and their university fees are covered. Other health boards expect registered nurses to undertake their postgraduate health visitor education on a bursary which is non-pensionable. This excludes many excellent candidates from training. There must be equitable, funded access to postgraduate health visitor education across Scotland.

17. The combination of the number of health visitors coming up to retirement, the current workload pressures on health visitors and the requirements of the additional capacity needed to implement the Named Person service mean that the health visitor workforce across Scotland is reaching crisis point.

18. In our joint briefing to MSPs in January 2013, the RCN set out key messages to be taken into account when planning health visiting for Scotland. These issues must be taken into consideration in financial planning:

19. The Scottish Government must fund NHS Education for Scotland to commission health visiting education programmes and provide backfill costs to the health boards so that staff can be released for training.

20. The Scottish Government must commit to the development of a process for determining optimal caseload numbers for health visiting teams with regular processes for review and adjustment, taking into account clinical weighting, continuity of care, the effective implementation of Getting It Right For Every Child (GIRFEC)/Named Person, deprivation, geography and skill mix, and must hold health boards to account for delivering this.

21. The Scottish Government must embed health visiting within its 2020 workforce vision and work with health boards and local authorities to ensure that workforce capability and capacity is based on population needs, and includes workforce projections, succession planning and career development.

22. Workforce planning must be based on national workload and workforce planning tools.

23. To deliver a universal health visiting service requires a team of qualified health visitors and other appropriately skilled staff, working within integrated teams, with robust supervision arrangements.

24. Health visiting teams must be supported by IT infrastructure which is fit for purpose.
Scotland's families deserve health visitors.

25. The RCN is not alone in calling for a review of the health visiting workforce. This is why the RCN has joined together with partners to campaign for the Scottish Government to commit to health visiting for all families in Scotland. Our partner organisations include Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, Children in Scotland, Parenting across Scotland, the Royal College of General Practitioners, the Community Practitioners and Health Visitors Association, the Queens Nursing Institute Scotland and the Institute of Health Visiting. As demonstrated by the range partners within our campaign alliance, the nursing profession is not alone in the view that investment in health visiting services is key to the Scottish Government’s approach to primary prevention.
1. I am writing to express my views relating to the Financial Memorandum accompanying the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, and I would be grateful if this letter could be admitted as a late submission of written evidence on that document.

2. My comments are restricted to Part 2 of the Bill, whose provisions would extend my office’s powers under the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 to include the handling and investigation of complaints concerning individual children. I understand this provision was included in the Bill as a result of calls made by organisations working with children and young people in response to the Scottish Government’s consultation on proposals for a Rights of Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill in 2011. It was subsequently consulted upon in A Scotland for Children: Consultation on a Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

3. I supported that proposal in principle then, and I support Part 2 of the Bill now, subject to it being sufficiently resourced. This is a view shared widely across the children’s sector.

4. It is important in this context to consider the purpose of the extension of the Commissioner’s s. 7 power. The Scottish Government’s documentation suggests that Part 2 would amend the 2003 Act so as to provide a mechanism for ‘redress’ for children. Since the Scottish Government has (for now) rejected the continuing calls for full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots Law, which among other things would provide redress for rights violations through the courts, it appears that the extended power in Part 2 is envisaged to be the principal means of redress for such complaints.

5. Against that background, the Scottish Government’s financial estimates relating to Part 2 are based on a number of assumptions. One central assumption is

1 Such investigations are currently specifically excluded from the Commissioner’s powers by s. 7 (3)(b) of the 2003 Act.
2 Paras 58-60.
3 A Scotland for Children, para 59; Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, Policy Memorandum, para 49.
4 The other key mechanism of redress would be litigation. However, this is inaccessible to most children and hindered by at least the following factors: the limitations of the current legal framework, including the non-enforceability of UNCRC rights; the impenetrable processes involved; the potentially serious cost implications and the diminishing availability of legal aid, especially for children and Judicial Review.

that the Commissioner would undertake between 1 and 4 investigations per year\(^5\). Another key assumption relates to an aspect of the new power that would provide a mechanism by which the Commissioner may take any appropriate steps to secure a resolution to a child’s complaint without resorting to an investigation, if the matter is capable of being so resolved\(^6\).

6. I will comment on these two crucial assumptions in turn.

7. Firstly, it is not clear what the Scottish Government’s estimate that there will be between 1 and 4 investigations per year is based on. I have consistently queried its provenance and accuracy in my discussions with the Scottish Government. In addition, I have expressed concern about the apparent mismatch between these estimates and the notion that the purpose of the proposed extension of investigatory powers is to provide a mechanism of ‘redress’ for children.

8. Secondly, the nature, scope and volume of ‘complaints casework’ are important dimensions of the discussion about the appropriate level of resources for the effective implementation of Part 2 of the Bill. Despite the implicit recognition of its existence in the provision in news. 7 (5), there is no reference to this work in the Financial Memorandum.

9. I am strongly of the view that in practice the effectiveness of the new powers would depend on this aspect of Part 2 and its adequate setup and resourcing. Whatever the correct number of investigations per year will be, it requires an effective mechanism to receive complaints, gather sufficient information, and assess the information obtained with a view to determining the appropriate route for resolution, and carrying out the disposal of the complaint accordingly.

10. This ‘triaging’ work can be complex and time-consuming, not least in light of the very wide range of issues currently brought to the office as enquiries. As you are aware, I currently have no power to investigate such enquiries as complaints. However, my office was involved, as far as permissible under current powers, in over 100 enquiries, which under Part 2 powers would have been treated as individual complaints in 2011-12\(^7\). It is my assessment that this ‘complaints casework’ will significantly increase and is likely to form the majority of work carried out under the proposed power in Part 2. I understand this to be in line with the experience of other bodies, such as Children’s Commissioners with powers similar to that envisaged in this Bill, and other complaints-handling bodies with a broader remit.

11. The Financial Memorandum does not fully take account of this significant element of the increased workload. The cost estimates relating particularly to areas which would be affected by the ‘complaints casework’ discussed above, include staffing and IT. At the time of writing, I am still in discussion with Scottish Government about these matters. I believe the resources must take proper account of the likely nature, scope and volume of this work, and it is this which needs to be

\(^5\) Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, Financial Memorandum, para 31.
\(^6\) New s. 7 (5), introduced by s. 5 (2) of the Bill, p. 4, lines 35-38.
\(^7\) This is out of a total of 423 enquiries in that year, many others of which involved some degree of engagement with the matter raised in order to facilitate effective signposting, etc.
understood to assess the actual impact on the workload of the office. All of this matters to children and young people and those advocating for them, as it goes to the heart of the effectiveness of the means of redress promised to them by Part 2.

12. I note the written evidence submitted by the Presiding Officer on behalf of the Scottish Parliamentary Corporate Body, which as you are aware is the Commissioner’s ‘sponsor body’. I was not privy to any discussions between the SPCB and the Scottish Government, although it appears that the SPCB evidence relies on the same assumptions as Scottish Government discussed above.

13. I understand the need for financial constraint at this time and this has already impacted on the resources of the Commissioner’s office. However, I do believe that the additional resources required to deliver Part 2 of this Bill have to be based upon a realistic appraisal of the work it will actually involve, and the likely impact on the office’s existing statutory functions.

14. I trust this submission is of interest to the Committee and I would be happy to provide any further information that the Committee would find useful in its deliberations.
Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. Yes, Scottish Borders Council submitted estimated costs of implementing the 5 options regarding the 600 hours early education and childcare proposals and confirmed at that time they believed the estimated budget allocation to be sufficient. Scottish Borders Council, along with community planning partners, submitted a detailed response to the draft bill at consultation stage.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

2. The FM recognises that the final models of delivery cannot be fully anticipated. We await confirmation that the full funding will be allocated to local authorities on the basis of the proportionate share for the national GAE.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

3. Yes, we were able to respond within the deadlines set.

Costs

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details.

4. In respect of the financial implications for 600 hours of early education and childcare, it is anticipated that the figures quoted in the FM (based on this council’s proportionate share of the national GAE) will be sufficient to cover additional costs. However, Scottish Borders Council have not agreed their delivery model so it is difficult to give a definitive response at this stage.

On the issue of capital funding to support the 600 hours we are assuming that this would be allocated to local authorities on the basis of the proportionate share of GAE giving Scottish Borders £700,000 over the three year period 2014/15 – 2016/17. If this capital fund were to be allocated in any other ways e.g. through a challenge fund, this council would have some concerns.

5. With regard to the Named Person we have some concerns around the financial profile as contained within the FM. Assuming the additional funding is allocated on the proportionate share of the national GSE, we estimate that £219,928 has been allocated to Scottish Borders in 2016/17.

6. Scottish Borders Council, along with its community planning partners, is already committed to the concept of the Named Person and plans to roll out this model during 2013/14. The council requests that the financial profile to support local... authorities implement the Named Person be amended to makes resources available from 2014/15. This council notes that funding to support the introduction of the Named Person is being made available to NHS Boards from 2014/15.

7. Scottish Borders Council also believes that additional funding to support the Named Person needs to be available for more than one fiscal year. The Highland Pathfinder showed it took several years to implement the cultural changes required within and across organisations in order to implement GIRFEC. Scottish Borders Council believes funding requires to be available over three consecutive years starting in 2014/15 to ensure the successful establishment of the Named Person role.

8. Kinship Care – The FM appears to assume that if carers successfully apply for a kinship care order, they would no longer require financial support. In relation to current s11 processes, we do not find this to be the case and if financial support was not available, it is believed that carers would not progress to a kinship care order under the new arrangements. Alternatively, if the Council on a discretionary basis was to continue to provide the required financial support to carers (carers’ allowance) then this would put an additional financial burden on the Council of up to an estimated £150k p.a. Additionally, current Welfare Benefits arrangements do not support kinship carers or carers on low income.

9. Counselling – It is unclear from the language and terminology used in the Bill and FM as to what type of intervention is being referred to with various terms such as “Counselling”, “Mediation”, “Family Therapy” and “Family Group Conferencing” being used relative to the current Social Work role. As a result, quantification of the level of savings that will be accrued from implementation of this provision of the bill is not possible.

10. If it is anticipated that the above are purchased services in addition to core then this will come at a significant additional cost to the Council. The types of services provided or described can clearly be one-off, short-term or long-term therapeutic and as a result, their individual financial implications are difficult to identify, but clearly they will vary. The Bill appears to imply that the above provisions would reduce future need and the costs of meeting this need, but there is no direct evidence to support this and the fact that ongoing support (and not a single intervention) would be required.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

11. Scottish Borders Council, as detailed above, has a concern that the estimated costs of establishing the Named Person role within the local authority is not sufficient to ensure this part of the Bill is effectively implemented. Funding requires to be available for more than one fiscal year and the profile needs to be amended to allow finances to be available in 2014/15.

12. With regard to the evidence of the benefits of GIRFEC (paragraph 53 of the FM), Scottish Borders Council and its partners have been designing and delivering services to children, young people and families around the principles of GIRFEC for some time. This includes the establishment of locality early intervention programmes, locality multi-agency teams, a single plan with a common assessment framework etc. As a consequence some of the tangible benefits described in this section of the FM have already been recorded and efficiencies have been made within service providers to reflect this. Whilst totally supporting the concept of the Named Person role, this council is cautious about projecting what additional cost savings will result through its implementation.

13. From the provisions in the bill and FM, it remains unclear as to whether the forecast additional costs, savings and future saved costs will in turn be used as a basis for reducing funding to the Council. Given the high-level approach to identifying these factors on a macro national basis, we are concerned that this will only have a detrimental effect on the Council’s ability to continue to provide and fund services.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

14. Notwithstanding the comments made previously Scottish Borders Council is aware that other aspects of the Bill may put some resource pressure on the council. For example to extension of powers to the Children’s Commissioner so that office will be able to undertake investigations in relation to individual children and young people will inevitably require time and resource, if that investigation is centres in or around the local authority.

15. Scottish Border Council’s comments regarding the financial costs are based on the assumption that the additional funding will be distributed based on this council’s proportionate share of the national GAE. If this was not to be the case, the council may require to reconsider its views on the financial implications.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

16. The main areas of uncertainty/risk identified by this council were around staff ratios, supporting local needs and flexibility requirements around the early learning and childcare. These are now reflected in the FM. The one-off nature of the financial support for the Named Person may result in budget pressures for this authority.

Wider issues

17. As previously described, Scottish Borders Council believes that financial support for the implementation of the Named Person needs to be available earlier than 2016/17 and that support needs to be allocated over at least a three-year period to allow the successful implementation.

18. The council has some concerns around the projected avoided costs arising from diverting children from formal kinship care. Does this mean that GAE allocations would be reduced proportionately from 2015/16 based on these financial assumptions?
Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

19. It is not possible to quantify at this time
FINANCE COMMITTEE CALL FOR EVIDENCE

CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL: FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

SUBMISSION FROM SCOTTISH COUNCIL OF INDEPENDENT SCHOOLS

Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. SCIS responded to the Scottish Government’s consultation on the Bill, however we did not comment on the financial assumptions made as, we felt more detail was required before we were able to do this.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. N/A

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
3. Yes.

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
4. SCIS is responding on behalf of the independent school sector, rather than commenting on direct costs associated with the organisation SCIS.

5. The following points reflect the financial implications for the independent sector:

6. The Named Person
The FM identifies at paragraph 62 that “training is currently provided by the Scottish Council of Independent Schools, at a cost of £95 per person, per day, and is, therefore, estimated to be £41,800 for Head Teachers and Depute Head Teachers.”

7. We would question this assumption, which has not been the subject of consultation with SCIS or with our member schools. Although SCIS does offer Continued Professional Development (CPD) courses, that Named Person training could be incorporated into, we have not assumed this role. In addition, we have not previously provided training relating to the Child’s Plan, as it has not been relevant to the teachers who attend our courses, and therefore this could not be easily subsumed into existing training.

8. Our preferred method of training Named Persons in the independent sector is cited in the Business Regulatory Impact Assessment (BRIA) which states, “Staff from these (independent schools) are already attending training that is being delivered by local authority partners”. SCIS believes that, to ensure that Scotland is getting it right for every child – irrespective of educational institution - training of Named Persons should be inclusive of independent schools. Children who attend these schools live within Local Authorities where they are entitled to use support services paid for through their parent’s contribution to income and council tax. This method of training, with the exception of Edinburgh, would only entail an additional few from independent schools attending each local authority training event.

9. Where independent schools develop separate training events, a budget, similar to that of the NHS’ contained in Table 13, should be included in the FM to account for any training materials that will not be provided for by the Scottish Government and the backfilling of staff. We would like to take this opportunity to state that if this were the case it, SCIS believes that it would contradict a desirable outcome of the GIRFEC approach: to encourage multi-agency working. Training of Named Persons by a third party could not satisfy the policy of ‘getting it right for every child’ effectively.

10. The costs of £398,097 (summarised in Table 8) has been calculated for backfilling staff for training days in regards to local authority schools, however, the same has not been considered in the FM for independent schools. Allocated Named Persons from independent schools may also require backfilling staff for training days as, some Head Teachers and Deputy Heads do teach; therefore this cost should be included in the FM.

11. The population of children aged 5-18 in independent schools appears to have been underestimated as, there are 29,626 pupils in primary and secondary education in SCIS’s 72 member schools alone. Conversely, the Scottish Government’s census states that the number of independent school pupils in Scotland totalled 30,427 in the same year (2012). This figure covers an additional 28 schools and, therefore seems unrealistic. If the number of pupils attending independent schools was higher, this could increase the additional cost in teacher staffing time per year significantly.

12. In Table 15 of the FM, private organisations are described as having 38 working weeks to a year, however all 18 of our additional support needs schools offer more than 38 placement weeks. In addition, boarding school pupils require supervision outwith school hours in addition to the regular ‘working week’, increasing the possible admin support hours required of a Named Person per week. Furthermore, if Named Persons in independent schools are to continue their role throughout school holidays these additional hours of work would need to be included in the FM.

13. Early learning and childcare
The assessment that there will be no cost to other bodies, individuals or businesses in relation to provisions regarding early learning and childcare should be questioned. The BIRA report states that there could be a negative impact on partnership providers if “current levels of funding from local authorities to deliver the entitlement are not increased”. Although the FM assigns £1,226,365 for ‘partner provider uprating’, local authorities are only advised to set a minimum payment level for preschool education, which poses a cause for concern.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

14. No, the FM itself does not appear to project that far in advance. For the 7 years that it does appear to project for, SCIS believes that:

15. In regards to early learning and childcare, the cost for partner provider uprating should continue to increase in line with inflation rather than only increasing in line with inflation when the Bill’s provisions are first implemented. This is shown in Table 17 by the figure for partner provider uprating remaining the same between 2014 and 2020.

16. The Summary of Additional Costs should include a budget for the expected increase in demand for partner providers (due to an increase in the number of families utilising free childcare and the extension of childcare hours). It would be useful to include information detailing how the figure of £1,226,365 has been reached for partner providers and, if it has been calculated for the existing number of partner providers with no inclusion of an increase in demand.

17. That the veracity of the statement regarding on-going Named Person training being absorbed into existing CPD courses depends on how specific Named Person training is/how long it will take, and therefore whether it can be subsumed into existing structures. If SCIS were unable to include this in existing training it would add further costs to independent schools and should be budgeted for in the FM.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

18. Again, SCIS is responding on behalf of the independent school sector, rather than commenting on direct costs associated with the organisation SCIS.

19. As previously stated, we think that the cost of training should be met centrally. Furthermore, early learning and childcare costs should continue to be met by local authorities and realistically budgeted for (to include inflation and increases in demand).

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

20. SCIS does not believe that margins of uncertainty have been accurately reflected in the FM as; budgets are not shown to increase in line with inflation; expected increases in demand are not included; and continued training of Named Persons is not thought to be required. There could be a further cause for concern if the models of flexibility that have been used “in advance of consultation with local populations”, in relation to the Bill’s childcare provisions, are not representative and accurate. This would affect the indicative additional staff costs considerably.
Wider Issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill?
If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?
21. N/A

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?
22. N/A
Consultation
1. Yes

2. It is difficult to judge as there still some unknowns. It is also difficult to see how one submission fits into the national perspective. If every Council did not reply then it is hard to quantify the total impact accurately.

3. Yes

Costs
4. There are some areas won’t be known until further work is done. E.g. 600 hours of early learning and childcare. This depends on the model of provision adopted.

5. Given the margins of uncertainty the costs and savings are reasonable. However, avoided future costs should not be netted off against future additional costs as the avoided costs are not currently budgeted for. i.e. there is no real saving against current budgets. They are assuming savings against budgets which do not exist at present.

6. Any new duties prescribed by legislation should be 100% funded by the Scottish Government.

7. Yes.

Wider Issues
8. I am not aware of other costs.

9. There could be potential future costs but they are not possible to quantify.
Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. A number of departments across the Council participated in the Consultation and commented on the financial assumptions being made.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. Based on the analysis of the different areas of the Bill, it appears that reasonable assumptions have been made in terms of costing the implications of the Bill, and therefore reasonable levels of funding have been allocated for Duties Relating to the Named Person and Child’s Plan and Corporate Parenting. However, the Council has concerns in relation to the costs identified for Early Learning and Childcare (including a need to clarify the allocation method for capital monies), Throughcare and Aftercare, Kinship Care and Counselling (including Cost Avoidance monies for the latter 2 areas).

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
3. Yes.

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
4. As noted in the response to question 2 above, it appears that the financial implications of Duties Relating to the Named Person and Child’s Plan and Corporate Parenting are captured by the FM. However, the figures for Early Learning and Childcare (in the first 3 years), Throughcare and Aftercare, Kinship Care, and Counselling (inc. Cost Avoidance for Kinship Care and Counselling) do not reflect the financial implications for the Council.

5. Specifically, in terms of the funding made available for Early Learning and Childcare, the monies noted by the Government do not appear adequate in the first 3 years. Moving forward, the principle of the additional funding to allow for the expectation of incremental increased flexibility within Early Learning and Childcare provision in future years is welcomed. In terms of the Capital Spend, the Council has not confirmed its requirements yet however, it does acknowledge the allocation made. In relation to capital, the Council feels it would be appropriate to ask Councils what they require to spend on capital works in order to inform the allocation process.
6. With regard to the allocation for Throughcare and Aftercare, current costings appear sufficient up to 2017/18 but show a shortfall thereafter.

7. In the areas of Kinship Care and Counselling Services, whilst “cost avoidance” is not quantifiable nor guaranteed, the Council does expect costs will be incurred. These do not appear to have been taken into account. This is an area of significant concern for the Council.

8. The Council will only be able to provide services and flexibility to the level of new funding provided.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

9. As noted in the response to question 4 above, the additional funding to allow for the expectation of incremental increased flexibility within early learning and childcare provision in future years is welcomed. However, local authorities will have to ensure that the level of flexibility offered to enhance service delivery does not exceed the level of affordability provided from the additional funding.

10. The allocation for Throughcare and Aftercare is sufficient up to 2017/18 but insufficient thereafter.

11. In the areas of Kinship Care and Counselling Services, whilst “cost avoidance” is not quantifiable, costs are expected. These do not appear to have been taken into account.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

12. The shortfalls in allocation are noted in previous responses above (questions 2, 4 and 5). Given these shortfalls, it is suggested that the Scottish Government could re-visit these areas.

13. The Council will only be able to provide services and flexibility to the level of new funding provided.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

14. As above.

Wider Issues

15. In addition to the shortfalls noted above, there are also costs associated with training for the Minimum Qualification for Foster Carers (which for the Council amounts to £0.070m).
16. There are likely to be additional costs associated with counselling services. The extent and accessibility of local authority and NHS counselling services for Children and Young People is currently limited. A key aspect of the preventative approach is meeting the emotional, psychological and mental health needs of Children and Young People through counselling and family therapy. There is currently no provision in the FM to invest new funding in this key service area.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

17. The Council would expect that their ongoing monitoring of implementing the Bill would identify any secondary issues.

Other Comments

Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. Yes, via COSLA’s submission.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. Not in all parts in particular in relation to rationale for only one year of additional funding in respect of Kinship Care.
3. See comments in relation to questions 4 to 7

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
4. Yes

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
5. No. A number of issues as follows:

a) GIRFEC – Named Persons – Training: the costs for the initial 2 days training seems reasonable, however there will be a need for ongoing training. It is anticipated that this ongoing training will displace other training on CPD days and actually require additional time for training on a regular basis. In order to complete the training it will require a degree of backfilling and this will be substantial given numbers of staff involved, particularly in Education services where, in primary schools it is likely that the best placed person to be the Named Person may actually be the class teacher, or if not the class teacher, then the class teacher will require to have a role in the process and be involved with the Named Person in delivering that role. This will have training costs and as noted above it is viewed that this will displace other training on CPD days and will therefore require an element of backfilling.

b) GIRFEC – Named Persons – Staff Costs: The calculation of the first year’s additional costs at 3.5 hours for 10% of all children is reasonable, however the assumption at paragraph 52 that some form of system change will accommodate these costs for years 2 onwards is speculative and basically assumes that £7.8m can be saved from elsewhere in the system to accommodate this. This is, however contradicted in some of the examples provided in paragraph 53 e.g. that Social Workers will have less referrals and therefore “freeing up time to focus on more serious concerns” – this does not generate a saving that can be used to fund the cost of time for the Named Persons. The example regarding savings of time from fewer meetings – again this is speculative as it is quoted as 75% of time saving for meetings – to be meaningful would assume that the people who will be Named Persons currently spend 75% of their time in meetings – this has not been measured. The savings identified for the Children’s Reporter will not result in funds being made available to local authorities to fund the Named Persons time. The potential for a reduction in numbers of children on the CP register will not necessarily result in savings, though this may be possible; however there is a lack of evidence for this assumption. Therefore the £7.8m cost identified for staff time should be funded on a recurring basis. In addition the assumption that Social Workers will ‘free up more time for more serious concerns’ actively works against the policy initiative around Early Years and Preventative work as supported and encouraged by the Early years Collaborative.

c) GIRFEC – Named Persons – Administrative Costs: For the same reasons identified at answer 4b) above the costs identified of £1.95m should be funded on a recurring basis.

d) GIRFEC – Named Persons – Staff Costs and Administrative Costs: In relation to the FM assumptions regarding local authorities this is inconsistent with the assumptions identified at paragraphs 60 and 61 of the FM which sees ongoing recurring costs for the NHS. There is a lack of detail as to why the proposed difference in assumptions for local authorities to the NHS.

e) Early Learning and Childcare – noted that costs are estimated at 2011/12 prices – these should be uprated to 2014/15 costs.

f) Early Learning and Childcare – While at paragraph 75 the FM states that the costs were derived in discussion with COSLA and some local authorities, it is not clear that the funding identified in table 17 are those which COSLA identified. The issue regarding flexibility of service provision is an issue that is not clearly costed in the FM and the discussion between COSLA and local authorities at the time of the Scottish Government consultation identified significant variations in cost depending on the model used to deliver the 600 hours. It is not fully clear as to how the FM stated costs are calculated and how the costs around flexibility are dealt with. Current models of delivery are simple and highly efficient - 2.5 hours in the morning and 2.5 hours in the afternoon, with time for a lunch break for staff in between. More flexible models could be much more expensive in terms of staffing and other resources. It would therefore appear that the costs of implementation are more than just “indicative” and are more “speculative” in nature. It would appear that this is simply placing the cost risk on local authorities.

g) Early Learning and Childcare – Capital costs: it is unclear how the £90m total cost has been calculated.

h) Getting It Right For Looked After Children – Extending Throughcare and Aftercare: the assumptions used in table 18 are speculative and generate an indicative demand that reduces by 1,000 cases by 2019/20. There is clearly a risk that this reduction in demand won’t occur and therefore the costs to local authorities are under-costed. In addition the assumption that the increase in successful applicants will increase to 65% is not evidenced and there is a risk that the success rate could be higher than this – again resulting in costs to local authorities. The value used for the cost of ongoing care at £3,142 is lower than the value of care for such clients which was done during the consultation process, where at that point the average cost was over £6,000 per client.

An additional concern here is that due to changes to benefits system brought in by Welfare Reform there may be more people aged up to 25 who will have difficulty in paying rent etc therefore this demand may need to be met by Local Authorities if they were previously looked after.

i) Getting It Right For Looked After – Kinship Care:
For tables 24 and 25 in the FM there are a range of percentage assumptions as to eligibility and uptake – it is not clear that these assumptions are robust. At paragraph 125 there is an assumption that of the estimated 15,668 children in informal kinship care only between 1.5% and 3.5% per year apply for a kinship care order – there is no rationale for using these figures and, of course, there is a risk that the uptake could be significantly higher than this. The projected avoided costs shown at table 28 suggest that by 2019/20 a minimum of £10.347m can be saved by reducing the number of formal kinship care arrangements. Of this sum around £4.2m is based on reduced demand on Social Workers which is debatable as to whether these are “cashable” savings with no cost of achievement e.g. redundancy costs. The underlying assumption in relation to the potential for avoided Social Worker costs is that demand for formal Kinship Care orders continues to rise at recently experienced rates and therefore local authorities would need to spend an additional £4.2m (lower end cost) on additional Social Worker time. This is a very broad assumption as to future demand and that local authorities would actually be able to afford the projected increased numbers of Social Workers – rather than diverting existing Social Worker time from other work. The assumptions around potential future costs avoided are therefore very speculative, whereas the costs of implementing the Bill may be lower than what would be required. The assumption that section 11 orders would reduce the amount and cost of support to continue to keep these children out of more formal care arrangements is based on a significant assumption – that the higher levels of intervention may well still be required and be comparable with the cost of maintaining a formal kinship care order, due to complex needs, etc. In relation to families “at risk” there is again the assumption that costs can be avoided relating to avoided formal kinship care arrangements – these assumptions may be flawed on the same grounds as noted above.

Table 32 summarises the position per year and shows that the total cost of implementing (at lower end estimates) by 2019/20 will be £7.5m (or £16.1m at higher end cost assumptions). The build-up of these costs is less clear, and it would appear that the total avoided cost identified in the table is wrong each year. For lower estimate costs in year 1 the total should be £3,824,150 (total of £476,894 from table 31 and £3,347,256 from table 28)? Nevertheless as has been stated above many of the stated avoided costs are based on projections around ongoing growth in demand for formal kinship care placements (which may not happen) which generates additional care/support costs and Social Worker costs. Both of these assumptions suggest that the section 11 order proposed in the Bill will allow such children’s care to be provided on a lower cost basis than is provided to those on formal kinship care orders. There is no guarantee that such costs will reduce – as the support needs of these children will still be the same no matter the form of care order in place as the same desire will be there to keep such children out of more formal care arrangements.

Additionally from a practice point of view it has consistently been the practice of social workers (certainly in West Dunbartonshire) to always seek out any extended family members who could take the child/ren on a kinship basis in order to avoid accommodating the child into formal placements. This has consistently been on the basis that this is often in the child’s best interests – keeps them within their community, near friends and attending the same nursery or school, and not on the basis of cost. However obviously it has avoided for some children the need to bring them into costly placements. The effort for the children who are placed within kinship placements has also been to secure their future care arrangements for the foreseeable future, therefore our social workers have consistently encouraged kinship carers to apply for residence Orders (also section 11). Our experience has been however that carers are less motivated to do so when they know that their weekly support costs will cease, even when we have offered to pay for associated legal costs should they not be in a position to do so. It is on this basis, and from long years of experience that we are not convinced that the assumptions about the number of carers applying for the new Section 11 Kinship Order are miscalculated and will not therefore reduce costs over time or demand.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

6. Cannot see 15 year projections in the FM. In the above response to question 4 it can be seen that there must be serious doubts over the assumptions made in a number of areas of the FM and the real risk that the real cost of implementation will be significantly higher than estimated in the FM.

7. An assumption in the FM cost/benefit analysis regarding Kinship Care is that there will be a significant number of carers who seek to apply for the new kinship care order. This is not guaranteed as even at present kinship carers (probably identified as informal in the FM) do not seek to gain a more formal style of order, as the support already provided by Councils is seen as sufficient. If this basic assumption is problematic then the assumption around the costs of the new order will not be incurred and more importantly the assumptions around avoided future care costs will not be realised (even though, as per above, this assumption is viewed as unlikely to be achievable in any case (per comments at question 4)). West Dunbartonshire always seeks, where the need for care arises, to place children with family members as being the referred route, rather than more formal approaches to care.
If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

8. No – the costs of implementation cannot be funded by this local authority and it is expected that the Scottish Government should provide local authorities with funding through normal distribution means to fund the full financial impact of the Bill. As stated at answer to question 4 – there is a significant risk that costs in relation to kinship care proposals will not be met by local authorities being able to reduce future costs and therefore the Scottish Government should fund the costs of kinship care changes per the Bill. There is also an underlying concern around the assumptions around future cost avoidance arising from the Kinship Care proposals, that the Scottish Government see this as a means of Councils funding future service cost demands – when in reality the view expressed above is that the potential to avoid costs/generate efficiencies around these proposals won’t actually materialise. The further risk is that the Scottish Government decides on the back of the FM that local authorities need less funding and reduce levels of RSG.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

9. No – there are a number of areas of significant uncertainty over the estimates – see comments at question 4. The identified timescales are thought to be reasonable.

Wider Issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

10. No – per responses above.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

11. Not aware of any.
Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial implications made?

1. Yes, West Lothian Council took part in the consultation and included comment on the financial implications.

2. This response has been prepared by the Head of Finance and Estates as it relates to the financial memorandum.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

3. Yes with regards to Early Learning and Childcare.

4. No with regards to Looked After Children and GIRFEC.

5. Looked After Children - Kinship Care

Kinship care is integral to West Lothian Council’s looked after children service. The council currently pays full allowances to all kinship carers and any move to change this would seriously impact on the council’s ability to provide suitable placements for children who need this service. The additional costs which are anticipated reflect the requirement to provide financial support to carers seeking legal guardianship of the children they look after. It is anticipated there would be an ongoing requirement in the region of £20,000 per annum, and as such additional funding should be provided on a recurring basis.

6. Looked After Children - Through care and Aftercare

Currently West Lothian Council has a number of high cost packages in place to support former looked after children up to age 21. It is estimated that an expansion of this up to age 25 could cost West Lothian Council in the region of £192,000 per annum. Based on new recurring costs additional funding should be provided on a recurring basis.

7. GIRFEC – duties relating to the named person and child’s plan

In order to implement the transformational change required in effective practice to meet the legislative duty regarding Named Person and Single Plan, the council would need ongoing funding to maintain, review and reinforce service delivery. The projected recurring costs of £324,000 reflect the additional administration and ongoing training required.
Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
8. Yes, on the basis that this is an officer response relating to financial issues.

Costs

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details.
9. The financial implications for West Lothian Council have not been accurately reflected in the FM in relation to Looked After Children and GIRFEC as outlined above in the response provided to question 2.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?
10. Funding proposals are provided for a six year period rather than a 15 year period. Based on the information provided, the costs appear reasonable with regards to Early Learning and Childcare but not with regards to Looked After Children and GIRFEC, as per the response provided to question 2.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?
11. As specified in the response to question 2 the recurring financial costs in relation to Kinship care, through care and aftercare and named person/child’s plan are not reflected in the FM. In line with previous practice the cost of legislative changes should be fully funded.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?
12. Yes with regards to Early Learning and Childcare. However, not for Looked After Children (Kinship Care Orders and Through care and Aftercare) and GIRFEC as no recurring funding has been provided, as outlined in response to question 2 above.

Wider Issues

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?
13. This question is answered in the response to question 6 provided above.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?
14. Future costs that might arise from subordinate legislation associated with the current Bill will need to be assessed when the draft regulations and guidance are available for comment. It is not possible to quantify these costs at this time. As previously noted, the expectation in line with previous practice would be that the Scottish Government would fund any further costs associated with legislation.

Dear Kenny,

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill – Revised Funding

I am writing to draw your attention to a change in the funding for the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill in light of the Budget this week. This letter should therefore be read alongside the Financial Memorandum.

The Financial Memorandum includes an estimate of £1.1 million for extending funded early learning and childcare to two year olds who are looked after or subject to a kinship care order. Following helpful discussions with COSLA we have decided to increase the amount allocated to local government for this priority area by £3.4 million to a total of £4.5 million. This is to reflect the importance we place on the early learning and childcare agenda and to integrate monies previously provided to support looked after 2 year olds via the Early Years Change Fund.

The Financial Memorandum also includes an estimate of £1.2 million for uprating partner provider payments in line with inflation from 2007. This is in recognition of the fact that local authorities have not increased partner provider payments consistently since Scottish Government advice on payment levels stopped in 2007. We now think this figure should be in the region of £2 million to more accurately reflect the financial pressures on local authorities and partner providers, and this too has been reflected in the Budget.

The early learning and childcare provisions in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill represent a significant step towards the Scottish Government’s vision for transformational change in early learning and childcare. I firmly believe that this positive shift in the resourcing of these provisions clearly underlines my commitment to this agenda and to supporting the delivery of this flagship policy.

Vol. 3, No. 50 Session 4

Meeting of the Parliament

Thursday 21 November 2013

Note: (DT) signifies a decision taken at Decision Time.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: The Minister for Children and Young People (Aileen Campbell) moved S4M-08326—That the Parliament agrees to the general principles of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

After debate, the motion was agreed to ((DT) by division: For 104, Against 0, Abstentions 14).

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Financial Resolution: The Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Employment and Sustainable Growth (John Swinney) moved S4M-08192—That the Parliament, for the purposes of any Act of the Scottish Parliament resulting from the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, agrees to any expenditure of a kind referred to in paragraph 3(b) of Rule 9.12 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders arising in consequence of the Act.

The motion was agreed to (DT).
The Deputy Presiding Officer (John Scott): The next item of business is a debate on motion S4M-08326, in the name of Aileen Campbell, on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

The Minister for Children and Young People (Aileen Campbell): I am grateful for the opportunity to open the debate on the general principles of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

I welcome Forrester high school and St Augustine’s high school, who have a beautiful photographic display in the Parliament to mark yesterday’s universal children’s day. It is apt to note that, given the topic of the debate.

I thank everyone who commented on the bill, especially the 2,400 children and young people and the 1,500 parents who provided their views. A range of opinions have been expressed. Many have been constructive and probing. That can only ensure that such a landmark bill will be examined, be improved and, ultimately, have the profound positive impact on children and young people that we all want it to have.

Today is an opportunity to take an overview of what the Parliament wishes the bill to achieve. I will start by discussing the principles that lie at the heart of not only the bill but our approach to improving the lives of children and young people.

The bill rests on five simple principles. First, it declares our collective commitment to making Scotland the best place in the world in which to grow up. It will establish in statute our shared responsibility for ensuring that our children have the best start in life and access to what they need to succeed as they grow and develop. Through its focus on what has been tried and on what we know works in our getting it right for every child approach, the bill builds on our renowned Scottish tradition of putting children at the centre of services and ensuring that their rights are upheld.

Next year is the 50th anniversary of the Kilbrandon report, which set the foundation for our children’s hearings system. I can think of no more fitting way of commemorating that than by passing a bill that so thoroughly embodies the principles of Kilbrandon.

The second principle is that shared responsibility should be achieved by working with parents and carers to provide the caring and supportive environments that our children should have. The bill aims to make public services more responsive to needs and sensitive to working with families. Our children deserve nothing less.

That will require a change in culture, systems and practice. The framework for that change is GIRFEC, which has been repeatedly endorsed by the Parliament, most recently in September. GIRFEC has been tested; it works. As the committee found in its evidence, the benefits to children and families are clear in those parts of Scotland that are furthest along with its implementation. As Barnardo’s Scotland said in its submission to the committee:

“We ... welcome the proposals to put elements of GIRFEC into law. GIRFEC has been a great success where it has been fully implemented and it is right that the Bill should seek to secure its wider adoption.”

The third principle in the bill is acknowledgement that we must continue to improve how we support our most vulnerable children and young people. The challenge that the Education and Culture Committee’s report of its inquiry into taking children into care has set is one that none of us takes lightly. The bill rises to that challenge by making it easier for children who need to be looked after to stay in their families through the kinship care order; by extending the support that is available to care leavers; and by ensuring that the wider public sector understands our shared corporate duty in relation to those who have been in care.

Moreover, the bill recognises that, for some children, we need to respond more quickly to the terrible risk of abuse and neglect. We are all familiar with the tragic stories in the media of children who were below the radar, the signals on whom were not picked up or acted on, and in relation to whom the need to act would have been apparent only to someone who had access to all the relevant information, which was spread among a number of different organisations. As I said on 25 September, the recent tragic case of Daniel Pelka highlights the importance of professionals putting the child’s interests at the heart of what they do and communicating their concerns. We can never prevent every case of abuse and neglect, but our bill will ensure that our services are better placed to identify and act on any concerns before those cases, too, become tragedies.

The fourth principle is the very simple idea that services to support our children and young people are better when they are planned jointly. That idea underpins our proposals for joint planning of services by local authorities and health boards, and it is equally well planted in the planning that we expect to be done for individual children who need additional support from services. We do not need scores of unco-ordinated plans across different services and professionals. Children need services that work together with one another and with their families.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): I am grateful to the minister for giving way.
