In linking her first and fourth principles, will she give an undertaking that she will ensure that children and their families are as closely involved as they can be in the process of developing those children’s plans?

Aileen Campbell: Absolutely. They need to be fully involved in the planning. That is the underlying ethos of GIRFEC—it is about ensuring that children and families are respected.

Lastly, the bill is watermarked with the principle of early intervention. Early intervention has been a mantra for years. We all know about the benefits to children and families of providing support as soon as problems arise, and to services whose resources are increasingly stretched. The bill will make real that recognition of the value of early intervention to our aspirations for early learning and childcare.

The benefits of investing in the early years are known when quality services are provided. We must ensure that those services meet the needs and wishes of families. With the resources and powers that we have now, we have made a start on transforming childcare. We want to match the very best in Europe and, as a step towards that, the bill will give three and four-year-olds 600 hours of free nursery education. That represents an increase of almost half on the figure of 412.5 hours that we inherited, and we are extending that provision to the most vulnerable two-year-olds. In total, around 120,000 children will receive more childcare, more nursery education and a better start in life. Families will be saved the equivalent of £707 per year per child.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): I am grateful to the minister for giving way and for the additional spending on that front.

How will the Scottish Government respond to the criticisms that Reform Scotland has levelled about the difficulties to do with when a child’s birthday falls?

Aileen Campbell: I will touch on that later in my remarks, but the increase in free nursery education that I have set out represents a huge step forward for children and families. In delivering a tangible increase in the number of hours of early learning and childcare, we will benefit families by protecting their budgets, as they will be able to save the equivalent of £707 per year per child. That first step should be recognised. We can look at what Reform Scotland has said, which will contribute to the wider debate that we must have in this country about how we transform childcare.

Those are the principles that steer our proposals. I am pleased that in its report the committee agreed that the bill’s principles are sound, and I am pleased that the bill will set our country on a path towards becoming the best place in the world in which to grow up—a Scotland that takes active and shared responsibility for the wellbeing of our children and young people and that recognises the continuing challenges and is never complacent. That is an ambition that I think members share.

We have listened carefully to everything that has been said during the bill process, taking full account of all interests in and perspectives on how to improve the delivery of services for all children and young people and ensure that their rights are respected across the public sector. Of course, there has not been agreement about all the detail of the bill. Throughout the process, we have welcomed constructive discussion, and in that spirit of positive debate I will address some of the issues that have been raised.

On the children’s rights provisions, I note the committee’s view that incorporation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child into Scots law does not represent the best way to progress the rights agenda at this time. That is our view. The whole premise of the bill is to make a practical difference in children’s lives, and we think that the balance that we have struck in the bill achieves that. We agree with Ken Norrie, who said:

“to incorporate the convention into the domestic legal system of Scotland would be bad policy, bad practice and bad law.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 3 September 2013; c 2682.]

We recognise that the committee feels that there is scope for the current ministerial duties to be strengthened. Our view is that the proposed package of legal measures represents a major and significant step forward, but we remain open to suggestions on strengthening the provisions.

On the new powers available to Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, we welcome the committee’s comments on the proposed changes. We recognise that the new investigatory function will undoubtedly have resource implications for the commissioner. The financial memorandum suggests a staffing structure to support the new functions. However, staffing and governance issues are entirely a matter for the Parliament. Indeed, the commissioner’s ability to operate entirely independently of Government is a key strength. Nevertheless, we remain willing to support the commissioner and the Parliament in considering some of the practicalities associated with the proposed changes.

On the role of the named person, I am pleased that the committee endorsed the value of the role and shares my determination that GIRFEC should be implemented consistently and effectively throughout Scotland. I note the committee’s comments about areas in which the practical implementation of GIRFEC needs further clarification and support from the Scottish Government. We will seek to clarify, through guidance in many cases, many of the issues that are raised in the report. On resources, we have set out our estimate of costs in the financial memorandum, but we recognise that costs will need to be monitored as implementation goes forward. We will reflect further on how best such monitoring can take place.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): The Royal College of Nursing Scotland said that the Scottish Government must recognise the Education and Culture Committee’s concerns about the capacity of the health visiting workforce to deliver on its existing duties, let alone the duties that are associated with the named person role. The people on the ground think that 450 additional health visitors will be required. Does the minister recognise those concerns? Will she give a commitment to increase the number of health visitors?

Aileen Campbell: We recognise very strongly the important role that health visitors have in the early years of a child’s life. Our ratio of health visitors to the people with whom they work is healthy compared with that in other parts of the United Kingdom. I have given a commitment to monitor implementation.

We note what the committee and some stakeholders said about information sharing. I think that all members understand why information sharing is such a critical and difficult area. Every inquiry into a child’s death in the UK over past decades has echoed the same crucial finding: that effective sharing of information within and between agencies is fundamental to improving the protection of children and young people. We have seen that too often to risk the same happening again. Proportionate, appropriate and timely information sharing is essential to ensuring that our children are kept safe from harm.

On our early learning and childcare proposals, we are delighted that many of the organisations that were invited to the Education and Culture Committee welcomed our focus on quality alongside the increased hours and flexibility. This is the first time that flexibility and choice have been put on a statutory footing and the first time that local authorities will be required to consult local parents to identify their needs.

The bill also introduces a new concept of early learning and childcare to replace the traditional concept of pre-school education. It recognises that the learning journey begins from birth, and sets the stage for our longer-term aim to develop high-quality and flexible early learning and childcare that is accessible and affordable for all children, parents and families.

We know that a number of organisations would like us to go further, especially in relation to additional vulnerable two-year-olds. Research shows that high-quality provision makes a difference to those children. We will not compromise on quality in ensuring that we improve the outcomes for our children.

I have, of course, dealt with some of the issues that Liz Smith raised in relation to Reform Scotland’s publication today. I look forward to continuing the debate with it.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: In 15 seconds, please. Regrettably, we are extraordinarily tight for time.

Aileen Campbell: The kinship care order recognises that the extended family has a responsibility to help when children are at risk and ensures that when kinship carers step into a parenting role, they will receive the support that they need. That is a huge step forward. Previously, any support that was provided to that group of carers was provided by local authorities on a discretionary basis only. The kinship care order will empower families to provide each child with a safe, stable, loving and nurturing home and will help some children to avoid formal care, if that is not in their best interests.

We also have strong commitments to ensure that we get things right for our looked-after children who are moving on to independent living. Our engagement on that with Who Cares? Scotland and others can ensure that we get things right in the final draft of the bill and that the bill works for our looked-after children.

I have set out the principles of the bill. Those principles represent the highest level of ambition for our children and young people, so it is not surprising that the bill covers a lot of ground.

I sincerely look forward to hearing the views of other members and the rest of the committee as we work together to ensure that the bill works for Scotland’s children.
I move,

That the Parliament agrees to the general principles of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We are extraordinarily tight for time. I invite members to speak for their allocated time or for less than that in order to allow as many members into the debate as possible.

Stewart Maxwell (West Scotland) (SNP): I am, of course, speaking today as the convener of the Education and Culture Committee.

As the minister said, the bill contains a wide range of proposals across its 13 parts. Consequently, we took a large amount of oral evidence and considered more than 180 written submissions. The input of all the organisations and individuals who submitted views to us has been essential, and we thank everyone who contributed. I also thank the committee clerks for all their hard work, my committee colleagues for their efforts in scrutinising the bill, and our Scottish Parliament information centre researcher for assisting us.

The Education and Culture Committee has spent significant time in this session examining issues that are linked to child welfare—specifically, the educational attainment of looked-after children and decision making on whether to take children into care. It is clear from our inquiries that much more is needed to improve outcomes for disadvantaged and looked-after children. That work has helped to inform our scrutiny of the bill. We support the bill’s central aim of promoting early intervention and preventative action to give children the best possible start in life.

A number of areas received particular comment in the evidence, which is reflected in our report. I cannot cover everything in the time that is available, so I will focus on five areas: children’s rights; named persons; information sharing; the extension of early learning and childcare; and aftercare for young care leavers.

Part 1 of the bill relates to the rights of children. Many children’s organisations supported the full incorporation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child into Scots law. They considered that that was the best way to embed children’s rights into the culture of our society, enhance respect for our children and send a clear message about how we value them.

Those are laudable outcomes, but the committee was unanimous in its view that the case had not been made for full incorporation of the convention. Our main difficulty was that it was not always clear what practical improvements such a move would bring for children and their families.

Our view is that, although the outcomes arising from incorporation are important, it does not necessarily follow that incorporation is the best or the only way in which to achieve them. In addition, the convention is already implemented in Scotland in a number of ways, such as under our obligations in the Scotland Act 1998.

Although we are not persuaded by the argument for full incorporation, we agree that the duties on the Scottish ministers and public authorities should be strengthened. Ministers must report every three years on what they have done to further the convention, for example. We want the bill to go further, so we have called on ministers to set out their vision on what they will do for each three-year period. We have also asked the Government to explain why it has chosen to require public authorities to report on “what steps they have taken ... to secure better or further effect” of the convention and not to require them to act on those findings.

The second area that I want to focus on is the introduction of a named person for every child and young person up to the age of 18. I should of course acknowledge that one committee member, Liz Smith, did not agree with the inclusion of that proposal in the bill. However, it was supported by the rest of the committee. The named person proposal forms part of the wider policy of getting it right for every child, or GIRFEC.

As members will be aware, the proposal to introduce named persons has received considerable comment. Some of the most compelling evidence that we received was from Highland Council, which is seen very much as a trailblazer for GIRFEC. The council told us that the named person role was developed through practice and experience, and that it was based on what families and professionals wanted. The initiative has been fully implemented since 2010 and the results are encouraging. Families like having contact with someone whom they know and who knows the child, and they do not have to deal with bureaucratic systems to get some extra support. Professionals, too, have welcomed the initiative. Teachers, health visitors and midwives feel that the named person role has not changed what they do but has made them feel empowered.

We also heard evidence from health and teaching professionals that the named person role could lead to a reduction in neglect. According to Highland Council, the introduction of named persons meant that children were more likely to get the help that they need when they need it, and fewer children were referred to the children’s reporter. However, the committee is mindful that some of that improvement is due in part to the culture of integration and collaborative working across front-line services in Highland.

As we have said in our report, we want the Scottish Government to give details of the range of support that it will provide to ensure that local authorities and health boards can replicate the successes that have been experienced in Highland, recognising the different circumstances that will prevail in different parts of the country. We also highlighted a number of practical issues that need to be resolved, such as the types of intervention that a named person will be expected to make and how the role will operate during school holidays. We believe that the success of the named person role will depend on the Government’s ability to work with its local partners to clarify those and other issues.

The Scottish Government must also be prepared to ensure that health boards, but particularly health visitors, can cope with the demands placed on them. The Finance Committee raised that point with us, and we have asked the Government to explain how capacity issues will be managed to ensure that the bill’s good intentions can be put in place.

Linked to the introduction of named persons is the proposal to lower the threshold for sharing information about individual children or young people without consent. The bill will allow professionals to share information where there is “concern about the wellbeing” of a child rather than only where, as the current test requires, there is “risk of significant harm”. It is crucial that all those who share information are properly trained. Training and guidance must cover all relevant service providers, including the private and third sectors, and must engender a common understanding of what constitutes proportionate, necessary information sharing.

We also refer in our report to the concerns that were raised by witnesses about the drafting of the information sharing provisions in the bill. For example, Professor Norrie described the provisions as “contradictory” and the Information Commissioner’s Office felt that the scope of section 27 was too wide and wanted it to be redrawn. We therefore welcome the minister’s commitment to look again at the drafting of those important provisions. I know that the Government will carefully consider the comments of the committee and others before we approach stage 2.

The bill will also extend the number of free hours of pre-school early learning and childcare to which children are entitled from 475 to 600 hours per year. That is indeed a positive step and it reflects the crucial importance of early years intervention in children’s development. We also very much welcome the plan to introduce increased flexibility in the provision of the new entitlement, which will make it easier for parents to take up employment opportunities. However, we urge the Scottish Government and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to work to ensure that flexible arrangements are made available as quickly as possible to enable families to take advantage of the new provision.

Finally, I want to touch on the important proposals to extend support for young care leavers up to the age of 26. Currently, local authorities must provide support up to the age of 18 and have discretion for those up to the age of 21. As we heard during our previous inquiries, young care leavers are particularly vulnerable. We must do all that we can to ensure that they receive adequate and appropriate support so that they can enjoy exactly the same outcomes in life as many of us take for granted. We recognise the difficulty of that and we recognise that the transition from being in care to independent living can often be an extremely difficult time in a young person’s life. We therefore support the bill’s proposals but invite the Government to respond to the three questions that are asked in paragraph 178 of our report. The minister referred to that earlier in her comments about the campaign led by Who Cares? Scotland.

I should mention that the committee will take evidence on school closures before stage 2. The Government intends to lodge amendments on that, and we want to hear from stakeholders, which will inform our scrutiny of those amendments.

The committee supports the bill’s aims of putting children and young people at the heart of the planning and delivery of services and of ensuring that their rights are respected throughout society. We welcome the Government’s aim of improving outcomes for children and young people and particularly those who are disadvantaged.

Other than on the named person provisions, the whole committee agreed with the bill’s general principles and we hope that our suggestions for improvement will help to make the bill stronger still.

Jayne Baxter (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab): I am pleased that we have finally reached the stage 1 debate on the bill. As we are all aware, it is a substantial piece of legislation, which is not surprising, given its origins as two separate bills. With that in mind, I will not explore in detail all the points that we hope to cover in the bill’s later stages.

Labour will support the Government and vote for the bill at decision time. We will go into stage 2 in a constructive and positive frame of mind. We will test the elements of the bill that concern us and look to enhance and improve other areas of it, where we feel that it is not ambitious enough for Scotland’s children. When considering our proposed amendments, we will focus on early learning and childcare, which my colleague Neil Bibby will address in his closing speech, and on issues that relate to care leavers, which my colleague Kezia Dugdale will focus on.

The potential for the bill to have a real impact on Scotland’s children should not be underestimated. Everyone in the Parliament is ambitious for Scotland, and that can be realised through improving our young people’s life chances. That is why I am pleased that Labour’s newest MSP, Cara Hilton, will make her maiden speech in the debate. I hope that the Parliament will join me in welcoming her.

Too many children’s life chances are determined by the circumstances in which they are born and grow up and not by their own unique potential to achieve, develop and thrive. For too many children and young people, access to opportunities is bound up in a tangled web of poverty-related issues that impact on their health, their home life, their interaction with their peers and their educational attainment. The key to the bill achieving its potential will be our making inroads into those issues, many of which are deeply rooted in our communities.

There are some headline-grabbing figures in the bill. Scottish Labour welcomes the increase in the statutory provision of free early learning and childcare, although it has been a long time coming, as it was a Scottish National Party manifesto commitment back in 2007. However, the danger is that introducing the bill places too much focus on the headlines, at the expense of working through the details of how the measures will be achieved. An increase in free early learning and childcare sounds excellent, but unless those hours are resulting in that.

Aileen Campbell: I reiterate that the bill will put flexibility on a statutory footing, to ensure that the provision works for the parents and carers whom Jayne Baxter refers to.

Jayne Baxter: I will touch on that as I proceed with my speech.

Earlier in the year, I was privileged to speak at the launch of a report by Fife Gingerbread and the Poverty Alliance on the impact of lone parenthood on families in rural areas. That report and the feedback from many conversations with parents supported by Save the Children have highlighted how important flexibility of childcare provision is to many parents who are in work or trying their hardest to get work.

I remain concerned that the proposals do not address that point in the short term. I look forward to hearing from the minister whether increased flexibility in early learning and childcare provision and in out-of-school childcare could be incorporated in the bill.

The point has been made at committee that we need to have a clearer understanding of how the bill fits in with other legislation that is aimed at planning services for children and young people. I referred to the value of framing the measures in the bill in the context of how poverty can be tackled. We will examine the extent to which the bill fits with or supports the Scottish child poverty strategy. One example would be to extend early years provision to include two-year-olds who are in poverty, as many children’s charities have recommended. We will also seek an amendment so that all three-year-olds receive the same entitlement regardless of where their birthday falls in the school year. For many parents, those few months could make an enormous difference, as Reform Scotland has said today.

Much of the controversy about the bill has concerned the named person provisions. If we cast our minds back to the Conservative Party debate on that a few weeks ago, we will be aware of the many concerns that have been raised. However, we are minded to support the principle of the named person, just as we support in principle the entire bill.

I return, however, to comments that I have made previously: this is the nugget of a good idea, but we need to ensure that it can work well and be effective. I want the positive outcomes that have been experienced in Highland to be replicated across the country, but the devil will be in the detail.

Aileen Campbell: I reiterate that the bill will put flexibility on a statutory footing, to ensure that the provision works for the parents and carers whom Jayne Baxter refers to.

Jayne Baxter: I will touch on that as I proceed with my speech.

Earlier in the year, I was privileged to speak at the launch of a report by Fife Gingerbread and the Poverty Alliance on the impact of lone parenthood on families in rural areas. That report and the feedback from many conversations with parents supported by Save the Children have highlighted how important flexibility of childcare provision is to many parents who are in work or trying their hardest to get work.

I return, however, to comments that I have made previously: this is the nugget of a good idea, but we need to ensure that it can work well and be effective. I want the positive outcomes that have been experienced in Highland to be replicated across the country, but the devil will be in the detail.

The Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning (Michael Russell): The member makes a wise point about ensuring that the bill is implemented well. I am sure that she will wish to do this anyway, but I recommend that she visits Angus, for example, or goes to see some of the excellent work that is being done in my constituency, in Argyll and Bute, to find out how policy is being converted into practice in a most impressive way. I think that it will set her mind at rest to know that people’s imagination, hard work and resources are resulting in that.

Jayne Baxter: I agree that resources will be fundamental to making the bill work. I reiterate that everywhere is different. What works in Highland might not work in other places. We need to take time to consider individual circumstances in different communities, and we need to work out... what works for each place. It is not as simple as saying that things will happen in a certain way. It will take a bit of time, imagination and commitment to make the policy work in every area.

The training and support that are necessary for effective implementation of the role of the named person must be appropriately resourced, and I hope that the roll call of concerns in the committee report is considered carefully. In their evidence, both the Royal College of Nursing Scotland and the Educational Institute of Scotland highlighted concerns in relation to funding and support. Further clarification of the role of the named person needs to be provided by the Scottish Government. Although we support the principle of what the minister is trying to achieve, we will continue to push to ensure that the proposals are fit for purpose. The volume of comment and debate surrounding that point is an indicator of Scotland’s wish to do better for vulnerable children and our desire to get this right. We have a golden opportunity to do so, and we must be able to say with confidence to parents, children and practitioners that the wholesale adoption of the named person model will promote a step change in how services are delivered to children and their families.

With that in mind, the Government must also address the concerns of kinship carers. My Labour colleague on the Education and Culture Committee and I have offered cautious support for the proposals at stage 1, but we will consider the matter carefully, with a view to lodging an amendment to provide greater clarity in the bill, rather than waiting for the detail on kinship care orders to emerge in secondary legislation.

I am pleased to have heard the minister reflecting on the publication of Together’s report on the “State of Children’s Rights in Scotland”. I was keen to read the assessment of where we are now on the implementation of the UNCRC. The report makes a fairly brutal judgement on the bill, stating that it “lacks a coherent child rights framework through which the Scottish Government’s policy intention to ‘make rights real’ can be achieved.”

Clearly, improvements can be made in that area of the bill, and I support looking towards having a duty on ministers to “have due regard to” the UNCRC when making policy decisions, as has been adopted in Wales. Our Welsh colleagues also require ministers to produce reports, and I hope that the minister will reflect on the committee’s recommendations in that regard.

In supporting the bill in principle, we will aim to be as constructive as possible in our comments and to reflect the huge amount of evidence and information that has been shared with us from the children and young people and care sectors throughout the country.

We are lucky to be able to work with such a range of organisations, which have such knowledge, skills and a genuine commitment to improving young Scots’ lives, and I thank them all for their hard work. I look forward to listening to the rest of the debate and to working with colleagues to improve the bill.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): The Scottish Government has made it clear in its introduction to the bill that its primary function is to ensure that there is a much more collaborative and integrated approach to the provision of children’s services, so that all young people can access the opportunities and support that they need. Given the better outcomes for young people that have been achieved by those service providers that have engaged in that greater collaboration and integrated approach, that is a reasoned approach for the bill, and it is an approach for which there is clear cross-party support.

Too many young people are losing out—whether they are children with foster families or kinship families, young carers, children with long-term illnesses who are unable to go to school, or children who cannot access the full entitlement for nursery provision.

On that last subject, I welcome the opening that the Minister for Children and Young People gave us to discuss the matter further. The issue about when the child’s birthday falls is different from the issue about the monetary provision. We will wish to pursue that matter at stage 2.

The Parliament knows that we have serious concerns about certain parts of the bill. In some cases, those concerns are substantive. In others, they are administrative and resourcing issues. Sometimes, it is a matter of drafting.

The legal profession rightly asks politicians to be mindful of what constitutes good law: whether proposals are clear, coherent, effective and accessible and therefore easily understood. Throughout the bill’s early progress, we have examined the proposals against those criteria and questioned whether new legislation or a change in culture and attitude is required, or perhaps a mixture of both.

For the most part, the Scottish Government has decided on a legislative route, so I will deal first with some substantive concerns in that respect. First, there has been a move to legislate with primary regard to the child’s “wellbeing” rather than to their “welfare”, which is a term that underpins most of the existing legislation. I well understand why there is a certain attraction in that, as it is generally assumed that wellbeing has a deeper and much more holistic meaning that might bring some added qualitative value. However, it has exposed the tension between the theory and the practice. Although I think we can all agree that wellbeing is a good thing, it is exceedingly difficult to define, notwithstanding the SHANARRI—safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included—indicators and their subdivisions, which have been operating in some local authorities. The bill is not entirely clear about the definition of wellbeing and it is too often conflated with welfare. The more the Scottish Government has tried to make legislative provision for improved children’s services, the more it has encountered difficulties with those definitions.

Aileen Campbell: In evidence to the committee, Barnardo’s Scotland spoke about how the SHANARRI indicators that go along with wellbeing give professionals who work with children a much greater understanding of what they are all talking about and enable them to work more purposefully with the child to ensure that their wellbeing needs are met and they achieve positive outcomes in later life.

Liz Smith: They do, but the point is that the terms “wellbeing” and “welfare” are sometimes conflated in the bill, which causes difficulties in how the rest of the bill hangs together. We have to consider that carefully.

Secondly, there is the issue of inconclusive legal advice, foremost with regard to whether to incorporate the UNCRC into Scots law. There is a wide divergence of opinion on that, as the minister indicated in her speech. Opinions include the one that the minister quoted, which suggests that incorporation would be bad policy, bad practice and bad law.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 3 September 2013; c 2682.]

However, Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People and some of the children’s charities say that incorporation is essential if we are to embed clear and robust means of accountability. The divergence in legal opinion is nothing new, but what has made life difficult for the committee is the relative lack of detailed evidence to support the contrary views, and the fact that the evidence that we took on this crucial issue is rather incomplete.

The Parliament already knows that the Scottish Conservatives oppose the section of the bill that includes the universal provision of a named person for all young people up to age 18. We have done so for several reasons, and I will not go over them again, as we have already held a debate on the issue.

We have been very persuaded by some of the evidence that was presented to the committee by the Scottish Parent Teacher Council, the Faculty of Advocates, the Law Society of Scotland, the Govan Law Centre, churches and experienced practitioners such as Maggie Mellon. They have all made the point that a universal provision for a named person clearly undermines the role of some parents, and the family and communities, and instead places professionals in the front line of responsibility for the child.

When that is taken together with the proposed extent of data sharing and the extension of powers to the children’s commissioner—and, in some cases, to Scottish Government ministers—in a way that Kenneth Norrie described as “open ended”, it makes the bill a bit too statist in its approach for our liking. We will abstain from the vote this afternoon because we are not yet satisfied that the bill is dealing with those issues in a way that would suit.

I have heard SNP ministers and back benchers claim that local authorities are facing incredibly difficult—and differing—challenges in their respective areas. That is absolutely true, and we must be careful to acknowledge that in the bill and ensure that we are not putting on large structures that take that away.

We have been very careful and we have thought about the bill and the vast number of submissions that have come in. The rights of children do not stand in isolation; they should be seen in the context of the rights of parents and families and all the communities that they represent. We are looking to develop the area when the bill reaches stage 2. We have a lot of sympathy with many of the bill’s principles, but there are still some fundamental issues that we want to tease out at stage 2, so we will abstain in the vote at decision time.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We move to the open debate, with speeches of up to six minutes.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): It has been enjoyable and a great honour to be involved in the work of the Education and Culture Committee on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. We took a significant amount of written and oral evidence. Unfortunately, we could not see everybody who wanted to appear at the committee, but we took on board the written evidence that the committee received. The care and attention that had been given to the briefings on the bill that members received are a testament to how much the people and agencies that are involved want the bill to work and to improve outcomes for young people.
The policy memorandum sets out that the fundamental reforms of children’s services are in line with the Christie commission report, which highlighted “the importance of early years, prevention and personalised service delivery”.

We should remember that the Christie report received significant cross-party support on its publication. It is to be commended that we are moving towards that.

We need to take stock of what is happening in Scotland, because we are not starting from zero in respect of children’s services. Colleagues in the national health service, local authorities and education services have all been working hard to take on board the recommendations of the Christie report. They are moving towards more collaborative working practices, not only in the early years and children’s services but in services for elderly people. A great deal of change is already happening in the sector.

I want to highlight some of the work that is being done in the area. The committee is on record as commending NHS staff, local authority workers and education staff for their dedication and commitment to their roles. I want to highlight the Roots of Empathy programme pilot that happened in North Lanarkshire. From the research that underpins the bill, we all know about the importance of early intervention. We know that a child’s emotional development can be badly damaged by poor parenting in the early years and in early schooling. The Roots of Empathy programme was piloted in the Berryhill primary area in North Lanarkshire. It is a Canadian programme, founded by Mary Gordon, that is designed to improve the emotional capacity of young children and their capacity to empathise with other people. It involves a young baby being brought into a primary classroom, with a structured series of questions and engagement with the baby, such as game playing and song singing. I shall spare members my rendition of the song for baby Ruben that I heard in Berryhill primary, but it was a delight to see the reaction of the young baby on hearing the children in the class welcoming him with that song.

The programme is well documented and the research has shown how much it improves the capacity for empathy in young people. Of course, for many young people, that will not be necessary because they are growing up in warm and nurturing homes with good responsible parenting and the opportunity to engage with other people. However, for children who have been denied that upbringing, the results are impressive in relation to anger management issues and reducing the behavioural problems that sometimes result from the complex issues that Jayne Baxter so eloquently described in talking about the damage that poverty can do to young people.

Far from starting from new on the issue, there is much good work going on in Scotland. We should acknowledge that and recognise the dedication and commitment of the people who are involved in that work. As the minister said at the launch of the roll-out, the Roots of Empathy programme shows “our commitment to early intervention and the importance of positive relationships as the cornerstone of a better Scotland.”

“This is an investment in the future; by encouraging empathy and respect in children we are giving them the foundations to be positive, successful adults who will pass those skills onto their own children.”

In its support for the principles of the bill, the committee is showing how important that is for moving forward. Putting that in statute will create a marker that sets Scotland out as one of the foremost countries in its support for young people and their development.

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): The member is in her final minute; I mention that because we are tight for time.

Clare Adamson: Thank you.

The report was based mainly on consensus and I do not need to repeat its recommendations or conclusions. The one issue on which committee members differed was the named person. We should therefore consider some of the support for the named person role. The Royal College of Nursing said that the named person role was working well in areas where GIRFEC is being implemented. Children 1st said that it supported the idea of the named person, as we believe it could offer a way to avoid children ‘slipping through the net’ when they are at their most vulnerable, and a useful point of contact for families so they can access advice and services without having to deal with excessive delay or red tape.”

In addition, we should take on the success of Highland Council and North Ayrshire Council and other authorities that are working on and rolling out GIRFEC successfully and implementing the named person role.

Kezia Dugdale (Lothian) (Lab): I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate. I do so from the pack and in recognition of the hard graft that my colleagues Neil Bibby and Jayne Baxter have done in working through the detail in committee.

I want to use my time to talk specifically about looked-after children and, in particular, parts 7 and 8 of the bill. Why? From everything that I have read and learned, every story that I have heard and every person whom I have met, nothing has angered me more than the experiences and life stories of looked-after children.

Let us go through some of the key statistics. There are 16,200 looked-after children today, which is up 25 per cent from 2006. Thirty per cent of them have experienced homelessness and up to 80 per cent of our young offender institutions’ population have been in care at some point; that figure was as high as 88 per cent of Polmont’s population when Barnardo’s published its plan B report. A person is far more likely to go to jail than to university if they have been in care—and that is before we even look at the difference in educational attainment between those in care and those beyond it. Such wasted potential somehow now feels inevitable.

While I was reading ahead of the debate, I followed the footnotes through to the 2007 report in the name of the then education minister, Hugh Henry, titled “Looked After Children and Young People: We Can and Must Do Better.” It is a fantastic report, brimming with statistics and action points to make things better. I was struck by just how little has changed in the six years since the report was published. When I put that to Who Cares? Scotland today, I was told that 17 different reports have been written on looked-after children since the dawn of the Parliament. One care leaver told me that each one somehow reads like an apology. Perhaps that is an apology for inaction, but it is more likely an apology for what feels like the inevitability of poorer life chances for looked-after children, which is a problem that somehow seems too big to fix.

I am not interested in a blame game of how we got here, because that care leaver could not care less about that. She wants to know what will happen now, and she is looking to the bill as a huge opportunity that must not be missed. That is why I am committed to lodging a number of amendments at stage 2, in conjunction with Barnardo’s, the Aberlour Child Care Trust and Who Cares? Scotland.

The legislation alone is not enough; we need a cultural shift in the public’s attitude towards looked-after children. I have two reflections on that issue. First, the public are largely ignorant about care leavers—how many there are, what being looked after at home is and means, and how poor their life chances are. Too many people think that those are bad kids worthy of little sympathy from anyone other than the biggest softies, rather than them being fundamentally good kids who find themselves where they are because of a life that has been free from care and full of neglect, and kids who have more experience of violence than affection and more experience of physical contact defined by restraint rather than by love. We need to put those children at the front and centre of our public discourse. We can start to do that with the bill.

Aileen Campbell: I agree entirely that we must change the myths that surround looked-after children and ensure that they are given the support and nurture that they need. Does the member welcome our support for Who Cares? Scotland’s time to listen campaign? Has she signed that pledge? If not, how can we work together so that more people sign the pledge? We need to listen to looked-after children. They are our responsibility and we must ensure, in our corporate parenting duties, that they have no less fulfilling a life than their non-looked-after peers.

Kezia Dugdale: I would be delighted to support the minister with that ambition and I speak for all my colleagues when I say that we are willing to work with the Government to improve the life chances of looked-after children. The minister can count on that not just throughout the bill process, but throughout this parliamentary session. I will speak more about that in a second.

We need to talk more about looked-after children and we need to challenge the media to do the same. We need to unite as a Parliament and agree that nothing should be inevitable about looked-after children’s life chances except the fulfilling of those children’s potential. They are our children and we should demand that their lives are full of love and expectation. In this Parliament we should create the rules by which that might happen.

My second reflection is on care leavers. It was put to me that the stigma associated with being in care is so strong that when a young person turns 16 they want to rid themselves of that label and everything to do with it. In so doing, they lose their rights to expect support as they transition into adult life. I can understand that, but I would like to get to a place where young care leavers can wear their label with pride and demand support to enhance their lives. In many ways it should be a liberation issue: care leavers should have more rights to support into their adult life exactly because of where they have come from and who they are. That will require a cultural shift in our attitudes to looked-after children, but it also requires care leavers themselves to make demands and exercise their rights.

Every care leaver whom I have met can name the date on which they left care. I cannot imagine that many people around the room can remember the date on which they left their family home. Why is that? The reason is that leaving home is a process, not an event. I want to see the bill greatly enhanced in that respect.
I hope that the Government will engage constructively on the bill. I appreciate that we cannot change society’s attitudes to looked-after children overnight, but I hope that by the end of the bill’s passage we will have a clear vision of our ambition for care leavers and a clear route map for how to get there.

Let me make it absolutely clear: I will do everything that I can to work with the Government to improve the lives of looked-after children, not just on this bill but throughout this parliamentary session. I have a strong and clear ambition for where we might be in 10 years’ time.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): We often talk about wanting Scotland to be the best place in the world to grow up in. I believe that the bill will help us get to that ambition. It will build foundations for us to ensure that we can do something. Whether we need one bill, two bills or whatever, this bill is very ambitious and deals with Scotland’s most important commodity: our children and young people. What we do here will make a massive difference to young people’s lives.

Clare MacFarlane is quite right when she says that various charities are still involved in the bill and want it to do extremely well. That is how important the bill is and we appreciate that. Charities have engaged with the committee and various other groups throughout the process.

It is interesting to see how the committee got to this stage. Before we started considering the bill, the committee had looked at length into looked-after children and their educational attainment. We heard some of the stories about what happened to young people, which made a big difference for every one of us on the committee, because it brought the issue into the real world. We were discussing not just a bill—a piece of paper—but real people’s lives. Every one of us took that forward into this process.

Not so long ago, I visited HM Young Offenders Institution Polmont, where Barnardo’s is running a project. I met a lot of young people who were in that secure unit because of various things that had happened in their life. Barnardo’s had a programme to help educate younger people in the system. We talked about the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and when the young people explained some of the things that had happened in their lives, they started to come round to the idea that the provisions in the bill might have been a way—although not in every case—to help them not get into the position of being in a secure unit.

That is the most important thing that we have to take from this. We live in challenging times and young people have challenging lives. We have to look at that and do what we can for those people.

When I was on that visit, I had instant credibility. One of my constituents was there and when I told him that I came from Seedhill in Paisley, he said to one of his colleagues, “George is one of us, so we can listen to him.”

The whole point of the bill is to put children and young people at the centre of decision making, empower them and give them opportunities.

Much has been said about the UNCRC but my view is that its principles actually inform GIRFEC. Indeed, the great work that has been done in Highland Council has clearly made a difference. When we took evidence on that project, we heard that, in many cases, problems arose when parents did not have a named person; once they understood what the named person did, they wanted to engage with them. With my constituency in mind, I certainly see how that approach can work in areas of deprivation and areas where there are various challenges.

We are here to get something that deals with the various issues. We can of course discuss at stages 2 and 3 how we might further develop the legislation, and I am glad that the Labour Party has decided to work with us and move things forward. As the Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning made clear at question time, this Parliament is at its best when, as in last night’s debate, it looks at how problems might be dealt with and solved and when members do not simply play the political game. The exciting thing about this bill is that it gives us an opportunity to make a difference in every young person’s life. That is not hyperbole or exaggeration; if we get this right, we can ensure that young men and women do not end up in places such as Polmont or in care.

I know from my time as a councillor in Renfrewshire that issues can arise when young people in care become adults and move out into adult life. Of course, going out into the big bad world is challenging for those of us with the best of lives—after all, the world is not an easy place to live in—but while I was at Renfrewshire Council we worked with one of the local housing associations to provide housing to these young people and support them in that respect. However, as a social housing provider, the council found that within two or so years of giving a young person the keys to their new home it was trying to evict them from it. We have to find a way of looking after these young people, and there are other ways of doing that than through legislation. We can, for example, work with other partners and organisations to offer support.
Today is about the vision; it is about the idea that we can make Scotland the best place for young people to grow up in. As long as we all work together and stay focused, we can make that difference.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): Like other members, I thank the very many people and organisations that submitted oral and written evidence on the bill and those responsible for the veritable snowstorm of briefings that we have received over the past few days. I also thank the clerks and committee colleagues for their contributions to what I think is a very reasonable report on a very wide-ranging bill.

Let me be clear: the Scottish Liberal Democrats support the bill’s principles and believe that it actually delivers on them, which perhaps distinguishes it from the Post-16 Education (Scotland) Bill. Like any bill, it needs to be improved in many areas—indeed, the Finance Committee’s report on the financial memorandum was particularly critical—but I welcome the minister’s willingness to address areas of concern pretty much across the board.

I am not sure, for example, that the bill properly reflects children’s rights at this stage and do not think that the committee was convinced that the case for full incorporation of the UNCRC had been adequately made. However, we were seized of the importance of looking again at incorporating specific rights, and the Law Society of Scotland’s description of the duty placed on members as a “diluted version of the existing obligations” and the Faculty of Advocates’ view that the bill does not further develop the rights of children and young people in Scotland to a significant extent suggest that more work needs to be done, particularly in relation to putting children’s rights impact assessments at the heart of the legislative process.

One of the most controversial areas was the named person provision, which the Parliament has already debated. Although I again make clear my support for the principle, I, like all committee members, must acknowledge the inherent practical and resource issues, some of which arise from uncertainty about roles and responsibilities, the interaction with lead professionals and some of the training requirements.

That, in turn, has consequences for resources—a point that was picked up by the Finance Committee, the education unions and the RCN, which in its briefing suggests that “concerns regarding the capacity of the health visiting workforce to deliver existing duties let alone those associated with the Named Person role” need to be borne in mind.

The practicalities stem from the lowering of the threshold to one of wellbeing, which has implications for information sharing and, indeed, where the consent of the individual is sought. Professor Kenneth Norrie, the Information Commissioner’s Office and others have highlighted their concerns in relation to sections 26 and 27. I am grateful to the minister for acknowledging that and for agreeing to take that issue away. There are practical and resource issues and we need to maintain a ruthless focus on welfare. I hope that the Government will ensure that there is a presumption in favour of consent in relation to information sharing.

The political heart of the bill is to be found in part 6, on early learning and childcare. It is a vehicle by which the Government can deliver on its commitment to provide 600 hours of early learning and childcare for three and four-year-olds. I restate my welcome for that policy, which I believe will deliver real benefits. The concerns that have been raised by Liz Smith, Jayne Baxter and others about the points that were made by Reform Scotland have been taken on board by the minister. However, there is scope for more ambition, particularly in relation to two-year-olds. The minister will argue that the bill represents a first step. I acknowledge that, but I do not think that it shows sufficient ambition. The Scottish Liberal Democrats have put forward reasonable and costed proposals for extending that provision to two-year-olds from the poorest backgrounds. In its briefing for the debate, Save the Children says that “to be effective at meeting its aims, we believe there is a strong case to also include two year olds growing up in poverty”.

It goes on to say: “Evidence shows that every month of pre-school provision after age 2 is linked to improved outcomes including increased educational performance at age 14”. That is picked up by Children in Scotland, which points to the provision for 40 per cent of two-year-olds that is delivering to 92,000 two-year-olds south of the border.

Aileen Campbell: Will the member give way?

Liam McArthur: I do not have time. I know that the minister will pick that up in her winding-up speech.

That is achievable and the bill offers a vehicle for delivering it. It can be done without impacting on quality, allowing the flexibility that the committee pointed to in ensuring that two-year-olds from the poorest backgrounds in Scotland do not fall behind those south of the border.

In relation to part 8, which strengthens the support for care leavers, I associate myself very much with the comments that Kezia Dugdale made in her excellent speech. The area has been a focus for the committee in at least two inquiries, and the bill represents a real step in the right direction in aftercare up to the age of 26. However, as our inquiries show, we need a renewed focus. There is no magic bullet because the reasons why those who go through the care system struggle with outcomes are many and varied. In last night’s excellent debate, the emphasis was on the need for strong, stable, loving relationships. That is very much the message that we got back time and again in our inquiries. More can be done on aftercare, building on the good provisions in the bill to deliver what Aberlour Child Care Trust, Who Cares? Scotland and Barnardo’s have talked about:

“transforming aftercare into a much stronger form of continuing care, which combines the continuation of support and the continuation of the strong relationships that young people in care have come to rely on.”

There are many issues that I have missed, which I will turn to at stages 2 and 3. We would all subscribe to the ambition for Scotland to be the best place to grow up in. We might disagree on how far we are from achieving that, but it is the right vision. The bill can play a part in delivering that, but it needs further clarity and ambition—clarity around resources and practical implications and ambitions around early learning for two-year-olds, aftercare and children’s rights. At stage 2, there will be an opportunity to provide that opportunity and ambition, building on an excellent start.

Bob Doris (Glasgow) (SNP): It is a privilege to speak in the debate. I will deal almost exclusively with kinship care and the development of the new kinship care order. I reiterate my belief that kinship carers should be given the same support as is given to foster carers. I made a promise to campaigners at a national kinship care hustings in Possilpark in 2007, and I have continued to champion the cause ever since.

The views that I express are heavily influenced by constituents of mine, such as Jessie Harvey and Ruby Grant who are members of the kinship care group in the north of the city that I represent, and by several other groups that I work with within the city. Put simply, kinship carers step in and take on a caring role for loved ones, for children, when mum and dad are unwilling or unable to do so. If kinship carers were not there to pick up the pieces, the life chances and life outcomes for such children would be far worse. That would also cost Scotland’s councils a small fortune, as they would instead need to use foster carers or residential care for those vulnerable children.

I pay tribute to our former children’s minister Adam Ingram for advancing the cause of kinship care under the SNP Government that was elected in 2007. Putting a kinship care outcome into the Scottish Government’s concordat with councils was vital. That sought to move to parity the financial support given to kinship carers and that given to foster carers. Clearly, although that aspiration was not fully met, that has made a real difference. I agree with the Child Poverty Action Group, which told the Education and Culture Committee:

“The initial agreement, which was to pay kinship carers of looked-after children at a rate equivalent to that for foster carers, has not become a reality, but all local authorities have shifted to a position where they are making payments of some sort to kinship carers of looked-after children. Quite a few local authorities are also making payments at some level to kinship carers of non-looked-after children.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 24 September 2013; c 2821.]

That is not enough, but we have driven a real change and it is important to put that on record.

Some kinship carers have asked me why the financial memorandum includes projected cost savings from kinship care. They ask how improvements can be made in the support for kinship carers while cost savings are also expected. However, the financial memorandum states that one reason for developing the kinship care order is “to reduce unchecked growth in formal kinship care”.

In other words, as children in kinship care come to the attention of social work or are placed in kinship care by social work—a vital distinction that, if I have time, I will return to later—they are less likely to become formally looked after. Kinship care orders will still provide support, but a crucial point is that the level of direct social work involvement will necessarily be less than if the child was deemed to be formally looked after.

I understand that the bill will lead to a projected saving in social work time, and that is the saving referred to in the financial memorandum. Fundamentally, those savings do not signal a reduction in direct cash support to kinship carers, but I would welcome some clarity and reassurance from the minister on that when she sums up the debate.

I also ask for some certainty that the bill does not put up any barriers to providing financial support to kinship carers. Can the minister confirm that the bill contains nothing that would instruct councils to pay less or, indeed, hinder them from paying more?

Aileen Campbell: I just want to put on record—

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Minister, I am afraid that you must face your microphone.

Aileen Campbell: The kinship care order—

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Sorry, minister, we cannot hear you unless you face into the microphone.

Aileen Campbell: The kinship care order will enhance support for kinship carers by giving more kinship carers the help and support that they need. Whether financially or otherwise, support will be provided to them to ensure that they are the best possible family for the child to have a long and lasting and nurturing life.

Bob Doris: I thank the minister for that intervention.

I will move on to the financial working group that the Scottish Government has set up, which will report shortly. My understanding is that the financial package of support to kinship carers is not contained within the bill—that is not what the bill seeks to do—but is the job of the financial working group. Can the minister provide more information on when the working group might report and how long it will take the Scottish Government to consider the group’s recommendations? If she can tease out how that will be taken forward, that would be very helpful.

Another issue that I want to mention is the postcode lottery or lack of consistency in how local authorities deal with kinship care. In Glasgow—I single out Glasgow City Council only because that is the local authority that I know best—the council provides payments of £50 a week for voluntary kinship care arrangements. Those payments are not enough, but I welcome them. However, the council makes a distinction between situations in which granny and granddad have decided to look after the vulnerable child, because they know that the child is at risk, and situations in which the local authority has turned up on the doorstep and placed the child with granny and granddad. In one case, the local authority has stepped in, whereas in the other case there is a voluntary arrangement, but I do not think that distinctions should be drawn when providing financial support for those families. I ask the Government to consider that.

The final thing that I would like to mention is the need for consistency in social work assessments of kinship carers across the country. Kinship carers in Glasgow believe that they are already going through an assessment process pretty similar to that for foster carers and they are asked for some deeply personal information and access to their personal medical records. Better guidance, better training and more consistency in social work assessments would also be welcome.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I am now very pleased to invite Cara Hilton to make her maiden speech in the chamber.

Cara Hilton (Dunfermline) (Lab): I am pleased to be making my maiden speech in this important debate on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. It may be the tradition for members to pay tribute to their predecessors in such speeches, but on this occasion I think that the less said about my predecessor, the better.

I am extremely proud to have been elected as member of the Scottish Parliament for Dunfermline. Dunfermline is the community in which I live, it is where my children go to school and nursery and there is no greater honour for me than the opportunity to serve the people of Dunfermline at Holyrood. In my election campaign, I promised my constituents that I would always put Dunfermline first and that I would focus on the issues that matter to people in their everyday lives.

Anyone who took part in the by-election campaign will know that Dunfermline is a growing area. We certainly have a large proportion of young families, and the number 1 challenge facing many of the young families that I represent is childcare. They face the constant challenge of juggling work, childcare, school pick-up times and family finances. Politicians in all parties say that they want to address that challenge, but for too long they have failed to do so. That is why I welcome the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill and support its general principles.

However, for the constituents that I represent, the bill is a missed opportunity and I think that it lacks ambition. The 600 hours of free childcare is extremely welcome, but it is long overdue. When the SNP originally pledged 600 hours, my oldest son was almost three years old and was just about to start pre-school. Like all my friends, I was looking forward to the extra provision that was promised back in 2007. My son and his friends are now aged nine and they are in primary 5, yet the 600 hours of provision still has not been delivered. There are few better examples of Scotland being on pause than the seven years for which the SNP has made parents in Dunfermline and across Scotland wait for extra free childcare.

The reality is that we are still playing catch-up with England and Wales where, despite the coalition Government’s best efforts to dismantle the good work that was done by Labour, families continue to benefit from better provision than exists here in Scotland. At the UK level, Ed
Miliband has pledged to deliver 25 hours a week of free childcare to working parents of three and four-year-olds if Labour wins in 2015, and to guarantee wraparound childcare for families of schoolchildren.

Why does the bill that we are discussing not include childcare provision for school-age children? Why does it do nothing to address the unfairness of birthday discrimination, which means that a child who is born after 31 August has to wait an extra six months—often until the end of January the next year—for a free pre-school place? Why is the SNP Government happy for Scotland to be lagging behind the rest of the UK when it comes to providing care for some of our most vulnerable two-year-olds? To quote a phrase from the Dunfermline by-election, Scotland "deserves better" than that.

The bill as it stands does little to tackle the number 1 issue facing families, which is the lack of flexible, affordable childcare. As the mum of three children, I was delighted when my five-year-old started school in August, not just because she was so looking forward to it, but because for the first time in years I was no longer paying every single penny that I earned in childcare. Up until then, with two pre-school children in childcare, even with juggling my working hours to finish at 3 o'clock and pick up my eldest from school and my daughter from pre-school, I was paying £1,200 a month in childcare, and that was for a four-day working week. Even now, with my oldest two at school and my youngest at pre-school, like families across Scotland, I pay more for childcare than for my mortgage.

Without the support of friends and family, I could not be standing here. I could not have stood for election to Holyrood, because getting home in time to pick up three children from different locations by 6 pm is simply impossible. I could never have afforded to return to work at all after having children if it was not for the support that a Labour Government at Westminster put in place with child tax credits to make work pay. That support has been cut by the coalition Government, which means that so many mums and dads now do not have the option of returning to work after having children.

As every parent knows, childcare costs do not stop when children start school. In fact, it is when children start school that some of the problems start. Parents face the challenge of juggling working hours around the school day, and let us not even get started on the 12 weeks a year of school holidays.

Many schools do not offer wraparound provision at all, and when they do the hours are restrictive. The only way that most parents I know manage is by working different hours and taking different holidays. That cuts childcare costs, but it means that families rarely spend time together. The chance of a family meal at teatime is a rare event. The reality is that, for many mums and dads, just finding, organising and paying for childcare at all is like a full-time job in itself. Is it any wonder that a recent survey of mums by Asda found that seven out of 10 stay-at-home mums said that they would actually be worse off in work than they are at home?

Although I support the bill, I believe that it needs to go further. Childcare is a vital service for families and every family in Dunfermline and in Scotland should have the right to high-quality, affordable, flexible childcare. Childcare should not be a luxury that only the better-off can afford, but for many families that I represent in Dunfermline, work is simply not an option because of the high cost of childcare. A family at Pitcorthie told me during the by-election that they can never hope for their two-year-old daughter to have a little brother or sister, because even with both of them working they would never be able to afford the cost of childcare. A family in Duloch, where I live, told me that they have resorted to putting the childcare costs on credit cards, because rising food bills, energy costs and train fares mean that they simply have no other option. How many other families are in that position in the run-up to Christmas? A mum in Abbeyview told me that she loved being a working mum, but that because of cuts in tax credits she had to give up the job that she loved.

Parents in Dunfermline and across Scotland deserve better than a Government that talks about delivering a better deal on childcare but in reality lacks ambition. The Scottish Government has the power now to revolutionise childcare in Scotland. We can do it now and parents are fed up waiting, so although I will support the bill today, I hope that we can work together across the political divide to deliver the better deal on childcare that families across Scotland deserve.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): I welcome the bill as a significant advance for the position of children and young people in Scotland. As my fellow Education and Culture Committee members have said, the committee has, in two other inquiries, examined outcomes for looked-after children. We agreed in both those inquiries that we need to tackle the problems of underachievement, neglect and poor parenting before families reach crisis point. We need a fundamental shift in philosophy and approach towards a focus on prevention. I believe that the bill will help to do that, and it is the reason why so many child welfare organisations also support its broad principles.
In Scotland last year, there were more than 16,000 looked-after children. Although recent years have seen the number of new referrals fall, Scotland still has a higher proportion of looked-after children than other parts of the UK. The Government estimates that between 10,000 and 20,000 children live with drug-abusing parents, and that between 36,000 and 51,000 children in Scotland live with parents who have alcohol problems, so there is a crisis that we need to tackle.

I mentioned the bill’s important emphasis on early intervention to prevent serious problems before they occur. An important means of delivering that step change is construction of a system in which it is easy for professionals to share information that could prevent a vulnerable child from coming to harm. As the minister has said, we are all familiar with the tragic cases that are covered in the news of children who die at the hands of their parents and carers. The common theme of the subsequent inquiries tends to be the same; someone had a vital piece of information that could have saved the child in question, but that information was not shared.

That is why I want to concentrate today on how the bill seeks to improve information sharing between relevant public authorities where there are concerns about the wellbeing of individual children and young people. Key to that is the introduction of the named person, which was supported by 72 per cent of respondents to the bill consultation. It is supported by the Royal College of Nursing, by Tam Baillie—Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People—and by the wonderful John Carnochan, who is the inspiring co-founder of Strathclyde’s violence reduction unit.

There has been considerable misunderstanding about the role of the named person, which already exists and works well in the Highlands, and we have heard colleagues talking about the evidence from that region. The role of named person must be universal, because if it is not some children will slip through the net, which is exactly what we are trying to prevent. To some extent, we already have universal provision. For example, everyone who has a baby has a health visitor allocated to them. When I had my children, which is quite some time ago now, the health visitor made one visit, saw that I had lots of support and was then able to go away and concentrate on people who needed support. In that sense, the measure is an extension of what we are already doing.

The evidence from Bill Alexander of Highland Council showed how important the named person is as a means of ensuring that GIRFEC does what it is supposed to do. GIRFEC is rooted in cooperation between services, with the child being at the centre, and it ensures that children and families receive holistic services that are underpinned by collaboration.

The committee’s convener has outlined some of the operational concerns about how the named person would work in particular circumstances, and I would like to endorse his comments about the definition of “wellbeing” and the lowering of the threshold for information sharing. In Scotland, under GIRFEC, the wellbeing indicators are known by the acronym SHANARRI—members of the Education and Culture Committee are very used to acronyms—which stands for safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included. Those are all extremely positive things, which I think we would all want for our children, but how will different professionals apply SHANARRI when it comes to lowering the threshold for information sharing? I am sure that although most professionals will act responsibly, it is not unreasonable to raise concerns about overzealous individuals applying subjective views.

I will give an example of what I mean. My children did not travel to primary school by themselves. Some people might think that I was an overprotective mother. That was my way of keeping them safe but, equally, it could be argued that I was breaching other SHANARRI indicators, because my children were not as active as they could have been, they did not get as much fresh air as they could have done and they were not included. People have different forms of parenting, so I would welcome reassurance that the use of the wellbeing indicators—which I know are already established—to lower the threshold for information sharing will be monitored by the Government, so that we can ensure that there are not cases in which it is abused and that interference does not go too far.

That said, I support the bill and I support the principle of information sharing as a way of protecting the most vulnerable children.

Gavin Brown (Lothian) (Con): I congratulate Cara Hilton on her maiden speech, which I thought was pretty thoughtful. I predict that if she makes a similar speech at stage 3, she might get a couple of interventions from members on the Government benches and perhaps elsewhere, but we will see what happens.

I want to focus the bulk of my remarks on the named person and, specifically, on what the financial memorandum says, which was the subject of Conservative business just a few weeks ago. It is something that I and other members of the Finance Committee looked into in some detail. Our difficulty with the financial memorandum centred on the costs that it puts forward. The prediction is that the named person will cost local authorities just shy of £8 million in the first year of implementation and that it will cost them nothing—zero pounds and zero pence—in year 2. When I first read the financial memorandum, I did not think that that was realistic or credible. When I read the evidence that was submitted to the committee by various councils and others, it became even less credible, and when the committee took oral evidence from various councils, it became still less credible, to the extent that the committee felt that that was not something that was likely to happen in practice.

I listened carefully to what the minister said and her response appeared to be—I hope that I have written it down correctly—that “costs will need to be monitored as implementation goes forward.”

I do not take huge comfort from that because, in my opinion, any policy that the Government implements must be monitored as it goes forward. That should happen regardless of whether the policy is controversial or whether questions are asked about it. Every policy ought to be monitored as it is implemented.

Aileen Campbell: Gavin Brown said that he had read the submissions to the committee. I wonder whether he read the one from City of Edinburgh Council, which said:

“The Council believes that the costs and any savings for Children’s Rights, GIRFEC, Early Learning/Childcare and Other Proposals are accurately reflected based on our understanding of the requirements of the legislation.”

Given what he has just said, how does he respond to that? Did he read the submission?

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We are very tight for time now.

Gavin Brown: Presiding Officer, I think that the minister’s tone is a little uncalled for. Of course I read that submission; I read every submission to the Finance Committee, and I have read every report to which the minister has referred the committee since her response. She will know that City of Edinburgh Council had already implemented the approach, so the financial costs on the council will not be the same as they will be for other councils. The minister has cherry-picked the submission of one council, which had already implemented most of the approach.

Let me quote another council. Scottish Borders Council said that it “believes that additional funding to support the Named Person needs to be available for more than one fiscal year. The Highland Pathfinder”—on which the Government rests almost everything—showed it took several years to implement the cultural changes required within and across organisations in order to implement GIRFEC. Scottish Borders Council believes funding requires to be available over three consecutive years starting in 2014/15 to ensure the successful establishment of the Named Person role.”

That could not be clearer. It took a number of years—

Stewart Maxwell: Will Gavin Brown give way?

Gavin Brown: Give me a moment.

The process took a number of years in Highland Council. I read in detail the Highland Council report to which the minister referred me—I will return to that, but first I will take an intervention from the convener of the Education and Culture Committee.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Please be as brief as possible.

Stewart Maxwell: I am grateful to Gavin Brown and I am interested in what he has to say. Surely he accepts that a pathfinder project will always take longer to achieve change, because it is designing the system that others will follow. The time and money that it takes to do something will always be greater in a pathfinder project than in those that come after.

Gavin Brown: That is probably true, but I do not accept that implementation can cost £8 million in year 1 and zero by year 2. No doubt we learn lessons from pathfinder projects and change can happen faster than it happened in Highland Council, but no council with any credibility has suggested that the cost will be zero in year 2. If anyone has evidence that the cost will be zero in year 2, I will be very happy to take an intervention from them, whether they are a minister, a committee convener or anyone else.

Gavin Brown: The same argument can be made about the NHS costs in the financial memorandum. The Government says that year 1 costs will be £10 million and that by year 3 they will be only £5 million—half the amount in year 1. Health boards that gave evidence to the Finance Committee described that as being not credible, as did the Royal College of Nursing Scotland. The experts who gave evidence to the Finance Committee made it clear that the costings are not credible, which is why the committee—en bloc, without division—expressed concern about the matter. In my view, the answers that we have received are not good enough.

The reason why all that is important is that by creating the bureaucracy that will result from giving everyone a named person, whether or not they need or want one, the Government will be taking money away from those who need it most.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I am afraid that you must finish, please. I have already cut the next speaker’s time.

Gavin Brown: Thank you. I will leave it there.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Thank you. I call Colin Beattie. I am afraid that I can give you only five minutes.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): I am delighted to speak about the bill. I am a member of the Education and Culture Committee, so I have been very much involved with the bill.

As Stewart Maxwell said, the committee agreed on the basic principles of the bill, and it is evident that there is widespread support from children’s charities and public bodies. Barnardo’s Scotland, in its written submission to the committee, said:

“This Bill has the potential to be one of the most far-reaching and influential bills considered in this session of the Parliament. At the heart of the Bill is a vision that Barnardo’s strongly shares—making Scotland the best place in the world for children to grow up.”

I think that we can all subscribe to that. We must ensure that we do not lose sight of the fact that the bill is about protecting vulnerable children. We must put that at the heart of all our arguments.

I have been struck by the level of support that the named person approach received in the Government’s consultation. I note that 72 per cent of respondents supported the idea of providing a named person for all children and young people under the age of 18. It is also worth looking at the evidence from a survey that Children 1st carried out, which received 117 responses from kinship carers and support groups. Children 1st found that 90 per cent of respondents thought that every child in Scotland should have a named person, and that some 78 per cent thought that having a named person would have been beneficial to them and their families.

In this instance, we have a ready-made example to look at. In 2010, Highland Council successfully put the named person approach into practice as part of its getting it right for every child approach. In its evidence to the Education and Culture Committee, that council highlighted the fact that the named person approach has led to a clear process for ensuring that relevant information is passed to the correct person, in contrast to what happened under the previous system, in which information was bounced around various agencies in the hope that it would get to the relevant organisation at some stage. The consequence has been earlier support to, and more effective intervention for, children. Getting that support to a child usually means that a successful outcome is more likely. We therefore have irrefutable proof that the named person approach can be successful if it is done right. It has the evidence to back up its success and it has widespread support, and it is an important element of the bill.

On childcare, I fully support an increase in free nursery provision from 475 hours to 600 hours for three and four-year-olds and looked-after two-year-olds. That will benefit 120,000 children throughout Scotland and will mean an increase of 45 per cent in free nursery hours provision since the SNP came to power in 2007. Perhaps Cara Hilton should reflect on that fact.

I feel that there is more to be done on that issue, but the Government has, with the powers that it has, acted and provided more support for families than any Government here to date has. I cannot help but consider the countless other things that could be done with the powers of independence. With those powers, we could work to ensure that there is further support for parents and their children. Scottish Government estimates suggest that Westminster welfare reform will put 50,000 children in poverty by 2020. It is time that we took control of our own affairs in order to protect our young people from Westminster.

I particularly welcome the First Minister’s statement at the SNP conference. He said:

I also noted with interest his announcement that the Council of Economic Advisers has been asked to analyse the social and economic implications of raising levels of childcare in an independent Scotland.

I want to highlight the issue of kinship carers. The kinship care order, which is included in the bill, will provide great support for kinship carers. I am pleased to note that the Scottish Government is currently reviewing the financial support for kinship carers in order to address inconsistencies across the country.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: You are in your final minute.

Colin Beattie: Again, I refer to the Children 1st survey, which shows that 60 per cent of kinship carers thought that a kinship care order would be a good thing. A further 27 per cent wanted more information. It was no surprise that 60 per cent said that they would apply for a kinship care order. We must remember that, before the SNP’s election victory in 2007, there was no support for kinship carers in Scotland and that, since 1997, successive Governments at Westminster have failed to consider the needs of children in kinship care through the benefits system.

I am proud that, in the previous parliamentary session, the Government launched the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009, which allowed local authorities to give vital financial support to kinship carers, but I am deeply concerned that the Westminster Government is threatening to undermine the support that the Scottish Government provides.

I am running short of time, so I will go quickly to the end of my speech.

It seems to be self-evident that being proactive is always better than being reactive. Preventative spending will help us to ensure that our children get a better start in life right from the beginning, and it provides added benefit in that it helps to ensure greater value for the public purse. Spending now should always reduce spending later.

The bill is an important milestone in achieving better outcomes for our children. I commend the Scottish Government and my colleagues in the Education and Culture Committee for the huge amount of work that has been done and for bringing the bill before Parliament.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We turn to the closing speeches. I am disappointed to note that two members who participated in the debate are missing from the chamber.

Mary Scanlon (Highlands and Islands) (Con):
I, too, congratulate Cara Hilton on her maiden speech. She certainly made the most of our policy of not intervening in maiden speeches; I say well done to her. I am sure that she will continue with the same passion and commitment in future debates.

I remind Colin Beattie, who is a colleague on the Public Audit Committee, that we do not have independence in the Highlands. However, I think that every member in the chamber has commented on how well GIRFEC and other measures are working there. We can certainly do an awful lot without independence.

I congratulate the Education and Culture Committee on its excellent scrutiny of the bill. I am not a member of that committee, but I recognise the complexities of the bill, which, obviously, I am new to. Given my experience of many bills since 1999, I can acknowledge the measured and constructive speech given by the committee convener, Stewart Maxwell, which I thought was commendable.

As Liz Smith said, the Scottish Conservatives agree with many of the bill’s proposals. In particular, we agree that we should do more to develop the collaborative approach to ensuring that children’s services are delivered more effectively. Like other members, we very much agree with the plans to extend childcare, enhance nursery provision and better train nursery staff. In 1999, conditions such as autism and dyslexia—Margaret McDougall referred to dyslexia in a question earlier today—were not picked up in nurseries. I therefore commend the training that our nursery staff now receive, as well as the additional support for kinship carers, to which Bob Doris and others have referred.

Neil Bibby made a critical point about health visitors. Some years ago, Dr Phil Wilson said in evidence to the Health and Sport Committee that there was overwhelming evidence to support the retention of health visitors. However, over the past decade, we have seen the demise of health visiting in this country, which is not something that we have supported. Last week, I met Bill Alexander, the director of social work in Highland Council, and I was pleased to learn that Highland is now employing more health visitors. We very much support that and hope that it will be replicated throughout Scotland.

We have several concerns about the bill, one of which is that, as Professor Kenneth Norrie stated, the bill will give ministers more powers that are open ended and not sufficiently well defined. In some key written submissions to the committee, concerns were expressed about the proposed extent of data sharing and about the extension of the powers of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People; the concern that parental and family responsibilities will be diluted was also expressed. I support COSLA’s point that the children’s commissioner should be the last resort after all local avenues of complaint have been exhausted. We will obviously keep a watching eye on that provision. Whether the additional £160,000 of funding for the children’s commissioner’s office is value for money, only time will tell. I say that with my Scottish Parliamentary Corporate Body hat on, because members of the corporate body must decide on such additional moneys.

We are concerned that having a named person for all children in the terms stated by the bill might take resources away from the most vulnerable children. John Stevenson of Unison said that the bill’s provisions would mean that children’s services would have to deal with far more children than they deal with currently. Like the EIS, Unison also had concerns about the implications for resources and training in an already well-stretched budget.
Stewart Maxwell: Will the member take an intervention?

Mary Scanlon: No, if the member does not mind. I have less than two minutes left for my speech and I still have quite a bit to cover.

I was a lecturer for 20 years before I became a member of the Scottish Parliament. However, if I was the named person for any 16 to 18-year-olds entering further education now, I would not know where to start or what I had to look for. It is a bit naive to assume that no training would be required.

We also have practical concerns about the named-person role. What will happen if relations break down between the named person and the family? What will the relationship be between the named person and the lead professional? Will there be a single point of contact? Stewart Maxwell raised a good question about what will happen with regard to the named person during the school summer holidays. It is reasonable to raise such important questions at stage 1. I have no doubt that we will get more clarity on those issues at stage 2.

Unison stated that the named-person proposals were not clear and it felt that what it regarded as a rather woolly approach would mean that, to cover their backs, named persons would end up sharing information that strictly speaking they did not have to share. Joan McAlpine made some very good, constructive points about that.

When I visited Inverness College two weeks ago, I came across two Gypsy Traveller girls and wondered what their families would think about their having a named person. I wonder whether any thought has been given to the Gypsy Traveller community in that regard.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): I congratulate Cara Hilton on her maiden speech, in which she showed passion and commitment—the sort of passion and commitment that helped her to win the Dunfermline by-election.

As Cara Hilton and my colleague Jayne Baxter said, Labour supports the principles behind the bill. Labour wants to make Scotland a better place for children to grow up in. Labour believes that we need to get it right for every child and supports the aspiration of improving life chances for children and young people in Scotland.

However, as some of the evidence says and as has been said this afternoon, we believe that the bill lacks ambition and we have concerns about practical issues, wording, details and financial and resource issues, which will be difficult to sum up in a seven-minute speech. Put simply, getting it right for every child means getting the bill right. We cannot let it be a missed opportunity.

The committee heard about a considerable number of issues from organisations and individuals and a significant number of them have been raised today. We have also received many briefings this week, which have contained specific concerns. I will raise a number of the issues that have been presented to us. I thank Children in Scotland and all the other children’s and youth organisations for their helpful briefings in advance of the debate.

A while back, the bill was described to me as four bills in one. It is clear that we need a joined-up bill and a joined-up approach. We should be concerned when NSPCC Scotland says:

“there appears to have been little strategic thinking about the position of children’s services in the raft of legislation currently underway in Scotland. We are concerned that the disparate nature of the various pieces of legislation which affect children’s services indicates a lack of coherent vision for how the whole range of services meet the needs of children.”

The NSPCC is not alone in raising concerns. There have been concerns that the Government’s proposals on children’s rights will not extend those rights or make a practical difference to children’s lives. The Law Society of Scotland described the duty on ministers as and it noted that the duty requires ministers only to consider the UNCRC and not to act on or explain those considerations. Children in Scotland noted that the proposals fall short of those that the National Assembly for Wales has embraced. A number of suggestions have also come from UNICEF and others about the use of child rights impact assessments and the duties on public bodies. We will have to look at that again at stage 2.

We have heard a great deal of concern about the controversial named person proposals. As I have said, the Royal College of Nursing has said clearly that

“The Scottish Government must recognise the Education Committee’s concerns regarding the capacity of the health visiting workforce to deliver existing duties let alone those associated with the Named Person role.”

Health visitors—the people on the ground—tell us that an additional 450 health visitors are needed. I say gently to the minister that that needs to be not monitored but acted on.

In its briefing, the RCN makes the shocking statement that “It is not currently known how many health visitors there are in Scotland.”

I am sure that I am not the only one who is extremely concerned by that comment. If the minister does not know how many health visitors there are, how can the figure be monitored and how can they be expected to take on the additional role?

Other concerns have been raised. Children 1st said:

“We remain concerned about the potential for confusion, which we already have experience of directly in practice—between the role of the named person and lead professional.”

YouthLink Scotland has called for clarity on the practicalities of a named person for a young person who is under 18 and who has left school. Questions have also been asked about inadequate funding for training and about who will take on the duty during school holidays.

Those issues are not going to go away. The minister and the Government need to take them seriously and address them accordingly if they want the provisions to be supported and to work.

We have been lobbied by Who Cares? Scotland and a number of our constituents about care leavers and we have been asked to speak up for them in the debate. I will speak up for them, just as Kezia Dugdale and others did. We should extend support for care leavers, and I hope that the Government will consider that request and look favourably on stage 2 amendments about that.

Jayne Baxter made a good contribution on kinship carers. The Government has more work to do to convince them of the merits of what it proposes.

I said that the bill should not be a missed opportunity. However, I feel that it will be a missed opportunity and that it lacks ambition on nursery education and childcare. I welcome again the Government’s flagship policy of an increase to 600 hours of provision for three and four-year-olds but, as we know, that was in the SNP’s manifesto in 2007. I have said it before and I will say it again: the Scottish Government will not solve the childcare problems of 2013 with a policy from 2007.

John Swinney was on television the other night, rightly saying that, if we increased childcare and female employment, that would be a good thing and it could create jobs. My message to the Government is this: do it, then! Actions speak louder than words. It has the powers right now to introduce more childcare than it is doing.

Labour in government acted to support and massively expand universal nursery education and childcare. The SNP in government has done very little in comparison. Instead, it has offered empty and vague referendum bribes. Members should not just take my word for it that that is unambitious. As Children in Scotland and Save the Children point out, the bill does not go nearly far enough in providing support for two-year-olds. Only about 1 or 2 per cent of two-year-olds are to be guaranteed nursery in Scotland, whereas 40 per cent of those in England are going to be offered it. You have a stated aim of making Scotland the best place to grow up in the world, but you cannot even offer the best nursery package in the UK.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: You are in your final minute. Speak through the chair, please.

Neil Bibby: The SNP actually cut nursery funding for vulnerable two-year-olds when it first came to power.

Other concerns have been raised about the proposals’ impact on quality, about the definition and split of early learning and care, about flexibility issues and about the need to consider the fact that some children are missing out on months of early years education.

As Children in Scotland notes, the bill says absolutely nothing about out-of-school care for primary school-aged children. It is shocking that the Scottish Government rejected Labour’s call for a cross-party childcare commission to consider the issue back in May. That is deeply regrettable.

The challenge for the Government is to act on the suggestions that have been made and to deliver a better bill. We support the principles of the bill, but it is only good as far as it goes. At present, sadly, it will not be a “landmark bill”, as the minister called it, but a landmark opportunity missed.

The Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning (Michael Russell): This has been, by and large—with the exception of the last few minutes—a positive and useful debate. The purpose of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill was defined by Aileen Campbell at the outset, and I will repeat what she said: the whole purpose of the bill is to improve children’s lives, and everything we do or say about it should be judged in that way. That is absolutely correct. By and large, members have responded to the challenge.

It is right to say that the bill is not a single bill, but the coming together of two bills into one bill. We thought about and consulted on how to improve lives, doing just what Aileen Campbell asked us to do. I pay tribute to Aileen Campbell’s leadership on the issue—her leadership on the bill and her leadership within the ministerial team. She has a strong commitment, as have I, to continue to work with members across the chamber to improve the bill and put it on the statute book. That is what we should be doing.

I thank everyone concerned with that process, particularly the Education and Culture Committee. The convener restated, cogently and eloquently, the constructive points that arose at committee—and they are constructive points, which are being considered by the Scottish Government. As with all proposed legislation, we are keen to improve the bill as it goes into detailed legislative scrutiny.

The bill will have material added to it. As the committee convener indicated, I will be lodging amendments at stage 2 regarding school closure proposals. I look forward to giving evidence to the committee on 3 December and to discussing proposals on the subject that have—by and large, albeit not completely—been well received.

I thank Jayne Baxter for her opening speech, and I welcome the support that she indicated in it. I am certain that, working together, we will be able to make the bill the best that it can be to ensure that Scotland is the best country to grow up in. I am positive that we can find ways to go forward together in that regard.

Liz Smith’s speech was measured and positive, and I am grateful to her. It is wise that we acknowledge the concern within the Conservative Party about the named person provision. I think that the named person is a positive provision. I have taken some time to be persuaded of that, because I wanted to see the work that was going on and the actions that were being taken across Scotland, but the named person provision is immensely impressive to see in operation. It is wrong to define it as more work; it is about smarter work and how professionals change and develop what they do to meet the challenges that exist.

Liz Smith: I thank the cabinet secretary for his remarks just now. Our concern—as Gavin Brown mentioned in his speech—is that, if we are to develop those resources, we might detract from the issues that are facing some of our most vulnerable children. We have a lot of evidence before us from a variety of stakeholders who say that we will indeed have to spend a lot more on the named person provision.

Michael Russell: I understand that concern, and I think that Liz Smith—if I might say so without embarrassing her—put it much better than did Gavin Brown, who got trapped by his ideological views. However, there is contrary evidence from a variety of places, in particular from those who are doing the job, to say that the provision is not about increased activity or primarily about increased resource, but about different methods of operation.

In giving evidence to the Education and Culture Committee, Bill Alexander stated in respect of the named person provision that "It is much easier to understand what is going on".

He went on to say that:

“Teachers ... and midwives tell me that it does not change what they do but it changes how they are regarded”

and that

"they feel that it has empowered them."—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 24 September 2013; c 2861-62.]

Bill Alexander knows more about the subject than almost anybody else, and I have found what he says to be true when I have spoken to the people who are involved. I want that to be demonstrated to the committee and to the chamber, and if there are ways in which it can be demonstrated, it should be.

The named person provision is about enabling, not enforcing. It is about not interference or approved parenting, nor substituting professionals for parents, but helping and assisting. It is a very important innovation.

Liam McArthur: There have been some concerns about the lack of consent for information sharing. Can something be done in the bill to lay down a presumption of seeking consent except in those exceptional circumstances in which welfare issues are at stake?

Michael Russell: It is possible to envisage that being included in the guidance, but I—and the minister, I think—would welcome a discussion with Liam McArthur and other members on the matter, because there are ways forward. I am grateful for that contribution.

I will deal quickly with one or two other points. I share Kezia Dugdale’s anger about looked-after children; I expressed it in an article that I wrote in 2006 about the fact that the Parliament had, until that stage, talked about the issue a lot with genuine feeling but had not brought about change.

The bill can help to bring about change, but it can also do what Kezia Dugdale wants it to do, which is to raise the profile of looked-after children—onece and for all—in a way that makes us understand our responsibilities; makes society understand the issue; and ensures that we can make progress in a way that none of us has succeeded in doing until now.

I say to Bob Doris that there is nothing in the bill at all that will interfere with the opportunities or rights of local authorities in relation to kinship carers—it is quite the reverse, in fact.

I pay tribute to Cara Hilton for her maiden speech. She was quite right to drop the convention of paying tribute to her predecessor at the beginning. To be fair to her, she dropped quite a number of other conventions too, including the convention of making a maiden speech of a consensual nature.

There was no harm in that at all—she has her mother’s passion for those whom she represents. I will be unconventional too, and pay tribute not just to the member but to her mum. Cathy Peattie is a loss to the chamber. We worked closely together in the first session of Parliament on the Education, Culture and Sport Committee; I regard her as a friend and I always will. She was a doughty fighter for her constituency, for education and schools, and for Scottish culture.

Cara Hilton asked a number of questions of the Scottish Government, and the answer to most of them lies in the need for this chamber to have full powers. Her election literature—[Interruption.] If questions are asked, they should be answered. Her election literature asked why the SNP Government would not match Labour’s commitment to 600 hours of free childcare. With the greatest respect, I suggest that the question was put in the wrong way. Why did Labour not deliver those hours when it was in power? Indeed, it did not even deliver the 475 hours that we have now—it was delivering only 412.5 hours. We are delivering, and we could deliver much more with the full powers of a normal Parliament.

Cara Hilton’s election slogan said that, “Dunfermline deserves better.” I agree, but I would go further and say that Scotland deserves better than the limit that her party has placed—and continues to place—on progress for her constituents. Let us have even more ambition for those powers.

The centrepiece of the bill is the 600 hours of free childcare. It is there on offer and it needs to be supported. In supporting it, we will make a difference and make this country the best country in which to grow up.

The bill is a major step forward, and the fact that members on all sides of the chamber wish to support it is incredibly welcome, but the task with all legislation is to make it as good as it can be. With the work that Jayne Baxter and Liam McArthur have offered to do, and perhaps with the consent and the work of the Scottish Tories—except on one issue, although I hope that we will be able to draw them into supporting that provision—we will have a bill to be proud of. We will have a country to be proud of in terms of how we look after and lead forward our children, and then, with independence, we can do even more.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Financial Resolution

The Presiding Officer (Tricia Marwick): The next item of business is consideration of motion S4M-08192, in the name of John Swinney, on the financial resolution for the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

Motion moved,

That the Parliament, for the purposes of any Act of the Scottish Parliament resulting from the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, agrees to any expenditure of a kind referred to in paragraph 3(b) of Rule 9.12 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders arising in consequence of the Act.—[John Swinney.]

The Presiding Officer: The question on the motion will be put at decision time.
Decision Time

The Presiding Officer: The next question is, that motion S4M-08326, in the name of Aileen Campbell, on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

Motion agreed to,

That the Parliament agrees to the general principles of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

The Presiding Officer: The next question is, that motion S4M-08192, in the name of John Swinney, on the financial resolution for the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, be agreed to.

Motion agreed to,

That the Parliament, for the purposes of any Act of the Scottish Parliament resulting from the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, agrees to any expenditure of a kind referred to in paragraph 3(b) of Rule 9.12 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders arising in consequence of the Act.

Meeting closed at 17:02.
Background

1. The Committee reported on the delegated powers in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill on 1 October in its 50th Report of 2013.

2. The response from the Scottish Government to the report is reproduced at the annex.

Scottish Government response

Section 28(1) – Guidance in relation to named person service
Section 29(1) – Directions in relation to named person service

3. The Bill makes provision for a “named person service” which creates a single point of contact around every child or young person. The named person will have responsibilities in relation to the child or young person’s wellbeing. Sections 28(1) and 29(1) confer power on the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance and directions to service providers about the exercise of named person service functions.

4. In its stage 1 report the Committee recommended that, given the potential impact of the named person service on children or young people and their families, publication of the guidance and directions should be made a requirement.

5. In response to this recommendation, the Scottish Government has agreed to bring forward amendments at stage 2 which would impose a duty on Scottish Ministers to publish guidance and directions under sections 28(1) and 29(1).
Section 39(1) – Guidance on child’s plans
Section 40(1) – Directions in relation to child’s plans

6. Part 5 of the Bill provides for a child’s plan to be created for every child with a wellbeing need which is considered to require targeted intervention. Section 39(1) enables the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance to any person in connection with that person’s functions under Part 5. Section 40(1) enables Ministers to issue directions to local authorities, health boards and directing authorities.

7. The Committee again considered that, given the potential impact of the exercise of functions relating to child’s plans on children and their families, the publication of the guidance and directions should be made a requirement.

8. Following this recommendation, the Government has agreed to bring forward amendments at stage 2 which would impose a duty on the Scottish Ministers to publish guidance and directions under sections 39(1) and 40(1).

Section 43(2)(c)(ii) – Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

9. Section 43(2)(c)(ii) enables Scottish Ministers, by order, to prescribe additional categories of children who are eligible for the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare.

10. The Committee considered that the power, in specifying categories of children who are entitled to early learning and childcare, is significant in nature and should therefore be subject to the higher level of parliamentary scrutiny afforded by the affirmative procedure.

11. In its response, the Government agreed that the affirmative procedure would be appropriate in this case and committed to bringing forward an amendment at stage 2 which would provide for this.

Section 61(3) – Provision of counselling services to parents and others

12. Section 61(2) provides that the parents of, or persons with parental rights and responsibilities in relation to, an eligible child will be eligible for counselling services. Section 61(3) enables the Scottish Ministers, by order, to specify the description of “eligible child” for the purposes of section 61(2).

13. Given its potential effect on the individuals it relates to, the Committee considered the power at section 61(3) to be of some significance and therefore recommended that it should be subject to the affirmative procedure.

14. Responding to the Committee, the Scottish Government re-iterated its intention that the power would be used to set and potentially extend, rather than narrow, eligibility. The Government acknowledged, however, that consideration should be given to the potential future use of the power and therefore agreed to bring forward an amendment at stage 2 which would make the power subject to the affirmative procedure.
Section 64(4) – Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

15. Section 64(4) enables the Scottish Ministers, by order, to specify the description of an “eligible child” for the purposes of kinship care assistance provisions.

16. The Committee took the view that the issue of eligibility for kinship care assistance is a substantive matter which Parliament should have the opportunity to debate and that the affirmative procedure would therefore be appropriate.

17. Similarly to the previously discussed power at section 61(3) in relation to eligibility criteria for counselling, the Scottish Government stated its intention that the intended use of the power was to set and potentially extend eligibility in relation to kinship care assistance provisions. The Government was content, however, to bring forward an amendment at stage 2 which would make the power subject to the affirmative procedure.

Inserting section 13A(1) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007

18. Section 68 of the Bill inserts section 13A(1) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. It requires the Scottish Ministers to make arrangements for the establishment and maintenance of Scotland’s Adoption Register (“the Register”). Section 13B(1) provides that such arrangements may in particular authorise an organisation (a “registration organisation”) to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register, and provide for payments to be made to that organisation.

19. In its report, the Committee noted that the power could enable arrangements to be made requiring payments to the registration organisation by third parties as well as by the Scottish Ministers.

20. Furthermore, the Committee noted that any arrangements made under the power will potentially authorise the registration organisation to perform all of the Scottish Ministers’ statutory functions relating to the Register (other than making subordinate legislation).

21. The Committee therefore concluded that, as the arrangements regarding the Register could potentially significantly affect the individuals concerned, they should be made as clear and accessible as possible. The Committee therefore recommended that any such arrangements should be published by Scottish Ministers. The Committee also drew the lead committee’s attention to the power to make arrangements.

22. The Government has taken account of the Committee’s recommendation and has accordingly agreed to bring forward an amendment at stage 2 which will require Scottish Ministers to publish any arrangements they make which impose liability for payment.

23. Section 13A(2) (newly inserted into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007) provides that Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, prescribe information or types of information to be included in the Register under section 13A(1). The Scottish Ministers may also provide for how information is to be retained in the Register and make such further provision about the Register as they consider appropriate.

24. Whilst the Committee accepted the power in principle, it recommended that, further provision should be made in the Bill to set out the intended purpose and use of the Register. Such provision would inform the broad power in section 13A(2) to make regulations about the Register and the information which it is to contain. Furthermore, the Committee considered that the power could be drawn more narrowly in order to better reflect the Government’s policy intention. The Committee therefore asked the Government to consider amending the power accordingly at stage 2.

25. In response, the Government informed the Committee that it was considering giving the Scottish Ministers flexibility to extend the Register in future to allow it to cover other forms of permanence care planning for children, in addition to adoption. Therefore, although the Government agreed to take the Committee’s recommendations on this matter into account when considering possible amendments to the Bill, they do not currently intend to narrow the powers in section 13A.

Section 74(3) – Assessment of wellbeing

26. Section 74(2) contains a list of indicators which a person required by the Bill to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person must take into account when carrying out such an assessment. Section 74(3) requires the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance on how those indicators are to be used to assess wellbeing.

27. The Committee considered that, given the potential impact of the assessment of wellbeing on children or young people and their families, the publication of the guidance and directions should be made a requirement.

28. The Government has agreed to bring forward amendments at stage 2 which would impose a duty on the Scottish Ministers to publish guidance and directions under section 74(3).

Conclusion

29. Members are invited to make any comments they wish on the Bill at this stage. Given the Scottish Government’s commitment to bring forward amendments, it is probable that the Committee will have a further opportunity to consider the Bill after stage 2.

Recommendation

30. Members are invited to note the Scottish Government’s response on the Bill and to make any comments they wish at this stage.
Correspondence from the Scottish Government, dated 11 November 2013:

Section 28(1) – Guidance in relation to named person service
Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Guidance
Parliamentary procedure: None

Section 29(1) – Directions in relation to named person service
Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Direction
Parliamentary procedure: None

The Committee asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to require publication of any guidance or directions issued by the Scottish Ministers under the powers contained in sections 28(1) and 29(1).

The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.

It has always been the Scottish Government’s intention to publish any directions or guidance issued under this Part of the Bill, however we understand the Committee’s concern about how those powers might be exercised from time to time by future administrations. Therefore, the Scottish Government is content to bring forward amendments to the Bill at Stage 2 to require publication of any guidance or directions issued by the Scottish Ministers under the powers contained in section 28(1) and 29(1).

Section 39(1) – Guidance on child’s plans
Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Guidance
Parliamentary procedure: None

Section 40(1) – Directions in relation to child’s plans
Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Direction
Parliamentary procedure: None

The Committee asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to require publication of any guidance or directions issued by the Scottish Ministers under the powers contained in sections 39(1) and 40(1).
The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.

It has always been the Scottish Government’s intention to publish any directions or guidance issued under this Part of the Bill, however we understand the Committee’s concern about how those powers might be exercised from time to time by future administrations. Therefore, the Scottish Government is content to bring forward amendments to the Bill at Stage 2 to require publication of any guidance or directions issued by the Scottish Ministers under the powers contained in section 39(1) and 40(1).

Section 43(2)(c)(ii) – Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

The Committee asks the Scottish Government to consider in advance of Stage 2 of the Bill whether the significance of setting eligibility criteria by order under this power is such that the affirmative procedure is a more suitable level of Parliamentary scrutiny of the exercise of this power than the negative procedure.

The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.

The Scottish Government has taken on board the concerns and comments from the Committee on this matter. The current policy intention is that the power will be used to specify 3 and 4 year olds, however, the Committee is correct that it could be used to make different provision in the future. Given that this might be a matter which Parliament may wish to have the ability to debate in full, the Scottish Government is content that an affirmative procedure offers a more suitable level of Parliamentary scrutiny and we will therefore bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 to make this change.

Section 61(3) – Provision of counselling services to parents and others

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

The Committee asks the Scottish Government to consider in advance of Stage 2 of the Bill whether the significance of setting eligibility criteria by order under this power is such that the affirmative procedure is a more suitable level of Parliamentary scrutiny of the exercise of this power than the negative procedure.

The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.
The current policy intention is to use this power to set and then potentially extend eligibility, rather than narrow it, however the Scottish Government takes on board the Committee’s view that consideration ought to be given to the potential use of the power in the future. Therefore, the Scottish Government feels that, given these concerns and comments, the affirmative procedure may be more appropriate and we will therefore bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 to make this change.

Section 64(4) – Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

The Committee asks the Scottish Government to consider in advance of Stage 2 of the Bill whether the significance of setting eligibility criteria by order under this power is such that the affirmative procedure is a more suitable level of Parliamentary scrutiny of the exercise of this power than the negative procedure.

The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.

The current policy intention is to use the power to set and then potentially extend eligibility, rather than narrow it, however the Scottish Government takes on board the Committee’s view that consideration ought to be given to the potential use of the power in the future, and the impact which eligibility, or lack of eligibility, for certain assistance would have on those affected. Therefore, on that basis the Scottish Government is content to proceed with an affirmative procedure for this power and we will therefore bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 to make this change.

Inserting section 13A(1) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Arrangement
Parliamentary procedure: None

The Committee accordingly draws the attention of the lead committee to the power in section 13A(1) as read with section 13B. This power proposes to enable the Scottish Ministers, by arrangements, to delegate their functions in respect of the Register (other than their function of making subordinate legislation) to a registration organisation. It also proposes to enable the Ministers, by arrangements, to provide for payments to be made to such an organisation, which may include payments by persons other than the Scottish Ministers. The Committee considers that any arrangements which impose liability for payment should be clear and accessible to those affected by them.
The proposal is that this delegation of functions and the making of provision about payments to the organisation be achieved without the need for subordinate legislation or parliamentary procedure, and without any requirement for publication of the arrangements entered into.

The Scottish Government has taken on board the Committee’s comments about this Part of the Bill and agrees that any arrangements which impose liability for payment should be clear and accessible to those affected by them. We will therefore bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 to place a requirement on the Scottish Ministers to publish any such arrangements.

Inserting section 13A(2) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007

Power conferred on:  The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by:  Regulations
Parliamentary Procedure:  Affirmative

The Committee accepts in principle the power under section 13A(2), as supplemented by sections 13C and 13D, to make regulations in relation to Scotland’s Adoption Register. It is also content with the choice of the affirmative procedure for those regulations. However, it asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments to section 13A at Stage 2 to make provision about the purpose or intended use of the Register, in order to inform the broad power in section 13A(2) to make regulations about the Register and the information which it is to contain.

The Committee also asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to restrict the terms of the power in section 13A(2)(a) to reflect the stated intention in taking the power, which is to enable information or types of information relating to children considered suitable for adoption, or to prospective adopters, to be prescribed for inclusion in the Register.

The Committee also asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to restrict the terms of the power in section 13A(2)(c) to reflect the stated intention in taking the power, which is to enable provision to be made about other administrative matters associated with the operation of the Register.

The Committee asks for further comment on these matters in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.

Further to our previous response, the Scottish Government has had an opportunity to reflect on the current provisions for Scotland’s Adoption Register. We are considering whether in future it may be desirable to allow the Scottish Ministers flexibility to extend the use of the Register to other forms of permanence (not just adoption). We are considering whether this could increase the efficiency of permanence care planning. While we are considering whether any further amendments should be made to the Bill to achieve this, we consider it would be prudent to retain the broad powers in section 13A, 13A(2)(a) and 13A(2)(c) pending the conclusion of this work. We will reflect on the Committee’s suggestions in relation to these powers when considering any future amendments to the Bill.

Section 74(3) – Assessment of wellbeing

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Guidance
Parliamentary procedure: None

The Committee therefore asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to require publication of any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers under the power contained in section 74(3).

The Committee asks for further comment on this in the Scottish Government’s response to this report.

It has always been the Scottish Government’s intention to publish any directions or guidance issued under this Part of the Bill, however we understand the Committee’s concern about how those powers might be exercised from time to time by future administrations. Therefore, the Scottish Government is content to bring forward amendments to the Bill at Stage 2 to require publication of any guidance or directions issued by the Scottish Ministers under the powers contained in section 74(3).
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: The Committee considered the Scottish Government’s response to its Stage 1 Report and agreed to write to the Minister for Children and Young People for further information.
The Deputy Convener: Agenda item 9 is consideration of the Scottish Government's response to the committee's stage 1 report on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Members have seen the briefing paper and the response from the Scottish Government. Do members have any comments?

Members: No.

The Deputy Convener: The committee will note from the Scottish Government's response that it is considering giving the Scottish ministers the flexibility to extend Scotland's adoption register in future to allow it to cover other forms of permanence care planning for children, in addition to adoption. If, however, the Scottish Government concludes that the register should be restricted to adoption, the committee may consider that amendments should be lodged at stage 2 to narrow the breadth of the power.

Does the committee therefore agree to write to the Minister for Children and Young People to ask her to inform the committee of what the Scottish Government proposes once its consideration of the issue is complete, in order to allow the committee to form a view on whether its concerns in relation to the power have been addressed?

Members indicated agreement.

John Scott: I think that that is the appropriate thing to do.

The Deputy Convener: Thank you.

That brings us to the end of the meeting. The date of our next meeting will be Tuesday 3 December.

Meeting closed at 11:17.
Dear Aileen

At its meeting on 26 November 2013, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee considered the Scottish Government’s response to its stage 1 report on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. The Committee agreed to write to you regarding Section 68 of the Bill (inserting section 13A(2) into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007) which relates to Scotland’s Adoption Register.

In its report, the Committee asked the Government to consider setting out the intended purpose and use of the Register on the face of Bill in order to inform the broad power in section 13A(2). The Committee also considered that the power could be drawn more narrowly in order to reflect the stated policy intention of enabling information or types of information relating to children considered suitable for adoption, or to prospective adopters, to be prescribed for inclusion in the Register.

The response to the report states that consideration is being given to extending the use of the Register to allow it to cover other forms of permanence care planning for children, in addition to adoption and that the Government therefore considers it appropriate that the power remains broadly drawn for the time being.

If the Government concludes, however, that the Register should be restricted to adoption, the Committee may consider that amendments should be brought forward to narrow the breadth of the power.

The Committee therefore seeks confirmation as to whether a final decision on extending the use of the Register will be taken prior to stage 3 in order to allow amendments to be brought forward if deemed appropriate.

Separate to this clarification, the Committee asks that, once the Government’s consideration of the issue is complete, the Committee is informed of the Government's intentions in relation to the use of the Register. This will allow the Committee to form a view on whether its concerns in relation to the power have been addressed.

Nigel Don MSP
Convener
Dear Stewart,

CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL – STAGE 1 REPORT

I wrote to you on 20 November 2013 to confirm receipt of the Stage 1 report from the Education and Culture Committee on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. As I said in that letter, I welcome the Committee’s consideration of the Bill during Stage 1 and support for its general principles.

I have considered the points raised in the report and reflected on the views expressed during the Stage 1 debate last week. I attach the Scottish Government Response to the report.

I look forward to continued working with the Committee as the Bill continues its Parliamentary scrutiny.

AILEEN CAMPBELL
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Scottish Government Response
Stage 1 Report

November 2013
INTRODUCTION

I would like to thank the Education and Culture Committee, Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Finance Committee and Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee for their consideration of this legislation at Stage 1. I welcome the report and the Education and Culture Committee’s support of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill which reflects the many positive responses you received about it.

The Bill is central to the Scottish Government’s aim of making Scotland the best place in the world to grow up. We believe that its proposals: to place new emphasis on the importance of promoting children’s rights; to provide a framework nationwide to ensure services are designed around the needs of each child and young person, and that they are supported whenever they are in need; to extend the availability of Early Learning and Childcare; and to provide more support for looked after children will improve the life chances of children in Scotland, and make for a happier, more successful country.

During my evidence I made clear my position that we will continue to consider all views and I note the Committee’s desire for further information on some areas. I am keen to clarify as many of these issues as I can and responses to all of key points raised in the Stage 1 report are set out below. For ease of reference I have used the paragraph numbering from your report.

I welcomed last week’s debate and look forward to continuing work with the Committee, stakeholders, partners and colleagues as the Bill progresses through the Parliamentary process.

RESPONSE TO STAGE 1 REPORT KEY POINTS

Part 1 - The Rights of Children and Young People

40. We recommend that the Scottish Government provides an explanation of the practical actions it intends to take to increase awareness of children’s rights, including details of the tool that will be developed.

Strong awareness and understanding of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) is absolutely essential in order for the other rights duties in the Bill to work. Ministers can only identify how best to further rights if they have a clear knowledge and understanding of what the Convention requires. The Children’s Rights Impact Assessment tool, detailed on Page 5, will help to increase awareness and understanding of children’s rights within the Scottish Government, ensuring that policies are properly informed at a national level.

The Scottish Government already takes forward a significant amount of work to increase awareness and understanding of children’s rights. Examples of recent activity include:
• Establishment of a charitable partnership with UNICEF linked to the 2014 Commonwealth Games. As part of that partnership, Scottish Ministers will support UNICEF to deliver work throughout Scotland and across the Commonwealth to promote the importance of children’s rights and the realisation of the UNCRC between now and 2018. In addition the Scottish Government has agreed funding of £50,000 in 2013/14 for UNICEF to undertake specific activities supporting raising awareness and understanding of children’s rights among children, young people and their families;
• The development and delivery of the learning resources – Recognising and Realising Children’s Rights - designed to increase awareness and understanding of children’s rights amongst learning professionals across Scotland. As well as increasing knowledge, the resources (launched by Education Scotland at this year’s Scottish Learning Festival) will support teachers and others to assess how they might improve the realisation of children’s rights in their establishments. Roll-out of the resources is now underway, with an evaluation planned for 2014/15. This is in addition to, and complements, UNICEF’s work on Rights Respecting Schools;
• Core funding of ‘Together’, a national alliance of third sector children’s organisations tasked with promoting children’s rights and scrutinising implementation of the UNCRC in Scotland; and
• Publication and dissemination of information materials for individuals of all ages, providing information on children’s rights and the Scottish Government’s approach to implementation of the UNCRC.

Moving forward, we will continue to identify further opportunities, like these, to strengthen awareness of children’s rights, working in partnership with Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, Together and other key stakeholders. As certain programmes of work conclude, it will be necessary for the Government to identify how best to target future resources in order to maximise impact with our awareness raising activity. The Bill will ensure that future Governments adopt a similar approach.

40. We also recommend that, in addition to reporting on the steps they have taken to fulfil their duties under Part 1, Ministers should be required to report on the activities they intend to undertake to further children’s rights in each three year period.

This Government is already committed to the production of regular plans describing how they intend to give effect to the principles of the UNCRC, the last of which was published in May 2012. We recognise the important role that these documents play, allowing organisations and the public to hold the Scottish Government to account around the progress being made in this important area. We can see some potential benefit in formalising this arrangement and are happy to work with the Committee to explore how this might be delivered through the Bill.

41. In relation to the duties placed on public authorities, we recognise there are different views on the wording of the Bill. We seek further clarification from the Scottish Government on why it has chosen not to include duties to 'keep under consideration' and thereafter, to ‘take steps identified by that consideration'.

The public sector reporting duty will increase transparency around UNCRC compliance, supporting the Scottish Government, the Parliament and Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People to hold to account those who play a key role in making rights real for children at a local level. We feel that the duty as currently drafted strikes the right balance. It is not overly onerous at a time when service providers are facing considerable pressure. It also reflects the fact that public bodies already have a host of existing legal obligations which support the aims of the UNCRC. Those legal requirements will be increased through, for instance, the Getting it Right for Every Child (GIRFEC) provisions in the Bill.

The reporting duty will ensure that all relevant public bodies deliver their work with a clear focus on children’s rights, helping to provide a comprehensive picture of how their activity contributes to compliance with the UNCRC’s principles across Scotland.

42. We welcome the intention to allow public authorities to report under this Part in their annual reports. We note that there are a number of new reporting and planning duties in the Bill, which often fall to the same organisations. We therefore ask whether some of these duties could be better integrated.

We will be actively encouraging public bodies to satisfy their reporting obligations in a streamlined and co-ordinated way. For example, we will be suggesting that certain public bodies satisfy their duty to report on children’s rights through the children’s services planning process in the Bill.

There are some practical challenges associated with reflecting this approach on the face of the Bill and that is why our preference is to pursue better integration through guidance which will be developed in partnership with stakeholders. Nevertheless, we remain open to suggestions regarding how the Bill might be strengthened to support these aims.

43. We note that Article 42 is incorporated in the Bill and request the Scottish Government’s response to the Children’s Commissioner’s suggestion that Articles 3 and 12 also be included.

The Scottish Government is of the view that implementation of the Convention is best achieved through targeted, meaningful and effective laws and policies. The Articles which are set out in the Convention vary significantly in terms of their scope and focus. Some are targeted and specific whilst others are broader and more aspirational.

Our view is that the principle underpinning Article 42 can be easily translated into a meaningful duty which will make a practical difference to children’s lives. However, this is not necessarily the case for other aspects of the UNCRC. For this reason, we have some reservations about the Commissioner’s suggestion regarding incorporation of Articles 3 and 12. That being said, we continue to discuss with the Commissioner how the provisions in Part 1 may be strengthened and would not want to pre-judge the outcome of that work.

44. A number of organisations expressed disappointment that the Scottish Government did not undertake a Child Rights Impact Assessment (CRIA) on the Bill. We wrote to the Scottish Government on this matter. We accept the Scottish Government’s reason for not undertaking a CRIA in this case, which was due to the extensive engagement activities carried out during the Bill’s development. However, the Scottish Government should commit to undertaking CRIAs in relation to relevant future legislation.

The Scottish Government agrees with the Committee about the importance of measuring the impact on children’s rights, not only in relation to legislation but also in policy development and delivery more generally. That is why we have committed to develop a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment tool, and work on this is already underway. As with other Government impact assessment tools, such as the Equality Impact Assessment and the Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment, the requirement to undertake a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment can be achieved through non-legislative means. Accordingly, we do not feel there is any need to explicitly reference Child Rights Impact Assessments on the face of the Bill. That being said, details of any such process could perhaps be included in 3 yearly plans focussing on the Government’s approach to children’s rights which have been suggested by the Committee and referenced in our response to paragraph 40 above.

Part 2 – Commissioner for Children and Young People In Scotland

58. We expect all parties to be clear about the interpretation of the Commissioner’s new powers and suggest that, if necessary, the Bill should be amended to ensure this.

The Bill, as currently drafted, provides a clear framework within which the Commissioner’s investigatory powers can be exercised and we see no immediate need to amend the provisions at Stage 2. Nevertheless, we are happy to consider any suggestions put forward prior to Stage 2.

In the meantime, the Commissioner continues to liaise with other complaints handling bodies in order to establish suitable processes for handling cases which come forward, negating the potential for duplication and ensuring that issues are resolved at the lowest possible level. The Scottish Government will continue to offer support as that work progresses.

59. The issue of resources is closely linked to the interpretation of the Commissioner’s new powers. If the resources are primarily aimed at funding staff to handle more enquiries, we question whether the proposed level of staffing is necessary. We are mindful of evidence indicating that the estimated £160,000 p.a could be better spent on, for example, greater access to mediation for children and young people, and are keen to ensure that any costs are fully justified. We recommend that the Scottish Government gives further consideration to the volume and type of work that any extra enquiries will require.

The cost estimates in the Financial Memorandum relating to the extension of the Commissioner’s powers have been influenced and developed in conjunction with a number of relevant stakeholders who have experience of enquiries handling and investigation. We have also consulted the Scottish Parliamentary Corporate Body who fund the Commissioner’s office.

We feel that the estimates in the Financial Memorandum are fair. They take into account the need for increased capacity within the Commissioner’s office to deal with the likely increase in general enquiries as well as any full investigations. We continue to engage with the Commissioner and Parliamentary officials regarding the resource requirements linked to the provisions and will be mindful of those discussions as the Bill progresses. We will also keep these issues under review in light of experience following the implementation of these provisions.

Part 3 - Children’s Services Planning

75. The Scottish Government should clearly illustrate how children’s service plans fit within the wider Government strategy to integrate service planning across for example, the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, the proposed Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and with Single Outcome Agreements and Community Planning Partnerships.

The Committee has asked about the relationship between the planning provisions in the Children and Young People and the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bills, as well as the ongoing work on community planning. The range of proposed changes shows the Scottish Government’s determination to take forward the principles of the Christie Commission, ensuring that there is more effective, more joined-up planning between bodies at local level. They all share the same core principles and aims with respect to future planning.

With respect to Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs), the children’s services plans set out in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill will feed into the wider community planning processes. As with other public sector bodies, there is a mutual relationship between CPPs and the children’s services plans. On the one hand, CPPs and their constituent partners will take account of the needs of children and young people in local communities, as set out in the children’s services plans. On the other, Single Outcome Agreements (SOA) will set the framework for planning in children’s services through the local, high-level priorities agreed by each CPP.

With respect to the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, while the Children and Young People Bill (Scotland) requires planning for children’s services across the whole range of public bodies, the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill focuses on the planning and delivery of health and social care specifically. The children’s services planning proposals of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill build on the existing good practice in planning that Local Authorities have been taking forward as part of the responsibilities under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.
The new proposals will put in place an overarching framework and a mechanism for strategic coordination of planning of all key services affecting the wellbeing of children and young people. The planning requirements of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Bill, should Local Authorities and Health Boards decide to include children’s services, will feed into developing the plans required of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Full alignment will be ensured through the parallel development of guidance for the duties in both Bills.

Part 4 – Provision of Named Persons

113. We invite the Scottish Government to provide details of the range of support it will make available to ensure that local authorities and health boards are able to replicate the successes experienced in Highland, recognising the different circumstances that will prevail in different parts of the country.

The Scottish Government realises that every local area in Scotland is not the same and faces its own challenges in the implementation of GIRFEC. However, recent work carried out on behalf of the GIRFEC Programme Board has indicated that most areas of Scotland have already begun implementing GIRFEC and are seeing results.

A number of implementation advisers have been seconded into the GIRFEC team within the Scottish Government. They have been working to support local areas with GIRFEC implementation. These individuals have come from posts within Local Authorities, a Health Board, Police Scotland and the Third Sector in different parts of Scotland. They work alongside local managers and planning groups. Their expertise from many years’ experience of children’s services in these agencies is helping to ensure that good practice is shared across the country and characteristics that are unique to specific areas are considered during implementation.

Since 2008 the Scottish Government has provided grant funding (around £600k per annum) to support implementation at local level in CPPs. This has been either through funding Learning Partnerships (Edinburgh/Lanarkshires) or supporting CPPs to come together in groupings to progress local implementation and to mainstream changes in systems, practice and culture. The lessons from CPPs have been shared and have formed the basis for much of the progress now being reported across the country. The Scottish Government team will continue to facilitate implementation in CPPs, many of whom are already making good progress, building on the investment we and they have made to date.

The Scottish Government team, as part of this process, has also been in discussion with partners over the content and format of the statutory guidance which will support practice. Detailed draft guidance will be shared next year to seek views and input from the people who will be asked to implement GIRFEC or who will be affected by its implementation. This guidance will seek to ensure the consistency of approach that has been lacking up till now, based on the legislative framework proposed by the Bill.

In terms of leadership the GIRFEC Programme Board has put in place an Implementation Sub Group, chaired by a Chief Executive of a Local Authority, to develop and oversee implementation at a strategic level. CPPs will report progress with implementation to this group periodically. This group has been established to provide national leadership to ensure that training resources and good practice are disseminated and that any barriers to implementation are noted and responded to as appropriate.

In March 2013, the Scottish Government launched the National Third Sector GIRFEC Project, to support CPPs to recognise and embed the role of the Third Sector in implementing GIRFEC. This work will run until March 2016. It will promote good practice and share learning from intensive work in at least four CPP areas.

114. We believe the success of the named person role will depend on the Scottish Government’s ability to work with its local partners to clarify a number of practical issues, which we bring to the attention of the Parliament.

i) The issues a named person would be expected to handle outwith their core professional area:

The Named Person will always carry out their functions within the bounds of their professional expertise. They will, however, be supported in doing so by the management framework within their own service and a range of other professionals who form part of the network of support for children and families at a local level. This builds on current good practice where, for example, a Health Visitor can ask for advice from other more specialist practitioners within health, or other services, and a Head Teacher can consult with an educational psychologist, or social work colleague to address concerns related to individual children or families.

Although in many cases the Named Person will be able to provide advice and support from within their own resources, they will not always be the source of support. The Named Person will be in a position to call on other services to provide such support to the child or family or to direct families to other kinds of supports.

Where assessment and planning indicate that concerns about wellbeing will require a range of coordinated interventions for a child, then arrangements will be in place, supported by guidance, for a Lead Professional to manage the Child’s Plan. The Named Person will work with the Lead Professional and will do so in line with locally agreed procedures.

ii) The types of intervention a named person would be expected to make:

The role of the Named Person will be varied. Providing support to parents, children and young people might be as simple as taking the time to meet with them to talk through the difficulties they are facing. The Named Person role incorporates and builds on the role of key staff in universal services who offer children and parents valuable, easily accessible practical support in line with best practice.

The Named Person may provide support from within the resources available in the universal services, or help a family negotiate their way through systems and services. For example, where a school-age child is struggling with homework due to their parent’s difficulties with literacy, the Named Person might arrange for them to attend a homework club in school, and provide the parent with advice about adult learning opportunities available in the community. Importantly, they will have a greater awareness of the context of the child’s life, and will be able to take this into consideration as they routinely support the child – e.g. making sure that they communicate appropriately with the parent.

In the early years the existence of the Named Person Service will mean that when parents need advice or help they know who to turn to (normally the Health Visitor). Children in need due to particular circumstances will utilise the service more than the majority of families. However many families may well use the service for support with issues such as: relationship difficulties; separation, loss or bereavement; play; advice on moving home; nurturing particular gifts or areas of development; nutrition, etc. as well as core NHS Health Visiting responsibilities.

Transition from primary to secondary school is a key point in a child’s development where the Named Person’s role can be particularly important. If, for example a young person is struggling to settle in to school, the Named Person may arrange for them to have an older pupil to act as their buddy to help them find their way around school. They might also encourage them to join in with social activities around school to help them form new friendship groups. Review by the Named Person may indicate that this support alone cannot address the settling in issues, and further information which comes to the Named Person may indicate that other factors related to the child’s health or activity within the community are impacting on wellbeing. If this happens, then the Named Person is well placed to review the support plan in discussion with the child and family, and with the other professionals who may have a role in providing the right support. A Child’s Plan may then be developed to reflect a range of targeted interventions, both within education services and from other agencies, or community services.

iii) The point at which a named person would be expected to pass a case to a lead professional, and in what circumstances would it be appropriate for a named person to take on the role of lead professional:

The Named Person role will be in place for every child and will be undertaken by an individual in universal services, i.e. health or education. Their role will be to act as the point of contact for children/young people and families, and for others. They should be in a position to provide or access information, advice and support for children and young people from within their own service; and, when necessary, to request support from other services or agencies. In practice we expect the Named Person to initiate and manage single agency Child’s Plans within their own service.

Where concerns about wellbeing require coordinated intervention from more than one service or agency, then a Lead Professional will be identified to take on that coordinating role. The Named Person will either take on the role of Lead Professional themselves, or will agree with the partners involved in supporting the child/young person, who else should most appropriately take on the role of Lead Professional to manage the multi-agency Child’s Plan. The Lead Professional may be drawn from any of the services or agencies who are partners to the Child’s Plan. Detailed guidance will set out examples to aid practitioners.

The choice of Lead Professional will be dependent on the needs of the child and the interventions and outcomes identified within the Child’s Plan. For example, where there are a range of concerns about the wellbeing of a teenager, but no significant concerns in relation to one particular area, then the Named Person in the school who knows the pupil well and has regular contact, may be the most appropriate person to take on the role of Lead Professional. In other cases, where the wellbeing concerns focus on family life and safety, it may be clear that a social worker should take on the lead role. If the partners to the plan cannot agree who is best placed to take on the role of Lead Professional, the Local Authority and Health Board will have a dispute resolution procedure in place to provide a resolution. Further details of when it would be appropriate for a Named Person to take on the role of a Lead Professional will be included in the statutory guidance for the Bill.

iv) The ability of children and young people to have input into who is assigned as their named person:

A key principle of the GIRFEC approach and the role of the Named Person is the fostering and maintenance of good working relationships with children and families. A child or young person will initially be allocated a Named Person. As with current procedures governing professional client relationships, where the relationship between a child or family and the Named Person becomes an obstacle to supporting the child’s wellbeing, other arrangements can be put in place. This may involve identifying a key member of staff within the school who will work directly with the child or family, and support the Named Person, or it may be agreed that another appropriate member of the staff team should take on the Named Person role. These decisions will be made with the wellbeing of the child as the main consideration.

Most children and families value the support they receive from universal services, including the Health Visitor and school. However some children and/or families choose not to seek support, or do not engage with the support on offer. Decisions regarding the support needed by a child will be based on an assessment of their wellbeing and will include the views of the child and parents.

v) The extent to which the Named Person would be expected to be involved with children and young persons for whom no support or intervention is required:

The majority of children and young people will not require any additional support from their Named Person. The majority of children receive the support they need from their families, and from the routine involvement of universal services through engagement with health services and attendance at school. Where there are no concerns about wellbeing, support will continue to be offered through the usual universal services. That means that the Named Person, in the role of Health Visitor or Head teacher for example, will have no involvement beyond the routine provision of their health and education functions.
115. Concerns were expressed to us and the Finance Committee which cast doubt on the potential savings for health boards from the named person role. We note that this is, at least in part, due to a lack of real-world experience on which to base the financial assumptions. In view of this, we consider that further resource may be required for health boards to implement GIRFEC, and we recommend that the Scottish Government be prepared to make such support available where appropriate.

116. We also acknowledge the concerns about the capacity of health visitors and the numbers required to deliver the requirements in the Bill. This indicates to us that there are wider issues about health visitor numbers. The Scottish Government should therefore explain how it will ensure that the demands placed on health visitors across the entire policy landscape will be met.

There will be an impact on Midwife and Health Visitor resources as a result of the Bill. The Financial Memorandum sets out estimates in relation to training and capacity costs of this over and above what is already being done by these professionals.

In recognition of the impact of the Bill on the children’s nursing workforce and the need to focus on the early years the Scottish Government is undertaking work to refocus and clarify the role of Health Visitor. This will contribute to evidence-based guidance to support consistency of service delivery. There is also work underway to review caseload size for Health Visitors and develop a caseload weighting tool. This work is expected to be complete by 2014. It will also explore core training and development needs for new Health Visitors along with competencies required by the current workforce to deliver on the provisions of the Bill and the GIRFEC policy.

The Scottish Government is working with Health Boards to support them to develop the workforce through national guidance and training to be ready for commencement of the GIRFEC provisions in the Bill. We are already aware that some Health Boards are investing in additional Health Visiting teams to support GIRFEC implementation. Health Visitor numbers have increased from 1139 in 2009 to 1316 in 2013. As of 30th June this year, Scotland compared favourably to England: with 4.1 whole time equivalent Health Visitors per 1000 population of children aged 0 to 4 compared to 2.6 whole time equivalent Health Visitors per 1000 children aged 0 to 4 in England.

117. We are concerned about the operation of the named person role during school holidays. This is an area that requires further consideration by the Scottish Government and its local partners.

All children in Scotland up to 18 years of age, or later if they are still in school, will have a Named Person (except for a small number in the regular forces where the Ministry of Defence has a duty of care). Otherwise, the Named Person service will be provided by the Health Board for children up to school age and by the Local Authority after that. In cases where a child attends a grant-aided or independent school, the directing authority of the school is to make arrangements to provide the service.

During school holidays, the Local Authority will make arrangements for the provision of the Named Person service. The detailed arrangements are being left to Local Authorities to determine in the light of their local practices and procedures. The aim is for them to build on their current practices during the school holidays. For many, at the moment, someone is based centrally in the education service to be the point of contact. Emergency or child safety issues which arise will be dealt with immediately through local child protection procedures as at present with more routine enquiries routed to existing help lines, or call centres.

For children who have a Child’s Plan, there will be planning for holiday periods when the support of the school is not available. This will be done in advance and appropriate mechanisms put in place to provide the necessary level of support. The Scottish Government does not intend to require specific procedures to be adopted across the country preferring to leave this to local decision making. The same will be true of independent or grant-aided schools. The Local Authority’s duty to provide the Named Person service applies until a child is 18 even if they leave school.

118. Given Highland’s experience of implementing GIRFEC, the Scottish Government should explain how the proposal to assign a named person for young people who have left school and are under the age of 18 will work.

Those young people who have left school will typically have the skills and knowledge to express their views and reach decisions. Some will still require help and support – especially those with complex needs – and the Bill will ensure that appropriate arrangements are in place at Local Authority level for children who have left school before the age of 18. It will be the role of the Named Person in these circumstances to advise the young person and, where appropriate, link the young person into resources and support networks which currently exist for young people who have left school but need further assistance. The Named Person arrangements would form part of the ‘Opportunities for All’ support arrangements in place locally across Scotland.

119. Finally, we note some views that the role of lead professional could usefully be included in the Bill. Whilst we understand the difficulties in legislating for the role, given that lead professionals may be employed from outside the public sector, we are concerned about the potential for confusion and lack of consistency in the way it will operate alongside the named person. We therefore recommend that the Scottish Government monitors the situation as these roles develop with a view to legislating for the lead professional in future, if necessary.

The role of Lead Professional is not included in the Bill because we are looking to public bodies to establish the arrangements that best suit the needs of individual children. The Named Person role flows from the function of the universal services of health or education. The Lead Professional will be the person who is best placed to support the child's needs and address any risk in a multi-agency context. This will not clearly fall to any one agency and they will not necessarily be located within health or education. What is important is that public bodies agree the arrangements and governance and make sure they work well. This is an area where guidance is more appropriate. The duty to cooperate provides a statutory backing to sort out protocols across agencies in a CPP to ensure local arrangements are agreed.

Part 4 - Information Sharing

132. We recognise the concerns raised by witnesses and welcome the Minister's commitment to give further consideration to the information-sharing provisions in the Bill and, in particular, to “fully consider all views on sections 26 and 27”. We expect any necessary safeguards to be introduced at Stage 2. We suggest that, in considering what revisions to bring forward, the Scottish Government engages with those who have raised concerns about the drafting with us.

Proportionate, appropriate and timely information sharing is essential to ensuring our children are protected and kept safe from harm. The Bill aims to create the framework which is fair and proportionate.

Section 26, with its triple test, encourages practitioners to consider carefully what relevant information must be shared, when and with whom. If a practitioner, on the basis of the information known to them, and in light of their professional judgment, decides to share information and does so in a way that is considered fair and proportionate, then it is unlikely they will have action taken against them or their organisation even if it later transpires that such sharing was not appropriate because the information at the time was either incomplete or wrong. However, that may still not remove the anxiety of having action taken for breach of confidentiality.

Section 27, therefore, provides the reassurance that action will not be taken for breach of confidentiality if the requirements of Section 26 are met.

The Scottish Government is of the view that Sections 26 and 27 of the Bill do not breach the Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA) or the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). We are however aware of concerns raised, both in written and oral evidence, to the Committee and have been working closely with stakeholders to further understand and appreciate any anxieties they may have. Most concerns are based around the wording of Section 26 and the lack of appreciation that, while the Bill does not replicate the wording of the Data Protection Act 1998 DPA, all information shared will still fall within the DPA tests of proportionality, relevance and appropriateness. In addition, some witnesses expressed a concern that the duty of confidentiality will, in many cases, be overridden without any regard to the views of children. This is not the intention and this will be made clear in the statutory guidance.

To further explore and alleviate concerns a workshop specifically about confidentiality was held on 16th October 2013 with many of the concerned parties. We have also invited all of those concerned to work with us on the preparation of statutory guidance. This has been welcomed, particularly during our discussions with LGBT Youth who relayed a number of scenarios that highlighted issues about current practice. They have agreed to work closely with us in producing specific guidance on LGBT issues and the appropriate and proportionate response by practitioners. They now see the Bill as providing an opportunity to set out clear statutory guidance, which will address many of the practice issues children with LGBT issues experience.

Our engagement process and listening to the views of stakeholders is continuing and will inform our approach to Stage 2 of the Bill process.

133. We agree that training and guidance for professionals will be absolutely crucial in determining the effectiveness of the proposals. All relevant service providers, including from the private and third sectors, must receive training and guidance in order to ensure there is a consistent approach to information-sharing. It is vital that the training and guidance engenders a common understanding of what constitutes proportionate, necessary information sharing.

We agree awareness raising and training across all sectors will be crucial in relation to all aspects of the Bill, the GIRFEC approach, the application of UNCRC principles, and the need to ensure fair, proportionate and justified information sharing that is relevant to the wellbeing concerns for the child or young person.

The delivery of such training is primarily the responsibility of organisations within the CPPs. There is evidence that improved multi-agency working and joint awareness raising and training in implementation of the GIRFEC approach creates added benefits and understanding. We have been and are continuing to encourage such multi-agency training ensuring a consistency of approach across boundaries. Elements of the financial and advisory support for CPPs by the Scottish Government team have been focused on developing such an approach.

Nationally within the NHS, the Scottish Government is supporting initiatives in Lothian, Borders and Tayside to embed GIRFEC core components in maternity services through practice development and a revised governance framework. NHS Education for Scotland and Health Scotland ensure that the GIRFEC approach is fully integrated into new and reviewed guidance that impacts on children to ensure that there is practice development across the health service.

With support from the Scottish Government, Police Scotland has designed a training package for all officers which is currently being rolled out across the country and will be delivered to all front line staff by the end of March 2014. The purpose of this training is to increase awareness and improve the police response to concerns about children and vulnerable adults. We believe this training will support operational officers and supervisors to have a good understanding of the potential vulnerabilities of children and how best to safeguard and support their wellbeing.

Once CPPs have agreed their systems and practice changes to reflect their local priorities and procedures, these packages can be adapted for delivery. A good example of this is the e-learning module developed by the Lothian and Borders CPP Grouping, which is being accessed by other CPP areas.

The Scottish Government and the Information Commissioner’s Office (ICO) are undertaking presentations across the country to inform practitioners and managers of the impact of the ICO statement in the context of existing and emerging legislation. The Scottish Government team also reviews local guidance and practices when requested to ensure a consistency of approach is promoted. In particular, in collaboration with the ICO they have been working with Perth and Kinross CPP in producing information sharing guidance for all staff in relation to risks to wellbeing. The guidance is expected to be published later this month and will be hosted on the GIRFEC website as an exemplar. Other areas, including Fife and Lothian and Borders, have already expressed an interest in it and the aim is that all areas will be able to adopt it or adapt it for their own use. The Scottish Government continues to encourage all training of children’s workforce staff to embrace the values and components of the Common Core Competencies, published in 2012 – (http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/06/5565), which have been founded on the UNCRC and GIRFEC. Use of the Common Core is supported and promoted by the Scottish Social Services Council. We also continue to work with Stirling University as part of their annual conference programme to enhance practitioners’ understanding, most recently 11–12 November 2013, and to support the on-going development of their CPD module on GIRFEC. The Scottish Government team is also available to advise other institutions in developing programmes.

135. The Scottish Government is working with various groups to update the Privacy Impact Assessment (PIA) that accompanies the Bill. Given its significance, we request the Scottish Government makes it available to us at the earliest opportunity.

The updated Privacy Impact Assessment has been sent to the Education and Culture Committee and was published on the Scottish Government website on 20 November: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0043/00438388.pdf

137. We note the evidence we received in relation to electronic information sharing. Concerns about the ability of organisations to share information electronically were also raised with us during our inquiries this Session. We therefore urge the Scottish Government to consider what further support it can provide to public services to improve their ability to share information in relation to the Bill.

The Scottish Government is developing a new health and care information sharing strategy in partnership with delivery agencies across Health, Local Authorities and the Third Sector. This will cover both services for adults and children and will be available for consultation in early 2014.

The Information Sharing Board (ISB) is leading on this and aims to enable improved information sharing and collaborative working, ensuring that there is minimum unnecessary duplication of effort. The ISB will fund local information sharing initiatives with a budget in excess of £1.5m in 2013-14 and £2m in 2014-15. It has just concluded a process associated with the release of this funding, with proposals received from all 14 areas. To date, funding from the ISB has already seen successful projects such as AYRshare develop and be implemented, as well as portal pilot developments in Lothian and Greater Glasgow and Clyde. Established initiatives in Lanarkshire and West Lothian have been assisted to develop a ‘proof of concept’ enabling child alerts to be shared across boundaries.

What has become increasingly important to the further sharing of information is that data such as a child concern, a chronology or a Child’s Plan is recorded and stored in a consistent manner and to that end national minimum data sets are being agreed. To support this the Scottish Government GIRFEC Team and eHealth are working with the Lothian and Borders area to test these data sets, explore all options to share information electronically to support GIRFEC and to produce a detailed generic ‘check list’ to be considered by all areas considering ICT support for GIRFEC implementation. The project will further expand the ‘GIRFEC Business Requirements for Electronic Information Sharing’ produced in partnership with stakeholders in 2012 and will provide valuable national learning.

Part 5 - Child’s Plan

143. We recommend that the Scottish Government ensures the child’s plan can be produced in such a way as to allow the easy incorporation of other statutory requirements.

The intention is not to alter the specific statutory duties to prepare a Coordinated Support Plan (CSP) or a plan for a Looked After Child. These other plans should be considered as contributing to a broader framework of support for the wellbeing of the individual child or young person.

Much of the detail of what should be included in the Child’s Plan will be set out in subordinate legislation and in statutory guidance. These will also make clear the relationship between the Child’s Plan and the other statutory planning mechanisms. The Code of Practice which supports the legislation governing Additional Support for Learning allows for the CSP to be incorporated within a Child’s Plan, and this is already practice within Highland CPP.

144. We also recommend the Scottish Government considers the suggestions made in evidence to us calling for the inclusion in the Bill of a mechanism to resolve disputes in relation to a child’s plans, and for children and young people’s views to be taken into account in developing child’s plans.

The child’s and/or parents’ views should be considered and valued throughout the process of development of the child’s plan. However, at times it may prove difficult to achieve consensus.

Disputes between professionals should be resolved locally whenever possible using existing Health Board and Local Authority dispute resolution procedures. Guidance will set out the need to have these in place and the requirement that they are visible and accessible to children and parents.
If disputes cannot be resolved locally, we want redress for children/young people and families to be accessible, clear and quick. We are considering whether there is a need for further bespoke redress, which may or may not require legislation. However, it is important to consider existing complaints mechanisms, such as provided by the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman, and those of Local Authorities which are being considered under the Scottish Government’s review of social work complaints procedures, so that we do not add unnecessary complexity to the public complaints landscape. Work is therefore on-going on this matter.

Part 6 - Early Learning and Childcare

158. We note that early years intervention is generally regarded as being of crucial importance to a child’s development and we support its proposed expansion. We also support the general desirability of continuing to expand this to two year olds as quickly as possible.

159. We welcome the Bill as a first step in the expansion of early learning and childcare, although a minority of us would like the Bill to go further.

The Scottish Government is aware that a number of organisations would like to see the Early Learning and Childcare provisions extended more widely to 2 year olds, particularly those living in poverty or disadvantage.

The Scottish Government is clear that we want significant changes which are achievable, manageable and sustainable, and we will not compromise on quality in order to ensure we actually improve outcomes for our children, especially our most vulnerable 2 year olds. All the research shows that what makes a difference to those children who are more disadvantaged is that the provision needs to be high quality. Research shows that while all social groups benefit from high quality pre-school provision, children from the poorest families gain most from universal provision of Early Learning and Childcare. Open to all, mixed provision can have the biggest impact and protects against early segregation, and that needs to be the way we go forward more broadly in the longer term. Our priority at this stage is therefore to build additional hours and flexibility into our high quality universal provision.

Where we do extend to 2 year olds, we want to make a difference. We know that looked after children have the poorest outcomes of any group of children; and the priority is that the guarantee of provision for this group, and for those under a kinship care order where this can be an alternative to a child being looked after, will make a difference for those children. That is why the Bill allows for individualised or alternative arrangements for looked after 2 year olds based on assessment and family circumstances; and, can include work with parents and carers in a range of settings including the home, with the aim of ensuring we really do make a difference.

We have also been clear that our aim is to develop a wider system of high quality Early Learning and Childcare that meets the needs of all children, parents and families, focusing initially on those most in need. The Bill is designed to allow for changes to eligibility and number of hours through secondary legislation. The Bill also introduces a new concept of Early Learning and Childcare in order to remove an artificial divide between pre-school education and childcare. This will enable more holistic and integrated provision which supports learning and development in caring and nurturing environments for all young children which can encompass any further expansion.

We are aware that the Department of Education in England has embarked on extending its provision to 20% of disadvantaged 2 year olds this year, increasing to 40% in 2014; but, we are also aware of consistent and sustained concerns expressed by key stakeholders about the resources and capacity to implement this commitment and ensure the necessary quality that will have a positive impact on outcomes for young children.

Our absolute priority is to ensure that the provision we are offering is high quality and sustainable. The Committee heard on 17 September from COSLA, the National Day Nurseries Association (NDNA) and the University of Strathclyde that quality is paramount, particularly for the most vulnerable two year olds who need provision which is flexible and appropriate to their needs, and the importance of getting it right before rolling out provision and increasing numbers further.

160. Whilst we accept local authorities will need some time to ascertain the level of need locally, we urge the Scottish Government and COSLA to work to ensure that flexible arrangements are made available as quickly as possible to enable families to take advantage of the new provision.

Flexibility means moving away from what has been a default model of provision of 2.5 hours per day, to providing models of provision that support a range of needs for parents including to support parents who are employed, training or studying. Those models will be defined by Local Authorities in consultation with local populations of parents; and, consultation will enable Local Authorities to access a range of views, from different areas to groups of parents with different needs.

The Bill requires consultation every 2 years, with published plans in response to identified needs. This is intended to build momentum into the changes that will be required over the next few years. The Financial Memorandum estimates the budget increasing incrementally year on year to enable Local Authorities to build in new patterns and choice, including models that may be more expensive. Therefore we would expect to see year on year incremental changes to early learning and childcare. We believe this provides the necessary pace and resources, without requiring the introduction of a range of choices from day one which would be necessarily limited and not necessarily what parents want.
161. We note the suggestion some nurseries are underfunded. We emphasise that the increase in supported hours of early learning and childcare must not have a detrimental effect on the quality of the service that is provided, or the sustainability of provision in the voluntary and private sectors.

The contribution of high quality and sustainable partner providers is a crucial element of funded Early Learning and Childcare provision. The duty to secure Early Learning and Childcare will remain with Local Authorities; and, it will remain their responsibility to agree with their partner providers, fair settlements locally for delivery of Early Learning and Childcare places.

The Financial Memorandum estimates the full costs of the additional 125 hours for 3 and 4 year olds and the costs for the most vulnerable 2 year olds. The draft budget for 2014/15 and 2015/16 has included those costs in full. There is therefore no reason for Local Authorities to underfund partner providers on the basis of this increase in hours or additional funding.

We will continue to work with local authorities and NDNA to promote good local working relationships and transparency of funding arrangements. Both the Association of Directors of Education in Scotland (ADES) and NDNA are members of the Early Years Policy Delivery Group which is developing draft statutory guidance to support implementation of the Early Learning and Childcare legislative proposals, which will cover this issue. More immediately, we will encourage further discussion of this issue through a Scottish Government and ADES national implementation conference this November.

162. On a related point, we heard calls for the Bill to revise the point at which children's entitlement to supported childcare would begin. Currently, children are entitled to use the service from the start of the school term following their third birthday. It has been suggested this system is unfair in that the amount of childcare to which children are entitled depends on when their birthday falls. We wrote to the Scottish Government asking it to respond to those concerns and asking whether it intended to take any further action on the matter. The Government confirmed its policy intention was for the current entitlement to continue. It also stated that it encouraged local authorities to commence early learning and childcare closer to the child’s third birthday where they have capacity to do so. We invite the Scottish Government to provide further explanation of why it is not appropriate for the Bill to include measures on this matter.

The priority for the Scottish Government at this stage is to build additional hours and flexibility into our high quality universal provision, increasing the entitlement to around 16 hours a week, and building flexibility into the system. This is a significant change and reconfiguring the system of Early Learning and Childcare must be achievable, manageable and sustainable. Secondary legislation will also allow for future flexibility should Ministers decide to make further changes to commencement and eligibility.
Local Authorities can and do deliver provision beyond the minimum number of hours and minimum eligible children. A number of Local Authorities therefore already start children from their 3rd birthday, or the month after their 3rd birthday. We welcome and encourage those arrangements to start closer to the child’s 3rd birthday where Local Authorities have the capacity to do so as this supports longer term aims to increase and expand Early Learning and Childcare for all children, parents and families.

The commencement dates for eligibility will be set through secondary legislation, and it is the intention to continue commencement for 3 year olds from the first term after their third birthday. There is also an intention to continue the entitlement for the youngest children who may receive only one term in their first year of Early Learning and Childcare (usually those born in January or February who start in the Spring term just before Summer) to an additional year of Early Learning and Childcare where their parents chose. This would allow parents to defer entry to school for an additional year, enabling the child to start school when they are closer to 5½ years old. Some slight variation will always remain whether children commence from their birthday or the first term after their birthday, but this system currently makes the best use of the entitlement in relation to the child’s age and needs.

Part 7 - Corporate Parenting

169. We note the evidence received indicating that several organisations do not agree with their inclusion on the list of corporate parents. This risks diluting the concept of corporate parenting. In the absence of specific criteria, we seek further clarification from the Scottish Government about the reasoning underpinning the decisions to identify those with corporate parenting responsibilities.

The organisations listed in Schedule 3 as Corporate Parents includes the wide range of public sector bodies that are in any way involved in delivering services, providing support or in making decisions about the lives of children and young people in care and their families. This list inevitably captures a broad list of organisations; some of which are involved in the day to day aspects of planning and delivering key services while some are less frontline. Much of what we are asking new Corporate Parents to do is within the range of activities and reporting obligations they have already. Many bodies already commit themselves to supporting children and young people in care and care leavers. As such, I am satisfied that the organisations listed in schedule 3 will be more than capable of meeting their responsibilities as Corporate Parents.

The Scottish Government has maintained a dialogue throughout the development of the Bill with organisations across the sector as part of our consideration of the list of corporate parents. We will continue that dialogue, keep the list under review and will consider making changes to it if necessary. The Committee will also be aware that there is a power in Section 50(2) of the Bill for Scottish Ministers to, by order subject to affirmative procedure, modify Schedule 3 by adding, removing or varying entries listed in it if it is thought appropriate to amend the list in light of experience after the Bill provisions come into effect.
Part 8 - Aftercare

178. We acknowledge the evidence that we heard from Who Cares? Scotland and others and invite the Government to respond to their suggestions that the Bill should include a right for care-leavers to return to care up to the age of 26; allow young people who have spent time in care, but are not in care at school-leaving age, to be eligible for aftercare; and include a mechanism enabling care leavers to appeal against decisions taken about the level of care they receive.

The Children (Scotland) Act 1995 sets out the responsibilities for Local Authorities in respect of young people leaving care. There is a statutory duty on each Local Authority to carry out an assessment of the needs of young people over school age leaving their care, whether they be persons to whom they owe a duty under Section 29(1) of the 1995 Act or persons who make an application to them to request advice, guidance and assistance under Section 29(2).

The Scottish Government acknowledges the principle of returning to care as a positive step in improving outcomes for care leavers. However, careful consideration needs to be given to the implications of care leavers having a right to return to care up to the age of 26 before that could be put in place and we have maintained a regular and detailed dialogue with the sector to further consider. We are agreed that care and support should always be about preparing young people to live independently and the transition from care to independent living is one that must be fully supported according to the individual needs of each care leaver and at a time and pace that suits their individual needs. In the meantime, the Scottish Government is considering a number of proposals including those mentioned above and will consider making any necessary changes to support the transition from care to independent living.

The Looked After Children Strategic Implementation Group – Throughcare and Aftercare hub, recently published ‘Staying Put - Scotland’, to support practitioners in extending the transition to independent living, maintaining relationships between young people leaving care and their carers and supporting staying in a care placement as long as possible and until a time when the young person is prepared and ready to sustain independent living. Work with stakeholders will continue over the coming year to engage them with the guidance and offer support to build on existing good practice.

In relation to a mechanism for appeals, regulations 16 to 20 of the Supporting Young People Leaving Care (Scotland) Regulations, 2003 set out existing rights of appeal for persons mentioned in Section 29(1) or (2) of the 1995 Act against decisions of the Local Authority either not to provide advice, guidance and assistance under Section 29(2) or in relation to the level or nature of advice, guidance and assistance to be provided under Section 29(1) or (2). A young person also has a right to make a complaint to the Local Authority about the service they have received or how an appeal has been handled. A complaint of this nature should currently be made under the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 or any other appropriate complaints procedure.

Section 60 of the Bill amends Section 29(6) of the 1995 Act to ensure that Local Authorities need to establish procedures for considering representations (including complaints) by persons in mentioned in Section 29(1) or (2) about the discharge of their functions under the provisions of subsection (1) up to and including their functions in new subsections (5A) and (5B) of Section 29. As such, the Scottish Government will, following the Bill’s passage, be considering these existing appeal rights to assess whether any amendments need to be made to them by way of secondary legislation in consequence of the provision in Section 60 of the Bill.

Part 9 – Counselling Services

185. We note the calls for further information on the measures to be provided and request that the Scottish Government provides such information as early as possible.

The Counselling services provisions in Part 9 of the Bill will place a duty on Local Authorities to ensure that families in the early stages of distress who seek help are provided with appropriate forms of intervention. The order, which will be made under these Bill provisions, will make it clear that the eligibility test for the counselling services will be where a child is at risk of becoming looked after or where the child’s wellbeing would be at risk of being impaired if the counselling services are not provided. Circumstances and appropriate supports will vary from child to child, and may change over time.

An order made under these Bill provisions will also specify the description of counselling services which Local Authorities are to make available to families where there is a child at risk of becoming looked after or where the child’s wellbeing is at risk of being impaired, if the services are not provided. Such assistance is likely to include:

- Family therapy or support services;
- Addiction therapy or support services;
- Substance misuse therapy or support services;
- Mental health counselling or support services;
- Attachment/parenting/behavioural counselling or support services; and
- Bereavement and grief counselling or support services.

Therefore, this provision could cover a very wide and evolving range of services which will require to be amended and updated to meet practice over time, which would not be possible to do if the services were specified on the face of the Bill.
186. We agree with the recommendation of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee that, due to the significance of eligibility for these matters, the affirmative procedure should apply rather than the negative procedure.

As detailed in our response to the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee on 11 November 2013, the Scottish Government agrees that this would be a sensible approach and intends putting forward an amendment at Stage 2 to change the order making power to affirmative.

Part 10 - Kinship Care

211. We therefore welcome the Scottish Government’s work in engaging with stakeholders, including local authorities and groups representing kinship carers, on the contents of the regulations and ask the Government to reassure kinship carers about the level of support they can expect to receive under the new arrangements.

The Scottish Government has conducted comprehensive consultation and engagement with kinship carers and key stakeholders throughout the Bill process. This consultation will continue as we develop secondary legislation under the Kinship Care Order Bill provisions to ensure that both kinship carers and the children in their care, where they are eligible, will be fully supported under a Kinship Care Order.

The level of support or assistance which will be provided by Local Authorities will vary on a case by case basis, depending on the individual circumstances of the family and the child/children concerned. It is anticipated that support will include:

- A start-up grant (for example where the child moves to live with the family following a kinship care order being obtained);
- Transitional support for 3 years, where a child moves from formal kinship care arrangements (or from being looked after) to informal kinship care, where a qualifying person has obtained a kinship care order. This will ensure that families will not be any worse off financially or otherwise at the point of transition (e.g. a carer would seek financial support from the UK benefits system and the Local Authority would then provide a top-up allowance to the level received under the previous formal arrangements). After the 3 year transitional period the level of support and or assistance provided will be dependent on the individual needs of the family; and
- Access to Early Learning and Childcare for all 2 year olds that are subject to a kinship care order (although this will not be dependent on individual family circumstances).

212. The Scottish Government Financial Review of kinship care expects to report by the end of 2013. We will consider its findings in due course. The Government should ensure the findings can be easily integrated into the regulations being developed under the Bill.

The Kinship Care financial review is being conducted independently of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. The review aims to reduce the complexity and inconsistencies in the system of kinship allowances. We agree that any changes to the system of allowances should be complementary to the Kinship Care Order proposals and reflect past learning about how allowances interact with the benefits system. Any legislative change required as a result of the findings from the review group will be dealt with through secondary legislation, most likely by amendment to the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009. We will ensure the Committee is kept informed of progress.

213. We invite the Scottish Government to provide details of the action it is taking to ensure that payments under the kinship care order will be disregarded as income in terms of the benefits system. We would be concerned if such support was not disregarded in this way and urge the Scottish Government to work closely with the relevant UK Government departments on the development of the regulations under this Part, to ensure clarity about what kinship carers can and cannot expect to receive.

The Scottish Government has pursued the UK Government for some time to financially support kinship carers through the UK welfare system and to recognise them for their parenting role. In pursuit of this we have had on-going dialogue with the Department for Work and Pensions and HM Revenue and Customs for some time with the result of securing concessions ‘benefit disregards’ for kinship carers.

It is however necessary that our secondary legislation is defined before UK Government departments can confirm how they will treat any entitlements. In designing the Kinship Care Order therefore, we have considered past learning on this policy area and will ensure we continue to work closely with the UK Government.

The interaction between kinship carers and the benefits system is very complex. To assist discussions with UK Government, the Scottish Government has, and will continue to, work with organisations such as Citizens Advice Scotland and the Child Poverty Action Group to gain a better understanding of the complexities kinship carers face. We are committed to supporting kinship carers to maximise take-up of their entitlements.

Part 11 - Adoption Register

219. We support the aim of enabling more children, particularly those who are looked after, to be matched with suitable adopted families without having to experience delays. We consider the compulsory nature of the Register will mean the remainder of local authorities and adoption agencies will join the Register, thereby increasing the chances of a suitable match.

220. However, we note the concerns raised in evidence by, for example, the British Association for Adoption and Fostering and invite the Scottish Government to respond to these points.

The Scottish Government is clear that the National Adoption Register must be designed and built to help find the maximum number of opportunities for every child for whom adoption is in their best interest. If a child cannot be matched locally, it is important to ensure that there is no unnecessary drift and delay in a child being potentially matched to adopters outside the Local Authority. This means every adoption agency must refer both children and approved adopters in a timely way to ensure that the Register can operate as effectively as possible.

The Scottish Government has been liaising with the British Association for Adoption and Fostering (BAAF) about their concerns on the Adoption Register provisions, in particular those relating to the insertion of the new Section 13C(2)(a)(i) and (ii) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. These provide that an adoption agency is not to disclose for inclusion in the Register information about a child without the consent of either the birth parent or any person who has parental responsibilities or parental rights for the child, or such other person as may be prescribed in regulations.

We note BAAF’s concerns regarding circumstances where the consent of parents or persons with parental rights and responsibilities is not forthcoming. We are actively considering this issue and exploring ways in which this matter could be addressed in the Bill.

We also note the concerns raised by BAAF in relation to the access of prospective adopters to the information held by the Register, including the Scottish Children in Waiting publication. Whilst Section 13A(3) provides that the Register should not be open to public inspection or search, the regulation making power in Section 13D(2)(b) allows Regulations to be made which authorise the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation to disclose information derived from the Register to any person specified in the Regulations for any purpose relating to adoption, amongst other things and this power may be used to ensure that the information from the Register can be shared with prospective adopters to increase the effectiveness of the Register.

I hope the Committee finds this response to their Stage 1 report helpful. I look forward to continued working with the Committee as the Bill progresses through the Parliamentary Process.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on school closures to inform its forthcoming consideration of Stage 2 amendments from—

Cleland Sneddon, Executive Director of Community Services, Argyll and Bute Council;
Leslie Manson, Executive Director of Education, Leisure and Housing, Orkney Islands Council, representing Association of Directors of Education in Scotland;
Malcolm Burr, Chief Executive, Comhairle nan Eilean Siar/Western Isles Council;
Eileen Prior, Executive Director, Scottish Parent Teacher Council;
Sandy Longmuir, Chairman, Scottish Rural Schools Network;
Michael Russell, Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning, Clare Morley, Team Leader, School Infrastructure Unit, and Lorraine Stirling, Principal Legal Officer, Scottish Government.
The Convener (Stewart Maxwell): Good morning. I welcome everybody to the 31st meeting in 2013 of the Education and Culture Committee, and I remind all those present that electronic devices should be switched off at all times while the committee is in session.

Our first item of business is to take evidence on the Scottish Government’s proposals to amend the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill in relation to school closures. The Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning wrote to us in September to tell us that he intended to lodge amendments on a number of issues to do with school closures.

In order to inform our scrutiny of the amendments when they are lodged, we will hear first from stakeholders and then from the cabinet secretary.

I welcome to the committee Cleland Sneddon from Argyll and Bute Council; Leslie Manson from the Association of Directors of Education in Scotland; Malcolm Burr from Western Isles Council; Eileen Prior from the Scottish Parent Teacher Council; and Sandy Longmuir from the Scottish rural schools network.

We will move immediately to questions from members.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): Good morning. I think that all of us who were involved would hold up our hands and say that we did not get the legislation correct with the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010, particularly when it comes to presumption. Given the evidence that you have presented to us, I still think that there is a considerable difference of opinion on the matter. Do you believe that it will clarify matters if we include the phrase “presumption against closure” in the bill, or do you still think that that will be open to considerable question?

The Convener: Who wants to start? I will just pick someone if no one volunteers.

Sandy Longmuir (Scottish Rural Schools Network): Whether the presumption helps will depend a lot on what policy backs it. The recent decisions in the Court of Session have found that the matters of regard have been left hanging in respect of who decides whether the matters of regard have been properly addressed, whether the community factors have been properly addressed, and whether attempts have been made to remedy any foreseen problems before the schools come to a consultation.

We have seen representations that say that the presumption will go too far and that it will make communities somehow mistakenly believe that no school will ever close, but that is not what a legal presumption means at all. The simplest legal presumption is the presumption of innocence. The general public do not believe that nobody will ever be found guilty because there is a presumption of innocence, but there must be a considerable body of proof that outweighs the presumption of innocence.

That is exactly what we are looking for in this context. A body of proof should have to be put forward to show that the matters of regard have been assessed and dealt with, and any attempt at remedial action has failed or would never succeed. As long as that can be demonstrated, the presumption will fall, as the presumption does in any other legal aspect.

I think that the Scottish Government is currently consulting on a sustainable development presumption to catch up with the presumption that exists and operates in England and Wales. I cannot see any problem with introducing the words “presumption against closure” into legislation.

Eileen Prior (Scottish Parent Teacher Council): We have somewhat sidestepped the question in our response because our key issue is how to define what a rural school is. We need to know what makes a rural school a rural school. For example, in South Lanarkshire you may be only 2 miles away from another village and yet be in a rural school. That does not make any sense. However, if you are in Knoydart and are 50 or 100 miles away from your nearest school, that is pretty rural.

The starting point must be to define what we are calling rural. I do not know how that should be done and I am not going to set up myself as an expert to do that. However, we must have clarity on what we define as a rural school and then perhaps look at—to use the Knoydart example again—whether there is a presumption against closing schools that are absolutely isolated and so different from my South Lanarkshire example.

As I say, we have somewhat sidestepped the question on presumption because another question behind it must be answered first.
Malcolm Burr (Comhairle nan Eilean Siar): The word “presumption” is somewhat unhelpful because it creates an expectation in the minds of many that a very high bar is set, which is simply not the case. As Mr Longmuir said, any presumption can be rebutted. The presumption of innocence argument is there but we are not talking about liberty; we are talking about policy choices.

The Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 provides some very good tests. If those are applied correctly, the necessary safeguards are given, and I am not clear what the sense of presumption adds to what is an objective process. It should be an objectively arguable process in procedural terms and in the sense of merits, by which I mean whether a council or the Scottish ministers have gone about their jobs correctly. I am not clear what introducing a term such as presumption adds to the process for anyone.

Liz Smith: If we set a very high bar, it raises all parties’ attempts to ensure that we are doing things absolutely correctly. Two previous panels have made a strong point about the fact that, because presumption has not been clarified in the existing legislation, it is open to misinterpretation. You referred to an objective process, but facts have not been correctly assimilated and, indeed, in some cases they have been plain wrong.

That has been very much to the detriment of the 2010 act and we are trying to move forward on that. What I am driving at is whether there needs to be a clear definition in legislation—a legal definition, if you like—or whether we must do a bit more than that. That is the nub of the question.

Malcolm Burr: The fact that the act provides for special regard for rural schools and factors says it all. That is how the Parliament should leave it because, by doing so, it would be saying that the intention is that rural schools have a separate set of criteria that councils must address properly. That is sufficient because the issue is about evidence, going about the process correctly and giving consideration to what the 2010 act requires. The presumption is there, if you like, in the rural factors.

Liz Smith: There is a difference between the intention to have special regard and including something in the act. The point that some people are trying to make is that, in order to raise the bar and ensure that we do things absolutely accurately, we need to have extra confidence in the terminology. As I say, we are all guilty of not getting the act right the first time round, and we have all found that the matter is open to misinterpretation, which is why we have seen lengthy legal disputes and difficulties for local councils and the Scottish Government.

Malcolm Burr: As the committee will know, my own council is involved in that legal action. The court found that there was no statutory presumption. I do not think that that affected the council’s consideration of our school closure programme—we looked at the special factors. I cannot go beyond that: there is an objective process of assessment, and it seems a little illogical to put statements of intent into that when the argument should be made on process and merit.

Liz Smith: What do you mean by illogical?

Malcolm Burr: Presumption is more of a political statement than is strictly consistent with a process such as this.

Liz Smith: I might be being very stupid here but I did not quite follow that. Could you just explain what you mean?

Malcolm Burr: I am saying that the act rightly defines the process that councils have to follow. The court clarified that there is a consideration of merit in any subsequent review of the process. Those are objective factors. A council either properly considers the rural factors or it does not.

The way in which a statement such as “presumption against closure” is fed into that objective process could be unhelpful. For example, at what stage is that considered? Is it considered at all stages? How then does the minister consider it? If the minister thinks that the council has gone about the process procedurally correctly and the case has merit, does the presumption against closure come in then? I do not think that it adds to the process.

I appreciate that there is a political intention behind the presumption against closure, but I am not sure that it helps anyone much.

Liz Smith: Convener, may I have one more question?

The Convener: I will first bring in Leslie Manson and Cleland Sneddon because we have not had a chance to hear from them yet.

Leslie Manson (Association of Directors of Education in Scotland): I am not sure that the word “presumption” helps.

The semantics are important here and the term is frequently misunderstood. For many parents and members of the community, it means that there is no possibility that there will ever be a consideration of their school closing or that, if the local council has the temerity to consider closure, it is likely that a higher authority will veto it. It gives people an inappropriate sense of protection.

If the fact of a presumption can be enshrined in law, it would be useful. As has already been said, it would suggest that the consideration is such that the closure of a rural school would be a rare event and the special rural factors would be taken into consideration.

It is also important that the status quo is always considered as an option and I am not sure that that has always been the case. More than that, the amended status quo—including the ideas, suggestions and contributions that parents and members of the community might bring to the table—could move a school from being regarded as not feasible to being feasible. If we could capture the presumption in the terms of the act, that would be useful, but I am not sure that the word itself is helpful.

The Convener: Is your position that, as long as the word “presumption” is clearly defined, you do not have a particular problem with it? Is the definition the issue?

Leslie Manson: No. As we say in our submission, it is for the Government to presume as it chooses; that is the role of Government. More than that, living and working in a rural community I also presume that rural schools are not to be closed. If your starting point is that rural school closures are going to be rare, that is acceptable.

Cleland Sneddon (Argyll and Bute Council): As the last to speak, I will try not to repeat comments that have already been made, but a couple of interesting points have come up.

Our written submission started from the premise that a proposal will be brought forward to clarify the presumption, and we welcome the clarification of that presumption. That might take the argument on from some of the earlier contributions.

The key aspect is how presumption is articulated. There was a misinterpretation of the presumption as it was presented in the 2010 act. It implied to some people that it was an immovable barrier to the closure of a school.

I was encouraged by the Scottish Government’s statement that it would ensure that it would articulate the presumption in such a way as to stifle “legitimate changes to schools which become necessary over time.”

If a presumption is to be retained within the 2010 act, it is incumbent on us to ensure that it is articulated clearly enough so that there is an understanding among all parties of what it means. I hope that that is a helpful contribution; it echoes some of the previous comments.

Liz Smith: I will pick up on that very issue, Mr Sneddon. Broadly speaking, do the recommendations of the commission on the delivery of rural education strike the right balance between safeguarding our schools and allowing councils to reform and ensure that the right schools are in the right areas?

Cleland Sneddon: In the wider sense, the commission’s recommendations are welcomed. Eileen Prior made the interesting point that the presumption takes up an awful lot of our attention, but there are a series of underpinning questions and arguments about amendments to the legislation that are arguably more important. Without jumping forward in the agenda, we have set out in our submission some of the key considerations for our authority—I am sure that they are in common with those of other authorities—about how the legislation is implemented.

Leslie Manson is correct that none of us entered into local government service to be the person closing rural schools, but we have a responsibility for how we use finite resources. Given that the fortunes of communities wax and wane, we must ensure that we have the right provision for our communities and that we adjust resources accordingly. That sometimes means that difficult decisions have to be made.

The Convener: Mr Burr, the cabinet secretary’s letter to the committee states that

“The presumption against closure should not mean that no rural school can ever close, but that very careful consideration should be given before making such a proposal, given the significant impact it could have on the community involved.”

Does that give you any comfort?

Malcolm Burr: Yes, it does. That point is picked up in the Government’s response, which states that

“the education authority must give very careful consideration to the matters ‘of special regard’ before bringing forward a closure proposal.”

I think that any competent council would do that before any closure proposal was even thought about. That is as it is. If all that adding the words “presumption against closure” means is to have “special regard” before a proposal is brought forward, it does not add very much to the 2010 act.

The Convener: Does it do any harm?

Malcolm Burr: Arguably not. If that is how the presumption against closure is defined and if it is clearly stated in those terms, it adds very little and hence does not do any harm. I think that the issue is more about parents and communities who might feel that the presumption against closure is an almost irreversible ban. I appreciate that that is not what the Government is saying—

The Convener: That is not what it says.
Malcolm Burr: I appreciate that. I question what the presumption adds, but if it is clearly defined in those terms, that would be helpful.

Sandy Longmuir: I think, and we hope, that the presumption adds something.

Currently, the matters to regard can be a procedural matter. In terms of the law, it is currently up to the council to say “We have had regard to these three matters.” It is for the council to decide the weight that is given to those matters.

If the presumption is put in place and operates in the way that we think and hope that it will, the matters to regard will have greater prominence as it will have to be demonstrated that they have been met. The presumption will add weight to that. All that we are asking for is that there is a weight of evidence. We are asking not that, as is being said, no school should ever close but that the weight of evidence has to be substantial.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): I will pick up on whether the presumption adds anything or is potentially counter-productive.

Is one of the issues with the 2010 act that it is interpreted differently by different people? There is a risk that the expectations—not necessarily of those who live and breathe the act but of those who have the misfortune to engage with it at the point at which they have to—are raised unduly. For example, it has been suggested that, with regard to the 2010 act in particular, financial considerations should not come into play in any decision on a school closure. However, as anyone who has been involved in such matters will know, that is simply nonsensical. Why would a council go into a process of even considering such a move if it were not weighing up financial considerations to some extent?

You might say that, although you would really rather not put the term “presumption” into the bill, doing so will not do any harm. However, is it fair to say that the potential of harm in such a move might be significant as it will lead to our simply continuing to raise expectations about what the legislation will actually do at the end of the day?

Malcolm Burr: That is a risk. However, as I said to the convener, if the bill makes it clear that careful consideration should be given to matters of special regard before the proposals are brought, that is what any competent authority will do. If such a provision is to be in the bill, it must be very carefully defined; if not, the risks that you have referred to will arise.

Eileen Prior: What does the term “presumption” mean to the layman? It means that we presume that this or that school will not close. It is the same with the presumption with regard to mainstreaming, in that we presume that children with additional needs will be taught in mainstream schools. People have a certain understanding of the word.

I, too, share Mr McArthur’s concern that this might lead to an unrealistic raising of expectations. Indeed, as Mr McArthur has also pointed out, unlike the local authority officers and others who deal with the issue day in, day out, the families and communities involved will engage with this process only when their school is being considered for closure. It is a very tough notion to explain to people. The whole process is emotionally charged for communities and we have to guard against giving people false expectations.

Sandy Longmuir: I can assure you that any policy memorandum will be read avidly by any parent who comes up against the act. In general, rural parents are not simple by nature; they are very quick at picking up and understanding even the most complex documents. We sell the public short in saying that if we set out in clear wording in a policy memorandum something that backs up the presumption they will not be able to understand it. Actually, I think that that is insulting.

The Convener: My understanding is that, if I presume that something will not happen, that does not mean that I believe that it will not happen. I believe that it is unlikely to happen but, at the same time, I realise that there are reasons why it might happen. I do not take the view that, just because I presume something, that something is an absolute.

Sandy Longmuir: If you presume something—

The Convener: Hang on a second—I wanted to ask Eileen Prior about this.

You seem to be suggesting that because the bill contains the term “presume” or “presumption” people will take that as an absolute position.

Eileen Prior: People are optimistic by nature and, when they see that something is a presumption, they become optimistic that it will be sustained.

I absolutely agree with Sandy Longmuir; I would never suggest that the layperson is ignorant or stupid. There are folk out there who will crawl all over the legislation; indeed, I have done it myself as a parent. You do it when you need to, but the problem is that you do it only when you absolutely have to and when you are perhaps not as familiar with the background and the legal position as you might otherwise have been.

It is great that Sandy Longmuir’s group is there to support parents who want to do that work, but I am simply saying that because all of us—or, at least, most of us—are by nature optimistic we take a presumption as being a very positive thing and will travel optimistically.
Jayne Baxter (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab): The Court of Session found that the 2010 act requires the Scottish ministers to consider the merits of a school closure proposal as well as the process that has been undertaken. Although all those who responded to the consultation on amendments to the 2010 act supported consideration of merits by the Scottish ministers, SPTC suggested that

and Western Isles Council said that

“It should not be for Scottish Ministers to substitute their decision for that of a Council, solely on the basis of policy preference.”

With that in mind, I would be interested to hear witnesses’ views on what level of merit consideration it would be appropriate for ministers to pursue.

Malcolm Burr: The Court of Session said that it is impossible to assess process without having some regard to the merits, which I think is absolutely correct. However, as Jayne Baxter has noted, the court was clear that matters of education provision are primarily for councils and that

“The circumstances in which central government may step in and deprive the local authority of its power to decide to close a school are, accordingly, very limited.”

However, in terms of the merits, what was clearly meant was that, given that there is a call-in procedure, it is logical that ministers should look at how reasonable a council has been. By that, I mean it should be considered whether the council has taken into account relevant or irrelevant considerations, whether it has been fair, and whether it has addressed properly the matters that parents and others in communities have put to the council, including those who oppose the proposals.

The Court of Session assessed those issues. In the case that involved the Western Isles Council, vast amounts of documents were assessed, which is what is expected of ministers. No one should be able to say that a council did not look at or answer people’s arguments—provided that they were legally relevant, of course—or to suggest that it took into account factors that were not relevant or, to get back to the financial point, that it gave undue weight to factors that were not education related. That is an important point, and I welcome the clarity that the proposed amendments seek to give on that matter. Councils look at such things primarily in terms of terms of educational benefit and for educational purposes; that is what is meant by “merits”. It is not an absolute rehearing of the case; that is clear. However, it is a check that the merits have been properly addressed.

Jayne Baxter: What we want from local authorities is that they use the process properly. We hear from parents—not frequently, but fairly regularly—that the process has not been operated properly, so we think that the process must be robust and that local authorities must stick to the rules and do what the legislation says. That is the first thing.

The second point is that people in our communities elect their local authorities to make such decisions. Sometimes they agree with them and sometimes they do not, but it is their job and I do not think that we should deprive folk of their jobs. It is a fairly simple argument; do it properly, well and thoroughly, and take into account the views of all those who have a stake in the matter. Parents who have exercised their choice to take their children out of a school and move them to another school are not currently having their voices heard in the process, and we think that that is wrong, because they have voted with their feet and their opinion is important. Asking why they have done that can offer a qualitative perspective that we are missing at the moment.

Those are decisions for local government, not national Government. They should be made at local level, and local politicians are accountable for those decisions. That is how we operate and that is how it should be.

The Convener: I agree. That is why we have local democracy and that is what it is for, but surely Eileen Prior will accept that there has been a groundswell of views among lots of communities—I dealt with a school closure proposal in my area—that local authorities were not dealing with matters correctly, reasonably or, in some cases, even legally. Clearly there was a problem, which we all recognised at the time. Therefore, much as it would be fantastic always to leave the situation in the hands of local councils, which are absolutely responsible for it, there was a view among the public, which came through Parliament, that a set of rules had to be put in place to manage the process.

Eileen Prior: Absolutely.

The Convener: So, it is not entirely the case that local councils should make the decision and the Scottish Parliament should not be involved.

Eileen Prior: Our utopian perspective is that it should be done properly at local authority level. If it is, there should be no role for Government other than as a last resort.

The Convener: If we ever manage to achieve Utopia, we can discuss it then.

Eileen Prior: You can come back to me.
Sandy Longmuir: As the Scottish Parliament information centre briefing says, in the development of the 2010 act we were one of the organisations that were confused into believing that the “material consideration” element of the act meant the merits of a case. The SPICe briefing says that some people thought that call-in would apply only to procedure, but others believed that it would also refer to any material consideration. We were pleased that the law lords also came to the conclusion that the two could not be separated and that, if there is a matter of substantial concern, the minister should have to take cognisance of it.

We have seen many cases and can give example after example, especially in the financial sphere, of information that was simply wrong having been presented to elected members. In some cases, the information in proposal papers is simply wrong; it is not elected members’ fault that they vote on wrong information. In such cases, there must be an appeals mechanism whereby people can say that the process was followed—the meetings were held on the right date and the proposal papers were issued on the right date to the right people—but the information was completely wrong, therefore the merits of the case do not stack up. We are content that the merits of a case must be considered.

Cleland Sneddon: I will reflect on our experience of the process. I am encouraged by the indications that, back in 2010, everyone thought that call-in would be exceptional and seldom used. I am also encouraged by the advice that we are now receiving that the focus will be on ensuring that there is support for the local authority throughout the process in order to minimise further the use of call-in. However, some of the submissions or commentary around the proposed amendments to the 2010 act make it clear that there are some people who will look at the retained call-in as a means to try to have every proposal called in.

The emphasis is very much on ensuring that, as we go through the process, all the matters to which due regard should be given are considered, that the proposal documents are as comprehensive, accurate and robust as possible, and that engagement with communities is as proactive as possible—notwithstanding the emotiveness of issues. Within the proposals there is discussion around the role of Education Scotland and the role of an independent referral mechanism. We will wait to see what that looks like. It will be extremely important for us to put the emphasis at the front end of the process rather than look at the retained call-in as something that communities will continue to use in every case because they view it as an opportunity to get a local authority decision overturned.

That is a fairly blunt way of presenting the proposal, but that type of opinion of the call-in is still present. Potentially, it goes back to the discussion that we have had about presumption. A clear articulation in the revised legislation could clarify the position for communities.

Jayne Baxter: I presume that our witnesses agree with the proposal to remit closure decisions back to local authorities.

Cleland Sneddon indicated agreement.

Malcolm Burr indicated agreement.

Sandy Longmuir indicated agreement.

Eileen Prior indicated agreement.

Leslie Manson indicated agreement.

The Convener: That is a welcome clarification of everybody’s agreement. Let us move on.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): I want to get your thoughts on the independent referral mechanism. Given what has been said, why do you believe that people would wish decisions about their schools and communities to be taken by people whom they have no role in appointing and by a body that is not answerable to local communities?

Cleland Sneddon: I will start, because that follows on from what I said previously.

Decisions on school closures should and will be made by local government. This is about ensuring that where there is concern about a decision that has been made, there will be an opportunity to review it.

There was a view that the existing process was open to being political; since 2010 there has been a consistent call for such proceedings to be independent.

We talk about Education Scotland’s role at an earlier stage in the process—we are quite clear about that in our submission. Some of the assessments around merit are inevitably subjective in nature, so we look for people with the appropriate credibility and professional background to make them.

Similarly, whatever the independent referral mechanism is, we look for it to be seen to be independent and transparent, and we look for a fairly quick turnaround on decisions. We do not want to create a new bureaucracy or to have a very expensive process. If all those aspects are delivered through amendments, I would view the mechanism as being a positive development.

Leslie Manson: There is a well tried and tested system. In the General Teaching Council and Education Scotland, those who make the rules, so to speak, are not those who adjudicate on whether those rules have been adhered to; there is a separation between policy making and adjudication as to adherence to policy. I think that that is well understood. I believe that you are less liable to legal challenge if you separate the roles in that way.

The idea that people can exercise considerable influence without being directly appointed is accepted right across the land; for example, our health boards are not locally appointed. There is a system for public appointments to influential and responsible bodies and individual positions that have nothing to do with local democracy through MSPs or councillors.

The ADES view is that just as councils can be deemed to have got things wrong, Parliament might, for political reasons, get it wrong in specific areas. It is probably best to remit that to an independent body, whose job is not to determine the merits of the case but to determine whether the politicians and policy makers have done their jobs properly—in other words, whether they have considered fairly the merits of the case and followed the process rigorously. That is what is being adjudicated on. The separation between the call-in process and the final adjudication should be clear for all to see.

Malcolm Burr: I think there is an issue of principle about why this particular aspect of service provision—schools—is subject to further procedure. One could talk about whether that reflects the parity of esteem between central and local government that the Scotland Act 1998 spoke of, but I appreciate that that is not a view that is shared; it was not shared by the commission of which I was a member. There is a clear consensus that there should be a further review of councils’ decisions on school closures. The independent referral mechanism is one way of doing that.

From my perspective, it does not really matter, as long as there is clarity about what either ministers or the referral body are doing—which is reviewing the procedural competence of councils’ decisions in the sense of whether there was adequate evidence and whether that evidence was properly weighed. Whether that is done by an independent body is not so important, provided that there is clarity and that, because of that clarity, everybody who is involved in the process is confident that decisions have been taken properly.

Eileen Prior: I simply echo what Mr Burr has said. There is in various aspects of our civil society a well-established system of independent bodies reviewing processes and reviewing whether everything has been done as it should have been done. I do not see any problem with that.

I return to the point that the decision should be a local authority decision and, if the process needs to be reviewed, it should be reviewed independently. It should not be a political decision.

Sandy Longmuir: I think that we are all pretty much in agreement.

The Convener: You do not have to add anything, Sandy; it is not absolutely necessary.

Sandy Longmuir: I would just like to say the same thing. There are so many aspects in public life. Even when a simple freedom of information request is refused by a council, the person who submitted it has the right to go to appeal. With a planning application, people have the right to access to a reporter. The approach is accepted in public life, and it is all about transparency. It is not about who is appointed, but about how they act when they are appointed. It is all about their taking the information that is presented to them.

We accept that some parents who are trying to hang on until the last minute will ask for call-ins on quite spurious matters, but they can quite easily be disregarded. There is a sifting mechanism to find out the cases that should be brought to an appeals process.

Neil Bibby: You said that a right of appeal is quite normal. Do the panel, in particular the local authorities, believe that the decision of an independent review mechanism should be final, or should local authorities be able to appeal what the independent review body has decided?

Sandy Longmuir: I am not a lawyer, but I think that it would be difficult to create a mechanism whereby there could not be an appeal to the Court of Session. It would be full and final in that the local authority could not go to ministers or whoever, but I think that there would always be access under the Wednesbury rules. If somebody had acted unreasonably, a local authority could appeal even an appeal panel decision.

Malcolm Burr: In the interests of all, there is that right of appeal to the Court of Session, but such appeals should be only on points of law, in order that the process can be concluded in a reasonable time.

Sandy Longmuir: Yes—absolutely.

Neil Bibby: If an independent review is introduced and it reviews decisions, why will the Scottish ministers need to be involved in the process at all?

The Convener: I think that the answer is quite clear, but would anyone like to respond to that? Cleland Sneddon?

Neil Bibby: You mentioned earlier the difficulty that decisions could be seen as political.
Cleland Sneddon: I do not want to repeat myself ad nauseum, but I am clear that the issue is how this is articulated. Mr Longmuir mentioned that certain spurious grounds for appeal can be disregarded. It is important to set a reasonably high bar, and that comes from the earlier part of the process, where there will be a closer relationship between Education Scotland and the local authority to ensure that what goes into the public domain as part of the proposal is as robust as possible, that the consultation is carried out as robustly as possible and that, ultimately, the decision that the council makes is as well informed as possible.

If that is achieved, there will need to be a significant step up to occasion a referral to ministers. Very few cases should reach the far stage at which ministers accept that a call-in is due—rather than reverting the case back to the local authority to address matters that ministers believe to be outstanding—and the case goes to an independent referral mechanism. I might have the figures wrong, but I think that, so far, only nine out of 85 call-ins have been refused. The greater emphasis on the diligence around the earlier part of the process should reduce that figure further. I would expect only a handful to go on to an independent referral mechanism; not all potential requests for appeal will go straight to the independent referral mechanism.

The Convener: With all due respect, Mr Bibby’s question was: if there is an independent review panel, why do ministers have to be involved at all? You have explained the process and how it would be used rarely, but what is the point of ministerial involvement if there is an independent review panel?

Cleland Sneddon: Again, to go back to what I understand is being proposed, the ability to return a proposal to the local authority so that it can try to address the situation before a formal appeal is referred to an independent review mechanism means that very few proposals would get to that point in the process. I therefore think that there is a role for Scottish Government officials to work with local authorities to ensure that outstanding matters that can be cleared up relatively straightforwardly are not referred further on to use up time in an independent review mechanism.

Leslie Manson: The public always view a sequence of sifts or considerations as a more rigorous and thorough way of considering cases. Parents and communities will inevitably go to their national politician anyway. After all, you are the lawmakers, so cases are going to come your way one way or another. It therefore makes sense to introduce the additional sift.

I cannot remember the actual numbers but I think that, of the 85 closure proposals, 20 or 30 or so were called in—that is one sift—and a further nine were turned down. A series of sifts is a good thing, and cases will come to the national politicians anyway, so they should be part of the sift.

The Convener: To contradict the question that I just asked, if there was no Government involvement and decisions were all left to the independent review panel, someone would have to decide what got called in, and the people who called in a proposal would also have to review it. Is that not the problem? Is that not why ministers have to be involved? If ministers call in a proposal and then a separate independent review body makes the decision, I presume that that separates out the decision-making process.

Cleland Sneddon indicated agreement.

Malcolm Burr indicated agreement.

Sandy Longmuir indicated agreement.

Eileen Prior indicated agreement.

Leslie Manson indicated agreement.

The Convener: Let us move on. I am concerned about time and we have a few more areas to cover.

Liam McArthur: I will tee up Malcolm Burr to answer this question. The ADES evidence says specifically about call-ins that

“It is important that ministers’ thinking is as transparent and well documented as that of councils as this avoids perceptions of political prejudice.”

Notwithstanding what has been said about providing up-front support to ensure that the process operates as transparently and smoothly as possible, is there not a risk that there is no downside to a minister calling in a case because the minister does not have to adjudicate it? If we have an independent panel that has the expertise to adjudicate, would it not be in a position to determine whether there was a prima facie case and to call in that case once all the sifts, which we all agree are a sensible way of progressing, had been completed?

Malcolm Burr: That is an interesting point. Paragraph 38 of the Government’s response to the consultation says:

“However, the cases which have been called-in, which would be expected to be the most difficult cases, will continue to require to be called-in”, and paragraph 44 says that the review body would look at cases once they had been called in by ministers. Liam McArthur’s point is important. Just as there must be clarity about what the review body is to do, there must also be clarity around the decision-making process that ministers follow when calling in proposals in the first place. If that process is not sufficiently clear, there will be a risk of dispute and even legal action.

I suppose that there is an argument that the review body could consider the whole call-in process, but that would probably take us down an unhelpful route. There are two stages to the process, and I think that all that councils would ask is that the criteria for decisions to call in and what the review body would do are absolutely clear.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): I will ask about the proposal to expand Education Scotland’s role in the process. Given that Education Scotland already has a statutory duty to advise ministers, why is a specific duty to advise on school closures required?

Cleland Sneddon: I have mentioned that a couple of times. By its nature, the process of evaluating a case’s merits, and particularly its educational benefits, is largely subjective. Someone said to me recently that it is not like measuring the length of a piece of wood. We are looking to people with the appropriate credentials and the right professional knowledge and background to make an assessment and judgment.

Unfortunately, in the emotion that comes out when a proposal is being consulted on, our communities quite often spend literally thousands of hours trying to gather evidence to present on why a proposal does not demonstrate education benefit, while, on the authority side, education professionals present the case that it does. Ultimately, neither side will batter the other down by weight of opinion or rational logic. Communities look for someone independent to make an assessment on their behalf and give them confidence that what is said or proposed will deliver the benefits that are expected to be realised, or to say that, unfortunately, the proposal does not stack up.

Education Scotland appears to be uniquely placed to provide that role, but the proposal still comes with a series of caveats. Staff in Education Scotland who would be involved in the process would still apply their subjective and professional opinion, which would still be subject to challenge. The opinions of Education Scotland cannot in themselves be the subject of further appeal, otherwise there would be appeal on appeal on appeal.

I am quite encouraged by what I heard last Monday from an Education Scotland colleague, who was talking about their early thoughts on how they would deliver that role. Education Scotland has capacity issues and there may be a cost implication, but it is uniquely placed to provide an independent and individual assessment that would reassure communities, feed back to local authorities and provide guidance to ministers in considering the merits of a case.

Leslie Manson: There should be the sharp focus on educational benefit that there currently is. I am not sure whether I am pre-empting a subsequent question—by the silence, apparently I am not.

The Convener: It is not for me to say what members might or might not ask about, but if you want to answer a question in a specific way, you should go ahead.

Leslie Manson: When there is the sharp focus on educational benefit, which most professional educators would agree carries a level of subjectivity, it will be vital that Education Scotland plays a role in the process. The professionals in what was formerly known as Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Education are held in high regard by people across the educational community of Scotland and, I believe, by parents as well. Their role will be critical in evaluating educational benefit. We are talking about one school being better or poorer than another school.

However, the role of those professionals does not come without problems. Members of the committee may be aware that, in these post-Crerar review times of reduced scrutiny, the evaluations by inspectors and the reports that are issued for schools are less detailed than they were, and it has become quite difficult to compare one school against another just from the inspection reports, as we are talking about quite broad bands of quality that are described.

A potential problem with deploying Education Scotland expertise is that you still do not have an instrument that can objectively compare the quality of one school with that of another as accurately as the legislation seems to demand. One could also argue that, if Education Scotland’s role is also to support the production of a council’s educational benefits statement, this is another instance of a body being asked to help to produce a policy statement, or at least an evaluation statement, and then subsequently advising ministers on its merit.

Although Education Scotland’s involvement is inevitable and would be welcome, it has to be treated carefully. Indeed, I think that there will have to be some Chinese walls in the organisation to ensure that the individuals who are engaged in support roles are not those who subsequently advise ministers on the merits of a case.

Malcolm Burr: I echo those comments. Procedural safeguards will have to be put in place to protect Education Scotland’s independence in its multiple roles.
Clare Adamson's quite subtle question was about whether Education Scotland's assistance is actually required. I do not think that it is required, but it is probably helpful. Of course, ministers need to be confident in their decision making and will therefore need advice. I am not qualified to say whether that advice is best taken from their civil servants or Education Scotland, but if a community or an objector says that a council has gone wrong educationally ministers will certainly need help and advice to evaluate the arguments. As Mr Manson has said, Education Scotland's presence is inevitable and probably to be welcomed but there must be procedural safeguards around its involvement.

Eileen Prior: Parents' view of Education Scotland's role is very positive, with the health warning that we are a bit concerned about the slightly cut-and-paste nature of reports. However, as we have said in our submission, it is not independent. We might like to talk about it as being independent, but we have to be absolutely clear that it is not and there must be some clear dividing lines with regard to roles and functions. How that might be organised, I do not know, although I acknowledge Mr Manson's point about Chinese walls.

Given that the network of current and former folk in what was the inspectorate and what is now Education Scotland is wide and to be found almost everywhere you go in Scottish education, I have a wee bit of a reservation and hope that folk do not assume an independence that is not there.

Sandy Longmuir: Although parents with whom we communicate generally have great respect for Education Scotland and indeed will recognise their school in most of its inspection reports, we would say that it has not lived up to what was expected of it in the 2010 act. I am not sure what the exact reasons for that might be; in addition to a certain cut-and-paste element to the individual school reports produced under the act, Education Scotland seems reluctant to engage after the fact and after it has done its report. The fact is that proposals tend to develop throughout a consultation process and the ones that end up being voted on will not necessarily be exactly the same as those in relation to which Education Scotland inspected the schools. As I have said, it seems reluctant to come back into the process and it would be helpful if the bill could give it a role at that end of things.

Clare Adamson: In his submission, Mr Sneddon says that it is “critical” that the commission’s recommendation 20 is accepted. However, the Scottish Government has rejected that proposal, saying that “If implemented, this recommendation would weaken the central principle of the 2010 Act, that a local authority must be able to demonstrate educational benefits to children affected by a school closure.”

Why is it critical for recommendation 20 to be accepted?

Cleland Sneddon: That is probably the question to which Mr Manson alluded. Setting aside the argument that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities will put forward about a perceived joint agreement to enter into the commission process and abide by its findings, that issue is core. It goes back to the reasons for considering educational benefit. I saw in the papers the suggestion that considering how an authority uses its resources and the impact on all the children would be an argument that would be used to justify removing resources from rural communities generally. I do not hold with that at all.

I will give an example. I recently met a secondary school parent council that was concerned about the level of teaching resources available to the school and the impact on its subject choices. I was asked why the authority was unable to provide the expected level of staffing resources in the school, given that other authorities were able to do so. My straightforward answer was that, for an equivalent population, an urban authority reasonably close to me runs 20 primary schools while I run 78, some of which have only three, four, six or eight pupils.

As others have mentioned, it is extremely difficult to compare schools directly, particularly when we are looking at Education Scotland reports that might be five or six years old. The quality of the relationship and quality of the teaching staff are the biggest determinants of the quality of a child's education. However, in schools with only one or two teachers, if one staff member leaves—if they move to another area, for example—the quality of education can change significantly.

To magnify small-scale educational benefits falsely, as the existing legislation has often prompted authorities to do, is not helpful; it is divisive and means that communities and authorities are more often in confrontation. A much more holistic view of how we use our resources to benefit all children is needed. Authorities such as mine have very few schools that are not rural, so it is not a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul.

Clare Adamson: Given the proposals to expand Education Scotland’s role, what interaction, if any, do you foresee that body having with the school closure review body?

Eileen Prior: I do not see it having any role other than simply providing documentation. Any review body must operate independently, so it would have no advisory role. Its role would be simply to provide required documents and evidence.

Malcolm Burr: Procedurally, the review body will first look at whether the process has been correctly followed and whether there is sufficient evidence to show that the merits of the case have been made, in the sense that questions have been answered, that the considerations are relevant and so on. I cannot imagine the review body needing further specialist advice on educational matters.

Neil Bibby: If Education Scotland is preparing a statement but is also advising the review body, surely that would be a conflict of interest.

Malcolm Burr: Potentially, yes. We covered that issue in an earlier answer. Some thought must be given to the procedures, in order to protect Education Scotland and everyone else involved.

Liam McArthur: I was interested in Sandy Longmuir’s comment about Education Scotland’s unwillingness to come back in later on in the process. Leslie Manson mentioned that a council always needs to have the status quo as an option in its considerations and also referred to a status quo-plus option. In order to deliver a status quo-plus option, will Education Scotland’s support and advice on that not be critical?

Leslie Manson: In my view, the likelihood of the status quo being retained is more to do with the place of a school in the wider community and its role as a community asset that brings people together by virtue of the activities that take place there and the accommodation that is to be found there. It is those community arguments that are most likely to prevail in retaining the status quo, rather than the notion that every other potential receiving school is a poor school.

It is not my experience that a single authority has a huge variation across its schools. As Graham Donaldson loves to say, the variation in educational provision is greater within schools than across schools. I would issue one caveat to that, to reiterate the point that Cleland Sneddon made. In very small schools—rural schools are predominantly small schools—the teaching workforce is the single key determinant of quality. With only two or three teachers, each teacher sees young children for two or three years, and if you have a poor teacher for two or three years—I believe me, there are some poor teachers—you will get poor-quality education and any of the neighbouring receiving schools would probably be an improvement.

I cannot stress enough how significant the consideration of recommendation 20 is for educational professionals. If you take five parents from the same school catchment area and ask them what they value about their school, you will get five different answers. One will say that it is attainment in English and maths, the next will say that it is the expertise of the school sports teams and the Christmas concert, and others will talk about class sizes, or about how their child with additional support needs is wonderfully integrated. There will be so many different descriptions of quality that it will be virtually impossible to form an objective comparison of the quality of that school with the quality of neighbouring schools.

Liam McArthur: I should have declared an interest as the parent of a child at a school under threat of closure—it was two children, but now it is just one child. For the avoidance of doubt, I put that on the record, and I echo Leslie Manson’s comments about the importance of the quality of teaching and the wider community function of schools.

In relation to recommendation 20, is there any way, in your view, that financial considerations can be separated from the process of arriving at a decision on educational benefit?

Malcolm Burr: The commission of which I was a member debated that long and hard. It was one of our more difficult decisions. On the financial point, we took into account the fact that councils have to strike a balance and that they are elected politically to make difficult decisions about the allocation of resources, and schools legitimately form part of that consideration. However, the commission was clear that the primary reason for considering school closures must be about educational quality—not benefit, but quality.

That that should be the primary factor is more than just a subtlety. As has been eloquently said, demonstrating educational benefit can be hard. In an area such as mine in Orkney, pupils are usually transferring from a good or very good school to another good or very good school, and in inspection terms one is looking at such things as peer group interaction and supported learning among pupils, simply because numbers are so small. Is that a better educational environment? I am certainly not qualified to say, but it is a better educational social environment, and an authority should have to show that it has primarily considered those factors.

To return to your question, finance has to be a factor in today’s climate, but it should not be the primary factor.

Sandy Longmuir: No matter what anybody says, finance has always been considered. Of all the proposals that I have been involved in, and there have been well over 100, I cannot think of one in which finance was not critical to the proposal paper. To say that it is not involved, never has been or would not be in the future is simply wrong.

On educational benefit, the figures that are out today show that Scotland and the United Kingdom are generally falling further and further behind, or at least not keeping up with, other countries in Europe and Asia in how we develop education. The Standards in Scotland’s Schools etc Act 2000 introduced the requirement that any action that the Scottish ministers and local authorities take should improve education. I take on board the point that, for some schools and some proposals, the benefit may be marginal, whether it is the development of education or the provision of a very similar standard of education. In a lot of instances that may be the case. However, we have seen proposals in which financial savings have been made predominantly by paying off teachers.

Seventy per cent of a primary school’s staff are teaching staff. Even considering additional transport costs, the loss of revenue grant and so on, the financial savings generally come from the removal of staff, predominantly teachers. Are we saying that the removal of teachers produces an educational benefit? If so, surely, losing even more teachers would produce a greater educational benefit. Educational benefit has always been part of the consideration, and the Standards in Scotland’s Schools etc Act 2000 would have to be repealed to change that.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): My question follows on from Sandy Longmuir’s point and concerns financial information on school closures. A lot of stakeholders supported the proposal to amend the 2010 act to make it clear that relevant financial information should be included in a school closure consultation, but some submissions from local authorities have suggested that they should not have to submit all the financial details because some of those could be, for example, commercially confidential. What is your view about the perceived difficulties in ensuring consistent treatment of financial information across different local authorities? How might those difficulties be resolved?

Cleland Sneddon: For the committee’s purposes, I will give a quick illustration. There is a short answer to your question. A piece of work is being undertaken by the Scottish Government, COSLA and ADES to produce a standard financial template and guidance. I cannot think of a circumstance in which a local authority would not want to present full and accurate information. If there is commercial confidentiality, the information can still be included but it needs to be grouped in such a way that no confidence is breached. That work is well advanced and, once it is concluded, it will remove any arguments because there will be consistency and every local authority will present its financial information in the same way. There is also an argument that, to avoid further disputes in other areas, a standard template for proposal documents in the wider sense could assist.

Malcolm Burr: I think that the way forward is a template that local authorities and everyone can agree presents the financial information as well and as consistently as possible. I cannot envisage circumstances in which commercial contracts would override the provision to parents and communities of information on the true cost of a school.

The area is complicated—I will not take up the committee’s time with the detail—and it is different for each local authority. My local authority is a beneficiary of the floor mechanism. If we were to lose grant-aided expenditure for a rural school, that would affect my council differently from how it would affect a council that is not a beneficiary of the floor mechanism, and that has to be factored in. There will always be comments on the template, but the way forward is an agreed and consistent mechanism and there is a means for producing that.

Sandy Longmuir: We have not seen the template, but the comments that we have read about it suggest that it seems to be a good attempt at getting something that we would agree to. Among the comments from people who have seen the template, one of the comments in response to the consultation was that things such as redundancy costs should not be included because they come from a central pool. That typifies the mindset that we come up against all the time. That comment came from the same authority that said that the receiving school would require two extra teachers but they would not cost anything because they came from a central pool. Because the authority had free teachers, it did not include them in the cost of the closure. That is the kind of thing that we come up against all the time. We need a standard template that removes that kind of nonsense from the process.

Joan McAlpine: I take it from what you are saying that a lot of the financial information that was provided in the past was inadequate.

Sandy Longmuir: Absolutely. The single biggest failing that we have come across is in the financial arguments that have been made.

It is interesting that local authorities have been saying in the past few weeks that they have had to embellish the education argument—I am not sure if that phrase was used—because the onus is on them to show an educational benefit that they cannot really show. Therefore, they have had to go further, which has brought in contention.
There is also an element of that in the financial arguments. Councils have to show a saving. Sometimes there has been a lack of care and basic mistakes have been made. In one case in Roy Bridge in Highland, a column of figures had not been added up correctly. It took us six months to get the council to agree that the figures did not add up. Any nine-year-old kid with a pocket calculator could have added up the numbers and seen that the figure was wrong, but the council simply would not admit it. We see more errors in that area than in anything else.

Liam McArthur: Cleland Sneddon talked about COSLA, ADES and the Scottish Government agreeing the template. I assume that the network will be invited to comment before the template is concluded and agreed. Is that a fair assumption?

Cleland Sneddon: I am not part of that piece of work. I would assume that appropriate stakeholders, which might include the network, would be consulted—it would be subject to wider consultation. I know that a piece of work was done, which had limited circulation, and some comments came in from various authorities. It is in all our interests to have the most robust template. As I said earlier, it might be a good blueprint to have a wider template that includes the full presentation of information, not just financial information.

The Convener: Can you confirm that, Leslie, given that you represent ADES?

Leslie Manson: Yes—although like Cleland Sneddon, I do not know what COSLA’s intentions are. I have seen the famous template; it is starting to assume some spy connotations. It is just a series of headings that would require each council to separate out the known cost of any proposal and set them out in a matrix. That way, people would be familiar with the context and would see that there was comparability from one school to another and from one authority to another. It is just to regularise things.

I have a background in maths, so I can count, but when it comes to some of the byzantine calculations on grant-aided expenditure in particular and how they relate to the provision of rural schools, I think that there are only two people on the planet who understand them and one of them is sitting on my right.

From discussions that I have had across ADES, I do not believe that education authorities have acted in anything other than good faith. The whole process has led to a wider and deeper understanding. It is not complete by any means; we still have some way to go to understand GAE.

No one would want to try to fox or mislead the public about something as objective as numbers. However, all councils present their accounts in different ways, so they are not always clear to the educationists who are leading on these proposals. We do not always understand or get the information from our finance departments. They do not always know that there is a problem that we need the solution to.

Only good will come out of standardisation. I believe that there will be more transparency and better understanding in future.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): One area in which there does not seem to be unanimity is the question of the five-year moratorium, whereby a council would not be able to revisit for five years any decision on a closure. I would be interested to hear the panel’s comments on that.

Leslie Manson: I have the pleasure of living and working in the community where I was born. I have direct experience of closing and amalgamating schools. I have seen what it feels like, because I have done it over a number of years. Even before the moratorium I was engaged in some similar proposals, one of which relates to Liam McArthur’s personal circumstances.

I assure you that the angst, fear and upset caused to communities by a proposal are well known to me and—I dare say—most of my professional colleagues. It is not something that we would wish to visit lightly on any community, any parent group or, for that matter, any school; it is very much a matter of last resort. It destabilises a community; ironically, it also brings a community together. If you want to bring together a disparate community, all you have to do is threaten their school and they will gel very quickly. All the same, you cannot impose on your neighbours and members of the community a constant merry-go-round of closure proposals, because that would be inhumane.

I understand that the intention behind the moratorium was to ensure that no single council made the same proposal about the same school during its lifetime and that only a fresh council could reconsider any proposal on a specific school. Nevertheless, five years is a long time for a small school. We could be talking about a school with three children from two families. What happens if the family with two children leave? The situation might be completely unsustainable and in no one’s best interests. The family that is left in the area might insist that the school be kept open for the one child, even though they might get a much better educational experience 3 miles or 5 miles down the road. To saddle a child, a family or indeed an education authority with that as an untouchable scenario—

The Convener: I am sorry but I must interrupt, because I am slightly puzzled by the latter parts of your response. The Scottish Government proposal makes it quite clear that, in exceptional circumstances, the position can be reviewed earlier than the five years. If the exceptional circumstances that you have suggested can be dealt with, I do not see the problem that you are painting.

Leslie Manson: In that case, I will refer the question to one of my colleagues.

Sandy Longmuir: I absolutely agree. The provision allows for such exceptional circumstances. However, schools have been threatened repeatedly—indeed, some have been threatened three or four times in 10 years—and Leslie Manson is right to say that the situation is inhumane and destabilising. Eventually, people who are passionate about their community and school get battle-weary and simply give up.

Again, we do not want to be overly prescriptive and say that a school that everyone has left must be kept open. Cabrach, for example, was repeatedly threatened with closure; because of a radon gas issue, the roll had dropped to a remarkably low level. As we would have considered such circumstances to be exceptional, we would not have stood in the way of the council’s closing the school. Nevertheless, from our experience of schools that have been repeatedly threatened with closure, schools need to be left with some kind of stability and assurance. For example, the five-year moratorium on Inveravon in Moray has just ended, and the whole community continually feels that it will always be first in line and next on the list. Despite the fact that the school is fantastic and that HMIE report after HMIE report has been exceptional, a number of parents in the catchment area simply refuse to send their children to it, regardless of how exceptional it is, because of the perception that it will be closed at the next possible opportunity.

Eileen Prior: For exactly that reason, such threats become a self-fulfilling prophecy. Parents say, “Well, I’m not going to send my kids there because it’s going to close in three, four or five years and their education will be disrupted. I’ll just make the decision now”; as a result, the school loses not only one child but the whole family and ends up with no kids at all. A five-year moratorium is a sound plan.

Malcolm Burr: I feel that five years is simply too long. My council’s submission recommends three years, because there can be substantial changes to a school in that length of time. A competent council would look at that point in time and at the number of zero to five-year-olds in the population. In my area one school was left with four pupils, all of whom were placing requests, and there was no one from the catchment area and no one coming up. The question could be asked whether that is truly a local school. A five-year moratorium is a little bit too long, given the current financial circumstances and the radical changes that can happen with rolls in very small schools. However, I appreciate that there should be some provision for exceptional circumstances.

The Convener: Colin Beattie has a supplementary question; it will be the final one, Colin, if you do not mind.

Colin Beattie: We have talked about significant changes. Would changes in financial circumstances be valid? Some say yes and some say no. If they would be valid, would a reduction in public sector funding be considered to be a significant reason to revisit?

Cleland Sneddon: Yes. If local authorities in Scotland experience the reductions in grant that our colleagues down south have experienced, and there is very little run-in time, the entire local government budget will inevitably come under scrutiny. To tie a bow around approximately half of a local authority’s expenditure and say that it cannot be touched impacts disproportionately on care for our elderly people, our children and family services, our roads infrastructure, and so on. It is simply an unacceptable level of disproportionate pressure on part of the council’s budget.

We need to be clear about what we mean by exceptional circumstances. If the wording is left as broad and woolly as “in exceptional circumstances”, that will give rise to the potential manipulation of, or challenge to, those words. We should be quite clear about what the exceptional circumstances are, so that we do not get into a broad argument about whether they apply.

I have one quick point to add to the comments about the exceptional circumstances that would have to be in place. Our communities cannot be exposed to being battered down by repetitive consultations to such an extent that they are always ready and ripe for a school closure. Equally, we must recognise that most of the schools that are being considered for a school merger or closure, whatever term we want to use, are being considered because of their current roll and roll projections. The presence of a school is not necessarily enough to prevent a community’s decline or changes in its make-up, but many communities that do not have a school are expanding and thriving. We need to come to a much broader understanding of what makes a community and where a school sits within it as one of a number of community assets. We also need clarity around what exceptional circumstances are.

The Convener: I should really move on, unless Sandy Longmuir can be extremely brief.
Sandy Longmuir: What are we talking about here? The question about the financial aspect sounded like it is make or break for Scotland’s financial future. We have already agreed that only a small number of schools will go to call-in; we are talking about one, two or three schools a year, or perhaps even fewer, that could be reprieved from closure. We are not talking about a make-or-break situation for council finances.

The Convener: Thank you. A number of questions are left; I will try to squeeze them in in two minutes.

Liam McArthur: In Orkney, as Leslie Manson will know, a secondary department has been mothballed, as has another school on another island. Is the panel satisfied that the rules around mothballing and where we would mothball as opposed to closing a school are satisfactorily understood, not least in terms of what it would take to trigger a de-mothballing? Is mothballing considered as a soft option compared to closure?

Leslie Manson: As Liam McArthur said, we have two schools that are mothballed. Parents would much rather have a school open, but they prefer mothballing to the school definitively being closed. It is relatively easy for the authority to reopen a mothballed school if pupil numbers demand it, and it also offers the community hope in that, if pupils move in, the school is there for the future.

The Convener: Is that a genuine view? It seems odd. I take Liam McArthur’s point. Is that an option that councils could use to get round the purpose of the 2010 act?

Leslie Manson: I dare say that the option could be taken cynically, but our council has articulated the conditions under which the school would reopen, and it has done so in numerical terms. It is a logistical combination of a number of pupils coming from a number of families who think that it would be viable and preferable to reopen the school, so there is an objective benchmark that the community is aware of and professes itself to be happy with.

Sandy Longmuir: It has happened. The school at Altnaharra in Highland reopened after a period of mothballing. That was due to economic development; I think that a logging plant was opened in the area. The nearest school was about 27 miles away. One of the island schools in Shetland was also mothballed and it reopened when people moved to the island.

The option should be there. It might depend on who uses it. There is a perception that, in some cases, it might be used to get round the 2010 act, but we are reassured by people such as Leslie Manson, who are using it in an open and honest way.

Cleland Sneddon: I will be very brief—

The Convener: Please be even quicker than that, if you can manage it.

Cleland Sneddon: Okay. I had a school that was mothballed for two years because it had no pupils. Two sets of parents approached me as they wanted to enrol four children, and the request met the criteria. I had some serious discussions about the benefits for their children of our reopening the school, but they were adamant that we were going to do that. We eventually reopened it, so I now have another school with four pupils in it. I do not think that the option is a way round the 2010 act. It is a reality. That was part way through the moratorium, which shows the impact.

The Convener: Thank you. The final question comes from Neil Bibby.

Neil Bibby: Are there likely to be any cost implications for your organisations associated with the Scottish Government’s proposed amendments to the 2010 act?

The Convener: I ask each of the panellists to respond.

Cleland Sneddon: There are no obvious implications.

Leslie Manson: Not at the moment.

Malcolm Burr: There are none that are immediately obvious.

Eileen Prior: No.

Sandy Longmuir: No.

The Convener: That was painless.

Thank you all very much for coming along today. The area that we have discussed is an important aspect of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, which will eventually become an act, and we were keen to hear your views. Thank you for both the written submissions that we received and your time today.

Meeting suspended.
On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome to the meeting the Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning, Michael Russell, and the Scottish Government officials Clare Morley and Lorraine Stirling. I invite the cabinet secretary to make some opening remarks before we move to questions.

The Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning (Michael Russell): Thank you very much, convener.

I will start with an obvious statement: closing any school is a difficult decision and communities deserve—and, indeed, demand—clarity on how the process will operate and to have a voice in decision making. The whole purpose of the original legislation—and of our proposed amendments to it—was to create a level playing field so that, even if they did not agree, both sides felt that they had been fairly treated.

This is the second time in recent years that we have looked at the legislation on the issue in detail. The Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010, which was passed unanimously by the Parliament, updated and strengthened consultation procedures for school closures and other significant proposals that affect schools. It was preceded by Murdo Fraser’s proposed member’s bill.

However, there were early concerns about how the act operated in rural areas and the commission on the delivery of rural education was set up jointly by the Scottish Government and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities in 2011 to address those issues. The commission reported in April 2013 and the Government has accepted 37 of the commission’s 38 recommendations. We intend to bring forward amendments at stage 2 to implement recommendations of the commission. In my view, those amendments will improve the consultation and determination process for school closures.

Although the commission concentrated on rural education, the majority of amendments will apply to the process for all school closure proposals. I am committed to continuous improvement in education in Scotland, and I am sure that that is the committee’s position, too. I believe that a school estate that fits the needs of communities in the 21st century has a key part to play in that, but a school closure has a significant disruptive effect on pupils and communities, so I could not support a proposal going ahead without an expectation that that difficult process would lead to educational benefit. It is important to recognise that other factors, such as the impact that a school closure would have on a rural community, are also in play.

As the committee knows, over the summer the Government consulted on making amendments to the act in six policy areas: the presumption against closure of a rural school; the provision of financial information on closure proposals; the clarification and expansion of Education Scotland’s role; the basis for determining school closure proposals; the establishment of an independent referral mechanism; and a five-year moratorium between closure proposals for the same school. The consultation received 226 responses. Respondents supported most aspects of the Government’s proposals. Our response to the consultation, which was published on 18 November—and supplied to the convener and, I think, to committee members—confirmed that we planned to take all the proposals forward. I will be happy to talk about how we intend to do so.

I should stress that the amendments will be lodged in plenty of time for the committee’s stage 2 consideration and that I am open to discussion about suggested improvements to amendments, as I always believe that that is a useful part of the parliamentary process.

The Convener: Thank you very much, cabinet secretary. We will move straight to questions, if you do not mind. We begin with Liz Smith.

Liz Smith: There has been a difference of opinion in the written submissions that we have received and in the evidence that we took earlier this morning about the use of the term “presumption”. I think that we all agreed in 2010 that it was not necessary to put it into the legislation, but we have come across a situation that suggests that we might have got that wrong. Can you put on record exactly why you believe that clarity on that would improve the whole set-up?

Michael Russell: Yes. I think that there are two parts to that. The first is the opinion of the courts. We are here today for a variety of reasons, one of which is the court action that Comhairle nan Eilean Siar brought regarding closures in its area. The testing of legislation in court is a normal enough process—it is not frequent, but it happens. One thing that has arisen as a result of that court action is the belief of the courts that the presumption is not present in the legislation. All of us who voted on the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Bill believed that the presumption against closure was in it. It was not an issue that received significant attention during the debate on the bill, because it was believed that that presumption was in there. It is not in there, so we must make the position clearer, if that was the legislative intention of Parliament. First, we need to do that because it is the view of the courts that the presumption is not present in the legislation.
Secondly, the way in which closures happen and the idea behind them should be quite clear. What should happen is that local authorities should tell themselves, when considering rural school closures, that there are special, defined issues to be considered and they must ask themselves whether those issues have been properly considered before the closure process kicks in. We need to be clear about what those special issues are. I am entirely open to improving that process and we will bring forward our ideas about how that should happen. If the committee or other people have other ideas about how to improve the process, let us debate them.

Liz Smith: It has been put to us that there is a difference of opinion. On the one hand, it is argued that raising the bar will ensure that there is greater confidence in the system and will make people provide much more accurate information. The other opinion, which was put to us this morning, is that it is only possibly useful to have the presumption against closure in the legislation; in other words, it will not give any added value, or it would be difficult to distinguish what that added value is. So the committee has two very different opinions to consider. Is it correct that the Scottish Government believes that by putting a presumption against closure in the act with such clarity we will be able to be certain of more information that is directly relevant to any situation of potential closure?

Michael Russell: That may be an outcome, but I am not sure that it is the intention. I am long enough in the tooth to have marched for the right to have a presumption against rural school closures. That wording came not from the Scottish debate but from the debates about school closures in England in the 1990s. When there was an early round of school closures in Argyll—some of which I was involved in as a member of the education committee in 1999 to 2000, although I was not a member for Argyll then—one of the issues was about finding a way in which a presumption against closure could be made available in Scotland to prevent the closure of schools in those special circumstances.

Stating that we wanted to achieve that in the bill is one thing. How you achieve it is the second thing. What we thought we were doing was ensuring that local authorities must consider—I use the words “must consider” deliberately—a viable alternative to closure, the likely community impact, and the likely impact of changes in travelling arrangements. Those were seen as particularly important in rural school closures. That is the bit of the change that applies only to rural schools.

From the opinion of the courts, it does not look as if that is yet firmly enough within the bill, so we are putting it in place and that is what will be there. The effect of that amendment may also be what Liz Smith has mentioned in relation to improved information, although that is dealt with in further amendments, particularly on financial information and on the issue of templates for financial information, where there has been a need to standardise that information.

I am probably teasing out two different things. One concerns the special circumstances that need to be considered before the process kicks in: the alternatives, the likely community impact, and the likely impact on travelling. Perhaps, further down the road, if a closure is to go ahead—presumably, it will be decided in some cases, having considered those circumstances, that a closure will not go ahead—improvements can be made to that information, particularly on those issues.

Liz Smith: Have you have changed your mind, as we have, since 2010—when we did not want that word in the act, although now we do—because there has been too much misinterpretation of the existing legislation?

Michael Russell: I am not sure. I was not the minister who took the bill through, so I am not entirely sure what happened at that stage. I do not think that minds have been changed. What was intended has not been achieved, so we want to make that change, assuming that the Parliament agrees. I am open to the issue of the words themselves. There were legal reasons why it seemed undesirable to have specific wording last time, and I have asked that the issue continue to be considered. It is quite difficult, because the interpretation of the words “presumption against closure” might be even more difficult, but I am open to that. Indeed, if those words are not in our amendment when we lodge it, I will be quite willing to say at that stage why they are not in there.

The Convener: Can I clarify an issue that was raised this morning? It was suggested that including a presumption against closure would raise an unrealistic expectation among members of the public. What is your view on that?

Michael Russell: I do not think that that is true. The presumption against closure says that the existence of rural schools is important and special because of what they provide educationally and to the community. Before a decision is taken to close a rural school, there should be a moment at which people say, “Stop. This is important and special. Are we to proceed?” That helps local authorities to make a decision, but nothing in the legislation says that schools do not close. As somebody who has been deeply involved in this issue for a long time, I have never said that every school is sacrosanct. I believe that schools close themselves and that we get to a stage at which a community is too small. There have been occasions when communities have said, “The closure of the school that serves us is a necessary step for us to get better educational services.” I can think of a couple of occasions on which that has happened.

What should not happen is that we subscribe to the fallacy that closing schools automatically leads to educational progress. To me, that seems axiomatic, though some people seem to believe it. In addition, we should be enormously sceptical about some of the figures that have been bandied around during school closure processes because they almost invariably turn out not to be true.

Liam McArthur: You have been fairly candid on the thinking that has been going on in Government around putting the presumption word into legislation. What we heard this morning is that, although the Parliament holds that presumption—it was clearly stated during a previous debate—it is expressed by the achievement of particular criteria in the process. Some on the earlier panel said that looking again at those criteria and ensuring that they give effect to that presumption may be a better way of achieving it than sticking the word in the legislation.

Michael Russell: That is distinctly possible. I do not want to rule out either of those approaches or even a hybrid approach. The drafting is not finished.

Equally, were we to come with a draft that the committee wished to see improved, I would be open—as I always am between stages 2 and 3—to discussing that further.

The Government’s intention would be to be true to the Parliament’s unanimous intention, were it to say that there should be expressed in legislation in some way a presumption against closure. That would in effect mean that rural schools have a special and important nature that requires them to be considered in a special way.

The Convener: Just for absolute clarity, what is the fundamental difference between having special regard to certain factors and having a presumption against closure?

Michael Russell: I would call a presumption a stronger measure, which underlies policy. Although I am happy to have that conversation with you, convener, my immediate reaction would be to say that presumption is a stronger thing, which expresses a policy intent. We would regard—and I would hope that Scotland regards—the provision of rural education as important, not just for educational reasons, though that is good enough, but in terms of the way in which we sustain and support often fragile rural communities.

Jayne Baxter: The Court of Session found that the 2010 act requires the Scottish ministers to consider the merits of a school closure proposal as well as the process undertaken. All those responding to the consultation on amendments supported the consideration of merits by the Scottish ministers. What level of merit consideration would it be appropriate for ministers to pursue?

Michael Russell: Thank you for the question. This is an interesting and important part of the change. As the original 2010 act was negotiated and discussed with the various stakeholders, there was a strong view that it should not second-guess local authorities and their decision-making process. I hesitate to suggest that local authorities would have been anything but happy and would not have agreed to that. The idea was that they should not be second-guessed.

What the courts have said goes somewhat further than anybody had anticipated. I understand the concept of merit to be one that expresses what one would expect a reasonable decision to be—reasonable decision-making. A reasonable decision based upon the evidence in front of you would seem to be the limit of the merit argument. In other words, in addition to observing the process that has taken place, there should be some judgment as to whether reasonable people within a local authority would make that decision based upon the evidence that they have. I think that is where the merit argument extends to. I do not see it extending any further than that. It is absolutely not the role of Government to retake that decision. In those circumstances, it would be the wrong thing to happen.

Jayne Baxter: Are you happy with the proposal to remit closure decisions back to the local authorities?

Michael Russell: Remitting a closure decision back to the local authority could be an effective tool that adds to the number of tools that are available, which are closure, no closure, and closure or no closure with conditions. It might therefore be a reasonable and useful thing to do, and I think that the commission is right in that regard.

You have given me an opportunity to stress that I am grateful to David Sutherland and the entire commission, which has done a very good job. We have accepted 37 out of 38 of their recommendations—virtually everything that was said—which is a high average. Some years ago, I served as a member of the Arbuthnott commission, from which probably only one or two of our recommendations were accepted.
Neil Bibby: I am looking for some information on the independent referral mechanism proposals, cabinet secretary. Who will appoint members of the independent review body? To whom will they be accountable? How will you ensure political independence?

Michael Russell: I think that that issue will be much clearer for everybody when the amendments are published. We are still working on that idea.

There are a number of possibilities. We want the process to be simple, not expensive, transparent and open. Those are the principles that we are applying.

Broadly speaking, there are three choices. I will not commit myself to any of those choices now, because we still want to be absolutely confident that we have made the right choice. It will then be up to Mr Bibby or anybody else to propose amendments to suggest other choices. We can have a useful discussion about that.

In essence, we could put in place our own tribunal system, go for arbitration with the Scottish arbitration service, or perhaps find a cheaper and more effective hybrid of the two.

On accountability, I would expect the minister to appoint the key individual chair or whatever and to have a process for appointing anybody else who is involved. The process should be able to operate entirely independently and very simply; I do not see it involving vast numbers of lawyers or vast expense. Things should be reviewable, but only on points of law. That would require a review by the sheriff on a point of law, which is much simpler. I would like to avoid a rerun of the recent court case that left some schools sitting with insecurity for a very long time.

It would be helpful if two things happened at the final stage of the process: it was seen to be impartial, independent and non-political; and it was approachable on at least one occasion by schools or communities that are involved. To wrap all that up, I want a simple, transparent and clear process that does not take too long, is at arm’s length from the Government, and gives the public confidence. That will be encapsulated in the final amendment that is lodged.

Neil Bibby: You mentioned cost. Will the body be paid? If so, by whom?

Michael Russell: I do not know that yet, but that is an option. If the labourer is worthy of his hire, you would not want me not to pay him for his work. If the body is paid, it will be paid in exactly the same way that people who sit on any independent body or tribunal are paid, but the people involved will not be accountable to ministers because of that payment.

Neil Bibby: If local authorities wished to appeal against the independent referral mechanism's decision would there be any opportunity for them to do that?

Michael Russell: As I have indicated, we should have a simple and clear process that does not run on for ever, so the intention at present is to have appeals on points of law only to the sheriff court.

Liam McArthur: Cabinet secretary, we heard quite a bit of support from across the first panel for a phased filtering process in the front-end support and advice to councils on issues that they may have in any closure programme, and I think that we can all understand that. At the back end of the process, the ability to appeal to an independent referral mechanism also commanded support. However, I am not sure that I entirely understand the rationale for ministers having a call-in power to refer a closure to the independent referral panel.

Why do we need that intervention from the minister, rather than the referral panel looking at the prima facie evidence and suggesting that the closure is one on which it requires to take a view? I say that not least because ADES emphasised in its submission the importance of ministers' thinking about call-in being transparent and well documented to avoid perceptions of political prejudice. Having gone to the trouble of setting up an independent referral panel, why would you still seek to have a call-in process to ministers, who will not ultimately make the decision?

Michael Russell: There are three parts to this. If you will allow me, I will work my way through them. First, one of the failures of the current legislation—I am sure that ADES and local authorities will have reflected on this—is that more proposals have been called in than anybody thought would be the case. Why is that? I do not think that it is a result of political interference, although that accusation has been made; I think that there are a number of reasons for it. The first step is to give Education Scotland a clearer role at that stage to advise both ministers and local authorities and to build communities' confidence in its impartiality. Proposed amendments deal with that part of the process, and I think that it is broadly agreed that we should do that.

Let us assume that that works. If it does, the number of call-ins will fall quite substantially. At the other end of the process, the number of call-ins that result in a closure decision that can be appealed will be commensurately smaller. We hope that those circumstances arise in only a very small number of cases.

Sitting in the middle is democratic accountability for the process of the legislation. The Parliament has passed the legislation and it wants to ensure, through the duly elected Scottish Government, that priority is given to rural schools and that the school closure process is fair and takes place on a level playing field. Provided that there is clear enough guidance on the reasons for a call-in—we are now back to the process and merit issues—there is a democratic place for the minister, or for the Scottish ministers collectively.

Remember that the idea of the tribunal was not in the commission’s report. I felt that to inject even further confidence in the process—and to remove the possibility of the accusation being made that the final decision was a political one—we should have the tribunal in place. If you were to take the minister out of that three-part process entirely, the democratic accountability would be missing and the way in which the balance is struck would be damaged.

It is open to Liam McArthur to lodge amendments to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill to amend the 2010 act. I will seriously think about Mr McArthur’s suggestions—as I always do—because I can see where you are coming from. I still think that there is a place for such accountability and I want to preserve its place, but I am not saying that I will not think about the point that you have made, which is one that I have heard from one or two individuals.

Liam McArthur: I appreciate that response. The concern would be that, notwithstanding the assistance that is provided earlier in the process, which I hope will result in fewer cases progressing to the point of requiring to be considered for call-in, there is no disincentive on whoever is in the role of cabinet secretary to call in the proposed closure, knowing that the decision will then be taken by an independent referral panel. I cannot see that the process would necessarily satisfy the criterion of democratic legitimacy, because it would become a bit of a postbox exercise, which ultimately will inevitably lead to the independent referral panel having to sit and consider the closure decision.

Michael Russell: If you look at it in another way—it is perhaps important to remember this—the first decision to close is made by elected politicians and the second decision on the call-in will be made by an elected politician. We remove elected politicians from the process only at the end, when the final choice is being made. That is not an illogical way of looking at the process.

There are legal tests for a call-in decision. One of the issues that Comhairle nan Eilean Siar was involved in was the challenge to the decision to call in, as well as other decisions. Legal tests seem appropriate for a minister; we might not have those legal tests for an independent tribunal. I am willing to consider Liam McArthur’s point, but I think that there are arguments for our proposal.

Clare Adamson: I would like to ask about the proposals to expand the role of Education Scotland. Given that Education Scotland already has a statutory duty to advise ministers, why is a specific duty to advise on school closures required?

Michael Russell: A specific duty is required because we are dealing with a range of issues to build confidence in the legislation and the process. COSLA has told me that local authorities wish to see a strengthening and clarification of the Education Scotland process. I want to see more confidence in all parties—there are a number of parties to decisions in the Education Scotland process. We want legislation that is even more transparent and appropriate, and advice is crucial to that, so in a sense I want to shine a spotlight on Education Scotland’s role, so that it is able to provide advice to the best of its ability.

The number of cases coming through is not enormous, so this is not a huge additional burden, although obviously we will discuss with Education Scotland what resource is required. Education Scotland will be in a better position to be fair to everybody if we clarify it in the bill. Local authorities believe—and I think that they may be right—that if the time and effort spent by Education Scotland is increased and there is clarity, we will have fewer call-ins.

Clare Adamson: How will Education Scotland’s independence and objectivity be maintained, given that it may have been given help to develop a case for a school closure and will then be in the position of writing a report on that to advise you? Witnesses this morning talked about Chinese walls in Education Scotland to keep that advice independent. Is that how you envisage the process?

Michael Russell: Education Scotland will not be involved in writing any individual educational benefit statements. That is not what it does. It will give advice about what a good educational benefit statement is; in other words, how clear it should be and the information that is required to be in it. It is not a player in each individual local authority decision, nor should it be.

If Chinese walls were necessary, they would be there, but there are two different roles, and Education Scotland does not fulfil the role that you asked about.

Clare Adamson: You have mentioned that you do not see the resource implications as being a significant burden at this stage, which is welcome. Do you envisage that there would be any interaction between Education Scotland and the school closures review body?
Michael Russell: I would expect there to be. I would expect the review body or the assessment body to have access to Education Scotland information. A question for the review body is what additional information it would wish, seek or could have. By the time a position is reached, a lot of information has been gone through. There are a lot of things involved that are thought through very carefully. The Scottish ministers will have had advice from Education Scotland and the local authority will know the education advice. If there are circumstances in which it is appropriate for that to continue, I see no bar to that.

I want the review body to be very transparent, so they should say what information they are seeking and what information they have had. Nothing in that process should be secret—not at that stage.

The Convener: You mentioned that you are trying to keep costs to an absolute minimum. Are there any resource implications for Education Scotland in taking on the additional duties?

Michael Russell: There will be small resource implications for Education Scotland, but I do not think that they are significant. I think that we are talking about one person or one and a half people, but we will discuss that with Education Scotland. It is not a significant matter.

Joan McAlpine: Good afternoon, cabinet secretary. I will ask about financial information in school closure proposals. Your amendments insist that local authorities give full information when making such decisions. In the consultation responses, some local authorities were unhappy about that. East Dunbartonshire Council said:

“There are a number of considerations that may not be appropriate to publish in the financial information. These include teachers’ pay information and land valuations, which are commercially sensitive.”

Will you respond to that?

Michael Russell: They would say that, wouldn’t they? The reality is that information about teachers’ pay can be seen on the national pay scales. It is not exactly a secret how much teachers are paid; in fact, it is published.

As for land valuations, I would expect that the local authority would want to be transparent. Obviously, if a public body owns an asset, it must be prepared to say how much it is worth. I therefore do not believe that what has been said is true.

What we need to get—and what the original act was intended to achieve—is absolute clarity and a level playing field. With this amendment, which has been unanimously accepted by COSLA and us, we are trying to ensure that there is a clear understanding of the finances. Knowing that he is sitting behind me, I am absolutely certain that Sandy Longmuir will have told you something of the intricacies of financing rural schools. It is a complex area—the educational equivalent of the Schleswig-Holstein question, if you remember that—but some people understand it and it is important that it is set out simply so that a community can understand it. There has been what I would term spectacular bad practice in that regard as well as some unfortunate mistakes, and we need to ensure that things are made clear and simple and that local authorities and communities agree on them.

I also believe that the assumption that there is, in a sense, a pot of gold at the end of every school closure rainbow turns out to be untrue far more often than it turns out to be true. It is very important that people are told that, that they understand it and that we publish figures that reflect that reality. Most school closures do not save significant sums of money for local authorities; indeed, when set against the damage, particularly the intangible damage, that they can do in rural communities, they are, to be honest, simply not worth it.

On occasion, closures are necessary. To take a recent example, a building can be so badly damaged that it would be impossible to envisage its remaining open and the costs of keeping it open would be impossibly high to meet. In most cases, however, keeping a rural school open as well as endeavouring to rebuild a rural community—after all, they are two sides of the same coin—is the right strategy, particularly in areas where the population is falling. Indeed, I represent an area that has the worst performance in that regard. It is crucial that we keep people in rural Scotland and the fact is that closing services does not keep people in communities. We need to understand that complexity and the figures and projections that local authorities are working to and make all that information available, including the effect of GAE.

Joan McAlpine: Thank you very much for that answer—and you are quite right. When I asked the previous panel the same question, Mr Longmuir echoed some of the points that you have just made. Someone also mentioned that a template was being introduced to make financial information consistent. How is that work progressing and what are your aspirations in that respect?

Michael Russell: It is progressing well; the negotiations have been good. I am sure that when the template, which is largely for ourselves and local authorities, goes through we will be happy to make it widely available and the committee can judge it. The discussions have been positive. After all, it is in everyone’s interest to sort this matter out.

In a sense, this legislation has taught me, local authorities, those campaigning for schools and lots of other people lots of things, including the need for a clear way of expressing information about which we need no longer have endless disputes. Things are going well and I see no difficulty in letting the committee see the template at the appropriate time.

Colin Beattie: On the proposed moratorium before decisions on school closures can be revisited, the previous panel had diverse opinions on whether the moratorium should be three or five years, as proposed. Will it encourage stability or does it constitute interference with the local council?

Michael Russell: No—and I realise that that constitutes a difference of opinion with others.

A five-year period has been chosen deliberately because it means that, in political terms, a different council will come back to the matter. Of course, that might not be the case—everyone might get re-elected—but the fact is that a council will change over that period. As a result, there is a political dimension to the proposal.

In addition, there is a practical issue. I know of schools that have had more than one closure proposal, and it is a debilitating experience. It must be an educational disbenefit for those schools. Having got through a set of school closure proposals and been reprieved, to discover in only a year or 18 months that the issue is back on the agenda is simply not good educationally. It is entirely fair, therefore, to put a five-year moratorium in place, with the caveat that, in special circumstances—which it would be unwise to define too closely—the decision can be revisited. I give the example of a building that has a problem. If in two years it was discovered that the building had a fault that meant that it required to be replaced, that would be a legitimate special circumstance, and there will be many others.

The guarantee is therefore fair, and the timing is also right.

Colin Beattie: We also heard from the panel of witnesses the allegation that a major driving force behind some of the closures is financial. Would a significant change in financial circumstances, such as a reduction in public sector funding, be a valid reason to revisit a closure decision?

Michael Russell: The closure of a rural school must be decided on by considering the circumstances of that rural school first and foremost. In that reckoning, educational benefit is the key indicator for the pupils at the school. There will be a range of others, and the cost of keeping the school open in certain special circumstances, and I have indicated one of them, will be part of the equation. At the overwhelming heart of the decision must be the interests of the children who attend the school and the community in which the school is set.

I go back to the issue of financial information. The concept that there is a pot of gold that can be released and applied elsewhere by closing one or 20 rural schools is usually a chimera.

Liam McArthur: I declared an interest in front of the previous panel of witnesses as the parent of a child who is at a school that was subject to a closure proposal. I certainly understand the effect that it has on the wider community and I recognise the purpose behind the five-year moratorium and how it relates to the transition between one council and another.

Any closure proposal will take account of the pipeline of children coming up through nurseries and pre-schools when the authority seeks to make a decision. When the child is five years old, parents might feel that they have a guarantee that there will be a school until their child gets into primary 3, 4 or 5, but there is a risk that at that point—which might be a pretty critical stage in their education—another closure proposal could be made. From experience, I understand the impact of that on staff, the wider community, and the children themselves, who somehow see it as being a failing on their part that their school is subject to a closure proposal.

I understand the difficulties in arriving at any number, but perhaps that five-year moratorium will not necessarily get the community or school out of the woods much more than it would if it were set at three or seven years.

Michael Russell: I would be happy to entertain a suggestion from Mr McArthur that the moratorium should be seven years; it is up to you. I thought that we were being moderately reasonable, but I am not joking about this: there is a logical argument that the extension of a school roll to a full school cohort, for example, might be the right way to go.

The other thing to say is that, if a community found itself with a catastrophic drop in numbers, that would strike me as a special circumstance. However, there is a grey area, and Mr McArthur points it out well. In some communities, the prospect of a closure can lead parents to think that they had better move their kids to another school. Local authorities sometimes factor that into their consideration. There will be attrition; some parents will simply take their children elsewhere.

Patterns change. If we look at commuting patterns—not in Mr McArthur’s constituency, although I know that it happens in Shetland—we can see that commuting from a rural area to a town every day is sometimes easier than having the children in a school in a rural community in which there might not be support structures. That is a material circumstance that a parent would want to consider.

I hope that a school’s being able to provide stability by saying, “We’re not going to close and we’ll be open for five years” would create confidence among the community to endeavour to save the school. I have seen that happen—quite dramatically—in some circumstances. Parents of children who have been to rural schools have said that it acts as a wake-up call. People say, “Gosh! We think this is a great wee school, but we need to do more as a community to protect and support it, and to ensure that more children go to it”, so there is an increase in numbers.

It would be interesting to do a piece of work on a sample of schools that have been threatened with closure in the past 10 years but have stayed open, in order to see whether rolls have risen or fallen. I suspect that, in many cases, rolls will have risen because there has been renewed interest in the school.

Finally—I know that I am imposing on you, convener—there is another issue with rural school closures. Some small accessible rural schools cater for special types of children, so there will be a high level of placing requests for those schools. Some parents find that a smaller school with smaller classes and better wraparound care is better for their children.

If we close accessible rural schools, we diminish choice in communities, and that choice is sometimes very important. For example, if individual children with support needs are finding it difficult to have their needs met in larger schools, having the choice in rural communities is the difference between success and failure for their families.

There is a complexity to the issue that needs to be understood.

Liam McArthur: On that point, I am not—for the avoidance of doubt—suggesting an extension of the moratorium from five to seven years. However, given the proposed five-year period, would you expect that it would need to be demonstrated that circumstances had changed materially from five years previously? If there had simply been a predictable trend and we revisited the proposal on the basis of circumstances that were all well understood five years ago, we would just go through the same process again.

Michael Russell: A local authority would be entitled to make a closure proposal without reference to previous proposals, but I am sure that the community would very quickly look at what it had done previously and say, “The council predicted this then, and that is what has happened.”

I know of some rural schools that have survived for which one can look at the predictions that were made and think, “Thank goodness they survived”, because the predictions were utterly wrong in terms of the community demography and the number of children. That has happened either because the community has woken up and done something about it, or because the projections simply did not add up even when they were made.

The Convener: I see that Liam McArthur has another question.

Liam McArthur: I am my own warm-up act.

The cabinet secretary mentioned earlier that the one recommendation from the commission that he is not prepared to accept is recommendation 20, and he hinted at the rationale behind that.

We heard from the first panel a concern about distinguishing between educational quality and educational benefit. In a sense, the latitude for trying to take proposals forward on the basis of safeguarding the quality of educational provision for children should be—and is—very much at the forefront of the thinking of officials and elected members at local level. However, without the bar being set that bit higher in terms of securing positive educational benefit, there is a risk that debates on closure proposals will continue to be very polarised, and it will therefore be very difficult to build a consensus around a way forward.

Michael Russell: We are leaving the bar where it is rather than raising or lowering it. Of course, I thought long and hard about the matter; recommendation 20 is the only one that I could not accept. It is the only recommendation on which the commission was split—it was not unanimous on the recommendation, which is interesting in itself.

I have seen a lot of school closure proposals over the years; members will know that I have a particular interest in and concern for this policy area, as do many rural members and those who have lived in rural communities for a long time. I have seen some pretty contentious debates, but most alarmingly I have seen highly questionable assertions about educational outcomes—for example, that curriculum for excellence cannot be delivered below a certain number of pupils. Such assertions have no educational validity at all. Equally, I have seen fears among some people that with a class of six, 10 or 12 there will be a strong educational disbenefit for children in smaller schools.
One of my key objectives is to cut through that type of information and to make it absolutely clear and without doubt that what is taking place will benefit the individual child. If that benefit cannot be proved, the decision will disadvantage that individual child and, by extension, the family and the entire community and so it should not be made.

That approach is absolutely central to how we see delivery of education. We should strive to ensure that benefit is always at the centre of our decision making. The discussion on this was difficult in the commission because, obviously, there were many differing opinions; I have come down clearly on the side of the minority report because I believe that it is right.

Liam McArthur: Someone referred to the chair of the commission’s comment that there is often as much divergence of quality within a school as there is between schools and that, in securing the benefit that you mentioned, proposals to merge schools are often not necessarily the threat that they are perceived to be. Indeed, there are examples of mergers that have clearly delivered benefits, but there was a recognition that expressing such benefits ahead of time is not straightforward and, in fact, would be a challenge. You clearly believe that we should stick to our guns in this area.

Michael Russell: We assess a school’s quality and educational advantage through inspections, and there is a set of indicators for a whole school. I accept that quality can differ between various parts of a school; indeed, we have seen attainment gaps affecting individual schools, never mind there being gaps between schools, although I am sure that members will be happy to note the programme for international student assessment—or PISA—results, which have been released this morning and show that we have further closed the attainment gap in Scotland.

You need a definition that works somewhere, and ours covers the whole school. If you assess the whole school and its contribution, you will clearly see any disbenefit to individual pupils in closing that school. Education Scotland will play a role in that. The argument that is made by the local authority will address that specific issue and people can then make a judgment on the matter. However, at the end of all this, parents and communities themselves will look at the decision. We need to help them with the right definitions, but they will be the judge of whether the decision brings benefit or disbenefit. After all, they will know what they are looking at.

Liam McArthur: In its evidence, ADES suggests that educational quality is at all times the prime motive in consideration of the school estate. What role do financial criteria play in decisions to propose closure?

Michael Russell: I think that I made that clear in a previous answer. Educational benefit is the touchstone of the decision. Although financial considerations run below that, they should be specific to the school and should not be overwhelming.

The local authority will have financial views that will be relevant but, again, I counsel local authorities not to think that this is a way of solving a lot of problems. The real outcome of school closure processes is that they hardly ever produce the expected sums or savings.

Liam McArthur: Do you believe that financial criteria have a role to play?

Michael Russell: They are a subordinate standard; they are not the standard. Of course, a local authority is entitled to argue that financial criteria should be considered, but the reason for closing a school has to be educational benefit.

Liz Smith: People are concerned about the emphasis on educational benefit not because they are against it but because it is so hard to define. Apart from an inspection report, which is the main way of giving feedback to parents, what other criteria do you think parents would want in order to make a judgment about educational benefit and, therefore, to be able to define it?

Michael Russell: That is an interesting question. The local authority must say why an educational benefit will arise and must define it—I cannot define it for every school, and it would be wrong of me to do so. The local authority must say what the benefit is and must prove that that is the case because parents will want to look at that critically.

I will give you an example drawn at random from the school closures that I know about. If a small school had been absolutely outstanding in previous inspection reports and was one of the best schools in its local authority area or in Scotland, and if the proposal was that the benefit from that quality education could be increased by merging the school with a larger school whose inspection reports were not as good, that would raise a strong question in the minds of the parents and the committee about whether there would be educational benefit in doing that. If there were holes in the roof or some other enormous problem with the building, there could be an argument that we could improve the overall educational experience and benefit to every child by merging the schools. However, when such arguments do not exist, that will be a tough one for local authorities to sell, and they are the ones who must sell it because it is their proposal.
Liz Smith: The onus is on the local authorities.

Michael Russell: Absolutely.

Neil Bibby: In the previous evidence session, Eileen Prior called for clarity about what is defined as a rural school. Should there be a reclassification of rural schools? For example, I attended Kilbarchan primary school in Renfrewshire, and Kilbarchan is not necessarily seen as a rural area. That is perhaps down to historical reasons rather than post-war demographic changes. What is your response to Eileen Prior’s suggestion?

Michael Russell: I have always thought of Kilbarchan as a rural place, and I am sure that you do, too.

There are anomalies, but the commission did not recommend a redefinition. The definition is complex and is applied according to a wider Scottish Government definition. Recommendation 37, which the Government has accepted, states:

“The current definition of a rural school should not be altered.”

COSLA has accepted that, too. Recommendation 37 continues:

“The Scottish Government should carry out a narrow and restricted review in conjunction with local authorities to address any anomalies that arise from the current definition.”

If you propose adding Kilbarchan primary school to that review, we will consider it. There are a number of anomalies that we could address, but the commission’s unanimous view was that the definition should not be revisited.

Neil Bibby: Can you provide information on additional costs that are associated with implementation of the proposed amendments to the 2010 act?

Michael Russell: The financial memorandum will give you that information. We do not regard those costs as significant, but we will, of course, bring forward information on the proposed amendments.

The Convener: I will finish this session with a general question. Do you agree that school closures are just one of those things that are inherently controversial and that no legislation will ever remove that controversy?

Michael Russell: If I say yes to that, convener, the past hour and a half will have been in vain. I do not agree that that is true. As I said in the first sentence of my opening statement, school closures are always going to be difficult and contentious. However, I am an optimist and believe that it is possible for agreement to be reached. We have had some agreements and can get more of them, but if the legislation is not working it is our job as legislators to make it work. We have advice from the courts on how that should be done, and the discussion that we have had today has been very positive and will lead to improvement. I am sure that Lorraine Stirling will take away the points that have been raised and that they will be considered in drafting the amendments. I make a commitment—as I have throughout the process—to be open to ideas from the committee as we do that. We are not here in vain and will keep working at it.

The Convener: I thank the cabinet secretary for coming along this morning and providing evidence on the proposed amendments to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. I also thank his officials.

Thank you for your letter of 25 June 2013 about the Government’s intention to use the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill to take forward recommendations from the Commission on the Delivery of Rural Education.

As I indicated to Parliament in my statement on 13 June, the Government has accepted the vast majority of the Commission’s recommendations. While many of these can be taken forward administratively, a number of the recommendations require legislation and we are keen to bring this forward as soon as possible. There is also a public interest in providing clarity in the light of the judgement in a recent court case which is relevant to the application of the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010. It is very helpful that an opportunity exists to use the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, and I will make every effort to ensure the proposed amendments are made clear to the Committee as soon as possible.

In order to do that, we are moving as quickly as we can to carry out a short public consultation on the legislative proposals. The Commission on the Delivery of Rural Education gathered evidence from a wide range of sources before making its recommendations and we do not want to duplicate that. However, nor do we wish to neglect the normal expectation that the Government will consult on legislative proposals and in particular those aspects which build on the Commission’s thinking. As officials noted to the Committee, this consultation will take place during July and August.

Officials also indicated that details of our proposed amendments would be available ahead of the start of Stage 2. However, I appreciate the Committee’s requirement to take evidence on these during Stage 1 and wish to provide as much information as possible to support that consideration. I will confirm the Government’s plans as soon as possible following the consultation and would hope to do this during September. I will write to you in September confirming our plans and outlining as much detail as I can, and would be happy to discuss these with the Committee during Stage 1 if that would be helpful. I would also hope that our consultation paper, which will clearly outline the areas for proposed amendments, will provide a useful basis for identifying stakeholder interest and planning invitations to your October meeting.

I hope that this is helpful.

MICHAEL RUSSELL
Following the commitment I made when I wrote to you on 26 June 2013, I am pleased to be able to confirm the Government’s proposals to bring forward amendments to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 through the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

The purpose of these amendments, as you are aware, is to implement recommendations from the Commission on the Delivery of Rural Education at the earliest opportunity. Following the extended consideration by the Commission, I believe it to be strongly in the public interest to move quickly to provide clarity and ensure the highest possible standards of consultation for all involved in school closure proposals.

The Commission, under Sheriff David Sutherland’s able leadership, gathered evidence from a wide range of sources before making its recommendations and these were very well received. Nevertheless, as is appropriate before proposing legislation, I was pleased to be able to hold a short public consultation on our specific proposals for legislation during the summer. We received a strong response, from around 220 groups and individuals, and these have been very helpful in refining policy and confirming the strong support for our proposals. These written responses were supplemented by meetings my officials carried out with parent groups and other stakeholders, and officials continue to engage with interested parties and take account of views they receive as the detail of our policy is refined.

The consultation sought views on six particular issues, and I address each of these below. Each proposal was supported by a clear majority of consultation respondents. I regret that the full consultation report is not ready yet, given that the consultation only closed on 2 September. This will be published during October and I will ensure copies are sent to the Committee.
The Presumption Against Closure
I will bring forward amendments which make it clear in the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 (the 2010 Act) that there is to be a presumption against the closure of rural schools. As you will recall, this was the Government’s policy intention, supported by Parliament during the passage of the 2010 Act. However, the approach that was taken to delivering this presumption was flawed, given the recent judgement of the Inner House of the Court of Session which found that there was no such presumption in the 2010 Act. The Commission also commented on the lack of clarity that the current approach gave to both communities and education authorities. Our consultation confirmed support from stakeholders of all types for this to be addressed, and we are determined to do so.

The amendment will deliver the policy intention set out during the passage of the 2010 Act. The presumption against closure should not mean that no rural school can ever close, but that very careful consideration should be given before making such a proposal, given the significant impact it could have on the community involved.

Providing Financial Information in Closure Proposals
The Commission strongly recommended that it was in the interests of all parties for it to be a requirement that school closure proposals provide transparent, accurate and consistent financial information. Our proposal to make this a requirement for all school closure proposals (rural and urban) received overwhelming support. We will bring forward a minor amendment to the 2010 Act to make this requirement, and will work with stakeholders on the guidance on what financial information should be provided.

Clarifying and Expanding Education Scotland’s Role
The Commission recommended that Education Scotland should have a wider role in providing a detailed response to the educational benefits set out in a school closure proposal and a more sustained involvement in the proposal. We accepted this recommendation, and see benefit in Education Scotland having a greater role in raising the quality of the analysis of educational benefits arising from a school closure proposal analysis and in advising Ministers on cases. Respondents supported this change, and considered it appropriate to clarify this aspect of Education Scotland’s role in legislation, so we will seek to bring forward a minor amendment to the 2010 Act to achieve this. We had considered whether the change could be delivered through a Memorandum of Understanding between Ministers and Education Scotland and will continue to consider whether that might also be helpful to set out further detail.

In drafting the amendment, we will consult carefully with Education Scotland, to ensure that the requirement respects their independence (of great importance to parents) while still providing the assistance and clarity that local authorities and Ministers seek to improve the quality and understanding of school closure proposals.

The Basis for Determining School Closure Proposals
During the passage of the 2010 Act, Ministers proposed, and Parliament agreed, that their role in relation to school closure proposals which were called in for Ministerial determination, should be to determine whether the correct process had been followed by the education authority. However, the recent ruling by the Inner House of the Court of Session concluded that the 2010 Act did require Ministers to consider both the process followed and the merits of the decision taken. The Commission supported this approach, and the Government has accepted its recommendation. The consultation responses overwhelmingly supported clarifying the Act to make it clear, in line with the Court of Session judgement, that Ministers’ role in determining school closure proposals is to consider both process and merits. We shall bring forward amendments to deliver this clarity.
Establishing an Independent Referral Mechanism

I have indicated to Parliament that I want to accept the Commission’s recommendation that there should be an additional option as well as consenting or refusing to a school closure proposal of remitting such a proposal back to the education authority to allow issues to be addressed. I also indicated that I thought it important to build on its recommendations and move without further hesitation to establish an independent review body to determine school closure proposals that have been called in by Scottish Ministers. I believe this is the way to ensure that these most difficult of decisions are taken in a transparent and objective manner which both communities and education authorities can have confidence in.

We consulted on this proposal, proposing that it should meet particular criteria: it should be a low cost, accessible process for communities; it should be time-limited, taking decisions efficiently; it should have authority and certainty so that its decision is final; and it should be fair and objective, determining whether the decision to implement a closure proposal is one that a reasonable education authority could have reached. The consultation responses supported the creation of an independent review body, and we are continuing to work on the detail of how this should work and responding to the suggestions made by respondents.

I will bring forward amendments to the 2010 Act to propose this change.

A Five Year Moratorium on Repeating a School Closure Proposal

Finally, we consulted on the Commission’s recommendation that there should be a five year moratorium on repeating a school closure proposal for the same school. There was strong support from consultation respondents for this provision, that once a school and its community have gone through a full school closure consultation and either the education authority has decided not to proceed or the proposal has been refused by Scottish Ministers, it should not be possible to make a further closure proposal for the same school for a five year period unless there has been a significant relevant change. This recognises the destructive impact of repeated closure proposals and the need for a period of stability for communities.

I noted the range of views from respondents on a longer or shorter period for the moratorium, and a strong majority in favour of making this provision through an amendment to the 2010 Act rather than simply in the guidance that accompanies the Act. I have concluded that to deliver this recommendation requires legislation, and will bring forward an amendment to achieve it. This will include the possibility of exceptions being justified where there has been a significant relevant change as I recognise that each situation is different and that in exceptional circumstances it will be appropriate to repeat a closure proposal after a shorter interval.

I hope that this is helpful, and I would be happy to provide further information to the Committee if required.

MICHAEL RUSSELL
1. Introduction

1.1 Argyll and Bute Council welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence to the Education and Culture Parliamentary Committee on the topic of school closures. It is the intention of this submission to be constructive rather than focusing solely on our experience of the implementation of the Act prior to the establishment of the Commission for Rural Education. Suffice to say, in common with many other authorities, the process of consideration and consultation on school closures was not a positive one. The process produced a very adversarial context which was stressful for communities, elected members and officers charged with taking forward policy decisions. At times the focus on process as a means to effectively block proposals generated a concentration on minor detail and some relationships became strained and at times unpleasant.

1.2 The Council welcomed the establishment of the Commission on the terms reported by COSLA as negotiated with the Scottish Government. The Council further welcomes the 38 recommendations made by the Commission under the chairmanship of Sheriff David Sutherland. As recently indicated by COSLA the understanding of the Council was that local government and the Scottish Government had entered a joint agreement to accept in full the recommendations of the Commission and urges the Cabinet Secretary to provide this confirmation, specifically in relation to recommendation 20 (educational benefit).

2. Background Context

2.1 In 2010 Argyll and Bute Council undertook a consultation exercise around each of its four administrative areas on the future of education services and sought feedback on priorities and proposals for the investment of resources. A consistent theme from the feedback received in each area was a view that resources were being stretched unsustainably across too many school establishments to the detriment of the quality of education of all pupils. At that time the Council was operating 80 primary schools, 10 secondary school and 1 learning centre for children with additional support needs (in 4 locations the primary and secondary schools are combined in joint campus arrangements). From that feedback the Council undertook a review of its school estate and identified an initial long leet of 26 primary schools it wished to conduct an informal consultation on with communities to explore school mergers.
2.2 Following a further review of the proposals this long list was reduced to a short list of 12 proposed school mergers on which the Council proposed to conduct a statutory consultation in terms of the Schools Consultation (Scotland) Act 2010. The consultation commenced on 3rd May 2011 with an intended end date of 30th June 2011 and the programme of public meetings for each school commenced in May 2011. The programme was ceased following the Council’s consideration of the request from the Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning for a moratorium on school closures and the establishment of the Commission for Rural Education.

2.3 In 1975 the primary population was 8,093 pupils which had reduced to 7,809 by 1996 before dropping to 6,048 pupils by 2010. This represents a consistent decline over 35 years of around 25%. The population was projected to decrease by a further 14% by 2020. During the period from 1975 - 1990, the number of primary schools reduced from 94 to 80. By 2010, the Council had 20 primary schools with less than 20 pupils, 9 of which had less than 10 pupils enrolled.

2.4 The cost per pupil figures (based on 2010/11 budget establishment – calculated by simple division by the number of pupils) ranged widely from around £3,000 per pupil to over £30,000 per pupil in certain locations.

2.5 The Council assessed each property using the criteria identified in the CIPFA “A Guide to Asset Management and Capital Planning in Local Authorities” (Cost per pupil; Occupancy levels; Sufficiency; Condition; Energy Use per pupil) to produce building efficiency scores. This information helped inform the consideration of the school estate and supported more local assessment such as the education case for proposals, the proximity of neighbouring schools, capacity calculations, road conditions/ transport times, roll projections, placing request patterns, collaborative working opportunities, financial impact, impact on communities, population projections/ birth rates etc. In relation to capacity calculations, the Council used an inherited model from Strathclyde Regional which combined a square meterage allowance per pupil and a ratio of classroom to non classroom teaching spaces. Research indicated that around two thirds of authorities applied a capacity model that was a variation on these core elements.

2.6 The Council and the wider Argyll and Bute Community Planning Partnership’s focus is on growing the population of the authority area and is clearly founded on the development of the local economy to achieve the key outcomes in the area’s Single Outcome Agreement. The recognition of the importance of sustaining and growing our rural communities is a key element of the Economic Development Action Plan. Equally however we are aware of long term demographic changes (population size and composition) in a number of our communities and that a re-alignment of services including education services may be necessary.

2.7 For Argyll and Bute communities the importance of schools as key assets in their economic wellbeing was a controversial issue. During the pre-consultation phase it was asserted that remote and island communities depended on a selection of community assets for them to remain attractive places to live and the loss of these assets can contribute to a spiral of decline. Argyll and Bute Council has recognised within its Economic Development Action Plan that the reversal of depopulation across the Council area is a priority and the provision of schools in rural communities will contribute to the economic case for repopulation.

3. Observations on the Commission’s Recommendations

3.1 Presumption Against Closure

Clarity in respect of the presumption against closure is helpful as its terms were unclear in the existing legislation and will help manage expectations. It is of note however that some respondents to the Scottish Government’s recent consultation on amendments to the legislation chose to view this clarification as a means to appeal any such decisions. The legislation should facilitate a level playing field to consider all factors associated with a merger proposal but should in itself not be seen primarily as the means to challenge proposals. Specifically the legislation should not enable every proposal to be called in as a matter of routine – in such case the process would be equally flawed as it will amount to a Scottish Government determination on local issues and render Council decisions irrelevant.

We note the Scottish Government’s intention to amend the legislation to clarify the presumption against closure. We welcome the intent to ensure an appropriate consideration of the “matters of special regard” whilst not articulating the presumption in such a way as to “stifle legitimate changes to schools that become necessary over time”.

3.2 Education Benefit

As highlighted earlier, the Commission’s recommendation 20 is a key consideration of its overall findings and we would urge the Scottish Government to accept this point. The assessment of a proposal should be to ensure no overall detriment to the education of pupils is realised – the current requirement to demonstrate additional benefit has been divisive as authorities seek to magnify relatively small impacts which attracts challenge from opponents. Often the assessment of benefit is based on professional opinion and therefore to some measure subjective – in our case this led to an exchange of background research reports and opinion that was neither conclusive nor productive in moving forward. Ultimately it boiled down to professional opinion not accepted by opponents on one hand and counter evidence not accepted by the authority’s education professionals as relevant on another. The process is time consuming and adversarial and has the potential to worsen relationships with local communities. The subjective nature, albeit professionally based, of the assessment applies equally to the role of Education Scotland.

3.3 Education Scotland Role

Following on from the issue highlighted above, an enhanced role for Education Scotland is to be welcomed. There are benefits for both local authorities and also for communities in the earlier and continuous engagement of Education Scotland. The guidance and input at an early stage should ensure that local authorities frame well presented, accurate and robust proposals, that the process of engaging with communities is carried out to best effect and ultimately should lead to a lower call in rate. Equally the independence of Education Scotland should provide reassurance to communities that proposals are scrutinised and their assessment takes into account all relevant factors. The role of Education Scotland and their assessment in terms of education benefit should not be subject to challenge in itself however, as the process does not need a further appeal stage.

The capacity of Education Scotland to adopt an enhanced role would need to be carefully assessed. We understand that there is a significant volume of closure proposals which are in the process of consideration by local authorities following the expiry of the moratorium which will put a strain on Education Scotland’s core functions. Similarly an expansion of Education Scotland staff to support this role will have an added cost implication.

3.4 Involvement of Young People

The Council took cognisance of the “Participants not Pawns” guidance issued by the Children’s Commissioner and appointed an external consultant to engage pupils in this exercise. It was a point of note that many parents reacted angrily to the proposal to involve their children and expressed concern at the stress that engaging them in a discussion around the closure of their school would cause. Further consideration of the guidance around this requirement would be beneficial to avoid this further area of potential conflict.

Further consideration of the relationship with children’s rights arising from the new Children and Young Persons Act should be reflected in updated guidance on school closure consultation.

3.5 Consistency of Information

The Council developed a template for the statutory consultation proposal document following a review of those used by other authorities that had conducted successful consultation proposals. The focus on process as a means of challenge gave rise to criticism about the format of information provided. The format of information also varied from authority to authority and it is understood that similar criticisms were levelled at other authorities. A standardised template for the proposal document as noted for the presentation of financial information (below) would also remove a further area of contention for communities.

The recommendations by the Commission to present full financial implications through the development of a standard template for the presentation of financial information along with guidelines to ensure consistency is strongly welcomed. This work is already well progressed in conjunction with COSLA. Equally, similar challenges regarding school capacity modelling and capacity assessments will benefit from a consistent methodology. Although this work has commenced, we appreciate the potential difficulties in arriving at a single consistent model but would highlight the importance of this work for asset management planning as well as its application for school merger proposals.

It is further helpful to have recognition that the financial consequences of a proposal have an impact on the education services provided to all pupils in an authority area. To consider an individual school and its costs in isolation, fails to recognise the impact of supporting and staffing a significantly larger than required school estate. There is a direct impact on the resources available to support the delivery of education to all pupils in the authority’s area.

The Scottish Government’s published response to the consultation responses it received on amendments to the Act is ambiguous and fails to acknowledge the comments of the Commission (paragraph 89 of the Commission report) which notes “the Commission agreed that it is unrealistic to suggest that closure proposals are only made for solely educational reasons and recommends that there should be a place for setting out transparent financial information in a closure proposal”. Further clarity on the legislative content would be helpful to reflect the Commission’s findings on this point.

3.6 Additional Option for Ministers/ Independent Referral Body to Determine a Call In Recommendation 33 which proposed a third disposal available to Ministers/ Independent Referral Body to determine the outcome of a called in proposal is a welcome proposal and will contribute to the update of section 5 of the Act which deals with errors or amendments in proposals. The proposal to remit a proposal back to an authority for reconsideration will allow for issues to be highlighted to authorities to address without the cost, expense and timeline associated with re-running consultation programmes. Helpfully, it does not enable proposals to be the subject of a moratorium as a result of minor administrative errors and will help move the focus towards consideration of the overall impact of a proposal and away from divisive arguments about points of minor and non-material detail.

3.7 Evaluation of Called in Proposals

We would note the Scottish Government’s intention to deviate from recommendation 34 of the Commission and establish an independent referral body to evaluate called in proposals. Whilst we fully support the position of COSLA in pursuing the acceptance of all 38 of the Commission’s recommendations, given the Scottish Government’s published intent to establish an independent referral body, it is appropriate to make some reference to that proposal. The intent to remove the evaluation of individual proposals from direct ministerial influence and the reasons behind the intent is understood. Any such mechanisms would need to have the confidence of all parties and therefore be fully independent. Regard should be given to the costs of such an arrangement, the additional time this stage in the process may take and the additional work to service this body and provide information. Additionally the decision of the body should not in itself be the subject of a further appeal and this position should be set in the legislation.

3.8 Five Year Moratorium

The proposed introduction of a 5 year moratorium on reconsidering schools for closure should not be an absolute position and we welcome the acknowledgement in the Scottish Government’s statement that circumstances can change substantially in relation to rural schools. Whilst acknowledging the reasons behind the 5 year moratorium, the intent to establish in the legislation a set of exceptions that may apply is equally welcome. It would be helpful if the Scottish Government would commit to further consultation with COSLA on the definition of these exceptions.

3.9 The Use of Former Rural School Buildings

The Commission makes an important point regarding the use of school properties following closure. Legislative vehicles such as the Land (Reform) Act 2003 and the current Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill provide mechanisms for communities to secure former public assets and associated grant programmes from distributors such as the Big Lottery Fund provide practical support. Local authorities however must not simply transfer liabilities to community organisations that are ill-prepared to sustain ownership arrangements and should ensure a robust business plan is in place. Care should also be taken that displacement does not occur that threatens the viability of other rural community owned assets such as local village halls that may survive on a financial knife edge. Carried out correctly however the sale or transfer of former school properties can add to the local economy – recently the sale of the former St Kieran’s Primary School in Campbeltown enabled the development of a large bed and breakfast business that supports tourism in the town and generates economic benefit.

3.10 Transport Implications

In assessing the travel impacts of proposed school mergers on pupils, the travel time data was the subject of significant challenge by opponents of the proposals. In response, when the consultation documents were published the travel durations were backed up by satellite tracker reports which recorded the start and finish times of the test runs, the speed of the vehicle and the drop off/pick up stops which were undertaken. Whilst there was some further challenge to the times quoted the availability of this supporting data was helpful in providing reassurance to elected members faced with the decisions on whether to commence formal closure consultations.

4. Other Issues Relating to Rural Education

4.1 Funding of Small Rural Schools

In its initial submission to the Commission the Council highlighted a number of issues in relation to the funding of rural education that are worthwhile re-emphasising. Whilst the Commission acknowledged at paragraphs 95-98 in its report the costs associated with funding very small schools and the impact of the small schools element of GAE, more could have been noted around that funding mechanism. There are significant differences in costs per pupil associated with running primary schools with between 60 and 70 pupils and those with single figure rolls. Particularly where the schools are island based or in very remote locations and no alternative options are available. One size does not fit all rural schools and it would have been helpful to see a more sophisticated look at how the enhanced funding support for rural schools could be tiered to reflect the costs of education in those contexts.

Similarly it appears incongruous that an authority would receive the enhanced support of around £2,500 (annually variable) per pupil for each pupil up to 69 and then have support reduced to zero (a reduction of over £170,000) when a 70th pupil enrolls. Setting aside the obvious disincentive that is at odds with growing our rural communities, the trajectory is away from where the costs are highest (in the very small schools) at one end of the spectrum and there is a financial cliff edge at the other.

4.2 Audit Bodies and Best Value

There is a need for some clarity and reconciliation between the findings of the Commission and the approach of Audit Scotland in relation to Best Value. Councils have an obligation to deliver Best Value: education is not exempt from this. Any decision which does not increase the efficiency of the school estate, impacts upon the education of all children and young people by creating a situation where the financial resource must be spread more thinly. Authorities will strategically plan for the size and use of its education estate and how it deploys its resources. However compliance with the Commission’s findings and the ability of authorities to meet the requirements of the amended Act, may result in sub optimal decisions being taken. Authorities seeking to embrace the spirit of the Commission’s report and specifically the “presumption against closure” which is likely to be clarified in future legislation should not feel the tension of negative audit findings in this regard. For example the Assurance and Improvement Plan 2010, noted the shared risk assessment had highlighted the need to consider school estate given “school occupancy levels amongst the lowest in Scotland and the significant backlog of maintenance in primary schools”.

4.3 Proportionality

Due regard should be given to the proportionality of the expectations on local government to consult on proposals. In our experience in the case of a merger proposal whose consequences would generate a recurring £28,000 per annum saving, the authority was being encouraged to commission very expensive unique research on the full gamut of community impacts. We are aware of another island authority who commissioned this level of research for one of its communities at a cost nearing £30,000. To expend considerable resources at this level in the context of the proposal is questionable. The burden on authorities should be proportionate and balanced.

4.4 Role of Local Elected Members

Opening a dialogue regarding changes to school provision is a difficult process without raising risks of communities entering into “campaign mode”. The suspicion with which such discussions are regarded and the highly emotive attachment to local community assets add to that difficulty. In an ideal world the difficult balance between strategic authority level needs and local community needs would be achieved without confrontation. However there are often barriers with senior officers or political leads arriving in a community where they are unknown to engage on such delicate topics. Equally it is unlikely to be appropriate to request local head teachers or other staff to lead these discussions when their own positions may be directly affected by the outcome.

In such circumstances the role of local elected members become a critical factor and requires significant political leadership to engage with communities on such sensitive yet important issues. Multi member ward arrangements may also add to the complexity as local members may take opposing positions on the issue or members may be exposed to political risk from the position they take. Nonetheless the most productive dialogues with communities as referenced by the Commission are politically led at a local level.

5. Conclusion

Argyll and Bute Council appreciates the opportunity to share some observations on the issue of school closures. The focus of these comments has been to deliberately look forward on how the process of school estate planning and, if appropriate, school closure consultations could be improved. The experience during 2010 and 2011 for communities, pupils, parents, elected members and staff was stressful, divisive and at times personally unpleasant. The Council is working hard to ensure that any future discussions regarding the education services in Argyll and Bute have a more positive and productive basis. The Council has no current plans to bring forward any proposals for school closures and would hope that the highlighted issues in relation to the funding of rural education are given further reflection by the Scottish Government.

Association of Directors of Education in Scotland (ADES) written submission on Amending the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010

General
ADES fully supports the findings of the Commission and believes that the recommendations arise from a thorough and comprehensive consideration of an emotive and polarised issue. ADES endorses the Cosla view that the package of recommendations should be adopted in full by the Scottish Government as they represent the holistic and considered result of an extensive and objective evaluation.

Presumption Against Closure of Rural Schools
ADES fully understands and supports the enhanced place schools have in rural communities and in particular the concept that Scotland’s rural schools merit support and protection given their contribution to Scottish cultural, social and political life. While accepting the right of Government to hold any presumption, two points are made:-

- Given that local authorities have the financial responsibility for school provision, ADES would assume that any national political presumption which had a resource implication would be accompanied by added resource provision.
- Proposals to close schools should be decided on their own merits. Once a formal consultation is begun, it is difficult to see that a presumption against closure can form a formal logical part of the proposal.

Relevant Financial Information should be included in a School Closure Consultation?
ADES welcomes the revised financial template and hopes that this will add transparency and consistency, and that this will lead to greater public confidence in the financial implications of any consideration. There are two points to note:-

- The vexed matter of how GAE is calculated for education provision for pupils in schools with rolls fewer than 70 remains as an illogical and unfair funding mechanism. It does not address the particularly high costs of providing education to sparsely populated areas whose schools have rolls of 20 or less.
- The very different ways in which Councils code funds may still lead to different interpretations of spend despite the common template.

Giving Education Scotland a More Sustained Role
ADES believes that Education Scotland can play an important evaluative and independent role in the school closure considerations. It will be important that Education Scotland are aware of all the factors involved in a school closure proposal and sets aside any political influence or opinion.

Ministers’ Role in Considering Both the Process and Merits of the Closure Proposal

ADES welcomes the recent improved articulations of justifications from ministers for closure calls. It is important that ministers’ thinking is as transparent and well documented as that of councils as this avoids perceptions of political prejudice.

ADES welcomes also the clarification of ministers’ role following the findings of the Commission.

Independent Referral Mechanism

ADES strongly supports this proposal and believes that it is the best means of removing politics from the matter.

Five year Moratorium Between Closure Proposals

ADES fully understands the community pressures during consideration of school closure. However, ADES would endorse the Government’s own acknowledgement that circumstances can change very rapidly, particularly regarding very small schools, and would therefore suggest a moratorium range of 3-5 years depending on the circumstances of the case.

Educational Benefits Statement

ADES is disappointed that the Commission's recommendation 20 has not been agreed by Government. ADES fully concurs with the view that educational quality has to be a prime motive in any consideration of the school estate. However, a sharp focus on educational benefit per se, a subjective indicator, will continue to polarise opinion, with the result that views and justifications on both sides will be attacked and discredited. Educational benefit implies that the proposed move is from a school to another where the educational provision is of a higher standard. This is extremely difficult to demonstrate as quality tends to fall into ‘bands of equivalent quality’, even using Education Scotland evaluations, and therefore it is much more pragmatic and transparent to show that a proposed move leads to no demonstrable detriment. Rural schools are predominantly small, and quality is most affected by the expertise of the teaching workforce, a criterion that can change overnight in 1-, 2- and 3-teacher schools.

Section 1: The presumption against closure

The Commission on the Delivery of Rural Education recommended that a new, clearer understanding of the term “presumption against closure” should be set out by Scottish Government in the Statutory Guidance accompanying the 2010 Act, to reduce conflict and to provide clarity and protection for communities and Councils.

The question asked in the Consultation paper is:

Do you support clarifying the presumption against closure of rural schools by stating it in legislation by means of an amendment to the 2010 Act?

Answer:

No; the Court of Session, in the recent judgement Comhairle nan Eilean Siar v The Scottish Ministers, correctly found that while there was no legislative presumption against the closure of rural schools, the Act provided the necessary safeguards for all parties, provided that it was interpreted and applied correctly. It is submitted that to impose a statutory presumption (which can, of necessity, be rebutted) would not provide any greater clarity or protection for either communities or Councils.

All proposals for school closures should be supported by credible evidence, sound reasoning and following extensive consultation with affected communities. If the correct statutory tests, and these are already present within the 2010 Act, are interpreted and applied competently and fairly, both communities and Councils and, indeed, Scottish Ministers can have confidence that their decisions are sustainable on both legal, procedural, educational and social grounds.

It is at least possible that use of the term “presumption” would create in the minds of communities that there is in fact a veto, or an almost irreversible ban, on closure of rural schools, and that would not be consistent with the terms of the 2010 Act.

Section 2: Providing financial information on closure proposals

Question: Do you support amending the 2010 Act to make it clear that relevant financial information should be included in a school closure consultation?

Answer:

Yes; the Commission on the Delivery of Rural Education addressed this matter in some detail, and it was clear that there were differing methods throughout Scotland in calculating the financial aspects of proposals for changes to the school estate. The Commission recommended that school closure proposals be accompanied by transparent, accurate and consistent financial information and that clear guidance and a template for such information should be developed to assist clarity and consistency.
Comhairle nan Eilean Siar has contributed to the work of the Commission in suggesting improvements in this area, and would support the recommendation.

Section 3: Clarifying and expanding Education Scotland’s role

Question: Do you support giving Education Scotland a more sustained role in a school closure proposal? If so, would you prefer Education Scotland’s role to be clarified through legislation or a memorandum of understanding?

Answer:

Comhairle nan Eilean Siar would be largely supportive of this proposal, and would refer to the findings of the report by the Commission which noted that there is currently no statutory role for Education Scotland to play in the school closure process once it has submitted its report to the Council, although Ministers may seek further advice on a case-by-case basis. It would be logical for Education Scotland, having given a professional contribution to a Council’s proposals up to statutory consultation stage, also to give a professional view on how that Council has responded to the factors set out in Education Scotland’s report, and which Education Scotland feel should be addressed before the Council makes its final decision. Equally, it would be logical for Scottish Ministers to be advised whether, in Education Scotland’s opinion, a Council had addressed such concerns in the final consultation report.

It should not, however, be held against a Council that it, for reasons which it should be required to explain, disagrees with points or comments made by Education Scotland; the Court of Session, in the recent case Comhairle nan Eilean Siar v The Scottish Ministers, has made it abundantly clear that decisions "as to where....educational provision is to be delivered are, primarily, for the education authority" and that "The circumstances in which central government may step in and deprive the local authority of its power to decide to close a school are, accordingly, very limited." The Court has confirmed that the opinions of other parties, including professional bodies, must be read in this context.

Section 4: The basis for determining school closure proposals

Question: Do you support amending the 2010 Act to provide clarity regarding Ministers’ role in considering both the process and merits of the closure proposal?

Answer:

Yes, to the extent that the Comhairle nan Eilean Siar case has made it clear that Ministers must consider not only process, but also merits, of school closure proposals. This should be read, however, in the context of the views expressed by the Commission that Scottish Ministers’ role should be by way of a “light touch”, and confined to ensuring that Councils have properly considered all material before them, have reached conclusions which were justifiable in terms of the relevant arguments, and have not either ignored relevant considerations, including responses to the various consultations, or taken into account irrelevant matters. It should not be for Scottish Ministers to substitute their decision for that of a Council, solely on the basis of policy preference; the Comhairle believes that, properly applied, this process should result in only legally and procedurally incompetent decisions of Councils being overturned and that, accordingly, these would be few in number. Both communities and Councils could then have confidence in the consultation processes, and not be then looking to Scottish Ministers as a Court of Appeal on all the merits of their case. As noted above, the Court of Session has clearly affirmed the primacy of the Council as the body identified in the 2010 Act as being best placed to consider such matters.

The proposal to include an additional statutory option to remit a proposal back to a Council for reconsideration, for example, to address a minor flaw in the consultation process, or to provide additional reasoning, is welcomed.

Section 5: Establishing and independent referral mechanism

Questions: Do you agree that the criteria specified (in paragraph 5.6) are appropriate as a dispute resolution process under the 2010 Act?

Do you support replacing the current Ministerial determination of school closure proposals that have been called in with an independent referral mechanism such as arbitration?

Answer:

Comhairle nan Eilean Siar continues to take the view that decisions on the provision of schools should, like all other decisions on service provision and priorities within their statutory competence, be left with Councils which are politically, electorally and legally accountable for the manner in which such decisions are taken. The Comhairle remains of the view that the provision of a referral mechanism to Scottish Ministers is accordingly inconsistent with principles of “parity of esteem” between central and local government, and with principles of subsidiarity, local democracy and administrative efficiency.

It is recognised, however, that both the Commission and Scottish Government do not share this view and, while referring to the principles set out above, the Comhairle believes that the guidance given by the Court of Session in Comhairle nan Eilean Siar and the subsequent implementation of the proposals set out in Section 4 above, should ensure that Scottish Ministers are better placed to deal with school closure proposals which are properly called-in in terms of the amended 2010 Act.

Section 6: A five year moratorium between school closure proposals

Question: Do you support a five year moratorium between closure proposals for the same school? If so, would you prefer this provision to be made in guidance or legislation?

Answer:

While the Comhairle understands the wish to give communities some “peace of mind” and eliminate ongoing uncertainty in a community as to where its local school will be, it is suggested that it is highly unlikely that Councils would, without there being exceptional reasons, seek to bring forward closure proposals for the same school and for the same reasons which had just been deemed insufficient to allow the proposal to be approved. It is also suggested that a five year period gives neither communities nor Councils any security: from a Council’s perspective, school rolls and other relevant factors, such as supporting pre-school provision, can change radically within a two or three year period, thus necessitating consideration within a period shorter than five years; and from a school community’s perspective, a community is unlikely to feel much more or less secure knowing that its school provision is liable to be reviewed within so comparatively short a period. In short, the suggested five year moratorium could have the result that it benefits no-one. At a time of reducing financial resources and capital spending ability, it is not inconceivable that a Council might, for sound policy reasons, have to re-examine its school estate in a way in which it would not ideally wish to do; a statutory prohibition would prevent any such examination, and it is suggested that it would be again inconsistent with principles of local democracy and subsidiarity for a Council to be deprived of the right to consider an application in such circumstances.

If Government is committed to the introduction of a moratorium, however, the Comhairle would prefer to see its time limit being set at three rather than five years, and, for the reasons set out above, it is suggested that such a provision be made in guidance rather than in legislation.
Written Submission of the Scottish Rural Schools Network to the Education and Culture
Committee of the Scottish Parliament

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill scrutiny – December 2013

Comment on Scottish Government proposals for amendments to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010.

Background

The Scottish Rural Schools Network [SRSN] has been involved in the progress towards legislative protection for rural schools since 2005, when a petition was lodged with the Scottish Parliament requesting a legislative presumption against closure of rural schools. This was in response to an unprecedented level of closure threats with over 75 schools coming under scrutiny for closure in 2005 alone. The network worked with the Education Committee members, the Scottish Government and the national press in highlighting procedural faults in the existing system in order to develop what is now the current legislation. While some degree of compromise was required in order to achieve an unopposed approval by Parliament of the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 [the Act], it was hoped that we had jointly achieved improvements which would at least ensure that the worst excesses of the case studies we had presented to Committee and Parliament would now be avoided.

It is with great disappointment we have to report to Committee that, while consultation proposals in the main have improved, we are still seeing consultations where the standards are falling drastically short of what communities should be entitled to expect.

Proposed changes

1) Presumption Against Closure

During the original drafting of the 2010 Act SRSN was talked into a compromise position of having the “presumption” only mentioned in the statutory guidance and not on the face of the Act. It was proposed that the “matters to have regard”, which were included in the Act, would have the impact in law of ensuring that the crucial factors of community, distance and environment, together with viable alternatives, would HAVE TO BE considered and remedial action attempted BEFORE a closure proposal was even brought forward.

The hopes for the Act have fallen well short of expectations. It would appear that several local authorities are still operating a “presumption to close”, bringing forward many proposals where scant or no attention has been given to the “matters to have regard”.

The scene for this was set in the first case of a rural school closure to come under the auspices of the Act. In this case the local authority simply stated that the school served a rural area and because there was no large scale built up area within the catchment, there was no community to have regard to. This, despite this being one of the best known farming communities in the country, did not merit even as much a call in to examine whether or not the community’s multiple claims of its own existence could be verified. This along with many other factors in the case, left many of us who had worked so hard on the Act at a complete loss. The same did not apply to other local authorities, who looked at a successful process and decided that all they had to do was to copy the model, and that this should give them the same result. To this extent, it is little wonder that those who followed in these footsteps should be rather disgruntled at the furore which enveloped them.

The best local authorities meanwhile have continued to adjust their school estate in association with rural communities, working in line with the original intentions of the “matters to have regard”.

The Court of Session ruling in the case of Scottish Ministers v Eilean Siar has clarified that relying only on the matters to have regard in the respect of special protection for rural schools was a mistake. They have ruled that the inclusion of the “presumption” in the guidance was creating a position which the legislation did not support, and was not legally enforceable. This is something we feared in the original drafting of the Act, but accepted in error. We had hoped that all local authorities would meet the intended requirements of giving due importance to community, distance and environmental factors and genuinely explore viable alternatives.

Committee may be told that the word “presumption” is legally very strong and will impose a high hurdle. It is clear that such a high hurdle is essential in the light of the conduct of a few authorities. As far as SRSN is concerned the normal English meaning of the word is not such that it would mean that no school should ever close, simply that every case will have to be made, and made after it has been clearly proven that any remedial actions to identified problems have not been (or could not possibly be) successful.

2) Requirement to Publish Accurate Financial Information on a School Closure

On the face of it this should simply go without saying, as an essential aspect of any proposal paper, but unfortunately experience shows otherwise. During the original development of the Act, Parliament was provided with several case studies such as that in Roy Bridge in Highland or Channelkirk in Scottish Borders, where the financial information provided was found to be both inadequate and in serious error. What was key in both of these cases was the reaction to this information being challenged. In the former case the original error was compounded by presenting the same individual who made the original error as an independent second opinion. In the second case a valid contention about the overall financial impact, made by highly qualified individuals, was simply dismissed by the Council. Both of these cases are well documented and can be supported by many similar cases from across Scotland. It was hoped again that the attention the progress of the Act created would have improved the situation, but again this has fallen woefully short of the expectations generated by Parliament’s intervention.

Along with a whole raft of inadequate proposals in this respect, there is an outstanding example from 2010 which proposed the closure of a small denominational school which was already mothballed (was already closed). It was claimed that a school with no pupils had a per pupil cost of £125,908 and even more bizarre, that staff savings alone would save £161,873 – some £35K more than the school cost when it was open. Further investigation and Freedom of Information requests showed that the bulk of the savings were coming from staff reductions at the receiving school, resulting from a falling roll and had absolutely nothing to do with the proposed (already enacted) closure. The savings shown formed a considerable proportion of the savings claimed in a wider school reorganisation, and were being used to reinforce a wider message that major savings could be made.

In a current consultation, a significant local authority has decided to completely ignore a Commission on the Delivery of Rural Education [the Commission] recommendation that Revenue Grant implications be outlined in a proposal paper. It appears that without legislation many of the Commission’s most important recommendations will be selectively utilised.

The Commission itself fell foul of the difficulty in obtaining accurate financial information. SRSN were asked by the Commission secretariat to comment on tables of cost per pupil analysis prepared especially for the Commission by two local authorities. Accompanying documentation assured us that the figures were most “robust” and had been thoroughly checked. On examination we recognised the pattern and amounts produced by one LA to be in line with what we expected to see from our own research. The other showed trends and amounts which were inconsistent. Again we investigated and with the help of the local finance officer were able to demonstrate that the costs of the schools from 2011 had been divided by the pupil numbers in 2012. This was during a period of major reorganisation and led to several serious anomalies in the figures which rendered some of the conclusions drawn for the Commission to be inaccurate. In commenting to the local press, the Council concerned denied inaccuracy and put the discrepancies down to a “different approach”.

This complete denial of errors in financial information is a recurring theme and as in the above cases can be quite preposterous. In responses to the consultation about changes to the Act one local authority writes “Including redundancy / severance costs as a result of the closure is also inconsistent. In XXXXX, these costs are not met by Education but are instead charged to general balances.” This is the same local authority who stated in a consultation that additional teachers required at the receiving school would have no cost as they would come from a central pool of teachers. These became known as the “free teachers”. It is quite ridiculous that any local authority can think that redundancy costs, or the costs of additional teachers, or Revenue Grant implications should not be included in the impact of closure proposals. It is ridiculous that one year’s costs can be analysed using a different year’s rolls. It is ridiculous that an authority can claim nearly £200K in savings from a school that is already closed. It is ridiculous that a local authority can seek a “independent financial opinion” from the same employee who gave the original opinion yet all of these things have happened in consultations under the 2010 Act, are well documented and continue to happen on a scale which is impracticable to communicate in this document.

3) Involvement of Education Scotland

Education Scotland [ES] is well respected for their individual school assessments, which are generally accepted as a fair reflection of school performance. SRSN believe ES has had some difficulty in adapting to the role assigned to it under the 2010 Act. It appears to us that there has been a reluctance to comment on proposals once they have evolved, as they inevitably do during a consultation. We have seen cases where the reduction in teaching staff voted through has been considerably higher than in the proposals commented on by ES. It is to be welcomed if Education Scotland can be asked by Ministers to comment on proposals once they have been finalised and voted upon.

We would not support the involvement of ES in assisting local authorities in drafting educational Benefit statements, as we believe that this would compromise ES and its opinion later in the process.

4) Basis for determination

The recent Court of Session ruling has made it clear that Ministers should be obliged to look at the merits of the case as well as process. This is something that SRSN has always believed to be the case and was surprised when “call in” failed to act or even acknowledge some of the case studies referred to above in the “financial information” section. Several cases have not been called in where there was a had a strong “merit” issue, with parent groups simply receiving a half page letter in response to many pages and many hundreds of hours of work in preparing those cases. These letters typically say that the authority has complied with the terms of the act and no further information is given as to why the points raised by the school community have simply been ignored. Communities and indeed any party making such an effort deserve at the very least to have an explanation of why the points raised are not valid.

SRSN recognises that efforts have already been made in this regard, and that replies to call in requests are now more detailed and cognizant of the effort that has been expended.

5) Independent Referral Mechanism

During the drafting of the original Act SRSN actively campaigned for an adjudication panel or a referral mechanism. The call in system was accepted as a compromise at the time, which we hoped would work but we accept that for several reasons it has not been as effective as anticipated.
There is absolutely no doubt that a serious error was made in the first ever case of a rural school requesting call in. This was a case which involved the “free teachers” referred to previously, where other financial information had been called into question along with many other aspects to the consultation. Several detailed call in requests were met with a very short response saying that the authority had met the requirements of the Act.

Subsequent to this we saw several cases where the methodology of the Council concerned had been copied by other authorities who now saw this as approved methodology. In some cases sections of the original proposal were simply copied and pasted, and thus the call in system got off to the worst possible start. Immediately there were claims of political bias or influences from bodies such as COSLA, who have repeatedly made it clear that they want to see no appeals process available to communities.

It is often stated that local authorities are democratically accountable for their actions and that this should be the only safeguard for rural communities. This never applied in the case of rural schools and now does so even less under the multi-member ward system. A typical small school rural community will have around 500 voters. A multi-member ward will have many thousands on the electoral roll. For a small rural school community to influence their local representatives, never mind the control of a local authority is almost impossible. Relying on the wider electorate to protect vulnerable minority groups over a single issue is simply not realistic, in our experience.

We would support the type of appeals process suggested in the Government documentation but above all it must be accessible, independent and transparent. It must give reasons why it finds for or against the case put forward by the parties involved.

Scotland is in desperate need of a body willing to investigate such cases fully. Even Audit Scotland has been found repeatedly wanting when requested to investigate faulty consultation procedures. In one case an informal consultation process received over 1000 responses from a single computer – all in favour of the council position. Despite being aware of the anomaly, the authority published an analysis of the responses and sent it to elected members saying they were “encouraged” by the level of response and indicating that they had public support for their proposals. An analysis of the true, non-anonymous responses, showed exactly the opposite result. The ensuing investigation by Audit Scotland was anything but adequate.

More recently Audit Scotland issued a highly critical report on a local authority and part of the analysis involved the operation of a school estate reorganisation proposal. In this Audit Scotland accepted without question that SRSN had lied in a report and a presentation:

“A report was also provided to councillors refuting allegations by the Scottish Rural Schools Network that officers misrepresented information. The council accepted the allegations were untrue and agreed to proceed to the statutory consultation phase.”
(Audit Scotland October 2013)

Audit Scotland were contacted by SRSN pointing out that we can supply documentation to support all of the points raised in our report and presentation, the Accounts Commission has so far refused a meeting with us and has replied...

“Your e-mail highlighted your concern that the text in exhibit 6 relating to events in April 2011 could be interpreted as a critical judgement about the Scottish Rural Schools Network. I am sorry if you feel this to be the case. The Controller of Audit has assured me that this particular interpretation was never his intention and that all of the exhibits are designed to be descriptive only, and do not offer audit judgements”. John Baillie 7/11/12

This failure to investigate, or even meet to establish fact, is typical of what we have faced over the last 8 years whenever we have asked for an objective examination of an issue. Any new appeals body MUST have the ability and the inclination to investigate thoroughly. Without such an action, this subject will simply keep returning to Parliament time and time again.

We strongly believe that a robust and effective appeals system will improve consultation practices and bring the worst performing up to the level of the best. It must be transparent and preferably judicially based, with the panel members being analytical in nature as a prime factor in selection. We firmly believe that it is the lack of such a robust system, along with a very poor test case, which has led to many of the problems with the current Act.

Any panel which is less than transparent in its dealings, will simply fail to have public confidence and we will all be back to square one within a very short time.

6) 5 Year Moratorium

SRSN supports this recommendation of the Commission and its intention to give an element of stability to rural schools threatened with closure. Too often we see the decline in a school because parents see a continued threat of closure after a school closure consultation. Many view the potential disruption of a closure as significant in their children’s future education (quite rightly from evidenced research) and are unwilling to take what they perceive as a “risk” at a school which may suffer further disruption.

Further to the moratorium we would expect any authority to have mind of the “matters to have regard” and would expect them to take remedial action to rectify any problems they had identified during the proposal period. This would be in line with the conditions of the Act and any “presumption”.

Scottish Rural Schools Network
Too often we have seen schools repeatedly targeted over a short time frame, where the communities have virtually been battered into submission or have become tired of what feels like a continual defence.

Other Matters

Accuracy of information

Although not stipulated in the Government proposals, we have repeatedly seen a problem with how the legislation deals with an alleged inaccuracy in proposal documents. In the interests allowing the Act to work and consultations to proceed without malicious hindrance, the current legislation leaves the authority as the sole adjudicator of whether or not an inaccuracy is serious enough to warrant any action during the consultation. Section 5 (3)(C) allows for the authority to “take no action”. It was explained to us that this was to allow for people who would complain about spelling mistakes or other minor errors in order to delay a consultation. We agreed with this on that basis, but have subsequently seen this clause being used to sweep quite serious errors under the carpet. Committee may wish to seek an amendment or at least assurances that any appeals body will deal with such actions in an appropriate manner.

Scottish Rural Schools Network - November 2013
7 December 2013

Dear Mr Callum

I refer to the meeting of the Education and Culture Parliamentary Committee held on Tuesday 3rd December 2013 at which I was able to offer evidence on the topic of school closures.

As you will be aware, Argyll and Bute Council agreed the submission of written evidence to the Committee which specifically focussed on constructive comments that would assist the Committee’s consideration of legislative amendments rather than reflecting in detail on the events during the Council school estate review during 2010 and 2011. A short summary was provided on background context as part of the introduction to the submission rather than a detailed chronology of events.

I am aware however for the sake of clarity that a bit further detail on the sequence of events may be helpful to the Committee’s understanding of that context.

8 - 17 June 2010 Informal consultation evenings held in each of the 4 administrative areas in Argyll and Bute chaired independently on behalf of the Council by Mr Keir Bloomer, Education Consultant. The focus was on future priorities for Education Services and the use of resources.
2 November 2010  Council meeting gave initial consideration to the Education Estate Review papers and agreed to defer consideration to the meeting of the 25th November 2010.

25 November 2010 Council considered the findings from the informal consultation, the analysis of the school estate and recommendations to take forward 26 primary schools for formal consultation on proposals to close and merge with other schools. The Council agreed to accept the recommendation from the Executive Director of Community Services to remove one school from the list of proposed consultations and agreed to take the remaining 25 schools to formal consultation (see Council papers: http://www.argyll-bute.gov.uk/moderngov/documents/g4336/Printed%20minutes%20Thursday%2025-Nov-2010%2009.30%20Argyll%20and%20Bute%20Council.pdf?T=1).

5 January 2011 Special Council meeting considered the schools consultation proposals and agreed a series of recommendations from a political motion (see: http://www.argyll-bute.gov.uk/moderngov/documents/g4462/Printed%20minutes%20Wednesday%2005-Jan-2011%2009.30%20Argyll%20and%20Bute%20Council.pdf?T=1). Of key relevance within the decision was the agreement to halt the current consultation process and the authority given to the Spokesperson for Education to bring forward a new set of consultation proposals to reflect on the consultation feedback already submitted and the knowledge acquired by the Spokesperson on her visits to schools across Argyll & Bute.

3 March 2011 The Council noted the findings of the Education spokesperson on her visit programme to schools and her review of the asset information considered in the review. The report on 3 March 2011 noted options which reduced the original long list of closure proposals on which formal consultation had commenced previously down to a short list involving the potential closure of 12 schools. The Council agreed the recommendations which included undertaking a “pre consultation” engagement with the affected communities (see http://www.argyll-bute.gov.uk/moderngov/documents/g4547/Printed%20minutes%20Thursday%2003-Mar-2011%2010.30%20Argyll%20and%20Bute%20Council.pdf?T=1)

I trust the above summary chronology and associated weblinks (for evidence) are helpful in clarifying the sequence of events. It is not intended to be an exhaustive list of all aspects during this time – such a report would be considerably larger and unlikely to add to the Education and Culture Committee’s consideration of amendments to be made in the relevant legislation. I would be pleased however to offer any additional detail to the Committee that may be helpful.

Yours sincerely

CC Members of the Education and Culture Committee

Dear Stewart,

Amendments to the Schools (Consultation) 2010 Act

As we look ahead to the Committee’s stage 2 consideration of Government amendments to the Schools (Consultation) 2010 Act, I felt it important to make clear COSLA’s position on the issue of school closure. I was asked by our Convention to write to you following its meeting in December. There are few issues as uniquely divisive as school closure and I am the first to acknowledge that strong views are held by many who have taken part in the debate. However, I feel it important that local government’s view is registered as it will be councils that will have the task of implementing the amended legislation once it comes into force.

Having considered Government’s response to their own consultation we feel there are two issues that must be drawn to the attention of the Committee. The first will no doubt be familiar to the Committee which is COSLA’s concern over the rejection of recommendation 20 from the Commission on the Delivery of Rural Education’s final report. At the request of our Convention I have recently written to the Cabinet Secretary on this subject, to point out that local authorities are neither the enemy of educational improvement nor the economic or social wellbeing of rural communities. Quite the reverse in fact. It is our view that it is possible to be both firm supporters of improving standards within education, while at the same time wanting to present communities with an honest, balanced and realistic appraisal of what is possible within existing resources. That is in essence what recommendation 20 is about.

COSLA has been an active participant in the debate on school closure for many years. We helped develop the 2010 Act and recognised that it was a pragmatic attempt to balance the Government’s desire to have a presumption against rural school closure with the reality of service planning and delivery at the local level. The 2010 Act has been proved not to be a lasting success, not because a lack of careful crafting but because it failed to provide the framework that allowed for an honest, balanced and realistic appraisal of how educational improvement is delivered within existing resources.
Our concern is that by failing to implement recommendation 20 from the Commission’s report we will make the same mistake as happened in 2010. We want local authorities to be able to say to communities, at the earliest possible opportunity, that there are a number of competing educational, financial and community factors which influence the viability of the school estate across a local authority’s area. The Commission recognised that in the real world educational benefit is not a clear cut concept, but one where educational differences between schools are often “more marginal than decisive”.

Local authorities do not consult on closing a school lightly, and are not in the business of closing schools where to do so would clearly harm the education of children. The Commission’s report certainly did not give a green light to closing schools on the whim of the authority, but set out the need for balanced decision making that properly weighed up all the relevant factors.

The Commission has produced a balanced report which COSLA welcomed and accepted in full. We have made clear that there are recommendations within the report which are not consistent with some of our long held views, but our members were initially able to put aside natural reservations about some of Commission’s findings in the belief that the entire report represented a package which could help lessen the division which I referred to at the start of this letter.

By not implementing recommendation 20 the Government has altered the balance brought in by the Commission, and we are now concerned it will be actually far harder for local authorities to take necessary decisions on the school estate. One area that now particularly concerns our members is the proposal for a five year moratorium following a decision not to close a school, or the decision being reversed by the proposed review panel. It could be argued that Commission had two broad aims - one to get to the bottom of why school closures had become so divisive, and two to improve the consultation and decision making process in a way that helped resolve this problem. The moratorium clearly fits within this second aim, but it has now been separated from the corresponding measures to solve the root causes of communities concerns. As a result we are worried that councils facing the need to review the school estate will still be forced as a result of the law to overplay the importance of educational benefit statements (even though real differences between schools affected are marginal as has been discussed) and downplay the financial and community factors. Communities will rightly see through this, which will result in more over turned decision or proposals called in, which will then in turn mean no further proposals can be considered in ordinary circumstances for five years. In the meantime the challenge of maintaining a high quality education service within a fixed budged remains with the local authority.

COSLA’s members understand that the five year moratorium was a recommendation of the Commission, but with the whole report no longer being taken forward as a package, there is view that this is now too long a period, and a more realistic timeframe would be something like three years.

This takes me on to the second point which I would like to make about the Government’s proposed response, which I have also stressed to the Cabinet Secretary in writing. This is the impact that amended legislation could have on improving educational outcomes. Like all my fellow elected members I share a strong desire to see improvement in outcomes for all children, but especially those whose opportunities for success are blighted by social and family circumstances. However, we have a growing concern that local government’s ability to deliver on this goal will be constrained the tightening of legislation around school closure consultations. The quality of education is determined by much more than simply the number of schools maintained in any one area, yet with so much resource locked up in infrastructure there is a genuine worry from our members that we are at risk of putting the protection of school buildings before pupils’ education.
The Commission’s report was far from being a pro-local government document. However, it was a report that we could work with. The concern of our members is that the proposals to amend the 2010 Act do not have embrace all that the Commission was trying to achieve and because of this local government’s job will be made all the harder.

The report from the Commission was our best opportunity in many years to resolve the division that has developed around school closure consultations. The opportunity has still not been completely lost but it is now the responsibility of Parliament to consider whether the balance sought by the Commission in its report can be restored.

Yours sincerely

After section 1, insert—

<Children’s rights impact assessment

(1) The Scottish Ministers must prepare and publish an assessment of the impact on the rights of children (“a children’s rights impact assessment”) in relation to every Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament by a member of the Scottish Government.
(2) A children’s rights impact assessment under subsection (1) must be laid in the Scottish Parliament before the introduction of the Bill to which it relates.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may prepare and publish a children’s rights impact assessment in relation to—
   (a) any subordinate legislation laid by virtue of an enactment introduced prior to the commencement of this section,
   (b) any other subordinate legislation where the Scottish Ministers or the Scottish Parliament consider that the children’s rights impact assessment of the Bill under subsection (1) by virtue of which the subordinate legislation is laid was unsatisfactory.

(4) A children’s rights impact assessment under subsection (3) must be laid in the Parliament before the laying of the subordinate legislation to which it relates.

(5) In preparing a children’s rights impact assessment under subsection (1) or (3) the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) children,
   (b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

(6) A children’s rights impact assessment under subsection (1) or (3) must contain—
   (a) information on the impact of the legislation or subordinate legislation on children,
   (b) information on how the legislation or subordinate legislation might secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC requirements,
   (c) the views of children on the legislation or subordinate legislation,
   (d) such other information as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(7) The Scottish Ministers may by order specify further documents in relation to which a children’s rights impact assessment must or may be required.

< Duties of Scottish Ministers: implementation scheme

(1) The Scottish Ministers must establish a scheme (“the implementation scheme”) setting out the arrangements they have made, and any arrangements they propose to make, for the purposes of—
   (a) complying with their duties under section 1,
   (b) ensuring that UNCRC requirements are implemented in Scotland.

(2) The implementation scheme may—
   (a) specify the matters that must be included in reports made under section 1(3),
   (b) include such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(3) The Scottish Ministers—
   (a) must, within six months of the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child (“the Committee”) making a recommendation under Article 45(d) of the UNCRC based on a United Kingdom report, consider whether to revise or remake the implementation scheme in light of such recommendation,
(b) must, at the end of each 3 year period after it first establishes the implementation scheme, remake the scheme, and
(c) may, at any other time, revise or remake the implementation scheme.

(4) In establishing, revising or remaking the implementation scheme, the Scottish Ministers must have regard to—
   (a) any report of the Committee under Article 44(5) or study recommended by the Committee under Article 45(c),
   (b) any other reports or documents, suggestions or general recommendations relating to the implementation of UNCRC requirements by the United Kingdom, and
   (c) such other matters as they consider appropriate.

(5) Before establishing, remaking or revising the implementation scheme, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) children,
   (b) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland,
   (c) such other person or bodies they consider appropriate.

(6) The Scottish Ministers must lay the implementation strategy before Parliament as soon as practicable after it is—
   (a) first established,
   (b) revised, or
   (c) remade.

(7) The Scottish Ministers must publish the implementation scheme (in such manner as they consider appropriate) as soon as practicable after it is—
   (a) first established,
   (b) revised, or
   (c) remade.

TRANSITION FROM CHILDREN’S SERVICES TO OTHER SERVICES AT AGE 18

Duty to plan for transition from children’s services to other services at age 18

(1) This section applies where—

(a) a child is provided with a children’s service or a related service by virtue of the child having a disability or a need for additional support in learning, and
(b) that disability or need is likely to mean that the child would benefit from the continued provision of services relating to the disability or need after the child attains the age of 18.

(2) The local authority for the area in which the child resides must prepare and, no later than 6 months before the child’s eighteenth birthday, finalise a transition plan for the child which identifies—

(a) services the provision of which would benefit the child after the child attains the age of 18, and
(b) the persons who are to provide such services to the child.

(3) In preparing a transition plan under subsection (2) a local authority must—

(a) ascertain and have regard to the views of the child, and
(b) consult the persons mentioned in subsection (2)(b).

Request that named person service is not provided

(1) A parent of a child other than a pre-school child may request that a named person service is not provided in relation to the child.

(2) A request under subsection (1)—

(a) must be made to the service provider in relation to the child, and

(b) may be made at any time until the child attains the age of 16 years.

(3) In considering whether to approve or refuse a request made under subsection (1), the service provider must—

(a) so far as reasonably practicable, ascertain and have regard to the views of the child,

(b) take into account any factors set out in an order under subsection (9)(a), and

(c) comply with any provision made under subsection (9)(b).
(4) In having regard to the views of the child, the service provider is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(5) If a request under subsection (1) is approved, no person has the function of providing a named person service in relation to the child during the period for which the request has effect and the child has no named person during that period.

(6) A request under subsection (1) has effect—
   (a) from the time the request is approved until whichever of the following occurs first—
      (i) the request is cancelled under subsection (8), or
      (ii) the child attains the age of 16 years, and
   (b) regardless of any change in the opted-out service provider in relation to the child.

(7) A child in respect of whom a request under subsection (1) has effect is referred to in this Part as an “opted-out child”.

(8) A request under subsection (1) which has effect—
   (a) may be cancelled at any time by—
      (i) the parent of the opted-out child,
      (ii) in a case where the opted-out service provider in relation to the child is satisfied that the child is of sufficient maturity to request a cancellation, the opted-out child,
   (b) must be cancelled by the opted-out service provider in relation to the child in circumstances set out in an order under subsection (9)(c).

(9) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about—
   (a) factors to be taken into account by service providers in considering requests under subsection (1),
   (b) circumstances in which such requests must or must not be granted by service providers,
   (c) circumstances in which a request under subsection (1) which has effect must be cancelled by the opted-out service provider in relation to a child,
   (d) how a request under subsection (1) or a request for cancellation of such a request which has effect may be made,
   (e) how and to whom the approval or refusal of a request under subsection (1) or the cancellation of such a request which has effect may be notified,
   (f) how a refusal of a request under subsection (1) or a cancellation of such a request which has effect under subsection (8)(b) may be appealed against,
   (g) such other matters relating to requests under subsection (1) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(10) The fact that a child is an opted-out child does not affect any power or duty of any person to provide any service (other than a named person service) or take any action in relation to the child.

(11) In subsections (6)(b), (8) and (9)(c), the “opted-out service provider” means the person which would, but for the fact that the child is an opted-out child, have the function of providing a named person service in relation to the child.

[The Convener opened the meeting at 10:02]

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Stage 2

The Convener (Stewart Maxwell): Good morning and welcome to the 33rd meeting in 2013 of the Education and Culture Committee. I ask everyone to switch off their mobile phones and any other electronic devices they might happen to have, as they affect the broadcasting system.

Today we begin stage 2 consideration of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. I welcome to the meeting Aileen Campbell, Minister for Children and Young People, and her officials. The officials are, of course, not permitted to participate in the formal proceedings.

I also welcome a number of non-committee members who will be participating in today's proceedings. Mary Fee and Siobhan McMahon have joined us for the start of the meeting, and Mark McDonald will join us later when we reach his amendments.

Everyone should have a copy of the bill as introduced; the first marshalled list of amendments, which was published on Friday; and the first groupings of amendments, which set out the amendments in the order in which they will be debated. We will not go beyond part 4 of the bill today, and there will be one debate on each group of amendments. Depending on the progress that we make, I will conclude proceedings at a suitable point. Any amendments that we do not reach today will be dealt with at our next meeting on 7 January.

For each debate, I will call the member who lodged the lead amendment in the group to speak to and move the amendment and to speak to all other amendments in the group. All other members with amendments in the group, including the minister, if relevant, will then be asked to speak to their amendments, and members who have not lodged any amendments in the group but who wish to speak should indicate as much by catching my eye or the clerks' attention. If the minister has not already spoken on a group, I will invite her to contribute to the debate just before we move to the winding-up speech.

The debate on the group will be concluded by my inviting the member who moved the first amendment in the group to wind up. After the debate, I will check whether the member who moved the lead amendment in the group wishes to press it to a vote or to withdraw it. If they wish to press it, I will put the question on the amendment. If a member wishes to withdraw their amendment after it has been moved they must seek approval to do so and, if any member objects, the committee will immediately move to the vote on the amendment.

If any member does not want to move their amendment when it is called, they should say “not moved”. Please note, however, that any other MSP can choose to move that amendment if they so wish. If no one moves the amendment, I will immediately call the next amendment on the marshalled list.

Only committee members are allowed to vote. Voting is done by division through a show of hands. It is important that members keep their hands raised clearly so that the clerks can record the vote.

The committee is required to indicate formally that it has considered and agreed to each section of the bill, so I will put a question on each section at the appropriate point.

With all those rules, guidelines and comments in mind, we begin day 1 of stage 2.

Section 1—Duties of Scottish Ministers in relation to the rights of children

The Convener: Amendment 119, in the name of Liam McArthur, is grouped with amendments 190, 120, 194, 195, 123, 196, 125, 89, 169, 172, 174 and 175.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): I am conscious of how much ground we have to cover this morning, so I will try to be brief, although that might be slightly tricky, given how many amendments I have in this group.

The purpose of amendment 119 is to allow the bill to do what it originally said on the tin, by underscoring the central importance of children’s rights within our society and ensuring that children’s views and interests are taken into account by decision makers across the public sector.

During stage 1, we heard from a number of organisations that argued strongly for full incorporation into the bill of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. Although, like others, I was not persuaded of their case, I certainly recognised the need to strengthen the provisions as they stand.

The evidence from the Law Society of Scotland and the Faculty of Advocates was that the bill “appears to be diluted” in terms of children’s rights and adds little to what is already in place. Similarly, the committee observed that the duty on ministers represented

“little more than a restatement of existing obligations.”

Therefore, there is a real risk that the bill represents a missed opportunity, unless the changes that I am proposing are agreed to.

Amendment 119 would strengthen the duty on ministers to

rather than simply keep those requirements under consideration. That reflects ministers’ initial intention, the expectations of those in the sector about what the bill would deliver and what similar legislation in Wales is beginning to achieve.

Amendment 190 recognises that while full incorporation of the UNCRC into the bill did not find support among committee members, there was a feeling that ways should be found to incorporate, or at least better reflect, the key articles 3 and 12, on upholding the best interests of the child and ensuring that the child’s voice is heard.

In a similar vein, amendment 120 seeks to beef up the requirement for ministers to report on the action that they have taken, detailing that would be placed on them. That does not seem an unreasonable request or requirement to place on ministers.

Those three amendments are mirrored by amendments 123, 196 and 125, which seek to ensure that a consistent approach is taken across public authorities. Many will argue, with no little justification, that that approach is already a feature of their decision-making processes, but it is difficult to understand how that differs from what ministers themselves might argue. If we are to achieve a cultural shift and practical benefits from properly respecting and reflecting children’s rights, consistency across the public sector would be essential, particularly when one considers that much of the decision making that directly affects children takes place at the local level.

Amendment 194 picks up another recommendation that the committee made at stage 1, which is that there should be a requirement on ministers to undertake a children’s rights impact assessment in relation to bills that are introduced in Parliament. There is now an established method of carrying out such assessments, and I think such a requirement would ensure confidence that the principles of the bill are being delivered across the board.

In response to the committee’s recommendation, the minister indicated that she felt that the requirement to undertake children’s rights impact assessments could be delivered through “non-legislative means”. As Together points out in its briefing for today’s meeting, the Government committed to trialling CRIAs in its UNCRC action plan “Do the Right Thing” back in 2008. Since then, not a single CRIA has been undertaken.

The other amendments in the group offer additional improvements to the bill. I might have the opportunity to respond in more detail once I have heard what the minister and Neil Bibby have to say in addressing their amendments. In the meantime, I hope that those relatively brief comments are helpful to the committee.

I move amendment 119.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): I will also try to be as brief as possible. I will speak to all the amendments in my name. Amendment 195 is on the introduction of a children’s rights implementation scheme, through which ministers would have to outline the arrangements that they have made and the steps that they will take to safeguard and promote children’s rights. Amendments 169, 172, 174 and 175 aim to ensure that children’s services plans are prepared, and related services are provided, with a view to securing the UNCRC requirements to better effect.

Members will be aware of the committee’s call for the Scottish Government to provide an explanation of the practical actions that it intends to take to increase awareness of children’s rights. My amendments address that point directly and involve a model that is similar to that being used in Wales, where the children’s rights scheme sets out the arrangements that Welsh ministers will have to put in place to make sure that they and Welsh Government staff comply with the duties that are placed on them to report on compliance arrangements every five years. Although the Welsh measure has been in place for a relatively short period, the positive impact of an implementation scheme in Wales is beginning to become clear. More children and young people are involved in influencing legislation, there have been more child-friendly Government publications, and ministers have been accountable in their consideration of children’s rights when developing policy and legislation. I know that the Scottish Government often talks about its desire to make Scotland the best place to grow up in the world, so I am sure that it will be keen to adopt best practice from elsewhere in the United Kingdom when it comes to implementing children’s rights.

On amendments 169, 172, 174 and 175, there is a concern that there is a disconnect between the provision in part 1 of the bill on reporting on children’s rights, and those in part 3, around children’s services planning. The amendments would specifically embed children’s rights in children’s services planning to provide a framework through which public bodies can safeguard, support and promote the rights and wellbeing of children in their area.

I know that the Scottish Government has said that it remains open to suggestions about how the bill might be strengthened to support those aims. I therefore urge the minister, the Government and members to join organisations such as Children 1st, Barnardo’s Scotland and the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland in supporting my amendments 195, 169, 172, 174 and 175. The amendments will help to provide ministers with a strategic and comprehensive approach to executing their duties, improve their accountability in doing so, and improve children’s services plans.

I also state my support for the amendments in the name of Liam McArthur. In relation to amendment 190, on articles 3 and 12 of the UNCRC, the need to act in the best interests of the child, which was raised by the UNCRC in 1959, has been integral to the practice of law, social work and education for many years. Indeed, the idea has been present in Scots child law since the Guardianship of Infants Act 1925. In more recent times, there have been moves towards the greater involvement of children, particularly since the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. To place such a duty on ministers would put in law what tends to happen already and should be supported.

Article 12, on listening to children’s voices in decision making, has been embraced by those who work with children, and I support it, too. The Scottish Government has consistently said that it is committed to listening to the views of children and young people, so I expect it to support Liam McArthur’s amendments 190, 120, 123, 196 and 125. However, we should guard against tokenistic consultation. If the Government is not willing to support Liam McArthur’s amendments, I would welcome clarification of and details about the measures that the Government will take to ensure that consultation is not tokenistic.

I also support Liam McArthur’s amendment 194, on children’s rights impact assessments, which are an important tool for ensuring children’s rights, and amendment 119, which is the due regard amendment.

I urge members to support all the amendments in the group, which will allow us to ensure that the bill is suitably ambitious and avoids becoming, as Liam McArthur said, a missed opportunity.

The Minister for Children and Young People (Aileen Campbell): Amendment 89, in my name, is a minor amendment that intended to ensure consistency with language used elsewhere in the bill, for example in sections 30(2) and 50(2).

Amendments 119, 120, 123 and 125 seek to place duties on Scottish ministers and other relevant public authorities to “have due regard to” the rights set out in the UNCRC, and to report on how they are satisfying those duties. I am clear that having such duties would not guarantee the type of nuanced approach that is likely to best serve the interests of children.

I understand that people will look to the experience of the Welsh Government, which has introduced duties that are broadly similar to those that Liam McArthur proposes. In response, I note that we are happy to draw on the experience of others, but, ultimately, we need an approach that is fit for purpose in Scotland—one that reflects our constitutional arrangements, our distinct legal system and the range of other factors that make us unique. The notion of a duty to have due regard to a piece of international law is untested in Scotland. We have no way of knowing how the courts would interpret and enforce such a duty. The bill should not place squarely at the door of the courts the responsibility for testing and directing our approach to a treaty whose wording does not always easily translate into clear, enforceable law. However, that is what a due regard duty could do.

On the extension of a due regard duty to other public bodies, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities has made it clear that it would not wish such a duty to be placed on its members at this time. The bill already places on public bodies a host of duties that will result in better protection and promotion of children’s rights, and the changes that the bill proposes are deliverable.

Amendment 194 would result in a duty being placed on the Scottish ministers to undertake a children’s rights impact assessment for all future Scottish Government bills. As indicated to the committee at stage 1, ministers recognise the importance of assessing the impact of our policies on our children and their rights. That is why we are taking steps to produce non-legislative guidance on the issue for use by civil servants and ministers. However, it is not necessary or desirable for the bill to prescribe exactly how impact assessments should be undertaken. Our experience in relation to equalities legislation supports that view.

We must also address proportionality. I recognise the value of submitting robust impact assessments on pieces of legislation that are likely to impact on children, but not all bills require that step to be taken. We should focus our activity on the issues that are most important to our children and young people.

Amendments 190 and 196 would have the effect of placing a new duty on the Scottish ministers and other relevant public bodies to have children’s best interests as “a key consideration” where those children are likely to be affected by a decision. We have some concerns about the introduction of such a concept. The UNCRC clearly recognises that the best interests of a child should be a primary consideration in all matters affecting them. We are supportive of that principle, but it does not make sense to pursue the aim through blanket duties on ministers and public bodies, particularly when that might lead to an increased emphasis on the courts and on unnecessary and unhelpful litigation. Instead, we should make targeted and enforceable changes to the law that will guarantee the changes that we want without the accompanying risks that I have just described. That is exactly what we are doing through, for example, the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, which the Parliament is considering.

On amendment 195, we recognise the benefit of having clear and robust plans in place to support further recognition of the UNCRC and we intend to provide for that in the bill through our own amendment—amendment 88—which will be discussed in a separate group. Again, there is an issue of proportionality to be addressed in respect of amendment 195. It could result in a fairly onerous obligation to publish fairly frequent reports, and I am concerned that we run the risk of report overload. It also prescribes fairly broad-ranging consultation arrangements that, although they are well intentioned, do not need to appear in primary legislation.

Amendments 169, 172, 174 and 175 seek to ensure that children’s services planning aims to support further recognition of the UNCRC. We have been clear about wanting public bodies to report on what they are doing to further the UNCRC, and that is why we have placed duties on them in part 1. It is not appropriate to impose a further duty in part 3. Moreover, by focusing on how services are safeguarding, supporting and promoting the wellbeing of children, planning will give practical effect to the UNCRC.

For all the reasons that I have stated, I do not support amendments 119, 190, 120, 194, 195, 123, 196, 125, 169, 172, 174 and 175. I support my own amendment 89.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): I am concerned that amendments 119, 190, 120, 123, 196 and 125, in the name of Liam McArthur, would introduce a lack of flexibility and, perhaps, be a bit too heavy handed.

As the minister said, a due regard duty is untested; we do not know the risks involved. Only 15 per cent of the consultation respondents said that the duties in section 1 did not go far enough.

The UNCRC is an aspirational document and does not easily translate into legislation—we took evidence from Professor Norrie on that at stage 1. It is clear that the best interests of the child should be the primary consideration, but Liam McArthur’s amendments do not seem to put those as the primary consideration, only a key one. That seems to be an alternative legal concept and not consistent with the UNCRC.

I welcome the fact that the Government is undertaking CRIAs in a non-legislative way. As the minister said, that will give us more flexibility should circumstances change in future.

Turning to the amendments in Neil Bibby’s name, I feel that including an implementation scheme in the bill would be too inflexible, disproportionate and onerous, and much of what is proposed will already be given effect through section 1, which is more proportionate.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): During stage 1 and in preparing for this meeting I have listened carefully to the debates on what is probably one of the most challenging and interesting parts of the bill. I have found that the legal advice that we received on several aspects of the bill, both from the Scottish Government and from many other groups that have been talking about the UNCRC—particularly those who favour incorporation—has been difficult to work through, because that advice has not been particularly clear.

I fully recognise that the Government is not in a position to publish all its guidance—I understand that. However, a slightly more detailed response to the arguments would have been helpful, particularly for those who argue that full incorporation is a legitimate way forward; I understand some of the points that they have raised.

I have listened carefully to Mr McArthur, and I have a great deal of sympathy with his amendments, because he is trying to ensure that there is a balance between not incorporating the UNCRC into Scots law and ensuring that there is more of a level playing field and that we think more carefully about some of the duties that should fall on ministers and on other public bodies such as local authorities. Having said that, we are in a difficult area when it comes to the phrase “due regard”. I am not entirely comfortable with its interpretation; maybe Mr McArthur can say a little more about that when he sums up. I certainly have difficulty with amendment 194, on the children’s rights impact assessment. I worry about how far that would take some of the issues, but I would be interested to hear Mr McArthur’s view on that.

I have some sympathy with Mr Bibby’s amendments, but I am not entirely confident that he has thought through the bureaucratic and, in some cases, financial burden that might be put on local authorities as a result. His intentions are absolutely clear, and they are good, but I am not sure that they actually match the amendments.

The Convener: I call Liam McArthur to wind up and to indicate whether he wishes to press or withdraw amendment 119.

Liam McArthur: I thank all members who have contributed. I have listened carefully to what has been said. I obviously have no difficulty with Government amendment 89. Neil Bibby’s clarification of the purpose and intent of his amendments reassures me and I am happy to support them.

The bill is fundamentally about extending children’s rights, and the evidence that we received at stage 1 was fairly clear that, as things stand, the bill does not do anything to progress children’s rights in key areas. Therefore, as I said, if this is not to be a missed opportunity, we need to stiffen up the provisions in part 1 of the bill. I respect what the minister said about providing something that is tailored to Scotland’s needs and Scotland’s legal structure and which allows an appropriate level of flexibility. Nevertheless, the evidence that we received from a wide range of bodies operating in the area—Children 1st, Barnardo’s and the UNICEF UK, to name but a few—indicates their concerns that the bill does not go far enough in doing what it said it would do on the tin.

It was particularly disappointing to hear the Government’s response on CRIAs. The committee recommended that we needed to go further in relation to CRIAs—if not in every bill, then certainly in all bills that touch on the interests of children and young people, so when the time comes I intend to press amendment 194. For the time being, I press amendment 119.

Amendment 191, in the name of Siobhan McMahon, is grouped with amendments 192, 197 and 202.

Siobhan McMahon (Central Scotland) (Lab):
We require reference to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities in the bill to give an additional assurance that disabled people’s views are embedded in the bill and will be given due regard and consideration in all aspects of policy development.

I understand that the Government is satisfied that the UNCRC requirements are sufficient to provide for that. However, recent publications—including a report that was commissioned by the Scottish Commissioner for Children and Young People entitled “It Always Comes Down to Money: Recent changes in service provision to disabled children, young people and their families in Scotland”—have demonstrated a great and urgent need for disabled children’s voices to be heard. I believe that my amendments will provide that voice and give greater assurance than the UNCRC requirements could ever provide. The Scottish Government does not wish to highlight specific groups of children. However, given that the bill specifically mentions looked-after children, I would argue that the precedent has already been set and that it would be remiss of the bill not to mention disabled children in the way that I propose.

Article 7 of the UNCRPD places a duty on member states to take adequate account of children’s views. Although the UNCRC includes article 22, which references the rights of disabled children to enjoy the rights of others, having specific regard to the UNCRPD would entrench the belief that disabled children are valued agents in Scottish society. More emphasis should be placed on ensuring that the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill makes adequate provision for the rights of disabled children to be realised. Embedding the UNCRPD into primary legislation would build a strong foundation for public authorities around Scotland to adjust their practice and procedures to reflect the national intention to uphold disabled children’s rights.

Integrating article 7 of the UNCRPD into the bill at this stage will require few additional resources to those that are already accounted for by establishing steps to consider the UNCRC. If that is postponed until a later stage, however—it is likely the UNCRPD will be legislated for at some point—the process of repeating and revising the legislation to account for that will incur further costs.

I move amendment 191.

Neil Bibby: I welcome the amendments in the name of Siobhan McMahon, as they raise important issues about the need for greater focus on and consideration of the rights of disabled children. We have a stated policy aim of getting it right for every child and, in order to get it right for every child, we must close, not widen, the equalities gap between disabled and non-disabled children. Later amendments will deal with the need for a specific focus on children who live in poverty. Here, we must ensure that the bill makes adequate provision for the rights of disabled children to be realised.

As Siobhan McMahon said, putting the UNCRPD in primary legislation will provide a strong foundation for public authorities to adjust their practices to reflect the national intention to uphold disabled children’s rights. Health and Social Care Alliance Scotland has said that integrating article 7 of the UNCRPD into the legislation would require few additional resources, and I understand that there are precedents for integrating the UNCRPD principles into legislation in both the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 and the Social Care (Self-directed Support) (Scotland) Act 2013.

Disabled children can be some of the most disadvantaged and vulnerable children in Scotland. The amendments are needed to ensure that the bill is not a missed opportunity and that it makes a substantial difference to the lives of disabled children. I therefore support the amendments in Siobhan McMahon’s name.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): I have listened carefully to my colleagues and understand their intention in lodging the amendments. However, my concern is that the principle of the bill is getting it right for every child, which includes children with special needs. If, at this stage, we tried to compartmentalise specific groups, there is a danger that we would make special provision for some children. The unintended consequence of that would be to disadvantage other groups, specifically in the area of protected characteristics. I do not think that the amendment is necessary. The UNCRC covers all children up to 18, including those with a disability.

Liz Smith: Although I have every sympathy with the intention of the amendments, there are unintended consequences that could make it quite difficult in the rest of the bill. We perhaps need to think that through a bit more carefully.

Aileen Campbell: All the amendments in this group seek to place requirements on Scottish ministers and public bodies to take steps with the aim of furthering the rights set out under article 7 of the UNCRPD. While we are strong supporters of the UNCRPD, we do not feel that amendment 191 is necessary. As Clare Adamson pointed out, the rights set out under the UNCRC apply equally to all children, including disabled children.

I recognise the importance of ensuring that ministers and public bodies do all that they can to support disabled children in enjoying their rights, and I thank Siobhan McMahon for raising the points that she did. However, reflecting this particular issue on the face of the bill has some risks attached.

In part 1 of the bill, we are seeking to promote a notion of universality—the notion that, no matter what a child’s background is and what their needs are, Scottish ministers and public bodies will work to promote their rights. To recognise explicitly some groups of children and not others could begin to dilute that message and would therefore go against the grain of what we are trying to achieve. The fact that we are not making explicit reference to disabled children absolutely does not detract from the commitment we are making to them.

While I support the intention behind the amendments in this group, I cannot support them.

Siobhan McMahon: I have listened to members’ comments. I argued for universality when we mentioned other children, so it is not a huge leap to mention disabled children. It would be an additional assurance to mention the UNCRPD requirements in the bill and therefore I press amendment 191.

Amendment 87, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 88, 193, 121, 122, 124 and 126.

Aileen Campbell: As members know, the Scottish Government is generally satisfied that the ministerial duties that are included in section 1 strike the right balance. They offer a degree of protection in domestic law and ensure that the UNCRC influences the decisions that the Scottish ministers take. However, they also recognise that the courts are generally not the best place to adjudicate on issues of social policy. That said, I previously made it clear that we would be happy to consider how the provisions might be strengthened by building on the approach that I have just described.

Amendments 87 and 88 are a direct response to the evidence that we heard in the committee's stage 1 scrutiny of the bill. If they are agreed to, they will place an additional requirement on ministers to prepare a plan that sets out how they intend to satisfy the duties that are included in section 1(1). The amendments also recognise the important role that children must play in developing that plan.

We accept that such plans are useful in holding the Government to account for the approach to children's rights. That is why, as a matter of good practice, we have previously taken steps to prepare and publish documents of a similar nature. I can understand why both the committee and stakeholders would like to ensure that future Governments do likewise, and I trust that the amendments represent a satisfactory response to the recommendation that is included in the committee's stage 1 report that such plans be provided for in the bill.

I am not convinced that amendment 193 would offer any material benefit. Section 1(3) requires ministers to prepare a report that sets out the steps that they have taken to further the rights that are set out in the UNCRC. Ministers are best placed to identify the steps that they have taken with that aim in mind. I am therefore unsure about what benefits would be offered by a consultation with stakeholders. Imposing a requirement to consult all the bodies that are referred to in the amendment is excessive. Furthermore, I do not take the view that primary legislation is generally the best place to describe when and how Government should engage civic society in its work. We should and we do engage with organisations as a matter of course. For that reason, I am not able to support amendment 193.

Amendments 121 and 126 propose that reports be published in a child-friendly format. We recognise the importance of delivering activity that helps children to understand how their rights are being promoted and protected, but that activity must meet the needs of its target audience. It might not always be the case that a child-friendly report—whatever that would mean in practice—is the best way to get information across to children. In those instances, it would not seem sensible to require the publication of such a report. Again, I am not convinced that primary legislation is the best place to describe how children should be involved in the work of Government. Primary legislation often does not recognise the need for flexibility, which is important in working with our young people. For that reason, I am not minded to support amendments 121, 126 or 122, which has a broadly similar aim.

Amendment 124 is a technical amendment that should be read in conjunction with amendment 125 in group 1 and amendment 126 in group 3.

In summary, I support amendments 87 and 88 and do not support amendments 193, 121, 122, 124 and 126.

I move amendment 87.

Liam McArthur: I welcome the provisions under section 2(1) on producing a report every three years on the steps that have been taken, and I certainly welcome the minister’s amendments, which respond to concerns that the committee raised at stage 1.

My amendments try to ensure that the information that ministers and other public bodies prepare is as accessible as possible.

Amendment 193 would broaden out the requirements for who is to be consulted on reports, although I acknowledge that, in referring specifically to voluntary organisations, it may run the risk of being seen to actively exclude others. I was slightly concerned by the minister’s apparent suggestion that stakeholders would not be involved in the process of preparing reports, but perhaps I picked that up wrongly. Perhaps she can clarify that in her concluding remarks.

Amendment 122 would place an onus on ministers to “promote public awareness and understanding” of the key findings and recommendations of their children’s rights reports. Amendments 121 and 126 seek to ensure that the reports are produced in such a way as to make them accessible to those whose interests they endeavour to further.

The minister expressed concern about the reference to the need for child-friendly language to be used, but it mirrors similar provisions in earlier legislation, notably that which established the children’s commissioner. It recognises that accessibility and awareness raising among children and young people will require creative use of, for example, internet social media, television and other methods of communication. There seems to be little point in committing to the production of such reports if every effort is not made to ensure that they are as accessible as possible to all those who may have an interest.

Neil Bibby: I support amendments 193, 121, 122, 124 and 126, in the name of Liam McArthur, and I am happy to support amendment 88, in the name of Aileen Campbell. As I have said previously, it is important that children’s views are considered in the Scottish ministers’ plans. I warn against the possibility that the legislation will be tokenistic. We do not want that. If the Government does not support amendment 193, it would be helpful for the committee to get more information and detail on what practical steps ministers and the Government will take to ensure that meaningful consultation is carried out with children.

Liam McArthur’s other amendments are eminently sensible as they promote awareness and understanding of the UNCRC. It is desirable to create child-friendly and accessible reports. I am happy to support those amendments.

The Convener: I will add a comment. I welcome Government amendments 87 and 88, which respond to the recommendations in the committee’s stage 1 report. I am grateful to the Government for supporting our views on the measure.

I share some of the concerns that the minister expressed about amendment 193. I am not sure what its purpose would be. It is about a report that covers issues that have already been dealt with, and I am not sure what the purpose of consultation would be in that case. I also have some concerns about exactly what child-friendly language would entail. I am not sure what the practical definition of that would be. Although we should, of course, make all our publications as open and transparent as possible to as many people as possible, I am not sure that, in all cases, that requires them to be child friendly.

Liam McArthur: May I respond, convener?

The Convener: Briefly.

Liam McArthur: I hear what you say. Initially, I had similar questions about child-friendly language and how that might be defined, but we have already established that there is a precedent, not least in the legislation that established the children’s commissioner, so I presume that there is a recognised definition and understanding of what it means. All that we would be doing is providing consistency between the bill and other pieces of legislation that the Parliament has passed.

The Convener: I heard the member make that comment earlier. It is interesting, but it does not necessarily mean that we should follow that example in this case. However, I understand the point that he is trying to make, and I will be interested to hear what the minister has to say in response to it. I call on her to wind up on the current group of amendments.

Aileen Campbell: I thank members for their comments. As I said in my opening remarks on the group, I am not convinced that amendment 193 would serve a useful purpose. In response to the points that Liam McArthur made, I clarify that, under part 1, ministers are required to prepare a report that sets out the steps that they have taken to further the rights that are set out in the UNCRC. I am not sure what value consultation on that would have, as the report will be a factual representation of the steps that have been taken.

For the reasons that I described earlier, I am not convinced that primary legislation is always the most appropriate vehicle for illustrating our commitment to consultation. We have well-established processes and a strong record of consulting stakeholders on these and other matters, and that has been achieved without the need for legislative duties. There is now an expectation that stakeholders will be involved in policy making. That is absolutely correct, and I see no reason for it to change.

On amendments 121 and 126, I remain unconvinced that a child-friendly report is always the best way in which to get information across to children. I also remain unconvinced that imposing duties through primary legislation necessarily represents the best mechanism for describing how we intend to engage with children and young people in our work. We undertake a lot of engagement with children and young people, and the bill is an example of that. We do that engagement in a number of ways, and it is essential to keep that flexible approach. Therefore, I am still not minded to support amendments 121 or 126, or indeed amendment 122, which has a broadly similar aim.

In summary, I support amendments 87 and 88 but not the other amendments in the group.

significant improvements to the access of children affected by parental imprisonment. The amendment would help to promote a more consistent approach across Scotland to the type and level of services that are put in place through children’s services planning to support children of imprisoned parents.

Amendment 239 highlights the need to ensure that guidance is introduced about how service providers and the named person service should exercise their function in relation to children and young people affected by parental imprisonment. Amendment 241 is vital if there are to be significant improvements in the level of support that is available to children affected by parental imprisonment. Amendment 241 would help to promote a more consistent approach across Scotland to the support that is provided by the named person service.

Amendment 247 highlights the need for guidance to be issued by the Scottish ministers regarding how a child’s plan should support a child who is affected by parental imprisonment. The amendment is designed to ensure that ministers give a commitment now, at stage 2, that the Scottish Government will introduce guidance on how that will operate.

Amendment 249 is vital to secure significant improvements in the level of support that is available to children who are affected by parental imprisonment. It would promote a consistent approach across Scotland to the support that is provided by the named person service.

I move amendment 198.

Neil Bibby: As my colleague Mary Fee said, her amendments are needed to improve the outcomes of children affected by parental imprisonment. An estimated 20,000 children are in families affected by parental imprisonment, which is a substantial number. As has been said, parental imprisonment can often have a negative impact on children’s mental health and other wellbeing indicators. Mary Fee’s amendments would help children’s services planning, child’s plans and the named person service to include a strong focus on ensuring that children affected by parental imprisonment are able to access and secure the vital support and services that they will require to fulfil their potential and make the most of their lives.

I support Mary Fee’s amendments 198, 211, 215, 221, 229, 233, 235, 239, 241, 247 and 249, and I hope that other members will do too, to ensure that the bill is not a missed opportunity.

Aileen Campbell: As has been indicated, the majority of amendments in the group highlight the needs of children affected by parental imprisonment, and I thank Mary Fee for raising the needs of that particular group. However, we do not believe that the amendments are necessary, as the existing provisions across the relevant sections of the bill provide appropriate coverage.

By focusing on the needs of all children up to the age of 18, the bill will ensure that children’s services planning, as set out in part 3, and the named person service, as set out in part 4, will cover children affected by parental imprisonment, including any guidance and directions issued by Scottish ministers. Moreover, where children in that group have particular needs, the provisions of part 5 will ensure that child’s plans can address those needs. Similarly, the reporting on the UNCRC that is set out in part 1 should cover the needs of all children, not least those for whom unique issues may need to be highlighted.

What is crucial is that the provisions of the bill as drafted are made to work for children affected by parental imprisonment. We will ensure that guidance and, where needed, directions, as well as public body reporting under part 1, will cover the distinctive needs of that group as appropriate.

Amendment 204 is not necessary, as amendments 90 and 91 in my name seek to clarify that the Scottish Prison Service will be covered by part 3 as a provider of children’s and related services. Those amendments will remove Scottish ministers from the list of other service providers in section 7(1) and add them to the list of persons who provide children’s and related services in section 7(2), but only when providing services in exercise of their functions under the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989. The SPS is an agency of the Scottish Government and therefore shares the same legal personality as Scottish ministers. Amendments 90 and 91 seek to describe the SPS in the correct way. For that reason, I do not support amendment 204.

In summary, I do not support any of the amendments in the group.

Mary Fee: I thank the minister for her comments and my colleague Neil Bibby for his supportive comments.

Children affected by parental imprisonment frequently fall through the safety net for accessing support services. My amendments could make a huge difference to the lives of children affected by parental imprisonment and the bill does not go far enough to offer support and protection for those children. It would be a missed opportunity if my amendments were not included in the bill and I wish to press amendment 198 and move the other amendments in the group.

Section 5—Investigations by the Commissioner

The Convener: Amendment 1, in the name of Liz Smith, is grouped with amendments 2 to 5.

Liz Smith: At stage 1, the committee asked for considerable clarification of the specific role of the SCCYP on account of the fact that there appeared to be different interpretations of the new powers set out in the bill. Amendments 1 to 5 are designed to clarify beyond doubt the powers to be conferred on the children’s commissioner.

I think that it is fairly plain to the committee that, given the bill’s general intent, there is scope to tighten up part 2 so that there is complete certainty regarding when it is right and proper for the children’s commissioner to intervene in a case. I have listened carefully to the Government’s perspective on that and looked at the children’s commissioner’s recent letter.

By adding the requirement that a general investigation must not duplicate what is properly the function of another individual, amendment 1 would clarify the role of the children’s commissioner in that respect. Likewise, by inserting the word “individual” into the bill, amendment 2 would introduce a clear distinction between proposed new section 7(2) of the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003, which refers to a general investigation, and proposed new section 7(2A) of the 2003 act, which would concern individual cases. I think that there is currently a lack of clarity.

At first glance, the adjustment might appear to be minor, but amendment 2 would increase the clarity of the entire bill on this matter and would set down clear principles to be followed when the children’s commissioner comes to initiate both general and individual investigations. After hearing evidence from the children’s commissioner himself, it became clear that perhaps in some quarters part 2 of the bill was being interpreted rather more broadly than was first envisaged. Amendment 2, in tandem with amendment 1, would ease such apprehensions and make it clear that a general investigation is to be carried out only when all other avenues have been completely exhausted. In turn, that would address the concerns of bodies such as COSLA and the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman that, if not properly checked, the new powers could see the commissioner tread on the toes of organisations such as Education Scotland, the Care Inspectorate, et cetera.

As I said, this committee asked the Scottish Government to clarify its understanding of the commissioner’s new powers, and the Scottish Government responded that it did not foresee there being a role for the commissioner to have extensive on-going involvement in a case prior to local processes being exhausted. That was a welcome explanation, but amendment 4, by inserting the word “otherwise” after the word “not”, would see proposed new section 7(2A) of the 2003 act carry forward that full intention.

Amendment 5 would prohibit the children’s commissioner from acting as a mediator when functioning under the new powers and ensure that the wishes of the Scottish Government are properly reflected in the bill. The children’s commissioner has stated that he does not intend to use the extension of powers for such a process, but there is a danger that successors might feel differently. Amendment 5 would ensure that that position is upheld in the short, medium and long terms.

I hope that these amendments represent the spirit of the bill, as the provisions need to be strengthened.

I move amendment 1.

Liam McArthur: The entire committee was slightly alarmed by what appeared to be quite a significant divergence in the views expressed by the minister on the one hand and the children’s commissioner on the other about the extent of the latter’s remit, and we also heard evidence from the SPSO about a potential overlap in their respective roles. The issue needs to be addressed and resolved before we proceed much further with the bill and certainly before we reach stage 3 and, in the absence of Government amendments to that effect, I am inclined to support Liz Smith’s amendments.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): I will be interested to hear the minister’s comments but my take is that amendments 1, 2, 3 and 5 really have no practical effect. After all, the bill already makes it clear that the commissioner cannot pursue an investigation unless he is satisfied that it does not duplicate another body’s work.

The Convener: I will make a few remarks myself before calling the minister.

Mr McArthur is quite right that the committee received evidence that, to put it politely, rather confused matters. The committee was concerned about the difference in interpretation of the commissioner’s powers in this section of the bill and I would certainly be grateful, minister, if you could give committee members some comfort about the actual position and that there is a clear and shared view of the commissioner’s powers in the bill.

Aileen Campbell: I thank members for their comments.

As far as amendments 1 to 5 are concerned, we are clear that no investigation by the commissioner should take place until local processes have been exhausted and that the commissioner should not duplicate the work of other persons. Indeed, the bill recognises those points and makes it clear that the commissioner may not pursue an investigation that would duplicate work that is properly the function of another body, which would include any complaint resolution functions delivered by service providers.

With regard to mediation, we agree that the commissioner should not take on such a role before all other relevant complaints-handling processes have been exhausted. However, once those processes have been exhausted, we would not want to prevent the commissioner from mediating on an issue where such a course of action was likely to result in a matter being resolved more quickly and effectively than could perhaps be achieved with a full investigation. Ultimately, it is all about responding in a way that best meets the child’s needs.

I also understand that the commissioner has recently written to the committee, confirming that his view is consistent with our own on this issue. Accordingly, we see no need for changes to be made and do not support amendments 1 to 5.

Liz Smith: I thank the minister for clarifying the Scottish Government’s position. However, although I accept that the intentions are there, I am still not convinced that, as far as the semantics and wording are concerned, the issue has been made absolutely clear in section 5. Perhaps we can consider the matter again before stage 3. Given that the convener himself has intimated the very considerable concerns that were expressed about interpretation, I will press amendment 1.

The Convener: Amendment 165, in the name of Jayne Baxter, is grouped with amendments 168, 170, 171, 217 and 173.

Jayne Baxter (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab): My amendments 165, 170 and 217 in this group are designed to ensure that the bill includes a strong focus on tackling child poverty. The amendments would also help to ensure that tackling child poverty is at the very centre of children’s services planning and that children’s services plans make a significant contribution to tackling child poverty. I believe that placing a duty on local authorities and health boards to ensure that the aims of children’s services plans include helping to tackle child poverty will also help to promote a more consistent approach to eradicating child poverty across Scotland.

Section 9 provides that one of the aims of children’s services plans is that “children’s services in the area concerned are provided in the way … which is most integrated from the point of view of recipients”.

It is reasonable to assume that “recipients” refers to children, young people, parents and carers. We should refer to them explicitly, as it is important to have language at the heart of the bill that reflects the people affected.

I move amendment 165.
Liam McArthur: My amendments 168 and 173, which are supported by Jayne Baxter—I very much welcome that support—reflect the findings of the report, "Putting the Baby in the Bath Water: Give priority to prevention and the first 1,001 days", which was put together by a number of organisations operating in this field and places particular emphasis on the need for a preventative approach in this area and a transition away from reactive, crisis-driven, costly services towards governmental plans and services that make primary prevention real. That was one of the key recommendations of the Christie commission report. The amendments would give local authorities that want to accord priority and major resources to primary prevention in early years a basis in Scots law for making that local choice. The amendments would put on a statutory footing the support that we have across the Parliament for the preventative spending agenda. I hope that that will attract support from the committee, although I am aware that amendment 171 in the name of Joan McAlpine seeks to do much the same thing. If my amendment 168 is not supported, I will certainly support amendment 171.

Joan McAlpine: Amendment 171 arose from discussions on the "Putting the Baby in the Bath Water" report with Barnardo's Scotland, the WAVE Trust and others. It recognises that children's services plans should show how children's services planning is achieving the aims of early intervention and preventative action, which are key principles underlying the bill as a whole.

The purpose of amendment 171 is to add text to section 9(2) to include among the aims of a children's services plan that it "ensures that any action to meet needs is taken at the earliest appropriate time and that, where appropriate, action is taken to prevent needs arising".

The effect of the amendment would be to require local authorities and health boards to set out in preparing their children's services plans how the services will work towards securing the achievement of the aims of early intervention and preventative action over the period covered by the plans. I welcome Mr McArthur’s supportive comments about my amendment.

Neil Bibby: I support amendments 165, 170 and 217, in the name of my colleague, Jayne Baxter. The purpose of the amendments is to ensure that local children's services planning contributes to the aims laid down in Scotland's child poverty strategy. I am sure that we all share the aspirations of making Scotland a better place for children to grow up in, and of eradicating child poverty. Although many children will grow up in Scotland with a great start in life, far too many grow up in poverty. We need to direct resources, but we need also to direct the focus of children's services plans, which, according to the Child Poverty Action Group, must play a vital part in developing and progressing the child poverty strategy for Scotland by ensuring that a consistent approach is taken to tackling child poverty across Scotland by local authorities, health boards and other key agencies.

At stage 1, we heard concerns about the lack of a joined-up vision from the Scottish Government in respect of the bill and other legislation and policies, and we have heard about the need to make rights real and to ensure that policies and law practically help children. The amendments seek to do that and would help to join up our approach to tackling child poverty, helping not only to provide a consistent approach but to strengthen links between the child poverty strategy for Scotland and children's services plans.

As the Child Poverty Action Group pointed out in its briefing, although local authorities in England and Wales have a legal duty to produce child poverty strategies, setting out their plans for reducing child poverty in their area, no such obligations exist in Scotland. I therefore urge members and the minister to agree to the amendments, which are also supported by Barnardo's Scotland, the Poverty Alliance, Children 1st, Children in Scotland, Save the Children, One Parent Families Scotland, and the church and society council of the Church of Scotland, so that the bill is not a missed opportunity.

I shall also support amendments 168 and 173, in the name of Liam McArthur, and I concur with Liam McArthur's comments on amendment 171, in the name of Joan McAlpine, and would be happy to support amendment 171 if amendment 168 is not agreed to.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 165 seeks to insert a definition of the “Child Poverty Strategy for Scotland” into section 7(1) of the bill as a result of the related amendment 170, which seeks to extend the aims of the plans to include tackling child poverty. Amendment 170 aims to ensure that the child poverty strategy for Scotland is explicitly addressed by children's services plans, but we do not believe that either amendment is necessary.

The intention of the bill is for such plans to cover a wide range of activity related to children's services in each local area. Many of those services will focus on improving child poverty. Consequently, having such a provision in the bill might raise questions about why other key strategies have not been mentioned. Guidance on that part of the bill should ensure that those links are made, and we are extremely keen to work with relevant organisations to ensure that child poverty... is properly addressed in guidance. Consequently, I do not support amendments 165 and 170.

Amendments 168 and 173 seek to ensure that the prevention of harm to children in the first place should be an explicit aim of children’s services planning. We believe that the existing aims set out in section 9—in particular the aim in section 9(2)(a)(i)—cover that. Children’s services plans that aim to best safeguard, support and promote the wellbeing of children and young people will also focus on the prevention of harm occurring in the first place. We are of the view that that existing aim, in combination with the additional aim set out in amendment 171, which we support, means that amendments 168 and 173 are not necessary, and we feel that those issues can be further clarified through guidance. Consequently, I do not support amendments 168 and 173.

I do support amendment 171 and I welcome the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” campaign for highlighting the importance of early intervention and primary prevention in children’s services planning. Those principles are the foundation of what we are all trying to achieve across children’s services, so we are happy to see the aim explicitly set out in the bill.

On amendment 217, I agree with the sentiment behind the amendment that parents and carers as well as children should be considered in children’s services planning. We believe that the primary focus of planning of children’s services should be the users of those services, which in many, but not all, cases will be parents and carers as well as children. The amendment suggests that all parents and carers should be part of the plans, and there will be some situations—for example, child protection—where that can be problematic. Guidance is the best place to make clear how parents and carers should be taken into account in planning. For those reasons, I do not support amendment 217.

In summary, I do not support amendments 165, 168, 170, 217 and 173, but I do support amendment 171.

Jayne Baxter: I welcome the comments from committee members and the minister. I am particularly heartened to hear about Joan McAlpine’s amendment, as it is the only SNP amendment that we are considering this morning. However, the aim of addressing poverty needs to be explicit in the bill, not implicit; therefore I will press amendment 165.

The Convener: Amendment 166, in the name of Liam McArthur, is grouped with amendments 167 and 203.

Liam McArthur: As we heard in relation to the previous group of amendments, there is widespread cross-party support for the findings of the “Putting the Baby in the Bathwater” briefing. I welcome the fact that the committee will agree to amendment 171, which picks up some of the concerns that underlie amendment 167 in my name, which is supported by Jayne Baxter.

Amendment 166 reflects the findings of that briefing from Children 1st, the WAVE Trust, Barnardo’s and others. There is a desire for specific reference to younger children to be made in the bill. We all acknowledge that what underlies the support for a preventative approach is recognition of the fact that what happens in the earliest days of a child’s life can have a significant and lasting effect on outcomes thereafter.

Amendment 166 tries to give proper attention to the needs of children from birth in the first 1,000 or so days of their lives. Therefore, I hope that it will attract the committee’s support.

I move amendment 166.

Siobhan McMahon: The aim of amendment 203 is to ensure that family support services are reflected in children’s services planning to inform local commissioning strategies. It would serve as a clear guide to public authorities that family support services should be reflected in such strategies. I hope that the committee will support that.

Clare Adamson: I thank the agencies behind “Putting the Baby in the Bathwater” for the work that they have done and the briefings that they have provided to the committee, which have been useful. However, I return to the universality of the bill. In the getting it right for every child approach, by definition we include those under the age of three. Therefore, amendment 166 is unnecessary.

The same applies to including the need for additional support in the definition of services. That is already covered by the universality of the bill.

The bill covers services that are for the benefit of all children with particular needs, so I really do not think that amendment 203 is necessary either, although I appreciate the member’s reasons for lodging it.

Liz Smith: I add my support for Liam McArthur and Siobhan McMahon. We have struggled for a long time with who is and is not covered by the definitions in the bill, particularly when it comes to service providers. From that angle alone, it is important that we tease the matter out before stage 3 so that we have a comprehensive decision on it. Therefore, I lend my support to all three amendments in the group.

Jayne Baxter: I am pleased to support the amendments, which would support the principle of ensuring that children’s services plans apply from birth and of recognising the importance of the earliest years of a child’s life when developing those plans.

Amendment 167 is especially important because we know that, for too many children, it can take a considerable time for a diagnosis to be made or for their additional support needs to be formally recognised. Without that, it could be crucial months or years before a child’s needs are taken into account.

The Convener: I very much support the principle behind the amendments, but I disagree with Liz Smith—it is pretty clear that the bill covers all children and it is unnecessary to single out groups of children in the bill.

Liz Smith: There are semantic issues about who is and is not classified in the bill. The meaning of “service provider” is different in different parts of the bill. Clarity is needed about that.

The Convener: That is an interesting point. Amendment 166 would add the words “including infants and children aged under 3”, but that is unnecessary, as they are covered. I do not support that amendment not because I do not support the principle but because I think that that group is covered and that the amendment would add nothing. The same is true of other amendments. I will not support the amendments in the group.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 166 is unnecessary, as the existing definition covers services for children generally, including children who are under three. All the definitions are made clear in each definition section in the bill.

Amendment 166 echoes proposals that were made in the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” campaign. Like other members, we welcome that campaign and congratulate it on its work on the bill. We absolutely share the policy goals that lie behind that campaign, and we will ensure that guidance makes it clear that children’s services plans should cover services for children up to the age of three. Consequently, I do not support the amendment.

Amendment 167 aims to ensure that children’s services planning covers services for children with suspected as well as confirmed additional support for learning needs. The amendment is unnecessary, as the existing definition at section 7(1)(a) covers that. Moreover, we will want to ensure in guidance that planning covers services for children with suspected as well as confirmed needs. Consequently, we do not support the amendment.

Amendment 203 has a good policy intention—to ensure that children’s services planning covers support for the families of children with particular needs. Children’s services planning should include support for families in their caring roles for such children, and the bill already covers services that are for the benefit of children with such needs. Guidance can make that more explicit. The amendment does not make clear what services for families would be covered, which could undermine the focus of such planning in children’s services. Consequently, we do not support the amendment.

In summary, we do not support any of the amendments in the group.

Liam McArthur: Despite the minister’s concluding sentence, I welcome the contributions from colleagues and the minister, which have generally been consensual. The convener and Clare Adamson raised concerns about amendment 166, but I do not think that it would any way detract from or strike at the heart of the principle of universality. The amendment recognises the importance of the earliest years and would complement amendment 171, which we discussed under the previous group. I also support Siobhan McMahon’s amendment 203.
I confirm that I will press amendment 166.

Amendment 90, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 91 to 94 and 96 to 100.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 90 to 94, 96, 99 and 100 clarify the reference to the Scottish ministers with respect to the role of the Scottish Prison Service. In particular, they remove the Scottish ministers from the definition of “other service provider” in section 7(1) and instead list them in section 7(2) as persons who may provide children’s or related services as the SPS.

The bill, as introduced, lists the Scottish ministers as an “other service provider”, which would have some unintended consequences. For example, by virtue of section 7(4), ministers would be obliged to consult themselves before bringing forward an order under section 7(3). The purpose of amendments 90 to 94, 96, 99 and 100 is to clarify how part 3 should apply to the Scottish ministers when they provide services as the SPS.

Amendments 97 and 98 address another set of unintended consequences. Section 10(7) requires the agreement of all the other service providers to the draft children’s services plan before it can be submitted to ministers and published. In some circumstances, that could mean that an “other service provider” withholding their agreement could prevent a plan from being published should the issue not be resolved.

I have lodged amendment 97 to avoid disagreements preventing a plan from being finalised by removing section 10(7). At the same time, a new subsection (8) would enable any disagreements with the plan to be publicly set out and would require the Scottish ministers—as the SPS—and other service providers to prepare and publish a notice setting out their reasons for disagreeing with a matter in the plan.

The combined effect of those changes is to remove the power of veto and require a public statement of any disagreement. The changes will not affect the existing requirement for service providers to be consulted and participate in the development of plans, which is provided for in section 10 as a whole.

Correspondingly, amendment 98 to section 12 is also needed. Its purpose is to prevent the Scottish ministers and other service providers from being bound to implement a matter in a plan with which they might disagree, which is in line with the notice set out in section 10(8). The effect of the amendment will be that the Scottish ministers and other service providers would not be compelled to provide relevant services in line with the plan, but only to the extent of the matter with which they disagree.

I urge the committee to support all the amendments in the group, and I move amendment 90.

The Convener: No members have indicated that they wish to speak. Minister, do you wish to wind up?

The Convener: Amendment 205, in the name of Siobhan McMahon, is grouped with amendments 206 to 210, 212 to 214, 218, 220, 224 to 228, 230, 232 and 237.

Siobhan McMahon: The bill introduces a new right for young people who are leaving care to request assistance and support from a local authority up to the age of 25. Although that is to be welcomed, as it will support some of Scotland’s most vulnerable young people, it falls short of supporting all vulnerable young people.

My amendment 205 aims to support young disabled people who are transitioning into adult life. It specifically requires a children’s services plan to be prepared with a view to ensuring that transitions are planned well in advance. That would support the transitions process and would be of particular benefit to young disabled people who have less complex support needs, and for whom the adult social care assessment frameworks might mean that they fall short of being assessed for a formal care plan as they move into adulthood and independent living.

On amendment 207, although the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Acts 2004 and 2009 make provision for transitions planning, it is only applicable to disabled young people who have been assessed as having an additional support for learning need via a co-ordinated support plan or individualised education plan, and the powers of the ASL acts do not extend beyond the responsibility of the education authority to develop a plan. The acts cannot place duties on other public bodies to comply beyond school leaver age.

I move amendment 205.

Liam McArthur: I echo Siobhan McMahon’s sentiments, which are very much the same as those that underlie amendment 237 in my name.

Notwithstanding the safeguards that are currently in place, from casework in my constituency—I suspect that colleagues have also experienced the same—I am aware of children who are progressing through the system feeling as if they will fall off a cliff edge when they reach adulthood. I do not think that we have got transition planning right yet. Those people are often the most vulnerable and the transition stage is absolutely critical to them.

Amendment 237 seeks to ensure that transition planning is well embedded for all those who need it and that young people are kept fully informed and involved in the process. I therefore hope that amendment 237 will command support across the committee and from the Government.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): I agree in principle with much of what has been said, but amendments 218 and 210 could cause some confusion at a local level where adult services and children’s services are working together and trying to cross over at one point. Some children’s services might end up suffering from that.

Although I agree in principle with what has been said, there might be problems with the idea as it has been proposed and it would be less than practical to try to make it work out there in the real world.

Aileen Campbell: Our provisions on children’s services planning in part 3 of the bill recognise that children deserve dedicated and integrated planning that makes clear how services are responding to their needs. The bill is based on the idea that children require co-ordinated and targeted support across all the range of services that can support their wellbeing, at strategic level as well as in planning for each individual child.

To widen such planning to include young persons up to the age of 25 risks diluting the focus of children’s services planning. The services that children require are not always the same as those that young adults require, and to combine both into the same set of plans runs the risk of overcomplicating planning, potentially resulting in plans that do not address the needs of children and young adults in the detail that they deserve.

Nevertheless, we believe that good transition planning is essential for those children whose needs will require continuing support into adulthood. Planning for that should be covered by children’s services plans. The existing provisions of the bill allow for that and it is hard to see how the absence of good transition planning would best safeguard, support and promote the wellbeing of children who are approaching 18 and are being left in uncertainty about how they will continue to be assisted.

Liam McArthur: Will the minister take an intervention on that point?

Aileen Campbell: Yes.

Liam McArthur: The minister talks about the current provisions allowing for such planning to be done, and we are all aware of where good practice exists. Thankfully, it is not the case that every vulnerable child who is moving into adulthood finds themselves falling off a cliff edge. Nevertheless, despite the existing provisions, that does still happen. Rather than simply allow for it, does the bill not provide an opportunity to require that transition planning to happen as a matter of course?

Aileen Campbell: I acknowledge the member’s point that good practice exists across Scotland—we should draw on that—but this issue is best addressed in guidance. I see that as the opportunity in the bill to ensure that transition planning is done in the most appropriate way to support young people who need additional support as they move into adulthood.

I am always happy to engage with the wider range of stakeholders who have been pushing for these particular amendments to ensure that the guidance is robust as it can be. However, given our belief that this matter is best approached through guidance, we do not support Siobhan McMahon and Liam McArthur’s amendments in this group, although I acknowledge the spirit in which they have been lodged.

Siobhan McMahon: I thank the minister for her comments. Although I disagree with her conclusion, I acknowledge that progress has been made in this area.

That said, as has been pointed out by Liam McArthur—I appreciate his support on this matter—the problem for many third sector organisations and for the parents and children in this situation is that children are falling through a hole. The services are just not there and there is already confusion, and the amendments seek to address that matter in law rather than through guidance. As a result, I will press amendment 205.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 205 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 205 disagreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 52, in the name of Liz Smith, is grouped with amendments 53 to 57, 64 and 66 to 81.

Liz Smith: One of the bill’s complexities relates to the use of the terms “wellbeing” and “welfare”. We know in our hearts that wellbeing sounds a little bit better and a bit more holistic than welfare and is a term that is perhaps missing from various pieces of legislation. However, the more we go into the issue, the more difficult it becomes to define wellbeing and I think that in practical terms the law will simply come back to the term “welfare”. That is irrespective of the safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included—or SHANARRI—indicators, which have been successful up to a point; indeed, I know that certain subdivisions of SHANARRI in local authorities have also been helpful, again up to a point. However, I think that the term “wellbeing” is fraught with many practical difficulties. It might be more holistic, but it is also a little more vague and is therefore not helpful as far as the bill is concerned. The conflation of the two terms could give rise to complications and confusion in the duties of certain service providers.

Amendment 52 seeks to define a related service as that provided in a local authority which, although not a children’s service, is still capable of having a significant effect on a child’s welfare. Amendment 53 seeks to ensure that children’s services are provided in a way that best safeguards, supports and promotes the welfare of the child in the area concerned, while amendment 54 seeks to introduce a similar duty for related services by again ensuring that, in the area concerned, such services are provided in a way that safeguards, support and promotes the welfare of children.

Amendment 55 relates to the implementation of the children’s services plan and seeks to ensure that section 12(2) does not apply to the extent that the person providing the service considers that to comply with it would adversely affect the welfare of a child. Amendment 56 seeks to guarantee that the annual report published by either a local authority or a health board would take into account the extent to which the provision has achieved outcomes in relation to the welfare of children in the areas prescribed by Scottish ministers.

Amendment 57, which relates to part 4, seeks to define as one of a named person’s functions promoting, supporting or safeguarding, where appropriate, the welfare of that child. Again, by substituting the term “wellbeing” with “welfare”, I hope that the bill will result in a better service and provide greater clarity with regard to a named person’s duties.

Finally, amendment 64 relates to information sharing and seeks to ensure that service providers do not divulge information in certain circumstances where it might be relevant—of course, it will depend on how we vote on that particular terminology later—to the exercise of any function that affects or might affect the welfare of the child or young person in question.

Unless the term “wellbeing” is much more tightly defined, problems could arise with children’s services having to carry out a whole range of complex, even slightly esoteric tasks. If we make welfare the standard term throughout the bill, not only will a greater degree of clarity emerge, but the bill will come into line with major pieces of existing legislation, which rarely refer to wellbeing.

I move amendment 52.

Colin Beattie: In seeking to replace the term “wellbeing” with “welfare”, the amendments in the group hit at an essential element of the bill. A core concept of the bill is the change from the more restricted term “welfare” to a term that is wider and more holistic, as Liz Smith mentioned, namely “wellbeing”. In the consultation on the bill, 90 per cent of respondents agreed that “a wider understanding of ... wellbeing should underpin our proposals”.

I would therefore be concerned if the proposed terminological change took place.

Jayne Baxter: I do not support the amendments in the group. Much of the work that we do for young people, especially under GIRFEC, is based on the concept of wellbeing. I support that wider, more holistic approach and I would be worried about us moving away from that. I would like to ensure that the concept of wellbeing is as embedded in the bill as it can be, so I do not support the amendments.

Liam McArthur: At stage 1, there was concern about the broadening out of the scope beyond welfare to wellbeing, principally in relation to the effect that it would have on the targeting of resources. A number of witnesses raised that with us, and there was also concern that there might be a redirection of focus in some areas that would not be helpful. Nevertheless, like others, I am concerned that the amendments would undermine the status of the GIRFEC process, so I cannot support them.

The Convener: I agree with Colin Beattie, Liam McArthur and Jayne Baxter. To remove the term “wellbeing” and replace it with “welfare” would be a step in the wrong direction. As Colin Beattie said, it would rather strike at the heart of what the bill is trying to do. Like other members, I will not support the amendments.

Aileen Campbell: Part of what we are seeking to achieve with the bill is the promotion of early intervention and prevention. Adopting the concept of wellbeing and taking that more holistic approach should encourage people to identify concerns at an earlier stage, as Colin Beattie and the convener mentioned. Rather than using the concept of welfare, which has been interpreted variously by services across a number of different pieces of legislation, we want to establish a clear, common definition of wellbeing that captures our early intervention principles and the advice of professionals who work across children’s services.

The concept of wellbeing that we have set out in the bill is already widely used and is well understood by practitioners. Wellbeing is therefore already embedded in practice, and to dispense with it would seriously impact on practitioners’ ability to take forward early intervention and remove a concept that is already accepted and widely implemented across Scotland. As the convener, Liam McArthur and Jayne Baxter acknowledged, wellbeing is the foundation of the GIRFEC approach and it has provided a common language for practitioners in taking forward GIRFEC across Scotland.

The concept was clearly endorsed in our consultation on the bill, as 90 per cent of respondents agreed that “a wider understanding of a child or young person’s wellbeing should underpin our proposals.”

Those views were echoed in the evidence that the committee received. For example, Professor Norrie supported the use of the term “wellbeing” as opposed to “welfare” in his written evidence to the committee, stating:
“the Bill, and especially the ‘wellbeing’ provisions, is not about compulsory intervention but about seeking to avoid the need for compulsory intervention.”

A number of children’s charities also spoke to the committee about the importance of setting out wellbeing in the bill. For the reasons that I have outlined, I do not support the amendments in the group.

The Convener: I call on Liz Smith to wind up and say whether she wishes to press or withdraw amendment 52.

Liz Smith: I thank members for their comments. I entirely accept that we all like the concept of wellbeing. However, the use of the word “concept” in defence of the term “wellbeing” is interesting. Wellbeing is a concept, and my concern is that it is difficult to define that concept in law. If we are confident that it is already being well used in guidance, I do not see why it has to go into the bill, especially as it is extremely difficult to define.

I press amendment 52.

The Convener: I welcome Mark McDonald to the committee. Amendment 216, in the name of Mark McDonald, is grouped with amendments 219, 222, 234, 236, 240, 242 to 246, 248 and 250 to 256. If amendment 244 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 183, in the group "Views of child in relation to child’s plan", because of pre-emption.

Mark McDonald (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP): I thank the Royal College of Speech and Language Therapists, which I met on a number of occasions to discuss my amendments. They are intended to be probing amendments, to look at whether the issues that they raise can be put on the Government’s agenda when it drafts the guidance relating to the bill.

It is worth putting in context, in relation to speech, language and communication needs, that around half of children and young people in deprived communities have speech, language and communication difficulties. Such difficulties are the most common experienced by children and young people, affecting about two children in every classroom. The majority of young people in crisis have speech, language and communication difficulties. More than 60 per cent of children referred to psychiatric services, 88 per cent of young unemployed men and a significant percentage of young men in young offenders institutions are found to have speech, language and communication difficulties.

Issues relating to speech, language and communication are critical, which is why it is important to consider how they can be encapsulated. For example, amendments 216 and 219 look at how those issues can be encapsulated in children’s service plans. Amendment 234 is about guidance for local authorities, health boards and other service providers to optimise speech, language and communication development for children and young people.

The intention of amendment 243 is to ensure that directions could also be issued about the type of strategic action that could optimise that speech, language and communication development. I heard the committee debate issues of wellbeing and welfare. The amendment looks at issues relating to a child’s wellbeing and how speech, language and communication needs would factor into that. Section 31 might take cognisance of that but, again, that could perhaps be reflected in the guidance.
Amendment 250 deals with what strategic action could be taken, following on from the child’s plan, to optimise speech, language and communication development.

Amendment 251 gets to the nub of the matter. Section 42 includes the phrase “regard being had to the importance of interactions and other experiences which support learning and development in a caring and nurturing setting.”

As such interactions will include speech, language and communication, it would be interesting to hear from the minister whether they are factors in the Government’s considerations on section 42. I would also be interested to know whether the minister would be willing to invite the Royal College of Speech and Language Therapists to be involved when it comes to the drafting and formulation of guidance in this area.

A number of Jayne Baxter’s amendments are extremely similar in nature to the ones that I lodged, except for amendment 254, which relates to the establishment of a speech, language and communication strategy. I have some sympathy for that, given the success that the Scottish Government’s autism and dementia strategies have had, but I do not think that the bill is necessarily the place to provide for such a strategy. Perhaps the lodging of the amendment could lead to further discussions and, I hope, some positive moves in that direction.

I move amendment 216.

Jayne Baxter: With the benefit of hindsight, it is clear that the issues of speech, language and communication are ones that we could have explored more fully in our earlier consideration of the bill. Children and young people need to be enabled to express themselves and to communicate to the best of their ability to understand their rights and to enjoy them fully. It seems like a niche area to focus on, but I believe that, when we look at the figures, the need for my amendments speaks for itself. Around half of the children and young people from deprived communities have speech, language and communication difficulties, which are the most common difficulties that are experienced by children and young people—two pupils in every classroom experience them, as Mark McDonald said.

To elicit a child’s views, the child must have the optimum opportunity and, where necessary, effective support to understand information and to express their views. To provide such support effectively, public authorities must take into account the child’s speech, language and communication needs, and the child’s optimum capacity to understand the process and to express their views.

Amendment 254 is rather lengthy. It relates to the creation of a national speech, language and communication strategy for children and young people. Significantly, Scotland—unlike other parts of the UK—currently has no comprehensive unified strategic focus on optimising all children and young people’s speech, language and communication development. A national strategy could deliver a major step change in such development. In the event that amendment 254 is not agreed to, I would be keen to hear from the minister what steps the Scottish Government intends to take to progress the measures that are outlined in it so that we do not miss the opportunity that the bill presents.

Liam McArthur: I listened with interest to Jayne Baxter’s comment that this was an area to which we did not necessarily pay sufficient attention at stage 1. A similar claim could be made in relation to any number of areas. Even if we had doubled the amount of time that we spent on the bill at stage 1, we would probably still have only scratched the surface on a range of key issues that are relevant to the bill.

As Mark McDonald indicated, this group of amendments reflects the value of having the ability to lodge probing amendments. I do not think that there is a feeling that it would be appropriate to put the provisions in question on the face of the bill, but I hope that the fact that the amendments have been lodged and considered at stage 2 will ensure that the issues that underlie them can be addressed in guidance in due course.

The Convener: Before I invite the minister to respond, I would like to make some comments of my own.

I very much support the nature of Mark McDonald’s amendments, but I agree with Liam McArthur that—as Mark McDonald himself said—they are probing amendments. It is extremely important that we get the opportunity at this stage to hear the Government’s view on speech and language therapy and on the specific issue of a strategy, which Jayne Baxter raised. Therefore, we would be grateful if the minister could explain the Government’s position on the amendments in this group and the general area that has been opened up as a result of Mark McDonald’s helpful lodging of his amendments.

Aileen Campbell: I thank Mark McDonald and Jayne Baxter for raising the needs of that group of children. The Government absolutely supports the intent behind their amendments, as that group of children should and must benefit from the provisions of the bill. However, we believe that the existing provisions already enable their needs to be addressed.
The bill is founded on a holistic approach to the wellbeing of children and young people in all circumstances and with all conditions, as we have already said in debate. The bill has been drafted to ensure that the needs of any particular group of children will be supported by the different provisions, whether at a strategic level, as in the children’s services plans in part 3, or at individual level, as in the support for individual children through parts 4, 5, 6 and 7. That includes speech, language and communication needs.

Moreover, we believe that guidance is the best place to address those children’s specific needs under the different parts of the bill, and indeed, the needs of all groups of children with particular issues. To provide reassurance to Mark McDonald and Jayne Baxter, we will commit to ensuring that the distinctive needs of children with speech, language and communication issues will be addressed by guidance as appropriate and that we will work with appropriate organisations to do so. We appreciate the work of the Royal College of Speech and Language Therapists in raising those important issues.

The Convener: I call Mark McDonald to wind up and to indicate whether he wishes to press or withdraw amendment 216.

Mark McDonald: I realise that the committee has had a marathon session so I shall keep my remarks brief. I am satisfied that the minister has taken on board the points that have been raised through the amendments, so I seek to withdraw amendment 216.

Section 10—Children’s services plan: process

Amendment 92 moved—[Aileen Campbell]—and agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 176, in the name of Liam McArthur, is grouped with amendments 223, 231 and 128.

Liam McArthur: As Mark McDonald said, this has been a marathon session, so I will try to keep my comments relatively brief. I put on record my gratitude to Barnardo’s Scotland and Aberlour Child Care Trust for their assistance with amendment 176.

Section 8 provides for local authorities and health boards to introduce children’s services plans. Those plans will help with the co-ordination, design and delivery of services, which will, in turn, improve outcomes for children and young people.

Although the bill provides for local authorities and health boards to consult a variety of organisations and agencies, thereby giving them an opportunity to contribute to the preparation of the plans, there is not sufficient provision to include the views of children and young people. Amendment 176 seeks to address that. It very much speaks to the fundamental principles of the bill, which are about the centrality of children’s rights and ensuring that their voice is heard at every stage where that is appropriate.

The other amendments in the group follow a similar pattern and seek to achieve the objectives of having the widest possible consultation and having children’s voices heard throughout the process. Therefore, I will support those other amendments.

I move amendment 176.

Jayne Baxter: In preparing children’s services plans, bodies should include direct consultation with children and families, as the recipients of services, as well as with service providers. There should also be reports on how that has been achieved. Therefore, I will move amendments 223 and 231.

Liz Smith: I agree with Mr McArthur and Mrs Baxter. I thank the groups that have helpful us on the issue. Amendment 128 would require the Scottish ministers to consult the organisations that fall within section 10(2) and that might have an interest in the guidance, and such other persons as the ministers consider appropriate. I hope that that will ensure that the Scottish ministers consult voluntary organisations on guidance in which those organisations have an interest, prior to the issue or revision of that guidance. Many voluntary organisations provide services for children on behalf of local authorities and other agencies, including health boards. As such, it is only right and proper that the consultation provisions are broadened to reflect that.

Joan McAlpine: Although I am sympathetic to the sentiments behind the amendments in the group, I am not sure that the amendments are necessary. Amendment 176 is unnecessary, as there is already a requirement in the bill to consult organisations that represent the interests of children as well as children themselves. Amendment 223 suggests that young people over 18 should be consulted. My concern is that that would dilute the focus of children’s services. The amendment does not set a proportionate limit as to how much consultation would be required. The requirement in amendment 231 would be difficult to undertake and enforce. For example, how would we measure service users’ expectations of the level and quality of service?

I accept that the intention of Liz Smith’s amendment 128 is to ensure that Barnardo’s and other such organisations are consulted before guidance is issued. I do not have a problem with that but, as a matter of course, the Government consults a wide range of organisations and children and families and it is inconceivable that it would not do so in the future. Therefore, the amendment need not be included in the bill.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 176 adds a duty to consult children and young people in children’s services planning. The amendment may have practical complexities that are best addressed through guidance that sets out how the views of children and young people are best represented in the planning process. A requirement exists in sections 10(1)(b)(i) and 10(2)(a) for those preparing a plan to consult such organisations that “represent the interests of persons who use or are likely to use any children’s service or related service”, and those persons would, of course, include children themselves.

Amendments 223 and 231 remind us that children’s services plans must focus on the needs of children and their families. However, the amendments are problematic. For a start, they refer to “young people”, which, given the definition of children in the bill as those up to the age of 18, suggests that children’s services planning should extend to include services to support a much wider age group, which, we believe, would hugely dilute the focus of planning on children.

The amendments also lack the proportionality that is essential for how local authorities and health boards respond to the needs and views of people in their area. Proportionality is crucial here if planning is not to become a burden rather than a boon for public bodies, and that is best addressed in guidance, which should make clear our collective expectations over how user views should inform planning. For those reasons, we do not support amendments 223 and 231.

Amendment 128 seeks to ensure that guidance on children’s services planning is issued or revised by the Scottish ministers only after consulting organisations falling within section 10(2) and such other persons as they consider appropriate in addition to the existing duty on ministers to consult the persons to whom the guidance relates. While we understand the intention behind the amendment, discussions on how that will work in practice will form part of the process of developing guidance around the duties in part 3, where consultation with relevant organisations will be ensured. It is not appropriate to legislate for that on the face of the bill; consequently, we do not support amendment 128.

In summary, we do not support the amendments in this group.

Liam McArthur: I thank colleagues and the minister for their comments on all the amendments in the group. I have listened carefully to what has been said. On amendment 176, I do not understand the concern about the aspiration to consult children and young people on the development of the plans on the basis that we do not set a limit on that consultation or the quality of it. Presumably, if that were a concern, a number of aspects of the bill would fall. If we are serious about putting children’s rights at the centre and ensuring that the voice of children is heard as a result of the bill, changes need to be made, one of which is encapsulated in amendment 176.

Jayne Baxter set out the justification for her amendments. I have nothing to add to that. On amendment 128, in the name of Liz Smith, we are very conscious that a large amount of detail is to be taken forward through guidance, which is entirely right and appropriate, but that serves only to underscore the importance of ensuring that, as the guidance is developed and subsequently amended, the widest possible input from stakeholders with the relevant expertise is brought to bear. On that basis, amendment 128 is sensible.

The Convener: Amendment 95, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 101 to 107, 111 to 116 and 118.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 101 to 103, 105 and 106 are minor drafting amendments to tidy up direction-making and guidance powers in sections 15 and 16 to ensure drafting consistency with other similar powers elsewhere in the bill. On amendments 95, 104, 107, 111 to 116 and 188, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in its report on the bill recommended that, where guidance or directions are issued by ministers under the named persons, child’s plan and wellbeing provisions in the bill, there should also be a duty for that guidance or those directions to be published. Our intention has always been to publish all bill guidance or directions. However, the bill does not currently specify that and therefore we were happy to accept the committee’s recommendation to do so.

To ensure consistency of approach, this group of amendments also moves disparate guidance and direction provisions from throughout the bill and inserts them into a new catch-all section that places a duty on ministers to publish all bill-related guidance and directions and provides that those can be issued generally or for particular purposes and to different persons for different purposes.

I urge you to support my amendments 95, 101 to 107, 111 to 116 and 118.

The Convener: Amendment 127, in the name of Liz Smith, is in a group on its own.

Liz Smith: Amendment 127 would remove the ability of local authorities and health boards to compel private and voluntary bodies, whether or not they have received state funding, to comply with demands for information, advice or assistance.

Section 14 states:
“A person mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any reasonable request made of them to provide a local authority and each relevant health board with information, advice or assistance for the purposes of exercising their functions under this Part.”

The bodies that are mentioned in subsection (2) include the private and voluntary organisations that were previously described in section 10(1)(b)(i), which provide a service in the area that, if it were provided by the local authority, any relevant health board or other service providers, would be in a children’s service or a related service. As well as the bodies that deliver services
Amendment 127 tries to remove a burden from non-statutory bodies to assist local authorities and health boards in the preparation of children's services plans by removing them from the scope of the duty in section 14(1). However, we think that it is important that those bodies are able to assist in that way, as they have a key role in developing those plans. Local authorities and health boards, while accounting for a large share of the services that should go into the plans, will need information and commentary from a wider group of service providers to ensure that the plans have the maximum strategic impact. Allowing an opt-out from a duty to assist would undermine the intention of creating collective responsibility for planning services around the wellbeing of all children in an area.

It is important to recognise that the duty in section 14(1) is for those persons mentioned in section 14(2) to comply only with “reasonable requests”. Also, by virtue of section 14(3), the duty does not apply when the person considers that providing the information, advice or assistance that has been requested would be incompatible with any duty of the person or would unduly prejudice the exercise of any of their functions. Those considerations provide safety checks on local authorities and health boards to ensure that they cannot abuse the provision in section 14 to compel persons to act in a way that would undermine their functions or be unduly onerous on them.

I hope that that has been helpful in clarifying our position. I do not support amendment 127.

Liz Smith: I will first pick up the important point that the minister made about collective responsibility. This is about having the widest impact on the children and taking into account their best interests. We have come across circumstances in which certain organisations have not been very clear about where their responsibility lies. Sometimes, children have missed out because they have not been able to access some of the services that they need. On that basis, I wish to press amendment 127.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 108, which relates to section 17(1), seeks to replace wording that was inadvertently left out of the bill when it was introduced and to ensure that the local authority, health board and other service providers’ duty to comply with section 12 is excluded from the direction-making power in section 17.

In effect, the amendment ensures that directions focus on issues of planning and not the implementation of plans and the delivery of services set out in section 12. It is all about consistency; the new wording mirrors the wording already in place in sections 15(1) and 16(1) in respect of guidance and other direction-making powers.

Amendment 109 is a minor amendment that seeks to improve the drafting of section 17(3) to clarify the persons whom the Scottish ministers... may direct to exercise planning functions, using their power in section 17(2)(b).

The purpose of amendments 110 and 117 is to remove the joint boards enforcement mechanism provided for in section 17(6) to (9). After discussion with COSLA, it was agreed that joint boards might result in the unnecessary transfer of powers from local authorities and heath boards and that the existing direction-making powers in sections 16 and 17 are sufficient for enforcement.

I hope that the committee will be able to support amendments 108, 109, 110 and 117.

6th January 2014

Dear Stewart,

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill – Government announcement of Stage 2 amendments

I would like to inform you that I intend to announce on 6 January the Scottish Government’s intention to submit Stage 2 amendments on 7 January to make changes to the Bill relating to the provision of aftercare and continuing care to young people.

As you are aware, during Stage 1 we have been engaged in detailed discussions with the sector, in particular with Who Cares? Scotland, Aberlour and Barnardo’s regarding the provision of aftercare and the desire to provide a package of continuing care for young people to enable them to maintain relationships with their carers and ease the transition to independent living.

Scottish Ministers accept the arguments and evidence for further support to this group of young people and are mindful of the Education and Culture Committee’s work in this area. The Scottish Government will therefore go as far as possible to meet the principles set out by the sector. Making the necessary changes will require significant effort on all sides, resourcing and a shift in the way we think about care on the ground. Necessarily, this will also take time.

The Committee will wish to be aware that I intend to announce our commitment to deliver a set of measures to support care leavers over the next 10 to 12 years. The amendments in this group form part of a wider package, some of which relate to Corporate Parenting and are scheduled for discussion on 7 January and the others will be considered at a future Stage 2 Committee session. Starting in April 2015, we will end a loophole that currently sees up to 40% of care leavers miss out on legal entitlements to aftercare support by virtue of the current eligibility criteria. We will move from a definition around school leaving age to a fixed age of 16 for all young people. Over the 3 years to 2018, we expect over 800 young people a year to become eligible for aftercare than now.

I am also announcing that from April 2015, each new cohort of 16 year olds (under the above definition) will be entitled to remain in their care placement – whether kinship, foster or residential care – until the age of 21. This measure empowers young people to own their care experience and will help them in time to see care as a positive, nurturing place to be.

The Scottish Government will commit to bringing forward a right to return to care to all former care leavers until the age of 21 and we are announcing the formation of an expert group in the next few weeks to establish how and over what timescales this can be achieved safely and practically. The group will also look at how we can expand the eligibility criteria for continuing care and aftercare to a larger group. The very significant complexity of this work requires we take the necessary time to write a ‘blueprint’ that works, is affordable and is acceptable to the sector.

This is a worthwhile and positive package of support for some of our most vulnerable young people and it is evidence that we are doing what is necessary to get it right for children and young people in care and for care leavers.

I look forward to saying more about these measures with the Committee shortly.

AILEEN CAMPBELL
Dear Nigel,

Thank you for your letter of 28 November regarding Section 68 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (inserting Chapter 1A into the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007) which relates to Scotland’s Adoption Register.

The Scottish Government highlighted in its response to the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s Stage 1 report on the Bill that consideration was being given to the possibility of extending the Register to other forms of permanence and whether this could increase the efficiency of permanence care planning.

I can now inform the Committee that the Scottish Government has concluded that the purpose of the Register should be restricted to facilitating adoption only. In light of this, the Government is today lodging amendments at Stage 2 to narrow the breadth of the power in section 13A(2).

The Committee has asked the Government to bring forward amendments to section 13A at Stage 2 to make provision about the purpose or intended use of the Register, in order to inform the broad power in section 13A (2) to make regulations about the Register and the information which it is to contain. The Scottish Government has taken on board the Committee’s suggestions and we are lodging an appropriate amendment.

The Committee also asked the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to restrict the terms of the power in section 13A(2)(a) to reflect the stated intention in taking the power, which is to enable information or types of information relating to children considered suitable for adoption, or to prospective adopters, to be prescribed for inclusion in the Register. The Scottish Government appreciates the Committee’s concerns in this respect and we are lodging amendments for Stage 2 to this effect.

The Committee also asked the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to restrict the terms of the power in section 13A(2)(c) to reflect the stated intention in taking the power, which is to enable provision to be made about other administrative matters associated with the operation of the Register. After consideration of the Committee’s suggestion and the evidence from a range of stakeholders in Stage 1 of the Bill, the Scottish Government wishes to retain this power as drafted. Given that the non-statutory Register has only been in operation since 2011 and the Bill provisions will make its use by adoption agencies mandatory, the volume of referrals of both children and prospective adopters is likely to increase and we would like to respond to any potential issues emerging from practice as swiftly as we can to ensure that the Register can operate effectively. This is why retaining the broad power to make further provision in respect of the Register would be desirable. We recognise that the Parliament may wish to have the ability to debate in full any further provision that may be made by regulations and given that the regulations are subject to the affirmative procedure, we consider that retaining the broad power is appropriate in this instance.

In addition, the Committee highlighted in its Stage 1 report on the Bill the power in section 13A(1) as read with section 13B. The Committee was concerned that any arrangements which delegate the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register (other than their function of making subordinate legislation) to a registration organisation and provide for payments to be made to such an organisation should be clear and accessible to those affected by them. The Scottish Government agreed in its response to the Committee’s report that an amendment would be brought forward at Stage 2 to place a requirement on the Scottish Ministers to publish any such arrangements. On further consideration of the Committee’s concerns, the Scottish Government is now lodging further amendments at Stage 2 which will clarify the provisions around payments in respect of the Register including making provision for regulations to prescribe fees or payments to be made by adoption agencies in relation to the Register.

I hope the Committee find this response helpful.

Yours sincerely

AILEEN CAMPBELL

61 After section 22, insert—
<Request that named person service is not provided

(1) A parent of a child other than a pre-school child may request that a named person service is not provided in relation to the child.

(2) A request under subsection (1)—

(a) must be made to the service provider in relation to the child, and

(b) may be made at any time until the child attains the age of 16 years.
In considering whether to approve or refuse a request made under subsection (1), the service provider must—

(a) so far as reasonably practicable, ascertain and have regard to the views of the child,
(b) take into account any factors set out in an order under subsection (9)(a), and
(c) comply with any provision made under subsection (9)(b).

In having regard to the views of the child, the service provider is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

If a request under subsection (1) is approved, no person has the function of providing a named person service in relation to the child during the period for which the request has effect and the child has no named person during that period.

A request under subsection (1) has effect—

(a) from the time the request is approved until whichever of the following occurs first—
   (i) the request is cancelled under subsection (8), or
   (ii) the child attains the age of 16 years, and
(b) regardless of any change in the opted-out service provider in relation to the child.

A child in respect of whom a request under subsection (1) has effect is referred to in this Part as an “opted-out child”.

A request under subsection (1) which has effect—

(a) may be cancelled at any time by—
   (i) the parent of the opted-out child,
   (ii) in a case where the opted-out service provider in relation to the child is satisfied that the child is of sufficient maturity to request a cancellation, the opted-out child,
(b) must be cancelled by the opted-out service provider in relation to the child in circumstances set out in an order under subsection (9)(c).

The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about—

(a) factors to be taken into account by service providers in considering requests under subsection (1),
(b) circumstances in which such requests must or must not be granted by service providers,
(c) circumstances in which a request under subsection (1) which has effect must be cancelled by the opted-out service provider in relation to a child,
(d) how a request under subsection (1) or a request for cancellation of such a request which has effect may be made,
(e) how and to whom the approval or refusal of a request under subsection (1) or the cancellation of such a request which has effect may be notified,
(f) how a refusal of a request under subsection (1) or a cancellation of such a request which has effect under subsection (8)(b) may be appealed against,
(g) such other matters relating to requests under subsection (1) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(10) The fact that a child is an opted-out child does not affect any power or duty of any person to provide any service (other than a named person service) or take any action in relation to the child.

(11) In subsections (6)(b), (8) and (9)(c), the “opted-out service provider” means the person which would, but for the fact that the child is an opted-out child, have the function of providing a named person service in relation to the child.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Stage 2

The Convener (Stewart Maxwell): Good morning. I wish everyone a happy new year. Welcome to the first meeting in 2014 of the Education and Culture Committee. I remind everyone who is present that they should switch off their mobile phones and any other electronic devices, as they may affect the broadcasting system.

Today, we will continue our consideration of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill at stage 2. I welcome to the committee the Minister for Children and Young People, Aileen Campbell, and her accompanying officials. Happy new year, minister.

The Minister for Children and Young People (Aileen Campbell): Happy new year.

The Convener: Officials are, of course, not permitted to participate in the formal proceedings of the committee. A number of non-committee members will participate in proceedings—I am sure that they will join us shortly.

We will not go beyond part 7 of the bill today. Depending on the progress that we make, I will conclude proceedings at a suitable point. Any amendments that we do not reach will be dealt with at our next meeting on 14 January.

Section 19—Named person service

The Convener: Amendment 6, in the name of Liz Smith, is grouped with amendments 8 to 15, 58, 16 to 20, 59, 21, 60, 133 to 135, 22, 61, 23 to 28, 62, 63, 29 to 40, 65, 41 to 44, 51 and 83.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): I apologise for the lengthy list of amendments in this group, but I know that members are well aware of the Conservatives’ long-standing concern about the bill’s named person provisions, which is both substantive and comes from an organisational and cost perspective.

After studying at length the evidence that was presented to the committee, we want to replace the Scottish Government’s policies with ones that we believe are more practical and which can command wider support among the public and professionals on the front line. In the first instance, we would prefer to see the provision of a universal health visitor system of the type proposed and argued for convincingly by the Royal College of Nursing and the Royal College of Midwives, which would attach all children from the immediate pre-birth stage up to the age of five to a qualified and registered health visitor.

Secondly, on account of the evidence that has been provided, which includes the unanimous findings of the Parliament’s Finance Committee, we believe that, beyond the age of five, named persons should be targeted at the most vulnerable children—the definition for which is provided by some of the amendments—to ensure that what are clearly limited resources are targeted at them instead of being spent on all children, the vast number of whom even the Scottish Government acknowledges have no compelling need for a named person.

Thirdly, we strongly believe that it is not practical nor, indeed, consistent with many other aspects of Scottish legislation to include 16 to 18-year-olds in the category of the child.

Finally, we believe that there should be some elements of opt-out, which is a principle that I note that the Scottish Government has accepted in some of its amendments.

My amendments in this group seek to alter the named person proposals in the bill to concentrate help on our most vulnerable children and to redress the balance between the state and parental responsibility, the latter of which we believe is likely to be seriously undermined by the Scottish Government’s policy.

Amendments 6, 8 to 14, 22 to 40, 42 to 44 and 51 relate to removing the term “young person” from the named person sections of the bill.

In defining a child as a person “who has not attained the age of 16”, amendment 40 seeks to limit the scope of the named person proposals to groups of children under the age of 16. Professor Kenneth Norrie told the committee:

“As the child increases in age, they increase in capacity...and have an increased right to make their own decisions and to determine how they will lead their own lives.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 3 September 2013; c 2683.]

Traditionally, 16 has been the age beyond which Scots law recognises a young person to be free of adult supervision, and there is no reason for the bill to state differently. As things stand, the Scottish Government is seeking to place all 17 and 18-year-olds under the supervision of a state-appointed guardian. That is wholly unnecessary and Highland Council pointed out that it might well be unworkable.

The idea that two 17-year-olds with an infant child would be under the supervision of not one or two but three named persons, each with a remit to become more involved in their family life is, to be frank, ridiculous and would bring about an inevitable dilution of resources for those who are most in need.

On the same principle, amendments 15 to 18, 20 and 21 would limit the named person service to vulnerable children once they reach school age. Designed specifically with the concerns of the Scottish Parent Teacher Council, the Faculty of Advocates and the Law Society of Scotland in mind, those amendments would ensure that the wishes of parents are better reflected in legislation and that the system is not swamped with children who do not need to be there.

Amendment 17 would introduce a definition of a “vulnerable child” based upon existing legislation. It seeks to bring additional clarity and to ensure that the legislation is better targeted towards those who require assistance.

Amendments 58 to 63, 65 and 83 introduce safeguards that would enable parents and children to opt out of the named person scheme. Such provisions would better reflect the wishes of parents and guardians throughout the country, many of whom have voiced considerable concern about the proposals.

On the specifics, amendment 61 makes it clear that, when a request to opt out is lodged, due regard would have to be given to the views of the child. Moreover, should a parent change their mind or should a child of sufficient maturity request that the opt-out be cancelled, that option would remain open. Amendment 62 considers the duties placed on what would be the outgoing opted-out-of service provider. Those would include informing other service providers that the child had opted out, which would ensure that the child’s wishes were properly reflected.

As the Parliament knows, the Conservatives feel strongly about this part of the bill. I ask committee members to consider carefully the four different reasons why we feel that the policy needs to be amended.

I move amendment 6.

Aileen Campbell: As a result of work undertaken by the Care Inspectorate and the Scottish Government, conditions of registration have been amended to ensure that services in secure accommodation are provided for young people only up to the age of 18 and that that is communicated to providers. Previously, on a limited number of occasions, young people have remained in secure care beyond the age of 18 in order to complete training or exams. Accordingly, amendments 133 to 135 in my name remove the duty on secure care providers to continue to provide the named person service for children aged 18 or over, as it is unnecessary.

Amendments 6, 8 to 14, 16, 19, 22 to 44 and 51 seek to remove support from children and their families, even where they have identified needs, at the time when they may face the challenge of transition to adult and post-school services. Many organisations and parents have stressed to us the importance of co-ordinated support from the school and other professionals as children with complex needs approach 17 and 18 years. Removal of the named person would simply heighten their concerns.

We all recognise that young people aged 16 or younger have varying degrees of concern, skill and maturity and the majority of them will be able to reach their own decisions on the issues that affect them either independently or with support and help from family, friends, advisers and other professionals.

Where concerns are already known, action should have been taken and support put in place, but no one knows what might happen in the next days, weeks or months. Children from all backgrounds and at any age may need help and support. They may look to family and friends for help but if they turn to public services, it makes sense for those who have been approached to be in the best place to offer advice.

The combined effect of amendments 15, 17, 18, 20 and 21 would be to negate the early intervention and preventative role of the named person. The named person provides the framework for intervening early, enabling parents to discuss their concerns and offering support. That is done before children might be considered vulnerable so that they do not become vulnerable. Practice teaches us that we cannot always identify which children are vulnerable until crises develop, by which time it may be too late. That is what the named person was designed to prevent happening.

In response to Liz Smith’s point that the named person approach might dilute support to the most vulnerable, evidence shows that that has not happened where the getting it right for every child approach is implemented effectively, as the focus on early intervention in the universal services helps to ensure that those who work with the most vulnerable children have the capacity to do so. Therefore, I cannot accept Liz Smith’s amendments 6, 8 to 44 and 51.

To turn to the named person opt-out, a fundamental purpose of the bill is to encourage early intervention and prevention, working with children and their families to offer support earlier than has been the practice in the past when thresholds of vulnerability or need have operated.

That is why we wish to establish the named person service in universal services. It is a service that is made available to all children and which will provide them with support and advice. If a child or young person does not wish to engage, they do not need to—unless there is a more serious concern about the child which demands that services become involved.

The bill as drafted places the child at the centre, while recognising the real importance of parents and the family. The amendments would remove the central focus from the child and put the parent at the centre. Parents clearly have a role but, as children mature, they will have an increased ability to take decisions for themselves.

The aim of the named person provisions as drafted in the bill is to provide a seamless service for children and families, which can flow easily from the routine support that is available through the day-to-day activity of education staff to an enhanced level of support if required and then back to routine support, where possible. The amendments call for services to dissect the role in an artificial way. We want a greater consistency of approach throughout Scotland, but the amendments mean that services would have to develop a two-tier approach, with bureaucratic procedures for opting out and opting back in.

The amendments would have a major impact on professionals. Apart from the added bureaucracy and reinforcement of silos that they would generate, there would be significant confusion over practitioners’ roles in relation to children who are part of the named person service and, separately, those who have been opted out. All we would have from the amendments is additional bureaucracy, greater confusion among practitioners and barriers to early intervention. For those reasons, I cannot support amendments 58 to 63, 65 and 83.

In summary, convener, I support my amendments 133, 134 and 135 and I do not support the other amendments in the group.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): As Liz Smith indicated, this was probably the area of most note and controversy—certainly in early consideration at stage 1.

Unlike Liz Smith and as I have made clear, I understand and support the principle underlying the named person provisions but—like a number of witnesses and, indeed, Liz Smith—I am concerned about the practical implications as regards how resources will be allocated and the circumstances in which information will be shared.

We will come to the latter issue in due course, but on the former, it is still not clear whether the focus on the wellbeing of a child as opposed to a narrower definition of welfare will have the effect, in some cases, of seeing resources and attention spread too thinly, with the risk that cases of genuine welfare concern are either not picked up or not picked up early enough.

We should also acknowledge the evidence that we heard at stage 1 suggesting that applying the named person provisions through the teenage years becomes increasingly problematic. Even Highland Council, an exemplar in many aspects, appears to have been unable to make that aspect of the named person approach work. That being the case, although I would not go as far as Liz Smith wishes to go in some of her amendments, I would question whether insisting on a named person up to the age of 18 is either necessary or achievable. If it is not, why run the risk of seeing scarce resources targeted at trying to do what even you, convener, from your personal experience, have acknowledged is a formidable task?

We also need to recognise the fear that some practitioners may be drawn into taking an unnecessarily interventionist approach—possibly with the best of intentions—which is neither in the interests of the child nor in keeping with the spirit of what we seek to achieve through the legislation. It may be difficult to guard against that eventuality entirely, but we need to be alive to it and the legislation and subsequent guidance need to be as robust as possible in that regard.

Liz Smith’s proposals for leaving open the possibility of opting out are interesting. On the face of it, they would seem pragmatic and likely to reduce any risk of legal challenge. My concern would be the basis on which such an opt-out was exercised and subsequently reviewed. However, the amendments are useful in at least flushing out that debate.

We will turn to my concerns about information sharing in discussion of a later grouping.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): As I have said previously, in principle I have no objection to putting the named person provisions in the bill. I want the best possible protection and support system for our children, as many other members do. However, the system has to work and it has to be properly resourced.

Amendments 6, 8 to 11, 13, 14, 23 to 28, 30 to 40, 42 and 43 in the name of Liz Smith, which seek to address a concern that the named person is not needed for young people over the age of 18, are worthy of support.
When Bill Alexander, the director of health and social care at Highland Council, gave evidence to the committee, I was concerned when he questioned why a named person would be needed for most children who have left school. He said:

“I do not understand how my daughter, who is 17 and doing performing arts in Manchester, could have a named person; she will not need or want one.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 24 September 2013; c 2858.]

There is no doubt that some young people will require additional support after leaving school, and it is important to have proportionate ways of supporting such individuals in managing their situations. However, the vast majority of young people who leave school will neither need nor want a named person, so a named person for all young people who are over 16 is not a necessity.

Members will know that Highland Council was the national pathfinder for implementing GIRFEC. Therefore, we need to listen to people such as Bill Alexander when they raise such issues. The Scottish Government might have technical issues with the amendments, but there are technical issues with the bill. I am minded to support the amendments that I listed in the name of Liz Smith.

I am not minded to support Liz Smith’s amendments to provide for an opt-out. As I said, I support the principle of the named person, and those amendments could undermine what the Scottish Government is trying to achieve. However, like Liam McArthur, I think that it is useful to debate the issues.

I am not convinced by Liz Smith’s other amendments on targeting of the named person role. Jayne Baxter and I have made it clear that we have concerns about resource issues, given the number of health visitors and so on who are needed to fulfil existing duties, never mind the new named person role. We do not believe that the Scottish Government has addressed the resource issues properly. We do not support Liz Smith’s amendments at this stage, but the Scottish Government needs to do more to address the concerns about resourcing the named person provisions.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): I understand some of the fears that have been expressed. It is important to recognise parents’ role, so I have thought hard about and looked at the issue carefully. I come down on the side of having a named person. Some of the debate has been misleading, using terms such as “state-appointed guardian”. I was convinced to support the proposal because it is about information sharing to support vulnerable children. All the tragedies in which children have died have occurred because information was not shared. The named person’s role is crucial in that.

For that reason, I question in the politest possible way the logic of amendments 58 to 63, 65 and 83 in the name of Liz Smith. The purpose of the named person is to protect vulnerable children, but the people who would be likely to opt out of such provision are those who might harm their children. We all know from reading about tragic cases that it is often observed that the parents were manipulative and in many ways intelligent in how they evaded the authorities’ scrutiny. For that reason, allowing people to opt out of the system would be completely wrong.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): I do not agree with the amendments that would reduce from 18 to 16 the age limit for having a named person. I agree that, in some circumstances, the position will be more difficult and young people who are over 16 will not need a named person’s services, but the named person might still be important in some instances. For example, when such a child or young person is still at school, it is important that they still have access to a single point of contact for whatever services there might be.

Highland Council gave the example of a young person who is in further education. We know that good pastoral care is provided in higher education and colleges, but other young people in that age group might not have access to another point of contact for support. On that basis, it is important that the named person continues to be available until the young person is 18.

The Convener: Thank you very much. I will make one or two comments on the issue. The named person provisions have been widely debated. Like others, we came to that part of the bill with some scepticism because we wanted to ensure that what was proposed dealt with the questions that members of the public and the committee and some of those who gave evidence to the committee had about it. I am more than satisfied by the answers that have been provided and the evidence that has been given to the committee on the issue. I do not think that it is in any way helpful or accurate to describe a named person as a state-appointed guardian.

On Liz Smith’s amendments 58 to 63, 65 and 83, I genuinely believe that the opt-out would be unhelpful for a number of the reasons that have been mentioned, including increased bureaucracy and confusion. I also have concerns along the same lines as those raised by Joan McAlpine. While many parents would never access a named person and might decide to opt out on that basis, which would do no harm, there may well be individuals who would do harm to their children who would use an opt-out, leaving a question mark. Providing the option for those who wish to evade the services and support that we are talking about is a concern.

On 16 to 18-year-olds, I, like others, listened carefully to Bill Alexander’s evidence. Although he has a point that some young people in that age group do not require such services, over the past two years, particularly as part of our inquiry, we have heard from many young people who have come and talked to us about their desire to have access to support services and the ability to go and speak to somebody. In many cases, they were above the age of 16.

Some young people will still be at school, some will be looked after and others will be looked after at home, but many young people are in a vulnerable position and they should be able to have a single individual whom they know—the named person—whom they can go to or others can access. In most cases, who that named person is will be obvious, and I would not like to lose that from the bill. For all those reasons, I do not support Liz Smith’s amendments.

I call Liz Smith to wind up and to press or withdraw her amendment.

Liz Smith: I fully recognise that the Conservatives have a different view on the entire policy, particularly from the substantive point of view. However, far too many doubts remain about the costing of the policy. Of all the committee sessions that I have ever seen in this Parliament, the one on the named person provided compelling evidence and, on all sides of the political spectrum, there was a strong feeling that the resourcing of the policy was totally inadequate. I ask the Scottish Government to reflect on that.

I am grateful to the members who have spoken in support of the amendments that deal with the 16 to 18 age group. I am convinced that that is an unworkable aspect of the policy, not only from the substantive point of view but because the mechanics make it extremely difficult. I acknowledge that we have a fundamental difference of opinion. We have tried to put forward our views without the rhetoric to which some of the newspapers have resorted. We have based our views on fact and a lot of the evidence that has been presented to the committee.

I press amendment 6.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 6 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 6 disagreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 177, in the name of Jayne Baxter, is grouped with amendment 7.

Jayne Baxter (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab): At present, section 19 suggests that the named person could be someone, or another body, to whom the service provider has contracted out work. By deleting most of section 19(3)(a)(ii), amendment 177 seeks to prevent the service provider from contracting out the role of the named person. However, where the named person is employed directly by the service provider, we wish to ensure that, for the crucial early years of a child’s life, the named person is either a midwife or a health visitor. We hope that by specifying that in the bill we will ensure that appropriate resources are directed at the role of the health visitor. We also support amendment 7.

I move amendment 177.

Liz Smith: Amendment 7 explicitly states that the named person for nought to five years, following on from the midwife, should be a qualified registered health visitor. The Scottish Government believes that that does not take into account the flexibility of the family nurse partnership scheme, but I am not entirely persuaded by that argument.

I am much more persuaded by the concerns that have been expressed by the Royal College of Nursing and the Royal College of Midwives. They fear that in some situations health boards might allocate named person roles to professionals who are less appropriately skilled than health visitors. They feel that that would be particularly likely in tough economic times, when health boards face financial difficulties. That would be a highly regrettable situation and one that I think is contrary to the main principles of the bill.

For me, the most powerful policy that we could put in place to address many of the concerns about the care of our youngest children is provision of a universal general-practitioner-attached system of qualified and registered health visitors. That has been very much at the forefront of the campaigns from the professionals who are on the front line. Indeed, if the bill achieves nothing else, that policy would bring about the greatest positive change. I hope that members will support amendment 7. I also support amendment 177.

Liam McArthur: I support amendment 7, which, as Liz Smith said, goes part of the way towards addressing the concerns that were raised by the RCN at stage 1. That still leaves the not inconsequential matter of adequate resources being made available. As Liz Smith said in relation to the first group of amendments, there has been a failure to provide a satisfactory response to concerns that the financial memorandum figures are calculated in such a way as to ignore the increased staffing requirements for midwives, and simply inflate the hours of those who are already in the sector. I hope that the minister can accept amendment 7.

As Jayne Baxter said, amendment 177 is an attempt to prevent the named person role from being contracted out wholesale, and to ensure that it is delivered by appropriately trained staff. That seems to be a sensible measure and it is worthy of support. I support amendment 177.

Aileen Campbell: On amendment 177, the named person service for children who are under school age will be provided by the health board, and for children of school age by the local authority. However, some flexibility is required to allow for situations in which the most appropriate named person is employed by another body. For example, Highland Council uses a lead commissioning model whereby the council provides children’s services and employs health visitors. Section 19(3)(a)(ii) will allow health visitors to be appointed as named persons in that situation, notwithstanding that they are not direct employees of the health board.

We agree that it is very important that a child’s named person is properly equipped to carry out their role. That is why we have included section 19(3)(b), which provides that ministers can, by order, specify what training and qualifications the named person must have. That will ensure that staff carrying out the role have the appropriate skills and experience.

The safeguard of having order-making powers in relation to the training, qualifications, experience and position of a named person will provide a specific description of who can perform the functions and ensure that that service is not contracted out to or commissioned from inappropriate organisations. For those reasons, I do not support amendment 177.

Amendment 7 would restrict the named person for pre-school age children to registered midwives or registered nurses who are health visitors. I am well aware of the well-intentioned petitioning in that regard. However, leaving no flexibility would not be in the best interests of the child. I agree that, in the vast majority of situations, those people would be the professionals who are best placed to fulfil that role. However, the amendment leaves no flexibility for health boards to agree the appointment of another professional in exceptional circumstances, even where that would be in the best interests of the child.

The development of the family nurse partnership programme over the past few years with family nurses from a wide variety of nursing backgrounds is a clear example of where having a statutory requirement for the named person to be a midwife or health visitor would not be in the best interests of the child or family. A growing number of vulnerable families have a family nurse providing intensive support while the child is under two years old. During that time, they are better placed to carry out the named person function for the child because they have the skills and they have frequent contact and an established relationship with the family. In addition, in exceptional circumstances the GP might be the one who undertakes the role of the named person. The bill provides the flexibility that will allow that to happen; amendment 177 would prevent it from happening at all.

In line with amendment 177, our statutory guidance will recommend that for the vast majority of children and families the named person role for the newborn will be the midwife and then a health visitor. Under section 19, we also have the capacity to make an order on the training qualifications and experience of those who can fulfil the named person function. As a result, I do not support amendment 7.

The Convener: Thank you. Jayne Baxter will wind up and tell us whether she wishes to press or to seek to withdraw amendment 177.

Jayne Baxter: Midwives and health visitors play central roles in family life, and I want to ensure that that is resourced and delivered by appropriately qualified staff. I think that that principle needs to be enshrined in the bill. I am not prepared to see it diluted or be subject to flexibility, so I will press amendment 177.

The Convener: Amendment 129, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 130, 152 and 156.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 129, 130, 152 and 156 will amend the named person provision so that the named person functions will not apply while the young person is subject to service law as a member of any of the reserve forces. The local authority will continue to provide the named person function at all other times for those young people, which means that while the young person is at home and going about their life in the usual way, the named person service will be available to them and will cease to be available only when they are away with the reserve forces.

It would be logistically problematic for the local authority to provide the named person service to a young person when their duties with the armed forces were taking place on Ministry of Defence premises or outwith the local authority area. If the young person is on call out, duty or training with the reserve forces, the Ministry of Defence will have a duty of care for the young person.

We do not consider that that will diminish the level of support for wellbeing that young person will receive, because we expect the armed forces to exercise a comparable level of support for the young person’s wellbeing while the young person is on duty with them. We intend to negotiate a memorandum of understanding with the MOD to detail how that support for wellbeing will be maintained. Therefore, I urge the committee to support amendments 129, 130, 152 and 156.

I move amendment 129.

Amendment 129 agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 178, in the name of Jayne Baxter, is grouped with amendment 329.

Jayne Baxter: Section 19 outlines the functions of the named person service and amendment 178 would expressly add preventing harm to the child or young person to the functions of a named person. The named person could play an important role in preventing harm to a child or young person; amendment 178 would further emphasise the importance of the named person in exercising their functions or preventing harm to the child or young person.

I move amendment 178.

Liam McArthur: My amendment 329 reflects the concerns that have been highlighted by the WAVE Trust and other experts who were involved in developing the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” report. As amendment 178 does, amendment 329 underscores the not unreasonable belief that the bill should contain proper emphasis on the need for prevention. I am bound to say that it is disappointing that the minister has, to date, not seen fit to accept a single amendment from any Opposition member, despite all our willingness to share with her and her officials the areas of concern that we have about a bill that enjoys cross-party support. Indeed, the sole exception to the Scottish Government’s apparently exclusive right to amend the bill is Joan McAlpine’s amendment on the theme of preventative action, which was agreed to at our previous meeting. I encourage Aileen Campbell to turn over a new leaf in the new year and to start showing some evidence of her commitment to the collaborative working that we talked about throughout stage 1.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): I am struggling to see what amendments 178 and 329 would add to the bill. On amendment 178, the functions of a named person already include promoting, supporting and safeguarding wellbeing. On amendment 329, under the bill corporate parents will already have to be alert to matters that might adversely affect the wellbeing of the child. What the amendments propose would not really add to that.

The concept of wellbeing was strongly supported during the bill consultation and the term is widely understood among professionals. Amendments 178 and 329 would not strengthen the bill or add protection for the child. I would be interested to hear from the minister whether guidance might add to or strengthen the provisions. As they stand, I do not see what the amendments would add.

Aileen Campbell: With respect to amendment 178, I whole-heartedly agree that preventing harm to a child is a crucial objective for all services and the wider community. Public services have responsibilities to look out for and to protect children from harm, abuse, exploitation, trafficking, and neglect. That includes taking action when harm is discovered.

It also means taking preventative action when wellbeing might be compromised. That is a key aim of the bill and it is central to the functions of the named person. We are deliberately promoting the concept of wellbeing to encourage early intervention and prevention to avoid children ending up in harm, however it is described. The definition in section 74 includes key references such as “safe”, “nurtured”, and “healthy”, all of which embrace the necessary elements of preventing harm.

The bill seeks to shift culture and practice to ensure that practitioners initiate action to support wellbeing not just through the lens of harm or child protection. That is what promoting, supporting and safeguarding mean. The bill focuses on positive outcomes for children and young people. Preventing harm is a feature of a deficit approach which does not sit with the aims of the bill and could impact adversely on how practitioners engage with families and children. The bill already embraces the aim of amendment 178, so the amendment is not necessary. For those reasons, and although I agree absolutely with its aim, I oppose amendment 178.

On Liam McArthur’s amendment 329, and in the spirit in which he talked about it, when we feel that the bill can be improved, we have worked with stakeholders to draft our own amendments. If we felt that an Opposition amendment would improve the bill, we would support it, so I hope that we can—regardless of whether we have supported previous Opposition amendments—continue to work together to ensure that the guidance and subsequent legislation will do what we all want the bill to achieve in making life better for all children across Scotland.

On the specifics of amendment 329, to which Liam McArthur spoke, a key responsibility of corporate parents as set out in section 52(a) of the bill is their being alert to “matters which, or which might, adversely affect the wellbeing of children and young people”. Wellbeing is a widely understood definition and quite clearly includes safety from harm, as is the word “safe” in the SHANARRI—safe, healthy, active, nurtured, achieving, respected, responsible and included—framework. The committee debated the word “wellbeing” at its previous stage 2 meeting, and the majority of members felt that it is a useful holistic term. Consequently, there is no need to specify the prevention of harm as a specific duty because it is already encapsulated in the existing duty in section 52(a). We can, of course, elaborate on that further in the guidance that will be issued to corporate parents under section 57 of the bill, relating to the exercise of their corporate parenting responsibilities.

Unfortunately for Liam McArthur, therefore, I cannot support amendment 329.

In summary, I do not support either amendment.

Jayne Baxter: I welcome many of the minister’s comments, and I fully understand the concept of wellbeing. However, I am thinking back to some of Joan McAlpine’s earlier comments about some of the very distressing cases that have come to light. There is therefore nothing wrong in focusing on preventing harm and looking through that prism. I will press amendment 178.

leaving age, whichever is later, will have access to a named person. The local authority will have to make the service available to all schoolchildren who reside in their area with only limited exceptions, for example where the child attends a school in another area or attends an independent school and the duties transfer to other bodies.
Children who do not have a standard pattern of school attendance and those who are temporarily or permanently excluded from school will continue to benefit from the named person service.

As a result, we believe that amendment 179 is unnecessary. Statutory guidance will detail the practical arrangements that are to be made for different groups of children. I therefore ask the member not to move amendment 179.

I move amendment 131.

Jayne Baxter: With amendment 179, I seek clarification of the support available to children who have been expelled or excluded from school.
As we have made clear throughout, although we support the named person process in principle, we need assurances that it will be adequately resourced and appropriately supported and that no child will fall through potential gaps in the system.

Joan McAlpine: I cannot see how amendment 179 is necessary, given that the legislation's central purpose is to give all children, including those who are temporarily or permanently out of full-time education, access to a named person. I am quite relaxed about and satisfied with the approach that is being taken and feel that the guidance will provide details of the named person for children who are outwith mainstream education.

Aileen Campbell: To echo Joan McAlpine’s comments, I feel that amendment 179 is unnecessary as the bill currently places a duty on local authorities to make the named person service available to all children and young people living in their area. That means that even a child or young person who is temporarily or permanently excluded from school will be covered by the named person provisions.

Given our belief that amendment 179 is already covered in the bill and therefore not required, I again ask Jayne Baxter not to move it.

The Convener: Amendment 136, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 137, 139, 140 to 142, 180, 143 to 145, 181, 163 and 164.

Aileen Campbell: We listened to stakeholders’ concerns throughout stage 1 and, after careful consideration of the issues, I propose the amendments in my name in this group to tighten up the bill and clarify that information should be shared when it “is likely to be” relevant to a child’s wellbeing, rather than the current “might be” relevant. The amendments further elaborate on and give context to what was always meant to be a subjective professional decision. They ensure that, where appropriate, the views of the child will be taken into account.

The amendments ensure that the holder of the information must take account of any adverse effect on the child’s wellbeing if information is shared and balance that against the benefit to the child in sharing. If the adverse effect outweighs the benefit, they must not share. That should help to allay concerns that are held by some that the duties in the section are to be complied with in the absence of any consideration of the child’s views or how the child would be affected by the provision of information.

Amendment 142 will provide comfort to professionals who are bound by duties of confidentiality and can at times, as we are aware, find themselves in a dilemma between what should be shared in a child’s best interest and the codes that bind their profession. Duties of confidentiality may be overridden, but only where the tests in sections 23 and 26 are met. At times, difficult decisions need to be made by professionals, but those provisions, as amended, will ensure that all contributing factors are taken into account.

We have listened to the concerns about section 27 and understand that, as drafted, it could allow court orders to be breached. As a result, the amendments to sections 23, 26, 27 and 38 will tighten the provisions to ensure that that should not happen.

Section 27 provides reassurance for professionals in respect of breaches of duties of confidentiality only if they apply the tests under section 26 and comply with the Data Protection Act 1998. The amended provisions should ensure that appropriate information is identified and consideration is given to sharing. They achieve improved but not excessive information sharing, which has been the aim of our policy all along.

With the amendments to those sections, the test for sharing information and the factors to be taken into account in doing so will be more explicit. We... will continue to liaise closely with stakeholders and listen to their views, in particular the Information Commissioner's Office. As he suggests, we will work in partnership with him in producing clear guidance, which will further enhance the application of those provisions in practice.

I hope that the changes to the bill will be welcomed and accepted. I know that the Law Society and the Information Commissioner's Office have already written to the committee to give broad support to my amendments.

On where the Law Society and the information commissioner have remaining concerns about the amendments, I offer a reassurance to the committee that our amended provisions permit the sharing of information in breach of a duty of confidentiality only in the circumstances in which sections 23 and 26 are complied with and where, in the interests of the child's wellbeing, it is necessary to do so. They do not permit or require the breach of any other restriction on information sharing, including the Data Protection Act 1998.

The effect of amendments 180 and 181 would be to remove sections 26 and 27 in their entirety, which would mean the duties on information holders to share relevant and appropriate information with the named person in a structured and targeted way. The amendments would hinder the ability of the named person service to promote early intervention and engage in preventative work, as there would be less clarity on when and with whom information should be shared, as well as on the criteria to be applied when considering whether to share information. Removal of those sections would remove a major policy aim of the bill.

The information-sharing provisions in the bill do not alter the application of the existing framework for information sharing under the Data Protection Act 1998. They do not constitute an interference with the European convention on human rights. Moreover, in written evidence, the Information Commissioner's Office said that advantages arise from the named person as a single point of contact, particularly in ensuring the consistency and accuracy of the information that is being shared about the child or young person. It said:

"Section 26 of the Bill also assists with compliance with Principle 1 of the Act by providing a lawful basis for the sharing of information by service providers and relevant authorities."

On section 27, practitioners have told us that they feel exposed when sharing information, and at times find it difficult to balance doing the right thing with breaching their duty of confidentiality. The section allows practitioners to act in the best interests of the child in the full knowledge that they are protected by law when they are doing the right thing.

In summary, I ask members to support my amendments and ask Liz Smith not to move amendments 180 and 181, which are unnecessary.

I move amendment 136.

Liz Smith: From day 1, the information-sharing issue has been hugely complex and controversial, and I think that it was generally agreed at the start that sections 26 and 27 did not help the safe passage of the bill. The Conservatives' view has been that those two sections are not necessary, as the Data Protection Act 1998 already covers the requirements for information sharing. Moreover, even with the proposed changes from "might be" relevant to "is likely to be" relevant, there is still confusion about the provisions and how that will be interpreted by the courts.

Fundamentally, the sections do not provide the same protection for personal data as the Data Protection Act 1998 does. There is therefore the implication that the act disappears or that the new measure takes precedence, which would be incompetent. The Data Protection Act 1998 already complies with the European Parliament and the Council of the European Union's directive 95/46/EC of October 1995. The sections contain no similar protections. We are strongly of the view that the provisions in question should be taken out of the bill altogether to clarify matters of law and to avoid the risk of later challenge.

Liam McArthur: As I said earlier, as well as the concerns that exist about the resource implications and the potential for focus on genuine issues of welfare to be diluted, I have another anxiety about the practical consequences of the named person proposals, which arises in the area of information sharing. It relates, in particular, to the safeguards surrounding what information will be shared, when, with whom and under what circumstances. Liz Smith has highlighted some of the serious concerns that we heard about at stage 1 in relation to sections 26 and 27.

I note that the minister's amendments 137, 141 and 142 go some way towards addressing the concerns that I expressed at stage 1, but the Law Society has raised concerns about the potential for amendment 142 to allow provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998 to be disregarded, while Clan Childlaw has drawn attention to the possibility of confidential information being shared without express consent being given. I raised that issue throughout stage 1, and I would welcome the minister responding not just to what the Law Society has said—I think that she has already done that—but to the concerns that Clan Childlaw has raised. The objective that we had hoped to achieve by the end of stage 2 was that of reaching a situation in which obtaining the consent of the child or young person would be a requirement in all but exceptional circumstances. I am still hopeful that we can obviate the need to adopt the nuclear option that was advanced initially by Professor Norrie and latterly by Liz Smith, but it may well be that we need to return to the issue at stage 3 or in guidance to finally allay those concerns.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): The information-sharing provisions are among the most important in the bill. As my colleague Joan McAlpine mentioned, in many of the tragic cases that we have heard about over the years, some of the problems have been created by the lack of an ability to share information.

However, I do not believe that, therefore, information should be shared willy-nilly with everyone in such scenarios, but I believe that the Government’s amendments will tighten things up and make the situation a lot better, and that they make Liz Smith’s amendments 180 and 181 unnecessary. As the minister said, the Law Society has broadly welcomed the Government’s amendments, as has the Information Commissioner’s Office.

As the part of the bill that deals with information sharing is one of its most important parts, we need to ensure that it is framed in such a way that it can make a difference to young people’s lives.

The Convener: I would like to make a few comments before I invite the minister to respond.

We have certainly spent a lot of time looking at and discussing the bill’s provisions on information sharing. Initially, when we took evidence on sections 26 and 27, many members of the committee had concerns but, to be fair, I think that the minister has dealt with those very well. Many of the concerns were to do with the language that was used, much of which has been tightened up. I am strongly in favour of the Government’s amendments, as I think that they answer the questions that were posed and deal with the concerns that the committee had. Therefore, I feel that Liz Smith’s amendments are no longer necessary.

Aileen Campbell: I thank members for their comments.

My amendments are based on feedback that was received from a wide range of stakeholders, including the Law Society, the Information Commissioner’s Office and others. As George Adam said, they will tighten and clarify the information-sharing provisions. I understand that the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has written to the committee to say that it is pleased that the Scottish Government has listened and acted on the concerns that were raised about the information-sharing provisions, and I will continue to work with any stakeholders that may continue to have concerns. I think that Liz Smith said that some stakeholders remain concerned, and the door is open to them if they want to engage with us further as the bill progresses so that we can allay their fears.

In response to what Liam McArthur said, we want to ensure that the child’s views are taken into account when the professional decides whether to share information. My amendments will ensure that the wellbeing of the child is balanced against any adverse effect on the child and that confidentiality may be breached only when the stricter tests apply. They should alleviate the concerns that were raised during evidence taking at stage 1.

Of course, we all want to get to a position in which no child is neglected or harmed and in which children can reach their full potential. That goal can be achieved only by acting earlier and preventing problems from escalating. The named person needs the information that others hold about a child’s wellbeing to be shared with them so that early signs can be picked up and acted on before a crisis is reached.

Therefore, I ask the committee to support my amendments and to oppose amendments 180 and 181.

I move amendment 146.

Jayne Baxter: Amendment 182 picks up on a key issue that has been raised in previous consideration of the named person proposal, namely the need for clarification of the roles of and interface between the named person and the lead professional.

A number of areas and issues require clarification, including the comparative remits of named person and the lead professional; their respective duties and responsibilities; the demarcation between their areas of decision making; identification of the areas in which they will operate and any limits in that respect; and whether there are likely to be any overlaps between their roles and, if so, how they will be managed. Given the need to clarify the relationship between the named person and the lead professional, I appreciate the minister’s comments about progressing the issue through guidance.

Aileen Campbell: I thank Jayne Baxter for lodging amendment 182. I absolutely recognise that the lead professional is a key element of GIRFEC, and I am committed to taking it forward in parallel with implementation of the bill’s provisions. However, given the greater variety of the individuals who take on the lead professional role and the difficulties in formulating a clear duty in statute, we are not persuaded that legislation is the best place for advancing the role. Given that flexibility is absolutely essential to its performance, clarification of who should perform the named person role should not be embedded in statute.

As I said in my opening remarks, we already plan to issue guidance on the named person service that will contain details on how the named person should interact with the lead professional. We believe that the best place for advancing the role is through guidance. Given the need to clarify the relationship between the named person and the lead professional, I appreciate the minister’s comments about progressing the issue through guidance.

Section 29—Directions in relation to named person service

The Convener: Amendment 148, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 159 to 162.

Aileen Campbell: These amendments seek to change the list of appropriate bodies subject to a duty to assist and share information with the named person and to ensure that those bodies, which are defined in part 4 as “relevant authorities”, comply with any directions issued by the Scottish ministers in relation to the named person functions.

As the National Waiting Times Centre board provides a range of specialist services to children and young people, it holds relevant information about children’s wellbeing. However, as the Scottish Court Service, Mental Health Tribunal for Scotland and Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland are not primarily public-facing, they are not primary sources of information on children’s wellbeing. Because they generally obtain their information from other persons already listed in the schedule, they requested that they be removed from the schedule and, on review, we have agreed that they should not be on it.

As a regional strategic body is primarily a funding body, it does not, in that capacity, require to be listed in schedule 2. Where it provides education, it is covered under the reference to “post-16 education body” and, as a result, is already listed in the schedule in that capacity.

I therefore ask members to support all of the amendments in this group.

The Convener: Amendment 316, in the name of Liam McArthur, is grouped with amendments 336, 317, 318, 320 to 326, 328, 330 and 331.

Liam McArthur: The amendments in the group seek to address concerns about vagueness in the language that is used in the bill while more effectively linking the preventative approach that we wish to see through part 3, which is on children’s services planning, with effective delivery of those plans. Once again, I am indebted to the broad coalition of expert groups and individuals behind the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” report for their suggestions on how we might improve the bill in that regard.

Amendments 316 and 328 reflect a concern that the phrase “capable of” might be too theoretical and that we should seek to provide assurance that wellbeing needs will be met. Amendments 336, 317 and 320 reflect a desire to make the language less vague and would set out more explicitly, particularly in the context of young babies, the needs that are to be met, while ensuring that the bill does not simply sanction a passive or reactive approach. The evidence from the coalition is that many children with significant needs are among those least likely to come to the attention of public services, notably before the age of three.

Amendments 318 and 321 acknowledge that, unlike in many other countries, the great majority of children in Scotland are not meaningfully screened in terms of their overall development in the two years following the assessments that are done in the first days and weeks of their lives. That seems to limit the opportunities for early detection of problems and to lead to more costly and perhaps less effective remedial action being taken later on.

It is important that, as well as ensuring that plans capture in a transparent fashion the outcomes for a child’s wellbeing and life chances, account is taken of any new and emerging needs, again in the spirit of making the preventative approach a reality. That is the thrust of the remaining amendments in the group, which I hope will elicit support. I look forward to hearing the comments of colleagues and the minister.

I move amendment 316.

Liz Smith: I am broadly supportive of the amendments in Mr McArthur’s name. There has been a bit of vagueness surrounding some of the intention behind section 31 and one or two later sections. Mr McArthur’s amendments are helpful in focusing minds. I, too, am grateful to the stakeholders who have given us a lot of information and to some of the practitioners on the front line who have helped us to understand exactly where problems might arise.

Joan McAlpine: I, too, am sympathetic to the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” campaign—indeed, at the committee’s previous meeting, I moved an amendment on prevention. However, I am not sure that the amendments in this group are all strictly necessary, and I will be interested to hear what the minister has to say.

On amendment 316, I am concerned that a child’s plan would be required in every case in which a child’s needs are not being met, as that might not always be necessary and could divert resources away from where they are really needed. On amendment 317, the bill currently focuses on the desired outcome of wellbeing, I am not sure that the amendments are all absolutely necessary.

Aileen Campbell: I thank Liam McArthur for explaining the intent of his amendments and I echo his thanks to the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” coalition. However, like Joan McAlpine, I do not consider that the amendments are necessary.

Amendment 316 seeks to require a relevant authority to develop a child’s plan in every case in which a child’s needs are not being met or are not fully met by existing supports. That might result in a move to statutory measures before full consideration has been given to the support that is available in universal services. The amendment would potentially lead to an increase in bureaucracy without any real gain in support to children. The requirement to consider the full range of universal services that are potentially available to meet the child’s wellbeing needs is necessary to ensure that there is no tendency to move too quickly to specialist services and statutory planning when they are not required.

The GIRFEC approach is an outcomes-focused approach that builds on strengths to promote resilience in addressing concerns about a child’s wellbeing. Amendment 317 would require any targeted intervention to focus on preventing the child’s wellbeing from being further compromised rather than on the desired outcome of improved wellbeing. That could result in missed opportunities to promote, support and safeguard wellbeing through early intervention.

The bill requires any concerns about wellbeing that are shared with the named person to be taken into consideration in a decision on whether the child requires a child’s plan. That would of course include any relevant and proportionate information that came to light in the course of routine screening. Amendments 318, 321 and 324 are therefore unnecessary.

Subordinate legislation that will be created under sections 32 and 37 will prescribe the information that is required in the child’s plan, and that will be supported by guidance. Amendments 320 and 326 are therefore unnecessary.

Amendments 322, 323, 330 and 331 aim to achieve similar things in relation to managing the child’s plan and reports by corporate parents, which are covered in parts 5 and 7 respectively. We feel that those amendments are also unnecessary, as they would not add to the assessment of or reporting on the child’s wellbeing, which is already covered fully by parts 5 and 7. The existing wording of section 37 covers all wellbeing needs of the child, the appropriateness of any intervention and an assessment as to whether the outcome has been achieved. The amendments are therefore unnecessary.

The level of detail in amendment 325 is also unnecessary, as the intention behind it is already addressed through the provisions on the review of the child’s plan in sections 37(1) and 37(4). Similarly, we feel that amendments 330 and 331 would introduce reporting duties that would be too specific to apply to all corporate parents. We fully expect corporate parents to take account of wellbeing needs and outcomes when preparing their reports as per section 55(2), which already provides that reports may, in particular, include information about standards of performance and outcomes that are being achieved.

The bill already addresses the aim of preventing wellbeing needs from arising, as reinforced by the committee’s agreement at its previous meeting to accept Joan McAlpine’s amendment 171 in respect of part 3. On amendments 336 and 328, although I absolutely share the desire to ensure that any assessment of needs is robust and comprehensive, I do not consider that the proposed definition of needs will achieve that. The definition and use of “wellbeing” in the bill provide a holistic framework.

Consequently, I do not support the amendments in the group.

Liam McArthur: I thank Joan McAlpine and Liz Smith for their comments, and I thank the minister for her detailed response and the spirit in which it was offered. I also thank the coalition behind the report “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water”, which has been incredibly useful and insightful in informing the discussion at stage 2. It has provided a useful opportunity to highlight some of the important issues that have been raised.

I do not suppose that the amendments will be passed, but I hope that they will go some way towards informing the way in which guidance is developed in due course. I therefore press amendment 316.

Aileen Campbell: Although the bill rightly places duties on public bodies to provide the right help to children to promote, support and safeguard wellbeing, the Scottish Government also recognises the important role that the third sector can play in local communities in supporting children and their families.

The amendments broaden the definition of targeted intervention to cover the provision of services by a third party—for example, a third sector provider not contracted by the health board or the local authority. Under the amendments, a relevant authority can arrange for a third sector organisation to provide such interventions.

This is absolutely not about privatising key services, as the responsibility for the child’s plan remains with the responsible managing authority. If we value the contribution of the third sector in supporting wellbeing, we need to ensure that there is a mechanism to co-ordinate that support within the statutory planning framework, where appropriate. The amendments ensure that the full range of interventions to support the child is captured in the child’s plan and that all the interventions that are provided are in accordance with the child’s plan and the child’s needs. Those who provide a targeted intervention would be a partner to the plan. The bill also requires that anyone who provides a targeted intervention under the plan must be consulted when the plan is reviewed.

The amendments will not place a duty on third sector organisations to provide a targeted intervention, but they recognise the important role of third sector services in their communities. The voluntary sector has asked for these amendments, and it will welcome them as they ensure that the valuable work that it does will continue to be included in the child’s plan. I therefore ask the committee to support the amendments.

The Convener: Amendment 262, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 183, 263, 272 to 274, 280, 281, 283 and 297. If amendment 183 is agreed to, I will be unable to call amendment 263, which is in this group, and amendment 244, which has already been debated on day 1, because of pre-emption.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 262, 272, 280 and 297 ensure that there is a consistent link between the named person and the creation, management and review of a child’s plan where the named person does not work for the authority that is responsible for the plan. The amendments ensure that the named person is at the heart of the single planning process and that the plan is prepared using accurate and relevant information about the child’s wellbeing.

Where the named person is an employee of the responsible authority, they will lead on the preparation and review of the child’s plan as appropriate. However, it will not always be appropriate for the named person to prepare the plan. For example, when a concern emerges about a child who requires urgent intervention by a specialist or targeted service provider such as child protection, it might be right for social work to lead on the plan. The amendments ensure that the named person will always be contacted to gain a full picture of the child’s wellbeing when decisions are made about the plan.

Amendments 263, 273, 274 and 281 widen the scope of whose views should be regarded in the preparation and management of a child’s plan. They enable ministers to specify who should be consulted and to direct or permit that a copy of the plan be given to a person or persons. That will allow the views of all relevant persons in the child’s life to be sought and considered throughout the child’s plan process.

Amendment 283 makes a minor drafting amendment to section 37 in the light of amendment 282, which has already been debated in group 25.

For those reasons, I ask the committee to support the amendments in my name in the group.

Liam McArthur’s amendment 183 adds an additional requirement for responsible authorities to consider the child’s age and maturity when obtaining their views on the need to have a child’s plan, and it requires responsible authorities to provide the child with an opportunity to indicate whether they wish to express a view when a decision is made on whether a child’s plan is required.

I agree with the principle of what Liam McArthur is trying to do, but I believe that the bill already achieves it. I am clear that responsible authorities should always seek to obtain the child’s views regardless of their situation, age, maturity, disability and communication or other needs, although we acknowledge that, in exceptional circumstances, that may not be reasonably practicable—for example, in the case of very young babies. The requirement to obtain views only so far as is reasonably practicable clearly also allows for the child to decline to give a view if they wish. The current provisions already allow for that.

The first part of amendment 183 could lead to a situation where responsible authorities could take a predetermined view that children were either too young or too immature to provide a view without testing that assumption with the child. Our preferred position is for authorities always to seek the child’s views whenever that is reasonably practicable and to take account of the child’s age and maturity when having regard to any view that is expressed. On the second part of Liam McArthur’s amendment, I believe that the bill provides sufficiently for children to choose whether to provide a view. I therefore believe that amendment 183 is unnecessary and suggest that it be withdrawn.

I move amendment 262.

Liam McArthur: As I made clear when I moved amendments to part 1 of the bill, I firmly believe that, if the bill is not to be seen as a missed opportunity, it must do more to ensure that the child’s voice is heard as part of the process of deciding how best to meet their needs and serve their interests. As I said, both the Faculty of Advocates and the Law Society of Scotland, among others, have questioned the extent to which the bill advances the rights of the child in any way. That is highly regrettable.

Amendment 183 attempts to redress that deficiency, making clear the right of the child to be heard and to have his or her views taken into account in the development of any plan. That might seem to be self-evident, but I do not think that it can be taken for granted. In the light of the comments from the Faculty of Advocates, the Law Society and others, it is clear that there is more work to be done if the legislation is to live up to its billing. It is also worth ensuring that steps are taken to seek and have regard to the views of the child’s parents as part of the process. That is reflected in the final part of amendment 183. On that basis, I hope that colleagues will see fit to support it.

The minister’s amendments in the group seem broadly helpful, but they would benefit from the addition of amendment 183, which I will move in due course.

Aileen Campbell: As I said in opening the group, authorities should always seek to obtain the child’s views. I agree with part of the principle that Liam McArthur talked about. However, if amendment 183 was agreed to, responsible authorities could take the view that a child was too young or immature to provide a view without testing that assumption with the child. That risk is real and I do not believe that anyone with an interest in the bill would wish that to happen.

As we have said, we have a degree of consensus on much of what we are trying to achieve in the bill. I sincerely believe that nobody wants what I suggested to happen. I also reiterate that the bill provides sufficiently for children to choose whether to provide a view.

I ask the committee to support the amendments in my name and not to support amendment 183, in Liam McArthur’s name.

The Convener: Amendment 45, in the name of Liz Smith, is grouped with amendments 46, 47, 300 and 312.

Liz Smith: Amendments 45 to 47 follow from extensive evidence that several groups of stakeholders have presented throughout the passage of the bill. They would introduce provisions to resolve disputes about the need for, the content of and the management of a child’s plan.

It is conceivable that parents could feel that a plan is unnecessary or inappropriately administered but, under the bill, the avenues for addressing such grievances are unclear. Amendment 45 would correct that by introducing a dispute resolution process for parents who disagree with a decision to initiate a plan. Amendment 46 relates to the preparation of a plan.

Section 33 says:

“Where the responsible authority and a relevant authority agree that it would be more appropriate for the relevant authority to prepare a child’s plan, the relevant authority is to proceed

“as soon as is … practicable.”

What will happen if the authorities do not agree? As it stands, only a reason for disagreement must be stated, which is not helpful in addressing the specific difficulties. The fact that there is a disagreement does not mean that a satisfactory discussion about the specific problems will occur.

A dispute resolution process would speed up the drafting of a plan and overcome any difficulties that might arise between responsible and relevant authorities. Amendment 46 would further strengthen the hands of parents who disagree with the content of a child’s plan. Amendment 47 relates to the management of a plan and provides for a process to resolve potential disputes as they emerge.

The same themes occur in amendments 300 and 312, in Liam McArthur’s name. They would introduce independent advocacy services and they cover similar ground.
My amendments are worth while as a way to clarify matters and I look forward to hearing the minister’s response.

I move amendment 45.

Liam McArthur: I spoke earlier of the need to ensure that the child and, indeed, the child’s parents or guardians have their voice heard during the development of the child’s plan. In many instances, it will be fairly straightforward to achieve that, but we are all aware, from cases in our constituencies and regions, that the involvement of advocacy support is critical to enabling some people—often, vulnerable individuals—to have their voice and views heard effectively.

Amendments 300 and 312 recognise that need, particularly where there may be disagreement and when emotions are already running high. They make modest but nonetheless important provision for advice on what advocacy support is available and assistance in accessing that support. They do not create any new rights to advocacy but are consistent with the existing legislation and leave considerable scope for ministers to determine how that may be delivered. Without such provision in the bill, we risk excluding many of those who might benefit most from the changes that are being made through both parts 5 and 3. As Liz Smith said, the amendments fit well with her amendments on dispute resolution, which seem both sensible and beneficial.

The Convener: As no other committee member wants to speak, I will make a brief comment before I bring the minister in. There is a question about dispute resolution that must be resolved. I am not convinced that these amendments are the answer, but evidence suggests that there is a question mark over the current status of the bill in this area and I am interested in hearing the minister’s assessment of where the bill stands and what possible remedies she may wish to bring forward.

Aileen Campbell: The Scottish Government is committed to clear, quick and accessible routes for redress for children and parents regarding the GIRFEC duties that are proposed in the bill. We are also committed to ensuring that a redress mechanism is in place in advance of the commencement of the GIRFEC duties, which is currently scheduled for 2016, as is set out in the financial memorandum. We do not, however, want to add unnecessary complexity to the complaints landscape, where there are existing mechanisms to enable people to challenge decisions or roles in public services. The Scottish Public Services Ombudsman, which is the independent body that handles complaints about devolved public services in Scotland, highlighted in evidence to the committee the difficulties that are sometimes caused by the complexity of complaints processes.

I agree with Liz Smith and our stakeholders that there has to be a clear route of redress for parents, families and children in relation to the proposed GIRFEC duties in part 5, and I have sympathy for the motivation behind amendments 45, 46 and 47. However, those amendments do not properly capture all the issues that need to be considered. Other issues that we need to consider include how children and young people—not just their parents—are able to challenge decisions that are taken about them if they feel that their needs are not being met, if appropriate. That is not covered in amendments 45, 46 and 47.

We also want to ensure that disputes concerning different duties relating to the GIRFEC planning process—for example, the need for a plan and the content of the plan—are properly linked so that we avoid overly complicated and time-consuming processes. We need to ensure that the right avenues are in place for pursuing a challenge, but we should not do that in isolation from the outcome of the wider consideration of dispute resolution in social work or the complaints processes that are already in place in local authorities, health boards and other public bodies.

We are open to considering the possibility of an order-making power, but not the one that is proposed here. We would be happy to discuss further with Liz Smith, the convener and others the issues around dispute resolution processes, including whether an enabling amendment might be required for stage 3 or, alternatively, what can be pursued more appropriately and effectively without the need for legislation through the bill.

On that basis, I cannot support amendments 45, 46 and 47.

Although I also sympathise with the motivation behind amendments 300 and 312, I am not able to support provision in the bill for an independent advocacy service such as has been outlined. The Government is committed to developing guidance to support all those who are involved in the provision of advocacy support to children and young people. That guidance will build on a set of principles and standards for independent advocacy that were published by the Scottish ministers in December. Although best practice should always be to inform children and families of where they might seek support in the event of a dispute about a child’s plan, a statutory obligation to signpost a child and his or her parents to independent advocacy in all cases when there is a dispute relating to a child’s plan is not proportionate.

Further, the definition of “independent advocacy services” in the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003, which is focused on persons with mental disorder, is not necessarily appropriate for child’s plans, which will cover a number of children with a wide range of needs.

Although I have sympathy for much of what Liam McArthur said, I do not support the amendments in this group.

The Convener: I call Liz Smith to wind up and indicate whether she wishes to press or withdraw.

Liz Smith: Thank you, convener, and thank you, minister, for what are very helpful comments. If I can, I will hold you to the commitment to discussions ahead of stage 3. As you raised in your speech, there is often complexity and a lack of understanding around this issue, part of which has been created by the problem that parents do not know what to do—they do not know where the process lies. There is a need to tackle that before stage 3.

On the basis that I will hold you to that commitment, I will not move amendment 45.

The Convener: You have moved it. Do you wish to withdraw it?

Liz Smith: I wish to withdraw it; sorry.

Amendment 45, by agreement, withdrawn.

Section 31, as amended, agreed to.

Section 32—Content of a child’s plan

Amendments 264 and 265 moved—[Aileen Campbell]—and agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 319, in the name of Liam McArthur, is grouped with amendments 266 to 271.

Liam McArthur: Amendment 319 is very much in keeping with the thrust of what I have sought to achieve in previous groupings of amendments, namely the involvement of parents as well the child in the development of a child’s plan. The importance of that needs to be more explicitly stated in the bill, as does the fact that we do not just wish to see parental involvement but recognise that, at times, that might require support to be effective.

I would be interested in the minister’s comments on her amendments in this group, but I see no difficulty with them at all.

I move amendment 319.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 266, 268, 269, 270 and 271 seek to ensure that a child’s plan can only contain a targeted intervention where the authority that is to provide it agrees to do so. They also will ensure that, where there are no targeted interventions that can be included in a child’s plan, the duty to prepare a plan is removed.

Amendment 266 will help to ensure that only those professionally qualified to determine the appropriateness of a targeted intervention can agree to have it included in a child’s plan. For example, where the relevant authority is a health board, it must agree to the health service support when requested to provide it by a local authority.

When such a service is asked to provide a targeted intervention and it believes in its professional opinion that the intervention is unnecessary or inappropriate, it can disagree with its provision. Such situations will not be commonplace and, when a service disagrees, it will have to provide a statement of reasons for doing so, which will provide some level of accountability.

Amendment 271 will ensure that, when there are no targeted interventions that could be contained in a child’s plan because a relevant authority does not agree to provide an intervention, the duty on the responsible authority to prepare the plan is removed. That will prevent a child’s plan being put in place when disagreements exist over what interventions can be provided and will ensure that unnecessary interventions that are not in the child’s best interest are avoided. Guidance will ensure that services are clear as to when such a situation may arise and the appropriate manner in which to deal with them.

Amendments 268, 269 and 270 are minor amendments that are being made in consequence of amendments 266 and 271. The amendments do not affect the general duty on a responsible authority to prepare a child’s plan if a child has a wellbeing need, so that, if there are other targeted interventions that could be provided to meet the wellbeing need, there will still be a requirement to prepare a plan.

Amendment 267 is a typographical amendment and removes a stray “a” in section 32.

Amendment 319, in the name of Liam McArthur proposes that all plans stipulate support arrangements for the child’s parents and how parents will be included in the plan. That is not necessary or appropriate in all cases. The child’s plan must focus on the needs of the child. If support is required to help the parent in order to improve the wellbeing needs of the child, that will be recorded in the plan, but to make the inclusion of such information a requirement in all cases is neither proportionate nor necessary.

I do not support amendment 319 but do support all the other amendments in this group in my name.

The Convener: I ask Liam McArthur to wind up and indicate whether he wishes to press amendment 319.
Liam McArthur: I confirm that the minister’s amendments in this grouping are indeed helpful in improving the bill, but I am not convinced that there is not a need for amendment 319 as well, so I press amendment 319.

Section 34—Responsible authority: general

The Convener: Amendment 275, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendment 276.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 275 corrects another typographical error in the bill.

Amendment 276 is necessary to clarify that a local authority that places any child in an independent or grant-aided school outside that local authority area retains responsible authority status in respect of that child. That means that the local authority will be responsible for determining whether a child’s plan is required. Where appropriate, it will also prepare and manage that plan.

Amendment 276 also ensures that when a child is placed or detained in residential accommodation, including secure accommodation, in an area other than their home local authority area, the home local authority retains responsibility for the child’s plan. That reflects current good practice, whereby a child’s home local authority retains responsibility for looked-after children when they are accommodated outside that authority area.

The amendment seeks to ensure that the provisions of section 35 reflect current good practice, which is why I support it.

I ask the committee to support both my amendments in the group.

Section 38—Assistance in relation to child’s plan

The Convener: Amendment 286, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 287 to 296 and 311.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 286 to 292 extend the duty to provide assistance, advice and information under section 38 to persons who are listed in the new schedule that amendment 293 inserts. That allows authorities that are exercising child’s plan functions to ask persons listed in the schedule for information and assistance with regard to the child’s plan, in the same way that a named person can, prior to the plan being initiated. That strengthens the bill in relation to children with high-level needs where co-ordinated input from a range of services may be necessary to promote, support and safeguard their wellbeing.

Amendments 292 and 311 add a power for the Scottish ministers to modify the new schedule by order and provide that such an order would be subject to affirmative parliamentary procedure.

Amendments 294 to 296 amend the provisions around guidance and directions in part 5 to achieve consistency in the bill as a whole and to take account of the fact that Scottish ministers will be listed in the new schedule in relation to part 5.

8 January 2014

Dear Stewart,

Further to yesterday's announcement on expanding eligibility for early learning and childcare to 2 year olds from workless households in August 2014, estimated at around 15% (8,400) of 2 year olds, I wanted to clarify that the intention is to do this through secondary legislation.

The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill was designed to allow expansion of early learning and childcare provision through secondary legislation; and, the intention was made clear that this would apply to 3 and 4 year olds in the first instance, with further expansion when it was affordable and sustainable. The confirmation of consequential funding in December has enabled us to make this initial additional expansion.

Eligibility for 600 hours of early learning and childcare for 2 year olds who are looked after or under a kinship care order are set out on the face of the Bill as we wanted to signal early our very clear intentions to cover those most vulnerable 2 year olds; and, to make alternative provisions for those looked after 2 year olds in terms of their wellbeing needs (as currently set out in section 45).

The flexibility of using secondary legislation means that the subsequent expansion to 27% of 2 year olds could also be carried out this way.

We will engage closely with stakeholders throughout this process.

best,

Aileen

AILEEN CAMPBELL
CHILDREN & YOUNG PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL: AMENDMENT TO REPEAL CHILD PERFORMANCE LICENSING RESTRICTIONS

I am writing to make you aware that I have lodged an amendment to the Children & Young People (Scotland) Bill which would repeal existing restrictions linked to the participation of children under 14 in performances.

As you will know, local authorities currently have responsibility for licensing those children under school leaving age who wish to take part in performances. The licensing arrangements are provided for under section 38 of the Children & Young Persons Act 1963.

In addition to the overarching safeguards delivered through the licensing regime, the 1963 Act also introduced additional restrictions focussing on performances by children aged under 14. Specifically, it prevents a licence being granted to a child under the age of 14 except where the child is acting or dancing (in a ballet) and the part can only be taken by a child of that age, or where the part is wholly or mainly musical or consists only of opera and ballet. These restrictions are commonly referred to as the ‘under 14 rule’.

The UK Government approached us in December notifying their intention to repeal the ‘under 14 rule’ in England and Wales and lodged an amendment to their Children & Families Bill on 17 December to deliver that change.

The ‘under 14 rule’ does seem rather arbitrary in nature and does not take account of the circumstances of individual children, their maturity or resilience. Furthermore, it does not properly take account of the wide range of performance opportunities that are now available to younger children, the majority of which result in extremely positive experiences which benefit their wellbeing. We are therefore minded to make a corresponding change to the law in Scotland.
It is also important to recognise that a lack of action on our part would result in Scotland being placed at a competitive disadvantage to other parts of the UK, both in terms of opportunities for children and for the creative industries.

We are confident that the change would not result in children’s wellbeing being negatively impacted. Whilst we are generally satisfied that the overarching licensing framework is sound, we have been working with stakeholders over a period of months to explore how we can improve the existing arrangements and hope to shortly be in a position to consult more broadly on our proposals.

Unfortunately, the timing of the UK Government’s decision has limited our ability to consult widely on the proposed removal of the ‘under 14 rule’ in Scotland. However, we have sought views from a number of key stakeholders including BBC, OFCOM, Scottish Youth Theatre, Barnardo’s and Glasgow City Council regarding the proposed change and the response has been favourable. We have also taken account of the fact that a previous UK Government consultation on this subject indicated strong support for such a change and many of the organisations (particularly those from the creative industries) who participated in that consultation operate on a UK-wide basis.

I recognise that it would have been preferable for the Committee to have had an opportunity to consider this proposed change before now. However, I trust that this letter is helpful in setting out the compelling reasons for pursuing an amendment even at this late stage. Of course, if you or any other member of the Committee would like to discuss the matter in more detail please do not hesitate to contact me.

After section 43

An order under section 43 must be made by statutory instrument.

The Scottish Ministers may not make an order under section 43 unless they have laid a draft order before the Scottish Parliament.

Before making a draft order under subsection (2), the Scottish Ministers must consult—

  (a) organisations working for, or on behalf of, children requiring and accessing early learning and childcare services,

  (b) parents of children requiring and accessing early learning and childcare services,

  (c) providers of early learning and childcare services, and

  (d) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

For the purposes of consultation under subsection (3), the Scottish Ministers must—

  (a) lay a copy of the proposed draft order before the Parliament,

  (b) publish the proposed draft order in such manner as they consider appropriate, and

  (c) have regard to any representations about the proposed draft order that are made to them within 60 days of the date on which the copy of the proposed draft order is laid before the Parliament under paragraph (a).

In calculating any period of 60 days for the purposes of subsection (4)(c), no account is to be taken of any time during which the Parliament is dissolved or is in recess for more than 4 days.
(6) When laying a draft order before the Parliament under subsection (2), the Scottish Ministers must also lay before the Parliament an explanatory document giving details of—
   (a) the consultation carried out under subsection (3),
   (b) any representations received as a result of the consultation, and
   (c) the changes (if any) made to the proposed draft order as a result of those representations.

CONTINUING CARE
Continuing care: looked after children
(1) After section 26 of the 1995 Act insert—
“26A Provision of continuing care: looked after children

(1) This section applies where an eligible person ceases to be looked after by a local authority.

(2) An “eligible person” is a person who—
   (a) is at least sixteen years of age, and
   (b) is not yet such higher age as may be specified.

(3) Subject to subsection (5) below, the local authority must provide the person with continuing care.

(4) “Continuing care” means the same accommodation and other assistance as was being provided for the person by the authority, in pursuance of this Chapter of this Part, immediately before the person ceased to be looked after.

(5) The duty to provide continuing care does not apply if—
   (a) the accommodation the person was in immediately before ceasing to be looked after was secure accommodation,
   (b) the accommodation the person was in immediately before ceasing to be looked after was a care placement and the carer has indicated to the authority that the carer is unable or unwilling to continue to provide the placement, or
   (c) the local authority considers that providing the care would significantly adversely affect the welfare of the person.

(6) A local authority’s duty to provide continuing care lasts, subject to subsection (7) below, until the expiry of such period as may be specified.

(7) The duty to provide continuing care ceases if—
   (a) the person leaves the accommodation of the person’s own volition,
   (b) the accommodation ceases to be available, or
   (c) the local authority considers that continuing to provide the care would significantly adversely affect the welfare of the person.

(8) For the purposes of subsection (7)(b) above, the situations in which accommodation ceases to be available include—
   (a) in the case of a care placement, where the carer indicates to the authority that the carer is unable or unwilling to continue to provide the placement,
   (b) in the case of a residential establishment provided by the local authority, where the authority closes the establishment,
   (c) in the case of a residential establishment provided under arrangements made by the local authority, where the arrangements come to an end.

(9) The Scottish Ministers may by order—
   (a) make provision about when or how a local authority is to consider whether subsection (5)(c) or (7)(c) above is the case,
   (b) modify subsection (5) above so as to add, remove or vary a situation in which the duty to provide continuing care does not apply,
   (c) modify subsection (7) or (8) above so as to add, remove or vary a situation in which the duty to provide continuing care ceases.
(10) If a local authority becomes aware that a person who is being provided with continuing care has died, the local authority must as soon as reasonably practicable notify—

(a) the Scottish Ministers, and

(b) Social Care and Social Work Improvement Scotland.

(11) An order under this section—

(a) may make different provision for different purposes,

(b) is subject to the affirmative procedure.

(12) In this section—

“carer”, in relation to a care placement, means the family or persons with whom the placement is made,

“care placement” means a placement such as is mentioned in section 26(1)(a) of this Act,

“specified” means specified by order made the Scottish Ministers.”.

(2) In section 29 of the 1995 Act, after subsection (2) insert—

“(2A) Subsections (1) and (2) above do not apply to a person during any period when the person is being provided with continuing care under section 26A of this Act.”.

(c) each eligible pregnant woman residing in its area,

(d) a qualifying person in relation to such a woman.

(2) An “eligible child” is a child who the authority considers—

(a) to be at risk of becoming looked after, or

(b) to fall within such other description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) A “qualifying person” in relation to an eligible child is a person—

(a) who is related to the child,
(b) who has any parental rights or responsibilities in relation to the child, or
(c) with whom the child is, or has been, living.

15 (4) An “eligible pregnant woman” is a pregnant woman who the authority considers is going to give birth to a child who will be an eligible child.

(5) A “qualifying person” in relation to an eligible pregnant woman is a person—

   (b) who is married to, in a civil partnership with or otherwise related to the pregnant woman,
   (c) with whom the pregnant woman is living, or
   (d) who does not fall within any of paragraphs (a) to (c) but who the authority considers will, when the pregnant woman gives birth to the child, become a qualifying person in relation to the child.

20 (6) The references in this section to a person who is related to another person (“the other person”) includes a person who—
   (a) is married to or in a civil partnership with a person who is related to the other person,
   (b) is related to the other person by the half blood.

25 (7) This section is without prejudice to section 22 of the 1995 Act.

National speech, language and communication strategy for children and young people

(1) The Scottish Ministers must, no later than one year after this section comes into force, lay a national speech, language and communication strategy for children and young people before the Scottish Parliament.

(2) The strategy must, in particular, set out—

(a) the Scottish Ministers’ objectives for speech, language and communication for children and young people,
(b) their proposals for meeting those objectives,
(c) the timescales over which those proposals and policies are expected to take effect.

(3) Before laying the strategy before the Scottish Parliament, the Scottish Ministers must publish a draft strategy and consult with—
(a) children and young people, including children and young people with speech, language and communication needs,
(b) the parents of children and young people with speech, language and communication needs,
(c) persons working for, and on behalf of, children and young people, including children and young people with speech, language and communication needs,
(d) the providers of services to children with speech, language and communication services in relation to those needs,
(e) such others persons as they consider appropriate.

(4) The strategy must be accompanied by a report setting out—
(a) the consultation process undertaken in order to comply with subsection (3), and
(b) the ways in which the views expressed during that process have been taken account of in finalising the strategy (or stating that no account has been taken of such views).

(5) The Scottish Ministers must, no later than—
(a) 5 years after laying a strategy before the Scottish Parliament under subsection (1), and
(b) the end of every subsequent period of 5 years,
lay a revised strategy before the Scottish Parliament; and subsections (2) to (4) apply to a revised strategy as they apply to a strategy laid under subsection (1).

Education and Culture Committee

[The Convener opened the meeting at 09:01]

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Stage 2

The Convener (Stewart Maxwell): Good morning, and welcome to the second meeting in 2014 of the Education and Culture Committee. I remind everyone present to switch off their mobile phones and any other electronic devices, because they can interfere with the broadcasting system.

Today, we will continue our consideration of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill at stage 2. Once again, I welcome the Minister for Children and Young People, Aileen Campbell, and her accompanying officials. Officials are, of course, not permitted to participate in the formal proceedings.

We will not go beyond part 11 of the bill today. Depending on the progress that we make, I will conclude proceedings at a suitable point. Any amendments that we do not reach will be dealt with at our next meeting, on 21 January.

Section 42—Early learning and childcare

The Convener: Amendment 337, in the name of Liam McArthur, is in a group on its own.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): Shortly, we will come to the substance of what we are looking to the bill to achieve on early learning and childcare but, whatever we decide in that context, I think that we would all accept that the bill can represent only a first step towards achieving our ambitions. There is an opportunity and, indeed, a need for us to underscore the purpose of what we seek to achieve and to ensure that it is outcome focused and focused on the needs of the child and of the family.

We all recognise the positive benefits that access to good-quality early learning and childcare in the crucial early years can deliver, which are wide ranging and are not limited to the aims that are set out in amendment 337. Nevertheless, I think that it is helpful to identify those key aims, beyond the policy memorandum, by making clear the specific challenges that we are—or, at least, should be—seeking to overcome through the measures in part 6.

As I said, we will come on to the issue of the level of ambition that we should show, particularly with respect to provision for children from the poorest backgrounds, but I hope that agreement can be reached, at least on the key aims that we are trying to meet.

I move amendment 337.

The Convener: As no other members wish to speak, I call the minister.

The Minister for Children and Young People (Aileen Campbell): Amendment 337 seeks to amend the early learning and childcare provisions to include specific reference to the aims of those provisions. It is unusual to place such general text in a bill, as it would have no practical effect. The one exception is that we have set out in the bill the aims of children's services plans. That is appropriate, because it relates to the aims of such plans rather than the aims of the bill itself.

Throughout the consultation on the bill and since its introduction, the Scottish Government has made clear commitments that the provisions are a first step towards longer-term aims that meet the needs of all children, parents and families, which will lead to improved outcomes for children and will support parents to work or study, as Liam McArthur acknowledged. That staged approach will focus initially on those children from more disadvantaged backgrounds in the context of access to high-quality, universal provision.

We have demonstrated our commitment to expanding eligibility by announcing an increased entitlement to cover two-year-olds in families that are seeking work from August this year, and a further expansion to those two-year-olds who meet the current criteria for free school meals from August next year. That will be funded through the Barnett consequentials that were confirmed in December last year. However, that still falls short of the transformation that we seek to make for all children and families in Scotland, further commitments on which have been set out in the Scottish Government's white paper, "Scotland's Future".

In relation to the aims of early learning and childcare, the bill introduces a new and more integrated concept of care and learning, which will be defined in more detail in statutory and supporting guidance on what we mean by early learning and childcare. Through that guidance, the Scottish Government will set out the bill's provisions in the context of the wider and longer-term aims, which will emphasise the evidence base for the expected multiple benefits and improved outcomes for children and families.

In summary, we do not support amendment 337.
Liam McArthur: I listened to what the minister said, particularly about the practical effect of amendment 337. Nevertheless, there would be value in setting out more clearly—beyond the policy memorandum, as I said—the aims that we seek to achieve through the bill. On that basis, I will press the amendment.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 337 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

Amendment 337 disagreed to.

Section 42 agreed to.

Section 43—Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

The Convener: Amendment 48, in the name of Liz Smith, is grouped with amendments 49 and 50.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): Thousands of children lose out on nursery provision simply because they were born in the wrong month. Children who were born between 1 September and 29 February receive fewer hours of nursery provision than those who were born in other months of the year, so their parents are also at a financial disadvantage.

Recent comprehensive statistical evidence that Reform Scotland published showed that that anomaly, which results from the Scottish Government’s policy of funding nursery provision after a child turns three, means that nursery provision can vary by up to 317 hours or by more than £1,000 within the cost of nursery partnership provision.

A child who was born between 1 March and 31 August is entitled to the full two years of nursery provision before beginning school, but a child who was born between 1 September and 31 December gets only 18 months’ provision and a child who was born between 1 January and 28 February receives just 15 months. The Scottish Conservatives believe that that situation is grossly unfair and that it would be much better if nursery provision started at a fixed point in the year for all children.

The Scottish Government’s defence of the current situation is that, when a child starts nursery at the beginning of the first term following their third birthday, that makes the best use of the entitlement and takes proper account of the child’s age and educational needs, and parents can keep younger children in nursery and defer the start of school if they feel that that is best. I ask the Scottish Government to consider the following points.

If we take a child who was born in late July and one who was born in late October, who both start primary school at the same time, where on earth is the logic in arguing that the child who was born in late July is entitled to six months more of nursery education? Under the current arrangements, only children who were born in January or February can defer entry to primary school and be guaranteed an extra year’s nursery provision. There is therefore further discrimination between those who were born between September and December and those who were born in January and February.

If there are to be arbitrary cut-off points, that is fine, but we need to be sure that all children are treated equally and that the system does not discriminate on the basis of children’s birthdays. Only 50 per cent of children who are born in Scotland are entitled to two full years of nursery provision. Children within the September to February group whose school entry is not deferred receive 400 hours less than the 600 hours a year under the Scottish Government’s policy.

Amendments 48 to 50 are designed to make the necessary changes to ensure a level playing field. I believe that the proposed changes have the support of Labour and Liberal members and of a wide cross-section of society. I hope that the minister will agree to change what is currently a highly discriminatory policy, which causes many children to lose out and many parents to face a financial penalty just because of when their children were born.

I move amendment 48.

Liam McArthur: Like Liz Smith and other members, during stage 1, I raised the issue of potential discrepancies in relation to how some children would benefit from the additional early learning and childcare provision that is being introduced through the bill.

I am pleased that Liz Smith has lodged amendments that would address that shortcoming. Given what appeared to be a cross-party consensus during the stage 1 debate on the need to tackle the issue, I hope that the minister will agree to these sensible changes. Indeed, given that, last week, she lodged amendments to address not dissimilar anomalies regarding eligibility criteria for those who are entitled to aftercare, it would be passing strange for her not to take the same approach in relation to eligibility criteria in this instance.

I reiterate my support for amendments 48 to 50 in Liz Smith’s name, which would, as she said, create a level playing field.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): My concern with a change to commencement dates is that there seems to be no funding available for it. The amendments do not indicate where the funding would come from, despite the fact that the change would result in perhaps 30,000 additional two-year-olds entering the system. There is currently no capacity in the system for that.

I think that everyone round the table would like further expansion of early learning and childcare as and when it can be done. The Government’s proposals to allow for future expansion of the facility to more children are eminently sensible, but it has probably done the maximum that it can at the moment. The bill certainly provides future flexibility to allow changes to come in at a later date.

Under Liz Smith’s proposal, there would still be a slight variation in the provision as to whether the child starts on their birthday or the term after their birthday. The current system makes best use of the entitlement in relation to the kids’ needs and ages, so I will certainly oppose the amendments.

Aileen Campbell: As we have heard, amendments 48 to 50, through moving to a system of all children receiving two full years of funded early learning and childcare, would result in significant numbers of children taking up their entitlement, some from the age of two and a half.

Although the Government absolutely accepts the need to build on the provisions in the bill, the priority at this stage must be to build additional hours and flexibility into our high-quality universal provision—increasing the entitlement to about 16 hours a week—and to focus on our more vulnerable two-year-olds as we expand. As I said, we have demonstrated our commitment to do that through the increased coverage of more vulnerable two-year-olds that was announced last week.

The amendments are unnecessary, as any further expansion or changes to commencement dates for entitlement to early learning and childcare for two or three-year-olds can be achieved through secondary legislation made under the bill.

The bill makes a significant change in reconfiguring the system of early learning and childcare, and further expansion must be subject to adequate funding. All the research shows that pre-school provision is beneficial to young children, particularly those who are most disadvantaged, only when it is of high quality.

On the dates on which three-year-olds take up the funded entitlement, local authorities can and do deliver provision beyond the minimum number of hours and the minimum of eligible children. A number of local authorities already start children from their third birthday, or the month after their third birthday, where they have capacity to do so. The youngest children—those born in January or February—who may get less provision when they are three, will continue to be entitled to an additional year after they are four, where parents want that, to ensure that they benefit from early learning and childcare and are ready to start school.

As I said, the commencement dates for entitlement to early learning and childcare will be set through secondary legislation. The intention is to continue commencement for three-year-olds from the first term after their third birthday. Some slight variation will always remain—relating to whether children commence from their third birthday or the first term after that birthday—but I reiterate that the system makes the best use of the entitlement in relation to children’s ages and needs.

There are capacity issues. Colin Beattie suggested the possibility of 30,000 additional two-year-olds and the associated costs that go with that. He raised some pertinent points that Liz Smith might address when she sums up.

I reiterate that the bill represents the first step in our journey towards transforming childcare, starting with those who need it most—the most vulnerable two-year-olds. Last week, we indicated our intention to expand that provision further. Therefore, I do not support the amendments in this group.

Liz Smith: I listened carefully to what the minister said, which repeated the comment that the Scottish Government has made before—that the current policy makes the best use of the entitlement. That is all very well for children who can receive the entitlement, but it is not all very well for those who are discriminated against because of their birthday.

I note what the minister said about the cost. There is of course a cost, but there is also a choice about priorities. I do not accept that the blatant discrimination against quite a large number of children can be allowed to continue. If the cost must be met, it should be met. In the context of all the recent Government announcements, it is hard for a minister to defend the existing policy, given all the other commitments that the Government has made about the essential nature of looking after our youngest children.

I do not accept the minister’s response. I will press amendment 48.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 48 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

Amendment 48 disagreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 84, in the name of Neil Bibby, is grouped with amendments 338, 85, 86, 339 and 340.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): I am pleased to speak to my amendments 84 to 86, which would increase and guarantee the number of two-year-old children in Scotland who are eligible for early learning and childcare. I am disappointed that it appears from a letter to the committee last week that the minister has already ruled out Scottish National Party Government support for increasing and guaranteeing in the bill the number of two-year-olds who are eligible for childcare.

We all know the importance of providing quality childcare. It helps a child’s learning and development and helps to put money in families’ pockets. It is targeted at the poorest and helps to reduce child poverty, and it is good for the economy more generally.

All parties that are represented on the committee have said that we need to provide more childcare, particularly for two-year-olds. However, just 3 per cent of two-year-olds will be guaranteed free nursery provision in the bill, which states that looked-after two-year-olds and those who are the subject of a kinship care order will be eligible for free nursery provision. I have said since before the bill was published that that is unambitious and risks being a missed opportunity. Opposition parties have rightly said that we can and should go much further—I repeat that, despite the Scottish Government’s partial U-turn last week. That was a U-turn, given that the minister said on 8 October 2013:

“I am not prepared to announce something that we cannot deliver on later”.—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 8 October 2013; c 2968.]

The Scottish Government has not gone far enough to back Labour’s proposal to give half Scotland’s two-year-olds childcare now. From September this year, 40 per cent of two-year-olds in England will receive nursery and childcare provision, but only 15 per cent will get that in Scotland. When that goes up to 27 per cent in Scotland in the following year, the SNP Government will still lag behind the Conservative and Lib Dem coalition on childcare.

As members know, amendment 85 would entitle half Scotland’s two-year-olds to 600 hours of childcare a year by using receipt of working tax credits and child tax credits as a criterion. That would benefit 30,000 children and save their families more than £2,000 a year in childcare costs—the figure was calculated using the same methods that the Scottish Government uses for its claims—and would be action to help with the cost of living and take children out of poverty. The policy is identical to the first stage of the plans that are in the Scottish Government’s white paper.

There are resources and powers to deliver on childcare now, as the First Minister proved last week, so this is a question of political will. Given that the policy is in the white paper, I expect SNP members to support amendment 85, which appeared to be SNP Government policy six or seven weeks ago.

Members should also support amendment 86, which would guarantee childcare for the poorest two-year-olds. It would extend childcare to two-year-olds who qualify to receive free school meals. That would mean that approximately 27 per cent of the poorest and most vulnerable two-year-olds would receive early learning and childcare, which was the SNP’s policy last week.

I am pleased that my amendments are supported by a significant number of children’s charities and others, who reaffirmed their support this week. Helping children in poverty should be a priority, and I expect members to support—as a minimum—amendment 86, given that its provisions appear to be the new SNP policy on childcare as announced last week.

I welcome Liam McArthur’s amendments 338 to 340. Our amendments propose different criteria, but they are consistent in acknowledging that the bill needs to go much further in providing nursery places and guaranteeing childcare for two-year-olds, so I am happy to support those amendments.

It is worth re-stating that, even after the Scottish Government’s partial U-turn of last week, 40 per cent of English two-year-olds will, as of September this year, receive childcare, while only 15 per cent of two-year-olds in Scotland will receive such provision. The Scottish Government will still be lagging behind England on childcare, even when it gets the percentage up to 27 per cent.

I ask the minister to state in her response whether she thinks that the situation is satisfactory, and to explain why Scottish two-year-olds will not have the same access to nursery provision as English two-year-olds. Is the minister happy with that? I think that parents will agree with me that it is not satisfactory.

It is also worth stating that SNP members will, in voting against the amendments, be voting against their own white paper policy and the policy change that was announced last week. There seems to be a real reluctance to put additional childcare entitlements for two-year-olds in the text of bill, and the obvious question is why. The original childcare entitlement for 3 per cent of two-year-olds was in the text of bill, so why will the Government not go further and include additional entitlements?

Why will the Government not support its own policy and put its stated childcare commitments in the text of the bill? If the minister refuses to do so, will she confirm that there will be no commitment to childcare—other than for looked-after two-year-olds—in the bill as currently drafted?

My Labour colleagues and I have said that the bill risks being a missed opportunity, but in reality it is fast becoming a childcare bill with next to no childcare commitments written into it.

I move amendment 84.

Liam McArthur: What a difference a week makes. I know that we were unable to deal with part 6 of the bill last week, for perfectly understandable reasons, but it leaves us wondering what might have been. Would the minister have been granted licence to pre-empt the First Minister’s announcement later in the day regarding the extension of early learning and childcare provision for two-year-olds, or would Mr Salmond have required her to block the Opposition amendments in this grouping that are aimed at doing just that, in order to keep his powder dry?

Whatever the case, I reiterate my colleague Willie Rennie’s welcome for the substance of what was announced last Tuesday afternoon. Although the 27 per cent of two-year-olds who stand to benefit from the extension in provision by the summer of next year falls short—as Neil Bibby explained—of the 40 per cent that are covered south of the border, that is by any measure a major advance on what the Scottish Government had originally proposed in the bill.

The extension will bring real benefits to some of the most disadvantaged two-year-olds from this year onwards, and I congratulate the minister on that change of position. Colleagues will recall that an extension has been a priority for Scottish Liberal Democrats over successive budgets. It reflects our belief that, welcome though the plans are for three and four-year-olds, it is the investment before the age of three that can make the most significant difference in closing gaps in cognitive development, social skills and so on, and ultimately in attainment and outcomes later in life. That was the thrust of the evidence that we received from Save the Children, among others, and of the well-established empirical findings of Nobel laureate Professor James Heckman. If those gaps are not closed at that stage, it is difficult—if not impossible—to close them subsequently.

That is why my colleague Willie Rennie has been pressing the First Minister on the issue week after week. Initially, those calls were rejected on the basis of policy differences between the Scottish Liberal Democrats and the Government. More recently, the SNP ministers have argued that, in order to deliver ambitious plans for early learning and childcare for two-year-olds, we first need the powers of independence. Given that childcare is an entirely devolved area, that position was never credible, and last week’s announcement has thankfully put it to rest.

Not surprisingly, I am still keen for the Government to go further and to be more ambitious in the bill. Moreover, the delays in reaching the current position have had the unfortunate consequence—as Neil Bibby said—of limiting the scope for us to properly scrutinise the Government’s proposals for two-year-olds, which we are told will be introduced in secondary legislation rather than in the text of the bill.

In that context, the amendments in this grouping are very valuable. Indeed, they perhaps offer members an opportunity not only to keep the Government honest but to press for greater ambition yet.

I support Neil Bibby’s amendments, albeit that they go further than the figure of 40 per cent of two-year-olds that we have proposed until now. Ultimately, that is where we should be heading. Of course, it may be achievable only in stages, and my amendments address the ways in which eligibility criteria might be extended, although it seems logical to start with free school meals and tax credits.
Amendment 338 links eligibility to disability living allowance, reflecting the additional or specialist needs that that group of two-year-olds may have. Access to quality early learning and/or childcare in that context would be hugely beneficial in laying the foundations for improved outcomes in later life.

Amendment 339 widens the criteria to include those identified as having additional support needs and could make a dramatic difference to later outcomes. It also chimes with the approach that is taken in the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2009.

Amendment 240 ties eligibility to those whose parents are in receipt of state pension credit. Although the previous two categories will be covered south of the border only from September 2014, two-year-olds in this group already benefit from what is being put in place by the coalition Government. The amendment also picks up a slight deficiency in Neil Bibby’s proposals, which appear to exclude this group of two-year-olds on the basis of the age of their parents or guardians. I think that he would perhaps accept that.

Again, I welcome the progress that has been made on the issue over the past week. The new year appears to have ushered in a new willingness on the part of the Government to listen. However, I urge the minister to go further and to support an even greater level of ambition for two-year-olds from the most disadvantaged backgrounds. On that basis, I will move the amendments in my name.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): I will speak to amendments 84 to 86. The bill has always been a starting point for the Scottish Government’s ambitions and I am sure that, as Neil Bibby said, all members around the table agree on the importance of expanding childcare. However, at the core of this Government’s actions is that the changes should also be affordable, costed, phased, and delivered in a sustainable way. On the developments last week, we heard that, as Neil Bibby said, the original figure for two-year-olds who have access to childcare will change from 3 per cent to 15 per cent by August this year. In addition, with the changes that the Government outlined last week, provision will be extended by August 2015 to reach 27 per cent of two-year-olds. We know that those changes are phased, costed and planned for. The investment in the training of childcare specialists announced last week is also welcome.

The Government’s proposal is absolutely the right way to move ahead. We can talk about the 40 per cent figure for provision down south, but we have seen the reports on the quality of care. This Government will not compromise on the quality of childcare provision—I include staff ratios in that. The amendments are not required at the moment. The bill is a starting point and we have seen that the Government will continue to expand provision when it is reasonable to do so and when that has been costed.

Mr Bibby made comments about people voting against amendments that echo what is in the white paper. The bill is in the context of where we are now—we have a devolved Government with a fixed budget, within which we have no flexibility. We can deliver transformational childcare policy only if people seize the opportunity of independence, in which case we will vote for childcare as set out in the white paper.

Jayne Baxter (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab): Although I support all the amendments in the group, I wish to focus on those in the name of my colleague Neil Bibby.

It is disappointing that we did not have time to reach the amendments at our meeting last Tuesday, especially when we consider the subsequent debate in the chamber that afternoon, but we are finally here now. It is clear that there is support from the Scottish Government for extending childcare provision to 50 per cent of two-year-olds; indeed, that is clearly laid out in the white paper. Where we differ from colleagues in the Scottish Government is that we want to deliver that commitment now. Amendments 85 and 86 in particular could make a real financial difference to many parents across Scotland. By putting those amendments into the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill today, we would be able to create a policy now—not years down the line—that would assist in getting parents into work and would help to lift the most vulnerable children out of poverty.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): I apologise to the convener, the minister and members for my slightly late arrival.

I, too, wish to speak to amendments 84 to 86. First, I congratulate Liam McArthur on the measured and consistent nature of his remarks and his acknowledgement that what the Government is proposing is a substantial advance as regards early years education.

However, it must be put on the record that the Labour Party has no credibility whatever on the measure, because it voted against extending childcare provision last week. It has no clue how to pay for its proposals under the devolved settlement, other than by depriving young children of free school meals, although the free school meals policy is backed widely by child poverty charities.

We can advance to the level of childcare that we require only with full independence, which will allow the income tax from women returning to work to come back into the economy. That will make the policy sustainable in the long term.
I do not support amendments 84 to 86. It is amazing that Labour had the cheek to lodge them.

Liz Smith: I fully understand and accept that not all childcare can be delivered in one context. The Conservatives have been totally consistent about that. Nonetheless, a major point of principle is raised: at no stage in evidence to the committee or in negotiations with individual members did we have any indication whatever of how money would be found for possible policy changes or of the timescale for such changes.

I regret that the minister has announced that secondary legislation will be required, because the bill’s intention is clear. In its comments, the Government has been clear about the major principle that is behind the bill—it is very much about childcare. I regret that that focus has been dissipated and that we have ended up in a situation in which such amendments must be discussed at stage 2 and possibly at stage 3, when they are central to the arguments that have been made, particularly by many children’s charities.

I add my support to the amendments in the group, because they are important to advancing the policy debate.

The Convener: I must be honest and say that, without proper analysis of where the finance would come from, it is impossible to see how any member can seriously consider supporting the amendments in Neil Bibby’s name. In last week’s debate in the chamber, Mr Bibby said that we could just use the £300 million of Barnett consequentials. I am afraid that that shows a gobsmacking level of financial illiteracy on Labour’s behalf, to be frank.

We all know that part of the £300 million is capital and that part of it is financial transactions. What is left is the money that has been announced for free school meals. The Labour Party has said that it would use that money, but it is insufficient to pay for the £100 million policy that Mr Bibby wishes to introduce.

That only leaves the money that has been allocated to equalising the poundage for business rates in Scotland and England and the money to expand the small business bonus scheme. If Mr Bibby can tell us how he would get the £100 million that the policy would cost, I am sure that members would be extremely interested in that detail. What is also missing from amendments 84 to 86 and from Labour members’ comments is how the capacity to introduce the policy now would be found, where the staff would come from, how that would be paid for and any other detail that would make the policy available and its introduction now sustainable.

The amendments in Neil Bibby’s name are no more than an attempt to cover the Labour Party’s embarrassment at voting against free school meals and the expansion of childcare that the First Minister announced last week. I know that Labour members are in a difficult and embarrassing position, but the amendments do not help them. I do not support the amendments.

Aileen Campbell: We share the ambition to deliver early learning and childcare to significantly more two-year-olds who are in greater need. We know that children from more disadvantaged backgrounds benefit most from high-quality early learning and childcare. Far from ruling out expansion in my letter, I have consistently said that we will expand provision through secondary legislation. We have always planned to expand eligibility through the order-making power in the bill when that is affordable. Any orders will be subject to the affirmative procedure, so it will receive detailed parliamentary scrutiny. That is why the order-making power is included in the bill, as I said on 8 October.

I am absolutely delighted that the First Minister announced last week that, from August next year, we will increase entitlement to those two-year-olds who are set out in amendment 86, but we do not need an amendment to do that. The proposals that the First Minister announced, which, as the convener pointed out, Neil Bibby’s party voted against, cover two-year-olds in families that are seeking work—approximately 15 per cent of two-year-olds from August this year. That will be followed by the two-year-olds who are set out in Neil Bibby’s amendment 86—approximately 27 per cent of two-year-olds who meet the criteria for free school meals. That represents a phased and sustainable expansion of childcare for the most vulnerable two-year-olds. We are prioritising the young children and families who will benefit most from an expansion of funded hours.

That is a positive step in expanding childcare provision, but it is not the transformation that we seek through independence. That can come only when the revenue that is generated by increased numbers of women in the labour market can be used to pay for the increased provision of childcare.

We share Neil Bibby’s ambitions, but we have to be absolutely realistic. There are not the resources to do what he proposes. As we set out in “Scotland’s Future: Your Guide to an Independent Scotland”, a more fundamental transformation of childcare for pre-five children will be possible only with the increased tax revenues that will help to fund expanded childcare. Under our proposals, if labour market participation were increased, more national insurance would be paid, while increased spending would boost VAT receipts and companies would pay corporation tax on the profits generated by their employees. This is about transforming the structure of our economy and the nature of our society.

That is why our ambitions for childcare cannot be funded on consequential hand-outs of money that is ours and comes back to us from Westminster. Under devolution, the vast majority of tax revenues flow to Westminster; we pay for Westminster policies that we do not necessarily agree with, such as the policy on Trident; and we are trying to mitigate the impact of welfare cuts that we cannot reverse, as tens of thousands of children grow up in poverty. It is suggested that about 50,000 children being pushed into poverty as a result of the coalition’s welfare reforms.

I urge members to recognise that we always planned to expand early learning and childcare provision through secondary legislation. The intention was made clear that that would apply to three and four-year-olds in the first instance, with further expansion when that was affordable and sustainable. The confirmation of consequential funding in December has enabled us to commit to making that initial expansion.

In his closing remarks, I urge Neil Bibby to provide us with clarity on how he and the Labour Party expect the proposals to be delivered. I am not just talking about the money, although I would be extremely interested in his comments on how he intends to fund the proposals, in relation to which the convener made good and valid points about the consequentials and the understanding of them. I would also be interested in how Neil Bibby intends to deliver the proposals in relation to capacity issues, such as staffing. How does he expect that to be coped with between now and August this year? If he cannot be specific on how he wants to deliver the proposals, the rate of expansion that he proposes could be viewed as political grandstanding.

I want to discuss other amendments in the group. Amendments 338 and 339 seek to extend the 600 hours of provision to two-year-olds who qualify for disability living allowance and to two-year-olds who have been identified as having additional support needs for the purposes of the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004. It is important that parents and professionals recognise that young children with additional support needs should be supported under the 2004 act. There are existing duties to provide appropriate educational support for disabled children before an entitlement to funded early learning and childcare would take effect—potentially from birth, where a need is identified.

Young children with additional support needs or a disability will also benefit from the named person provisions and from the requirement for a child’s plan where a wellbeing need is identified from birth. A key issue for young children with additional support needs that arise or become apparent in the first few years of life is the identification of those needs. A child’s health and wellbeing are assessed from birth during the contacts that are set out in the child health programme, which now includes a 27-month universal health review. The named person will support the identification of wellbeing concerns at an even earlier stage than the one at which entitlement to early learning and childcare would take effect.

Finally, the bill proposes that local authorities consult locally representative populations of parents. Local authorities should use those opportunities to encourage broad, open and transparent dialogue with parents, and to identify the needs of parents with a range of needs, including those who have children who are disabled.

The statutory guidance that will support the bill’s early learning and childcare provisions will refer to the code of practice on additional support for learning under section 27 of the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004, to make clear local authorities’ existing obligations regarding disabled two-year-olds and those with additional support needs. It is not necessary to amend the bill in those respects. With that, I have set out the reasons why we cannot support amendments 338 and 339.

We announced a significant expansion of childcare last week. We have always made it clear that that can be done through secondary legislation. The crux of the matter is how Neil Bibby intends to find the funding to cover what he proposes. There are also significant capacity issues. If Neil Bibby cannot respond to those points, to ensure that the quality of provision is such that two-year-olds can benefit developmentally from this first step towards transforming childcare in Scotland, something is seriously lacking in his proposal.

Neil Bibby: I want to rebut some of the highly misleading claims of Joan McAlpine, the minister and the convener, who said that Labour voted against increased childcare provision last week. I remind members that Labour proposed last week to provide childcare for half Scotland’s two-year-olds, whereas the SNP proposed to provide childcare for 15 per cent and then 27 per cent of two-year-olds. If any party voted against increased childcare last week, it was the SNP. I urge members to be careful about making erroneous claims, which I think highlight their insecurity about their party’s childcare policy.
Labour and other Opposition parties have lodged dozens of amendments to the bill, and so far not one has been supported by a single SNP committee member or by the Scottish Government. Perhaps that is not surprising. However, I am surprised that SNP members will not support their own childcare policies, as set out in the white paper and the policy change that was announced last week. The Government’s failure to support its own policy will leave parents and families perplexed about how committed the SNP Government is to its childcare policy. One week childcare is the Government’s number 1 priority, then it is not the number 1 priority, and then it is again.

We have heard excuses from the minister, and what she said is confusing. The minister who said that she would not go further on two-year-olds now says—after the First Minister’s announcement last week—that she was going to go further all along. The Scottish Government has the power and the resources to provide half of Scotland’s two-year-olds with childcare now, as it proved last week—

Aileen Campbell: Will you take an intervention?

Neil Bibby: I want to conclude, minister.

Labour supports the provision of more childcare now, under devolution. As I said, the SNP could have gone much further last week but chose not to do so.

Finance has been mentioned. If finance is the reason for objecting to the amendments in the group, SNP members cannot possibly object to amendment 86, because the SNP announced the money for the policy last week.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): Will you take an intervention?

Neil Bibby: No.

Concern about finance is not an argument against amendment 86, because the Scottish Government last week pledged to introduce and fully fund the approach for which amendment 86 would provide.

On amendment 85, I simply point out that this is a matter of priorities. The Scottish Government pledged to spend £88 million on free school meals and childcare in 2015–16 and I have no doubt that it could have found—and will find—an additional £12 million from somewhere before the budget is finalised if it decides to spend £100 million.

On the comments about financial illiteracy, I remind the minister that she had to provide a revised forecast for the cost of providing childcare for looked-after two-year-olds. The estimate went from £1.1 million to £4.5 million.

Members talked about capacity issues. I remind the minister that on 8 May, in the context of her objection to increasing provision beyond 3 per cent of two-year-olds, she said:

“It is not acceptable to this Government to run the risk of there being adverse impacts on our youngest children.”—[Official Report, 8 May 2013; c 19514.]

Capacity issues are certainly not a reason to object to amendment 86 or indeed amendment 85.

The SNP could and should go further, as Labour has suggested, but it has chosen not to. A YouGov survey last week showed that parents agree: 66 per cent of parents think that the Scottish Government should get on with expanding childcare now. However, despite what the minister has said, she will not put an extension of provision for two-year-olds in the bill. Given that the two-year-old entitlement is already in the bill and that expanding it is the Government’s own policy, I think that parents will be confused and will again question how committed the SNP Government is to its own childcare policies. They will be confused about why the Scottish Government is not putting its own stated commitments on childcare in the bill.

As I said, despite the partial U-turn last week, as of September this year 40 per cent of two-year-olds in England, but only 15 per cent of two-year-olds in Scotland, will get nursery provision. Even when the figure in Scotland goes up to 27 per cent, the SNP Government will still lag behind the Conservative and Liberal Democrat coalition.

The SNP could go further now on childcare but has chosen not to. The bill is a missed opportunity. It will be remembered as the childcare bill with next to no childcare commitments in it. We do not need separation to increase childcare. Members have said that they share Labour’s ambitions for increasing childcare. If so, they should vote for our amendments.

The Convener: Amendment 327, in the name of Neil Bibby, is grouped with amendments 301 to 302 and 344 to 346.
Neil Bibby: Childcare for the early years is only one part of the Scottish model of childcare that we need to develop. We need to ensure that we have a model of childcare up to the age of 14 that meets the needs of children and their families. That is why back in May 2013 Labour proposed a childcare commission to examine all the issues. It is very unfortunate that the proposal was rejected by the Scottish Government. It was particularly unfortunate because the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill says nothing about out-of-school childcare and childcare at holiday times. The white paper does not mention those either, which is a major oversight.

Improving access, availability and the affordability of out-of-school care is crucial in developing a Scottish model of childcare that supports children and helps parents. My Labour colleagues and I have consistently raised those issues in committee and chamber debates on the bill, and when childcare has been debated more generally.

Amendment 327, which is supported by Barnardo’s, Children 1st and others, seeks to ensure that increasing childcare for the early years is not done to the detriment of out-of-school and holiday care. Councils are suffering significantly from budget cuts. Although they want to work with the Scottish Government to improve childcare, they need the funds to do that, and there is concern that out-of-school care and holiday care are vulnerable to budget pressures. Amendment 327 would ensure protection of existing services.

Children 1st, in its briefing for this meeting, said that parents and carers who contact parentline Scotland tell it that the need to improve availability of age-appropriate and affordable childcare for older children is a major issue. Childcare is important throughout childhood and is not limited to the early years.

Amendment 302 in the name of Clare Adamson is welcome in that it at least mentions out-of-school care. However, it would do little that is new. I suspect that local authorities already consult and plan alongside parents. The same is the case for amendment 301, although I welcome the intention to ensure that consultation happens. However, why does that have to be done every two years as opposed to every three, four or five years?

The general point is that the Scottish Government clearly does not view out-of-school care as a priority—it is not mentioned in the bill or the Government’s white paper. However, the fact that the SNP Administration does not place any emphasis on it does not mean that we cannot pass an amendment that would allow future Governments that value out-of-school care the opportunity to increase its availability.

Amendment 346 would ensure that the Scottish Government, working with local authorities and their community planning partners, provides out-of-school care. Save the Children, Children in Scotland, the Scottish Out of School Care Network, Parenting Across Scotland, the Scottish Childminding Association and One Parent Families Scotland point out that non-statutory services are vulnerable to cuts. Because of that—coupled with the changes that are planned by the UK coalition Government that will result in withdrawal of financial support for parents of over-5s and successor arrangements being put in place only incrementally over several years—they fear that parents and carers here could face severe pressures. Therefore, there is an increasing case for putting the provision of childcare for school-age children on a statutory footing.

Those organisations believe that priority should be given to school-age children in low-income households with working parents. Others may disagree with that focus, but the key is to establish out-of-school care as a key part of a Scottish model of childcare. Scottish children are at a disadvantage compared with English children in that regard. There is an existing duty on local authorities in England—the Childcare Act 2006 was passed by the previous UK Labour Government—to secure for working parents sufficient childcare that covers childcare for children up to 14 years.

Amendment 344 would introduce a right to childcare for young children and school-age children under 15. It is widely recognised that there is a lack of suitable childcare in Scotland for children and their families. As I have said, the bill says little about childcare for children under 3 and nothing about school-age children. There is considerable support for the measure. The Parliament’s Equal Opportunities Committee recommended that childcare for school-age children should be available on a statutory basis for children up to the age of 15. There is also public support for that—Save the Children has collected more than 1,000 signatures for its petition to the Scottish Government.

As is widely recognised, and as I very much recognise, there are cost implications for delivering wider childcare improvements in the long term. I do not expect that to happen overnight; I do not think that any member would. I hope that we can work together across the parties to amend the bill so that we can act when resources become available and can be given to local authorities so that they can provide more childcare for primary-school age children. My fear is that the bill, as it stands, is unambitious and that we will have missed an opportunity without substantial amendments in this area.

I move amendment 327.
Clare Adamson: I will speak to my amendment 301. I start by thanking Save the Children and other children’s charities that have been involved in drafting the amendment.

The purpose of the amendment is to require authorities to consult every two years and to prepare and publish plans in relation to early learning and childcare that they have the power to provide. Coupled with the requirement in section 46 to consult, and to prepare and publish plans in relation to 600 hours of mandatory early learning and childcare, the provisions in amendment 301 would ensure that there would be a comprehensive picture of the availability and integration of those services consistently across the country. The amendment would also require authorities every two years to consult and plan in relation to all-day care and out-of-school care that they have either a duty or a power to provide, in order to ensure a comprehensive picture of availability, and to identify opportunities to integrate and support provision, as appropriate.

Amendment 301 would provide local authorities with a more comprehensive picture of provision for childcare of all ages, and would encourage integrated and longer-term planning of support and the range of provision. It would also increase transparency and would include parents and carers in the process at a level that is not achieved under the current planning process.

George Adam: We have already heard today about unsustainable proposals for childcare. The convener said that it was “financial illiteracy”, but we have moved on to fiscal fantasy with the Labour Party. Neil Bibby says that he knows that costs will be involved and that he does not expect that what he wants would happen overnight. Why has he changed his attitude? It is expected that everything else would happen overnight. Why the change of heart? He usually asks for everything to be delivered now, at this precise moment.

The bill is a starting point. It is an opportunity for us to build towards something better for children. As some of my colleagues have already mentioned, the white paper says that when we get the powers of independence, we will be able to make that life-changing difference to young people. That is the important thing.

How would Mr Bibby pay for what he wants? Would it mean another attack on the small business bonus or would he take the money away from something else within the confines of devolution? Has Mr Bibby spoken to the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and other relevant organisations? Amendment 327 is unnecessary because under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, local authorities already have a statutory duty to provide care outside school hours and during school holidays. Amendment 344 seeks day care for pre-school children, which is no different from the early learning provision that is already offered in the bill. Mr Bibby not only has difficulty with the fiscal side of things, but seems to have difficulty with understanding the bill itself. Amendment 345 is too bureaucratic and would be difficult to define at national level.

Mr Bibby talks about trying to work with local government; having worked with Mr Bibby in local government, I would say that my five years was spent understanding what local government is about and how we can work with it in partnership, as opposed to the centre forcing things on it. I ask Mr Bibby and his Labour colleagues to think again and to try to join us here in the real world, where we work within the fiscal boundaries of the devolved settlement, and to look to the better future that independence offers.

Aileen Campbell: The amendments in Neil Bibby’s name highlight the important issue of out-of-school care, which the Government takes very seriously. The financial memorandum has estimated the additional costs that will arise from the bill, and the Scottish Government’s draft budgets for 2014-15 and 2015-16 include in full the costs of early learning and childcare. The Scottish Government has also since committed to fully funding the costs of an additional 15 per cent of two-year-olds in 2014 at £15 million, and an additional 27 per cent of two-year-olds in 2015 at £44 million. There is therefore no reason for local authorities to reduce funding from any budgets to meet the additional cost of early learning childcare as specified in the bill and through secondary legislation. We would not expect that.

Amendments 344 to 346 seek to introduce rights to day care for all pre-school children, and to out-of-school care for children up to the age of 14 who are attending school. They also seek to impose duties on local authorities to secure sufficient day care and out-of-school care in order to enable parents to work or study, based on assessments of sufficiency and the setting of mandatory hours for out-of-school care. However, the amendments’ effect would be to take us down a route that has not worked in England and which is currently being repealed. They would create rights that cannot be delivered and for which there is no immediate capacity or resourcing, and they would impose duties on local authorities—duties that would be both subject to mandatory hours and to being delivered only as “far as” would be “reasonably practicable”, which would likely be confusing and ineffective.

The Scottish Government has consistently indicated that the bill’s provisions are a first—but significant—step towards developing a system of early learning and childcare that meets the needs of all children, parents and families. Day care for pre-school children is, in practice, largely the same provision as early learning and childcare, and the bill and associated guidance documents will clarify how local authorities can deliver their statutory duties alongside wider powers for children before they start school.

I have been consistently clear in saying that the bill is a starting point—which George Adam reiterated—and that we will expand entitlement, where doing so is affordable, through secondary legislation under the bill, under an all-encompassing definition of early learning and childcare.

I have also said consistently that high quality is paramount, which is why we announced significant increases in the number of eligible two-year-olds, using consequentials that were confirmed by the UK Government in December last year. That is why the First Minister asked the Council of Economic Advisers to consider the economic and social impacts of improving levels of childcare, and to guide our thinking on changes in policy that could provide the best system for children and families in our economy. That is also why he has identified transformational change in early learning and childcare as being a key priority for Scotland. It is also why we have set out in the white paper, “Scotland’s Future”, that transformational change to match the levels that are commonplace across Europe can be achieved only with independence. It is also why I announced that I would ask the early years task force to look at out-of-school care and to recommend what more can be done on it. We are working and engaging with our valued partners including the Scottish Childminding Association, the Scottish Out of School Care Network and the Care and Learning Alliance, and many have already benefited through the third sector early intervention fund and our strategic funding partners.

I support amendments 301 and 302, which will support the longer-term aims to develop systems of early learning and childcare and out-of-school care, and will enable local authorities to co-ordinate consultation on and planning of all mandatory provision of early learning and childcare, alongside the non-mandatory provision that local authorities have the power to deliver or support. I welcome Clare Adamson’s amendments 301 and 302 and their aim to broaden the scope of consultation and planning in the bill, to reflect its longer-term aims to develop systems of early childhood learning and care for all children, parents and families.

I agree that amendments 301 and 302 will provide local authorities with a more “comprehensive picture” for children of all ages and will encourage integrated and longer-term planning of and support for the range of provision.

This will create the opportunity for local authorities to co-ordinate consultation and planning of all mandatory provision of early learning and childcare, and out-of-school provision alongside the non-mandatory provision that local authorities have the powers to deliver, or support.

In this group, I support only Clare Adamson’s amendments 301 and 302.

The Convener: I call Neil Bibby to wind up and indicate whether he intends to press or withdraw amendment 327.

Neil Bibby: As I said in my introductory remarks, it is a major oversight that the Scottish Government has not mentioned out-of-school and holiday care in the bill or the white paper. I welcome the fact that the minister has said that the early years task force is now considering out-of-school care, but that should have been started some time ago. It is clear that we need to do more to improve access to and availability and affordability of out-of-school care during term time and school holidays. Given that, and the concerns that have been raised by parents and opposition parties, I am surprised that the minister has not lodged any amendments on out-of-school care.

As I said earlier, I welcome Clare Adamson’s amendment 302, but I do not believe that it sufficiently addresses the issue and the concerns that we have heard. I would expect that the services would be consulted on and planned with parents.

Although the bill may say something about out-of-school care, there is a real danger that if Clare Adamson’s amendment 302 is successful on its own it will do not very much to improve out-of-school care. That is why I lodged other amendments in this area. Amendment 327 is to protect existing out-of-school care services and my other amendments are to provide a potential framework for childcare for children under three and for primary-school age children.

Mr Adam mentioned that the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 already has regard to the matter. If Mr Adam reads my amendments, he will see that I am proposing to amend the 1995 act, because I do not think that the legislation is sufficient.

On finances, I acknowledge—as I have before and as is widely recognised—the potential cost implications of delivering childcare improvements in the long term, but my amendments provide the framework for that. It would not happen overnight, but over the longer term. I hope that we can amend the bill by working across the parties appropriately.
George Adam: Neil Bibby admits that there would be financial implications. I have already asked how he would pay for them. How would he pay for the measures?

Neil Bibby: Mr Adam is missing the point.

George Adam: So, does the money not count?

Neil Bibby: My amendments would provide the framework for providing out-of-school care and holiday care to children before the age of three and up to the age of 14. It would be possible to come up with individual policies after that, and it would be up to individual parties to propose policies along those lines. The amendments provide the framework for that.

I hope that, working across the parties, we can amend the bill to ensure that we are able to act when resources become available and are given to local authorities so that we can provide more childcare for primary-school age children.

I accept that there may be concerns over some aspects of my amendments, but they seek to address a gaping hole in the Scottish Government's childcare policy. If the amendments are not passed at stage 2, I sincerely hope that we can revisit them, or something similar, at stage 3. It is all very well to criticise the amendments, but there is a need to address the issue. No one, with the exception of Clare Adamson, and not even the minister, has made proposals.

I hope that members will support my amendments at stage 2. If not, we can revisit the matter at stage 3. Otherwise, this will be another area where the bill will prove to be a missed opportunity.

The Convener: Amendment 341, in the name of Jayne Baxter, is grouped with amendment 313.

Jayne Baxter: Amendment 341 is designed to ensure that the order-making powers in section 43 are subject to increased parliamentary scrutiny. The intention is to ensure greater input from key stakeholders. The order specifying eligible pre-school children would be given the scrutiny worthy of such an important decision and would be properly debated by Parliament.

As is clear from the debate that we have had this morning, childcare and the provisions that are made by Parliament to support children and their parents are hugely important. The procedure that is set out in amendment 341 will ensure that all relevant bodies are consulted on the provisions, and it will give them an opportunity to help to shape proposals.

I move amendment 341.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 341 seeks to make the order-making powers in section 43(2)(c)(ii) to specify which children are eligible for early learning and childcare subject to the super-affirmative procedure. My amendment 313 will make the order subject to the affirmative procedure, on the recommendation of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee.

We think that the affirmative procedure will offer more detailed parliamentary scrutiny of orders. We consider that to be appropriate. Extensive consultation of stakeholders on eligibility for 600 hours of free early learning and childcare, and on supporting statutory guidance to be issued on the bill’s provisions has been undertaken and will continue over the coming months. That will build on our consultation of stakeholders. I believe that we have a great deal of consensus around our aims to increase eligibility and in the first instance to focus on children who are most vulnerable, and we shall engage closely with stakeholders to achieve that. However, we consider that making orders subject to the super-affirmative procedure is not necessary, so I ask members to support amendment 313.

The Convener: No other member has indicated that they wish to contribute, so I call Jayne Baxter to wind up and to indicate whether she wishes to press or withdraw amendment 341.

Jayne Baxter: I will press amendment 341. The level of interest and the contributions that we have seen throughout the progress of the bill is a measure of the knowledge and expertise that are out there. Amendment 341 would provide an opportunity for them to be channelled and brought to bear on the issue.

Section 47—Method of delivery of early learning and childcare

The Convener: Amendment 342, in the name of Liam McArthur, is grouped with amendment 343.

Liam McArthur: I am well aware that my track record on getting amendments passed so far has been less than impressive, and I put the blame for that squarely—if with a woeful lack of chivalry—at the door of the minister, but I shall try to break my ill-deserved duck.

Amendment 342 reflects the fact that, whether it is an increase in hours of early learning childcare for three and four-year-olds or an expansion in provision for two-year-olds from the most disadvantaged backgrounds, what matters most is the quality of what is provided—a point made by the minister in earlier remarks. As Children 1st pointed out, “increasing the amount of early learning and childcare will do nothing to improve outcomes for children if this care is of a low quality”.

That is not a point on which there will be any dispute in the committee, and the minister has already signalled her agreement in that respect, yet it is not clear how the bill guards against the potential dilution of quality, so my amendment leaves open at least the option for minimum standards to be agreed and set by ministers, if and where appropriate.

Amendment 343 would allow Parliament a means of monitoring progress in delivery by local authorities of greater flexibility in the delivery of early learning and childcare services. The committee heard at stage 1 that the current lack of flexibility in the way in which nursery provision is delivered is a problem, particularly for parents on lower incomes or without a wider network of family or friend support.

There are concerns that the bill has not delivered the improvements promised initially, and that the “have regard” duty on local authorities may provide less than adequate incentive for further change across the country, leading to the prospect—according to Save the Children and others—of “more ‘postcode lotteries’ for childcare.”

In that context, it seems necessary and sensible to ensure that data is collected on the progress being made in subsequent years. In that way, ministers and Parliament can identify where barriers remain and can take a view on whether further action and the necessary resources are required.

I hope that the two amendments find favour with colleagues and with the minister. I move amendment 342.

The Convener: No other member has indicated that they wish to contribute, so I call the minister to speak to amendments 342 and 343.

Aileen Campbell: Unfortunately, we are not in a position to assist Liam McArthur in breaking his duck. However, I recognise the spirit in which he has moved many of his amendments, and I want to continue working with him and with other members to improve the bill. I shall outline why we cannot support the amendments in his name this morning.

Amendment 342 seeks to introduce minimum standards for early learning and childcare provision and to enable any provider who meets those standards to deliver the entitlement where a parent wishes it. It is important to note that the bill maintains local authorities’ key responsibility for the system in Scotland, including their duties to secure partnership places and improvement in the quality of provision.

Amendment 342 reflects the fact that, whether it is an increase in hours of early learning childcare for three and four-year-olds or an expansion in provision for two-year-olds from the most disadvantaged backgrounds, what matters most is the quality of what is provided—a point made by the minister in earlier remarks. As Children 1st pointed out, “increasing the amount of early learning and childcare will do nothing to improve outcomes for children if this care is of a low quality”.

That is not a point on which there will be any dispute in the committee, and the minister has already signalled her agreement in that respect, yet it is not clear how the bill guards against the potential dilution of quality, so my amendment leaves open at least the option for minimum standards to be agreed and set by ministers, if and where appropriate.

Amendment 343 would allow Parliament a means of monitoring progress in delivery by local authorities of greater flexibility in the delivery of early learning and childcare services. The support adaptations and improvements to the infrastructure.

We value highly partner providers’ contribution to early learning and childcare and, in the past, we have called on them mainly to deliver flexibility for working parents. We should move away from debates about the providers to focus on where parents can access high-quality provision and the patterns of hours that meet their needs. We can secure diversity, high quality and flexibility from all sectors and it is for local authorities to manage that process.

We have put flexibility and choice on a statutory footing for the very first time. Local authorities will consult parents locally on patterns of hours that give a degree of choice and flexibility and will develop systems to deliver them. Funded early learning and childcare is part of our high-quality universal education system based on the national frameworks curriculum for excellence and “Pre-Birth to Three: Positive Outcomes for Scotland's Children and Families”. By securing the expansion of that service through education authorities, we will protect education, quality and integration with other key areas of policy and practice for children such as, among many, getting it right for every child, additional support for learning and child protection. We will maintain a high-quality universal service that we can also seek to expand and build on to meet the needs of a wider range of children and families in the future.

Amendment 343 seeks to place a duty on Scottish ministers to report to Parliament on progress on delivering flexibility in early learning and childcare provision. When we consulted on the bill, respondents told us that placing duties on local authorities to offer a specific range of early learning and childcare flexible options would not be effective in ensuring more flexible delivery. As a result, we did not include that in the bill.

The bill now strengthens the original plans on flexibility proposed in the consultation by allowing far broader, more diverse and more locally based needs and options and being more reflective of them. In addition, each local authority will have to publish plans as a result of their consultations with representative populations of parents on patterns of provision that best meet their needs. Education authorities will also be under a duty to have regard to the desirability of ensuring that the method by which they make early learning and childcare available is flexible enough to allow parents an appropriate degree of choice over patterns of hours of provision when deciding how to access the service. The provisions on consulting, planning and flexibility are sufficient and transparency and local accountability will be key to the whole process. The requirement for Scottish ministers to report to Parliament would represent disproportionate bureaucracy and centralisation.

As a result, we do not support amendments 342 and 343. However, I reiterate that we are happy to engage on and accept any amendments that seek to improve the bill. I think that my comments on these amendments demonstrate that we have considered them very carefully, but at this point we are not in a position to accept them.

Liam McArthur: I am grateful to the minister for at least attempting to let me down gently with regard to these amendments.

On amendment 342, I certainly recognise that delivering the quality and the flexibility that we want is and must remain the responsibility of local authorities. Inevitably, that will draw on what partner providers are able to deliver and I do not necessarily envisage any problems in that respect. Nevertheless, it would be remiss of us not to include in the bill the sort of safeguard that I have envisaged in amendment 342.

As for amendment 343, I cannot see how a requirement on ministers to report to Parliament can be seen as either bureaucratic or disproportionate. The danger is that, during our consideration of a bill, we focus a great deal of attention on its strengths and weaknesses and there is a tendency for us then to move on to the next piece of legislation or issue that we are required to deal with and not necessarily return to the previous matter. Given that, as we have acknowledged, flexibility will be delivered progressively over time, we need to keep a watching brief on the matter to establish what barriers might remain, what further action might be needed and what resources might help to deliver it.

For that reason, I will be moving amendment 343 and, for now, will press amendment 342.

Section 50—Corporate parents

The Convener: Amendment 303, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 304 to 307, 306, 310, and 315.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 305, 306 and 307 remove the Scottish Court Service, the Scottish Further and Higher Education Funding Council and regional strategic bodies from the list of corporate parents that are contained in schedule 3. That is because, as administration and funding bodies respectively, those organisations do not have a key role to play in direct decision making about children and young people and we are content that they do not have a corporate parenting role.

Amendment 303 retains Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People and post-16 education bodies but exempts them from the duty to comply with directions issued by Scottish ministers in section 58 because it conflicts with their established status as independent from ministers, the Scottish Government and the Scottish Parliament as set out in existing legislation.

Additionally, should Scottish ministers add a new body to the list of corporate parents in future using the order-making power in section 52, amendment 303 allows the orders to modify section 50 so that the same exemption from ministerial direction can be applied to that body should that be appropriate, if for example, that new body has a similar protection of independence from ministers.

Amendments 304, 310 and 315 give Scottish ministers the flexibility to adjust the list of corporate parenting duties in section 52 and also to modify their application to particular corporate parents by order. That will allow us to be flexible in future when certain duties might be more appropriate to apply to specific corporate parents. It is not intended that the power be used to reduce the baseline of duties; it will allow for the future adjustment of corporate parenting duties in light of experience of the evolution of the role, including, where necessary or desirable, the flexibility to apply specific duties to an appropriate group of corporate parents or, indeed, to individual ones.

We cannot support amendment 347, in the name of Jayne Baxter, because it introduces a duty that is too specific to apply to all corporate parents. Although we acknowledge the principle of what amendment 347 is trying to achieve, it is not appropriate or practical to require those organisations that quite rightly have a role as a corporate parent but are not in the front line of supporting children and young people to promote and facilitate contact arrangements between them and those who have parental responsibilities for them and their siblings. Having said that, we believe that the corporate parenting responsibilities in section 52 are quite clear and that they communicate the importance that we place on that role. Each corporate parent will plan and report individually and collaboratively on how they have exercised that role. In due course, if required, Scottish ministers may use the order-making powers set out in amendment 310 to adjust the list of corporate parenting duties and their application to particular corporate parents in light of the experience and evolution of the role.

In summary, I ask the committee to support my amendments in this group and to consider not supporting amendment 347, whose principles we acknowledge but which we cannot support.

I move amendment 303.

Jayne Baxter: I wish to highlight the responsibilities of corporate parents as raised by amendment 347. The amendment has two main functions. The first is to extend to all corporate parents the duty that section 17 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 places on local authorities in respect of personal relations and contact between looked-after children and their parents. The second is to place a duty on corporate parents to at least consider whether contact between separated siblings is practicable and appropriate in the circumstances of each case, consistent with promoting the child’s interests, while providing a safeguard when it is not practicable or appropriate.

The community law advice network, which has extensive experience of representing children and young people, has highlighted the importance of amendment 347, as it has found that the relationships that looked-after children have with their siblings become all the more important to them when they are removed from their core family unit, and corporate parents often fail to consider the impact of sibling separation on children and young people or to promote the sibling relationship at all. Contact with siblings can be a reassuring link to the family home that might come without the pressures that parental contact can often bring, such as supervision and assessment.

Liam McArthur: On amendment 303, it would be helpful to get clarification from the minister in relation to a point that has been raised with me. I would certainly not argue against the removal of any power of direction from ministers over colleges or universities, as colleagues will recall from the Post-16 Education (Scotland) Bill process. Nevertheless, we are all aware of the concerns around educational attainment outcomes for those who are looked after in terms of their representation in further and higher education. It would therefore be helpful to know how—perhaps through outcome agreements and guidance to the funding council—the minister thinks that some of the objectives that we all want to be fulfilled for looked-after children might be attained without there necessarily being ministerial powers of direction over colleges and universities.

Aileen Campbell: I thank Jayne Baxter for lodging amendment 347 and for raising the points that she has made today in describing her intentions through that amendment. We do not support the introduction of duties that are too specific to apply to all corporate parents.
The corporate parenting responsibilities in section 52 clearly communicate the level of importance that we place on that role. If required in the light of experience and evolution of that role, Scottish ministers may use the order-making powers that are set out in amendment 310 to adjust the list of corporate parenting duties and their application to particular corporate parents. Amendment 347 is too specific to apply to all of them and to the different levels of interaction that corporate parents have. However, we appreciate Jayne Baxter raising the points that she has.

On the points that Liam McArthur has made, my officials engaged with all the relevant organisations before making a determination about whether to remove them from schedule 3. The aim is to balance their independence against the direction that ministers have, but we nevertheless feel that many organisations should have a corporate parenting responsibility, balanced with direction. That needs to be worked through and, through guidance, we will be able to provide that balance under this part of the bill.

We can work with all the stakeholders who may have remaining concerns, but the guidance will tidy up some of the issues. We are working with stakeholders to ensure that the bill does what we intend it to do to strengthen corporate parenting for children throughout Scotland.

Schedule 3, as amended, agreed to.

Section 51—Application of Part: children and young people

The Convener: Amendment 308, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 309, 348, 394, 349, 395, 350 to 353, 381 to 385 and 314.

Aileen Campbell: This is a sizeable area of the bill and I will do my best to keep my comments as succinct as possible. However, there is an awful lot to get through and I want to give the committee as much information as I possibly can.

The committee will be aware that, on 6 January, I announced the Scottish Government’s commitment to a number of measures to support care leavers over the next 10 to 12 years. All my amendments in the group form part of that wider package. As a result of the amendments, starting in 2015, each new cohort of 16-year-olds in foster, kinship or residential care will have a right to stay in care until they are 21 years old. That means that, over the coming years, just as is the case with their non-looked-after peers, those who are not ready to leave home will be entitled to remain with their carers until the age of 21. Ultimately, we will put measures in place to enable care leavers to return to care if they need that support as they make their way towards independent living.

Just as important, this package of amendments provides that local authorities will be required to notify the Scottish ministers and the care inspectorate about the death of any care leaver in receipt of aftercare services. That is so that, where possible in such tragic circumstances, lessons are learned to ensure that, as far as possible, services are doing their utmost for all our young people who have been in care.

My amendments seek to clarify the eligibility of those care leavers who are entitled to corporate parenting and aftercare support, and they seek order-making powers to extend those types of support to further cohorts of formerly looked-after children, through secondary legislation.

During all stages of the development of the bill it has been our absolute priority to consult and to engage in some detail with young people and with all parts of the sector, so as to steer a path through the complex and emotive issues that are covered in various parts of the bill. We know that the bill is better as a result and we want that level of commitment to continue into the work of the expert group, which will be established very soon to work collaboratively to develop and deliver the next stage of measures.

This significant package of amendments represents a uniquely Scottish solution to tackle some of the most pressing issues that some of our most vulnerable young people face. Not only is it a huge step forward for Scottish teenagers in care, but it is groundbreaking in policy terms. I am very proud of these amendments and I want to record my thanks to the committee for its role in bringing to the fore many of the issues tackled in the bill, not least through the inquiry that we debated last year.

I would also like to acknowledge the effort and commitment shown by all the sectoral representatives, particularly Aberlour Child Care Trust, Barnardo’s Scotland and Who Cares? Scotland. I also acknowledge the Centre for Excellence for Looked After Children in Scotland, local government contacts and our looked-after young people themselves, who collectively and separately worked with us to identify the most appropriate and realistic way forward in challenging financial circumstances.
I will set out specifically what my amendments seek to achieve. Amendments 308, 309 and 314 will clarify who is eligible for corporate parenting support by replacing references to being over school age or ceasing to be of school age with references to “at least the age of 16” and “on the person’s 16th birthday”.

They will also add a new order-making power, subject to the affirmative procedure, for the Scottish ministers to specify descriptions of young people who were, but are no longer, looked after by a local authority. That is with the intention of extending the categories of young people who would be eligible for support.

Amendment 348 will remove the reference to persons being “over school age” and will convey eligibility for assessment for aftercare support to anyone who leaves care aged 16 or above. That will ensure that those who might enter care at a later age—15, for example—and leave care at 16 will be eligible. It will align corporate parenting eligibility in section 51 with section 60, on aftercare.

We also propose order-making powers for the Scottish ministers to specify additional descriptions of those who were but are no longer looked after by a local authority, who will then be eligible for aftercare support. That means that as soon as is practicable we will bring forward secondary legislation to extend the measures to additional cohorts of young people. It is appropriate to attach affirmative procedures to such orders, to give the Parliament the appropriate level of scrutiny to debate the merits and affirm any changes that are thought necessary.

As I mentioned, the expert group is still to work out details of any additional cohorts of those eligible for corporate parenting and aftercare support, but I want to emphasise the Government’s commitment to widen the groups of young people who are eligible. However, we cannot support Liam McArthur’s amendment 394, as it would introduce an entitlement for aftercare support that is too broad at this point: one that realistically could not be met with the current infrastructure. The expert group will provide ministers with realistic recommendations on the most appropriate timing and categories of additional cohorts of children who should be entitled to such support.

We acknowledge the need to immediately extend entitlement to stay in care to those who are 16 years old and wish to stay in their placement. Therefore, amendment 353 will insert a new section 26A into the 1995 act to specify who is eligible for continuing care. It defines continuing care, sets out the conditions under which the duty would not apply and sets out the circumstances under which the duty might cease. The effect of that will be that any child who is in care at 16 years old and then ceases to be looked after will have the right to stay in their kinship care, foster care or residential placement, subject to certain exceptions.

We also propose order-making powers to allow the Scottish ministers to modify new section 26A to vary the situations in which the duty to provide continuing care either does not apply or ceases to apply. There are also order-making powers to specify the upper age limit of eligible persons and the period of time for which the local authority’s duty to provide care lasts.

The last two powers will enable us to roll out the continuing care entitlement to additional cohorts of young people in a measured way over the coming years. We have suggested that that be subject to the affirmative procedure, to give the Parliament the appropriate level of scrutiny to debate the merits and make changes that are deemed to be necessary.

Amendment 350 will provide for the notification of deaths of those persons to whom the local authority was providing aftercare support, under section 29 of the 1995 act, at the time of their death. As I said earlier, it is important that lessons are learned to ensure, as far as possible, that services do their utmost for all our young people who have been in care. That replicates a similar provision for the notifications of deaths of looked-after children that is contained in regulation 6 of the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009.

We will also revise existing 2007 guidance to child protection committees to include the death of a young person receiving aftercare in the suggested criteria for child protection committees to consider when deciding whether to conduct a significant case review.

I hope that that gives the committee a helpful level of detail on the amendments, so that we can make commitments of the magnitude that is required, with enough flexibility to fully develop the policy. That will require extensive consultation with the care sector and care leavers about the precise parameters of the entitlements, working with local government on how best to fund the extension of that support.

I turn now to Liam McArthur’s remaining amendment, amendment 395. We do not feel that it is necessary, as a procedure is already in place to allow aggrieved persons to appeal against local authority decisions under section 29 of the 1995 act. The Support and Assistance of Young People Leaving Care (Scotland) Regulations 2003 already include provisions allowing people to appeal against local authority decisions. It is likely that those regulations will have to be amended in consequence of section 60 of the bill, which will provide an opportunity to ensure that all measures are clarified.

A review of the complaints procedures, as provided for by section 5B of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968, is currently under way. Regulation 16(2) of the 2003 regulations provides that:

“All complaints, representations or appeals not falling within paragraph (1) shall be dealt with in accordance with the procedure established under section 5B of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968”.

As such, although some stakeholders might wish us to go further, we feel that the existing appeals procedures and our post-bill review of the current regulations are sufficient to address the needs of care leavers in this regard.

In summary, I ask members to support the amendments in my name. I reiterate my thanks to the committee for the work that it did in helping us to set out the amendments, which have been described as making Scotland world leading.

I move amendment 308.

Liam McArthur: I am very pleased to see the changes that the Scottish Government is proposing for the provision of aftercare to those who have been through the care system. Although I was happy to welcome the original proposals in the bill, it was clear at that stage that a number of important deficiencies remained. Failure to address them would not have made the bill a bad bill in relation to aftercare, but it certainly would have represented a missed opportunity.

It is therefore encouraging to see that the Government has listened to the concerns that were raised by me and by committee colleagues at stage 1, and to the very powerful evidence from Barnardo’s, the Aberlour Child Care Trust, Who Cares? Scotland and, crucially, care leavers themselves with regard to where improvements needed to be made. I note, however, that COSLA’s submission points to the need to take great care to ensure that the measures that are being introduced are fully and properly funded.

Removing the arbitrary eligibility criteria for access to aftercare is particularly welcome. That will ensure that the provisions benefit more people who actually need them. I would, however, welcome the minister’s view on how we might go about ensuring that those who are currently leaving the care system do not fall through the net. As I understand it, the number of people involved is likely to be very small, but the expectations of those concerned will have been raised, and it would be nice to think that they will not be left on the wrong side of an arbitrary deadline.

Enabling a return to care up to the age of 26 is also very welcome. That more fairly reflects the opportunity that exists for other young adults, which will hopefully provide reassurance, confidence and support for those care leavers who need it.

It would be interesting to hear the minister set out how what is envisaged under the amendments might be tapered to ensure that we do not create another cliff edge, this time at the age of 26, and to reflect the fact that we are talking about young adults, whose rights and needs must be balanced with those of other young people and children within the care system.

In relation to my amendments in this group, amendment 394 seeks to address the point that I have already referred to regarding an arbitrary cut-off point for eligibility. Amendment 395 reflects another concern that was raised at stage 1, namely the absence of an adequate mechanism for allowing decisions made by local authorities regarding on-going care and aftercare to be effectively questioned or appealed.

The former amendment appears to be adequately covered by the minister’s amendments in the group, so I will therefore not move it, but I am less sure that the point about appeals is covered. Despite the existing provisions, which the minister referred to, stakeholders clearly believe that what is in place at the moment is inadequate. If the minister were to indicate a willingness to discuss the matter further at stage 3, I would be minded not to move amendment 395.

I again thank Barnardo’s, Aberlour, Who Cares? Scotland and of course the young care leavers who spoke so passionately and eloquently about what they feel needs to happen to improve care and outcomes for those who find themselves in care. I believe that we have gone a considerable way in responding to those pleas, and I congratulate the minister on her efforts in that regard.

Clare Adamson: When the committee carried out its inquiry into the educational attainment of young people in care, I think that members felt a shared frustration that the problems and poor outcomes were well recognised but no significant progress had been made on tackling some of the issues. For politicians, when we are involved in inquiries and make proposals, there is always a concern that they will not lead to significant change. However, in this case, when I look at the minister’s amendments in the group, I have to agree with her term “groundbreaking”. I absolutely believe that the amendments are groundbreaking and will make significant changes to the lives of young people in care.

I thank the minister for her words about the committee’s work on the issue and I associate myself with Liam McArthur’s comments about the stakeholders and young care leavers. The young care leavers’ evidence has been absolutely key to me in my deliberation on much of the bill, not least the issues that we are now considering about support, but also those that we debated previously regarding continuing family relationships for young people. Along with Liam McArthur—and I am sure the rest of the committee—I thank them for their contribution to both our inquiries on the issues.

I am delighted to support the minister’s amendments and I look forward to her summing-up comments regarding the issues that Liam McArthur raised.

Liz Smith: I add my whole-hearted support to the Government’s amendments. Nobody who sat through the substantial and compelling evidence on the issue could possibly find any reason to disagree with them. I warmly welcome the Government’s amendments and I am interested to hear the response to Mr McArthur’s amendments. In principle, I agree that there are concerns among some stakeholders, although I think that the Government has taken them on board.

George Adam: I fully support the minister’s amendments—it is great to see the changes come in. We have had two inquiries on the issues, during which, as Liam McArthur said, we heard compelling evidence from young people about their experience. As a politician, it is good to see the process working and moving things forward for people. At the end of the day, regardless of our political beliefs and disagreements, the reason why we all got involved was to try to make changes in our local communities and throughout the country. The minister’s amendments will make that big difference. Obviously, they will provide the help and support that are needed. As Liam McArthur said, the charities that gave evidence and worked with us on the two inquiries—Who Cares? Scotland, Barnardo’s and Aberlour—have to be congratulated on highlighting the issues. The process shows the many young people who have been involved, some of whom might be here today, that politics can work.

The Convener: Before I bring in the minister, I will add a few comments. I welcome the Government amendments, which perhaps show that parliamentary committees can work successfully. We have pushed the Government to where the committee agreed that we should be, so we are pleased about that. I think that I speak for all members in saying that the evidence that we received over two years and two inquiries led us to believe that change is necessary. We are therefore delighted that the Government has agreed and lodged the amendments.

I join other members in thanking Barnardo’s, Aberlour and Who Cares? Scotland for their effort and forbearance over the past couple of years in helping us to get to this point. The work of the two inquiries that the committee undertook has been shown to have been well worth while, given this outcome. As others have done, I particularly thank the young people who took part in the inquiries and, outside the committee’s meetings, in some of our visits, during which we heard some of the most important and compelling evidence and discussion that took place during the inquiries. That helped us to come to the view that it was necessary for the Government to support such a change.

I welcomed the minister’s announcement a week past Monday about this. It would have been helpful if it had been a week past Saturday, because I and a member of Who Cares? Scotland were on the radio that morning discussing that very issue, but I thank the minister for the announcement anyway. I know that the committee appreciates the work that has been done by the outside groups and the Government in this area.

Aileen Campbell: Again, I want to reiterate how proud we are of these amendments and thank the committee for its work, which, as George Adam said, has shown how politics can work when we all come together to maximise the impact of legislation and the opportunities that it presents. We also want to thank again the sectoral representatives—Barnardo’s, Aberlour and Who Cares? Scotland, among a wider arena of representatives—who have done a great deal to ensure that we get this part of the bill absolutely right for young looked-after care leavers.

I want to put on record again my thanks to the young looked-after people who gave so much of their time and personal experience to help us to identify the most appropriate and realistic way forward with this bill. I think that some of them are in the committee room today. They have left an enormously positive legacy for future care leavers in Scotland.

We have been pleased with the feedback. We welcome the support that the committee has given to the amendments.

Liam McArthur talked about the possibility of the amendments leading to the creation of a new cliff edge. We do not want a new cliff edge for our looked-after children and this bill is also about changing culture to ensure that we are much more supportive of care leavers as they enter independent living. We want to ensure that they are supported as fully as possible and that no new cliff edge emerges, and our expert group—which we announced at the time that you said, convener—will consider which other cohorts of children should be eligible for corporate parenting and aftercare. That should ensure that we get that right and that that support is there for them.

On Liam McArthur’s amendment about appeals, the 2003 regulations that I outlined in my opening remarks already include appeals. Regulations 17 to 20 set out the procedures that are to be followed in that regard.

I hope that that gives some reassurance to Liam McArthur that we do not want a new cliff edge to emerge, that the expert group will consider new cohorts as they emerge through the progress of the legislation and that appeals are covered in the existing regulations.

The Convener: Amendment 332, in the name of Liam McArthur, is grouped with amendments 333, 184, 390, 354, 354A, 185, 334, 186, 335, 187, 391, 355, 356, 188, 392, 189, 393, 357, 386 and 388. I point out that if amendment 354 is agreed to I cannot call amendments 185, 334, 186 and 335 because of pre-emption. I advise members that amendments 184, 187, 188 and 189 are direct alternatives for, respectively, amendments 390, 391, 392 and 393.

Liam McArthur: My amendments in this group cover a couple of general areas of concern that were highlighted at stage 1, to which I will turn shortly.

I am conscious that—as the convener pointed out—the minister’s amendment 354 perhaps renders redundant a number of my proposed changes, and I am happy to accept that. Nevertheless, having concluded my remarks on the previous group by extolling the efforts of the minister, I once again find myself wondering why I bothered meeting her and her officials on two separate occasions to discuss possible amendments. The exchange of information seems to have been a rather one-way process.

Amendments 332 and 333 further reflect the excellent evidence that was provided to us by the broad coalition of experts behind the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” report. Amendment 333 reflects the reality that a disproportionately high percentage of care leavers become parents at an earlier age. Many of those who are intended to be beneficiaries of the bill’s aftercare provisions will already have children of their own. It is therefore likely that they will need assistance and support beyond that which is provided for eligible individuals. It would also be good policy and good practice for care leavers who are still only prospective parents to be far better supported than is the norm now to understand their options and the implications of their choices about whether and/or when to have children of their own.

Evidence indicates that the children of care leavers are more likely to become looked after themselves and are more likely to have additional support needs. The bill’s excellent aftercare provisions should therefore promote preventative spending and efforts to prevent current care leavers’ needs from becoming intergenerational ones.
Although the main issues will—and should—be addressed by statutory guidance, it would help to have a reference point in the bill. That would improve planning for, and working with, care leavers holistically. I encourage the minister to make a commitment to work with the coalition that produced the report when preparing the regulations and guidance in due course.

My amendments 184 to 189 address a concern about the terminology as originally set out in the bill, which could create confusion about the support that is potentially available. Although the definition of “counselling services” appears, thankfully, to be fairly broad, it suffers from perceptions of what that means in practice. A change to a reference to “early intervention” services better reflects what is intended by the bill.

I note that Colin Beattie has lodged very similar amendments—perhaps his meetings with the minister were more of a two-way process than mine—and I will support his amendments in the event of mine falling. However, I draw the committee’s attention to the fact that Children 1st’s preference is for the term “early intervention” rather than the more ambiguous reference to “relevant services”.

I move amendment 332.

Colin Beattie: As Liam McArthur said, amendments 390, 391, 392 and 393 take out the word “counselling” and insert the word “relevant”. The purpose of the amendments is to address concerns that the term “counselling services” might be a bit restrictive and might not cover the range of services that local authorities might consider.

The issue of “counselling services” as a generic term has been raised by a number of stakeholders and there has been some discussion about what would be the most appropriate term. Obviously, circumstances and appropriate supports will vary from child to child and will change over time. It therefore seems appropriate to change the terminology to the wider term “relevant services”.

Amendment 354A adds to the minister’s amendment 354—which I welcome—in so far as it provides further definition of the term “relevant service”. I take on board the fact that Liam McArthur has sought to do something very similar in substituting “early intervention” for “counselling services” but that would probably not be as appropriate because, in order to receive the counselling services under the bill, the family would need to seek help and be willing to participate in the service that was provided. It is important that the services are seen as a form of support rather than a form of state intervention. By substituting “relevant” for “counselling”, my amendments create a better definition.

Aileen Campbell: We have listened to members and have taken on board the concerns that have been expressed in our meetings with them to shape and hone the bill. I am sorry that Liam McArthur did not find the meetings useful; I wonder whether that is more to do with the fact that he was 45 minutes late for the first meeting. We will continue to work with members as we progress through the stages of the bill.

We cannot support amendments 332 and 333. The Scottish Government aims to ensure that all care leavers have access to the most appropriate support according to their needs, such as other young people typically receive from their parents. Local authorities are under a duty in section 29(5) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 to carry out an assessment of the needs of each care leaver to whom they have a duty under section 29(1) of that act and also to assess the needs of all those who make an application to them for aftercare support under section 29(2) of the act, whether they are parents or prospective parents. That assessment will be conducted in accordance with GIRFEC principles and all services—both adult and child services—will co-operate in delivering the best aftercare support possible to safeguard the wellbeing of all vulnerable young care leavers.

Furthermore, we believe that including pregnancy and parenthood in part 8, on aftercare, has the potential to cause unnecessary confusion over who, within children’s services, is responsible for the child or care leaver. Crucially, by putting that in the text of the bill and requiring throughcare and aftercare teams to take responsibility for babies and very young children, we may create unintended consequences around the level of qualification and training that is required.

As a consequence of the bill, an extensive update will be required of all guidance relating to throughcare and aftercare. We will undertake to ensure that every effort is made to provide clarification of and more detailed guidance on the expected level of service that is required under the new provisions.

Amendments 184 to 189 replace the term “counselling” with “early intervention” throughout part 9, which requires local authorities to provide such services to eligible children and their families. Colin Beattie’s amendments 390, 354A, 391, 392 and 393 seek to replace the term “counselling services” with “relevant services” throughout part 9. I accept that there are concerns among stakeholders that the term “counselling services” may be too restrictive, and we therefore accept the need to change that term. We have genuinely considered both sets of competing amendments and consider that those that best reflect the policy intention are Mr Beattie’s. Accordingly, we support

The term “early intervention”, although universally accepted in public service terminology as a good thing, is not appropriate when used in this context as it could imply a statutory or compulsory intervention, which is not the purpose of this part of the bill. The aim is to secure the willing involvement of families in preventing a child from becoming unnecessarily looked after. Therefore we cannot support Liam McArthur’s amendments in this group. The word “relevant”, which Colin Beattie’s amendment suggests, captures a wider range of services and is therefore much more appropriate.

A further Government amendment to section 61 will, if it is accepted, place the eligibility test for such services in the text of the bill and will make it clear that authorities are to provide such services as will help to prevent a child from becoming looked after. Further detail of the type of services that could be offered under that provision will be contained in secondary legislation, which we will consult on.

Taken together, the amendments will widen the term so that, where the child is at risk of becoming looked after, local authorities will be required to provide to eligible children and their families services that are not restricted to those that involve counselling or counsellors. The circumstances of individual families will vary greatly, and the type of service that they require will vary and may evolve over time. The proposed changes should mean that the provision will be wide enough to ensure that local authorities can provide a wide range of services to meet those needs and address those varying circumstances.

The amendments in my name do a number of things. They ensure that an eligible child and a qualifying person in relation to such a child are eligible for relevant services under part 9. That makes it clear that support can be provided to various members of the child’s family or to the child themselves, not just to their parent or to a person with parental rights and responsibilities in relation to the child, in order to avoid the risk of the child becoming looked after.

In response to concerns about a lack of detail in that part of the bill, the amendments ensure that the term “eligible child” is defined in the text of the bill rather than in an order. A child will be eligible if they are at risk of becoming looked after if relevant services are not provided. That risk need not be imminent but may be some way in the future, as the support that is to be provided under part 9 is intended to involve early intervention to offset or reduce the risk of the child becoming looked after.

It will be for local authorities to judge, on a case-by-case basis, whether a child meets that test, and it is intended that ministers will issue guidance to assist local authorities in making that assessment. Furthermore, there is an order-making power in sections 62(1)(a) and 62(1)(b) to allow further provision to be made on how the test is to be applied. In addition, it will be possible to amend the eligibility test by order if that is required.

The amendments also ensure that an eligible pregnant woman and qualifying persons in relation to such a woman—such as the father of her child, a person to whom she is married or with whom she is in a civil partnership, someone to whom she is otherwise related or with whom she is living, or a person whom the local authority considers will, when the pregnant woman gives birth, become a qualifying person in relation to the child—are all eligible for services under that part of the bill.

A pregnant woman will be considered to be eligible if a local authority considers that she is going to give birth to a child who will be eligible. That provision is a direct response to the request from the coalition behind “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water”. We agree that expectant parents would be a good target for an early intervention approach and have lodged our amendments accordingly.

Amendment 386 is a technical amendment that clarifies what is meant in parts 9 and 10 by a child becoming looked after. In summary, we cannot support Liam McArthur’s amendments, but we support Colin Beattie’s amendments and ask that members support the amendments in my name.

Liam McArthur: I thank Colin Beattie and the minister for their comments on my amendments on counselling services.

Colin Beattie is right to point to concerns about the rather restrictive nature of, and the potential lack of coverage that would arise from, the original wording in the bill. I note his comments on the potential for early intervention to be seen as too state interventionist rather than in the context of the support that will be provided.

I will certainly not wrestle Colin Beattie to the floor over our amendments, but I will press mine. As I indicated earlier, I will be happy to support his amendment 354A, which clearly indicates the benefits that are to be derived from turning up on time to meetings with ministers to the point at which one gets not only ministerial approval for one’s own amendment but an invitation to amend the minister’s amendments.

I note the minister’s points about the genesis of amendments 332 and 333 with regard to the importance of the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” report and recommendations. However, I would welcome a commitment from her to work with the experts behind that group in developing regulations and guidance.

Aileen Campbell: I intend to work with all expert groups and stakeholders in developing guidance—I give that commitment.

Liam McArthur: On that basis, I seek to withdraw amendment 332.

Section 64—Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

The Convener: Amendment 396, in the name of Jayne Baxter, is grouped with amendments 397 and 400 to 404. Amendment 396 is pre-empted by amendment 363, which is in the next group, and which concerns persons who are eligible to receive kinship care assistance.

Jayne Baxter: By strengthening the commitment by the Scottish ministers to set out in secondary legislation their expectations of local authorities, the amendments in this group provide a route by which Scottish ministers can ensure that kinship carers receive adequate support. As we know, secondary legislation will be vital in setting out in detail how kinship care orders and assistance will work. I seek stronger measures to ensure that they must, and not just may, be enacted.

There is wide variation in the allowances that are paid to formal kinship carers across the 32 local authorities, which results in a postcode lottery of support. I am keen to hear from the minister whether the Scottish Government will consider setting out at stage 3 specified rates of payment for the provision of financial support and require local authorities to pay at least that rate to all qualifying persons.

Many kinship carers embark on that role with little or no awareness of their rights in the benefits system. Accurate and timely advice regarding benefits entitlement is essential if kinship carers are not to be financially disadvantaged and are to be able to make informed decisions about their future. A consultation by Children 1st for the Scottish Government’s financial review that involved more than 250 kinship carers found that they receive a range of different benefits and many do not know what they are entitled to or who to ask. If we ensure that financial support includes advice, it will help many kinship carers to maximise their income and thereby to mitigate any child poverty. Amendment 402 aims to do that.

Amendment 404 would ensure that local authorities review the kinship care assistance that is provided to kinship care families. At the moment, local authorities review the assistance that is provided only if an eligible child’s status changes. If an eligible child is in kinship care for, for example, six years, their support needs may change over those years. It may be that it is not the eligibility that changes, but the qualifying person and the child’s support needs. There is currently no right for a qualifying person who has obtained a kinship care order to ask for such a review of support. Amendment 404 enables ministers to provide for how or when a kinship carer who has obtained an order may request a review.

I move amendment 396.

Liz Smith: I have a lot of sympathy with the points that Jayne Baxter has raised, not least because we heard compelling evidence about kinship care. We must never forget that the issue has come back to the Parliament many times and that we are not yet doing the best possible job for kinship carers. However, I am a little concerned about the choice of wording in her amendments and whether it articulates with other legislation, so I will be interested to hear the minister’s response.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 396 replaces “may” with “must” in section 64(2) to ensure that Scottish ministers must specify descriptions of kinship care assistance by order. Amendments 400 and 401 amend section 66(1) to remove the words “which may be” and replace “includes” with “must include” to require ministers, when making an order under section 64(2), to specify that kinship care assistance must include the categories of assistance that are specified in section 66(1). Amendment 403 replaces “may” with “must” in section 66(3) to ensure that Scottish ministers must by order make certain provisions about kinship care assistance, such as when or how it is to be provided.

We are aware that there is concern about the variation in the level of support that is offered to kinship carers across Scotland, and we believe that the amendments are intended to help to prevent that variation. However, we do not consider that they would result in local authorities providing a uniform level of support to kinship carers. Although we are sympathetic to Jayne Baxter’s aims and absolutely sympathise with some of the issues that she has outlined, we are also aware that individuals’ circumstances and the levels of assistance that they might require vary widely.

Given that, it is not appropriate to be so prescriptive in the bill about the type and level of support that is to be provided. The amendments would require ministers to exercise their order-making power in section 64(2) and require the assistance that they specify in doing so to include the categories of assistance that are specified in section 66(1). The amendments would also require ministers to exercise their order-making power in section 66(3) to make provision about when or how kinship care assistance is to be provided, for example.

The amendments are unnecessary. Ministers fully intend to exercise their powers under those sections to make orders that specify descriptions of the kinship care assistance that local authorities must make available to those who are eligible for that assistance. The orders will include the categories of assistance that are specified in section 66(1) and the provision that is specified in section 66(3).

As Liz Smith perhaps alluded to, the preference in legislation is to use the word “may” in relation to order-making powers, because the exercise of the power is ultimately and properly a matter for the Parliament. Using the word “must” would not necessarily ensure that any order that ministers made would become law; it would be for the Parliament to decide whether to pass any secondary legislation that the Government made.

Amendment 397 would amend section 64(4) to provide that the Scottish ministers must, instead of may, by order specify a description of an eligible child. If the committee agrees to my amendment 363, it will place the description of an eligible child in the bill, so amendment 397 will not be necessary.

Amendment 402 would amend section 66(1) to provide that an order under section 64(2) must include the provision of “advice or information about how financial support may be obtained” as one of the categories of specified assistance. That is unnecessary. No other forms of kinship care assistance are specified in the bill. We intend to describe them in secondary legislation, and the order-making power in section 64(2) will allow us to do that. We will consult before making any such provision.

The intention is to issue guidance to local authorities on the kinship care assistance that they will be required to provide. We will consult widely on that. My reply to Jayne Baxter’s points about financial consistency across Scotland is that we await the outcomes of a financial review.

Amendment 404 would insert a new paragraph into section 66(3) to make a mechanism available “to review the kinship care assistance being made available to a person and when or how a person to whom ... assistance is being made available may request such a review”.

In practical terms, authorities would review the assistance that is being made available to a person in reviewing whether a child continues to be eligible under section 66(3)(c). Provision about that and about how a person can request a review of their assistance could be covered by section 66(3)(d), which enables ministers to make provision about “such other matters about the provision of kinship care assistance as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.”

We will work with stakeholders to ensure that any provision that is made under section 66(3) is as comprehensive as is necessary.

For those reasons, we do not support the amendments in Jayne Baxter’s name. I hope that it was helpful for me to explain the legislative preference and the choice of words in the bill and that that has given her clarity for when she considers how to proceed with her amendments.

Jayne Baxter: I thank the minister for her comments. The issue is not going away and I have heard nothing from her that reassures me about the intentions. In the absence of the outcome of the financial review, I will press amendment 396.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 396 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

The Convener: Amendment 358, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 359 to 364, 398, 399, 365 to 369 and 389.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 358 to 361 clarify two things: first, that kinship care orders subsist only until the eligible child reaches the age of 16 and therefore that those persons specified in sections 64(3)(a) to 64(3)(c) are entitled to kinship care assistance only until the child attains the age of 16; and, secondly, that a child who was subject to a kinship care order prior to attaining the age of 16 is still eligible to receive assistance until they are 18. That is to be made clear in the bill for the avoidance of any misunderstanding.

Amendments 362, 364 and 365 will remove the exclusion on a guardian from being a qualifying person and therefore from being eligible to receive kinship care assistance under section 64. We have considered the views of stakeholders on the issue and agree that the status of guardians is not sufficiently different from that of kinship carers to justify their exclusion from being eligible for kinship care assistance. It is not our intention to discourage people from applying for a guardianship order where that would be in the interests of the child, but that could be an unintended consequence of exclusion. Therefore, I lodged amendments 362, 364 and 365 to ensure that guardians—whether they are court appointed or appointed by parents in a will, for example—and the children who are being cared for are not at a disadvantage compared with kinship carers and children who are in kinship care.
The bill provides that kinship care assistance can be provided to specific categories of people where there is an eligible child, as set out in section 64(3), and that the description of an eligible child will be specified by order, under section 64(4). Amendment 363 will put the definition of “eligible child” in the bill, rather than in an order. That is in response to concerns about a perceived lack of detail in the bill, despite the reassurances that we have given. The test will be whether a child is at risk of becoming looked after if kinship care assistance is not provided.

Amendment 363 also gives ministers an order-making power to specify other descriptions of a child as eligible if that is considered to be required at a later date. Amendment 389 will amend section 77 to provide that such an order will be subject to the affirmative procedure. It will be for local authorities to judge on a case-by-case basis whether a child meets that test. It is intended that guidance will be issued to help local authorities to make that assessment. The order-making power in sections 66(3)(a) and 66(3)(b) allows further provision to be made in relation to how the test would be applied.

Amendments 367 and 368 make minor technical amendments to section 66(3) that are required in consequence of amendment 363, which places the eligibility test in the bill. Amendment 366 provides that a civil partner of a person who is related to an eligible child can be a qualifying person for a kinship care order. That is a technical amendment to correct an oversight in the bill and to ensure compliance with equalities and human rights legislation.

Amendment 369 will insert a definition of “parent” into section 67 so that the term, when used in part 10 of the bill, has the same meaning as in part 1 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. That will remove a potential for misunderstanding. Parents will not be eligible for kinship care orders under section 65. However, kinship carers can have parental rights and responsibilities for a child, which might lead to confusion about their status. We must be clear that, despite having those rights and responsibilities, kinship carers are not considered to be parents in this context and are still therefore eligible to obtain a kinship care order if they are a qualifying person under section 65(2).

Jayne Baxter’s amendments 398 and 399 seek to add to the categories of person who can be a qualifying person for the purposes of obtaining a kinship care order those with a pre-existing relationship to or connection with the child, and to remove the order-making power that allows ministers to specify such other relationships to or connection with the child as is considered appropriate.

Section 65 is drafted in a way that ensures that we cover all eventualities and do not unnecessarily exclude people from being eligible to be kinship carers. We understand the concerns that section 65(2) is too wide and could result in someone with no effective relationship with a child becoming their kinship carer. However, section 65(2)(c) allows ministers to specify such other relationships to or connections with a child as are considered appropriate, and we intend to consult extensively before making such an order.

Also, it will be for a sheriff to determine whether it is appropriate to grant an order under section 11(1) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, a residence order or a guardianship order—in other words, a kinship care order—which we think is a sufficient safeguard and meets any concerns about the provision being too widely drawn. Therefore, we consider that amendments 398 and 399 are not necessary.

I ask the committee to support the amendments in my name and not to support amendments 398 and 399.

I move amendment 358.

Jayne Baxter: I am keen to ensure that we acknowledge the concern that the wording in section 65 is too wide and recognise the importance of a kinship carer being a person who knows the child. By stipulating a pre-existing relationship, amendment 398 highlights the importance of the child being accommodated with someone who understands their circumstances and background, is aware of their needs and is best placed to offer optimum care and support.

Aileen Campbell: Under the bill, ministers will be able to specify by order other relationships to or connections with a child that are considered appropriate for eligibility for a kinship care order. As I said, we intend to consult extensively with a wide range of interested parties before making such an order.

It will be for the sheriff to determine whether it is appropriate to grant an order under section 11(1) of the 1995 act, a residence order or a guardianship order. That is a sufficient safeguard, which meets any concerns about section 65(2) of the bill being too widely drawn. I therefore consider that Jayne Baxter’s amendments are unnecessary.

Section 68—Scotland’s Adoption Register

The Convener: Amendment 370, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 371 to 380. As members have been advised, it has been determined that rule 9.12.6(b) of standing orders applies to amendment 380, which means that—depending on the amendments that are lodged for consideration at next week’s meeting—it could contribute to the bill requiring a financial resolution under rule 9.12.4, which deals with powers to charge fees. Amendment 380 can be debated today, but I intend to end today’s consideration of amendments before the decision on it. How we deal with it at next week’s meeting will depend on whether any amendments to deal with powers to charge fees are lodged and whether a financial resolution is in place.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 370 to 372 arose from the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s stage 1 report, in which it asked the Scottish Government to consider lodging stage 2 amendments to proposed new section 13A of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007, as inserted by section 68 of the bill, to “make provision about the purpose or intended use of the Register, in order to inform the broad power in section 13A(2) to make regulations about the Register and the information which it is to contain.”

Amendments 373, 374, 376, 379 and 380 also arose from the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s stage 1 report. That committee was concerned that any arrangements that authorise the Scottish ministers’ function in respect of Scotland’s adoption register to be carried out by a registration organisation and which provide for payments to be made to such an organisation should be clear and accessible to those who are affected by them. That committee recommended that we include provisions in the bill to require ministers to publish details of any organisation that they have authorised to carry out their functions in respect of the register and details of payments to be made to that organisation other than those by the Scottish ministers. As a result, amendment 374 will require the Scottish ministers to publish any arrangements that they make to authorise an organisation to perform their functions in respect of the register.

The amendments go even further in addressing the concerns of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee about the accessibility of arrangements to impose liability for payment on persons other than the Scottish ministers, by clarifying the payment provisions in respect of the register. Amendment 373 will make it clear that any arrangements that the Scottish ministers make to authorise a registration organisation to run the adoption register may include provision for payments to be made by the Scottish ministers to that organisation.

The amendments go even further in addressing the concerns of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee about the accessibility of arrangements to impose liability for payment on persons other than the Scottish ministers, by clarifying the payment provisions in respect of the register. Amendment 373 will make it clear that any arrangements that the Scottish ministers make to authorise a registration organisation to run the adoption register may include provision for payments to be made by the Scottish ministers to that organisation.

Amendment 380 will make new provision for regulations to prescribe the fees to be paid or other payments to be made by adoption agencies in relation to the register, which means that any payment made or fee paid by persons other than the Scottish ministers will be set out in subordinate legislation. Amendments 376, 379 and 380 will bring all the provisions about payments and fees in respect of the register together in one section for clarity. We consider that the amendments address the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s concerns.
Amendments 375 and 377 address concerns that the British Association for Adoption and Fostering and others expressed and which were highlighted in the Education and Culture Committee’s stage 1 report about the requirement in the bill for parental consent when information is provided about a child for Scotland’s adoption register.

The amendments do two things: they remove from the bill the requirement for adoption agencies to obtain consent before disclosing certain information for the register and they allow regulations to specify circumstances in which adoption agencies are not to provide information for the register—for example, when consent might be an issue. We consider it best that any circumstances in which information is not to be put on the register, such as when consent might be an issue, should be set out in regulations.

Those regulations will be subject to the affirmative parliamentary procedure, which will ensure that this important issue receives the appropriate level of scrutiny. We will work in partnership with key stakeholders, including BAAF, when developing the regulations, to ensure that Scotland’s adoption register can operate effectively and without unnecessary delays in finding permanent homes for some of our most vulnerable children.

Amendment 378 is a technical amendment that will ensure that a register that is maintained in respect of England, Wales or Northern Ireland—referred to in proposed new section 13D(2)(b)(ii) of the 2007 act, as inserted by section 68 of the bill—is correctly described as a register containing information about children who are suitable for adoption or prospective adopters instead of simply as a register containing “information about children who are suitable for adoption”.

I hope that the committee will support the amendments. I move amendment 370.

(3) After that section, insert—

‘12A Preliminary requirements in relation to rural school closure

(1) This section applies where an education authority is formulating a closure proposal as respects a rural school.

(2) The authority must—
   (a) identify its reasons for formulating the proposal,
   (b) consider whether there are any reasonable alternatives to the proposal as a response to those reasons,
   (c) assess, for the proposal and each of the alternatives to the proposal identified under paragraph (b) (if any)—
      (i) the likely educational benefits in consequence of the implementation of the proposal, or as the case may be, alternative,
      (ii) the likely effect on the local community (assessed in accordance with section 12(4)) in consequence of such implementation,
      (iii) the likely effect that would be caused by any different travelling arrangements that may be required (assessed in accordance with section 12(5)) in consequence of such implementation.

(3) For the purposes of this section and section 13, reasonable alternatives to the proposal include (but are not limited to) steps which would not result in the school or a stage of education in the school (within the meaning of paragraph 12 of schedule 1) being discontinued.

(4) The authority may not publish a proposal paper in relation to the proposal unless, having complied with subsection (2), it considers that implementation of the closure proposal would be the most appropriate response to the reasons for the proposal.

(5) In this section and section 13, the references to the reasons for the proposal are references to the reasons identified by the education authority under subsection (2)(a).”.

(4) For section 13 of the 2010 Act substitute—

‘13 Additional consultation requirements

(1) This section applies in relation to any closure proposal as respects a rural school.

(2) The proposal paper must additionally—
   (a) explain the reasons for the proposal,
   (b) describe what (if any) steps the authority took to address those reasons before formulating the proposal,
(c) if the authority did not take such steps, explain why it did not do so,

(d) set out any alternatives to the proposal identified by the authority under section 12A(2)(b),

(e) explain the authority’s assessment under section 12A(2)(c),

(f) explain why the authority considers, in light of that assessment, that implementation of the closure proposal would be the most appropriate response to the reasons for the proposal.

(3) The notice to be given to relevant consultees under section 6(1) must—

(a) give a summary of the alternatives to the proposal set out in the proposal paper,

(b) state that written representations may be made on those alternatives (as well as on the proposal), and

(c) state that written representations on the proposal may suggest other alternatives to the proposal.

(4) In sections 8(4)(c), 9(4) and 10(2)(a), the references to written representations on the proposal include references to written representations on the alternatives to the proposal set out in the proposal paper.

(5) When carrying out its review of the proposal under section 9(1), the education authority is to carry out—

(a) for the proposal and each of the alternatives to it set out in the proposal paper (if any), a further assessment of the matters mentioned in section 12A(2)(c)(i) to (iii), and

(b) an assessment, in relation to any other reasonable alternative to the proposal suggested in written representations on the proposal, of—

(i) the likely educational benefits in consequence of the implementation of the alternative,

(ii) the likely effect on the local community (assessed in accordance with section 12(4)) in consequence of such implementation,

(iii) the likely effect that would be caused by any different travelling arrangements that may be required (assessed in accordance with section 12(5)) in consequence of such implementation.

(6) The consultation report must additionally explain—

(a) the education authority’s assessment under subsection (5)(a),

(b) how that assessment differs (if at all) from the authority’s assessment under section 12A(2)(c),

(c) the authority’s assessment under subsection (5)(b).”.

(5) In section 1 of the 2010 Act (overview of key requirements), after subsection (4) insert—

“(4A) In the case of a closure proposal in relation to a rural school, the education authority must also comply with—

(a) the preliminary requirements set out in section 12A when it is formulating the proposal,
(b) the additional consultation requirements set out in section 13.”;

<Call-in of closure proposals

(1) In section 15 of the 2010 Act (call-in of closure proposals)—
(a) in each of subsections (3), (4) and (6) for “6” substitute “8”,
(b) subsection (5) is repealed.
(2) Section 16 of the 2010 Act is repealed.
(3) In section 17 of the 2010 Act (grounds for call-in etc.)—
(a) in subsection (3)—
(i) the word “or” immediately following paragraph (a) is repealed,
(ii) paragraph (b) is repealed,
(b) after that subsection insert—
“(3A) HMIE must provide the Scottish Ministers with such advice as to the educational aspects of a closure proposal as the Scottish Ministers may reasonably require of HMIE for the purpose of the Scottish Ministers’ consideration of whether to issue a call-in notice.”.
(4) After section 17 of the 2010 Act insert—

“17A Referral to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels

(1) This section applies where a call-in notice is issued as respects a closure proposal.
(2) The Scottish Ministers must refer the proposal to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.
(3) The Convener must, within the period of 7 days beginning with the day on which the call-in notice is issued, constitute a School Closure Review Panel to review the proposal under section 17B(1).
(4) The education authority may not implement the proposal (wholly or partly)—
(a) unless the Panel grants its consent to it under section 17C(1), and
(b) until—
(i) the period mentioned in section 17D(2)(c) has expired without any appeal to the sheriff being made, or
(ii) where such an appeal is made, it is abandoned or the sheriff confirms the Panel’s decision.
(5) Schedule 2A makes further provision about the Convener and School Closure Review Panels.
In this Act—

(a) “the Convener” is the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels,

(b) a “School Closure Review Panel” is a School Closure Review Panel constituted under subsection (3).

17B Review by Panel

(1) A School Closure Review Panel must consider both of the following in relation to a closure proposal—

(a) whether the education authority has failed in a significant regard to comply with the requirements imposed on it by (or under) this Act so far as they are relevant in relation to the proposal,

(b) whether the education authority has failed to take proper account of a material consideration relevant to its decision to implement the proposal.

(2) The education authority must provide the Panel with such information in connection with the proposal as the Panel may reasonably require of it for the purpose of subsection (1).

(3) HMIE must provide the Panel with such advice as to the educational aspects of the proposal as the Panel may reasonably require of them for the purpose of subsection (1).

(4) The Panel may request such other information and advice from any other person as it may reasonably require for the purpose of subsection (1).

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision as to the procedures to be followed by the Panel when carrying out a review under subsection (1).

17C Decision following review

(1) Following a review of a closure proposal under section 17B(1), the School Closure Review Panel may—

(a) refuse to consent to the proposal,

(b) refuse to consent to the proposal and remit it to the education authority for a fresh decision as to implementation,

(c) grant consent to the proposal—

   (i) subject to conditions, or

   (ii) unconditionally.

(2) The Panel must give reasons for its decision.

(3) Where the Panel remits the proposal to the education authority under subsection (1)(b), the Panel may specify any steps in the process provided for in sections 1 to 11 and (in relation to a closure proposal as respects a rural school) 12A that the authority must take again in relation to the proposal before making a fresh decision.

(4) The Panel may refuse to consent to the proposal under subsection (1)(a) or (b) only if the Panel finds either or both of the following—
(a) that the education authority has failed in a significant regard to comply with the requirements imposed on it by (or under) this Act so far as they are relevant in relation to the proposal,

(b) that the authority has failed to take proper account of a material consideration relevant to its decision to implement the proposal.

(5) The Panel must notify the education authority of its decision within the period of 8 weeks beginning with the day on which the Panel is constituted unless (before the end of that period) the Panel issues a notice to the education authority—

(a) stating that the Panel does not intend to notify the decision within that period,

(b) specifying the reason why that is so, and

(c) indicating the likely date for notifying the decision.

(6) Where the Panel issues a notice under subsection (5), it must notify the education authority of its decision within the period of 16 weeks beginning with the day on which the Panel is constituted.

(7) After the Panel notifies the education authority of its decision, the Panel must—

(a) notify the Scottish Ministers of the decision, and

(b) publish notice of the decision in such manner as it considers appropriate.

(8) Where the Panel grants consent to the proposal subject to conditions, the education authority must comply with the conditions.

17D Appeal against decision of the Panel

(1) An appeal may be made to the sheriff against a decision of a School Closure Review Panel under section 17C(1) by—

(a) the education authority,

(b) a relevant consultee in relation to the closure proposal.

(2) An appeal under subsection (1)—

(a) may be made only on a point of law,

(b) must be made by way of summary application,

(c) must be made within the period of 14 days beginning with the day on which the Panel publishes notice of the decision under section 17C(7)(b).

(3) In the appeal, the sheriff may—

(a) confirm the decision, or

(b) quash the decision and refer the matter back to the Panel.

(4) The sheriff’s determination of the appeal is final.”.

(5) After schedule 2 to the 2010 Act, insert—
“SCHEDULE 2A
(introduced by section 17A)

SCHOOL CLOSURE REVIEW PANELS

Convener of the School Closure Review Panels

1 (1) There is established the office of the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must appoint a person to hold that office.

(3) A person so appointed—

(a) is not to be regarded as a servant or agent of the Crown and does not have any status, immunity or privilege of the Crown,

(b) subject to any provision made in regulations under sub-paragraph (9), holds and vacates office on such terms and conditions as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

(4) The Convener—

(a) may delegate a function conferred on the Convener by this Act,

(b) must delegate such a function if required to do so by directions issued under paragraph 4.

(5) Nothing in sub-paragraph (4)(a) prevents the Convener from carrying out any function delegated under that sub-paragraph.

(6) Sub-paragraph (7) applies during any period when—

(a) the office of the Convener is vacant, or

(b) the person holding that office is unable to perform the functions conferred on the office because the person is incapacitated.

(7) The Scottish Ministers may appoint a person to act as Convener during that period.

(8) A person appointed to act as Convener under sub-paragraph (7)—

(a) is to be appointed on such terms and conditions as the Scottish Ministers may determine,

(b) while acting as such, is to be treated for all purposes, except those of any regulations made under sub-paragraph (9), as the Convener.

(9) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision for or about—

(a) eligibility for, and disqualification from, appointment under sub-paragraph (2),

(b) tenure and removal from office of a person appointed under sub-paragraph (2),

(c) payment of—

(i) salary, fees, expenses and allowances to such a person,

(ii) pensions, allowances or gratuities (including by way of compensation for loss of office) to, or in respect of, such a person,

(d) such other matters in relation to the appointment of the Convener as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.
Panel members

2 (1) The Convener is to appoint such number of persons as the Convener considers appropriate to be eligible to serve as members of a School Closure Review Panel.

(2) Each Panel is to consist of 3 of the persons appointed under sub-paragraph (1).

(3) It is for the Convener to select—
   (a) the members of the Panel,
   (b) one of those members to chair the Panel.

(4) The Convener is to make appropriate arrangements for the training of persons appointed under sub-paragraph (1).

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision for or about—
   (a) eligibility for, and disqualification from, appointment under sub-paragraph (1),
   (b) tenure and removal from office of persons so appointed,
   (c) the process for the selection of Panel members under sub-paragraph (3),
   (d) payment of expenses, fees and allowances to persons selected under that sub-paragraph,
   (e) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate in relation to—
      (i) the appointment of persons under sub-paragraph (1),
      (ii) the selection of Panel members under sub-paragraph (3).

Property, staff and services

3 (1) The Scottish Ministers may—
   (a) provide, or ensure the provision of, such property, staff and services to the Convener as they consider necessary or expedient in connection with the exercise of the Convener’s functions,
   (b) pay grants to the Convener for the purposes of enabling the Convener to employ staff and obtain services in connection with the exercise of the Convener’s functions.

(2) The Convener is to provide a School Closure Review Panel with such staff and services as the Convener considers necessary or expedient in connection with the exercise of the Panel’s functions.

Directions

4 (1) The Scottish Ministers may issue directions to the Convener as to the exercise of the Convener’s functions (and the Convener must comply with them).

(2) Directions under sub-paragraph (1) may vary or revoke earlier such directions.

(3) The Scottish Ministers must publish any directions issued under sub-paragraph (1) in such manner as they consider appropriate.
Reports

5 (1) As soon as practicable after the end of each calendar year, the Convener must prepare a report on—

(a) the exercise of the Convener’s functions during that year, and

(b) the exercise of the functions of any School Closure Review Panel which has carried out a review under section 17B during that year.

(2) A report prepared under sub-paragraph (1) must be—

(a) submitted to the Scottish Ministers, and

(b) published in such manner as the Convener considers appropriate.”.

(6) In section 4 of the 2010 Act (proposal paper), in subsection (2) for “17” substitute “17D”.

(7) In section 19 of the 2010 Act (guidance)—

(a) the existing text becomes subsection (1),

(b) after that subsection insert—

“(2) The Convener, and a School Closure Review Panel, must have regard to any such guidance in exercising their functions under this Act.”.

(8) In section 20 of the 2010 Act (regulations)—

(a) in subsection (3) for “17” substitute “17D”,

(b) after subsection (6) insert—

“(7) Regulations under section 17B(5) and paragraphs 1(9) and 2(5) of schedule 2A—

(a) may make different provision for different purposes,

(b) may make supplemental, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision,

(c) are subject to the negative procedure.”.

(9) In section 21(2) of the 2010 Act (definitions)—

(a) after the definition of “consultation period” insert—

“‘the Convener’ is defined in section 17A(6),”;

(b) after the definition of “rural school” insert—

“‘School Closure Review Panel’ is defined in section 17A(6)”.

(10) In the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman Act 2002, in schedule 2 (listed authorities), before paragraph 21C insert—

“21ZC The Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.”.

(11) In the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002, in schedule 1 (Scottish public authorities)—

(a) before paragraph 62C insert—

“62ZC The Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.”;

(b) after paragraph 76 insert—
“76A A School Closure Review Panel constituted under section 17A(3) of the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010.”.

(12) In the Public Appointments and Public Bodies etc. (Scotland) Act 2003, in schedule 2 (the specified authorities), before the cross-heading “Executive bodies” insert—
   “the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels”.

Liam McArthur

409A As an amendment to amendment 409, line 78, at end insert—
   <( ) Where the Panel does not find that the education authority has—
   (a) failed in a significant regard to comply with the requirements imposed on it by (or under) this Act so far as they are relevant in relation to the proposal, or
   (b) failed to take proper account of a material consideration relevant to its decision to implement the proposal, the Panel may include in the notification to the authority of its decision a statement that, in the Panel’s view, no call-in notice should have been issued in relation to the proposal.>

   (b) after subsection (2), insert—
   “(3) This subsection applies where the children’s hearing was arranged under section 45, 46, 50, 96, 126 or 158.”.>

Aileen Campbell

411 Before section 69, insert—
   <Maximum period of child protection order
   In each of paragraphs (c) and (d) of section 54 of the 2011 Act, after “day” insert “after the day on which”.>

Aileen Campbell

412 Before section 69, insert—
   <Power to determine that deeming of person as relevant person to end
   (1) The 2011 Act is amended as follows.
   (2) In section 79—
(a) in subsection (1), for “This section applies” substitute “Subsections (2) to (5) apply”;

(b) after subsection (1), insert—

“(1A) Subsection (5A) applies (in addition to subsections (2) to (5)) where the children’s hearing is—

(a) a subsequent children’s hearing under Part 11, or

(b) held for the purposes of reviewing a compulsory supervision order.”;

(c) after subsection (5), insert—

“(5A) The Principal Reporter—

(a) must refer the matter of whether an individual deemed to be a relevant person by virtue of section 81 should continue to be deemed to be a relevant person in relation to the child for determination by a pre-hearing panel if requested to do so by—

(i) the individual so deemed,

(ii) the child, or

(iii) a relevant person in relation to the child,

(b) may refer that matter for determination by a pre-hearing panel on the Principal Reporter’s own initiative.”.

(3) After section 81, insert—

“81A Determination that deeming of person as relevant person to end

(1) This section applies where a matter mentioned in section 79(5A)(a) is referred to a meeting of a pre-hearing panel.

(2) Where the matter is referred along with any other matter, the pre-hearing panel must determine it before determining the other matter.

(3) The pre-hearing panel must determine that the individual is no longer to be deemed to be a relevant person if it considers that the individual does not have (and has not recently had) a significant involvement in the upbringing of the child.

(4) Where the pre-hearing panel makes a determination as described in subsection (3), section 81(4) ceases to apply in relation to the individual.

(5) Where, by virtue of section 80(3), the children’s hearing is to determine a matter mentioned in section 79(5A)(a), references in subsections (2) to (4) to the pre-hearing panel are to be read as references to the children’s hearing.”.

Aileen Campbell

413 Before section 69, insert—

<Grounds hearing: non-acceptance of facts supporting ground

In section 90 of the 2011 Act—

(a) in subsection (1), for paragraph (a) substitute—

“(a) explain to the child and each relevant person in relation to the child—

(i) each section 67 ground specified in the statement of grounds, and
(ii) the supporting facts in relation to that ground,”,

(b) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) In relation to each ground that a person accepts applies in relation to the child, the chairing member must ask the person whether the person accepts each of the supporting facts.

(1B) Where under subsection (1A) any person does not accept all of the supporting facts in relation to a ground, the ground is taken for the purposes of this Act to be accepted at the grounds hearing only if the grounds hearing considers that—

(a) the person has accepted sufficient of the supporting facts to support the conclusion that the ground applies in relation to the child, and

(b) it is appropriate to proceed in relation to the ground on the basis of only those supporting facts which are accepted by the child and each relevant person.

(1C) Where a ground is taken to be accepted for the purposes of this Act by virtue of subsection (1B), the grounds hearing must amend the statement of grounds to delete any supporting facts in relation to the ground which are not accepted by the child and each relevant person.

(1D) In this section, “supporting facts”, in relation to a section 67 ground, means facts set out in relation to the ground by virtue of section 89(3)(b).”.

Aileen Campbell

414 Before section 69, insert—

<Failure of child to attend grounds hearing: power to make interim order

In section 95 of the 2011 Act, after subsection (2) insert—

“(3) Subsection (4) applies where under subsection (2) the grounds hearing requires the Principal Reporter to arrange another grounds hearing.

(4) If the grounds hearing considers that the nature of the child’s circumstances is such that for the protection, guidance, treatment or control of the child it is necessary as a matter of urgency that an interim compulsory supervision order be made, the grounds hearing may make an interim compulsory supervision order in relation to the child.

(5) An interim compulsory supervision order made under subsection (4) may not include a measure of the kind mentioned in section 83(2)(f)(i).”.

Aileen Campbell

415 Before section 69, insert—

<Limit on number of further interim compulsory supervision orders

In section 96(4) of the 2011 Act, for the words from “the effect” to the end substitute “it would be the third such order made under subsection (3) in consequence of the same interim compulsory supervision order made under section 93(5)”.

(3) After section 28L, insert—

“28LA Power of Scottish Ministers to provide for children’s legal aid to be available to other persons in relation to court proceedings

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify this Part so as to—

(a) provide that children’s legal aid is to be available, in relation to a type of court proceedings under the 2011 Act, to a person to whom it is not available by virtue of section 28D, 28E or 28F,

(b) vary any availability provided by virtue of paragraph (a), or

(c) remove any availability provided by virtue of paragraph (a).

(2) If regulations are made making children’s legal aid available to a child, the regulations must include provision requiring the Board to be satisfied that the conditions in subsection (3) are met before children’s legal aid is made available.

(3) The conditions are—

(a) that it is in the best interests of the child that children’s legal aid be made available,

(b) that it is reasonable in the particular circumstances of the case that the child should receive children’s legal aid,

(c) that, after consideration of the disposable income and disposable capital of the child, the expenses of the case cannot be met without undue hardship to the child, and

(d) if the proceedings are an appeal to the sheriff principal or the Court of Session under Part 15 of the 2011 Act, that the child has substantial grounds for making or responding to the appeal.

(4) If regulations are made making children’s legal aid available to a person other than a child, the regulations must include provision requiring the Board to be satisfied that the conditions in subsection (5) are met before children’s legal aid is made available.

(5) The conditions are—

(a) that it is reasonable in the particular circumstances of the case that the person should receive children’s legal aid,

(b) that, after consideration of the disposable income and disposable capital of the person, the expenses of the case cannot be met without undue hardship to the person or the dependants of the person, and

(1) The Scottish Ministers must, no later than one year after this section comes into force, lay a national speech, language and communication strategy for children and young people before the Scottish Parliament.

(2) The strategy must, in particular, set out—

(a) the Scottish Ministers’ objectives for speech, language and communication for children and young people,

(b) their proposals for meeting those objectives,

(c) the timescales over which those proposals and policies are expected to take effect.

(3) Before laying the strategy before the Scottish Parliament, the Scottish Ministers must publish a draft strategy and consult with—

(a) children and young people, including children and young people with speech, language and communication needs,
(b) the parents of children and young people with speech, language and communication needs,
(c) persons working for, and on behalf of, children and young people, including children and young people with speech, language and communication needs,
(d) the providers of services to children with speech, language and communication services in relation to those needs,
(e) such others persons as they consider appropriate.

(4) The strategy must be accompanied by a report setting out—
(a) the consultation process undertaken in order to comply with subsection (3), and
(b) the ways in which the views expressed during that process have been taken account of in finalising the strategy (or stating that no account has been taken of such views).

(5) The Scottish Ministers must, no later than—
(a) 5 years after laying a strategy before the Scottish Parliament under subsection (1), and
(b) the end of every subsequent period of 5 years,
lay a revised strategy before the Scottish Parliament; and subsections (2) to (4) apply to a revised strategy as they apply to a strategy laid under subsection (1).>
(a) means sharing information in a way that everybody can understand,
(b) relates to all modes of communication, and
(c) requires that service providers—

Scottish Parliament
Education and Culture Committee
Tuesday 21 January 2014

[The Convener opened the meeting at 09:52]

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Stage 2

The Convener (Stewart Maxwell): Good morning and welcome to the third meeting in 2014 of the Education and Culture Committee. I remind everyone present to switch off mobile phones and other electronic devices because they affect the broadcasting system.

Today is the fourth and final day of stage 2 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. I welcome to the meeting Michael Russell, who is the Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning, and his accompanying officials. I remind the officials that they are not permitted to participate in the formal proceedings—I am sure that they are well aware of that fact.

Some additional members will be coming along this morning to move amendments and get involved in our discussions. Clare Adamson is absent, but has been replaced by her substitute Marco Biagi. I know that Mr Biagi has another appointment, but he will stay with us for as long as possible; I thank him for coming along this morning. The Minister for Children and Young People will join us after we have debated the amendments on school closures.

Section 68—Scotland’s Adoption Register

The Convener: I start by calling amendment 380. As members know, the Presiding Officer has determined that rule 9.12.6(B) applies to this amendment. However, as no further amendments dealing with powers to charge fees have been lodged and as this is the final day of stage 2 consideration, we are able to dispose of amendment 380 according to normal marshalled order.

Amendment 380 moved—[Michael Russell]—and agreed to.

Section 68, as amended, agreed to.

After section 68

The Convener: Amendment 405, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 406, 407, 408, 408A, 409, 409A and 423.

The Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning (Michael Russell): Thank you very much, convener, and thank you for inviting me before the committee to discuss these amendments. Unfortunately, given the amendments that I will be covering, I will have to speak for a reasonable length of time, but I hope that the committee will bear with me.

Amendment 405 sets the scene for the substantive package of amendments on school closures that has been lodged in my name, by seeking to insert a new part into the bill and by making it clear that any references to “the 2010 act” in the part are to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010.

I think that we are all familiar with the issues here. School closures are emotive and disruptive events for the children, parents and communities who are affected by them, and it is clear that the 2010 act has not been operating satisfactorily either for those who are affected or for education authorities. The commission on the delivery of rural education, which was jointly established by the Government and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, was charged with examining the 2010 act. Its report made a number of recommendations for change, all of which bar one were accepted by the Government. The amendments that we are debating today will implement many of those recommendations. I add that some of the recommendations do not require legislation.

The commission’s remit was to consider rural education; amendment 408 applies to rural schools only. However, the other amendments in my name apply to all schools and will improve and strengthen consultation in every community.

Amendment 407 seeks to require an education authority to present information about the financial implications of a school closure proposal as part of its proposal paper for consultation. I think that we are all determined that educational benefit must continue to be the primary consideration in making the case for school closure proposals. However, requiring authorities to provide clear financial information to communities will ensure that there is a more informed debate about such proposals.

Amendment 408 seeks to make a number of changes to the process for rural school closures under the 2010 act by clarifying how an education authority should assess whether a rural school should close, and it will ensure that the 2010 act operates as Parliament originally intended. When the Scottish Parliament unanimously passed the 2010 act, it intended that the three rural factors in section 12 would operate as a presumption against closure of rural schools. It was expected that they would require local authorities to show that they had carefully considered and weighed up the implications of proposed closures. However, following the judicial review that was brought by Comhairle nan Eilean Siar, it was clear that the provision in the act was not having the required impact. Clarity on the issue was recommended by the commission, was strongly supported in the Government’s consultation and is what I now wish to deliver through amendment 408.

Amendment 408 seeks to set out the detailed careful consideration that an education authority is required to carry out before even proposing a rural school closure. Authorities will be subject to an additional requirement to identify any reasonable alternatives to closure, and to assess the likely educational benefits and effect on the rural community and on travel arrangements of any and each such alternative. The alternatives are to be set out in the consultation on the proposal and further alternatives may be proposed during the consultation. The authority is then to reassess the proposal and the alternatives following consultation and, if it chooses to proceed, to explain why, in the light of those assessments, it still considers that the closure proposal is the most appropriate response. I want to ensure that future consultations reach not just the letter but the spirit of what Parliament intended when it passed the 2010 act.

When I gave evidence to the committee in December, I explained that we were still considering the best way of ensuring that the presumption against closure was as clear as possible. Having given the matter careful consideration, we think that from a legal perspective it is clearer and safer to set out exactly what we expect authorities to have assessed and considered in formulating a closure proposal for a rural school, and to set out exactly what they must assess and explain when consulting on a closure proposal. We think that amendment 408 will ensure that authorities will not be able to proceed with a closure proposal unless there is a clear educational benefit in doing so, and unless there is no more appropriate means of addressing whatever problem a rural school is experiencing. In other words, if this clear test is not met, a closure proposal cannot be implemented.

We consider that revising, adding to and strengthening both the statutory assessment and consultation requirements that authorities are subject to is a better way of achieving the policy. We consider that to be clearer than simply referring to a presumption against closure in the 2010 act, which education authorities and the courts might, in any case, not find clear.

The additional and strengthened statutory processes in proposed new sections 12A and 13 of the 2010 act, which will be inserted by amendment 408, should secure the careful and comprehensive consideration that education authorities have to give any proposal to close a rural school, given their particularly important status and the long-term consequences of closure on both families and rural communities. I believe that that is what those communities want and that it is what they deserve.

Amendment 409 seeks to make a number of changes to the process for calling in and determining school closure proposals. It will require Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Education to provide advice that is requested by Scottish ministers in deciding whether to call in a closure proposal. Formalisation of that mechanism in legislation will add transparency to the process and ensure that ministers have access to educational advice when making their call-in decision.

Amendment 409 will require ministers, following call-in of a school closure proposal, to refer the proposal to a new public appointee—the convener of the school closure review panels. It also makes provision for the convener’s appointment. It will be the responsibility of the convener to appoint individuals who will be eligible to be members of a panel, and to constitute panels on a case-by-case basis to determine on particular closure proposals once they are called in.

Establishing the school closure review panels to determine school closure proposals will improve transparency and remove allegations of political bias from the decision-making process. Although it has never been the case that ministers’ decisions have been biased or influenced by political considerations, it is a perception that is often hard to refute, so it is better that in the future those decisions will be taken away from the political spotlight and be made at arm’s length from ministers.

Amendment 409 also provides for the panels to be able to draw on advice from HMIE, as well as information from the education authority and any other person, just as ministers may obtain expert advice from HM Inspectorate of Education at the call-in stage.

The judgment in the case of Comhairle nan Eilean Siar v the Scottish ministers held that the 2010 act as written required ministers to consider the merits and the procedural aspects of an education authority’s decision to implement a closure proposal. The commission also recommended that ministers should consider the merits of the decision as well as its procedural aspects. We have accepted that recommendation.

We have considered whether further clarification of the 2010 act is required. However, given that the judgment from the inner house of the Court of Session is clear that the wording in section 17(2) of the 2010 act requires such consideration, we have concluded that, although it was not the original policy intention behind the provision, no amendment to section 17(2) is required. We have used the same formulation in proposed new sections 17B and 17C to make it clear that a school closure review panel will also be required to consider the merits and procedural aspects of an education authority’s decision in determining whether to consent to or refuse a proposal once it has been called in. Had we chosen to amend the wording in the 2010 act, that might have been interpreted as meaning that the amended provision did not require a determination of merits and process. We therefore concluded that we should follow the wording in the 2010 act in relation to call-in.

Amendment 409 also sets out the options that a school closure review panel will have for determining a school closure proposal. The commission recommended an additional option of remitting the proposal back to a local authority for the authority to take the decision afresh, so amendment 409 will add that option to the decisions that are available to the school closure review panel. That respects the primacy of local decision making in a case where a flaw in a closure proposal process, for example, can be easily remedied, and is especially important given that amendment 406, which has been lodged by Liz Smith, and to which I will speak in more detail later, would mean that refusing consent would lead to a five-year restriction on repeating the closure proposal.

Finally, amendment 409 provides for a right of appeal against a panel decision to the sheriff court on a point of law only. That will achieve the right balance between providing a right of appeal and the need to ensure that decisions can be taken forward efficiently.

I believe that the extensive changes to the call-in and determination process that are contained in amendment 409 will significantly improve the transparency of the overall process, so that it has the full confidence of communities and education authorities.

I now turn, with relief, to the non-Government amendments.

I welcome amendment 406, which has been lodged by Liz Smith, and which I believe will significantly benefit communities that have been affected by a school closure proposal and give them a degree of certainty over their school’s future. I agree that a five-year period sets the correct balance between providing assurance to a community and not unreasonably restricting an education authority’s ability to manage its school estate.

Liz Smith’s amendment 406 recognises that there will be exceptions to the moratorium during the five-year period; I agree that it is necessary to have limited flexibility in that area. Significant changes in a school’s circumstances might include a school’s roll declining dramatically, or the fabric of the building requiring significant unplanned investment. The Government proposes to set out in the revised statutory guidance for the 2010 act further advice on the types of appropriate exception.

I am glad that there is support across the political divide for amendment 406. That very much reflects the spirit in which the 2010 act came into being, and the unanimous support that Parliament gave in passing it. I believe that amendments 405 to 409 will benefit all those who are involved in and affected by school closures.

Amendment 408A, in the name of Liz Smith, would amend amendment 408 to alter the basis on which an education authority could decide to implement a rural school closure proposal. Instead of the authority being “satisfied”, it would have to have “demonstrated” that closure was the best option.

I am sympathetic to that proposal, and I understand and respect the intention behind the amendment. I accept that Liz Smith and others have concerns about whether “satisfied” is the most appropriate term to use—it may not be. However, I do not believe that changing the wording of amendment 408 to include “has demonstrated” will deliver the clarity and improvements in the assessment and consultation process that both Liz Smith and I wish to be implemented.

I have concerns that the change that amendment 408A proposes would result in a lack of clarity. It is unclear to whom it would need to be demonstrated that closure would be the most appropriate response, and—crucially—such a requirement could inject into the process further uncertainty and delay for parents and young people. Furthermore, given how controversial closure proposals can be, it is unclear that an education authority would ever be able to satisfy that test fully. In addition, amendment 408, as drafted, maintains consistency with the rest of the 2010 act, which is desirable.

As I have explained, amendment 408 will require an education authority to carry out a more rigorous assessment in formulating a rural school closure proposal, and to consult in a more thorough and transparent way. Its complying with those requirements should mean that the authority will, in practice, demonstrate that its decision is the most appropriate response based on the reasons for formulating the proposal. If it does not, and the decision is considered to be unreasonable, ministers may call in that decision for the panel to determine.

However, as I have indicated many times throughout the bill process, I am prepared to listen, in advance of stage 3, to suggestions to improve the provisions that relate to rural school closure proposals. The additional safeguards for rural schools that were originally included in the 2010 act followed a sustained campaign from communities that was supported by a number of MSPs and championed by Murdo Fraser. The campaign was an example of MSPs from a number of different political parties working together to deliver a common objective, which I hope we can do again.

I am happy to discuss with Liz Smith, and with others who have an interest in the issue, their concerns and the best way to deliver what we are all after: an improved assessment and consultation process. We need to step back and think through carefully the implications and consequences of any amendment, but we are clear, as legislators, that the proposal is what we want. If Liz Smith is prepared to undertake that process with those with whom she is involved, I am prepared to do so too, and to come back with an improved amendment at stage 3.

Liam McArthur will be disappointed that I am not going to be quite as positive in my comments on his amendment 409A. The Scottish ministers may issue a call-in notice for a school closure proposal only where it appears to them that the education authority “may”—I use that word advisedly, because it is in the legislation—have failed either to comply with the factors that are set out in sections 17(2)(a) and (b) and therefore failed significantly to comply with the requirements that are imposed on it by or under the 2010 act, in so far as they are relevant to the closure proposal, or to take proper account of a material consideration that is relevant to its decision to implement the proposal.

The crucial word in the 2010 act is “may”. At that stage in the process, ministers have not decided that a failure has occurred. Issues might have been raised in representations to ministers, or in reviewing the documentation that is associated with the proposal, which suggest that the education authority “may” have failed to comply with the 2010 act and that ministers should call in the proposal.

However, in undertaking further investigation and evidence gathering following call-in, a school closure review panel could find that the authority has not failed in either of those respects and that the appropriate decision is to grant consent. That does not mean that the proposal should not have been called in. It is important that possible failures are investigated, and undertaking further investigation and making determinations on proposals that have been called in, in a manner that has the confidence of the affected community and the education authority, is the primary role of the school closure review panels.

Amendment 409 will require a panel to give reasons for its decision, which may in practice make it clear whether the panel considers that a call-in was required or not. Furthermore, it requires the convener of the panels to provide an annual report to the Scottish Parliament on its decisions. It will therefore be apparent if there are many—or any—school closure proposals that are called in but given unconditional consent by the panels.

Although I will listen to any cogent arguments that Liam McArthur makes, I do not think that amendment 409A is necessary; indeed, it may deflect a panel towards spending time looking backwards instead of considering the matters that are in front of it. Therefore—with some relief—I ask the committee to support amendments 405, 407, 408, 409 and 423 in my name, and amendment 406 in the name of Liz Smith. I do not support amendments 408A and 409A, although I am willing to work with Liz Smith to see whether we can find a way forward through amendments to improve the legislation.

I move amendment 405.

The Convener: I have been extremely generous with time because, given that we are inserting a completely new part into the bill, I feel that it is appropriate for members to have a full understanding of what the amendments refer to. I will be equally generous with other members who have amendments to this part of the bill, although I hope that their speeches will not be quite as lengthy.

I call Liz Smith to speak to amendment 406 and the other amendments in the group.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): I am afraid that my speech will be a little lengthy, but not quite as lengthy as the cabinet secretary’s speech, I hope.

In the event of a school closure proposal being rejected, my amendment 406 would ensure that the decision would not be revisited for a period of five years. I have listened carefully to the debate about the appropriate length of time for a moratorium following the rejection of a school closure, and I am grateful to Councillor Douglas Chapman and his colleagues at COSLA for the letter that they wrote to the committee on 17 January—specifically paragraph 7—in which he set out his reasons for the rejection of the amendment.
I have considered Councillor Chapman’s points carefully, especially his concern about the Scottish Government’s decision not to implement the commission’s recommendation 20. I have also considered how to balance educational benefit—to which the cabinet secretary referred, quite rightly, as the prime motive—with the challenges that local authorities face as they seek to rationalise their education services. It is not an easy issue, but I have come down on the side of favouring a five-year moratorium with some flexibility. I shall explain why.

A moratorium would prevent a multiple review from occurring over a short period of time, and it would give parents, pupils and teachers the necessary confidence to commit to the school and develop it beyond just the short term. Although it has been a rare occurrence, there have been instances of a school going through three or four closure proposals in under a decade. Such uncertainty benefits no one and can create a vicious circle whereby parents opt against sending their child to the school, which in turn calls into question its long-term viability.

A five-year moratorium would ensure that communities are not put through what Leslie Manson of the Association of Directors of Education in Scotland described as “a constant merry-go-round”. Indeed, it might well encourage parents to send their children to rural schools safe in the knowledge that the school has a medium-term future and the opportunity to address any shortcomings.

A further upshot of the five-year period concerns the fact that any second proposal would therefore fall after council elections and, as such, would be considered by some fresh faces. That would ensure that the arguments were deliberated anew and that different voices would participate in the process.

Although there are arguments for having a three-year or seven-year moratorium, the need to provide the balance that we seek between safeguarding the school’s immediate future and monitoring its progress has persuaded me to come down on the side of having a five-year moratorium.

I thank the cabinet secretary for his comments on amendment 408A. When our predecessor committee met on 30 September 2009, the then cabinet secretary Fiona Hyslop said:

“The intention of the bill is to create a robust, fair and transparent process that addresses such concerns.” — [Official Report, Education, Culture and Lifelong Learning Committee; 30 September 2009; c 2770.]

That was very much the spirit of the bill at that time. Section 5 of the 2010 act was supposed to be absolutely watertight when it came to ensuring that the decision-making process is based on accurate and relevant information and that there is absolutely no scope for misinterpretation. That has turned out not to be the case, which is largely why we are here to amend the legislation.

In the interim period, we have been furnished with very detailed evidence from several key witnesses who have been able to demonstrate just how extensive has been the misuse of information and, in a few cases, the failure to present accurate information in decision making. That evidence included examples of situations in which information had been incomplete, other situations in which the information had been inaccurate and—perhaps worst of all—situations in which it was alleged that information had been withheld or misrepresented to suit a specific viewpoint.

The committee has been presented with very detailed evidence in the area. I will not go over it all again; suffice it to say that, whatever the reason for misinformation happens to be, it is completely unacceptable. It is important that, under the current bill, there is no scope for that practice in the future.

Amendment 408A is an attempt to ensure that any local authority has to demonstrate how it has arrived at its decision, rather than just being called on to claim that it is satisfied that it has met the correct criteria. Simply having one stakeholder saying that it is satisfied is absolutely no guarantee of that or of any appropriate, objectively drawn conclusions having been made.

It is my understanding that the cabinet secretary is sympathetic to the spirit of amendment 408A, but I understand what he has said: that it will be necessary to be more specific when it comes to demonstrating that a proposal is appropriate. I will take him up on his offer of meeting before stage 3, so that we can lodge a tighter amendment. The last thing that we want to do is to create any further confusion. I thank the cabinet secretary for his offer.

On the other amendments in the cabinet secretary’s name and amendment 409A in Liam McArthur’s name, I am grateful to the cabinet secretary for noting that the Scottish Conservatives have a long-standing interest in the issue, given the efforts by my colleague Murdo Fraser in 2007, when he made his own proposal for a member’s bill. I thank the cabinet secretary for referring to that.

The cabinet secretary is absolutely correct when he says that the essential principles that ought to underpin all school closures, irrespective of whether they are rural or urban, must revolve around the maximum educational, economic and social benefit that can be achieved. A completely level playing field must be provided; there must be full transparency when it comes to the actual decision-making process; and there needs to be an opportunity for engagement with and participation by the interested parties.

I believe that those principles have been at the basis of the deliberations on the issue since before 2010, but for one reason or another—mainly to do with the interpretation of language in the bill—it has not been possible for many of the recent decisions regarding school closure proposals to adhere to the principles.

The six areas of concern that were set out by the Sutherland commission are absolutely correct, and it is appropriate that we are examining each of them with regard to the amendments.

We had an interesting debate at committee about the concept of presumption: what it really means and whether it needs to be set in stone in the bill. It was pointed out by some witnesses that, if it was fully written into the bill, it would raise too many expectations among parents and that all schools would stay open even where that is not the correct decision. In one witness’s words, that would set the bar too high.

Although I understand the logic behind that statement, I have been persuaded by other evidence that, in too many cases, the intended presumption against closure would in some circumstances be interpreted by local authorities as a presumption to close. I note what the cabinet secretary said in response to a question from Joan McAlpine at committee on 3 December 2013.

The ruling by the Court of Session clearly said that it is not sufficiently tight to rely on provisions involving matters “to have regard to” and that doing so had allowed misunderstanding and evasion. Anything that we can do to tighten up the provisions is crucial.

I will support the Government’s amendments in this area. Although I understand the spirit with which Mr McArthur presents his amendment 409A, I accept what the cabinet secretary has said about the wording, so I am interested to hear what Mr McArthur has to say.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): Like the cabinet secretary and Liz Smith, I apologise at the start for the length of my comments, convener, although I hope that you are reassured that we will witness an increasing level of brevity, in accordance with Liz Smith’s comments.

As ever, I need to declare an interest in this issue, as the father of a son at a primary school that was identified for closure prior to the last local council elections. From that experience, I am all too well aware of the impact that even the prospect of school closure can have on pupils, staff, parents and the wider rural community.

Fortunately, two of the proposed school closures in Orkney appear to have been shelved, but it is fair to say that people in Stenness and Burray remain apprehensive. That threat brought both communities closer together, although the experience was difficult for all those involved. I accept that it was also difficult for those on the council who were involved in the proposals.

All of that might be predictable, but I did not anticipate the effect that the situation had on some of the pupils involved. Listening to my youngest son, it was clear that he, along with some or perhaps all of his peers, felt somehow responsible for what was happening. That was despite the reassurances and support that were given by us as parents, by the teachers, by support staff and by others. I confess that I found that almost the most difficult aspect of the whole experience to deal with.

I do not underestimate the importance of the amendments to this part of the bill, including Liz Smith’s amendment 406, which seeks to limit the speed with which any closure proposal affecting a particular school could be initiated—save in exceptional circumstances, as articulated by Mr Russell. However, we passed the previous act only in 2010 and, if that experience tells us anything, it is that we should take great care not to raise expectations unduly about what we are trying to do or what the bill will be able to do.

I am in absolutely no doubt that responsibility for the decisions should continue to rest with local authorities and not with ministers or panels of experts, however esteemed or independent they are. We can undoubtedly assist in that task and help to ensure that decisions are taken on the best possible evidence and are subject only to tightly defined and clearly understood criteria, but ultimately government at all levels is about making choices and taking decisions even—or indeed particularly—when they are difficult. To pretend otherwise may offer short-term respite, but the longer-term consequences can invariably prove more serious and damaging.

I turn to the amendments in the group. I broadly support the proposed changes, which, as the cabinet secretary said, largely reflect the conclusions of the Sutherland commission. That said, I recognise the disappointment that some commission members and many in local government feel about the Scottish Government’s refusal to accept recommendation 20. It seems to me that this is likely to be the area on which the most controversy will continue to be focused and where decisions will be challenged in future. However, it was not clear to me—like, I think, Liz Smith and the minister—that adopting recommendation 20 and diluting the educational benefit threshold that has to be met would avoid those challenges.

I welcome the efforts to support councils in the earlier stages as well as to improve the basis on which proposals come forward and are then consulted on. I certainly hope that amendments 407 and 408 reduce the number of cases that are subsequently challenged, although it is not entirely clear how Education Scotland will be able to manage the potential conflicts of interest in its different roles, as was indicated through evidence early in the process. The Chinese walls that are needed here may well be visible from space.

Mr Russell’s amendment 409 proposes changes to call-in procedures and introduces the idea of a review panel. He recalled in his earlier remarks our exchanges during stage 1 evidence and my concerns about ministers retaining the power to call in council decisions but leaving examination and determination to an independent panel of experts. I accept—and Mr Russell has confirmed—that I am not going to persuade him to change his mind, but he will appreciate my concern that that leaves ministers free to play to the gallery in calling in controversial decisions without having to worry about actually determining whether they were justified.

In order to address that issue, my amendment 409A seeks to introduce an option for the panel also to pass judgment on the validity of the call-in by the minister. That option would be exercised only when the panel felt that the council was justified in its original decision to close, but it—or at least a variant of it—could act as a useful check on ministers simply calling in decisions because it is politically expedient to do so. Even the perception of that, as the minister acknowledged, is damaging and has given rise in the past to accusations of political bias.

Like the cabinet secretary, I understand the motivation behind Liz Smith’s amendment 408A, but I have concerns about the practicalities of the provision. At the end of the day, it may be impossible to demonstrate to the satisfaction of those who oppose a proposed closure the benefits to be had, in which case such wording is likely only to raise expectations unfairly, prolong conflict or indeed both. I know that we are all keen to avoid that.

In conclusion, I acknowledge the importance of the improvements that we are seeking to introduce in this part of the bill. I am disappointed by the cabinet secretary’s failure to accept my amendment in the group, although at this stage it hardly comes as a surprise. I accept that improvements are being introduced to the bill through amendment 409 but, without some safeguard of the kind that I seek to introduce through my amendment 409A, I have reservations about how they will be implemented. I therefore reserve the right to bring my amendment or a variant of it back at stage 3. However, I welcome the comments that the cabinet secretary made to clarify his position.

The Convener: A number of members wish to contribute to the debate on this group. I begin by calling Neil Bibby.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): I have a number of concerns about amendment 408, and I note COSLA’s concerns about the exclusion from the bill of provisions to implement recommendation 20 in the COSLA and Scottish Government commission report. That recommendation states:

> “It should be acceptable for an Educational Benefits Statement to conclude that the educational impact is neutral, with no overall educational detriment to the children directly concerned.”

Councillor Douglas Chapman from COSLA has since written to the committee:

> “By not implementing recommendation 20 the Government has altered the balance brought in by the Commission, and we are now concerned it will be actually far harder for local authorities to take necessary decisions on the school estate.”

He says that he has written to the cabinet secretary to express concern that

> “This is the impact that amended legislation could have on improving educational outcomes”,

and he also raises COSLA members’ concerns

> “that the proposals to amend the 2010 Act do not ... embrace all that the Commission was trying to achieve and because of this local government’s job will be made all the harder.”

In discussing these amendments, we need to take note of such very serious concerns and, indeed, the valuable points that have been raised about amendment 408.

In addition, I am concerned about the unnecessary burden that the required steps, particularly those to be taken before any school closure proposals are made, could place on local authorities. For example, if there is a school with zero pupils in an area where the population is not likely to increase, there is little point in looking at alternatives. We do not want schools with no children to be mothballed. There is also the obvious question about why the community benefits and transport opportunities should apply only to rural schools and not to all.

I also have a number of concerns about the proposal in amendment 409, the first of which is, as Liam McArthur has already mentioned, the abdication of ministerial and Government responsibility. Although the panel will be appointed by ministers, it will have a fair degree of autonomy and the amendment says little about the criteria for appointing the convener, who will select the panel members. That appears to be an attempt to divert responsibility for making unpopular decisions to the panel, and it is also unclear who the panel will be accountable to.

As has been suggested, the panel will be another quango from a Government that said that it would cut the number of quangos. Given the Scottish Government’s statement that the panel will have whatever staff and resources are needed, its creation is likely to increase expenditure. As a result, it would be helpful to find out whether the Scottish Government has set any cost limit for establishing the panel. For all those reasons, I cannot support amendment 409.

I very much agree with amendment 409A, in the name of Liam MacArthur, which would ensure that, if a minister called in a closure proposal but the panel found in favour of the authority, the panel would have to say in its response that the proposal should not have been called in.

Amendment 406, in the name of Liz Smith, seeks to ensure that local authorities cannot make any new proposals for five years. I believe that such a measure has the potential to be too restrictive and that the period should be reduced from five years to three. The five-year period is likely to outlast the period of an administration given that it is unlikely to consult and get a decision on any new proposals on day 1 of its period in office.

Amendment 407 in the name of Mike Russell, which relates to the financial impact of closures, appears to allow the Scottish Government to show that certain proposals by councils are being used to save money. However, on the flip-side, local authorities might be able to show that money is being better spent and, on that basis, I am comfortable with the amendment.

Finally, amendment 408A in the name of Liz Smith seeks to place on local authorities an additional burden of demonstration. I do not believe that such a measure is necessary because, if an authority had met the preliminary requirements, it would in effect have demonstrated that closure is the most appropriate course of action. I am therefore not convinced by the proposal.

At present, I will abstain on amendment 408 and oppose amendments 406, 408A and 409.

Colin Beattie (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP): Having experienced the closure of no less than six rural schools in Midlothian, I obviously have a big interest in this proposed new section.

I welcome the cabinet secretary’s amendments, which seek to extend the consistency that the Government has put in place in order to improve transparency and public confidence in the school closure process. We should keep in mind that, back in June, the cabinet secretary confirmed that educational benefit would remain a key consideration of the school closure decision-making process. As such, I very much welcome this package of amendments.

On amendment 406 in the name of Liz Smith, I must say that when I saw the reference to five years I thought that it was quite a long time. Neil Bibby has made one or two relevant comments but, considering the responses to the consultation, which overwhelmingly support the five-year moratorium, I am persuaded that it is right to support the amendment.

With regard to amendment 408A, I do not actually think that such a change is necessary. It is the education authority’s responsibility to be satisfied with compliance and the implementation of the proposal as the most appropriate response to the reasons for the formulation of the proposal. That should really remain with the education authority; indeed, I think that there would be a lot of opposition from local authorities to the proposed move.

On amendment 409A, amendment 409 already requires a panel to give reasons for its decision, and I presume that its explanation will make it clear whether it thought that the call-in was required. Moreover, the convener of the school closure review panel will send an annual report to Parliament on the decisions that have been taken during the year, which means that any information about the number of school closure proposals that have been called in and the cases in which consent has been granted will be readily available. As a result, I do not really see the purpose of amendment 409A.

Mike MacKenzie (Highlands and Islands) (SNP): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in favour of amendment 408. Indeed, I felt it important to do so, given the real difficulty that the issue of school closures has caused across the Highlands and Islands. I also make it clear that I am sympathetic to the spirit of what Liz Smith is attempting to achieve in amendment 408A.

The issue causes difficulty not only for councils, council members, parents, children and communities but, as we have seen, for the courts. For the sake of all concerned, the Parliament needs to take this opportunity to clarify matters. Although the spirit and intention of the 2010 act seem very clear, in practice, the legislation does
I was disappointed that when Argyll and Bute Council gave evidence to the committee it did not enter into the spirit of candour that characterises the interaction of most agencies and individuals with this Parliament. The committee and the Parliament should have the benefit of learning from the experience of the proposed Argyll and Bute school closures in 2010, because the experience of the parents and communities affected by the proposals differs greatly from the version that the council presented. For example, the community on the island of Luing very quickly showed that the closure of their school would result in pupils having to take a very much longer journey than the guidelines suggested. Moreover, the journey to the next nearest school involved a ferry journey that is often subject to cancellation or delay because of bad weather. As a result, that school was taken off the list of proposed closures, which was very quickly reduced to 25, but similar inaccuracies were found in the proposals for a high number of the other schools.

Parents were aghast to discover that the council that they trusted with the education of their children could be so casual about the closure proposals. They were shocked, too, to discover so many mistakes. Instead of admitting its mistakes, the council clung tenaciously to the proposals and, inevitably and understandably, trust then began to break down.

Thanks to the good offices of the Scottish rural schools network and the expertise of Sandy Longmuir, from whom the committee has heard, and to the parents’ own diligence in scrutinising the proposals and acquiring their own expertise, the proposals were revealed as increasingly incompetent. Local council members were also disappointed that the information that they had accepted from officers proved to be so untrustworthy. The final straw came when Sandy Longmuir was able to prove conclusively that, far from saving the council money, many of the proposals would cost money.

The statistics show that our small rural schools substantially outperform the average school. They are the jewels in the crown of our education system and if they can be saved they should be. They are at the very foundations of sustainable rural communities, as parents, quite rightly, place a high value on the quality of education.

Argyll and Bute is one of the few areas in Scotland with a declining population. People are voting with their feet and rejecting the dead hand of Argyll and Bute Council. Parliament must take into account the worst of councils as well as the best of them. I therefore urge the committee to support amendment 408 and the other amendments in the name of the cabinet secretary.

The Convener: Before I call the cabinet secretary, I have one or two comments to make on the amendments.

I support the amendments in the name of the cabinet secretary. Given what has occurred since the 2010 act came into being, it is clear that a relatively quick resolution is required, so I very much welcome the changes that have been proposed in the cabinet secretary’s amendments.

I turn to the amendments in the names of Opposition members. I too am interested in amendment 406, in the name of Liz Smith, and in the five-year period that was chosen—not because I thought that it was too long, but because I wondered whether seven years was a more appropriate period, as that is the length of an individual pupil’s primary schooling. However, I accept that a period of five years probably strikes the right balance in the circumstances that Liz Smith outlined.

I do not believe that five years is too short a period. If we had a period of three years, we would effectively have a perpetual round of closure proposals—we would never escape from that cycle. If that were the case, as outlined by Liz Smith, parents would effectively vote with their feet and schools would close by default, rather than be closed by intent. That shows that three years would be too short a period.

I welcome the discussion and agreement between the cabinet secretary and Liz Smith on amendment 406A. We must have absolute clarity in that area, as we do not want to have to come back in a short time to go over the issue again.

Finally, I cannot support amendment 409A, in the name of Liam McArthur, not because it is in the name of Liam McArthur, as he may be beginning to suspect, but because I do not believe that any cabinet secretary or minister can call in such a decision on a whim. That is not the basis on which such things are done. There is a process that has to be undertaken and it can be difficult to persuade a minister to call in a decision by a council. Having gone through some of the process myself, I think that it is important that there is the right balance and a separation of powers in that area, and I do not think that amendment 409A strikes at the reality of the situation regarding the decision that a minister—whether this cabinet secretary or any future cabinet secretary—would make. There is a process to be undertaken, and I am sure that ministers follow it diligently and have due regard to it and to the rules that are in place. Therefore, I cannot support amendment 409A.

I call the cabinet secretary to wind up.
Michael Russell: Thank you, convener, and thank you for the discussion that has taken place.

I will start with Mr McArthur's amendment 409A. I understand the point that he is making and the fact that ministers might be more reluctant to call in proposals if they feel that they will be publicly criticised for doing so. However, when we look at the list of proposals that have been called in and at the suggestion—the intention—that in future the list should be even shorter, given the involvement of Education Scotland, we can see that amendment 409A is unnecessary. Mr McArthur should be reassured to know that a panel could undertake the actions that we are talking about without the need for any specific legislation. There is to be an annual report, and I would expect that an independent convener would want to say if they felt that ministers were abusing the legislation in any way.

Mr McArthur's intention is probably a good one but adding what he proposes to the bill is unnecessary. If his proposal was enshrined in legislation, local authorities might be encouraged to focus solely on trying to get the panel to justify why there should not have been a call-in. We have a better situation in the bill, so, reluctantly, I do not support his amendment.

Liam McArthur: Will the cabinet secretary take an intervention?

Michael Russell: Absolutely.

Liam McArthur: I am grateful that the cabinet secretary accepts at least the principle that lies behind what I am seeking to achieve with amendment 409A. He has just implied what the response of local authorities might be. Does he accept that that is no different from my suggestion that we might need to guard against even the perception that the minister might take a certain approach to calling in particular proposals? Does he accept that that would be better dealt with on the face of the bill rather than our simply making an assumption that it will happen as a matter of course?

Michael Russell: No—I disagree. The matter will be best dealt with if we have robust legislation that is entirely clear, and we are trying to improve the 2010 act in this process. Once we have the legislation in place, the issue will be well dealt with if all those involved forbear from attacking ministers for being politically partisan when they make these decisions and instead look at the facts of the case. Those two things together will assist.

I have in front of me the number of school closure proposals that have been called in. The final outcome was that six cases received unconditional consent, which is 7 per cent of the total. It is therefore possible that, in 7 per cent of cases, that might have been the panel's judgment. The issue is around the use of the word "may"—a small number of cases might have been subject to comment, and the panel would be free to comment. It is interesting to note that there was conditional consent in 24 per cent of the total number of schools that were prepared for closure.

That meant that there were issues that were clarified and assisted by the process, which is a vital point. Only in 10 per cent of cases was consent refused.

I understand the points that Mike MacKenzie makes. I lived through the experience of the school closure proposals in Argyll and Bute not once but twice, because I was involved in an earlier round of school closures—I declare an interest, in that my wife was the headteacher of a school that was closed.

The process is damaging for everyone involved, and Mr McArthur was quite right to say that pupils and staff often blame themselves for the process that they are going through. As Liz Smith has said on a number of occasions, we must have a fair and transparent process. That objective is not assisted if the information in the process is regarded as being unfair, not comprehensive and—as has often happened—impossible to understand. I regret that the information that the committee was given, in the opinion of many people in Argyll and Bute, did not conform to the facts of the chronology of the process. That was regrettable—the council might still want to consider that point.

I turn to the points made by Mr Bibby. If the school has no pupils, the local authority will have to consider alternatives only when there are alternatives. I have never argued that all schools should remain open. There are schools that close because they have no pupils, so that issue is a red herring.

Mr Bibby's position is logically inconsistent. Having attacked me for refusing to accept one out of 37 recommendations—the only one that was not unanimously agreed by the commission—Mr Bibby announced at the end of his comments that he is going to reject more than that in his approach to my amendments. He is therefore taking a position that is even less consistent than that taken by COSLA and is motivated more by the Bain principle than by anything else.

Neil Bibby: Will the cabinet secretary take an intervention?

Michael Russell: Of course.

Neil Bibby: It is not just me who has raised concerns about the altering of the balance of the legislation—Councillor Douglas Chapman has done that, too, on behalf of COSLA.
Michael Russell: I heard Mr Bibby the first time that he mentioned that. My point remains. I disagree with COSLA on the issue. I have done so openly and have had a discussion with COSLA. I disagree because I believe, as we should all believe, that educational benefit is paramount in all educational decisions. We have had that disagreement, which is on one out of 37 recommendations—the only one on which there was a minority report. I repeat that Mr Bibby’s position will be to oppose more of the recommendations than that. Therefore, if I am altering the balance of the measures, Mr Bibby is undermining them in an even greater way. That speaks volumes about the fact that his approach is motivated by the Bain principle rather than by anything else.

I think that my amendments are valuable contributions, not because I am proposing them but because the commission on the delivery of rural education proposed them and had strong views on what should change. In those circumstances, the amendments will be welcomed right across Scotland. There are differences of opinion. COSLA objects to the idea of a five-year moratorium. Again and again, I hear those who are involved in the process and who have saved a school say, “Please, don’t let them come again for us too quickly.” People recognise that times change, but they do not want to go through the process again and again. I believe that the five-year proposal is sensible.

On Liz Smith’s amendment 408A, I repeat the undertaking to work with her and others to ensure that we get the approach absolutely correct. I hope that, at stage 3, we can find a way in which she can lodge an amendment that will achieve the effect that she and others wish for.

The changes to call-in and the determination process in amendment 409 are important. It is right to take ministers out of the final decision. Mr Bibby lambasted me for giving up that right, but he and his colleagues usually lambast me for exercising my rights as a minister—there really is no winning in these matters. However, I think that it is absolutely right to ensure that there is another set of voices in the process, so that we can return to the intention of the 2010 act, which was to have a level playing field and transparency and to ensure that people are treated fairly. We are taking a further step towards that, difficult as it has been.

I encourage members not to sit on the sidelines or to undermine the commission, as Mr Bibby proposes to do, but to support my amendments and ensure that we take the issue forward.

Before section 69

Amendment 410, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 411 to 418 and 432.

The Minister for Children and Young People (Alileen Campbell): The Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 places an obligation on safeguarders who are appointed under the act to produce a report for a children’s hearing. In certain circumstances, it is extremely difficult for a safeguarder to carry out their investigations and produce a detailed report for the hearing because of the time limits for certain hearings proceedings. The standard time for producing a safeguarder report is 35 days, but some hearings take place after as few as two working days. Amendment 410 will remove the duty on safeguarders to produce reports in those limited circumstances, as no meaningful report can be produced.

Amendment 411 is a technical amendment to ensure that, where a child protection order is made under the 2011 act, the period within which the eighth-working-day hearing is to take place begins on the eighth working day after the making or implementation of the order, as was the case under the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.

Amendment 412 gives power to a pre-hearing panel to determine whether a person who had previously been deemed to be a relevant person in relation to a child should not continue to be deemed a relevant person. The pre-hearing panel would have power to make such a determination if the person did not have and had not recently had a significant involvement in the upbringing of the child.

A pre-hearing panel has power to deem a person to be a relevant person in relation to a child, so we consider it appropriate that it should also have power to undeem a relevant person. Part of amendment 432 provides that a person undeemed by a pre-hearing panel may appeal against that decision and part of amendment 426, which is part of a later group, ensures that children’s legal aid is available for such an appeal.

Amendment 414 addresses the situation in which a child does not attend a grounds hearing for unforeseen reasons but in which the child’s circumstances are such that it is necessary as a matter of urgency for that hearing to put in place measures to protect the child. The amendment would give the grounds hearing power to make an interim compulsory supervision order where the hearing considers that the nature of the child’s circumstances is such that an ICSO is necessary as a matter of urgency for the protection, treatment, guidance or control of the child. That would allow the hearing to be assured that appropriate supervision was in place to protect the child for an interim period until a subsequent grounds hearing could be held.

Amendment 413 addresses the situation in which a child’s circumstances are such that it is necessary as a matter of urgency for that hearing to put in place measures to protect the child. The amendment would give the grounds hearing power to make an interim compulsory supervision order where the hearing considers that the nature of the child’s circumstances is such that an ICSO is necessary as a matter of urgency for the protection, treatment, guidance or control of the child. That would allow the hearing to be assured that appropriate supervision was in place to protect the child for an interim period until a subsequent grounds hearing could be held.

Amendment 413 is a technical, clarifying amendment to ensure that a children’s hearing is able to address all the issues that may merit compulsory supervision. Situations can arise where the child or relevant person indicates to the hearing that grounds are accepted but certain facts—perhaps significant facts—are not. The hearing should not be impeded by limited acceptance of certain facts, especially where it considers it appropriate to be able to send the disputed matters to the sheriff for determination.

The policy intention is that children’s hearings should be able to address all the issues in a child’s life that may merit compulsory supervision. Amendment 413 obliges the chair of the hearing to check understanding and acceptance of each fact and, on that basis, enables the hearing to decide whether to proceed only on the basis of the accepted facts alone or to send the matter to the sheriff for determination.
Amendment 415 simplifies the basis on which the timeframes can be calculated for interim compulsory supervision orders that the principal reporter seeks from the sheriff. The previous provision made it difficult for the reporter to align the expiry of ICSOs with a timely and appropriate application to the sheriff. To comply with the statutory timescales, children and families were being called into ICSO review hearings to renew an interim order for a matter of days before returning to the sheriff for the same case. That process was not child centred.

Amendment 415 enables the reporter to make an application at a suitable point before the expiry of the third ICSO. It keeps ICSO decisions in the hands of the tribunal, limits the number of successive ICSOs applying to the child, simplifies hearings administration and still prevents the sheriff from becoming involved at an unduly early stage in the process.

Amendments 416 to 418 are technical amendments to aid interpretation of the bill.

I ask the committee to support all the amendments in this group.

I move amendment 410.

Amendment 418 moved—[Aileen Campbell]—and agreed to.

Section 71—Appeal against detention of child in secure accommodation

The Convener: Amendment 419, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 420 and 430.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 419 and 420 bring the appeal process created by section 44A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, as inserted by section 71 of the bill, in relation to situations where a child has been placed in secure accommodation following the making of an order by a sheriff under section 44 of that act, into line with the relevant parts of the appeal process set out in the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 and subordinate legislation made under that act.

Amendment 419 provides that an appeal under the new section 44A may be made jointly by the child and one or more relevant persons or by two or more relevant persons and that the appeal must not be held in open court.

Amendment 420 provides that a relevant person in relation to a section 44A appeal is a relevant person for the purpose of the 2011 act and includes a person who has been deemed to be a relevant person.

Amendment 430 is a minor technical amendment to correct a small error in an amendment made by the recent section 104 order in consequence of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. It clarifies that each reference to the 2000 act in the definition of secure accommodation in section 44(11) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, as amended by the section 104 order, is to the Care Standards Act 2000.

I ask that the committee supports amendments 419, 420 and 430 in my name.

I move amendment 419.

Amendment 419 agreed to.

Amendment 420 moved—[Aileen Campbell]—and agreed to.

Section 71, as amended, agreed to.

After section 71

The Convener: Amendment 421, in the name of the minister, is in a group on its own.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 421 adds new section 28LA to the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986, which will allow Scottish ministers to make regulations extending the availability of children’s legal aid for court proceedings under that act. This addresses concerns that were raised by stakeholders during consultation on the draft Children’s Legal Assistance (Scotland) Regulations 2013 about when children’s legal aid can and cannot be extended under the existing powers and ensures that children’s legal aid can be made available to more people in the future where that is appropriate.

It is important that children’s legal aid can be made available to those individuals who need it for proceedings under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. Most commonly, applicants for children’s legal aid will be children and relevant persons as described by the 2011 act. Discussion with stakeholders has shown that children’s legal aid may also need to be made available to other people, including for court proceedings. That requires flexibility to lay regulations to make legal aid available where further discussion shows that that should be the case.

Similarly, the eligibility tests for making legal aid generally available must be equitable and consistent. Children’s legal aid is no different. Where the circumstances are the same, the same tests should apply.

The amendment achieves both those aims: it allows flexibility to make children’s legal aid more widely available where that is appropriate; and it does so in a way that is consistent with existing children’s legal aid provisions. I therefore ask committee members to support the amendment.

I move amendment 421.

Liam McArthur: I am very supportive of amendment 421. In the context of the financial memorandum, has any calculation been made about the impact that these provisions would have on the overall legal aid budget, particularly in the light of what we all understand are quite serious pressures on the budget already?

Aileen Campbell: I take on board the points that Liam McArthur makes. There will be a supplementary financial memorandum to accompany some of the changes that have been made as a result of the amendments that have been agreed to, not just in this regard but in other areas, too.

Amendment 421 agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 422, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendment 431.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 422 seeks to remove outdated restrictions linked to the participation of children under the age of 14 in performances by repealing section 38 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963.

Amendment 431 is a minor repeal in consequence of amendment 422.

You will be aware that I wrote to the committee on 13 January setting out the background to the proposals in this area. The arrangements for licensing children to participate in performances, whether on stage or on screen, are of long standing and are in need of modernisation.

The vast majority of the changes that we need to make can be delivered through revised secondary legislation, and we will shortly publish a consultation paper that sets out what that should look like. However, in December it became clear that Scotland could be negatively impacted by changes that are proposed by way of amendment to the UK Government’s Children and Families Bill, which is before the House of Lords. An amendment to that bill will remove restrictions that limit the types of performance in which children under 14 can be involved across England and Wales, by repealing section 38 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963. Scotland could be placed at a disadvantage, in terms of opportunities for our young people and for our creative industries if a similar change is not pursued here.

Of course, our young people’s wellbeing must always be our primary consideration. We would not propose the removal of the rule if we were concerned that doing so could result in children being placed at risk. However, the rule seems arbitrary and unnecessary, given the broader licensing arrangements for all children below school-leaving age. All licensing decisions that are taken by a local authority should be based on a thorough assessment of a child’s circumstances and not simply on the child’s age. Indeed, that is the child-centred approach that we should be taking to all decisions that impact on our young people.

It is unfortunate that the timing of the amendment to the UK bill has left us little scope for consultation on the proposed change. However, throughout December we sought views from a number of key organisations, including the Scottish Youth Theatre, Barnardo’s Scotland, Glasgow City Council, BBC Scotland and the Office of Communications, all of which supported the removal of the under-14 rule. My officials have written to COSLA on the matter, and no concerns have been raised.

I hope that the committee, having taken what I said into account, is satisfied as to the merits of making the change and I encourage members to support amendments 422 and 431, in my name.

I move amendment 422.

The Convener: For clarity and for my own interest, can you reassure the committee that amendment 422 will in no way affect the protection of children? It is clear that the rule was put in place some time ago, for good reasons, and I want to be reassured that if section 38 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963 is repealed, children and young people who take part in artistic performances will still be properly protected.

Aileen Campbell: The approach will in no way affect a child’s wellbeing, which is paramount not only in relation to amendment 422 but throughout the bill. We have taken views, not just from stakeholders who have an interest in performance but from Barnardo’s, and COSLA did not raise issues. We will be able to continue to look at the issue through the consultation and engagement that will be required for the secondary legislation.

Amendment 422 agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 433, in the name of Alex Johnstone, is in a group on its own.

Alex Johnstone (North East Scotland) (Con): Members will instantly recognise amendment 433 as a blunt instrument; they will be equally unsurprised that this is my weapon of choice. I have lodged the amendment in the context of the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill, with a view to ensuring that children are educated in line with their parents’ wishes. The amendment would apply to sex education across the board, but it is the introduction of same-sex marriage that makes it necessary at this time.

There is no doubt that the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill is controversial. Therefore, it is of paramount importance that the rights of parents in relation to what their children are taught are fully protected. It is correct, of course, that children are taught the law of the land, regardless of whether they or their parents or teachers agree with it. That is not in dispute. However, that is different from lessons that endorse or promote a particular lifestyle to which many parents might have a sincere moral objection, such as same-sex marriage.

The Scottish Government appears to concede the need for safeguards in the area. It did so in July 2012 when it promised that, through consultation, it would “consider any additional measures that may be required to guarantee freedom of speech and religion in specific circumstances, including education.” Therefore, it is unfortunate that the bill neglects the area.

The Scottish Government’s approach is to rely on guidance, but in the eyes of many people guidance is insufficient. Many parents, because of religious or other convictions, will not want their children to learn about same-sex marriage before they reach a certain age, fearing that they will find it confusing. Some parents might be concerned that teaching on the subject will not be balanced or will not respect their convictions on the matter.

The danger, if the right of withdrawal is not strengthened and placed on a statutory footing, is that parents’ deeply held beliefs will be undermined by their inability to have their children educated in accordance with their convictions, as is their right under article 2 of protocol 1 to the European convention on human rights, which people fear might be infringed. I would like to hear the minister’s views on whether there is a problem and how she has satisfied herself that the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill satisfies the undertaking that was given in 2012.

I am aware that there is more than one option for dealing with the circumstances. Other suggested routes might yet be explored. I look forward to hearing what the minister has to say, so that I can decide how to proceed.

I move amendment 433.

Neil Bibby: The amendment raises a difficult question of competing rights. A child has a right to education about his or her health. The number of teenage pregnancies and sexually transmitted diseases is rising in some areas. It would be difficult to tell a 15-year-old who is capable of making their own decisions and who might well be sexually active—we do not know—that they cannot attend sex education classes and that doing so would not be in their best interests.

However, as Alex Johnstone said, there is a right to private family beliefs and a right to raise a child in a religious family with certain views. The decision is about whether withdrawal from sex education is in a child’s best interests. I do not believe that that would in all probability be in a child’s best interests, so I do not support Alex Johnstone’s amendment 433.

Liam McArthur: The Government is consulting on legislation to license airguns. I have misgivings about aspects of that, but perhaps we should look at licensing blunt weapons, given Alex Johnstone’s performance this morning. I understand the background to the concerns that he has raised and the motivation for the amendment, but I see sex education as an important part of equipping our children and young people with the knowledge that they need to make safe, sensible and informed decisions about issues that can have a dramatic impact on their lives.

There is no dispute that the development of such education and even aspects of its content should be discussed between on the one hand schools and on the other hand children and young people and their parents or guardians. That can provide helpful reassurance and address the fairly legitimate point that Alex Johnstone raised about ensuring that materials are age appropriate.

However, sex education is a fundamental part of ensuring that our children and young people are equipped and empowered to deal with the challenges that life throws up, and the safeguards that Alex Johnstone wants are covered in guidance. In its briefing, Barnardo’s Scotland points out that paragraph 13 of Scottish Executive circular 2/2001 says:

‘While it is a nationally accepted part of the existing and agreed curricular framework for Scottish schools and of pupils’ educational entitlement, there is no statutory requirement for participation in a programme of sex education. Schools and authorities must therefore be sensitive to the rare cases in which a parent or carer may wish to withdraw a child from all or part of a planned sex education programme."

I understand what Mr Johnstone seeks to do and the further assurances that he seeks, but amendment 433 is unnecessary and would not help to do what we all seek to do through the bill, which is to underscore the rights of children and young people.

Liz Smith: I understand exactly where Mr Johnstone is coming from. Irrespective of people’s views, it is important that the Government appreciates the concern that the existing legislation—whether it is considered by this committee or any other committee—is not sufficiently tight. I understand why Mr Johnstone lodged amendment 433.

However, I am concerned that the amendment would not necessarily articulate with some current legislation. I worry that if it was taken in its full context, the system would become bureaucratic and it would be difficult to spell out exactly what sex education consists of. On that basis, I will abstain.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): It is good to see that Mr Johnstone is starting the new year being a wee bit more subtle than he has been in the past—that was sarcasm.

On the whole, I can understand the concerns and reasoning behind Mr Johnstone’s amendment, but I do not agree with it and there is no definition of "any programme of sex education" in the amendment.

I remember going through sex education at a difficult time in the 1980s, when it was an important part of my own development as a person. As a parent, I have gone through it again with my two now 20-something children. I do not like to be reminded of the time that I had to talk about contraception with my daughter, who was a teenager at the time, but it was something important that we had to do, so I am a strong advocate of sexual health education.

Following the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill, the Government will issue guidance and will seek views, and I think that guidance is probably the best way forward. I have faith that Scotland’s teachers will be able to deal with the issue in a way that helps young people to develop as young adults. Like Liam McArthur, I do not believe that amendment 433 is necessary.

The Convener: I very much agree with the comments made by a number of members this morning about amendment 433. In particular, I emphasise the point made by Liam McArthur about the issue already being covered. There is flexibility in the system, so the amendment is unnecessary. The amendment as laid down is also badly drafted.

I have concerns, too, because the motivation behind the amendment, if I understand Mr Johnstone correctly, is concern about the same-sex marriage issue that is being debated at the moment in Parliament. However, his amendment refers to the withdrawal of the child "from any programme of sex education", so I do not think that his motivation meets with what is in the amendment itself. Those two things do not equate.

Finally, I would like to emphasise a point that other members have mentioned. Sex education is an extremely important part of a young person’s health. It should not be seen as somehow different from other matters of health education. Irrespective of the balance of privacy and the rights of parents, young people have a right to understand fully the implications of engaging in sexual activity and the possible impacts on their health, and to deny them that would be a mistake on our part, as legislators. Therefore, I cannot support Alex Johnstone’s amendment.

Aileen Campbell: The Government does not support amendment 433, in the name of Alex Johnstone. The Government is a strong believer in and advocate of sexual health education. Neil Bibby has raised some important points about a right to education and about how sex education enables young people to develop appropriate relationships and to keep themselves safe—a point that you also made, convener.

Liam McArthur also made important points about the rights of the child, which underpin much of the bill. I understand that a number of issues have been raised in the debate on the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill, and we have sought views on guidance for education authorities and schools to follow. The Government believes that parents should be given transparent information about what children should be learning, so that parents can offer views and feedback. That is true not only in relation to sexual health education, although we recognise that it can be a sensitive area, so we consider guidance to be the best and most appropriate route.

As Alex Johnstone suggested in his opening remarks, amendment 433 is blunt, and it is not clear what it includes. A definition of "any programme of sex education" would need to be included for members to know exactly what they are voting on. That is another point that you raised, convener, and Elizabeth Smith also alluded to it.

As I said, we have sought views on updated guidance on sexual health education and have received more than 60 responses, which we are currently considering. We aim to issue revised guidance towards the end of March and will continue to keep stakeholders informed of progress.

I am sure that we will take on board this morning’s debate and the points that have been made regarding the concerns that parents have raised, so that we can strike the right balance when we publish that revised guidance in the spring. I suggest that having guidance in this regard is better than having provisions in legislation. Therefore, and for all the reasons that other members have outlined, I do not support Alex Johnstone’s amendment 433.

Alex Johnstone: Having heard the discussion, I have some hope. I have heard members expressing one or two concerns that are in line with those that I expressed myself.

However, I am convinced that not everybody around the table fully understands the desire that exists among some parents to ensure that the liberal attitudes that resulted in the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill are not universally shared. There is a reluctance among those who support movement towards the bill to accommodate the broad needs of others. The discussion has not been reassuring. As a consequence, I remain very concerned about the position in which some individuals will find themselves as a result of the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill once it passes into law.

Given the views that have been expressed, I give an undertaking that I will continue to pursue the matter and will consult a number of organisations on how the issue might be dealt with before this bill or other proposed legislation reaches stage 3.

Amendment 433, by agreement, withdrawn.

The Convener: Amendment 434, in the name of Liam McArthur, is grouped with amendments 436 and 437.

Liam McArthur: The Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 was a landmark piece of legislation for our Parliament, of which we can feel justifiably proud, not least our predecessor Education Committee. The 2004 act attracted cross-party support and has made a real, positive difference to the lives of children and young people, their parents and Scottish education more widely.

As we have already noted this morning in connection with the debate on rural school closures—an area of legislation that is in for an overhaul after less than four years—no legislation is ever perfect, and so it is with the ASL act. Ten years ago, our understanding of the crucial importance of the earliest years in shaping later educational results was less robust, and prevention was only starting to become a guiding principle of public policy.

The coalition behind the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” report reminds us of three facts in this regard. First, although children are officially covered by the 2004 act from birth, its implementation has not benefited equally those below the age of three. That is reflected in the fact that progress reports have next to nothing to say about children with ASL needs from birth to three years. On average, 15 per cent of the school-age population has established ASL needs, a number that appears to have risen dramatically, according to the figures that ministers recently released in response to a question from me, yet the number and proportion of under-school-age children having or likely to have ASL needs remains unknown, or at least unexplored.

Secondly, Scotland does well in identifying and dealing with physical conditions that suggest ASL needs that are obvious at or soon after birth. However, many ASL needs, such as those associated with communication difficulties, autism and foetal alcohol harm, develop or emerge in the two years between the age of two months, when universal health visiting usually ends, and 27 to 30 months, when the new universal checks will start occurring. That hiatus appears to be out of step with the whole notion of early intervention. Some preventable problems are not being prevented, just as some problems that could be addressed through early intervention instead get worse.

Finally, we know that that situation has arisen in part because the ASL act is an education act and was not written with under-school-age children in mind, and because the act’s benefits have been limited—unlike for children of any other age—to those eligible under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. That undermines primary prevention and denies support during most of the first 1,001 days of life, when young children and their parents could most effectively and inexpensively be helped through genuinely early intervention.

Although the gap in ASL assessment and provision has not gone unrecognised over the years, it remains to be closed. Amendment 434 offers such an opportunity by explicitly including in the ASL legislation a duty with regard to prevention in the 1,001 days of life, which, after all, are also the first 1,001 days of learning.
As has been said many times, the bill before us is a starting point and this amendment not only provides an illustration of what could and should happen next in the delivery of its objectives but is entirely in keeping with recommendations in the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” report. I hold out little hope that the amendment will be supported but, in moving it, I encourage committee members to see this as unfinished business and invite the minister to commit to looking at ways of closing this particular gap.

Amendments 436 and 437 are much simpler and seek to enable a named person for an under-school-age child to request an ASL assessment instead of relying almost entirely on parents to do so. Parental consent would still be required but not direct parental action and I urge the committee to support the amendments.

I move amendment 434 and look forward to the responses from the minister and other colleagues.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): I support Liam McArthur’s comments. He has raised an important issue and I think that we will all agree that the ASL act was a landmark and has made a positive difference to the lives of many children. However, I think that what these amendments are trying to achieve is already covered in the bill. Every child, including pre-school-age children, will have access to a named person and, where there is a wellbeing need, the named person can seek to determine the best way of supporting the child, which might well be through a co-ordinated support plan. Although Liam McArthur has raised a number of very important issues, I am not sure that these amendments to this bill are necessary at this stage and, as a result, I will not be supporting them.

The Convener: Before I bring in the minister, I, too, will make one or two comments.

I am certainly very sympathetic to Liam McArthur’s argument and think that he has made a number of very pertinent points in defence of his amendments. As a result, I would like to hear from the minister a clear statement of the Government’s view of the amendments, an indication of whether, as Joan McAlpine has suggested, these issues are already covered in the bill and perhaps a commitment to further discussions about some of these areas. After all, these amendments and others that we have dealt with are making a wider point that requires to be discussed not just today but outwith the committee itself.

With that, I call the minister.

Aileen Campbell: I thank Liam McArthur for the points that he has raised and the coalition behind “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” for suggesting these amendments.

First of all, I reiterate that we absolutely support the principle of prevention and early intervention that lies behind all of these amendments, especially where such early intervention might prevent an additional support need from developing in the first place or existing additional support needs from getting worse. Indeed, that is why, as Joan McAlpine has pointed out, the bill contains a number of early intervention and prevention provisions. I want to outline some of the areas of the bill where we think that such an approach is most apparent and then address the specific requests that have been made by Liam McArthur and Stewart Maxwell.

A child’s health and wellbeing are assessed from birth during the contacts set out in the child health programme, which now includes a 27 to 30-month universal health review. Where wellbeing needs require it, a child’s plan will be developed in partnership with the child, their family and relevant professionals and will take account of learning needs to ensure that as part of the named person’s role to promote, support and safeguard children’s wellbeing the learning needs of children under school age are met alongside any other needs that might affect their wellbeing.

Section 24 requires service providers to publish information about the named person service and its functions and contact arrangements to ensure that families are made aware of the most appropriate contact for information. The named person functions include a duty to advise, inform and support the child and their parents.

Section 25 requires service providers and relevant authorities, where requested, to provide assistance to the named person service provider where it would assist the exercise of the named person functions, and section 38 contains a similar duty in respect of child’s plans. As a result, the bill already contains sufficient provision to ensure that relevant information about children’s wellbeing, including any learning needs, is or can be made available to those who require it.

More specifically in relation to the points made by Liam McArthur and Stewart Maxwell, the advisory group for additional support for learning has agreed that the issue of prevention and early intervention through the early years is very important. The statutory code of practice for ASL is already being revised because we wish to be clear about the delivery of additional support for learning in the context of this bill, and that work will specifically include a focus on prevention and early intervention. The revised code of practice will be subject to full consultation and parliamentary scrutiny as required under section 27 of the 2004 act and, given the considered and thoughtful input that the campaign behind “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” has already made, I know that the code’s revision will benefit from the coalition’s expertise, knowledge and input.

With regard to the collection of data on school-age children with additional support needs, I note that under the bill’s provisions relating to child’s plans local authorities and health boards will be required to report on outcomes prescribed by the Scottish ministers, including a number of outcomes related to early intervention and primary prevention activity. Again, statutory guidance on this part of the bill will be developed in collaboration with a wide range of partners and stakeholders.

Although I appreciate the points that Liam McArthur has made, we believe that, for all the reasons that I have set out, his amendments are unnecessary. However, I hope that my commitment to a full and wide consultation on the revision of the code gives comfort not only to committee members but to the coalition, which has already suggested some very thought-provoking amendments to this section of the bill.

Liam McArthur: I thank the convener, Joan McAlpine and the minister for their very encouraging comments. As Joan McAlpine has indicated, the 2004 act is a landmark piece of legislation and I think that this bill will address a number of the concerns that have been raised. However, we need to guard against any suggestion that once this bill has been passed our business is done. Clearly, we will have to keep the matter under review and, in that respect, I welcome the minister’s comments about the advisory group’s consideration of the statutory code. I also think that the invitation to the coalition behind the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” report to engage directly with that process will be helpful.

I am conscious that we will be discussing our work programme later on. It might be a bit premature for this issue to be picked up in that item but we certainly have an opportunity to come back to it in due course. For the time being, I am grateful to the minister, in particular, for her comments and will not press amendment 434.

Amendment 434, by agreement, withdrawn.

The Convener: Amendment 435, in the name of Mary Fee, is grouped with amendment 438.

Mary Fee (West Scotland) (Lab): Amendments 435 and 438 relate to the minimum age at which a young transgender person can apply for a gender recognition certificate. At the moment, the minimum age is 18 and the lack of gender recognition for 16 and 17-year-old transgender people means that, compared with other 16 and 17-year-olds, they are discriminated against, including being prevented from marrying in accordance with their gender identity until they are 18.

During stage 1 of the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill, the Equal Opportunities Committee heard evidence on the need to reduce the minimum age for gender recognition from 18 to 16 and, in its stage 1 report, that committee asked the Scottish Government to provide a detailed response. In that response, the Government said that it needs to consult and obtain more evidence on the matter before making any such change. That is exactly what my amendments would provide for. They were ruled out of scope for the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill because they do not relate only to marriage and civil partnerships; however, they fall within the scope of this bill.

This is a very important issue for young transgender people. A significant number of young people are diagnosed with gender dysphoria in their early teenage years and, with their parents’ support, transition until they are full time in the opposite gender to that on their birth certificate. They can change their name on a range of documents, including school reports, medical and dental records, bank records and bus passes but without a gender recognition certificate their legal gender remains unchanged, which causes significant discrimination in education and employment, for example, when they make college or job applications.

People can apply for gender recognition as long as they have a diagnosis of gender dysphoria and have lived in their acquired gender for at least two years. Significant numbers of 16 and 17-year-olds qualify but are prevented from applying by the minimum age being 18. Changing the application age to 16 is supported by the specialist psychiatrist who provides treatment to young transgender people in Scotland; it is also in line with best practice in other European countries.

Amendment 435 would provide for a consultation and review on the proposed change. If a review concluded that a change should be made, the amendment would provide for a one-off order-making power for that purpose only. Amendment 438 would make the order-making power subject to the affirmative procedure. I believe that a review of the matter is needed and should not be delayed, because young transgender people are facing real discrimination now and the sooner that the issue is sorted, the better. I hope that the committee can support the amendment.

I move amendment 435.
The Convener: Thank you very much, Mary, and congratulations on getting through that although you have a cold.

Liam McArthur: I congratulate Mary Fee on lodging the amendments and, indeed, getting through the process of speaking to them.

Mary Fee’s call for at least a review of the minimum age for applying for gender recognition is well made. Reviewing whether the limit should be lowered from 18 to 16 or 17, possibly through secondary legislation, seems to me to be perfectly sensible and it would go some way towards better reflecting the needs of young transgender people in Scotland. As LGBT Youth Scotland pointed out in its briefing for this morning’s proceedings, many transgender young people begin living in their new or acquired gender well before they reach 16, so they must live for far longer than the normally required two years in their new gender role without proper legal documentation or recognition. It is not hard to appreciate, as Mary Fee set out, that that can force those who are affected to develop a very negative perception of themselves, and it can impact adversely on the way in which others view them.

Mary Fee also set out some of the practical disadvantages that arise from the way in which the law is currently framed. If the minister does not support the amendments, I hope that she will at least offer a commitment to have the position reviewed outwith the context of the bill. Again, I thank Mary Fee for bringing her amendments to the committee this morning.

Joan McAlpine: I am sympathetic to the spirit of Mary Fee’s amendments. I commend the briefing on the subject that we received from the Equality Network, which covers many of the comments that Mary Fee made. I learned a lot from reading the briefing, including that the issue is obviously a very sensitive and important one for those who are affected. However, the fact that I learned so much from reading the briefing and that the committee has not heard any of that evidence makes me uncomfortable about supporting Mary Fee’s amendments. The way in which the committee should work and how we should pass legislation is that we should be able to take evidence on a subject, particularly one as important as this, before making a change to the law.

I, too, would welcome the minister’s comments. As I said, I support the spirit of amendment 435 and the organisations that have argued in favour of it.

Liz Smith: I think that I understand the basis on which amendments 435 and 438 have been proposed, because there are quite clearly some discrimination issues that we must address.

However, I have concerns about the issue in Parliament just now of applying legislation to 16 to 18-year-olds, whether this committee deals with it or not. I do not think that our approach to such legislation is entirely consistent, and I hope that that can be addressed in terms of whether we take forward amendment 435.

I think that there is a debate to be had about not just the merits of amendment 435, but where we sit with regard to legislation that includes 16 to 18-year-olds, because there are lots of inconsistencies. On that basis, I am not comfortable about voting for amendment 435. It is nothing to do with the discrimination aspect; it is because I am not comfortable about the consistency of our legislative process at present.

The Convener: Mary Fee has very fairly raised an issue that needs to be addressed. The problem that I face with regard to her amendments 435 and 438 is the lack of background knowledge, information and evidence received by the committee throughout the process. The issue has come to the committee out of left field, if I may put it that way. It is certainly very new to the committee, and I am personally unaware of the detail and the arguments, both in favour of and against such a change.

The issue has to be properly debated and argued through. Like other members, I am very interested to hear what the Government’s position on it is. I am sympathetic to removing discrimination if such discrimination exists but, unfortunately, I cannot support Mary Fee’s amendments at this stage, because of that lack of background evidence. We have not had such evidence as we have gone through the process of scrutinising the bill, and that leaves me in some difficulty when it comes to supporting the amendments.

Aileen Campbell: I thank Mary Fee for battling through her sore throat in speaking to and moving her amendments.

The issue of reducing the application age for gender recognition arose, as the member outlined, in the context of the Marriage and Civil Partnership (Scotland) Bill, which is also making its way through Parliament. Amendment 435 is deemed to be outwith the scope of that bill. As Mary Fee suggested, this is an incredibly sensitive issue, and the young people whom Mary Fee mentioned can face very difficult and uncertain circumstances. It is critical that we make the right legislative choices and have the right understanding to support all those who face such important decisions about their lives. However, we do not believe that this is the right point at which to make those choices, nor do we think that the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is the best place in which to do it.
We understand the points that were made in evidence to the Equal Opportunities Committee, where the matter was first raised. However, the Government considers it premature to take an order-making power now. As the convener mentioned, the matter was not raised in the original consultation on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill or in the committee’s evidence gathering at stage 1. We think that it would be responsible to consult and seek expert advice on the issue, as Joan McAlpine outlined. That consultation would of course include expert groups such as the equalities groups that have provided briefing material to committee members.

Under the current requirements of the Gender Recognition Act 2004, a person normally has to live in the acquired gender for two years before applying to the gender recognition panel. That means that children would have to start living in the acquired gender at 14 in order to be able to apply at 16. That raises questions about the support and advice that are available to people of that age, which deserve far more detailed and careful consideration. Liz Smith raised some important issues about the wider context of the bill.

Policy responsibility rests with my health colleagues. I understand that the equalities minister, Shona Robison, will carefully and seriously consider representations on the issue. We will not forget the points that have been raised and raised well here at this committee. We will ensure that the equalities minister is updated about today’s debate and the points that have been made, including the submissions that have been presented by the equalities groups.

However, in the meantime we cannot support Mary Fee’s amendments, and I invite her to withdraw amendment 435 and not move amendment 438.

Mary Fee: I thank the minister and committee members for their comments, and for their understanding of a very sensitive subject. I am slightly disappointed that a greater commitment has not been given to review the issue in some way. However, I take on board the minister’s comments about the equalities minister looking into the issue. We will ensure that the equalities minister is updated about today’s debate and the points that have been made, including the submissions that have been presented by the equalities groups.

Mary Fee: On that basis, I am happy to withdraw amendment 435.

The Convener: Amendment 82, in the name of Liz Smith, is in a group on its own.

Liz Smith: This committee knows better than any other committee in the Parliament about the outstanding work that voluntary organisations do in supporting the development of children and young people. It is as a result of their important and highly informative insistence that I have lodged amendment 82. Its purpose is to enable the Scottish Government to provide voluntary bodies with either general or particular guidance after consulting them beforehand, which acknowledges the unique role of voluntary bodies in assisting development. Guidance that is issued to local authorities is sometimes not appropriate or consistent with that which is required for voluntary bodies, and its demands might be too onerous or take up scarce resources that volunteer organisations do not have or at times when those resources are best deployed elsewhere.

Amendment 82 would prevent such problems from arising by creating a separate avenue through which distinct guidance can emerge, which would ensure that voluntary bodies always have a voice in the process of development on issues relating to children and young people. I think that we are all aware that, as things stand, voluntary bodies are nervous that their interests will not always be adequately reflected and that guidance sometimes fails to take into account their special role and circumstances.

Amendment 82 is designed to address those concerns head on, and would go a long way towards reassuring voluntary bodies that their specific role and character will be taken into account.

I move amendment 82.

Liam McArthur: I can think of few other bills that have impacted quite so much on voluntary organisations or on the third sector more widely, given the extent to which this bill will rely on the voluntary sector in delivering its objectives. Liz Smith makes the fair point that guidance for public bodies more generally does not necessarily apply in its entirety to voluntary organisations. Amendment 82 would appear to be a sensible addition to the bill that would allow ministers to provide more specific guidance where it is appropriate.

Aileen Campbell: I echo Liz Smith's view that the voluntary sector is unique and plays an important role in services and in developing policy. The voluntary sector is actively engaged in all aspects of the bill, including the development of guidance, and we have said a number of times that we will want to consult those organisations as we progress the bill's implementation. Third sector organisations are represented at all levels of consultation and policy development.

However, the amendment's use of the term "voluntary organisations" is imprecise and does not reflect the complexity and range of provision of children's services by non-public sector organisations, which include voluntary, charitable, social enterprise, non-governmental and private sector organisations.

The inclusion of the term “voluntary organisations” would require a legal definition and an attendant consultation with the sector to agree on that definition. Previous discussions and consultations on the issue have resulted in general agreement on the term “third sector”, which is now generally accepted.

Traditionally, the third sector has valued its independence. Specific reference on the face of a Government bill could undermine that and it would not be welcomed by all parties in the sector.

Scottish ministers can at any time issue non-statutory guidance to voluntary organisations about the application of the act to them—that can be achieved without the need for amendment 82.

I therefore urge the member to withdraw amendment 82.

Liz Smith: I have listened to what the minister said, but amendment 82 was lodged because of lobbying and consultation with many who are in the third sector or voluntary organisations. They were very clear indeed that they do not have the clarity that they require about the roles that they will have and how they will proceed when it comes to children and young people. We have to be extremely clear that we are giving them that guidance. I am not convinced at present that the guidance is sufficient to make it clear to the organisations exactly what is expected of them and where their role lies. For that reason, I will press amendment 82.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 82 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Schedule 4—Modification of enactments

The Convener: Amendment 424, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 425, 426, 387 and 427 to 429.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 424 and 425 are minor technical drafting amendments consequential on the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, which came into force after the introduction of the bill. Amendment 427 is consequential on the changes that are made by amendments 424 and 425.

Amendment 426 makes two minor consequential amendments in relation to legal aid as a result of amendments 412, 432 and 421 in previous groups. It will ensure that legal aid is available for appeals against the decision that a person previously deemed to be a relevant person is no longer deemed a relevant person under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. It will also ensure that affirmative procedures apply to the new section 28LA powers to be inserted in the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 by amendment 421.

Amendment 387 makes an amendment to section 20 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 in consequence of provisions in the bill on counselling services and kinship care orders. Under section 20 of the 1995 act, local authorities must, from time to time, prepare and publish information about relevant services that they provide.

Amendment 387 extends the definition of “relevant services” to cover services provided by local authorities for, or in respect of, children in their area under part 9, which is on counselling, and part 10, which is on kinship care orders. It is a technical amendment to ensure that local authorities publish information about the kinship care assistance and counselling services that they provide, alongside information about other services that support children and families and promote their wellbeing.

Amendments 428 and 429 are two minor drafting amendments to make small adjustments to the text of an amendment that is being made by paragraph 3(4) of schedule 4 to the bill to section 44(1) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. Section 44 of the 1995 act makes provision for publishing restrictions in relation to certain proceedings involving children. The amendments align the wording in new section 44(1)(a) of the 1995 act with an amendment previously made to that section by section 52(a) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 to ensure drafting consistency.

I ask the committee to support the amendments in this group.

cabinet secretary, who came along this morning, for their contributions to stage 2.

Aileen Campbell: I thank the committee.

The Convener: Thank you, minister.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
[AS AMENDED AT STAGE 2]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about the rights of children and young people; to make provision about investigations by the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland; to make provision for and about the provision of services and support for or in relation to children and young people; to make provision for an adoption register; to make provision about children’s hearings, detention in secure accommodation and consultation on certain proposals in relation to schools; and for connected purposes.

RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

1 Duties of Scottish Ministers in relation to the rights of children

10 (1) The Scottish Ministers must—

(a) keep under consideration whether there are any steps which they could take which would or might secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC requirements, and

(b) if they consider it appropriate to do so, take any of the steps identified by that consideration.

15 (2) The Scottish Ministers must promote public awareness and understanding (including appropriate awareness and understanding among children) of the rights of children.

(3) As soon as practicable after the end of each 3 year period, the Scottish Ministers must lay before the Scottish Parliament a report of—

(a) what steps they have taken in that period to secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC requirements,

(b) what they have done in that period in pursuance of subsection (2), and

(c) their plans until the end of the next 3 year period—

(i) to take steps to secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC requirements, and

(ii) to do things in pursuance of subsection (2).
(3A) In preparing such a report the Scottish Ministers must take such steps as they consider appropriate to obtain the views of children on what their plans for the purposes of subsection (3)(c) should be.

(4) In subsection (3), “3 year period” means—

(a) the period of 3 years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, and

(b) each subsequent period of 3 years.

(5) As soon as practicable after a report has been laid before the Scottish Parliament under subsection (3), the Scottish Ministers must publish it (in such manner as they consider appropriate).

2 Duties of public authorities in relation to the UNCRC

(1) As soon as practicable after the end of each 3 year period, an authority to which this section applies must publish (in such manner as the authority considers appropriate) a report of what steps it has taken in that period to secure better or further effect within its areas of responsibility of the UNCRC requirements.

(2) In subsection (1), “3 year period” means—

(a) the period of 3 years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, and

(b) each subsequent period of 3 years.

(3) Two or more authorities to which this section applies may satisfy subsection (1) by publishing a report prepared by them jointly.

3 Authorities to which section 2 applies

(1) The authorities to which section 2 applies are the persons listed, or persons within a description listed, in schedule 1.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 1 by—

(a) adding a person or description of persons,

(b) removing an entry listed in it, or

(c) varying an entry listed in it.

(3) An order under subsection (2)(a) may—

(a) add a person only if the person falls within subsection (4),

(b) add a description of persons only if each of the persons within the description falls within subsection (4).

(4) A person falls within this subsection if the person—

(a) is part of the Scottish Administration,

(b) is a Scottish public authority with mixed functions or no reserved functions (within the meaning of the Scotland Act 1998), or

(c) is a publicly owned company.

(5) In subsection (4)(c), “publicly owned company” means a company that is wholly owned by—
Part 1—Rights of children

(a) the Scottish Ministers, or
(b) a person listed, or a person within a description listed, in schedule 1.

(6) For the purpose of subsection (5), a company is wholly owned—
(a) by the Scottish Ministers if it has no members other than—
(i) the Scottish Ministers or other companies that are wholly owned by them, or
(ii) persons acting on behalf of the Scottish Ministers or of such other companies,
(b) by a person listed, or a person within a description listed, in schedule 1 if it has no members other than—
(i) the person or other companies that are wholly owned by the person, or
(ii) persons acting on behalf of the person or of such other companies.

(7) In this section, “company” includes any body corporate.

4 Interpretation of Part 1

(1) In this Part—
“the rights of children” includes the rights and obligations set out in—
(a) the UNCRC,
(b) the first optional protocol to the UNCRC, and
(c) the second optional protocol to the UNCRC,
“the UNCRC” means the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child adopted and opened for signature, ratification and accession by General Assembly resolution 44/25 of 20 November 1989,
“the first optional protocol” means the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict,
“the second optional protocol” means the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography,
“the UNCRC requirements” means the rights and obligations set out in—
(a) Part 1 of the UNCRC,
(b) Articles 1 to 6(1), 6(3) and 7 of the first optional protocol, and
(c) Articles 1 to 10 of the second optional protocol.

(2) A reference in subsection (1) to a UNCRC document is to be read as a reference to that document subject to—
(a) any amendments in force in relation to the United Kingdom at the time, and
(b) any reservations, objections or interpretative declarations by the United Kingdom in force at the time.

(3) In subsection (2), “UNCRC document”—
(a) means the UNCRC or any optional protocol to the UNCRC, and
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Part 2—Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland

(4) Where subsection (5) applies, the Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (1) as they consider appropriate to take account of—
   (a) an optional protocol to the UNCRC, or
   (b) an amendment of a document referred to in subsection (1) at the time.

(5) This subsection applies where the protocol or amendment is one which—
   (a) the United Kingdom has ratified, or
   (b) the United Kingdom has signed with a view to ratification.

(6) No modification may be made by an order under subsection (4) so as to come into force before the protocol or amendment is in force in relation to the United Kingdom.

PART 2

COMMISSIONER FOR CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE IN SCOTLAND

5 Investigations by the Commissioner

(1) The Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 is amended as follows.

(2) In section 7—
   (a) for subsections (1) and (2), substitute—
      “(1) The Commissioner may carry out an investigation into—
      (a) whether, by what means and to what extent a service provider has regard to the rights, interests and views of children and young people in making decisions or taking actions that affect those children and young people (such an investigation being called a “general investigation”),
      (b) whether, by what means and to what extent a service provider had regard to the rights, interests and views of a child or young person in making a decision or taking an action that affected that child or young person (such an investigation being called an “individual investigation”).

(2) The Commissioner may carry out a general investigation only if the Commissioner, having considered the available evidence on, and any information received about, the matter, is satisfied on reasonable grounds that the matter to be investigated raises an issue of particular significance to—
   (a) children and young people generally, or
   (b) particular groups of children and young people.

(2A) The Commissioner may carry out an investigation only if the Commissioner, having considered the available evidence on, and any information received about, the matter, is satisfied on reasonable grounds that the investigation would not duplicate work that is properly the function of another person.”,

(b) in subsection (3), omit paragraph (b),

(c) after that subsection, add—

“(4) Subsection (5) applies in relation to a matter about which the Commissioner may carry out an individual investigation.
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Part 2—Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland

(5) Where the Commissioner considers that the matter may be capable of being resolved without an investigation, the Commissioner may with a view to securing that outcome take such steps as the Commissioner considers appropriate.”.

5 (3) In section 8—
(a) in subsection (1), for paragraph (b) substitute—
“(b) take such steps as appear to the Commissioner to be appropriate with a view to bringing notice of the investigation and terms of reference to the attention of persons likely to be affected by it.”,

10 (b) in subsection (2), for “An” substitute “A general”,
(c) after that subsection, add—
“(3) An individual investigation is to be conducted in private.”.

(4) In section 11—
(a) in subsection (1), for “lay before the Parliament” substitute “prepare”,
(b) in subsection (3), for “laid before the Parliament” substitute “finalised”,
(c) after that subsection, add—
“(4) The Commissioner must lay before the Parliament the report of a general investigation.
(5) The Commissioner may lay before the Parliament the report of an individual investigation.”.

6 Requirement to respond to Commissioner’s recommendations

(1) The Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 is amended as follows.

(2) In section 11—
(a) after subsection (2), insert—
“(2A) In relation to any such recommendation, the report may include a requirement to respond.
(2B) A requirement to respond is a requirement that the service provider provides, within such period as the Commissioner reasonably requires, a statement in writing to the Commissioner setting out—
(a) what the service provider has done or proposes to do in response to the recommendation; or
(b) if the service provider does not intend to do anything in response to the recommendation, the reasons for that.”,

35 (b) after subsection (5) (as inserted by section 5 of this Act), add—
“(6) Where a report of an investigation includes a requirement to respond, the Commissioner must give a copy of the report to the service provider.”.

(3) After section 14, insert—
“14AA Publication of responses to recommendations of investigations

(1) The Commissioner must publish any statement provided in response to a requirement to respond to a recommendation arising out of a general investigation.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply if, or to the extent that, the Commissioner considers publication to be inappropriate.

(3) The Commissioner may publish any statement provided in response to a requirement to respond to a recommendation arising out of an individual investigation.

(4) The Commissioner must ensure that, so far as reasonable and practicable having regard to the subject matter, the version of the statement which is published under subsection (1) or (3) does not name or identify any child or young person, or group of children or young people, referred to in it.

(5) The Commissioner may, in such manner as the Commissioner considers appropriate, publicise a failure to comply with a requirement to respond.”.

PART 3
CHILDREN’S SERVICES PLANNING

7 Introductory

(1) For the purposes of this Part—

“children’s service” means any service provided in the area of a local authority by a person mentioned in subsection (2) which is provided wholly or mainly to, or for the benefit of—

(a) children generally, or

(b) children with needs of a particular type (such as looked after children or children with a disability or a need for additional support in learning),

“other service provider” means—

(a) the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland,

(b) the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service,

(c) the Principal Reporter,

(d) the National Convener of Children’s Hearings Scotland,

(e) the Scottish Court Service,

“related service” means any service provided in the area of a local authority by a person mentioned in subsection (2) which though not a children’s service is capable of having a significant effect on the wellbeing of children,

“relevant health board” means a health board whose area comprises some or all of the area of the local authority.

(2) The persons referred to in the definitions of “children’s service” and “related service” in subsection (1) are—

(a) the local authority,

(b) any relevant health board,
(c) any other service provider,
(d) the Scottish Ministers (but only in relation to a service provided by them in exercise of their functions under the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989).

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by order specify—

(a) services which are to be considered to be included within or excluded from the definition of “children’s service” or “related service” in subsection (1),
(b) matters in relation to services falling within either of those definitions which are to be considered to be included within or excluded from those services.

(4) Before making such an order, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) each health board,
(b) each local authority, and
(c) where the service concerned is provided by one of the other service providers, that person.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify the definition of “other service provider” in subsection (1) by—

(a) adding a person or a description of persons,
(b) removing an entry listed in it, or
(c) varying an entry listed in it.

(6) A function conferred by this Part on a local authority and each relevant health board is to be exercised by those persons jointly.

8 Requirement to prepare children’s services plan

(1) A local authority and each relevant health board must in respect of each 3 year period prepare a children’s services plan for the area of the local authority.

(2) In subsection (1)—

“3 year period” means—

(a) the period of 3 years beginning with such date after the coming into force of this section as the Scottish Ministers specify by order, and
(b) each subsequent period of 3 years,

“children’s services plan” means a document setting out their plans for the provision over that period of all—

(a) children’s services, and
(b) related services.

9 Aims of children’s services plan

(1) A children’s services plan is to be prepared with a view to securing the achievement of the aims in subsection (2).

(2) Those aims are—

(a) that children’s services in the area concerned are provided in the way which—
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Part 3—Children’s services planning

(i) best safeguards, supports and promotes the wellbeing of children in the area concerned,

(ii) ensures that any action to meet needs is taken at the earliest appropriate time and that, where appropriate, action is taken to prevent needs arising,

(iii) is most integrated from the point of view of recipients, and

(iv) constitutes the most efficient use of available resources,

(b) that related services in the area concerned are provided in the way which, so far as consistent with the objects and proper delivery of the service concerned, safeguards, supports and promotes the wellbeing of children in the area concerned.

10 Children’s services plan: process

(1) In preparing a children’s services plan a local authority and each relevant health board must—

(a) give each of the other service providers and the Scottish Ministers an effective opportunity (consistent with the extent to which the services they provide are to be the subject of the children’s services plan) to participate in or contribute to the preparation of the plan, and

(b) consult—

(i) such organisations as appear to fall within subsection (2),

(ii) such social landlords as appear to provide housing in the area of the local authority, and

(iii) such other persons as the Scottish Ministers may by direction specify.

(2) The organisations falling within this subsection are organisations (whether or not formally constituted) which—

(a) represent the interests of persons who use or are likely to use any children’s service or related service in the area of the local authority, or

(b) provide a service in the area which, if it were provided by the local authority, any relevant health board, any of the other service providers or the Scottish Ministers, would be a children’s service or a related service.

(3) In subsection (1)(b)(ii), “social landlords” has the meaning given by section 165 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010.

(4) A direction under subsection (1)(b)(iii) may be revised or revoked.

(5) Each of the other service providers is and the Scottish Ministers are to participate in or contribute to the preparation of the children’s services plan in accordance with the opportunity given to them under subsection (1)(a).

(6) The persons to be consulted under subsection (1)(b) are to meet any reasonable request which the local authority and each relevant health board make of them—

(a) to participate in the preparation of the children’s services plan for the area,

(b) to contribute to the preparation of that plan.

(7) As soon as reasonably practicable after a children’s services plan has been prepared, the local authority and each relevant health board must—
(a) send a copy to—
   (i) the Scottish Ministers, and
   (ii) each of the other service providers, and
(b) publish it (in such manner as the local authority and each relevant health board consider appropriate).

5 (8) Where the Scottish Ministers or any of the other service providers disagrees with the plan in relation to any matter concerning the provision of a service by them, they must prepare and publish (in such manner as they consider appropriate)—
   (a) a notice of the matters in relation to which they disagree, and
   (b) a statement of their reasons for disagreeing.

10 11 Children’s services plan: review

(1) A local authority and each relevant health board—
   (a) must keep the children’s services plan for the area of the local authority under review, and
   (b) may in consequence prepare a revised children’s services plan.

(2) The following provisions apply to a revised children’s services plan as they apply to a children’s services plan—
   section 9,
   section 10, and
   subsection (1) of this section.

15 12 Implementation of children’s services plan

(1) During the period to which a children’s services plan relates, the persons mentioned in subsection (2) must, so far as reasonably practicable, provide children’s services and relevant services in the area of the local authority in accordance with the plan.

(2) Those persons are—
   (a) the local authority,
   (b) each relevant health board,
   (c) the Scottish Ministers,
   (d) the other service providers.

(3) The duty in subsection (1) to provide services in accordance with the plan—
   (a) does not apply to the extent that the person providing the service considers that to comply with it would adversely affect the wellbeing of a child,
   (b) does not apply in relation to the Scottish Ministers or the other service providers to the extent of any matter within a notice published by them under section 10(8) in relation to the plan.
13 Reporting on children’s services plan

(1) As soon as practicable after the end of each 1 year period, a local authority and each relevant health board must publish (in such manner as they consider appropriate) a report on the extent to which—

(a) children’s services and related services have in that period been provided in the area of the local authority in accordance with the children’s services plan, and

(b) that provision has achieved—

(i) the aims listed in section 9(2),

(ii) such outcomes in relation to the wellbeing of children in the area as the Scottish Ministers may by order prescribe.

(2) In subsection (1), “1 year period” means—

(a) the period of 1 year beginning with the date specified under section 8(1), and

(b) each subsequent period of 1 year.

14 Assistance in relation to children’s services planning

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any reasonable request made of them to provide a local authority and each relevant health board with information, advice or assistance for the purposes of exercising their functions under this Part.

(2) Those persons are—

(a) any of the other service providers or the Scottish Ministers (but only in so far as the information, advice or assistance relates to a children’s service or a related service which it is a function of the person to provide),

(b) any of the persons mentioned in section 10(1)(b).

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply where the person considers that the provision of the information, advice or assistance concerned would—

(a) be incompatible with any duty of the person, or

(b) unduly prejudice the exercise of any function of the person.

15 Guidance in relation to children’s services planning

(1) A person or the persons mentioned in subsection (2) must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 12).

(2) Those persons are—

(a) a local authority and each relevant health board,

(b) each of the other service providers.

(5) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult the persons to whom it relates.
16  Directions in relation to children’s services planning

(1) A person or the persons mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 12).

(2) Those persons are—

(a) a local authority and each relevant health board,
(b) each of the other service providers.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the person to which it relates.

17  Children’s services planning: default powers of Scottish Ministers

(1) This section applies where the Scottish Ministers consider that a local authority and each relevant health board—

(a) are not exercising a function conferred on them by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 12), or

(b) are in exercising such a function not complying with section 15(1).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may direct that the function—

(a) is to be exercised in a particular way, or

(b) is to be exercised instead by such of the persons mentioned in subsection (3) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(3) Those persons are—

(aa) the local authority,
(ab) any relevant health board,
(b) another local authority or health board.

(4) A direction under subsection (2)(b) may include such provision as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate as to the making by a person who is not to be exercising the function of payment to a person who is to exercise the function by virtue of the direction.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction under subsection (2) the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) the local authority and relevant health boards whose failure is to be, or is, the subject of the direction, and

(b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

(5A) The persons to whom a direction under subsection (2) is addressed must comply with the direction.

18  Interpretation of Part 3

In this Part—

“children’s services plan” has the meaning given by section 8(2),

“service” means any service or support—
(a) which must be provided by the person concerned, or
(b) which the person concerned has power to provide.

PART 4

PROVISION OF NAMED PERSONS

19 Named person service

(1) In this Part, “named person service” means the service of making available, in relation to a child or young person, an identified individual who is to exercise the functions in subsection (5).

(2) An individual may be identified for the purpose of a named person service only if the individual falls within subsection (3).

(3) An individual falls within this subsection if—
   (a) the individual—
      (i) is an employee of the service provider, or
      (ii) is, or is an employee of, a person who exercises any function on behalf of the service provider, and
   (b) the individual meets such requirements as to training, qualifications, experience or position as may be specified by the Scottish Ministers by order.

(4) An individual does not fall within subsection (3) if the individual is a parent of the child or young person.

(5) The functions referred to in subsection (1) are—
   (a) subject to subsection (5A), doing such of the following where the named person considers it to be appropriate in order to promote, support or safeguard the wellbeing of the child or young person—
      (i) advising, informing or supporting the child or young person, or a parent of the child or young person,
      (ii) helping the child or young person, or a parent of the child or young person, to access a service or support, or
      (iii) discussing, or raising, a matter about the child or young person with a service provider or relevant authority, and
   (b) such other functions as are specified by this Act or any other enactment as being functions of a named person in relation to a child or young person.

(5A) The function in subsection (5)(a) does not apply in relation to a matter arising at a time when the child or young person is, as a member of any of the reserve forces, subject to service law.

(6) The named person functions are exercised on behalf of the service provider concerned.

(7) Responsibility for the exercise of the named person functions lies with the service provider rather than the named person.
20 Named person service in relation to pre-school child

(1) A health board is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to each pre-school child residing in its area.

(2) A “pre-school child” is a child who—

(a) has not commenced attendance at a primary school, and

(b) if the child is of school age, has not commenced attendance at a primary school because the relevant local authority has consented to the child’s commencement at primary school being delayed.

(3) For the purposes of this section—

(a) the reference to school age is to be construed by reference to the school commencement dates fixed by the relevant local authority,

(b) references to attendance at a primary school do not include attendance at a nursery class in such a school,

(c) references to the relevant local authority are to the local authority for the area in which the child concerned resides.

21 Named person service in relation to children not falling within section 20

(1) A local authority is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to each child residing in its area, other than—

(a) a pre-school child, or

(b) a child falling within subsection (2) or (3).

(2) A child falls within this subsection if the child is—

(a) a pupil at a public school which is managed by a different local authority,

(b) a pupil at—

(i) a grant-aided school, or

(ii) an independent school,

(c) kept in secure accommodation, or

(d) in legal custody or subject to temporary release from such custody.

(2A) For the purposes of subsection (2)(d), a child is in legal custody—

(a) while confined in or being taken to or from any penal institution in which the child may be lawfully confined,

(b) while working, or for any other reason, outside the penal institution in the custody or under the control of an officer of the institution, a constable or a police custody and security officer,

(c) while being taken to any place to which the child is required or authorised to be taken by virtue of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989, or

(d) while kept in custody in pursuance of such a requirement or authorisation.

(3) A child falls within this subsection if the child is a member of any of the regular forces.
(4) During any period when a child falls within subsection (2)(a), the local authority which manages the school concerned is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to the child.

(5) During any period when a child falls within subsection (2)(b) or (c), the directing authority of the establishment concerned is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to the child.

(6) During any period when a child falls within subsection (2)(d), the Scottish Ministers are to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to the child.

22 Continuation of named person service in relation to certain young people

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (5) is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to each young person.

(2) A “young person” is a person who—
   (a) attained the age of 18 years while a pupil at a school, and
   (b) has since attaining that age, remained a pupil at that or another school.

(5) The person referred to in subsection (1) is—
   (a) where the young person is a pupil at a school managed by a local authority, that authority,
   (b) where the young person is a pupil at a grant-aided school or an independent school, the directing authority of the establishment concerned.

23 Communication in relation to movement of children and young people

(1) This section applies where a person ceases to be the service provider in relation to a child or young person.

(2) The person (“the outgoing service provider”) must as soon as is reasonably practicable—
   (a) inform any other person which has become or which it considers may be the service provider in relation to the child or young person (“the incoming service provider”) that the outgoing service provider has ceased to be the service provider in relation to the child or young person, and
   (b) provide the incoming service provider with—
      (i) the name and address of the child or young person and each parent of the child or young person (so far as the outgoing service provider has that information), and
      (ii) all information which the outgoing service provider holds which falls within subsection (3).

(3) Information falls within this subsection if the outgoing service provider considers that—
   (a) it is likely to be relevant to—
      (i) the exercise by the incoming service provider of any functions of a service provider under this Part, or
(ii) the future exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person,

(b) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and

(c) its provision would not prejudice the conduct of a criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

(4) In considering for the purpose of subsection (3)(b) whether information ought to be provided, the outgoing service provider is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child or young person.

(5) In having regard to the views of a child under subsection (4), an outgoing service provider is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(6) The outgoing service provider may decide for the purpose of subsection (3)(b) that information ought to be provided only if the likely benefit to the wellbeing of the child or young person arising in consequence of doing so outweighs any likely adverse effect on that wellbeing arising from doing so.

(7) Other than in relation to a duty of confidentiality, this section does not permit or require the provision of information in breach of a prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information arising by virtue of an enactment or rule of law.

24 Duty to communicate information about role of named persons

(1) Each service provider must publish (in such manner as it considers appropriate) information about—

(aa) the operation of the named person service provided in pursuance of the arrangements made by it, including in particular—

(i) how the named person functions are, generally, exercised, and

(ii) the arrangements, generally, for contacting named persons,

(d) how the service provider generally exercises its functions under this Part, and

(e) such other matters relating to this Part as it considers appropriate.

(2) The service provider in relation to a child or young person must provide the child or young person and the parents of the child or young person with information about the arrangements for contacting the named person for the child or young person—

(a) as soon as reasonably practicable after it becomes the service provider in relation to the child or young person, and

(b) as soon as reasonably practicable after there is any change in those arrangements.

25 Duty to help named person

(1) Subsection (2) applies where it appears to the service provider in relation to a child or young person that another service provider or a relevant authority could, by doing a certain thing, help in the exercise of any of the named person functions for a child or young person.

(2) The other service provider or relevant authority must comply with any request for such help which is made of it, unless subsection (3) applies.

(3) This subsection applies where the other service provider or relevant authority considers that the provision of the help would—be incompatible with any duty of the other service provider or relevant authority, or
(b) unduly prejudice the exercise of any function of the other service provider or relevant authority.

Information sharing

(1) A service provider or relevant authority must provide to the service provider in relation to a child or young person any information which the person holds which falls within subsection (2).

(2) Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that—

(a) it is likely to be relevant to the exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person,

(b) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and

(c) its provision to the service provider in relation to the child or young person would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

(3) The service provider in relation to a child or young person must provide to a service provider or relevant authority any information which the person holds which falls within subsection (4).

(4) Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that—

(a) it is likely to be relevant to the exercise of any function of the service provider or relevant authority which affects or may affect the wellbeing of the child or young person,

(b) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and

(c) its provision to the service provider or relevant authority would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

(4A) In considering for the purpose of subsection (2)(b) or (4)(b) whether information ought to be provided, the information holder is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child or young person.

(4B) In having regard to the views of a child under subsection (4A), an information holder is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(4C) The information holder may decide for the purpose of subsection (2)(b) or (4)(b) that information ought to be provided only if the likely benefit to the wellbeing of the child or young person arising in consequence of doing so outweighs any likely adverse effect on that wellbeing arising from doing so.

(5) The service provider in relation to a child or young person may provide to a service provider or relevant authority any information which the person holds which falls within subsection (6).

(6) Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that its provision to the service provider or relevant authority is necessary or expedient for the purposes of the exercise of any of the named person functions.

(7) References in this section to a service provider or a relevant authority include any person exercising a function on behalf of a service provider or relevant authority.
(8) Other than in relation to a duty of confidentiality, this section does not permit or require the provision of information in breach of a prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information arising by virtue of an enactment or rule of law.

27 Disclosure of information

(2) This section applies—

(a) where by virtue of this Part, a person provides information in breach of a duty of confidentiality, and

(b) in providing the information, the person informs the recipient of the breach of duty.

(3) The recipient is not to provide the information to any other person, unless the provision of information is permitted or required by virtue of any enactment (including this Part) or rule of law.

28 Guidance in relation to named person service

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (1A) must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by this Part.

(1A) Those persons are—

(a) a local authority,

(b) a health board,

(c) a directing authority,

(d) a relevant authority.

(4) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult any person to whom it will relate.

29 Directions in relation to named person service

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by this Part.

(2) Those persons are—

(a) a local authority,

(b) a health board,

(c) a directing authority,

(d) a relevant authority.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the person to which it relates.

30 Interpretation of Part 4

(1) In this Part—

“constable” has the same meaning as in section 13(b) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989,

“directing authority” means—
(a) when used generally, each of the following—

(i) the managers of each grant-aided school,

(ii) the proprietor of each independent school, and

(iii) the local authority or other person who manages each residential establishment which comprises secure accommodation,

(b) when used in relation to a particular establishment—

(i) in relation to a grant-aided school, the managers of the school,

(ii) in relation to an independent school, the proprietor of the school,

(iii) in relation to secure accommodation, the local authority or other person who manages the residential establishment,

“named person” means the identified individual made available in pursuance of a named person service,

“named person functions” means the functions to be exercised by way of the named person service,

“parent” has the same meaning as in the 1980 Act,

“penal institution” means any—

(a) prison (other than a naval, military or air force prison),

(b) remand centre (within the meaning of section 19(1)(a) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989), or

(c) young offenders institution (within the meaning of section 19(1)(b) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989),

“pre-school child” has the meaning given by section 20(2),

“regular forces” has the meaning given by section 374 of the Armed Forces Act 2006,

“relevant authority” means a person listed, or within a description listed, in schedule 2,

“reserve forces” has the meaning given by section 374 of the Armed Forces Act 2006,

“secure accommodation” means accommodation provided in a residential establishment, approved in accordance with regulations made under section 78(2) of the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, for the purpose of restricting the liberty of children,

“service provider” means—

(a) when used generally, each of the following—

(i) each health board,

(ii) each local authority,

(iii) each directing authority, and

(iv) the Scottish Ministers,
(b) when used in relation to a child or young person, the person which has the function of making arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to the child or young person,

“subject to service law” has the meaning given by section 374 of the Armed Forces Act 2006,

“temporary release” means release by virtue of rules made under section 39(6) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989,

“young person” has the meaning given by section 22(2).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 2 by—

(a) adding a person or description of persons,

(b) removing an entry listed in it, or

(c) varying an entry listed in it.

PART 5

CHILD’S PLAN

31 Child’s plan: requirement

(1) For the purposes of this Part, a child requires a child’s plan if the responsible authority in relation to a child considers that—

(a) the child has a wellbeing need, and

(b) subsection (3) applies in relation to that need.

(2) A child has a wellbeing need if the child’s wellbeing is being, or is at risk of being, adversely affected by any matter.

(3) This subsection applies in relation to a wellbeing need if—

(a) the need is not capable of being met, or met fully, by the taking of action other than a targeted intervention in relation to the child, and

(b) the need, or the remainder of the need, is capable of being met, or met to some extent, by one or more targeted interventions in relation to the child.

(4) A “targeted intervention” is a service which—

(a) is provided by a relevant authority in pursuance of any of its functions, and

(b) is directed at meeting the needs of children whose needs are not capable of being met, or met fully, by the services which are provided generally to children by the authority.

(4A) The references in subsection (4) to services being provided by a relevant authority include references to services provided by a third person under arrangements made by the relevant authority.

(5) In deciding whether a child requires a child’s plan, the responsible authority—

(a) is, where the child’s named person is not an employee of the responsible authority, to consult the child’s named person, and

(b) is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of—

(i) the child,
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Part 5—Child’s plan

(ii) the child’s parents,

(iii) such persons, or the persons within such description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify, and

(iv) such other persons as the responsible authority considers appropriate.

(6) In having regard to the views of the child, the responsible authority is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(7) Subsection (1) does not apply in relation to—

(a) a child who already has a child’s plan,

(b) a child who is a member of any of the regular forces.

(8) In subsection (7)(b), “regular forces” has the meaning given by section 374 of the Armed Forces Act 2006.

32 Content of a child’s plan

(1) A child’s plan is to contain a statement of—

(a) the child’s wellbeing need,

(b) the targeted intervention which requires to be provided, or the targeted interventions which require to be provided, in relation to the child, and

(c) in relation to each such targeted intervention—

(i) the relevant authority which is to provide the targeted intervention,

(ii) the manner in which the targeted intervention is to be provided, and

(iii) the outcome in relation to the child’s wellbeing need which the targeted intervention is intended to achieve.

(1A) A child’s plan may contain a targeted intervention only where the relevant authority which would provide it, or under whose arrangements it would be provided, agrees.

(1B) If that relevant authority is not to prepare the plan, it must provide to the person who is to prepare the plan a statement of its reasons for not agreeing.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision as to—

(a) other information which is, or is not, to be contained in child’s plans,

(b) the form of child’s plans.

33 Preparation of a child’s plan

(1) This section applies where a child requires a child’s plan.

(2) Subject to subsections (3) and (5A), the responsible authority is to prepare such a plan as soon as is reasonably practicable.

(3) Where the responsible authority and a relevant authority agree that it would be more appropriate for the relevant authority to prepare a child’s plan, the relevant authority is to prepare the plan as soon as is reasonably practicable.

(5) A relevant authority which declines to give its agreement as mentioned in subsection (3) must provide a statement of its reasons.
(5A) Subsection (2) does not apply where, by virtue of section 32(1A), there are no targeted interventions which may be contained in a child’s plan.

(6) In preparing a child’s plan, an authority—
   (a) is, where the child’s named person is not an employee of the authority, to consult the child’s named person, and
   (b) is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of—
      (i) the child,
      (ii) the child’s parents,
      (iii) such persons, or the persons within such description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify, and
      (iv) such other persons as the authority considers appropriate.

(7) In having regard to the views of the child, the authority preparing the child’s plan is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(8) The Scottish Ministers may by order—
   (a) make further provision as to the preparation of child’s plans,
   (b) make provision requiring or permitting the authority which prepared a child’s plan to provide a copy of it to a particular person or to the persons within a particular description.

(9) An order under subsection (8)(b) may include provision to the effect that a copy of a child’s plan is to be provided to a person, or to persons within a particular description, only—
   (a) in circumstances described in the order, or
   (b) where the authority considers it appropriate.

34 Responsible authority: general

(1) For the purposes of this Part, the responsible authority in relation to a child is—
   (a) where the child is a pre-school child, the health board for the area in which the child resides,
   (b) where the child is not a pre-school child, the local authority for the area in which the child resides.

(2) Subsection (1) is subject to section 35.

(3) A “pre-school child” is a child who—
   (a) has not commenced attendance at a primary school, and
   (b) if the child is of school age, has not commenced attendance at a primary school because the relevant local authority has consented to the child’s commencement at primary school being delayed.

(4) For the purposes of this section—
   (a) the reference to school age is to be construed by reference to the school commencement dates fixed by the relevant local authority,
   (b) the references to attendance at a primary school do not include attendance at a nursery class in such a school, and
(c) the references to the relevant local authority are to the local authority for the area in which the child concerned resides.

35 Responsible authority: special cases

(1) Where in pursuance of a decision of a local authority or health board a pre-school child resides in the area of a health board which is different to that in which the child would otherwise reside, the health board for the area in which the child would otherwise reside is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

(2) Where the child is a pupil at a public school which is managed by a local authority other than the one for the area in which the child resides, that other authority is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

(3) Where the child is a pupil at a grant-aided school or an independent school, the directing authority of that school is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

(4) Subsection (3) does not apply where the child is such a pupil by virtue of a placement by a local authority.

(4A) Where—

(a) the child falls within subsection (4B), and

(b) in consequence the child resides in the area of a local authority which is different to that in which the child would otherwise reside,

the local authority for the area in which the child would otherwise reside is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

(4B) A child falls within this subsection if—

(a) in pursuance of the duties of a local authority under the 1980 Act the child—

(i) is a pupil at a grant-aided school or an independent school, and

(ii) resides in accommodation provided for the purpose of attending that school by its managers,

(b) by virtue of Chapter 1 of Part 2 of the 1995 Act, the child is placed in a residential establishment (within the meaning of section 93 of that Act),

(c) by virtue of an order under the Children’s Hearing (Scotland) Act 2011, the child resides at a residential establishment (within the meaning of section 202 of that Act), or

(d) in pursuance of an order under the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, the child is detained in residential accommodation provided under Part 2 of the 1995 Act.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify this section so as to make further or different provision as to circumstances in which section 34(1) does not apply in relation to a child.

36 Delivery of a child’s plan

(1) A relevant authority is so far as reasonably practicable—

(a) to provide any targeted intervention contained in a child’s plan which is to be provided by it in accordance with the plan,
(b) to secure that any targeted intervention contained in a child’s plan which is to be provided by a third person under arrangements made by the authority is provided in accordance with the plan.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to the extent that the authority considers that to comply with it would adversely affect the wellbeing of the child.

37 Child’s plan: management

(1) The managing authority of a child’s plan is to keep under review whether—

(a) the wellbeing need of the child stated in the plan is still accurate,

(b) in relation to each targeted intervention, it or the manner of its provision, is still appropriate,

(c) the outcome of the plan has been achieved, and

(d) the management of the plan should transfer to another relevant authority.

(2) In reviewing a child’s plan, the managing authority—

(a) is to consult—

(i) each other relevant authority to which subsection (2A) applies,

(ii) where it is neither the managing authority nor consulted under sub-paragraph (i), the responsible authority in relation to the child, and

(iii) where the child’s named person is not an employee of the managing authority, the child’s named person, and

(b) is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of—

(i) the child,

(ii) the child’s parents,

(iii) such persons, or the persons within such description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify, and

(iv) such other persons as the managing authority considers appropriate.

(2A) This subsection applies to a relevant authority if—

(a) it is providing a targeted intervention contained in the plan, or

(b) a targeted intervention contained in the plan is being provided by a third person under arrangements made by the authority.

(3) In having regard to the views of the child as mentioned in subsection (2)(b)(i), the managing authority is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(4) The managing authority of a child’s plan may in consequence of the review—

(a) amend the plan so as to revise—

(i) the wellbeing need of the child,

(ii) a targeted intervention,

(iii) the manner in which a targeted intervention requires to be provided, or

(iv) the outcome which the plan is intended to achieve,

(b) transfer the management of the plan to another relevant authority, or
(c) end the plan.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about the management of child’s plans, including provision about—

(a) when and how a child’s plan is to be reviewed in accordance with subsection (1),

(b) who is to be the managing authority of a child’s plan,

(c) when and to whom management of a child’s plan is to or may transfer under subsection (4)(b),

(d) when and how a new targeted intervention may be included in a child’s plan,

(e) the keeping, disclosure and destruction of child’s plans.

(6) Subject to provision made under subsection (5)(b), the managing authority of a child’s plan is—

(a) the relevant authority which prepared it, or

(b) where management of the child’s plan has been transferred under subsection (4)(b), the relevant authority to which the management of the child’s plan was so transferred (or where there has been more than one such transfer, last so transferred).

38 Assistance in relation to child’s plan

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (1A) must comply with any reasonable request made of the person to provide a person exercising functions under this Part with information, advice or assistance for that purpose.

(1A) Those persons are—

(a) a relevant authority,

(b) a person listed, or within a description listed, in schedule 2A.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply where the person to whom the request is made considers that provision of the information, advice or assistance concerned would—

(a) be incompatible with any duty of the person, or

(b) unduly prejudice the exercise of any function of the person.

(3) Other than in relation to a duty of confidentiality, subsection (1) does not permit or require the provision of information in breach of a prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information arising by virtue of an enactment or rule of law.

(4) Subsection (5) applies—

(a) where, by virtue of subsection (1), a person provides information in breach of a duty of confidentiality, and

(b) in providing the information, the person informs the recipient of the breach of duty.

(5) The recipient is not to provide the information to any other person unless the provision of information is permitted or required by virtue of any enactment (including this Part) or rule of law.

(6) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 2A by—

(a) adding a person or description of persons,
(b) removing an entry listed in it, or
(c) varying an entry listed in it.

39  Guidance on child’s plans

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (1A) must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by or under this Part (other than the function of complying with section 36).

(1A) Those persons are—
(a) a relevant authority,
(b) a person (other than the Scottish Ministers) listed, or within a description listed, in schedule 2A.

(4) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult any person to whom it will relate.

40  Directions in relation to child’s plans

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by or under this Part (other than the function of complying with section 36).

(2) Those persons are—
(aa) a relevant authority,
(ab) a person (other than the Scottish Ministers) listed, or within a description listed, in schedule 2A.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the person to which it relates.

41  Interpretation of Part 5

In this Part—

“child’s named person” means the individual who is the child’s named person by virtue of Part 4,
“directing authority” means—
(a) when used generally—
   (i) the managers of each grant-aided school,
   (ii) the proprietor of each independent school,
(b) when used in relation to a particular establishment—
   (i) in relation to a grant-aided school, the managers of the school,
   (ii) in relation to an independent school, the proprietor of the school,
“parent” has the same meaning as in the 1980 Act,
“relevant authority” means any—
(a) health board,
(b) local authority, or
(c) directing authority,

“service” includes support,

“targeted intervention” has the meaning given by section 31(4).

PART 6

EARLY LEARNING AND CHILDCARE

42 Early learning and childcare

In this Part, “early learning and childcare” means a service, consisting of education and care, of a kind which is suitable in the ordinary case for children who are under school age, regard being had to the importance of interactions and other experiences which support learning and development in a caring and nurturing setting.

43 Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

(1) An education authority must, in pursuance of its duty under section 1(1) of the 1980 Act, secure that the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare is made available for each eligible pre-school child belonging to its area.

(2) An “eligible pre-school child” is a child who—

(a) is under school age,

(b) has not commenced attendance at a primary school (other than at a nursery class in such a school), and

(c) either—

(i) falls within subsection (3), or

(ii) is within such age range, or is of such other description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) A child falls within this subsection if the child is aged 2 or over and is or has been at any time since the child’s second birthday—

(a) looked after by the authority concerned or by any other local authority, or

(b) the subject of a kinship care order.

(4) An order made under subsection (2)(c)(ii) may provide that a child is to be an eligible pre-school child only if the education authority concerned is satisfied as to any matter relating to the child which is specified in the order.

(5) In subsection (3)(b), “kinship care order” has the meaning given by section 65(1).

44 Mandatory amount of early learning and childcare

(1) The “mandatory amount”, for the purposes of section 43(1), means—

(a) 600 hours in each year for which a child is an eligible pre-school child, and

(b) a pro rata amount for each part of a year for which a child is an eligible pre-school child.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (1) so as to vary the amount of early learning and childcare which is to be made available in pursuance of section 43(1).
(3) Such an order may, without prejudice to section 77(1)(a), make different provision in relation to different types of eligible pre-school children.

45  Looked after 2 year olds: alternative arrangements to meet wellbeing needs

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) an authority’s duty under section 43(1) applies in relation to a child only by virtue of the child falling within section 43(3)(a),

(b) the authority, after assessing the child’s needs, considers that making alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care would better safeguard or promote the child’s wellbeing.

(2) Where this subsection applies, the authority—

(a) need not comply with its duty under section 43(1) in relation to the child, but

(b) must make such alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care as it considers appropriate for the purposes of safeguarding or promoting the child’s wellbeing.

(3) Subsection (2) does not apply in relation to a child who is not being looked after by the authority if a parent of the child objects to the authority making alternative arrangements.

(4) The authority may, at any time, review any alternative arrangements it makes in relation to a child in pursuance of subsection (2)(b) (and must do so on becoming aware of any significant change in the child’s circumstances) and may, following such a review, alter those arrangements.

(5) The authority must seek to ensure that a record of—

(a) the outcome of any assessment of a child’s needs that it undertakes in pursuance of subsection (1)(b), and

(b) any alternative arrangements that it makes in relation to the child’s education and care in pursuance of subsection (2)(b), is included in any child’s plan which is prepared for the child under Part 5.

46  Duty to consult and plan on delivery of early learning and childcare

(1) An education authority must, at least once every 2 years—

(a) consult such persons as appear to it to be representative of parents of children under school age in its area about how it should make early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part, and

(b) after having had regard to views expressed, prepare and publish a plan for how it intends to make early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (1) so as to vary the regularity within which an education authority must consult and plan in pursuance of that subsection.

47  Method of delivery of early learning and childcare

(1) An education authority must ensure that it makes early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part by way of sessions—
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Part 6A—Power to provide school education for pre-school children

(a) which are provided during at least 38 weeks of every calendar year, and
(b) which are each of more than 2.5 hours but less than 8 hours in duration.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (1) so as to vary the method of delivering early learning and childcare which it describes.

Flexibility in way in which early learning and childcare is made available

In exercising functions under sections 46 and 47, an education authority must have regard to the desirability of ensuring that the method by which it makes early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part is flexible enough to allow parents an appropriate degree of choice when deciding how to access the service.

Interpretation of Part 6

In this Part—

“early learning and childcare” has the meaning given by section 42,
“eligible pre-school child” has the meaning given by section 43(2),
“parent” has the same meaning as in the 1980 Act.

Power to provide school education for pre-school children

Duty to consult and plan in relation to power to provide school education for pre-school children

In section 1 of the 1980 Act, after subsection (2A) insert—

“(2B) An education authority must, at least once every two years—

(a) consult such persons as appear to be representative of parents of pre-school children within their area about whether and if so how they should provide school education for such children under subsection (1C) above; and

(b) after having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish their plans in relation to the provision of such education for such children under that subsection.

(2C) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (2B) above so as to vary the regularity within which an education authority must consult and plan in pursuance of that subsection.

(2D) An order made under subsection (2C) above is subject to the negative procedure.”.

Day care and out of school care

Duty to consult and plan in relation to day care and out of school care

(1) Section 27 of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) After subsection (1) insert—
“(1A) A local authority must, at least once every two years—

(a) consult such persons as appear to be representative of parents of children in need within their area who satisfy the conditions mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (1) above about how they should provide day care for such children in pursuance of that subsection; and

(b) after having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish their plans for how they intend to provide day care for such children in pursuance of that subsection.

(1B) A local authority must, at least once every two years—

(a) consult such persons as appear to be representative of parents of children within their area who satisfy the conditions mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (1) above but are not in need about whether and if so how they should provide day care for such children under that subsection;

(b) after having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish their plans in relation to the provision of day care for such children under that subsection.

(3) After subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) A local authority must, at least once every two years—

(a) consult such persons as appear to be representative of parents of children in need within their area who are in attendance at a school about how they should provide appropriate care for such children in pursuance of subsection (3) above; and

(b) after having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish their plans for how they intend to provide appropriate care for such children in pursuance of that subsection.

(3B) A local authority must, at least once every two years—

(a) consult such persons as appear to be representative of parents of children within their area who are in attendance at a school but are not in need about whether and if so how they should provide appropriate care for such children under subsection (3) above; and

(b) after having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish plans in relation to the provision of appropriate care for such children in their area under that subsection.

(3C) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (1A), (1B), (3A) or (3B) above so as to vary the regularity within which a local authority must consult and plan in pursuance of that subsection.

(3D) An order made under subsection (3C) above is subject to the negative procedure.”.
PART 7

CORPORATE PARENTING

50 Corporate parents

(1) The persons listed, or within a description listed, in schedule 3 are “corporate parents” for the purposes of this Part (subject to subsection (3)).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 3 by—
   (a) adding a person or description of persons,
   (b) removing an entry listed in it, or
   (c) varying an entry listed in it.

(3) The Scottish Ministers are not corporate parents for the purposes of sections 55 to 58.

(3A) The following persons are not corporate parents for the purposes of section 58—
   (a) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland,
   (b) a body which is a “post-16 education body” for the purposes of the Further and Higher Education (Scotland) Act 2005.

(3B) An order under subsection (2) which adds a person, or a description of persons, to schedule 3, may modify this section so as to provide that the person is not a corporate parent, or the persons within the description are not corporate parents, for the purposes of section 58.

(4) In this Part, references to the “corporate parenting responsibilities” of a corporate parent are to the duties conferred on that corporate parent by section 52(1).

51 Application of Part: children and young people

(1) This Part applies to—
   (a) every child who is looked after by a local authority, and
   (b) every young person who—
       (i) is under the age of 26, and
       (ii) was (on the person’s 16th birthday or at any subsequent time) but is no longer looked after by a local authority.

(2) This Part also applies to a young person who—
   (a) is at least the age of 16 but under the age of 26, and
   (b) is not of the description in subsection (1)(b)(ii) but is of such other description of person formerly but no longer looked after by a local authority as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order.

52 Corporate parenting responsibilities

(1) It is the duty of every corporate parent, in so far as consistent with the proper exercise of its other functions—
   (a) to be alert to matters which, or which might, adversely affect the wellbeing of children and young people to whom this Part applies,
(b) to assess the needs of those children and young people for services and support it provides,
(c) to promote the interests of those children and young people,
(d) to seek to provide those children and young people with opportunities to participate in activities designed to promote their wellbeing,
(e) to take such action as it considers appropriate to help those children and young people—
   (i) to access opportunities it provides in pursuance of paragraph (d), and
   (ii) to make use of services, and access support, which it provides, and
(f) to take such other action as it considers appropriate for the purposes of improving the way in which it exercises its functions in relation to those children and young people.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order—
   (a) modify subsection (1) so as to confer, remove or vary a duty on corporate parents,
   (b) provide that subsection (1) is to be read, in relation to a particular corporate parent or corporate parents of a particular description, with a modification conferring, removing or varying a duty.

53 Planning by corporate parents

(1) A corporate parent must—
   (a) prepare a plan for how it proposes to exercise its corporate parenting responsibilities, and
   (b) keep its plan under review.

(2) Before preparing or revising a plan, a corporate parent must consult such other corporate parents, and such other persons, as it considers appropriate.

(3) A corporate parent must publish its plan, and any revised plan, in such manner as it considers appropriate (and, in particular, plans may be published together with, or as part of, any other plan or document).

54 Collaborative working among corporate parents

(1) Corporate parents must, in so far as reasonably practicable, collaborate with each other when exercising their corporate parenting responsibilities or any other functions under this Part where they consider that doing so would safeguard or promote the wellbeing of children or young people to whom this Part applies.

(2) Such collaboration may include—
   (a) sharing information,
   (b) providing advice or assistance,
   (c) co-ordinating activities (and seeking to prevent unnecessary duplication),
   (d) sharing responsibility for action,
   (e) funding activities jointly,
55 Reports by corporate parents

(1) A corporate parent must report on how it has exercised—
   (a) its corporate parenting responsibilities,
   (b) its planning and collaborating functions in pursuance of sections 53 and 54, and
   (c) its other functions under this Part.

(2) Reports may, in particular, include information about—
   (a) standards of performance,
   (b) the outcomes achieved in pursuance of this Part.

(3) Reports are to be published in such manner as the corporate parent considers appropriate (and, in particular, reports may be published together with, or as part of, any other report or document).

56 Duty to provide information to Scottish Ministers

(1) A corporate parent must provide the Scottish Ministers with such information as they may reasonably require about how it is—
   (a) exercising its corporate parenting responsibilities,
   (b) planning, collaborating or reporting in pursuance of sections 53, 54 or 55, or
   (c) otherwise exercising functions under this Part.

(2) Information which is required may, in particular, include information about—
   (a) standards of performance,
   (b) the outcomes achieved in pursuance of this Part.

57 Guidance on corporate parenting

(1) A corporate parent must have regard to any guidance about corporate parenting issued by the Scottish Ministers.

(2) Guidance may, in particular, include advice or information about—
   (a) how corporate parents should—
       (i) exercise their corporate parenting responsibilities,
       (ii) promote awareness of their corporate parenting responsibilities,
       (iii) plan, collaborate or report in pursuance of sections 53, 54 or 55, or
       (iv) otherwise exercise functions under this Part,
   (b) outcomes which corporate parents should seek to achieve in exercising functions under this Part.

(5) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) any corporate parent to which they relate, and
   (b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.
58 Directions to corporate parents

(1) A corporate parent must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about—
   (a) its corporate parenting responsibilities,
   (b) its planning, collaborating or reporting functions under sections 53, 54 or 55, or
   (c) its other functions under this Part.

(4) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) any corporate parent to which it relates, and
   (b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

59 Reports by Scottish Ministers

(1) The Scottish Ministers must, as soon as practicable after the end of each 3 year period, lay before the Scottish Parliament a report on how they have exercised their corporate parenting responsibilities during that period.

(2) In subsection (1), “3 year period” means—

(a) the period of 3 years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, and
(b) each subsequent period of 3 years.

60 Provision of aftercare to young people

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 29—
   (ya) in subsection (1)—
      (i) for “over school age” substitute “who is at least sixteen”,
      (ii) for the words from first “at” substitute “either—
         (a) was (on his sixteenth birthday or at any subsequent time) but is no longer looked after by a local authority; or
         (b) is of such other description of person formerly but no longer looked after by a local authority as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order.”,
   (za) after subsection (1) insert—
     “(1A) An order made under subsection (1)(b) above is subject to the affirmative procedure.”,
   (a) in subsection (2)—
      (i) for “twenty-one” substitute “twenty-six”,
      (ii) the words from third “and” to the end of the subsection are repealed,
(b) in subsection (3), for “or (2) above” substitute “above or (5A) or (5B) below”,

(ba) in subsection (4), for “over school” substitute “who is at least sixteen years of”,

(c) after subsection (5) insert—

“(5A) After carrying out an assessment under subsection (5) above in pursuance of an application made by a person under subsection (2) above, the local authority—

(a) must, if satisfied that the person has any eligible needs which cannot be met other than by taking action under this subsection, provide the person with such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers necessary for the purposes of meeting those needs, and

(b) may otherwise provide such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers appropriate having regard to the person’s welfare,

(5B) A local authority may (but is not required to) continue to provide advice, guidance and assistance to a person in pursuance of subsection (5A) after the person reaches the age of twenty-six.”,

(d) in subsection (6), for “(5)” substitute “(5B)”,

(e) after subsection (7) insert—

“(8) For the purposes of subsection (5A)(a) above, a person has “eligible needs” if the person needs care, attention or support of such type as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(9) An order made under subsection (8) is subject to the affirmative procedure.

(10) If a local authority becomes aware that a person who is being provided with advice, guidance or assistance by them under this section has died, the local authority must as soon as reasonably practicable notify—

(a) the Scottish Ministers, and

(b) Social Care and Social Work Improvement Scotland.”.

(3) In section 30—

(a) in subsection (2)—

(i) in paragraph (a)—

(A) for “over school” substitute “at least sixteen years of”,

(B) for “twenty-one” substitute “twenty-six”,

(ii) for paragraph (b) substitute—

“(b) he either—

(i) was (on his sixteenth birthday or at any subsequent time) but is no longer looked after by a local authority; or

(ii) is of such other description of person formerly but no longer looked after by a local authority as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order.

(2A) An order made under subsection (2)(b)(ii) above is subject to the affirmative procedure.”,

(b) omit subsections (3) and (4).
PART 8A

CONTINUING CARE

60A Continuing care: looked after children

(1) After section 26 of the 1995 Act insert—

“26A Provision of continuing care: looked after children

(1) This section applies where an eligible person ceases to be looked after by a local authority.

(2) An “eligible person” is a person who—

(a) is at least sixteen years of age, and

(b) is not yet such higher age as may be specified.

(3) Subject to subsection (5) below, the local authority must provide the person with continuing care.

(4) “Continuing care” means the same accommodation and other assistance as was being provided for the person by the authority, in pursuance of this Chapter of this Part, immediately before the person ceased to be looked after.

(5) The duty to provide continuing care does not apply if—

(a) the accommodation the person was in immediately before ceasing to be looked after was secure accommodation,

(b) the accommodation the person was in immediately before ceasing to be looked after was a care placement and the carer has indicated to the authority that the carer is unable or unwilling to continue to provide the placement, or

(c) the local authority considers that providing the care would significantly adversely affect the welfare of the person.

(6) A local authority’s duty to provide continuing care lasts, subject to subsection (7) below, until the expiry of such period as may be specified.

(7) The duty to provide continuing care ceases if—

(a) the person leaves the accommodation of the person’s own volition,

(b) the accommodation ceases to be available, or

(c) the local authority considers that continuing to provide the care would significantly adversely affect the welfare of the person.

(8) For the purposes of subsection (7)(b) above, the situations in which accommodation ceases to be available include—

(a) in the case of a care placement, where the carer indicates to the authority that the carer is unable or unwilling to continue to provide the placement,

(b) in the case of a residential establishment provided by the local authority, where the authority closes the establishment,

(c) in the case of a residential establishment provided under arrangements made by the local authority, where the arrangements come to an end.

(9) The Scottish Ministers may by order—
(a) make provision about when or how a local authority is to consider whether subsection (5)(c) or (7)(c) above is the case,
(b) modify subsection (5) above so as to add, remove or vary a situation in which the duty to provide continuing care does not apply,
(c) modify subsection (7) or (8) above so as to add, remove or vary a situation in which the duty to provide continuing care ceases.

(10) If a local authority becomes aware that a person who is being provided with continuing care has died, the local authority must as soon as reasonably practicable notify—
(a) the Scottish Ministers, and
(b) Social Care and Social Work Improvement Scotland.

(11) An order under this section—
(a) may make different provision for different purposes,
(b) is subject to the affirmative procedure.

(12) In this section—
“carer”, in relation to a care placement, means the family or persons with whom the placement is made,
“care placement” means a placement such as is mentioned in section 26(1)(a) of this Act,
“specified” means specified by order made the Scottish Ministers.”.

(2) In section 29 of the 1995 Act, after subsection (2) insert—
“(2A) Subsections (1) and (2) above do not apply to a person during any period when the person is being provided with continuing care under section 26A of this Act.”.

PART 9
SERVICES IN RELATION TO CHILDREN AT RISK OF BECOMING LOOKED AFTER, ETC.

61 Provision of relevant services to parents and others

(1) A local authority must make arrangements to secure that relevant services of such description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify are made available for—
(a) each eligible child residing in its area,
(b) a qualifying person in relation to such a child,
(c) each eligible pregnant woman residing in its area,
(d) a qualifying person in relation to such a woman.

(1A) A “relevant service” is a service comprising, or comprising any combination of—
(a) providing information about a matter,
(b) advising or counselling about a matter,
(c) taking other action to facilitate the addressing of a matter by a person.

(2) An “eligible child” is a child who the authority considers—
(a) to be at risk of becoming looked after, or
(b) to fall within such other description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) A “qualifying person” in relation to an eligible child is a person—

(a) who is related to the child,
(b) who has any parental rights or responsibilities in relation to the child, or
(c) with whom the child is, or has been, living.

(4) An “eligible pregnant woman” is a pregnant woman who the authority considers is going to give birth to a child who will be an eligible child.

(5) A “qualifying person” in relation to an eligible pregnant woman is a person—

(a) who is the father of the child to whom the pregnant woman is to give birth,
(b) who is married to, in a civil partnership with or otherwise related to the pregnant woman,
(c) with whom the pregnant woman is living, or
(d) who does not fall within any of paragraphs (a) to (c) but who the authority considers will, when the pregnant woman gives birth to the child, become a qualifying person in relation to the child.

(6) The references in this section to a person who is related to another person (“the other person”) includes a person who—

(a) is married to or in a civil partnership with a person who is related to the other person,
(b) is related to the other person by the half blood.

(7) This section is without prejudice to section 22 of the 1995 Act.

Relevant services: further provision

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about—

(a) when or how relevant services specified in an order under section 61(1) are to be provided,
(b) when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child is within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 61(2),
(c) when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 61(2),
(d) such other matters about the provision of relevant services specified in an order under section 61(1) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(2) An order under subsection (1)(d) may include provision about—

(a) circumstances in which relevant services specified in an order under section 61(1) may be provided subject to conditions (including conditions as to payment), and
(b) consequences of such conditions not being met.
Interpretation of Part 9

The following expressions have the same meaning in this Part as they have in Part 1 of the 1995 Act—

parental responsibilities

parental rights.

PART 10
SUPPORT FOR KINSHIP CARE

64 Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

(1) A local authority must make arrangements to secure that kinship care assistance is made available for a person residing in its area who falls within subsection (3).

(2) “Kinship care assistance” is assistance of such description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) A person falls within this subsection if the person is—

(a) a person who is applying for, or considering applying for, a kinship care order in relation to an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years,

(b) an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years who is the subject of a kinship care order,

(c) a person in whose favour a kinship care order in relation to an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years subsists,

(d) a child who has attained the age of 16 years, where—

(i) immediately before doing so, the child was the subject of a kinship care order, and

(ii) the child is an eligible child,

(e) a person who is a guardian by virtue of an appointment under section 7 of the 1995 Act of an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years (but this is subject to subsection (3A)),

(f) an eligible child who has a guardian by virtue of an appointment under section 7 of the 1995 Act.

(3A) Subsection (3)(e) does not include a person who is also a parent of the child.

(4) An “eligible child” is a child who the local authority considers—

(a) to be at risk of becoming looked after, or

(b) to fall within such other description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

65 Orders which are kinship care orders

(1) In section 64, “kinship care order” means—

(a) an order under section 11(1) of the 1995 Act which gives to a qualifying person the right mentioned in section 2(1)(a) of that Act in relation to a child,
(b) a residence order which has the effect that a child is to live with, or live predominantly with, a qualifying person, or

(c) an order under section 11(1) of the 1995 Act appointing a qualifying person as a guardian of a child.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), a “qualifying person” is a person who, at the time the order is made—

(a) is related to the child,

(b) is a friend or acquaintance of a person related to the child, or

(c) has such other relationship to, or connection with, the child as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) But a parent of a child is not a “qualifying person” for the purposes of subsection (1).

(4) The references in subsection (2) to a person who is related to a child include a person who is—

(a) married to or in a civil partnership with a person who is related to the child,

(b) related to the child by the half blood.

66 Kinship care assistance: further provision

(1) The assistance which may be specified as kinship care assistance includes—

(a) the provision of counselling, advice or information about any matter,

(b) the provision of financial support (or support in kind) of any description,

(c) the provision of any service provided by a local authority on a subsidised basis.

(2) An order under section 64(1) may specify assistance by reference to assistance which a person was entitled to from, or being provided with by, a local authority immediately before becoming entitled to assistance under that section.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about—

(a) when or how kinship care assistance is to be provided,

(b) when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child is within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 64(4),

(c) when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 64(4),

(d) such other matters about the provision of kinship care assistance as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(4) An order under subsection (3)(d) may include provision about—

(a) circumstances in which a local authority may provide kinship care assistance subject to conditions (including conditions as to payment for the assistance or the repayment of financial support), and

(b) consequences of such conditions not being met (including the recovery of any financial support provided).

67 Interpretation of Part 10

In this Part—
“kinship care assistance” has the meaning given by section 64(2),
“parent” has the same meaning as it has in Part 1 of the 1995 Act.

PART 11
ADOPTION REGISTER

Scotland’s Adoption Register

After section 13 of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007, insert—

“CHAPTER 1A
SCOTLAND’S ADOPTION REGISTER

13A Scotland’s Adoption Register

(1) The Scottish Ministers must make arrangements for the establishment and maintenance of a register to be known as Scotland’s Adoption Register for the purposes of facilitating adoption (referred to in this Chapter as “the Register”).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—
(a) prescribe information relating to adoption which is, or types of information relating to adoption which are, to be included in the Register, which may include information relating to—
(i) children who adoption agencies consider ought to be placed for adoption,
(ii) persons considered by adoption agencies as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption,
(iii) matters relating to such children or persons which arise after information about them is included in the Register,
(iv) children outwith Scotland who may be suitable for adoption,
(v) prospective adopters outwith Scotland,
(b) provide for how information is to be retained in the Register,
(c) make such further provision in relation to the Register as they consider appropriate.

(3) The Register is not to be open to public inspection or search.

(4) Information is to be kept in the Register in any form the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

13B Registration organisation

(1) Arrangements made by the Scottish Ministers under section 13A(1) may in particular—
(a) authorise an organisation to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register (other than functions of making subordinate legislation),
(b) provide for payments to be made by the Scottish Ministers to an organisation so authorised.
(1A) The Scottish Ministers must publish arrangements under section 13A(1) so far as they authorise an organisation as mentioned in subsection (1)(a).

(2) An organisation authorised in pursuance of subsection (1)(a) (a “registration organisation”) must perform functions delegated to it in accordance with any directions (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers.

13C Supply of information for the Register

(1) An adoption agency must provide the Scottish Ministers with such information as may be prescribed in regulations made under section 13A(2) about—

(a) children who it considers ought to be placed for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such children,

(b) persons who it considers as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such persons.

(3) Regulations made under section 13A(2) may—

(a) provide that information is to be provided to a registration organisation in pursuance of subsection (1) instead of to the Scottish Ministers,

(b) provide for how and by when information is to be provided in pursuance of subsection (1),

(d) prescribe circumstances in which an adoption agency, despite subsection (1), is not to disclose information of the type prescribed for the purposes of that subsection.

13D Disclosure of information

(1) It is an offence to disclose any information derived from the Register other than in accordance with regulations made under section 13A(2) in pursuance of this section.

(2) Regulations made under section 13A(2) may authorise the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation to disclose information derived from the Register—

(a) to an adoption agency for the purposes of helping it—

(i) to find persons with whom it would be appropriate to place a child for whom the agency is acting, or

(ii) to find a child who is appropriate for adoption by persons for whom the agency is acting,

(b) to any person (whether or not established or operating in Scotland) specified in the regulations—

(i) for any purpose connected with the performance of functions by the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation in pursuance of this Chapter,

(ii) for the purpose of enabling the information to be entered in a register which is maintained in respect of England, Wales or Northern Ireland and which contains information about children who are suitable for adoption or prospective adopters,
(iii) for the purpose of enabling or assisting that person to perform any functions which relate to adoption,

(iv) for use for statistical or research purposes, or

(v) for any other purpose relating to adoption.

(3) Regulations made under section 13A(2) may—

(a) set out terms and conditions on which information may be disclosed in pursuance of this section,

(b) specify steps to be taken by an adoption agency in respect of information received in pursuance of subsection (2),

(c) authorise an adoption agency to disclose information derived from the Register for purposes relating to adoption.

(4) Subsection (1) does not apply to a disclosure of information by or with the authority of the Scottish Ministers.

(5) A person who is guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 3 months, or a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale, or both.

13DA Fees and other payments

Regulations made under section 13A(2) may prescribe—

(a) a fee which is to be paid by an adoption agency when providing information in pursuance of section 13C(1),

(b) a fee which is to be paid to the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation in respect of a disclosure of information made in pursuance of section 13D(2), (3)(c) or (4),

(c) such other fees to be paid by adoption agencies, or payments to be made by them, in relation to the Register as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

13E Use of an organisation as agency for payments

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations authorise a registration organisation or any other person to act as agent for the payment or receipt of sums payable by adoption agencies to other adoption agencies and may require adoption agencies to pay or receive such sums through the organisation.

(2) A registration organisation or other person authorised under subsection (1) is to perform the functions exercisable by virtue of that subsection in accordance with any directions (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers.

13F Supplementary

Nothing authorised or required to be done by virtue of this Chapter constitutes an offence under section 72(2) or 75(1)."
PART 11A

SCHOOL CLOSURE PROPOSALS, ETC.

68A References to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010

In this Part, references to the 2010 Act are to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010.

68B Restriction on closure proposals

After section 2 of the 2010 Act, insert—

“2A Restriction on closure proposals

(1) This section applies where a decision is made not to implement a closure proposal in relation to a school.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1)—

(a) a decision not to implement a closure proposal is—

(i) a decision not to implement the proposal made by the education authority following the publication of a consultation report in relation to the proposal (whether or not the proposal was called-in under section 15),

(ii) a decision of a School Closure Review Panel in relation to the proposal under section 17C(1)(a),

(b) such a decision is made by a School Closure Review Panel on the day on which the Panel notifies the decision to the education authority in pursuance of section 17C(5).

(3) The education authority may not publish a proposal paper concerning a further closure proposal in relation to the school during the period of 5 years beginning with the day on which the decision is made unless there is a significant change in the school’s circumstances.”.

68C Financial implications of closure proposals

In section 4 of the 2010 Act (proposal paper), after subsection (2) insert—

“(2A) Where a proposal paper relates to a closure proposal, it must also contain information about the financial implications of the proposal.”.

68D Special provision for rural school closure proposals

(1) Before section 12 of the 2010 Act (factors for rural school closure), insert—

“11A Presumption against rural school closure

(1) This section applies in relation to any closure proposal as respects a rural school.

(2) The education authority may not decide to implement the proposal (wholly or partly) unless the authority—

(a) has complied with sections 12, 12A and 13, and
(b) having so complied, is satisfied that implementation of the proposal is the most appropriate response to the reasons for formulating the proposal identified by the authority under section 12A(2)(a)."

(2) In that section—

(a) subsection (3)(a) is repealed,

(b) in subsection (4), after "(3)(b)" insert "and sections 12A(2)(c)(ii) and 13(5)(b)(ii)",

(c) in subsection (5), after "(3)(c)" insert "and sections 12A(2)(c)(iii) and 13(5)(b)(iii)".

(3) After that section, insert—

"12A Preliminary requirements in relation to rural school closure

(1) This section applies where an education authority is formulating a closure proposal as respects a rural school.

(2) The authority must—

(a) identify its reasons for formulating the proposal,

(b) consider whether there are any reasonable alternatives to the proposal as a response to those reasons,

(c) assess, for the proposal and each of the alternatives to the proposal identified under paragraph (b) (if any)—

(i) the likely educational benefits in consequence of the implementation of the proposal, or as the case may be, alternative,

(ii) the likely effect on the local community (assessed in accordance with section 12(4)) in consequence of such implementation,

(iii) the likely effect that would be caused by any different travelling arrangements that may be required (assessed in accordance with section 12(5)) in consequence of such implementation.

(3) For the purposes of this section and section 13, reasonable alternatives to the proposal include (but are not limited to) steps which would not result in the school or a stage of education in the school (within the meaning of paragraph 12 of schedule 1) being discontinued.

(4) The authority may not publish a proposal paper in relation to the proposal unless, having complied with subsection (2), it considers that implementation of the closure proposal would be the most appropriate response to the reasons for the proposal.

(5) In this section and section 13, the references to the reasons for the proposal are references to the reasons identified by the education authority under subsection (2)(a)."

(4) For section 13 of the 2010 Act substitute—

"13 Additional consultation requirements

(1) This section applies in relation to any closure proposal as respects a rural school.

(2) The proposal paper must additionally—
(a) explain the reasons for the proposal,
(b) describe what (if any) steps the authority took to address those reasons before formulating the proposal,
(c) if the authority did not take such steps, explain why it did not do so,
(d) set out any alternatives to the proposal identified by the authority under section 12A(2)(b),
(e) explain the authority’s assessment under section 12A(2)(c),
(f) explain why the authority considers, in light of that assessment, that implementation of the closure proposal would be the most appropriate response to the reasons for the proposal.

(3) The notice to be given to relevant consultees under section 6(1) must—
(a) give a summary of the alternatives to the proposal set out in the proposal paper,
(b) state that written representations may be made on those alternatives (as well as on the proposal), and
(c) state that written representations on the proposal may suggest other alternatives to the proposal.

(4) In sections 8(4)(c), 9(4) and 10(2)(a), the references to written representations on the proposal include references to written representations on the alternatives to the proposal set out in the proposal paper.

(5) When carrying out its review of the proposal under section 9(1), the education authority is to carry out—
(a) for the proposal and each of the alternatives to it set out in the proposal paper (if any), a further assessment of the matters mentioned in section 12A(2)(c)(i) to (iii), and
(b) an assessment, in relation to any other reasonable alternative to the proposal suggested in written representations on the proposal, of—
(i) the likely educational benefits in consequence of the implementation of the alternative,
(ii) the likely effect on the local community (assessed in accordance with section 12(4)) in consequence of such implementation,
(iii) the likely effect that would be caused by any different travelling arrangements that may be required (assessed in accordance with section 12(5)) in consequence of such implementation.

(6) The consultation report must additionally explain—
(a) the education authority’s assessment under subsection (5)(a),
(b) how that assessment differs (if at all) from the authority’s assessment under section 12A(2)(c),
(c) the authority’s assessment under subsection (5)(b).”.

(5) In section 1 of the 2010 Act (overview of key requirements), after subsection (4) insert—
“(4A) In the case of a closure proposal in relation to a rural school, the education authority must also comply with—

(a) the preliminary requirements set out in section 12A when it is formulating the proposal,

(b) the additional consultation requirements set out in section 13.”.

68E Call-in of closure proposals

(1) In section 15 of the 2010 Act (call-in of closure proposals)—

(a) in each of subsections (3), (4) and (6) for “6” substitute “8”,

(b) subsection (5) is repealed.

(2) Section 16 of the 2010 Act is repealed.

(3) In section 17 of the 2010 Act (grounds for call-in etc.)—

(a) in subsection (3)—

(i) the word “or” immediately following paragraph (a) is repealed,

(ii) paragraph (b) is repealed,

(b) after that subsection insert—

“(3A) HMIE must provide the Scottish Ministers with such advice as to the educational aspects of a closure proposal as the Scottish Ministers may reasonably require of HMIE for the purpose of the Scottish Ministers’ consideration of whether to issue a call-in notice.”.

(4) After section 17 of the 2010 Act insert—

“17A Referral to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels

(1) This section applies where a call-in notice is issued as respects a closure proposal.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must refer the proposal to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.

(3) The Convener must, within the period of 7 days beginning with the day on which the call-in notice is issued, constitute a School Closure Review Panel to review the proposal under section 17B(1).

(4) The education authority may not implement the proposal (wholly or partly)—

(a) unless the Panel grants its consent to it under section 17C(1), and

(b) until—

(i) the period mentioned in section 17D(2)(c) has expired without any appeal to the sheriff being made, or

(ii) where such an appeal is made, it is abandoned or the sheriff confirms the Panel’s decision.

(5) Schedule 2A makes further provision about the Convener and School Closure Review Panels.

(6) In this Act—

(a) “the Convener” is the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels,
(b) a “School Closure Review Panel” is a School Closure Review Panel constituted under subsection (3).

17B Review by Panel

(1) A School Closure Review Panel must consider both of the following in relation to a closure proposal—

(a) whether the education authority has failed in a significant regard to comply with the requirements imposed on it by (or under) this Act so far as they are relevant in relation to the proposal,

(b) whether the education authority has failed to take proper account of a material consideration relevant to its decision to implement the proposal.

(2) The education authority must provide the Panel with such information in connection with the proposal as the Panel may reasonably require of it for the purpose of subsection (1).

(3) HMIE must provide the Panel with such advice as to the educational aspects of the proposal as the Panel may reasonably require of them for the purpose of subsection (1).

(4) The Panel may request such other information and advice from any other person as it may reasonably require for the purpose of subsection (1).

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision as to the procedures to be followed by the Panel when carrying out a review under subsection (1).

17C Decision following review

(1) Following a review of a closure proposal under section 17B(1), the School Closure Review Panel may—

(a) refuse to consent to the proposal,

(b) refuse to consent to the proposal and remit it to the education authority for a fresh decision as to implementation,

(c) grant consent to the proposal—

(i) subject to conditions, or

(ii) unconditionally.

(2) The Panel must give reasons for its decision.

(3) Where the Panel remits the proposal to the education authority under subsection (1)(b), the Panel may specify any steps in the process provided for in sections 1 to 11 and (in relation to a closure proposal as respects a rural school) 12A that the authority must take again in relation to the proposal before making a fresh decision.

(4) The Panel may refuse to consent to the proposal under subsection (1)(a) or (b) only if the Panel finds either or both of the following—

(a) that the education authority has failed in a significant regard to comply with the requirements imposed on it by (or under) this Act so far as they are relevant in relation to the proposal,
(b) that the authority has failed to take proper account of a material consideration relevant to its decision to implement the proposal.

(5) The Panel must notify the education authority of its decision within the period of 8 weeks beginning with the day on which the Panel is constituted unless (before the end of that period) the Panel issues a notice to the education authority—

(a) stating that the Panel does not intend to notify the decision within that period,

(b) specifying the reason why that is so, and

(c) indicating the likely date for notifying the decision.

(6) Where the Panel issues a notice under subsection (5), it must notify the education authority of its decision within the period of 16 weeks beginning with the day on which the Panel is constituted.

(7) After the Panel notifies the education authority of its decision, the Panel must—

(a) notify the Scottish Ministers of the decision, and

(b) publish notice of the decision in such manner as it considers appropriate.

(8) Where the Panel grants consent to the proposal subject to conditions, the education authority must comply with the conditions.

17D Appeal against decision of the Panel

(1) An appeal may be made to the sheriff against a decision of a School Closure Review Panel under section 17C(1) by—

(a) the education authority,

(b) a relevant consultee in relation to the closure proposal.

(2) An appeal under subsection (1)—

(a) may be made only on a point of law,

(b) must be made by way of summary application,

(c) must be made within the period of 14 days beginning with the day on which the Panel publishes notice of the decision under section 17C(7)(b).

(3) In the appeal, the sheriff may—

(a) confirm the decision, or

(b) quash the decision and refer the matter back to the Panel.

(4) The sheriff’s determination of the appeal is final.”.

(5) After schedule 2 to the 2010 Act, insert—
“SCHEDULE 2A
(introduced by section 17A)

SCHOOL CLOSURE REVIEW PANELS

Convener of the School Closure Review Panels

1 (1) There is established the office of the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must appoint a person to hold that office.

(3) A person so appointed—
   (a) is not to be regarded as a servant or agent of the Crown and does not have any status, immunity or privilege of the Crown,
   (b) subject to any provision made in regulations under sub-paragraph (9), holds and vacates office on such terms and conditions as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

(4) The Convener—
   (a) may delegate a function conferred on the Convener by this Act,
   (b) must delegate such a function if required to do so by directions issued under paragraph 4.

(5) Nothing in sub-paragraph (4)(a) prevents the Convener from carrying out any function delegated under that sub-paragraph.

(6) Sub-paragraph (7) applies during any period when—
   (a) the office of the Convener is vacant, or
   (b) the person holding that office is unable to perform the functions conferred on the office because the person is incapacitated.

(7) The Scottish Ministers may appoint a person to act as Convener during that period.

(8) A person appointed to act as Convener under sub-paragraph (7)—
   (a) is to be appointed on such terms and conditions as the Scottish Ministers may determine,
   (b) while acting as such, is to be treated for all purposes, except those of any regulations made under sub-paragraph (9), as the Convener.

(9) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision for or about—
   (a) eligibility for, and disqualification from, appointment under sub-paragraph (2),
   (b) tenure and removal from office of a person appointed under sub-paragraph (2),
   (c) payment of—
      (i) salary, fees, expenses and allowances to such a person,
      (ii) pensions, allowances or gratuities (including by way of compensation for loss of office) to, or in respect of, such a person,
   (d) such other matters in relation to the appointment of the Convener as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.
Panel members

2 (1) The Convener is to appoint such number of persons as the Convener considers appropriate to be eligible to serve as members of a School Closure Review Panel.

(2) Each Panel is to consist of 3 of the persons appointed under sub-paragraph (1).

(3) It is for the Convener to select—

(a) the members of the Panel,

(b) one of those members to chair the Panel.

(4) The Convener is to make appropriate arrangements for the training of persons appointed under sub-paragraph (1).

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision for or about—

(a) eligibility for, and disqualification from, appointment under sub-paragraph (1),

(b) tenure and removal from office of persons so appointed,

(c) the process for the selection of Panel members under sub-paragraph (3),

(d) payment of expenses, fees and allowances to persons selected under that sub-paragraph,

(e) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate in relation to—

(i) the appointment of persons under sub-paragraph (1),

(ii) the selection of Panel members under sub-paragraph (3).

Property, staff and services

3 (1) The Scottish Ministers may—

(a) provide, or ensure the provision of, such property, staff and services to the Convener as they consider necessary or expedient in connection with the exercise of the Convener’s functions,

(b) pay grants to the Convener for the purposes of enabling the Convener to employ staff and obtain services in connection with the exercise of the Convener’s functions.

(2) The Convener is to provide a School Closure Review Panel with such staff and services as the Convener considers necessary or expedient in connection with the exercise of the Panel’s functions.

Directions

4 (1) The Scottish Ministers may issue directions to the Convener as to the exercise of the Convener’s functions (and the Convener must comply with them).

(2) Directions under sub-paragraph (1) may vary or revoke earlier such directions.

(3) The Scottish Ministers must publish any directions issued under sub-paragraph (1) in such manner as they consider appropriate.
Reports

5 (1) As soon as practicable after the end of each calendar year, the Convener must prepare a report on—
(a) the exercise of the Convener’s functions during that year, and
(b) the exercise of the functions of any School Closure Review Panel which has carried out a review under section 17B during that year.

(2) A report prepared under sub-paragraph (1) must be—
(a) submitted to the Scottish Ministers, and
(b) published in such manner as the Convener considers appropriate.”.

6 In section 4 of the 2010 Act (proposal paper), in subsection (2) for “17” substitute “17D”.

7 In section 19 of the 2010 Act (guidance)—
(a) the existing text becomes subsection (1),
(b) after that subsection insert—
“(2) The Convener, and a School Closure Review Panel, must have regard to any such guidance in exercising their functions under this Act.”.

8 In section 20 of the 2010 Act (regulations)—
(a) in subsection (3) for “17” substitute “17D”,
(b) after subsection (6) insert—
“(7) Regulations under section 17B(5) and paragraphs 1(9) and 2(5) of schedule 2A—
(a) may make different provision for different purposes,
(b) may make supplemental, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision,
(c) are subject to the negative procedure.”.

9 In section 21 of the 2010 Act (definitions)—
(a) after the definition of “consultation period” insert—
““the Convener” is defined in section 17A(6),”,
(b) after the definition of “rural school” insert—
““School Closure Review Panel” is defined in section 17A(6)”.

10 In the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman Act 2002, in schedule 2 (listed authorities), before paragraph 21C insert—
“21ZC The Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.”.

11 In the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002, in schedule 1 (Scottish public authorities)—
(a) before paragraph 62C insert—
“62ZC The Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.”,
(b) after paragraph 76 insert—
“76A A School Closure Review Panel constituted under section 17A(3) of the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010.”.

(12) In the Public Appointments and Public Bodies etc. (Scotland) Act 2003, in schedule 2 (the specified authorities), before the cross-heading “Executive bodies” insert—

“the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels”.

PART 12
CHILDREN’S HEARINGS

68F Safeguarders: exceptions to duty to prepare report on appointment

In section 33 of the 2011 Act—

(a) in subsection (1)(a), after “(2)” insert “or (3)”,

(b) after subsection (2), insert—

“(3) This subsection applies where the children’s hearing was arranged under section 45, 46, 50, 96, 126 or 158.”.

68G Maximum period of child protection order

In each of paragraphs (c) and (d) of section 54 of the 2011 Act, after “day” insert “after the day on which”.

68H Power to determine that deeming of person as relevant person to end

(1) The 2011 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 79—

(a) in subsection (1), for “This section applies” substitute “Subsections (2) to (5) apply”,

(b) after subsection (1), insert—

“(1A) Subsection (5A) applies (in addition to subsections (2) to (5)) where the children’s hearing is—

(a) a subsequent children’s hearing under Part 11, or

(b) held for the purposes of reviewing a compulsory supervision order.”,

(c) after subsection (5), insert—

“(5A) The Principal Reporter—

(a) must refer the matter of whether an individual deemed to be a relevant person by virtue of section 81 should continue to be deemed to be a relevant person in relation to the child for determination by a pre-hearing panel if requested to do so by—

(i) the individual so deemed,

(ii) the child, or

(iii) a relevant person in relation to the child,
(3) After section 81, insert—

“81A Determination that deeming of person as relevant person to end

(1) This section applies where a matter mentioned in section 79(5A)(a) is referred to a meeting of a pre-hearing panel.

(2) Where the matter is referred along with any other matter, the pre-hearing panel must determine it before determining the other matter.

(3) The pre-hearing panel must determine that the individual is no longer to be deemed to be a relevant person if it considers that the individual does not have (and has not recently had) a significant involvement in the upbringing of the child.

(4) Where the pre-hearing panel makes a determination as described in subsection (3), section 81(4) ceases to apply in relation to the individual.

(5) Where, by virtue of section 80(3), the children’s hearing is to determine a matter mentioned in section 79(5A)(a), references in subsections (2) to (4) to the pre-hearing panel are to be read as references to the children’s hearing.”.

68I Grounds hearing: non-acceptance of facts supporting ground

In section 90 of the 2011 Act—

(a) in subsection (1), for paragraph (a) substitute—

“(a) explain to the child and each relevant person in relation to the child—

(i) each section 67 ground specified in the statement of grounds, and

(ii) the supporting facts in relation to that ground,”;

(b) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) In relation to each ground that a person accepts applies in relation to the child, the chairing member must ask the person whether the person accepts each of the supporting facts.

(1B) Where under subsection (1A) any person does not accept all of the supporting facts in relation to a ground, the ground is taken for the purposes of this Act to be accepted at the grounds hearing only if the grounds hearing considers that—

(a) the person has accepted sufficient of the supporting facts to support the conclusion that the ground applies in relation to the child, and

(b) it is appropriate to proceed in relation to the ground on the basis of only those supporting facts which are accepted by the child and each relevant person.

(1C) Where a ground is taken to be accepted for the purposes of this Act by virtue of subsection (1B), the grounds hearing must amend the statement of grounds to delete any supporting facts in relation to the ground which are not accepted by the child and each relevant person.

(1D) In this section, “supporting facts”, in relation to a section 67 ground, means facts set out in relation to the ground by virtue of section 89(3)(b).”.
Failure of child to attend grounds hearing: power to make interim order

In section 95 of the 2011 Act, after subsection (2) insert—

“(3) Subsection (4) applies where under subsection (2) the grounds hearing requires the Principal Reporter to arrange another grounds hearing.

(4) If the grounds hearing considers that the nature of the child’s circumstances is such that for the protection, guidance, treatment or control of the child it is necessary as a matter of urgency that an interim compulsory supervision order be made, the grounds hearing may make an interim compulsory supervision order in relation to the child.

(5) An interim compulsory supervision order made under subsection (4) may not include a measure of the kind mentioned in section 83(2)(f)(i).”.

Limit on number of further interim compulsory supervision orders

In section 96(4) of the 2011 Act, for the words from “the effect” to the end substitute “it would be the third such order made under subsection (3) in consequence of the same interim compulsory supervision order made under section 93(5)”.

Area support teams: establishment

(1) The 2011 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In schedule 1—

(a) in paragraph 12—

(i) in sub-paragraph (1), omit “and maintain”,

(ii) for sub-paragraph (3), substitute—

“(3) The National Convener—

(a) must keep the designation of areas under sub-paragraph (1) under review, and

(b) may at any time revoke a designation or make a new one.

(3A) In exercising the powers to make and revoke designations, the National Convener must ensure that at all times each local authority area falls within an area designated under sub-paragraph (1).

(3B) Revocation of a designation under sub-paragraph (1) has the effect of dissolving the area support team established in consequence of the designation.

(3C) Before deciding to make or revoke a designation under sub-paragraph (1), the National Convener must consult each affected local authority.

(3D) In sub-paragraph (3C), “affected local authority” means—

(a) in the case of making a designation, each local authority whose area falls within the area proposed to be designated,

(b) in the case of revoking a designation, each constituent authority for the area support team established in consequence of the designation.
(3E) On making or revoking a designation under sub-paragraph (1), the National Convener must notify each local authority which was consulted under sub-paragraph (3C) in relation to the decision to make or revoke the designation."

(b) in paragraph 13—

(i) in sub-paragraph (1), the words “the National Convener establishes an area support team under paragraph 12(1)” become sub-sub-paragraph (a),

(ii) after that sub-sub-paragraph insert “, and

(b) the area of the area support team consists of or includes a new area.”,

(iii) in sub-paragraph (4)(a), for “area of the area support team” substitute “new area concerned”;

(iv) in sub-paragraph (7), after the definition of “Children’s Panel Advisory Committee” insert—

“‘new area’ means an area which has never previously been the area (or part of the area) of an area support team.”.

(3) An area support team established before this section comes into force continues in existence as if it were established under paragraph 12(1) as amended by this section.

70 Area support teams: administrative support by local authorities

(1) The 2011 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In schedule 1, in paragraph 14, after sub-paragraph (8) insert—

“(9) A constituent authority must provide an area support team with such administrative support as the National Convener considers appropriate.

(10) In sub-paragraph (9), “administrative support” means staff, property or other services which the National Convener considers are required to facilitate the carrying out by an area support team of its functions.”.

70A Interpretation of Part 12

In this Part, “the 2011 Act” means the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

PART 12A

OTHER REFORMS

Detention of children in secure accommodation

71 Appeal against detention of child in secure accommodation

After section 44 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 insert—

“44A Appeal against detention in secure accommodation

(1) A child, or a relevant person in relation to the child, may appeal to the sheriff against a decision by a local authority to detain the child in secure accommodation in pursuance of an order made under section 44 of this Act.

(1A) An appeal under subsection (1) may be made jointly by—

(a) the child and one or more relevant persons in relation to the child; or
(b) two or more relevant persons in relation to the child.

(1B) An appeal must not be held in open court.

(2) The sheriff may determine an appeal by—

(a) confirming the decision to detain the child in secure accommodation; or

(b) quashing that decision and directing the local authority to move the child to be detained in residential accommodation which is not secure accommodation.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision about appeals under subsection (1).

(4) Regulations under subsection (3) may in particular—

(a) specify the period within which an appeal may be made;

(b) make provision about the hearing of evidence during an appeal;

(c) provide for appeals to the sheriff principal and Court of Session against the determination of an appeal.

(5) Regulations under subsection (3) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

(6) In this section—

―relevant person‖, in relation to a child, means any person who is a relevant person in relation to the child for the purposes of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (including anyone deemed to be a relevant person in relation to the child by virtue of section 81(3), 160(4)(b) or 164(6) of that Act);

―secure accommodation‖ has the same meaning as in section 44 of this Act.”.

Children’s legal aid

71A Power of Scottish Ministers to modify circumstances in which children’s legal aid to be made available

(1) The Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 is amended as follows.

(2) The title of section 28L becomes “Power of Scottish Ministers to extent or restrict types of proceedings before children’s hearings in which children’s legal aid to be available”.

(3) After section 28L, insert—

“28LA Power of Scottish Ministers to provide for children’s legal aid to be available to other persons in relation to court proceedings

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify this Part so as to—

(a) provide that children’s legal aid is to be available, in relation to a type of court proceedings under the 2011 Act, to a person to whom it is not available by virtue of section 28D, 28E or 28F;

(b) vary any availability provided by virtue of paragraph (a), or

(c) remove any availability provided by virtue of paragraph (a).
(2) If regulations are made making children’s legal aid available to a child, the regulations must include provision requiring the Board to be satisfied that the conditions in subsection (3) are met before children’s legal aid is made available.

(3) The conditions are—

(a) that it is in the best interests of the child that children’s legal aid be made available,

(b) that it is reasonable in the particular circumstances of the case that the child should receive children’s legal aid,

(c) that, after consideration of the disposable income and disposable capital of the child, the expenses of the case cannot be met without undue hardship to the child, and

(d) if the proceedings are an appeal to the sheriff principal or the Court of Session under Part 15 of the 2011 Act, that the child has substantial grounds for making or responding to the appeal.

(4) If regulations are made making children’s legal aid available to a person other than a child, the regulations must include provision requiring the Board to be satisfied that the conditions in subsection (5) are met before children’s legal aid is made available.

(5) The conditions are—

(a) that it is reasonable in the particular circumstances of the case that the person should receive children’s legal aid,

(b) that, after consideration of the disposable income and disposable capital of the person, the expenses of the case cannot be met without undue hardship to the person or the dependants of the person, and

(c) if the proceedings are an appeal to the sheriff principal or the Court of Session under Part 15 of the 2011 Act, that the person has substantial grounds for making or responding to the appeal.”.

Licensing of child performances

71B Extension of licensing of child performances to children under 14

Section 38 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963 (licences for performances by children under 14 not to be granted except for certain dramatic or musical performances) is repealed.

Wellbeing under 1995 Act

73 Consideration of wellbeing in exercising certain functions

After section 23 of the 1995 Act, insert—

“23A Sections 17 and 22: consideration of wellbeing

(1) This section applies where a local authority is exercising a function under or by virtue of section 17, 22 or 26A of this Act.”
(2) The local authority must have regard to the general principle that functions should be exercised in relation to children and young people in a way which is designed to safeguard, support and promote their wellbeing.

(3) For the purpose of subsection (2) above, the local authority is to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person by reference to the extent to which the matters listed in section 74(2) of the 2014 Act are or, as the case may be, would be satisfied in relation to the child or young person.

(4) In assessing the wellbeing of a child or young person as mentioned in subsection (3) above, a local authority is to have regard to the guidance issued under section 74(3) of the 2014 Act.

(5) In this section, “the 2014 Act” means the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.”.

GENERAL

Assessment of wellbeing

(1) This section applies where under this Act a person requires to assess whether the wellbeing of a child or young person is being or would be—

(a) promoted,
(b) safeguarded,
(c) supported,
(d) affected, or
(e) subject to an effect.

(2) The person is to assess the wellbeing of the child or young person by reference to the extent to which the child or young person is or, as the case may be, would be—

Safe,
Healthy,
Achieving,
Nurtured,
Active,
Respected,
Responsible, and Included.

(3) The Scottish Ministers must issue guidance on how the matters listed in subsection (2) are to be used to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person.

(4) Before issuing or revising such guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) each local authority,
(b) each health board, and
(c) such other persons as they consider appropriate.
(5) In measuring the wellbeing of a child or young person as mentioned in subsection (2), a person is to have regard to the guidance issued under subsection (3).

(6) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify the list in subsection (2).

(7) Before making an order under subsection (6), the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) each local authority,

(b) each health board, and

(c) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

Interpretation

(1) In this Act—

“the 1980 Act” means the Education (Scotland) Act 1980,

“the 1995 Act” means the Children (Scotland) Act 1995,

“child” means a person who has not attained the age of 18 years,

“health board” means a board constituted under section 2(1)(a) of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978.

(2) References in this Act to a child being or becoming “looked after” are to be construed in accordance with section 17(6) of the 1995 Act.

(3) The following expressions have the same meaning in this Act as they have in the 1980 Act—

education authority
grant-aided school
independent school managers
nursery class primary school
proprietor
public school pupil
school age.

Modification of enactments

Schedule 4 (which makes minor amendments to enactments and otherwise modifies enactments for the purposes of or in consequence of this Act) has effect.

Subordinate legislation

(1) Any power of the Scottish Ministers to make an order under this Act includes power to make—

(a) different provision for different purposes,
(b) such supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate.

(2) An order made under any of the following sections is subject to the affirmative procedure—

- section 3(2)
- section 7(5)
- section 30(2)
- section 35(5)
- section 38(6)
- section 43(2)(c)(ii)

- section 51(2)(b)
- section 52(2)
- section 61(2)(b)
- section 64(4)(b)
- section 74(6).

(3) An order made under section 78 containing provisions which add to, replace or omit any part of the text of this or any other Act is subject to the affirmative procedure.

(4) All other orders made under this Act are subject to the negative procedure.

(5) This section does not apply to an order made under section 79(2).

77A Guidance and directions

(1) Any power of the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance or directions under this Act may be exercised—

- (a) to issue guidance or directions generally or for particular purposes,
- (b) to issue different guidance or directions to different persons or otherwise for different purposes.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must publish (in such manner as they consider appropriate) any guidance or directions issued by them under this Act.

(3) In subsection (2)—

- (a) the reference to guidance includes revision of guidance,
- (b) the reference to directions includes revision and revocation of directions.

78 Ancillary provision

The Scottish Ministers may by order make—
(a) such supplementary, incidental or consequential provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, or for the purposes of giving full effect to, any provision made by, or by virtue of, this Act, and

(b) such transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of any provision of this Act.

79 Commencement

(1) This Part (apart from sections 74, 75 and 76) comes into force on the day after Royal Assent.

(2) The other provisions of this Act come into force on such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

(3) An order under this section may include transitional, transitory or saving provision.

On: 17 April 2013
Bill type: Government Bill
INTRODUCTION

1. As required under Rule 9.7.8A of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, these Revised Explanatory Notes are published to accompany the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013) as amended at Stage 2. Text has been added or deleted as necessary to reflect the amendments made to the Bill at Stage 2 and these changes are indicated by sidelining in the right margin.

2. These Explanatory Notes have been prepared by the Scottish Government in order to assist the reader of the Bill and to help inform debate on it. They do not form part of the Bill and have not been endorsed by the Scottish Parliament.

3. The Notes should be read in conjunction with the Bill. They are not, and are not meant to be, a comprehensive description of the Bill. So where a section or schedule, or a part of a section or schedule, does not seem to require any explanation or comment, none is given.

THE BILL

Summary and background

4. The Bill makes provision in relation to aspects of children’s services reform to:

- Reflect in domestic law the role of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) in influencing the design and delivery of policies and services by placing duties on the Scottish Ministers and the wider public sector, and strengthening the powers of the Children’s Commissioner to enable investigations to be conducted in relation to individual children and young people;

- Improve the way services work to support children, young people and families by: ensuring there is a single planning approach for children who need additional support from services; creating a single point of contact around every child or young person; ensuring coordinated planning and delivery of services with a focus on outcomes, and providing a holistic and shared understanding of a child’s or young person’s wellbeing;

- Strengthen the role of early years support in children’s and families’ lives by:
  - Increasing the amount and flexibility of free early learning and childcare from 475 hours a year to a minimum of 600 hours for 3 and 4 year olds; 2 year olds who are, or have been at any time since turning 2, looked after or subject to a kinship care order; as well enabling further expansion through secondary legislation;

- Introducing a comprehensive and coordinated approach to consultation and planning on all early learning and childcare, day care and out of school care which local authorities have duties or powers to secure.

- Ensure better permanence planning for looked after children by: extending corporate parenting across the public sector; clarifying eligibility of care leavers who are entitled to corporate parenting and aftercare support; extending support to young people leaving care for longer (up to and including the age of 25); entitling 16 year olds in foster, kinship or residential care the right to stay in care until they are 21 years old; supporting families and the parenting role of kinship carers through new legal entitlements; and putting Scotland’s National Adoption Register on a statutory footing; and

- Strengthen existing legislation on school closures under the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”), adding to the requirements education authorities are subject to when taking forward a school closure proposal, particularly when proposing to close a rural school. A new process is also put in place for school closure proposals called in by Scottish Ministers which are to be referred to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels for determination by a Panel.

- Strengthen existing legislation that affects children and young people by creating a new right to appeal a local authority decision to place a child in secure accommodation, and by making procedural and technical changes in the areas of children’s hearings support arrangements.

COMMENTARY ON SECTIONS

Part 1 – Children’s Rights

Section 1 – Duty on Scottish Ministers in relation to the rights of children

5. Section 1 places duties on the Scottish Ministers in relation to the rights of children as set out in the UNCRC and its First and Second Optional Protocols.

6. Subsection (1)(a) places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to keep under consideration whether there are any steps which they could take to give better or further effect to the UNCRC requirements. In effect, this means a requirement on the Scottish Ministers to keep under review their approach to implementation of the UNCRC in the exercise of their functions. Subsection (1)(b) requires the Scottish Ministers to take steps which they believe to be appropriate in consequence of that consideration.

7. Subsection (2) places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to promote public awareness and understanding of the rights of children. The term “rights of children” has a different definition to the term “UNCRC requirements” for these purposes. An interpretation of both terms is included at section 4. This provision has the effect of incorporating Article 42 of the UNCRC into Scots law, introducing a new domestic requirement on the Scottish Ministers to raise awareness and understanding of the UNCRC amongst children, and those individuals working with children and members of the public. This could involve, for example, targeted work within schools, the development of information materials, the preparation of guidance for professionals and the provision of support to other organisations who have a role in promoting children’s rights in Scotland.

8. Subsection (3) requires the Scottish Ministers to lay a report before the Scottish Parliament every 3 years detailing the steps they have taken in the 3 year period just ended to give better or further effect to the UNCRC requirements and to promote public awareness and understanding of the rights of children. The report must also include details of the steps that the Scottish Ministers intend to take in the current 3 year period in pursuance of those same aims. The Scottish Ministers must take appropriate steps to obtain the views of children on what their plans should be.

9. Subsection (4) defines what is meant by “3 year period”. This is the period of 3 years beginning with the day the section comes into force and each period of 3 years thereafter.

10. Subsection (5) requires the Scottish Ministers to publish the report they have laid before the Scottish Parliament as soon as practicable.

Section 2 – Duties of public authorities in relation to the UNCRC

11. Subsection (1) requires each identified public authority, as listed, or with a description listed, in schedule 1, to publish (in a way they think is appropriate) a report every 3 years setting out the steps it has taken in that 3 year period to give better or further effect within its areas of responsibility to the UNCRC requirements. The public authority may choose to satisfy the duty through, for example, annual reports. The public authority can also satisfy the duty through development of a standalone report, should it choose.

12. Subsection (3) makes clear that two or more of the public authorities to whom the duty applies may satisfy the duty through preparation and publication of a joint report.

Part 2 – Commissioner for Children and Young People In Scotland

Section 5 – Investigations by the Commissioner

13. Section 7 of the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 (the 2003 Act) provides for the Commissioner to undertake an investigation into whether, by what means and to what extent, a service provider has regard to the rights, interests and views of children and young people in making decisions or taking actions that affect those children and young people. Any such investigation must focus on a matter of particular significance to children and young people generally or to particular groups of children and young people, but not to individual children.

14. Subsections (1) and (2) amend sections 7(1) and 7(2) of the 2003 Act in order to allow for the Commissioner to undertake two distinct types of investigation: a “general investigation” which is consistent with the Commissioner’s original investigatory power under section 7 of the 2003 Act; and an “individual investigation” focusing on the extent to which a service provider has had regard to the rights, views and interests of an individual child or young person. The term “service provider” is defined in the 2003 Act and means any person or organisation providing a service to children and young people. This includes the private, public and voluntary sector. Thus any individual who, or organisation or company which, provides services to children or young people can be investigated by the Commissioner. For example, organisations which give advice, provide guidance or provide goods could be investigated. The service in question does not need to be provided exclusively to children or young people. Parents carrying out their parental responsibilities are not service providers. However, the local authorities to whom parental responsibilities have been transferred are treated as service providers.

15. Section 7(2) of the 2003 Act as amended provides that the Commissioner can only carry out a general investigation if the evidence and information collected demonstrates that there is an issue that is significant for children and young people generally or specific groups of children and young people.

16. New section 7(2A) of the 2003 Act makes clear that the Commissioner may only undertake either a general or individual investigation if they are satisfied that it would not duplicate the work that is the function of another person. There are a number of bodies already tasked with considering complaints and responding to concerns raised by members of the public in Scotland including the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman, Social Care and Social Work Improvement Scotland (the Care Inspectorate) and the Equality and Human Rights Commission. Each has a particular function and where it is recognised that a complaint falls within the remit of one of these bodies or any other complaint handling body, the Commissioner should not pursue the matter.

17. Subsection (2)(b) removes section 7(3)(b) of the 2003 Act. This is the provision that currently prevents the Commissioner from undertaking investigations in relation to individual children.

18. Subsection 2(c) amends section 7 of the 2003 Act to provide for the Commissioner to resolve a matter which could properly form the basis of an individual investigation without the need for a formal investigation. Such a step might be taken by the Commissioner where it is felt that an issue can be addressed satisfactorily without having to exhaust the investigatory process.

19. Subsection (3)(a) replaces section 8(1)(b) of the 2003 Act, removing the requirement for the Commissioner to publish notice of any investigation and terms of reference. Instead, it simply requires the Commissioner to give notice of an investigation to those individuals who are likely to be affected by it. The change reflects the fact that it will not always be appropriate for details of a planned investigation to be made widely available, particularly where the investigation focuses on sensitive matters relating to an individual child. Subsections (3)(b) and (c) provide for individual investigations to be held in private whilst the presumption is that general investigations will be held in public unless the Commissioner is satisfied that there are grounds for taking evidence in private, as is currently provided for under section 8(2) of the 2003 Act.

20. Subsection (4)(a) amends section 11(1) of the 2003 Act, removing the need for all investigation reports to be laid before the Scottish Parliament. Instead, section 11(1) will require that the Commissioner prepares a report in relation to each investigation. In order to finalise the report, the Commissioner will share its content for consideration and comment with all those persons named within the report or identifiable from it. Should the report be amended as a consequence of this process, a revised version will be made available to all of the above persons.

21. Subsection (4)(c) adds new subsections to section 11 that require the Commissioner to lay before the Scottish Parliament any finalised report relating to a general investigation. The Commissioner will have the power, but not an obligation, to lay before the Scottish Parliament a report relating to an individual investigation.

Section 6 – Requirement to respond to Commissioner’s recommendations

22. Subsection (2) amends section 11 of the 2003 Act, providing the Commissioner with a power to require a response from a service provider to any recommendations made as part of a report linked to either a general investigation or an individual investigation and to identify a time by which that response must be received. Where a report includes a requirement to respond, a copy of the report must also be shared with the service provider on whom the requirement is made.

23. Subsection (3) sets out the arrangements for publishing a service provider’s response to any recommendations made by the Commissioner. It requires the Commissioner to publish any response made by a service provider in respect of recommendations following a general investigation unless the Commissioner considers publication to be inappropriate. The Commissioner may publish a response to recommendations following an individual investigation. Any published material should not, so far as reasonable and practicable, name or identify any child/children referred to in it.

24. Where a service provider fails to respond to a requirement, the Commissioner may take steps to publicise this failure.

Part 3 – Children’s Services Planning

Section 7 – Introductory

25. Subsections (1) and (2) are interpretation subsections for this Part. Subsection (1) defines the terms “children’s service” and “related service” and who are “other service providers” and “relevant health boards” for the purposes of Part 3. Subsection (2) defines the persons who may provide a “children’s service” or a “related service” as being local authorities, relevant health boards, any other service provider and the Scottish Ministers (but only in relation to a service provided by them in exercise of their functions under the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989) i.e. when they are providing children’s or related services as the Scottish Prison Service.

26. Subsections (3) and (4) provide that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify the services which are to be included within or excluded from the definition of children’s services or related services for the purposes of this Part. They may also specify matters in relation to those services. Before making such an order the Scottish Ministers must consult with each relevant health board, local authority and where the service is provided by another service provider, that person.
27. Subsection (5) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify the definition of “other service provider” in subsection (1) by adding a person, removing an entry or varying an entry.

28. This Part confers certain functions on “a local authority and each relevant health board”. Subsection (6) provides that those are joint functions (i.e. functions that are to be exercised by those persons together).

Section 8 – Requirement to prepare children’s services plan

29. Subsection (1) provides that each local authority and relevant health board must jointly prepare a children’s services plan for the area of the local authority, in respect of each 3 year period.

30. Subsection (2) defines “3 year period” as that beginning with such date after the coming into force of this section as the Scottish Ministers specify, by order, and each subsequent period of 3 years. It defines “children’s services plan” as a document setting out their plans for the provision of children’s services and related services over that 3 year period.

Section 9 – Aims of children’s services plan

31. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that a children’s services plan should be prepared with a view to achieving the aims of providing children’s services in the area in a way which: best safeguards, supports or promotes the wellbeing of children; ensures that any action to meet needs is taken at the earliest appropriate time and that, where appropriate, action is taken to prevent needs arising; is most integrated from the point of view of the recipients; and constitutes the most efficient use of available resources. Most integrated would be where service providers cooperate with each other to ensure that service provision is planned and delivered in a way which best meets the needs of children and families. Also, related services in the area are to be provided in the way which safeguards, supports or promotes the wellbeing of children, so far as this is consistent with the objects and proper delivery of the service concerned.

Section 10 – Children’s services plan: process

32. Subsection (1) provides that in preparing a children’s services plan, the local authority and relevant health board must give the other service providers and the Scottish Ministers an effective opportunity to participate in or contribute to the preparation of the plan. The local authority and relevant health board must also consult with organisations falling within subsection (2) (which represent the interests of persons who use or are likely to use any children’s service or related service in the area; or provide a service in the area which, if it were provided by the local authority, health board, other service provider or the Scottish Ministers, would be a children’s service or related service), such social landlords as appear to provide housing in the area of the local authority and other such persons as the Scottish Ministers may, by direction, specify. “Social landlords” has the meaning given by section 165 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010.

33. Subsection (4) provides that a direction under subsection (1)(b)(iii) may be revised or revoked.
34. Subsections (5) and (6) require the other service providers and the Scottish Ministers to participate in, or contribute to, the preparation of the children’s services plan, and the bodies to be consulted within subsection (1)(b) are to meet any reasonable request of the local authority or health board in participating in, or contributing to, the preparation of the children’s services plan. Subsection (7) provides that, as soon as reasonably practicable after the plan has been prepared, the persons who prepared it must send a copy to the Scottish Ministers and each of the other service providers, and publish it (in such a manner as considered appropriate).

35. Subsection (8) provides that, where the Scottish Ministers or any of the other service providers disagree with any aspect of a plan which relates to a service provided by them, they must prepare and publish a notice detailing the matters in relation to which they disagree and a statement of their reasons for disagreeing.

Section 11 – Children’s services plan: review

36. Subsection (1) provides that local authorities and relevant health boards in an area must jointly keep the children’s services plan under review and as a consequence of that review may prepare a revised plan.

37. Subsection (2) means that where a revised plan has been prepared, the local authority and each relevant health board must keep it under review and may in consequence prepare a revised plan.

Section 12 – Implementation of children’s services plan

38. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that, during the period to which the children’s services plan relates, the local authority, each relevant health board, the Scottish Ministers and each of the other service providers in an area must, so far as reasonably practicable, provide services in accordance with the children’s services plan for that area. Subsection (3) provides that the duty does not apply to the extent the person providing the service considers that doing so would adversely affect the wellbeing of a child or where the service is delivered by the Scottish Ministers or one of the other service providers and they have published a notice of disagreement in line with section 10(8).

Section 13 – Reporting on children’s services plan

39. Subsection (1) provides that as soon as is practicable at the end of each year, the local authority and relevant health board must publish, in a way they consider appropriate, a joint report on how the provision of children’s services and related services in that area during that period have been provided in accordance with the children’s services plan and the extent to which the aims, specified in section 9(2) have been achieved, and such outcomes in relation to the wellbeing of the children in the area as the Scottish Ministers may, by order, prescribe.

40. Subsection (2) defines “1 year period” as the period of a year beginning on the date on which the children’s services plan for the area has begun, in accordance with section 8(1), and each period of a year thereafter.
Section 14 – Assistance in relation to children’s services planning

41. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that any of the other service providers, the Scottish Ministers and persons mentioned in section 10(1)(b) must comply with any reasonable request made of them to provide the local authority or relevant health board with information, advice or assistance, for the purposes of carrying out their functions under this Part.

42. Subsection (3) states that subsection (1) does not apply where the person considers the provision of information, advice or assistance would be incompatible with any duties of that person or unduly prejudices the carrying out of any functions of the person.

Section 15 – Guidance in relation to children’s services planning

43. Subsections (1) and (2) state that local authorities and relevant health boards and the other service providers in each area must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about how to exercise the functions conferred by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 12).

44. Subsection (5) states that before guidance is issued or revised, the Scottish Ministers have to consult with the persons to whom the guidance relates.

Section 16 – Directions in relation to children’s services planning

45. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that local authorities, relevant health boards and the other service providers must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the carrying out of the functions conferred by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 12).

46. Subsection (5) provides that, before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the person to whom it relates.

Section 17 – Children’s services plan: default powers of Scottish Ministers

47. Subsection (1) states that this section applies where the Scottish Ministers consider that local authorities and relevant health boards are either not carrying out one of their functions conferred on them by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 12) or, in carrying out such a function, are not complying with their duty to have regard to guidance issued under section 15(1).

48. Subsection (2) provides a power for the Scottish Ministers to issue directions stating that the function is to be carried out in a particular way or that the function is to be carried out instead by such of the persons mentioned in subsection (3) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

49. Subsection (3) explains that persons referred to in subsection (2)(b) are the local authority, any relevant health board or another local authority or health board.
50. Subsection (4) states that a direction under subsection (2)(b) may include such provision as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate as to the making by a local authority or relevant health board in an area, which is not to be carrying out the function, of payment to a person who is to carry out the function by virtue of the direction.

51. Subsection (5) states that before issuing, revising or revoking a direction under subsection (2) the Scottish Ministers must consult with the local authority or relevant health boards whose failure is to be, or is, the subject of the direction, and such other persons as they consider appropriate.

52. Subsection (5A) requires that any direction given under subsection (2) must be complied with.

Section 18 – Interpretation of Part 3

53. This is an interpretation section for this Part.

Part 4 – Provision of named persons

Section 19 – Named person service

54. Subsections (1) and (5) define “named person service” as meaning the service of making available an individual from within named person service providers who carry out the functions in order to promote, support or safeguard the wellbeing of the child or young person. They will do this through a number of activities, including: advising, informing or supporting the child or young person or their parent; helping them to access a service or support; or discussing or raising a matter about that child or young person with a service provider or relevant authority.

55. Subsections (2) and (3) provide that individuals can only be identified for the named person service if they are an employee of the service provider, or are either a person, or employee of a person, who carries out functions on behalf of the service provider. Individuals must also satisfy such requirements as to qualifications, training and experience as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order.

56. Subsection (4) provides that the named person function cannot be carried out by a parent of the child or young person. Subsection (5A) confirms that the named person functions are not to be exercised during any time when a child or young person is subject to service law as a member of the reserve forces.

57. Subsections (6) and (7) state that the named person functions are carried out on behalf of the service provider and the responsibility for carrying out the named person function lies with the service provider and not with the individual named person.

Section 20 – Named person service in relation to pre-school child

58. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that it is the duty of the health board to make arrangements to provide a named person for each pre-school child in its area and defines “pre-school child” as a child who has not started primary school either because they are not old enough or the education authority has allowed the child to delay starting at primary school.
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2

59. Subsection (3) explains that for the purposes of this section, school age should be taken to be that determined by the relevant education authority by reference to the school commencement dates fixed by it. Attendance at primary school does not include attendance at a nursery class based in a school, and relevant education authority means that of the area where the child lives.

Section 21 – Named person service in relation to children not falling within section 20

60. Subsections (1), (2) and (3) state that an education authority must make arrangements to provide a named person service for each child living in its area unless: they are a pre-school child (as defined in section 20); they attend a school managed by a different local authority or attend a grant-aided school or independent school; they are kept in secure accommodation; or they are in legal custody (as defined at subsection (2A) or subject to temporary release from custody. The duty to provide a named person does not apply to a child if they are a member of any of the regular forces.

61. Subsection (4) provides that, during any period when a child is a pupil at a public school managed by a different authority from the one in which they reside, then that local authority must make arrangements to provide the named person service for that child. Subsection (5) provides that at any time when the child attends a grant-aided school, independent school or is kept in secure accommodation, that establishment must provide the named person service for the child. Subsection (6) provides that, during any period when a child is in legal custody or subject to temporary release from such custody, the Scottish Ministers must make arrangements to provide the named person service for the child.

Section 22 – Continuation of named person service in relation to certain young people

62. This section provides that, where a young person attends a public school, the education authority must make arrangements to provide the named person service to that young person. Where the young person attends a grant-aided or independent school, the directing authority of the establishment, as defined in section 30(1), must make arrangements to provide the named person service. “Young person” is defined as anyone who has reached the age of 18 but still attends school.

Section 23 – Communication in relation to movement of children and young people

63. This section provides that where a service provider no longer provides named person services to a child, they must provide the new service provider, or the person it considers will be the new service provider, with information it holds that is likely to be relevant in the exercise of any functions of the service provider under this Part, or the future exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person, if it ought to be provided for that purpose and unless this information prejudices the conduct of a criminal investigation or the prosecution of an offence.
64. Subsection (4) provides that, when establishing whether information ought to be shared, the outgoing service provider is, so far as reasonably practicable, required to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child or young person. In having regard to the views of a child, the outgoing service provider is to take account of their age and maturity (subsection (5)).

65. Subsection (6) provides that the outgoing service provider can only decide that information ought to be shared, for the purpose of section 23(3)(b), if the likely benefit to a child or young person’s wellbeing in doing so outweighs any likely adverse effect on their wellbeing.

66. Subsection (7) makes it clear that section 23 does not permit or require the sharing of information in breach of any legal prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information, except a duty of confidentiality.

Section 24 – Duty to communicate information about role of named persons

67. Subsection (1) provides that a service provider, as defined in section 30(1), must publish, in such a manner as it considers appropriate, information about the operation of the named person service provided by it, including: details of how the named person functions are exercised; how to contact named persons in their area or establishment; how the service provider exercises its functions under Part 4; and any other matters they consider appropriate.

68. Subsection (2) states that service providers must provide the child or young person for whom they are providing the named person, and their parents, with details of how to contact named persons in their area as soon as is reasonably practicable after they become the service provider for the child, and as soon as is reasonably practicable after there is any change in those arrangements.

Section 25 – Duty to help named person

69. This section provides that where it appears to a service provider that another service provider or relevant authority could, by doing something, help in the exercise of any of their functions as provider of a named person, the other service provider or relevant authority must comply with a request for help. This could entail the relevant authority providing assessments or analysis, chronologies of significant events or any other information which would assist the named person in assessing the overall needs of the child and determining how they can be met. This duty to comply with a request applies unless the request is incompatible with any of its own duties or unduly prejudices the exercise of any of its functions. Schedule 2 contains a list of relevant authorities.

Section 26 – Information sharing

70. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that a service provider or relevant authority (as listed in schedule 2) must provide to the service provider in relation to a child or young person information which it holds if it considers that: it is likely to be relevant to the exercise of the named person functions; it ought to be provided for that purpose; and its provision would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.
71. Subsections (3) and (4) provide that a service provider in relation to a child or young person must provide, to a service provider or relevant authority, any information which it holds that is likely to be relevant to the exercise of any function of the service provider or relevant authority which affects or may affect the wellbeing of the child or young person. This applies where the service provider in relation to the child or young person considers that the information ought to be provided for that purpose and where its provision would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation.

72. Subsection (4A) requires that, in establishing whether information ought to be shared, the information holder is, so far as reasonably practicable, required to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child or young person. In having regard to the views of a child, the information holder is to take account of their age and maturity (subsection (4B)). Subsection (4C) provides that the information holder can only decide that information ought to be shared, for the purpose of subsection (2)(b) or (4)(b), if the likely benefit to the child or young person’s wellbeing in doing so outweighs any likely adverse effect on their wellbeing.

73. Subsections (5) and (6) provide that the named person service provider may provide to a service provider or relevant authority any information they hold which is necessary or expedient to help them carry out their named person role.

74. Subsection (8) makes it clear that section 26 does not permit or require the sharing of information in breach of any legal prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information, except a duty of confidentiality.

Section 27 – Disclosure of information

75. Section 27 applies where a person (“the recipient”) receives information in accordance with Part 4 of the Bill which has been provided in breach of a duty of confidentiality and where the recipient has been made known of this breach. The recipient is not then to provide that information to anyone else (a third party), unless they are permitted or required to provide that same information to the third party by virtue of any enactment (including Part 4) or any rule of law.

Section 28 – Guidance in relation to named person service

76. Section 28 provides that all persons listed in subsection (1A) must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about exercising functions Part 4.

77. Subsection (4) provides that before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult with any person to whom it will relate.

Section 29 – Directions in relation to named person service

78. This section provides that all persons listed in subsection (2) must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by Part 4. Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the persons to which it relates.
Section 30 – Interpretation of Part 4

79. Subsection (1) explains the definition of phrases used in this Part. Subsection (2) confers upon the Scottish Ministers a power to modify schedule 2 which contains a list of relevant authorities.

Part 5 – Child’s plan

Section 31 – Child’s plan: requirement

80. Subsections (1) to (4A) provide that for this Part a child requires a child’s plan where the responsible authority considers that the child has a wellbeing need and that need is not capable of being met, or fully met, by taking action other than targeted intervention, and the need is capable of being met, at least to some extent, by one or more targeted interventions. A child has a wellbeing need if the child’s wellbeing is being, or is at risk of being, adversely affected by any matter. “Targeted intervention” means the provision of a service, by a health board or local authority or a grant aided or independent school, provided by a relevant authority (either directly or through a third party) which is directed at meeting the needs of children whose needs cannot be met, or fully met, by the services which are generally provided to all children by that body.

81. Subsections (5) and (6) provide that in deciding whether a child requires a child’s plan, the responsible authority is, so far as reasonably practicable, to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child, their parent(s), any persons as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify, and any other persons as it considers appropriate. In having regard to the views of the child, the responsible authority is to take account their age and maturity. The responsible authority must also consult the child’s named person where that individual is not employed by them.

82. Subsections (7) and (8) provide that if a child already has a plan, or if the child is a member of any of the regular forces, then subsection (1) does not apply. Where a child already has a plan, section 37 would apply. “Regular forces” has the meaning given by section 374 of the Armed Forces Act 2006.

Section 32 – Content of a child’s plan

83. Subsection (1) provides that a child’s plan must include a statement of: the child’s wellbeing need; any targeted intervention(s) which requires to be provided in relation to the child to address the wellbeing need; details of the relevant authority which is tasked with providing any targeted intervention; details of how the intervention is to be provided; and the outcome which the intervention is intended to achieve. A child’s plan may contain a targeted intervention only where the relevant authority tasked with delivering the intervention agrees to its inclusion. If the relevant authority is not in agreement and is not leading on the preparation of the plan, it must provide the person preparing the plan with its reasons for not agreeing to provide an intervention.

84. Subsection (2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, make provision as to any other information which is, or is not, to be contained in child’s plans and the form of those plans.
Section 33 – Preparation of a child’s plan

85. Subsections (1) and (3) state that where a child requires a child’s plan, the responsible authority should prepare the plan unless the responsible authority and a relevant authority agree that it would be more appropriate for the relevant authority to prepare the plan. Subsections (2) and (5A) provide that the plan should always be prepared as soon as is reasonably practicable unless there are no targeted interventions to be included because a relevant authority has not agreed to them in the terms of section 32(1A).

86. Subsection (5) provides that where a relevant authority declines to give its agreement to prepare a plan, the relevant authority must provide a statement of its reasons for declining.

87. Subsection (6) provides that in preparing a child’s plan, an authority must consult with the child’s named person where that individual is not employed by the authority. Furthermore, the authority must, so far as reasonably practicable, ascertain and have regard to the views of the child, their parent(s), any other persons as specified by order by the Scottish Ministers and any other persons as it considers appropriate. In having regard to the views of the child, the authority is to take account of the child’s age and maturity. Subsections (8) and (9) provide that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, make further provision as to the preparation of child’s plans, including provisions requiring or permitting a copy of the plan to be given to a particular person or persons within a particular description, in the circumstances described in the order or where the authority considers it appropriate.

Section 34 – Responsible authority: general

88. Subsection (1)(a) provides that for the purposes of this Part the responsible authority for a pre-school child is the health board for the area where the child lives. Subsection (1)(b) provides that the responsible authority for a child who is not a pre-school child is the local authority for the area where the child lives. Subsection (2) provides that subsection (1) is subject to special cases outlined in section 35. Special cases are those not covered in section 34.

89. Subsection (3) defines “pre-school child” as a child who has not started primary school and, if the child is of school age, has not started school because the education authority has consented to this being delayed.

90. Subsection (4) provides that for the purposes of this section, the reference to school age is to be construed by reference to the school commencement dates fixed by the relevant education authority; the references to attendance at primary school do not include attendance at nursery classes based in a primary school; and the references to relevant education authority are to the education authority for the area where the child resides.

Section 35 – Responsible authority: special cases

91. Section 35 makes provision about who the responsible authority is in relation to special cases, which are cases where section 34 does not apply. Subsection (1) provides that where a pre-school child resides in the area of a health board, by virtue of a placement by another health board or local authority, the health board for the area in which the child resides immediately before that placement is the responsible authority in relation to the child. “Pre-school child” has the meaning given by section 34(3).

92. Subsection (2) provides that where the child is at a public school managed by a local authority other than the one for the area in which the child lives, that other authority is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

93. Subsection (3) provides that where the child is a pupil at a grant-aided or independent school, the directing authority of that school is the responsible authority in relation to that child.

94. Subsection (4) provides that subsection (3) does not apply where the child is a pupil at a grant-aided or independent school by virtue of a placement by a local authority.

95. Subsection (4A) provides that where a child’s residence is displaced by virtue of their falling within any of the categories set out in subsection (4B), the local authority for the area in which they would normally reside is the responsible authority in relation to the child. Subsection (4B) specifies these categories as: where, in pursuance of a local authority’s duties under the Education (Scotland) Act 1980, a child is a pupil at a grant-aided or independent school and resides in accommodation provided for the purpose of attending that school; where the child is placed in a residential establishment by virtue of Chapter 1 of Part 2 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995; where the child resides at a residential establishment by virtue of an order under the Children’s Hearing (Scotland) Act 2011; or where the child is detained in residential accommodation in pursuance of an order under the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

96. Subsection (5) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order (subject to affirmative procedure), modify this section so as to make further or different provision as to the circumstances in which section 34(1) does not apply in relation to the child.

Section 36 – Delivery of a child’s plan

97. Subsection (1) provides that a relevant authority which is to provide a targeted intervention (either directly or through a third party) in terms of a child’s plan is to provide it, so far as reasonably practicable, in accordance with the plan. This does not apply where the responsible authority considers that to do so would adversely affect the wellbeing of the child (subsection (2)).

Section 37 – Child’s plan: management

98. Subsection (1) provides that the managing authority of a child’s plan must keep under review: whether the wellbeing need of the child stated in the plan is still accurate; whether the targeted intervention(s) or manner of provision of those interventions is still appropriate; whether the outcome of the plan has been achieved; and whether the management of the plan should transfer to another authority. In reviewing a child’s plan, subsections (2), (2A) and (3) state that the managing authority is to consult each relevant authority which is providing a targeted intervention contained in the plan (either directly or through a third party), the responsible authority (where that authority is neither the managing authority nor providing a targeted intervention) and the child’s named person where that individual is not employed by the managing authority. The managing authority must also, so far as is reasonably practicable, ascertain and have regard to the views of the child, their parents, such other persons as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order, and any other person that the managing authority considers appropriate. In having regard to the child’s views, the managing authority is to take account of their age and maturity.

99. In consequence of this review, the managing authority may, under subsection (4)(a) amend the plan so as to revise the wellbeing need of the child, any targeted intervention(s), or manner of the provision of targeted intervention(s) which require to be provided, or the outcome which the plan is intended to achieve. The managing authority may also transfer the management of the plan to a relevant authority or end the plan (subsections (4)(b) and (c)).

100. Subsection (5) provides that the Scottish Ministers may make, by order, provision about: the management of the child’s plan, including when and how a child’s plan is to be reviewed in accordance with subsection (1); who is to be the managing authority of the plan; when and to whom the management of the plan is to or may be transferred under subsection (4)(b); when and how a new targeted intervention may be included in a child’s plan; and the keeping, disclosure and destruction of child’s plans.

101. Subsection (6) provides that the managing authority of a child’s plan is the authority which prepared it, or where the management of the plan has been transferred, the person to whom it was transferred. This is subject to any different provision made under subsection (5)(b).

Section 38 – Assistance in relation to child’s plan

102. Subsections (1) and (1A) provide that any relevant authority or person listed in schedule 2A must comply with any reasonable request made of them to provide a person exercising a function under this Part with information, advice and assistance.

103. Subsection (2) provides that subsection (1) does not apply where the authority or person to whom the request is made considers that the provision of such information, advice or assistance would be incompatible with any of their duties or would unduly prejudice the exercise of any of their functions.

104. Subsection (3) provides that subsection (1) does not permit or require the sharing of information in breach of any legal prohibition or restriction linked to the sharing of such information, other than a breach of a duty of confidentiality.

105. Subsections (4) and (5) apply where a person (“the recipient”) receives information in accordance with section 38(1), which has been provided in breach of a duty of confidentiality and where the recipient has been made known of this breach. The recipient is not then to provide that information to anyone else (a third party) unless they are permitted or required to provide that same information to the third party by virtue of any enactment (including Part 5) or any rule of law.
106. Subsection (6) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 2A by adding, removing or varying an entry listed in it.

Section 39 – Guidance on child’s plans

107. Subsection (1) and (1A) provide that relevant authorities and those persons listed in schedule 2A (with the exception of the Scottish Ministers) must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions under Part 5 (other than the function of complying with section 36). Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult any person to whom it will relate.

Section 40 – Directions in relation to child’s plans

108. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that relevant authorities and those persons listed in schedule 2A (with the exception of the Scottish Ministers) must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of the functions conferred by Part 5 (other than the function of complying with section 36). Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult the person to whom it relates.

Section 41– Interpretation of Part 5

109. This is an interpretation section for this Part. It includes the definition of “directing authority”. When used generally, this means the managers of each grant-aided school and the proprietor of each independent school. When used in relation to a grant-aided school, it means the managers of the school, and in relation to an independent school, it means the proprietor of the school. It also defines “relevant authority” as any health board, local authority or directing authority.

Part 6 – Early Learning and Childcare

Section 42 – Early learning and childcare

110. Section 1(1) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 (the 1980 Act) imposes a duty on every education authority to secure that there is adequate and efficient provision of school education made for their area. Section 42 defines “early learning and childcare” as a service, consisting of education and care, of a kind which is suitable in the ordinary case for children who are under school age, with regard being had to the importance of interactions and other experiences which support learning and development in a caring and nurturing setting. The phrase “of a kind which is suitable in the ordinary case for children who are under school age” is consistent with its use in the Education (Scotland) Act 1980. Guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers under section 34 of the Standards in Scotland’s Schools Act 2000 (the 2000 Act) (which is amended by paragraph 5 of schedule 4) together with national guidance will be used to provide more detail as to what those types of interactions and experiences will encapsulate.

Section 43 – Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

111. Subsection (1) provides that an education authority must, in pursuance of its duty under section 1(1) of the 1980 Act, secure that the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2
(SP Bill 27A)

(as defined in section 42) is made available for each eligible pre-school child belonging to its area. Section 23(3) of the 1980 Act provides that a pupil receiving school education is deemed to belong to the area where the pupil’s parent is ordinarily residing. This is subject to any regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

112. Subsection (2) defines “eligible pre-school child”. It means a child who is under school age, has not started primary school and either falls within subsection (3) or is within such age range, or is of such other description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

113. Subsection (3) provides that a child is also an eligible pre-school child if the child is aged 2 or over, and is, or has been at any time since their 2nd birthday, looked after by a local authority (“looked after” is defined in section 75(2)) or the subject of a kinship care order. Kinship care order is defined in subsection (5) as having the meaning given by section 65(1).

114. Section 75(3) provides that “school age” has the same meaning as it has in the 1980 Act. Section 31 of the 1980 Act defines a person as being of “school age” if they have attained the age of 5 but not 16 years. Section 31 is however qualified by section 32(3) of the 1980 Act which provides that a child who does not attain the age of 5 on a school commencement dated (defined in section 32(1)) shall for the purposes of section 31 be deemed not to have attained that age until the school commencement date following his/her 5th birthday.

115. An order under section 43(2)(c)(ii) is subject to affirmative resolution procedure. It is anticipated that any order made under that enabling power will include provision akin to that made in the Provision of School Education for Children under School Age (Prescribed Children) (Scotland) Order 2002 (SSI 2002/90) made under section (1A) of the 1980 Act (which order making power is to be removed from the 1980 Act by paragraph 2(2)(a) and (b) of schedule 4), so for example to set out that eligibility for early learning and childcare starts from the first term following the child’s 3rd birthday; or to 15% of 2 year olds from workless or job seeking households, or the 27% of 2 year olds whose parents are on certain welfare benefits. Subsection (4) provides that an order under section 43(2)(c)(ii) may sub-delegate the function of determining the eligibility criteria to an education authority so for example the order might provide that a child is an eligible pre-school child only if the education authority is satisfied as to any matter relating to the child which is specified in the order.

Section 44 – Mandatory amount of early learning and childcare

116. Subsection (1) defines the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare for the purposes of section 43(1) as 600 hours in each year for which a child is an eligible pre-school child and a pro rata amount for each part of a year for which a child is so eligible.

117. Subsection (2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare in subsection (1) for eligible pre-school children so as to vary the amount of early learning and childcare which is to be made available. Under subsection (3) the order is capable of making different provision for different types of eligible pre-school children (for example different amounts for children of different ages). Such an order is subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of section 77(2).
Section 45 – Looked after 2 year olds: alternative arrangements to meet wellbeing needs

118. Section 45 enables an authority to make alternative provision of education and care in order to meet the wellbeing needs of children. Subsection (1) provides that where an authority’s duty under section 43(1) applies in relation to a child only by virtue of the child falling within section 43(3)(a)(that is any 2 year old who is, or has been at any time since turning 2, looked after until he or she becomes eligible under section 43(2)), and the authority, after assessing the child’s needs considers that making alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care would better safeguard or promote the child’s wellbeing, then subsection (2) applies.

119. Subsection (2) provides that in relation to these children the authority need not comply with its duty under section 43(1) in relation to the child but must make alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care as it considers appropriate for the purposes of safeguarding or promoting the child’s wellbeing. The power for the authority to make alternative arrangements by virtue of 45(1) and (2) continues to apply notwithstanding that the 2 year old child ceases to be looked after so as to ensure continuity in the education and care of the child. However, under subsection (3), alternative arrangements cannot continue to be made if a parent of the child objects to those alternative arrangements being made.

120. Subsection (4) provides that the authority may, at any time, review any alternative arrangements it makes in relation to a child in pursuance of subsection (2)(b) and must do so on becoming aware of any significant change in the child’s circumstances. It may, following such a review, alter those arrangements.

121. Subsection (5) provides that the authority must seek to ensure that a record of the outcome of any assessment of a child’s needs that it undertakes in pursuance of subsection (1)(b) and any alternative arrangements that it makes in relation to the child’s education and care in pursuance of subsection (2)(b) is included in any child’s plan which is prepared under Part 5.

Section 46 – Duty to consult and plan on delivery of early learning and childcare

122. Subsection (1)(a) provides that an education authority must consult such persons as appear to it to be representative of parents of children under school age in its area about how it should make early learning and childcare available. Subsection (1)(b) provides that the education authority must have regard to the views expressed in that consultation and having done so prepare and publish a plan for how it intends to make early learning and childcare available. Such consultation must be carried out every 2 years although subsection (2) enables the Scottish Ministers to vary the regularity of that consultation by order subject to negative resolution procedure. Guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers under section 34 of the 2000 Act (as amended by paragraph 5 of schedule 4) will be used to set out more detail about how it is expected the consultation will be carried out and in relation to the preparation of the requisite plans for how early learning and childcare will be delivered.

Section 47 – Method of delivery of early learning and childcare

123. Subsection (1) provides that an education authority must ensure that it makes early learning and childcare available by way of sessions which are provided during at least 38 weeks of every calendar year, and which are at least 2.5 hours but no more than 8 hours in duration. This is the minimum framework for delivering early learning and childcare.

124. Subsection (2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (1) so as to vary the minimum framework for delivering early leaning and childcare. Such an order is subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of section 77(2).

Section 48 – Flexibility in way in which early learning and childcare is made available

125. This section provides that in exercising functions under sections 46 (duty to consult and plan on delivery of early learning and childcare) and 47 (method of delivery of early learning and childcare), an education authority must have regard to the desirability of ensuring that the method by which it makes early learning and childcare available is flexible enough to allow parents an appropriate degree of choice when deciding how to access the services.

Section 49 – Interpretation of Part 6

126. This section is an interpretation section for this Part which explains that the expression “early learning and childcare” has the meaning given by section 42, “eligible pre-school child” has the meaning given by section 43(2) and “parent” has the meaning given by the 1980 Act. Other interpretation provisions relevant to this Part are contained in section 75.

Part 6A – Power to provide school education for pre-school children

Section 49A - Duty to consult and plan in relation to power to provide school education for pre-school children

127. Section 49A inserts subsections (2B), (2C) and 2(D) into section 1 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 (“the 1980 Act”). Section 1(1C) of the 1980 Act gives power to education authorities to provide school education for pre-school children (i.e. early learning and childcare) in addition to the mandatory provision required in terms of section 1(1A) of the 1980 Act as amended by Part 6 of this Bill.

128. Subsection (2B) requires education authorities to consult parents of pre-school children in their area at least once every two years about whether and if so how they should provide such education in exercise of their power under section 1(1C) of the 1980 Act and, having had regard to those views, prepare and publish plans in relation to that. Subsection (2C) enables the Scottish Ministers by order to vary the regularity within which such consultation and planning should happen and such an order is subject to negative procedure in terms of subsection (2D).

Part 6B – Day care and out of school care

Section 49B - Duty to consult and plan in relation to day care and out of school care

129. Section 49B inserts new subsections (1A), (1B), (3A), (3B), (3C) and (3D) into section 27 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). Section 27(1) of the 1995 Act requires local authorities to provide day care for pre-school children who are in need and gives local authorities power to provide day care for pre-school children who are not in need. Section 27(3) of the 1995 Act requires local authorities to provide out of school care for school aged children who are in need and gives local authorities power to provide out of school care for school aged children who are not in need.

130. Subsections (1A) and (3A) requires local authorities at least once every 2 years to consult with such persons who are representative of parents of pre-school and school aged children in need about how they should provide day care and out of school care for such children; and, having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish plans in relation to their duty to provide day care to pre-school children in need and out of school care to school aged children in need.

131. Subsections (1B) and (3B) requires local authorities at least once every 2 years to consult with such persons who are representative of parents of pre-school children and school aged children about whether and if so how they should provide day care and out of school care; and, having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish plans in relation to their powers to provide day care to pre-school children who are not in need and out of school care to school aged children who are not in need.

132. Subsection (3C) enables the Scottish Ministers by order to vary the regularity with which such consultation and planning in relation to day care and out of school care provided under section 27 of the 1995 Act should happen and such an order is subject to negative procedure in terms of subsection (3D).

Part 7 – Corporate parenting

Section 50 – Corporate parents

133. This Part of the Bill gives effect to a concept of “corporate parenting”. This concept involves placing new duties on certain public bodies to act in particular ways in support of certain children and young people. The public bodies are called “corporate parents” and the duties are “corporate parenting responsibilities”.

134. Subsection (1) of this section provides that those people listed, or included within a description which is listed, in schedule 3 are “corporate parents”.

135. Subsection (2) provides that the Scottish Ministers can, by order, modify schedule 3 by adding a person or description of persons, removing an entry or changing an entry. Such an order is subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of section 77(2) (subordinate legislation). Subsection (3B) provides that an order under subsection (2) which adds a person, or a description of persons, to schedule 3, may modify this section so as to provide that the person is not a corporate parent for the purposes of section 58 (directions).

136. Although the Scottish Ministers are corporate parents, there is an exception for them in relation to certain of the provisions (see subsection (3)). This is because of their special position in relation to some of the duties. Also, subsection (3A) provides that the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland and “post-16 education bodies” are not corporate parents for the purposes of section 58.
137. Subsection (4) provides that references in this Part to the “corporate parenting responsibilities” of a corporate parent are to the duties conferred on that corporate parent by section 52(1).

Section 51 – Application of Part: children and young people

138. The children and young people in relation to whom corporate parenting responsibilities apply are set out in this section. They are children who are looked after by a local authority in accordance with section 17(6) of the 1995 Act and young people who are under 26 and were, on their 16th birthday, or at any subsequent time, but are no longer, looked after by a local authority. This Part also applies to a young person who is at least the age of 16 but under 26 and is not of the description in subsection (1)(b)(ii) but is of other such description as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order. Such an order is subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of section 77(2).

Section 52 – Corporate parenting responsibilities

139. As noted above, this section sets out the corporate parenting responsibilities. Subsection (1) provides that it is the duty of every corporate parent (where consistent with their other functions): to be alert to matters which could adversely affect the wellbeing of children and young people to whom this Part applies; to assess the needs of those children and young people for support and services it provides; to promote the interests of those children and young people; to seek to provide those children and young people with opportunities to participate in activities designed to advance their wellbeing; to take such action as it considers appropriate to help those children and young people to access those opportunities and to make use of services, and access the support, which it provides; and to take any other action it considers appropriate to improve the way in which it carries out its functions in relation to those children and young people.

140. Subsection (2)(a) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (1) so as to confer, remove or vary a duty on corporate parents. By virtue of subsection (2)(b) such an order may also provide that subsection (1) is to be read, in relation to a particular corporate parent or particular descriptions of corporate parents, with a modification conferring, removing or varying a duty. The effect of this is that the power may be used to apply different duties to different corporate parents. Orders under subsection (2) are subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of section 77(2).

Section 53 – Planning by corporate parents

141. Subsection (1) provides that corporate parents must prepare a plan for how they propose exercising their corporate parenting responsibilities and must keep this plan under review.

142. Subsection (2) provides that before preparing or revising this plan, corporate parents must consult with other corporate parents and persons as they consider appropriate.

143. Subsection (3) provides that corporate parents must publish their plan, or revised plan, in such manner as they consider appropriate (and, in particular, that plans may be published together with, or as a part of, any other plan or document).
Section 54 – Collaborative working among corporate parents

144. Subsection (1) provides that corporate parents must collaborate with each other, in so far as is reasonably practicable, when undertaking their corporate parenting responsibilities or any other functions under this Part, where they consider that doing so would safeguard or promote the wellbeing of children or young people which this Part applies to.

145. Subsection (2) gives examples of what that collaboration may include, namely sharing information, providing advice or assistance, co-ordinating activities, sharing responsibility for action, funding activities jointly and exercising these functions jointly (for example, by publishing a joint plan or joint report).

Section 55 – Reports by corporate parents

146. Subsection (1) provides that a corporate parent must report on how it has exercised its corporate parenting responsibilities, planning and collaborating functions in pursuance of sections 53 and 54, and its other functions under this Part.

147. Subsection (2) states that these reports may, in particular, include information about standards of performance, and the outcomes achieved in pursuance of this Part.

148. Subsection (3) provides that reports are to be published in such manner as the corporate parent considers appropriate (and, in particular, that reports may be published together with, or as part of, any other report or document).

Section 56 – Duty to provide information to Scottish Ministers

149. Subsection (1) states that a corporate parent must provide the Scottish Ministers with such information they require about how it is: exercising its corporate parenting responsibilities; planning, collaborating or reporting in pursuance of sections 53, 54 or 55; or otherwise exercising functions under this Part.

150. Subsection (2) states that information which is required may include information about standards of performance, and the outcomes achieved in pursuance of this Part.

Section 57 – Guidance on corporate parenting

151. Subsection (1) provides that a corporate parent must have regard to any guidance about corporate parenting issued by the Scottish Ministers.

152. Subsection (2) states that guidance may include advice or information about how corporate parents should: exercise their corporate parenting responsibilities; promote awareness of their corporate parenting responsibilities; plan, collaborate or report in pursuance of sections 53, 54 and 55; and otherwise exercise their functions under this Part. Guidance may also include information about the outcomes which corporate parents should seek to achieve in exercising their functions.
153. Subsection (5) provides that before issuing guidance the Scottish Ministers must consult with the corporate parents to which guidance relates and anyone else they consider appropriate.

Section 58 – Directions to corporate parents

154. Subsection (1) provides that corporate parents have to comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about their corporate parenting responsibilities, their planning or collaborating or reporting functions in pursuance of sections 53, 54 and 55 or their functions under this Part. Section 53 requires a corporate parent to prepare and review a plan for how it proposes to exercise its corporate parenting responsibilities. Section 54 requires corporate parents to work collaboratively when exercising their corporate parent responsibilities or other functions under this Part. Section 55 requires a corporate parent to report on how it has exercised its corporate parenting responsibilities, collaborating functions and its other functions under this Part.

155. Subsection (4) provides that before issuing, revising, or revoking directions, Scottish Ministers must consult with any corporate parent to which it relates and such other persons as they consider appropriate.

Section 59 – Reports by Scottish Ministers

156. Subsection (1) provides that the Scottish Ministers must, as soon as practicable, after the end of each 3 year period, lay before the Scottish Parliament a report on how they have exercised their corporate parenting responsibilities during that period.

157. Subsection (2) states that “3 year period” means the period of 3 years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, and each subsequent 3 years.

Part 8 – Aftercare

Section 60 – Provision of aftercare to young people

158. Subsection (2) of this section amends section 29 of the 1995 Act which places certain duties on, and gives certain powers to, local authorities in relation to the provision of aftercare to young people that were at one stage looked after. Subsection (3) of this section amends section 30 of the 1995 Act which gives local authorities the power to provide financial assistance to a similar category of young people for the purpose of meeting expenses connected with their education and training.

159. Subsection (2)(ya) amends section 29(1) of the 1995 Act to provide that a local authority shall, unless they are satisfied that their welfare does not require it, advise, guide and assist any person in their area who, is at least sixteen but not nineteen years of age who, either was (on his sixteenth birthday or at any subsequent time) but is no longer looked after by the local authority; or is of such other description of person formerly but no longer looked after by a local authority as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order. Subsection (2)(za) inserts a new subsection (1A) into section 29 to provide that such orders will be subject to the affirmative procedure. Section 29(1) previously only placed local authorities under a duty to provide aftercare support to those persons in their area who were over school age but not yet nineteen years of age who, at the time they ceased to be of school age or at any subsequent time, were but are no longer, looked after.

160. Subsection (2)(a) amends section 29(2) to provide that a person who is at least nineteen and who is otherwise a person as described in section 29(1) (as amended) may apply to their local authority for advice, assistance and support up to the age of twenty-six. This provision increases the upper age limit for aftercare support from twenty-one up to the age to twenty-six.

161. Subsection (2)(c) inserts new subsections (5A) and (5B) into section 29. New subsection (5A) provides that, after carrying out an assessment under section 29(5) in pursuance of an application made by a person under section 29(2), the local authority must, if satisfied that the person has eligible needs and that these cannot be met other than by taking action under this subsection, provide the person with such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers necessary for the purposes of meeting those needs. The local authority may otherwise provide such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers appropriate having regard to the person’s welfare. New subsection (5B) provides that a local authority can continue to provide advice, guidance and assistance after a person reaches the age of 26, but they are not required to do so.

162. Subsection (2)(e) inserts new subsections (8) and (9) into section 29 to provide that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify types of care, attention and support that constitute “eligible needs” for the purposes of new subsection (5A)(a). It also inserts new subsection (10) into section 29 to provide that if a local authority becomes aware that a person who is being provided with advice, guidance or assistance by them under this section has died, the authority must as soon as reasonably practicable notify the Scottish Ministers and Social Care and Social Work Improvement Scotland.

163. Subsection (3) amends section 30(2) of the 1995 Act to alter the definition of who is a “relevant person” for the purposes of a local authority’s power in section 30(1) to provide such persons with financial assistance towards education or training. As amended, a person is a relevant person if he is at least sixteen years of age but not yet twenty-six years of age (increased from twenty-one) and either (was on his sixteenth birthday or at any subsequent time) but is no longer looked after by the local authority; or is of such other description of person formerly but no longer looked after by a local authority as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order. Subsection (3) also inserts a new subsection (2A) into section 30 to provide that such orders will be subject to the affirmative procedure.

Part 8A – Continuing care

Section 60A – Continuing Care: looked after children

164. Subsection (1) of section 60A inserts a new section 26A after section 26 of the 1995 Act. This new section details the provision of continuing care to those who cease to be looked after children. Subsection (4) of new section 26A defines “continuing care” as meaning the same accommodation and other assistance as was being provided for the person by the local authority immediately before they ceased being looked after.
165. Subsection (1) of new section 26A provides that this section only applies where an eligible person ceases to be looked after by a local authority. Subsection (2) defines an “eligible person” as a person who is at least sixteen years of age and is not yet such higher age as may be specified. By virtue of new section 26A(12), “specified” means specified by order made by the Scottish Ministers which will be subject to affirmative procedure (see new subsection (11)(b)).

166. Subsection (3) of new section 26A provides that, subject to subsection (5), the local authority must provide the person with continuing care. Subsection (6) provides that this duty lasts, subject to subsection (7), until the expiry of such period as may be specified by order made by Scottish Ministers (subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of subsection (11)(b)).

167. Subsection (5) of new section 26A provides that the duty to provide continuing care does not apply if the accommodation the person was in immediately before ceasing to be looked after was secure accommodation; was a care placement and the carer has indicated to the authority that they are unable or unwilling to continue to provide the placement; or the local authority considers that providing the care would significantly adversely affect the welfare of the person.

168. Subsection (7) of new section 26A provides that the duty to provide continuing care ceases if: the person leaves the accommodation of the person’s own volition; the accommodation ceases to be available; or the local authority considers that continuing to provide the care would significantly adversely affect the welfare of the person. Subsection (8) provides that the situations in which accommodation ceases to be available include: in the case of a care placement, where the carer indicates to the authority that the carer is unable or unwilling to continue to provide the placement; in the case of a residential establishment provided by the local authority, where the authority closes the establishment; or in the case of a residential establishment provided under arrangements made by the local authority, where the arrangements come to an end.

169. Subsection (9) of new section 26A provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order: make provision about when or how a local authority is to consider whether providing or continuing to provide the care would significantly adversely affect the person’s welfare; modify subsection (5) so as to add, remove or vary a situation in which the duty to provide continuing care does not apply; or modify subsection (7) or (8) so as to add, remove or vary a situation in which the duty to provide continuing care ceases.

170. Subsection (10) of new section 26A provides that, if a local authority becomes aware that a person who is being provided with continuing care has died, the local authority must as soon as reasonably practicable notify the Scottish Ministers and Social Care and Social Work Improvement Scotland.

171. Subsection (11) provides that an order made under this section may make different provision for different purposes and is subject to the affirmative procedure.

172. Subsection (2) of section 60A amends section 29 of the 1995 Act by adding a new subsection (2A) which provides that subsections (1) and (2) of section 29 do not apply to a person during any period when they are being provided with continuing care under new section 26A. This means that a person receiving continuing care under new section 26A cannot also receive aftercare support under section 29 of the 1995 Act at the same time. However, if the duty to provide continuing care to that person ceases for one of the reasons set out in new section 26A(7) of the 1995 Act that person will then be able to apply for aftercare support under section 29 of the 1995 Act as amended by section 60 of the Bill.

Part 9 – Services in relation to children at risk of becoming looked after, etc.

Section 61 – Provision of relevant services to parents and others

173. Subsection (1) of section 61 provides that a local authority must make arrangements to secure that relevant services as described by the Scottish Ministers, by order, are made available for each eligible child residing in its area, a qualifying person in relation to such a child, each eligible pregnant woman residing in its area and a qualifying person in relation to such a woman.

174. Subsection (1A) defines a “relevant service” as a service comprising, or comprising any combination of: providing information about a matter; advising or counselling about a matter; and taking other action to facilitate the addressing of a matter by a person.

175. Subsection (2) defines an “eligible child” as a child who the authority considers to be at risk of becoming looked after or who falls within such other description as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order. Subsection (3) defines a “qualifying person” in relation to an eligible child as a person: who is related to the child; who has any parental rights or responsibilities in relation to the child; or with whom the child is or has been living.

176. Subsection (4) defines an “eligible pregnant woman” as a pregnant woman who the authority considers is going to give birth to a child who will be an eligible child. Subsection (5) defines a “qualifying person” in relation to an eligible pregnant woman as a person: who is the father of the child to whom the pregnant woman is to give birth; who is married to, in a civil partnership with or otherwise related to the pregnant woman; with whom the pregnant woman is living; or who does not fall within any of these descriptions but who the authority considers will, when the pregnant woman gives birth to the child, become a qualifying person in relation to the child.

177. Subsection (6) explains that the references in this section to a person who is related to another person includes a person who is married to or in a civil partnership with a person who is related to the other person, or a person who is related to the other person by the half blood.

Section 62 – Relevant services: further provision

178. Section 62(1) provides that the Scottish Ministers may make, by order, provision about: when or how relevant services specified in an order under section 61(1) are to be provided; when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child falls within paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 61(2) (a child at risk of becoming looked after or falling within such other description as the Scottish Ministers specify by order); when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to fall within paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 61(2); and such other matters about the provision of relevant services specified in an order under section 61(1) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.
179. Subsection (2) provides that an order under subsection (1)(d) may include provision about circumstances in which relevant services specified in an order under section 61(1) may be provided subject to conditions (including conditions as to payment), and consequences of such conditions not being met.

Section 63 – Interpretation of Part 9

180. This is an interpretation section for this Part of the Bill and explains that the terms parental responsibilities and parental rights have the same meaning as in Part 1 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.

Part 10 – Support for kinship care

Section 64 – Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

181. Subsections (1), (2), (3) and (3A) of section 64 provide that local authorities must make arrangements to ensure that kinship care assistance, which is assistance of such description as specified by the Scottish Ministers by order, is made available to those persons, living in its area specified in subsection (3) as: a person applying for, or considering applying for, a kinship care order in relation to an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years; an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years who is subject of a kinship care order; a person in whose favour a kinship care order in relation to an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years subsists; a child who is 16 years old where, immediately before attaining the age of 16, the child was the subject of a kinship care order and where the child is still eligible; a person who is a guardian by virtue of an appointment under section 7 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 of an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years (but this is subject to subsection (3A) which provides that this does not include a parent who is a guardian of an eligible child); and an eligible child who has a guardian by virtue of an appointment under section 7 of the 1995 Act.

182. Subsection (4) defines an “eligible child” as a child who the local authority considers to be at risk of becoming looked after, or who falls within such other description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

Section 65 – Orders which are kinship care orders

183. A kinship care order is not a new, or separate, form of court order. Subsection (1) of section 65 explains that for the purposes of this section a “kinship care order” is an order under section 11(1) of the 1995 Act which gives a qualifying person the right to have the child living with that person or to otherwise regulate the child’s residence; a residence order which has the effect of the child living with or predominately living with a qualifying person; or an order under section 11(1) of the 1995 Act appointing a qualifying person as a guardian of a child.

184. Subsection (2) provides that a “qualifying person” means a person who, at the time the order is made, is related to a child, is a friend or acquaintance of someone related to a child or who has another relationship to, or connection with, a child, as specified by order by the Scottish Ministers. An acquaintance is someone who is known slightly to the relative, where the relationship does not necessarily have the same depth or intimacy as a friendship, for example a neighbour. It will be for the sheriff to decide on a case by case basis whether to grant the order referred to in section 65(1) in the usual way for the order concerned.

185. Subsection (3) provides that a parent is not a “qualifying person” for the purposes of subsection (1). In subsection (2) where it refers to a person who is related to a child, subsection (4) provides that this includes someone married to or in a civil partnership with a person who is related to the child, or a person who is related to the child by half blood.

Section 66 – Kinship care assistance: further provision

186. Subsection (1) of section 66 provides that the kinship care assistance which the Scottish Ministers may specify in an order under section 64(1) includes: the provision of counselling, advice or information about any matter; financial support (or support in kind) of any description; and any service provided by a local authority on a subsidised basis.

187. Subsection (2) provides that the assistance specified by such an order may include assistance which a person was entitled to from, or being provided with by, a local authority, immediately prior to a person becoming entitled to assistance under section 64(1). This allows for a person to continue to receive assistance (which is of a description of assistance specified by Ministers by order under section 64(2)) which they received from a local authority prior to their becoming eligible.

188. Subsection (3) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, make provision about: when or how kinship care assistance is to be provided; when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child is within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 64(4) (at risk of becoming looked after or falling within such other description as the Scottish Ministers specify by order); when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 64(4); and such other matters about the provision of kinship care assistance specified in an order under section 64(1) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

189. Subsection (4) provides that an order under subsection (3)(d) may include provision about circumstances in which a local authority may provide kinship care assistance specified in an order under section 64(2) subject to conditions (including conditions as to payment for the assistance or the repayment of financial support) and consequences of such conditions not being met (including the recovery of any financial support provided).

Section 67 – Interpretation of Part 10

190. This is an interpretation section for this Part and provides that “kinship care assistance” has the meaning given by section 64(2) and that “parent” has the same meaning as it has in Part 1 of the 1995 Act.

Part 11 – Adoption register

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register

191. This section amends the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 by inserting sections 13A to 13F after section 13 of that Act.
Section 13A – Scotland’s Adoption Register

192. Subsection (1) provides that the Scottish Ministers must make arrangements for the establishment and maintenance of a register to be known as Scotland’s Adoption Register (“the Register”) for the purposes of facilitating adoption.

193. Subsection (2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, prescribe information relating to adoption which is, or types of information relating to adoption which are, to be included in the Register. This may include information relating to: children who adoption agencies consider should be placed for adoption; persons considered by adoption agencies as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption; matters relating to such children or persons which arise after information about them is included in the Register; or prospective adopters outwith Scotland. It provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, provide for how information is to be retained in the Register and make such further provision in relation to the Register as they consider appropriate.

194. Subsection (3) provides that the Register is not to be open to public inspection or search. The information on the Register cannot be accessed or searched by anyone other than the Scottish Ministers, or the Registration organisation on behalf of the Scottish Ministers.

195. Subsection (4) provides that information is to be kept in the Register in any form the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

Section 13B – Registration organisation

196. Subsection (1) provides that arrangements made by the Scottish Ministers under the previous section may, in particular: authorise an organisation to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register (other than functions of making subordinate legislation) and provide for payments to be made by the Scottish Ministers to an organisation so authorised. Section 13B(1A) requires Scottish Ministers to publish arrangements under section 13A(1) so far as they authorise an organisation to perform the functions of Scottish Ministers in respect of the Register.

197. Subsection (2) provides that an organisation authorised in pursuance of subsection (1) must perform functions delegated to it in accordance with any directions (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers.

Section 13C – Supply of information for the Register

198. Subsection (1) provides that an adoption agency must provide the Scottish Ministers with such information as may be prescribed in regulations made under section 13A(2) about children who it considers ought to be placed for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such children; and persons who it considers as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such persons. Subsection (3) provides that regulations made under section 13A(2) may: provide that information is to be provided to a registration organisation in pursuance of subsection (1) instead of to the Scottish Ministers; provide for how and by when that information is to be provided; prescribe circumstances in which an adoption agency, despite the requirement to provide information in subsection (1) is not to disclose information of the type prescribed for the purposes of that subsection.

Section 13D – Disclosure of information

199. Subsection (1) provides that it is an offence to disclose any information derived from the Register other than in accordance with the regulations under section 13A(2). Subsection (2)(a) provides that the regulations under section 13A(2) may authorise the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation to disclose information derived from the Register to an adoption agency for the purposes of helping it to find someone with whom it would be appropriate to place a child for whom the agency is acting, or to find a child who is appropriate for adoption by someone for whom the agency is acting. Subsection (2)(b) provides that regulations may authorise the Scottish Ministers or registration organisation to disclose this information: to any person (whether or not established or operating in Scotland) specified in the regulations, for any purpose connected with the performance of functions by the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation in pursuance of this Chapter; for the purpose of enabling the information to be entered in a register which is maintained in respect of England, Wales or Northern Ireland and which contains information about children who are suitable for adoption or prospective adopters, for the purpose of enabling or assisting that person to perform any functions which relate to adoption; for use for statistical or research purposes; and for any other purpose relating to adoption.

200. Subsection (3) provides that regulations made under section 13A(2) may set out terms and conditions on which information may be disclosed in pursuance of this section; specify steps to be taken by an adoption agency in respect of information received in pursuance of subsection (2); and authorise an adoption agency to disclose information derived from the Register for purposes relating to adoption.

201. Subsection (4) provides that subsection (1) (the offence provision) does not apply to a disclosure of information by or with the authority of the Scottish Ministers.

202. Subsection (5) provides that a person who is guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 3 months, or a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale, or both.

Section 13DA – Fees and other payments

203. This section provides that regulations made under section 13A(2) may prescribe: a fee which is to be paid by an adoption agency when providing information in pursuance of section 13C(1); a fee which is to be paid to the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation in respect of a disclosure of information made in pursuance of section 13D(2), (3)(c) or (4); and such other fees to be paid by adoption agencies, or payments to be made by them, in relation to the Register as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.
Section 13E – Use of an organisation as agency for payments

204. Subsection (1) provides that Scottish Ministers may by regulations authorise a registration organisation or any other person to act as agent for the payment or receipt of sums payable by adoption agencies to other adoption agencies and may require adoption agencies to pay or receive such sums through the organisation.

205. Subsection (2) provides that a registration organisation or other person authorised under subsection (1) is to perform the functions exercisable under section 13E(1) in accordance with any directions given by the Scottish Ministers.

Section 13F - Supplementary

206. Section 13F provides that nothing authorised or required to be done by virtue of Chapter 1A constitutes an offence under section 72(2) or 75(1) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. Section 72(2) of the 2007 Act provides it is an offence to make, agree or offer to make, receive or agree to receive, or attempt to obtain certain payments in relation to the adoption of a child. Section 75(1) of the 2007 Act provides that it is an offence to make arrangements for the adoption of a child or to place a child for adoption (this does not apply to adoption agencies).

Part 11A - School Closures

Section 68A – References to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010

207. Section 68A provides that references in Part 11A of the Bill to “the 2010 Act” are to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010.

Section 68B – Restriction on closure proposals

208. Section 68B inserts a new section 2A (restriction on closure proposals) after section 2 in the 2010 Act. Section 2A(3) provides that, following a decision not to implement a closure proposal, an education authority would not be able to publish a proposal paper under section 4(4) of the 2010 Act for the same school within 5 years (beginning with the day on which the decision not to implement a closure proposal is made) unless there had been a significant change in the school’s circumstances.

209. Subsection (2) of section 2A makes it clear what is meant by “a decision not to implement a closure proposal”, which is a decision taken by an education authority not to implement the proposal after it has published a consultation report on the proposal, or a decision by a School Closure Review Panel to refuse consent to the proposal.

Section 68C – Financial implications of closure proposals

210. Section 68C amends section 4 of the 2010 Act (proposal paper), adding a new subsection (2A) which requires education authorities, as part of the proposal paper prepared under that section, to provide information about the financial implications of a proposal, where the proposal paper relates to a school closure. This will ensure that school closure consultations provide financial information. Further detail on the type and level of financial information required to be provided by education authorities in their proposal paper can be set out in statutory guidance issued under section 19 of the 2010 Act.
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (SP Bill 27A)

Section 68D – Special provision for rural school closure proposals

211. Section 68D inserts a number of new sections into the 2010 Act (sections 11A, 12A and a substituted section 13) which impose additional requirements on education authorities in terms of the process to be followed for rural school closure proposals. It also makes consequential amendments to section 12 of the 2010 Act (Factors for rural closure proposals).

212. Subsection (1) of section 68D inserts a new section 11A (Presumption against rural school closure) into the 2010 Act. Section 11A(1) provides that section 11A only applies to closure proposals for rural schools (which are those designated as such under section 14 of the 2010 Act). Section 11A(2) prevents an education authority from making a decision to implement a closure proposal unless it has complied with the additional requirements that apply to rural schools in sections 12, 12A and 13, and having so complied, unless it is also satisfied that a closure proposal is the most appropriate response to the reasons for formulating the proposal (which it is required to identify under section 12A(2)(a)).

213. Subsection (2)(a) amends section 12 of the 2010 Act (Factors for rural school proposals). It repeals section 12(3)(a) of the 2010 Act, which provided for “any viable alternatives to the closure proposal” to be one of the factors to which an education authority must have special regard in proposing a rural school closure (new sections 12A and 13 to the 2010 Act make new provision requiring education authorities to consider alternatives to the closure proposal).

214. Subsections (2)(b) and (c) amend section 12(4) and (5) to provide that for the purpose of sections 12(2)(c)(ii) and 13(5)(b)(iii) and of sections 12(2)(c)(iii) and 13(5)(b)(iii), the effect on the community and the effect caused by any different travelling arrangements of any reasonable alternatives which an education authority identifies or which are identified by consultees in their written representations on a closure proposal, must be assessed by reference to the factors specified in sections 12(4) and (5). These sections require an education authority to assess the likely effect on the community and the likely effect caused by any different travelling arrangements, in relation to reasonable alternatives to the proposal identified before and during the consultation process.

215. Subsection (3) of section 68D inserts a new section 12A (Preliminary requirements in relation to rural school closure) into the 2010 Act. This new provision outlines preliminary steps that an education authority must take before it can publish a proposal paper for the closure of a rural school.

216. Section 12A(2) requires the education authority to identify its reasons for the closure proposal (12A(2)(a)) and consider whether there are any reasonable alternatives to the proposal which could respond to those reasons (12A(2)(b)). For the proposal and each and any alternatives identified, the education authority is required to assess the likely educational benefits, the likely effect on the local community and the likely effect of different travelling arrangements (12A(2)(c)). Section 12A(3) provides that reasonable alternatives to the closure proposal may be steps or actions that could be taken which would not result in the school or part of the school closing. However, they are not limited to this and could also include alternative steps or actions that could be taken which would result in the school or part of the school closing.

217. Section 12A(4) places a duty on the education authority not to publish a proposal paper unless, following the consideration required under section 12A(2), it considers that implementation of the proposal is the most appropriate response to the reasons for the proposal.

218. Subsection (4) of section 68D substitutes a new section 13 (additional consultation requirements) into the 2010 Act. The new section 13 imposes fuller and additional requirements on education authorities in consulting on a rural school closure proposal.

219. Section 13(2)(a) to (f) lists the additional information or explanations an education authority must include in a proposal paper for the closure of a rural school, over and above the information specified in section 4 of the 2010 Act. This requires the education authority to inform consultees of the reasons why the proposal is being made, the steps the education authority has taken (if any) to address those reasons (and if no such steps have been taken, why not), and any reasonable alternatives to the closure proposal identified by the authority, and it requires the authority to explain to the consultees their assessment under section 12A(2)(c) of the educational benefit, effect on the community and effect of different travelling arrangements that would result from the proposal and any alternatives identified, and to explain why the authority considered, in light of that assessment, that implementation of the proposal would be the most appropriate response to the reasons for the proposal.

220. Section 13(3) provides that for rural school closure proposals, the notice an education authority must give to relevant consultees under section 6(1) of the 2010 Act must additionally summarise the alternatives to the closure proposal identified in the proposal paper and to state that representations can be made on those alternatives and that representations can suggest other alternatives.

221. Section 13(4) provides that references to written representations in sections 8(4)(c), 9(4) and 10(2)(a) of the 2010 Act, also include written representations regarding the alternatives to the proposal set out in the consultation paper.

222. Section 13(5) imposes additional assessment requirements on an education authority in terms of the review it must carry out of the proposal under section 9(1) of the 2010 Act (the review which follows the authority’s receipt of HMIE’s report after public consultation on the proposal). It is required, for rural school closure proposals, that the authority must carry out a further assessment in relation to the educational benefit, community effect and effect on travelling arrangements of the proposal and reasonable alternatives set out in the proposal paper following the receipt of the HMIE report, and that it must also carry out an assessment of any reasonable alternatives suggested by consultees in their written representations (section 13(5)(a) and (b)).

223. Section 13(6) provides that the consultation report the authority prepares under section 9(2) of the 2010 Act must additionally explain the assessments it makes under section 13(5)(a) and (b) and how these differ (if at all) from the authority’s assessment carried out before consultation (under section 12A(2)(c)).

224. Subsection (5) of section 68D amends section 1 of the 2010 Act (overview of key requirements), inserting a new subsection (4A) which makes it clear that in the case of rural school closure proposals, the key requirements an education authority must comply with in formulating a closure proposal in relation to a rural school include complying with the preliminary and additional requirements set out in new sections 12A and 13.

Section 68E – Call-in of closure proposals

225. Section 68E amends the provisions in the 2010 Act regarding call-in and determination of school closure proposals. It inserts new sections 17A, 17B, 17C and 17D and schedule 2A into the 2010 Act which make new provision for a proposal which has been called-in by the Scottish Ministers under section 15 of the Act to be referred to the Convener of School Closure Review Panels for determination by a Panel. There is also detailed provision in relation to the appointment and role and functions of the Convener and the School Closure Review Panels.

226. Subsection (1)(a) amends section 15(3), 15(4) and 15(6) of the 2010 Act to amend the period for the Scottish Ministers to issue a call-in notice to the education authority. This is amended from 6 weeks to 8 weeks and has the effect of giving the Scottish Ministers an additional 2 weeks to consider whether to issue a call-in notice.

227. Subsection (1)(b) repeals section 15(5) of the 2010 Act, which provided that a call-in notice issued by the Scottish Ministers under section 15(3) has the effect of remitting the closure proposal to the Scottish Ministers. New section 17A to the 2010 Act, introduced by subsection (4), makes new provision for closure proposals which have been called-in by the Scottish Ministers.

228. Subsection (2) repeals section 16 of the 2010 Act, which provided for the Scottish Ministers to determine closure proposals which had been called-in. Subsection (3)(a) makes a consequential repeal of section 17(3)(b) of the 2010 Act which refers to the Scottish Ministers’ consideration of consent under section 16(2) which is repealed by subsection (2)(a).

229. Subsection (3)(b) adds a new subsection (3A) following section 17(3) of the 2010 Act. This places a duty on HMIE (a reference to HMIE is defined under section 8(7) of the 2010 Act as a reference to Her Majesty’s Inspectors) to provide the Scottish Ministers with any advice that they reasonably require in considering whether to issue a call-in notice. This advice is to concern the educational aspects of a closure proposal.

230. Subsection (4) inserts 4 new sections into the 2010 Act, sections 17A, 17B, 17C and 17D.

231. New section 17A (referral to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels) of the 2010 Act provides that a school closure proposal which has been called-in by the Scottish Ministers must be referred to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels. Section
17A(3) provides that the Convener has a period of 7 days to constitute a School Closure Review Panel which is to consider the case that has been referred to the Convener.

232. Section 17A(4) prevents an education authority from implementing a closure proposal which has been referred to the Convener unless the School Closure Review Panel reviewing the proposal grants consent to it and either the period during which that decision may be appealed to the sheriff has expired or an appeal has been abandoned or the sheriff has confirmed the Panel’s decision to consent to the proposal. Section 17A(5) introduces a new schedule 2A to the 2010 Act which makes further provision about the Convener and School Closure Review Panels including provision for the appointment of the Convener and panel members.

233. Section 17A(6) defines the Convener and a School Closure Review Panel.

234. New section 17B (review by Panel) of the 2010 Act provides for the review that a School Closure Review Panel is required to carry out when it is constituted under section 17A(3). Section 17B(1) requires the Panel to consider both: whether the education authority has failed to comply with the requirements imposed on the authority under the 2010 Act and whether the education authority failed to take proper account of a material consideration relevant to its decision. These are the same issues which the Scottish Ministers are required to consider under section 17(2) of the 2010 Act in considering whether to call-in a closure proposal (although Ministers only have to consider if the authority may have failed to comply with the requirements imposed on the authority under the 2010 Act or to take proper account of a material consideration).

235. New sections 17B(2), (3) and (4) relate to providing information and advice that a School Closure Review Panel reasonably requires in conducting its review of closure proposal. Section 17B(2) places a duty on the education authority to provide information to the Panel. Section 17B(3) places a duty on Her Majesty's Inspectors of Education (HMIE) to provide a Panel with advice that it reasonably requires in conducting its review of closure proposal. This advice is concerning the educational aspects of a closure proposal. Section 17B(4) provides a power for a School Closure Review Panel to request information or advice from any other person for the purpose of its review. This could include experts on issues that are relevant to the proposals, or those who made representations regarding the proposal.

236. New section 17B(5) provides a power for the Scottish Ministers to make provision in regulations as to the procedures to be followed by a School Closure Review Panel in carrying out a review under section 17B(1). This power, which is subject to the negative procedure, ensures that Ministers can specify procedures for the Panels to follow in carrying out their review of a school closure proposal once called-in by Ministers.

237. New section 17C(1) (decision following review) sets out the decisions available to a School Closure Review Panel following a review of a school closure proposal. Section 17C(2) requires the Panel to give reasons for its decision. In addition to the options currently available to Ministers under section 16 of the 2010 Act (which is repealed by section 68E(2)) - to consent, consent with conditions or refuse consent to a school closure proposal - the Panel has the option to refuse consent to the proposal and remit it back to the education authority to reconsider and make a fresh decision as to implementation (section 17C(1)(b)).
238. Section 17C(3) provides that in the case of remitting the proposal back to the authority, the Panel may specify which steps under the 2010 Act must be taken again before the authority can take a fresh decision on the proposal. The grounds on which a Panel may refuse consent to a proposal or to remit a proposal back to the education authority are set out in 17C(4). Section 17C(4) also provides that the Panel may refuse to consent to a proposal for either or both of the grounds or reasons set out in paragraphs (a) or (b), and this is irrespective of the grounds on which Ministers called the proposal in.

239. Sections 17C(5) and (6) provide time limits for a Panel to make its decision. A Panel is required to make a decision within 8 weeks of being constituted, unless it has issued a notice that a further period is required and, in such a case, this further period is to be no longer than 16 weeks in total from when the Panel was constituted.

240. Section 17C(8) provides that any conditions set by a Panel as part of its consent to a proposal are binding on an education authority.

241. New section 17D (appeal against decision of the Panel) provides that a decision of a School Closure Review Panel may be appealed to the sheriff by the education authority or a relevant consultee in relation to the closure proposal. An appeal can only be made on a point of law, must be made by summary application and must be made within 14 days of the Panel’s decision. Section 17D(3) provides that the sheriff may confirm the Panel’s decision or quash the decision and refer the matter back to the Panel, and section 17D(4) provides that this decision by the sheriff is final and is not subject to further appeal.

242. Subsection (5) of section 68E inserts a new schedule 2A (School Closure Review Panels) into the 2010 Act. This is introduced by the new section 17A of the 2010 Act. Schedule 2A makes detailed provision for the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels and those Panels.

243. Schedule 2A, paragraph 1 makes provision for the establishment of the office of the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels, for the appointment by the Scottish Ministers of a person to hold that office, and for the status of the office-holder. It also provides that the Convener may delegate his or her functions, and for Ministers to appoint a person to act as Convener if the office is vacant or the office holder is unable to perform their functions for whatever reason. Paragraph 1(9) provides a regulation making power that allows Ministers to make provision for or about eligibility for and disqualification from appointment, tenure and removal from office and about the payment of salary etc. to the Convener, and these regulations are subject to negative procedure.

244. Schedule 2A, paragraph 2 makes provision for the appointment of persons eligible to serve as members of the School Closure Review Panel, for the appointment of those persons to individual Panels, for the Convener to make arrangements to train those persons appointed and for a regulation making power to allow Ministers to make provision about eligibility for and disqualification from appointment, tenure, removal from office, payment of expenses and fees etc. to Panel members.
Schedule 2A, paragraph 3 allows Ministers to provide such property, staff and services to the Convener as they think necessary or expedient in connection with the exercise of the Convener’s functions (including the payment of grants to allow the Convener to employ staff etc.) and requires the Convener to provide a Panel with such staff and services the Convener thinks necessary or expedient in connection with the exercise of the Panel’s functions.

Schedule 2A, paragraphs 4 and 5 allow Ministers to issue directions to the Convener as to the exercise of the Convener’s functions and require the Convener to prepare an annual report on the exercise of their functions and of the Panel’s functions during the year and for this to be submitted to Ministers.

Subsections (6), (7), (8) and (9) to section 68E make consequential and technical amendments to various other provisions of the 2010 Act, including requiring the Convener and School Closure Review Panels to have regard to guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers.

Subsections (10), (11) and (12) to section 68E amend the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman Act 2002, the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002 and the Public Appointments and Public Bodies etc. (Scotland) Act 2003 to add the Convener to the list of authorities which are respectively subject to investigation by the Ombudsman, subject to Freedom of Information requests and whose appointments are subject to the Public Appointments Code of Practice.

Part 12 – Children’s Hearings

Section 68F – Safeguarders: exceptions to duty to prepare report on appointment

The Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 was introduced to Parliament in February 2010 and was enacted on 6 January 2011. The 2011 Act was commenced on 24 June 2013. The Act aims to strengthen and modernise the children's hearings system and brings into one place most of the children’s hearings related legislation. Section 68F amends section 33 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (functions of safeguarder). Section 33(1) of the 2011 Act requires any safeguarder appointed by a children’s hearing by virtue of section 30, on appointment, to prepare a report for the hearing. Following amendment, section 33 of the 2011 Act will provide that a report does not require to be prepared by a safeguarder if the children’s hearing is arranged under any of the following sections of the 2011 Act: section 45 (review by children's hearing where child in place of safety), section 46 (review by children's hearing where order prevents removal of child), section 50 (children’s hearing to provide advice to sheriff in relation to application), section 96 (children’s hearing to consider need for further interim compulsory supervision order), section 126 (review of contact direction), or section 158 (compulsory supervision order: suspension pending appeal).

Section 68G – Maximum period of child protection order

Section 68G amends section 54 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (termination of child protection order after maximum of 8 working days). Following amendment, section 54 of the 2011 Act will provide that if, following the making of a child protection order under section 37 of the 2011 Act, a children’s hearing does not take place within the period of 8 working days beginning on the day after the day on which a child is removed... under the child protection order to a place of safety or within the period of 8 working days beginning on the day after the day on which the order was made, the child protection order automatically terminates.

Section 68H – Power to determine that deeming of person as relevant person to end

251. Section 68H amends section 79 (referral of certain matters for pre-hearing determination) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 and adds a new section 81A into the 2011 Act. Following amendment, the 2011 Act will provide for a pre-hearing panel to determine whether an individual previously deemed for the purposes of the 2011 Act to be a “relevant person” in relation to a child should continue to be deemed a “relevant person” in relation to the child. The amendments at paragraph 10(2), (3) and (7) of schedule 4 are consequential on these substantive provisions. The amendment to section 160 of the 2011 Act at paragraph 10(8) of schedule 4 makes provision for appeal to the sheriff against a determination of the pre-hearing panel.

Section 68I – Grounds hearing: non-acceptance of facts supporting ground

252. Section 68I amends section 90 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (grounds to be put to child and relevant person). Following amendment, section 90(1)(a) requires the chairing member of a children’s hearing arranged under section 69(2) or 95(2) of the 2011 Act (known as the “grounds hearing”) to explain to the child and each relevant person each ground for referral to the children’s hearing (known as a “section 67 ground”) as set out in the statement of grounds prepared by the Principal Reporter under section 89 of the 2011 Act and all the facts supporting each section 67 ground set out in the statement of grounds. Existing section 90(1)(b) requires the chairing member to ask the child and each relevant person whether they accept that each section 67 ground applies in relation to the child. New section 90(1A) requires the chairing member to ask the child and each relevant person whether, in relation to each section 67 ground that that person accepts, each of the supporting facts is also accepted. New section 90(1B) provides that where the child or relevant person does not accept all of the supporting facts in relation to a section 67 ground which they have accepted, the ground is taken, for the purposes of the 2011 Act, to be accepted only if the grounds hearing considers that the person has accepted sufficient of the supporting facts to support the conclusion that the ground applies in relation to the child and it is appropriate to proceed in relation to the ground on the basis only of those supporting facts which are accepted. New section 90(1C) provides that where a ground is taken to be accepted by virtue of section 90(1B), the grounds hearing is required to amend the statement of grounds to delete any supporting facts which are not accepted. The amendments at paragraph 10(4), (5), (6) and (9) of schedule 4 are consequential on these substantive amendments.

Section 68J – Failure of child to attend grounds hearing: power to make interim order

253. Section 68J amends section 95 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (child fails to attend grounds hearing). Following amendment, new section 95(3) and (4) will give power to a children’s hearing arranged under section 69(2) or 95(2) (known as a “grounds hearing”) to make an interim compulsory supervision order (ICSO) where a child fails to attend that hearing and was not excused from attending the hearing and the hearing, as a result, has required the Principal Reporter to arrange another grounds hearing. New section 95(4) provides that this power is available if the hearing considers that the nature of the child’s circumstances is such that for their protection, guidance, treatment or control it is necessary that an ICSO be made as a matter of urgency. New section 95(5) provides that an ICSO made under section 95(4) may not include a requirement that the implementation authority arrange a specified medical or other examination of the child.

Section 68K – Limit on number of further interim compulsory supervision orders

254. Section 68K amends section 96 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 so that a children’s hearing may only make a maximum of 3 interim compulsory supervision orders (ICSOs) in respect of a child in relation to one reference to the Hearing. If a further ICSO is required beyond that, an application must be made to the sheriff under section 98 of the 2011 Act.

Section 69 – Area support teams: establishment

255. Section 69 amends paragraphs 12 and 13 of schedule 1 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (the 2011 Act). Schedule 1 of the 2011 Act makes further provision about the National Convener of Children’s Hearings Scotland (CHS) and about CHS itself – such as provision relating to appointment and functions, etc. Paragraph 12 of the schedule provides for the establishment and membership of area support teams (ASTs) which are to carry out for their areas, the selection of children’s hearing members and paragraph 13 applies when the National Convener first establishes an AST under paragraph 12 and is a transitional provision dealing with the transfer of members from a Children’s Panel Advisory Committee to an AST. Paragraph 14 makes provision for the functions of ASTs.

256. Section 69(2)(a) provides that the National Convener must keep the designation of areas under paragraph 12(1) under review and that the National Convener may revoke or make a new designation at any time. The National Convener will be required to ensure, when revoking or making new designations, that each local authority will fall within a designated area under paragraph 12(1). Where a designation is revoked, this will have the effect of dissolving the area support team that was established as a consequence of the designation. New paragraph 12(3C) requires the National Convener to consult with the affected local authority before revoking or making a designation. This means that the National Convener must ensure that when exercising the power to make and revoke designations of ASTs, there will always be an AST in relation to each local authority area and therefore that there will not be a time when a local authority no longer has an AST as a result of a revocation.

257. New paragraph 12(3D) provides that in sub-paragraph 3C “affected local authority” means in the case of making a designation the local authority whose area falls with the area proposed to be designated and, in the case of a revocation of a designation, each constituent local authority for the area support team established as a consequence of the designation.

258. On making or revoking a designation under paragraph 12(1) and 12(3B), the National Convener must notify each affected constituent local authority.
259. Section 69(2)(b) amends paragraph 13 of schedule 1 to the 2011 Act so that paragraph 13 applies where the National Convener establishes an area support team under paragraph 12(1) and where the area of the area support team consists of or includes a new area.

260. Paragraph 13(b)(iv) amends paragraph 13(7) to provide that “new area” means an area which has never previously been the area (or part of the area) of an area support team.

261. Section 69(3) provides that an area support team established before this section comes into force continues in existence as if it were established under paragraph 12(1) as amended by this section.

Section 70 – Area support teams: administrative support by local authorities

262. This section amends paragraph 14 of schedule 1 to the 2011 Act to provide that each constituent local authority (of an area support team, as established by the National Convener in terms of schedule 1, paragraph 12 of the 2011 Act) must provide an area support team with such administrative support as the National Convener considers appropriate. “Administrative support” is defined as staff, property or other services which the National Convener considers are required to facilitate the carrying out by an area support team of its functions.

Part 12A – Other reforms

Detention of children in secure accommodation

Section 71 – Appeal against detention of child in secure accommodation

263. This section amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (the CPSA) to insert a new provision, section 44A. This new section provides that a child or relevant person(s) in relation to the child, or the child and one or more relevant persons jointly or 2 or more relevant persons jointly, may appeal to the sheriff against a local authority decision to detain the child in secure accommodation following an order having been made to detain the child in residential accommodation under section 44 of the CPSA. New section 44A(1B) provides that an appeal hearing under this new section cannot be held in open court. New section 44A(2) provides that the sheriff may either confirm the decision to detain the child in secure accommodation or quash the decision and direct the local authority to move the child to residential accommodation which is not secure accommodation instead.

264. New section 44A(3) allows the Scottish Ministers by regulations to make further provisions about appeals. These regulations, which are subject to affirmative procedure, may specify the period within which appeals should be made, make provision about the hearing of evidence during an appeal and provide for appeals to the sheriff principal and Court of Session against the determination of an appeal.

265. “Relevant person” is defined as any person who is a relevant person in relation to the child for the purposes of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, including any person who is deemed to be a relevant person in relation to the child by virtue of sections 81(3), 160(4)(b) or 164(6) of the 2011 Act.
266. This new procedure reflects appeal rights in the 2011 Act. Section 151 of that Act sets out the ways in which secure accommodation authorisations are implemented where a children’s hearing makes a relevant order or warrant (including a compulsory supervision order) in relation to a child and section 162 of that Act provides for an appeal to the sheriff against a decision to implement a secure accommodation authorisation, including by one or more relevant persons in relation to a child. Section 81(4) of the 2011 Act provides that where the children’s hearing deems the individual to be a relevant person, they are to be treated as relevant persons for the purposes of Part 15 (which includes the appeal to the sheriff against secure accommodation authorisation implementation decisions) and section 81(3) provides that the children’s hearing must deem the individual to be a relevant person if it considers that the individual has or has recently had a significant involvement in the upbringing of the child.

267. Secure accommodation in this section has the meaning assigned to it in Part II of the 1995 Act.

Children’s legal aid

Section 71A – Power of Scottish Ministers to modify circumstances in which children’s legal aid to be made available

268. This section inserts a new section 28LA into the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 (“the 1986 Act”). Section 28L of the 1986 Act allows Scottish Ministers to make children’s legal aid available by regulations for specified children’s hearings under the 2011 Act to specified persons. The purpose of section 28LA is to allow Scottish Ministers to make similar regulations in respect of court proceedings under the 2011 Act. Those regulations would be subject to affirmative procedure.

269. The same tests would apply to similar circumstances whether children’s legal aid is provided by means of section 28LA or another section of the Act. In relation to court proceedings, the eligibility tests for a person (other than a child) are whether it is reasonable and whether undue hardship would occur if state-funded representation is not provided. In relation to court proceedings where the person is a child, the eligibility tests are reasonableness, undue hardship, and whether it is in the best interests of that child for children’s legal aid to be made available. If the court proceedings are an appeal, the person (whether or not they are a child) must satisfy an additional test of substantial grounds for making or responding to that appeal.

Licensing of child performances

Section 71B – Extension of licensing of child performances to children under 14

270. This section repeals section 38 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963 (“the 1963 Act”). It has the effect of removing restrictions in that section which limit children under the age of 14 from being granted a performance licence under section 37 of the 1963 Act, except where the child is dancing in a ballet or acting and the part can only be taken by a child of that age, or where the performance is wholly or mainly musical or consists only of opera and ballet.

Wellbeing

Section 73 – Consideration of wellbeing in exercising certain functions

271. This section inserts text after section 23 of the 1995 Act to create a new section 23A.
272. Subsection (1) of the new section 23A applies where a local authority is exercising a function under or by the virtue of section 17, 22 or 26A of the 1995 Act.

273. Subsection (2) provides that the local authority must have regard to the general principle that their functions in relation to children and young people should be exercised in a way which is designed to promote, safeguard and support their wellbeing.

274. Subsection (3) provides that for the purposes of the previous subsection the local authority is to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person by referring to the extent to which the wellbeing indicators in section 74(2) are or would be satisfied in relation to them.

275. Subsection (4) provides that a local authority is to have regard to the guidance issued under section 74(3) of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 when assessing the wellbeing of the child or young person.

276. Subsection (5) defines “the 2014 Act” as the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

Part 13 - General

Section 74 – Assessment of wellbeing

277. Subsection (1) applies where a person is to assess whether the wellbeing of a child or young person is being, or would be, promoted, safeguarded, supported, or adversely affected.

278. Subsection (2) provides that the person should assess the wellbeing of the child or young person by reference to the extent to which the child or young person would be safe, healthy, achieving, nurtured, active, respected, responsible and included.

279. Subsection (3) provides that the Scottish Ministers must issue guidance on how the wellbeing indicators listed in subsection (2) are to be used to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person.

280. Subsections (4) and (5) provide that the Scottish Ministers must consult with local authorities, health boards and any other persons they think appropriate before a person issues or revises guidance and that, in measuring the wellbeing of a child or young person, they must have regard to the guidance issued in subsection (3).

281. Subsections (6) and (7) provide that Scottish Ministers can, by order, modify the list of wellbeing indicators in subsection (2) and before making an order must consult with each local authority, health board and any other people they think are appropriate.

Section 76 – Modification of enactments

282. This section introduces schedule 4 which contains minor amendments to enactments and otherwise modifies enactments for the purposes of or in consequence of this Act.
Section 77 – Subordinate legislation

283. Subsection (1) provides that any power of the Scottish Ministers to make an order or regulations includes powers to make different provision for different purposes and such supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate.

284. Subsection (2) states that an order made under the following sections is subject to the affirmative procedure – sections 3(2), 7(5), 30(2), 35(5), 38(6), 43(2)(c)(ii), 44(2), 47(2), 50(2), 51(2)(b), 52(2), 61(2)(b), 64(4)(b) and 74(6).

285. Subsection (3) provides that an order made under section 78 containing provisions which add to, replace or omit any part of the text of this or any other Act is subject to affirmative procedure.

286. Subsection (4) provides that other orders made under this Act, and any regulations made under this Act, are subject to negative procedure.

287. Subsection (5) provides that this section does not apply to an order made under section 79(2).

Section 77A – Guidance and directions

288. This section provides that any guidance or directions issued by the Scottish Ministers in exercise of their powers under the Act can be issued either generally or for particular purposes and different guidance or directions can be issued to different persons or otherwise for different purposes. Subsection (2) require the Scottish Ministers to publish (in a manner they consider appropriate) any guidance or directions issued by them under the Act. Subsection (3) makes clear that the requirement to publish includes a requirement to publish any revised guidance and revised or revoked directions.

Section 78 – Ancillary provision

289. This section allows the Scottish Ministers, by order, to make such supplementary, incidental or consequential provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with or for the purposes of giving full effect to, any provision made by, or by virtue of, this Act. Such an order may also make such transitional, transitory or savings provision as Scottish Ministers consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of any provision.

Section 79 – Commencement

290. This section provides for this Part (except for sections 74, 75 and 76) to come into force on the day after Royal Assent and for the other provisions of the Act to be commenced by order made by the Scottish Ministers. Such an order may include transitional, transitory or savings provision.
Section 80 – Short title

291. This section states the short title of the Act as being the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

Schedule 1 – Authorities to which section 2 applies

292. Schedule 1 lists the authorities to which the duty in section 2 of the Act (duties of public authorities in relation to the UNCRC) applies. Schedule 1 is introduced by section 3. The persons included in this schedule are those persons who it is considered are likely to, in the course of their function, engage directly with children and young people, and as such should be taking steps to secure better or further effect, within the area of its responsibility, of the UNCRC requirements.

Schedule 2 – Relevant authorities

293. Schedule 2 lists relevant authorities for the purposes of Part 4 (named persons) of the Act and is introduced by section 30. The persons included in this schedule are those persons who it is considered are likely to, in the course of their function, engage directly with children, families and adults.

Schedule 2A – Persons listed for the purposes of section 38

294. Schedule 2A lists the persons who must comply with any reasonable request made of them to provide a person exercising child's plan functions under Part 5 with information, advice or assistance for that purpose. The persons included in this schedule are those persons who it is considered are likely to, in the course of their functions, engage directly with children, families and adults.

Schedule 3 – Corporate parents

295. Schedule 3 lists the persons who are “corporate parents” for the purposes of Part 7 (corporate parenting) of the Act and is introduced by section 50. The persons included in this schedule are those bodies who it is considered are likely to, in the course of exercising their functions, engage directly with looked after children.

Schedule 4 – Modification of enactments

296. Schedule 4 makes minor amendments to enactments and otherwise modifies enactments for the purposes of or in consequence of this Act. Schedule 4 is introduced by section 76.

297. Paragraph 1 amends the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 (the 1968 Act). Section 5(1) of the 1968 Act provides that local authorities shall perform their functions under certain enactments under the general guidance of the Scottish Ministers. Further, section 5(1A) enables the Scottish Ministers to issue directions to local authorities (either individually or collectively) as to the manner in which they are to exercise their functions under the enactments mentioned in subsection (1B); and a local authority is required to comply with any direction made.
298. Paragraph 1(2)(a)(i) and (ii) of schedule 4 amend section 5 of the 1968 Act so as to bring the early learning and childcare provisions and the kinship care order and counselling services provisions within the ambit of section 5(1) of the 1968 Act; the effect will be that local authorities must perform their functions in relation to early learning and childcare in so far as they apply to children falling within section 43(3)(a) of the Act (that is looked after 2 year olds), and in relation to the provision of support to kinship carers and the provision of counselling services to those eligible to receive it under the general guidance of the Scottish Ministers. Paragraph 1(b) amends section 5(1B) of the 1968 Act so as to include the provisions on early learning and childcare in so far as they relate to looked after 2 year olds within subsection (1B) of the 1968 Act: the effect being that the Scottish Ministers will be able to issue directions to local authorities as to the manner in which they exercise their functions in relation to early learning and childcare for looked after 2 year olds. Paragraph 1(c) inserts a definition of looked after children into section 5 of the 1968 Act.

299. Paragraph 2 amends the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 (the 1980 Act) in consequence of the provisions on early learning and childcare in Part 6 of the Act. Paragraph 2(2)(a) amends section 1(1A) of the 1980 Act so as to provide that the duty to provide adequate and effective provision of school education conferred on education authorities under section 1(1) of the 1980 Act, in relation to children who are under school age, is to be exercisable only to the extent required by section 43(1). Under the current law, the duty to provide adequate and effective school education in relation to children who are under school age is exercisable only in respect of children described in an order made under subsection (1A) of section 1 of the 1980 Act.

300. Paragraph 2(2)(b) removes subsections (1B) and (4A) from section 1 of the 1980 Act; those provisions set out that an order made under subsection (1A) could set out the amount of school education which children described in the order are to be provided with (subsection (1B)) and that such an order was subject to negative procedure (subsection (4A)).

301. Section 1(5)(a)(i) of the 1980 Act defines school education in relation to pupils who are under school age. Paragraph 2(2)(c) of schedule 4 replaces that definition with the concept of early learning and childcare which has the meaning given in Part 6 of the Act (see the definition of “early learning and childcare” inserted into section 135 of the 1980 Act by paragraph 2(3)(a) of schedule 4).

302. Paragraph 2(3) amends section 135 of the 1980 Act which is an interpretation section. Paragraph 2(3)(a) inserts a definition of “early learning and childcare” which has the same meaning as in Part 6. Paragraph 2(3)(b) substitutes the definitions of “nursery school” and “nursery classes” and replaces the current definition (which gives them the same meaning in section 1(5)(a)(i) of the 1980 Act) with a definition which states that they are schools and classes which provide early learning and childcare.

303. Paragraph 2A amends the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986. Specifically, it amends sections 28F(1)(b) to provide that children’s legal aid is available in relation to the changes made by section 68H of this Act, and it amends section 37(2) of the 1986 Act to provide that affirmative procedure applies to the powers of Scottish Ministers under the new section 28LA of the 1986 Act (inserted by section 71A of this Act).
Paragraph 3 amends the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 (the 1995 Act). Paragraph 3(2) repeals section 19 (local authority plans for services for children) of the 1995 Act in consequence of the provisions in Part 3 of the Bill relating to Children’s Services Planning. Paragraph 3(3) amends section 20 (publication of information about services for children) of the 1995 Act to substitute a new subsection (2) which defines “relevant services” for the purposes of that section which means services provided by a local authority under or by virtue of Part II of the 1995 Act, the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, Part 9 or 10 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 or any of the enactments mentioned in section 5(1B)(a) to (n), (r) or (t) of the 1968 Act. A further connected amendment is made in paragraphs 4 and 7 of schedule 4 and is explained below.

Paragraph 3(4) amends section 44 of the 1995 Act to prevent a person publishing information which would identify a child, their address or school only in respect of proceedings before a sheriff on an application for an exclusion order under section 76(1) of the 1995 Act. This is connected to the amendment made in paragraph 10 of schedule 4 which is explained below.

Paragraph 4 makes minor drafting amendments to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

Paragraph 4A repeals paragraph 11 of section 37 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1996 in consequence of the repeal of section 38 of the Children & Young Persons Act 1963 which is achieved through section 71B of this Bill.

Paragraph 5 amends the Standards in Scotland’s Schools Act 2000 (the 2000 Act) in consequence of the provisions on early learning and childcare in Part 6 of the Act. Section 34 of the 2000 Act contains a power for the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance to education authorities as respects the discharge of their functions under the 1980 Act and education authorities must in discharging those functions have regard to such guidance. Paragraph 4(a) and (b) of schedule 4 amend section 34 to enable guidance to be issued by the Scottish Ministers to local authorities about their functions in relation to the provision of early learning and childcare under Part 6 of the Act.

Paragraph 6 amends section 73(2)(a) of the Regulation of Care (Scotland) Act 2001 in consequence of the provision made at 60 of the Act relating to the provision of aftercare to young people. Section 73(2) is a power for the Scottish Ministers to make regulations to specify the manner in which assistance may be provided under subsections (1) and (2) of section 29 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. Section 73(2)(a) is amended so that this power may be exercised in relation to assistance provided under new subsections (5A)and (5B) which are inserted by section 60 of the Act.

Paragraph 7 amends the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 so as to make a change to the definition of “relevant services” consequential on the repeal of section 19 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 by paragraph 3(2) of schedule 4 explained above.

Paragraph 8 amends the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 (the 2004 Act) in consequence of the provisions on early learning and childcare in Part 6 of the Act. Paragraph 6(2), (3) and (4)(a) amends sections 1(3), 5(3)(a) and 29(1) of the 2004 Act respectively so as to replace the concept of "prescribed pre-school child" (as under current law such children are prescribed under an order section 1(1A) and (1C) of the 1980 Act) with the concept of "eligible pre-school child" as defined in section 43(2) of the Act. Paragraph 8(4)(b) of schedule 4 removes the definition of "prescribed pre-school child" in consequence of the other amendments made by paragraph 8. It should be noted that an “eligible pre-school child” for the purposes of the early learning and childcare provisions in Part 6 of the Act will fall squarely within the definition of “pre-school child” in the 2000 Act and other enactments which refer to that concept.

312. Paragraph 9 amends the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 to provide that any orders or regulations made under section 13A(2) or 13E(1) respectively, are not to be made unless a draft of the instrument has been laid before and approved by resolution of the Scottish Parliament (affirmative procedure instruments).

313. Paragraph 10 amends sections 80(1), 81, 142 and 160 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 in consequence of the changes made by section 68H (power to determine that deeming of person as relevant person to end) of this Bill. It also amends sections 94(3), 105, 106 and 202(1) of the 2011 Act in consequence of the changes made by section 68I (grounds hearing: non-acceptance of facts supporting ground) of this Bill. Further, it amends schedule 6 (repeals) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (the 2011 Act) to omit the repeal of section 44 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 (prohibition of publication of proceedings at children’s hearing) from the list of repealed provisions in that Act. Section 44, whilst broadly replaced by provision made at section 182 of the 2011 Act, requires to be retained in relation to proceedings for exclusion orders under section 76(1) of the 1995 Act. Paragraph 3(4) of schedule 4 makes amendments to section 44 of the 1995 Act to limit its effect in this regard.

CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL
[AS AMENDED AT STAGE 2]

SUPPLEMENTARY FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. As required under Rule 9.7.8B of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, this Supplementary Financial Memorandum is published to accompany the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 17 April 2013) as amended at Stage 2.

2. This Memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government. It does not form part of the Bill and has not been endorsed by the Parliament. It should be read in conjunction with the Financial Memorandum on the Bill as introduced.

3. This Supplementary Financial Memorandum includes the financial impact of Stage 2 amendments. The majority of the amendments do not significantly affect the assumptions in the original Financial Memorandum. This document, therefore, only addresses those Stage 2 amendments with anticipated or apparently potential cost implications.

4. The new costs in the Supplementary Financial Memorandum have resulted in revised total costs for the Bill as a whole and for the different categories of body bearing the costs, and these are set out in the tables below. As with the original Financial Memorandum, the period covered by the supplementary Financial Memorandum is up to 2019-20.

NAMED PERSON

5. The duties relating to the named person are being placed on local authorities, health boards and the bodies which run independent and grant-aided schools. However, following an amendment at Stage 2, section 21(6) now places a duty on Scottish Ministers to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service for children held in legal custody or subject to temporary release from custody. In practice, this will be achieved via the Scottish Prison Service, and there is anticipated to be minimal associated costs. The provision will be required for a very small number of children each year and the role essentially formalises some of the good practice which the Scottish Prison Service has already developed for children and young people in custody. Scottish Prison Service managers have been fully engaged in the process of identifying their role in these circumstances, and they are content that any additional costs can be met within existing budgets.

EARLY LEARNING AND CHILDCARE

6. While the power in section 43(2)(c)(ii) of the Bill to extend eligibility has not been amended, the stated intentions of how the power will be used have changed since the original Financial Memorandum. Local authorities will be required to provide 600 hours of early learning and childcare to any 2-year old who is defined as living in a workless household from August 2014, with further extension to all 2-year olds who qualify for free school meals under the current passported benefits eligibility criteria from August 2015. This equates to around an additional 8,400 2-year olds from August 2014, rising to approximately 15,400 from August 2015.

7. The main costs of these Bill provisions are for expanding the availability of 600 hours of early learning and childcare to additional 2-year old children, specifically:
   - staff costs;
   - operational costs;
   - support service costs;
   - partner provider uprating; and
• special education/additional support costs.

8. The costs will fall wholly on local authorities. These have been estimated by applying a similar methodology to that used in the original Financial Memorandum, for 2-, 3- and 4-year olds, along with the estimated costs of delivering new models. Provision costs to these 2-year olds are different from previous costs, allowing some adjustment to reflect a degree of flexibility to provide more individualised approaches, given the needs of these vulnerable children. The costs are different from what would be offered to a “universal” 2-year old not deemed “vulnerable”.

9. Estimated costs are based on:
   • terms 1 and 2 of the academic year 2014-15 covering the period August 2014 to April 2015;
   • costs in 2015-16 include continuity of offer for those children whose entitlement began in 2014-15, delivery of Term 3 to that cohort of children, and the increase in eligibility from August 2015;
   • 2016-17 costs reflect the full 12-month provision to the widened group of 2-year olds;
   • cost totals in 2017-18 take forward the cost estimate for the year before and apply growth from the population projection. Thus, the cost in 2017-18 is 1% higher than in 2016-17; and
   • the revenue costs include staff costs (provided by COSLA and adjusted for higher staff:child ratios for 2-year olds), operational costs, support service costs, additional support needs costs and the partner provider uprating for inflation.

10. The main costs arising from these provisions will be staff costs associated with the additional staff required to deliver the expansion in eligibility, based on higher staff:child ratios for 2-year olds (1:5). The additional staff costs associated with a range of patterns of delivery have been estimated on the basis of previous work with COSLA. Additional operational and support costs have been added to those staff costs, based on variable marginal costs as set out in the original Financial Memorandum. Recruitment for additional staff and extensions or renegotiations of current staff contracts will also be required.

11. Early learning and childcare will continue to include those children with additional support needs, and this has been factored into the estimated revenue costs. They have been calculated on a pro-rata basis from the existing additional support for learning needs published expenditure, as set out in the original Financial Memorandum. Special education apportionment is estimated at 3.3% of the special school population and 3.3% of the special education budget. 90% of this is estimated as a variable cost.

12. Broadly, local authorities secure around 40% of provision through independent, private and third sector partners; it is anticipated that local authorities will continue to use those sectors to provide capacity for this expansion. It is also envisaged that a continued mix of early years staff and skills will be paramount to ensure quality of expanded provision.

13. Capital costs have not been explicitly estimated. It is not possible to provide an accurate estimate of the level of infrastructure investment required at this stage. Further work will be required to explore the need for any additional capital funding.

14. It should be noted that any future changes to eligibility under section 43(2)(c)(ii) would have cost implications, which cannot be anticipated or estimated at this stage.

15. Lastly, it is not anticipated that the new duties in section 6 – to consult and plan in relation to pre-school children and school aged children in need and not in need, alongside duties to consult on provision of mandatory hours of early learning and childcare – will incur additional costs. Consultation with communities is already embedded and widespread good practice within local authorities, and there will be no requirement on local authorities to make additional provision available.

AFTERCARE/CONTINUING CARE

Changing the age of leaving care

16. Amendments agreed by the Education and Culture Committee change the “age at leaving care” eligibility criteria for aftercare support from “beyond school minimum leaving age” to “age 16”. This will result each year in a number of additional 16-year olds being eligible for aftercare services that would otherwise not have been eligible. The costs will fall wholly on local authorities.

17. On average, over the last 4 years there were 901 children each year ceasing to be looked after at age 16. In 2012 around 54% were eligible for aftercare support; of these, 60% were in receipt of aftercare services. If the “age at leaving care” criteria was changed to 16, then it can be assumed that all care-leavers aged 16 would be eligible – i.e. roughly 901 16-year olds each year.

18. If it is assumed that similar proportions to those currently eligible will claim aftercare services (around 60%), it might be expected that around 540 of these 901 care-leavers will potentially claim. Given that over the last 3 years an average of 312 16-year olds have received aftercare each year, the legislation could be expected to give rise to an additional 228 claims (i.e. 540 less the 312 who would claim under the current eligibility criteria).

19. If it is further assumed that they also draw on aftercare services for an average duration of 3 years, consistent with the assumptions in the original Financial Memorandum, then by year 3 there will be an additional population of 684 (i.e. 228 multiplied by 3) 16-year old care-leavers eligible for support in the first, second and third years of aftercare support. Costs in years 1 and 2 are lower because there are fewer cohorts of newly qualifying 16-year olds; by year 3 there are three cohorts of new care-leavers in years 1, 2 and 3.

20. This is set out in Table 7, which also sets out the gross costs of the proposal. With an estimated aftercare cost of £3,142 per year per young person (as set out in the original Financial Memorandum), the total additional cost of the proposal would be approximately £2.1 million from year 3 onwards. It should be noted that some of those eligible for aftercare may choose continuing care. This option is included in section below on costing continuing care. This generates the aftercare avoided costs over the period when the young person chooses the continuing care option and is set out in Table 12.

Continuing care

21. Amendments have been added that will enable 16-year old care-leavers eligible for aftercare support whose final placement was not at home to choose to stay in their care placement (“continuing care”) until a higher age which may be specified by order. The Scottish Government has set out its policy intention of setting this age at 21; consequently, costs have been calculated on this basis. Any future changes to eligibility will have cost implications, which cannot be anticipated or estimated at this stage. The anticipated costs will fall wholly on local authorities.

22. The estimates are based on the expected number of those eligible who will take up this provision from the cohort of 16-year olds who will be eligible for aftercare support, (around 901 16-year olds each year\(^1\)). Of these care-leavers, it is estimated that around 45% (405) will have a final care placement of ‘looked after at home’ and they are, therefore, not deemed eligible for continuing care. This leaves 496 16-year old care-leavers who would be eligible for either aftercare or the option of continuing care. Currently, of all those eligible for aftercare support, around 60% are actually in receipt.\(^2\)

- it is assumed that around 60% of those eligible will claim (298);
- of those who claim it is anticipated 75% are expected to choose aftercare (224);

This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (SP Bill 27A)

- this leaves 25% (74 young persons) choosing the option of continuing care. This figure is an estimate based partly on the evaluation of the Costing the When I am Ready Scheme report, which evaluated a similar pilot programme in Wales (published in November 2013). It is assumed that in each subsequent year, a decreasing number of the young persons will choose continuing care as they reach older ages; this accords with current trends, wherein decreasing numbers remain in care through until 21 years of age;
- it is also assumed that once the 16-year olds leave care, they do not have the right to return;
- these numbers are annual flows, in the sense that in year 2 of the policy, a further 74 16-year old potential care-leavers will choose to the continuing care option and may do so up to and including age 21;
- this dynamic is modelled in Table 9 below for each annual cohort, taking account of the tailing off in numbers remaining in care;
- the offer of continuing care is only extended to potential care-leavers aged 16 and not aged 17 and over; and
- by 2019-20, there will be roughly an additional 164 young persons in care between the ages of 16 and 21 inclusive.

23. The unit and total costs and savings associated with this proposal are set out in Tables 10-13 below. Table 13 identifies the net total costs each year from 2016-17 to 2019-20. They are lowest in year 1 of implementation at £4.2 million, rising to £9.3 million by 2019-20 at which point they stabilise along with the additional numbers of children in care.

24. The costs of remaining in care depend upon the type of care placement from which the young person is considering leaving. A breakdown of the split applied to those staying in care is set out in Table 8, drawing on data from CLAS statistics 2011-12, identifying the final care placement type for care-leavers over minimum school-leaving age. The proportions are adjusted to remove care-leavers who were at home and in secure care and/or crisis accommodation.

25. For all those young persons who choose continuing care, avoided costs arise in the form of the foregone aftercare service costs. These were estimated to be approximately £3,142 per annum per young person in the original Financial Memorandum and the same figure is applied in the current modelling. Table 12 sets out the total avoided costs for each cohort for each subsequent year in care; the profile declines as the numbers who continue to stay in care reduces year on year. Each new cohort starting at the age of 16 will have this profile of saving and cost through until age 21.

COUNSELLING SERVICES

26. As an amendment to Part 9 of the Bill, a pregnant woman who a local authority considers will give birth to a child who is at risk of becoming looked after, and their families or the people with whom they are living, are also eligible for the services to be provided under Part 9. Unborn children can already be placed on the child protection register, and in 2011-12 95 were placed on it, which is a strong indication that they were at risk of becoming looked after. Of those 95 there will be a proportion whose families are already eligible for support under Part 9 by virtue of other children in the family. There will also be some unborn children about whom the local authority has concerns but for whatever reason has chosen not to place them on the child protection register. Extending eligibility to this group is particularly worthwhile because they are easily identifiable and the cost savings to the wider public sector of such early intervention and support are likely to be maximised as the child is not yet born.

27. Because the numbers related to this expansion are very small in relation to the much larger numbers modelled in the original Financial Memorandum (see paragraphs 133-142), which in themselves contain a margin of error at least as big as this expansion, the view is that this amendment can be absorbed within the original estimates of costs and savings.

28. In terms of other changes made at Stage 2, minor changes to the eligibility for support and the re-titling are considered of negligible impact on the overall costing assumptions. In practice, support would be available to the family around a child, not just the parents and persons with parental rights and responsibilities in relation to, an eligible child. Consequently, the modelling set out in the original Financial Memorandum was done on that basis. Amendments to this provision of Part 9 clarify the different categories of person who can receive support. ‘Counselling services’ was a term intended to cover a wide variety of services that could be available. The change to the term ‘relevant services’ and the re-titling of the provision does not represent a change in the anticipated range of support available, or the associated costs. Similarly, the eligibility test is now on the face of the Bill, as opposed to being defined separately; this test was always intended to be put in place in practice and was used as the basis for the original financial modelling.
29. Any future changes to eligibility would have cost implications, but as there are no policy intentions of doing so at this stage, they cannot be anticipated or estimated.

KINSHIP CARE ORDER

30. In the introductory draft of the Bill, guardians, along with parents, were excluded from kinship care assistance. However, a guardian can be in a very similar position to a kinship carer and the child or children they care for may be at risk of becoming looked after. In order to ensure that guardians, and the children for whom they care, are not at a disadvantage, they are now to be eligible for kinship care assistance. Amendments to sections 64 and 65 mean that guardians are now to be deemed to have the same eligibility for a kinship care order.

31. Guardians are appointed in 2 ways – under section 7 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) or under section 11(2)(h) of that Act. Under section 7, an appointment of a guardian is a private matter between individuals with no court process – this is where a guardian is appointed through a will or similar. It is not possible to know how many people become guardians through this route each year. However, it is assumed that, where this happens, a parent is also likely to have made financial provision for the child and/or the chosen guardian, who has had to agree to be a guardian, is likely to have the means to support the child without recourse to the state. There will be situations where this is not the case, but it is considered that this will be absorbed within the estimated 1.5-3.5% of informal carers who have already been estimated may apply for a kinship care order per annum (see paragraph 125 of the original Financial Memorandum) and it is not proposed to model this group further.

32. Where a guardian is appointed under section 11(2)(h) of the 1995 Act, this goes through the civil courts. There are statistics for orders pursued under section 11(2) (orders relating to parental rights and responsibilities), but these are not broken down sufficiently to show the exact number of orders under section 11(2)(h). Contact orders and residence orders are the main categories of orders under section 11(2) and are recorded individually. The remainder, covering 6 other potential types of order, are grouped together as ‘other’. There were 583 of these ‘other’ orders in 2011-12. There are few section 11(2)(h) orders and, therefore, a figure of 60 per year can be assumed (roughly 1/10 of the ‘other’ total). This is a relatively stable number, as the 1995 Act and the Bill do not provide any particular incentive to take out guardianship and the flexible nature of section 11 orders means many people seeking guardianship would in practice seek a different order – so are included in the existing modelling. This measure, therefore, to some extent closes a perceived loophole in support for a small residual group who face unexpected difficulties when taking in a child following the death of the birth parent(s).

33. The calculation of gross costs and avoided costs for this group follows the same methodology as for informal kinship carers in the kinship care order section in the original Financial Memorandum. The differences are that it is assumed that:

- guardians will not require transport costs to facilitate contact, as guardianship is generally where there is no parental involvement; and
- only 33% avoid care, which is a lower figure than assumed for informal kinship carers but reflects the view that people who pursue guardianship generally do so because they already have the means and/or the child is unlikely otherwise to be at risk of becoming looked after.
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2
(SP Bill 27A)

34. The assessment of the costs of including this group within the kinship are order are, therefore, as follows. The costs will fall wholly on local authorities.

| Applied to % of kinship care (guardian) order | 33%   |

35. In response to concerns about a perceived lack of detail in this Part of the Bill, Scottish Ministers agreed to make amendments at Stage 2 to provide for a clear, core eligibility test for kinship care assistance on the face of the Bill (whether or not a child was in danger of becoming looked after). However, this test was the same as was used in the underlying financial modelling and, therefore, the amendments result in no changes to the overall financial impact. Although there is a power to add to the description of child that is eligible by order, there are no current plans to make use of this power; consequently, it is not possible to model these costs at this stage.

36. Overall, there were no additional net costs in relation to kinship care in the original Financial Memorandum. This remains the case with these amendments.

SCHOOL CLOSURE

37. Part 11A of the Bill, added by way of amendments, makes a number of amendments to the process for school closure proposals under the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”). This Act sets out the consultation processes and procedures that education authorities are required to follow when proposing changes to their school estate. The amendments to the 2010 Act that are anticipated to result in some costs are as follows:

- the requirement to provide financial information in relation to school closure proposals (section 68C);
- the additional requirements for rural school closure proposals (section 68D);
- the expansion of the role of Education Scotland (section 68E);
the establishment of an independent referral mechanism following Ministerial call in (section 68E); and the provision which prevents the publication of a closure proposal within 5 years of a previous publication of such a proposal (section 68B).

Providing financial information

38. Section 68C amends section 4 of the 2010 Act to provide that closure proposals should be accompanied by relevant financial information. The Scottish Government will work closely with education authorities and other stakeholders to develop guidance in relation to and a standard form for the presentation of this information, to ensure that those being consulted are provided with accurate, consistent and easily understood information. While some education authorities are very good at presenting this information, others are less so, with information presented containing errors, omissions or simply unclear to lay readers as to how the figures have been derived.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

39. The Scottish Government will be responsible for drafting the guidance on how this information is to be presented. The staff costs associated with this are estimated at less than £10,000 and will be managed from within existing resources.

Costs on local authorities

40. Education authorities will be required to provide specific financial information to accompany their closure proposals in line with the guidance. COSLA and ADES strongly support this new duty and it is hoped that setting this important information out in a clear and consistent way will allow the financial implications of a closure proposals to be more clearly understood. It is believed this will help the overall consultation process by ensuring less contention around the details underpinning the proposal.

41. This is one part of a comprehensive package of information which education authorities are required to put forward as evidence to support a closure proposal. However, it does not require education authorities to collate new information or information not already held by them; it simply requires them to present it in a consistent and transparent way. Consequently, it is not considered that this new requirement will place any significant additional cost burden on education authorities.

Additional requirements for rural school closure proposals

42. Section 68D inserts a number of new sections into the 2010 Act (sections 11A, 12A and a substituted section 13) which impose additional requirements on education authorities in terms of the process to be followed for rural school closure proposals. An education authority will be required to carry out a more rigorous assessment in its formulation of a closure proposal, requiring it to consider reasonable alternatives to closure and assess the likely educational benefits, effect on the local community and likely effect of any different travelling arrangements of both the closure proposal and any alternatives identified. It will also require an authority to consult in a more thorough and transparent way.
Costs on the Scottish Administration

43. The Scottish Government will be responsible for drafting guidance in relation to the additional requirements for rural school closure proposals. The staff costs associated with this are estimated at less than £10,000 and will be managed from within existing resources.

Costs on local authorities

44. At present the 2010 Act contains additional safeguards for rural schools. There are 3 factors which a local authority must have special regard to when proposing a rural school closure. The Financial Memorandum for the 2010 Act set out the expected costs for this special provision for rural schools. The overall conclusion was that there were no additional school running costs directly attributable to the new and more rigorous consultation procedures but that there would be minor costs associated with publishing how the special factors relating to rural school closure proposals had been applied, of the order of an additional £2,200 per annum.

45. The procedures set out in section 68D are those that it was originally expected would be followed by local authorities under the 2010 Act when consulting on a rural school closure. Therefore, it is not considered that these new requirements will place any significant additional cost burden on education authorities beyond that which Parliament intended when passing the 2010 Act.

Clarifying and expanding Education Scotland’s role

46. Ministers have previously sought Education Scotland’s advice on a case by case basis either when considering calling in a proposal, or when determining a proposal that has been called in, or both. This amendment will formalise the role for Education Scotland in statute. The Bill refers to Education Scotland as Her Majesty’s Inspectors of Education (HMIE) as it is the appropriate part of Education Scotland which would provide this advice (HMIE is responsible for the inspection of schools in Scotland – it has statutory powers of inspection conferred on it by Part III of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 and also by the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010).

47. Given that Ministers’ role in determining proposals that have been called in is to be transferred to the School Closure Review Panels under section 68E which inserts new section 17A into the 2010 Act, equivalent provision is also made in new section 17B of the 2010 Act for School Closure Review Panels to call on Education Scotland for advice where necessary.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

48. This will have a minor resource implication for Education Scotland, which is funded from the Scottish Administration. The precise cost will depend on the number of closure proposals that come forward in future and on whether Education Scotland’s advice is sought by Ministers considering call ins or by the School Closure Review Panels considering proposals once called in.

49. Based on previous experience and in light of the effect of the various amendments being proposed to the 2010 Act, it is estimated that the number of school closure proposals being made in Scotland is likely to be in the range of 25 to 30 per annum. It is further expected that Scottish Ministers may require to request advice from Education Scotland in around a third of these closure proposals – between 8 to 10 cases per annum. Provision of this further advice would not require Education Scotland to submit an additional report, but rather respond to specific issues raised with them by Scottish Ministers.

50. It is also estimated that around 5 to 6 closure proposals per annum might be called in and referred to the new School Closure Review Panels for determination. For some of these, the Panel may require additional advice from Education Scotland to assist them with their determination, perhaps 3 to 6 cases per year. However again, this will not require Education Scotland to prepare and submit a revised report; rather this will be dealt with in correspondence between the Panel and Education Scotland.

51. Education Scotland has estimated the cost of the additional requirement this will place on inspection staff at around £9,300. Education Scotland is expected to manage these costs within its existing budgets.

Establishing an independent referral mechanism

52. At present, school closure proposals that have been called in are determined by the Scottish Ministers. Section 68E which inserts new sections 17A to 17D into the 2010 Act changes that process by referring school closure proposals which have been called in (by Scottish Ministers) to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels, who is to constitute a School Closure Review Panel to determine the case. The Convener is a statutory role and he or she will be appointed through the Ministerial appointments process. The Convener will be responsible for administering School Closure Review Panels, including the appointment of people eligible to serve as members of a Panel, the selection of members of Panels to determine each case, setting the rules for how Panels conduct a review and reporting to Ministers. This involves a transfer in functions from the Scottish Ministers who are currently responsible for determining school closures decisions that have been called in. There will be costs associated with the new independent function, though these will be partially offset by a reduction in the costs of administering the current “in-house” system. These costs will be borne by the Scottish Administration.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

53. The Convener of the School Closure Review Panels is expected to be a part-time appointment. It is hoped the Scottish Arbitration Centre may be in a position to provide administrative support for this function; this is being actively explored with the Centre. The equivalent of 2 administrative staff might be required to carry out administrative functions to support the Convener and School Closure Review Panel members. Based on current Scottish Government employment costs, it is estimated that the annual costs of the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels and the administrative support services which will be required to be delivered to both will be between £83,000 and £90,000.

54. It is hoped that it may be possible for the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels and the necessary administrative support to be located within the Scottish Arbitration Centre; the details of this are being actively explored with the Centre. Sharing office space and other resources with the Scottish Arbitration Centre should increase flexibility and value for money. If co-location with the Scottish Arbitration Centre were not possible, other alternatives would be considered, including the possibility of locating the Convener within current Scottish Government accommodation. These office costs are estimated to be £22,000 per annum.

55. There will be initial and ongoing costs relating to appointing the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels and the Panel members. The Convener will be appointed under the public appointment process, making use of existing Scottish Government infrastructure and resourced centrally, with costs limited to £2,000 for advertising. This would be required every 5 years.

56. The Convener will be responsible for appointing Panel members, who will serve on Panels as required depending on when closure proposals are called in by Ministers. It is proposed that Panel members are recruited for a set period of 5 years and appointments are made in at least 3 tranches (to plan for staggered replacement of Panel members and to allow any vacancies that arise mid-term to be addressed). Costs might be incurred initially in years 1, 2 and 4. The additional cost of each appointment cycle round is estimated at £2,000.

Training for panel members

57. There will be on-going costs associated with the training for Panel members to ensure that they are fully aware and compliant with the statutory responsibilities set out under the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010. It is estimated that this would cost £15,000 in the first year, with further training costs of £10,000 in subsequent years whenever a new group of Panel members were appointed.

Costs associated with determination

58. As stated above, it is expected that on average education authorities will bring forward in the region of 25-30 school closure proposals per year, of which around 5-6 may be called in for determination by the School Closure Review Panel. Cases will vary in their complexity and the amount of time that the Panel will require to investigate and determine proposals. The complexity of the case and the length of time it takes for the Panel to determine it, will determine the cost, and it is estimated that the likely costs will range from £5,000 (for more straightforward cases) to £10,000 (for proposals with more complex issues), giving a total cost for determining 5-6 cases between £25,000 and £60,000 per year. An estimate of the travel and subsistence costs incurred by Panel members, to cover travel, overnight accommodation and meals where necessary, increases these cost estimates by £4,250 to £10,200 (depending on the complexity and number of cases considered) to a total of £29,250 to £70,200. The travel costs will vary significantly based on the location of Panel members, and it could be expected that members would be more likely to come from rural areas. The Panels are also likely to require legal advice and legal costs per annum are estimated to be around £10,000, which again will depend on the Panel’s caseload and the complexity of the case.

59. These costs will be partially offset by savings from reduced workload for the civil servants currently delivering this function, and these savings are estimated at around £51,000-£65,000. These savings will start from 2015-16, once the transitional arrangements are completed. In the total cost tables at the start of this Memorandum, the higher of the figures in the ranges in Table 16 have been used.

*Data for 2014-15 assumes that the Convener and Panels are operational for 6 months and incur 50% of standard annual costs.

Costs on local authorities

60. The School Closure Review Panel will be able to request the education authority to provide any relevant additional information it may require about the proposal in order to be able to make its determination. These would normally be requested to be provided in writing – it is not intended that a hearing will be required which would require either the education authority to attend or to be legally represented. The costs education authorities might incur in providing additional information are considered to be small and not expected to be an additional burden on the education authority. As noted above, it is estimated that only 5-6 cases might be considered by the School Closure Review Panels per annum.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

61. Representations about school closure proposals come from many sources, for example, from parents, pupils, community groups and other individuals including local businesses and employers. Where a case is referred to the School Closure Review Panel, it may seek additional information or representations from these groups or individuals. Any costs involved in this would be borne by the groups and individuals concerned, and it will be a priority that the practices developed by the Panel will minimise the burdens they place on third parties.

A 5-year moratorium between school closure proposals

62. At present, when an education authority decides not to implement a closure proposal or where consent is not given by the Scottish Ministers to a proposal called in, it is open to the authority to immediately start the process again. Section 68B which inserts new section 2A into the 2010 Act provides that when an education authority decides not to proceed with a closure proposal or, in the event of call in, the School Closure Review panel refuses to give consent, the authority may not publish a proposal to close the same school again before the expiry of a 5-year period. There is, however, provision for exceptions to be made where a significant change has taken place.
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (SP Bill 27A)

Costs on the Scottish Administration

63. The new section 2A of the 2010 Act as inserted by section 68B, could mean a minor reduction in the number of closure proposals coming forward for consideration by Scottish Ministers for call in, and on those being referred to the School Closure Review Panels. However, the number of repeat proposals would be expected to be very small so this saving is not expected to be significant.

Costs on local authorities

64. The new section 2A of the 2010 Act will make it harder for education authorities to quickly repeat a school closure proposal which they have either decided against at a late stage or had refused by a School Closure Review Panel. However, this will be possible 5 years after a decision not to close the school or a decision of School Closure Review Panel to refuse consent, has been made, or earlier where a significant change has taken place. It would be anticipated that this would cover scenarios where the case for closure became compelling, for example, where the school roll had fallen very substantially or the school building had become unsuitable.

65. In preventing an education authority from bringing forward a closure proposal until the expiry of a period of 5 years after the publication of a previous closure proposal in relation to the same school, it could be argued that there may be a cost in maintaining a school for longer than the authority wished. However, it could not be guaranteed that a closure proposal made during that period would have received consent. Therefore it is not possible to estimate any cost implication in relation to such an argument as this would depend on the individual circumstances of the school concerned, its costs and the costs of the possible alternative arrangements and the time that the change was delayed by this new provision, section 2A.

CHILDREN’S LEGAL AID

66. An amendment introduced a new 71A section into the Bill, inserting a new section 28LA into the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 (“the 1986 Act”). Section 28L of the 1986 Act allows Scottish Ministers to make children’s legal aid available by regulations for specified children’s hearings under the 2011 Act to specified persons. The purpose of section 28LA is to allow Scottish Ministers to make similar regulations, in order to make children’s legal aid available to children and other persons in respect of court proceedings under the 2011 Act.

67. The financial impact of the amendment is estimated to be relatively modest compared to current provision for children’s legal assistance. Expenditure on children’s legal assistance in 2012-13, prior to the 2011 Act coming into force, was £5.4 million. The Scottish Legal Aid Board has forecast that the impact of the 2011 Act on the cost of children’s legal assistance will be £3.3 million. It is difficult to estimate the exact financial impact of the new section 28LA; children’s legal aid is particularly susceptible to the impact of a small number of very expensive cases and the effects of the 2011 Act are still in their early stages. There are only a very small number of instances where it is felt likely to be appropriate to extend the availability of children’s legal aid for court proceedings as a result of the amendment. Nonetheless, the Scottish Legal Aid Board estimates that such an extension would be likely to have a very limited impact on application volumes although an individual case could be relatively expensive. It has, therefore, tentatively estimated a financial impact of around £10,000 per year.
SUPPLEMENTARY DELEGATED POWERS MEMORANDUM

Purpose

1. This Memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government to assist the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in its consideration of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. This Memorandum describes provisions in the Bill conferring power to make subordinate legislation which were either introduced to the Bill or amended at Stage 2. The Memorandum supplements the Delegated Powers Memorandum on the Bill as introduced.

PART A – POWERS TO MAKE SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION AMENDED AT STAGE 2

The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in their Report of 1 October 2013 suggested some changes which have led to the following revisals:

Part 6 – Early learning and childcare

Section 43 – Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

Subsection (2)(c)(ii) – Power to specify additional categories of eligible pre-school child

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: Revised
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

2. Section 43(2) sets out the children who are to be eligible for the mandatory amount of Early Learning and Childcare in accordance with subsection (1). Such children are referred to as “eligible pre-school children” and under the Bill they are those children who are under school age and who have not commenced primary school and either fall within subsection (3) (that is, they are 2 or over and are, or have been at any time since their 2\textsuperscript{nd} birthday, looked after or subject to a kinship care order) or are within such age range, or are of such description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify (subsection (2)(c)(ii)).

3. Section 43(2)(c)(ii) enables the Scottish Ministers to specify by order additional categories of “eligible pre-school child” in relation to whom Early Learning and Childcare will be made by reference to the description of such children and their ages. The policy intention is to specify that 3 and 4 year olds will be eligible for Early Learning and Childcare from the first term after their 3\textsuperscript{rd} birthday in a similar way in which the current law does so by virtue of the order made under Section 1(1A) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 (“the 1980 Act”), which the Bill amends.

4. Subsection (4) provides that an order under section 43(2)(c)(ii) may sub-delegate the function of determining eligibility criteria to an education authority so, for example, the order might provide that a child is an “eligible pre-school child” only if the education authority is satisfied as to any matter relating to the child which is specified in the order.

Reason for taking this power

5. The current policy is part of a longer term ambition to increase and improve Early Learning and Childcare for all children. The power will allow the Scottish Ministers to specify additional categories of “eligible pre-school child” in the future, and thereby provide maximum flexibility and enable progress towards this longer term ambition.

Choice of Procedure

6. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee recommended that the procedure for this order be changed. The order was previously subject to negative procedure but has been amended to be subject to an affirmative procedure. The current policy intention is that the power will be used to specify 3 and 4 year olds, however, it could be used to make different provision in the future. Given that this might be a matter which the Parliament may wish to have the ability to debate in full, the Scottish Government is content that affirmative procedure offers a more suitable level of Parliamentary scrutiny. An amendment to section 77(2) has been made at Stage 2 so as to make this order-making power subject to affirmative procedure.

Part 9 – Services in relation to children at risk of becoming looked after, etc

Section 61 – Provision of relevant services to parents and others

(Subsection (3) – Power to specify the definition of “eligible child” – this power has been removed at Stage 2 and a new and different power inserted as follows:)

Subsection (2)(b) – Power to specify another description of an ”eligible child”

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: Revised
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

7. This subsection provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify a description of an “eligible child” other than the description of “eligible child” provided for in subsection 61(2)(a); a child at risk of becoming looked after.
Reason for taking this power

8. Subsection 61(2)(a) was added as an amendment at Stage 2 and provides that an “eligible child” is a child who the authority considers to be at risk of becoming looked after. This was added to the face of the Bill to address concerns about a lack of detail in this section. The power at subsection 61(2)(b) (which replaces with minor drafting changes what was previously section 61(3)) was also added as an amendment. This power allows the Scottish Ministers to specify by order an additional description of an eligible child to that at subsection 61(2)(a). The reason for taking this power is to ensure that relevant services are targeted at those in greatest need. It is highly desirable to retain flexibility to specify other descriptions of an “eligible child” so that, if necessary, adjustments can be made in the future to ensure that support is focused on those most in need.

Choice of procedure

9. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee recommended that the Parliamentary procedure for the power which was contained in section 61(3) should be changed from negative procedure to affirmative procedure. The Scottish Government agrees that a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny is required. This is because the use of the power will result in additional descriptions of children and qualifying persons in relation to such children becoming eligible for relevant services provided by Local Authorities and given that the power could be used to remove or vary any descriptions of children so added (although it is not the intention to remove a description of child once added). This would clearly have an impact on those eligible for, and in receipt of, relevant services, which is why it is considered that affirmative procedure with its more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny is more appropriate. An amendment to section 77(2) has been made at Stage 2 to make the power in section 61(2)(b) (which was previously contained in section 61(3)) subject to affirmative procedure.

Part 10 – Support for kinship care

Section 64 – Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

(Subsection (4) – Power to specify the description of a child who is considered an “eligible child” – this power has been removed at Stage 2 and a new and different power added as follows:

Subsection (4)(b) – Power to specify another description of an “eligible child”

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: Revised
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative
Provision

10. This subsection provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, specify a description of an “eligible child” other than the description of “eligible child” provided for in subsection 64(4)(a); a child at risk of becoming looked after.

Reason for taking this power

11. Subsection 64(4)(a) was added as an amendment at Stage 2 and provides that an “eligible child” is a child who the authority considers to be at risk of becoming looked after. This was added to the face of the Bill to address concerns about a lack of detail in this section. The power at subsection 64(4)(b) (which replaces with minor drafting changes what was previously section 64(4)) was also added as an amendment. This power allows the Scottish Ministers to specify by order an additional description of an eligible child to that at subsection 64(4)(a). As with subsection 61(2)(b), the reason for taking this power is to ensure that services are targeted at those in greatest need. It is highly desirable to retain flexibility to specify other descriptions of an “eligible child” so that, if necessary, adjustments can be made in the future to ensure that support is focused on those most in need.

Choice of Procedure

12. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee recommended that the Parliamentary procedure for the power which was contained in section 64(4) (and which section 64(4)(b) now contains) should be changed from negative procedure to affirmative procedure. The Scottish Government agrees that a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny is required. This is because the use of the power will result in additional descriptions of children and qualifying persons in relation to such children becoming eligible for kinship care assistance provided by Local Authorities and given that the power could be used to remove or vary any descriptions of children so added (although it is not the intention to remove a description of a child once added). This would clearly have an impact on those eligible for, and in receipt of, kinship care assistance, which is why it is considered that affirmative procedure with its more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny is more appropriate. An amendment to section 77(2) has been made at Stage 2 to make the power in section 64(4)(b) (which was previously contained in section 64(4)) subject to affirmative procedure.

Part 11 – Adoption Register

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register (inserting new chapter 1A after section 13 of the Adoption and Children Act (Scotland) 2007)

Section 13A – Scotland’s Adoption Register

Subsection (1) – Arrangements for the establishment and maintenance of a register to be known as Scotland’s Adoption Register
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (SP 27A)

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: Revised. The amendment narrows the scope of an existing power.
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

13. This provision inserts into section 13A(1) detail about the purpose of Scotland’s Adoption Register.

Reason for taking this power

14. In the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s Report it was suggested that the Scottish Government should consider bringing forward amendments to section 13A at Stage 2 to make provision about the purpose and intended use of the Register, in order to inform the broad power in section 13A(2) to make regulations about the Register and the information which it is to contain. The Scottish Government agrees and section 13A(1) is being amended at Stage 2 to clarify that the purpose of Scotland’s Adoption Register is for facilitating adoption. There is no change to the procedure for the regulations under section 13A(2) which remains affirmative.

Choice of Procedure

15. The regulations under section 13A(2) are subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of Section 117(5)(ia) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 (as inserted by paragraph 9(5) of Schedule 4 to the Bill). Affirmative procedure allows for a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny, which is considered appropriate.

Section 13A – Scotland’s Adoption Register

Subsection (2)(a) – Power to prescribe in regulations the information which is to be included in the Adoption Register

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: Revised. The amendment clarifies the use of an existing power.
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

16. This provision narrows the powers in section 13A(2)(a) which prescribe information that can be included in the Register.

Reason for taking this power

17. In the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s Report it was suggested that the terms of the power in section 13A(2)(a) should be restricted to reflect the stated intention in taking the power. The Scottish Government agrees and is amending the Bill at Stage 2 to narrow the regulation-making power to make it clear that regulations under section 13A(2)(a) may prescribe information relating to adoption which is to be included in the Register.

Choice of Procedure

18. The regulations are subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of Section 117(5)(ia) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 (as inserted by paragraph 9(5) of Schedule 4 to the Bill). Affirmative procedure allows for a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny, which is considered appropriate.

The following revision is not as a result of comments from the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee but is a change to existing powers:

Part 7 – Corporate parenting

Section 50 – Corporate parents

Subsection (3B) – Expansion of power to modify Schedule 3 contained in section 50(2)

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: Revised
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

19. The order-making power at section 50(2) allows the Scottish Ministers to modify Schedule 3 to add, remove or vary the list of Corporate Parents in that Schedule. A new section 50(3B) expands that power so that an order made under 50(2) which adds a person, or description of persons, to Schedule 3 may also modify section 50 to provide that the person is not a Corporate Parent for the purposes of section 58 (directions to Corporate Parents).

Reason for taking this power

20. This power was revised by way of Government amendment at Stage 2 to acknowledge that in adding further persons to Schedule 3 in the future using the power in section 50(2) it may not always be appropriate for those persons to be subject to the duty to comply with Ministerial directions issued under section 58. For example, the same Government amendment provided that the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland was not to be a Corporate Parent for the purposes of section 58. This was brought forward to acknowledge that the Commissioner has a statutory protection of independence in the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 (paragraph 2 of Schedule 1) so that the Commissioner is not subject to the direction or control of any member of the Parliament, the Scottish Government or the Parliamentary corporation. It may be that persons to be added to Schedule 3 in the future will also have a similar degree of independence written into their founding provisions and so it is appropriate to have this level of flexibility built into the revised power in section 50(2).
Choice of Procedure

21. The revised power at section 50(2) remains subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of section 77(2) and this is still thought to afford the appropriate level of Parliamentary scrutiny for this power.

PART B – FURTHER PROVISIONS CONFERRING POWER TO MAKE SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION INTRODUCED AT STAGE 2

Part 5 – Child’s plan

Section 31 – Child’s plan: Requirement

Subsection (5) – Power to specify persons whose views should be taken into account in deciding whether a child requires a Child’s Plan

Provision

22. These provisions relate to the persons who require to be consulted about the requirement for a Child’s Plan. The provisions allow the Scottish Ministers to specify such persons by order. This is in addition to those listed on the face of the Bill, which will be the child, the child’s parents and such other persons as the responsible authority in respect of the Child’s Plan considers appropriate.

Reason for taking this power

23. These provisions add an order-making power so that the provisions about Child’s Plans more closely reflect the requirements of the Looked After Children (Scotland) Regulations 2009 (“the 2009 Regulations”). The elements of the Child’s Plan in respect of Looked After Children will be incorporated in to the Child’s Plan required by the Bill, so that there is a single Child’s Plan incorporating all of the relevant information. The 2009 Regulations require persons other than the child and their parents to be consulted on the Child’s Plan, for example, any person who has parental rights and responsibilities. This power has been taken to ensure that the order to be made under Part 5 of the Bill, setting out the procedure for creating, preparing and reviewing Child’s Plans, can contain the necessary provisions so as to incorporate the requirements of the 2009 Regulations.

Choice of Procedure

24. The negative procedure is considered appropriate because the order-making powers for the 2009 Regulations are also subject to negative procedure. In a similar way to Regulation 4(2) of the 2009 Regulations (which requires specified persons to be consulted when assessing a looked after child’s needs and how they can be met, after which a Child’s Plan is prepared), an order made under this section will allow for the Scottish Ministers to make provision as to who should be consulted about the requirement for a Child’s Plan in terms of the Bill. The persons who require to be consulted may change over time, for example to reflect future changes in other legislation. An order made under this section would not allow the criteria for determining whether a Child’s Plan is required, as set out in section 31(1), to be amended, but would only allow for detail to be provided as to further persons who require to be consulted about this requirement, in addition to those already specified on the face of the Bill. The negative procedure is considered to offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expedition and convenience and, on the other, the need for scrutiny for a provision of this nature.

Section 33 – Preparation of a child’s plan

Subsection (6) and (8)(b) – Power to specify persons whose views should be taken into account in preparing a Child’s Plan, and to make provision requiring or permitting a copy of the plan to be given to particular persons

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

25. These provisions relate to the persons who require to be consulted about the preparation of a Child’s Plan. The provisions allow the Scottish Ministers to specify such persons by order. This is in addition to those listed on the face of the Bill, which will be the child, the child’s parents and such other persons as the authority preparing the Plan considers appropriate. The existing order-making power in section 33(8) is also being widened slightly to allow the Scottish Ministers to provide that a copy of a Child’s Plan is to be given to particular persons in certain circumstances.

Reason for taking this power

26. These provisions add an order-making power so that the provisions about Child’s Plans more closely reflect the requirements of the 2009 Regulations. The elements of the Child’s Plan in respect of looked after children will be incorporated in to the Child’s Plan required by the Bill, so that there is a single Child’s Plan incorporating all the relevant information. The 2009 Regulations require persons other than the child and their parents to be consulted on the Child’s Plan, for example, any person who has parental rights and responsibilities. They also require a copy of the Plan to be given to the child, their parents and, in certain circumstances, to other persons. This power has been taken to ensure that the order to be made under Part 5 of the Bill, setting out the procedure for creating, preparing and reviewing Child’s Plans, can contain the necessary provisions so as to incorporate the requirements of the 2009 Regulations.
Choice of Procedure

27. The negative procedure is considered appropriate because the order-making powers for the 2009 Regulations are also subject to negative procedure. The existing order-making power in subsection (8) is subject to the negative procedure, and the above amendment, which is minor in nature, does not necessitate a change in this procedure.

Section 37 – Child’s plan – management

Subsection (2)(b) – Power to specify persons whose views should be taken into account in reviewing a child’s plan

Provision

28. These provisions relate to the persons who require to be consulted about the review of a Child’s Plan. The provisions allow the Scottish Ministers to specify such persons by order. This is in addition to those listed on the face of the Bill, which will be the child, the child’s parents and such other persons as the managing authority of the Plan considers appropriate.

Reason for taking this power

29. These provisions add an order-making power so that the provisions about Child’s Plans more closely reflect the requirements of the 2009 Regulations. The elements of the Child’s Plan in respect of looked after children will be incorporated in to the Child’s Plan required by the Bill, so that there is a single Child’s Plan incorporating all the relevant information. The 2009 Regulations require persons other than the child and their parents to be consulted on the Child’s Plan, for example, any person who has parental rights and responsibilities. This power has been taken to ensure that the order to be made under Part 5 of the Bill, setting out the procedure for creating, preparing and reviewing Child’s Plans, can contain the necessary provisions so as to incorporate the requirements of the 2009 Regulations.

Choice of Procedure

30. The negative procedure is considered appropriate because the order-making powers for the 2009 Regulations are also subject to negative procedure. In a similar way to Regulation 44(3) of the 2009 Regulations (which requires specified persons to be consulted when reviewing a looked after child’s case and revising their Child’s Plan), an order made under this section will allow the Scottish Ministers to make provision as to who should be consulted about the review of a Child’s Plan in terms of the Bill. The persons who require to be consulted may change over time, for example to reflect future changes in other legislation. An order made under this section will not allow the requirements for the review of a child’s plan, as set out in section 37(1), to be amended, nor will it change the existing consultation requirements as set out in section 37(2), but would only allow for detail to be provided as to further persons who require to be consulted about the review, in addition to those specified on the face of the Bill. The negative procedure is considered to offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expedition and convenience and, on the other, the need for scrutiny for a provision of this nature.

Provision

31. The Bill has been amended at Stage 2 to create a new Schedule 2A, which lists persons who are required to provide information and assistance to an authority exercising Child’s Plan functions under Part 5. In large part, Schedule 2A replicates the existing Schedule 2 in the Bill. However, a separate Schedule was considered necessary because the Scottish Ministers, by virtue of a Stage 2 amendment to Part 4, required to be removed from the existing Schedule 2. A separate Schedule which included the Scottish Ministers for the purpose of Part 5 was therefore necessary. The order-making power being taken here is to allow for the Scottish Ministers to modify the new Schedule 2A by order.

Reason for taking this power

32. The reason for taking this power is so that the list of persons in Schedule 2A can be modified in the future should new bodies be created, or listed persons' names be changed.

Choice of Procedure

33. An order made under this provision is subject to affirmative procedure (by virtue of section 77(2)) which allows for a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny. This is considered appropriate given that the order may be used to modify primary legislation.
Part 6 – Early learning and childcare

Section 49A – Duty to consult and plan in relation to power to provide school education for pre-school children (Early Learning and Childcare)

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

34. Part 6A of the Bill amends section 1 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 (“the 1980 Act”). Section 1(2B)(a) of the 1980 Act requires an education authority to consult within its area about whether, and if so how, it should provide school education to pre-school children under its powers in section 1(1C) of the 1980 Act (this is the power to provide non-mandatory Early Learning and Childcare over and above that which authorities are statutorily obliged to provide under section 43(1) and 44 of the Bill). Section 1(2B)(b) of the 1980 Act requires the authority, after having had regard to the views expressed in that consultation, to prepare and publish Plans for how it intends to make non-mandatory Early Learning and Childcare available. The education authority is required to consult and plan at least once every 2 years. Section 1(2C) of the 1980 Act provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (2B) so as to vary the regularity within which an education authority must consult and plan in pursuance of that subsection.

Reason for taking this power

35. The reason for taking this power is to provide the Scottish Ministers with a degree of flexibility over the frequency of the requirement to consult and plan. Two years is necessary in the first instance to provide consistency with momentum of consultation on statutory entitlement to the mandatory amount of Early Learning and Childcare; and, to co-ordinate, integrate and align those processes of consultation. The regularity within which authorities are required to consult and plan could be reduced if successive consultations were producing similar findings, or if a wide range of flexible provision had been achieved. Conversely, the regularity could be increased if there was, for example, a major policy change emerging in response to local consultations.

Choice of Procedure

36. The order is subject to negative procedure in terms of section 1(2D) of the 1980 Act. The power is not being used to change any of the requirements to consult and plan but only the regularity within which that consultation and planning is to take place and therefore it is considered that the level of Parliamentary scrutiny afforded should be subject to negative procedure is sufficient. Further, negative procedure is consistent with the procedure selected for the current power in section 46(2) (power to modify regularity in relation to the mandatory amount of Early Learning and Childcare) of the Bill. The negative procedure is considered to offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expedition and convenience and, on the other, the need for scrutiny for a provision of this nature.

Section 49B –Duty to consult and plan in relation to day care and out of school care

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

37. Part 6B of the Bill inserts new subsections (1A), (1B), (3A), (3B), (3C) and (3D) into section 27 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). Section 27(1A)(a) of the 1995 Act requires a Local Authority to consult in its area every 2 years about how it should provide day care for pre-school children who are in need which they have a duty to provide in terms of section 27(1) of the 1995 Act. Section 27(1B)(a) of the 1995 Act contains a similar consultation requirement in relation to how and whether the Local Authority should provide day care to pre-school children who are not in need which they have a power to provide in terms of section 27(1) of the 1995 Act.

38. Section 27(1A)(b) and (1B)(b) of the 1995 Act requires the Local Authority, after having regard to the views expressed in that consultation, to prepare and publish plans for how it intends to make day care for pre-school children in need available and whether and, if so how, it intends to make day care for pre-school children, who are not in need available.

39. Section 27(3A)(a) of the 1995 Act requires a Local Authority to consult in its area every 2 years about how it should provide appropriate out of school care for school aged children who are in need which they have a duty to provide in terms of section 27(3) of the 1995 Act. Section 27(3B)(a) of the 1995 Act contains a similar consultation requirement in relation to whether, and if so how, the Local Authority should provide appropriate out of school care for school aged children who are not in need which they have a power to provide in terms of section 27(3) of the 1995 Act.

40. Section 27(3A)(b) and (3B)(b) of the 1995 Act requires the authority, after having regard to the views expressed in that consultation, to prepare and publish a Plan for how it intends to make out of school care for school aged children in need available and in relation to the provision of out of school care for school aged children who are not in need.

41. The education authority are required to consult and plan at least once every 2 years. Section 27(3C) of the 1995 Act provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsections (1A), (1B), (3A) or (3B) so as to vary the regularity within which a Local Authority must consult and plan in pursuance of those subsections.
Reason for taking this power

42. The reason for taking this power is to provide the Scottish Ministers with a degree of flexibility over the frequency of the requirement to consult and plan. Two years is necessary in the first instance to provide consistency with momentum of consultation on statutory entitlement to the mandatory amount of Early Learning and Childcare and to co-ordinate, integrate and align those processes of consultation. The regularity within which authorities are required to consult and plan could be reduced if successive consultations were producing similar findings, or if a wide range of flexible provision had been achieved. Conversely, the regularity could be increased if there was, for example, a major policy change emerging in response to local consultations.

Choice of Procedure

43. The order is subject to negative procedure in terms of section 27(3D) of the 1995 Act. The power is not being used to change any of the requirements to consult and plan but only the regularity with which that consultation and planning is to take place and therefore it is considered that the level of Parliamentary scrutiny afforded should be subject to negative procedure is sufficient. Further, negative procedure is consistent with the procedure selected for the current power in section 46(2) (power to modify regularity in relation to the mandatory amount of Early Learning and Childcare) of the Bill. The negative procedure is considered to offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expedition and convenience and, on the other, the need for scrutiny for a provision of this nature.

Part 7 – Corporate parenting

Section 51 – Application of Part: children and young people

Subsection (2)(b) – Power to extend eligibility for corporate parenting support to additional descriptions of formerly looked after young persons

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

44. A new subsection (2) was added to section 51 by amendment at Stage 2. It inserts a new power to allow the Scottish Ministers to extend the application of Part 7, and therefore the eligibility for Corporate Parenting support, to such persons who are between the ages of 16 and 26 and who are not of the description in section 51(1)(b)(ii) but are of such other description of person formerly but no longer looked after by a Local Authority, as they may specify by order.
Reason for taking this power

45. Taking this power will allow Ministers to, in the future, widen the application of Part 7 of the Bill to new groups of young people who have been formerly looked after, effectively extending eligibility criteria for Corporate Parenting support under that Part.

Choice of Procedure

46. The higher level of scrutiny afforded by affirmative procedure is more appropriate than negative to allow Parliament to debate the merits of extending Corporate Parenting support to new categories of young people who were formerly looked after. This is achieved by adding the power to section 77(2) of the Bill.

Section 52 – Corporate parenting responsibilities

Subsection (2) – Power to modify Section 52(1) to add, remove or vary the list of corporate parenting duties and to apply different duties to different corporate parents

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

47. This order-making power allows the Scottish Ministers to modify section 52(1) to confer, remove or vary a duty on Corporate Parents. The power also allows Ministers to provide that section 52(1) is to be read, in relation to a particular Corporate Parent or Corporate Parents of a particular description, with a modification conferring, removing or varying a duty.

Reason for taking this power

48. It is useful to be able to adjust the duties of Corporate Parents in light of the experience of these provisions taking effect and the Corporate Parent role in practice evolving over time. A power to amend section 52 gives the flexibility to allow what may be progressive adjustments to be made without the requirement of primary legislation to make the changes. The power to apply certain duties to certain Corporate Parents would also allow for more duties to be tailored for particular Corporate Parents which might not be appropriate to apply to all Corporate Parents listed in Schedule 3.

Choice of Procedure

49. As the new power in section 52(2) is a power to modify primary legislation it is thought that affirmative procedure is appropriate and this is achieved by adding the power to section 77(2). Affirmative procedure affords Parliament a higher level of scrutiny and to debate the merits of any proposed addition of new duties or variation or removal of existing duties in section 52. The power is also wide enough to allow the modification in relation to particular Corporate Parents and, again, modifying the application of primary legislation in this way merits affirmative procedure being used.

Part 8 – Aftercare

Section 60 – Provision of aftercare to young people

Subsection (2) – Inserting new Section 29(1)(b) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995

- Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
- Revised or new power: New
- Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

50. This provision inserts a new section 29(1)(b) of the 1995 Act to allow Ministers to extend eligibility for Aftercare support to such descriptions of formerly but no longer looked after persons, as they may specify by order.

Reason for taking this power

51. Taking this power will allow Ministers to, in the future, widen the application of section 29 of the 1995 Act to new groups of young people who have been formerly looked after, effectively extending eligibility criteria for Aftercare under that section.

Choice of Procedure

52. The higher level of scrutiny afforded by affirmative procedure is more appropriate than negative to allow Parliament to debate the merits of extending this type of support to new categories of young people who were formerly looked after. This is achieved by provision made in new section 29(1A) of the 1995 Act.

Section 60 – Provision of aftercare to young people

Subsection (3) – Inserting new Section 30(2)(b)(ii) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995

- Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
- Revised or new power: New
- Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

53. This provision inserts a new section 30(2)(b)(ii) of the 1995 Act to allow Ministers to extend eligibility for financial assistance towards expenses of education or training under that section to such descriptions of formerly but no longer looked after persons, as they may specify by order.
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (SP Bill 27A)

Reason for taking this power

54. Taking this power will allow Ministers to, in the future, widen the application of section 30 of the 1995 Act to new groups of young people who were formerly looked after, effectively extending eligibility for financial assistance towards the expenses of education or training under that section.

Choice of Procedure

55. The higher level of scrutiny afforded by affirmative procedure is more appropriate than negative to allow Parliament to debate the merits of extending this type of support to new categories of young people who were formerly looked after. This is achieved by provision made in new section 30(2A) of the 1995 Act.

Part 8A – Continuing care

Section 60A – Inserting new section 26A into the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 – various order making powers

Powers conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Powers exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

56. This provision inserts a new Part 8A on Continuing care which inserts a new section 26A into the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. New section 26A places a duty on Local Authorities to provide “continuing care” to “eligible persons” who cease to be looked after by them. “Continuing care” is defined in new section 26A(4) and “eligible person” in subsection (2) as meaning a person who is at least sixteen years of age and is not yet such higher age as may be specified. Subsection (6) provides that a Local Authority’s duty to provide continuing care lasts, subject to subsection (7), until the expiry of such period as may be specified. “Specified” is defined in subsection (12) as meaning specified by order made by the Scottish Ministers.

57. Subsections (5) and (7) respectively set out when the duty to provide continuing care does not apply and when it ceases. Subsection (8) provides, for the purposes of subsection (7)(b), examples of situations in which accommodation ceases to become available. Subsection (9) takes powers for Scottish Ministers to, by order –

(a) make provision about when or how a local authority is to consider whether subsection (5)(c) or (7)(c) is the case (i.e. when or how they consider that providing or continuing to provide the care would significantly adversely affect the welfare of the person);
(b) modify subsection (5) so as to add, remove or vary a situation in which the duty to provide continuing care does not apply;
(c) modify subsection (7) or (8) so as to add, remove or vary a situation in which the duty to provide continuing care ceases.

58. Subsection (11) provides that orders made under new section 26A may make different provision for different purposes and are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Reason for taking these powers

59. Taking the power in subsection (2) to specify the upper age of an “eligible person” and the power in subsection (6) to specify the period for which the Local Authority’s duty to provide care lasts in subsection (6) will allow Ministers to extend the eligibility for continuing care over the coming years to additional cohorts of young persons with the eventual policy aim that it be available to all care leavers up to the age of 21.

60. Taking the order-making powers contained in subsection (9) will allow Ministers to add, remove or vary the situations in which the duty to provide continuing care either does not apply or ceases to apply. This will allow Ministers to modify subsections (5), (7) or (8) in light of experience of the duty being operated in practice so that, for example, if a particular situation in (5) is framed too widely or too restrictively it can be varied or if it comes to light that a new situation in which accommodation ceases to be available needs to be added to subsection (8) it can be done by order. It is also conceivable that, for example, in modifying the situations in subsections (5) or (7), different provision may need to be made for different purposes and so that is why the power in subsection (11)(a) is sought.

Choice of Procedure

61. The higher level of scrutiny afforded by affirmative procedure is more appropriate than negative to allow Parliament to debate the merits of extending eligibility for continuing care to additional cohorts of young care leavers. Also, as the powers in subsection (9) include powers to modify primary legislation, it is, therefore, appropriate to attach affirmative procedure to those particular powers.

Part 11 – Adoption Register

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register (inserting new chapter 1A after section 13 of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007)

Section 13C – Supply of information for the Register
Subsection (3) – Inserting new paragraph to section 13C(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative
Provision

62. A new paragraph is being inserted into section 13C(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 by amendment at Stage 2. This provision creates a new power to prescribe in regulations circumstances in which adoption agencies will not be required to disclose information to Scotland’s Adoption Register.

Reason for taking this power

63. This power will allow Ministers to prescribe in regulations any circumstances in which an adoption agency, despite the requirement in section 13C(1) to provide information, is not to disclose prescribed information to the Register. At the same time, section 13C(2) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 (as added by section 68 of the Bill), which requires the consent of certain persons before the disclosure of information to the Adoption Register, is being removed. It is anticipated that the circumstances in which information is not to be disclosed to the Register prescribed by regulations may include circumstances where consent may be an issue.

Choice of Procedure

64. Affirmative procedure allows for a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny, which is considered appropriate. This is achieved by paragraph 9(5) of Schedule 4 to the Bill which amends section 117(5)(ia) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Section 13DA — Fees and other payments

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision

65. New section 13DA is being added to the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 by amendment at Stage 2. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of that new section directly replace existing sections 13C(3)(c) and 13D(3)(d). Section 13DA(c) contains a new power to prescribe in regulations under section 13A(2) fees to be paid by adoption agencies or payments to be made by them in relation to the Adoption Register.

Reason for taking this power

66. The new section brings the provisions for fees and payments in relation to the Adoption Register together in one place and the new power will enable Scottish Ministers to prescribe in regulations any fees to be paid or payments to be made by adoption agencies in relation to the Register. This new power addresses the concerns of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee expressed in their Stage 1 Report with regard to the provision in section 13B(1)(b) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 for payments to be made in relation to the Register, in particular that any provision for payments should be clear and accessible to those affected.

Choice of Procedure

67. Affirmative procedure allows for a more detailed level of Parliamentary scrutiny, which is considered appropriate. This is achieved by paragraph 9(5) of Schedule 4 to the Bill which amends section 117(5)(ia) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Part 11A – School closure proposals, etc.

Section 68E – Inserting new section 17B (Review by the Panel) into the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010

Provision

68. Part 11A of the Bill makes a number of amendments to the process for School Closure proposals under the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 (the 2010 Act). Section 68E adds section 17B to the 2010 Act (Review by the Panel) and section 17B(5) provides a power for Scottish Ministers to make provision in regulations as to the procedures to be followed by a School Closure Review Panel in carrying out a review under section 17B(1).

Reason for taking this power

69. The reason for taking this power is to provide the Scottish Ministers with a power to set out in regulations the procedures that Panels are to follow in carrying out a review of a School Closure proposal under the 2010 Act. This is a useful power to ensure that Ministers can specify procedures for the Panels to follow in carrying out their review of a School Closure proposal once called in by Ministers if it is decided that such regulations are necessary either at the point the Panels are set up or at a later point to address any issues that have arisen during their operation, for example, in carrying out their first reviews. The Panels will be new, so it appropriate to provide this power in case it is required. It is appropriate that these procedures and any revisions to them should be set out in regulations rather than primary legislation, given they will relate to procedures and processes to be followed by the Panels as opposed to anything more substantive.

Choice of Procedure

70. Negative procedure is considered to be appropriate for these regulations, which would set out the detail of procedures that Panels were to follow in carrying out a review of a School Closure proposal once called in by Ministers. The provision to be set out in regulations will be technical and procedural in nature rather than affecting the powers or responsibilities of a School Closure Review Panel, therefore, it is not considered that a higher level of Parliamentary scrutiny is required.
This document relates to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (SP Bill 27A)

Section 68E – Inserting new section 17A which introduces new Schedule 2A (School Closure Review Panels) into the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010

</tbody>

Provision

71. Section 68E of the Bill also inserts a new section 17A (Referral to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels) into the 2010 Act which provides that the Scottish Ministers must refer any School Closure proposal once called in under section 17 of the 2010 Act to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panel. New section 17A also introduces new Schedule 2A (School Closure Review Panel) into the 2010 Act. Paragraph 1(9) of Schedule 2A allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations regarding the appointment of the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels. These regulations may cover eligibility for and disqualification from appointment, the Convener’s tenure and removal from office, remuneration arrangements, and any other matters in relation to the appointment of the Convener which the Scottish Ministers think fit.

Reason for taking this power

72. It is considered that it is more appropriate to provide for the administrative and procedural aspects in relation to appointment of the Convener in regulations rather than in the primary legislation, given the level of detail that is likely to be required. It is also considered that it would be useful to have the flexibility to change the administrative aspects of the appointment process if the need arises and that doing so through primary legislation would not be an effective use of Parliamentary time.

Choice of Procedure

73. The regulations are subject to negative procedure given the administrative and technical nature of the provision that is to be made in them. The negative procedure is considered to offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expediency and convenience and on the other, the need for scrutiny for a provision of this nature.
Section 68E – Inserting new section 17A (Referral to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels) which introduces new Schedule 2A (School Closure Review Panels) into the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Negative

Provision

74. Section 68E in new Part 11A of the Bill inserts section 17A (Referral to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels) into the 2010 Act and new section 17A introduces new Schedule 2A (School Closure Review Panel) into the 2010 Act. Paragraph 2(5) of Schedule 2A allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations about appointment and selection of members of the School Closure Review Panels. This includes eligibility for (and disqualification from) appointment, tenure and removal from office, the process for the selection of panel members, remuneration arrangements, and any other matters in relation to the appointment and selection of School Closure Review Panel members.

Reason for taking this power

75. The reason for taking this power is to provide for Scottish Ministers to set out clear arrangements for the appointment and selection of members of the School Closure Review Panels, ensuring that these Panels, who will operate independently and at arm’s length from Government, with members appointed by the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels, are subject to transparent and accountable appointment procedures. Making this provision in regulations is appropriate given the level of detail that is likely to be required and the desirability for flexibility to update these arrangements over time as the need arises.

Choice of Procedure

76. The regulations are subject to negative procedure given the administrative and procedural nature of the provision that can be made in them. The negative procedure is considered to offer an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, expedition and convenience and, on the other, the need for scrutiny for a provision of this nature.
Part 12 – Other Reforms

Section 71A – Power of Scottish Ministers to provide for children’s legal aid to be available to other persons in relation to court proceedings

New section 28LA of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986

- Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
- Revised or New Power: New
- Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative

Provision

77. Section 71A(3) inserts section 28LA into the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 (“the 1986 Act”). Subsection (1) provides the Scottish Ministers with a regulation-making power to make children’s legal aid available for specified court proceedings under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (“the 2011 Act”) to specified persons, other than where children’s legal aid is already available. The power includes the power to vary or remove the children’s legal aid previously made available.

78. Subsections (2) to (5) make provision as to the eligibility tests which must be used in any regulations made by the Scottish Ministers under subsection (1). The tests will be applied by the Scottish Legal Aid Board. The tests reflect the existing tests, under sections 28D, 28E and 28F of the 1986 Act, which already apply to children and other persons.

Reason for taking power

79. The power is needed to allow Scottish Ministers to make children’s legal aid available for court proceedings under the 2011 Act to persons other than in the circumstances already covered by provisions of the 1986 Act. One instance of potential use of the power has already been identified in respect of individuals to whom section 126 of the 2011 Act applies. The power would be exercised in respect of court proceedings involving those individuals at first instance and on appeal.

80. However, this may not be the only situation in which the power is needed – hence the general nature of the power. Other examples of persons in respect of whom the power might be used are a child who has now become an adult, or a person has formerly been a relevant person.

81. It was previously thought that section 28L of the 1986 Act was sufficient in respect of court proceedings, but further investigation has shown that that power is not suitable other than in respect of children’s hearings.

82. The power being taken maintains consistency with other provisions of the 1986 Act in respect of the eligibility tests which applicants must satisfy in order for children’s legal aid to be provided.
Choice of procedure

83. The regulation-making power is subject to affirmative procedure. This is consistent with the similar existing power under section 28L of the 1986 Act, and other provisions of the 1986 Act regarding eligibility for legal aid. The Scottish Government considers that affirmative power is appropriate as it allows the Parliament to consider the impact and need for any regulations which the Scottish Ministers bring forward. The Government recognises these are important matters requiring thorough Parliamentary scrutiny.

PART C – OTHER MATTERS RAISED BY THE DPLRC

Guidance and Direction-making powers

84. In paragraphs 17, 24 and 86 of their 50th Report, 2013 (Session) 4, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee asked the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to require the publication of any guidance or directions issued by the Scottish Ministers under the powers contained in sections 28(1), 29(1), 39(1), 40(1) and 74(3).

85. After consideration of these points, Scottish Government amendments were brought forward at Stage 2 of the Bill to amend the various guidance and direction-making powers across the Bill to make them more consistent with each other. Also, a new general section on guidance and directions was inserted in Part 13 (section 77A) which draws together the common elements of all these powers and includes a requirement that the Scottish Ministers must publish (in such manner as they consider appropriate) any guidance or directions issued by them under the Bill. This is in response to the points raised by the Committee and the requirement covers any guidance or directions issued under the Bill and not just those highlighted in the Committee’s 50th Report.

Requirement to publish arrangements (authorisation to perform functions and provision for payments) relating to Scotland’s Adoption Register

86. At paragraphs 63 and 64 of the Committee’s 50th Report, they drew to the lead Committee’s attention the duty of Scottish Ministers to make arrangements for the establishment and maintenance of Scotland’s Adoption Register contained in new section 13A of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 as read with new section 13B (both inserted by section 68 of the Bill). In particular the Committee was concerned that any arrangements which authorise the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of Scotland’s Adoption Register to be carried out by a registration organisation and provide for payments to be made to such an organisation should be clear and accessible to those affected by them.

87. In light of these concerns, new section 13B was amended at Stage 2 to provide that the Scottish Ministers must publish arrangements under section 13A(1) so far as they authorise a registration organisation to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register. New section 13B(1)(b) was also amended to make it clear that any arrangements made by the Scottish Ministers authorising a registration organisation to run the Adoption Register may include provision for payments to be made by the Scottish Ministers to that organisation. A new section 13DA(c) which was inserted at Stage 2 will allow regulations made by the Scottish Ministers under 13A(2) to prescribe fees and other payments and this is covered earlier in this Memorandum at paragraphs 65 to 67.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered correspondence received on school closures relating to written evidence from Argyll and Bute Council submitted for the evidence session it held on 3 December.

The Committee—

- noted the written and oral evidence received on school closures including comments made during the stage 2 meeting on 21 January;
- considered it was adequately informed to consider the amendments, which were designed to avoid any recurrence of problems which had happened and provide clarity and transparency;
- agreed that the evidence from Argyll and Bute Council concerning its processes around school closures did not influence the approach members took on stage 2 amendments;
- agreed that deliberately misleading a parliamentary committee was a serious matter;
- agreed to take no further action in respect of the written evidence submitted by Argyll and Bute Council;
- agreed to bring this minute to the attention of all relevant parties;
- agreed to publish a redacted version of the correspondence received, taking into account relevant data protection legislation, along with the clerk’s covering paper.

Rural School Closures and the evidence from Argyll and Bute Council

Purpose
This paper brings to members’ attention 5 written submissions received following the 3 December evidence session on school closures. This note summarises these communications (which are attached at Annexe A).

Background
The Committee held an evidence session on 3 December to inform their understanding prior to considering government amendments to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill on school closures.

In July 2011 the Scottish Government and COSLA agreed the membership and remit for the Commission on the Delivery of Rural Education (the Commission). In June 2012 the Commission agreed to delay its findings pending the outcome of a judicial review on school closures in the Eilean Siar.

The Commission published its recommendations in April 2013 following the conclusion of legal proceedings and the Scottish Government accepted all but one of the 38 recommendations and announced it would legislate in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

In July 2013, the Scottish Government wrote to local authorities describing the court’s interpretation of the 2010 Act as:

“represent(ing) a significant shift in the role of Ministers in the call-in and determination of school closure cases. Previously Ministers looked only at whether the correct processes and procedures as set out in the 2010 Act had been followed”

SPICe prepared a full briefing for the Committee which covered the pattern of school closures since 1995. It gave an overview of policy developments leading to the 2010 Act, the new process under that Act and developments since which led to the current proposals for change.

On 3 December the Committee took oral evidence from 2 panels of witnesses including local authority education officials, one of whom was a member of the Commission as well as Sandy Longmuir, the Chairman of Scottish Rural Schools Network. The Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning, Michael Russell and officials also gave evidence. This session was supported by written submissions including from Argyll and Bute Council.

Although raising no concerns in oral evidence Mr Longmuir subsequently e-mailed the Committee complaining that the written evidence from Argyll and Bute Council contained “several misrepresentations”. Subsequently further written evidence was received from the Council which elaborated on the earlier evidence. The Committee considered these in private on 10 December and indicated no action was required.

Amendments to the Bill introducing changes to the procedure for rural school closures were lodged by the Government on 13 January and agreed by the Committee on 21 January.

On 13 and 14 January five e-mails were received concerning the evidence session on 3 December. These are summarised in the following section.

Communications received

i. Councillor Michael Breslin indicates his role in the council process to agree the written submission.

ii. Mr Longmuir provides his interpretation of historical events which led to the amendments suggesting that a basic (emphasis added) understanding of what went wrong is essential reading to make good legislation. He also expresses concern that members were not adequately informed of issues.

iii. [Redacted] focusses exclusively on the behaviour of an elected official.

iv. [Redacted] comments on the reliability of Mr Longmuir.

v. Mike MacKenzie MSP suggests that Argyll and Bute’s written evidence was “misleading and a misinterpretation of the truth” and “may have influenced the Committee in its scrutiny”. He further asks that the Bill safeguard parents and communities (rights). Finally he observes that this has “the wider implication of casting doubt on the integrity of the Parliamentary process.”

Action

Members are invited to consider, in the light of the communications received, what, if any, action they wish to take in relation to these communications. In summary there appears to be three questions:-

- Do members consider they were adequately informed to consider the amendments on school closures?
- Did the evidence from Argyll and Bute council concerning their consultation exercise influence the approach members took to the amendments on school closures?
- Do members wish to take any action in respect of the written evidence submitted by Argyll and Bute council?

Subject: Argyll & Bute's evidence to the Education Committee

Dear Mr Maxwell

I am one of the elected members of Argyll & Bute Council who was very concerned at the evidence provided to your committee by my council, both verbally and in writing. I am writing to you in a personal capacity since I cannot speak for the council on this issue. I will keep this as brief as I can but my concerns were:

- The written evidence was tabled as a last minute paper to the November meeting of the council. I wasn’t a councillor at the time of the school closure debacle but I did take an interest in it, primarily due to the poor standard of papers that were produced and the allegations, later substantiated, that a number of them contained inaccurate information.

- At the November council meeting I didn’t spot the factual errors in the tabled paper and my only excuse for that is that I wasn’t as fully informed as others of what happened in the previous life of the council.

- I was greatly concerned when I later discovered that some of the information was inaccurate. I took the view that the council itself had been misled in November and subsequently the education committee.

- Despite only being a councillor since May 2012, this is far from the first time I have had misleading information given to me. Often it’s misleading by omission rather than what happened here.

- The defence offered subsequently doesn’t wash I’m afraid. I do accept that this wasn’t a full history of events but the potted version was plainly inaccurate in the way it described what were in fact formal consultations on 26 possible school closures as informal ones. Even a potted history has to be accurate.

- I think there are 2 possible reasons why this may have happened. One is that a mistake was made, albeit an inexplicable one. In that event, all that we needed to do was say sorry, here is the corrected version. But we didn’t do that I regret to say. The other possible reason is one I will leave to you.

I did raise this issue at the December meeting of the council but the reply I got was not satisfactory.
Please accept my personal apologies for the inaccurate information provided to your committee and I sincerely hope it never happens again. I am genuinely ashamed that this has happened.

Yours sincerely

Michael Breslin
Independent Councillor, Ward 7 Dunoon
Correspondence from Mr Sandy Longmuir

Dear Committee

It has been brought to my attention that Education Committee may be under the impression that I am "content" with the supplementary written evidence supplied by Argyll & Bute Council in respect of the events in late 2010. This is far from the truth but before I explain my objections in any detail I feel it is essential that Education Committee understands just why this is so important.

1) We are just about to see amendments brought forward on an Act of Parliament which is still under 4 years old and which was voted through unopposed with the universal support of the then Education Committee. Questions have to be asked as to why the Schools (Consultation) Act 2010 has fallen so short of what Parliament intended for it? In my opinion it is impossible to look forwards towards improvement without an understanding of why it has been seen to fail in important respects. Any search of the official report will show a number of examples of where the Act has been seen not to supply the intended improvement in consultation practices. By far the largest and most influential of these is undoubtedly the aborted formal consultation on 25 schools in Argyll from the 25th November 2010 until 5th January 2011. If we are to make good legislation and suitable amendments then a basic understanding of what went wrong here should be considered essential reading.

2) What has happened at Committee regrading the evidence supplied by Argyll & Bute Council is a microcosm of a situation which has faced community after community who have undergone school closure consultations. My own personal reasons for getting involved in the Parliamentary procedure was primarily because I was knowingly supplied false and inadequate information by Angus Council in 2004. I have now worked across the country on consultations in many of our rural areas and similar misrepresentations are commonplace. We have proven some of these to be simple errors and some incompetence. More still are a result of having a desired outcome and working backwards to present an argument for that outcome - thereby missing salient points which do not support the conclusion. The final category of misrepresentation of information is the most troubling. It is the calculated and deliberate decision to present false or inadequate information. We have consistently asked, not that no schools should close - that would be absurd - but that decisions should be taken on the best possible information and that there should be a deterrence for supplying false or inadequate information. Section 5 of the 2010 Act was supposed to present the solution to this problem but it has failed spectacularly in this regard. By far the most significant example of this was the events in Argyll in 2010 and the reaction of the Council to having the accuracy of their information challenged.

I personally could not believe that Argyll & Bute Council would dare to present the Scottish Parliament with similar airbrushing of history and the deliberate omission of pertinent facts that their communities now accept as commonplace. Local Councillors and elements of the local press who followed the events are similarly stunned by the portrayal of events. One member of the press contacted me with a supplementary explanation provided to him by the Council which his own records satisfied him as being nothing more than fabrication.
I copy below some detail as to why the information supplied to Parliament and press is far from adequate, especially in light of the fact that we are trying to amend legislation in a manner which will eradicate such behaviour. Some Councils have managed to operate within the legislation and have closed schools without the sky falling in on them. It should not be an impossible task to draft legislation which forces the worst to attain the standards of the best. It will be difficult if we do not understand what it is that the worst have been doing and fail to learn from it.

Best regards,

Sandy Longmuir

Argyll & Bute Council launched a FORMAL consultation under the terms of the Schools (Consultation) Act 2010 on the 25th November 2010 and withdrew all the proposals in complete disarray on the 5th January 2011.

It was remarkable that the first submission from Argyll & Bute Council failed entirely to mention those events and instead listed the preliminary events to the second formal consultation as "informal" and a "review process". Presenting evidence in this manner was clearly designed to draw Parliament's attention away from scrutiny of what was a disastrous consultation process.

The second attempt at informing Committee and Parliament is in some ways worse. When you couple this with attempts to persuade the local press with further inaccuracies it would appear that there have been further attempts to prevent accurate scrutiny ahead of legislation.

The detail supplied regarding events between November 2010 and March 2011 is very restricted in terms of actual events and gives a very different impression of the reason for the failure of the 25 school consultation process. While the official reason given in Council minutes was a "political motion" this is not a true reflection of the position as viewed by almost everyone except those who voted for that motion. The real reason was that the consultation process had been destroyed by countless individuals who had explored vast amounts of errors and assumptions within the proposal documents. These documents were so badly flawed that it was impossible that they could have continued within any legal framework. At no time have the Council ever acknowledged something which is clearly understood by public, press and Parliament. This latest submission to Parliament simply continues this process of denial in the face of overwhelming evidence.

There is still an attempt to state that the list of 12 schools taken forward in March is somehow a "short list" derived from the "long list" of 25 schools formally consulted on. This is confused by emails from the Council to local press sources which state that the "informal" consultation referred to in the first submission was in fact visits to the 25 schools by the Education Spokesperson following the collapse of the statutory consultations.

All of this is yet again another attempt to rewrite well known history after the event.
The motion on the 5th January 2011 clearly instructs officers to draw up a "NEW" list of schools to consult and not simply to narrow the existing list to a shorter one. This is reinforced by the fact that not all of the 12 schools on the second list were in the original "long list" of 25. (How can you add new items to a short list derived from a long one?)

Despite efforts to say the the Education Spokesperson visited the 25 schools in informal consultation, this is again confounded by the fact that she claimed to have visited 66 schools in preparing the NEW list. The new schools added to the list of 12 schools not in the previous list of 25 WERE included in the list of 66 schools visited.

This is a Council determined that the events of 2010/11 are not revisited and that the real causes of the collapse of the consultation process is not explored, understood and used to inform the legislative process.

This behaviour is a recurring theme within this Council. Time and again during the process the Council used evasive and diversionary tactics to obscure errors and changes of position during the process. I give an example below from one of my Argyll colleagues...

"Not the first time he has airbrushed history to cover this tracks. Anyone remember when [redacted] was suddenly removed from his role in the school closure proposal – strangely enough just after his role in the entire process was clearly shown to be totally lacking in the independence the council claimed he had.

[Name] was challenged then to explain why he had been deemed surplus to requirements. His response (sent to an elected member by e-mail on 16 December 2010) was

"[Name] was engaged to provide an input to the informal consultation only and was therefore involved in the process that recommended that the school estate be reviewed. To ensure there would be no allegations of partiality in the subsequent statutory consultation we are looking to appoint someone unconnected with the earlier exercise. There is no inference to be drawn from this approach regarding [name] credentials which are of a national standing."

This response might have had a degree of credibility if it were not for the fact that in Annex 2 of the ‘Review of School Estate’ papers submitted to full Council on 2 November 2010 [redacted] recommended that Members:

"Agree to delegate power to the Executive Director of Community Services and the Head of Education to procure the services of [redacted] as an Education Consultant to support the statutory consultation process in accordance with the accompanying report, Review of the School Estate – Consultation Process ."

Somewhere between 2 November 2010 and 16 December 2010 [redacted] appeared to have erased his desire to procure the services of [redacted] to support the consultation process and replaced it with a desire to avoid 'allegations of partiality'.

Education Committee has just become subject to exactly the type of tactic that school communities were regularly treated to. Although this type of practice was at its most prolific in Argyll it remains a feature of consultation practices throughout Scotland. It is vitally important that those in charge of legislation are fully aware of the shifting sands of truth - especially when they have been victims to it themselves.

Correspondence from [redacted]

Dear Mike and Stewart,

I am writing with regards the evidence submitted to the Education Committee by Argyll & Bute Council on the Provision of Rural Education.

From analysis of the submission, I can see that [redacted] has been as accurate in this as he was in the ridiculously inept and flawed closure proposals he put forward which triggered this whole need for the commission's investigation to take place.

In particular, I am wishing to point out [redacted] in this section:

"From that feedback the Council undertook a review of its school estate and identified an initial long leet of 26 primary schools it wished to conduct an informal consultation on with communities to explore school mergers. 2.2 Following a further review of the proposals this long leet was reduced to a short leet of 12 proposed school mergers on which the Council proposed to conduct a statutory consultation in terms of the Schools Consultation (Scotland) Act 2010. The consultation commenced on 3rd May 2011 with an intended end date of 30th June 2011 and the programme of public meetings for each school commenced in May 2011. The programme was ceased following the Council's consideration of the request from the Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning for a moratorium on school closures and the establishment of the Commission for Rural Education".

May I first point out, that these events took place in 2010, not 2011 as stated, however I believe this is a simple oversight.

The list of 26 schools were NEVER consulted upon and I have documentation from the Council to prove this.

During the school closures I submitted a Freedom of Information request to A&BC for copies of the letters sent to my children's school inviting us to the "consultation" on education. As you can see from the attached response, 2 letter were sent. One to our HT and one to the then chair of the Parent Council. At no point on the letter does it mention school closures specifically and nowhere does it state that our school, Luss Primary was one of the 26 being "informally" consulted upon.

Also with this FOI request is a copy of the outcome of these meetings, a summary of the feedback from the attendees instead of minutes and you can see that there is no mention of any specific schools being named for closure and certainly not a list of 26.

You can also obtain through A&BC's website, documents from the 17th of May 2010 where it clearly states the council are agreeing that [redacted] can investigate where savings in the school estate can be made, it does not give him permission to informally consult on the closure of any specific school or a list of candidates.
The list of 26 schools quite clearly, did not exist at this point and not during the informal meetings held throughout June 2010.

repeatedly lied throughout the school closures debacle and how he remains in post is a bafflement to me, especially as his behaviour seems to be continuing to have such a loose connection to telling the truth.

I have now heard the he has tried to respond to the allegations that his version of events are inaccurate and misleading, however I wish to make it clear, he is lying yet again. I can provide further proof of "form" with documents from during the consultation on my children's school.

As a member of the and the I am disgusted that continues to play God with our children and our communities by manipulating the truth and lying to cover his tracks.

I would like this deception to be pointed out to the Education Committee.

Kind regards
Correspondence from John

Dear Mike,

Further to my previous communication I am alarmed that Argyll & Bute Council has attempted to gloss over its grossly misleading evidence with further misleading evidence. I am very clear, as a member of the Commission for the delivery of rural education, that Sandy Longmuir cannot be challenged. He was involved in the Argyll & Bute debacle from the earliest murmurs and gained the respect and absolute trust of parents across the region. His records are accurate and his attention to detail is forensic. Further, he will not allow inaccuracy from fellow campaigners. You can be certain that his letter to the committee contains the absolute and provable truth.

Conversely, our collective experience of Argyll & Bute Council and the committee in particular is that error, manipulation and untruths are ingrained in every document. We are however aghast that they seem to hold MSPs in the same contempt in which they held parents, children, teachers and communities. I very much hope the committee will take a dim and serious view of such blatant lies. There is more at stake here than schools. Democracy is not served at all when officials feel they can operate however they like with complete impunity. Please do all you can to ensure this council is dragged into the light of the twenty-first century and held to account.
Correspondence from Mike MacKenzie MSP

Dear Stewart,

Please accept my apologies for the delay in replying. I am afraid that I am unimpressed by the latest communication from Argyll and Bute Council but I wanted to discuss these issues with parents and others affected by the Argyll and Bute school closures programme and also and importantly with the then Convenor of Education at Argyll and Bute Council who has only this weekend returned from a holiday in Australia. I felt it important to do so to be absolutely sure that Sandy Longmuir’s and my own concerns were shared by others who had been involved.

Opinion amongst those I have talked to is unanimous that the evidence presented to the Education Committee is misleading and a misrepresentation of the truth. There is concern that this may have influenced the Committee in its scrutiny.

There is a further perhaps more fundamental concern where parents and communities feel that they have been the victims of a lack of good faith on the part of the Council, feel that their schools are still under threat of closure and wonder if it is possible for the Parliament to provide any safeguards in respect of a Council who will apparently misrepresent issues material to school closures not just to themselves as parents but also to the Parliament.

I would therefore ask if the Committee could consider what steps it could take to remedy this unfortunate situation bearing in mind that I consider this to have the wider implication of casting doubt on the integrity of the Parliamentary process.

Best Regards

Mike

INTRODUCTION

1. At its meeting on 4 February 2014, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee considered the delegated powers provisions in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 ("the Bill")\(^1\). The Committee submits this report to the Parliament under Rule 9.7.9 of Standing Orders.

2. In broad outline, the Bill concerns the rights and wellbeing of children and young people, and the duties of public authorities to support children, young people and their families. It places duties on the Scottish Ministers and other public authorities in line with the requirements of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, and amends the powers of the Children’s Commissioner to enable investigations to be conducted in relation to individual children and young people.

3. The Bill also makes provision about the way public services work to support children and young people, by providing for a single planning approach for children who need additional support from services ("child’s plans") and creating a single point of contact around every child or young person (the "named person service"). It also requires authorities which provide children’s services to have a coordinated approach to planning and delivery of those services, and makes provision about the approach to assessing the wellbeing of children and young people.

4. The Bill also extends the duties of local authorities to provide early learning and childcare for pre-school age children and extends the support available to looked after children and young people leaving care. It makes provision for counselling services and other forms of assistance to be made available to parents and kinship carers, and creates a statutory adoption register for Scotland.

\(^1\) Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_Bills/Children%20and%20Young%20People%20(Scotland)%20Bill/b27as4-stage2-amend-rev.pdf
5. Finally, the Bill amends existing legislation which affects children and young people by creating a new right to appeal a local authority decision to place a child in secure accommodation, and by making procedural and technical arrangements in the areas of children’s hearings support arrangements and school closures.

6. The Scottish Government has provided the Parliament with a supplementary memorandum on the delegated powers provisions in the Bill, in advance of Stage 3 of the Bill (“the SDPM”).

7. The Committee reported on certain matters in relation to the delegated powers provisions in the Bill at Stage 1 in its 50th report of 2013.

DELEGATED POWERS PROVISIONS

8. The Committee considered each of the new or substantially amended delegated powers provisions in the Bill after Stage 2.

9. After Stage 2, the Committee reports that it does not need to draw the attention of the Parliament to the new or substantially amended delegated powers provisions listed below and that it is content with the Parliamentary procedure to which they are subject:

- Section 43 – Duty to secure provision of Early Learning and Childcare. Subsection (2)(c)(ii) – Power to specify additional categories of eligible pre-school child
- Section 50 – Corporate Parents. Subsection (4) – Expansion of power to modify Schedule 3 contained in section 50(2)
- Section 61 – Provision of counselling services to parents and others. Subsection (2)(b) – Power to specify another description of an “eligible child”
- Section 64 – Assistance in relation to kinship care orders. Subsection (4)(b) – Power to specify another description of an “eligible child”
- Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register insofar as inserting section 13A and section 13DA of the Adoption and Children (Scotland ) Act 2007 – Scotland’s Adoption Register
- Section 31 – Child’s Plan: Requirement. Subsection (5) – Power to specify persons whose views should be taken into account in deciding whether a child requires a child’s plan.

• Section 33 – Preparation of a child’s plan. Subsection (6) and (8)(b) – Power to specify persons whose views should be taken into account in preparing a child’s plan, and to make provision requiring or permitting a copy of the plan to be given to particular persons

• Section 37 – Child’s Plan – Management. Subsection (2)(b) – Power to specify persons whose views should be taken into account in reviewing a child’s plan

• Section 38 – Assistance in relation to child’s plan. Subsection (6) – Power to modify schedule 2A

• New Part 6A – Section 49A: Duty to consult and plan in relation to power to provide school education for pre-school children

• New Part 6B – Section 49B: Duty to consult and plan in relation to day care and out of school care

• Section 51 – Application of Part: children and young people. Subsection (2)(b) – Power to extend eligibility for corporate parenting support to additional descriptions of formerly looked after young persons

• Section 60 – Provision of aftercare to young people. Subsection (2) – Inserting new section 29(1)(b) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995

• Section 60 – Provision of aftercare to young people. Subsection (3) – Inserting new section 30(2)(b)(ii) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995

• Section 68E(4) – Inserting new section 17B (Review by the Panel) into the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010

• Section 68E(5) – Inserting new schedule 2A (School Closure Review Panels) into the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 paragraphs 1(9) and 2(5)

• Section 71A(3) – Power to provide for children’s legal aid to be available to other persons in relation to court proceedings (inserting new section 28LA of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986)

• Section 77A: Guidance and directions – requirement to publish guidance and directions.

10. The Committee’s comments and, where appropriate, recommendations on the other delegated powers in the Bill are detailed below.

Section 52 – Corporate Parenting responsibilities
Subsection (2) – Power to modify section 52(1) to add, remove or vary the list of corporate parenting duties and to apply different duties to different corporate parents

11. Section 52(2)(a) allows the Scottish Ministers to modify section 52(1) by order to confer, remove or vary duties on corporate parents. Section 52(2)(b) also allows Ministers to provide that section 52(1) is to be read, in relation to a particular corporate parent or corporate parents of a particular description, with any modification conferring, removing or varying a duty.

12. The SDPM states that it is useful to be able to adjust the duties of corporate parents in light of the experience of these provisions taking effect and the corporate parent role in practice evolving over time. A power to amend section 52 gives the flexibility to allow what may be progressive adjustments to be made without the requirement of primary legislation to make the changes. The power to apply certain duties to certain corporate parents would also allow for more duties to be tailored for particular corporate parents which might not be appropriate to apply to all corporate parents listed in schedule 3.

13. The Committee considers this to be an important power since it allows Ministers to remove, add or vary new duties which are to be fulfilled by corporate parents. The Committee agrees with the Scottish Government that powers to modify duties set out in primary legislation, particularly in the manner proposed, merit the affirmative procedure.

14. At present the Bill applies all duties to all corporate parents. A further power will allow Ministers to alter this “one size fits all” model so as to tailor the duties to specific corporate parents or classes of corporate parent. The Committee finds this acceptable in principle. The power is framed in such a way that suggests the duties will become fragmented between primary legislation (which appears absolute in applying to all) and modifications in subordinate legislation. The Committee is concerned that the proposed structure could lead to confusion in determining which duties are owed by which authorities unless the interaction between the primary and secondary legislation is clear.

15. The Committee finds the power in section 52(2)(b) acceptable in principle and that it is subject to the affirmative procedure.

16. However, the Committee reports that it is concerned that the structure proposed by the power of a mandatory list of duties in primary legislation modified by subordinate legislation which requires those duties to be read in a different way could lead to confusion and a lack of clarity.
Part 8A – Continuing Care
Section 60A – Inserting new section 26A into the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 – various order making powers

Powers conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Powers exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

Provision
17. New part 8A inserts a new section 26A into the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 which places a duty on local authorities to provide “continuing care” to “eligible persons” who cease to be looked after by them. The provision confers several powers on the Scottish Ministers within this framework. Ministers have to specify the upper age limit of eligible persons (subsection (2)). Ministers also specify the period for which the duty to provide continuing care subsists (subsection (6)). Subsection (9) allows Ministers to modify the Bill to provide when the duty to provide continuing care does not apply or when it ceases. Subsection (11) provides that all powers under new section 26A may make different provision for different purposes.

18. The SDPM explains that the powers in subsections (2) and (6) will allow Ministers to extend the eligibility for continuing care over the coming years to additional cohorts of young persons on a staged basis with the eventual policy aim that it be available to all care leavers up to the age of 21.

19. The SDPM explains that subsection (9) will allow Ministers to add, remove or vary the situations in which the duty to provide continuing care either does not apply or ceases to apply in light of experience of the duty being operated in practice.

20. The Committee considers that the duty to provide continuing care for looked after children is a significant addition to the Bill. Within the framework provided by the Bill there are a number of powers which are themselves of importance in structuring the scope and application of the duty over time. As a result of these being inserted in the Bill at stage 2 the Committee does not have the opportunity to scrutinise the purpose of the power and its effects as effectively as it would at stage 1 since time does not permit it.

21. The powers offer maximum flexibility to Ministers to structure the duty and to vary the application of the duty over time in the manner they consider appropriate. Whilst it is understood that Ministers intend to “roll out” the duty to different cohorts over time, the power could be used very differently. Each of the powers is subject to the affirmative procedure which affords a high level of scrutiny and for active involvement by the Parliament but there is no requirement for consultation with local authorities, Social Care and Social Work Improvement Scotland or persons who may be affected. The Committee considers that the subject matter is of sufficient importance that some prior consultation with such persons should be required when using the delegated powers to alter the scope of the duty. This could also assist the Parliament in its scrutiny of proposals for the “roll out” of the duty.
22. The Committee reports that it is concerned that powers of this significance have been added at stage 2 which has reduced the scrutiny which the Committee has been able to apply.

23. The Committee recommends that there should be a requirement for consultation with local authorities, SCSWIS and persons representing the interests of looked after children before the powers are exercised.

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register inserting section 13C(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 – Supply of information for the Register

| Power conferred on: | The Scottish Ministers |
| Power exercisable by: | Regulations made by Scottish statutory instrument |
| Revised or new power: | New |
| Parliamentary Procedure: | Affirmative |

24. A new power has been inserted into section 13C(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 by amendment at Stage 2. This provision permits Ministers to prescribe circumstances in which adoption agencies must not disclose prescribed information concerning information relevant to Scotland’s Adoption Register despite the general duty to do so set out in section 13C(1). Section 13C(3)(a) provides that disclosure may be to a registration organisation rather than to the Scottish Ministers.

25. On introduction section 13C(2) required the consent of certain persons to be obtained before disclosure was required. That provision has been removed and replaced with the power in section 13C(3)(d) to prescribe circumstances in which the adoption agency is not to disclose information. The Scottish Government anticipates that the circumstances in which information is not to be disclosed may include circumstances where consent will be required.

26. Given the nature of the information to which the obligation on disclosure relates the Committee views the exercise of this power as significant in ensuring that the disclosure regime is compatible with ECHR rights. On introduction the requirement placed upon adoption agencies to provide the Scottish Ministers with information about children who ought to be placed for adoption and suitable adopters was tempered by a requirement for consent to that disclosure to be obtained from the child’s parents and any other prescribed persons. The requirement to obtain consent to disclosure has now been removed from the face of the Bill. In its place is a power which permits the Scottish Ministers to prescribe the circumstances in which prescribed information is not to be disclosed.

27. By removing the consent requirements from the face of the Bill Parliament has given up its control over them to the Ministers. The Committee considers this to be an issue of importance which it should draw to the Parliament’s attention. In so doing the Parliament has retained the ability to reject any proposed regulations under the affirmative procedure. But the Parliament can no longer insist on the Government bringing forward regulations which make consent to disclosure mandatory.

28. The Committee reports that it is concerned that the requirement for consent to be obtained for disclosure under section 13C of the 2007 Act has been removed from the face of the Bill and has been replaced with a power which enables Ministers to prescribe those circumstances in which disclosure is not permitted but which does not require consent to disclosure to be obtained.
1. The Committee reported on the delegated powers in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at stage 2 on 5 February 2014 in its 12th Report of 2014.

2. In its report the Committee invited the Scottish Government to respond in relation to three matters.

3. The first relates to the power to modify section 52(1) to add, remove or vary the list of corporate parenting duties and to apply different duties to different corporate parents. The Committee reported that it was concerned that the structure proposed by the power of a mandatory list of duties in primary legislation modified by subordinate legislation which requires those duties to be read in a different way could lead to confusion and a lack of clarity.

4. Secondly, insofar as section 60A, which inserts new section 26A into the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 is concerned, the Committee reported its concerns that powers of this significance had been added at stage 2 reducing the scrutiny which the Committee was able to apply.

5. Furthermore, with regard to inserted section 26A, the Committee recommended that there should be a requirement for consultation with local authorities, SCSWIS and persons representing the interests of looked after children before the powers are exercised.

6. Finally, in terms of section 68 insofar as it inserts section 13C(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007, the Committee reported its concerns that the requirement for consent to be obtained for disclosure under section 13C of the 2007 Act had been removed from the face of the Bill and had been replaced with a power enabling Ministers to prescribe those circumstances in which disclosure is not permitted but which does not require consent to disclosure to be obtained.

7. The response from the Scottish Government to these matters is attached at the Annex.

8. Members are invited to note the Scottish Government’s response and to make any comments they wish.
CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL AS AMENDED AT STAGE 2

Section 52 – Corporate Parenting responsibilities

Subsection (2) – Power to modify section 52(1) to add, remove or vary the list of corporate parenting duties and to apply different duties to different corporate parents

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

The Committee finds the power in section 52(2)(b) acceptable in principle and that it is subject to the affirmative procedure.

However, the Committee reports that it is concerned that the structure proposed by the power of a mandatory list of duties in primary legislation modified by subordinate legislation which requires those duties to be read in a different way could lead to confusion and a lack of clarity.

We note that the Committee finds the power in section 52(2)(b) of the Bill, which is subject to affirmative procedure, acceptable in principle.

We also note the Committee’s concerns about the structure of the proposed power, however, we do not agree that the exercise of the power could lead to confusion and a lack of clarity.

It is clear on reading section 52(2)(b) that the list of Corporate Parent duties in 52(1) has to be read in conjunction with any orders made under that power which provide for modifications in relation to particular Corporate Parents or Corporate Parents of a particular description. This is a clear signpost to the reader that they will have to look beyond section 52 to any secondary legislation made under the power to see the full extent of the duties that apply to particular Corporate Parents.

An alternative approach would have been to frame the power as a power to modify the text of section 52(1) itself so that any modifications of the listed duties for particular Corporate Parents are on the face of primary legislation. However, given the intention is that, in due course, the power may be exercised from time to time to tailor duties for particular parents, it is suggested that this approach would ultimately result in a rather unwieldy list of duties in section 52.

In practice, the Scottish Ministers will of course consult with the particular Corporate Parents who will be affected by the proposed exercise of the power in 52(2)(b) prior to such an order being made and so they will be well aware of the extent of the duties about to be placed on them. Also, it is intended that guidance issued by Scottish Ministers under section 57 of the Bill will be developed in collaboration with key stakeholders and will contain advice or information about how Corporate Parents should exercise their responsibilities and promote awareness of their responsibilities so that they are as well informed as possible as to the extent of their duties.

Part 8A – Continuing Care

Section 60A – Inserting new section 26A into the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 – various order making powers

Powers conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Powers exercisable by: Order made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

The Committee reports that it is concerned that powers of this significance have been added at stage 2 which has reduced the scrutiny which the Committee has been able to apply.

The Committee recommends that there should be a requirement for consultation with local authorities, SCSWIS and persons representing the interests of looked after children before the powers are exercised.

We note the Committee is concerned about the stage at which these powers have been added to the Bill, however, they have been pursued in response to an on-going campaign by stakeholders. Ministers were keen to have as full and detailed an engagement as possible with those stakeholders so that the provision ultimately met their aspirations. This on-going dialogue necessitated amendments being brought forward at Stage 2 rather than provision being made on Introduction.

We note the Committee’s comments in relation to these powers. Whilst we appreciate that there are a number of powers within new section 60A which will affect how Ministers “roll out” the new duty, they are subject to affirmative procedure to allow the Parliament the appropriate level of scrutiny when the proposals come before them.

We fully agree with the Committee about the importance of the subject matter and Ministers have committed to setting up a Blueprint Working Group to assist in the development of secondary legislation to be brought forward under the powers in new section 60A. This Working Group will be comprised of sectoral representatives, service providers, young people, Local Authorities and other relevant stakeholders and will be tasked with assisting the Scottish Government to develop the policy in consideration of appropriate timing, resourcing and infrastructure. This commitment has been well received by the representatives and is seen as an important continuation of the detailed dialogue conducted to date.

However, in light of the Committee’s comments and recommendation relating to consultation we have brought forward a Government amendment for Stage 3 which will insert a requirement for Ministers to consult Local Authorities and such other persons as they consider appropriate before they exercise the powers. In addition to the planned Working Group to develop the proposals in detail, this consultation requirement will ensure that all those with an interest are formally consulted before the order is made.

Section 68 – Scotland’s Adoption Register inserting section 13C(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 – Supply of information for the Register

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish statutory instrument
Revised or new power: New
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative

The Committee reports that it is concerned that the requirement for consent to be obtained for disclosure under section 13C of the 2007 Act has been removed from the face of the Bill and has been replaced with a power which enables Ministers to prescribe those circumstances in which disclosure is not permitted but which does not require consent to disclosure to be obtained.

During Stage 1 proceedings, Ministers were made aware by practitioners of real concerns about whether the absolute requirement at section 13C(2) for consent to be obtained was workable. In their written evidence to the Education and Culture Committee, the British Association of Adoption and Fostering (BAAF) expressed “extreme concern” about this absolute requirement. BAAF stated that if adoption agencies were required in all cases to first obtain the consent of parents or person with parental rights or responsibilities, this would result in fewer children being referred to the Register. It is BAAF’s experience that if parents’ consent is required for referral and parents are not in favour of plans for adoption, they will usually withhold consent. It was necessary to find a way to deal with this difficulty to ensure that the Register could operate as effectively as possible.

It was decided to remove from the Bill the absolute requirement for consent to be obtained from those persons named in the Bill or from persons who would have been prescribed in regulations. Ministers will instead prescribe in regulations circumstances in which an adoption agency is not to disclose information. Ministers do not have an unfettered discretion as to the exercise of this power, however, and in prescribing circumstances in which adoption agencies would not require to disclose information, will require to exercise the new power at section 13(3)(d) in a way which complies with Data Protection Act and ECHR requirements as to consent to the disclosure of information. Given the concerns expressed by stakeholders during Stage 1, it is considered appropriate to consult with all adoption agencies and other key stakeholders including BAAF about the regulations in order that the information may be disclosed to the Register in a way that addresses both the practical and legal issues in this regard.

February 2014
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered correspondence from the Scottish Government in response to its report on the Bill as amended at Stage 2.
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: After Stage 2

The Convener: Item 5 is the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. As members will recall, the committee agreed its report on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill as amended at stage 2 at last week’s meeting. The committee asked the Scottish Government to respond to concerns raised by the committee in its report. Members have seen the Scottish Government’s response. Do members have any comments to make?

John Scott (Ayr) (Con): I have a concern that, given the proposals and the withdrawals that have been made, the bill may not be fully compliant with the European convention on human rights. I know that we have the Government’s assurance that it intends to consult widely, but there is, on my part at any rate, an underlying concern. Given the recent history on ECHR compliance, I would like to make certain that all the i’s are dotted and the t’s are crossed at this stage, if that is possible.

Stewart Stevenson (Banffshire and Buchan Coast) (SNP): It is pretty clear that the bill itself appears to be ECHR compliant. The issue arises in relation to powers that could be exercised under the bill. Of course, that is probably quite common to bills, because it is always possible to draft powers that might step outside the ECHR. Of course, the committee will have the opportunity to consider secondary legislation as it is brought forward.

The Convener: Do other members have any comments? I am in your hands as to how we might proceed on this.

Stewart Stevenson: I propose that we simply accept it as it is and be grateful for the changes that have already been made.

Richard Baker (North East Scotland) (Lab): On the issue of compliance, what has already been highlighted by the committee is the importance of ministers consulting on regulations that are to be brought forward. Of course, the committee will have another chance to scrutinise the regulations when they come before us, and that process of consultation and scrutiny will be important. More generally, I think that our consideration of these proposals has shown the difficulty that can be caused by the short timescale between stages 2 and 3 of the bill process. I think that it is well worth our flagging up that issue again to ministers.

John Scott: I endorse that comment about the timescales being perhaps too short to allow us to fully assess and understand all the implications. That may need to be addressed in greater depth at a future date.

The Convener: Indeed. I think that that point is well understood. I think that we have made it already.

Stewart Stevenson: I have just a very brief point. It might be useful if our clerks ensure that the Standards, Procedures and Public Appointments Committee clerks are aware of this specific example, rather than simply the general case, which I think is probably understood already.

The Convener: Okay. On balance, is the committee content to note the Scottish Government’s response and await the subordinate legislation, whenever it comes through?

Members indicated agreement.

Apologies were received from Malcolm Chisholm.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the supplementary Financial Memorandum of the Bill as amended at Stage 2 from—

Philip Raines, Acting Deputy Director, Children’s Rights and Wellbeing Division, Scottish Government.

On resuming—

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Financial Memorandum

The Convener: Our third item of business is to take evidence from the Scottish Government bill team on the supplementary financial memorandum to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, which has been lodged following amendments at stage 2.

I welcome to the meeting Philip Raines, who is acting deputy director, children’s rights and wellbeing division, and Gordon Wales, who is deputy director, finance programme management division. Would either of you like to make a statement before we proceed to questions?

Philip Raines (Scottish Government): No, we are happy to answer questions on the supplementary financial memorandum. As you know, the stage 3 debate takes place this afternoon, so we will be happy to do anything that we can to clarify the issues that arise from the stage 2 amendments now or, if that is not possible during the oral evidence, afterwards.

The Convener: Thank you. We will move straight to questions. I will ask the initial ones, after which colleagues will ask theirs. Some of the questions will relate directly to the financial revisions.

As you will know, significant revisions have been made, with the additional costs going from £14.7 million in 2014-15 to £71.7 million. The supplementary FM appears to reflect the costs associated with the expanded provision that was announced on 7 January, but it does not appear to include the additional costs that were outlined in the Minister for Children and Young People’s letter of 12 September, which, as you may recall, mentioned an increase of some £4.2 million. Will you give us a wee explanation of that, please?

Philip Raines: Absolutely. The best way to explain it is that the letter of 12 September dealt with funding issues. In a sense, it was to do with how the bill for the early learning and childcare elements of the original financial memorandum—which, of course, have now changed—would be picked up. It did not touch on the costs.

As I recall, the letter of 12 September dealt with two elements: the funding for the vulnerable two-year-olds who were to be included in the extension of hours; and the element of the costs that would arise for the partner provider uprating—the element for which local authorities negotiate funding, for other organisations to provide the early learning and childcare. The letter set out how that would be funded as a result of the budget discussions and negotiations, but it did not touch on the costs. The costs for two-year-olds and for the partner provider uprating should not and would not have changed as a result of that letter. How that would be funded—the division between local government and central Government—is what was addressed as part of that letter.

The letter set out that the extension of provision for the cohort of two-year-olds as set out in the original financial memorandum would be paid for from an additional £4.5 million a year, some of which—the money for 2014-15—would incorporate the early years change fund, which operates up to the end of this financial year.

An additional element would cover the difference—the inflationary uprating, if you will—between the partner provider floor, which is the national figure that was used for calculating the funding between local authorities and private sector providers and which was last set in 2007, and what that figure might look like currently as a result of inflation, which was set out in the original financial memorandum.

The Convener: The original financial memorandum set out the childcare costs in 2011-12 prices, but the supplementary FM does not state what price basis is used.

Philip Raines: I confirm that the same price basis is used.

The Convener: It is the same. I also wonder why capital costs have not been included with regard to the planned extension to the policy. The supplementary FM states:

“It is not possible to provide an accurate estimate of the level of infrastructure investment required at this stage.”

That contrasts with the approach taken in the original FM, in which capital costs were included. Why is there a difference of approach?

Philip Raines: That is purely down to time. There just was not enough time between the conclusion of the stage 2 amendments and the point at which the supplementary financial memorandum had to be submitted to calculate the capital costs that we recognise there will be. We are in close discussion with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the Association of Directors of Education in Scotland about what those costs will be.

The approach also reflects the fact that the capital costs for the vulnerable group of children will not necessarily be the same as we would expect to be the case for three and four-year-olds. For three and four-year-olds, we are talking about a more universal provision and therefore a different staff to child ratio. We are also perhaps looking at providing more standardised service to those children through early learning and childcare. However, the group of vulnerable two-year-olds covered by the January announcement may have more significant needs, so we will be considering different staff to child ratios, and the capital costs will be quite different.

It will take time to get in the estimates, do the calculations and work through them with COSLA and ADES. Unfortunately, there just was not that time in the window that we had for providing the supplementary FM.

The Convener: When will those figures be available?

Philip Raines: I cannot confirm when they will be available but, because the policy commences in August, the costs will have to be developed very quickly. I can provide additional information to the committee about the timescale and, perhaps as importantly, what those costs will be.

The Convener: Who will be expected to meet those capital costs?

Philip Raines: As ministers have set out, all additional costs for local authorities arising from the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill will be picked up by the Scottish Government. The understanding—COSLA understands this—is that, although we do not know exactly what the costs will be, those additional costs will fall to the Scottish Government, as is the case with all the other early learning and childcare costs.

The Convener: Thank you very much. I am keen to let in colleagues, but I have one or two wee other issues that I want to ask about.

The first is about the amendment to eligibility for continuing care. Table 13 of the supplementary FM estimates the costs of that to be £9.3 million by 2019-20. Concern has been raised that there is a wide variation in the costs of the different types of care and that they have not been provided for “because no sensitivity analysis has been presented.”

You will be aware that local government is suggesting that the costs may be almost twice as much as the estimated £3,142; indeed, some local authorities estimate the cost to be £6,000. Will you talk us through that issue?

Philip Raines: There are two separate points, and I will take them in the order in which you raised them.

In order to calculate the costs for those staying in care, we need to know what type of care they will be in. As you mentioned, table 13 sets out the costs, but table 10 sets out the estimated share for the type of care. The table 10 figures are taken from the official looked-after children statistics. We have used the most up-to-date statistics—I think those are the 2011-12 figures—which show where kids left care from.

We have not looked at what those variations might be because the statistics have remained relatively stable over the years. We have no sense that the policy that we are pursuing would lead to a shift in the proportions. A sensitivity analysis would make sense if we had good reason or evidence to believe that the figures had shifted significantly either historically or over recent time, or if the policy was likely to lead to a significant shift in the proportions of children in the different types of care.

If anything, our sense from anecdotal evidence is that the use of residential care—the most expensive element—is probably reducing, so by using the historical figures we may well have made an underestimate of the number of children in other types of care. However, we must use the firm figures. That is why we used those proportions and applied them as assumptions.

Your second point was about what might be called the unit cost. For the record, paragraph 101 of the original financial memorandum set out the figure of £3,142. As with all such calculations, we must take evidence and take a view on how to make them up. One of the components that was perhaps the most difficult to get a consensus on was travel costs.

I saw in the Scottish Parliament information centre briefing that COSLA has cited a figure of £6,000 per person. That arose largely from COSLA discussions with some local authorities that felt that travel costs would be much more significant and therefore what would be provided for every care leaver might be significantly more than we estimate.

As we said before, we feel that the higher figure for travel costs does not represent an average across local authorities. It represents the higher end of the figures, which will undoubtedly apply in some rural areas, such as Argyll and Bute and the Highlands, but which will not necessarily be the costs in places that are not as large or where travel is easier, such as Glasgow. We have taken the average cost as £3,142.

The short answer is that we used exactly the same estimates and the same assumptions for the supplementary financial memorandum as we used for the original calculations to produce the original financial memorandum.

The Convener: The point, which you have addressed, was that some local authorities considered £6,000 to be a more realistic figure. Will the additional costs that local authorities incur for geographic and other reasons be taken into account in funding?

Philip Raines: I hope so. Such costs are worked out at a global level. A distribution mechanism will be needed for the funding that goes to local authorities; that applies as much to the aftercare and continuing care elements as it does to early learning and childcare. There are well-understood and well-established mechanisms and governance arrangements for that. I believe that a distribution group that COSLA operates will work with the Scottish Government on how best to deal with that.

The Convener: I will make one more point before handing over to the deputy convener.

When we took evidence previously, we had concerns about partner providers. We understand that "It is entirely the responsibility of Local Authorities to decide what they pay partner providers", but some of us were somewhat concerned about that, given that some local authorities might not be as generous as others. It was interesting that you touched on partner providers. The Scottish Government has announced that it will provide an extra £800,000. Is there any guarantee that that will be used as it is supposed to be?

Philip Raines: If you are asking whether we have placed conditions on and ring fenced the use of that money, the committee will understand that that is not how our relationship operates.

The Convener: That is what I thought.

Philip Raines: The answer to your question has two parts. We are not treating the funding differently from other similar types of funding; we expect local authorities to meet their obligations and to get the adequate additional provision that they should get from partner providers, which is a matter for them. However, there is a clear role for us in setting out expectations in national guidance.

We have not taken a statutory role, which will remain the case, but we have a role in relation to how the funding provision should operate. The issue is sensitive and should properly be addressed as part of guidance. In developing that guidance, we will deal with providers. We need to bring the National Day Nurseries Association closely into the discussions on developing the guidance. I believe that that work has started and will continue.

The Convener: I think that all committee members are aware that there is no ring fencing, but I wondered whether, through COSLA and others, you have had any kind of gentleman’s agreement that the money would be put where it is supposed to be put. Obviously, in some cases the partner providers are concerned about their own survival, let alone viability. It must be deeply frustrating if we are providing additional money and the local authorities decide not to put it into those areas. Is there any sort of quid pro quo, in which the Scottish Government, in discussions with local authorities, says, “We’ll give you additional money; we know it’s not in tablets of stone that it’ll go into this but we expect an understanding that that’s where it will be spent”?

Philip Raines: I am not aware of such discussions. To be honest, it is the sort of question that is probably best answered by COSLA. At the end of the day, the local authorities and COSLA are the ones that need to account for how they are fulfilling their obligations and relationships with the partners who are doing the provision.

The Convener: Thank you for that. I now pass over to John Mason.

John Mason: I want to follow up one of the areas that the convener touched on, which was the capital costs. I was a little uneasy with the questions, I mean the answers—obviously I was happy with the questions. [Laughter.]

The supplementary financial memorandum states:

“Capital costs have not been explicitly estimated.”

My understanding is that they have not been estimated at all, so the word “explicitly” does not really mean anything. Is that correct?

Philip Raines: I would say that internal calculations are going on and that the work is being taken forward. People clearly cannot be resting on their laurels in going forward. However, if it is "explicitly" in the sense in which we would be happy to share those estimates and costs formally because they have reached the point where we can verify them, I would say that that is not the case. The work is under way, though—it has to be under way.

John Mason: I am relatively new—I have been here for only three years—and I do not remember a situation in which we were looking at a financial memorandum in the morning, we did not have the figures and the bill was due to be approved in the afternoon. Maybe that is common—I do not know.

We are sitting here with a figure of nil. We know that it will be something but we have no idea what. Could you give us even a range of figures that we might be talking about?

Philip Raines: No. I would not go as far as that.

John Mason: So will it be under £100 million?

Philip Raines: Sorry. I have just said that I would not go as far as that.
John Mason: You would not say that it is under £100 million.

Philip Raines: I would not say anything at all. I cannot provide those estimates or figures, I am afraid.

John Mason: And—

Philip Raines: All I can say is that we have shared our working and calculations with COSLA. We are working closely with COSLA, and concerns have not been raised about the capital costs from the people who are going to be the providers.

John Mason: COSLA is not going to raise any concerns if the Government is going to pay for it, is it? That is fairly clear.

Effectively, the figure of nil has been put in. Okay, there is a note saying that nil will not be the figure—

Philip Raines: No. I think that there is a difference between putting in no figure and saying a figure of nil. A figure of nil suggests that we think there is no cost. That is clearly not the case. We are just saying that, at this stage, we are not in a position to be able to offer estimates. That is not the same as zero.

John Mason: Well, I would argue that that is just semantics. However, I take your point that there is a slight difference between not having a figure and having a figure of nil. I just want to say publicly that I find it very unsatisfactory that we are being asked to approve this supplementary financial memorandum and we have not been given even a range of figures.

Gavin Brown: The convener and deputy convener have raised most of my queries. You are not in a position to tell us the figure—

Philip Raines: I am sorry—I misunderstood what you meant. As far as capital costs are concerned, I am afraid that I am not in a position to be able to say whether the per child cost as worked out would be higher or lower than what we used in the financial memorandum, which related to three and four-year-olds.

Gavin Brown: So when you talked about the costs being higher, you were talking about the staffing costs per head.

Philip Raines: Yes.

Gavin Brown: And you do not know about the capital costs.

Philip Raines: That is true.

Gavin Brown: Thank you.

Jamie Hepburn: Just to clarify the issue a little more, I should point out that the Scottish Government has given a clear commitment to meet the capital costs of the bill's provisions. I think that Mr Raines has made that pretty clear. I am not going to ask for a specific figure because Mr Raines has quite fairly set out why that is not available at this time.

Given the early work, the on-going work and the calculations that are under way, are you able to give a commitment that the Scottish Government can meet these costs and that this policy is not going to bankrupt the nation?

Philip Raines: It will not. The number of additional two-year-olds we are talking about falls well within the scope of all this. In that sense, it is not significantly different from what was done for three and four-year-olds.

The Scottish Government has made it very clear that the additional costs as a whole, including the capital costs, arising from early learning and childcare for local authorities will be met. That commitment remains.

Jamie Hepburn: Again, can you clarify that a burden will not be placed on any other part of the public sector to meet these costs and that the Scottish Government will meet them?

Philip Raines: Yes.

Jamie Hepburn: Thank you.

Michael McMahon: When the original financial memorandum came before the committee, members raised a number of concerns about the estimates and assumptions that it contained. I do not know what other committee members think, but I certainly have not been assured by the answers that have been given in response to our report on that financial memorandum.

As John Mason has said, here we are on the morning of stage 3 of the bill, discussing additional costs and the additional funds that have been introduced into the financial memorandum. Could these additional costs and the mechanism by which they were scrutinised have come at a later date when the figures were available so that we could have had greater clarity about them? Do they have to be included in today’s proceedings?

Philip Raines: I am not sure why this evidence session was scheduled for today, so I am afraid that I cannot comment on that.

The costs in the supplementary financial memorandum arise largely from the stage 2 amendments and the announcements that were made barely six weeks ago in January. Obviously the time for making calculations has been shortened and accelerated, and we provided the supplementary financial memorandum as quickly as possible after the conclusion of stage 2.

Clearly we cannot put out a supplementary financial memorandum until stage 2 is completed. As soon as it was completed, we carried out some quite intensive work in an accelerated way to enable the committee to consider the costs as quickly as possible.

Michael McMahon: So it would have been possible for the committee not to have discussed this issue today. It could have waited until the bill had been passed and then a supplementary memorandum in which we could actually see the figures could have been put before the committee.

Philip Raines: No—

Michael McMahon: This morning we are discussing an addition to the financial memorandum that is based on stage 2 amendments. You say that you had only six weeks to carry out this work, but can you tell us what happens in other circumstances? After all, we do not come back with supplementary financial memoranda every time a bill is amended at stage 2, so why are we doing it today?

Philip Raines: I draw your attention to paragraph 3 of the briefing that you have received. It refers to rule 9.7.8B of standing orders, which basically sets out how to deal with what happens at stage 2. When changes are made to a bill, it makes sense for Parliament to be able to consider their cost implications.

Rule 9.7.8B also sets out a timescale from the completion of stage 2—after all, you cannot tell people what the bill is going to cost until stage 2 is completed—for producing our formal estimate of those costs. We met those timescales, produced the document as quickly as possible and provided it to Parliament.

Beyond that, the consideration of the supplementary financial memorandum by the committee is an internal matter for yourselves, as is the scheduling of today’s evidence session. The document was produced within the existing timescales as set out by Parliament and according to the understood process for putting bills together. You might be asking wider and deeper questions that I cannot answer because they are to do with parliamentary process.

Michael McMahon: It is partly to do with that, but the other problem is that, whatever the timeframe might be, you have told us that you do not actually have the costs that the stage 2 amendments will incur. Why are we discussing this issue when, first of all, the timescale does not allow for the amendments to be properly scrutinised and, secondly, you cannot tell us whether the costs are up or down or what the capital costs will be? We are just expected to accept this supplementary financial memorandum and go into this afternoon’s debate no wiser about the changes that are being made.

Philip Raines: I want to make it clear that we have provided the costs for everything else except the capital costs. Admittedly, the capital costs are quite complex and we are not in a position to provide that information so, in that respect, what you say is true. However, I do not think that it is fair to say that we have not provided costs.

We have provided quite a lot of costs; indeed, we have easily provided the lion’s share of costs. The ratio of the capital costs in the original financial memorandum to the total costs of early learning and childcare was, although significant, perhaps not the most significant element. I think that the revenue element was probably more significant.

Michael McMahon: But what was significant about the earlier financial memorandum was that we had major concerns about the costings involved and there has been no attempt to amend, change or clarify them.

Philip Raines: That is not true. On 28 October, we wrote to the Education and Culture Committee to respond in detail to a number of the issues that your committee raised in your report. We have responded on those points, but whether you are satisfied with our responses is another issue.

Michael McCoVE: That is the point that I made earlier: the answers certainly did not satisfy me.

Philip Raines: But it is not fair to say that we have not responded. We responded in great detail to the comments that were made and which were passed to us by the Education and Culture Committee.

The Convener: Just to provide some clarification, I point out that the supplementary financial memorandum was published on 31 January. As there was a recess, we did not really have an opportunity to discuss or take evidence on it before today. I decided that it would be more appropriate to take the item today instead of a week after stage 3 so that we could get as much clarification as possible about the available information. As Mr Raines has pointed out, information has been provided except on the capital issue.

It is very unusual to have a supplementary financial memorandum and it is only happening now because of the scale of the amendments. Rule 9.7.8B of standing orders states:

“If a Bill is amended at Stage 2 so as to substantially alter any of the costs set out in the Financial Memorandum that accompanied the Bill on introduction, the member in charge shall lodge with the Clerk, not later than the end of the second week before the week on which Stage 3 is due to start, a revised or supplementary Financial Memorandum.”

That is what has happened.

That said, I want to raise with Mr Raines an issue with regard to rule 9.3.2 of standing orders, which states:

“A Bill shall on introduction be accompanied by a Financial Memorandum which shall set out the best estimates of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the provisions of the Bill would give rise, best estimates of the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise, and an indication of the margins of uncertainty in such estimates.”

The committee’s concern is that it has received no real estimates of the capital costs. There are not even any margins of uncertainty; we do not have anything that says, for example, that the costs might be between £10 million and £50 million, £20 million and £100 million, or whatever. That is what the committee is frustrated about.

Standing orders make it clear that we really need that information so that even if we go into this afternoon’s debate not knowing everything—and you have explained to us why that is the case—we have at least a ballpark figure, for want of a better phrase. Do you not agree? It is clear in standing orders.

Philip Raines: That would be the interpretation of that rule—

The Convener: I do not think that it needs to be interpreted—it is pretty straightforward. I have just read out the rule in standing orders word for word, and it talks about “an indication of the margins of uncertainty”.

The real issue is that there are no parameters with regard to the capital costs.

Philip Raines: I do not think that we were in a position to provide those margins within the timescale that we had to produce the supplementary financial memorandum. As you know, it was provided by 31 January, a couple of weeks after the announcement was made. It is now 19 February, and work on this issue has progressed. I apologise for not being in a position to be able to provide an oral update about those parameters, but I imagine that they are beginning to emerge. If we cannot provide those margins of uncertainty, we cannot address the question.

The Convener: We will have to deliberate further on the matter, but I have one further question on a different issue that I hope you will be able to answer.

The supplementary financial memorandum contains a significant section on individual kinship care costs for guardians. Paragraph 36 says:

“Overall, there were no additional net costs in relation to kinship care in the original Financial Memorandum. This remains the case with these amendments”.

I note, however, that paragraph 35 states:

“In response to concerns about a perceived lack of detail in this Part of the Bill, Scottish Ministers agreed to make amendments at Stage 2 to provide for a clear, core eligibility test for kinship care assistance on the face of the Bill”.

I find it counterintuitive that there are no additional costs whatever. Can you talk us through why that might be the case?

Philip Raines: The methodology that was applied to the calculation of the additional cohort that might be eligible for kinship care was also applied to this element. As you will know from the original financial memorandum and our evidence to the committee, our view is that this policy will lead to avoided costs or, in effect, net savings.

These particular numbers—which, as I have said, were produced using the same methodology—are set out in table 14, which sets out the gross costs, and table 15, which sets out the avoided costs. As the avoided costs are larger than the gross costs, our view is that, as with the original methodology for calculating kinship care in the financial memorandum, the provision will not lead to additional costs.

The Convener: Because of the £3,000 margin between tables 14 and 15.

Philip Raines: Yes. It is the same principle that was applied in the original financial memorandum.

The Convener: I just wanted to get that clarification on the record.

As my colleagues do not seem to have any further questions, do you wish to make any further points or comments?

Philip Raines: No, except to say that as the further work, particularly on capital costs, is carried out we will be very keen and happy to provide that additional information at a suitable date for the committee, to enable you to carry out your rightful role of scrutinising the costs as they emerge.

The Convener: I am pretty sure that I am speaking on behalf of the committee when I say that we would very much appreciate the opportunity to take evidence once the figures are available.

Thank you very much for answering our questions; your responses were appreciated. As we are moving into private session, I ask our witnesses, the public and the official reporters to leave the meeting.

Dear Aileen

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

The Finance Committee considered the supplementary Financial Memorandum (FM) on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill at its meeting this morning. Paragraph 13 of the FM states that: “Capital costs have not been explicitly estimated. It is not possible to provide an accurate estimate of the level of infrastructure investment required at this stage.” However, the FM does not appear to include any estimate of the capital costs. The Committee pursued this point in evidence with the Bill Team who were unable to provide this information. The Committee is very concerned that a best estimate has not been provided for the capital costs as required by Rule 9.3.2 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. The Committee asks for an explanation as to why a best estimate has not been provided and an assurance that these costs will be provided to the Committee at the very earliest opportunity. The Committee also invites you to give evidence on these costs once they are available.

Yours sincerely

Kenneth Gibson MSP
Convener

<Duty to provide out of school care>

(1) Section 27 of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) For subsection (3) substitute—

“(3) Each local authority must secure that the mandatory amount of—

(a) care outside school hours, and

(b) care during school holidays,

is made available to children within their area who are in attendance at a school.

(3ZA) The “mandatory amount” for the purposes of subsection (3) is such number of hours, to be provided over such period of time and by such methods, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify in relation to each of paragraph (a) and (b) of that subsection.

(3ZB) A local authority may secure that—

(a) care outside school hours,

(b) care during school holidays,

other than that which they are required to secure under subsection (3) is made available to children within their area who are in attendance at a school.
(3ZC) An order under subsection (3ZA)—
    (a) may make different provision for different purposes (and may in particular specify different mandatory amounts in relation to different descriptions of children specified in the order),
        (b) is subject to the affirmative procedure.

(3ZD) Before laying a draft order under subsection (3ZA) before the Scottish Parliament, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
    (a) each local authority,
    (b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

(3ZE) For the purposes of such consultation, the Scottish Ministers must—
    (a) lay a copy of the proposed draft order before the Parliament,
    (b) publish the proposed draft order in such manner as they consider appropriate, and
    (c) have regard to any representations about the proposed draft order that are made to them within 60 days of the date on which the copy of the proposed draft order is laid before the Parliament under paragraph (a).

(3ZF) In calculating any period of 60 days for the purposes of subsection (3ZE)(c), no account is to be taken of any time during which the Parliament is dissolved or is in recess for more than 4 days.

(3ZG) When laying a draft order under subsection (3ZA) before the Parliament, the Scottish Ministers must also lay before the Scottish Parliament an explanatory document giving details of—
    (a) the consultation carried out under subsection (3ZD),
    (b) any representations received as a result of the consultation, and
    (c) the changes (if any) made to the proposed draft order as a result of those

(i) relevant information has (in its opinion) been omitted from the proposal paper, or

(ii) there is (in fact) an inaccuracy in the proposal paper,

(b) in a situation mentioned in subsection (1)(b).

(4) Where—

(a) the information that has been omitted or, as the case may be, the inaccuracy relates to a material consideration relevant to the education authority’s decision as to implementation of the proposal, it must take action as mentioned in subsection (5)(a) or (b),

(b) that information or inaccuracy does not relate to such a material consideration, the authority may—

(i) take action as mentioned in subsection (5)(a) or (b), or
(ii) take no further action (except by virtue of section 10(3)).

(5) The action referred to in subsection (4)(a) and (b)(i) is—

(a) to take the following steps—

(i) publish a corrected proposal paper,

(ii) give revised notice in accordance with section 6, and

(iii) send a copy of the corrected paper to HMIE,

(b) to issue a notice to the relevant consultees and HMIE—

(i) providing the omitted information or, as the case may be, correcting the inaccuracy, and

(ii) if the authority considers it appropriate, extending the consultation period by such period as is reasonable by reference to the significance of the information provided or, as the case may be, the nature of the correction.

(6) Where the education authority issues a notice mentioned in subsection (5)(b) after the end of the consultation period—

(a) the notice may, instead of extending the consultation period, specify such further period during which representations may be made on the proposal as is reasonable by reference to the significance of the information provided or, as the case may be, the nature of the correction, and

(b) any such further period is to be treated as part of the consultation period for the purposes of sections 8, 9 and 10.”.

(5) In section 10 of the 2010 Act (content of the consultation report), in subsection (3)—

(a) in the opening text, after “applies,” insert “including any alleged omission or inaccuracy notified to the education authority,”,

(b) in paragraph (a), after “inaccuracy” insert “, or (as the case may be) the alleged omission or inaccuracy,”,

(c) in paragraph (b), after “inaccuracy” insert “, or (as the case may be) the alleged omission or inaccuracy,”,

Mentoring scheme for children and young people with a disability

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision for a mentoring scheme for eligible children and young people with a disability to support such children and young people in their transition to adulthood.

(2) An order under subsection (1) must include provision about—

(a) the criteria which will be applied in determining eligibility for the scheme,

(b) the advice, assistance and support to be provided under the scheme,

(c) the qualifications and experience required of persons to provide such advice, assistance and support under the scheme,

(d) such other matters about the establishment and provision of the scheme as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(3) For the purposes of this section, a child or young person is disabled if they have a disability within the meaning of section 1 of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995.
After section 71B, insert—

National speech, language and communication strategy for children and young people

(1) The Scottish Ministers must, no later than one year after this section comes into force, lay a national speech, language and communication strategy for children and young people before the Scottish Parliament.

(2) The strategy must, in particular, set out—
   (a) the Scottish Ministers’ objectives for speech, language and communication for children and young people,
   (b) their proposals for meeting those objectives,
   (c) the timescales over which those proposals and policies are expected to take effect.

(3) Before laying the strategy before the Parliament, the Scottish Ministers must publish a draft strategy and consult with—
   (a) children and young people, including children and young people with speech, language and communication needs,
   (b) the parents of children and young people with speech, language and communication needs,
   (c) persons working for, and on behalf of, children and young people, including children and young people with speech, language and communication needs,
   (d) the providers of services to children with speech, language and communication needs in relation to those needs,
   (e) such others persons as they consider appropriate.

(4) The strategy must be accompanied by a report setting out—
   (a) the consultation process undertaken in order to comply with subsection (3), and
   (b) the ways in which the views expressed during that process have been taken account of in finalising the strategy (or stating that no account has been taken of such views).

(5) The Scottish Ministers must, no later than—
   (a) 3 years after laying a strategy before the Parliament under subsection (1), and
   (b) the end of every subsequent period of 3 years,
lay a revised strategy before the Parliament; and subsections (2) to (4) apply to a revised strategy as they apply to a strategy laid under subsection (1).

(6) The Scottish Ministers must, when laying a revised strategy before the Parliament, also lay before the Parliament a report evaluating the effectiveness of the strategy immediately preceding that revised strategy.

EXTRACT FROM THE MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

Vol. 3, No. 79 Session 4

Meeting of the Parliament

Wednesday 19 February 2014

Note: (DT) signifies a decision taken at Decision Time.

Business Motion: Joe FitzPatrick, on behalf of the Parliamentary Bureau, moved S4M-09071—That the Parliament agrees that, during stage 3 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, debate on groups of amendments shall, subject to Rule 9.8.4A, be brought to a conclusion by the time limit indicated, that time limit being calculated from when the stage begins and excluding any periods when other business is under consideration or when a meeting of the Parliament is suspended (other than a suspension following the first division in the stage being called) or otherwise not in progress:

Groups 1 and 2: 40 minutes
Groups 3 to 5: 1 hour 10 minutes
Groups 6 to 8: 1 hour 45 minutes
Groups 9 to 11: 2 hours 20 minutes
Groups 12 and 13: 3 hours 5 minutes
Groups 14 to 16: 3 hours 35 minutes
Groups 17 and 18: 4 hours 15 minutes
Groups 19 and 20: 4 hours 40 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill - Stage 3: The Bill was considered at Stage 3.

The following amendments were agreed to (without division): 93, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 101, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 102, 86, 103, 104, 105, 87, 88, 89, 178, 191, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 90, 113, 91, 114 and 115.

The following amendments were agreed to (by division)—

140 (For 101, Against 19, Abstentions 0)
192 (For 98, Against 15, Abstentions 0)
201 (For 115, Against 0, Abstentions 0)

The following amendments were disagreed to (by division)—

116 (For 36, Against 84, Abstentions 0)
117 (For 55, Against 65, Abstentions 0)
118 (For 56, Against 65, Abstentions 0)
92 (For 42, Against 78, Abstentions 0)
The following amendments were moved and, with the agreement of the Parliament, withdrawn: 177, 193 and 194.

The following amendments were not moved: 119, 94, 120, 95, 122, 96, 97, 99, 100, 129, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 163 (and, as a consequence, 163A, 163B, 163C, 163D, 163E and 163F), 164, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 168, 38, 39, 169, 170, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 171, 52, 53, 202A, 182, 183, 203A, 184, 185, 204 (and, as a consequence, 204A), 186, 205, 187, 188, 189, 190, 49, 195, 54, 196, 115A, 197, 50, 198, 199 and 200.

The Deputy Presiding Officer extended the third time-limit under Rule 9.8.4A(c).
The Minister for Parliamentary Business moved a motion without notice under Rule 9.8.5A to move the fourth time limit by up to 30 minutes. The motion was agreed to. As a consequence, subsequent time limits were also moved by 30 minutes.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill - Stage 3: The Minister for Children and Young People (Aileen Campbell) moved S4M-09050—That the Parliament agrees that the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill be passed.

After debate, the motion was agreed to ((DT) by division: For 103, Against 0, Abstentions 15).
Point of Order

14:09

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): On a point of order, Presiding Officer. This morning, the Finance Committee considered the supplementary financial memorandum to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. During the meeting, members were informed by Scottish Government officials that the Scottish Government is “at this stage ... not in a position to be able to offer estimates” for the capital costs of the bill. That is in direct contravention of rule 9.3.2 of the standing orders, which states that a bill shall be “accompanied by a Financial Memorandum which shall set out the best estimates of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the provisions of the Bill would give rise, best estimates of the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise, and an indication of the margins of uncertainty in such estimates.”

I understand that the Finance Committee is very concerned about that failure and has written to the minister, asking for an urgent explanation. Presiding Officer, I would welcome your advice on the implications of what is a clear breach of the standing orders by the Scottish Government, what that means for the debate this afternoon and whether this would set a precedent whereby rule 9.3.2 of the standing orders no longer applies.

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): I thank the member for prior notification of the point of order. I have given the matter consideration and it is clear that, under rule 9.12 of the standing orders of the Parliament, the financial resolution was passed by the Parliament at stage 1 of the bill and a supplementary financial memorandum was lodged, as is required under rule 9.7.8B, as a result of amendments that were agreed to at stage 2. As the member mentioned, supplementary financial memorandums must “set out the best estimates of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the provisions of the Bill would give rise”.

I appreciate, from what the member has said, that he has concerns about the information that has been provided in the supplementary financial memorandum to the bill. It is, of course, perfectly legitimate to raise those points in debate. However, it is up to members to decide to what extent they take that into account in taking a position on amendments and the bill. The current rules do not require that the Parliament pass a resolution on a revised financial memorandum.

The member raises an interesting question with the point that he makes. He might like to write to our Standards, Procedures and Public Appointments Committee, which—as he may know—is currently reviewing the legislative procedures of the Parliament.

That is my answer, under the standing orders at the moment, to the member’s question on the financial resolution. Members may wish to raise those points as matters of debate.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill: Stage 3

14:14

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): We move to stage 3 proceedings on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Members should have copies of the bill as amended at stage 2, the marshalled list and the groupings of amendments. The division bell will sound and proceedings will be suspended for five minutes for the first division of the afternoon, and the period of voting for the first division will be 30 seconds. Thereafter, I will allow a voting period of one minute for the first division after a debate. Members who wish to speak in the debate on any group of amendments should press their request-to-speak buttons as soon as possible after the group is called. We are very tight for time this afternoon.

Before section 1

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 1 is on duties of Scottish ministers in relation to the rights of children. Amendment 116, in the name of Jean Urquhart, is grouped with amendments 117, 118, 93 and 119 to 126.

Jean Urquhart (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): The stated policy intention behind the bill is to contribute to Scotland being the best place for children to grow up, and I applaud that intention. It is vital to the Scotland that we wish to create, which recognises not only the vital contribution that children and young people make to our society and our communities but that, in order for them to make that contribution, they deserve and require our respect, our protection and our nurturing.

I welcome the provisions in part 1 of the bill but, like many organisations and individuals working with and for children in Scotland, I am disappointed that part 1 does not go further. Accepting all the stage 3 amendments would go some way to progress our commitment to children’s rights, and accepting amendment 116 would form a key part of that commitment.

My amendment seeks to place a duty on Scottish ministers to establish a body within one year of royal assent to examine the case for giving legislative effect to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. I recognise that the Government has intimated that it believes full incorporation to be unnecessary; I also recognise that the Education and Culture Committee’s stage
I hear what the committee has said about incorporating children’s rights, but why do we need evidence to accept that children have rights that should be upheld and promoted in law in the same way that adults do? The same arguments were not made when the case was made for the adoption of the European convention on human rights, or for extending the Human Rights Act 1998 to apply to devolved matters during the passage of the Scotland Act 1998. If we did not require evidence to apply human rights to our domestic law, why do we need evidence for children to have rights in law?

There has been strong support for such a move from the children’s sector and the human rights sector. Incorporation of the UNCRC was supported by UNICEF, the Scottish Human Rights Commission, Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, the NSPCC, Families Outside and Together. Amendment 116 has the support of Children 1st, Barnardo’s, Together, YouthLink Scotland, Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People and a number of academics across the legal and sociological disciplines. For such a move to be supported by such a wide range of interested organisations surely suggests that the amendment has merit.

The bill should mark not the end of our journey in the process, but the beginning. Today, we can commit to explore how to incorporate children’s rights into our legislative framework; signal our intent to make our society truly a child-centred one; and recognise children as having rights in their own regard, which all of us should be willing and devoted to pursuing.

Amendment 116 would give Scottish ministers considerable scope to determine how best to achieve that. Setting up a body such as an independent commission to examine the options would make a statement that I hope we can all support. The amendment would not require Scottish ministers or the Parliament to commit to anything other than the establishment of an appropriate body and consideration of its report. In doing that, we would send a clear signal about the importance that we attach to children’s rights and provide a clear message about the seriousness of our commitment to make Scotland the best place to grow up. Therefore, I hope that Scottish ministers and all MSPs, from all political parties and none, will support amendment 116.

I move amendment 116.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): The bill represents the coming together of two pieces of proposed legislation, one of which is a bill on children’s rights. As Jean Urquhart identified, the Government appears largely to have lost sight of that aspect of what we should be trying to achieve.

The Law Society of Scotland and the Faculty of Advocates said that the bill added little to what was in place and in some respects even diluted children’s rights. Our committee concluded at stage 1 that the duty on ministers was “little more than a restatement of existing obligations.”

Although improvements were introduced at stage 2, the children’s commissioner is clear that “So far the opportunity has been missed to be ambitious for children’s rights and to embed children’s rights in Scotland’s governance and public services.”

My amendments are an attempt to address that position, not just with regard to the bill but with regard to future legislation.

Like others, I did not feel that the case had been made for the full incorporation of the UNCRC, but more can and should be done to incorporate key principles, most notably articles 3 and 12. Tam Baillie proposed that idea in his stage 1 evidence, and he was backed by a wide range of children’s charities. Despite that, the minister and her Scottish National Party colleagues refused to support any of my stage 2 amendments.

Parliament should have a further opportunity to consider the issues and to take a view. My amendments 117 and 118 reflect what we have heard about the need to put children’s rights and interests at the centre of the bill, to make sure that their voices and views are heard, and to give proper effect to the principles that should underpin the bill. I am sad to say that the minister’s amendment 93 will not do that. While I have sympathy with Jean Urquhart’s amendment 116, the important thing is to get substantive and meaningful changes into the bill now.

At stage 2, I sought to beef up the reporting requirements on ministers with regard to the steps taken to comply with the duties that are placed upon them. All my amendments in that regard were rejected. I am pleased that Neil Bibby has taken up the cudgels at stage 3 and I will support his efforts.

I will be interested to hear Alison Johnstone’s comments about the amendments in her name. I am instinctively sympathetic, but it is perhaps unfortunate that she did not lodge amendments with such effect at stage 2, to enable more detailed consideration and, if necessary, refinement.

Amendments 125 and 126 represent an attempt to safeguard children’s rights in the context of future legislation. Amendment 126 repeats an amendment that I lodged at stage 2 and would require a children’s rights impact assessment to be carried out on every relevant bill that was introduced to the Scottish Parliament. Ministers would have discretion about how widely the approach would apply. The approach would enable us to reflect the Education and Culture Committee’s recommendation, follow the lead that has been taken in Wales and deliver a cultural shift in the way in which we view children’s rights.

The minister has argued that undertaking CRIAs could be delivered through non-legislative means. However, although the Government committed to trialling CRIAs in its UNCRC action plan in 2009, not a single CRIA has been carried out.

Amendment 125 tries to skin the cat in another way and would place a duty on ministers to make a statement or assessment of compatibility with the UNCRC, as currently happens with regard to the Human Rights Act 1998. I understand that such an approach works well in Australia. I hope that if amendment 126 remains unpalatable to the minister, amendment 125 will be an acceptable alternative.

On children’s rights, the bill remains a missed opportunity. The children’s commissioner has made clear that if my amendments and others in this group are not agreed to, the bill “will fall far short of matching the high ambition to ‘make rights real’, often stated by Ministers.”

I urge the Parliament to vote to put that right.

The Minister for Children and Young People (Aileen Campbell): I welcome the opportunity to respond to the range of amendments that focus on part 1 of the bill. The bill will ensure that children’s rights properly influence the design and delivery of policy and services, by placing new duties on ministers.

Amendment 116 proposes the establishment of a new body to look at legal implementation of the UNCRC. The proposal seems similar to the children’s commissioner’s suggestion at stage 1 that a parliamentary inquiry look at UNCRC incorporation. The suggestion was not pursued by the Education and Culture Committee in its report.

We have robust structures for holding ministers to account for their approach to the UNCRC. We have the Scottish Parliament and its committees, the children’s commissioner and a national implementation group for children’s rights. Another body is not required, and even if it were required, there would be no need to legislate for its creation.

UNCRC incorporation was the subject of a great deal of discussion at stage 1. A range of views was given by key figures with expertise in children’s rights and the law. The Education and Culture Committee carefully considered the arguments and was not convinced of the merits of incorporation. Professor Ken Norrie said:

“I think that to incorporate the convention into the domestic legal system of Scotland would be bad policy, bad practice and bad law. I say that primarily because the UN convention was not drafted or worded to create directly enforceable legal rights in the domestic legal system.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 3 September 2013; c 2682.]

We will continue to engage with partners about how we can strengthen children’s rights, through the fora that are in place, and build on the strong foundations in the bill, which are a good starting point from which to develop the UNCRC.

On amendment 117, a similar amendment was considered at stage 2. Now, as then, we have concerns about the introduction of the concept that children’s interests should be “a key consideration”. The UNCRC clearly recognises that children’s best interests should be a primary, rather than a key, consideration. That is the standard towards which we should be working. It does not make sense to pursue such a broad-ranging principle through blanket duties on ministers, which would open up the risk of unnecessary litigation. That would serve no one’s interests.

It makes sense to consider amendment 118 alongside amendment 93, in my name, as both amendments focus on the views of children. Amendment 93 stems from a suggestion from stakeholders that the Government should consider incorporating article 12 of the UNCRC, recognising a child’s right to be heard. Our position remains that implementation of article 12 is not best achieved through a blanket duty. Instead, we require targeted changes, tailored to individual circumstances. Nevertheless, we remain keen to explore how our commitment to article 12 can be realised. Amendment 93 is designed to ensure that children’s views feature in ministerial decision making.

Amendment 118 would go further than amendment 93, by requiring ministers actively to seek children’s views in relation to all decisions. I recognise the value of consulting children and young people, but that must be done in a meaningful way. Amendment 93 addresses that point by offering flexibility around when to consult. For that reason, I encourage members to support amendment 93 as an alternative to amendment 118.

Amendments 119, 120 and 122 represent a radical departure from our current system for protecting children. They would impose on ministers a duty to take all measures to protect children from violence and ill treatment. Although I welcome the intention behind what is proposed and respect Alison Johnstone’s commitment to children and young people, the proposed duty may be impractical and would be impossible to satisfy. Ministers can introduce legislation and policies to protect children, but we cannot guarantee that a child will be safe from violence and neglect in the way that amendment 119 seems to require.

Furthermore, Alison Johnstone’s amendments fail to recognise the central role that many other bodies must play if we are to protect children effectively. Our system does not provide for Scottish ministers to work directly with individual children and their families on a day-to-day basis. Instead, it is founded first and foremost on strong multi-agency working at a local level. That approach continues to deliver an ever-improving system for supporting our most vulnerable children, as is evidenced by the many inspections of children’s services that have been undertaken over the years.

Amendments 119, 120 and 122 cut across all that. They fail to recognise that the people who are best placed to support children are those who have most contact with them and their families. Our focus must be on strengthening those relationships, because that is what our children need.

Getting it right for every child builds on the approach that I have described, and it is through the effective implementation of that model that we will best be able to ensure that all children—including those who are at risk of violence or ill treatment—get the help and support that they need at the time that they need it.

Amendment 121 seeks to recognise the important role that the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child plays in shaping our approach to children’s rights. Although it is important to recognise the excellent work that that committee does, the bill is not the best place to do that. Furthermore, I am not sure what practical difference the amendment would achieve. Any steps taken in response to recommendations by the committee would already be captured by the existing reporting duties under our bill.

The issue with which amendments 123 and 124 deal was debated at stage 2. There is now a well-established expectation that ministers will consult stakeholders as part of the policy development process. Accordingly, there is no need to identify every instance in which consultation is necessary and with which organisations it must be carried out. I am sure that we would all recognise that, when it comes to engaging children, our practice is perhaps not as well established. That is why we took steps at stage 2 to introduce section 1(3A), which will ensure that children will be consulted on ministers’ UNCRC implementation plans.

Amendment 124 would place on ministers a requirement to consult every three years on the steps that have been taken to secure “better or further effect” of the UNCRC. At stage 2, I made it clear that I could not see the value of consulting on a list of steps that ministers had taken with a particular aim in mind. After all, that is quite different from producing a plan of future actions, in relation to which there is scope for influencing activity. That same scope simply does not exist in relation to a retrospective report.

Amendment 125 would require ministers to prepare and publish a statement of UNCRC compatibility for all future bills. There would be a huge degree of overlap between that proposal and the children’s rights impact assessments that are proposed in amendment 126, and a system of unnecessary bureaucracy would be created.

As I made clear at stage 2, the Scottish Government recognises the importance of assessing our decisions against the rights of children, and we are developing a children’s rights impact assessment for use across Government as a direct consequence of the duty in section 1(1). Therefore, amendments 125 and 126 are disproportionate and unnecessary.

Liam McArthur: I listened carefully to what the minister said. She seemed to be concerned that amendment 125 overlaps with amendment 126. That would make sense if she intended to accept either of them, but by the sound of things she will accept neither of them.

As I made clear, in the UNCRC action plan that was published in 2008 it was indicated that the Government was committed to trialling CRIAs, yet we have not seen one in the intervening years. When might the first CRIA be piloted under the action plan?

Aileen Campbell: As I have said, we are developing that. That is something that we will achieve in order to ensure that we make rights real for children and that the UNCRC is much more keenly felt across the Government’s wider agenda.

For all the reasons that I outlined before Liam McArthur’s intervention, we cannot support any of the amendments in the group except my amendment 93, for which I seek members’ support.

I add that I respect the role that Liam McArthur, Alison Johnstone and Jean Urquhart have played and the way in which they have set out their arguments. I hope that we can work together to achieve more on the UNCRC and to make rights real for children in Scotland.

Alison Johnstone (Lothian) (Green): It has, at times, been difficult to articulate through this bill the potential impact of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child on children’s lives. Some see the articles in the UNCRC as very
I note Jeannette Funnel’s comments about the lodging of my amendments, but I know that he agrees that we must strive to do all that we can to give children the best start in life. Amendment 119, which uses almost exactly the same language as that found in article 19, aims to ensure that Governments have to do exactly that: to strive for the best and comply with the UNCRC.

The intention is to create an overarching national approach to protecting children from abuse, neglect and violence and to modernise criminal provisions in this area that are now 76 years old. Although the obsolete parts of section 12 of the Children and Young Persons (Scotland) Act 1937 have been repealed, our authorities continue to rely on that statute to protect children from harmful, criminal acts of abuse, neglect and violence and adopting amendment 119 would provide a holistic framework within which we can work to protect children.

I note the minister’s concerns about the adoption of this particular article but I hope that she will respond to my points about modernising the legislation and say how, if amendment 119 does not find support, the Government will progress the protections that protect children in Scotland.

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): I welcome the opportunity to speak to amendments 121, 123 and 124 in my name as well as the other amendments in the group.

Although I join members of all parties in welcoming the general principle of raising awareness of children’s rights, it is clear that section 1 could—and should—be improved and go further. During the Education and Culture Committee’s scrutiny of the bill, a number of witnesses said that, in reality, this particular section fails to add anything new and lacks ambition. The Law Society of Scotland described the duty that is placed on ministers as a “diluted version of ... existing obligations” and it was noted that the bill requires ministers only to “consider” the UNCRC but not to act on or explain those considerations.

If the bill is to avoid becoming what Jeannette Funnel has described as a missed opportunity, members should support my amendments, which would add a requirement on ministers to demonstrate how they have responded to general comments or recommendations made directly to the United Kingdom by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child. That would bring the reporting duty more in line with the children’s scheme that is set out in the Rights of Children and Young Persons (Wales) Measure 2011, which contains a duty of “due regard” to the UNCRC and has been widely welcomed by those working with and for children in Wales. It is important that we can properly scrutinise ministers’ actions if we are to ensure that the bill is having the kind of impact that we all want it to have.

On amendment 116 in the name of Jean Urquhart, during the bill’s passage through Parliament there has been a great deal of discussion and debate about the extent to which the UNCRC should be incorporated into law. Amendment 116 would allow us to continue that discussion by placing on ministers a duty to establish a group to consider the merits of incorporating the UNCRC into law and to report back. Any decision on the extent to which incorporation is appropriate would, of course, be a decision for Parliament and would be informed by the best available evidence.

Finally, I am also supportive of the amendments in the name of Liam McArthur and Alison Johnstone. In particular, I draw members’ attention to the importance of seeking the views of children who are likely to be affected by decisions and ensuring that children’s rights impact assessments are carried out on every relevant bill. Having spoken a number of times in the chamber about the importance of listening to children and young people instead of just talking at them, I am slightly disappointed that the minister’s amendment in this respect does not go as far as Liam McArthur’s amendment.

Amendments 116 to 126 as well as amendment 93 would significantly strengthen what is widely regarded as a weak section in the bill. I urge members to support those amendments if the bill is to match our ambition.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): Over a lengthy period, I have listened very carefully to what has been the most challenging but nevertheless one of the most interesting aspects of the debate on the bill. As I said on the very first day of evidence taking at stage 1, the main difficulty all along with part 1 has been the need to assimilate very different legal perspectives on the bill, especially the need to reach a rational judgment on the need to incorporate the UNCRC into Scots law.
In turn, that meant examining whether the current duties on Scottish ministers are sufficiently strong in terms of protecting children and whether in some cases we have not done enough to enhance the rights of children. In particular, there was a need to ensure that there was a clear understanding of the duties on ministers and those that fall on local authorities and other bodies.

At the end of that process, the Scottish Conservatives do not believe that there is a sufficiently strong case for full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law, on account of the fact that some aspects of the UNCRC are not fully compatible with our legal traditions. However, we believe that there has to be more clarity over the rights of ministers, children and their families and, just as important, those of local authorities and other professional bodies. Following those criteria, we will support amendments 117, 118, 93, 121, 123 and 124 but not the other amendments in the group.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): Like Liz Smith, I listened as part of the Education and Culture Committee to the evidence on this section of the bill. Like the rest of the committee, I came to the conclusion that there was little evidence of how full incorporation of the UNCRC would improve outcomes for children in Scotland.

Paragraph 38 of the committee’s conclusions in its stage 1 report notes:

“the UNCRC is implemented in Scotland in a number of ways already”.

In fact, article 42 is incorporated into the bill and it obliges ministers to promote awareness of children’s rights among children as well as parents. That aspect of the bill has been welcomed by the Scottish Information Commissioner.

The committee’s conclusions also state:

“We are not persuaded of the case for full incorporation of the UNCRC into Scots law … We agree that the benefits arising from incorporation of the UNCRC could be realised from improvements in policy and practice, such as through the implementation of GIRFEC.”

Liam McArthur mentioned that Neil Bibby had taken up the cudgels at stage 3. I find it quite strange that it has taken such a long time for Neil Bibby to reach that position, given that he was one of the members of the committee who signed up to those fairly fulsome conclusions.

The Deputy Presiding Officer (John Scott): Minister, would you like to respond to any of the points that were made in the debate? You do not have to by any measure.

Aileen Campbell: Joan McAlpine raised the fact that the committee did not support the full incorporation of the UNCRC, and I reflect again on Professor Ken Norrie’s comments on the bill. Technical difficulties prevent us from accepting Alison Johnstone’s amendments, but there is a firm commitment to ensure that we can work with everyone who is interested, to ensure that we make rights real across Scotland. This is about making sure that we put Scotland on the path towards becoming the best place to grow up, and making rights real is a key part of that.

I will make sure that we work with others across the chamber to allow us to have the proper scrutiny, which, as I set out in my opening remarks, is already there through the Parliament, the Education and Culture Committee and the children’s commissioner. By working together, we can have a bill that we are proud of, with regards to UNCRC provision.

Jean Urquhart: I return to the wording of amendment 116 and reiterate what it would do and what it would not. It would require Scottish ministers to set up a body to consider whether the UNCRC should be given legislative effect. It does not state what sort of body that should be, nor does it insist that the UNCRC should be given legislative effect. It would allow ministers and indeed MSPs to charge that body with exploring all the issues relating to this matter. The body would have to lay its report before Parliament and Scottish ministers would be expected to respond. At no point in that process would there be a burden, responsibility or even an expectation on Scottish ministers and MSPs to commit to giving legislative effect to the UNCRC.

As someone who believes passionately in creating a rights-based society for all, I hope that the option of giving legislative effect to the UNCRC would be explored fully and that the body would conclude that that would be the appropriate thing to do. I hope, too, that the body would provide advice on how and when to do so. However, committing to establishing the body would not commit future Governments or Parliaments to its recommendations. We would still be able to make that democratic decision, which is as it should be.

I have made my views clear on why I think it is important for Scotland to incorporate the UNCRC into our legislative framework, but far greater politicians than me have called on us all to do more for children. Someone said:

“Our children are our greatest treasure. They are our future.”

He also said:

“History will judge us by the difference we make in the everyday lives of children.”

There are many reasons to follow the teachings and words of the late, great Nelson Mandela. Throughout his presidency and his retirement, Mandela championed the cause of children. His love for children and his appreciation of their needs, rights and interests, and of society’s duty and responsibility to protect and nurture them by being child centred and furthering their rights, provide us with more and indeed compelling reasons to do as I suggest.

I uphold my amendment 116.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I am afraid that I did not hear what you said. Are you pressing or withdrawing your amendment?

Jean Urquhart: I am upholding it—I am pressing it.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Right. The question is, that amendment 116 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There will be a division. We will have it shortly, as there will now be a five-minute gap—the word I am looking for is “suspension”.

14:40

Meeting suspended.

14:45

On resuming—

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We move to the division on amendment 116.

I also understand that the Scottish Government does not wish to highlight specific groups of children and seeks to promote the notion of universality. However, given that the bill specifically mentions looked-after children, the precedent has already been set and it would be remiss of the bill not to mention disabled children in the way that I propose.

The minister will be aware that my proposed amendments are supported by the Health and Social Care Alliance Scotland, Enable Scotland and Children 1st.

Notwithstanding the fact that there is a problem with the financial memorandum and that we in the Labour Party are concerned about the financial support that is available for the bill, I urge the minister to support amendment 92 and all other amendments in this group.

I move amendment 92.

Liz Smith: As I mentioned at stage 2, I have a great deal of sympathy for the intent of Siobhan McMahon’s amendments, and by bringing them to stage 3, she has allowed us to undertake further detailed and important scrutiny of the rights issue. I am also grateful to the Health and Social Care Alliance Scotland for its helpful briefing.

Having sought other legal advice on the issue and revisited the lengthy and fairly complex debates that we had during the passage of legislation on additional support for learning, we remain nervous about identifying a specific group of young people who have special needs without addressing the concerns of others. We will therefore not support the amendments in the group, but we would like the minister to provide further reassurance beyond that which she gave at stage 2 that the rights of disabled children will not in any way be undermined or diluted when it comes to providing them with the appropriate levels of support.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 92 and 94 to 100 seek to place requirements on Scottish ministers and public bodies to take steps with the aim of furthering the rights set out under article 7 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities.

The proposals mirror a series of amendments lodged by Siobhan McMahon at stage 2 and, as I was then, I am happy to welcome the sentiment behind the amendments, and I take the opportunity to thank Siobhan McMahon for bringing the matter to members’ attention today.

The rights set out under the UNCRPD apply to all children, including disabled children. On Siobhan McMahon’s particular point, the UNCRPD specifically recognises the importance of ensuring that disabled children are supported to access the... same opportunities as their peers. Article 7 of the UNCRPD restates those important principles.

We are strong advocates of the UNCRPD, but it is important to remember that part 1 of the bill seeks to promote a universal approach to protecting and promoting the rights of all children, in express recognition of our responsibilities to each and every one of our children, irrespective of their background or needs. To begin to recognise some groups of children and not others would begin to dilute that notion of universality, which echoes the points that Liz Smith made in her remarks.

I state this categorically, and I hope that it gives comfort to Siobhan Mcmahon and Liz Smith: the fact that we are not making explicit reference to disabled children does not in any way detract from the commitment that we are making to them. We have worked and will continue to work with all the groups that Siobhan Mcmahon mentioned that are supportive of the intention behind her amendments. Although I am supportive of that intention, we cannot support the amendments, but we will continue to work with the groups that have been helpful with the drafting of the amendments to ensure that we get things right for children who have disabilities.

Siobhan Mcmahon: I appreciate the comments made by Liz Smith and the minister. Liz Smith and I spoke earlier and at stage 2 about her concerns, so I appreciate where she is coming from. However, I suggest that we pay attention to the third sector organisations that wish for this to happen. As the minister keeps saying, the key principle of universality is about ensuring that everyone has the same rights and access to everything in education. Therefore, when a disabled child faces additional barriers, we should make provision for their needs. That is the reason for my amendments and I will press them.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The question is, that amendment 92 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

Section 7—Introductory

Amendment 127, in the name of Siobhan McMahon, is the only amendment in the group.

Siobhan McMahon: Amendment 127 aims to ensure that family support services are reflected in children’s services planning in order to inform local commissioning strategies. The amendment would ensure specifically that the bill’s policy aim translates into effective services that meet the needs of disabled children and young people and their families.

The amendment has come from the for Scotland’s disabled children group, a banner organisation for several charities and organisations working for and with disabled children and their families. The organisation and I believe that without a clear duty in the bill that ensures that the specific needs of that vulnerable group of children and their families are reflected in joint local planning and in the local commissioning processes, there is a real danger that opportunities to deliver innovative support for that group will be missed.

I urge the chamber to support the amendment.

I move amendment 127.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 127 from Siobhan McMahon was raised at stage 2. It has a good policy intention—to ensure that children’s services planning covers support for the families of children with particular needs. As I said at stage 2, we share the belief that children’s services planning should include support for families in their caring roles for children with particular needs and that kind of support is already covered by the bill as drafted.

We will ensure that guidance makes that more explicit and we will work with others who have an interest in this area to develop that very important guidance. Nevertheless, as drafted, the amendment does not make it clear which services for such families would be covered, which could undermine the focus of children’s services planning. Consequently, we do not support amendment 127. I understand the intention behind it and will continue to work with groups to ensure that the guidance makes provision much more explicit.

Siobhan McMahon: I welcome the minister’s comments and I appreciate that she will make that support explicit in the guidance. However, I will press my amendment.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The question is, that amendment 127 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

to public authorities that local commissioning strategies must reflect the needs of young people transitioning into adult life, services and support.

For disabled young people, there is a further significant pressure point at the transitions planning stage, when young people are moving from one set of eligibility criteria under the additional support for learning framework to a completely different framework under social care. Many young people with less complex care needs may no longer qualify for a formal care plan and so are likely to require access to softer, community-based support services that currently might not exist or which are not accessible to disabled young people.

It is therefore crucial that the bill places a duty on local authorities to develop and implement children's and young people's services plans as opposed to children's services plans. That would support the transitions process and would be of particular benefit to those young disabled people who have less complex support needs and for whom the adult social care assessment framework may mean that they fall short of being assessed for a formal care plan as they move into adulthood and independent living.

Amendment 179 would give Scottish ministers the powers to introduce a national mentoring scheme to support children and young people with a disability during the key transition from childhood to adulthood. As we know, children and young people with a disability often face significant barriers in accessing life chances, including employment and leisure opportunities and opportunities to develop social contacts. Amendment 179 seeks to address that and could significantly improve outcomes in those key areas for children and young people with a disability across Scotland.

I urge the minister and the chamber to support the amendments in this group.

I move amendment 128.

Liam McArthur: I start by paying tribute to Siobhan McMahon not only for the amendments in this group but for those in earlier groups and for the work that she did at stage 2 to bring issues to the attention of the committee. Like her, I have been concerned about some of the problems that can arise around a young person's transition to adulthood when they reach the age of 18 and all the support suddenly disappears or starts to fragment. Although I am conscious of the need to protect the rights of adults, and adults with particular needs, I think that the issues that she raises in these amendments are extremely pertinent.

In addition, amendments 179 and 196, which seek to provide a right to mentoring support for children and young people with a disability, are well made, and I am happy to lend my support to them.

Aileen Campbell: On amendments 128 to 139 and 142 to 161, I said in response to the similar amendments that Siobhan McMahon raised at stage 2 that we believe that widening the planning of services around children by including the needs of young people up to the age of 25 risks making such planning less meaningful. The services that children need are not necessarily the same as those that young adults require. Conflating both within the same set of plans overcomplicates planning and does not necessarily serve children and young people well.

On amendment 141, we recognise the difficulties that are associated with the transition from children's services to adult services and that good transition planning is essential for those children whose needs will require continuing support into adulthood. Planning for that absolutely should be covered by children's services plans, which is why the existing provisions in the bill allow for that. We will work with relevant stakeholders to ensure that that is clear in the guidance supporting this part of the bill.

On amendments 179 and 196, we can see the merit in a scheme that provides mentors to disabled children to help to ease their transition into adulthood and promote their wellbeing. Indeed, there is strong evidence that goal-oriented mentoring can help young people to achieve and to become more confident in expressing their views. To that end, I announced in December my intention to establish a national mentoring scheme, initially focused on the children who will benefit the most from such help—especially children looked after at home, aged from eight to 14—before being expanded to other groups of young people.

The scheme is non-statutory in nature and will allow us to test how to apply it to improve outcomes. Although it is not aimed directly at children with a disability, it will still benefit a significant number of disabled children. As the scheme develops, I am open to discussing with Siobhan McMahon and others how we can target it further to help those most in need. Consequently, I do not believe that the amendments are necessary.

It is important to remember that not every child with a disability will need—or, indeed, want—a mentoring service. However, through our mentoring scheme, we can actively explore means by which such a scheme can be made more widely available to those children who will benefit.
For those reasons, we do not support this group of amendments. We are happy to continue the dialogue around the intentions behind the amendments.

Siobhan McMahon: I thank Liam McArthur for his kind comments. I feel as if I am an honorary member of the Education and Culture Committee, I thank him for welcoming me on the days that I was there and for offering his support in relation to these amendments, which are genuinely my best attempt to deliver a better bill in relation to the transition service. I think that the minister has recognised that. However, I disagree with her to an extent. Of course not all disabled children and young people are the same but, at the moment, young adults are getting lost in the system because there is not a care plan for them, so I will be pressing the amendments.

On the mentoring scheme, I absolutely believe that the intention behind the scheme that the minister announced in December is right. Of course I will continue the dialogue to expand that. However, I do not think that that prohibits us from voting for these amendments today.

I press amendment 128.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The question is, that amendment 128 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We move to group 5. Amendment 55, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 56 to 68, 70, and 72 to 74.

Aileen Campbell: The amendments in this group are technical amendments to take into account the effect of recent legislative changes to the administrative boundaries of health board areas and ensure that the definition of “relevant health board” in section 7(1) and associated references throughout part 3 are consistent with that legislation.

The text in part 3 of the bill as introduced was drafted on the basis that local authority and health board boundaries are currently not aligned. As a result, to ensure that the joint planning duties would cover each local authority area, the original provisions required local authorities to plan jointly with each health board that operated within that local authority area. However, in light of the recent decision to introduce secondary legislation to adjust the boundaries of health board areas to ensure that they are aligned with those of local authority areas, amendments are now required to part 3 of the bill. The National Health Service (Variation of Areas of Health Boards) (Scotland) Order 2013 will make the changes to health board areas with effect from 1 April.

Amendment 55 amends the definition of “relevant health board” in section 7(1) to reflect those changes. Consequently, associated references in part 3 should be amended from “each” or “any” relevant health board to “the relevant health board” or “the health board”. That is the effect of amendments 56 to 68, 70, and 72 to 74.

I move amendment 55 and ask Parliament to support the amendments in my name.

Amendment 130 moved—[Siobhan McMahon].

Section 9—Aims of children’s services plan
Amendments 137 to 139 not moved.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 6 concerns the aims of children’s services plans. Amendment 140, in the name of John Wilson, is the only amendment in the group.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (SNP): I thank the Coalition of Care and Support Providers in Scotland for suggesting the amendment.

Section 9 sets out the four aims of the children’s services plan. The fourth aim, which is in section 9(2)(a)(iii), says that children’s services should be provided in the way that “constitutes the most efficient use of available resources”.

If the amendment is agreed to, the provision would read “constitutes the best use of available resources”. The reason for lodging the amendment is that the present wording is inconsistent with the statutory duty of best value, to which all local authorities must have regard when planning and delivering services under section 1 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003.

Maintaining a balance between the two principles of efficiency and effectiveness is essential to the idea of best value. It is believed that including only one of those two fundamental principles in the children’s services planning part of the bill is inconsistent with that Government policy and related legislation and may send a message to local authorities that might encourage an emphasis on cost to the detriment of quality and effectiveness in the provision of children’s services.

Audit Scotland has repeatedly highlighted the importance of best value as the key to success for local authorities. In 2012, it said:
“Local authorities that place best value at the centre of all they do are well placed to deal with the challenges in 2012 and beyond.”

Audit Scotland has also raised concerns about the possibility of local authorities taking an overzealous approach to cost cutting at the expense of service quality and provision.

Therefore, although the amendment appears to deal with a small issue in the context of the many significant issues with which the bill deals, it is no less important, given the potential positive impact of good-quality, effective children’s services. This is an opportunity to improve the drafting of the bill.

I move amendment 140.

Aileen Campbell: The amendment is not likely to make a significant difference to the way that children’s services plans are prepared. Local authorities remain bound by section 1 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, which sets out the basic principles of best value. Local authorities would not be able to develop children’s services plans without taking account of best value, and we would ensure that that principle was clearly set out in the national guidance on how to prepare children’s services plans.

Nevertheless, we can see the attraction of providing greater consistency in the language of best value between different pieces of legislation. Best value remains a key principle at the heart of our children’s services, and we support an amendment that further highlights its importance. Therefore, we support John Wilson’s amendment.

John Wilson: The minister has clearly stated that the Government has accepted the amendment, and I press it.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The question is, that amendment 140 be agreed to. Are we all agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We move to group 7. Amendment 69, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 71, 75, 76, 83, 85 and 88.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 69, 71, 75, 76, 83 and 85 amend the sections on guidance and directions in parts 3, 4, and 5, which cover, respectively, children’s services planning, the named person and the child’s plan. The amendments make it clear that, before issuing, revising or revoking guidance or directions under those parts, Scottish ministers, in addition to consulting any person to whom the guidance or directions relates, must consult such other persons as they consider appropriate.

It has always been the Scottish Government’s intention to consult as widely as is required in respect of guidance and directions that are issued under those parts of the bill, including with children, parents and third sector organisations when that is appropriate. However, we consider that it is helpful to make it clear in the bill that consideration should be given to who will be affected by the issue, revision or revocation of any set of guidance or any direction, as that will ensure that the necessary consultation is undertaken.

The amendments also achieve drafting consistency across parts 3 to 5 in respect of the provisions on guidance and directions.
Amendment 88 makes a minor drafting adjustment to section 57 to achieve drafting consistency between that section, which concerns guidance that is issued in respect of the corporate parenting duties in part 7, and the sections on guidance in parts 3 to 5.

I move amendment 69.

Amendment 69 agreed to.

Amendments 72 to 74 moved—[Aileen Campbell]—and agreed to.

Section 18—Interpretation of Part 3

Amendment 161 not moved.

Section 19—Named person service

The Deputy Presiding Officer: That takes us to group 8. Amendment 1, in the name of Liz Smith, is grouped with amendments 2 to 11, 162, 162A, 12 to 24, 163, 163A, 163B, 163C, 163D, 163E, 163F, 164 and 25 to 50.

Liz Smith: From the very outset, the Conservatives have argued strongly against the introduction of a named person for all nought to 18-year-olds, and we will now do so again. We believe that the policy is wrong in principle, that it does not have conclusive supporting evidence and that it has not been properly costed—something that was unanimously agreed by the Finance Committee. In addressing the bill team, the committee’s convener, Kenny Gibson, said:

“the savings that you are talking about over a short period ... are not realistic, and ... that would lead, two or three years after the bill has been passed, to significant funding shortfalls.”—[Official Report, Finance Committee, 18 September 2013; c 2991.]

Again this afternoon, concerns have been raised about the revised financial memorandum.

Amendments 1 to 50 and 162 to 164 seek to address two of the most fundamental flaws. Amendments 1 to 50 would remove those aged 16 and above from the named person plans—a move that I know has the unqualified support of both Labour and the Liberals and, I suspect, some SNP members, too. Even the most ardent supporters of the policy do not believe that it is workable beyond 16, because it is not compatible with many other aspects of Scots law that define an adult at age 16 and because many practitioners believe there would be additional confusion over the lines of accountability. Bill Alexander, of Highland Council, who is one of the most ardent supporters, said:

“I do not understand how my daughter, who is 17 and doing performing arts in Manchester, could have a named person; she will not need or want one.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 24 September 2013; c 2858.]

Professor Norrie said:

“I should have been more comfortable if the limit of childhood were set at 16”.

The Scottish Government’s response to those points at stage 2 was exceedingly weak, so I hope that, in the intervening time, it has had a change of heart. We are talking about young adults—16 and 17-year-olds who are allowed to marry, free to leave school and able to enlist—who are being told by this Government that they are old enough to vote in the upcoming referendum but not old enough to go about their business without being assigned a named person. That inherent contradiction speaks for itself.

The second set of amendments—amendments 162 to 164—seeks to limit the function of the named person and create a route for parents to contest any decision that a named person is necessary. The reasoning behind that combines the substantial concerns raised by several groups and by Aidan O’Neill QC, that there would be scope for a legal challenge against the Scottish Government’s proposals, particularly with regard to article 8 of the European convention on human rights which safeguards the right to “private and family life”.

Since stage 2, we have listened very carefully to the concerns that a general opt-out could undermine efforts to safeguard the welfare of our most vulnerable children. Consequently, amendment 162 proposes limiting the functions of the named person policy to instances where there is a safety, legal, wellbeing or rights concern.

Similarly, amendments 163 and 164 place a duty on the service provider to inform parents, children and young people of a decision to appoint a named person and create a provision for that judgment to be subject to appeal. Taken together, the amendments will ensure that the policy is based on need rather than imposed across the board. That point has been raised by a number of organisations, including several churches and parents groups, many of which have written to MSPs in the past few weeks to ask them to reconsider the matter. Time after time, they are pointing out that the named person policy fails the criteria of what makes good law, that it tips the balance away from parental and family responsibilities towards the state, that it is not properly costed and that it will be open to legal challenge. For all those reasons, and for the sake of common sense, I ask the chamber to support the amendments in my name.

I move amendment 1.

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): I have a number of members who want to contribute to this group of amendments, so I ask that they be as brief as possible.

Fiona McLeod (Strathkelvin and Bearsden) (SNP): It is difficult to be brief on the topic of the named person, given the amount of misinformation that has been going out in their lives.

First, I make clear to members that I speak as someone who was once a chair of a children's panel advisory committee and who was, many years ago, a researcher for the former Royal Scottish Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children. What is so important about the named person provision is that we are trying to provide a universal safety net for all young people. The point about universal access to the safety net is that that would proactively support young people, rather than reacting when things go bad in their lives.

The amount of misinformation that we have had has been appalling. Liz Smith mentioned the emails that members have received. Some of the emails that I have received have bordered on the offensive. Indeed, some of them talked about “state surveillance”, “1930s Nazi Germany”, and “Big Brother”. I have to wonder whether some of those emails have been orchestrated.

Given my child protection background, I know that it is most important that the named person is a universal service for all young people. As parents, most of us will bring up our children well, but we never can know or foretell when we or our children may suffer through, for example, bereavement, family break-up or illness, or when we might need instant access to a named person who knows our child well and can provide access to all the relevant services at the time of need.

As with our children's hearings service and GIRFEC, Scotland is, with the named person, introducing groundbreaking legislation and child protection work. I urge every member to support the named person provisions.

Neil Bibby: There is no doubt that this is the most controversial aspect of the bill. The measure must be properly debated and discussed, as it has been at some length on the Labour benches. There are strong feelings about it. Some people believe that it is absolutely necessary if we are to identify and protect vulnerable children; some people believe that it is not required and will potentially interfere in family life.

As I have said, in principle I have no objection to provision for a named person being in the bill. However, I do not believe that it is the state’s role or job to bring up all children—I hope that all members agree. I would welcome reassurances from the minister on the concerns that parents have raised in recent weeks.

Like many members, I want us to have the best possible protection and support system for our children. However, there are two critical tests for the named person provision: the system must work in practice; and it must be properly resourced. The minister and the Government have completely failed to address those two key concerns.

Labour cannot support all the amendments in this group, but we will support Liz Smith's amendments on reducing the age limit for having a named person from 18 to 16. We supported similar amendments at stage 2. Liz Smith referred to Bill Alexander, the director of health and social care at Highland Council. When he gave evidence to the committee, I was concerned when he questioned why a named person would be needed for most children who have left school. He said:

“I do not understand how my daughter, who is 17 and doing performing arts in Manchester, could have a named person; she will not need or want one.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 24 September 2013; c 2858.]

There is no doubt that some young people will require additional support after leaving school. However, the vast majority of young people will neither need nor want a named person. As members know, Highland Council was the national pathfinder for implementing GIRFEC, so Bill Alexander is highly respected by the Parliament. During the stage 1 debate, a member said:

“Bill Alexander knows more about the subject than almost anybody else, and I have found what he says to be true”.—[Official Report, 21 November 2013; c 24832.]

That member was the cabinet secretary, Mike Russell. It is therefore astonishing that the Scottish Government intends to proceed without listening to what people such as Bill Alexander and Opposition parties say about the issue.

My position on resources is the same as that of the child protection charity the NSPCC, which said:

“NSPCC Scotland supports the intention behind the Named Person approach which, if properly resourced, could increase the likelihood of early intervention for children and young people; thus improving their outcomes.”

The key phrase is “if properly resourced.” During the stage 1 debate, I raised concerns about resourcing on behalf of the Royal College of Nursing. The RCN said:

“Using the Scottish Government’s own estimate of health visiting hours required to deliver the Named Person role specifically—on top of the rest of the health visiting workload—the RCN estimates it would necessitate around... an additional 450 health visitors to be recruited and trained.”

The matter was raised at stage 1 and the minister said that she was listening, but no action was taken. It was raised at stage 2 and the minister said that she was listening, but no action was taken.

Aileen Campbell: Has the member had a chance to read what the City of Edinburgh Council said? It said:

“The Council believes that the costs for Children’s Rights, GIRFEC, Early Learning/Childcare and Other Proposals are accurately reflected based on our understanding of the requirements of the legislation.”

Does he agree with the City of Edinburgh Council? Does he agree that we have been listening to others, to ensure that the estimates in our financial memorandum are the best that they can be, to finance the approach thoroughly?

Neil Bibby: With respect, I say that the minister listens to the people to whom she wants to listen. She says that she is listening, but she is not hearing the concerns of the RCN. The issue was raised at stages 1 and 2. If she is serious about the policy, where are the extra health visitors?

I have not even mentioned the resources that local authorities and teachers will require if they are to meet their named person responsibilities and provide on-going, rather than one-off, training. It is also still not clear how the named person role will be properly resourced or how it will work during 12 weeks of school holidays. It is no wonder that the Finance Committee said, in its damning report on the bill:

“The Committee has a number of concerns in relation to some of the costings within this FM and notes that there is a lack of evidence to support the figures provided for some aspects of the Bill.”

The Scottish Government has failed properly to address the resource issues. The policy will not achieve its intended purpose unless it is properly resourced.

The minister has said consistently that she was hearing, but I do not think that she has been listening. She has not listened to Opposition parties, to people such as Bill Alexander or to organisations such as the RCN.

Like many other members, I can support the policy in principle, but the minister and the Scottish Government have failed the two key tests in relation to the practical and resource issues. By failing those key tests, the Scottish Government risks failing Scotland’s children.

Gil Paterson (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP): I will restrict my comments to the named person in a school setting.

What is proposed will normalise what takes place in any well-run school. It will give people confidence to approach a person whom a child trusts—the headteacher. We should not forget that the named person can be for the whole school complement. That person will be there to listen and to advise. The first port of call, I assume, would be the family. The named person will have no powers in bringing up a child, but sometimes extremely serious incidents happen in the home. We know about such situations—they are graphic, worrying and detrimental to children. In such circumstances, society does not simply expect us to intervene; it demands that we intervene. There is an expectation that intervention should take place swiftly. As a result of the named person being well connected with the different authorities involved, it will be possible to act swiftly for the sake of the child.

The evidence and experience from the Highlands, where no person or family has raised any issues in regard to the named person, is there for all to see.

Liam McArthur: As Neil Bibby indicated, part 4 of the bill, on named persons, has attracted the most attention, controversy and opposition since stage 1.

After some initial misgivings, through the process I have been persuaded of the benefit that a named person arrangement can deliver. That said, I was concerned—as were a number of witnesses—about the practical implications of the way in which resources would be allocated and about the circumstances in which information would be shared. We will come to that issue in a later group.

On the former, it is still not clear whether the focus on the wellbeing of a child as opposed to the narrower definition of their welfare will have the effect—in some cases—of diverting resources and attention, with the risk that cases of genuine welfare concern will not be picked up, or will be picked up later than would otherwise have been the case. The serious criticisms that the Parliament’s Finance Committee—whose convener and deputy convener are Government back benchers—made of the bill’s financial memorandum did nothing to allay those concerns.

In addition, I am not convinced that the task of implementation has been made any easier by the insistence of the Scottish Government on making the named person provisions apply universally in relation to young people all the way up to the age of 18. At stage 1, we were told that applying the named person provisions through the teenage years becomes increasingly problematic. That will come as no surprise to any of us who have or have had teenagers. Even Highland Council—the exemplar in the delivery of GIRFEC and a pioneer of the named person approach—appears to have been unable to make that aspect of the named person approach work. Neil Bibby and Liz Smith were quite right to cite what Bill Alexander said in evidence about his own experience, and we know the high regard in which his views are held by the education secretary.

I question whether insisting on a named person for young people up to the age of 18 is necessary or achievable. That being the case, why risk spending scarce resources trying to do what even the convener of the Education and Culture Committee, from his personal experience, acknowledged would be a formidable challenge? Therefore, I support Liz Smith’s amendments that are aimed at limiting the universal application of the named person provisions to children and young people up to the age of 16.

This is an area that is crying out for post-legislative scrutiny. Although Highland Council’s experience has been persuasive, it should be recalled that the named person arrangements were implemented on a non-statutory basis. How named person provisions will operate on a statutory footing remains to be seen, but Parliament will want to be reassured that what the bill proposes remains proportionate, and we may need to return to the issue in the coming years.

Joan McAlpine: Labour’s front benchers say that they support the named person in principle, but Neil Bibby used the phrase that it is not “the state’s... job to bring up... children”.

That is not just speaking with forked tongue; it is pandering to the most hysterical misinterpretation of the proposal and, as such, it is profoundly irresponsible.

Neil Bibby rose—

Joan McAlpine: We know that all the children's charities support the universal principle universally, but so—interestingly—do parents charities. In committee, when my colleague Colin Beattie asked Clare Simpson of parenting across Scotland whether she agreed with opponents of the named person that the proposal would usurp the role of the parent, she said:

“I do not feel that that is accurate at all. Parents’ rights and responsibilities are firmly enshrined in law.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 10 September 2013; c 2746.]

She went on to talk about a MORI poll that her organisation carried out in which parents across Scotland were asked whether they knew where to turn when they felt that they needed help and support in their parenting. According to that survey, 72 per cent of parents across Scotland and 84 per cent of parents in deprived areas did not know where to turn. I think that I will listen to Clare Simpson before I listen to some of the rather hysterical arguments against the named person provision which, through the application of the universal principle, is intended to protect the most vulnerable children in our society.

Kezia Dugdale (Lothian) (Lab): Honestly, I think that Joan McAlpine could pick a fight with the Labour Party in an empty room. That was ridiculous. [Interruption.]

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order, please.

Kezia Dugdale: Liz Smith has lodged two different sets of amendments: those that reduce the maximum age at which people will have a named person from 18 to 16, which we can support, and those that seek to diminish the universality of the named person, which we cannot.

That said, it has not been easy for us to come to this conclusion. We have always said that, although the principle is sound, resourcing is an issue. Concerns about resourcing are as strong as ever and, indeed, are being expressed by those such as the RCN and the Educational Institute of Scotland that actually support the named person principle. I say to Fiona McLeod that any misconception about what the named person is and does has arisen because her Government’s front bench has failed to stand up and explain the principle in a way that parents find meaningful.

I ask the minister, first, to specifically reassure Parliament in her closing speech that no resources will be moved away from children who are in need to those who do not need support. Secondly, if this is not state interference in family life—and the minister needs to listen to such concerns, which parents are raising; after all, it is our duty as parliamentarians to give voice to them—can she tell us why parents who feel that their child is healthy, happy and succeeding should need a named person? That simple and legitimate question is being asked by thousands of parents across the country and if the minister wants their support, she has to answer it.

We support what the Government is doing, but the minister needs to do a much better job of explaining exactly what this provision means to people across the country.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): Mr Bibby mentioned Bill Alexander’s evidence to the committee. I remember that and, indeed, the discussion that we had about it after the meeting. He had mentioned a daughter who had left school to go on to university and I challenge anyone in the chamber to say that those who are at university or college are not supported. There are student welfare associations, universities provide pastoral care and so on—those young people are in supported places.

However, not all young school leavers have such an outcome, and some 16-year-olds leaving school will be denied access to a named person simply because they are leaving earlier. My own son is 16; if he stays on until sixth year, he will be in school until a month before his 18th birthday. However, a 16-year-old who leaves the school system might go on to a difficult working situation, might experience financial problems that they were not expecting or might have a different type of lifestyle from what they had expected when they left school. Those young people should not be denied access to a named person because of that.

Finally, in the excellent chamber debate that we had on the Public Petitions Committee’s report on child sexual exploitation, there was unanimous support for a named person for any victim of child sexual exploitation who was going through the court process. I would suggest, however, that the court process should not be the beginning and the end of that support. If a named person were universally available to all young people, any victim of child sexual exploitation would be able to go to that person at the very beginning of the process.

Aileen Campbell: The debate about the named person provisions has attracted a lot of comment, information and—as Fiona McLeod made clear in her remarks—misinformation. As a result, before I turn to the specifics of Liz Smith’s amendments, I want to make absolutely clear our intentions and how the provisions will help us to achieve them.

We want to ensure that our children have the best start and outcomes, that children and families have somewhere to go if they need an extra bit of help and that no one is left without support.

We want to promote an early intervention and prevention approach that is co-ordinated and prevents problems from escalating into crises. We want to ensure, as far as possible, that no child slips through that net. A named person for every child will help us to achieve all that. It has to be for every child because we do not know when that extra bit of help is needed. It is a universal service, as Fiona McLeod stated; a public good. As Martin Crewe, director of Barnardo’s Scotland, said:

“If we’re to try and create a system where children don’t fall through the gaps, it has to be a universal system. Unfortunately children aren’t born with an ‘at risk’ sign on their heads, so we have to have a system that does its very best not to allow children to slip through the gaps.”

Following the serious case review of the tragic death of Daniel Pelka, Anne Houston, the chief executive of Children 1st, said:

“Deaths like Daniel’s remind us why the principle behind the named person ... in the Children and Young People Bill is a sound one as it aims to prevent children slipping through the net.”

The named person also provides parents, families and children with a familiar person to whom they can go if they want a bit of advice or help navigating other services. In Highland, where the role has been implemented, Bill Alexander, who has already been mentioned, said:

“It operates effectively, and enables agencies to respond more quickly to parents who raise concerns about their child’s wellbeing.”

Mr Alexander also said:

“We do not get complaints about the named person role being deployed; we get complaints when parents believe it has not been deployed.”

We have consulted widely on the bill’s provisions and we have listened to parents and other groups. The bill has been shaped and honed by what people told us was needed—that includes parents and families as well as charities and other organisations.

It was after listening to views and concerns, including those of parent groups, that we strengthened the information sharing provisions at stage 2. Fundamentally, parents told us that they wanted a single point of contact and were fed up with repeating the same stories to a number of different services. We listened to parents and we will continue to listen to them, because, as I have consistently said, they are almost always the best people to support and protect their children.

I clarify that ministers will use powers under the bill to issue guidance in relation to the named person service prior to the commencement of the duties. The majority of children get all the love, support and encouragement that they need from their parents and wider family, but it is impossible to say which children or families may at some stage need extra support.

If the named person can spot early signs that a child is experiencing difficulty they can work with the parents and family to put in place the right support where required. Parents will still have the right not to accept the advice. The only circumstances in which parents would not be fully involved would be where to involve them could place the child at risk of harm or danger, or adversely affect the wellbeing of the child or young person. That will be the exception. Our guidance will be absolutely clear on those principles and I will continue to work with parent and family groups when developing the statutory guidance.
To undo this part of the bill, as the amendments in this group would do, and as Neil Bibby seems to want to do, would be wrong and ill thought out, as it would remove the universal framework that will support early intervention and the better outcomes and wellbeing for our children that we all want to see.

Amendments 1-50 specifically seek to remove support from young people and their families at the very time when they may be facing the challenges of transition to adult services and post-school services. As Jim Sweeney, chief executive officer of YouthLink Scotland, said:

“It is vitally important to support young people through this key transitional stage. Unfortunately, not all young people have parents who are willing or able to provide them with the support that they need at this difficult time – a period when they are making choices that will affect their future lives.”

Indeed, during its inquiry into decision making on whether to take children into care, the Education and Culture Committee heard from many children and young people, including those over the age of 16 who reported their desire to have access to support services and to be able to go and speak to somebody.

Ms Smith’s amendments fail to acknowledge that, or to—

Liam McArthur: Will the minister take an intervention?

Aileen Campbell: I will take an intervention from Liam McArthur.

Liam McArthur: I have listened to what the minister said and I think that she is right about the evidence that we heard about the benefits of the named person. However, as Liz Smith and Neil Bibby indicated, Bill Alexander’s evidence varied. He specifically highlighted the problem of having a named person for those in later teenage years. I am not saying that a named person should not be available to those aged 16, 17 or 18, but the universality of that provision risks diverting resources away from and undermining the very things that she is intent on achieving.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Before I call you back, minister, I say that as we are nearing the agreed time limit for the debate on this group, I will exercise my power under rule 9.8.4A(c) to allow the debate on the group to continue beyond the time limit, in order to avoid its being unreasonably curtailed.

Aileen Campbell: Thank you, Presiding Officer.

I will go on to make more points on the issue, but if providing co-ordinated and targeted support to children from their earliest years up to the age of 16 is effective—as we know it is—the same principle holds true for young people aged 16 and 17. Liz Smith’s amendments fail to acknowledge that, or that a young person needs to be able to access support if they have personal challenges, which might be related to addiction, mental health issues, unemployment or homelessness.

Liz Smith: What prevents young people and their families from accessing that important support now?

Aileen Campbell: The measure is about ensuring that support is co-ordinated in an effective way and that there is a single point of contact, so that people know where to go if they do not get support from their family, friends or whatever. That is why the approach has worked well in the Highlands and why there have been fewer inappropriate referrals to the children’s reporters and to children’s panels. We have been able to better target support at those who are the most vulnerable.

Jim Sweeney—someone whom we should listen to—has pointed out:

“Even if young people who leave school before they are 18 succeed in accessing a positive opportunity such as a job or a Further Education place, they may need support to sustain these opportunities, as many young people drop out of courses or have difficulties in finding and keeping a job. Failing to find or keep a first job can have a ‘scarring’ effect on the rest of young people’s lives, leading to negative outcomes such as poor health and reduced life expectancy, and can also contribute to generational cycles of worklessness and poverty”.

Our aim through the bill is to provide better and slicker support for those who need it or where significant concerns emerge. We all recognise that young people aged 16 or over have varying degrees of need, skill and maturity and that the majority of them will be able to reach their own decisions on the issues that affect them. Many will not need to use the named person service and guidance. The role should be delivered with flexibility and with a light-touch approach when required. However, no one knows what might happen in the coming days, weeks or months. People might look to family and friends but, when they turn to public services for help, we should not remove the support of their named person just because they have reached their 16th birthday, which is what Liz Smith’s amendments would do and what Labour seems to want to support.

Liz Smith has referred a number of times to the situation in which a young couple who are aged 17 could be parents and could have contact with three named persons. What has not been acknowledged is the fact that many young parents struggle to cope and can benefit from having a professional to turn to who can help them to access the support that they need. Liz Smith suggests that the way to streamline support for such young people is to take it away altogether.

More generally, Liz Smith’s amendments 162 to 164 would fundamentally undermine the named person role and restrict the ability to encourage the early intervention and prevention approach that is needed if we are to prevent crises.

Amendment 163 would add unnecessary bureaucracy to the named person role. In respect of the proposed right of appeal to a sheriff, procedures are already in place at local level to deal with complaints about the exercise of the named person functions. We have lodged Scottish Government amendments, which we will debate later, to ensure that there is a clear and accessible route for parents and families to take for independent consideration of complaints and determination of the issues, if those local procedures are unsuccessful.

Amendments 162A and 163A to 163F are dependent on amendments 162 and 163 being agreed to. Similarly to amendments 1 to 50, they would remove references to “young person”. Liz Smith’s suggestion does not support a responsive, preventative and early intervention approach, but rather is overly bureaucratic, resource intensive, unnecessary and, ultimately, not in the best interests of our children and young people.

In response to Neil Bibby’s point about finance, we have costed the measure and we are financing it. Health visitor numbers have increased by more than 14 per cent since 2007. As Joan McAlpine stated, we have to wonder about Labour’s full commitment to the policy, which has proven to be a success and has allowed services to be better and more effectively targeted at our most vulnerable young people and children.

I do not support the amendments in Liz Smith’s name.

Liz Smith: I repeat that we have two fundamental objections to this part of the bill. We thoroughly object to the assertion that all children between the nought and 18 need a named person. I will go back to some of the evidence. It has been cited time and again that Highland Council has been highly successful because of its named person policy. I do not doubt that Highland has been highly successful, but I can see no evidence whatever that that is to do with the named person policy, rather than other highly efficient aspects of GIRFEC, the council’s good leadership and the way in which social services are organised. The council has had a particular success rate on that, but I cannot find the evidence that it is to do with the named person.

A further point was brought to the Parliament’s attention by the Finance Committee. The minister has alleged that the policy is fully costed and funded. I simply do not accept that, nor did every single member of the Finance Committee, which in effect said that the minister’s plans on this policy looked as though they had been written on the back of an envelope.

It is very clear to me that the lack of costing and funding for the policy has serious implications. We have teachers and perhaps health visitors who are very concerned about the accountability that they will have under the policy and where the resources will come from. I ask the minister to think about that very carefully before we come to the vote.

Some members referred to all the evidence from parents and said that it has always been the case that parents have supported the named person policy. That is simply not true. The Scottish Parent Teacher Council’s extensive survey showed that 83 per cent of the parents surveyed did not accept the policy. I therefore think that we have to be very careful about how we balance that evidence.

I will press amendment 1 because we have a fundamental objection to this part of the bill.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The question is, that amendment 1 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

Smith, and all previously debated with amendment 1.

Section 24—Duty to communicate information about role of named persons
Amendments 164 and 25 to 29 not moved.

Section 25—Duty to help named person
Amendments 30 to 31 not moved.

Section 26—Information sharing
Amendments 32 to 36 not moved.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 9 is on information sharing and the requirement to obtain informed consent when the information concerned is confidential. Amendment 165, in the name of Liam McArthur, is grouped with amendments 166 to 171.

Liam McArthur: The minister and committee colleagues will be aware that I have been pursuing this issue since stage 1. I recognise that progress has been made since then—notably through a series of amendments that the minister lodged at stage 2.

Sections 26 and 27 came in for fairly pointed criticism, not least from Professor Norrie, whom the minister quoted earlier and who gave the committee every encouragement to dump over the side sections 26 and 27 lock, stock and barrel. However tempting that might have been, we opted for a different approach, and as a result sharing of information about a child or young person can take place only when it is proportionate and relevant. Moreover, it can happen only with regard having been had to the views of the child.

Welcome although that is—I acknowledge the steps that the minister took at stage 2—evidence that the committee received makes it clear that information being shared will not require the child’s consent. As a result, there is a risk that the child’s right to privacy under article 16 of the UNCRC or article 8 of the ECHR could be compromised.

They go on to confirm that a child or young person’s right to privacy “is not respected in the absence of a requirement to seek consent”.

My amendments acknowledge the need for exceptions to be made where “the information holder considers that to seek ... consent would be likely to adversely affect the wellbeing of the child or young person.”

The amendments would require that guidance be drawn up on how confidential information could be shared in such circumstances. I understand that the amendments reflect the approach that is already taken in the health service. The absence of a more explicit reference to a need to seek informed and explicit consent weakens the bill and opens it up to justified criticism.

I look forward to hearing comments from the minister and other colleagues.

I move amendment 165.

Stewart Maxwell (West Scotland) (SNP): Information sharing was discussed extensively in evidence taking at stage 1 by the Education and Culture Committee. Concerns were raised by some witnesses, as Liam McArthur fairly said, and the committee raised the matter in its stage 1 report. The committee had the chance to discuss and debate information sharing again at stage 2, and we did so extensively.

In my view, this provision was improved by amendments that were passed at stage 2, so the bill is now robust and balanced in this respect. In addition, the minister committed to publishing full guidance on implementation of the information-sharing provisions.

I turn directly to Liam McArthur’s amendments on confidentiality. Of course confidentiality should be respected at all times. However, Liam McArthur must recognise—I think that he does, because he was careful in how he spoke—that there is an expectation that there will be discussions with the child and that their views will be taken into account before a decision is made to share information. A decision to breach confidentiality would never be taken lightly, but sometimes such a decision is necessary in order to promote, support or safeguard a child’s wellbeing.

I am concerned that, if Liam McArthur’s amendments were to be agreed to, they would interfere with the bill’s intention regarding safeguarding a child’s wellbeing. I know that that is not Liam McArthur’s intention and that he is doing his best to strike a difficult balance. However, I am sure that he is aware that in many of the most tragic cases of recent years lack of information sharing has been identified as one of the key factors in the tragedy. I therefore cannot support amendments that could in any way result in appropriate information sharing being either confused or slowed down.

Kezia Dugdale: I support Liam McArthur's amendments for two reasons. First, they seek to increase the amount of rights that children have. That is important given that, a long time ago, two bills were proposed, one of which was a rights of children and young people bill. To involve them wherever possible in consent to access their data is absolutely the correct approach.

The other reason is that Liam McArthur’s amendments would give parents the right to be consulted where organisations propose to share information about the child that is not specifically about the parents. That is sensible, and it is why Labour members will support Liam McArthur's amendments.

Liz Smith: I, too, am grateful to Liam McArthur for lodging the amendments in group 9, which strike at the heart of the concerns about the data-sharing aspect of the bill. Notwithstanding Stewart Maxwell’s well-intentioned comments, there is no doubt that data sharing remains a controversial element of the bill and that there is, as things stand, still scope for data sharing to be misused or abused, and not only in relation to the named person policy.

Many professionals are concerned about where their responsibilities lie and, therefore, about where accountability will lie, especially in a dispute or even a general disagreement between them, the family and the named person. We will support the amendments.

Joan McAlpine: As Stewart Maxwell does, I respect how Liam McArthur has put his argument across. He will know that I raised concerns in committee about some of the bill's provisions, including the concerns of LGBT Youth Scotland with regard to the privacy of young gay teenagers. However, I am confident that the guidance will address those concerns and that, given the amount of attention that we have paid to data sharing, professionals will act appropriately.

There is also the issue of confidentiality for parents. Again, I had concerns about how proportionate the provisions are with regard to sharing information about children whose wellbeing is not threatened. However, we must balance such considerations and consider what is best for vulnerable children.

In the wider context, it is important that every inquiry into a child’s death has concluded that information sharing was not robust. I believe that, on balance, I and others should put our concerns aside and trust that professionals will make the correct judgments and protect the most vulnerable children. I will therefore not support the amendments in group 9.

Aileen Campbell: We have listened carefully to the arguments in support of the amendments in group 9, and we share many of the sentiments that have been expressed. We must ensure that appropriate information is shared when there is a reason to do so, and that we seek to respect the views of the child and their right to privacy with regard to data protection and ECHR legislation as well as seeking to promote, support and safeguard their wellbeing.

In that context, the amendments seek to strike a careful balance in what are complex provisions. However, I will set out why we believe that the provisions in the bill as amended at stage 2 best reflect—as Joan McAlpine and Stewart Maxwell pointed out—an appropriate balance in terms of sharing information, promoting good practice and meeting the important aims that Liam McArthur has set out.

Amendments 165, 166 and 168 seek to ensure that informed and explicit consent is obtained prior to the sharing of confidential information under section 26. They would also provide that the information holder take account of the child’s age and maturity when seeking consent. An exception to the duty to seek consent would be made if the information holder considered that it would adversely affect the child or young person’s wellbeing to do so.

The amendments in the group rightly recognise that confidential information should not routinely be shared, that the child’s views about the information being shared are important, and that sharing or not sharing information can have a serious effect on a child. The information sharing provisions in the bill as amended at stage 2 already provide that careful consideration be given to issues of confidentiality, the views of the child or young person and the impact of information sharing on their wellbeing. The amendments are more limited in scope than the current bill provisions in that they do not extend to sections 23 and 38, which also require information sharing.

Amendments 169 and 171 seek to remove sections 26(8) and 38(3). They would therefore remove the protection that we introduced at stage 2 to make it explicit that where there is a legal prohibition or restriction on sharing information, that prohibition or restriction cannot be ignored. The amendments do not include an amendment to the corresponding provision in section 23, which we included in our stage 2 amendments. Although the bill's provisions refer to a duty of confidentiality, the amendments refer simply to “confidential” information without any definition, which leaves room for potential confusion.
Amendments 167 and 170 seek to ensure that guidance that is to be published on part 4 of the bill contains advice on how to proceed when consent to sharing of confidential information cannot be obtained, and that information holders must proceed in accordance with that guidance. Section 28 of the bill already allows for guidance to be issued in relation to the exercise of all functions that will be conferred by part 4, including the information-sharing duties, and it also already requires all persons exercising those functions to have regard to the guidance. The amendments are therefore unnecessary. The bill is clear that practitioners need to consider carefully what information must be shared, when and with whom.

The bill’s provisions support early intervention; that is why it is crucial for the named person to be aware of all concerns about a child’s wellbeing. We have listened to the views of stakeholders—specifically in the health sector—who have experienced confusion and, at times, conflict when operating under a duty of confidentiality, even when they knew that it would be in the best interests of the child to share information. Section 26(8), as amended, therefore permits them to share information, but only after consideration of all the other tests in section 26. Sections 23(7) and 26(8) also make it clear that the bill does not permit a breach of any other legal restrictions on disclosure of information.

Of course we know that the child’s views are important—that is why at stage 2 we lodged amendments to all the information-sharing provisions to ensure that the child’s views are obtained wherever possible. As stipulated in section 28, guidance will reinforce those important principles, which recognise the importance of taking the child’s views into account, and recognise that sharing information about a child’s wellbeing can do harm as well as good. The amendment to further specify that guidance should be followed is not required and will add nothing to the existing provisions.

Amendments 165 to 171 seek to go too far when a child’s wellbeing is at risk and would potentially prevent information from being shared appropriately. Stewart Maxwell has already pointed out that every inquiry into a child’s death in the past few decades has shown that lack of information sharing has been a key factor. What is proposed in the amendments would complicate and potentially confuse—the intention behind the bill, which is to ensure that appropriate and proportionate information gets to the named person well before crisis point is reached.

We therefore strongly oppose all the amendments in group 9, not because we do not respect the principles that they seek to promote—as outlined by Liam McArthur—but because we strongly believe that the bill already provides for the important principles that Liam McArthur laid out to be respected.

Liam McArthur: I thank Kezia Dugdale and Liz Smith for their comments and support. I also thank Joan McAlpine for her interest in and pursuit of the issue throughout stage 2, in particular in relation to the concerns that were raised by LGBT Youth Scotland. I was very sympathetic to those concerns. I thank Stewart Maxwell for what I thought was a fairly accurate explanation of the journey that the committee went through and the evidence that we took. He is right to highlight the concern that we do not want to do anything that would either create confusion or slow down the process.

However, as I said earlier, there is equally a risk that we will slow down the process through children and young people and their parents and guardians not engaging with confidential services because of concerns about lack of explicit consent. The presumption of consent—with the exemption that consent would not be sought when it was likely to affect adversely the wellbeing of the child or the young person—would strike the right balance. To pick up on the point that the minister—and, I think, Joan McAlpine—made, it would also leave scope for the professional judgment of the people who are tasked with making enormously difficult decisions about the circumstances under which they should share confidential information.

I think that the amendments in group 9 are important in that they would give more confidence to children and young people and their parents and guardians that what will be put in place is proportionate and robust and will allow latitude for the exchange of information in the correct circumstances.

On that basis, and notwithstanding the comments that have been made by the minister and other colleagues, I press amendment 165.

Motion moved,

That the next time limit be extended by up to 30 minutes.—[Joe FitzPatrick.]

Motion agreed to.

After section 29

The Presiding Officer: We move to group 10. Amendment 101, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 102, 112 and 113.

Aileen Campbell: The Scottish Government is committed to clear, quick and accessible routes for consideration of complaints if there are disagreements about the exercise of the named person or child’s plan functions. We are also committed to ensuring that a mechanism for that is in place in advance of the commencement of the GIRFEC duties, which are currently scheduled for 2016, as set out in the financial memorandum.

However, we do not want to add unnecessary complexity to the complaints landscape, where there are existing mechanisms to enable people to challenge decisions or roles in public services. In evidence to the committee the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman—the independent body that handles complaints about devolved public services in Scotland—highlighted the difficulties that are sometimes caused by the complexity of complaints processes.

Amendment 101 will enable ministers to propose provisions for dealing with complaints in respect of the named person duties in part 4. It will also enable ministers to propose changes to other legislation, if required, in order to provide as accessible and consistent an avenue as possible for complaints handling in relation to the named person duties. Amendment 102 will allow the Scottish ministers to make equivalent provision in respect of the child’s plan duties in part 5.

Amendments 112 and 113 propose that the order-making powers will be subject to affirmative procedure. That is considered appropriate so that Parliament has the opportunity to scrutinise, to debate and, if satisfied, to affirm the detailed proposals before they can come into force.

I am grateful to Liz Smith for her help and her input into discussions on the amendments, and for the useful meeting that we had following the stage 2 committee meetings. I hope that we can continue working together as we develop the detail of the proposals. Processes already exist for consideration of complaints at local level; we expect that disagreements about the duties in parts 4 and 5 will be resolved at that level, where possible.

If that is not possible, we want to ensure that there is a clear and accessible route for parents and families to go for independent consideration of complaints and determination on issues. The order-making powers will enable us to ensure that all matters that should be subject to a complaint and independent investigation are covered. That will be a key focus of our planned consultation, as we take into account stakeholder views on the detail of what is required. We will also continue our discussions and work with the SPSO to ensure that we avoid duplication and do not add unnecessary complexity to the complaints landscape.

As we develop the detail, we also need to take into account the current wider consideration of complaints in social work, where we are keen that the system should meet the needs of service users. We do not want to pre-empt the outcome of that work by putting detail for the GIRFEC provisions in the bill now.

We are therefore proposing the order-making powers to give the flexibility that is required to take into account related developments elsewhere. That will also enable us to engage further with stakeholders—especially parents and families—which will inform the development of our proposals.

As I said previously, we are committed to having in place a clear and accessible system for consideration of complaints in advance of commencement of the GIRFEC duties. The proposed order-making power will enable us to achieve that. Therefore, we ask Parliament to support the amendments in my name.

I move amendment 101.

Liz Smith: As the minister has indicated, at stage 2 I lodged three amendments that sought to introduce provisions for resolution of disputes regarding the need, content and management of a child’s plan. After hearing the responses from the minister, I decided not to press the amendments on the ground that she was similarly committed to introducing a clear route of redress for families, parents and children.

I appreciated that sentiment and I was grateful to the minister for some engagement. She knows from my email of 5 February that although I am... content with the spirit of the Scottish Government amendments 101, 102, 112 and 113. I still have some concerns about whether there will be a sufficiently robust appeals process, as distinct from just a complaints process. Before I accept the amendments in full, I would be grateful if she would guarantee that she will consider the matter further and engage with the Muir Maxwell Trust, which has been extremely diligent in addressing the issue.

Likewise, it would be very helpful if the minister would indicate the timeframe for consultation on the new mechanism and say how its independence will be assured.

Liam McArthur: As I said earlier, after initial misgivings I have been persuaded by the case for the development of a system of “named persons”. That said, it does not require a crystal ball to see that there are likely to be points at which how that operates in practice will not be acceptable to those involved, including children, young people and their parents or guardians.

I raised similar concerns about the lack of an appeals process with regard to the child’s plan provisions that are set out in part 5 of the bill. However, it was the efforts of Liz Smith at stage 2 that secured the concession from the minister in relation to part 4. I congratulate her on that not inconsiderable achievement, given the fate of every other Opposition amendment at stage 2.

Nevertheless, I can give only a cautious welcome at this stage to the minister’s move in amendments 101 and 102 to take order-making powers that would allow a complaints procedure to be introduced for parts 4 and 5. As Liz Smith suggested, the Muir Maxwell Trust has made some interesting observations in that respect. It suggests that what is set out looks a little like a tick-box exercise, with the cards stacked against the child and/or their parents. It also questions the need or justification for time limits. I have some sympathy with that, because any case would, I presume, be dealt with on its merits.

The minister will have seen the Muir Maxwell Trust briefing and the call for a firm commitment to continue working with the trust and others to create an appeals system that is fair and which genuinely works for all—especially children and young people with profound learning disabilities. I assume that she will confirm that she is happy to do that.

Stewart Maxwell: I thank the minister for taking on board the discussion that took place in the Education and Culture Committee, particularly at stage 2 on the amendments that Liz Smith mentioned earlier. I am delighted that the minister has moved on the matter and has lodged the amendments in group 10, which are welcome. We all look forward to the consultation process to ensure that we get in place a transparent and speedy complaints procedure as soon as possible.

Aileen Campbell: I am grateful to Liz Smith for her engagement on the matter and for not pressing her amendments at stage 2 in order to allow us to work together on what we have proposed at stage 3. I am also grateful to Liam McArthur and Stewart Maxwell for their comments.

I have said that GIRFEC will not be implemented until 2016, so we will be able to work until then to ensure that robust complaints procedures are in place before it is implemented. We will commit to working with the Muir Maxwell Trust to ensure that we have managed to capture all views, not least those of parents and families, as we develop the approach to raising complaints. We will also ensure that we can use affirmative procedure to allow Parliament to scrutinise he provisions more widely.

I hope that the spirit in which we have approached the matter and our continued commitment to engage with parliamentarians and other interest groups will ensure that we will, by the point at which GIRFEC comes into action, have a robust process by which families can raise any concerns they have.

Amendment 101 agreed to.

The Presiding Officer: I suspend the meeting for 10 minutes to allow a short comfort break.

16:42
Meeting suspended.

16:52
On resuming—

The Presiding Officer: We move to group 11, on the meaning of relevant and listed authorities et cetera. Amendment 77, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 77A, 78 to 82, 84, 86, 86A, 87, 176, 90, 91 and 198 to 200.

Aileen Campbell: Amendments 77 and 86 specify that the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland and post-16 education bodies are not relevant authorities for the purposes of section 29 in relation to directions on the named person functions and section 40 in relation to directions on child’s plan functions. The amendments remove those bodies from being subject to ministerial direction because that conflicts with their established status of being independent from ministers, the Scottish Government and Parliament.

It is conceivable that bodies that are to be added to schedules 2 and 2A in the future may have similar concerns about their independent status and being subject to ministerial direction. Therefore, the changes that are proposed by amendments 77 and 86 allow the duty to comply with ministerial directions to be disappplied in relation to those bodies should that be appropriate. Amendments 90 and 91 provide that those order-making powers should be subject to the affirmative procedure.

Amendments 78 to 82 and 84 are minor technical amendments that are made in consequence of amendments 77 and 86.

Amendment 87 is a minor technical amendment to section 50(1) to provide that the definition of corporate parents for the purposes of part 7 is made subject to subsection (3A) as well as subsection (3). That change is made in consequence of the addition of subsection (3A) at stage 2 to provide that the children’s commissioner and post-16 education bodies are not corporate parents for the purposes of section 58, thereby exempting them from ministerial direction under the powers set out in that section. Those bodies are, however, corporate parents for all other purposes in part 7.

Amendments 198 to 200 would have the effect of removing the children’s commissioner from schedules 2, 2A and 3—effectively, they remove the requirement for him to provide information and assistance with regard to the named person and child’s plan functions and to take on corporate parenting responsibilities.

Amendments 77A, 86A and 176, in Liam McArthur’s name, seek to remove the references to the children’s commissioner in the provisions on directions in parts 4, 5 and 7 in consequence of amendments 198 to 200, also in Liam McArthur’s name. We do not support these amendments in Liam McArthur’s name, and I will explain why.

At stage 2, we lodged an amendment to remove the requirement that the children’s commissioner and his officers must comply with ministerial directions relating to part 7, on corporate parenting responsibilities, on the ground that that conflicted with their established independence from ministers and the Parliament. For similar reasons, we have lodged stage 3 amendments to disapply ministerial direction-making powers in respect of the children’s commissioner in parts 4 and 5. However, the removal of the children’s commissioner from schedules 2, 2A and 3 completely goes too far.

If the children’s commissioner holds relevant information about a child that meets the tests introduced in section 26 at stage 2, and that information is not known to the named person, our policy intention is that that information should be shared. The provisions are designed to promote, support and safeguard children’s wellbeing. Sharing relevant and proportionate information relating to wellbeing concerns with the named person need not compromise the commissioner’s ability to exercise his functions, including any investigatory function.

The duties to help the named person with regard to section 25, and to provide information, advice or assistance in relation to a child’s plan under section 38, do not apply where that would be incompatible with any of the children’s commissioner’s duties or unduly prejudice the exercise of any of his functions. That would give the commissioner a safeguard if he felt that his position would be compromised in providing the requested information, advice or assistance.

On amendments 176 and 200, I acknowledge Liam McArthur’s concerns about the role of the children’s commissioner and his proposal to remove the commissioner as a corporate parent. Our stage 2 amendment to disapply the section 58 ministerial direction-making power met the substance of the commissioner’s concerns at that time but importantly retained the commissioner as a corporate parent with the same broad duties as the wider public sector.

The children’s commissioner is a leading advocate of children’s rights and plays a key role in improving outcomes for looked-after children. It therefore sits uncomfortably that we should consider giving the commissioner a special exemption when his role in meeting that aim is so important.

In summary, we cannot support Mr McArthur’s amendments. I ask the Parliament to support my amendments in the group.

I move amendment 77.

Liam McArthur: In speaking to the amendments in her name in the group, the minister has set out the steps that the Government is taking to remove the children’s commissioner from the lists of relevant and listed authorities, effectively, as she said, thereby lifting the threat of the commissioner being subject to ministerial powers of direction. I very much welcome that move, following on from the earlier steps that the minister took at stage 2.

However, concerns remain, arising from the continued inclusion of the commissioner’s office in schedules 2, 2A and 3. According to the commissioner, that could result in “unprecedented executive interference with the model that Parliament chose and reaffirmed for bodies such as the Commissioner.”

As a result of the schedules, the commissioner would be inevitably involved in a network of close institutional relationships with statutory children’s services providers. On the face of it, that appears desirable, but there is the chance that such providers could be the subject of investigation by the commissioner, in which case the perception of independence could be compromised. The problem would be all the more acute where the commissioner owed a duty to share information about individual children with statutory services acting as named persons, as the minister acknowledged. The commissioner explains:

“It is only a question of time until the Commissioner will be required under this duty to disclose sensitive information about a child complainant to the service provider under investigation, which also provides the named person service to the child, thereby giving the service provider a degree of power over the Commissioner in terms of the investigation—precisely what Parliament sought to avoid by choosing the institutional setup of the 2003 Act.”

In addition, it has been pointed out that its inclusion in schedules 2A and 3 of the bill would appear to require the commissioner’s office to actively participate in care planning for individual children—something that quite demonstrably would be inappropriate, not least given the importance of the commissioner maintaining, and being seen to maintain, a level of independence.

Without my amendments 198 to 200—and the other consequential changes—we could end up needlessly limiting the effectiveness of the commissioner and his office. In so doing, we risk closing off avenues of complaint and appeal that are open to some of the most vulnerable children and young people in our society. That is not the intention, but I fear that it could be the effect. Therefore, I urge Parliament to support my amendments.

Aileen Campbell: The amendments in my name in the group strike a good balance between respecting the role of the children’s commissioner and understanding his position in relation to maintaining the independence that he requires.

I explained why we need to retain the commissioner in the lists in schedules 2 and 2A. If we are to achieve our policy of getting it right for every child, we need to ensure that everyone who holds relevant information about children’s wellbeing can share that information. I am confident that the safeguards to which I referred, which recognise circumstances in which it would not be appropriate to share information, will give the commissioner the reassurance that he requires that his independence and investigations will not be compromised.

On schedule 3, we do not consider that a special exemption from the corporate parenting duty would be appropriate, given the commissioner’s key role in achieving the aims of part 7. The disapplication of the duty to comply with directions, which we have achieved in respect of part 7 and which we are proposing in respect of parts 4 and 5, enables us to strike the right balance between protecting the commissioner’s independence and ensuring that the bill’s important policy aims in respect of promoting, supporting and safeguarding children’s wellbeing are met.

We hope that the children’s commissioner, in recognition of the unique position that he holds, will want to engage with other services to address issues that relate to children’s wellbeing, wherever they arise. We hope that the commissioner is keen to play a part in improving outcomes for looked-after children. That seems to be in the best interests of the child. The bill as drafted and as we are proposing to amend it will not require the commissioner to act in a way that is inconsistent with the proper exercise of his functions.

I therefore ask members to support the amendments in my name and not to support the amendments in Liam McArthur’s name. We think that we have struck the right balance and protected the commissioner’s role in respect of his functions.

The Presiding Officer: I call Liam McArthur to wind up.

Liam McArthur: Oh, am I winding up on this group, Presiding Officer?

I heard what the minister said about the amendments in my name. I still think that there is an issue to do with, if not the compromising of the commissioner’s independence, a perception that his independence will be compromised. I intend to move the amendments in my name.

I move amendment 77A.

The Presiding Officer: The question is, that amendment 77A be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

Section 43—Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

The Presiding Officer: Group 12 is on the provision of early learning and childcare.

Kezia Dugdale: Presiding Officer, I raise a point of order under rule 9.3.2 of standing orders. I do so as section 43 is the first part of the bill that involves capital costs.

I ask you to look again at rule 9.3.2. This issue was first raised by the distinguished convener of the Finance Committee and I draw your attention to the letter that he sent to the minister earlier today, in which he said:

“The Committee is very concerned that a best estimate has not been provided for the capital costs as required by Rule 9.3.2 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders.”

Furthermore, I draw your attention to the childcare section of the supplementary financial memorandum to the bill, which states clearly, in paragraph 13, on page 5:

“Capital costs have not been explicitly estimated. It is not possible to provide an accurate estimate of the level of infrastructure investment required at this stage. Further work will be required to explore the need for any additional capital funding.”

Given that, essentially, we are being asked to sign a blank cheque, do standing orders provide scope for business to be suspended until the Government can offer an explanation and, indeed, an apology? We believe that for it to proceed without giving an explanation is discourteous to parliamentarians to scrutinise and vote on what is involved in our nurseries, as a result of which discrimination in our nurseries, as a result of which further evidence will be taken prior to our voting on these particular amendments.

The Presiding Officer: Thank you, Ms Dugdale, and thank you for giving me prior notice of your point of order.

As was said earlier when a similar point of order was raised, under rule 9.12, a financial resolution was passed by the Parliament at stage 1. A supplementary financial memorandum was lodged, as is required under rule 9.7.8B, as a result of amendments that were agreed to at stage 2.

I am aware that the Finance Committee and its distinguished convener took advice on the supplementary financial memorandum this morning and that, in the light of that scrutiny, the committee’s convener has written to the minister to raise concerns about the information in the supplementary financial memorandum. The convener has also invited the minister to give further evidence to the committee.

As the Deputy Presiding Officer said earlier, standing orders make it clear that a financial resolution must be passed, which has happened, and a supplementary financial memorandum has been put forward in relation to the amendments in question.

I understand the point that the member has made. It is, of course, open to any member to write to the Standards, Procedures and Public Appointments Committee to ask whether the issue might be looked at in future. For the moment, however, a financial resolution has been passed and the Parliament’s standing orders have been met.

Amendment 51, in the name of Liz Smith, is grouped with amendments 103, 172, 104, 173, 105, 174, 52 to 54, 114, 115, 115A and 197.

Liz Smith: Just before I speak to amendment 51, Presiding Officer, I seek clarification of whether you are indicating that further evidence will be taken prior to our voting on these particular amendments.

The Presiding Officer: That is entirely a matter for the Finance Committee and the minister.

Liz Smith: At stage 2, I lodged amendments that were designed to end the practice of birthday discrimination in our nurseries, as a result of which children born between 1 September and 29 February receive significantly less provision than those born at other times of the year. Indeed, that anomaly was acknowledged by Angela Constance in her response to, I think, question 13 from Malcolm Chisholm at this afternoon’s education question time. The anomaly itself derives from the Scottish Government’s practice of funding nursery provision from the term after a child turns three. As Reform Scotland has shown, that means that nursery provision can vary by up to 317 hours or by more than £1,000 within the cost of nursery partnership provision.

A child born between 1 March and 31 August is entitled to the full two years’ nursery provision before beginning school, but a child born between 1 September and 31 December will get only 18 months’ provision and a child born between 1 January and 28 February receives just 15 months. Evidently, the situation is grossly unfair and amendments 51 to 54 would rectify it by introducing a fixed start point for all children, as is common practice in primary schools. That would end the present shortcoming and would place nursery provision on an equal basis. Although the plans were supported by the Liberal Democrats and Labour at stage 2, Scottish National Party members seem, for some reason, intent on blocking the measures, despite their commitment to what they describe as transformational policies to support young children.

At stage 2, Colin Beattie talked about

"30,000 additional two-year-olds entering the system."—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 14 January; c 3287.]

That is wrong. Amendments 51 to 54 would not extend childcare to new groups; instead, they would ensure equality of access across the board by accelerating uptake. We are very well aware that that would incur a cost. The Conservatives have not shied away from that fact but we would prefer to see this policy in place rather than, for example, the universal free school meals policy.

Furthermore, the minister argued at stage 2 that the amendments were “unnecessary” because commencement dates can be set via secondary legislation. However, she made no commitment to make such a change; indeed, the SNP has said on the record that it has no plans to make such changes. That is why amendments 51 to 54 are necessary—the status quo is simply unacceptable.

By removing an unwelcome anomaly from the nursery system, amendments 51 to 54 would place all children on an equal footing. The suggestion is entirely reasonable and I hope that the Scottish Government will accept the amendments.

I move amendment 51.

Aileen Campbell: By proposing a move to a system in which all children would receive two years of funded early learning and childcare, amendments 51 to 53 would result in significant numbers of children taking up their entitlement, some from the age of two and a half. Amendment 54 would make the order-making power in amendment 51 subject to the affirmative parliamentary procedure.

Although we accept the need to build on the bill’s provisions, the priority at this stage must be to build additional hours and flexibility into our high-quality universal provision, increasing the entitlement to around 16 hours a week, and, as we expand, focusing on our more vulnerable two-year-olds. We have demonstrated our commitment to do that with the announcement on additional two-year-olds by the First Minister on 7 January.

Amendments 51 to 54 are unnecessary, as any further expansion of or changes to the commencement dates for entitlement to early learning and childcare for two or three-year-olds can be achieved through secondary legislation made under the bill.

On the start date for three-year-olds to take up the funded entitlement, local authorities can and do deliver provision beyond the minimum number of hours and the minimum eligible children. A number of local authorities already start children from their third birthday, or the month after their third birthday, where they have capacity to do so.

The youngest children—those born in January or February—who may get less provision when they are three, will continue to be entitled to an additional year after they are four, where parents wish. In addition, increasing entitlements to two-year-olds will result in a significant decrease in the number of children who are impacted by the issue of third birthday start dates.

We share the ambitions within amendments 172, 173 and 174 to deliver early learning and childcare to significantly more two-year-olds in greater need. We know that children from more disadvantaged backgrounds benefit most from high-quality early learning and childcare and we were absolutely delighted when the First Minister announced on 7 January that from August 2015 we will increase the entitlement to those two-year-olds set out in amendments 172, 173 and 174. I am pleased that Neil Bibby agrees with our timescales, but we do not need amendments to the bill to do that.

I have said that the bill is a starting point and that we will expand entitlement through secondary legislation where it is affordable. We have demonstrated our commitment to that approach by allocating consequential funding that was confirmed to us in December 2013.

Amendments 115A and 197 seek to ensure that those two-year-olds who would be eligible by virtue of meeting free school lunches criteria, whom Neil Bibby wants added on the face of the bill, are commenced separately in or by August 2015.

Amendments 172, 173, 174, 115A and 197 are all unnecessary, as we have made clear our commitment to commence children by virtue of meeting the free school lunch criteria through secondary legislation, for implementation from August 2015. Those amendments would overcomplicate the issue by introducing additional children and dates on the face of the bill. There are clear advantages to defining children through secondary legislation, as we always set out to do, especially through the affirmative procedure agreed at stage 2, affording an appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny and discussion—indeed, more discussion than would be possible through an amendment at stage 2 or 3.

The purpose of amendments 103, 105 and 114 is to ensure that the arrangements for stopping early learning and childcare to start school are the same for all children. Currently, children whose fifth birthdays are in September to December, and so who are not quite five in August when they are eligible to start school, can be deferred for a year by their parents so that they are over five when they start school. However, they are not automatically entitled to an additional year of early learning and childcare. Children whose birthdays are in January and February, who would only be around four and a half if they started school the August before, when first eligible, can be deferred by their parents for a year so that they are over five when they start school. They are also entitled to an additional year of early learning and childcare. Those starting and stopping arrangements are all set out in secondary legislation, which will be replaced by new secondary legislation enabled by the bill at section 43(2)(c)(ii).

The children who are defined on the face of the bill—two-year-olds who are looked after, are under a kinship care order or have a parent-appointed guardian—have their start dates set out on the face of the bill. However, they are not currently covered by the secondary legislation enabled by section 43(2)(c)(ii) and therefore have no stopping dates.

For all children born in September to December, regardless of whether they are specified on the face of the bill or through secondary legislation, whose parents or carers decide to defer entry to school for a year until after they are five, there is scope for an additional year of early learning and childcare at the discretion of the local authority. That is based on the needs of the child and informed by appropriate professional assessment, which could be by educational psychologists, early years staff or teachers.

Amendments 103, 105 and 114 are technical amendments to enable the same end dates to be specified by secondary legislation made under the bill for those children specified on the face of the bill as for all other children specified by secondary legislation under the bill. That will ensure consistent arrangements for all children and is important in determining eligibility for an additional year of early learning and childcare before starting school.

Amendment 104 will provide that children who have guardians appointed under section 7 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995—guardians appointed as such in a parent’s will or similar—are also eligible for funded early learning and childcare provision from the age of two. That is to bring them in line with children who have guardians appointed by the court under section 11 of the 1995 act. Those children were deemed at stage 2 to be subject to a kinship care order and therefore eligible for funded early learning and childcare from the age of two. The amendment will ensure that two-year-old children who have a guardian, no matter how that guardian was appointed, will be eligible for funded early learning and childcare.

The purpose of amendment 115 is to provide for the commencement of the non-substantive provisions in sections 43(2) to 43(4), which define the children who are eligible for early learning and childcare provision, and of the power to make secondary legislation to describe further eligible children, including when their entitlement starts and stops.

We have worked closely with our key delivery partners on our policy intentions as regards defining eligible children and we have used the opportunity of the consequential funding that was confirmed in December to announce further eligible children to be defined through secondary legislation. I am pleased that my amendment to make the order-making power subject to the affirmative procedure, which was recommended by the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, was agreed, as that will allow greater parliamentary scrutiny. It is essential that we set out at the earliest possible opportunity who the eligible pre-school children are, to enable local authorities to plan and work towards implementation.

We share the ambitions of local authorities and key stakeholders to contribute to Scotland’s social and economic development, improve attainment, support parents to find or sustain employment and, first and foremost, see our young children happy and benefiting from early learning and childcare. I am grateful to local authorities and all our delivery partners for the tremendous amount of work that is under way to plan and prepare for the delivery of the early learning and childcare provisions. I want to continue the pace and engagement on the aspects of provision that are subject to secondary legislation. The bill is the first step in achieving our ambition to transform childcare and to do more for children in the earliest years. In the white paper “Scotland's Future”, we set out our ambitions to do even more and to help families to balance work and life more ably.

I ask the Parliament to support my amendments in the group and not to support Liz Smith’s and Neil Bibby’s amendments.

Neil Bibby: I welcome the opportunity to speak to my amendments 172 to 174, 115A and 197, which are quite simple. They would put the Scottish Government’s recent commitments on early learning and childcare for two-year-olds in the bill, and are supported by Children in Scotland, Save the Children and many other organisations. We all know the importance of providing quality childcare. It helps a child’s learning and development and helps to put money in the pockets of families. When targeted at the poorest, it helps to reduce child poverty and it is good for the economy generally.

As members will know, Labour and other Opposition parties have pushed for an extension of early learning and childcare for two-year-olds. We welcome the fact that, from next year, 15,000 vulnerable two-year-olds will get early years provision who were not going to get it previously. That is not as many as we would like, but it is welcome all the same. However, members will forgive me for being a bit sceptical. I want to ensure that the Scottish Government cannot go back on its word and cut back that commitment at a later date. Members might ask why the Government would do that. Well, let us not forget that Fiona Hyslop and the SNP Government cut nursery provision for vulnerable two-year-olds when the SNP first came to power in 2007, so the SNP has form on the issue. That is why I want the entitlement to be in the bill.

The original childcare entitlement for 3 per cent of two-year-olds is in the bill, so why not go further and put the additional two-year-olds in it, too? I am not sure why the Government does not support its own policy and put its recently stated childcare commitments in the bill. If the minister refuses to do so, will she therefore confirm that, as it stands, other than the commitment on looked-after two-year-olds, there will be no commitment to childcare in the bill?

Aileen Campbell: We have made it clear from the start of the bill process that we will subsequently extend and expand childcare through secondary legislation.

Neil Bibby: As I said, I am concerned because that comes from the Government that cut nursery provision for two-year-olds when it first came to power.

So far, Labour and other Opposition parties have lodged dozens of amendments to the bill but, unfortunately, not one of them has been supported by a single SNP member of the Education and Culture Committee or by the Scottish Government. I am surprised that the SNP Government will not support the inclusion of its own childcare policy in the bill, as I propose should happen. However, perhaps that should not be surprising as, at stage 2, the SNP members of the committee voted against their own childcare policy in the white paper of 600 hours of early learning and childcare for half of Scotland’s two-year-olds. We said that the bill was unambitious on childcare, and it still is.

Despite the partial U-turn of last month, as of September this year, 40 per cent of two-year-olds in England will get the nursery provision while only 15 per cent of two-year-olds in Scotland will get it, and even when the figure goes up to 27 per cent the SNP Government will still be lagging behind England. The SNP keeps saying that we need independence to improve childcare, despite having done next to nothing on it over the past seven years.

Labour has supported, does support and will continue to support more childcare under devolution. The SNP could go further now on childcare, but it has chosen not to this year and in every other year that it has been in power. The bill really is a missed opportunity. It is the childcare bill with next to no childcare commitments written in it. The least that the SNP Government could do is to put its recent stated commitments on the face of the bill.

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): Several members wish to speak. I call Christian Allard, to be followed by Liam McArthur.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): I speak in support of the minister’s amendments. I listened carefully to the minister and found what she said a very welcome clarification of what children are entitled to. I wish that it had been as clear when I was a single working parent many years ago.

On Friday, the Equal Opportunities Committee will visit Dads Care Aberdeen, a fathers support group. I will explain to them the minister’s welcome clarification through her amendments and that we need them to make sure that the bill’s provisions are as clear as possible.

On Liz Smith’s and Neil Bibby’s amendments, I note that the minister said that we would be using secondary legislation. I share Neil Bibby’s ambition in his amendments, but I disagree with his point. I think that we are going in the right direction and I think that the Scottish Government and the Parliament have been at the forefront of childcare. This morning, I was at a committee that was talking about Scotland’s future, but we heard only about the currency. It is refreshing that we are spending all afternoon—and even the evening—in the Parliament speaking about Scotland’s future through the childcare that the Parliament and Government will pursue. That is why I support the minister’s amendments.

Liam McArthur: For nearly two years, my esteemed colleague Willie Rennie has repeatedly and consistently made the case for a major expansion of free nursery and childcare provision for two-year-olds in this country, starting with those from the poorest backgrounds. Initially, those calls were rejected by ministers, who said that that was not the Government’s priority. We were then told that any such expansion would require the powers of independence. Finally, last month, we had a change of tack from the First minister—let us call it a plan B—which was confirmed in the budget a fortnight ago. Again, I put on record my welcome and that of my party for that move.

Although 27 per cent of two-year-olds stand to benefit from this extension in provision by the summer of next year, that figure falls short of the figure of 40 per cent for those who will be covered south of the border this summer. It is nevertheless a major advance on what was originally proposed and could bring real benefits to some of the most disadvantaged two-year-olds in our country. However, that will be the case only if adequate capital funding is put in place. The minister has regularly questioned what is being delivered now in England and Wales, where adequate capital funding has been allocated. However, given the events in the Finance Committee meeting earlier today, she may be better advised to focus more attention on what is being delivered in Scotland and how.

Understandably, there is a desire and ambition among all of us to go further, which is reflected in the amendments in this group. Liz Smith’s amendments seek to address an anomaly, which was first highlighted by Reform Scotland, in the way in which the additional early learning and childcare provisions in the bill would benefit some children but not others. At stage 2, similar amendments were rejected by the Government, though not, it must be said, on the basis of any point of principle. In the absence of any principled objection, I urge the minister to think again, accept the proposed changes and provide a more level playing field.

Neil Bibby’s amendments seek to go considerably further. Obviously, the Government has so far insisted that that is not possible and, in some cases, not desirable. However, given recent dramatic changes in the Government’s policy on provision for two-year-olds, it is perhaps worth all of us keeping the minister’s feet to the fire.

We all accept that the bill is simply a step along the way to delivering our longer-term ambitions in relation to early learning and childcare. We all wish to go further, although only some of us recognise that that does not require us to break away from the rest of the UK but requires us rather to learn, if and where appropriate, from where they are doing things rather better.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): This is an aspirational and ambitious bill. In particular, the provision of 600 hours of nursery care will make a difference in young people’s lives. It offers flexibility for families and will affect initially 120,000 young people. As the minister has noted, in January the First Minister said that nursery care would be extended to two-year-olds in workless households, which will benefit another 8,800 children—15 per cent of all two-year-olds.

As the minister rightly said, the bill is a starting point and, if we are to make a difference through transformational change, we must have the powers of independence to gain the 1,140 hours of childcare that families will need. The bill will release people and enable more of them to get back to work, which will help families to make a difference in their own lives, particularly for women who are in a family situation, although I take on board what Christian Allard said as well. Those are some of the reasons why I am backing the bill. It is ambitious and aspirational for the people of Scotland.

It has already been mentioned that Mr Bibby’s amendments 115A, 172, 173, 174 and 197 could be covered by secondary legislation. Mr Bibby’s contribution would therefore have more credibility if the Labour Party had not voted for the budget a couple of weeks ago, because it covers the issue. When he comes to the chamber at this stage and starts talking about the issues that were covered in the budget, he shows that he is completely lost with nowhere to go. However, that is not unusual for that particular individual.

These amendments are in a very important part of the bill. The bill is ambitious and it is building the foundations of the type of Scotland that we all want by ensuring that Scotland can be the best place in the world for children to grow up in.

Joan McAlpine: I will be brief, but I felt that it would be wrong to let this part of the bill pass without talking about the quality of childcare, particularly the quality of the training of childcare workers. We should be very pleased that Professor Iram Siraj is leading the Scottish childcare review of the training of early learning teachers. The legislation that will be passed today is ambitious and will increase the amount of free childcare for three-year-olds and four-year-olds and vulnerable two-year-olds, and the review will ensure also that that care is of the very best quality. We should all be pleased about that.

Liz Smith: I add the Conservatives’ very strong support for the improvements in childcare. There is no doubt that there is substantial evidence about the benefits of providing childcare for health and wellbeing as well as education, and we are very supportive of that. However, it is deeply regrettable that it has formed part of the referendum debate, because it is quite clear that the Scottish Government has these powers already.

If the Scottish Government is truly aspirational and if it wants to have a transformational policy, I hope that it will agree to the amendments that will end the birthday discrimination when it comes to nursery provision. I will press amendment 51.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The question is, that amendment 51 be agreed to. Are we all agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

Before section 49

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 13 is on duty to provide a mandatory amount of out-of-school care. Amendment 175, in the name of Neil Bibby, is the only amendment in the group.

Neil Bibby: I have already spoken this afternoon about some areas of the bill that need to be strengthened. Amendment 175 seeks to address an area that was initially altogether absent from the bill. To improve access to and the availability and affordability of out-of-school care is crucial if we are to develop a model of childcare that supports children and helps parents. My Labour colleagues and I have consistently raised that issue in the chamber and the Education and Culture Committee.

Amendment 175 is important because it seeks to address the issue by enabling ministers to specify a minimum amount of out-of-school care when resources allow, in a way that is similar to the bill’s current provisions for pre-school care.

We all know that councils are suffering significantly as a result of budget cuts. Although councils want to improve childcare, they need the funds to do so, and there is increasing concern that out-of-school care and holiday care are vulnerable to those budget pressures.

Scottish children are already at a disadvantage in comparison with English children with regard to out-of-school care. There is an existing duty on local authorities in England to secure for working parents sufficient childcare for children up to the age of 14. There is therefore a strong case for putting the provision of childcare for school-age children on a statutory footing in Scotland. There is no doubting the importance of childcare for the early years, but working parents, who may be working from 9 to 5—or in some cases until 8 o’clock—need help with care for school-age children.

Amendment 175, which has support from a number of children’s organisations, would allow the current Government—or future Governments, which may place a greater priority on out-of-school childcare than the current Administration does—to introduce a minimum amount of out-of-school care and increase its availability when resources allow.

Ed Miliband and the UK Labour Party have already proposed to introduce a primary school guarantee of childcare from 8 am to 6 pm. I ask the SNP Government to consider seriously what its policies and plans are on childcare for children of primary school age.

George Adam: Will the member take an intervention?

Neil Bibby: I am just closing.
parents, and for many it is just too full of hurdles and they have no choice but to stay at home.

The issue is not just fitting in working hours and the school day—members should try fitting 12 weeks’ school holiday a year into an average five weeks’ annual leave entitlement. Some employers have gone out of their way to offer more family-friendly hours and school-run contracts, but jobs that would allow parents to fit work around the school day, never mind around the school term, are just not out there. It is vital that we remember that childcare is not just about babies, toddlers and pre-schoolers—

Bruce Crawford (Stirling) (SNP): Will the member give way?

Cara Hilton: No.

Childcare is about schoolchildren too. At UK level, as Neil Bibby mentioned, Ed Miliband has pledged to guarantee wraparound childcare for primary school children if Labour should win next year.

Here in Scotland, the Scottish Government has promised parents a childcare revolution if Scotland should vote yes, and yet it is making no promises to deliver a better deal for parents of schoolchildren either now or after the referendum. Whether the result is yes or no, the Scottish Parliament has the power to lead the way and give mums and dads the right to out-of-school childcare now.

Stewart Maxwell: Will the member take an intervention?

Cara Hilton: No—I have no time now. [Interruption.]

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order, please.

Cara Hilton: Amendment 175 would ensure that mums and dads in Scotland were better able to combine work and family life—[Interruption.]

Stewart Maxwell rose—

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Mr Maxwell, the member has said no.

Cara Hilton: That would be a boost to families, to our economy and to equality—[Interruption.]

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order in the chamber, please.

Cara Hilton: It would make life less of a juggling act for working parents. I urge members to support amendment 175.

17:45

Bruce Crawford: I want to follow up on that contribution, in terms of where we are. I find it quite astonishing that we have just had that speech from Cara Hilton—delivered with passion, I concede—just a week after the member voted to close Pitcorthie primary school in her constituency, despite the fact that she campaigned for that school all the way through the Dunfermline by-election—[Interruption.]

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order, please.

Bruce Crawford: It is absolute hypocrisy.

Cara Hilton: I ask the member to withdraw his remarks.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order, please.

Cara Hilton: I ask the member to withdraw his remarks.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order, Ms Hilton. Please resume your seat.

Aileen Campbell: The Scottish Government has consistently indicated that the provisions in the bill are a first—but significant—step towards developing a system of childcare that meets the needs of all children, parents and families. [Interruption.]

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order in the chamber, please. We cannot hear the minister’s response on the amendment.

Aileen Campbell: Out-of-school care and holiday care are essential to the wellbeing of our children, as well as providing support for families to work and provide economic security for their children.

The resource implications of introducing statutory requirements for the provision of out-of-school care are hugely significant. The priority at this stage is to build additional hours and flexibility into our high-quality universal early learning and childcare provision—increasing the entitlement to about 16 hours a week—and to focus initial expansion on our most vulnerable two-year-olds.

However, I am aware that the need for high-quality childcare does not end when a child hits primary school age. That is why the Government is also driving forward a range of measures to improve our out-of-school care: I announced that our early years task force would review our out-of-school care provision and recommend what more could be done; I supported amendments at stage 2 to broaden the requirement on local authorities to consult on their duties and power to deliver and support out-of-school care. That will contribute to those longer-term aims to develop comprehensive systems of early learning and childcare and out-of-school care. It will also enable local authorities to co-ordinate consultation and planning of all mandatory provision of early learning and childcare, alongside non-mandatory provision, which local authorities have the powers to deliver or support. That will inform delivery, expansion or support for delivery of out-of-school care by local authorities. We have also provided funding to—and regularly engage with—key organisations that can support or deliver out-of-school care, in particular the Scottish Out of School Care Network and the Scottish Childminding Association.

Given the range of actions that I have outlined, which the Scottish Government is driving forward to increase and improve early learning and childcare, the steps that we are taking in relation to out-of-school care, and the need to prioritise resources to make the biggest impact, we are taking action now to ensure that we can do our best to support families.

On whether we need independence to achieve our transformational aim for childcare, we have no access to the increased revenues that will be generated by enabling more parents to get back into work. We do not get that tax increase. If we were to emulate what they do in Sweden, it would generate £700 million-worth of revenue that we could then reinvest back into childcare. We cannot do that because we have one arm tied behind our back. That is why we need independence and that is why our aspirations are set out in the white paper.

Ken Macintosh (Eastwood) (Lab): On a point of order, Presiding Officer. Is it in order, after a member has made one of the most powerful, passionate and eloquent contributions to the debate—[Interruption.]

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order, please. I must hear the point of order.

Ken Macintosh: Is it in order for another member, particularly a former Minister for Parliamentary Business, to make a rebuttal that has nothing to do with the amendment but is a personal and entirely inaccurate attack on that member? [Interruption.]

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order. I chose to call Mr Crawford to make a contribution on that point in the debate. He made his contribution. I did not thereafter hear any point of order from Cara Hilton. I cannot call a member back to make any point in the chamber. I therefore asked Ms Hilton to resume her seat at that point. It is not a point of order, Mr Macintosh. It may well be a debating point but you know that it is not a point of order.

Neil Bibby: As I said in my opening remarks, out-of-school care is important to families. It is clearly not that important to Bruce Crawford, because he completely neglected to mention it in his contribution.

We have consistently said that, despite the obvious importance of childcare in the early years, childcare should not just be about that age group.
It is regrettable that the white paper says absolutely nothing about out-of-school childcare and that, until recently, the bill said nothing either.
That is a gaping hole and a clear omission in the SNP's childcare policies. Labour gets that this is a real issue for families. Cara Hilton gets that this is a real issue for working families—that is why she won the Dunfermline by-election by 3,000 votes in October. That is why we continue to raise out-of-school care as an issue. That is why we want to do something about it, and that is why I will press the amendment.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The question is, that amendment 175 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The result of the division is: For 53, Against 63, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 176 disagreed to.

Section 57—Guidance on corporate parenting

Amendment 88 moved—[Aileen Campbell] and agreed to.

After section 59

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 14 is on sibling contact: duty on local authority in relation to looked-after children. Amendment 177, in the name of Jayne Baxter, is the only amendment in the group.

Jayne Baxter (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab): As the minister knows, I raised the issue of sibling contact at stage 2. Unfortunately, too many looked-after children are separated from their siblings and accommodated outwith the parental home. If sibling contact is not prioritised by the local authority, siblings can lose contact with each other entirely, leading to the loss of a crucial close family relationship.

Section 17 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 places a duty on local authorities with regard to promoting contact between looked-after children and those adults with parental responsibilities. Amendment 177 would extend that to cover contact between looked-after children and their separated siblings. Unfortunately, at present, if a local authority does not choose to prioritise such contact between looked-after children and their siblings, there is little or no way in which that can be challenged by those looked-after children.

I am grateful to Clan Childlaw—the community law advice network, which exists to provide specialist legal advice to children and young people—for drawing to my attention this omission in our existing provisions for some of our most vulnerable young people. I hope that amendment 177 will be supported, as we have tried to take on board the minister's comments in relation to sibling contact and the duties on corporate parents by narrowing the focus of the amendment to just local authorities.

I move amendment 177 and look forward to hearing from the minister.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There has been one request to speak. Can I ascertain whether the member wishes to contribute to this part of the debate?

Cara Hilton: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: In which case, I call the minister.

Aileen Campbell: I genuinely thank Jayne Baxter for bringing this important issue to stage 3. I recognise that promoting and facilitating sibling contact is a good idea in principle but only where it is in the best interests of the children involved. We need to remember that in such scenarios, we are dealing with the interests of two children: the looked-after child and the sibling. That raises two concerns about how this measure could work in practice.

First, amendment 177 seems to focus only on the assumed best interests of the looked-after child. We need to recognise that the sibling may have good reasons for not wanting to maintain contact with the looked-after child. It seems wrong in principle to impose a duty to promote contact in circumstances in which that contact may not be wanted. Further, where siblings are not resident together there may be good reasons for that, in particular on welfare grounds. It would seem to contradict such professional decision making to use the law to force a local authority to facilitate such contact when that might not be in the best interests of one or both of the children.

Secondly, the amendment seems incomplete. For the amendment to work effectively, someone needs to be under an obligation to keep the local authority informed of any changes of address for the sibling. That would require section 18 of the 1995 act to be amended.

Nevertheless, the intention behind amendment 177 is laudable. Looked-after children should usually have the opportunity to maintain contact with their siblings. I suggest that local authorities should be encouraged to facilitate that, where the children concerned want it and it is appropriate. I would be happy to consider how we can further improve our guidance and good practice on what can be done to ensure appropriate and good-quality contact between siblings, in the interests of all the children that we have in question.

Finally, it is important to note that there has been little consultation on this proposal. Many stakeholders would have views on it, so it would be good to embrace those views, including those that have been expressed consistently by Jayne Baxter, to ensure that we have good-quality guidance on enabling contact between siblings that is beneficial for the looked-after child and the sibling.

Jayne Baxter: I am disappointed that the minister has indicated that she does not support the amendment. However, I am grateful to her for taking the time to provide the reasoning behind that difficult decision. I welcome her comments and hope that she will look into the matter further. I urge her to meet Clan Childlaw and other experts in this area to consider ways in which sibling contact between looked-after children can be secured. I will not press amendment 177.

Amendment 177, by agreement, withdrawn.

Section 60—Provision of aftercare to young people

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 15 is on aftercare and continuing care: minor amendments. Amendment 89, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendment 178.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 89 is a minor technical amendment to repeal the opening words of section 30(2) of the 1995 act, which are now redundant given the provision to repeal subsection (3) of section 30 that is made at section 60(3)(b).

Amendment 178 was lodged in response to a recommendation by the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in its report on the bill as amended at stage 2. It seeks to amend new section 26A of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 as inserted by new section 60A of the bill, which relates to the duty of local authorities to provide continuing care. That section was added to the bill at stage 2 with the full support of the Education and Culture Committee. The amendment seeks to require ministers to consult each local authority and such other persons as they consider appropriate before making an order under the various powers in that section.

We fully agree with the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee's comments after stage 2 that the subject matter is of such importance that prior consultation with affected persons should be required before the powers in section 26A are exercised. In that regard, ministers have already committed to setting up a working group consisting of sectoral representatives, service providers, young people, local authorities and other relevant stakeholders to develop the detail of the policy of continuing care and how the new duty will roll out over the coming years.

In addition to that commitment, we are content to include an explicit requirement for ministers to consult local authorities and such other persons as they consider appropriate before they exercise the delegated powers. In addition to the planned working group to develop the proposals in detail, the consultation requirement will ensure that all those with an interest are formally consulted before any order is made.
Therefore, I ask members to support both of my amendments in this group. In the provisions in the bill for Scotland’s looked-after care leavers more generally, we have created—with the support of the Parliament, I hope—an approach that will have long-lasting benefits for that group of young people, who need our support. The bill is a product of young care leavers’ courage and diligence in articulating how it should deliver for them and I am proud that we have worked across the chamber to enable us to deliver it today.

I move amendment 89.

Kezia Dugdale: I said at stage 1 that there had been 17 reports in the existence of the Parliament about the experiences of kids in care and that a care leaver called Ashley had told me that each and every one of them read like an apology note—an apology for the lack of action.

We have made significant progress throughout the passage of the bill and it is vastly better for care leavers as a consequence. I pay tribute to all the care leavers who have been actively involved in the political process over the weeks and months that we have been through. For many of them, we have lit a political fire that will mean that they ensure that no child will have the life experience that they did.

Although the minister has already done so, I draw attention to amendment 178, which concerns the duty to consult. That is critical if we are to build on the work that she has done today with regard to kids in care because, ultimately, care leavers are looking for a right to return to care until the age of 25. If that is ever to be realised in Scotland, we have to do it in conjunction with local authorities, which are at the forefront of service delivery and the transition in and out of care.

I thank the minister for amendment 178, recognise that, although we have made significant progress, there is a long way to go yet and hope that she will commit to further action around kids who live in care throughout Scotland.

Liam McArthur: I simply echo Kezia Dugdale’s comments. At stage 1, the bill reflected a real advance in aftercare for those going through the care system but, in the stage 1 debate, there was a feeling across the chamber that more could, and should, be done.

The evidence that the committee took from Who Cares? Scotland, the Aberlour Child Care Trust, Barnardo’s and—as Kezia Dugdale rightly identified—those with direct experience of the care system provided compelling evidence and the basis on which the minister has been able to act. It is an aspect of the bill of which the Parliament and, in particular, the Education and Culture Committee, which has dedicated the best part of two years to considering issues in the policy area, can feel justifiably proud.

Aileen Campbell: I appreciate the comments that Kezia Dugdale and Liam McArthur made. We can be proud of what the bill delivers for our looked-after young care leavers. Others, not necessarily in the Government—I think that it was Who Cares?—described the provision as having the potential to make the way that Scotland looks after its young looked-after care leavers world leading.

There will be a working group to ensure that we can extend the support for young looked-after care leavers. It will include young looked-after children themselves. I particularly echo what Kezia said about the role that looked-after care leavers have played in developing the provision in the bill. They have left a lasting legacy for future generations of looked-after children and should feel proud of what they have achieved in the bill. They are absolutely our bairns and we need to do what we can for that group of young children and young care leavers. We are proud that we are able to help them and future generations to have better outcomes in life.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I remind all members to use full names.

Amendment 89 agreed to.

Section 60A—Continuing care: looked after children

Amendment 178 moved—[Aileen Campbell]—and agreed to.

Section 64—Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): Group 16 is on the eligibility for kinship care and the assistance to be provided. Amendment 180, in the name of Jayne Baxter, is grouped with amendments 180A, 180B, 181, 202, 202A, 182, 183, 203, 203A, 184, 185, 204, 204A, 186, 205, 187 to 190, 206 and 195.

Jayne Baxter: There is no doubt that the kinship care landscape in Scotland has changed significantly since 2007. We have seen legislation introduced to provide support for kinship care families, but it is clear that we need to do more.

It is probably helpful to highlight that the amendments in the group follow three main strands. The intention behind amendments 180 and 206 is to end the postcode lottery of funding that kinship carers face across the country. There can be no justification for the extent and degree of variance in kinship care allowances that local authorities pay across Scotland. As anyone who went out at lunch time to speak with kinship carers will know, the system of funding that is available to people to support them in their vital role of supporting, caring for and nurturing many of our children and young people is hugely complicated, confusing and variable. I put on record my thanks to the Scottish kinship care alliance and Children 1st for the huge amount of work that they have put in throughout the passage of the bill to try to improve the situation for kinship carers in Scotland.

Amendment 180B and amendments 202 to 205 seek to extend the availability of financial support for kinship carers to those who still care for a young person who is over the age of 16 but has not yet reached 18. The other amendments in the group seek to change the eligibility criteria as defined in section 64(4), as we are concerned that they present too restricted a definition of the eligibility of the children who end up being looked after by kinship carers.

Finally, amendment 206 seeks to address the concerns of those who continue to care for looked-after children. The minister has powers to set the levels of kinship care allowances for those carers but currently does not choose to do so. The amendment seeks to end the postcode lottery of funding and ensure that there is a minimum rate of financial support for formal kinship carers, no matter where they live.

The costs of supporting children in foster care, residential care, and formal and informal kinship care vary enormously. Kinship carers often see themselves as the poor relations as a result of the funding and support that are available to them in their crucial role of caring for children in our society.

It is worth noting that it is extremely disappointing that the Scottish Government’s financial review of kinship care has not been published in time for the bill. The Scottish Government promised to bring before the Parliament the outcome of its financial review of kinship care during the passage of the bill, but it has failed to do so. I sincerely hope that, when it is published and the minister is drawing up the regulations, there will be significant and careful consultation with kinship carers and organisations with an interest in the area.

I look forward to hearing the minister’s response to the amendments and would welcome any commitments that she can give to supporting kinship carers in the future.

I move amendments 180 and 180A.

Bob Doris (Glasgow) (SNP): I consistently see the outstanding work that kinship carers do on a long-term and enduring basis across Glasgow, which I represent. I have always sought to work across parties to advance their rights and entitlements. Indeed, I acknowledge that Glasgow City Council, which previously had no kinship care allowance, began to provide one following constructive representations from me. However, the allowance can be subject to a postcode lottery across Scotland, and that is wrong.

Amendment 206 and associated amendments seek to address that problem in relation to looked-after children. However, given that, as previously mentioned, an independent financial review intends to build consistency and fairness into the system, I am unsure why, at this time, amendment 206 should be included in the bill. I hope that the minister can give us an update on that financial review and very much hope that it will specify minimum rates and be age related.

I will also comment on amendment 180 and related amendments. Amendment 180 seeks to specify minimum payments for those on a kinship care order. I will make three brief points, if I may.

First, kinship care orders are progress, because some local authorities offer no support at all when a child loses looked-after status. That will be changed. Those children will be given a statutory footing for the first time in the system.

Secondly, young people on kinship care orders will have varying levels of need, some of which will be more informal than others. Some will have moved from the looked-after process on to a kinship care order. Therefore, I remain unconvinced that, as a rule, there should be exactly the same levels of support and a national rate.

Although I cannot accept amendment 180 today, my third point is to ask the Scottish Government to ensure that there are no unintended consequences from kinship care orders, particularly in relation to those who currently get payments under section 11 orders or guardianship under section 7 of the 1995 act. Perhaps it is for the minister to examine that matter another day.

As a result of my experience of working with the minister on the issue, I know that none of this has been intended to cut support for kinship carers—if that impression has been given, it is completely and fundamentally wrong. The bill improves support for kinship carers, putting it on a further statutory footing. The Parliament cannot do this just now but, in the future, kinship care payments should be a benefit that is integrated with the wider social security and benefits system. The Parliament does not have the power to do that today, but I hope that, after September, that situation will change.

Liz Smith: I add the Scottish Conservatives’ strong support for many of the amendments that Jayne Baxter has lodged. There are several issues around kinship care, and we have previously let kinship carers down by not providing the care and support that they require.

Bob Doris sensibly made the point that there is a need to get rid of the postcode lottery, particularly when it comes to the minimum rate of support. However, I entirely accept that we do not want to pay everybody exactly the same, as that would raise issues about the effectiveness of the support.

Broadly speaking, we will support Jayne Baxter’s amendments but not those that seek to change the eligibility definition, as we think that that might have some unintended consequences.

Aileen Campbell: Amendment 180, as amended by amendment 180B, seeks to provide that kinship care assistance is the provision of financial assistance at a minimum rate and “additional assistance of such description” as ministers specify by order. That assistance would be payable to those who apply for or who have a kinship care order and to guardians who have been appointed under section 7 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 in relation to children who have not yet attained the age of 16, as well as those who have attained the age of 16 but not the age of 18. The amendment also introduces an order-making power that would require ministers to specify “the minimum rate of financial support” payable and that would require “the rate to be the same” across all authorities in Scotland. Such an order could also allow for rate rises, depending on the age of the child.

We think that amendment 206 seeks to achieve a similar effect to amendment 180 by amending the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007 to require the Scottish ministers to make regulations specifying a “minimum rate of financial support” to be provided across all local authorities in relation to looked-after children in formal kinship care arrangements who are placed by authorities with “qualifying persons”, as defined in part 10 of the bill.

We accept that there is concern among stakeholders that there is a wide variation in the allowances that are paid to formal kinship carers across the 32 local authorities. Some people feel that a similar situation may arise for families with a kinship care order or for those who seek to obtain one. We are sympathetic to those concerns and agree that there is merit in providing financial assistance to holders of a kinship care order when it is required. Indeed, the bill already provides for that. Kinship care assistance will cover a wide range of support, reflecting the fact that financial assistance is not the only type of assistance needed by kinship carers and the children whom they care for. Subsections (1)(b) and (3)(a) of section 66 of the bill provide the Scottish ministers with an order-making power to allow provision to be made regarding the payment of financial support and “when or how” such assistance is to be provided. We therefore do not consider that any additional powers are required over and above the provisions in the bill.

Kezia Dugdale: I acknowledge that it is a very complicated area. Given that fact, it was important that the minister promised that a financial review of kinship care would be published during the bill process. That has not happened. Can the minister explain why she has not kept her promise and published that review during the bill process?

Aileen Campbell: The reason why we have the financial review is that we absolutely understand and have sympathy with the concerns that have been expressed to us about the 32 different varieties of financial assistance packages that kinship carers get. It is a complex and very time-consuming piece of work and its complexity is added to by the interaction with benefits. We are currently reviewing the support that is available to both formal and informal kinship carers with a view to reducing those inconsistencies and improving fairness across Scotland. I will ensure that the Parliament is made aware of the review’s publication.

Kezia Dugdale: I do not mean to labour the point, but the minister promised that we would have the information as we considered the issues. The minister has not kept that promise and we deserve an explanation as to why that is the case.

Aileen Campbell: I have explained that we intend to publish the kinship care financial review because we are absolutely determined to ensure that the inconsistencies expressed by kinship carers are not felt and that we deal properly and adequately with them. I have explained the complexities around the issue and the need to get the policy absolutely right, because doing so is in the best interests of kinship carers.

Amendments 180A, 180B, 181 to 187 and 190 all seek to ensure that kinship care assistance should be provided to qualifying persons with regard to all children and not just those who would be eligible in terms of the test provided for in section 64(4). However, the circumstances of those children who are looked after by kinship carers and guardians will vary widely and we believe that kinship care assistance should only be targeted at, and available for, those children in informal kinship care arrangements who are at risk of becoming looked after if kinship care assistance is not provided by the local authority.

The remaining amendments seek to extend the requirement on local authorities to provide kinship care assistance to qualifying persons in relation to children who have attained the age of 16 but not the age of 18. Kinship care orders subsist only until the child reaches the age of 16 and, at that point, it is possible that the child who was formerly the subject of the kinship care order may leave the carer’s home and their care. Given that and the fact that a child who was subject to a kinship care order or who has a guardian is still eligible to receive assistance until they are 18, we do not consider it to be appropriate or necessary to extend the entitlements in that way.

We will work with all those advocating on behalf of kinship carers as implementation progresses. We are grateful to all who have had an input into the bill, including the Health and Social Care Alliance Scotland, Children 1st, Citizens Advice Scotland, Mentor UK and the many others that have articulated very strongly the need for us to ensure that we get support for kinship carers absolutely right.

Today, the Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning met the Scottish kinship care alliance. We have consistently valued the work of kinship carers, which is why the kinship care order provides additional assistance to kinship carers who may never have received such support before. Indeed, the bill improves the supports available to them and I hope that that commitment gives comfort to Bob Doris on the points that he made eloquently and consistently through the course of not just this parliamentary session but the previous one.

Jayne Baxter: I am disappointed that the minister will not support the amendments in group 16. As she will be aware, there is considerable concern among many kinship carers about the changes to section 64 of the bill. Should my amendments not be agreed to, I repeat my hope that there will be thorough engagement with kinship carers and their representative organisations when the Scottish Government draws up the regulations.

I am also keen to see the outcome of the financial review of kinship care. I once again record my disappointment that it has not been published in time for the bill’s final stage. I press amendment 180A.

Amendment 191, in my name, addresses long-standing concerns that section 5 of the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010 is ineffective in requiring an education authority to act to correct inaccuracies or omissions that are discovered in its proposal paper for a school closure. The amendment requires an education authority to be more transparent in its consideration of allegations of inaccuracy or omission and, if there is any such inaccuracy or omission, requires the authority to take action where it relates to a material consideration relevant to the decision. If nothing else, such a provision should help to remove the perception that authorities can dismiss legitimate concerns and makes it clearer that all allegations of inaccuracy or omission must be investigated and reported on. I hope that, as a result, communities’ confidence in the process might be more readily safeguarded.

If communities continue to be dissatisfied with the authority’s response under section 5, they can make further representations to the authority, which must be included in the consultation report that the authority prepares. Amendment 191 was disagreed to.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The result of the division is: For 46, Against 73, Abstentions 0.

After section 68C

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 17 is on school closures. Amendment 191, in the name of Liam McArthur, is grouped with amendments 106 to 111.
therefore makes the whole process more transparent with regard to how an authority deals with allegations of omissions and inaccuracies and makes it easier for those who have made allegations that are not ultimately corrected by the authority to raise their concerns with ministers in seeking to have a proposal called in for consideration by a school closure review panel. Although I still have some reservations about how the call-in process and referral to the panel will operate, I recognise that that battle was perhaps fought and lost at stage 2.

I do not think that any of us will pretend that these and earlier changes will remove the controversy or anxiety that is created by the threat of a rural school closure. However, I think that if we improve the process and make it more transparent and balanced while providing appropriate support at key stages, we should be confident that we can keep that upheaval to a minimum and limit the number of cases that are ultimately required to be called in for review. That would certainly seem to be a measure of success.

I am happy to move amendment 191.

The Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning (Michael Russell): Like Liam McArthur, I have a long-standing involvement in this issue. It has not been without its difficulties—and, sometimes, controversy—but my very strong view is that the health of rural communities is, to a greater or lesser extent, closely attached to the health of the services that are provided and that one core service is a rural school.

Those of us who know rural Scotland well and represent rural communities know the great importance of rural schools and the many benefits that they bring to pupils. I am not arguing, I have never argued and the chamber would never argue that rural schools do not have to close sometimes. Often rural schools close themselves as a result of population changes. However, if there is to be community confidence in the school closure process, the process has to be transparent and open and provide a level playing field for all the partners.

The 2010 act, which was passed unanimously by the chamber, was a big step forward, but it has not operated quite how this Parliament intended. The commission on the delivery of rural education did sterling work, and I pay tribute to the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities for the partnership that resulted in its establishment. All the commission’s members worked very hard to look at the issue in the round and I pay tribute to them and to the commission’s chair, Sheriff David Sutherland. It is a tribute to their work that the Scottish Government accepted and is implementing 37 out of the 38 recommendations. That is a pretty good—in fact, remarkably good—average for any commission.

I say at the outset that this has been a contentious area in which, after a difficult period, we might be moving towards completing Parliament’s role. I hope that our amendments will be treated in that manner and supported across the chamber.

As well as Government amendments 106, 107 and 109 to 111, I welcome and, as Liam McArthur has suggested, actively support amendment 191 from Liam McArthur and amendment 108 from Liz Smith. It is important that we join together to finish the job that we started when Parliament passed unanimously the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010.

Government amendments 106 and 107 are minor drafting changes to the amendments made to the 2010 act at stage 2.

Government amendments 109 and 110 address a similar issue to that of amendment 108, in the name of Liz Smith. All three amendments seek to improve the transparency of local authorities’ decision making. First, amendment 109 will require an authority, when explaining in its proposal paper why it considers, in the light of its assessments, that implementation of the proposal to close the rural school is the most appropriate response to the reasons for the proposal, to give the reasons why that is the case. That transparency will help ensure that parents and communities can better understand why the authority considers that closure is the most appropriate way to proceed.

Secondly, amendment 110 will impose an additional requirement on authorities to explain in consultation reports on rural school closure proposals why it considers implementation of the proposal to be the most appropriate response to the reasons for the proposal. The authority will also have to set out its reasons in the consultation report. That will ensure that councillors have a clear understanding of the recommendation that they are receiving and the reasons for that recommendation.

I welcome amendment 108, which addresses the third and critical point at which it is right to require an authority to set out its reasons for proceeding with a rural school closure. Section 11A of the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010, which the Government brought forward at stage 2, sets out the clear test that we expect authorities to meet before they can decide to implement a closure proposal in relation to a rural school. It will ensure that authorities will not be able to proceed with a closure proposal unless they have complied with the additional statutory requirements imposed on them and there is no more appropriate means of addressing whatever problem a rural school is experiencing. Section 11A of the 2010 act will be further strengthened by amendment 108, which will require an authority to publish the reasons why it is satisfied that closure is the most appropriate response to the problems that the school has been facing.

Amendment 111 will require that that information is supplied to the Scottish ministers and will require the authority to publish on its website notice of the fact that it has notified ministers of the decision and of the opportunity for consultees to make representations to ministers in relation to the decision. That will ensure that the reasons given in the authority’s notice are made public, which is clearly desirable, are published within six days of the decision being taken and are able to be taken into account by those making representations to ministers, and by ministers themselves when considering whether to call in the decision.

Those requirements will help to increase the overall transparency of the decision-making process, which can only serve to increase the confidence of the communities that are affected by the decisions reached. That transparency and clarity is already successfully delivered by many authorities—that is to be welcomed; I commend them for it. Unfortunately, however, we have found that, since 2010, consultation has not always reached the high standards that communities deserve. That is why the provisions are necessary.

No one should be asked to support a decision—least of all one that affects the education of their children—on the basis of poor, incomplete or, in some cases, plain wrong information. That is why I support amendment 191, which will require an authority to correct an inaccuracy or omission that it has confirmed when it relates to a material consideration relating to the proposal. All allegations of inaccuracy and omission must be determined by the authority, with reasons given to the person who raised the issue, if it is proposed that no action is going to be taken in relation to the allegations. The person who raised the issue will then be entitled to make further representations to the authority and the authority will then be able to make a new determination on the matter. Finally, the authority will be required to include in its consultation report information on all allegations of inaccuracies and what action is taken in relation to those allegations.

We all know that school consultations are highly charged and it is essential that a fair debate is promoted, based on reliable information. Errors do occur, for a variety of reasons, and amendment 191 provides a clear process to address and resolve them in as transparent a way as possible. That has to be welcomed.

Scotland’s schools and the school estate are not set in stone and a policy that no school should ever close is divorced from reality. Schools, in both urban and rural communities, must change and develop to respond to the needs of the 21st century and provide our young people with the best opportunities. A great deal of that change is very much for the better, for example the delivery of impressive buildings and the bringing together of communities around sustainable, high-achieving schools. However, it does no one any good to rush into those decisions on false premises.

We need to start with the problem in order to find the solution, rather than the other way round. Therefore, communities need and deserve authorities to be subject to robust and comprehensive processes to ensure that proposals can pass scrutiny. Only in that way will we ensure that higher standards in decision making are reached and maintained.

In summary, I ask the Parliament to support amendments 191 and 106 to 111.

Liz Smith: I begin by thanking the cabinet secretary for his constructive and helpful approach when formulating the amendments relating to rural school closures, which is an issue on which I believe it is essential that we secure cross-party support. I also acknowledge the unstinting efforts of Sandy Longmuir, who has campaigned passionately on behalf of the Scottish rural schools network to change the 2010 act for the better. His diligence and advice have been much appreciated.

Over the years, we have had far too many instances of a failure to provide the necessary information that is an essential part of making a judgment about whether a school should close. As the cabinet secretary rightly said, no parent should be put in that position. In some cases, there has been a failure to provide complete information, in others, there has been a failure to provide fully accurate information and, in others again, there have been allegations of deliberate attempts to mislead interested parties or relevant committees. None of those situations is acceptable, so it is essential that we do everything possible to ensure that they cannot happen again.

Amendment 108 will strengthen the duties that are placed on local authorities so that a council must publish on its website the notice of its decision and the reasons why it is satisfied that such action is the most appropriate way forward. Councils will no longer be able to say that they are simply satisfied. That goes significantly beyond the initial proposals and will introduce much tighter language that is designed to furnish communities with fuller knowledge of the decision-making process and, crucially, the logic behind it.
Given the sensitivities that are at play, it is paramount that stringent checks are in place to ensure that all relevant information is disclosed and is presented in a clear and neutral manner. A school closure proposal can often be a fraught and controversial process, so it is important that high standards of transparency are adhered to throughout. Amendment 108 will strengthen the duties on local authorities to secure just that and will give parents, pupils and staff much greater confidence in the process through which decisions are reached. I hope that the Parliament will support amendment 108 and all the other amendments in the group.

Neil Bibby: The amendments on the issue appear to be minimal and do not fundamentally add to or detract from the current proposals. They appear to improve the process that must be followed when a school closure is considered and the transparency of the decision, and they make the process more accessible to parents. Those are positive steps. I agree with the cabinet secretary that proposals should come with complete information, but perhaps he could have ensured that the financial memorandum had complete information.

Members might be aware that, at stage 2, I raised concerns about Mike Russell’s proposals on this issue. There are still a number of points of concern, particularly on the new unelected quango that will decide on rural school closures. For example, who will the members be accountable and responsible to, who will pay them and how much will the new quango cost?

It is regrettable but, unfortunately, far too typical that the Scottish Government ignored the views of local government and COSLA on recommendation 20 from the commission on the delivery of rural education. I recognise that we should try to get cross-party support on such issues, but surely it is also important to have agreement between national and local government, as local authorities are responsible for running primary and secondary education. Members should not just take my word for it; they should take the word of SNP councillor Douglas Chapman, the COSLA education spokesperson, who said:

“By not implementing recommendation 20 the Government has altered the balance brought in by the Commission, and we are now concerned it will be actually far harder for local authorities to take necessary decisions on the school estate.”

He also said that he had written to the cabinet secretary to express concern that

“This is the impact that amended legislation could have on improving educational outcomes”

and

“because of this local government’s job will be made all the harder”.

Mark McDonald (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP): Surely the member accepts that, for example, the case in my constituency of Bramble Brae and Middleton Park primary schools, where the educational benefit statements and the response to them by Education Scotland proved that the process was a complete guddle, shows the need to measure against educational benefit to avoid schools being closed for purely spurious reasons.

Neil Bibby: I am not aware of the case that Mr McDonald raises, but the process needs to proceed by consensus with local authorities.

I turn to the key issue, which I hope Mr McDonald agrees on. Of course nobody wants to close schools, whether they are rural or urban. If Mike Russell wants to keep schools open not just in his own constituency but in the other 72 constituencies in Scotland whose schools he is responsible for as education secretary, then he needs to ensure that our education system and local authorities are properly resourced. However, rather than changing council budgets, he has chosen to change the law. The only new budget that has been created is a limitless one for a new, unelected quango that will let him abdicate from the responsibility for making difficult decisions on school closures.

Fiona McLeod: Some members may be surprised that, as the MSP for Strathkelvin and Bearsden, I rise to talk about rural schools, but I actually have three rural schools in my constituency. However, I believe that the debate is also important because we can learn from the standards that we are going to apply for rural school closures and use them for urban school closures. The cabinet secretary used words such as “clarity” and “transparency” with regard to the process in the future. I know that that will be welcomed by campaigners but, given my experience in my constituency, I wonder whether it will be welcomed by local authorities.

The cabinet secretary talked about having higher standards for decision making, but he also said that no false premises must be used when decisions are made about school closures. Liz Smith talked about there perhaps being sometimes deliberate attempts to mislead. I am not making such a charge against East Dunbartonshire Council in the current, divisive campaign that we are going through in closing and merging local primary schools, but I know that local campaigners have had to dig deep and spend long hours forensically going through documents from the council. They have had to use freedom of information requests to try to get behind what the council called facts and find out whether they were really the case.

That closure process has resulted in a ministerial call-in. Local people await the decision on that with bated breath. However, the local council does not await the decision with bated breath because, just last week, East Dunbartonshire Council at its budget meeting preempted the decision of the ministerial call-in by changing the parameters of how it will make decisions on closing and merging schools.

I absolutely welcome Liam McArthur’s amendments and all the other amendments in this area and I hope that they mean that no other local school campaigners have to go through what the campaigners in my constituency have had to go through.

Liam McArthur: I thank Fiona McLeod, Liz Smith, Neil Bibby and the education secretary for their comments on the amendments. The cabinet secretary was right to set the scene by talking about the importance that rural schools play in the wider community. I know that the argument will be made in much the same way by those in urban communities, but I think that, as I am a member from Orkney, members would not expect me to do anything other than acknowledge the specific status that schools in rural communities play.

As the cabinet secretary said, the 2010 act was unanimously supported, but it quickly became evident that it was being applied inconsistently, which gave rise to concerns that it was having unintended consequences or that local authorities were applying it inappropriately. Liz Smith made some excellent points in that regard.

The responsibility for school closures must lie with local authorities, which are best placed to act in the best interests of the communities that they represent. I do not believe that any council does or should enter the process of consulting on a school closure lightly. Nevertheless, I think that there is sufficient evidence that there are inadequacies in the way in which the current legislation is being interpreted. I think that we all acknowledge that this is not about saying that no rural school should ever or will ever close, but a school should certainly not close on what Fiona McLeod referred to as a false premise or on the basis of inaccurate or incomplete information.

What we will have as a result of the amendments passed at stage 2 and the group of amendments that we are considering is an opportunity to make the process more transparent, better balanced and subject to proper, effective and well-informed consultation. I share some of Neil Bibby’s concerns about the review panel, but I think that that battle was fought and lost at stage 2. Nevertheless, the stage 2 amendments and the amendments in the group that we are considering will make a good bill better and clearer. I encourage the Parliament to support all the amendments in the group. I will press amendment 191.

Amendment 191 agreed to.

Section 68D—Special provision for rural school closure proposals

Amendments 106 and 107 moved—[Michael Russell]—and agreed to.

Amendment 108 moved—[Liz Smith]—and agreed to.

Amendments 109 and 110 moved—[Michael Russell]—and agreed to.

Section 68E—Call-in of closure proposals

Amendment 111 moved—[Michael Russell]—and agreed to.

After Section 71A

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Amendment 192, in the name of Adam Ingram, is grouped with amendment 201.

Adam Ingram (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (SNP): There was a warm welcome last month for the First Minister’s announcement of the extension of free school lunches to all primary 1 to 3 children in Scotland from January 2015. That welcome came not least from long-time campaigners for free school meals such as the Child Poverty Action Group. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is an opportunity for us to make sure that we have a fit-for-purpose legislative foundation for the provision of free school lunches, so that we can deliver on that commitment. The amendments that I propose reach a compromise between the wishes of some to use primary legislation to compel local authorities to honour the First Minister’s commitment and the desire of ministers to work with COSLA to negotiate implementation of the commitment.

Amendment 192 has two purposes. First, it gives education authorities the power to provide school lunches free of charge to pupils who satisfy such conditions as the authority thinks fit to choose; and secondly, it imposes a duty on education authorities to provide certain pupils, as prescribed through regulations, with school lunches free of charge.

The first purpose removes the anomalous duty on education authorities in most circumstances to charge for school lunches. They will be able to choose conditions, as they see fit, in which they will provide free school lunches. It also allows flexibility and is consistent with other legislative provisions on food or drink in schools.

The second purpose—the enabling power—will allow Government to ensure that local authorities provide free school lunches to children in primaries 1 to 3. It goes beyond but complements the existing benefit-centric enabling powers that allow ministers to prescribe what benefits a parent or carer, or a pupil themselves, must receive to be eligible for a free school lunch. It gives ministers the required powers to prescribe circumstances in which a free school lunch must be provided.

Amendment 201 primarily amends two important duties on education authorities, as introduced by the Schools (Health Promotion and Nutrition) (Scotland) Act 2007. The first is the duty, set out in section 53A(2) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980, on authorities to take reasonable steps to ensure that every pupil who is entitled to receive school lunches free of charge receives them. The second is the duty, set out in section 53B of the 1980 act, on authorities to take reasonable steps to protect the identity of a pupil who receives school lunches free of charge.

It is right that those provisions extend to free school lunches that are provided under the changes that are proposed in amendment 192. However, the effect of the amendments may be that free school lunches will be provided to more than those pupils who receive, or whose parents receive, certain benefits. For example, with the implementation of free school lunches for all primary 1 to 3 pupils, the potential stigma that can be associated with free school lunches will not arise. In such cases, it will be neither necessary nor possible to protect the identity of pupils who receive free school lunches, so it would be inappropriate for the duty to continue to apply to education authorities. I therefore propose that ministers have the power to prescribe through regulations the circumstances in which the duty in section 53B of the 1980 act to protect pupils’ identity will not apply.

I move amendment 192.

Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh Northern and Leith) (Lab): I will be very brief because of the time.

I make it clear that I and, I know, my colleagues warmly welcome and support the amendments that we are discussing, as indeed we support the bill. I know that nobody in the chamber today is going to misrepresent our position on the matter, although a few weeks ago, our position was misrepresented because of our passion for childcare for two-year-olds. Clearly, we thought that that was a higher priority, but I am sure that every member in the chamber can grasp the concepts of “good” and “better”. We thought that that would have been a better policy, but we certainly think that this is a good policy.

I will make two points. First, I have raised with the cabinet secretary in other contexts that there is a bit of an issue about capital provision for the policy, because some schools—I can think of at least one in my constituency—will not be able to accommodate the increased numbers in existing dining room facilities. That issue will have to be looked at, and according to John Swinney it is being discussed with COSLA.

Secondly, I note that the main discussion on the policy has been about the financial relief that it will give parents, but it is potentially an important health policy, and I believe that an even greater focus on nutritional guidelines would make this good policy even better.

Bob Doris: I support the amendments in the name of my colleague Adam Ingram. I am delighted to note the political conversion by some in the chamber to free nutritious school meals. This is a pro-health, anti-poverty and pro-social-equality measure.

I put on the record my firm personal view that the end point in the medium term should be to extend provision to primary 7. I have said over the years that there are no rich children or poor children—there are just children, and every child should be guaranteed a free nutritious school meal, regardless of parental income. That is the right thing, no matter what others have said in the past.

Although there are no rich children or poor children, there can be poor political commitment, and that is why we must entrench in the bill the ability to compel local authorities, should they choose to flout the Parliament’s will.

I finish by saying that the Labour Glasgow City Council has been calling for free school meals for P1 to P3. The SNP opposition group on the council has found the money to deliver those free nutritious school meals early, from August this year. I hope that, in the spirit of unity and that political conversion, the Labour Glasgow City Council will now support the SNP in Glasgow and deliver early on our important and significant free school meals commitment.

I urge members to support Adam Ingram’s two amendments.

19:00

Kezia Dugdale: Consensus breaks out and then Bob Doris speaks. [Laughter.]

We are happy to support Adam Ingram’s amendments. The points that he made about flexibility are important.
However, I remind members that we have seen no capital assessment of the cost of providing free school meals. The Government’s inability to produce the correct financial memorandum for us to assess matters not only in the context of today’s debate, but in relation to the reality of how the policy is delivered.

That point is important for two reasons. First, I know from schools in Edinburgh that—as Malcolm Chisholm pointed out—there will be capacity issues with seating all children at one time to have a school meal. Even getting close to giving 75 per cent of children a free school meal would be incredibly difficult.

Secondly, the capacity issue affects not just school halls and assembly rooms, but kitchens. We know that kitchens in schools throughout Scotland cannot accommodate the facilities required to cook so many meals from scratch. If the meals are not to be cooked from scratch, we will simply end up contracting out the production of free school meals to private companies, which thrive in a low-wage economy and would produce poor food that would only just meet the nutritional standards for free school meals. We would then have to ask ourselves what we had actually achieved during the bill process.

Legitimate concerns remain with regard to the degree to which the policy is resourced, particularly in terms of capital investment. Having said that, we are pleased and happy to support Adam Ingram’s amendments 192 and 201.

Liam McArthur: I welcome the Scottish Government’s decision to follow the lead that the UK coalition Government has set in delivering what Bob Doris described as a progressive, anti-poverty and pro-health measure.

It is unfortunate that the committee had no opportunity to scrutinise the proposals in detail, but I understand the reasons for that, which are considerably more justified than those that applied to the substantive changes to the childcare provisions that arrived well past the 11th hour.

Nevertheless, as with the extension of childcare for two-year-olds, the Parliament and the Education and Culture Committee will want to keep a close eye on how the proposals are rolled out in order to ensure that they are properly funded, as Kezia Dugdale and others have said, and delivered to children in P1 to P3 throughout the country.

In that respect, Adam Ingram was very fair in setting out the issues and choices that we face as a Parliament, and his amendments in group 18 offer a pragmatic and flexible way of proceeding. On that basis, we are happy to support the amendments.

Michael Russell: I welcome the sensible position that the Labour Party is now taking. It was nice to hear Malcolm Chisholm on form; I always think that he is at his most convincing when he is arguing for what he believes in; unfortunately, he has not been doing that very often in recent days. It is clear that he believes in the policy, so it is good to see that today.

Malcolm Chisholm raised the issue of capital provision—which he did pleasantly; Kezia Dugdale was not quite so constructive. There is a great deal of experience in relation to the capital provision that is required. The SNP pilot that took place in 2007-08, along with its subsequent report, offers an interesting indication of how the policy can be implemented. Together with COSLA, we will work our way through to ensure that that can be done.

Neil Bibby rose—

Michael Russell: No. I would like to make some progress on this point; I heard the point that the member made. [Interuption.]

It has been a long day, and although Duncan McNeil is still shouting, Presiding Officer, the rest of us would like to finish debating the bill and make it happen. Labour has already tried to stop the bill today—why do we not just complete it?

I thank Adam Ingram—[Interuption.]

It is a pity that the outbreak of goodwill is finished so soon, but there we are.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: A little bit of calm, please. Calm down everyone.

Michael Russell: Thank you, Presiding Officer.

I thank Adam Ingram for his amendments, which follow and support the First Minister’s recent announcement on extending entitlement to free school lunches to children in P1 to P3 in Scotland from January 2015. There are—

Kezia Dugdale: Will the cabinet secretary give way?

Michael Russell: No, thank you—I would like to make some progress.

There are many benefits of extending the provision of a healthy school lunch free of charge—

Neil Bibby: Go home—put your feet up.

Michael Russell: Do not tempt me, Mr Bibby.

The policy will not only save families throughout Scotland approximately £330 a year for each child who takes up their entitlement to a free lunch every day, but remove any possibility of free school lunches being a source of stigma and encourage healthy eating habits.
As Adam Ingram outlined, his amendment 192 would do two things. First, it would give Scottish ministers the power to place local authorities under a duty to provide school lunches free of charge to certain pupils as prescribed in regulations, whether that is by reference to their yearly stage of education or to another description.

With regard to the First Minister’s announcement, I made it clear from the start that I fully intend to implement the extended eligibility to free school lunches in partnership with local government. Provided that agreement can be reached to ensure full implementation, there will be no need to call on the power that the amendment would provide, and I can happily say that I have no intention of invoking it if we can get a clear partnership agreement to progress the policy’s implementation within the timescale that we are talking about.

Dialogue is taking place with COSLA to agree on how the commitment can be delivered without having to put a duty on local authorities. Although it is both sensible and timely to put the power in place, I am quite sure, given that the Labour Party is showing such strong backing for the policy now, that an outbreak of sense will also take place in COSLA.

The amendment also gives education authorities the power to provide school lunches free of charge to pupils who satisfy such conditions as the authority sees fit. Although the provisions would replace existing powers to meet the commitment to provide free school lunches to children in primaries 1 to 3 through the Provision of School Lunches (Disapplication of the Requirement to Charge) (Scotland) Order 2008, they also go further—they allow education authorities the flexibility that they do not currently have to provide free school lunches to children whom they identify as those who would benefit from free school lunches.

Consequential amendment 201, which relates to the duties to ensure that every pupil who is entitled to school lunches free of charge receives those lunches and to protect the identity of pupils who receive free school lunches, is appropriate. To get the full benefit, it is important that schools promote free school lunches and take reasonable steps to ensure that those who are entitled to them take them. That is particularly important when the reasons for entitlement arise from a circumstance that may disadvantage the child. Equally, it is important—where appropriate—to reduce the burden on local authorities. I welcome the amendment, which will allow ministers to disapply the education authority duty to protect the identity of those receiving school lunches when there is no benefit in doing so.

The amendments future proof the legislative framework. They allow local authorities the freedom to meet the needs of the children and young people for whom they are responsible through the provision of a healthy lunch at school, and they allow the Government to amend or extend—I note that point—entitlement to a healthy free school lunch.

I repeat that the purpose of amendment 192 is to provide a power, but there is neither a requirement nor a need to use that power provided that we can work together in partnership. That is what I wish to do with local authorities and—to be fair—the indication from local authorities is that that is what they wish to do with the Government, in which case we will all be happy. Even the Labour Party is happy now—what more could be called for?

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Many thanks. I now call Adam Ingram to wind up—briefly, if you can, Mr Ingram, please.

Adam Ingram: There seems to be an outbreak of consensus—there are repentant sinners everywhere—so I am quite happy to leave the debate there and urge members to support the amendments.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The question is, that amendment 192 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

Amendment 192 agreed to.

After section 71B

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 19 is on the functions of the education authority in relation to pre-school children with additional support needs. Amendment 193, in the name of Liam McArthur, is the only amendment in the group.

Liam McArthur: At stage 2, I moved various amendments prompted by recommendations from “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water”, an excellent report that was prepared by a wide-ranging group of expert organisations and individuals.

All the amendments had one thing in common—over and above the fact that not one of them was accepted by the Government—which was the need for a ruthless focus on preventative action and the earliest possible identification of support needs. That again is the rationale behind amendment 193.

As I made clear at stage 2, I firmly believe that the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 is an act of which this Parliament and all the parties within it can feel rightly proud. However, 10 years ago, our understanding of the crucial importance of the earliest years to later success at school and more generally was less robust. Prevention was only starting to guide Scottish public policy.

As the authors of the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” report identified, there now appears to be a case for addressing shortcomings in the ASL act that would not be picked up through revisions to the ASL code of practice. Although children are officially covered by that legislation from birth, its implementation has not equally benefitted children below the age of three. That is both unwise and unfair.
Two things make the ASL act stand out. One is that children who need extra help “for whatever reason” have a legal right to receive it. The other is its broad definition of the types of extra help that can be provided. Both of those excellent features of the act apply to all children and young people across Scotland—unless they are under school age. The ASL act can help our youngest children only if they qualify under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. Why deny access to assessment and additional support during the first 1,001 days of life, which is when young children—and their parents—could be most effectively and inexpensively helped by genuinely early intervention? Why make them wait until they reach school age to become eligible?

Amendment 193, therefore, would remove the subsection that has proven to be a major obstacle to some very young children getting the help that they need and to which they would be entitled if they were older.

Let us not forget that many ASL needs, such as those associated with communications difficulties, autism and foetal alcohol harm, emerge between the age of two months, when universal health visiting usually ends, and 27 to 30 months, when the new universal health checks will start. A waiting period of more than two years is a long time in the life of an under-school-age child. As a result, some preventable problems are not being prevented, and some ASL needs that could have been identified—and met through early intervention—instead are overlooked and grow worse.

Given the fate of my earlier amendments on behalf of the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” coalition, I am realistic about the prospects for amendment 193. However, although the minister rejected the amendments at stage 2, she offered some assurances that their policy intentions would be incorporated into secondary legislation, regulation or statutory guidance. I hope that that is the case and that the minister will reaffirm her intention to engage directly with this diverse coalition to assist in the development of all relevant guidance. The devil is in the detail, and the input of this group of experts can help to translate good intentions into detailed policy implementation.

For now, I look forward to the comments from the minister and other colleagues.

I move amendment 193.

Aileen Campbell: I thank Liam McArthur for the points that he has raised, and I thank the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” campaign for the amendment. However, we believe that the proposed amendment to the Education (Additional Support for Learning) (Scotland) Act 2004 is unnecessary. I will outline why before closing my remarks by providing the comfort that Liam McArthur indicated that he would like to hear.

Amendment 193 seeks to extend the current duties on education authorities under the ASL act to apply to all children under school age and not receiving school education.

As I indicated at stage 2, the Scottish Government absolutely supports the principle of prevention and early intervention, especially where it might prevent an additional support need from developing or worsening. That is why the bill already contains a number of provisions that focus on early intervention and prevention. A child’s wellbeing is assessed from birth during the contacts that are set out in the child health programme, which now includes a 27 to 30-month universal health review. Where a child’s wellbeing needs require it, their named person will initiate a child’s plan in partnership with the child, their family and relevant professionals. That child’s plan will take account of learning needs. That will ensure that the learning needs of children under school age are met alongside any other needs that might affect their wellbeing. Indeed, a crucial part of the named person’s role is to promote, support and safeguard children’s wellbeing.

As a result of those provisions in the bill, it is not necessary to extend the ASL act in the way that has been proposed. The provisions in the bill provide the necessary protection for those vulnerable children.

As I said at stage 2, the advisory group for additional support for learning has agreed that prevention and early intervention through the early years are very important issues. I indicated that the revision of the statutory code of practice for additional support for learning is already under way, and committed to the code of practice specifically including a focus on prevention and early intervention and to including representatives of the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” campaign in the process.

As I also said then, the revised code of practice will be subject to full consultation and parliamentary scrutiny, as required by section 27 of the ASL act. The code of practice will also be closely aligned with statutory guidance on the child’s plan and on early learning and childcare to ensure that all related guidance is clear and consistent.

I believe that amendment 193 is unnecessary and that the provisions in the bill already take account of the issues that it seeks to address. Therefore, we do not support the amendment. However, in this, the penultimate group of amendments, I reiterate my thanks to the coalition responsible for “Putting the Baby in the Bath “Water” for its work, not just on this set of amendments but more generally throughout the bill’s progress. Its experience, knowledge and expertise will enable us to get guidance right.

I also thank Liam McArthur for allowing the committee and Parliament to discuss what is a very important issue.

Liam McArthur: I thank the minister for her comments and for the assurances at the end of her contribution. I welcome the restated commitment to prevention and, indeed, the confirmation that the coalition behind the “Putting the Baby in the Bath Water” report will be involved in the on-going review.

I was intrigued by earlier comments that the minister made in response to Siobhan McMahon’s amendments on the rights of children and young people with disabilities. The point that was being made, I think, was that we should not make a distinction between different types of children and young people. The anomalies that the coalition has highlighted in the operation of the ASL act appear to suggest that a distinction is made between the treatment of those of school age and the treatment of those in the first 1,000 days of life. I acknowledge the point about the universal health review at 27 to 30 months, but it appears to me as if that gap remains. I am sure that the review group will return to that as part of its work. However, for the time being, I thank the minister for her commitment and will not press amendment 193.

Amendment 193, by agreement, withdrawn.

Amendment 179 moved—[Siobhan McMahon].

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The question is, that amendment 179 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The result of the division is: For 39, Against 75, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 179 disagreed to.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 20 is on the national speech, language and communication strategy. Amendment 194, in the name of Siobhan McMahon, is the only amendment in the group.

Siobhan McMahon: The minister’s commitments at stage 2 to “ensuring that the distinctive needs of children with speech, language and communication issues will be addressed by guidance”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 17 December 2013; c 3199.]

and to “work with appropriate organisations” are welcome. In making those commitments, the Scottish Government has, it seems, already accepted the irrefutable link between speech, language and communication and improving outcomes for all of Scotland’s children and young people.

Indeed, key policies and initiatives such as the early years collaborative and GIRFEC identify speech, language and communication development and capacity as fundamental to ensuring that Scotland is the best place to grow up for all children and young people.

The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill aims to secure equality of outcomes for all children and young people, regardless of where they live or their home circumstances. Optimising the speech, language and communication development of every child in Scotland must be at the heart of that process.

Significantly, although many Scottish Government policies and initiatives recognise the fundamental importance of speech, language and communication development and capacity, Scotland, unlike other parts of the UK, has no comprehensive strategy that focuses local authorities, health boards and other key agencies on ensuring that SLC development and capacity are optimised for all children and young people.

A national speech, language and communication strategy would provide clear direction, cohesion and focus for all responsible authorities on how to optimise speech, language and communication development and capacity for Scotland’s children and young people.

Currently, local authorities and health boards throughout Scotland pursue different approaches to speech, language and communication development. For example, in some parts of Scotland, health, education and other professionals—from prenatal services to secondary school—work effectively together to optimise speech, language and communication development and capacity. However, in other parts of the country, that evidence-based approach is less apparent. A national speech, language and communication strategy would drive consistent, quality-assured, evidence-based approaches to speech, language and communication development and capacity, and would help to improve outcomes for all children and young people in Scotland.

Linked to that inconsistent approach are significant variations in the levels of shared ownership of, and investment in, speech, language and communication development throughout Scotland. For example, some local authorities have withdrawn funding for speech and language therapy provision, arguing that investment in those key areas of children’s and young people’s development represents additionality or is simply unaffordable.

A national speech, language and communication strategy would also help to drive multi-agency ownership of and investment in this fundamental life skill. Independent evidence tells us that such effective investment partnerships would be able to enjoy their share of the estimated annual £58 million preventative spend savings that arise out of quality speech, language and communication services.

The bill aspires to equality of outcomes for all children and young people. A national speech, language and communication strategy would act as a key foundation for the realisation of that aspiration.

I call on the minister to make a commitment to developing a national speech, language and communication strategy or to enter into a dialogue with interested parties as soon as possible about the need for, and benefit of, such a strategy and how it can be taken forward.

I move amendment 194.

Mark McDonald: The commitment that the minister made at stage 2 on guidance followed on from amendments on speech, language and communication that I and Jayne Baxter lodged. Amendment 194 reproduces one of them. At stage 2, I said that I had sympathy with the thrust of the amendment but did not feel that the bill was the place for it to be.

As somebody who has personal experience of the role that speech, language and communication assistance can play in a family’s life, I recognise the points that Siobhan McMahon has made and agree entirely on the importance of effective speech, language and communication therapy where possible and necessary.

We need to have further discussion—possibly on a cross-party basis—about the issue. I made that point at stage 2 and it still stands at stage 3. I am more than happy to sit down with Siobhan McMahon, Jayne Baxter and others from parties across the chamber to talk about what the best way to proceed is.

We have had success with, for example, the national autism strategy, which has perhaps formed some of the thinking on amendment 194. However, perhaps other means could be pursued. Some of what we want to do could be captured in guidance and some of it could be pursued through other methods. Perhaps a broader cross-party discussion among interested parties would yield more than would including the amendment in the bill at this stage.

I am interested to hear the minister’s views, but I see indications that members find that suggestion broadly agreeable.

Liam McArthur: I congratulate Mark McDonald, Jayne Baxter and Siobhan McMahon on their efforts on the issue at stages 2 and 3. I hope that those efforts will be rewarded with a firm commitment from the minister to produce either a strategy encompassing speech, language and communication or, at least, as Mark McDonald indicated, a process for taking the issues forward.

I recognise that amendment 194 is intended to probe and is not necessary for incorporation in the bill. However, it is relevant to some of the issues that were highlighted in discussion about earlier amendments.

As I said at the outset, the bill should be about putting children’s rights front and centre and making children’s voices heard. Self-evidently, that is influenced by a child or young person’s capacity to communicate—to understand information and to express views. Moreover, that ability can also have a bearing on assessments of maturity and capacity, which are key to the amendments that I moved on information sharing. Therefore, although the issues that Siobhan McMahon, Jayne Baxter and Mark McDonald have raised are not appropriate for the face of the bill, they are highly relevant to it, and I look forward to seeing a proper strategy being developed and emerging in the near future.

Malcolm Chisholm: I will be brief.

It would be very helpful if the minister made a statement of intent. If that is done, I am sure that members will not mind if the proposal is not on the face of the bill.

As Siobhan McMahon said, there has been a lot of mention in policy of the matter, but there is no strategy. I do not need to remind the minister that the stretch aim of the early years collaborative is that all children reach their developmental milestones, including age-appropriate communication skills, by 27 to 30 months. In fact, communication and language needs are the most common developmental difficulty that children and young people experience. The issue is therefore central to the agenda that we are discussing. It is also very much a social justice and inequality issue, because those speech and language difficulties are often related to current social disadvantage and disadvantages in later life. Therefore, I hope that there will be a statement of intent today.

Aileen Campbell: My comments on Siobhan McMahon’s amendment 194 are similar to those on Jayne Baxter’s amendment 254 at stage 2. The bill has been drafted to ensure that the needs of any particular group of children will be supported by the different sets of provisions. Those include speech, language and communication needs. The creation of additional specific statutory duties and provisions for communication is not, as Mark McDonald and others have suggested, for the face of the bill. In this context, the specific needs of different groups of children are best addressed through guidance, and we have committed to ensuring that the distinctive needs of children with speech, language and communication issues are addressed by guidance as appropriate.

We have taken on board the important points that Siobhan McMahon has raised around consistency and other issues. I certainly remember her talking about consistency.
In constructing the guidance, we will draw on the expertise and experience of the Royal College of Speech and Language Therapists, for instance, and will ensure that others can contribute. We can also draw on the expertise that has been articulated in the debate so far by Mark McDonald, Jayne Baxter, Malcolm Chisholm, Liam McArthur and others to ensure that we get the guidance absolutely right.

I make a commitment that we will speak to others to ensure that the guidance can be influenced on a cross-party basis given others’ clear desire to get things right in speech and language support.

Siobhan McMahon: I thank the members who have supported my probing amendment.

I agree with Mark McDonald that, if we can get cross-party support for the strategy going forward and for discussion not only across the parties but with the organisations that asked for the amendment, that will benefit all young children. That is all that we want, of course. I welcome the minister’s assurance and therefore seek to withdraw my amendment 194.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: That ends consideration of amendments. The other piece of good news is that the Scottish men’s curling team are through to the Olympic final. [Applause.]

Before we start the next item of business, I advise Parliament that, as a consequence of the earlier decision to extend the debate on amendments by 30 minutes, decision time will be moved by 30 minutes and will now be at 8.30.

Malcolm Chisholm: On a point of order, Presiding Officer. A point of order has already been raised concerning rule 9.3.2 of the standing orders, but I think that it is important that, before the end of stage 3, we have a statement from the cabinet secretary on the issue that was raised by the convener of the Finance Committee this morning. Under rule 9.3.2, the best estimates of the capital costs of the bill should have been provided, but they have not been provided. I hope that we can get from the cabinet secretary, in his speech in the next debate, at least some indication of why that information has not been provided and when it will be provided.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I thank Mr Chisholm for his point of order, but I refer him to what was said previously. Parliament passed a financial resolution on the bill on 21 November 2013, which stated:

“That the Parliament, for the purposes of any Act of the Scottish Parliament resulting from the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, agrees to any expenditure of a kind referred to in paragraph 3(b) of Rule 9.12 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders arising in consequence of the Act.”

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The result of the division is: For 115, Against 0, Abstentions 0.
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

The Deputy Presiding Officer (John Scott): The next item of business is a debate on motion S4M-09050, in the name of Aileen Campbell, on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill.

The Minister for Children and Young People (Aileen Campbell): Presiding Officer, thank you for the update on the curling—that was welcome news.

I am pleased to open this stage 3 debate. I start by thanking everyone who has been involved in the development and scrutiny of this landmark piece of legislation. In particular, I thank the three parliamentary committees for their detailed examination of the bill—not least, the Education and Culture Committee, following four three-hour stage 2 meetings and a five-hour stage 3 meeting. Its careful and balanced consideration of the proposals has resulted in a bill that captures better the principles that Parliament endorsed at stage 1. I am genuinely appreciative of committee members' work.

I also thank everyone who responded to our consultation and all who have been involved in the bill's development—especially the 2,400 children and young people and the 1,500 parents who shared their views. I also record my thanks and gratitude to all the Government officials who have worked absolutely tirelessly and with dedication on the bill. I sincerely appreciate their very hard and fine work.

We have listened carefully to all that has been said. Since day 1, that collaborative approach has allowed the bill to evolve into an extraordinary piece of legislation that will convey our aspirations to improve the wellbeing of our children and to help make Scotland the best place to grow up.

The legislation will place our commitment to the early years on a statutory basis. It will do that as much through our proposals to transform early learning and childcare as it will through requiring children's services plans to demonstrate early intervention and primary prevention.

Through the named person provision, the bill will put in place a universal approach to promoting, supporting and safeguarding every child's wellbeing by working with families. The named person—albeit that the provision is not supported by everyone—will be the single point of contact that parents told us they wanted, and whose job will be to ensure that children, young people and their families get the support they need when they need it.

The bill will, through our care and aftercare provisions, change how our most vulnerable children and young people make the very difficult transition through and out of care when the time is right for them, by ensuring that there is appropriate support at every stage on the way.

We are placing a duty on local authorities to provide services to families where there is a risk that a child will become looked after. We are also supporting the invaluable work of kinship carers by requiring authorities to provide assistance to carers of a child who is at risk of becoming looked after. We are strengthening the impact that corporate parenting can make and we are helping the children who need to proceed to adoption by making use of the national adoption register compulsory. The bill puts children's rights at the heart of the public sector and government for the first time. It will ensure that ministers assess all future decisions against the rights of children, and will require public bodies to embed rights in the front-line services that our children and families rely on day in, day out.

Those overall intentions have not changed during the bill's progress; what has changed is how the bill can achieve the intentions. We welcomed and put forward many suggestions for improvement at stage 2; that was the result of a shared recognition of the importance of the legislation and our common ambitions.

As I have always said, the bill is a starting point for the expansion of early learning and childcare. This is the first time that flexibility and choice have been put on a statutory footing. The bill sets the stage for our longer-term aim to develop high quality flexible early learning and childcare that are accessible and affordable for all children, parents and families.

We have always intended, through secondary legislation, to open out entitlement where it is affordable to do so. Therefore, I was absolutely delighted that the First Minister announced on 7 January that we will from August this year increase the entitlement of free early learning and childcare to two-year-olds in families that are workless or seeking work, which is 15 per cent of that age group. That will be followed in August 2015 by extension to two-year-olds who meet the free school meals criteria, which is 27 per cent of two-year-olds, or more than 15,000 children. That is a phased sustainable expansion of early learning and childcare to more vulnerable two-year-olds. We are focusing first on families who are most in need and who will benefit most from the expansion of funded hours. That will not only improve the life chances of children, but will provide opportunities for parents and families to benefit from support into training or sustainable employment.
In the Scottish Government’s white paper, “Scotland’s Future: Your Guide to an Independent Scotland”, we have set out phased plans to achieve 1,140 hours a year for all children aged between one and five, starting with an increase to half of all two-year-olds. The expansion that is set out in the bill will be a significant step towards realising that vision.

In addition, on 7 January the First Minister announced that all schoolchildren in primary 1 to primary 3 will from January 2015 receive free school meals. The benefits to children and families will be significant and have been commented on.

Gil Paterson (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP): I congratulate the minister and Parliament on coming to a sensible decision on free school meals—in particular, on the decision to make provision universal. I can talk from experience about how that will benefit children. A child whose family cannot afford school meals but who receives a meal anonymously will eat the meal, rather than withdrawing and going away because they are likely to get bullied. Children who really need good square meals will get them, and they will be healthy for the rest of their lives, because of Parliament’s decision to act in this way.

Aileen Campbell: I thank Gil Paterson for his intervention. The benefits to children and families are significant, not least because the approach will tackle issues to do with stigmatisation of children who access free school meals, as he said. It will improve the health and wellbeing of children and it will mean a saving of around £330 a year per child for the families who will benefit. Through today’s amendments in the name of Adam Ingram, who has been committed to the policy, we intend to give ministers the power to place a duty on local authorities to provide free school lunches.

The bill’s positive impact on young people who are or who have been in care has grown. We were mindful of the Education and Culture Committee’s request that we give further consideration to aftercare. We worked closely with key organisations—in particular Who Cares? Scotland, the Aberlour Child Care Trust and Barnardo’s Scotland—and we introduced a suite of new measures in support of continuing care.

Members will be aware that on 6 January I announced that, starting in 2015, 16-year-olds in foster care, kinship care or residential care will have the right to stay in care up to the age of 21, before receiving aftercare. The changes will give young people in care the same opportunities that their non-looked-after peers enjoy. We have been delighted with the positive feedback that we have received since I announced the package of measures. Duncan Dunlop, the chief executive of Who Cares? Scotland said that the number of “young care leavers who will benefit from these changes is significant and I don’t know of any other country in the world that has made a commitment like this”.

It is good to hear that we are in the vanguard when it comes to improving the life chances of young care leavers.

I pay tribute to the looked-after care leavers who, from the start, articulated their desire to make things better for future generations of care leavers. Their positive mark has been left on the bill for ever and they should feel incredibly proud of what they have achieved.

Some amendments to the bill have helped us to realise our goals more effectively, not least as we place on statute key elements of the getting it right for every child approach. Working closely with key stakeholders, we listened and gave careful consideration to concerns around the provisions on the named person and information sharing. On the basis of feedback from a wide range of stakeholders, the provisions have been amended so that professionals will be clearer about when and how to share information in a way that will always put the child’s best interests at heart, working with parents. The Law Society of Scotland and the Information Commissioner’s Office wrote to the Education and Culture Committee to give broad support to the amendments in my name.

New measures have also been introduced to reflect needs that have arisen since the bill was introduced. Existing legislation on school closures has been strengthened through a number of amendments to the school closure proposals consultation process under the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010. A school closure can be significant and incredibly disruptive for the children, parents and communities who are affected. It is clear that the 2010 act has not been operating satisfactorily for the people who have been affected or for education authorities. For that reason, and in response to recommendations from the commission on the delivery of rural education, amendments were agreed to that will benefit all who are involved in and affected by school closures.

Fundamentally, the bill will bring about transformational change for Scotland’s children and young people. We should be proud that we will today pass legislation that will improve the lives of our children.

Beyond the individual elements of the bill, perhaps its most important achievement lies in its title: it is a bill for the children and young people of Scotland. Over the past year, Parliament has given the whole wellbeing of children and young people its full intense consideration. We have demonstrated that we are not complacent when it comes to finding ways of improving the lives of all children and young people, and that we will continue to put their rights and wellbeing at the centre of Scottish political life.

We may not agree on all aspects of how best to promote, support and safeguard the wellbeing of children and young people, but in a year in which the people of Scotland are being asked to consider the nation’s future, it is a mark of our national maturity that we place such a high priority on the next generation. For those reasons, it gives me enormous pleasure to move the motion.

I move,

That the Parliament agrees that the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill be passed.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Unsurprisingly, we are extraordinarily tight for time, so less would be more.

19:45

Kezia Dugdale (Lothian) (Lab): I was struck by the fact that Aileen Campbell said that the bill would bring about “transformational change for Scotland’s children”.

Her back benchers have been telling us for weeks and months that we need independence if we are to deliver transformational change.

Aileen Campbell: Aw!

Kezia Dugdale: Those are the words that the minister used. She admitted that devolution can bring about such change.

At the beginning of the process, Labour set out to improve the bill in three key areas. We believe that we have worked positively and constructively throughout the process. We said that we wanted to improve the provisions on care leavers, on childcare and on kinship care.

I will start with the good stuff. I have been profoundly moved by the experiences of care leavers whom I have met during the bill’s passage. I have been moved not only by the stories of their lives, what they have had to live through and what they have seen with eyes so young, but by their resolute determination to ensure that no child will ever again have a life like the one that they have had. The Government has moved quite considerably on aftercare and support for care leavers, and we have taken many steps towards providing a more equal Scotland for care leavers.

However, as I said during consideration of amendments, more needs to be done. The minister talked about a working group, but I would like an independent cross-party commission to be set up. I believe that it could look at the root causes of children ending up in care and at why doing nothing costs the state. It could examine how much doing nothing costs our criminal justice system and our health service. It could look specifically at the mental health, drug and alcohol problems that care leavers suffer from, and it could investigate the number of premature deaths in the care-leaver population.

Such a commission could also investigate education—more specifically, the educational attainment of care leavers and their progress into tertiary education. It could consider wider economic issues, such as the percentage of the more choices, more chances group who are care leavers and the number of care leavers who are economically inactive.

I mention all that with the support of the whole of the care-leaver sector. I am referring to all the organisations that have an active interest in the issue, which include Barnardo’s, the Aberlour Child Care Trust and Who Cares? Scotland. The children whom we are talking about are Scotland’s children—our children. There are no politics in this; we need a cultural shift and a national debate about the scandal of the life expectancy and the life chances of care leavers in Scotland today.

Regardless of who is in power and what the constitutional settlement is, the problems remain. We should unite across Parliament and commit to addressing the issue together. I would welcome it if the minister did not respond to my request now. I ask her to think about it, and I will write to her to outline exactly what could be involved in the process that I have proposed. I will provide her with details of the support that exists across the sector for such work.

I turn to childcare. We welcome the increased support that is to be provided for two-year-olds. We also welcome the provision for three and four-year-olds, although we simply cannot forget the fact that the Scottish National Party first promised such provision back in 2007. There are thousands of children who were not born when the SNP first made its promise and who are now too old to benefit from it.

That takes me to after-school care. Labour pushed its amendment because we understand the challenges that families face in accessing good-quality affordable childcare outside of school hours. That problem has been worsened by the SNP Government’s failure to fully fund local authorities, which has led to non-statutory services such as breakfast clubs and after-school clubs being the first services to go.

All those points were made by Cara Hilton in excellent remarks at the amendment stage. Cara Hilton is still counting the weeks for which she has been a member of the Parliament; she is still learning and is still familiarising herself with the standing orders, while Bruce Crawford has years of experience at the highest level of parliamentary business. I therefore took great exception to what he said. He knows better than anyone that he was expected to address the amendment in question. To make such a direct and personal attack on Cara Hilton for merely speaking the truth was ugly and a real low point in this afternoon’s debate.

Stewart Maxwell (West Scotland) (SNP): That was the real low point right there—slagging off someone who is not in the chamber.

Kezia Dugdale: I hear a sedentary comment that I am

“slagging off someone who is not in the chamber.”

I am afraid that it is Mr Crawford’s choice not to be here just now, and I have to say that I really took exception to the point that he made.

Today dozens of people were outside Parliament, very angry because seven years on from when the UK Government gave the Scottish Government money to address the disparity in the kinship care system, they are still waiting. There is undoubtedly a postcode lottery with regard to kinship care in Scotland. There are different definitions of what it means to be a kinship carer, different eligibility criteria and different systems of recompense and financial support for people who are looking after children whose parents are simply unable to look after them themselves. Those people are doing a great act of public service every single day and all they are asking for is the money to make ends meet. I really do not think that is too much to ask. I regret that we have not been able to address the issue today, but I am sure that we will return to it in the future.

Although the Labour Party supported the named person principle at stages 1 and 2, we were not uncritical of it and raised serious points that people in the sector had made about the degree to which it will be resourced. I believe very strongly that the Scottish National Party Government has failed to advocate its own policy effectively enough; it could have done a much better job in that respect. It has failed to justify the policy in the months up to today, and I am afraid to say that today it has failed again to do so, which is a real shame. It means that the guidance on implementation of the named person provisions will really matter, so I urge the Government in the strongest terms to take considerable care over that.

In the minute that I have left, I want to say that this has been a day of promises unkept, with a real failure to tell us the bill’s true costs. Despite its promises to do so, the Government has failed to provide details of the financial review of kinship care. The Government has so far had seven years to deliver on its promise of 600 hours of childcare; we are still waiting for it to happen.

The Government has also failed to say what all of the bill’s provisions will cost. There has been no attempt to quantify the costs of expanding nurseries to deliver on the childcare commitments, or the costs of free school meals and what that will mean for the policy’s delivery in schools. There is an arrogance and incompetence about the Government this afternoon. It has been arrogant in its justification or explanation for what it is doing with regard to the named person provisions. After all, it has the votes, so why should it tell the people about what it is trying to do? It has been incompetent in its failure to detail what all this will cost. If the Government cannot provide the figures for what it plans to do now, how can we expect any of its figures for an independent Scotland to balance or add up?

In my remaining seconds, I want to thank all the organisations, in particular Children in Scotland and Barnardo’s, for everything that they have done to support Labour members in preparing for this process. After the robust discussions that we have had today, I am very glad to support the bill.

Liz Smith (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): I think that the chamber is very well versed on the Scottish Conservatives’ approach to the bill.

From the outset, we have been very supportive of the majority of intentions in the bill, most especially those that will improve care for our most vulnerable children, those that will expand childcare and kinship care, and those that address the failings within the existing school closures legislation. We have been very happy to ensure that, and I hope, very diligent in ensuring—that those aspects of the bill have been improved and, as such, will deliver better opportunities and support for our young people. We were particularly supportive of measures to expand a collaborative approach across most aspects of children’s services and measures to ensure more effective delivery.

We have been very methodical and consistent in our approach to the bill, critically examining each aspect against important criteria: the likely practical changes on the ground when it comes to the best way of improving the chances of young people across Scotland; cost; and what we see as the most important priorities in an economic environment in which resources are constrained. I will come back to those criteria in a minute.

Our judgments have been part of a process that covers so many related but nonetheless very diverse topics and the fact that, as with the Post-16 Education (Scotland) Bill, we have sometimes had to cope with less than perfect drafting, which has held us up at times.

From the very first evidence session, key sections of the bill were given a very tough time by legal experts, stakeholders concerned about some of the bill’s practicalities and those, such as the Scottish Conservatives, who objected to a certain centralising approach in some key sections. It is clear even now that, as far as the practical application of some aspects of the bill are concerned, there is still uncertainty about its provisions, most especially about its costs. Indeed, that is one reason why we could not accept a number of amendments earlier this afternoon.

Let me deal with the three sets of criteria against which we have judged the bill. First, when it comes to making a real, practical difference on the ground that we can be sure will improve the chances of young people, we were very conscious of the desire to look at the main principles of the bill under the term “wellbeing” rather than “welfare”, which is the usual terminology in law. The expectation was that that would bring a more holistic meaning to policy making, which I think has been accepted in theory, but I remain a little concerned as to how that will work in practice.

Several witnesses made the valid point that to really change the way that we operate we require a change of culture, not overly burdensome legislation. A few worries remain about some of the bill’s implications for professionals who work on the ground. Liam McArthur’s amendments on data sharing were designed to tackle that issue, as were some of Neil Bibby’s amendments and most certainly the Conservative ones on the named person.

Secondly, there was an important issue relating to cost. It is our firm belief that some of the costs inherent in the bill are sizeable and, as the Finance Committee observed, are not as the Government would intend. I will cite some comments from the Finance Committee.

I referred earlier to Kenny Gibson’s point that beyond year 1 the bill’s provisions have not been properly costed. The implication is that there will be some funding shortfalls. Gavin Brown said that it seems counterintuitive that the training can just be squeezed into existing training with absolutely no cost, including materials or other expense. He also made the very good point that, although the Education and Culture Committee took evidence from Highland region, we cannot necessarily compare that to areas of Glasgow or other parts that perhaps have a higher incidence of deprivation. Michael McMahon also said:

“From the evidence that we have received, the best estimates from NHS boards, children’s charities, local government bodies and foster care organisations all say that your best estimates are wrong.” —[Official Report, Finance Committee, 18 September 2013; c 2994.]

It therefore seems to me that some serious questions remain about the funding of the bill and that we still have some problems to resolve regarding the revised financial memorandum.

Thirdly, and not unrelated to the cost issue, there is the matter of priorities. Everyone accepts that tough choices have to be made and that it is impossible to do everything that we might like. Instead, we must weigh up the costs and benefits of different options and, indeed, the opportunity costs of not pursuing something. We have seen party lines split on that issue.

I will not go back over all our arguments about our two fundamental objections regarding the named person policy and the fact that the Government seems very unwilling to address the anomalies in the provision of nursery care.

The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill will do many good things, but it has some seriously misplaced priorities. The Scottish Conservatives have been frustrated and disappointed that the Scottish Government has made no efforts to address those concerns. It has not engaged particularly well with some of the stakeholders and Opposition parties.

As a result of that, our considered approach is that we will not give the bill our whole-hearted support. We will make a principled abstention this afternoon. We do not want the bill to fall, but nonetheless we cannot support a bill that includes the named person and does not address the issue of nursery provision.

The Presiding Officer (Tricia Marwick): We now move to open debate. Time is extremely tight and speeches should be no more than four minutes.

Stewart Maxwell (West Scotland) (SNP): This is a good bill and a positive contribution to Scottish society. It is positive for families and particularly positive for children and young people, so I am rather disappointed by some of the contributions so far.

I thank all those who gave evidence to the Education and Culture Committee, particularly the young people who did so, and I thank my fellow committee members for their efforts and the clerking team and the Scottish Parliament information centre for their very able assistance during the passage of the bill.

The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill is comprehensive, and I would like to focus on several important parts of it in my short speech. Like many MSPs, I have had a number of people contact me about the named person provision. I am disappointed that the provision has been somewhat misrepresented and misunderstood, and I am grateful to the minister for taking the time to write to MSPs to clarify what the Scottish Government hopes to achieve through the bill.

The named person provision will ensure that vulnerable children are better protected and that families and carers are given greater support if required. I strongly refute any suggestion that the provision will result in a snooper’s charter that undermines the role of parents. In fact, the majority of evidence that the committee received showed support for the measure, which will provide a clear point of contact for parents and carers. The named person provision builds on the getting it right for every child approach, which was introduced by the previous Executive and which has already been implemented in some parts of the country.

Evidence from the Highland Council pathfinder model shows that the named person approach can work well. More than a dozen children’s charities and organisations back the proposals. The fact that so many charities that are committed to improving the lives of children strongly support the introduction of the named person approach suggests to me that it is the right thing to do. The proposal does not mean having a social worker for every child, and it is in no way intended to usurp the role of parents and carers. If it was usurping the role of parents and carers, I believe that nobody in the chamber would support it, and I certainly would not. That is not what is happening; instead, the named person will provide support when needed by a family and will assist with early recognition of where children are at risk in order to prevent them from coming to harm.

The fact is that most children will never need the named person, and the majority of families will be unaffected by the change. However, the measure will ensure that a point of contact is available to provide support to families that need it. I welcome the minister’s assurances that parents who do not want to engage with the named person will be under no obligation to do so. I believe that the Scottish Government has worked well with stakeholders and has struck the right balance in the bill between protecting privacy and ensuring a child’s safety and wellbeing. It is clear to me that the implementation of GIRFEC across Scotland is a positive step forward that will help to ensure that child welfare continues to be prioritised and that no child who needs support is left without it.

I want to talk a little about data sharing. Highland Council’s written evidence highlighted that the named person role has put in place a clear process by which information about a child is passed to the right person. Improved information sharing between health, education, justice and social work services for vulnerable youngsters is to be welcomed. Better co-ordination of public services will help to ensure that relevant information is shared in a more targeted way and only under the right circumstances, when an appropriate need is identified. Because of that, it is expected that less information will be passed around, rather than more, as has been demonstrated by the pathfinder in Highland. The minister has also clarified that, contrary to what has been reported, there is no plan to introduce a national database of children’s personal information—that is yet another scare story that has been spread about the bill.

I am delighted that the bill will deliver a positive change for care leavers by allowing young people in care to receive support for longer. Martin Crewe, the director of Barnardo’s, has said that the changes represent “the biggest shake-up” in the sector for two decades and will help to “transform the lives” of some of Scotland’s most vulnerable young people.

I am delighted that we will pass the bill today, as it will have a positive impact on Scotland’s children and young people. All members really should support the bill at decision time.

The Presiding Officer: I call Alex Rowley, to be followed by Liam McArthur. Members will wish to note that this is Mr Rowley’s first speech in the chamber.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): Thank you, Presiding Officer.

This is my first speech since being elected to the Scottish Parliament. I begin it by saying that it is with great sadness that I am here today, for it was the untimely death of Helen Eadie MSP that caused the by-election in the Cowdenbeath constituency. During that by-election, it was clear in all the towns and villages that make up the constituency that Helen was held in the highest regard and that everyone knew someone whom Helen had helped. Helen spent her life fighting injustice and inequality, and I make it my aim to continue that work.

I speak in this debate on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill because I am convinced that, in the Cowdenbeath area and across the country, we must focus more support and resources on the early years of a child’s life if we want that child to have the best chance of good health, prosperity and success throughout their life.

The bill includes provision on free school meals. In my constituency, free school meals entitlement is used as a robust indicator of poverty and deprivation. Under the current entitlement, which is based on low income, it is stark that at one end of the Cowdenbeath constituency we have Aberdour, where 1 per cent of primary 1 to 3 pupils qualify for free school meals, while at the other end we have Ballingry, where more than 50 per cent of such children qualify. Since 2007, across the constituency, there has been an increase of 7 per cent in the number of children of that age group who are entitled to free school meals.

Although I support free school meals, what I really believe is more important for the health and wellbeing of children in Cowdenbeath and elsewhere is to tackle the underlying causes of poverty, social inequality and deprivation. One key way out of poverty is employment, and a key barrier to employment for many families is a lack of affordable childcare.

Although the bill makes progress with an additional 125 hours of nursery education, which in the Cowdenbeath constituency amounts to half an hour a day extra for each child, it is far short of a comprehensive childcare strategy that will meet the needs of children and families. However, that is what we need to put in place.

In Fife, we have seen an increase in the number of looked-after children in the care of the council, which went from 626 in 2006 to 855 in 2012—a 38 per cent increase. Today, the figure is over 900. It is a fact that there is a clear correlation between deprivation and children being taken into the care of the council. Last year, Fife Council set aside £7.8 million to focus on early years and family support for those families in the greatest need of that support. I am told that educationists, health visitors and social workers can identify children at an early age who are most likely to end up in the care system and in the most difficulty.

I support the bill because there are good things in it, but I am not sure that it will go far enough to address the major issues that I have outlined. Therefore, the message today must be that we need to be more ambitious for every child and to tackle at root the problems that hold back too many children and families across Scotland.

Liam McArthur (Orkney Islands) (LD): I have put on record my admiration for Helen Eadie and said how the Parliament is the poorer for her absence, but that should not be taken as a reflection on Alex Rowley’s obvious talents. I am sure that he will be an effective and assiduous advocate for his Fife constituents. I congratulate him on a very forceful maiden speech.

Like the convener, I put on record my thanks to the witnesses who gave evidence, provided briefings and supported the preparation of amendments to the bill. I thank the clerks and SPICe for their support and thank my colleagues on the Education and Culture Committee who, as the minister alluded to, put in a pretty herculean effort over the past few months.

The bill is wide ranging, and I have supported its principles from the outset, albeit that, like probably most members, I had concerns at the outset. Many of those have been addressed, but some perhaps less so. There have been considerable advances since stage 1, particularly in the provisions relating to aftercare for care leavers; the expansion of childcare for two-year-olds, which proves that we do not have to await the outcome of the vote on 18 September; and a more transparent and balanced system for dealing with possible rural school closures. Those are positive developments since stage 1.

An element of the process has felt somewhat unsatisfactory though. The minister talked of a collaborative approach, but at times it has been difficult to see the evidence for that, given that Opposition amendment after Opposition amendment was rejected. That was disappointing for those of us moving the amendments, but I think that it also struck many third sector organisations as somewhat surprising. I think that that has given rise to concerns about certain aspects of the bill, and I will touch on a couple of those.

I said earlier this afternoon that I still do not feel that we have made the advances in children’s rights that we should have made. The Law Society of Scotland and the Faculty of Advocates have pointed to that and even to the suggestion that there has been a dilution of children’s rights. The rejection of the incorporation of specific rights under articles 3 and 12 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, the rejection of any reporting duties and the rejection of children’s rights impact assessments have not helped in that respect and probably help explain the view of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People that the bill represents a missed opportunity for children’s rights.

As I said earlier, I was initially sceptical about the named person policy, but the evidence that we received in committee, not least that on the Highland pathfinder experience, persuaded me of the benefits of the approach. However, concerns remain about resources. Education unions, the Royal College of Nursing and, indeed, the Finance Committee have expressed concerns about that. The named person policy has practical implications as well, and I pointed to those when moving amendments earlier in stage 3, particularly in relation to the exchange of information and the lack of explicit consent. The Government rejected amendments on the limiting of universality of the named person provision to those aged 16 and under and on the presumption in favour of explicit consent for information sharing, so we do not have the bill that we could have had, and I think that it has suffered as a result.

Notwithstanding those concerns, and despite an unduly dismissive attitude to any amendment that was not of Government origin, I firmly believe that the legislation will help to deliver real and significant benefits.

I will dwell on a couple of those benefits now. In relation to aftercare, during the stage 1 debate I welcomed the bill’s provisions on the support that will be available to those leaving the care system, but I emphasised where I felt that the Government could go further in extending aspects of aftercare and improving ways in which—

The Presiding Officer: I need to ask you to close Mr McArthur.

Liam McArthur: —the eligibility for access to that would be determined. This is the area in which I feel most justifiably proud of what the bill has achieved. The committee can take justifiable pride in that, as can Parliament.

I cannot speak about the early years, but I think that that is another significant achievement of the bill, which we will support at decision time.

The Presiding Officer: We move to the last two speakers in the open debate. I say to Joan McAlpine and George Adam that I cannot give them any more than three minutes.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): I congratulate Alex Rowley on his maiden speech. I did not agree with everything that he said, but I welcome the tone in which he said it, and I share his commitment to comprehensive childcare. I suggest that the bill is only the start and that we need independence to cross the finishing line.

The bill has been widely praised for its ambition and commitment to improving the lives of children and families in Scotland. The briefing from Children 1st alone singles out seven key measures in the bill that it wanted to highlight and commend: the definition of wellbeing; the furthering of the UNCRC; the named person service as a universal service; the legislative entitlement to free childcare for three-year-olds, four-year-olds and vulnerable two-year-olds; continuing care for care leavers after 16; the duty on early intervention in the lives of vulnerable children to prevent them from becoming looked-after children; and the measures to help kinship carers and the children for whom they care.

If our foremost children’s welfare charity can single out seven key measures in the bill for praise and commendation, the bill is far from being a missed opportunity. In fact, Children 1st describe it as a significant milestone, and it is in that context that I wish to single out one of those significant measures that Children 1st praised, which is the creation of the named person as a universal service for all our children. We have all had emails from a vociferous lobby who oppose that. I said earlier that the point about usurping parents’ rights was put directly in committee to Clare Simpson of parenting across Scotland when she gave evidence to the committee, and she flatly denied it and said that the measure was necessary, not to usurp the rights of parents and families but to support them and to protect children.

Those who have written to us about their fears of some kind of Orwellian dystopia should read the bill, not the hysterical hyperbole of the Daily Mail. Better still, they should read the evidence that was given by dozens of child welfare charities that support the universal service. I will quote one of those. Alex Cole-Hamilton of the Aberlour Child Care Trust said:

“In the vast majority of cases, there will be very little interface between the child and the named person, or between the family and the named person.”

He went on to say that anxiety

“is fuelled by some unhelpful tabloid headlines about there being a social worker for every child. That is not what we are talking about here.”

When Liz Smith asked Jackie Brock from Children in Scotland why a formalisation of the existing policy was needed, she replied:

“Having the duties in statute will ensure that it is the responsibility of universal services to respond and take action where necessary, where it is in the child’s best interest that they do so.”—[Official Report, Education and Culture Committee, 10 September 2013; c 2722, 2724, 2720.]

The Presiding Officer: You must wind up.

Joan McAlpine: Far from the named person being a state guardian who undermines the family, the universal provision of a named person will strengthen and underpin the family and most crucially of all—

The Presiding Officer: I call George Adam. No more than three minutes.

20:14

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): Like Stewart Maxwell, I believe that this is a good bill, not just because it is bold and ambitious and is paving the way to making the type of Scotland that we all want for our children but because it will make a difference to the lives of children and young people, and that is what we are all here for. That is the reason why we all get involved in politics in the first place.

I would also like to talk about the named person provision. The idea can make such a difference to a lot of children and young people, including the tragic cases that we have heard about in the past. It will provide support to the young men and women who are involved, and their families.

Towards the end of last year, I visited Barnardo’s outside in project, which works in Polmont and Cornton Vale. The young men and women I met there told me about some of the situations that they had got themselves into. Would a named person have helped the young man whose pregnant girlfriend was abused, who believed that violence was the only way to deal with the situation, or the young woman whose mother had died, who ended up feeling that she had to be violent to someone else when they gave her a difficult time at school? I believe that a named person would help in such situations, and the support may ensure that such young people do not end up in places such as Cornton Vale or Polmont. I saw how the young people I met have developed through being given support and opportunities through the outside in project. I believe that the named person can make that difference.

I am also pleased that care leavers will be supported until the age of 21. The Education and Culture Committee has held two inquiries into looked-after children and young people, and we heard from young people about how they have been affected and what has happened to them. That had a dramatic effect on every single member of the committee. We heard how being looked after made a difference in their lives and how they felt when they left care and were left out in the cruel adult world. That measure alone shows—after a year and a half of evidence taking as part of the committee’s work programme—that the committee system works. We managed to influence the bill and ensure that we make a difference for young people. That will be those young people’s legacy.

I close by saying that I believe in the bill and that this is about making a difference to young people’s lives.

The Presiding Officer: I call Mary Scanlon. Ms Scanlon, you have three minutes.

20:16

Mary Scanlon (Highlands and Islands) (Con): In the three minutes that I have, I first congratulate Alex Rowley on his maiden speech. I sat beside Helen Eadie on the Health and Sport Committee for four years—2007 to 2011—and from what I knew of her, I think that she would be very proud of the speech that Alex Rowley made today.

I turn to an issue that Kezia Dugdale mentioned when she spoke passionately about care leavers. I am not a member of the Education and Culture Committee so I did not hear all the information, but I add that many families cry out for support at early stages of their problems with children; in some cases, adequate and appropriate support that is given at the right time could prevent children from going into care. Perhaps that has been looked at, but it is something for the future. I met Bill Alexander last week with a parent of a child in care to discuss that.

Many good speeches have been made today. I congratulate my colleague Liz Smith and indeed all the other members of the Education and Culture Committee on their extensive work on the bill. I welcome many of its provisions, particularly the extension of the support that is provided to kinship carers. Jayne Baxter spoke very well and in a measured and considered way about that. It is a significant step forward, as is the extension to the upper age limit for aftercare support from 21 to 26.

It is a shame that so much of the media coverage of the bill has been about the named person. I was not totally aware of the excellent amendments and provisions in the bill in relation to rural schools. The fact that a school closure proposal may not be revisited for five years will enable many parents, pupils and staff to commit to a school with much greater enthusiasm, safe in the knowledge that they are not facing another closure.

I move quickly on to Highland, which has been mentioned quite a few times in the debate. I remind members that in Highland, uniquely, we have a lead agency of the council looking after children and NHS Highland looking after adults, so to use that example and assume that it applies to the rest of Scotland is not appropriate.

I see that I have about 20 seconds left. I very much welcome the extension of childcare as well. However, as I said at stage 1, I would like to know what consultation has been carried out with colleges—

The Presiding Officer: You need to close, please.

Mary Scanlon: —in relation to lecturers being named persons.

20:19

Neil Bibby (West Scotland) (Lab): It is customary when stage 3 of a bill reaches its conclusion to thank the legislation team, the committee clerks and anyone else who has been involved in drafting the bill, and I certainly thank them all today. However, I also thank all the organisations and charities for the evidence and briefings that they have submitted throughout the bill process.

I pay tribute to my newly elected colleague for Cowdenbeath, Alex Rowley, for his powerful and insightful maiden speech and his eloquent tribute to the late Helen Eadie. I am sure that his vast experience and expertise in the area will lead him to be a great asset in the chamber.

Cara Hilton, as Labour’s new MSP for Dunfermline, also made a passionate and committed speech on the bill during the stage 1 debate in the chamber. The fact that both new Labour MSPs chose to speak on this particular bill in two chamber debates ably demonstrates the importance and commitment that the Labour Party and its representatives place on improving life chances for our children and young people.

Labour will vote for the bill at decision time because there are some positive elements to it. However, as Labour members have said, the bill is good only as far as it goes. We on the Labour side of the chamber are certainly not blind to its many failings, and we believe that it will be viewed as a missed opportunity in a number of respects.

We, and a number of organisations, have serious concerns about the resource and practical issues that the Government has not addressed—none more so than the incompetent financial memorandum—and we still believe that the bill lacks ambition.

As my new Labour colleagues and I have said throughout the bill process, we share the SNP Government’s ambition to make Scotland the best place for our children to grow up, and we want to make that ambition a reality. The Scottish Government has often said—too many times to count—that it wants to fulfil that ambition, and at stage 1 the minister said that it was the first principle that guided the bill.

My Labour colleagues and I enthusiastically share that ambition, but the minister and the Scottish Government need to match all their rhetoric with a bit more reality. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill will not do that—if I am being honest, it will not even come close. I am not saying that it could not do that, but—as Alex Rowley said—big challenges still lie ahead for the Government and the Parliament, and I do not believe that the bill will provide the transformational change that Aileen Campbell suggests that it will.

There are welcome measures in the bill. I very much welcome the extension of support for care leavers, and I thank Who Cares? Scotland and the care leavers themselves for advocating those changes forcefully and powerfully. It is clear that we have more to do to help looked-after children in the months and years ahead, and there are big challenges with regard to implementing the named person role. We all acknowledge that the named person role was the most controversial part of the bill, and I hope that the Government is right about the improvements that such a statutory role will bring, but it cannot say that it has not been warned about the practical and resource issues, which we discussed earlier.

If the named person role has been misrepresented or misunderstood, as Stewart Maxwell said, the Scottish Government should look at itself and reflect on the reason: it failed to make a proper and coherent case for the policy.

On kinship care, there are big challenges ahead. Kinship carers have been sceptical about the proposals, and they await the outcome of the financial review.

We are pleased that the Scottish Government has finally got around to implementing its 2007 commitment to provide 600 hours of childcare, but—as I said at the outset—it will not solve the childcare problems of 2014 with a seven-year-old policy.

The Presiding Officer: You need to bring your remarks to a close, Mr Bibby.

Neil Bibby: On early learning and childcare, and on out-of-school care, the bill is a missed opportunity. It will be regarded not as a landmark piece of legislation, but as a landmark opportunity missed. Labour looks forward, in the years ahead, to progressing the issues that the SNP Government has not addressed in the bill.

20:24

The Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning (Michael Russell): I start with some traditional, and some slightly untraditional, thanks. I certainly thank the bill team, the committee and the members who have been in the chamber today, but I also thank all those organisations and individuals—some of whom are in the public gallery today—who have been most influential in shaping this landmark piece of legislation.

The Government has engaged with 2,400 young people, 1,500 parents and 150 organisations. I say to them that this is a good bill—it is a very good bill—and we should commend everybody who has taken part in the process of shaping it.

What we should not do is run down the work that those organisations and individuals have done. We should work together and celebrate, because that is traditionally what we do at the end of a bill process—we celebrate the progress that has been made. Liz Smith said, quite correctly, that not everything is perfect, but when I hear that a bill has taken so much time and so much effort—including from my colleague Aileen Campbell, whom I really want to commend—I want to celebrate that.

Aileen Campbell has been formidable in shaping the bill. She has argued and fought for the bill with everybody, including me, and she has produced a wonderful piece of work. [Interruption.] It is very sad that Labour members want to laugh at that work, because I want to commend Alex Rowley’s maiden speech. I thought that it got the tone right. I do not want to embarrass Alex Rowley but he and I have form. We worked together—sometimes against each other—when he was Labour general secretary and I was SNP chief executive. We proved, despite our differences, that we could on occasion work together for Scotland.

That is what this bill has been: a process of working together for Scotland. Neither Alex Rowley nor I want to demonise our opponents but, alas, that is what we have heard this afternoon. That is a very sad thing because when it happens, we do not make progress. However, we have made progress today.

What have we achieved? From 2015, teenagers in residential, foster or kinship care who turn 16 gain new rights. They have worked hard to get those and the Parliament has listened. New duties have been placed on ministers and on the wider public sector to promote children’s rights—something that I have argued for since I came into this Parliament in 1999.

Kinship carers are getting enhanced legal entitlements and involvement in the process. I met kinship carers this morning to talk to them about it. Scotland’s national adoption register is being placed in statute and counselling and other support is being provided for vulnerable children and their families. There is improved provision of advice and help when needed, strengthened legislation on school closures and the school meals provision. Those are all significant achievements and we should say well done to everybody who is involved in them. What we should not do is demonise our opponents.

When I first came into this chamber in 2009, I learned a lot of lessons. One lesson I learned is from the man who is now First Minister. During a debate, he said to me that there was an old maxim at Westminster—the vote follows the voice. That means that if someone believes in something and they think that it is right, they speak for it and then they vote for it.

I believe that the named person provision is right. I did not originally believe that; I needed some persuading by others, including Aileen Campbell. Then I went to that hotbed of revolution, Forfar, and saw the provision in operation there. It was profoundly moving to speak to a young man who had been enormously helped by having a named person. I therefore want to say, “Well done,” to those who have supported and argued for the named person legislation. When I listened to Neil Bibby this afternoon, I could not decide whether he was for it or against it. The vote follows the voice: have some courage to speak up for what you believe in.

I know that Liz Smith profoundly disagrees with the provision, and I am sorry about that. If I had time, I would repeat the commitments that Aileen Campbell has made, because I believe that the provision will be helpful and useful. I do not for a second believe that it will interfere with family life or subordinate the rights of parents, otherwise I would not have supported it. With respect, I think that the Tories are wrong about it. If they could nudge their way from a principled abstention to support, they would be helping the young people of Scotland.

This has been an important step forward for Scotland and for this chamber. It has been particularly important for all those organisations and individuals who have engaged with the Parliament, helping to build a piece of legislation and make it even better than it was when it started. We should say thank you to them. What we should not do is take the dismal, negative approach that we have heard, alas, from Mr Bibby and Kezia Dugdale. That approach does not demean the chamber; it demeans them.
Decision Time

The Presiding Officer: The next question is, that motion S4M-09050, in the name of Aileen Campbell, on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
[AS PASSED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about the rights of children and young people; to make provision about investigations by the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland; to make provision for and about the provision of services and support for or in relation to children and young people; to make provision for an adoption register; to make provision about children’s hearings, detention in secure accommodation and consultation on certain proposals in relation to schools; and for connected purposes.

PART 1
RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

1 Duties of Scottish Ministers in relation to the rights of children

(1) The Scottish Ministers must—

(a) keep under consideration whether there are any steps which they could take which would or might secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC requirements, and

(b) if they consider it appropriate to do so, take any of the steps identified by that consideration.

(1A) In complying with their duty under subsection (1)(a), the Scottish Ministers must take such account as they consider appropriate of any relevant views of children of which the Scottish Ministers are aware.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must promote public awareness and understanding (including appropriate awareness and understanding among children) of the rights of children.

(3) As soon as practicable after the end of each 3 year period, the Scottish Ministers must lay before the Scottish Parliament a report of—

(a) what steps they have taken in that period to secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC requirements,

(b) what they have done in that period in pursuance of subsection (2), and

(c) their plans until the end of the next 3 year period—

(i) to take steps to secure better or further effect in Scotland of the UNCRC requirements, and
(ii) to do things in pursuance of subsection (2).

(3A) In preparing such a report the Scottish Ministers must take such steps as they consider appropriate to obtain the views of children on what their plans for the purposes of subsection (3)(c) should be.

(4) In subsection (3), “3 year period” means—

(a) the period of 3 years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, and

(b) each subsequent period of 3 years.

(5) As soon as practicable after a report has been laid before the Scottish Parliament under subsection (3), the Scottish Ministers must publish it (in such manner as they consider appropriate).

2 Duties of public authorities in relation to the UNCRC

(1) As soon as practicable after the end of each 3 year period, an authority to which this section applies must publish (in such manner as the authority considers appropriate) a report of what steps it has taken in that period to secure better or further effect within its areas of responsibility of the UNCRC requirements.

(2) In subsection (1), “3 year period” means—

(a) the period of 3 years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, and

(b) each subsequent period of 3 years.

(3) Two or more authorities to which this section applies may satisfy subsection (1) by publishing a report prepared by them jointly.

3 Authorities to which section 2 applies

(1) The authorities to which section 2 applies are the persons listed, or persons within a description listed, in schedule 1.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 1 by—

(a) adding a person or description of persons,

(b) removing an entry listed in it, or

(c) varying an entry listed in it.

(3) An order under subsection (2)(a) may—

(a) add a person only if the person falls within subsection (4),

(b) add a description of persons only if each of the persons within the description falls within subsection (4).

(4) A person falls within this subsection if the person—

(a) is part of the Scottish Administration,

(b) is a Scottish public authority with mixed functions or no reserved functions (within the meaning of the Scotland Act 1998), or

(c) is a publicly owned company.
(5) In subsection (4)(c), “publicly owned company” means a company that is wholly owned by—

(a) the Scottish Ministers, or

(b) a person listed, or a person within a description listed, in schedule 1.

(6) For the purpose of subsection (5), a company is wholly owned—

(a) by the Scottish Ministers if it has no members other than—

(i) the Scottish Ministers or other companies that are wholly owned by them, or

(ii) persons acting on behalf of the Scottish Ministers or of such other companies,

(b) by a person listed, or a person within a description listed, in schedule 1 if it has no members other than—

(i) the person or other companies that are wholly owned by the person, or

(ii) persons acting on behalf of the person or of such other companies.

(7) In this section, “company” includes any body corporate.

4 Interpretation of Part 1

(1) In this Part—

“the rights of children” includes the rights and obligations set out in—

(a) the UNCRC,

(b) the first optional protocol to the UNCRC, and

(c) the second optional protocol to the UNCRC,

“the UNCRC” means the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child adopted and opened for signature, ratification and accession by General Assembly resolution 44/25 of 20 November 1989,

“the first optional protocol” means the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict,

“the second optional protocol” means the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography,

“the UNCRC requirements” means the rights and obligations set out in—

(a) Part 1 of the UNCRC,

(b) Articles 1 to 6(1), 6(3) and 7 of the first optional protocol, and

(c) Articles 1 to 10 of the second optional protocol.

(2) A reference in subsection (1) to a UNCRC document is to be read as a reference to that document subject to—

(a) any amendments in force in relation to the United Kingdom at the time, and

(b) any reservations, objections or interpretative declarations by the United Kingdom in force at the time.

(3) In subsection (2), “UNCRC document”—
(a) means the UNCRC or any optional protocol to the UNCRC, and
(b) includes provision of a UNCRC document.

(4) Where subsection (5) applies, the Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (1) as they consider appropriate to take account of—
(a) an optional protocol to the UNCRC, or
(b) an amendment of a document referred to in subsection (1) at the time.

(5) This subsection applies where the protocol or amendment is one which—
(a) the United Kingdom has ratified, or
(b) the United Kingdom has signed with a view to ratification.

(6) No modification may be made by an order under subsection (4) so as to come into force before the protocol or amendment is in force in relation to the United Kingdom.

PART 2
COMMISSIONER FOR CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE IN SCOTLAND

5 Investigations by the Commissioner

(1) The Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 is amended as follows.

(2) In section 7—
(a) for subsections (1) and (2), substitute—
‘(1) The Commissioner may carry out an investigation into—
(a) whether, by what means and to what extent a service provider has regard to the rights, interests and views of children and young people in making decisions or taking actions that affect those children and young people (such an investigation being called a “general investigation”),
(b) whether, by what means and to what extent a service provider had regard to the rights, interests and views of a child or young person in making a decision or taking an action that affected that child or young person (such an investigation being called an “individual investigation”).
(2) The Commissioner may carry out a general investigation only if the Commissioner, having considered the available evidence on, and any information received about, the matter, is satisfied on reasonable grounds that the matter to be investigated raises an issue of particular significance to—
(a) children and young people generally, or
(b) particular groups of children and young people.
(2A) The Commissioner may carry out an investigation only if the Commissioner, having considered the available evidence on, and any information received about, the matter, is satisfied on reasonable grounds that the investigation would not duplicate work that is properly the function of another person.”,
(b) in subsection (3), omit paragraph (b),
(c) after that subsection, add—
“(4) Subsection (5) applies in relation to a matter about which the Commissioner may carry out an individual investigation.

(5) Where the Commissioner considers that the matter may be capable of being resolved without an investigation, the Commissioner may with a view to securing that outcome take such steps as the Commissioner considers appropriate.”.

(3) In section 8—
(a) in subsection (1), for paragraph (b) substitute—
   “(b) take such steps as appear to the Commissioner to be appropriate with a view to bringing notice of the investigation and terms of reference to the attention of persons likely to be affected by it.”;
(b) in subsection (2), for “An” substitute “A general”;
(c) after that subsection, add—
   “(3) An individual investigation is to be conducted in private.”.

(4) In section 11—
(a) in subsection (1), for “lay before the Parliament” substitute “prepare”,
(b) in subsection (3), for “laid before the Parliament” substitute “finalised”,
(c) after that subsection, add—
   “(4) The Commissioner must lay before the Parliament the report of a general investigation.
   (5) The Commissioner may lay before the Parliament the report of an individual investigation.”.

6 Requirement to respond to Commissioner’s recommendations

(1) The Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003 is amended as follows.

(2) In section 11—
(a) after subsection (2), insert—
   “(2A) In relation to any such recommendation, the report may include a requirement to respond.
   (2B) A requirement to respond is a requirement that the service provider provides, within such period as the Commissioner reasonably requires, a statement in writing to the Commissioner setting out—
   (a) what the service provider has done or proposes to do in response to the recommendation; or
   (b) if the service provider does not intend to do anything in response to the recommendation, the reasons for that.”,
(b) after subsection (5) (as inserted by section 5 of this Act), add—
   “(6) Where a report of an investigation includes a requirement to respond, the Commissioner must give a copy of the report to the service provider.”.

(3) After section 14, insert—
“14AA Publication of responses to recommendations of investigations

(1) The Commissioner must publish any statement provided in response to a requirement to respond to a recommendation arising out of a general investigation.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply if, or to the extent that, the Commissioner considers publication to be inappropriate.

(3) The Commissioner may publish any statement provided in response to a requirement to respond to a recommendation arising out of an individual investigation.

(4) The Commissioner must ensure that, so far as reasonable and practicable having regard to the subject matter, the version of the statement which is published under subsection (1) or (3) does not name or identify any child or young person, or group of children or young people, referred to in it.

(5) The Commissioner may, in such manner as the Commissioner considers appropriate, publicise a failure to comply with a requirement to respond.”.

PART 3
CHILDREN’S SERVICES PLANNING

7 Introductory

(1) For the purposes of this Part—

“children’s service” means any service provided in the area of a local authority by a person mentioned in subsection (2) which is provided wholly or mainly to, or for the benefit of—

(a) children generally, or

(b) children with needs of a particular type (such as looked after children or children with a disability or a need for additional support in learning),

“other service provider” means—

(a) the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland,

(b) the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service,

(c) the Principal Reporter,

(d) the National Convener of Children’s Hearings Scotland,

(e) the Scottish Court Service,

“related service” means any service provided in the area of a local authority by a person mentioned in subsection (2) which though not a children’s service is capable of having a significant effect on the wellbeing of children,

“relevant health board” means—

(a) if the area of the local authority is the same as that of a health board, that health board,

(b) if the area of the local authority is not the same as that of a health board, the health board within whose area the area of the local authority falls.
(2) The persons referred to in the definitions of “children’s service” and “related service” in subsection (1) are—
(a) the local authority,
(b) the relevant health board,
(c) any other service provider,
(d) the Scottish Ministers (but only in relation to a service provided by them in exercise of their functions under the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989).

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by order specify—
(a) services which are to be considered to be included within or excluded from the definition of “children’s service” or “related service” in subsection (1),
(b) matters in relation to services falling within either of those definitions which are to be considered to be included within or excluded from those services.

(4) Before making such an order, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) each health board,
(b) each local authority, and
(c) where the service concerned is provided by one of the other service providers, that person.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify the definition of “other service provider” in subsection (1) by—
(a) adding a person or a description of persons,
(b) removing an entry listed in it, or
(c) varying an entry listed in it.

(6) A function conferred by this Part on a local authority and the relevant health board is to be exercised by those persons jointly.

8 Requirement to prepare children’s services plan

(1) A local authority and the relevant health board must in respect of each 3 year period prepare a children’s services plan for the area of the local authority.

(2) In subsection (1)—
“3 year period” means—
(a) the period of 3 years beginning with such date after the coming into force of this section as the Scottish Ministers specify by order, and
(b) each subsequent period of 3 years,
“children’s services plan” means a document setting out their plans for the provision over that period of all—
(a) children’s services, and
(b) related services.
9  Aims of children’s services plan

(1) A children’s services plan is to be prepared with a view to securing the achievement of the aims in subsection (2).

(2) Those aims are—

(a) that children’s services in the area concerned are provided in the way which—

(i) best safeguards, supports and promotes the wellbeing of children in the area concerned,

(ii) is most integrated from the point of view of recipients, and

(iii) constitutes the best use of available resources,

(b) that related services in the area concerned are provided in the way which, so far as consistent with the objects and proper delivery of the service concerned, safeguards, supports and promotes the wellbeing of children in the area concerned.

10  Children’s services plan: process

(1) In preparing a children’s services plan a local authority and the relevant health board must—

(a) give each of the other service providers and the Scottish Ministers an effective opportunity (consistent with the extent to which the services they provide are to be the subject of the children’s services plan) to participate in or contribute to the preparation of the plan, and

(b) consult—

(i) such organisations as appear to fall within subsection (2),

(ii) such social landlords as appear to provide housing in the area of the local authority, and

(iii) such other persons as the Scottish Ministers may by direction specify.

(2) The organisations falling within this subsection are organisations (whether or not formally constituted) which—

(a) represent the interests of persons who use or are likely to use any children’s service or related service in the area of the local authority, or

(b) provide a service in the area which, if it were provided by the local authority, the relevant health board, any of the other service providers or the Scottish Ministers, would be a children’s service or a related service.

(3) In subsection (1)(b)(ii), “social landlords” has the meaning given by section 165 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010.

(4) A direction under subsection (1)(b)(iii) may be revised or revoked.

(5) Each of the other service providers is and the Scottish Ministers are to participate in or contribute to the preparation of the children’s services plan in accordance with the opportunity given to them under subsection (1)(a).
(6) The persons to be consulted under subsection (1)(b) are to meet any reasonable request which the local authority and the relevant health board make of them—
   (a) to participate in the preparation of the children’s services plan for the area,
   (b) to contribute to the preparation of that plan.

(7) As soon as reasonably practicable after a children’s services plan has been prepared, the local authority and the relevant health board must—
   (a) send a copy to—
       (i) the Scottish Ministers, and
       (ii) each of the other service providers, and
   (b) publish it (in such manner as the local authority and the relevant health board consider appropriate).

(8) Where the Scottish Ministers or any of the other service providers disagrees with the plan in relation to any matter concerning the provision of a service by them, they must prepare and publish (in such manner as they consider appropriate)—
   (a) a notice of the matters in relation to which they disagree, and
   (b) a statement of their reasons for disagreeing.

11 Children’s services plan: review

(1) A local authority and the relevant health board—
   (a) must keep the children’s services plan for the area of the local authority under review, and
   (b) may in consequence prepare a revised children’s services plan.

(2) The following provisions apply to a revised children’s services plan as they apply to a children’s services plan—
   section 9,
   section 10, and
   subsection (1) of this section.

12 Implementation of children’s services plan

(1) During the period to which a children’s services plan relates, the persons mentioned in subsection (2) must, so far as reasonably practicable, provide children’s services and relevant services in the area of the local authority in accordance with the plan.

(2) Those persons are—
   (a) the local authority,
   (b) the relevant health board,
   (c) the Scottish Ministers,
   (d) the other service providers.

(3) The duty in subsection (1) to provide services in accordance with the plan—
   (a) does not apply to the extent that the person providing the service considers that to comply with it would adversely affect the wellbeing of a child,
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Part 3—Children’s services planning

(b) does not apply in relation to the Scottish Ministers or the other service providers to the extent of any matter within a notice published by them under section 10(8) in relation to the plan.

13 Reporting on children’s services plan

(1) As soon as practicable after the end of each 1 year period, a local authority and the relevant health board must publish (in such manner as they consider appropriate) a report on the extent to which—
(a) children’s services and related services have in that period been provided in the area of the local authority in accordance with the children’s services plan, and
(b) that provision has achieved—
(i) the aims listed in section 9(2),
(ii) such outcomes in relation to the wellbeing of children in the area as the Scottish Ministers may by order prescribe.

(2) In subsection (1), “1 year period” means—
(a) the period of 1 year beginning with the date specified under section 8(1), and
(b) each subsequent period of 1 year.

14 Assistance in relation to children’s services planning

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any reasonable request made of them to provide a local authority and the relevant health board with information, advice or assistance for the purposes of exercising their functions under this Part.

(2) Those persons are—
(a) any of the other service providers or the Scottish Ministers (but only in so far as the information, advice or assistance relates to a children’s service or a related service which it is a function of the person to provide),
(b) any of the persons mentioned in section 10(1)(b).

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply where the person considers that the provision of the information, advice or assistance concerned would—
(a) be incompatible with any duty of the person, or
(b) unduly prejudice the exercise of any function of the person.

15 Guidance in relation to children’s services planning

(1) A person or the persons mentioned in subsection (2) must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 12).

(2) Those persons are—
(a) a local authority and the relevant health board,
(b) each of the other service providers.

(5) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) any person to which it relates, and
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Part 3—Children’s services planning

(b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

16 Directions in relation to children’s services planning

(1) A person or the persons mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 12).

(2) Those persons are—
   (a) a local authority and the relevant health board,
   (b) each of the other service providers.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) any person to which it relates, and
   (b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

17 Children’s services planning: default powers of Scottish Ministers

(1) This section applies where the Scottish Ministers consider that a local authority and the relevant health board—
   (a) are not exercising a function conferred on them by this Part (other than the function of complying with section 12), or
   (b) are in exercising such a function not complying with section 15(1).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may direct that the function—
   (a) is to be exercised in a particular way, or
   (b) is to be exercised instead by such of the persons mentioned in subsection (3) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(3) Those persons are—
   (aa) the local authority,
   (ab) the relevant health board,
   (b) another local authority or health board.

(4) A direction under subsection (2)(b) may include such provision as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate as to the making by a person who is not to be exercising the function of payment to a person who is to exercise the function by virtue of the direction.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction under subsection (2) the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) the local authority and relevant health board whose failure is to be, or is, the subject of the direction, and
   (b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

(5A) The persons to whom a direction under subsection (2) is addressed must comply with the direction.
18 Interpretation of Part 3

In this Part—

“children’s services plan” has the meaning given by section 8(2),

“service” means any service or support—

(a) which must be provided by the person concerned, or

(b) which the person concerned has power to provide.

PART 4

PROVISION OF NAMED PERSONS

19 Named person service

(1) In this Part, “named person service” means the service of making available, in relation to a child or young person, an identified individual who is to exercise the functions in subsection (5).

(2) An individual may be identified for the purpose of a named person service only if the individual falls within subsection (3).

(3) An individual falls within this subsection if—

(a) the individual—

(i) is an employee of the service provider, or

(ii) is, or is an employee of, a person who exercises any function on behalf of the service provider, and

(b) the individual meets such requirements as to training, qualifications, experience or position as may be specified by the Scottish Ministers by order.

(4) An individual does not fall within subsection (3) if the individual is a parent of the child or young person.

(5) The functions referred to in subsection (1) are—

(a) subject to subsection (5A), doing such of the following where the named person considers it to be appropriate in order to promote, support or safeguard the wellbeing of the child or young person—

(i) advising, informing or supporting the child or young person, or a parent of the child or young person,

(ii) helping the child or young person, or a parent of the child or young person, to access a service or support, or

(iii) discussing, or raising, a matter about the child or young person with a service provider or relevant authority, and

(b) such other functions as are specified by this Act or any other enactment as being functions of a named person in relation to a child or young person.

(5A) The function in subsection (5)(a) does not apply in relation to a matter arising at a time when the child or young person is, as a member of any of the reserve forces, subject to service law.

(6) The named person functions are exercised on behalf of the service provider concerned.
(7) Responsibility for the exercise of the named person functions lies with the service provider rather than the named person.

20  Named person service in relation to pre-school child

(1) A health board is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to each pre-school child residing in its area.

(2) A “pre-school child” is a child who—
   (a) has not commenced attendance at a primary school, and
   (b) if the child is of school age, has not commenced attendance at a primary school because the relevant local authority has consented to the child’s commencement at primary school being delayed.

(3) For the purposes of this section—
   (a) the reference to school age is to be construed by reference to the school commencement dates fixed by the relevant local authority,
   (b) references to attendance at a primary school do not include attendance at a nursery class in such a school,
   (c) references to the relevant local authority are to the local authority for the area in which the child concerned resides.

21  Named person service in relation to children not falling within section 20

(1) A local authority is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to each child residing in its area, other than—
   (a) a pre-school child, or
   (b) a child falling within subsection (2) or (3).

(2) A child falls within this subsection if the child is—
   (a) a pupil at a public school which is managed by a different local authority,
   (b) a pupil at—
      (i) a grant-aided school, or
      (ii) an independent school,
   (c) kept in secure accommodation, or
   (d) in legal custody or subject to temporary release from such custody.

(2A) For the purposes of subsection (2)(d), a child is in legal custody—
   (a) while confined in or being taken to or from any penal institution in which the child may be lawfully confined,
   (b) while working, or for any other reason, outside the penal institution in the custody or under the control of an officer of the institution, a constable or a police custody and security officer,
   (c) while being taken to any place to which the child is required or authorised to be taken by virtue of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989, or
   (d) while kept in custody in pursuance of such a requirement or authorisation.
(3) A child falls within this subsection if the child is a member of any of the regular forces.

(4) During any period when a child falls within subsection (2)(a), the local authority which manages the school concerned is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to the child.

(5) During any period when a child falls within subsection (2)(b) or (c), the directing authority of the establishment concerned is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to the child.

(6) During any period when a child falls within subsection (2)(d), the Scottish Ministers are to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to the child.

22 Continuation of named person service in relation to certain young people

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (5) is to make arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to each young person.

(2) A “young person” is a person who—

(a) attained the age of 18 years while a pupil at a school, and

(b) has since attaining that age, remained a pupil at that or another school.

(5) The person referred to in subsection (1) is—

(a) where the young person is a pupil at a school managed by a local authority, that authority,

(b) where the young person is a pupil at a grant-aided school or an independent school, the directing authority of the establishment concerned.

23 Communication in relation to movement of children and young people

(1) This section applies where a person ceases to be the service provider in relation to a child or young person.

(2) The person (“the outgoing service provider”) must as soon as is reasonably practicable—

(a) inform any other person which has become or which it considers may be the service provider in relation to the child or young person (“the incoming service provider”) that the outgoing service provider has ceased to be the service provider in relation to the child or young person, and

(b) provide the incoming service provider with—

(i) the name and address of the child or young person and each parent of the child or young person (so far as the outgoing service provider has that information), and

(ii) all information which the outgoing service provider holds which falls within subsection (3).

(3) Information falls within this subsection if the outgoing service provider considers that—

(a) it is likely to be relevant to—

(i) the exercise by the incoming service provider of any functions of a service provider under this Part, or
(ii) the future exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person,

(b) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and

(c) its provision would not prejudice the conduct of a criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

(4) In considering for the purpose of subsection (3)(b) whether information ought to be provided, the outgoing service provider is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child or young person.

(5) In having regard to the views of a child under subsection (4), an outgoing service provider is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(6) The outgoing service provider may decide for the purpose of subsection (3)(b) that information ought to be provided only if the likely benefit to the wellbeing of the child or young person arising in consequence of doing so outweighs any likely adverse effect on that wellbeing arising from doing so.

(7) Other than in relation to a duty of confidentiality, this section does not permit or require the provision of information in breach of a prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information arising by virtue of an enactment or rule of law.

24 Duty to communicate information about role of named persons

(1) Each service provider must publish (in such manner as it considers appropriate) information about—

(aa) the operation of the named person service provided in pursuance of the arrangements made by it, including in particular—

(i) how the named person functions are, generally, exercised, and

(ii) the arrangements, generally, for contacting named persons,

(d) how the service provider generally exercises its functions under this Part, and

(e) such other matters relating to this Part as it considers appropriate.

(2) The service provider in relation to a child or young person must provide the child or young person and the parents of the child or young person with information about the arrangements for contacting the named person for the child or young person—

(a) as soon as reasonably practicable after it becomes the service provider in relation to the child or young person, and

(b) as soon as reasonably practicable after there is any change in those arrangements.

25 Duty to help named person

(1) Subsection (2) applies where it appears to the service provider in relation to a child or young person that another service provider or a relevant authority could, by doing a certain thing, help in the exercise of any of the named person functions for a child or young person.

(2) The other service provider or relevant authority must comply with any request for such help which is made of it, unless subsection (3) applies.

(3) This subsection applies where the other service provider or relevant authority considers that the provision of the help would—
(a) be incompatible with any duty of the other service provider or relevant authority, or
(b) unduly prejudice the exercise of any function of the other service provider or relevant authority.

26 Information sharing

(1) A service provider or relevant authority must provide to the service provider in relation to a child or young person any information which the person holds which falls within subsection (2).

(2) Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that—

(a) it is likely to be relevant to the exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person,
(b) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and
(c) its provision to the service provider in relation to the child or young person would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

(3) The service provider in relation to a child or young person must provide to a service provider or relevant authority any information which the person holds which falls within subsection (4).

(4) Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that—

(a) it is likely to be relevant to the exercise of any function of the service provider or relevant authority which affects or may affect the wellbeing of the child or young person,
(b) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and
(c) its provision to the service provider or relevant authority would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

(4A) In considering for the purpose of subsection (2)(b) or (4)(b) whether information ought to be provided, the information holder is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child or young person.

(4B) In having regard to the views of a child under subsection (4A), an information holder is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(4C) The information holder may decide for the purpose of subsection (2)(b) or (4)(b) that information ought to be provided only if the likely benefit to the wellbeing of the child or young person arising in consequence of doing so outweighs any likely adverse effect on that wellbeing arising from doing so.

(5) The service provider in relation to a child or young person may provide to a service provider or relevant authority any information which the person holds which falls within subsection (6).

(6) Information falls within this subsection if the information holder considers that its provision to the service provider or relevant authority is necessary or expedient for the purposes of the exercise of any of the named person functions.

(7) References in this section to a service provider or a relevant authority include any person exercising a function on behalf of a service provider or relevant authority.
(8) Other than in relation to a duty of confidentiality, this section does not permit or require the provision of information in breach of a prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information arising by virtue of an enactment or rule of law.

27 Disclosure of information

(2) This section applies—

(a) where by virtue of this Part, a person provides information in breach of a duty of confidentiality, and

(b) in providing the information, the person informs the recipient of the breach of duty.

(3) The recipient is not to provide the information to any other person, unless the provision of information is permitted or required by virtue of any enactment (including this Part) or rule of law.

28 Guidance in relation to named person service

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (1A) must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by this Part.

(1A) Those persons are—

(a) a local authority,

(b) a health board,

(c) a directing authority,

(d) a relevant authority.

(4) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) any person to which it relates, and

(b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

29 Directions in relation to named person service

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by this Part.

(2) Those persons are—

(a) a local authority,

(b) a health board,

(c) a directing authority,

(d) a relevant authority.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) any person to which it relates, and

(b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.
29A Complaints in relation to Part 4
(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about the making, consideration and determination of complaints concerning the exercise of functions conferred by or under this Part.
(2) The provision which may be made under subsection (1) includes provision about—
(a) matters which may, or may not, be the subject of a complaint,
(b) who may make a complaint,
(c) how a complaint may be made,
(d) time limits for making complaints,
(e) steps which require to be taken before a complaint may be made,
(f) who is to consider a complaint,
(g) the procedure for the consideration of a complaint,
(h) the obtaining of information for the purpose of considering a complaint,
(i) the keeping of records in relation to complaints or their consideration,
(j) the making of findings, and reporting, following the consideration of a complaint.
(3) An order under subsection (1) may modify any enactment.

29B Relevant authorities
(1) The persons listed, or within a description listed, in schedule 2, are “relevant authorities” for the purposes of this Part (subject to subsection (3)).
(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 2 by—
(a) adding a person or description of persons,
(b) removing an entry listed in it, or
(c) varying an entry listed in it.
(3) The following persons are not relevant authorities for the purposes of section 29—
(a) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland,
(b) a body which is a “post-16 education body” for the purposes of the Further and Higher Education (Scotland) Act 2005.
(4) An order under subsection (2) which adds a person, or a description of persons, to schedule 2, may modify this section so as to provide that the person is not a relevant authority, or the persons within the description are not relevant authorities, for the purposes of section 29.

30 Interpretation of Part 4
In this Part—
“constable” has the same meaning as in section 13(b) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989,
“directing authority” means—
(a) when used generally, each of the following—
(i) the managers of each grant-aided school,
(ii) the proprietor of each independent school, and
(iii) the local authority or other person who manages each residential establishment which comprises secure accommodation,

(b) when used in relation to a particular establishment—

(i) in relation to a grant-aided school, the managers of the school,
(ii) in relation to an independent school, the proprietor of the school,
(iii) in relation to secure accommodation, the local authority or other person who manages the residential establishment,

“named person” means the identified individual made available in pursuance of a named person service,

“named person functions” means the functions to be exercised by way of the named person service,

“parent” has the same meaning as in the 1980 Act,

“penal institution” means any—

(a) prison (other than a naval, military or air force prison),
(b) remand centre (within the meaning of section 19(1)(a) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989), or
(c) young offenders institution (within the meaning of section 19(1)(b) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989),

“pre-school child” has the meaning given by section 20(2),

“regular forces” has the meaning given by section 374 of the Armed Forces Act 2006,

“reserve forces” has the meaning given by section 374 of the Armed Forces Act 2006,

“secure accommodation” means accommodation provided in a residential establishment, approved in accordance with regulations made under section 78(2) of the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, for the purpose of restricting the liberty of children,

“service provider” means—

(a) when used generally, each of the following—

(i) each health board,
(ii) each local authority,
(iii) each directing authority, and
(iv) the Scottish Ministers,

(b) when used in relation to a child or young person, the person which has the function of making arrangements for the provision of a named person service in relation to the child or young person,

“subject to service law” has the meaning given by section 374 of the Armed Forces Act 2006,
Part 5

Child’s plan

(1) For the purposes of this Part, a child requires a child’s plan if the responsible authority in relation to a child considers that—

(a) the child has a wellbeing need, and

(b) subsection (3) applies in relation to that need.

(2) A child has a wellbeing need if the child’s wellbeing is being, or is at risk of being, adversely affected by any matter.

(3) This subsection applies in relation to a wellbeing need if—

(a) the need is not capable of being met, or met fully, by the taking of action other than a targeted intervention in relation to the child, and

(b) the need, or the remainder of the need, is capable of being met, or met to some extent, by one or more targeted interventions in relation to the child.

(4) A “targeted intervention” is a service which—

(a) is provided by a relevant authority in pursuance of any of its functions, and

(b) is directed at meeting the needs of children whose needs are not capable of being met, or met fully, by the services which are provided generally to children by the authority.

(4A) The references in subsection (4) to services being provided by a relevant authority include references to services provided by a third person under arrangements made by the relevant authority.

(5) In deciding whether a child requires a child’s plan, the responsible authority—

(a) is, where the child’s named person is not an employee of the responsible authority, to consult the child’s named person, and

(b) is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of—

(i) the child,

(ii) the child’s parents,

(iii) such persons, or the persons within such description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify, and

(iv) such other persons as the responsible authority considers appropriate.

(6) In having regard to the views of the child, the responsible authority is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(7) Subsection (1) does not apply in relation to—

(a) a child who already has a child’s plan,
(b) a child who is a member of any of the regular forces.

(8) In subsection (7)(b), “regular forces” has the meaning given by section 374 of the Armed Forces Act 2006.

32 Content of a child’s plan

(1) A child’s plan is to contain a statement of—

(a) the child’s wellbeing need,

(b) the targeted intervention which requires to be provided, or the targeted interventions which require to be provided, in relation to the child, and

(c) in relation to each such targeted intervention—

(i) the relevant authority which is to provide the targeted intervention,

(ii) the manner in which the targeted intervention is to be provided, and

(iii) the outcome in relation to the child’s wellbeing need which the targeted intervention is intended to achieve.

(1A) A child’s plan may contain a targeted intervention only where the relevant authority which would provide it, or under whose arrangements it would be provided, agrees.

(1B) If that relevant authority is not to prepare the plan, it must provide to the person who is to prepare the plan a statement of its reasons for not agreeing.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision as to—

(a) other information which is, or is not, to be contained in child’s plans,

(b) the form of child’s plans.

33 Preparation of a child’s plan

(1) This section applies where a child requires a child’s plan.

(2) Subject to subsections (3) and (5A), the responsible authority is to prepare such a plan as soon as is reasonably practicable.

(3) Where the responsible authority and a relevant authority agree that it would be more appropriate for the relevant authority to prepare a child’s plan, the relevant authority is to prepare the plan as soon as is reasonably practicable.

(5) A relevant authority which declines to give its agreement as mentioned in subsection (3) must provide a statement of its reasons.

(5A) Subsection (2) does not apply where, by virtue of section 32(1A), there are no targeted interventions which may be contained in a child’s plan.

(6) In preparing a child’s plan, an authority—

(a) is, where the child’s named person is not an employee of the authority, to consult the child’s named person, and

(b) is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of—

(i) the child,

(ii) the child’s parents,
(iii) such persons, or the persons within such description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify, and

(iv) such other persons as the authority considers appropriate.

(7) In having regard to the views of the child, the authority preparing the child’s plan is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(8) The Scottish Ministers may by order—

(a) make further provision as to the preparation of child’s plans,

(b) make provision requiring or permitting the authority which prepared a child’s plan to provide a copy of it to a particular person or to the persons within a particular description.

(9) An order under subsection (8)(b) may include provision to the effect that a copy of a child’s plan is to be provided to a person, or to persons within a particular description, only—

(a) in circumstances described in the order, or

(b) where the authority considers it appropriate.

34 Responsible authority: general

(1) For the purposes of this Part, the responsible authority in relation to a child is—

(a) where the child is a pre-school child, the health board for the area in which the child resides,

(b) where the child is not a pre-school child, the local authority for the area in which the child resides.

(2) Subsection (1) is subject to section 35.

(3) A “pre-school child” is a child who—

(a) has not commenced attendance at a primary school, and

(b) if the child is of school age, has not commenced attendance at a primary school because the relevant local authority has consented to the child’s commencement at primary school being delayed.

(4) For the purposes of this section—

(a) the reference to school age is to be construed by reference to the school commencement dates fixed by the relevant local authority,

(b) the references to attendance at a primary school do not include attendance at a nursery class in such a school, and

(c) the references to the relevant local authority are to the local authority for the area in which the child concerned resides.

35 Responsible authority: special cases

(1) Where in pursuance of a decision of a local authority or health board a pre-school child resides in the area of a health board which is different to that in which the child would otherwise reside, the health board for the area in which the child would otherwise reside is the responsible authority in relation to the child.
(2) Where the child is a pupil at a public school which is managed by a local authority other than the one for the area in which the child resides, that other authority is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

(3) Where the child is a pupil at a grant-aided school or an independent school, the directing authority of that school is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

(4) Subsection (3) does not apply where the child is such a pupil by virtue of a placement by a local authority.

(4A) Where—
   (a) the child falls within subsection (4B), and
   (b) in consequence the child resides in the area of a local authority which is different to that in which the child would otherwise reside,

the local authority for the area in which the child would otherwise reside is the responsible authority in relation to the child.

(4B) A child falls within this subsection if—
   (a) in pursuance of the duties of a local authority under the 1980 Act the child—
      (i) is a pupil at a grant-aided school or an independent school, and
      (ii) resides in accommodation provided for the purpose of attending that school by its managers,
   (b) by virtue of Chapter 1 of Part 2 of the 1995 Act, the child is placed in a residential establishment (within the meaning of section 93 of that Act),
   (c) by virtue of an order under the Children’s Hearing (Scotland) Act 2011, the child resides at a residential establishment (within the meaning of section 202 of that Act), or
   (d) in pursuance of an order under the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, the child is detained in residential accommodation provided under Part 2 of the 1995 Act.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify this section so as to make further or different provision as to circumstances in which section 34(1) does not apply in relation to a child.

36 Delivery of a child’s plan

(1) A relevant authority is so far as reasonably practicable—
   (a) to provide any targeted intervention contained in a child’s plan which is to be provided by it in accordance with the plan,
   (b) to secure that any targeted intervention contained in a child’s plan which is to be provided by a third person under arrangements made by the authority is provided in accordance with the plan.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to the extent that the authority considers that to comply with it would adversely affect the wellbeing of the child.

37 Child’s plan: management

(1) The managing authority of a child’s plan is to keep under review whether—
(a) the wellbeing need of the child stated in the plan is still accurate,

(b) in relation to each targeted intervention, it or the manner of its provision, is still appropriate,

(c) the outcome of the plan has been achieved, and

(d) the management of the plan should transfer to another relevant authority.

(2) In reviewing a child’s plan, the managing authority—

(a) is to consult—

(i) each other relevant authority to which subsection (2A) applies,

(ii) where it is neither the managing authority nor consulted under subparagraph (i), the responsible authority in relation to the child, and

(iii) where the child’s named person is not an employee of the managing authority, the child’s named person, and

(b) is so far as reasonably practicable to ascertain and have regard to the views of—

(i) the child,

(ii) the child’s parents,

(iii) such persons, or the persons within such description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify, and

(iv) such other persons as the managing authority considers appropriate.

(2A) This subsection applies to a relevant authority if—

(a) it is providing a targeted intervention contained in the plan, or

(b) a targeted intervention contained in the plan is being provided by a third person under arrangements made by the authority.

(3) In having regard to the views of the child as mentioned in subsection (2)(b)(i), the managing authority is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(4) The managing authority of a child’s plan may in consequence of the review—

(a) amend the plan so as to revise—

(i) the wellbeing need of the child,

(ii) a targeted intervention,

(iii) the manner in which a targeted intervention requires to be provided, or

(iv) the outcome which the plan is intended to achieve,

(b) transfer the management of the plan to another relevant authority, or

(c) end the plan.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about the management of child’s plans, including provision about—

(a) when and how a child’s plan is to be reviewed in accordance with subsection (1),

(b) who is to be the managing authority of a child’s plan,

(c) when and to whom management of a child’s plan is to or may transfer under subsection (4)(b),
(d) when and how a new targeted intervention may be included in a child’s plan,
(e) the keeping, disclosure and destruction of child’s plans.

(6) Subject to provision made under subsection (5)(b), the managing authority of a child’s plan is—

(a) the relevant authority which prepared it, or

(b) where management of the child’s plan has been transferred under subsection (4)(b), the relevant authority to which the management of the child’s plan was so transferred (or where there has been more than one such transfer, last so transferred).

38 Assistance in relation to child’s plan

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (1A) must comply with any reasonable request made of the person to provide a person exercising functions under this Part with information, advice or assistance for that purpose.

(1A) Those persons are—

(a) a relevant authority,

(b) a listed authority.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply where the person to whom the request is made considers that provision of the information, advice or assistance concerned would—

(a) be incompatible with any duty of the person, or

(b) unduly prejudice the exercise of any function of the person.

(3) Other than in relation to a duty of confidentiality, subsection (1) does not permit or require the provision of information in breach of a prohibition or restriction on the disclosure of information arising by virtue of an enactment or rule of law.

(4) Subsection (5) applies—

(a) where, by virtue of subsection (1), a person provides information in breach of a duty of confidentiality, and

(b) in providing the information, the person informs the recipient of the breach of duty.

(5) The recipient is not to provide the information to any other person unless the provision of information is permitted or required by virtue of any enactment (including this Part) or rule of law.

39 Guidance on child’s plans

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (1A) must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by or under this Part (other than the function of complying with section 36).

(1A) Those persons are—

(a) a relevant authority,

(b) a listed authority.

(4) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill

Part 5—Child’s plan

(a) any person to which it relates, and
(b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

40 Directions in relation to child’s plans

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (2) must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about the exercise of functions conferred by or under this Part (other than the function of complying with section 36).

(2) Those persons are—

   (aa) a relevant authority,
   (ab) a listed authority.

(5) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

   (a) any person to which it relates, and
   (b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

40A Complaints in relation to Part 5

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about the making, consideration and determination of complaints concerning the exercise of functions conferred by or under this Part.

(2) The provision which may be made under subsection (1) includes provision about—

   (a) matters which may, or may not, be the subject of a complaint,
   (b) who may make a complaint,
   (c) how a complaint may be made,
   (d) time limits for making complaints,
   (e) steps which require to be taken before a complaint may be made,
   (f) who is to consider a complaint,
   (g) the procedure for the consideration of a complaint,
   (h) the obtaining of information for the purpose of considering a complaint,
   (i) the keeping of records in relation to complaints or their consideration,
   (j) the making of findings, and reporting, following the consideration of a complaint.

(3) An order under subsection (1) may modify any enactment.

40B Listed authorities

(1) The persons listed, or within a description listed, in schedule 2A, are “listed authorities” for the purposes of this Part (subject to subsections (3) and (4)).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 2A by—

   (a) adding a person or description of persons,
   (b) removing an entry listed in it, or
   (c) varying an entry listed in it.
(3) The Scottish Ministers are not a listed authority for the purposes of sections 39 and 40.

(4) The following persons are not listed authorities for the purposes of section 40—
   (a) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland,
   (b) a body which is a “post-16 education body” for the purposes of the Further and Higher Education (Scotland) Act 2005.

(5) An order under subsection (2) which adds a person, or a description of persons, to schedule 2A, may modify this section so as to provide that the person is not a listed authority, or the persons within the description are not listed authorities, for the purposes of section 40.

41 Interpretation of Part 5

In this Part—

“child’s named person” means the individual who is the child’s named person by virtue of Part 4,

“directing authority” means—

(a) when used generally—
   (i) the managers of each grant-aided school,
   (ii) the proprietor of each independent school,

(b) when used in relation to a particular establishment—
   (i) in relation to a grant-aided school, the managers of the school,
   (ii) in relation to an independent school, the proprietor of the school,

“parent” has the same meaning as in the 1980 Act,

“relevant authority” means any—

(a) health board,

(b) local authority, or

(c) directing authority,

“service” includes support,

“targeted intervention” has the meaning given by section 31(4).

PART 6

EARLY LEARNING AND CHILDCARE

42 Early learning and childcare

In this Part, “early learning and childcare” means a service, consisting of education and care, of a kind which is suitable in the ordinary case for children who are under school age, regard being had to the importance of interactions and other experiences which support learning and development in a caring and nurturing setting.
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Part 6—Early learning and childcare

43 Duty to secure provision of early learning and childcare

(1) An education authority must, in pursuance of its duty under section 1(1) of the 1980 Act, secure that the mandatory amount of early learning and childcare is made available for each eligible pre-school child belonging to its area.

(2) An “eligible pre-school child” is a child who—

   (a) is under school age,

   (b) has not commenced attendance at a primary school (other than at a nursery class in such a school), and

   (c) either—

   (i) falls within subsection (3), or

   (ii) is within such age range, or is of such other description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) Subject to subsection (3A), a child falls within this subsection if the child is aged 2 or over and is or has been at any time since the child’s second birthday—

   (a) looked after by the authority concerned or by any other local authority, or

   (b) the subject of a kinship care order or a child falling within section 64(3)(f).

(3A) The Scottish Ministers may by order provide that a child aged 4 or over does not (or is no longer to) fall within subsection (3) in such circumstances as may be specified in the order.

(4) An order made under subsection (2)(c)(ii) may provide that a child is to be an eligible pre-school child only if the education authority concerned is satisfied as to any matter relating to the child which is specified in the order.

(5) In subsection (3)(b), “kinship care order” has the meaning given by section 65(1).

44 Mandatory amount of early learning and childcare

(1) The “mandatory amount”, for the purposes of section 43(1), means—

   (a) 600 hours in each year for which a child is an eligible pre-school child, and

   (b) a pro rata amount for each part of a year for which a child is an eligible pre-school child.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (1) so as to vary the amount of early learning and childcare which is to be made available in pursuance of section 43(1).

(3) Such an order may, without prejudice to section 77(1)(a), make different provision in relation to different types of eligible pre-school children.

45 Looked after 2 year olds: alternative arrangements to meet wellbeing needs

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

   (a) an authority’s duty under section 43(1) applies in relation to a child only by virtue of the child falling within section 43(3)(a),

   (b) the authority, after assessing the child’s needs, considers that making alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care would better safeguard or promote the child’s wellbeing.
(2) Where this subsection applies, the authority—
   (a) need not comply with its duty under section 43(1) in relation to the child, but
   (b) must make such alternative arrangements in relation to the child’s education and care as it considers appropriate for the purposes of safeguarding or promoting the child’s wellbeing.

(3) Subsection (2) does not apply in relation to a child who is not being looked after by the authority if a parent of the child objects to the authority making alternative arrangements.

(4) The authority may, at any time, review any alternative arrangements it makes in relation to a child in pursuance of subsection (2)(b) (and must do so on becoming aware of any significant change in the child’s circumstances) and may, following such a review, alter those arrangements.

(5) The authority must seek to ensure that a record of—
   (a) the outcome of any assessment of a child’s needs that it undertakes in pursuance of subsection (1)(b), and
   (b) any alternative arrangements that it makes in relation to the child’s education and care in pursuance of subsection (2)(b), is included in any child’s plan which is prepared for the child under Part 5.

46 Duty to consult and plan on delivery of early learning and childcare

(1) An education authority must, at least once every 2 years—
   (a) consult such persons as appear to it to be representative of parents of children under school age in its area about how it should make early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part, and
   (b) after having had regard to views expressed, prepare and publish a plan for how it intends to make early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (1) so as to vary the regularity within which an education authority must consult and plan in pursuance of that subsection.

47 Method of delivery of early learning and childcare

(1) An education authority must ensure that it makes early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part by way of sessions—
   (a) which are provided during at least 38 weeks of every calendar year, and
   (b) which are each of more than 2.5 hours but less than 8 hours in duration.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may, by order, modify subsection (1) so as to vary the method of delivering early learning and childcare which it describes.

48 Flexibility in way in which early learning and childcare is made available

In exercising functions under sections 46 and 47, an education authority must have regard to the desirability of ensuring that the method by which it makes early learning and childcare available in pursuance of this Part is flexible enough to allow parents an appropriate degree of choice when deciding how to access the service.
Interpretation of Part 6
In this Part—
“early learning and childcare” has the meaning given by section 42,
“eligible pre-school child” has the meaning given by section 43(2),
“parent” has the same meaning as in the 1980 Act.

PART 6A
POWER TO PROVIDE SCHOOL EDUCATION FOR PRE-SCHOOL CHILDREN

49A Duty to consult and plan in relation to power to provide school education for pre-school children
In section 1 of the 1980 Act, after subsection (2A) insert—
“(2B) An education authority must, at least once every two years—
(a) consult such persons as appear to be representative of parents of pre-school children within their area about whether and if so how they should provide school education for such children under subsection (1C) above; and
(b) after having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish their plans in relation to the provision of such education for such children under that subsection.

(2C) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (2B) above so as to vary the regularity within which an education authority must consult and plan in pursuance of that subsection.

(2D) An order made under subsection (2C) above is subject to the negative procedure.”.

PART 6B
DAY CARE AND OUT OF SCHOOL CARE

49B Duty to consult and plan in relation to day care and out of school care
(1) Section 27 of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.
(2) After subsection (1) insert—
“(1A) A local authority must, at least once every two years—
(a) consult such persons as appear to be representative of parents of children in need within their area who satisfy the conditions mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (1) above about how they should provide day care for such children in pursuance of that subsection; and
(b) after having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish their plans for how they intend to provide day care for such children in pursuance of that subsection.

(1B) A local authority must, at least once every two years—
(a) consult such persons as appear to be representative of parents of children within their area who satisfy the conditions mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (1) above but are not in need about whether and if so how they should provide day care for such children under that subsection; and

(b) after having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish their plans in relation to the provision of day care for such children under that subsection.”.

(3) After subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) A local authority must, at least once every two years—

(a) consult such persons as appear to be representative of parents of children in need within their area who are in attendance at a school about how they should provide appropriate care for such children in pursuance of subsection (3) above; and

(b) after having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish their plans for how they intend to provide appropriate care for such children in pursuance of that subsection.

(3B) A local authority must, at least once every two years—

(a) consult such persons as appear to be representative of parents of children within their area who are in attendance at a school but are not in need about whether and if so how they should provide appropriate care for such children under subsection (3) above; and

(b) after having had regard to the views expressed, prepare and publish plans in relation to the provision of appropriate care for such children in their area under that subsection.

(3C) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify subsection (1A), (1B), (3A) or (3B) above so as to vary the regularity within which a local authority must consult and plan in pursuance of that subsection.

(3D) An order made under subsection (3C) above is subject to the negative procedure.”.

50 Corporate parents

(1) The persons listed, or within a description listed, in schedule 3 are “corporate parents” for the purposes of this Part (subject to subsections (3) and (3A)).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 3 by—

(a) adding a person or description of persons,

(b) removing an entry listed in it, or

(c) varying an entry listed in it.

(3) The Scottish Ministers are not corporate parents for the purposes of sections 55 to 58.

(3A) The following persons are not corporate parents for the purposes of section 58—

(a) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland,
(b) a body which is a “post-16 education body” for the purposes of the Further and Higher Education (Scotland) Act 2005.

(3B) An order under subsection (2) which adds a person, or a description of persons, to schedule 3, may modify this section so as to provide that the person is not a corporate parent, or the persons within the description are not corporate parents, for the purposes of section 58.

(4) In this Part, references to the “corporate parenting responsibilities” of a corporate parent are to the duties conferred on that corporate parent by section 52(1).

51 Application of Part: children and young people

10 (1) This Part applies to—

(a) every child who is looked after by a local authority, and

(b) every young person who—

(i) is under the age of 26, and

(ii) was (on the person’s 16th birthday or at any subsequent time) but is no longer looked after by a local authority.

15 (2) This Part also applies to a young person who—

(a) is at least the age of 16 but under the age of 26, and

(b) is not of the description in subsection (1)(b)(ii) but is of such other description of person formerly but no longer looked after by a local authority as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order.

52 Corporate parenting responsibilities

(1) It is the duty of every corporate parent, in so far as consistent with the proper exercise of its other functions—

(a) to be alert to matters which, or which might, adversely affect the wellbeing of children and young people to whom this Part applies,

(b) to assess the needs of those children and young people for services and support it provides,

(c) to promote the interests of those children and young people,

(d) to seek to provide those children and young people with opportunities to participate in activities designed to promote their wellbeing,

(e) to take such action as it considers appropriate to help those children and young people—

(i) to access opportunities it provides in pursuance of paragraph (d), and

(ii) to make use of services, and access support, which it provides, and

(f) to take such other action as it considers appropriate for the purposes of improving the way in which it exercises its functions in relation to those children and young people.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order—

(a) modify subsection (1) so as to confer, remove or vary a duty on corporate parents,
(b) provide that subsection (1) is to be read, in relation to a particular corporate parent or corporate parents of a particular description, with a modification conferring, removing or varying a duty.

53 Planning by corporate parents

(1) A corporate parent must—

(a) prepare a plan for how it proposes to exercise its corporate parenting responsibilities, and

(b) keep its plan under review.

(2) Before preparing or revising a plan, a corporate parent must consult such other corporate parents, and such other persons, as it considers appropriate.

(3) A corporate parent must publish its plan, and any revised plan, in such manner as it considers appropriate (and, in particular, plans may be published together with, or as part of, any other plan or document).

54 Collaborative working among corporate parents

(1) Corporate parents must, in so far as reasonably practicable, collaborate with each other when exercising their corporate parenting responsibilities or any other functions under this Part where they consider that doing so would safeguard or promote the wellbeing of children or young people to whom this Part applies.

(2) Such collaboration may include—

(a) sharing information,

(b) providing advice or assistance,

(c) co-ordinating activities (and seeking to prevent unnecessary duplication),

(d) sharing responsibility for action,

(e) funding activities jointly,

(f) exercising functions under this Part jointly (for example, by publishing a joint plan or joint report).

55 Reports by corporate parents

(1) A corporate parent must report on how it has exercised—

(a) its corporate parenting responsibilities,

(b) its planning and collaborating functions in pursuance of sections 53 and 54, and

(c) its other functions under this Part.

(2) Reports may, in particular, include information about—

(a) standards of performance,

(b) the outcomes achieved in pursuance of this Part.

(3) Reports are to be published in such manner as the corporate parent considers appropriate (and, in particular, reports may be published together with, or as part of, any other report or document).
Duty to provide information to Scottish Ministers

(1) A corporate parent must provide the Scottish Ministers with such information as they may reasonably require about how it is—
   (a) exercising its corporate parenting responsibilities,
   (b) planning, collaborating or reporting in pursuance of sections 53, 54 or 55, or
   (c) otherwise exercising functions under this Part.

(2) Information which is required may, in particular, include information about—
   (a) standards of performance,
   (b) the outcomes achieved in pursuance of this Part.

Guidance on corporate parenting

(1) A corporate parent must have regard to any guidance about corporate parenting issued by the Scottish Ministers.

(2) Guidance may, in particular, include advice or information about—
   (a) how corporate parents should—
      (i) exercise their corporate parenting responsibilities,
      (ii) promote awareness of their corporate parenting responsibilities,
      (iii) plan, collaborate or report in pursuance of sections 53, 54 or 55, or
      (iv) otherwise exercise functions under this Part,
   (b) outcomes which corporate parents should seek to achieve in exercising functions under this Part.

(5) Before issuing or revising guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) any corporate parent to which it relates, and
   (b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

Directions to corporate parents

(1) A corporate parent must comply with any direction issued by the Scottish Ministers about—
   (a) its corporate parenting responsibilities,
   (b) its planning, collaborating or reporting functions under sections 53, 54 or 55, or
   (c) its other functions under this Part.

(4) Before issuing, revising or revoking a direction, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) any corporate parent to which it relates, and
   (b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

Reports by Scottish Ministers

(1) The Scottish Ministers must, as soon as practicable after the end of each 3 year period, lay before the Scottish Parliament a report on how they have exercised their corporate parenting responsibilities during that period.
(2) In subsection (1), “3 year period” means—

(a) the period of 3 years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, and

(b) each subsequent period of 3 years.

PART 8
AFTERCARE

PROVISION OF AFTERCARE TO YOUNG PEOPLE

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 29—

(ya) in subsection (1)—

(i) for “over school age” substitute “who is at least sixteen”,

(ii) for the words from first “at” substitute “either—

(a) was (on his sixteenth birthday or at any subsequent time) but is no longer looked after by a local authority; or

(b) is of such other description of person formerly but no longer looked after by a local authority as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order.”,

(za) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) An order made under subsection (1)(b) above is subject to the affirmative procedure.”,

(a) in subsection (2)—

(i) for “twenty-one” substitute “twenty-six”,

(ii) the words from third “and” to the end of the subsection are repealed,

(b) in subsection (3), for “or (2) above” substitute “above or (5A) or (5B) below”,

(ba) in subsection (4), for “over school” substitute “who is at least sixteen years of”,

(c) after subsection (5) insert—

“(5A) After carrying out an assessment under subsection (5) above in pursuance of an application made by a person under subsection (2) above, the local authority—

(a) must, if satisfied that the person has any eligible needs which cannot be met other than by taking action under this subsection, provide the person with such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers necessary for the purposes of meeting those needs, and

(b) may otherwise provide such advice, guidance and assistance as it considers appropriate having regard to the person’s welfare,

(5B) A local authority may (but is not required to) continue to provide advice, guidance and assistance to a person in pursuance of subsection (5A) after the person reaches the age of twenty-six.”,

(d) in subsection (6), for “(5)” substitute “(5B)”,

(e) after subsection (7) insert—
“(8) For the purposes of subsection (5A)(a) above, a person has “eligible needs” if the person needs care, attention or support of such type as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(9) An order made under subsection (8) is subject to the affirmative procedure.

(10) If a local authority becomes aware that a person who is being provided with advice, guidance or assistance by them under this section has died, the local authority must as soon as reasonably practicable notify—

(a) the Scottish Ministers, and

(b) Social Care and Social Work Improvement Scotland.”.

(3) In section 30—

(a) in subsection (2)—

(zii) in the opening words, for “Subject to subsection (3) below, a” substitute “A”,

(i) in paragraph (a)—

(A) for “over school” substitute “at least sixteen years of”,

(B) for “twenty-one” substitute “twenty-six”,

(ii) for paragraph (b) substitute—

“(b) he either—

(i) was (on his sixteenth birthday or at any subsequent time) but is no longer looked after by a local authority; or

(ii) is of such other description of person formerly but no longer looked after by a local authority as the Scottish Ministers may specify by order.

(2A) An order made under subsection (2)(b)(ii) above is subject to the affirmative procedure.”,

(b) omit subsections (3) and (4).

---

PART 8A
CONTINUING CARE

60A Continuing care: looked after children

(1) After section 26 of the 1995 Act insert—

“26A Provision of continuing care: looked after children

(1) This section applies where an eligible person ceases to be looked after by a local authority.

(2) An “eligible person” is a person who—

(a) is at least sixteen years of age, and

(b) is not yet such higher age as may be specified.

(3) Subject to subsection (5) below, the local authority must provide the person with continuing care.
(4) “Continuing care” means the same accommodation and other assistance as was being provided for the person by the authority, in pursuance of this Chapter of this Part, immediately before the person ceased to be looked after.

(5) The duty to provide continuing care does not apply if—

(a) the accommodation the person was in immediately before ceasing to be looked after was secure accommodation,

(b) the accommodation the person was in immediately before ceasing to be looked after was a care placement and the carer has indicated to the authority that the carer is unable or unwilling to continue to provide the placement, or

(c) the local authority considers that providing the care would significantly adversely affect the welfare of the person.

(6) A local authority’s duty to provide continuing care lasts, subject to subsection (7) below, until the expiry of such period as may be specified.

(7) The duty to provide continuing care ceases if—

(a) the person leaves the accommodation of the person’s own volition,

(b) the accommodation ceases to be available, or

(c) the local authority considers that continuing to provide the care would significantly adversely affect the welfare of the person.

(8) For the purposes of subsection (7)(b) above, the situations in which accommodation ceases to be available include—

(a) in the case of a care placement, where the carer indicates to the authority that the carer is unable or unwilling to continue to provide the placement,

(b) in the case of a residential establishment provided by the local authority, where the authority closes the establishment,

(c) in the case of a residential establishment provided under arrangements made by the local authority, where the arrangements come to an end.

(9) The Scottish Ministers may by order—

(a) make provision about when or how a local authority is to consider whether subsection (5)(c) or (7)(c) above is the case,

(b) modify subsection (5) above so as to add, remove or vary a situation in which the duty to provide continuing care does not apply,

(c) modify subsection (7) or (8) above so as to add, remove or vary a situation in which the duty to provide continuing care ceases.

(10) If a local authority becomes aware that a person who is being provided with continuing care has died, the local authority must as soon as reasonably practicable notify—

(a) the Scottish Ministers, and

(b) Social Care and Social Work Improvement Scotland.

(11) An order under this section—

(a) may make different provision for different purposes,

(b) is subject to the affirmative procedure.
Before making an order under this section, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) each local authority, and
(b) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

In this section—
“carer”, in relation to a care placement, means the family or persons with whom the placement is made;
“care placement” means a placement such as is mentioned in section 26(1)(a) of this Act,
“specified” means specified by order made the Scottish Ministers.

(2) In section 29 of the 1995 Act, after subsection (2) insert—
“(2A) Subsections (1) and (2) above do not apply to a person during any period when the person is being provided with continuing care under section 26A of this Act.”.

PART 9
SERVICES IN RELATION TO CHILDREN AT RISK OF BECOMING LOOKED AFTER, ETC.

61 Provision of relevant services to parents and others

(1) A local authority must make arrangements to secure that relevant services of such description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify are made available for—
(a) each eligible child residing in its area,
(b) a qualifying person in relation to such a child,
(c) each eligible pregnant woman residing in its area,
(d) a qualifying person in relation to such a woman.

(1A) A “relevant service” is a service comprising, or comprising any combination of—
(a) providing information about a matter,
(b) advising or counselling about a matter,
(c) taking other action to facilitate the addressing of a matter by a person.

(2) An “eligible child” is a child who the authority considers—
(a) to be at risk of becoming looked after, or
(b) to fall within such other description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) A “qualifying person” in relation to an eligible child is a person—
(a) who is related to the child,
(b) who has any parental rights or responsibilities in relation to the child, or
(c) with whom the child is, or has been, living.

(4) An “eligible pregnant woman” is a pregnant woman who the authority considers is going to give birth to a child who will be an eligible child.
(5) A “qualifying person” in relation to an eligible pregnant woman is a person—
(a) who is the father of the child to whom the pregnant woman is to give birth,
(b) who is married to, in a civil partnership with or otherwise related to the pregnant woman,
(c) with whom the pregnant woman is living, or
(d) who does not fall within any of paragraphs (a) to (c) but who the authority considers will, when the pregnant woman gives birth to the child, become a qualifying person in relation to the child.

(6) The references in this section to a person who is related to another person (“the other person”) includes a person who—
(a) is married to or in a civil partnership with a person who is related to the other person,
(b) is related to the other person by the half blood.

(7) This section is without prejudice to section 22 of the 1995 Act.

62 Relevant services: further provision

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about—
(a) when or how relevant services specified in an order under section 61(1) are to be provided,
(b) when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child is within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 61(2),
(c) when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 61(2),
(d) such other matters about the provision of relevant services specified in an order under section 61(1) as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(2) An order under subsection (1)(d) may include provision about—
(a) circumstances in which relevant services specified in an order under section 61(1) may be provided subject to conditions (including conditions as to payment), and
(b) consequences of such conditions not being met.

63 Interpretation of Part 9

The following expressions have the same meaning in this Part as they have in Part 1 of the 1995 Act—

parental responsibilities
parental rights.
PART 10

SUPPORT FOR KINSHIP CARE

64 Assistance in relation to kinship care orders

(1) A local authority must make arrangements to secure that kinship care assistance is made available for a person residing in its area who falls within subsection (3).

(2) "Kinship care assistance" is assistance of such description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) A person falls within this subsection if the person is—

(a) a person who is applying for, or considering applying for, a kinship care order in relation to an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years,

(b) an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years who is the subject of a kinship care order,

(c) a person in whose favour a kinship care order in relation to an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years subsists,

(d) a child who has attained the age of 16 years, where—

(i) immediately before doing so, the child was the subject of a kinship care order, and

(ii) the child is an eligible child,

(e) a person who is a guardian by virtue of an appointment under section 7 of the 1995 Act of an eligible child who has not attained the age of 16 years (but this is subject to subsection (3A)),

(f) an eligible child who has a guardian by virtue of an appointment under section 7 of the 1995 Act.

(3A) Subsection (3)(e) does not include a person who is also a parent of the child.

(4) An "eligible child" is a child who the local authority considers—

(a) to be at risk of becoming looked after, or

(b) to fall within such other description as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

65 Orders which are kinship care orders

(1) In section 64, "kinship care order" means—

(a) an order under section 11(1) of the 1995 Act which gives to a qualifying person the right mentioned in section 2(1)(a) of that Act in relation to a child,

(b) a residence order which has the effect that a child is to live with, or live predominantly with, a qualifying person, or

(c) an order under section 11(1) of the 1995 Act appointing a qualifying person as a guardian of a child.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), a "qualifying person" is a person who, at the time the order is made—

(a) is related to the child,
(b) is a friend or acquaintance of a person related to the child, or
(c) has such other relationship to, or connection with, the child as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(3) But a parent of a child is not a “qualifying person” for the purposes of subsection (1).

(4) The references in subsection (2) to a person who is related to a child include a person who is—
(a) married to or in a civil partnership with a person who is related to the child,
(b) related to the child by the half blood.

66 Kinship care assistance: further provision

(1) The assistance which may be specified as kinship care assistance includes—
(a) the provision of counselling, advice or information about any matter,
(b) the provision of financial support (or support in kind) of any description,
(c) the provision of any service provided by a local authority on a subsidised basis.

(2) An order under section 64(1) may specify assistance by reference to assistance which a person was entitled to from, or being provided with by, a local authority immediately before becoming entitled to assistance under that section.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by order make provision about—
(a) when or how kinship care assistance is to be provided,
(b) when or how a local authority is to consider whether a child is within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 64(4),
(c) when or how a local authority is to review whether a child continues to be within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 64(4),
(d) such other matters about the provision of kinship care assistance as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(4) An order under subsection (3)(d) may include provision about—
(a) circumstances in which a local authority may provide kinship care assistance subject to conditions (including conditions as to payment for the assistance or the repayment of financial support), and
(b) consequences of such conditions not being met (including the recovery of any financial support provided).

67 Interpretation of Part 10

In this Part—
“kinship care assistance” has the meaning given by section 64(2),
“parent” has the same meaning as it has in Part 1 of the 1995 Act.
PART 11
ADOPTION REGISTER

68 Scotland’s Adoption Register

After section 13 of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007, insert—

“CHAPTER 1A
SCOTLAND’S ADOPTION REGISTER

13A Scotland’s Adoption Register

(1) The Scottish Ministers must make arrangements for the establishment and maintenance of a register to be known as Scotland’s Adoption Register for the purposes of facilitating adoption (referred to in this Chapter as “the Register”).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—

(a) prescribe information relating to adoption which is, or types of information relating to adoption which are, to be included in the Register, which may include information relating to—

(i) children who adoption agencies consider ought to be placed for adoption,

(ii) persons considered by adoption agencies as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption,

(iii) matters relating to such children or persons which arise after information about them is included in the Register,

(iv) children outwith Scotland who may be suitable for adoption,

(v) prospective adopters outwith Scotland,

(b) provide for how information is to be retained in the Register,

(c) make such further provision in relation to the Register as they consider appropriate.

(3) The Register is not to be open to public inspection or search.

(4) Information is to be kept in the Register in any form the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

13B Registration organisation

(1) Arrangements made by the Scottish Ministers under section 13A(1) may in particular—

(a) authorise an organisation to perform the Scottish Ministers’ functions in respect of the Register (other than functions of making subordinate legislation),

(b) provide for payments to be made by the Scottish Ministers to an organisation so authorised.

(1A) The Scottish Ministers must publish arrangements under section 13A(1) so far as they authorise an organisation as mentioned in subsection (1)(a).
(2) An organisation authorised in pursuance of subsection (1) (a “registration organisation”) must perform functions delegated to it in accordance with any directions (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers.

13C Supply of information for the Register

(1) An adoption agency must provide the Scottish Ministers with such information as may be prescribed in regulations made under section 13A(2) about—

(a) children who it considers ought to be placed for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such children,

(b) persons who it considers as suitable to have a child placed with them for adoption or persons who were included in the Register as such persons.

(3) Regulations made under section 13A(2) may—

(a) provide that information is to be provided to a registration organisation in pursuance of subsection (1) instead of to the Scottish Ministers,

(b) provide for how and by when information is to be provided in pursuance of subsection (1),

(d) prescribe circumstances in which an adoption agency, despite subsection (1), is not to disclose information of the type prescribed for the purposes of that subsection.

13D Disclosure of information

(1) It is an offence to disclose any information derived from the Register other than in accordance with regulations made under section 13A(2) in pursuance of this section.

(2) Regulations made under section 13A(2) may authorise the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation to disclose information derived from the Register—

(a) to an adoption agency for the purposes of helping it—

(i) to find persons with whom it would be appropriate to place a child for whom the agency is acting, or

(ii) to find a child who is appropriate for adoption by persons for whom the agency is acting,

(b) to any person (whether or not established or operating in Scotland) specified in the regulations—

(i) for any purpose connected with the performance of functions by the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation in pursuance of this Chapter,

(ii) for the purpose of enabling the information to be entered in a register which is maintained in respect of England, Wales or Northern Ireland and which contains information about children who are suitable for adoption or prospective adopters,

(iii) for the purpose of enabling or assisting that person to perform any functions which relate to adoption,
(iv) for use for statistical or research purposes, or
(v) for any other purpose relating to adoption.

(3) Regulations made under section 13A(2) may—

(a) set out terms and conditions on which information may be disclosed in pursuance of this section,

(b) specify steps to be taken by an adoption agency in respect of information received in pursuance of subsection (2),

(c) authorise an adoption agency to disclose information derived from the Register for purposes relating to adoption.

(4) Subsection (1) does not apply to a disclosure of information by or with the authority of the Scottish Ministers.

(5) A person who is guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 3 months, or a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale, or both.

13DA Fees and other payments

Regulations made under section 13A(2) may prescribe—

(a) a fee which is to be paid by an adoption agency when providing information in pursuance of section 13C(1),

(b) a fee which is to be paid to the Scottish Ministers or a registration organisation in respect of a disclosure of information made in pursuance of section 13D(2), (3)(c) or (4),

(c) such other fees to be paid by adoption agencies, or payments to be made by them, in relation to the Register as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

13E Use of an organisation as agency for payments

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations authorise a registration organisation or any other person to act as agent for the payment or receipt of sums payable by adoption agencies to other adoption agencies and may require adoption agencies to pay or receive such sums through the organisation.

(2) A registration organisation or other person authorised under subsection (1) is to perform the functions exercisable by virtue of that subsection in accordance with any directions (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers.

13F Supplementary

Nothing authorised or required to be done by virtue of this Chapter constitutes an offence under section 72(2) or 75(1).
68A References to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010

In this Part, references to the 2010 Act are to the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010.

68B Restriction on closure proposals

After section 2 of the 2010 Act, insert—

“2A Restriction on closure proposals

(1) This section applies where a decision is made not to implement a closure proposal in relation to a school.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1)—

(a) a decision not to implement a closure proposal is—

(i) a decision not to implement the proposal made by the education authority following the publication of a consultation report in relation to the proposal (whether or not the proposal was called-in under section 15),

(ii) a decision of a School Closure Review Panel in relation to the proposal under section 17C(1)(a),

(b) such a decision is made by a School Closure Review Panel on the day on which the Panel notifies the decision to the education authority in pursuance of section 17C(5).

(3) The education authority may not publish a proposal paper concerning a further closure proposal in relation to the school during the period of 5 years beginning with the day on which the decision is made unless there is a significant change in the school’s circumstances.”.

68C Financial implications of closure proposals

In section 4 of the 2010 Act (proposal paper), after subsection (2) insert—

“(2A) Where a proposal paper relates to a closure proposal, it must also contain information about the financial implications of the proposal.”.

68CA Correction of proposal paper

(1) Section 5 of the 2010 Act (correction of the proposal paper) is amended in accordance with subsections (2) to (4).

(2) In subsection (2)—

(a) the word “and” immediately following paragraph (a) is repealed,

(b) after that paragraph insert—

“(aa) inform the notifier of its determination under paragraph (a), and the reasons for that determination,”,

(c) in paragraph (b), for “subsection (3)” substitute “subsection (4) and of the reasons why it is, or is not, taking such action”,
(d) after paragraph (b) insert “, and

(c) invite the notifier to make representations to the authority if the notifier disagrees with the authority’s determination under paragraph (a) or its decision as to whether to take action under subsection (4).”.

(3) After that subsection insert—

“(2A) Where the notifier makes representations to the authority in pursuance of subsection (2)(c), the authority may—

(a) make a fresh determination under subsection (2)(a),

(b) make a fresh decision as to whether to take action under subsection (4).

(2B) The authority must inform the notifier if it takes a step mentioned in subsection (2A)(a) or (b).”.

(4) For subsection (3) substitute—

“(3) Subsection (4) applies—

(a) where, in a situation mentioned in subsection (1)(a), the education authority determines that—

(i) relevant information has (in its opinion) been omitted from the proposal paper, or

(ii) there is (in fact) an inaccuracy in the proposal paper,

(b) in a situation mentioned in subsection (1)(b).

(4) Where—

(a) the information that has been omitted or, as the case may be, the inaccuracy relates to a material consideration relevant to the education authority’s decision as to implementation of the proposal, it must take action as mentioned in subsection (5)(a) or (b),

(b) that information or inaccuracy does not relate to such a material consideration, the authority may—

(i) take action as mentioned in subsection (5)(a) or (b), or

(ii) take no further action (except by virtue of section 10(3)).

(5) The action referred to in subsection (4)(a) and (b)(i) is—

(a) to take the following steps—

(i) publish a corrected proposal paper,

(ii) give revised notice in accordance with section 6, and

(iii) send a copy of the corrected paper to HMIE,

(b) to issue a notice to the relevant consultees and HMIE—

(i) providing the omitted information or, as the case may be, correcting the inaccuracy, and

(ii) if the authority considers it appropriate, extending the consultation period by such period as is reasonable by reference to the significance of the information provided or, as the case may be, the nature of the correction.
Where the education authority issues a notice mentioned in subsection (5)(b) after the end of the consultation period—

(a) the notice may, instead of extending the consultation period, specify such further period during which representations may be made on the proposal as is reasonable by reference to the significance of the information provided or, as the case may be, the nature of the correction, and

(b) any such further period is to be treated as part of the consultation period for the purposes of sections 8, 9 and 10.”.

(5) In section 10 of the 2010 Act (content of the consultation report), in subsection (3)—

(a) in the opening text, after “applies,” insert “including any alleged omission or inaccuracy notified to the education authority,,”,

(b) in paragraph (a), after “inaccuracy” insert “, or (as the case may be) the alleged omission or inaccuracy,”,

(c) in paragraph (b), after “inaccuracy” insert “, or (as the case may be) the alleged omission or inaccuracy,”,

(d) after that paragraph insert—

“(c) any representations made to the authority in pursuance of section 5(2)(c).”.

68D Special provision for rural school closure proposals

(1) Before section 12 of the 2010 Act (factors for rural school closure proposals), insert—

11A Presumption against rural school closure

(1) This section applies in relation to any closure proposal as respects a rural school.

(2) The education authority may not decide to implement the proposal (wholly or partly) unless the authority—

(a) has complied with sections 12, 12A and 13, and

(b) having so complied, is satisfied that such implementation of the proposal is the most appropriate response to the reasons for formulating the proposal identified by the authority under section 12A(2)(a).

(3) The authority must publish on its website notice of—

(a) its decision as to implementation of the proposal, and

(b) where it decides to implement the proposal (wholly or partly), the reasons why it is satisfied that such implementation is the most appropriate response to the reasons for formulating the proposal identified by the authority under section 12A(2)(a).”.

(2) In that section—

(a) subsection (3)(a) is repealed,

(b) in subsection (4), after “(3)(b)” insert “and sections 12A(2)(c)(ii) and 13(5)(b)(ii),”,

(c) in subsection (5), after “(3)(c)” insert “and sections 12A(2)(c)(iii) and 13(5)(b)(iii).”.
(3) After that section, insert—

“12A Preliminary requirements in relation to rural school closure

(1) This section applies where an education authority is formulating a closure proposal as respects a rural school.

(2) The authority must—

(a) identify its reasons for formulating the proposal,

(b) consider whether there are any reasonable alternatives to the proposal as a response to those reasons,

(c) assess, for the proposal and each of the alternatives to the proposal identified under paragraph (b) (if any)—

(i) the likely educational benefits in consequence of the implementation of the proposal, or as the case may be, alternative,

(ii) the likely effect on the local community (assessed in accordance with section 12(4)) in consequence of such implementation,

(iii) the likely effect that would be caused by any different travelling arrangements that may be required (assessed in accordance with section 12(5)) in consequence of such implementation.

(3) For the purposes of this section and section 13, reasonable alternatives to the proposal include (but are not limited to) steps which would not result in the school or a stage of education in the school (within the meaning of paragraph 12 of schedule 1) being discontinued.

(4) The authority may not publish a proposal paper in relation to the proposal unless, having complied with subsection (2), it considers that implementation of the closure proposal would be the most appropriate response to the reasons for the proposal.

(5) In this section and section 13, the references to the reasons for the proposal are references to the reasons identified by the education authority under subsection (2)(a).”.

(4) For section 13 of the 2010 Act substitute—

“13 Additional consultation requirements

(1) This section applies in relation to any closure proposal as respects a rural school.

(2) The proposal paper must additionally—

(a) explain the reasons for the proposal,

(b) describe what (if any) steps the authority took to address those reasons before formulating the proposal,

(c) if the authority did not take such steps, explain why it did not do so,

(d) set out any alternatives to the proposal identified by the authority under section 12A(2)(b),

(e) explain the authority’s assessment under section 12A(2)(c),
(f) explain the reasons why the authority considers, in light of that assessment, that implementation of the closure proposal would be the most appropriate response to the reasons for the proposal.

(3) The notice to be given to relevant consultees under section 6(1) must—

(a) give a summary of the alternatives to the proposal set out in the proposal paper,

(b) state that written representations may be made on those alternatives (as well as on the proposal), and

(c) state that written representations on the proposal may suggest other alternatives to the proposal.

(4) In sections 8(4)(c), 9(4) and 10(2)(a), the references to written representations on the proposal include references to written representations on the alternatives to the proposal set out in the proposal paper.

(5) When carrying out its review of the proposal under section 9(1), the education authority is to carry out—

(a) for the proposal and each of the alternatives to it set out in the proposal paper (if any), a further assessment of the matters mentioned in section 12A(2)(c)(i) to (iii), and

(b) an assessment, in relation to any other reasonable alternative to the proposal suggested in written representations on the proposal, of—

(i) the likely educational benefits in consequence of the implementation of the alternative,

(ii) the likely effect on the local community (assessed in accordance with section 12(4)) in consequence of such implementation,

(iii) the likely effect that would be caused by any different travelling arrangements that may be required (assessed in accordance with section 12(5)) in consequence of such implementation.

(6) The consultation report must additionally explain—

(a) the education authority’s assessment under subsection (5)(a),

(b) how that assessment differs (if at all) from the authority’s assessment under section 12A(2)(c),

(c) the authority’s assessment under subsection (5)(b),

(d) whether and, if so, the reasons why the authority considers that implementation of the proposal (wholly or partly) would be the most appropriate response to the reasons for the proposal.”.

(5) In section 1 of the 2010 Act (overview of key requirements), after subsection (4) insert—

“(4A) In the case of a closure proposal in relation to a rural school, the education authority must also comply with—

(a) the preliminary requirements set out in section 12A when it is formulating the proposal,

(b) the additional consultation requirements set out in section 13.”.
68E Call-in of closure proposals

(1) In section 15 of the 2010 Act (call-in of closure proposals)—

(za) in subsection (2), after paragraph (b)(ii) insert—

“(iii) where the decision relates to a rural school, the notice published under section 11A(3),”.

 zb) after that subsection insert—

“(2A) At the same time as it notifies the Scottish Ministers of the decision under subsection (2)(a), the education authority must publish on its website notice of—

(a) the fact that the Scottish Ministers have been so notified, and

(b) the opportunity for making representations to the Scottish Ministers in connection with subsection (4), including the date on which the 3 week period referred to in that subsection ends.”,

(a) in each of subsections (3), (4) and (6) for “6” substitute “8”,

(b) subsection (5) is repealed.

(2) Section 16 of the 2010 Act is repealed.

(3) In section 17 of the 2010 Act (grounds for call-in etc.)—

(a) in subsection (3)—

(i) the word “or” immediately following paragraph (a) is repealed,

(ii) paragraph (b) is repealed,

(b) after that subsection insert—

“(3A) HMIE must provide the Scottish Ministers with such advice as to the educational aspects of a closure proposal as the Scottish Ministers may reasonably require of HMIE for the purpose of the Scottish Ministers’ consideration of whether to issue a call-in notice.”.

(4) After section 17 of the 2010 Act insert—

“17A Referral to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels

(1) This section applies where a call-in notice is issued as respects a closure proposal.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must refer the proposal to the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.

(3) The Convener must, within the period of 7 days beginning with the day on which the call-in notice is issued, constitute a School Closure Review Panel to review the proposal under section 17B(1).

(4) The education authority may not implement the proposal (wholly or partly)—

(a) unless the Panel grants its consent to it under section 17C(1), and

(b) until—

(i) the period mentioned in section 17D(2)(c) has expired without any appeal to the sheriff being made, or
(ii) where such an appeal is made, it is abandoned or the sheriff confirms the Panel’s decision.

(5) Schedule 2A makes further provision about the Convener and School Closure Review Panels.

(6) In this Act—

(a) “the Convener” is the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels,

(b) a “School Closure Review Panel” is a School Closure Review Panel constituted under subsection (3).

17B Review by Panel

(1) A School Closure Review Panel must consider both of the following in relation to a closure proposal—

(a) whether the education authority has failed in a significant regard to comply with the requirements imposed on it by (or under) this Act so far as they are relevant in relation to the proposal,

(b) whether the education authority has failed to take proper account of a material consideration relevant to its decision to implement the proposal.

(2) The education authority must provide the Panel with such information in connection with the proposal as the Panel may reasonably require of it for the purpose of subsection (1).

(3) HMIE must provide the Panel with such advice as to the educational aspects of the proposal as the Panel may reasonably require of them for the purpose of subsection (1).

(4) The Panel may request such other information and advice from any other person as it may reasonably require for the purpose of subsection (1).

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision as to the procedures to be followed by the Panel when carrying out a review under subsection (1).

17C Decision following review

(1) Following a review of a closure proposal under section 17B(1), the School Closure Review Panel may—

(a) refuse to consent to the proposal,

(b) refuse to consent to the proposal and remit it to the education authority for a fresh decision as to implementation,

(c) grant consent to the proposal—

(i) subject to conditions, or

(ii) unconditionally.

(2) The Panel must give reasons for its decision.
(3) Where the Panel remits the proposal to the education authority under subsection (1)(b), the Panel may specify any steps in the process provided for in sections 1 to 11 and (in relation to a closure proposal as respects a rural school) 12A that the authority must take again in relation to the proposal before making a fresh decision.

(4) The Panel may refuse to consent to the proposal under subsection (1)(a) or (b) only if the Panel finds either or both of the following—

(a) that the education authority has failed in a significant regard to comply with the requirements imposed on it by (or under) this Act so far as they are relevant in relation to the proposal,

(b) that the authority has failed to take proper account of a material consideration relevant to its decision to implement the proposal.

(5) The Panel must notify the education authority of its decision within the period of 8 weeks beginning with the day on which the Panel is constituted unless (before the end of that period) the Panel issues a notice to the education authority—

(a) stating that the Panel does not intend to notify the decision within that period,

(b) specifying the reason why that is so, and

(c) indicating the likely date for notifying the decision.

(6) Where the Panel issues a notice under subsection (5), it must notify the education authority of its decision within the period of 16 weeks beginning with the day on which the Panel is constituted.

(7) After the Panel notifies the education authority of its decision, the Panel must—

(a) notify the Scottish Ministers of the decision, and

(b) publish notice of the decision in such manner as it considers appropriate.

(8) Where the Panel grants consent to the proposal subject to conditions, the education authority must comply with the conditions.

17D Appeal against decision of the Panel

(1) An appeal may be made to the sheriff against a decision of a School Closure Review Panel under section 17C(1) by—

(a) the education authority,

(b) a relevant consultee in relation to the closure proposal.

(2) An appeal under subsection (1)—

(a) may be made only on a point of law,

(b) must be made by way of summary application,

(c) must be made within the period of 14 days beginning with the day on which the Panel publishes notice of the decision under section 17C(7)(b).

(3) In the appeal, the sheriff may—

(a) confirm the decision, or
(b) quash the decision and refer the matter back to the Panel.

(4) The sheriff’s determination of the appeal is final.”.

(5) After schedule 2 to the 2010 Act, insert—

“SCHEDULE 2A
(introduced by section 17A)

SCHOOL CLOSURE REVIEW PANELS

Convener of the School Closure Review Panels

1 (1) There is established the office of the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.

10 (2) The Scottish Ministers must appoint a person to hold that office.

(3) A person so appointed—

(a) is not to be regarded as a servant or agent of the Crown and does not have any status, immunity or privilege of the Crown,

(b) subject to any provision made in regulations under sub-paragraph (9), holds and vacates office on such terms and conditions as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

(4) The Convener—

(a) may delegate a function conferred on the Convener by this Act,

(b) must delegate such a function if required to do so by directions issued under paragraph 4.

(5) Nothing in sub-paragraph (4)(a) prevents the Convener from carrying out any function delegated under that sub-paragraph.

(6) Sub-paragraph (7) applies during any period when—

(a) the office of the Convener is vacant, or

(b) the person holding that office is unable to perform the functions conferred on the office because the person is incapacitated.

(7) The Scottish Ministers may appoint a person to act as Convener during that period.

(8) A person appointed to act as Convener under sub-paragraph (7)—

(a) is to be appointed on such terms and conditions as the Scottish Ministers may determine,

(b) while acting as such, is to be treated for all purposes, except those of any regulations made under sub-paragraph (9), as the Convener.

(9) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision for or about—

(a) eligibility for, and disqualification from, appointment under sub-paragraph (2),

(b) tenure and removal from office of a person appointed under sub-paragraph (2),

(c) payment of—

(i) salary, fees, expenses and allowances to such a person,
(ii) pensions, allowances or gratuities (including by way of compensation for loss of office) to, or in respect of, such a person,

(d) such other matters in relation to the appointment of the Convener as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

Panel members

2 (1) The Convener is to appoint such number of persons as the Convener considers appropriate to be eligible to serve as members of a School Closure Review Panel.

(2) Each Panel is to consist of 3 of the persons appointed under sub-paragraph (1).

(3) It is for the Convener to select—

(a) the members of the Panel,

(b) one of those members to chair the Panel.

(4) The Convener is to make appropriate arrangements for the training of persons appointed under sub-paragraph (1).

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision for or about—

(a) eligibility for, and disqualification from, appointment under sub-paragraph (1),

(b) tenure and removal from office of persons so appointed,

(c) the process for the selection of Panel members under sub-paragraph (3),

(d) payment of expenses, fees and allowances to persons selected under that sub-paragraph,

(e) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate in relation to—

(i) the appointment of persons under sub-paragraph (1),

(ii) the selection of Panel members under sub-paragraph (3).

Property, staff and services

3 (1) The Scottish Ministers may—

(a) provide, or ensure the provision of, such property, staff and services to the Convener as they consider necessary or expedient in connection with the exercise of the Convener’s functions,

(b) pay grants to the Convener for the purposes of enabling the Convener to employ staff and obtain services in connection with the exercise of the Convener’s functions.

(2) The Convener is to provide a School Closure Review Panel with such staff and services as the Convener considers necessary or expedient in connection with the exercise of the Panel’s functions.

Directions

4 (1) The Scottish Ministers may issue directions to the Convener as to the exercise of the Convener’s functions (and the Convener must comply with them).
(2) Directions under sub-paragraph (1) may vary or revoke earlier such directions.

(3) The Scottish Ministers must publish any directions issued under sub-paragraph (1) in such manner as they consider appropriate.

Reports

5 (1) As soon as practicable after the end of each calendar year, the Convener must prepare a report on—

(a) the exercise of the Convener’s functions during that year, and

(b) the exercise of the functions of any School Closure Review Panel which has carried out a review under section 17B during that year.

10 (2) A report prepared under sub-paragraph (1) must be—

(a) submitted to the Scottish Ministers, and

(b) published in such manner as the Convener considers appropriate.”.

(6) In section 4 of the 2010 Act (proposal paper), in subsection (2) for “17” substitute “17D”.

(7) In section 19 of the 2010 Act (guidance)—

(a) the existing text becomes subsection (1),

(b) after that subsection insert—

“(2) The Convener, and a School Closure Review Panel, must have regard to any such guidance in exercising their functions under this Act.”.

(8) In section 20 of the 2010 Act (regulations)—

(a) in subsection (3) for “17” substitute “17D”,

(b) after subsection (6) insert—

“(7) Regulations under section 17B(5) and paragraphs 1(9) and 2(5) of schedule 2A—

(a) may make different provision for different purposes,

(b) may make supplemental, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision,

(c) are subject to the negative procedure.”.

(9) In section 21(2) of the 2010 Act (definitions)—

(a) after the definition of “consultation period” insert—

““the Convener” is defined in section 17A(6),”

(b) after the definition of “rural school” insert—

““School Closure Review Panel” is defined in section 17A(6)”.

(10) In the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman Act 2002, in schedule 2 (listed authorities), before paragraph 21C insert—

“21ZC The Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.”.

(11) In the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002, in schedule 1 (Scottish public authorities)—
(a) before paragraph 62C insert—

“62ZC  The Convener of the School Closure Review Panels.”,

(b) after paragraph 76 insert—

“76A  A School Closure Review Panel constituted under section 17A(3) of the Schools (Consultation) (Scotland) Act 2010.”.

(12) In the Public Appointments and Public Bodies etc. (Scotland) Act 2003, in schedule 2 (the specified authorities), before the cross-heading “Executive bodies” insert—

“the Convener of the School Closure Review Panels”.

PART 12

CHILDREN’S HEARINGS

68F Safeguarders: exceptions to duty to prepare report on appointment

In section 33 of the 2011 Act—

(a) in subsection (1)(a), after “(2)” insert “or (3)”;

(b) after subsection (2), insert—

“(3) This subsection applies where the children’s hearing was arranged under section 45, 46, 50, 96, 126 or 158.”.

68G Maximum period of child protection order

In each of paragraphs (c) and (d) of section 54 of the 2011 Act, after “day” insert “after the day on which”.

68H Power to determine that deeming of person as relevant person to end

(1) The 2011 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 79—

(a) in subsection (1), for “This section applies” substitute “Subsections (2) to (5) apply”,

(b) after subsection (1), insert—

“(1A) Subsection (5A) applies (in addition to subsections (2) to (5)) where the children’s hearing is—

(a) a subsequent children’s hearing under Part 11, or

(b) held for the purposes of reviewing a compulsory supervision order.”,

(c) after subsection (5), insert—

“(5A) The Principal Reporter—

(a) must refer the matter of whether an individual deemed to be a relevant person by virtue of section 81 should continue to be deemed to be a relevant person in relation to the child for determination by a pre-hearing panel if requested to do so by—

(i) the individual so deemed,
(ii) the child, or

(iii) a relevant person in relation to the child,

(b) may refer that matter for determination by a pre-hearing panel on the Principal Reporter’s own initiative.”.

(3) After section 81, insert—

“81A Determination that deeming of person as relevant person to end

(1) This section applies where a matter mentioned in section 79(5A)(a) is referred to a meeting of a pre-hearing panel.

(2) Where the matter is referred along with any other matter, the pre-hearing panel must determine it before determining the other matter.

(3) The pre-hearing panel must determine that the individual is no longer to be deemed to be a relevant person if it considers that the individual does not have (and has not recently had) a significant involvement in the upbringing of the child.

(4) Where the pre-hearing panel makes a determination as described in subsection (3), section 81(4) ceases to apply in relation to the individual.

(5) Where, by virtue of section 80(3), the children’s hearing is to determine a matter mentioned in section 79(5A)(a), references in subsections (2) to (4) to the pre-hearing panel are to be read as references to the children’s hearing.”.

68I Grounds hearing: non-acceptance of facts supporting ground

In section 90 of the 2011 Act—

(a) in subsection (1), for paragraph (a) substitute—

“(a) explain to the child and each relevant person in relation to the child—

(i) each section 67 ground specified in the statement of grounds, and

(ii) the supporting facts in relation to that ground,”,

(b) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) In relation to each ground that a person accepts applies in relation to the child, the chairing member must ask the person whether the person accepts each of the supporting facts.

(1B) Where under subsection (1A) any person does not accept all of the supporting facts in relation to a ground, the ground is taken for the purposes of this Act to be accepted at the grounds hearing only if the grounds hearing considers that—

(a) the person has accepted sufficient of the supporting facts to support the conclusion that the ground applies in relation to the child, and

(b) it is appropriate to proceed in relation to the ground on the basis of only those supporting facts which are accepted by the child and each relevant person.

(1C) Where a ground is taken to be accepted for the purposes of this Act by virtue of subsection (1B), the grounds hearing must amend the statement of grounds to delete any supporting facts in relation to the ground which are not accepted by the child and each relevant person.
(1D) In this section, “supporting facts”, in relation to a section 67 ground, means facts set out in relation to the ground by virtue of section 89(3)(b).”.

68J Failure of child to attend grounds hearing: power to make interim order

In section 95 of the 2011 Act, after subsection (2) insert—

“(3) Subsection (4) applies where under subsection (2) the grounds hearing requires the Principal Reporter to arrange another grounds hearing.

(4) If the grounds hearing considers that the nature of the child’s circumstances is such that for the protection, guidance, treatment or control of the child it is necessary as a matter of urgency that an interim compulsory supervision order be made, the grounds hearing may make an interim compulsory supervision order in relation to the child.

(5) An interim compulsory supervision order made under subsection (4) may not include a measure of the kind mentioned in section 83(2)(f)(i).”.

68K Limit on number of further interim compulsory supervision orders

In section 96(4) of the 2011 Act, for the words from “the effect” to the end substitute “it would be the third such order made under subsection (3) in consequence of the same interim compulsory supervision order made under section 93(5)”.

69 Area support teams: establishment

(1) The 2011 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In schedule 1—

(a) in paragraph 12—

(i) in sub-paragraph (1), omit “and maintain”,

(ii) for sub-paragraph (3), substitute—

“(3) The National Convener—

(a) must keep the designation of areas under sub-paragraph (1) under review, and

(b) may at any time revoke a designation or make a new one.

(3A) In exercising the powers to make and revoke designations, the National Convener must ensure that at all times each local authority area falls within an area designated under sub-paragraph (1).

(3B) Revocation of a designation under sub-paragraph (1) has the effect of dissolving the area support team established in consequence of the designation.

(3C) Before deciding to make or revoke a designation under sub-paragraph (1), the National Convener must consult each affected local authority.

(3D) In sub-paragraph (3C), “affected local authority” means—

(a) in the case of making a designation, each local authority whose area falls within the area proposed to be designated,

(b) in the case of revoking a designation, each constituent authority for the area support team established in consequence of the designation.
(3E) On making or revoking a designation under sub-paragraph (1), the National Convener must notify each local authority which was consulted under sub-paragraph (3C) in relation to the decision to make or revoke the designation.

(b) in paragraph 13—

(i) in sub-paragraph (1), the words “the National Convener establishes an area support team under paragraph 12(1)” become sub-sub-paragraph (a),

(ii) after that sub-sub-paragraph insert “, and

(b) the area of the area support team consists of or includes a new area.”,

(iii) in sub-paragraph (4)(a), for “area of the area support team” substitute “new area concerned”,

(iv) in sub-paragraph (7), after the definition of “Children’s Panel Advisory Committee” insert—

““new area” means an area which has never previously been the area (or part of the area) of an area support team.”.

(3) An area support team established before this section comes into force continues in existence as if it were established under paragraph 12(1) as amended by this section.

70 Area support teams: administrative support by local authorities

(1) The 2011 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In schedule 1, in paragraph 14, after sub-paragraph (8) insert—

“(9) A constituent authority must provide an area support team with such administrative support as the National Convener considers appropriate.

(10) In sub-paragraph (9), “administrative support” means staff, property or other services which the National Convener considers are required to facilitate the carrying out by an area support team of its functions.”.

70A Interpretation of Part 12

In this Part, “the 2011 Act” means the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.
(b) two or more relevant persons in relation to the child.

1B) An appeal must not be held in open court.

(2) The sheriff may determine an appeal by—

(a) confirming the decision to detain the child in secure accommodation; or

(b) quashing that decision and directing the local authority to move the child to be detained in residential accommodation which is not secure accommodation.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision about appeals under subsection (1).

(4) Regulations under subsection (3) may in particular—

(a) specify the period within which an appeal may be made;

(b) make provision about the hearing of evidence during an appeal;

(c) provide for appeals to the sheriff principal and Court of Session against the determination of an appeal.

(5) Regulations under subsection (3) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

(6) In this section—

“relevant person”, in relation to a child, means any person who is a relevant person in relation to the child for the purposes of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (including anyone deemed to be a relevant person in relation to the child by virtue of section 81(3), 160(4)(b) or 164(6) of that Act);

“secure accommodation” has the same meaning as in section 44 of this Act.”.

Children’s legal aid

25 71A Power of Scottish Ministers to modify circumstances in which children’s legal aid to be made available

(1) The Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 is amended as follows.

(2) The title of section 28L becomes “Power of Scottish Ministers to extend or restrict types of proceedings before children’s hearings in which children’s legal aid to be available”.

(3) After section 28L, insert—

“28LA Power of Scottish Ministers to provide for children’s legal aid to be available to other persons in relation to court proceedings

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify this Part so as to—

(a) provide that children’s legal aid is to be available, in relation to a type of court proceedings under the 2011 Act, to a person to whom it is not available by virtue of section 28D, 28E or 28F;

(b) vary any availability provided by virtue of paragraph (a), or

(c) remove any availability provided by virtue of paragraph (a).
(2) If regulations are made making children’s legal aid available to a child, the regulations must include provision requiring the Board to be satisfied that the conditions in subsection (3) are met before children’s legal aid is made available.

(3) The conditions are—

(a) that it is in the best interests of the child that children’s legal aid be made available,

(b) that it is reasonable in the particular circumstances of the case that the child should receive children’s legal aid,

(c) that, after consideration of the disposable income and disposable capital of the child, the expenses of the case cannot be met without undue hardship to the child, and

(d) if the proceedings are an appeal to the sheriff principal or the Court of Session under Part 15 of the 2011 Act, that the child has substantial grounds for making or responding to the appeal.

(4) If regulations are made making children’s legal aid available to a person other than a child, the regulations must include provision requiring the Board to be satisfied that the conditions in subsection (5) are met before children’s legal aid is made available.

(5) The conditions are—

(a) that it is reasonable in the particular circumstances of the case that the person should receive children’s legal aid,

(b) that, after consideration of the disposable income and disposable capital of the person, the expenses of the case cannot be met without undue hardship to the person or the dependants of the person, and

(c) if the proceedings are an appeal to the sheriff principal or the Court of Session under Part 15 of the 2011 Act, that the person has substantial grounds for making or responding to the appeal.”.

Provision of school meals

(1) Section 53 of the 1980 Act is amended as follows.

(2) Subsection (2) is repealed.

(3) In subsection (2A), after “lunches” insert “which the authority are required to provide by virtue of subsection (3)”.

(4) In subsection (2C)(b), the words “(other than in the middle of the day)” are omitted.

(5) In subsection (2D), the words “(2) or” are omitted.

(6) In subsection (3), after paragraph (b) insert—

“(c) who is in such yearly stage of primary or secondary education, or is of such other description, as the Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe.”.
Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill
Part 13—General

Licensing of child performances

71B Extension of licensing of child performances to children under 14
Section 38 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963 (licences for performances by children under 14 not to be granted except for certain dramatic or musical performances) is repealed.

Wellbeing under 1995 Act

73 Consideration of wellbeing in exercising certain functions
After section 23 of the 1995 Act, insert—

“23A Sections 17 and 22: consideration of wellbeing
(1) This section applies where a local authority is exercising a function under or by virtue of section 17, 22 or 26A of this Act.
(2) The local authority must have regard to the general principle that functions should be exercised in relation to children and young people in a way which is designed to safeguard, support and promote their wellbeing.
(3) For the purpose of subsection (2) above, the local authority is to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person by reference to the extent to which the matters listed in section 74(2) of the 2014 Act are or, as the case may be, would be satisfied in relation to the child or young person.
(4) In assessing the wellbeing of a child or young person as mentioned in subsection (3) above, a local authority is to have regard to the guidance issued under section 74(3) of the 2014 Act.
(5) In this section, “the 2014 Act” means the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.”.

GENERAL

74 Assessment of wellbeing
(1) This section applies where under this Act a person requires to assess whether the wellbeing of a child or young person is being or would be—

(a) promoted,
(b) safeguarded,
(c) supported,
(d) affected, or
(e) subject to an effect.

(2) The person is to assess the wellbeing of the child or young person by reference to the extent to which the child or young person is or, as the case may be, would be—

Safe,
Healthy,
Achieving,
Nurtured,
Active,
Respected,
Responsible, and Included.

(3) The Scottish Ministers must issue guidance on how the matters listed in subsection (2) are to be used to assess the wellbeing of a child or young person.

(4) Before issuing or revising such guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) each local authority,
(b) each health board, and
(c) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

(5) In measuring the wellbeing of a child or young person as mentioned in subsection (2), a person is to have regard to the guidance issued under subsection (3).

(6) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify the list in subsection (2).

(7) Before making an order under subsection (6), the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) each local authority,
(b) each health board, and
(c) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

75 Interpretation

(1) In this Act—

“the 1980 Act” means the Education (Scotland) Act 1980,
“the 1995 Act” means the Children (Scotland) Act 1995,
“child” means a person who has not attained the age of 18 years,
“health board” means a board constituted under section 2(1)(a) of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978.

(2) References in this Act to a child being or becoming “looked after” are to be construed in accordance with section 17(6) of the 1995 Act.

(3) The following expressions have the same meaning in this Act as they have in the 1980 Act—education authority
grant-aided school
independent school
managers
nursery class
primary school
proprietor
public school
pupil
school age.

76 Modification of enactments

Schedule 4 (which makes minor amendments to enactments and otherwise modifies enactments for the purposes of or in consequence of this Act) has effect.

77 Subordinate legislation

(1) Any power of the Scottish Ministers to make an order under this Act includes power to make—

(a) different provision for different purposes,

(b) such supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate.

(2) An order made under any of the following sections is subject to the affirmative procedure—

section 3(2)
section 7(5)
section 29A(1),

(3) An order made under section 78 containing provisions which add to, replace or omit any part of the text of this or any other Act is subject to the affirmative procedure.

(4) All other orders made under this Act are subject to the negative procedure.

(5) This section does not apply to an order made under section 79(2).
77A  Guidance and directions

(1) Any power of the Scottish Ministers to issue guidance or directions under this Act may be exercised—

(a) to issue guidance or directions generally or for particular purposes,

(b) to issue different guidance or directions to different persons or otherwise for different purposes.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must publish (in such manner as they consider appropriate) any guidance or directions issued by them under this Act.

(3) In subsection (2)—

(a) the reference to guidance includes revision of guidance,

(b) the reference to directions includes revision and revocation of directions.

78  Ancillary provision

The Scottish Ministers may by order make—

(a) such supplementary, incidental or consequential provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, or for the purposes of giving full effect to, any provision made by, or by virtue of, this Act, and

(b) such transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of any provision of this Act.

79  Commencement

(1) This Part (apart from sections 74, 75 and 76) comes into force on the day after Royal Assent.

(1A) Subsections (2) to (4) of section 43 also come into force on the day after Royal Assent.

(2) The other provisions of this Act come into force on such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

(3) An order under this section may include transitional, transitory or saving provision.

80  Short title

The short title of this Act is the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

Dear Mr Gibson

Thank you for your letter of 19 February in which you ask for an explanation as to why a best estimate of capital costs was not provided within the supplementary Financial Memorandum on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill which your committee considered on 19 February. You were seeking an assurance that these costs will be provided to the Committee at the very earliest opportunity; and, you invited me to give evidence on these costs once they are available. These capital costs are associated with implementing early learning and childcare for 15% of 2 year olds with parents who are not working or seeking work, as defined through secondary legislation to be laid following Royal Assent.

The First Minister announced an expansion of the funded early learning and childcare entitlement to 2 year olds from workless or jobseeking households on 7 January. The Supplementary Financial Memorandum was prepared at the end of January, as required by Parliamentary rules. The limited period between formulating the policy announcement on 7 January and delivering the supplementary financial memorandum did not allow sufficient time to develop a robust analysis of the existing capacity within local government, and therefore the additional estimated cost estimates (best or otherwise) of additional infrastructure were not available at that time.

Work is underway to generate and test those estimates. We are working closely with COSLA and local authorities to determine the capacity and capital implications of our commitment to deliver funded early learning and childcare to around 15% of 2 year olds from households where parents are not working or seeking work from August 2014; and, to around 27% of 2 year olds where their parents would meet free school meal qualifying criteria, from August 2015; and, to identify additional capital costs. Capacity is complex, but we are addressing these issues as swiftly as we can.
These costs will be provided to the Finance Committee at the very earliest opportunity and I am happy to give evidence to the Finance Committee on those costs once they are available.

Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014: The Committee took evidence from—

Michael Russell, Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning, Stuart Robb, Head of Policy Delivery, and Scott MacKay, Finance Business Partner, Scottish Government.
Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014

09:30

The Convener: Our second item of business is to take evidence on the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 from the Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning. He is accompanied today by Stuart Robb and Scott Mackay from the Scottish Government.

I intend to allow around an hour for this part of the meeting. I welcome Mr Russell to the meeting and invite him to make a short opening statement.

The Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning (Michael Russell): Thank you, convener. As you may have noticed, I am not Aileen Campbell. I proffer her apologies; she has, unfortunately, been taken ill. I look forward to answering the committee’s questions today, to the best of my ability.

I thank you for the opportunity to give evidence on the additional capital costs that are associated with implementing the early learning and childcare commitments for additional two-year-olds, in relation to the supplementary financial memorandum for the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

My colleagues and I appreciate the need to provide the Finance Committee with that information, and I know that Aileen Campbell would like to have got it to you sooner. Unfortunately, in the very short period between the new provisions being put forward and the date by which the supplementary financial memorandum was required, it was not possible to secure the essential information that was required for making a robust estimate, nor even to provide the committee with a best estimate.

We want to make sure we get the information right in order properly to inform parliamentary consideration and to deliver the policy properly. That has meant our going through a complex process that has required close engagement with local authorities, through the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, to produce what I believe is now a robust estimate.

The Scottish Government is committed to funding fully the agreed costs of the policy. We have already committed more than a quarter of a billion pounds—£280 million, in fact—to local authorities to support implementation of our early learning and childcare commitments. That includes significant capital funding, £59 million over the next two years in revenue costs for the expansion for two-year-olds and £3.5 million of funding to strengthen the capacity and skills of staff. That demonstrates how seriously we take the policy and how committed we are to delivering it.

With regard to capital costs, we have already made significant funding available. In the original financial memorandum, we provided £90 million in capital over three years for additional capacity for three-year-olds and four-year-olds. The Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Employment and Sustainable Growth reaffirmed that commitment with a further allocation of £31 million to the capital funding requirement of local authorities for the financial years 2014-15 and 2015-16, specifically in relation to the expansion of early learning and childcare to additional two-year-olds.

The method for estimating the capital costs that are associated with the provisions is not straightforward and has required close engagement with COSLA and local authorities. We have analysed data from local authorities, which includes their estimates of required investment, and recent examples of capital that has been spent on the nursery estate for new builds or adaptations.

The work has been underpinned by data on location and numbers of eligible children, along with estimates of likely uptake rates, availability of existing capacity and distribution of children among local authorities and partner providers. That work has shown huge variations in the costs that are applied by local authorities and in the delivery models.

We have not yet been able to reach a final agreement with COSLA on the figures, although we intend to do so. However, we have produced a proposal, which is detailed in the paper that members have in front of them. It suggests an overall capital cost of £61 million for the extension of early learning and childcare to 27 per cent of two-year-olds. I believe that that represents a fair allocation that is drawn from clear evidence from the data that were submitted by local authorities on new build and adapted accommodation, linked to the latest available statistical information on uptake rates and existing capacity.

The process has necessarily been complex, and although we have not yet been able to reach final agreement with COSLA, we will continue to engage with it and with local authorities, and we expect to reach agreement.

I am, of course happy to take questions.

The Convener: Thank you very much for your opening statement. As is normal on the Finance Committee, I will ask some opening questions before I open out the meeting to colleagues.

Paragraph 4 of annex A of your submission states that

"Twenty returns have been received and analysed by the Scottish Government."

It adds that there has been

"wide variation in costs per child being applied from £1,000 to £23,000."

How can you give such a definitive figure of £61 million when it seems that the figure is not based on all 32 local authorities?

Michael Russell: The answer to your question is in the detailed information that we have provided to the committee, in particular the metric that we applied. Paragraphs 14 to 16 and table 1 indicate the overall calculations and the following paragraph shows how the metric was developed based on the local authority examples. I ask Scott Mackay to expand on that, but I think that the figure is based on very firm information and experience from, for example, the well-advanced work of the Scottish Futures Trust.

Scott Mackay (Scottish Government): Not all local authorities sent us data on new build and estimates of future build. We analysed what was available in order to underpin an average, which was generated in the metric that is displayed in the submission.

The Convener: One of the issues about which COSLA has raised concerns in its submission is the 60:40 split in provision between the public and private sectors. It states:

"this is by far the most significant issue and this aspect needs to be reconsidered."

COSLA’s submission states that

"Private providers have been approached but in the vast majority of Council areas they are unable or unwilling to offer places for 2 years olds."

The submission goes on to say that

"Two Councils in the west of Scotland are needing to work on a 100% local authority provision, with one of these Councils finding that only 1 of 70 private providers is willing to place 2 year olds from families seeking work. ... As an average, COSLA considers the true split of local authority provision will be between 80-100%.”

It suggests that that means that the figure of £61 million is somewhat optimistic.

Michael Russell: We do not believe that it is, and I will tell you why, convener.

The latest pre-school statistics show that, on average across Scotland, 60 per cent of early learning and childcare provision is delivered by a local authority, and 40 per cent is delivered through partner providers. The pre-school statistics show that 5,700 two-year-olds receive funded early learning and childcare, of which 50 per cent is delivered in local authority settings and 50 per cent by partner providers. Where such provision already exists, 60:40 is a favourable split for local authorities. COSLA has given examples of a number of councils that are using up to 100 per cent local authority provision. I do not deny that, but we have seen a number of examples of councils using partner providers to deliver in excess of 60 per cent of provision and, in some cases, 100 per cent.

There is a variation in current practice and in plans around the use of partner providers. We propose that the acceptable split needs to draw on current experience and what is happening. That leads us to the 60:40 split. I am not saying that negotiations cannot continue and, of course, in a negotiation both partners take robust positions in discussing the matter. However, the evidence that we have is that the 60:40 split is an accurate split and is based on actual activity now. Of course, we will continue to discuss the issue.

The Convener: COSLA’s submission states:

“The information obtained from Councils has been shared with Scottish Government officials during our discussions, and we had agreed a process to seek further clarification from Councils to help in the discussions with the metric. However, before this process could be completed we received an updated copy of the metric”, which basically said that the figure had been set at £61 million. If negotiations are continuing with COSLA, how flexible are you about the figure?

Michael Russell: There was an obligation on Aileen Campbell to come to the committee and give it further information. It is quite right that she did so. The metric that we have been working on is the information that you required. The metric leads us to the figure of £61 million. The COSLA figure is very substantially higher, but we have moved from earlier discussions of a lower figure. We will continue to discuss the issue, but we are confident in our robust calculations. Of course, there will be flexibility, but in terms of our estimate of what is taking place, the calculations that are laid out before you are very robust.

The Convener: I have one more question before I open the discussion out to colleagues. We are talking about a policy that will have to start being delivered from August, although discussions are still on-going with local authorities and COSLA. How confident are you that we will be able to commence the policy from August, as intended?

Michael Russell: I am entirely confident that we can do that, but we are also offering local authorities as much help as we can, which is the right thing to do. I do not question COSLA’s commitment; from the beginning, COSLA has shown a strong commitment to the policy. In turn, we have said that we will fully fund it — there has been no question about that. We are now talking about the detail.

Let us remember the numbers that are involved. Roll-out will start in August with a comparatively small number, which will rise over the next year and a bit from the 15 per cent that is to be achieved at the end of the first year to the 27 per cent that is to be achieved at the end of the second year. In those circumstances, what requires to be spent now can be spent now. Further discussions will have to take place, but I am confident that authorities can deliver.

Members will understand that delivery will be most difficult in rural areas because of the need to provide for small or very small numbers. I represent a rural area, so I understand that. We will give COSLA every assistance. We are trying to deliver the policy as partners and we are confident that we will do so.

Jamie Hepburn (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (SNP): You could have chosen a legislative instrument other than the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill to implement the policy, which could have been in a stand-alone bill. What might have been the effect of that?

Michael Russell: A stand-alone bill would have delayed implementation. The timeline on which we decided shows that we are trying to achieve as much as possible as early as possible. It is important to consider that timeline and how we got here.

We introduced the bill on 17 April 2013. On 5 December 2013, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made the autumn budget statement, which included consequential funding. On 7 January, the First Minister said that we would use consequential funding to expand provision to 15 per cent of two-year-olds in 2014-15, which will rise to 27 per cent in 2015-16: we said only in January this year that we would try to do that. There was a lot of parliamentary interest in that and we believed that we should try to do it.

On 19 February, stage 3 took place and the committee had its final discussion of the financial memorandum. On 19 March, the chancellor’s United Kingdom budget included consequentials. On 1 April, John Swinney announced the use of the entire £31 million of capital consequentials as a down payment on the capital costs. It was accepted that that would not be the final position. What he said was important. I quote:

“We will continue to work with our partners at the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to fully understand the capital cost implications of the expansion of childcare services, but the initial investment of £23.6 million in 2014-15 and £7.7 million in 2015-16 will emphasise our determination to properly resource our early learning and childcare services within the constraints of devolution.” — [Official Report, 1 April 2014; c 29606.]
We have moved quickly to deliver something that is required and desirable, but the negotiations will take longer. If we had not done what we did, we would not have been able to deliver the policy this year and we would have had to use a special legislative vehicle or part of another bill. The earliest we could have done that would probably have been next year. If we had had to wait for a bill to be passed next year, that might well have meant a delay not of a single year but of two years. We did not want that.

Jamie Hepburn: So, 15 per cent of two-year-olds would not have been getting the provision by the end of 2014-15—that could have been delayed until 2016-17 or later.

Michael Russell: Yes. You put it more succinctly than I did.

Jamie Hepburn: You estimate that the average capital cost per child will be £6,900, which is lower than the schools for the future metric. Will you explain the difference? Is it down to the fact that the approach differs slightly from the schools for the future programme, which involves new build?

Michael Russell: Scott Mackay will talk about the metric, which is complex. It covers new build, reconstruction and other actions, and it also involves sessions. We calculate the cost per pupil, but the new metric involves the cost per two pupils, because there are two sessions a day.

Scott Mackay: The detail of the metric and the variation from the standard Scottish Futures Trust metric result from the interaction with COSLA and the acknowledgment that different types of build have different costs.

Based on the returns that we received, we factored in an adjustment for the costs of adaptations to existing provision, we included a standard cost—an approximation of the costs of a new build was accepted—and we adjusted for a slightly higher cost of extensions to existing build. After factoring in all those costs, we came to the revised figure in the table. That was an attempt to reflect the information that we had received from COSLA on cost variations based on the type of provision that is needed in particular areas.

Jamie Hepburn: Thank you for that. COSLA’s paper makes the point on discussions that the cabinet secretary made. It says:

“COSLA has had a number of discussions with Scottish Government officials around the capital costs and the use of a metric was first proposed by Scottish Government in early May. Through discussions some of our concerns have been taken on board.”

That is COSLA’s view, but will you respond and set out how the Scottish Government has moved towards taking on board COSLA’s concerns?

Michael Russell: It is probably for the officials who were involved in those discussions to respond to your question.

Stuart Robb (Scottish Government): The main shift in our position to meet COSLA’s concerns has been on full-time equivalent places. We have moved to two children per space on the basis that local authorities deliver sessions in the morning and the afternoon. Our previous estimates had a slightly higher figure.

Scott Mackay mentioned the cost per child metric. We have looked at the data from local authorities and we have adjusted our capital expenditure costings in the original financial memorandum based on that information. We have increased the cost for extensions, as Scott said. We have also adjusted the split between the adaptations, new build and extensions that local authorities are expecting to deliver, and we have factored all that into the calculations, which has resulted in a higher figure.

Jamie Hepburn: In the process of dialogue and negotiation, has the Government taken on board what COSLA has said?

Stuart Robb: Yes.

Michael Russell: We will continue to do so. We are having a positive debate. We think that we have a robust metric, but we are listening.

Jamie Hepburn: Thank you.

Gavin Brown (Lothian) (Con): Cabinet Secretary, you explained that it was not possible to give capital costs in the supplementary financial memorandum because of the lack of time between 7 January, when the new provisions were presented, and the supplementary financial memorandum’s publication at the end of January. Why has it taken almost five months to get any details on capital costs to the Finance Committee?

Michael Russell: As I tried to indicate with the timeline, the process has been fast moving. The original bill had only a tiny inclusion on two-year-olds, but in January it was decided that they would be a major feature. Capital money was allocated only in March, which was followed by discussion of the metric process.

On 1 April, John Swinney announced the allocation of the money. The reality is that we should look at the process only from 1 April until now which, by my calculation, means that we have been looking at the matter for only two months and a few days. Since that time, following the down payment of the full amount of the consequentials and how we took that on, a complex series of... discussions have taken place about how to progress the work.

We have reached a position whereby the discussion is meaningful, but we have not finished the debate, I suppose that, in a sense, Aileen Campbell, on whose behalf I speak, would have preferred to have come here with a final agreement with COSLA. We are not in that position, but we are in a position to share substantial information and to show, if I may put it this way, the workings.

Gavin Brown: The policy was announced in January, the supplementary financial memorandum was published at the end of January and the legislation was passed in February. Why are you saying that we should count only from 1 April?

Michael Russell: We have a situation whereby, on 1 April, the first scoping out of the money that would be made available was announced by the cabinet secretary. I quoted his words when I said that we had > "an initial investment of £23.5 million in 2014-15 and £7.7 million in 2015-16."—[Official Report, 1 April 2014; c 29606.]

From then on, it has been a matter of negotiation.

We are where we are—we are having a detailed discussion, and that is useful. The alternative would be to say that we could not implement the policy this year, that we should put the issue away, that we should not address it in legislation and that we should not put the money aside for it. In that case, as Mr Hepburn has pointed out, there would be a delay in implementation. That would not benefit the children whom we are trying to benefit.

Gavin Brown: The alternative would be to have done the scoping before announcing the policy.

Michael Russell: The policy was something that we wished to pursue. When the money became available, we tried to find a way to do that. It is a positive and ambitious thing that we have been trying to do, and we are getting there.

Gavin Brown: I understand that a Scottish statutory instrument, the Provision of Early Learning and Childcare (Specified Children) (Scotland) Order 2014, was laid on 19 May this year, with a figure of £31 million attached to it. How was that £31 million figure reached?

Michael Russell: I have just explained to you that it was the entire capital consequentials that were available from the budget. John Swinney said:

> "We will continue to work with our partners at the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to fully understand the capital cost implications of the expansion of childcare services, but the initial investment of £23.5 million in 2014-15 and £7.7 million in 2015-16 will emphasise our determination to properly resource our early learning and childcare services within the constraints of devolution."—[Official Report, 1 April 2014; c 29606.]

That is what was available, and that is what we were starting with. I think that it was the right thing to have a discussion and debate with COSLA to see what the final figure would be.

Gavin Brown: To be clear, that was based on what was available in consequentials, as opposed to what you thought would be needed.

Michael Russell: As John Swinney put it, it was an “initial investment”. We were listening, and we should be listening. We continue to listen, debate and discuss.

Gavin Brown: COSLA is saying that its estimate, from what it calls a “bottom-up” exercise, is £114 million. You are now saying that the amount is going to be £61 million. You said earlier that both parties take a robust position and then discuss and negotiate. Is your £61 million basically you taking a robust position for discussion and negotiation?

Michael Russell: No. As I am sure you are aware—I am sure that you have read the paper—

Gavin Brown: Of course.

Michael Russell: The £61 million is based on the metrics. That is a provable figure, and it is the figure that we are discussing. Sparing my officials’ blushes, I think that the set of calculations were well worked out as regards what we believe to be the right approach.

I am not going to indicate an inflexibility, as there is no inflexibility. We are working as partners on the matter, and we will continue to do so.

Gavin Brown: We heard evidence from the Scottish Government on 19 February. In response to our questioning about the capital costs, the Government said:

> "we have shared our working and calculations with COSLA ... and concerns have not been raised".—[Official Report, Finance Committee, 19 February 2014; c 3665.]

At that point, workings had been shared and concerns had not been raised. How do you explain that statement, given what COSLA has said in its written submission to us, where it is clearly raising what it describes as “significant concerns”?

Michael Russell: Considerable work has been done since then on both sides. No indication was given that there was an agreement, and we have continued to proceed in a very positive way. However, there was no final agreement—there was not even an interim agreement. A lot of work has been done since that time, and that will continue.
Gavin Brown: But it remains the Scottish Government’s position that there were no concerns from COSLA in February this year.

Michael Russell: It depends on the interpretation of “no concerns”. There was a good mutual relationship, and that continues. There is clearly a discussion to be had about the fine detail of paying for something.

Gavin Brown: With respect, it is not—

Michael Russell: Does Scott Mackay wish to say anything about that?

Scott Mackay: I was not at the evidence session on 19 February, but I think that that statement was made in the expectation that we would continue to engage positively with COSLA until we achieved a resolution.

Gavin Brown: You are saying that it is a matter of interpretation. Either COSLA had raised concerns at that stage, or it had not. Which was it?

Michael Russell: The evidence that an official gives is the evidence that the official gives. They obviously have a good, positive relationship, and they have been discussing the matter. We continue to discuss it. Figures have been worked on and have varied since that time. We are trying to deliver the policy in partnership in a way that benefits two-year-olds. It is a positive approach from both sides.

Gavin Brown: Okay. In relation to timescales, obviously the pace needs to accelerate somewhat if the policy, or at least a portion of it, is going to be delivered in 10 weeks’ time. How many children will be eligible as of August 2014 for the first cohort?

Michael Russell: The figure is 3,440—well, that is the anticipated take-up figure.

Gavin Brown: How many will be eligible?

Michael Russell: That figure is 70 per cent of the total eligibility figure. Is that correct, Stuart?

Stuart Robb: Yes.

Michael Russell: So we will get the figure for 100 per cent by adding to the 70 per cent figure of 3,440.

The total eligibility figure is roughly 8,000 for the 15 per cent target. The anticipated take-up is 70 per cent, which would give an anticipated take-up for the 15 per cent target in the first year of 6,800. The anticipated figures have been broken down for the phasing timetable, of which you are aware. The exact anticipated figures—which I fortunately now have in front of me—are 3,440 in August 2014, 2,293 in January 2015 and 1,147 in March 2015. Therefore, the estimate for August is 3,440.

Gavin Brown: Thank you. That is cohort 1, and time is tight, as we are only weeks away from the August start. Assuming that the 3,440 figure is correct, how do you know definitely that they can all be accommodated?

Michael Russell: I know that local authorities wish to ensure that that happens and that that is their intention. I am therefore sure that they will be able to make that provision. I would like to have that resolved as soon as possible, but we would expect local authorities to make that provision and we are continuing to work with each local authority to help them to do so. We will go on doing that right up until the first day of term—although there will not of course be a universal first day of term, as it varies from place to place.

Gavin Brown: I get that, but do you see what I am driving at here?

Michael Russell: I do.

Gavin Brown: The local authorities are raising concerns about whether that can be delivered. I am asking you how you know that it can be delivered.

Michael Russell: I believe that the local authorities want to deliver it as much as the Scottish Government does, because we are doing it for the benefit of two-year-olds. We believe that the policy is right. It has been challenging from the beginning, but we are going to continue to work together with the local authorities to deliver it. That is our firm intention, that is what we want to do, and that is what we are working together to do.

Gavin Brown: How many of the 3,440 will require some form of building work or adaptation to happen?

Michael Russell: I do not think that it is possible to say whether that is the situation. We must remember that COSLA applies a formula, so I do not think that it is possible to say how many of those will require additional build places.

I think that we can apply some logic to this. Given that we are talking about 3,440 and that the ultimate total—once the 27,000 is in—will be 12,971 minus the ones already in the system, we are really talking about something like a quarter of the total. I would have thought that it would be much easier to accommodate those in existing space, if that were required, than it would be, for example, to accommodate the total after the two-year process. I think that there will be the good will to do so.

Gavin Brown: I guess that that is my question: can they be accommodated in existing space?

Michael Russell: The local authorities wish to do so, we wish to do so, and our intention is to do so. Mr Brown, I am doing my very best to indicate to you that there is a strong commitment to the policy on both sides and that we intend to deliver it.

Gavin Brown: Thank you.

Michael McMahon (Uddingston and Bellshill) (Lab): Again, the issue comes down to some of the figures that have been used. You have been very specific in terms of the number that currently exists, which is 12,971 minus the 1,983. I suppose that it is easy to be specific when you already know that those children exist and you can count them.

You then have to project, but the figures become a bit less clear. I understand that. However, according to the financial memorandum, the figure that you used would suggest that an additional 10,988 places are going to be required, whereas the supplementary financial memorandum suggested that the additional figure for two-year-olds from August 2014 would be 8,400 and would rise to 15,400 from August 2015. There is therefore a question because, no matter how you do those sums, they do not come out to the same figure. Can you explain that to us?

Michael Russell: I was myself concerned when I saw those figures. Let me explain them to you, because I had to ask for an explanation. If I fail to explain them adequately to you, I shall ask the person who explained them to me—Mr Robb—who will then explain them to you.

The figure for total eligibility at the end of the second year—which is the 27 per cent—equates to the 15,400. That is the total eligibility at the end of year 2. The assumed take-up rate in year 2 is 84 per cent, which is higher than the assumed 70 per cent in year 1. That is because experience elsewhere tends to show that the take-up rate for the first group will be lower than the subsequent take-up rate. There is also a particular issue in the group that is eligible in relation to the first take-up rate. Parents from workless households paradoxically may already have made some arrangements, because they themselves often do the care.

Therefore, the assumption for year 1 is a take-up rate of 70 per cent and the assumption for year 2 is a take-up rate of 84 per cent. The eligibility figure goes from 15 per cent in year 1 to 27 per cent in year 2. The figure for the end of year 2 is 15,400. If I am correct, an 84 per cent take-up rate is 12,971. When we take away from that the children who are already in the system, we come to 10,988.

In year 1, the eligibility figure is lower, as we are dealing with 15 per cent. The 8,400 figure relates to the total entitlement in year 1, which is a lower figure. The assumed take-up rate of that total entitlement is 70 per cent. That gets us down to the expectation that the figure will be around 6,800 in the first year, which is further subdivided by the phasing of the take-up. The first phase will involve 3,440. That is the phase that comes in this August, and it builds up to 15,400 at the end of year 2.

That is how it plays out. I had to have that explained to me this morning. I hope that I have explained it adequately.

Michael McMahon: You certainly have. The difficulty is that that answer must have been known when the SFM was drawn up, so why could you not give us that answer and explanation at that time? If you did, we would not have had to speculate on why those figures do not add up and it might have helped the misunderstandings about affordability and deliverability between COSLA and the Government.

Michael Russell: Perhaps Stuart Robb can explain that.

Stuart Robb: We did not know those figures at that time. The initial announcement was based on annual statistics that related to the number of children in workless households. Since then, we have had to work with COSLA and the Department for Work and Pensions. Members will have seen the criteria that we set out in the eligibility order that has been laid. We had to identify the qualifying benefits that would allow us to identify the right number of children, and it took a bit of time to get to that stage. We therefore did not know the exact numbers at the time.

Michael Mcmahon: I understand that you might not have known the exact numbers, but there was a disparity between the financial memorandum and the supplementary financial memorandum. Those figures were in the SFM, so you knew them. The explanation about why there was a difference was missing.

Michael Russell: That is a fair point, and I am glad to have been able to provide an explanation today. You are absolutely right to say that it would have been better to have provided that earlier.

Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh Northern and Leith) (Lab): I want to look at the two basic reasons why COSLA is in disagreement with you. The convener has already touched on one of them, but I want to ask further about it.

Your response to COSLA’s objection to the 60:40 split was to quote current percentages. Are you confident that the composition of the two-year-old cohort that currently has childcare will be identical or even similar to that of the new cohort? I suppose that many two-year-olds who are currently in private provision get all-day provision, as their parents work, for example.

I will quote just one sentence from COSLA’s submission—I do not know whether it is right, but it possibly makes some sense. COSLA said:

“private providers can be reluctant to provide the service for 2 year olds from workless households due to the expectation that the parents would be unlikely to buy additional further hours from the provider.”

I suppose that it is true that the majority of the new cohort of two-year-olds will not necessarily be from workless households, but they will certainly be from households that will not pay for extra hours for one reason or another. I wonder whether the percentages that you quoted are directly relevant to the new situation.

Michael Russell: That is a fair point, but we have not seen that evidence from COSLA. Equally, we believe that there is no evidence that a local authority will have to provide all of that provision itself or that it would do so where there is not already some existing capacity. We have not been inflexible in that discussion, but we have seen no evidence that suggests that. The evidence that I have quoted shows that provision for two-year-olds is provided by private providers, and there is no evidence that they will stop providing that.

We are not inflexible in the discussion and, because the policy is fully funded, the actual revenue cost of meeting that policy aim—were it to fall more extensively upon local authorities—would be reflected. I do not think that we are seeing the evidence from COSLA that proves the point, and the evidence that I have quoted shows that private providers will continue to play a major role. There is a capacity question as to whether local authorities would be able to provide in that way without fairly major changes, so I think that the Government’s assumptions are reasonable.

Malcolm Chisholm: The second point that COSLA makes—it makes only two major points—appears to be more objectively provable, because it questions your estimate of the cost per square metre of new build. COSLA says that it should not be an estimate, because

“the cost per metre for a new build provided for in the metric is £2,400, however figures obtained by COSLA suggest that £2,800 per square metre is more realistic”.

One would think that that could be proved one way or the other.

Michael Russell: Mr Chisholm, I share your hope in physical fact, but I have found, having dealt with the Scottish Futures Trust funding for school buildings, that there is often a huge debate that rages over a long period of time about what the actual costs will be. I shall ask Scott Mackay to address that, because it is a debate that arises especially in the provision of school buildings.

Scott Mackay: We have drawn the figures on the basis of the data that was provided to us by individual local authorities, as the COSLA paper says. Because of the timing of our commitment to appear before the committee, we had to submit the paper to you before we really had a chance to engage fully on the detail of that metric. I expect to be able to resolve that with further discussion. We are perfectly willing to share the details of information that we have based our figures on and how we have arrived at them, and I hope that that discussion will allow us to arrive at some consensus.

Stuart Robb: I can add a bit of detail about how we have reached the £2,400 figure and how that has fed through into the calculations.

The figure of £2,400 is based on the metric used for the schools of the future programme, which we agreed with COSLA for the previous allocation of capital. For that reason, we used it as a starting point. However, it is clear from the information submitted by local authorities that the costs per square metre vary depending on the type of capital programmes that are being considered. For example, adaptations are cheaper than new build and extensions are more expensive than new build.

Accordingly, as set out in table 2 of the proposal, we adjusted the cost per square metre to reflect the different kinds of capital costs that local authorities have told us will be involved. From a new build figure of £2,400, we are down to £1,700 for adaptations, because they are cheaper, and up to £3,100 for extensions. Based on local authority returns, we have estimated a split of 30 per cent adaptations, 30 per cent new build and 40 per cent extensions.

John Mason (Glasgow Shettleston) (SNP): Since we are talking about square metres, are we clear about whether all the councils are on a level playing field when it comes to how much space is needed for each child? There is mention of areas from 2.8m² up to 7.5m² but, if I understand the figures correctly, that is because we are sometimes talking just about the play area that the kids are in most of the time, not including office space, changing space, cloakrooms and all those things. Is it all the same when you boil it down?

Michael Russell: It is, from a wider educational perspective. Those are exactly the issues that are addressed in the new build and replacement of primary schools and in questions of school closures when considering what the space occupied by a child would be.

Stuart Robb is better placed to talk about the issue in this context, but it is a common problem in the negotiation that takes place about any educational establishment or building and in determining how to reach an agreement on the total space occupied and how that space is used.

Stuart Robb: In the returns that we had from local authorities, some used the Care Inspectorate metric, which involves a figure of 2.3m² to 2.8m²; some used a different measurement, which comes out at about 5m²; and others used the schools for the future programme figure, which is 7.5m². Other authorities have used slightly different figures. On average, we have come out with the figure of 7.5m² as the right one. There is huge variation in the returns from local authorities.

John Mason: Is it the case that some councils are more optimistic, or do some just want more space than others?

Stuart Robb: You were right when you said that the lower cost metric includes just the play space. That is perhaps what some authorities have used for their costings, whereas others have done that by including all the other facilities. That is what is included in our metric—it covers a wider area.

Scott Mackay: The figure of 7.5m² is in essence the highest figure. In the calculation, we make a full estimation of all the additional space that is required to support the provision.

Michael Russell: It is significant that we have not accepted the lower figure. That was done after some thought and because we have seen circumstances in other school building processes in which lower figures were accepted. That is not really what we are trying to aspire to.

John Mason: That is helpful. As long as that is all being looked into, I am content. I know that, with primary school buildings, councils have had different ideas as to what is required.

On the point about private providers, I assume that the word “private” includes both the voluntary sector and what we would normally think of as private providers. Are we convinced that the councils are supporting, helping and approving the private providers? Historically, I have found that some councils have been a bit resistant to using private providers. Are we convinced that it is really the private providers and want to do everything themselves. Are we convinced that it is really the private providers that are not willing, or is it the councils that are not willing to use those providers or to pay them properly?

Michael Russell: We have to be careful about our involvement in that issue. The delivery of the policy is an issue for local authorities—they choose how they will deliver it. Some local authorities believe that it is best to deliver that substantially through their own efforts; others believe that it is better and more cost effective to deliver it through the use of private providers; and there is a mix between the two.

I do not think that it is or should be our position to tell local authorities how to do that. The decision is rightly made by the local authority. There are national standards that have to be met, and we expect them to be met—indeed, they are enforceable. However, I would not intrude on that any further.

A local authority will have its own reasons for making a decision. Nobody would want us to second-guess a local authority’s decisions in that regard. We need to know the balance of provision across Scotland, and we think that our estimate of that, from what we know of the sector, is correct.

John Mason: So if a family in one part of a council area had no provision near them and the council said that they should just travel to the other side of the council area to get the council provision, that would really be an issue between the family and the council and is not something that the Government would get involved in.

Michael Russell: Yes.

John Mason: My final point is to seek clarification on the figure of £61 million that we have touched on. In negotiations, one party starts at one end and another party starts at the other, and there is a movement towards the middle. Has the £61 million figure been reached after some movement towards the middle, or is it the starting point?

Michael Russell: It is not the starting point, but we are in the process of negotiation. We are talking about £61 million not only because it is our obligation in talking to the Finance Committee but because we believe that it is robust and well founded. We have laid out our workings, and that is the strong position that we find ourselves in, but we are discussing the figure. COSLA has talked about £114 million, but we do not agree with that figure, for reasons that we have given to COSLA. That is the position that we are in.

John Mason: Are you implying that you have already moved from a lower figure?

Michael Russell: Yes. I think that we were at £41 million some time ago. I am absolutely not ruling out there being a different figure at the end of the day, but I am saying that we believe that the figure of £61 million is well founded and well established and we stand by the metric that we are presenting to you.

The Convener: That concludes questions from members. Before you charge off, cabinet secretary, I still have some questions to ask, as is usual—I always have one or two wind-up questions.
I want to go back to the private sector issue. COSLA said in its submission:

"the location of the private providers is usually not in the same location as the eligible children from workless households targeted by the policy."

How will the policy be delivered in areas in which a disproportionate number of children have to go to private providers, given the issues that we have talked about, such as the apparent resistance from the private sector and capacity in the public sector?

Michael Russell: That is a delivery issue for the local authorities, which, in Scotland, are charged with the responsibility of delivering education at those levels. If a local authority believes that there is not adequate provision in an area and is under an obligation to deliver, it will have to find the way so to do.

I do not entirely accept that there is no provision in some areas. That is a very broad-brush approach to take. The third sector is involved in delivery in a variety of places in Scotland and might well deliver in areas where there is a high percentage of workless households.

We want to support local authorities to be able to deliver the policy in all the places where it is needed—the places where there is any demand at all, not just the places where demand is highest. That is the purpose of our negotiations. We will provide the revenue support that is required, in its entirety, and we will provide the capital support for delivery, in its entirety. Ultimately, local authorities will make the delivery decisions themselves. That is what they are charged to do.

The Convener: As a result of the negotiations, you have increased the amount of capital from the £31 million that was announced on 1 April to £61 million. In relation to the private sector, if the issues to do with delivery that we touched on arise, will additional funding potentially be available to individual local authorities?

Michael Russell: No, I would not expect that to be the case. The allocation that we are making is for local authorities to deliver the policy; it would not be normal for local authorities then to fund private providers to expand their services. That is a decision that local authorities could make, but it would not be dealt with through the provision that we are talking about.

The Convener: Sorry, I was not clear. I was thinking about what would happen in an area if the private sector was unable to provide services and the burden fell disproportionately on the local authority, in the context of what had been estimated. Would there be additional funding for the local authority?

Michael Russell: There would be no disproportionate burden, because the local authorities should be aware of what it will take to implement the policy in their areas. Education is delivered through local authorities because they know their areas and understand the best way to deliver education at every level. That is the system that we have in Scotland from early years and right through the education system.

We would not second-guess local authorities and say, “You must deliver it in this way.” The only area in which there is that sort of relationship is school closures, which is a complex area that is governed by legislation. In the circumstances that we are talking about, the current arrangement is that local authorities are keen on and will deliver the policy, and they are being fully funded to deliver the policy, but how they do so within that framework will be for them. I am sorry to keep stressing that, but it is absolutely the situation.

We do not interfere in the way that has been suggested. I think that members of the Parliament—indeed, members of this committee—might criticise us if we interfered in the decisions that local authorities rightly take on how they deliver policy.

The Convener: Okay. You emphasised that the Scottish Government will fully fund the policy. There is, of course, a disparity between what the Scottish Government says it will cost and what COSLA says it will cost, which we have discussed. Negotiations are still going on in that regard. If, after a year, it is clear that there is a funding gap, will the Scottish Government re-assess the figures and ensure that the gap is effectively plugged?

Michael Russell: Yes, and I have made that clear to COSLA. We want to get this right, and we think that the best time to get it right is before we start, or in the process of setting things up, which is why discussions are taking place.

If COSLA comes back in a year or 18 months’ time and says that it has discovered 10 things that it did not know about delivering for two-year-olds, we will of course have a serious conversation, because this is about ensuring that two-year-olds, progressively, get the early years education that we hope ultimately—through the powers of independence, if I may make that point—to deliver for all two-year-olds in Scotland. This is a growing service, and we would not want it to be adversely affected.

We have made a commitment to full funding and we will meet that commitment, but that does not mean that full funding is simply decided on by someone saying, “This is the figure; take it or leave it.” There has to be negotiation based on robust fact, which is what we are trying to get to.

The Convener: Okay. Thank you. Is there anything else that you want to bring to the committee’s attention?

Michael Russell: I will just say thank you for the opportunity to give evidence. I hope that we have clarified the issues that required to be clarified.

The Convener: I thank the cabinet secretary and his officials.
