This fact sheet provides an overview of the electoral system used to elect Members of the Scottish Parliament. It includes an explanation of how the regional seats are allocated.
SCOTTISH PARLIAMENT ELECTORAL SYSTEM

Scottish Parliament general elections

The system used for Scottish Parliament general elections is a mixed member system comprising a first-past-the-post component, under which seats are allocated in single member constituencies, and a proportional representation (PR) component based on regional party lists. These two elements are then linked through a formula known as the d'Hondt method or system. This electoral system is known as the Additional Member System (AMS). Part 1 of the Scotland Act 1998 sets out the processes by which Members are elected to the Scottish Parliament.

Under AMS, each voter has two votes. The first is used to vote for a named candidate for a geographically defined single member constituency. There are 73 constituencies (see the list at the end of this fact sheet) and candidates are elected via the same first-past-the-post system which is used for elections to Westminster. The second vote is used to elect an 'additional' member. This vote is cast for a political party or an independent candidate. There are 8 regions and 7 candidates are elected from each. In total, therefore, 56 'list' or 'regional' members are elected. Each person in Scotland, therefore, is represented by 1 constituency and 7 regional Members of the Scottish Parliament (MSPs). The regional vote is intended to make representation in the Parliament more proportional in relation to share of the vote, taking into account the size of the regional vote for each party (or independent candidate) and the number of constituency seats won by each party (or independent candidate) in that region.

Regional lists

When casting their regional vote, voters choose between political parties rather than named individuals (except where individuals are standing on the regional list). Each registered political party standing in the regional ballot will have submitted a list of their candidates in order of the party's preference. The names on a list are in a fixed order. The first person on the list will take the first additional seat a party wins, the second person will take the second additional seat, and so on.

A candidate can stand both in a constituency and on a regional list. If they succeed in a constituency, this takes priority and their name is then removed from the regional list so they cannot be elected twice.

How the seats are allocated

The d'Hondt system allocates additional seats to political parties or independent candidates according to the number of regional votes cast for that party or independent candidate divided by the number of seats (constituency and regional) already gained in that region, plus one. The party with the highest total after this calculation gains one additional member. The divisor for that party, or individual, is then increased by one (because of the victory in the first round) and the calculation is repeated. Again, the party, or individual, with the highest total wins a seat. This process is repeated until all seven regional/list seats are allocated.

The example below shows how additional seats might be allocated in a region.
So the totals for the Parties after all seven additional regional seats have been allocated are:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Party</th>
<th>Votes on regional ballot</th>
<th>Constituencies won</th>
<th>Additional seats allocated</th>
<th>Total seats in the Parliament</th>
</tr>

In practice, political parties (or candidates standing as independents) will generally need to win at least 6-7% of the vote in a particular regional ballot in order to have a chance of gaining an additional seat.

The following table shows how this formula worked for the Lothian Region in the 2011 election. The results were taken from the BBC website. N.B. the Green Party and the independent candidate Margo MacDonald stood only in the regional ballot so could not have won constituency seats.

Filling vacancies

Part 1 of the Scotland Act 1998, sections 9 and 10, deals with the filling of vacancies in both constituency and regional seats.

If a vacancy occurs in a constituency seat, for example, through the death or resignation of the MSP, an election (known as a by-election) would be called to fill the vacancy. The presiding Officer fixes the date of the by-election.

If a vacancy occurs in a regional seat held by a political party, the vacancy will be filled by the next person in the party’s list submitted at the time of the last general election. If there are no people left in the party’s list, the vacancy will remain unfilled until the next Scottish Parliament general election.

If the vacancy occurs in the regional seat held by an independent candidate then the vacancy will remain unfilled until the next Scottish Parliament general election.
