Passage of the

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill 2013

SPPB 223
Passage of the
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill 2013

SP Bill 35 (Session 4), subsequently 2016 asp 1

SPPB 223

EDINBURGH: APS GROUP SCOTLAND
Contents

Foreword

Introduction of the Bill

Bill (As Introduced) (SP Bill 35) 1
Explanatory Notes (and other accompanying documents) (SP Bill 35–EN) 59
Policy Memorandum (SP Bill 35–PM) 151
Delegated Powers Memorandum (SP Bill 35–DPM) 207

Stage 1

Stage 1 Report, Justice Committee 215
Annexe A: Reports from other committees 323
  Report from the Finance Committee 323
  Extract from the Minutes, Finance Committee, 20 November 2013 343
  Official Report, Finance Committee, 20 November 2013 344
  Written evidence to the Finance Committee 355
Report from the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee 449
  Extract from the Minutes, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, 24 September 2013 465
  Official Report, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, 24 September 2013 466
Annexe B: Extracts from the minutes of the Justice Committee 468
Annexe C: Oral evidence to the Justice Committee 472
Annexe D: Written evidence to the Justice Committee 707
Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Justice Committee, 3 September 2013, regarding automatic early release of certain categories of prisoner 1055
Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Justice Committee, 16 January 2014 1059
Diagram of processes for police powers of arrest and detention, provided by the Scottish Government to the Justice Committee 1062
Correspondence between Lord McCluskey and the Justice Committee regarding corroboration 1064
Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Justice Committee, 4 February 2014, regarding independent reference group on corroboration 1085
Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Justice Committee, 5 February 2014, regarding independent reference group on corroboration 1086
Paper for the meeting of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, 4 February 2014, incorporating Scottish Government response to the Committee’s report at Stage 1 1088
Extract from the Minutes, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, 4 February 2014 1093
Official Report, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, 4 February 2014 1094
Scottish Government response to the Stage 1 Report, 25 February 2014 1095
Extracts from the Minutes of the Parliament, 27 February 2014

1119

Official Report, Meeting of the Parliament, 27 February 2014

1120

After Stage 1

- Official Report, Meeting of the Parliament, 23 April 2014
  - 1153
- Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Justice Committee, 27 May 2014, regarding automatic early release of certain categories of prisoner
  - 1155
- Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Justice Committee, 4 June 2014
  - 1156
- Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Justice Committee, 21 April 2015, regarding report of independent reference group on corroboration
  - 1158

Before Stage 2

- Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Justice Committee, 25 August 2015, providing an update on the Bill
  - 1159
- Extract from the Minutes, Justice Committee, 1 September 2015
  - 1172
- Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Justice Committee, 2 September 2015, regarding stop and search advisory group report
  - 1173

Stage 2

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Marshall List</th>
<th>Groupings</th>
<th>Minutes</th>
<th>Report</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1st ML1</td>
<td>G1</td>
<td>8 Sept 2015</td>
<td>1204</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2nd ML2</td>
<td>G2</td>
<td>22 Sept 2015</td>
<td>1271</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3rd ML3</td>
<td>G3</td>
<td>29 Sept 2015</td>
<td>1332</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4th ML4</td>
<td>G4</td>
<td>6 Oct 2015</td>
<td>1395</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bill (As amended at Stage 2) (SP Bill 35A)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>1429</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Revised Explanatory Notes (SP Bill 35A–EN)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>1503</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Supplementary Financial Memorandum (SP Bill 35A–FM)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>1544</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Supplementary Delegated Powers Memorandum (SP Bill 35A–DPM)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>1556</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
After Stage 2
Report on Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee

Before Stage 3
Correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Justice Committee, 2 December 2015, regarding independent legal representation for complainers in relation to sexual offences

Stage 3
Marshalled List of Amendments selected for Stage 3 (SP Bill 35A–ML)
Groupings of Amendments for Stage 3 (SP Bill 35A–G (Timed))
Extract from the Minutes of the Parliament, 8 December 2015
Official Report, Meeting of the Parliament, 8 December 2015

Bill (As Passed) (SP Bill 35B)
Foreword

Purpose of the series

The aim of this series is to bring together in a single place all the official Parliamentary documents relating to the passage of the Bill that becomes an Act of the Scottish Parliament (ASP). The list of documents included in any particular volume will depend on the nature of the Bill and the circumstances of its passage, but a typical volume will include:

- every print of the Bill (usually three – “As Introduced”, “As Amended at Stage 2” and “As Passed”);
- the accompanying documents published with the “As Introduced” print of the Bill (and any revised versions published at later Stages);
- every Marshalled List of amendments from Stages 2 and 3;
- every Groupings list from Stages 2 and 3;
- the lead Committee’s “Stage 1 report” (which itself includes reports of other committees involved in the Stage 1 process, relevant committee Minutes and extracts from the Official Report of Stage 1 proceedings);
- the Official Report of the Stage 1 and Stage 3 debates in the Parliament;
- the Official Report of Stage 2 committee consideration;
- the Minutes (or relevant extracts) of relevant Committee meetings and of the Parliament for Stages 1 and 3.

All documents included are re-printed in the original layout and format, but with minor typographical and layout errors corrected. An exception is the groupings of amendments for Stage 2 and Stage 3 (a list of amendments in debating order was included in the original documents to assist members during actual proceedings but is omitted here as the text of amendments is already contained in the relevant marshalled list).

Where documents in the volume include web-links to external sources or to documents not incorporated in this volume, these links have been checked and are correct at the time of publishing this volume. The Scottish Parliament is not responsible for the content of external Internet sites. The links in this volume will not be monitored after publication, and no guarantee can be given that all links will continue to be effective.

Documents in each volume are arranged in the order in which they relate to the passage of the Bill through its various stages, from introduction to passing. The Act itself is not included on the grounds that it is already generally available and is, in any case, not a Parliamentary publication.

Outline of the legislative process

Bills in the Scottish Parliament follow a three-stage process. The fundamentals of the process are laid down by section 36(1) of the Scotland Act 1998, and amplified by Chapter 9 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. In outline, the process is as follows:
• Introduction, followed by publication of the Bill and its accompanying documents;
• Stage 1: the Bill is first referred to a relevant committee, which produces a report informed by evidence from interested parties, then the Parliament debates the Bill and decides whether to agree to its general principles;
• Stage 2: the Bill returns to a committee for detailed consideration of amendments;
• Stage 3: the Bill is considered by the Parliament, with consideration of further amendments followed by a debate and a decision on whether to pass the Bill.

After a Bill is passed, three law officers and the Secretary of State have a period of four weeks within which they may challenge the Bill under sections 33 and 35 of the Scotland Act respectively. The Bill may then be submitted for Royal Assent, at which point it becomes an Act.

Standing Orders allow for some variations from the above pattern in some cases. For example, Bills may be referred back to a committee during Stage 3 for further Stage 2 consideration. In addition, the procedures vary for certain categories of Bills, such as Committee Bills or Emergency Bills. For some volumes in the series, relevant proceedings prior to introduction (such as pre-legislative scrutiny of a draft Bill) may be included.

The reader who is unfamiliar with Bill procedures, or with the terminology of legislation more generally, is advised to consult in the first instance the Guidance on Public Bills published by the Parliament. That Guidance, and the Standing Orders, are available free of charge on the Parliament’s website (www.parliament.scot).

The series is produced by the Legislation Team within the Parliament’s Chamber Office. Comments on this volume or on the series as a whole may be sent to the Legislation Team at the Scottish Parliament, Edinburgh EH99 1SP.

Notes on this volume

The Bill to which this volume relates followed the standard 3 stage process described above.

The oral and written evidence received by the Justice Committee at Stage 1 was originally published on the web only. That material is included in this volume after the Stage 1 Report.

The Justice Committee’s Stage 1 Report included only web-links to the material relating to the Finance Committee’s consideration of the Financial Memorandum and the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s consideration of the delegated powers provisions in the Bill. The reports by those committees, along with written evidence and extracts from the minutes and the Official Reports of the relevant meetings, are included in this volume.

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice wrote to the Justice Committee on 4 February 2014, providing information on the Scottish Government’s intention to set up a reference group to consider further changes to criminal law in light of proposed corroboration reform. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice subsequently announced at the meeting of the Parliament on 23 April 2014 that Stage 2 consideration of the Bill would not commence until after the reference group, chaired by Lord Bonomy, had reported. The report was published on 21 April 2015. Several pieces of correspondence relating to the review, its report and the Scottish Government’s subsequent proposals are included in this volume.

At its meeting on 1 September 2015, the Justice Committee agreed to a motion by the Convener to consider the Bill at Stage 2 in an order that departed from the usual default order. This followed a request from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice (in a letter dated 25 August 2015, included in this volume) that the Committee take into account in scheduling Stage 2 that the Scottish Government planned to lodge amendments relating to police powers of stop and search once an advisory group on the issue had reported at the end of August. An extract from the minutes of the committee meeting of 1 September 2015 is included in this volume. (The normal default order, under Standing Orders Rule 9.7.4, is that the sections are taken in the order in which they arise in the Bill, with each schedule taken immediately after the section which introduces it. The long title is taken last.)

The Scottish Government originally informed the Committee that it intended proposals to end the system of automatic early release for certain categories of prisoners to be brought forward by way of amendment to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Following announcement of a delay in Stage 2 of the Bill, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice wrote to the Committee on 27 May 2014 advising that the provisions relating to automatic early release would be brought forward as a separate piece of legislation. That correspondence is included in this volume. The separate legislation was brought forward as the Prisoners (Control of Release) (Scotland) Bill, introduced in the Parliament on 14 August 2014. Further information is available on the Prisoners (Control of Release) (Scotland) Bill page.

The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee considered the delegated powers in the Bill after Stage 2, and agreed its report without debate. No extracts from the minutes or the Official Report of the relevant meeting of the Committee are, therefore, included in this volume. The report includes, as an annexe, correspondence from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice regarding proposed Stage 3 amendments that would give the Scottish Ministers new delegated powers.

---

1 The report of the review group can be found at: http://www.gov.scot/Resource/0047/00475400.pdf
2 The report of the advisory group can be found at: http://www.gov.scot/Resource/0048/00484527.pdf
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill
[AS INTRODUCED]

CONTENTS

Section

PART 1
ARREST AND CUSTODY

CHAPTER 1
ARREST BY POLICE

Arrest without warrant

1 Power of a constable
2 Exercise of the power

Procedure following arrest

3 Information to be given on arrest
4 Arrested person to be taken to police station
5 Information to be given at police station
6 Information to be recorded by police

CHAPTER 2
CUSTODY: PERSON NOT OFFICIALLY ACCUSED

Keeping person in custody

7 Authorisation for keeping in custody
8 Information to be given on authorisation
9 Review after 6 hours
10 Test for sections 7 and 9
11 12 hour limit: general rule
12 12 hour limit: previous period
13 Medical treatment

Investigative liberation

14 Release on conditions
15 Conditions ceasing to apply
16 Modification or removal of conditions
17 Review of conditions
CHAPTER 3
CUSTODY: PERSON OFFICIALLY ACCUSED

Person to be brought before court

18 Person to be brought before court

Police liberation

19 Liberation by police
20 Release on undertaking
21 Modification of undertaking
22 Review of undertaking

CHAPTER 4
POLICE INTERVIEW

Rights of suspects

23 Information to be given before interview
24 Right to have solicitor present
25 Consent to interview without solicitor

Person not officially accused

26 Questioning following arrest

Person officially accused

27 Authorisation for questioning
28 Authorisation: further provision
29 Arrest to facilitate questioning

CHAPTER 5
RIGHTS OF SUSPECTS IN POLICE CUSTODY

Intimation and access to another person

30 Right to have intimation sent to other person
31 Right to have intimation sent: under 18s
32 Right of under 18s to have access to other person

Vulnerable persons

33 Support for vulnerable persons
34 Power to make further provision

Intimation and access to a solicitor

35 Right to have intimation sent to solicitor
36 Right to consultation with solicitor

CHAPTER 6
POLICE POWERS AND DUTIES

Powers of police

37 Use of reasonable force
38 Common law power of entry
39 Common law power of search etc.
40 Power of search etc. on arrest

Duties of police

41 Duty not to detain unnecessarily
42 Duty to consider child’s best interests

CHAPTER 7

BREACH OF LIBERATION CONDITION

43 Offence where condition breached
44 Sentencing for section 43 offence
45 Breach by committing offence
46 Matters for section 45(2)(b)
47 Matters for section 45(2)(c)
48 Evidential presumptions
49 Interpretation of Chapter

CHAPTER 8

GENERAL

Common law and enactments

50 Abolition of pre-enactment powers of arrest
51 Abolition of requirement for constable to charge
52 Consequential modification

Disapplication of Part

53 Disapplication to terrorism offences

Interpretation of Part

54 Meaning of constable
55 Meaning of officially accused
56 Meaning of police custody

PART 2

CORROBORATION AND STATEMENTS

Abolition of corroboration rule

57 Corroboration not required
58 Effect of other enactments
59 Relevant day for application
60 Deeming as regards offence
61 Transitional and consequential

Statements by accused

62 Statements by accused

PART 3

SOLEMN PROCEDURE

63 Proceedings on petition
PART 4
SENTENCING

Maximum term for weapons offences

71 Maximum term for weapons offences

Prisoners on early release

72 Sentencing under the 1995 Act
73 Sentencing under the 1993 Act

PART 5
APPEALS AND SCCRC

Appeals

74 Preliminary pleas in summary cases
75 Preliminary diets in solemn cases
76 Extending certain time limits: summary
77 Extending certain time limits: solemn
78 Certain lateness not excusable
79 Advocation in solemn proceedings
80 Advocation in summary proceedings
81 Finality of appeal proceedings

SCCRC

82 References by SCCRC

PART 6
MISCELLANEOUS

CHAPTER 1
PROCEDURAL MATTERS

Aggravation as to people trafficking

83 General aggravation of offence
84 Aggravation involving public official
85 Expressions in sections 83 and 84

Use of live television link

86 Use of live television link
CHAPTER 2

POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

87 Establishment and functions

PART 7

FINAL PROVISIONS

Ancillary and definition

88 Ancillary regulations
89 Meaning of “the 1995 Act”

Commencement and short title

90 Commencement
91 Short title

Schedule 1—Modifications in connection with Part 1
   Part 1—Provisions as to arrest
   Part 2—Further modifications
Schedule 2—Modifications in connection with Part 2
   Part 1—Transitional provisions
   Part 2—Consequential provisions
Schedule 3—Police Negotiating Board for Scotland
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

[AS INTRODUCED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about criminal justice including as to police powers and rights of suspects and as to criminal evidence, procedure and sentencing; to establish the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland; and for connected purposes.

PART 1

ARREST AND CUSTODY

CHAPTER 1

ARREST BY POLICE

Arrest without warrant

1 Power of a constable

10 (1) A constable may arrest a person without a warrant if the constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed or is committing an offence.

(2) In relation to an offence not punishable by imprisonment, a constable may arrest a person under subsection (1) only if the constable is satisfied that it would not be in the interests of justice to delay the arrest in order to seek a warrant for the person’s arrest.

15 (3) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (2), it would not be in the interests of justice to delay an arrest in order to seek a warrant if the constable reasonably believes that unless the person is arrested without delay the person will—

(a) seek to avoid arrest,
(b) continue committing the offence,
(c) interfere with witnesses or evidence, or otherwise obstruct the course of justice.

2 Exercise of the power

20 (1) A person may be arrested under section 1 more than once in respect of the same offence.

(2) A person may not be arrested under section 1 in respect of an offence if the person has been officially accused of committing the offence or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence.
Procedure following arrest

3 Information to be given on arrest

When a constable arrests a person (or as soon afterwards as is reasonably practicable), a constable must inform the person—

(a) that the person is under arrest,

(b) of the general nature of the offence in respect of which the person is arrested,

(c) of the reason for the arrest,

(d) that the person is under no obligation to say anything, other than to give the information specified in section 26(3).

4 Arrested person to be taken to police station

Where a person is arrested by a constable outwith a police station, a constable must take the person as quickly as is reasonably practicable to a police station.

5 Information to be given at police station

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply when—

(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested at a police station, or

(b) a person is in police custody and has been taken to a police station in accordance with section 4.

(2) The person must be informed as soon as reasonably practicable—

(a) that the person is under no obligation to say anything, other than to give the information specified in section 26(3),

(b) of any right the person has to have intimation sent and to have access to certain persons under—

(i) section 30,

(ii) section 32,

(iii) section 35,

(iv) section 36.

(3) The person must be provided as soon as reasonably practicable with such information (verbally or in writing) as is necessary to satisfy the requirements of Articles 3 and 4 of Directive 2012/13/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council on the right to information in criminal proceedings.

6 Information to be recorded by police

(1) There must be recorded in relation to any arrest—

(a) the time and place of arrest,

(b) the general nature of the offence in respect of which the person is arrested,

(c) if the person is taken from one place to another while in police custody (including to a police station in accordance with section 4)—
(i) the place from which, and time at which, the person is taken, and
(ii) the place to which the person is taken and the time at which the person arrives there,

(d) the time at which, and the identity of the constable by whom, the person is informed of the matters mentioned in section 3,

(e) the time at which, and the identity of the person by whom, the person is—
   (i) informed of the matters mentioned in subsection (2) of section 5, and
   (ii) provided with information in accordance with subsection (3) of that section,

(f) the time at which the person requests that intimation be sent under—
   (i) section 30,
   (ii) section 35,

(g) the time at which intimation is sent under—
   (i) section 30,
   (ii) section 33,
   (iii) section 35,

(h) the time at which the person—
   (i) is released from custody, or
   (ii) is taken from a police station or other place in order to be brought before a court or (as the case may be) appears before a court by means of a live television link.

(2) Where a person is in police custody and not officially accused of committing an offence, there must be recorded the time, place and outcome of any decision under section 7.

(3) Where a person is held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section 7 there must be recorded—

   (a) the time at which the person is informed of the matters mentioned in section 8,
   (b) the time, place and outcome of any review under section 9,
   (c) the time at which any interview in the circumstances described in section 13(6) begins and the time at which it ends.

(4) If a person is released from police custody on conditions under section 14, there must be recorded—

   (a) details of the conditions imposed, and
   (b) the identity of the constable who imposed them.

(5) If a person is charged with an offence by a constable while in police custody, there must be recorded the time at which the person is charged.
CHAPTER 2
CUSTODY: PERSON NOT OFFICIALLY ACCUSED

Keeping person in custody

7 Authorisation for keeping in custody

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—
   (a) a person is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and
   (b) since being arrested, the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) Authorisation to keep the person in custody must be sought as soon as reasonably practicable after the person—
   (a) is arrested at a police station, or
   (b) arrives at a police station, having been taken there in accordance with section 4.

(3) Authorisation may be given only by a constable who has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.

(4) Authorisation may be given only if that constable is satisfied that the test in section 10 is met.

(5) If authorisation is refused, the person may continue to be held in police custody only if a constable charges the person with an offence.

8 Information to be given on authorisation

At the time when authorisation to keep a person in custody is given under section 7, the person must be informed of—
   (a) the reason the person is being kept in custody, and
   (b) the 12 hour limit arising by virtue of section 11.

9 Review after 6 hours

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a person—
   (a) has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 6 hours, beginning with the time at which authorisation was given under section 7, and
   (b) during that time the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) As soon as reasonably practicable a constable must consider whether the test in section 10 is met.

(3) The constable mentioned in subsection (2) must be a constable who—
   (a) is of the rank of inspector or above, and
   (b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.

(4) If the constable is not satisfied that the test in section 10 is met, the person may continue to be held in police custody only if a constable charges the person with an offence.
10 Test for sections 7 and 9

(1) For the purposes of sections 7(4) and 9(2), the test is that—

(a) there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed an offence, and
(b) keeping the person in custody is necessary and proportionate for the purposes of bringing the person before a court or otherwise dealing with the person in accordance with the law.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1)(b), in considering what is necessary and proportionate for the purpose mentioned in that subsection regard may be had to—

(a) whether the person’s presence is reasonably required to enable the offence to be investigated,
(b) whether the person (if liberated) would be likely to interfere with witnesses or evidence, or otherwise obstruct the course of justice,
(c) the nature and seriousness of the offence.

11 12 hour limit: general rule

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a person—

(a) has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 12 hours, beginning with the time at which authorisation was given under section 7, and
(b) during that time the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) The person may continue to be held in police custody only if a constable charges the person with an offence.

12 12 hour limit: previous period

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) a person is being held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section 7,
(b) authorisation has been given under that section to hold the person in police custody on a previous occasion, and
(c) the offence in connection with which the authorisation mentioned in paragraph (a) has been given is the same offence or arises from the same circumstances as the offence in connection with which the authorisation mentioned in paragraph (b) was given.

(2) The 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 is reduced by the length of the period during which the person was held in police custody by virtue of the authorisation mentioned in subsection (1)(b).

(3) Subsections (5) and (6) of section 13 apply for the purpose of calculating the length of the period during which the person was held in police custody by virtue of the authorisation mentioned in subsection (1)(b).
Medical treatment

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—

(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant,
(b) since being arrested, the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable, and
(c) the person is at a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment.

(2) If authorisation to keep the person in custody has not been given under section 7, that section has effect as if—

(a) each reference in subsection (2) of that section to a police station were a reference to the hospital, and
(b) the words after the reference to a police station in paragraph (b) of that subsection were omitted.

(3) Where authorisation is given under section 7 when a person is at a hospital, authorisation under that section need not be sought again if, while still in custody, the person is taken to a police station in accordance with section 4.

(4) Subsections (5) and (6) apply for the purpose of calculating the 12 hours mentioned in section 11.

(5) Except as provided for in subsection (6), no account is to be taken of any time during which a person is—

(a) at a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment, or
(b) being taken to a hospital for that purpose.

(6) Account is to be taken of any time during which a person is both—

(a) at a hospital, or being taken to one, and
(b) being interviewed by a constable in relation to an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the person of committing.

Investigative liberation

Release on conditions

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) a person is being held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section 7,
(b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed a relevant offence, and
(c) the period of 28 days described in subsection (4) has not expired.

(2) If releasing the person from custody, a constable may impose any condition that an appropriate constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence.

(3) A condition imposed under subsection (2) is a liberation condition for the purposes of Chapter 7.

(4) For the purpose of subsection (1)(c)—
(a) the period of 28 days is to be calculated by counting as a day of the period any day on which the person is subject to a condition imposed under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence,

(b) a person is to be treated as being subject to a condition imposed under subsection (2) on a day if the person is subject to a condition under that subsection for any part of the day.

(5) In subsection (2), “an appropriate constable” means a constable of the rank of inspector or above.

(6) In this section, “a relevant offence” means—

(a) the offence in connection with which the authorisation under section 7 has been given, or

(b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

15 Conditions ceasing to apply

(1) A condition imposed on a person under section 14(2) ceases to apply—

(a) at the end of the last day of the 28 day period described in section 14(4), or

(b) before then, if—

(i) the condition is removed by a notice under section 16,

(ii) the person is arrested in connection with a relevant offence,

(iii) the person is officially accused of committing a relevant offence, or

(iv) the condition is removed by the sheriff under section 17.

(2) In subsection (1), “a relevant offence” means—

(a) the offence in connection with which the condition was imposed, or

(b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

16 Modification or removal of conditions

(1) A constable may by notice modify or remove a condition imposed under section 14(2).

(2) A notice under subsection (1)—

(a) is to be given in writing to the person who is subject to the condition,

(b) must specify the time from which the condition is modified or removed.

(3) A constable of the rank of inspector or above must keep under review whether or not—

(a) there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person who is subject to a condition imposed under section 14(2) has committed a relevant offence, and

(b) the condition imposed remains necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence.

(4) Where the constable referred to in subsection (3) is no longer satisfied as to the matter mentioned in paragraph (a) of that subsection, a constable must give notice to the person removing any condition imposed in connection with a relevant offence.
(5) Where the constable referred to in subsection (3) is no longer satisfied as to the matter mentioned in paragraph (b) of that subsection, a constable must give notice to the person—
(a) modifying the condition in question, or
(b) removing it.

(6) Where a duty to give notice to a person arises under subsection (4) or (5), the notice—
(a) is to be given in writing to the person as soon as practicable, and
(b) must specify, as the time from which the condition is modified or removed, the time at which the duty to give the notice arose.

(7) The modification or removal of a condition under subsection (1), (4) or (5) requires the authority of a constable of the rank of inspector or above.

(8) In this section, “a relevant offence” means—
(a) the offence in connection with which the condition was imposed, or
(b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

Chapter 3

Custody: person officially accused

Person to be brought before court

(1) Subsection (2) applies to a person when—
(a) the person is in police custody having been arrested under a warrant (other than a warrant granted under section 29(1)), or
(b) the person—
   (i) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and
   (ii) since being arrested, the person has been charged with an offence by a constable.
(2) Wherever practicable the person must be brought before a court competent to deal with the case not later than the end of the court’s first sitting day after the day on which this subsection began to apply to the person (unless the person is released from custody under section 19).

(3) A person is deemed to be brought before a court in accordance with subsection (2) if the person appears before it by means of a live television link.

Police liberation

19  Liberation by police

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—

(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested under a warrant (other than a warrant granted under section 29(1)), or

(b) a person—

(i) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and

(ii) since being arrested, the person has been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) A constable may—

(a) if the person gives an undertaking in accordance with section 20, release the person from custody,

(b) release the person from custody without such an undertaking,

(c) refuse to release the person from custody.

(3) A constable is not to be subject to any claim whatsoever by reason of having refused to release a person from custody under subsection (2)(c).

20  Release on undertaking

(1) A person may be released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) only if the person signs the undertaking.

(2) The terms of an undertaking are that the person undertakes to—

(a) appear at a specified court at a specified time, and

(b) comply with any conditions imposed under subsection (3).

(3) The conditions which may be imposed under this subsection are—

(a) that the person does not commit an offence while subject to the undertaking,

(b) any condition that an appropriate constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring that the person does not obstruct the course of justice in relation to the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody.

(4) Conditions which may be imposed under subsection (3)(b) include a curfew.

(5) In subsection (3)(b), “an appropriate constable” means a constable of the rank of inspector or above.

(6) The requirements imposed by an undertaking to attend at a court and comply with conditions are liberation conditions for the purposes of Chapter 7.
21 Modification of undertaking

(1) The procurator fiscal may by notice modify the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) by—

(a) changing the court specified as the court at which the person is to appear,

(b) changing the time specified as the time at which the person is to appear at the court,

(c) removing or altering any condition imposed under section 20(3).

(2) A condition may not be altered under subsection (1)(c) so as to forbid or require something not forbidden or required by the terms of the condition when the person gave the undertaking.

(3) The procurator fiscal may by notice rescind an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) (whether or not the person who gave it is to be prosecuted).

(4) An undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) expires at the end of the day on which the person who gave the undertaking is required by its terms to appear at a court, except that—

(a) if before then the procurator fiscal sends notice to the person under subsection (3), it expires at the end of the day on which the notice is sent, or

(b) if the person fails to appear at a court as required by the terms of the undertaking and a warrant is granted on account of that failure, it expires at the end of the day on which the person is brought before a court having been arrested under the warrant.

(5) Notice under subsection (1) or (3) must be effected in a manner by which citation may be effected under section 141 of the 1995 Act.

22 Review of undertaking

(1) A person who is subject to an undertaking containing a condition imposed under section 20(3)(b) may apply to the sheriff to have the condition reviewed.

(2) Before disposing of an application under this section, the sheriff must give the procurator fiscal an opportunity to make representations.

(3) If the sheriff is not satisfied that the condition is necessary and proportionate for the purpose for which it was imposed, the sheriff may modify the terms of the undertaking by—

(a) removing the condition, or

(b) imposing an alternative condition that the sheriff considers to be necessary and proportionate for that purpose.
CHAPTER 4

POLICE INTERVIEW

Rights of suspects

23 Information to be given before interview

(1) Subsection (2) applies to a person who—
   (a) is in police custody, or
   (b) is attending at a police station or other place voluntarily for the purpose of being interviewed by a constable.

(2) Not more than one hour before a constable interviews the person about an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the person of committing, the person must be informed—
    (a) that the person is under no obligation to say anything other than to give the information specified in section 26(3),
    (b) about the right under section 24 to have a solicitor present during the interview, and
    (c) if the person is in police custody, about any right which the person has under
        Chapter 5.

(3) A person need not be informed under subsection (2)(c) about a right to have intimation sent under either of the following sections if the person has exercised the right already—
    (a) section 30,
    (b) section 35.

(4) For the purpose of subsection (2), a constable is not to be regarded as interviewing a person about an offence merely by asking the person for the information specified in section 26(3).

24 Right to have solicitor present

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply to a person who—
    (a) is in police custody, or
    (b) is attending at a police station or other place voluntarily for the purpose of being interviewed by a constable.

(2) The person has the right to have a solicitor present while being interviewed by a constable about an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the person of committing.

(3) Accordingly—
    (a) unless the person consents to being interviewed without having a solicitor present, a constable must not begin to interview the person about the offence until the person’s solicitor is present, and
    (b) the person’s solicitor must not be denied access to the person at any time while a constable is interviewing the person about the offence.
(4) Despite subsection (3)(a) a constable may, in exceptional circumstances, proceed to interview the person without a solicitor being present if the constable is satisfied that it is necessary to interview the person without delay in the interests of—
   (a) the investigation or the prevention of crime, or
   (b) the apprehension of offenders.

(5) For the purposes of subsections (2) and (3), a constable is not to be regarded as interviewing a person about an offence merely by asking the person for the information specified in section 26(3).

(6) Where a person consents to being interviewed without having a solicitor present, there must be recorded—
   (a) the time at which the person consented, and
   (b) any reason given by the person at that time for waiving the right to have a solicitor present.

25 Consent to interview without solicitor

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply for the purpose of section 24(3)(a).

(2) A person may not consent to being interviewed without having a solicitor present if—
   (a) the person is under 16 years of age, or
   (b) the person is 16 years of age or over and, owing to mental disorder, appears to a constable to be unable to—
      (i) understand sufficiently what is happening, or
      (ii) communicate effectively with the police.

(3) A person to whom this subsection applies (referred to in subsection (5) as “person A”) may consent to being interviewed without having a solicitor present only with the agreement of a relevant person.

(4) Subsection (3) applies to a person who is—
   (a) 16 or 17 years of age, and
   (b) not precluded by subsection (2)(b) from consenting to being interviewed without having a solicitor present.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (3), “a relevant person” means—
   (a) if person A is in police custody, any person who is entitled to access to person A by virtue of section 32(2),
   (b) if person A is not in police custody, a person who is—
      (i) at least 18 years of age, and
      (ii) reasonably named by person A.

(6) In subsection (2)(b)—
   (a) “mental disorder” has the meaning given in section 328(1) of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003,
   (b) the reference to the police is to any—
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill
Part I—Arrest and custody
Chapter 4—Police interview

(i) constable, or

(ii) person appointed as a member of police staff under section 26(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

Person not officially accused

26 Questioning following arrest

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply where—

(a) a person is in police custody in relation to an offence, and

(b) the person has not been officially accused of committing the offence or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence.

(2) A constable may put questions to the person in relation to the offence.

(3) The person is under no obligation to answer any question, other than to give the following information—

(a) the person’s name,

(b) the person’s address,

(c) the person’s date of birth,

(d) the person’s place of birth (in such detail as a constable considers necessary or expedient for the purpose of establishing the person’s identity), and

(e) the person’s nationality.

(4) Subsection (2) is without prejudice to any rule of law as regards the admissibility in evidence of any answer given.

Person officially accused

27 Authorisation for questioning

(1) The court may authorise a constable to question a person about an offence after the person has been officially accused of committing the offence.

(2) The court may grant authorisation only if it is satisfied that allowing the person to be questioned about the offence is necessary in the interests of justice.

(3) In deciding whether to grant authorisation, the court must take into account—

(a) the seriousness of the offence,

(b) the extent to which the person could have been questioned earlier in relation to the information which the applicant believes may be elicited by the proposed questioning,

(c) where the person could have been questioned earlier in relation to that information, whether it could reasonably have been foreseen at that time that the information might be important to proving or disproving that the person has committed an offence.

(4) Where subsection (5) applies, the court must give the person an opportunity to make representations before deciding whether to grant authorisation.

(5) This subsection applies where—
(a) a warrant has been granted to arrest the person in respect of the offence, or
(b) the person has appeared before a court in relation to the offence.

(6) Where granting authorisation, the court—
(a) must specify the period for which questioning is authorised, and
(b) may specify such other conditions as the court considers necessary to ensure that allowing the proposed questioning is not unfair to the person.

(7) A decision of the court—
(a) to grant or refuse authorisation, or
(b) to specify, or not to specify, conditions under subsection (6)(b), is final.

(8) In this section, “the court” means—
(a) where an indictment has been served on the person in respect of the High Court, a single judge of that court,
(b) in any other case, the sheriff.

28 Authorisation: further provision

(1) An application for authorisation may be made—
(a) where section 27(5) applies, by the prosecutor, or
(b) in any other case, by a constable.

(2) In subsection (1)(a), “the prosecutor” means—
(a) where an indictment has been served on the person in respect of the High Court, Crown Counsel, or
(b) in any other case, the procurator fiscal.

(3) Where an application for authorisation is made in writing (rather than orally) it must—
(a) be made in such form as may be prescribed by act of adjournal (or as nearly as may be in such form), and
(b) state whether another application has been made for authorisation to question the person about the offence or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence.

(4) Authorisation ceases to apply as soon as either—
(a) the period specified under section 27(6)(a) expires, or
(b) the person’s trial in respect of the offence, or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence, begins.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (4)(b), a trial begins—
(a) in proceedings on indictment, when the jury is sworn,
(b) in summary proceedings, when the first witness for the prosecution is sworn.

(6) In this section—
“authorisation” means authorisation under section 27,
“the offence” means the offence referred to in section 27(1).

29 Arrest to facilitate questioning

(1) On granting authorisation under section 27, the court may also grant a warrant for the person’s arrest if it seems to the court expedient to do so.

(2) The court must specify in a warrant granted under subsection (1) the maximum period for which the person may be detained under it.

(3) The person’s detention under a warrant granted under subsection (1) must end as soon as—

(a) the period of the person’s detention under the warrant becomes equal to the maximum period specified under subsection (2),

(b) the authorisation ceases to apply (see section 28(4)), or

(c) in the opinion of the constable responsible for the investigation into the offence referred to in section 27(1), there are no longer reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed—

(i) that offence, or

(ii) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

(4) For the purpose of subsection (3)(a), the period of the person’s detention under the warrant begins when the person—

(a) is arrested at a police station, or

(b) arrives at a police station, having been taken there in accordance with section 4.

(5) For the avoidance of doubt—

(a) if the person is on bail when a warrant under subsection (1) is granted, the order admitting the person to bail is not impliedly recalled by the granting of the warrant,

(b) if the person is on bail when arrested under a warrant granted under subsection (1)—

(i) despite being in custody by virtue of the warrant the person remains on bail for the purpose of section 24(5)(b) of the 1995 Act,

(ii) when the person’s detention under the warrant ends, the bail order continues to apply as it did immediately before the person’s arrest,

(c) if the person is subject to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a), the person remains subject to the undertaking despite—

(i) the granting of a warrant under subsection (1),

(ii) the person’s arrest and detention under it.
CHAPTER 5

RIGHTS OF SUSPECTS IN POLICE CUSTODY

Intimation and access to another person

30  Right to have intimation sent to other person

(1) A person in police custody has the right to have intimation sent to another person of—
   (a) the fact that the person is in custody,
   (b) the place where the person is in custody.

(2) Intimation under subsection (1) must be sent—
   (a) where a constable believes that the person in custody is under 16 years of age, regardless of whether the person requests that it be sent,
   (b) in any other case, if the person requests that it be sent.

(3) The person to whom intimation is to be sent under subsection (1) is—
   (a) where a constable believes that the person in custody is under 16 years of age, a parent of the person,
   (b) in any other case, an adult reasonably named by the person in custody.

(4) Intimation under subsection (1) must be sent—
   (a) as soon as reasonably practicable, or
   (b) if subsection (5) applies, with no more delay than is necessary.

(5) This subsection applies where a constable considers some delay to be necessary in the interests of—
   (a) the investigation or prevention of crime, or
   (b) the apprehension of offenders.

(6) In this section and section 31—
   “adult” means person who is at least 18 years of age, “parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of a person.

31  Right to have intimation sent: under 18s

(1) This section applies where a constable believes that a person in police custody is under 18 years of age.

(2) At the time of sending intimation to a person under section 30(1), that person must be asked to attend at the police station or other place where the person in custody is being held.

(3) Subsection (4) applies where—
   (a) it is not practicable or possible to contact, within a reasonable time, the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3), or
   (b) that person will not attend, within a reasonable time, at the police station or other place where the person in custody is being held.

(4) Attempts to send intimation under section 30(1) must continue to be made until—
(a) an appropriate person is contacted and agrees to attend, within a reasonable time, at the police station or other place where the person in custody is being held, or

(b) if a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, the person requests that (for the time being) no further attempt to send intimation is made.

5

(5) In subsection (4)(a), “an appropriate person” means—

(a) if a constable believes that the person in custody is under 16 years of age, a person the constable considers appropriate having regard to the views of the person in custody,

(b) if a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, an adult who is named by the person in custody and to whom a constable is willing to send intimation without a delay by virtue of section 30(4)(b).

6

(6) The reference in subsection (3)(a) to its not being possible to contact a person within a reasonable time includes the case where, by virtue of section 30(4)(b), a constable delays sending intimation to the person.

32 Right of under 18s to have access to other person

(1) Access to a person in police custody who a constable believes is under 16 years of age must be permitted to—

(a) a parent of the person,

(b) where a parent is not available, at least one person sent intimation under section 30 in respect of the person in custody who is able to attend within a reasonable time.

20

(2) Access to a person in police custody who a constable believes is 16 or 17 years of age must be permitted to at least one person sent intimation under section 30 in respect of the person in custody where—

(a) the person sent intimation is able to attend within a reasonable time, and

(b) the person in custody wishes to have access to the person sent intimation.

(3) In exceptional circumstances, access under subsection (1) or (2) may be refused or restricted so far as the refusal or restriction is necessary—

(a) in the interests of—

(i) the investigation or prevention of crime, or

(ii) the apprehension of offenders, or

(b) for the well-being of the person in custody.

30

(4) In this section, “parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of a person.

33 Support for vulnerable persons

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) a person is in police custody,
(b) a constable believes that the person is 18 years of age or over, and
(c) owing to mental disorder, the person appears to the constable to be unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or to communicate effectively with the police.

(2) With a view to facilitating the provision of support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) to the person as soon as reasonably practicable, the constable must ensure that intimation of the matters mentioned in subsection (4) is sent to a person who the constable considers is suitable to provide the support.

(3) That is, support to—

(a) help the person in custody to understand what is happening, and
(b) facilitate effective communication between the person and the police.

(4) Those matters are—

(a) the place where the person is in custody, and
(b) that support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) is, in the view of the constable, required by the person.

(5) In this section—

(a) “mental disorder” has the meaning given by section 328(1) of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003,
(b) the references to the police are to any—

(i) constable, or
(ii) person appointed as a member of police staff under section 26(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

34 Power to make further provision

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations amend—

(a) subsection (1)(c) of section 33,
(b) subsection (3) of that section.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations specify descriptions of persons who may for the purposes of subsection (2) of section 33 be considered suitable to provide support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) of that section (including as to training, qualifications and experience).

(3) Regulations under subsection (1) or (2) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Intimation and access to a solicitor

35 Right to have intimation sent to solicitor

(1) A person who is in police custody has the right to have intimation sent to a solicitor of any or all of the following—

(a) the fact that the person is in custody,
(b) the place where the person is in custody,
(c) that the solicitor’s professional assistance is required by the person,

(d) if the person has been officially accused of an offence—

(i) whether the person is to be released from custody, and

(ii) where the person is not to be released, the court before which the person is to be brought in accordance with section 18(2) and the date on which the person is to be brought before that court.

(2) Where the person requests that intimation be sent under subsection (1), the intimation must be sent as soon as reasonably practicable.

36 Right to consultation with solicitor

10 (1) A person who is in police custody has the right to have a private consultation with a solicitor at any time.

(2) In exceptional circumstances, a constable may delay the person’s exercise of the right under subsection (1) so far as it is necessary in the interests of—

(a) the investigation or the prevention of crime, or

(b) the apprehension of offenders.

(3) In subsection (1), “consultation” means consultation by such means as may be appropriate in the circumstances and includes (for example) consultation by means of telephone.

CHAPTER 6

POLICE POWERS AND DUTIES

Powers of police

37 Use of reasonable force

A constable may use reasonable force—

(a) to effect an arrest,

(b) when taking a person who is in police custody to any place.

38 Common law power of entry

Nothing in this Part affects any rule of law concerning the powers of a constable to enter any premises for any purpose.

39 Common law power of search etc.

(1) Nothing in this Part affects any rule of law by virtue of which a constable may exercise a power of the type described in subsection (2).

(2) The type of power is a power that a constable may exercise in relation to a person by reason of the person’s having been arrested and charged with an offence by a constable.

(3) Powers of the type described in subsection (2) include the power to—

(a) search the person,
(b) seize any item in the person’s possession,
(c) place the person in an identification parade.

40 Power of search etc. on arrest

(1) A constable may exercise in relation to a person to whom subsection (2) applies any power of the type described in section 39(2) which the constable would be able to exercise by virtue of a rule of law if the person had been charged with the relevant offence by a constable.

(2) This subsection applies to a person who—
(a) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and
(b) has not, since being arrested, been charged with an offence by a constable.

(3) In subsection (1), “the relevant offence” means the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody.

Duties of police

41 Duty not to detain unnecessarily

A constable must take every precaution to ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held in police custody.

42 Duty to consider child’s best interests

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a constable is deciding whether to—
(a) arrest a child,
(b) hold a child in police custody,
(c) interview a child about an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the child of committing, or
(d) charge a child with committing an offence.

(2) In taking the decision, the constable must treat the need to safeguard and promote the well-being of the child as a primary consideration.

(3) For the purposes of this section, a child is a person who is under 18 years of age.

CHAPTER 7

BREACH OF LIBERATION CONDITION

43 Offence where condition breached

(1) A person commits an offence if, without reasonable excuse, the person breaches a liberation condition by reason of—
(a) failing to comply with an investigative liberation condition,
(b) failing to appear at court as required by the terms of an undertaking, or
(c) failing to comply with the terms of an undertaking, other than the requirement to appear at court.
(2) Subsection (1) does not apply where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (in which case see section 45).

(3) It is competent to amend a complaint to include an additional charge of an offence under subsection (1) at any time before the trial of a person in summary proceedings for—

(a) the original offence, or

(b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as the original offence.

(4) In subsection (3), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—

(a) an investigative liberation condition was imposed, or

(b) an undertaking was given.

44 Sentencing for section 43 offence

(1) A person who commits an offence under section 43(1) is liable on summary conviction to—

(a) a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale, or

(b) imprisonment for a period—

(i) where conviction is in the justice of the peace court, not exceeding 60 days,

(ii) where conviction is in the sheriff court, not exceeding 12 months.

(2) A penalty under subsection (1) may be imposed in addition to any other penalty which it is competent for the court to impose, even if the total of penalties imposed exceeds the maximum penalty which it is competent to impose in respect of the original offence.

(3) The reference in subsection (2) to a penalty being imposed in addition to another penalty means, in the case of sentences of imprisonment or detention—

(a) where the sentences are imposed at the same time (whether or not in relation to the same complaint), framing the sentences so that they have effect consecutively,

(b) where the sentences are imposed at different times, framing the sentence imposed later so that (if the earlier sentence has not been served) the later sentence has effect consecutive to the earlier sentence.

(4) Subsection (3)(b) is subject to section 204A (restriction on consecutive sentences for released prisoners) of the 1995 Act.

(5) Subsection (6) applies where—

(a) a court finds a person guilty of an offence under section 43(1), or

(b) a person pleads guilty to an offence under that section.

(6) The court may remit the person for sentence in respect of the offence under section 43(1) to any court which is considering the original offence.

(7) In subsections (2) and (6), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—

(a) the investigative liberation condition was imposed, or

(b) the undertaking was given.
45 Breach by committing offence

(1) This section applies—

(a) where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (“offence O”), but

(b) only if the fact that offence O was committed while the person was subject to the liberation condition is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(2) In determining the penalty for offence O, the court must have regard—

(a) to the fact that offence O was committed in breach of a liberation condition,

(b) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an investigative liberation condition, to the matters mentioned in section 46(1),

(c) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an undertaking other than the requirement to appear at court, to the matters mentioned in section 47(1).

(3) Where the maximum penalty in respect of offence O is specified by (or by virtue of) an enactment, the maximum penalty is increased—

(a) where it is a fine, by the amount equivalent to level 3 on the standard scale,

(b) where it is a period of imprisonment—

(i) as respects conviction in the justice of the peace court, by 60 days,

(ii) as respects conviction in the sheriff court or the High Court, by 6 months.

(4) The maximum penalty is increased by subsection (3) even if the penalty as so increased exceeds the penalty which it would otherwise be competent for the court to impose.

(5) In imposing a penalty in respect of offence O, the court must state—

(a) where the penalty is different from that which the court would have imposed had subsection (2) not applied, the extent of and the reasons for that difference,

(b) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.

46 Matters for section 45(2)(b)

(1) For the purpose of section 45(2)(b), the matters are—

(a) the number of offences in connection with which the person was subject to investigative liberation conditions when offence O was committed,

(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under section 43(1)(a),

(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of section 45(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that section.

(2) In subsection (1)—

(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a Member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under section 43(1)(a),
(b) in paragraph (c), the references to section 45(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this subsection, as references to any provision that is equivalent to section 45(2).

(3) Any issue of equivalence arising under paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (2) is for the court to determine.

47  Matters for section 45(2)(c)

(1) For the purpose of section 45(2)(c), the matters are—

(a) the number of undertakings to which the person was subject when offence O was committed,

(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under section 43(1)(c),

(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of section 45(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that section.

(2) In subsection (1)—

(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a Member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under section 43(1)(c),

(b) in paragraph (c), the references to section 45(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this subsection, as references to any provision that is equivalent to section 45(2).

(3) Any issue of equivalence arising under paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (2) is for the court to determine.

48  Evidential presumptions

(1) In any proceedings in relation to an offence under section 43(1), the facts mentioned in subsection (2) are to be held as admitted unless challenged by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded.

(2) The facts are—

(a) that the person breached an undertaking by reason of failing to appear at court as required by the terms of the undertaking,

(b) that the person was subject to a particular—

(i) investigative liberation condition, or

(ii) condition under the terms of an undertaking.

(3) In proceedings to which subsection (4) applies—

(a) something in writing, purporting to impose investigative liberation conditions and bearing to be signed by a constable, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the investigative liberation conditions imposed under section 14(2),

(b) something in writing, purporting to be an undertaking and bearing to be signed by the person said to have given it, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the undertaking at the time that it was given,
(c) a document purporting to be a notice (or a copy of a notice) under section 16 or 21, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the notice.

(4) This subsection applies to proceedings—
(a) in relation to an offence under section 43(1), or
(b) in which the fact mentioned in section 45(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(5) In proceedings in which the fact mentioned in section 45(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment, that fact is to be held as admitted unless challenged—
(a) in summary proceedings, by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded, or
(b) in the case of proceedings on indictment, by giving notice of a preliminary objection in accordance with section 71(2) or 72(6)(b)(i) of the 1995 Act.

49 Interpretation of Chapter

In this Chapter—
(a) references to an investigative liberation condition are to a condition imposed under section 14(2) or 17(3)(b) and subject to any modification by a notice under subsection (1) or (5)(a) of section 16,
(b) references to an undertaking are to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a),
(c) references to the terms of an undertaking are to the terms of an undertaking subject to any modification by—
(i) notice under section 21(1), or
(ii) the sheriff under section 22(3)(b).

Chapter 8

General

Common law and enactments

50 Abolition of pre-enactment powers of arrest

A constable has no power to arrest a person without a warrant in relation to an offence that has been or is being committed other than—
(a) the power of arrest conferred by section 1,
(b) the power of arrest conferred by section 41(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000.

51 Abolition of requirement for constable to charge

Any rule of law that requires a constable to charge a person with an offence in particular circumstances is abolished.

52 Consequential modification

Schedule 1 contains repeals and other provisions consequential on this Part.
Disapplication of Part

53 Disapplication to terrorism offences
Nothing in this Part applies in relation to a person who is arrested under section 41(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000.

Interpretation of Part

54 Meaning of constable
In this Part, “constable” has the meaning given by section 99 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

55 Meaning of officially accused
For the purposes of this Part, a person is officially accused of committing an offence if—
(a) a constable charges the person with the offence, or
(b) the prosecutor initiates proceedings against the person in respect of the offence.

56 Meaning of police custody
For the purposes of this Part, a person is in police custody if the person has been arrested by a constable and has not subsequently been—
(a) released from custody, or
(b) brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2).

Part 2
Corroboration and statements

Abolition of corroboration rule

57 Corroboration not required
(1) This section—
(a) relates to any criminal proceedings,
(b) is subject to sections 58 and 59.
(2) If satisfied that a fact has been established by evidence in the proceedings, the judge or (as the case may be) the jury is entitled to find the fact proved by the evidence although the evidence is not corroborated.

58 Effect of other enactments
Section 57 does not affect the operation of any enactment which provides in relation to the proceedings for an offence that a fact can be proved only by corroborated evidence.
59 Relevant day for application

(1) Section 57 applies in relation to the proceedings for an offence only if the specified condition is met.

(2) The specified condition is that the offence is committed on or after the relevant day.

(3) In this section and section 60, “the relevant day” means the day on which section 57 comes into force.

60 Deeming as regards offence

(1) Subsection (2) is for the purpose of section 59(2).

(2) Where the period of time during which a continuous offence is committed includes the relevant day, the specified condition is deemed to be met in relation to the offence as a whole.

61 Transitional and consequential

(1) Schedule 2 contains transitional and consequential provisions in connection with section 57.

(2) But the effect of the modifications in Part 2 of that schedule is subject to subsection (3).

(3) For the purpose of any proceedings in relation to which section 57 does not apply, the enactments modified by that Part of that schedule continue to have effect as they would but for that Part of that schedule.

Statements by accused

62 Statements by accused

(1) After section 261 of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“261ZA Statements by accused

(1) Evidence of a statement to which this subsection applies is not inadmissible as evidence of any fact contained in the statement on account of the evidence’s being hearsay.

(2) Subsection (1) applies to a statement made by the accused in the course of the accused’s being questioned (whether as a suspect or not) by a constable, or another official, investigating an offence.

(3) Subsection (1) does not affect the issue of whether evidence of a statement made by one accused is admissible as evidence in relation to another accused.”.

(2) The title of section 261 of the 1995 Act becomes “Statements by co-accused”.

PART 3

SOLEMN PROCEDURE

63 Proceedings on petition

(1) In section 35 (judicial examination) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (6) there is inserted—
(6A) In proceedings before the sheriff in examination or further examination, the accused is not to be given an opportunity to make a declaration in respect of any charge.”.

(2) The following provisions of the 1995 Act are repealed:

(a) in section 35, subsections (3), (4) and (5),
(b) sections 36, 37 and 38,
(c) in section 68, subsection (1),
(d) in section 79, paragraph (b)(iii) of subsection (2),
(e) section 278.

64 Citation of jurors

In subsection (4) of section 85 (citation of jurors) of the 1995 Act, the words “by registered post or recorded delivery” are repealed.

65 Pre-trial time limits

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 65 (prevention of delay in trials)—

(a) in subsection (1), after paragraph (a) there is inserted—

“(aa) where an indictment has been served on the accused in respect of the sheriff court, a first diet is commenced within the period of 11 months;”,

(b) in subsection (1A), after the word “applies)” there is inserted “, the first diet (where subsection (1)(aa) above applies),”,

(c) in subsection (4)(b), for the words “110 days” there is substituted—

“(i) 110 days, unless a first diet in respect of the case is commenced within that period, which failing he shall be entitled to be admitted to bail; or

(ii) 140 days”,

(d) in subsection (9)—

(i) the word “and” immediately following paragraph (b) is repealed,

(ii) after paragraph (b) there is inserted—

“(ba) a first diet shall be taken to commence when it is called;”.

(3) In section 66 (service and lodging of indictment, etc.), for sub-paragraphs (i) and (ii) of paragraph (a) of subsection (6) there is substituted “at a first diet not less than 29 clear days after the service of the indictment,“.

(4) In section 72C (procedure where preliminary hearing does not proceed), for paragraph (b) of subsection (4) there is substituted—

“(b) where the charge is one that can lawfully be tried in the sheriff court, at a first diet in that court not less than 29 clear days after the service of the notice.”.
66 Duty of parties to communicate

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 71 (first diet), after subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1ZA) If a written record has been lodged in accordance with section 71C, the court must have regard to the written record when ascertaining the state of preparation of the parties.”.

(3) Before section 72 there is inserted—

“71C Written record of state of preparation: sheriff court

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) the accused is indicted to the sheriff court, and

(b) a solicitor—

(i) has notified the court under section 72F(1) that the solicitor has been engaged by the accused for the purposes of conducting the accused’s defence, and

(ii) has not subsequently been dismissed by the accused or withdrawn.

(2) The prosecutor and the accused’s legal representative must, within the period described in subsection (3), communicate with each other and jointly prepare a written record of their state of preparation with respect to their cases (referred to in this section as “the written record”).

(3) The period referred to in subsection (2) begins on the day the accused is served with an indictment and expires at the end of the day falling 14 days later.

(4) The prosecutor must lodge the written record with the sheriff clerk not less than two days before the first diet.

(5) The court may, on cause shown, allow the written record to be lodged after the time referred to in subsection (4).

(6) The written record must—

(a) be in such form, or as nearly as may be in such form,

(b) contain such information, and

(c) be lodged in such manner,

as may be prescribed by act of adjournal.

(7) The written record must state the manner in which the communication required by subsection (2) was conducted (for example, by telephone, email or a meeting in person).

(8) In subsection (2), “the accused’s legal representative” means—

(a) the solicitor referred to in subsection (1), or

(b) where the solicitor has instructed counsel for the purposes of the conduct of the accused’s case, either the solicitor or that counsel, or both of them.

(9) In subsection (8)(b), “counsel” includes a solicitor who has a right of audience in the High Court of Justiciary under section 25A of the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980.”.
(4) In section 75 (computation of certain periods), after the words “67(3),” there is inserted “71C(3)”.

67 First diets

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 66 (service and lodging of indictment, etc.)—

(a) after subsection (6AA) there is inserted—

“(6AB) A notice affixed under subsection (4)(b) or served under subsection (6), where the indictment is in respect of the sheriff court, must contain intimation to the accused that the first diet may proceed and a trial diet may be appointed in the accused’s absence.”,

(b) in subsection (6B), for the words “or (6AA)” there is substituted “, (6AA) or (6AB)”.

(3) In section 71 (first diet)—

(a) in subsection (1), the words from “whether” to “particular” are repealed,

(b) in subsection (5), after the word “proceed” there is inserted “, and a trial diet may be appointed,”,

(c) in subsection (6), for the words from the beginning to “required” there is substituted “Where the accused appears at the first diet, the accused is to be required at that diet”,

(d) subsection (7) is repealed,

(e) in subsection (9), after the word “section” there is inserted “and section 71B”.

(4) After section 71 there is inserted—

“71B First diet: appointment of trial diet

(1) At a first diet, unless a plea of guilty is tendered and accepted, the court must—

(a) after complying with section 71, and

(b) subject to subsections (3) to (7), appoint a trial diet.

(2) Where a trial diet is appointed at a first diet, the accused must appear at the trial diet and answer the indictment.

(3) In appointing a trial diet under subsection (1), in any case in which the 12 month period applies (whether or not the 140 day period also applies in the case)—

(a) if the court considers that the case would be likely to be ready to proceed to trial within that period, it must, subject to subsections (5) to (7), appoint a trial diet for a date within that period, or

(b) if the court considers that the case would not be likely to be so ready, it must give the prosecutor an opportunity to make an application to the court under section 65(3) for an extension of the 12 month period.

(4) Where paragraph (b) of subsection (3) applies—
(a) if such an application as is mentioned in that paragraph is made and granted, the court must, subject to subsections (5) to (7), appoint a trial diet for a date within the 12 month period as extended, or

(b) if no such application is made or if one is made but is refused by the court—

   (i) the court may desert the first diet simpliciter or pro loco et tempore, and

   (ii) where the accused is committed until liberated in due course of law, the accused must be liberated forthwith.

(5) Subsection (6) applies in any case in which—

   (a) the 140 day period as well as the 12 month period applies, and

   (b) the court is required, by virtue of subsection (3)(a) or (4)(a) to appoint a trial diet within the 12 month period.

(6) In such a case—

   (a) if the court considers that the case would be likely to be ready to proceed within the 140 day period, it must appoint a trial diet for a date within that period as well as within the 12 month period, or

   (b) if the court considers that the case would not be likely to be so ready, it must give the prosecutor an opportunity to make an application under section 65(5) for an extension of the 140 day period.

(7) Where paragraph (b) of subsection (6) applies—

   (a) if such an application as is mentioned in that paragraph is made and granted, the court must appoint a trial diet for a date within the 140 day period as extended as well as within the 12 month period,

   (b) if no such application is made or if one is made but is refused by the court—

      (i) the court must proceed under subsection (3)(a) or (as the case may be) (4)(a) to appoint a trial diet for a date within the 12 month period, and

      (ii) the accused is then entitled to be admitted to bail.

(8) Where an accused is, by virtue of subsection (7)(b)(ii), entitled to be admitted to bail, the court must, before admitting the accused to bail, give the prosecutor an opportunity to be heard.

(9) On appointing a trial diet under this section in a case where the accused has been admitted to bail (otherwise than by virtue of subsection (7)(b)(ii)), the court, after giving the parties an opportunity to be heard—

   (a) must review the conditions imposed on the accused’s bail, and

   (b) having done so, may, if it considers it appropriate to do so, fix bail on different conditions.

(10) In this section—

    “the 12 month period” means the period specified in subsection (1)(b) of section 65 and, in any case in which that period has been extended under subsection (3) of that section, includes that period as so extended,
“the 140 day period” means the period specified in subsection (4)(b)(ii) of section 65 and, in any case in which that period has been extended under subsection (5) of that section, includes that period as so extended.”.

(5) In subsection (3) of section 76 (procedure where accused desires to plead guilty), for the words from “or, where” to “Court,” there is substituted “; the first diet or (as the case may be)”.

(6) After section 83A there is inserted—

“83B  Continuation of trial diet in the sheriff court

(1) In the sheriff court a trial diet and, if it is adjourned, the adjourned diet, may, without having been commenced, be continued from sitting day to sitting day—

(a) by minute, in such form as may be prescribed by act of adjournal, signed by the sheriff clerk,

(b) up to such maximum number of sitting days after the day originally appointed for the trial diet as may be so prescribed.

(2) The indictment falls if a trial diet, or adjourned diet, is not commenced by the end of the last sitting day to which it may be continued by virtue of subsection (1).

(3) For the purposes of this section, a trial diet or adjourned trial diet is to be taken to commence when it is called.

(4) In this section, “sitting day” means any day on which the court is sitting but does not include any Saturday or Sunday or any day which is a court holiday.”.

(7) The italic cross-heading immediately preceding section 83A becomes “Continuation of trial diet”.

68  Preliminary hearings

In section 72A (preliminary hearing: appointment of trial diet) of the 1995 Act—

(a) in subsection (1), for the words from the beginning to “section” there is substituted “In any case in which subsection (6) of section 72”,

(b) subsection (1A) is repealed.

69  Plea of guilty

In the 1995 Act—

(a) in section 70 (proceedings against organisations), subsection (7) is repealed,

(b) in subsection (1) of section 77 (plea of guilty), the words from “and, subject” to the end are repealed.

70  Guilty verdict

(1) In section 90 (death or illness of jurors) of the 1995 Act—

(a) in subsection (1), the words “, subject to subsection (2) below,” are repealed,

(b) subsection (2) is repealed.
(2) After section 90 of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

"90ZA Guilty verdict by jury

(1) A jury of 15 members may return a verdict of guilty only if at least 10 of them are in favour of that verdict.

(2) Where by virtue of section 90(1) a jury has fewer that 15 members, it may return a verdict of guilty only if—

(a) in the case of 14 members, at least 10 of them are in favour of that verdict,

(b) in the case of 13 members, at least 9 of them are in favour of that verdict,

(c) in the case of 12 members, at least 8 of them are in favour of that verdict.

(3) A jury of any number is to be regarded as having returned a verdict of not guilty if it informs the court that—

(a) it will not return a verdict of guilty in accordance with subsection (1) or (as the case may be) (2), and

(b) there is no majority among its members in favour of one of the other verdicts available to it.”.

PART 4
SENTENCING

Maximum term for weapons offences

20 71 Maximum term for weapons offences

(1) The Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1)(b) of section 47 (prohibition of the carrying of offensive weapons), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”.

(3) In subsection (1)(b) of section 49 (offence of having in public place article with blade or point), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”.

(4) In subsection (5) of section 49A (offence of having article with blade or point (or offensive weapon) on school premises)—

(a) in paragraph (a)(ii), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”;

(b) in paragraph (b)(ii), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”.

(5) In subsection (6)(b) of section 49C (offence of having offensive weapon etc. in prison), for the word “4” there is substituted “5”.

Prisoners on early release

72 Sentencing under the 1995 Act

After section 200 of the 1995 Act there is inserted—
“200A Sentencing prisoners on early release

(1) Before sentencing or otherwise dealing with a person who has been found by the court to have committed an offence punishable with imprisonment (other than an offence in respect of which life imprisonment is mandatory), the court must so far as is reasonably practicable ascertain whether the person was on early release at the time the offence was committed.

(2) Where the court ascertains that the person was on early release at the time the offence was committed, the court must consider making an order, or as the case may be a reference, under section 16(2) of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993.

(3) For the purposes of this section a person is on early release if, by virtue of one of the following enactments, the person is not in custody—

(a) Part I of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993,
(b) Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, or
(c) Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003.”.

73 Sentencing under the 1993 Act

(1) Section 16 (commission of offence by released prisoner) of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1), for the words “or Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991” there is substituted “, Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 or Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003”.

(3) In subsection (2)—

(a) in paragraph (a), for the words from “other” to “below” there is substituted “to which subsection (2A) does not apply”,
(b) in paragraph (b), for the words from “where” to “subsection (1)(a)” there is substituted “to which subsection (2A) applies”.

(4) After subsection (2) there is inserted—

“(2A) This subsection applies to a case if—

(a) the court mentioned in subsection (1)(b) is inferior to the court which imposed the original sentence, and
(b) the whole of the period described in subsection (2)(a) exceeds—

(i) if the court mentioned in subsection (1)(b) is a justice of the peace court not constituted by a stipendiary magistrate, 60 days,
(ii) if the court is a justice of the peace court constituted by a stipendiary magistrate or the sheriff sitting summarily, 12 months,
(iii) if the court is the sheriff sitting as a court of solemn jurisdiction, 5 years.”.”
PART 5

APPEALS AND SCCRC

Appeals

74 Preliminary pleas in summary cases

(1) Section 174 (appeals relating to preliminary pleas) of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1)—
   (a) the words from “with the leave” to “and” are repealed,
   (b) for the words “this subsection” there is substituted “subsection (1A)(b)”.

(3) After subsection (1) there is inserted—
   “(1A) An appeal under subsection (1) may be taken—
   (a) in the case of a decision to dismiss the complaint or any part of it, by the prosecutor without the leave of the court,
   (b) in any other case, only with the leave of the court of first instance (granted on the motion of a party or ex proprio motu).”.

(4) After subsection (2) there is inserted—
   “(2A) Subsection (3) applies where—
   (a) the court grants leave to appeal under subsection (1), or
   (b) the prosecutor—
   (i) indicates an intention to appeal under subsection (1), and
   (ii) by virtue of subsection (1A)(a), does not require the leave of the court.”.

(5) In subsection (3), for the words from the beginning to “it” there is substituted “Where this subsection applies, the court of first instance”.

75 Preliminary diets in solemn cases

In section 74 (appeals in connection with preliminary diets) of the 1995 Act—

(a) in subsection (1), for the words from “to—” to “motu)” there is substituted “to any right of appeal under section 106 or 108 a party may,”,

(b) after subsection (2) there is inserted—
   “(2A) An appeal under subsection (1) may be taken—
   (a) in the case of a decision to dismiss the indictment or any part of it, by the prosecutor without the leave of the court,
   (b) in any other case, only with the leave of the court of first instance (granted on the motion of a party or ex proprio motu).”.

76 Extending certain time limits: summary

(1) Section 181 (stated case: directions by High Court) of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.
(2) After subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) Where an application for a direction under subsection (1)—

(a) is made by the person convicted, and

(b) relates to the requirements of section 176(1),

the High Court may make a direction only if it is satisfied that doing so is justified by exceptional circumstances.

(1B) In considering whether there are exceptional circumstances for the purpose of subsection (1A), the High Court must have regard to—

(a) the length of time that has elapsed between the expiry of the period mentioned in section 176(1)(a) and the making of the application,

(b) the reasons stated in accordance with subsection (2A)(a)(i),

(c) the proposed grounds of appeal.”.

(3) Subsection (2C) is repealed.

(4) In paragraph (a) of subsection (3), the words from “(unless” to the end are repealed.

(5) At the end of the section there is inserted—

“(5) If the High Court makes a direction under subsection (1) it must—

(a) give reasons for the decision in writing, and

(b) give the reasons in ordinary language.”.

77 Extending certain time limits: solemn

(1) In section 105 (appeal against refusal of application) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (3) there is inserted—

“(3A) Subsection (3) does not entitle an applicant to be present at the hearing and determination of an application under section 111(2) unless the High Court has made a direction under section 111(4)(b).”.

(2) Section 111 (provisions supplementary to sections 109 and 110) of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(3) After subsection (2) there is inserted—

“(2ZA) Where an application under subsection (2) is received after the period to which it relates has expired, the High Court may extend the period only if it is satisfied that doing so is justified by exceptional circumstances.

(2ZB) In considering whether there are exceptional circumstances for the purpose of subsection (2ZA), the High Court must have regard to—

(a) the length of time that has elapsed between the expiry of the period and the making of the application,

(b) the reasons stated in accordance with subsection (2A)(a)(i),

(c) the proposed grounds of appeal.”.

(4) In subsection (2A)—

(a) the words “seeking extension of the period mentioned in section 109(1) of this Act” are repealed,
(b) in paragraph (a)(i) —
   (i) after “failed” there is inserted “, or expects to fail,”,
   (ii) the words “in section 109(1)” are repealed.

(5) Subsection (2C) is repealed.

(6) At the end of the section there is inserted —
   “(4) An application under subsection (2) is to be dealt with by the High Court—
   (a) in chambers, and
   (b) unless the Court directs otherwise, without the parties being present.

(5) If the High Court extends a period under subsection (2) it must—
   (a) give reasons for the decision in writing, and
   (b) give the reasons in ordinary language.”.

78 Certain lateness not excusable
In section 300A (power of court to excuse procedural irregularities) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (7) there is inserted —
   “(7A) Subsection (1) does not authorise a court to excuse a failure to do any of the following things timeously—
   (a) lodge written intimation of intention to appeal in accordance with section 109(1),
   (b) lodge a note of appeal in accordance with section 110(1)(a),
   (c) make an application for a stated case under section 176(1),
   (d) lodge a note of appeal in accordance with section 186(2)(a).”.

79 Advocation in solemn proceedings
After section 130 of the 1995 Act there is inserted —
   “130A Bill of advocation not competent in respect of certain decisions
   It is not competent to bring under review of the High Court by way of bill of advocation a decision taken at a first diet or a preliminary hearing.”.

80 Advocation in summary proceedings
After section 191A of the 1995 Act there is inserted — “191B Bill of advocation not competent in respect of certain decisions
   It is not competent to bring under review of the High Court by way of bill of advocation a decision of the court of first instance that relates to such objection or denial as is mentioned in section 144(4).”.

81 Finality of appeal proceedings
(1) In subsection (2) of section 124 (finality of proceedings) of the 1995 Act—
   (a) for the words “sections 288ZB and 288AA” there is substituted “section 288AA”,

(b) the words “a reference under section 288ZB or” are repealed.

(2) After section 194 of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“194ZA Finality of proceedings

(1) Every interlocutor and sentence (including disposal or order) pronounced by the High Court when disposing of an appeal relating to summary proceedings is final and conclusive and not subject to review by any court whatsoever.

(2) Subsection (1) is subject to—

(a) Part XA and section 288AA of this Act, and

(b) paragraph 13(a) of Schedule 6 to the Scotland Act 1998.

(3) It is incompetent to stay or suspend any execution or diligence issuing from the High Court under this Part, except for the purposes of an appeal under—

(a) section 288AA of this Act, or

(b) paragraph 13(a) of Schedule 6 to the Scotland Act 1998.”.

SCCRC

15 References by SCCRC

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 194B—

(a) in subsection (1), for “section 194DA of this Act” there is substituted “subsection (1A)”.

(b) after subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) Where the Commission has referred a case to the High Court under subsection (1), the High Court may not quash a conviction or sentence unless the Court considers that it is in the interests of justice to do so.

(1B) In determining whether or not it is in the interests of justice that any case is disposed of as mentioned in subsection (1A), the High Court must have regard to the need for finality and certainty in the determination of criminal proceedings.”.

(3) The title of section 194B becomes “References by the Commission”.

(4) Section 194DA is repealed.

PART 6
MISCELLANEOUS
CHAPTER 1
PROCEDURAL MATTERS

Aggravation as to people trafficking

83 General aggravation of offence

(1) This subsection applies where it is—
(a) libelled in an indictment or specified in a complaint that an offence is aggravated by a connection with people trafficking activity, and

(b) proved that the offence is so aggravated.

(2) An offence is aggravated by a connection with people trafficking activity if the offender is motivated (wholly or partly) by the objective of committing or conspiring to commit a people trafficking offence.

(3) It is immaterial whether or not in committing an offence the offender in fact enables the offender or another person to commit a people trafficking offence.

(4) Where subsection (1) applies, the court must—

(a) state on conviction that the offence is aggravated by a connection with people trafficking activity,

(b) record the conviction in a way that shows that the offence is so aggravated,

(c) take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence, and

(d) state—

(i) where the sentence in respect of the offence is different from that which the court would have imposed if the offence were not so aggravated, the extent of and the reasons for that difference, or

(ii) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.

84 Aggravation involving public official

(1) This subsection applies where it is—

(a) libelled in an indictment or specified in a complaint that a people trafficking offence is aggravated by an abuse of a public position, and

(b) proved that the offence is so aggravated.

(2) A people trafficking offence is aggravated by an abuse of a public position if the offender is, at the time of committing the offence—

(a) a public official, and

(b) acting or purporting to act in the course of official duties.

(3) Where subsection (1) applies, the court must—

(a) state on conviction that the offence is aggravated by an abuse of a public position,

(b) record the conviction in a way that shows that the offence is so aggravated,

(c) take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence, and

(d) state—

(i) where the sentence in respect of the offence is different from that which the court would have imposed if the offence were not so aggravated, the extent of and the reasons for that difference, or

(ii) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.
Expressions in sections 83 and 84

(1) In sections 83 and 84, “a people trafficking offence” means—
   (a) an offence under section 22 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003, or
   (b) an offence under section 4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004.

(2) In section 84, “a public official” means an individual who (whether in Scotland or elsewhere)—
   (a) holds a legislative or judicial position of any kind,
   (b) exercises a public function in an administrative or other capacity, or
   (c) is an official or agent of an international organisation.

(3) For the purpose of subsection (2)(c), “an international organisation” means an organisation whose members are—
   (a) countries or territories,
   (b) governments of countries or territories,
   (c) other international organisations, or
   (d) a mixture of any of the above.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify subsections (1) to (3).

(5) Regulations under subsection (4) are subject to the negative procedure.

Use of live television link

(1) After section 288G of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

   “Use of live television link

288H Participation through live television link

(1) Where the court so determines, a detained person is to participate in a specified hearing by means of a live television link.

(2) The court—
   (a) must give the parties in the case an opportunity to make representations before making a determination under subsection (1),
   (b) may make such a determination only if it considers that to do so is not contrary to the interests of justice.

(3) The court may require a detained person to participate by means of a live television link in an ad hoc hearing held for the sole purpose of considering whether to make a determination under subsection (1) with respect to a specified hearing.

(4) Where a detained person participates in a specified hearing or such an ad hoc hearing by means of a live television link—
   (a) a place of detention is, for the purposes of the hearing, deemed to be part of the court-room, and
(b) accordingly, the hearing is deemed to take place in the presence of the detained person.

(5) In this section—

“court-room” includes chambers,

“live television link” means live television link between a place of detention and the court-room in which a specified hearing is or (as the case may be) is to be held.

288I Evidence and personal appearance

(1) No evidence as to a charge may be led or presented at a specified hearing in respect of which there is a determination under section 288H(1).

(2) The court—

(a) may, at any time before or at a specified hearing, revoke a determination under section 288H(1),

(b) must do so in relation to a detained person if it considers that it is in the interests of justice for the detained person to appear in person.

(3) Where this subsection applies—

(a) the court may postpone a specified hearing to the next day which is not a Saturday, Sunday or a court holiday, and

(b) the period of any such postponement is not to count towards any time limit applying in respect of the case.

(4) Subsection (3) applies where, on the day on which a specified hearing takes place or is due to take place—

(a) the court decides not to make a determination under section 288H(1) with respect to the hearing, or

(b) the court revokes such a determination under subsection (2).

(5) But subsection (3) does not apply where a specified hearing is one at which the detained person is, or is to be, brought before the court in accordance with section 18(2) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2014.

288J Specified hearings

(1) The Lord Justice General may by directions specify types of hearing at the High Court, sheriff court and JP court in which a detained person may participate in accordance with section 288H(1).

(2) Directions under subsection (1) may specify types of hearing by reference to—

(a) the venues at which they take place,

(b) particular places of detention,

(c) categories of cases or proceedings to which they relate.

(3) Directions under subsection (1) may—

(a) vary or revoke earlier such directions,
(b) make different provision for different purposes.

(4) The validity of any proceedings is not affected by the participation of a detained person by means of a live television link in a hearing that is not a specified hearing.

(5) In this section, “hearing” includes any diet or hearing in criminal proceedings which may be held in the presence of an accused, a convicted person or an appellant in the proceedings.

288K Defined terms

For the purpose of sections 288H to 288J—

“detained person” means person who is—

(a) an accused, a convicted person or an appellant in the case to which a specified hearing relates, and

(b) imprisoned or otherwise lawfully detained (whether or not in connection with an offence) at any place in Scotland,

“place of detention” means place in which a detained person is imprisoned or detained, “specified hearing” means hearing of a type specified in directions having effect for the time being under section 288J.”.

(2) In addition—

(a) in section 117 (presence of appellant or applicant at hearing) of the 1995 Act—

(i) subsection (6) is repealed,

(ii) in subsection (7), for the word “(6)” there is substituted “(5),”

(b) section 80 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 is repealed.

CHAPTER 2

POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

87 Establishment and functions

(1) After section 55 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 there is inserted—

“CHAPTER 8A

POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

55A Establishment of the PNBS

(1) There is established a body to be known as the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

(2) Schedule 2A makes further provision about the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

(3) In this Chapter, the references to the PNBS are to the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.
55B Representations about pay etc.

(1) The PNBS may make representations to the Scottish Ministers about—
   (a) any draft regulations shared with it under section 54(1)(a),
   (b) any draft determination of a kind mentioned in subsection (2),
   (c) the matters mentioned in subsection (4) generally.

(2) The draft determination referred to in subsection (1)(b) is a draft of a determination to be made by the Scottish Ministers—
   (a) in relation to a matter mentioned in subsection (4), and
   (b) by virtue of regulations made under section 48.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may, after consulting the chairperson of the PNBS—
   (a) require the PNBS to make representations under subsection (1),
   (b) set a time period within which it must do so.

(4) The matters referred to in subsections (1)(c) and (2)(a) are the following matters in relation to constables (other than special constables) and police cadets—
   (a) pay, allowances and expenses,
   (b) public holidays and leave,
   (c) the issue, use and return of police clothing and equipment,
   (d) hours of duty.

55C Representations on other matters

(1) The PNBS may make representations to the Scottish Ministers about—
   (a) any draft regulations shared with it under section 54(2),
   (b) the matters mentioned in subsection (2) generally.

(2) The matters referred to in subsection (1)(b) are matters relating to the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables (other than special constables) and police cadets.

(3) But those matters do not include the matters mentioned in section 55B(4).

55D Reporting by the PNBS

(1) The PNBS must, as soon as practicable after the end of each reporting year, prepare a report on how it has carried out its functions during that year.

(2) The PNBS must—
   (a) give a copy of each report to the Scottish Ministers,
   (b) publish each report in such manner as it considers appropriate.

(3) In subsection (1), “reporting year” means yearly period ending on 31 March.”.

(2) In section 54 (consultation on regulations) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, in subsection (1)—
(a) for the words from “61(1)” to “pensions)” there is substituted “55B(4)”,
(b) in paragraph (a), for the words “the United Kingdom” there is substituted “Scotland”.

3 After schedule 2 to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 there is inserted (as schedule 2A to that Act) the schedule set out in schedule 3.

PART 7

Final provisions

Ancillary and definition

88 Ancillary regulations

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make such supplemental, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider necessary or expedient for the purposes of or in connection with this Act.

(2) Regulations under this section—

(a) are subject to the affirmative procedure if they add to, replace or omit any part of the text of an Act (including this Act),

(b) otherwise, are subject to the negative procedure.

89 Meaning of “the 1995 Act”

In this Act, “the 1995 Act” means the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

Commencement and short title

90 Commencement

(1) This Part comes into force on the day after Royal Assent.

(2) The other provisions of this Act come into force on such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

(3) An order under subsection (2) may include transitional, transitory or saving provision.

91 Short title

The short title of this Act is the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2014.
MODIFICATIONS IN CONNECTION WITH PART 1

PART 1

PROVISIONS AS TO ARREST

Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995

1 The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

2 These provisions are repealed—
   (a) in section 13, subsection (7),
   (b) section 21.

3 In section 28—
   (a) in subsection (1), for the words “has broken, is breaking, or is likely to break” there is substituted “is likely to breach”,
   (b) in subsection (1A), for the words “has breached, or is likely to breach,” there is substituted “is likely to breach”.

4 (1) In section 234A, subsections (4A) and (4B) are repealed.
    (2) In subsection (11) of section 234AA, for the words from the beginning to “those sections apply” there is substituted “Section 9 (breach of orders) of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 applies in relation to antisocial behaviour orders made under this section as that section applies”.

Miscellaneous enactments

5 In section 4 of the Trespass (Scotland) Act 1865, for the words from the beginning to “every” in the last place where it occurs there is substituted “A”.

6 In subsection (3) of section 1 of the Public Meeting Act 1908, the words from “, and if he refuses” to the end are repealed.

7 In the Firearms Act 1968, section 50 is repealed.

8 In the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982—
   (a) in section 59, subsections (1), (2) and (5) are repealed,
   (b) in section 65, subsections (4) and (5) are repealed,
   (c) in subsection (1) of section 80, for the words from “and taken” to the end there is substituted “by a constable”.

9 In the Child Abduction Act 1984, section 7 is repealed.

10 In section 11 of the Protection of Badgers Act 1992, paragraph (c) of subsection (1) is repealed.

11 In the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, section 60B is repealed.
12 In section 8B of the Olympic Symbol etc. (Protection) Act 1995, subsections (2) and (3) are repealed.

13 In the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995—
   (a) in section 7, subsection (4) is repealed,
   (b) in section 47, subsection (3) is repealed,
   (c) in section 48, subsection (3) is repealed,
   (d) in section 50, subsections (3) and (5) are repealed.

14 In the Deer (Scotland) Act 1996, section 28 is repealed.

15 In section 61 of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997, subsection (5) is repealed.

16 In the Protection of Wild Mammals (Scotland) Act 2002, paragraph (a) of subsection (1) is repealed.

17 In the Fireworks Act 2003—
   (a) in section 11A, subsection (6) is repealed,
   (b) section 11B is repealed.

18 In section 307 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003, subsection (4) is repealed.

19 In the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004—
   (a) section 11 is repealed,
   (b) in section 22, subsections (3) and (4) are repealed,
   (c) section 38 is repealed.

20 In section 130 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, subsection (3) is repealed.

21 In the Animal Health and Welfare (Scotland) Act 2006, in schedule 1—
   (a) paragraph 16 is repealed,
   (b) in paragraph 18(b)(i), the words “except paragraph 16” are repealed.

22 In the Prostitution (Public Places) (Scotland) Act 2007, section 2 is repealed.

23 In section 32 of the Glasgow Commonwealth Games Act 2008, subsections (3) and (4) are repealed.

24 In section 7 of the Tobacco and Primary Medical Services (Scotland) Act 2010, subsection (4) is repealed.

25 In section 9 of the Forced Marriage etc. (Protection and Jurisdiction) (Scotland) Act 2011, subsections (2) and (3) are repealed.

PART 2

FURTHER MODIFICATIONS

26 The 1995 Act is amended as follows.
27 These provisions are repealed—
   (a) sections 14 to 15A,
   (b) section 17,
   (c) sections 22 to 22ZB (together with the italic cross-heading immediately preceding section 22),
   (d) in section 135, subsection (3).

28 In section 74, after paragraph (a) of subsection (2) there is inserted—“(aza)may not be taken against a decision taken by virtue of section 27 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2014;”.

29 In section 79—
   (a) for subsection (2)(b)(ii) there is substituted—“(ii) a preliminary objection under any of the provisions listed in subsection (3A);”,
   (b) after subsection (3) there is inserted—
       “(3A) For the purpose of subsection (2)(b)(ii), the provisions are—
          (a) section 27(4A)(a) or (4B), 90C(2A), 255 or 255A of this Act,
          (b) section 9(6) of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 or that section as applied by section 234AA(11) of this Act, (c) section 48(5)(b) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2014.”.

30 Before section 261A there is inserted—“Statements made after charge

261ZB Exception to rule on inadmissibility

Evidence of a statement made by a person in response to questioning carried out in accordance with authorisation granted under section 27 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2014 is not inadmissible on account of the statement’s being made after the person has been charged with an offence.”.

Other enactments

31 In subsection (2)(a) of section 8A of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986, for the words “section 15A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (right of suspects to have access to a solicitor)” there is substituted “section 24 (right to have solicitor present) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2014”.

32 In the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010, sections 1, 3 and 4 are repealed.

33 In section 20 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, subsections (2) and (3) are repealed.
SCHEDULE 2
(introduced by section 61)

MODIFICATIONS IN CONNECTION WITH PART 2

PART 1

TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS

People trafficking aggravations

1  (1) Evidence from a single source is sufficient to prove that an offence is aggravated as described in section 83.

(2) Evidence from a single source is sufficient to prove that an offence is aggravated as described in section 84.

2  Paragraph 1 has effect only for the purpose of any proceedings in relation to which section 57 does not apply.

Children (Scotland) Act 1995

3  (1) Sub-paragraph (2) has effect for as long as the relevant section of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 continues to apply to any proceedings under Part II of that Act (despite the repeal of that section by the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011).

(2) Section 57 applies—

(a) in relation to the ground for a referral for which the relevant section makes provision, and

(b) as if any such proceedings with respect to the ground were criminal proceedings.

4  For the purpose of paragraph 3, the relevant section of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 is section 68(3) of that Act.

PART 2

CONSEQUENTIAL PROVISIONS

Companies, land and rail

5  In section 149 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845, the words from “, either” to “more,“ are repealed.

6  In section 130 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845, the words from “, either” to “more,” are repealed.

7  In section 137 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845, the words from “, either” to “more,” are repealed.

Fisheries and wildlife

8  (1) In the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries (Protection) (Scotland) Act 1951, sections 7(3) and 7A(3) (so far as they are not already repealed) are repealed.

(2) In section 10C of the Salmon Act 1986, the following provisions (so far as they are not already repealed) are repealed—
(a) in subsection (2), the words “7(3) (evidence),”;
(b) subsection (3)(a).

(3) In the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 2003—
(a) sections 9(3), 10(2), 13(5), 14(3), 15(4), 16(4), 17(5), 17A(5), 17B(6), 18(3), 19(4) and 20(4) are repealed,
(b) in section 23(7), the words from “may” to “and” are repealed,
(c) sections 31(8), 33A(6), 38(8) and 51A(9) are repealed.

(4) In the Scotland Act 1998 (River Tweed) Order 2006 (S.I. 2006/2913)—
(a) articles 30(3), 32(3), 35(5), 37(4), 38(3), 39(4), 41(4), 42(4) and 43(4) are revoked,
(b) in article 46(7), the words from “may” to “and” are revoked,
(c) articles 52(8) and 54(8) are revoked.

9 Section 19A of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 is repealed.
10 Section 23(5) of the Deer (Scotland) Act 1996 is repealed.
15 In the schedule to the Aquaculture and Fisheries (Scotland) Act 2007, paragraph 6(2) is repealed.
12 Section 12 of the Wildlife and Natural Environment (Scotland) Act 2011 is repealed.

Environmental matters

13 Section 87(7) of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 is repealed.
14 Section 1(4) of the Dog Fouling (Scotland) Act 2003 is repealed.

Road traffic law

15 (1) Section 21 of the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988 is repealed.
(2) In Schedule 4 to the Road Traffic Act 1991, paragraph 89 is repealed.
16 Section 54 of the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994 is repealed.

25 Offences against persons

17 (1) In section 96(2) of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, the words from “and evidence” to the end are repealed.
(2) Section 74(5) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 is repealed.
(3) Sections 1(4) and 2(4) of the Offences (Aggravation by Prejudice) (Scotland) Act 2009 are repealed.
(4) Section 29(4) of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 is repealed.
18 Sections 4(6) and 5(5) of the Emergency Workers (Scotland) Act 2005 are repealed.
Breach of court orders

19 Section 18(3) of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 is repealed.

20 (1) Sections 227ZD(1), 234G(3) and 245F(2A) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 are repealed.

(2) Section 58 of the Criminal Proceedings etc. (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007 is repealed.

Proof at children’s hearings

21 In section 102 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, after subsection (3) there is inserted—

“(3A) Section 57 (corroboration not required) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2014 applies in relation to the ground as if the proceedings with respect to the ground were criminal proceedings.”.

Miscellaneous UK legislation

22 In Schedule 5 to the Finance Act 2002, paragraph 15 is repealed.

23 In the Extradition Act 2003—

(a) in section 7—

(i) paragraph (b) of subsection (7) is repealed,

(ii) the word “but” immediately preceding that paragraph is repealed,

(b) in section 77—

(i) paragraph (b) of subsection (2) is repealed,

(ii) the word “but” immediately preceding that paragraph is repealed,

(c) in section 86(8), the words “(except that for this purpose evidence from a single source shall be sufficient)” are repealed.

24 Section 31(4) of the Counter-Terrorism Act 2008 is repealed.

SCHEDULE 3
(introduced by section 87)

POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

“SCHEDULE 2A
(introduced by section 55A)

POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

Status of the PNBS

1 (1) The PNBS—

(a) is not a servant or agent of the Crown, and

(b) has no status, immunity or privilege of the Crown.
(2) The property of the PNBS is not property of, or property held on behalf of, the Crown.

Chairing and membership

2 (1) The PNBS is to consist of—

(a) a chairperson,

(b) a deputy chairperson,

(c) other persons representing the interests of each of—

(i) the Authority,

(ii) the chief constable,

(iii) constables (other than special constables) and police cadets,

(iv) the Scottish Ministers.

(2) It is for the Scottish Ministers to appoint the chairperson and deputy chairperson.

(3) Other members are to be appointed in accordance with the constitution prepared under paragraph 4.

(4) A member of the PNBS holds and vacates office in accordance with the terms of the member’s appointment.

(5) The chairperson or deputy chairperson may—

(a) resign from office by giving notice in writing to the Scottish Ministers,

(b) be removed from office if, in the opinion of the Scottish Ministers, the person is unable, unfit or unwilling to perform the functions of the office.

Disqualification from chairing

3 A person is disqualified from appointment, and from holding office, as chairperson or deputy chairperson of the PNBS if the person is or becomes—

(a) a member of the House of Commons,

(b) a member of the Scottish Parliament,

(c) a member of the European Parliament,

(d) a Minister of the Crown,

(e) a member of the Scottish Government,

(f) a civil servant.

Constitution and procedure etc.

4 (1) It is for the Scottish Ministers to prepare the constitution for the PNBS.

(2) The constitution—

(a) must regulate the procedure for the PNBS to reach agreement on representations to be made under section 55B(1),
(b) may require such agreement to be reached by arbitration in such circumstances as are described in the constitution.

(3) The constitution may contain provision about—

(a) membership (including number of members to represent each of the interests mentioned in paragraph 2(1)(c)),

(b) internal organisation (for example, committees and office-holders),

(c) procedures to be followed (including conduct of meetings),

(d) the content of a report required by section 55D,

(e) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(4) The Scottish Ministers—

(a) must keep the constitution under review,

(b) may revise it from time to time.

(5) Before preparing or revising the constitution, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) the Authority,

(b) the chief constable, and

(c) persons representing the interests of constables (other than special constables) and police cadets.

Remuneration and expenses

(1) The Scottish Ministers may pay—

(a) such remuneration to the chairperson and deputy chairperson of the PNBS as they think fit,

(b) such expenses of the members of the PNBS as they think fit.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must pay such expenses as they consider are reasonably required to be incurred to enable the PNBS to carry out its functions.”.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill
[AS INTRODUCED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about criminal justice including as to police powers and rights of suspects and as to criminal evidence, procedure and sentencing; to establish the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland; and for connected purposes.

Introduced by: Kenny MacAskill
On: 20 June 2013
Bill type: Government Bill
CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL

EXPLANATORY NOTES

(AND OTHER ACCOMPANYING DOCUMENTS)

CONTENTS

As required under Rule 9.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, the following documents are published to accompany the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013:

- Explanatory Notes;
- a Financial Memorandum;
- a Scottish Government Statement on legislative competence; and
- the Presiding Officer’s Statement on legislative competence.

A Policy Memorandum is printed separately as SP Bill 35–PM.
EXPLANATORY NOTES

INTRODUCTION

1. These Explanatory Notes have been prepared by the Scottish Government in order to assist the reader of the Bill and to help inform debate on it. They do not form part of the Bill and have not been endorsed by the Parliament. Any examples provided are purely illustrative and do not imply that provisions do not apply in other circumstances.

2. The Notes should be read in conjunction with the Bill. They are not, and are not meant to be, a comprehensive description of the Bill. So where a section or schedule, or a part of a section or schedule, does not seem to require any explanation or comment, none is given.

OVERVIEW OF THE BILL

3. The Bill seeks to support the aims set out in the Policy Memorandum by introducing reforms to modernise and enhance the efficiency of the Scottish criminal justice system. The provisions in the Bill take forward a range of the Scottish Government’s key justice priorities. Some of these provisions have been developed from the recommendations of two independent reviews: Lord Carloway’s review of criminal law and practice\(^1\) and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s review of sheriff and jury procedure\(^2\). The Scottish Government sought views on Lord Carloway’s\(^3\) and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s\(^4\) recommendations in two separate consultations. A further consultation was also carried out on whether additional safeguards\(^5\) may be required if the requirement for corroboration is removed. Further information on these consultations can be found in the Policy Memorandum.

4. The Bill is in seven Parts.

5. Part 1 (Arrest and custody) includes provisions on the powers of the police to arrest, hold in custody and question a person who is suspected of committing an offence. This part also provides for the rights of such persons in custody and makes specific provision for vulnerable adults and children.

6. Part 2 (Corroboration and statements) provides for the abolition of the corroboration rule in criminal proceedings as well as the admissibility of mixed and exculpatory statements.

7. Part 3 (Solemn procedure) makes a number of amendments to the solemn procedure set out in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). These include imposing a duty on parties in criminal proceedings to communicate, increasing the length of time for which an accused person can be remanded before having to be brought to trial from 110 to 140 days, and increasing the jury majority required for a guilty verdict.

---

\(^1\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/Review/CarlowayReview
\(^2\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2010/06/10093251/0
\(^3\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/4794
\(^4\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/8141/0
\(^5\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/4628
8. Part 4 (Sentencing) increases the maximum sentence for handling offensive weapons offences, places a specific duty on the court to consider whether it is appropriate to punish an offender for committing an offence while on early release, and increases the flexibility for different levels of court to consider imposing a punishment on such offenders.

9. Part 5 (Appeals and SCCRC) amends the 1995 Act to make changes to appeal procedures in the High Court and adjusts how the Appeal Court will consider Scottish Criminal Case Review Commission referrals.

10. Part 6 (Miscellaneous) creates a statutory aggravation of people trafficking which will apply in cases where an accused commits an offence connected with people trafficking. This Part also makes provision to enable the use of TV links by courts and establishes and sets out the functions for a Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

11. Part 7 contains general and ancillary provisions.

COMMENTARY ON SECTIONS

Part 1 – Arrest and custody

Chapter 1 – Arrest by police

Arrest without warrant

Section 1 – Power of a constable

12. Section 1 sets out new powers of a police constable to arrest, without a warrant, a person suspected of having committed or to be committing an offence in Scotland. (Note, however, that the arrest regime under the Terrorism Act 2000 is unaffected by the Bill (see sections 50(b) and 53)).

13. Section 1(1) provides that a constable (defined in section 54) who has reasonable grounds to suspect that a person has committed or is committing an offence may arrest that person without a warrant.

14. Section 1(2) qualifies the power of a constable to arrest a person without warrant for having committed an offence which is not punishable by imprisonment. Not only must a constable have reasonable grounds for suspecting the person, the constable must also be satisfied that the “interests of justice” would not be met if the person was not immediately arrested for the offence. Section 1(3) sets out factors that may be relevant in applying the “interests of justice” test referred to in section 1(2).

Section 2 – Exercise of the power

15. Section 2 sets out how the power of arrest set out in section 1 can be exercised.
16. Section 2(1) provides that a person may be arrested under section 1 multiple times for the same offence (e.g. a person may be arrested, questioned and released and subsequently arrested again if, for example, further evidence comes to light).

17. Section 2(2) clarifies that the power to arrest again does not apply to persons who have been “officially accused” (defined in section 55) of having committed the offence or an offence arising from the same circumstances. For example, the police cannot use the power of arrest to arrest a person without a warrant if they have a warrant to arrest the person.

Procedure following arrest

Section 3 – Information to be given on arrest

18. Section 3 specifies the information which must be provided by a constable, as soon as is reasonably practicable, to an arrested person. The information will normally be provided immediately upon arrest.

Section 4 – Arrested person to be taken to police station

19. Section 4 sets out the requirement on a constable to take an arrested person to a police station as soon as is reasonably practicable after arrest (if not arrested there). By virtue of section 37 a constable may use reasonable force when doing so.

Section 5 – Information to be given at police station

20. Section 5 sets out the information that must be provided to a person taken to a police station under arrest and to those arrested whilst at a police station.

21. In particular, section 5(2) and (3) set out various matters that the arrested person must be informed of, as soon as reasonably practicable, e.g. their right not to say anything other than to provide information relating to their name, address etc.; their rights to have intimation sent, and to have access, to solicitors and, where appropriate, persons such as parents or other persons capable of giving support; and their rights under Articles 3 and 4 of Directive 2012/13/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council, including, for example, a letter of rights which contains basic information to assist persons in understanding their rights.

Section 6 – Information to be recorded by police

22. Section 6 details the information which must be recorded by the police when a person is arrested under section 1.

23. Section 6(1) provides a list of the information to be recorded in respect of all arrests.

24. Section 6(2) to (5) specifies the information that must be recorded in relation to a person arrested and held in police custody (defined in section 56) but not officially charged with an offence e.g. the timing and outcome of a police decision on whether to authorise their continued custody; the time and outcome of any review of continued custody; the time a person is released from custody on conditions or charged.
Chapter 2 – Custody: person not officially accused

Keeping person in custody

Section 7 – Authorisation for keeping in custody

25. Section 7(1) sets out the procedure for keeping a person in custody where the person has been not been arrested under a warrant or charged with an offence by a constable.

26. Section 7(2) provides that authorisation to keep the person in custody must be sought as soon as reasonably practicable after the person is arrested at a police station or arrives at a police station following arrest.

27. Section 7(3) and (4) provide that authorisation to keep a person in custody may only be given by a constable who has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody and if the test set out in section 10 is met. Section 7(5) provides that if authorisation is refused then the person can continue to be held in custody only if charged with an offence.

Section 8 – Information to be given on authorisation

28. Section 8 provides that at the time when authorisation is given to keep a person in custody under section 7, the person must be informed of the reason they are being kept in custody and that they may only be kept in custody without charge for a maximum of 12 hours.

Section 9 – Review after 6 hours

29. Section 9(1) and (2) provide that where a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of six hours and has not been charged with an offence, a decision must be made on whether to continue to keep that person in custody. That decision must be made as soon as reasonably practicable after the expiry of the period of six hours which started when the authorisation under section 7 was given. In making that decision, the test set out in section 10 is applied (referred to below). Under section 9(3) the decision must be made by a constable of the rank of inspector or above, who has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody. If the test set out in section 10 is not met, the person may continue to be held in custody only if they are charged with an offence.

Section 10 – Test for sections 7 and 9

30. Section 10 sets out the test for keeping a person in custody under section 7(4) and reviewing continuation of that period of custody after six hours under section 9(2).

31. Section 10(1) provides that the test is that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed an offence and keeping the person in custody is necessary and proportionate for the purposes of bringing the person before a court or otherwise dealing with the person under the law. In considering what is “necessary and proportionate” regard may be had to (among others) the factors detailed in section 10(2).
Section 11 – 12 hour limit: general rule

32. Section 11 provides that a person may not continue to be held in custody after a continuous period of 12 hours unless that person is then charged with an offence by a constable. The period of 12 hours begins at the point when authorisation to keep a person in custody is given by a constable in accordance with section 7. After the expiry of 12 hours if the person is not charged, they must be released, perhaps conditionally, if appropriate (see section 14).

Section 12 – 12 hour limit: previous period

33. Where a person is held in custody on more than one occasion for the same or a related offence, section 12 provides that the 12 hour maximum period of custody (set out in section 11) is reduced by any earlier period during which the person was held in custody for that offence.

Section 13 – Medical treatment

34. Section 13(1) and (2) apply to a person who is taken into police custody having been arrested without a warrant, has not been charged with an offence and is at a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment. They provide that authority to keep a person in custody may be given as though section 7 applies in the hospital as it does in a police station. For the purpose of calculating the 12 hour maximum period of custody set out in section 11, account will be taken of any time during which a person is at a hospital or travelling to one and is being questioned by a constable (section 13(4) to (6)). The same rules apply in calculating any previous period of custody (section 12(3)).

Investigative liberation

Section 14 – Release on conditions

35. Section 14 applies where a person is in police custody by virtue of the authorisation under section 7 (that is, where a person has been arrested without warrant and not charged, including a case where authorisation has been reviewed and continued under section 9) where a constable has reasonable grounds to suspect that the person has committed a relevant offence and the period of 28 days calculated in accordance with subsection (4) has not expired. As explained further below, the effect of section 14 is to enable the police to release such persons from police custody on conditions which may be applied for a maximum period of 28 days. It follows, that a person could not be released again on investigative liberation if arrested again after those 28 days have expired. The meaning of “relevant offence” is given in subsection (6).

36. Subsection (2) provides that a constable of the rank of inspector or above (subsection (5)) may authorise the release of a person from custody on any condition which is necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence. The meaning of “relevant offence” is given in subsection (6).

37. Section 14(3) ensures that any condition imposed is treated as a liberation condition for the purposes of Chapter 7. This means that a breach of any condition may be penalised by a fine or a prison sentence as outlined in Chapter 7 and, a breach which would be an offence were the person not subject to liberation conditions may be taken into account in sentencing for that offence.
Section 15 – Conditions ceasing to apply

38. Section 15 provides when conditions imposed on a person under section 14(2) cease to apply: namely, (under section 16) if the condition is removed by the police by notice, if the person is arrested in connection with a relevant offence (“relevant offence” as defined by section 15(2)), if the person is officially accused of committing a relevant offence, at the end of the 28 day period (described in section 14(4)) or (under section 17) if the condition is removed as a result of an application for review made to a sheriff against the conditions.

Section 16 – Modification or removal of conditions

39. Section 16 enables a constable, by notice, to modify or remove any condition imposed by the police under section 14(2). A modified condition may be more or less onerous than the condition originally set. Under section 16(2) a notice about the modification or removal of a condition must be given in writing to the person who is subject to it and must specify the time from which the condition is modified or removed. Any modification or removal of a condition requires to be approved by a constable of the rank of an inspector or above. This power gives the police the flexibility to adjust conditions in light of changed circumstances.

40. Section 16(3) provides that a constable of the rank of inspector or above must keep under review whether or not there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person who is subject to a condition imposed under section 14(2) has committed a relevant offence (as defined in section 16(8)), and whether the condition imposed remains necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence. If the inspector is no longer satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person who is subject to a condition has committed a relevant offence, the person must be given notice of the removal of the condition. If no longer satisfied that a condition is necessary and proportionate, again the person must be given notice that the condition is being modified or removed.

41. Section 16(6) provides that any such notice must be given in writing to the person as soon as practicable and it must specify as the time from which the condition is modified or removed, the time at which the duty to give the notice arose i.e. the time at which the decision is made by an appropriate constable, to remove or modify the condition.

Section 17 – Review of conditions

42. Section 17(1) provides that a person who is subject to a condition imposed under section 14(2) may make an application for review to a sheriff.

43. Section 17(2) requires the sheriff to give the procurator fiscal an opportunity to make representations before the review is determined.

44. Section 17(3) provides that where the sheriff is not satisfied that the condition imposed is necessary and proportionate, the sheriff may remove it or impose an alternative condition which the sheriff considers to be necessary and proportionate for that purpose.

45. Section 17(4) provides that a condition imposed on review by the sheriff under section 17(3) is to be regarded as having been imposed by a constable under section 14(2). This provides that in effect, the conditions set by the sheriff have the same effect and are to be taken as having taken effect when set by the police, i.e. the 28 day period is calculated from the date on which the police conditions were set. Conditions imposed by the sheriff can be modified or removed under section 16(1) in the same manner as police conditions.

Chapter 3 – Custody: person officially accused

Person to be brought before court

Section 18 – Person to be brought before court

46. Section 18(1) and (2) provide that, wherever practicable, persons kept in custody after being arrested under a warrant or arrested without a warrant and subsequently charged with an offence by a constable, must be brought before a court by the end of the next court day. For example, a person arrested at 11pm on a Tuesday and charged with an offence at 2am on the Wednesday would be due in court not later than the end of the court’s sitting on the Thursday.

47. Section 18(3) provides for persons to be considered to be brought before a court if appearing by television link.

Police liberation

Section 19 – Liberation by police

48. Section 19(1) and (2) provide that where a person is in custody having been charged with an offence, the police may: release that person on an undertaking under section 20, release the person without an undertaking or refuse to release. (Note the provisions do not apply where a person is in custody by virtue of a warrant granted under section 29(1)). It is also relevant to note that under section 41 a constable must take every precaution to ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held in police custody.

49. Section 19(3) provides that a constable will not be liable to any claim because of a refusal to release a person from custody.

Section 20 – Release on undertaking

50. Again, in considering whether to release a person on an undertaking the police will be mindful of their obligations under section 41 of the Bill (duty not to detain unnecessarily). Section 20(1) provides for a person to be released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) only if they sign that undertaking.

51. Section 20(2) specifies the terms of an undertaking and section 20(3) and (4) set out the conditions that an appropriate constable (defined in section 20(5) as a constable of the rank of inspector or above) may impose.
Section 20(6) provides that the requirement imposed by an undertaking to attend at court and comply with conditions are to be taken to be liberation conditions for the purposes of Chapter 7 on breach of liberation conditions. This means that a breach of any condition may be penalised by a fine or a prison sentence as outlined in Chapter 7 and a breach which would be an offence were the person not subject to liberation conditions may be taken into account in sentencing for that offence.

Section 21 – Modification of undertaking

53. Section 21(1) enables the procurator fiscal by notice (effected as set out in section 21(5)) to modify an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a), either by changing the time or place of the court hearing or removing or altering a condition in the undertaking. The manner of citation may be effected, for example, by delivering the notice personally or leaving it at the person’s home.

54. Section 21(2) provides that any alteration to a condition in an undertaking should not make a condition more onerous on the person.

55. Section 21(3) provides for the procurator fiscal to rescind an undertaking. This would be appropriate, for example, if a decision is made not to prosecute. Section 21(4) provides for the circumstances in which an undertaking will expire.

Section 22 – Review of undertaking

56. Section 22(1) enables a person subject to an undertaking to apply to the sheriff for review.

57. Section 22(2) provides that the sheriff must provide the procurator fiscal with an opportunity to make representations with regard to the review. Section 22(3) provides that the sheriff may either remove a condition or impose any alternative condition that the sheriff considers to be necessary and proportionate.

Chapter 4 – Police interview

Rights of suspects

Section 23 – Information to be given before interview

58. Section 23 applies to a person who is either in police custody (defined in section 56) or has voluntarily attended a police station, or other place, for the purpose of being interviewed by the police.

59. It requires a constable to inform a person suspected of committing an offence of their rights at the most one hour before any interview commences. These rights are:

- the right not to say anything other than to provide the person’s name, address, date of birth, place of birth and nationality;
- the right to have a solicitor present during any interview; and
• if the person is being held in police custody, the rights detailed in Chapter 5, namely: the right to have another person informed that the person is in custody, the right to have a solicitor informed that the person is in custody and the person’s right of access to a solicitor whilst in custody.

60. Subsection (3) provides that if a person has already exercised their right to have another person or solicitor informed of their custody, then the police are not required to inform the person of these rights a second time.

61. For the purpose of this section, a constable is not to be regarded as interviewing a person about an offence merely by asking for the person’s name, address, date of birth, place of birth and nationality. As such, a constable does not have to inform the person of their rights, as detailed at subsection (2), before asking the person for these details.

Section 24 – Right to have solicitor present

62. This section provides for the right of a person reasonably suspected of committing an offence to have a solicitor present during police interview. It applies to a person who is either in police custody or has voluntarily attended a police station, or other place, for the purpose of being interviewed by a constable.

63. Section 24(3) provides that unless a person has consented to be interviewed without a solicitor present, a constable must not start to interview the person about the alleged offence until a solicitor is present and must not deny the solicitor access to the person at any time during interview.

64. Under subsection (4), a constable may start to interview the person without a solicitor present if satisfied it is necessary to interview the person without delay in the interests of the investigation or prevention of crime, or the apprehension of offenders. This is a high test. If a solicitor becomes available during such time as the police are interviewing a person, the solicitor must be allowed access to that person.

65. For the purpose of this section, a constable is not to be regarded as interviewing a person about an offence merely by asking for the person’s name, address, date of birth, place of birth and nationality. As such, a constable does not have to wait for a solicitor to be present before asking a person for these details.

66. Subsection (6)(a) and (b) provides for a record to be made of the time at which a person consents to be interviewed without a solicitor present and any reason the person gives for waiving the right to have a solicitor present. A person may revoke their consent at any time and in such a case the police must record the time at which a person requests that intimation is sent to a solicitor and the time that intimation is sent (section 6(1)(f) and (g)).

Section 25 – Consent to interview without solicitor

67. Subsection (2)(a) provides that a person under 16 years of age may not consent to be interviewed without a solicitor present.
68. Subsection (2)(b) provides that a person aged 16 years and over and, owing to a mental disorder (as defined in subsection (6)(a)), is considered by a constable to be unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or to communicate effectively with the police, may not consent to be interviewed without a solicitor present.

69. Subsections (3), (4) and (5) provide that a person who is 16 or 17 years of age and not suffering from a mental disorder may consent to be interviewed without a solicitor present with the agreement of a “relevant person”. If the person aged 16 or 17 years is in police custody, a “relevant person” means any person who could by virtue of section 32(2) visit the person. If the person aged 16 or 17 is not in police custody, a “relevant person” means a person who is at least 18 years of age and is reasonably named by the 16 or 17 year old.

Person not officially accused

Section 26 – Questioning following arrest

70. Section 26 enables a constable to question a person following arrest provided the person has not been officially accused of the offence (i.e. charged with the offence by the police or where a prosecutor has started proceedings in relation to the offence), or an offence arising from the same circumstances. The person has the right, however, not to answer any questions but must provide the police with their name, address, date of birth, place of birth and nationality.

71. Under subsection (3), the use, in evidence, of any answers given by a person during questioning is subject to the laws on admissibility. In general terms, this means that any questioning must be fair.

Person officially accused

Section 27 – Authorisation for questioning

72. Section 27 introduces a regime to allow the court to authorise a constable to question an accused person after the person has been officially accused of an offence or offences.

73. Subsection (1) confirms that the court may authorise a constable to carry out questioning once this stage has been reached. There is no provision for any other person, such as a prosecutor, to be so authorised.

74. Subsections (2) and (3) set out the circumstances in which the court can allow this questioning to take place. These provisions are designed to ensure that this power is exercised proportionately, having regard both to the rights of the accused person and to the public interest in gathering evidence in respect of an alleged criminal offence.

75. Thus subsection (2) provides that the court needs to be satisfied that the proposed questioning is in the interests of justice.

76. Subsection (3) sets out further factors which the court must take into account when deciding whether or not to authorise an application for questioning.
77. Subsection (5) applies where a court has granted an application to authorise questioning after the case has called in court, either having been commenced by means of a warrant, or where the accused has appeared in court. In those circumstances, subsection (4) gives the accused person the right to be heard by the court before any decision on the application is made. The person can be represented by a solicitor for these purposes, if the person wishes. It follows that the person has no similar right to be heard in respect of an application about a case which has not yet called in court.

78. Subsection (6) applies where the court has decided to grant the application and authorise questioning. In that event, subsection (6)(a) provides that the court must specify the length of time during which a constable may question the accused person. Subsection (6)(b) allows, but does not require, a court to place other conditions on the questioning to ensure that it is not unfair to the accused person. This might, for example, mean a restriction on the subject matter about which the accused person can properly be questioned.

79. Subsection (7) provides that there is no right of appeal against the decision of a court either to grant or refuse authorisation, or against any conditions imposed by the court under subsection (6)(b).

80. Subsection (8) defines the word “court” for the purposes of this section.

Section 28 – Authorisation: further provision

81. Section 28 makes further provision in respect of questioning after a person has been officially accused of an offence.

82. Subsection (1) sets out who may make an application for authorisation. Where the case against the accused person has called in court in terms of section 27(5), subsection (1)(a) provides that the application must be made by a prosecutor; otherwise the application should be made by a constable (subsection (1)(b)). In the former case, though, even if the application is granted, the questioning will be carried out by a constable, in terms of section 27(1); the prosecutor’s limited right to question an accused person at the inception of solemn proceedings only (generally known as “judicial examination”) is abolished by section 63 of this Bill.

83. Subsection (2) defines “prosecutor” for the purposes of subsection (1).

84. Subsection (3)(a) gives the High Court of Justiciary the power to prescribe, in an Act of Adjournal, the form in which a written application seeking authorisation must be made; and a written application should closely follow that form. Subsection (3)(b), by requiring an applicant to include details of any previous applications for authorisation to question the accused person, either about the same offence, or about another offence arising out of the same circumstances, will ensure that the court has information about any such previous applications.

85. Subsection (4) sets out when authorisation to question the accused person comes to an end: either when the period stipulated by the court under section 27(6)(a) expires; or, when the trial of the accused person starts. Subsection (5) defines when a trial is deemed to have started for this section.
86. Subsection (6) defines “authorisation” and “offence” for the purposes of this section.

Section 29 – Arrest to facilitate questioning

87. Where the police wish to question someone who has been officially accused of an offence, but is at liberty, section 29 provides that it will be open to the court to grant a warrant for the arrest of the accused person so the person can be detained for the purposes of questioning.

88. Subsection (1) provides that, when granting authorisation for questioning, a court can grant a warrant for the accused person’s arrest if it is expedient to do so.

89. Subsection (2) protects the accused person from indefinite detention, by requiring that if the court grants an application for a warrant it must put a time limit on the period for which the person can be detained to be questioned. Subsection (3) makes provision as to when the accused person’s detention, under a warrant granted in terms of this section, must come to an end.

90. Subsection (4) clarifies when an accused person’s detention under a warrant granted in terms of this section starts, making it possible to determine when the period specified in section 29(3)(a) has expired.

91. Subsections (5)(a) and (b) put it beyond doubt that a warrant under this section does not operate to recall or affect the operation of any bail order that the accused person might be on, whether in the same proceedings or not. While the accused person is in custody, having been detained and arrested on the warrant, subsection 24(5)(b) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which makes it a condition of bail that the accused does not commit an offence while on bail, remains in force. This means that if the person commits an offence while detained in custody under a warrant granted in terms of this section, it would be a breach of that condition of bail. Once the accused person’s detention ends, the bail order applies in full, including any conditions attached to that order.

92. Similarly, subsection (5)(c) makes it clear that, where an accused person has been liberated on an undertaking in terms of section 19 of this Bill, the terms and conditions of the undertaking remain in force where a warrant is granted for the accused person, and continue in force after arrest and detention on that warrant.

Chapter 5 – Rights of suspects in police custody

Intimation and access to another person

Section 30 – Right to have intimation sent to other person

93. Section 30 affords a person in police custody the right to have someone else informed that the person is in police custody and where they are being held in custody.

94. This intimation must be sent as soon as reasonably practicable after the person arrives at a police station unless a delay is considered necessary in the interests of the investigation or prevention of crime, or the apprehension of offenders (subsection (5)). Where such a delay is required, it should be for no longer than necessary (subsection (4)(b)).
95. If a constable believes that the person in police custody is under 16 years of age, under subsections (2)(a) and (3)(a), a parent must be informed, regardless of whether the person requests that intimation be sent. The definition of a parent for this section and section 31 includes a guardian and any other person who has the care of the person (subsection (6)).

Section 31 – Right to have intimation sent: under 18s

96. Under this section, if a constable believes that a person in police custody is under 18 years of age, the person sent intimation under section 30 must be asked to attend at the police station or other place where the person is being held (subsection (2)). For those under 16 years this means a parent of the person and for those aged 16 and 17 years, an adult named by them (section 30(3)).

97. If a constable believes that a person in police custody is under 18 years of age and finds that the person to whom intimation is to be sent is not contactable within a reasonable time, or is unable or unwilling to attend in a reasonable time, then intimation must be sent to another appropriate person. An “appropriate person” for these purposes might be a parent or guardian or carer or as a final resort, a duty social worker from the local authority.

98. Where the person in police custody is believed to be under 16, attempts to send intimation must continue until an “appropriate person” is contacted and agrees to attend at the police station or other place the person is being held within a reasonable time. For these purposes, an “appropriate person” means a person the police consider appropriate having regard to the views of the person in police custody.

99. Where the person in police custody is believed to be 16 or 17 years of age, attempts to send intimation must continue until attempts to send intimation must continue until an “appropriate person” is contacted and agrees to attend at the police station or other place the person is being held within a reasonable time or the person in custody requests that, for the time being, no further attempts be made. For these purposes an “appropriate person” means an adult who is named by the person in custody and to whom a constable is willing to send intimation without delay.

100. Subsection (6) provides that, where the police delay sending intimation by virtue of section 30(4)(b) (which allows the police to delay sending intimation where the person to be contacted is someone the police fear will compromise the investigation or the apprehension of offenders), they must endeavour to contact another appropriate person in accordance with subsection (4)).

Section 32 – Right of under 18s to have access to other person

101. Section 32 provides for children under 18 years of age in police custody to have access to another person.

102. Under subsection (1) all children under 16 years of age in police custody must have access, in the first instance, to any parent (defined in subsection (4) to include guardians and carers) to provide support. Subsection (1)(b) ensures that where a parent is not available (that is, where they cannot be reached or are unable to attend within a reasonable time), the child has access to another appropriate adult sent intimation under section 30, subject to the caveats in section 32(3).

103. Subsection (2) provides similar rights of access for those aged 16 or 17 years. However, in this case the adult granted access to the 16 or 17 year old does not have to be their parent (in line with section 30, which allows this age group to request that intimation be sent under that section to an adult other than their parent). As explained in section 31, intimation may be sent to more than one person. Access must be provided to at least one person (or more, if it is considered appropriate and in the best interests of the child), subject to the caveats in section 32(3).

104. In both subsection (1) and (2) the reference to reasonable time ensures that the police can provide access to another person where the parent (children aged under 16 years) or the initially and reasonably named person (children aged 16 or 17 years) cannot attend within a reasonable time.

Vulnerable persons

Section 33 – Support for vulnerable persons

105. Section 33 makes provision to identify vulnerable adults in police custody and to provide them with support to assist communication between them and the police. In practice, this support is provided by an Appropriate Adult though this term is not used in the Bill.

106. To ensure support is provided as soon as is reasonably practicable, subsections (1), (2) and (4) provide that, where a police constable (who may have been advised that a person is vulnerable following an initial assessment by the police custody and security officer, who is a uniformed non-warranted officer, whose duties include attending to the wellbeing of a person in their custody) considers that a person in police custody is age 18 or over and is unable, because of a mental disorder, to understand what is happening or to communicate effectively, they must make sure that an Appropriate Adult is told where the person is being held (this is not always at the police station and could be, for example, at a hospital) and that they require the support of an Appropriate Adult.

107. Subsection (3) provides that the role of the Appropriate Adult is to assist a vulnerable person to understand what is happening and to facilitate effective communication between the vulnerable person and the police.

108. Subsection (5) explains that “mental disorder” is as defined in section 328(1) of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 (i.e. “any mental illness, personality disorder, learning disability however caused or manifested”). It also explains that references to the police are to constables or members of police staff as provided for in section 99 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012. This ensures that a constable can delegate certain tasks, such as intimation to an Appropriate Adult, to a civilian member of police staff.
Section 34 – Power to make further provision

109. Section 34 gives the Scottish Ministers regulation making powers to amend the category of person entitled to support from an Appropriate Adult, and what that support should consist of. It also allows the Scottish Ministers to specify who may be considered a suitable person to provide support to a vulnerable person and what training, qualifications or experience are necessary to undertake this role.

Intimation and access to a solicitor

Section 35 – Right to have intimation sent to solicitor

110. Section 35 affords a person in police custody the right to have a solicitor informed, as soon as reasonably practicable after a request is made by the person in police custody, that the person is being held in police custody, where they are being held and that the professional assistance of a solicitor is required. If the person has been officially accused of an offence (i.e. charged with the offence by the police or where a prosecutor has started proceedings in relation to the offence), the person has the right to have a solicitor informed whether they are to be released from custody or, if not, of the court before which the person is to be brought and the day on which the person will be brought before court.

Section 36 – Right to consultation with solicitor

111. Section 36 provides for the right of a person in police custody to have a private consultation with a solicitor at any time. For the purposes of this section, a consultation is defined by subsection (3) as a consultation by such means as considered appropriate, for example, by telephone.

112. Under subsection (2) the police can delay the exercise of this right only so far as necessary in the interest of the investigation or prevention of crime, or the apprehension of offenders.

Chapter 6 – Police powers and duties

Powers of police

Section 37 – Use of reasonable force

113. Section 37 enables a constable to use reasonable force to effect an arrest and when taking a person in custody to any place.

Section 38 – Common law power of entry

114. Section 38 makes clear that any existing powers of a constable to enter any premises for any purposes are not affected by this Bill. Those powers remain.

Section 39 – Common law power of search etc.

115. Section 39(1) similarly preserves any existing powers of a constable in relation to a person arrested and charged, for example, to search them, seize items in their possession and place them in an identification parade (this list is not exhaustive).
Section 40 – Power of search etc. on arrest

116. Section 40 makes clear that the powers described in section 39(2) which can be exercised by a constable in relation to a person after arrest and charge can also be exercised between a person’s arrest and the person being charged.

Duties of police

Section 41 – Duty not to detain unnecessarily

117. Section 41 provides that a constable must ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held in police custody.

Section 42 – Duty to consider child’s best interests

118. Section 42 states that in making decisions to arrest a child (defined for this section in subsection (3) as a person under 18 years of age), hold a child in police custody, interview a child about an offence which the child is suspected of committing, or charge a child with an offence, a constable must treat the need to safeguard and promote the well-being of the child as a primary consideration. This does not mean that the interests of the child are the only consideration or that they are, in all cases, the most important consideration. For example, the need to protect others may prevail.

Chapter 7 – Breach of liberation condition

Section 43 – Offence where condition breached

119. Section 43(1) sets out the circumstances in which a person breaches a liberation condition and thereby commits an offence. A “liberation condition” includes investigative liberation conditions imposed before charge under section 14(2) or requirements imposed by an undertaking given after charge under section 19(2). Section 43(2) provides that section 43(1) does not apply when a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence. Such breaches are dealt with in accordance with section 45. An example of a breach of condition which may, of itself, not constitute a separate offence is a condition not to enter a particular street. If the person subject to the condition is subsequently found in that street, then a breach of liberation has occurred, but not a separate offence. If the condition was that the person was not to approach a particular witness in the case and the person does contact the witness then not only has a breach of condition occurred, but a more serious offence (attempting to defeat the ends of justice) may have taken place.

120. Section 43(3) provides that a complaint may be amended to add an additional charge of an offence of breaching a liberation condition at any time before the trial of an accused for either the original offence (see section 43(4)) or an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

Section 44 – Sentencing for section 43 offence

121. Section 44(1) sets out the penalties applicable to a person convicted of an offence of breaching a liberation condition under section 43. Sections 44(2) to (3) provide that such a penalty may be imposed in addition to any other penalty that may be imposed, even if the total exceeds the maximum penalty for the original offence. The penalties should run consecutively, subject to section 204A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 Act which concerns restriction on consecutive sentences for released prisoners. The provisions put beyond doubt that the penalty imposed for breach of the condition can be imposed on top of the penalty for original offence, even where the penalty imposed for the original offence represents the maximum penalty applicable in the circumstances.

122. Subsections (5) and (6) provide that where a court finds a person guilty of breaching a liberation condition, or the person pleads guilty to that offence, the person may be sent for sentence at any court which is considering the original offence (as defined in subsection (7).

Section 45 – Breach by committing offence

123. Section 45 applies where a person breaches a liberation condition by committing an offence and the fact that the offence was committed whilst the person was subject to a liberation condition is specified in the complaint or indictment. This is distinct from failing to comply with a condition and applies where the person is being prosecuted for the offence committed while on liberation conditions.

124. Section 45(2) requires the court, in determining the penalty for the offence, which constituted the breach of condition, to have regard to the matters specified.

125. Section 45(3) and (4) enable the court to increase the maximum penalty otherwise specified for the offence. This provision effectively displaces the maximum penalty, allowing the court to add to the penalty to take account of the fact that a breach of conditions has occurred as a consequence of the commission of an offence.

126. Section 45(5) requires the court to explain the reasons for the penalty imposed for the offence, whether it imposes an increased penalty or not.

Section 46 – Matters for section 45(2)(b)

127. Where a person breaches an investigative liberation condition, as defined in section 49(a), by committing an offence, the court must have regard to the matters specified in section 46 in determining the penalty.

Section 47 – Matters for section 45(2)(c)

128. Where a person breaches the terms of an undertaking, as defined in section 49(c), (other than the requirement to appear to court) by committing an offence, the court must have regard to the matters specified in section 47 in determining the penalty.

Section 48 – Evidential presumptions

129. In proceedings relating to an offence under section 43(breach of liberation conditions), the evidential presumptions sets out in section 48 apply.
Chapter 8 – General

Common law and enactments

Section 50 – Abolition of pre-enactment powers of arrest
130. Section 50 provides that the only power of arrest which the police have to bring a person into police custody comes from Section 1 of this Bill and Section 41(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000.

Section 51 – Abolition of requirement for constable to charge
131. Section 51 provides that a constable does not have to charge a suspect with a crime at any time and abolishes any rule of law that requires such a charge to be made.

Section 52 – Consequential modification
132. Section 52 provides that schedule 1 to the Bill contains details of changes to existing legislation as a consequence of Part 1. Paragraph 242 provides further detail in regard to schedule 1.

Disapplication of Part

Section 53 – Disapplication to terrorism offences
133. Section 53 provides that Part 1 of the Bill, dealing with arrest and custody, does not apply to persons arrested under the Terrorism Act 2000.

Interpretation of Part

Section 54 – Meaning of constable
134. Section 54 defines the meaning of constable for the purposes of this Part.

Section 55 – Meaning of officially accused
135. Section 55 defines the meaning of the term “officially accused” for the purposes of this Part.

Section 56 – Meaning of police custody
136. Section 56 defines the meaning of police custody for the purposes of this Part.

Part 2 – Corroboration and statements

Abolition of corroboration rule

Section 57 – Corroboration not required
137. Section 57 provides that, subject to the conditions set out in sections 58 and 59, where a fact has been established by evidence in any criminal proceedings, the judge or jury is entitled to find the fact proved by the evidence although the evidence is not corroborated.
138. The effect of this provision is to abolish the requirement in Scots common law that the essential facts of a case must be proven by corroborated evidence, which is to say evidence from two separate sources.

Section 58 – Effect of other enactments

139. Section 58 provides that the removal of the requirement for corroboration does not apply where an enactment specifically provides that, in relation to proceedings for an offence, a fact requires to be proven by corroborated evidence (for example, section 89(2) of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, which provides that a person cannot be convicted for speeding on the uncorroborated evidence of one witness that the person was breaking the speed limit).

Section 59 – Relevant day for application

140. Section 59 provides that section 57 only applies in relation to proceedings for an offence committed on or after the date on which section 57 comes into force. The date on which section 57 comes into force will be specified by the Scottish Ministers in an order under section 90(2).

Section 60 – Deeming as regards offence

141. Section 60 provides that where an offence is committed over a period of time which includes the date on which section 57 comes into force, the requirement for corroborative evidence does not apply to the offence as a whole; meaning that corroborative evidence is not needed to prove those parts of the offence which took place before the date on which section 57 comes into force.

Section 61 – Transitional and consequential

142. Section 61 introduces schedule 2, which contains transitional and consequential provision relating to the removal of the requirement for corroboration. Schedule 2 is explained in paragraphs 243 to 247 of these Notes.

143. Section 61(3) provides that the consequential modifications provided for in Part 2 of schedule 2 only have effect in relation to criminal proceedings to which section 57, removing the requirement for corroboration, applies.

Statements by accused

Section 62 – Statements by accused

144. Section 62 inserts new section 261ZA into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). New section 261ZA will modify the common-law rule on the admissibility of hearsay evidence in criminal proceedings, as it applies to certain types of statement made by an accused.

145. Section 261ZA(1) and (2) provide that evidence of a statement made by an accused in certain circumstances is not inadmissible as evidence of a fact contained in the statement on account of the evidence being hearsay. The provision applies to a statement made by the accused in the course of being questioned (whether as a suspect or not) by a constable or another official investigating an offence.
146. The provision modifies the law relating to hearsay. As explained by the High Court of Justiciary in Morrison v HM Advocate 1991 SLT 57, “The general rule is that hearsay, that is evidence of what another person has said, is inadmissible as evidence of the facts contained in the statement”. That general rule is subject to exceptions. The existing common-law exceptions (discussed in McCutheon v HM Advocate 2002 SLT 27) allow for a statement made by the accused to be admitted as evidence of a fact contained in the statement if it is inculpatory of the accused (e.g. a confession) or “mixed” (e.g. a statement in which the accused puts himself or herself at the locus at the time the offence was committed, but does so in the context of proffering an innocent explanation for why the accused was there). The common-law does not, however, allow evidence of a statement made by the accused to be admitted as evidence of a fact asserted in the statement if the statement is purely exculpatory of the accused.

147. Subject to subsection (3), section 261ZA extends the exceptions by dispensing with the distinctions between inculpatory, exculpatory and mixed statements. The effect is that any statement made by an accused person to a constable or another official investigating an offence is excepted from the general rule that hearsay evidence is not admissible as evidence of a fact contained in the statement, regardless of whether it is inculpatory, exculpatory or “mixed”.

148. By virtue of subsection (3), section 261ZA does not affect the admissibility of evidence of a statement made by an accused as evidence in relation to a co-accused. Section 261 of the 1995 Act lays down special rules which apply before hearsay evidence of a statement by one accused can be admitted in evidence in relation to another accused. Those rules will continue to apply before evidence of a statement made by accused A can be treated as evidence of fact in the case for or against accused B.

149. New section 261ZA is restricted in its effect to superseding objections to the admissibility of evidence based on its hearsay quality. The provision does not override any other objections to the admissibility of evidence of a statement, such as objections to its admissibility based on the fairness of the circumstances in which the statement was made, or based on the content of the statement (for example, section 274 of the 1995 Act, which concerns the admissibility of evidence relating to the sexual history or character of a complainer in a sexual offence case, will still apply).

Part 3 – Solemn procedure

Section 63 – Proceedings on petition

150. Section 63 changes the procedure to be followed at what are usually the first court appearances of a person being prosecuted under solemn procedure, when the person appears on petition.

151. The purpose of these provisions is to abolish the procedure, commonly known as judicial examination, whereby the prosecutor can, at the commencement of a case being prosecuted under solemn procedure, question the accused in the presence of the sheriff. In addition, the section 63 removes the rarely-used option for the accused to make a declaration – broadly, a statement of his or her position in respect of the charge or charges on the petition – at that stage in proceedings.
152. Subsection (1) inserts a provision into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) which removes the accused’s common-law right to be given the opportunity to make a declaration at the commencement of a case being prosecuted under solemn procedure.

153. Subsection (2) both removes from statute various provisions which relate to declarations, and abolishes the procedure known as judicial examination.

154. Subsection (2)(a) removes, from the 1995 Act, provisions which govern the making of declarations, and the right of the prosecutor to question the accused on extra-judicial confessions.

155. Subsection (2)(b) removes from the 1995 Act three sections which enable and regulate procedure at judicial examinations. By so doing, it abolishes the procedure.

156. Subsections (2)(c), (2)(d), and (2)(e) remove from the 1995 Act various provisions in respect of any records made of a judicial examination. These changes are consequential to the abolition of the judicial examination procedure by subsection (2)(b).

Section 64 – Citation of jurors

157. Section 64 removes from section 85(4) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 the requirement to cite potential jurors by registered post or recorded delivery. It thereby allows potential jurors to be cited by any means the sheriff clerk thinks appropriate, which may include electronic means.

Section 65 – Pre-trial time limits

158. Sections 65 to 67 make changes to the procedure followed in proceedings on indictment in the sheriff court.

159. Section 66 introduces a requirement on the prosecution and the defence to communicate and to lodge a written record of their state of preparation in advance of the first diet.

160. Section 67 provides that the arrangement by which a sheriff court indictment assigns dates for both the first diet and the trial ceases to have effect. Instead the court will appoint a trial diet at the first diet, or at a continuation of it, having ascertained the parties’ state of preparation.

161. Section 65 makes changes to the time limits prescribed in section 65 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) which are intended to allow time for the procedure set out in section 66. In particular the period during which the accused can be remanded in custody pending a first diet and trial are brought in line with the corresponding High Court limits to reflect the altered pre-trial procedure.

162. Subsection (2) amends section 65 of the 1995 Act to set out revised time limits for various procedural steps in proceedings on indictment in the sheriff court.

163. The amendments made by subsection (2)(a) and (b) prevent the accused being tried on indictment in the sheriff court where the first diet is not commenced within 11 months of the first appearance on petition. That period can be extended by the court under section 65(3) of the 1995 Act. The 12-month period within which the trial must be commenced, as specified in section 65(1)(b) of the 1995 Act is unaffected. The amended provisions mirror the equivalent arrangements for proceedings in the High Court.

164. Subsection (2)(c) amends the provisions in section 65(4) of the 1995 Act concerning the periods during which the accused person who is committed until liberated in due course of law (i.e. imprisoned to await the outcome of a trial) can be detained by virtue of that committal where an indictment has been served in respect of the sheriff court. The effect of the amendment is that the accused person must be liberated after 110 days, if no first diet has been held, and 140 days if such a diet has been held, unless the trial begins within that period. These periods can be extended by the court under section 65(5) of the 1995 Act. Again, the amended provisions mirror High Court procedure. To assist in the calculation of the time period, subsection (2)(d) amends section 65(9) of the 1995 Act to provide that the first diet in the sheriff and jury court shall be taken to commence when it is called.

165. Subsection (3) amends section 66(6) of the 1995 Act to replace the arrangements whereby an accused person is to be tried on indictment in the sheriff court is given notice of the first diet and trial diet at the same time as being served with the indictment. Instead, the accused will be given notice only of the first diet and the date of the trial diet will be fixed at the first diet. The period within which the first diet must take place will be increased from 15 clear days from the service of the indictment to 29 clear days; this change makes the sheriff court practice consistent with High Court practice.

166. Subsection (4) amends section 72C(4) of the 1995 Act for consistency with the amendment made by subsection (3). Section 72C(4) is a provision in similar terms to section 66(6), it deals with the situation where a fresh indictment has to be served on an accused because a preliminary hearing before the High Court either did not take place when it was supposed to, or was deserted for the time being without another hearing being appointed.

Section 66 – Duty of parties to communicate

167. Section 66 amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) to impose a duty on the prosecution and the defence, in cases indicted to the sheriff court, to communicate and to prepare a written record of their state of preparation.

168. Subsection (2) amends section 71 of the 1995 Act by inserting a new subsection (1ZA) which requires the court to have regard to the written record when ascertaining the parties’ state of preparation at the first diet.

169. Subsection (3) inserts a new section 71C into the 1995 Act. Subsection (2) of this new section requires the prosecutor and the accused’s legal representative (as defined in subsections (8) and (9)) to communicate and jointly to prepare a written record of the state of preparation of their respective cases. The requirement arises where the accused is indicted to the sheriff court and is represented by a solicitor (new section 71C(1)).
170. Subsection (3) of the new section 71C provides that the period within which the communication must take place, and within which the written record of the state of preparation must be prepared is the period beginning with the service of the indictment and ending 14 days later. Subsection (4) provides that the written record thus established must be lodged with the sheriff clerk at least two days before the first diet, though the court may, on cause shown, extend this deadline (subsection (5)).

171. Subsection (6) of the new section 71C provides for the form, content, and arrangements for lodging of the written record, to be prescribed under an Act of Adjournal. Subsection (7) provides that the record must include a statement of how the communication required by this new section took place. Subsection (7) gives examples of the means by which the communication may take place, but the examples are not exhaustive of the means that might be employed.

172. Section 66(4) of the Bill amends section 75 of the 1995 Act to include a reference to the period mentioned in section 71C. This ensures that, where the 14 day period referred to in section 71C(3) ends on a weekend or on a court holiday, it is extended to include the next day that is not a Saturday, Sunday or court holiday.

Section 67 – First diets

173. Section 67 deals with the procedure at first diets in proceedings on indictment in the sheriff court.

174. Subsection (2) amends section 66 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). Subsection (2)(a) requires the notice served on the accused with the indictment to include a warning to the accused that the first diet may proceed in his or her absence and that a trial diet may be fixed in his or her absence. This is distinct from the intimation that requires to be given by virtue of section 66(6AA) where the accused is a body corporate. However, even if the notice does not contain this warning, the amendment to section 66(6B) of the 1995 Act made by subsection (2)(b) ensures that the validity of the notice, and other procedure against the accused, is not invalidated by the omission.

175. Subsection (3) amends section 71 of the 1995 Act. The amendments provided for in subsection (3)(a), (b) and (d) are consequential on the new arrangements whereby the trial diet is appointed at the first diet (see discussion below of new section 71B). Subsection (3)(c) ensures that the requirement in section 71(6) that the accused should be called upon to plead at the first diet does not prevent the first diet proceeding in the absence of the accused. Subsection (3)(e) extends to the new section 71B discussed below the definition of the word “court” in section 71 of the 1995 Act, so that in the new section 71B references to the court will be understood as references to the sheriff court only.

176. Subsection (4) inserts a new section 71B into the 1995 Act, to deal with appointment of a trial diet at the first diet.

177. Subsection (1) of the new section 71B provides that, having taken the steps and examined the issues required at the first diet, the court only then goes on to appoint a trial. The appointing of a trial has to be in accordance with subsections (3) to (7), which are discussed below. Subsection (2) requires the accused to appear at the trial diet.

178. Subsections (3) and (4) of the new section 71B apply when a case is subject to the requirement that the trial must commence within 12 months of the accused’s first appearance on petition. If the court considers that the case would be likely to be ready to proceed to trial within the 12 months (which may not be 12 months from the petition appearance, because the period can be extended under section 65(3) of the 1995 Act) the court must, subject to subsections (5) to (7) appoint a trial within the 12 month period. If the court does not think the case will be ready to proceed within the 12 months, the prosecutor must be given an opportunity to seek an extension of the 12 month period. If an extension is granted the court must, again subject to subsections (5) to (7), appoint a trial within the 12 month period as extended. If the period is not extended the court may desert the first diet (either permanently or for the time being only) and if the accused is being held in custody pending trial, the accused must be liberated.

179. Subsections (5) to (7) of the new section 71B apply where, in addition to the court being required to appoint a trial diet within the 12 month period under subsection (3) or (4), the accused has been committed until liberated in due course of law (i.e. imprisoned to await the outcome of a trial) and cannot be detained by reason of that committal for more than 140 days without being put on trial. In that event, as well as appointing a trial diet within the 12 month period, the court must appoint a trial within the 140 day period if it is satisfied that the case will be ready to go to trial within that period. If the court is not satisfied about that, the prosecutor must be given an opportunity to apply for an extension of the 140 day period. If an extension is granted the court must appoint a trial for a date within the 140 day period as extended (as well as within the 12 month period). If the period is not extended the accused is entitled to be admitted to bail. In that event, subsection (8) requires the court to give the prosecutor an opportunity to be heard before admitting the accused to bail.

180. Where the court has appointed a trial diet for an accused on bail (other than in the circumstances where the accused has been bailed as described in the previous paragraph) subsection (9) of the new section 71B requires that the court must review the accused’s bail conditions and empowers it, if it considers it appropriate, to set different conditions.

181. Subsection (10) of the new section 71B defines the 12 month and 140 day time limits with reference to the applicable provisions of section 65 of the 1995 Act.

182. Subsection (5) of section 67 amends section 76(3) the 1995 Act which makes provision for the situation where a diet fixed as a result of an intimation given by the accused under section 76(1) (that he intends to plead guilty) does not result in pleas being accepted in respect of all charges. The amendment allows the court to postpone a first diet where a case has been indicted to the sheriff court on the same basis as the power to postpone a preliminary hearing where the case has been indicted to the High Court.

183. Subsection (6) inserts a new section 83B into the 1995 Act applying to jury trials in the sheriff court. The section allows trials that have not yet been commenced to be continued from sitting day to sitting day, up to a maximum number of sitting days after the day originally appointed for the trial, the maximum being set by Act of Adjournal. Failure to commence the trial by the end of the last sitting day permitted results in the indictment falling and proceedings against the accused coming to an end.

Section 68 – Preliminary hearings

184. Section 68 reverses the effect of amendments to section 72A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 effected by section 7(3) of the Vulnerable Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2004. The amendments, which relate to proceedings in the High Court, were mistakenly applied after the section to which they related was repealed by the Criminal Procedure (Amendment) (Scotland) Act 2004, and replaced with another section with the same number.

Section 69 – Plea of guilty

185. Section 69 repeals that part of section 77(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) which requires that the accused pleading guilty to an indictment should sign a copy of the plea. Section 70(7) of the 1995 Act, which provides for an exception to the signing requirement where the accused pleading guilty is an organisation, is thereby rendered obsolete and is also repealed.

Section 70 – Guilty verdict

186. Section 70 amends the law concerning the size of the majority required for a jury to return a verdict of guilty, in both the High Court and the sheriff court.

187. Subsection (1) repeals section 90(2) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) which prescribes conditions for the returning of a verdict of guilty where the size of the jury in a criminal trial falls below 15.

188. Subsection (2) inserts new section 90ZA into the 1995 Act. Section 90ZA(1) provides that a jury of 15 members may return a verdict of guilty only if at least 10 of them are in favour of that verdict.

189. Section 90ZA(2) sets out the number of jurors required to return a verdict of guilty where the jury size falls below 15. In each case, a majority of at least two thirds of the jurors is required.

190. Section 90ZA(3) provides that a jury is to be regarded to have returned a verdict of “not guilty” if it does not return a verdict of “guilty” in accordance with subsection (1) or (2) and there is no majority in favour of either a “not guilty” or “not proven” verdict.

Part 4 – Sentencing

Maximum term for weapons offences

Section 71 – Maximum term for weapons offences

191. The Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 creates the following offences:

- carrying an offensive weapon in a public place (section 47);
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

• possessing an article with a blade or point in a public place (section 49);
• possessing an article with a blade or point (or weapons) on school premises (section 49A);
• having an offensive weapon etc. in prison (section 49C).

192. Section 71 of the Bill increases the maximum penalty for each of those offences from 4 to 5 years.

Prisoners on early release

Section 72 – Sentencing under the 1995 Act

193. Section 72 of the Bill inserts a new section 200A into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). New section 200A(1) of the 1995 Act provides that when the court is dealing with a person who has been found to have committed an offence that is capable of being punishable with imprisonment (except where the offence is such that the court is required to impose a life sentence), the court must so far as is reasonably practicable ascertain whether the person was on early release from a previous sentence at the time the offence was committed.

194. Part I of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 (“the 1993 Act”), Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 or Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 provide for the operation of release from custody of a prisoner prior to the end of a prisoner’s sentence. The operation of these provisions is commonly known as “early release” arrangements. For the purposes of new section 200A, new section 200A(3) provides that a person is on early release if they are not in custody as a result of the operation of Part I of the 1993 Act, Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 or Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003.

195. Section 16 of the 1993 Act provides the court with a power to be able to punish a person who commits an offence while on early release. This power is separate and additional to the normal powers of the court to sentence the person for having committed the offence. These powers are commonly known as section 16 orders and can be seen as a punishment on a person for having abused the trust placed in them by committing an offence while on early release.

196. New section 200A(2) provides that where the court has determined under new section 200A(1) that a person was on early release at the time the offence was committed, the court must consider making a section 16 order.

197. New section 200A(2) also provides that in the case where the court dealing with the offence is inferior to the court which imposed the previous sentence from which the person was released early, an inferior court must consider making a reference to the court which imposed the previous sentence so that they can consider making a section 16 order. This is subject to the new powers being given to inferior courts to make section 16 orders contained in section 73(4) of the Bill.
Section 73 – Sentencing under the 1993 Act

198. Where an offence ("the new offence") has been committed while a person was on early release, section 16(2) of the 1993 Act provides that a Scottish court may, instead of or in addition to imposing a sentence for plea or finding of guilt, order that a person may be returned to prison for a period of time. This period can be up to a maximum length equal to the period of time between the date on which the new offence was committed and the date of the expiry of their previous sentence. Section 16(2)(b) of the 1993 Act provides that where the court dealing with the new offence is inferior to the court which imposed the sentence from which the person was released early, the inferior court cannot directly impose a section 16 order and can only refer the case to the higher court for consideration to be given as to whether a section 16 order should be imposed.

199. Section 73(2) of the Bill adjusts section 16(1) of the 1993 Act so that prisoners released early under Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 can have section 16 orders imposed upon them.

200. Section 73(4) of the Bill inserts new section 16(2A) into the 1993 Act. New section 16(2A) provides new discretion for courts dealing with persons who have committed offences while on early release from a previous sentence imposed by a higher court. The effect of the new discretion is that inferior courts will be able to consider making a section 16 order in such cases.

201. The powers of inferior courts to impose section 16 orders are restricted to those cases where the maximum length of a section 16 order does not exceed the sentencing powers of the court in respect of common law offences. Section 7(6) of the 1995 Act provides that a Justice of the Peace court can impose a custodial sentence for common law offences of up to 60 days. Section 5(2) of the 1995 Act provides a sheriff’s summary court, including when constituted by a stipendiary magistrate (by virtue of section 7(5) of the 1995 Act), can impose a custodial sentence for a common law offence of up to 12 months. Section 3(3) of the 1995 Act provides a sheriff solemn court can impose a custodial sentence for a common law offence of up to 5 years.

202. New section 16(2A)(b)(i) provides that a Justice of the Peace court, except when constituted by a stipendiary magistrate, will be able to impose a section 16 order in cases where the maximum length of a section 16 order does not exceed 60 days.

203. New section 16(2A)(b)(ii) provides that a Justice of the Peace court constituted by a stipendiary magistrate or a sheriff sitting summarily (i.e. without a jury) will be able to impose a section 16 order in cases where the maximum length of a section 16 order does not exceed 12 months.

204. New section 16(2A)(b)(iii) provides that a sheriff sitting as a court of solemn jurisdiction (i.e. with a jury) will be able to impose a section 16 order in cases where the maximum length of a section 16 order does not exceed 5 years.

205. Section 73(3) makes consequential changes to section 16(2) reflecting the insertion of new section 16(2A) into the 1993 Act.
Part 5 – Appeals and SCCRC

Appeals

Section 74 – Preliminary pleas in summary cases

206. Section 174 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 ("the 1995 Act") allows for decisions disposing of certain objections and denials in summary proceedings, including objections to the competency and relevancy of the complaint, to be appealed to the High Court where the first instance court gives permission for the appeal. Section 74 of the Bill amends section 174 of the 1995 Act by removing the requirement to obtain permission for an appeal by the prosecutor against a decision that has resulted in the dismissal of the complaint, or any part of it.

Section 75 – Preliminary diets in solemn cases

207. Section 74 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 ("the 1995 Act) allows for decisions taken at first diets and preliminary hearings to be appealed to the High Court where the first instance court gives permission for the appeal. Section 75 of the Bill amends section 74 of the 1995 Act by removing the requirement to obtain permission for an appeal by the prosecutor against a decision that has resulted in the dismissal of the indictment, or any part of it.

Section 76 – Extending certain time limits: summary

208. Section 76 amends section 181 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 Act ("the 1995 Act") so as to make further provision concerning applications to extend certain time limits that apply in relation to appeals from summary proceedings.

209. Subsection (2) inserts provisions prescribing the test to be applied by the High Court when determining an application to extend the period within which a convicted person may apply for a stated case. Subsections (3) and (4) omit the provisions under which the respondent in relation to an application under section 181(1) of the 1995 Act may insist on a hearing. Subsection (5) inserts section 181(5) which requires the court to give reasons in writing for a decision to extend a period on an application under section 181(1).

210. By virtue of section 186(8) of the 1995 Act, the amendments effected by section 76 of the Bill also have effect in relation to certain applications to extend the period allowed for the lodging of a note of appeal under section 186.

Section 77 – Extending certain time limits: solemn

211. Section 77 makes provision concerning applications to the High Court under section 111(2) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 ("the 1995 Act") applications to extend the period within which a convicted person may lodge intimation of intention to appeal, or a note of appeal.

212. Subsections (3) to (6) amend section 111. Subsection (3) inserts provisions prescribing the test to be applied by the High Court when determining an application under section 111(2) when it is received after the expiry of the period to which it relates. Subsection (4) amends...
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

section 111(2A) so as to extend to every application under section 111(2) the requirement on the applicant to state reasons for the failure to comply with the applicable time limit and to state the proposed grounds of appeal. Subsection (6) inserts section 111(4) which provides that applications under section 111(2) are to be dealt with in chambers and, unless the court otherwise directs, without parties being present. Subsections (1) and (5) contain amendments that are consequential on this change. Subsection (6) also inserts section 111(5) which requires the court to give reasons in writing for a decision to extend a period.

Section 78 – Certain lateness not excusable

213. Section 78 amends section 300A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 by inserting a new subsection (7A). Section 300A gives courts a general power to excuse failures to comply with procedural requirements. The amendment precludes a failure to timeously lodge certain documents from being excused under section 300A. The documents in question are those which the High Court can permit being lodged late by applying the tests that are to be amended by sections 76 and 77 of the Bill (i.e. documents used to initiate appeals from, respectively, summary and solemn proceedings).

Section 79 – Advocation in solemn proceedings

214. Section 79 inserts section 130A into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which provides that it is not competent for a decision taken at a first diet or preliminary hearing to be appealed to the High Court by bill of advocation. The provision excludes bill of advocation as a competent method of appealing a decision that could be appealed under the procedure provided for in section 74 of the 1995 Act.

Section 80 – Advocation in summary proceedings

215. Section 80 inserts section 191B into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The new section applies to decisions disposing of certain objections and denials which require to be stated before a plea is tendered in summary proceedings, including objections to the competency or relevancy of a complaint. Such decisions can be appealed to the High Court under the procedure provided for in section 174 of the 1995 Act. The new section provides that such decisions cannot also be competently appealed by way of bill of advocation.

Section 81 – Finality of appeal proceedings

216. Section 81(1) amends section 124(2) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) (as amended by section 36(11) of the Scotland Act 2012) by removing references to section 288ZB of the 1995 Act.

217. Section 81(2) inserts a new section 194ZA into the 1995 Act. Subject to the exceptions specified, the new section provides that decisions of the High Court when disposing of an appeal related to summary proceedings are final and conclusive and not subject to review by any court whatsoever. The new section is in similar terms to the corresponding provision in section 124(2) of the 1995 Act, which relates to decisions of the High Court when disposing of appeals from solemn proceedings.
SCCRC

Section 82 – References by SCCRC

218. Section 82 of the Bill amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 to adjust how the High Court considers cases referred to it by the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (“the SCCRC”).

219. Section 82(2) of the Bill inserts new subsection (1A) into section 194B of the 1995 Act and provides that the High Court can only quash a conviction or sentence if it is satisfied that it is in the interests of justice to do so. New subsection (1B) provides that when the High Court is considering the interests of justice, they must have regard to the requirement for finality and certainty in the determination of criminal proceedings.

220. Section 82(4) of the Bill repeals section 194DA of the 1995 Act so that the High Court will no longer have the power to reject a SCCRC reference without hearing the appeal.

221. The overall effect of section 82 is that the High Court will apply the interests of justice test alongside hearing an appeal based on a SCCRC reference, rather than applying the interests of justice in order to decide whether to allow an appeal based on a SCCRC reference to be heard.

Part 6 – Miscellaneous

Chapter 1 – Procedural matters

Aggravation as to people trafficking

Section 83 – General aggravation of offence

222. Section 83 makes provision for a statutory aggravation which applies in cases where an accused commits an offence connected with people trafficking. Subsection (1) applies where an indictment or complaint libels or specifies that an offence is aggravated by a connection with people trafficking activity and it is subsequently proved that the offence is aggravated in that way.

223. Subsection (2) sets out the circumstances in which an offence can be regarded to have been aggravated by a connection with people trafficking. This relies on proof that the accused was motivated, in whole or in part, by the objective of committing or conspiring to commit a people trafficking offence. In terms of subsection (3), it is not material to establishing the aggravation whether or not a people trafficking offence (as defined in section 85(1)) was committed at any time or by the offender or another specific person.

224. Subsection (4) sets out the steps the court must take when it is libelled in an indictment or specified in a complaint that an offence is aggravated by a connection with people trafficking and proved that the offence is so aggravated. In addition to a number of formal matters, the court must take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence.
Section 84 – Aggravation involving public official

225. Section 84 makes similar provision about a statutory aggravation which applies in cases where a public official, acting or purporting to act in the course of official duties, commits a people trafficking offence.

Section 85 – Expressions in sections 83 and 84

226. Section 85(1) defines people trafficking offences for the purpose of sections 83 and 84. Subsection (2) defines those to be considered as a public official for the purposes of section 84 while subsection (3) defines the term “an international organisation”.

227. Subsection (4) enables the Scottish Ministers to modify by regulations the offences considered to be people trafficking offences, the definition of who is a public official and the definition of an international organisation.

Use of live television link

Section 86 – Use of live television link

228. Subsection (1) of section 86 inserts sections 288H to 288K into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The new sections (discussed in greater detail in the following paragraphs) make provision for the participation of detained persons in hearings by means of live television link from the place of detention.

229. Subsection (2) repeals enactments in consequence of the new sections of the 1995 Act inserted by subsection (1). Specifically, paragraph (a) repeals section 117(6) of the 1995 Act, which requires an appellant in an appeal from solemn proceedings to appear before the court in ordinary civilian clothes. Paragraph (b) repeals section 80 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003, which allowed certain court appearances to be conducted by means of live television link and is rendered obsolete by the wider reaching new sections inserted by section 86 of the Bill.

Inserted section 288H – Participation through live television link

230. Subsection (1) requires a detained person to participate in a “specified hearing” (defined by inserted section 288J) by means of live TV link where the court has determined that the hearing should proceed in that manner. Before so determining, subsection (2) requires the court to give the parties an opportunity to make representations on the use of the TV link in the hearing. The court can only allow the hearing to proceed by TV link if satisfied that it is not contrary to the interests of justice to do so.

231. Subsection (3) gives the court the power to require a detained person to appear by TV link from the place where the person is in custody at an ad hoc hearing for the sole purpose of considering whether to make a determination on the use of TV links.

232. Where a detained person participates in a hearing by means of a TV link, the effect of subsection (4) is that the place of detention is deemed part of the court room, so that the hearing is deemed to take place in the presence of the detained person.
Inserted section 288I – Evidence and personal appearance

233. Subsection (1) precludes evidence as to the charge against the detained person being led at a hearing in which the detained person is participating by means of a TV link. It would therefore not be possible for a trial to proceed with the accused participating by TV link.

234. Subsection (2) gives the court the power to revoke, before or during a hearing, a determination (under section 288H(1)) that the accused is to participate at the hearing by TV link. Subsection (2)(b) requires that the court exercise the power to revoke the determination if it considers that it is in the interests of justice for the detained person to appear in person. For example, a problem with the technology arises unexpectedly and the court is not satisfied that it can clearly see or hear the detained person.

235. Subsection (3), read in conjunction with subsection (4), allows the court to postpone a hearing to the next day which is not a Saturday, Sunday or court holiday, if it decides either to revoke a determination under section 288H(1) or not to make a determination on the day a specified hearing takes place or is due to take place. Such a postponement does not count towards any statutory time limits applicable in the case, such as the time limits for detaining a person in custody pending a first diet or preliminary hearing. However, by virtue of subsection (5), the power cannot be used to postpone a hearing in which a person makes their first appearance from police custody.

Inserted section 288J – Specified hearings

236. Subsection (1) confers on the Lord Justice General the function of specifying the categories of hearings, such as the first appearance, at which a detained person may participate by live television link. Hearings may be specified by reference to the venues at which hearings take place (subsection (2)(a)), particular places of detention (subsection (2)(b)), or the types of cases or proceedings in which TV links can be used (subsection (2)(c)). Under subsection (3)(a) the Lord Justice General can vary or revoke any earlier directions and make different provision for different purposes (subsection (3)(b)).

Inserted section 288K – Defined terms

237. This section defines certain terms used within sections 288H to 288J. The expression “detained person” is defined so that the person imprisoned or lawfully detained at a location in Scotland. The concept of lawful detention is a broad one, it includes detention at a police station pending first appearance at court, detention in hospital by virtue of an assessment order or a treatment order imposed under the 1995 Act, detention in hospital under the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003, or a young person’s detention in local authority secure accommodation.

Chapter 2 – Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

Section 87 – Establishment and functions

238. Section 87 inserts a new Chapter 8A into the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 (“the 2012 Act”) to provide for a Police Negotiating Board for Scotland (PNBS). New section 55A provides for the Board to be established, and introduces a new schedule 2A to make further provision about it. New schedule 2A is set out in schedule 3 to the Bill (see paragraphs 248 and 249 for further discussion).

239. New section 55B provides that the PNBS may make representations to the Scottish Ministers about pay, allowances and expenses, public holidays and leave, the issue, use and return of police clothing and equipment, and hours of duty, in relation to constables (other than special constables) and cadets. Such representations may be made about draft regulations or determinations on these issues, or generally. The Scottish Ministers may, after consultation with the chairperson, require the PNBS to make representations about these matters within a set time period.

240. New section 55C provides that the PNBS may also make representations to the Scottish Ministers about other matters relating to the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables (other than special constables) and police cadets including draft regulations on such matters. New section 55D requires the PNBS to produce an annual report on how it has carried out its functions. The annual report is to be given to the Scottish Ministers and published.

241. Subsection (2) amends section 54 of the 2012 Act to require the Scottish Ministers to consult the PNBS before making regulations about the matters mentioned in new section 55B(4).

Schedule 1 – Modifications in connection with Part 1

242. Schedule 1 makes amendments to existing legislation as a consequence of specific elements of the Bill. Part 1 makes provision for the repeal of various enactments conferring a power to arrest without warrant, which are affected by the new power of arrest for the police set out in section 1 of the Bill. Part 2 makes provision for the repeal of enactments affected by the new arrangements for police custody and access to legal advice set out in Part 1 of the Bill.

Schedule 2 – Modifications in connection with Part 2

243. Schedule 2 makes transitional and consequential provision arising from section 57, which abolishes the requirement for corroboration.

244. Paragraphs 1 and 2 make transitional provision in respect of the people trafficking aggravations provided for in sections 83 and 84. The effect is that even before section 57 comes into force and abolishes the requirement for corroborative evidence at large, corroborative evidence will not be required to prove an aggravation under either section.

245. Paragraphs 3 and 4 provide that the removal of the requirement for corroboration in criminal proceedings by section 57, will also apply to sheriff court proceedings under section 68(3) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, to determine whether offence grounds for a referral to a children’s hearing have been established. This is a transitional provision. The Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 (“the 2011 Act”) will repeal section 68(3) but some proceedings under the section may continue as part of the transitional arrangements for the 2011 Act. Once all proceedings under section 68(3) are concluded, paragraphs 3 and 4 of the schedule will cease to apply.
246. Paragraph 21 inserts a new subsection into section 102 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 providing that section 57, which abolishes the requirement for corroborative evidence in criminal proceedings, applies where an application is made to a sheriff to determine whether offence grounds for referral to a children’s hearing under section 67(2)(j) of the 2011 Act are established.

247. Paragraphs 5 to 20 and 22 to 24 make provision in consequence of section 57. Certain statutory exceptions to the requirement for corroborative evidence presently exist. Once section 57 abolishes the requirement for corroborative evidence in criminal proceedings generally, the specific exceptions will be redundant. Part 2 of the schedule therefore removes from the statute book the existing exceptions to the general requirement for corroborative evidence.

Schedule 3 – Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

248. Schedule 3 inserts schedule 2A into the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012. Paragraph 1 establishes that the PNBS is not a Crown servant and has no Crown status, immunity or privilege. Paragraph 2 sets out the membership of the PNBS. It is to consist of a chair and deputy chair appointed by the Scottish Ministers, and other persons representing the Scottish Ministers, the Scottish Police Authority, the chief constable, constables (other than special constables) and police cadets. Under paragraph 3, MPs, MSPs, MEPs, government Ministers and civil servants will be disqualified from being the chair or deputy chair of the PNBS to ensure that the chair and deputy chair are independent.

249. Paragraph 4 provides that the Scottish Ministers are to prepare the constitution for the PNBS, after consulting the other persons to be represented on it. They must keep the constitution under review and may from time to time revise it. This paragraph also sets out what the constitution may include. It must regulate the procedure by which the PNBS reaches agreement on representations to the Scottish Ministers under new section 55B(1), and may require agreement to be reached by arbitration in specified circumstances. Paragraph 5 provides that the Scottish Ministers may pay remuneration to the chair and deputy chair of the PNBS, and expenses to its members. They must also pay such expenses as are necessary to enable the PNBS to carry out its functions.
INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.2 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. It does not form part of the Bill and has not been endorsed by the Parliament.

2. The Policy Memorandum, which is published separately, explains in detail the background to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill and the policy intention behind the Bill. The purpose of this Financial Memorandum is to set out the costs associated with the measures introduced by the Bill, and as such it should be read in conjunction with the Bill and the other accompanying documents.

3. The Bill has been developed around three elements:
   - Implementation of the recommendations of Lord Carloway’s review of the criminal justice system as a package of reforms⁶;
   - Implementation of the recommendations of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure⁷; and
   - A number of miscellaneous provisions.

4. This Financial Memorandum is structured around these three elements, but this does not translate directly to the structure of the Bill’s provisions. Table 1 below sets out the grouping of provisions used in the Financial Memorandum and how that relates to the sections of the Bill. The table also provides an index to where the provisions are covered in this Memorandum.

Table 1: cross-references to Bill sections and index to paragraph numbers

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Provisions as described in Financial Memorandum</th>
<th>Relevant sections of Bill</th>
<th>Paragraph references in this Memorandum</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Arrest and detention, period of custody</td>
<td>1-13, 18, 37-41, 50-55</td>
<td>21 (general), 47-54 (SPA)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Liberation from police custody</td>
<td>14-17, 19-22, 43-49</td>
<td>22-23 (general), 55-76 (SPA), 138-141 (COPFS), 168-170 (SCS), 198-201 (SLAB)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Legal advice</td>
<td>23-25, 30, 35-36</td>
<td>24-26 (general), 77-94 (SPA), 202-214 (SLAB)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

⁶http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/Review/CarlowayReview
⁷http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2010/06/10093251/0
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Provisions as described in Financial Memorandum</th>
<th>Relevant sections of Bill</th>
<th>Paragraph references in this Memorandum</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Questioning</td>
<td>26-29</td>
<td>27 (general), 95-104 (SPA), 142-146 (COPFS), 171-176 (SCS)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child suspects</td>
<td>31-32, 42</td>
<td>28-30 (general), 129-131 (SPA), 222-224 (SLAB), 227-230 (local authorities)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Corroboration</td>
<td>56-60</td>
<td>31-35, 42 (general), 105-124 (SPA), 147-156 (COPFS), 177-182 (SCS), 184-195 (SPS), 215-217 (SLAB), 226 (SCRA), 231-235 (local authorities)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Appeals</td>
<td>73-80</td>
<td>38 (general), 218-221 (SLAB)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vulnerable adult suspects</td>
<td>33-34</td>
<td>39 (general), 132-134 (SPA)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Exculpatory and mixed statements</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>40 (general)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Finality and certainty</td>
<td>81</td>
<td>41 (general)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Carloway general</td>
<td>All above</td>
<td>36-37 (general), 125-128, 135-136 (SPA), 157-163, 165 (COPFS)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bowen provisions</td>
<td>62, 64-68</td>
<td>240-273</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maximum term for weapons offences</td>
<td>70</td>
<td>274-288</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Method of juror citation</td>
<td>63</td>
<td>311-312</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Video links</td>
<td>85</td>
<td>289-310</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sentencing on early release</td>
<td>71-72</td>
<td>313</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People trafficking</td>
<td>82-84</td>
<td>314</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Police Negotiating Board</td>
<td>86</td>
<td>315-318</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

5. Tables 2-5, providing an overall summary of the financial impact of the Bill, can be found after paragraph 11.

6. The estimates of costs contained in this memorandum are compiled from information provided by those bodies affected by the Bill. The figures and projections provided are the best estimates available for the costs and income that will be generated as a result of the provisions of this Bill. All costs have been rounded to the nearest £1,000. Figures may not sum due to rounding.

7. This financial memorandum assumes that the Bill provisions will take effect in the financial year 2015-16.
OVERVIEW

8. The Bill will have financial implications for a number of bodies. It will primarily affect the Scottish Police Authority (“SPA”), the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (“COPFS”), the Scottish Legal Aid Board (“SLAB”), the Scottish Court Service (“SCS”), and the Scottish Prison Service (“SPS”).

9. The measures which will have the greatest financial implications are connected with the Carloway provisions, particularly:
   - The removal of the requirement for corroboration; and
   - The provisions on access to legal advice.

10. The Bowen and miscellaneous provisions on the whole have lower financial costs.

11. The tables below summarise the costs of the Bill, differentiating between financial and opportunity costs. Many of the impacts of the Bill take the form of administrative burdens resulting from increased volumes of procedures currently undertaken and the introduction of additional procedures to meet the requirements of the Bill. Where a cost has been established based on additional staff time required to perform a particular new task, or to deal with an increase in case numbers, the Scottish Government anticipates that that this will likely be dealt with through measures such as full use of existing resources, prioritisation of functions, and increased operational efficiency. These are classified as opportunity costs. Only where a specific need for additional staff has been identified, has the cost been identified as an additional financial cost. There are also some one-off capital costs associated with the Bill, for example around the police custody estate.

Table 2: total financial costs by organisation

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>2015-16</th>
<th>2016-17</th>
<th>2017-18</th>
<th>2018-19</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Recurring costs £’000</td>
<td>Non-recurring costs £’000</td>
<td>Recurring costs £’000</td>
<td>Non-recurring costs £’000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scottish Government [paras 44, 245, 295]</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SPA [paras 45-137, 246-248, 296-300]</td>
<td>138</td>
<td>2,590</td>
<td>138</td>
<td>1,648</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>COPFS [paras 138-165, 249-255, 301]</td>
<td>(128)</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>(128)</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SCS [paras 166-183, 256-259, 302-305, 312]</td>
<td>(169)</td>
<td>84</td>
<td>(169)</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SPS [paras 184-196, 260-262, 278-288, 306]</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

Table 3: total opportunity costs by organisation

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Organisation</th>
<th>2015-16</th>
<th>2016-17</th>
<th>2017-18</th>
<th>2018-19</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Recurring costs £’000</td>
<td>Non-recurring costs £’000</td>
<td>Recurring costs £’000</td>
<td>Non-recurring costs £’000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scottish Government [paras 44, 245, 295]</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SPA [paras 45-137, 246-248, 296-300]</td>
<td>5,549</td>
<td>9,848</td>
<td>5,549</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>COPFS [paras 138-165, 249-255, 301]</td>
<td>3,842</td>
<td>1,268</td>
<td>3,842</td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SCS [paras 166-183, 256-259, 302-305, 312]</td>
<td>1,363</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>1,363</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SPS [paras 184-196, 260-262, 278-288, 306]</td>
<td>6,850</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>14,600</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SLAB [paras 197-225, 263-266]</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Local authorities [paras 227-237, 267-268, 309]</td>
<td>1,244</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>1,244</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>18,848</td>
<td>11,116</td>
<td>26,598</td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total opportunity cost</td>
<td>29,964</td>
<td>26,685</td>
<td>30,735</td>
<td>34,748</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

Table 4: total financial costs by Bill provision

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Arrest &amp; detention, period of custody</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Liberation from police custody</td>
<td>863</td>
<td>40</td>
<td>863</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>863</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>863</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Legal advice</td>
<td>1,842</td>
<td>1,650</td>
<td>1,842</td>
<td>1,648</td>
<td>1,842</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>1,842</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Questioning</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child suspects</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Corroboration</td>
<td>4,032</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>4,032</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>4,032</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>4,032</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Appeals</td>
<td>(69)</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>(69)</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>(69)</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>(69)</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vulnerable adult suspects</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Exculpatory and mixed statements</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Finality and certainty</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Carloway general</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>860</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bowen provisions</td>
<td>87</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>87</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>87</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>87</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maximum term for weapons offences</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Method of juror citation</td>
<td>(169)</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>(169)</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>(169)</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>(169)</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Video links</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>154</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sentencing on early release</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People trafficking</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Police Negotiating Board</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>6,587</td>
<td>2,703</td>
<td>6,587</td>
<td>1,648</td>
<td>6,587</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>6,587</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total financial cost</td>
<td>9,290</td>
<td>8,235</td>
<td>6,587</td>
<td>6,587</td>
<td>6,587</td>
<td>6,587</td>
<td>6,587</td>
<td>6,587</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Although there are costs associated with establishing a Police Negotiating Board for Scotland, these are balanced by equivalent savings from discontinuing contributions to the existing Police Negotiating Board.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

Table 5: total opportunity costs by Bill provision

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>2015-16</th>
<th>2016-17</th>
<th>2017-18</th>
<th>2018-19</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Recurring costs £'000</td>
<td>Non-recurring costs £'000</td>
<td>Recurring costs £'000</td>
<td>Non-recurring costs £'000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arrest &amp; detention, period of custody</td>
<td>99</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>99</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Liberation from police custody</td>
<td>1,127</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>1,127</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Legal advice</td>
<td>406</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>406</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Questioning</td>
<td>167</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>167</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child suspects</td>
<td>84</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>84</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Corroboration</td>
<td>14,974</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>22,724</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Appeals</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vulnerable adult suspects</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Exculpatory and mixed statements</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Finality and certainty</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Carloway general</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>11,116</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bowen provisions</td>
<td>228</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>228</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maximum term for weapons offences</td>
<td>1,250</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>1,250</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Method of juror citation</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Video links</td>
<td>512</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>512</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sentencing on early release</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People trafficking</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Police Negotiating Board⁹</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>18,848</td>
<td>11,116</td>
<td>26,598</td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total opportunity cost</td>
<td>29,964</td>
<td>26,685</td>
<td>30,735</td>
<td>34,748</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

IMPACT

12. Any rise in the overall running costs of relevant organisations will be reviewed as part of the overall planning of the Justice budget.

⁹ Although there are costs associated with establishing a Police Negotiating Board for Scotland, these are balanced by equivalent savings from discontinuing contributions to the existing Police Negotiating Board.
13. The opportunity costs associated with the Bill will be for the affected organisation to manage through measures such as full use of existing resources, prioritisation of functions, and increased operational efficiency.

14. A total of £5,549,000 has been identified as recurring opportunity costs for SPA. This is as a result of new processes including investigative liberation and post-charge questioning, as well as increases in case numbers from the removal of the requirement for corroboration.

15. There is also a large one-off opportunity cost of £9,848,000 for SPA. This comprises staff time to attend training on the revised procedures provided for in the Bill. The impact of this should be minimised by ensuring the Bill’s provisions are implemented in 2015, when the Commonwealth Games and other major events of 2014 are over, and the normal police training regime resumes.

16. A total of £3,842,000 has been identified as recurring opportunity costs for COPFS. Some of this is from the new processes around challenging of special conditions for liberation from police custody, but the greater part is from the projected increase in cases as a result of the removal of the requirement for corroboration.

17. A total of £1,363,000 has been identified as recurring opportunity costs for SCS, as a result of additional court time for new processes and volume increases. It is anticipated that these will be managed within the available court time. Expected savings in court time from the Bowen provisions have already been applied to this figure.

18. A total of £22,750,000 has been identified as recurring opportunity costs for SPS, as a result of increased prison places, primarily from the removal of the requirement for corroboration. This increase will not take full effect immediately, but will gradually increase up to this level over four to five years. SPS has indicated that additional prison places can be accommodated within existing capacity, but that long term increases may accelerate the rate that the flexibility in the system is used up. This will be kept under review.

19. A total of £1,244,000 has been identified as recurring opportunity costs for local authorities, as a result of increases in community sentences, and provision of social worker support to a minority of 16 and 17 year old suspects. It is anticipated that this will be managed within existing resources.

PART A – CARLOWAY PROVISIONS

OUTLINE OF MEASURES

Measures with cost implications

20. Those measures which will have definite financial or opportunity cost implications are outlined below.
Arrest and detention, period of custody

21. The changes in the Bill to periods of custody include the requirement for a police review at or about six hours after detention and that this review should be carried out by an officer of at least the rank of inspector not directly involved in the investigation. This will have implications for the police in terms of staff time.

Liberation from police custody

22. The Bill introduces a new process of investigative liberation from police custody. This will have resource implications for the police in terms of staff time to consider and authorise liberations where conditions are applied, as well as increased numbers of returning prisoners, and increases to persons breaching conditions of undertakings.

23. There are also potential cost implications for COPFS, SLAB and SCS from the application of special conditions to bail, and associated court hearings for challenges to these conditions. This includes additional IT costs for SCS.

Legal advice

24. The Bill extends the right to legal advice to suspects detained by the police, regardless of whether questioning takes place. This will likely lead to an increase in requests for legal advice, and this will have cost implications for SLAB, as well as for the police in administering access to solicitors.

25. In addition, Police Scotland has identified a need for modifications to the custody estate. These are in line with what was identified at the point of the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals (Scotland) Act 2010. These costs will be phased over two years.

26. There will also be minor one-off costs for police in the production of aide memoire cards for the revised common law caution and for the production of a letter of rights for suspects.

Questioning

27. The Bill provides for the possibility of police questioning after charge, following police or Crown application to a sheriff for permission. COPFS advise that post-charge questioning is likely to be a rare occurrence. Where it occurs, it will have cost implications for SPA, COPFS, SLAB and SCS.

Child suspects

28. In giving effect to Carloway’s recommendations on child suspects, the Bill makes provision for a number of changes to the manner in which children and young people are treated in the criminal justice system with regard to the arrest, detention, interview and being charged. For the most part these changes are part of wider changes to criminal procedure which will require operational change, but of particular relevance are Carloway’s recommendations that:

- For the purposes of arrest, detention and questioning, a child should be defined as anyone under the age of 18 years. This means that the current provisions concerning notification to an adult reasonably named by the person and these persons having access to a child suspect should be extended to all persons under 18 years of age; and

- All children should have the right of access to an adult reasonably named by the child if detained and, in any event, in advance of and during any interview, provided that access can be achieved within a reasonable time.

29. The Scottish Government anticipates that there will be an impact for the police by way of additional time spent finding, waiting for and accommodating parental or similar support and/or legal support for 16 and 17 year olds wishing it. However, Police Scotland has indicated that this can be achieved through the Whole System Approach already underway, and that no significant additional costs are anticipated.

30. The Bill’s provisions on child suspects could bring new costs for local authorities, as a result of increased provision of social worker support for 16 and 17 year old suspects, in cases where this is not provided by a parent, family member or friend.

Corroboration and sufficiency of evidence

31. The Bill removes the current requirement for corroboration in criminal cases. Lord Carloway commented in evidence to the Justice Committee on 29 November 2011\(^\text{10}\) that he did not think that the total number of prosecutions would necessarily increase as a result of this change.

32. However, shadow reporting and shadow marking exercises carried out by Police Scotland and COPFS suggest that there are likely to be increases in the number of cases reported by the Police to COPFS, and in the number of cases prosecuted by COPFS. The potential scale of increase is as follows:

- Police – increase in police reports to COPFS in the range 1.5%-2.2%, with a most likely estimate of 1.5%.
- COPFS – change in summary prosecutions in the range of a 1% decrease to a 4% increase, with a best estimate of a 1% increase; and increase in solemn prosecutions in the range of 2-10% increase, with a best estimate of a 6% increase.

33. Taken together, and assuming that the effects are cumulative (i.e. an increase in police reports feeds directly into additional prosecutions, with changed marking procedures within COPFS applying on top of this impact), suggests potential increases in the number of prosecutions as per the table below. Relatively small sample sizes were used in analysis of the potential impact of removing the requirement for corroboration. This means that the confidence interval between which the impacts could lie – presented as low and high estimates in the table – is very large. However it is extremely unlikely that impacts at the high end of the scale would be seen.

Table 6: potential % increase in the number of prosecutions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Summary prosecutions</td>
<td>0.5%</td>
<td>2.5%</td>
<td>6.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solemn prosecutions</td>
<td>3.5%</td>
<td>7.6%</td>
<td>12.4%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

34. An increase in prosecutions would have potential cost implications for SPA, COPFS, SLAB and SCS in terms of increased workload. An increase in prosecutions will also have impacts on the SPS and local authorities on the basis that additional prosecutions are likely to lead to additional convictions and additional custodial and community sentences. The number of criminal reports received by COPFS, and of summary and solemn prosecutions, vary significantly between years. In recent years there has been a significant downward trend in recorded crime, reports to COPFS and both summary and solemn court disposals (see Figures 1 and 2 below). This Financial Memorandum includes estimated costs associated with the increases indicated by the shadow marking exercises from a current baseline. However, the context for these increases is the overall scale in the reduction in criminal prosecutions over recent years.

Source: http://www.copfs.gov.uk/About/corporate-info/Caseproclast5
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

Figure 2: Court Disposals 2007-12

Source: http://www.copfs.gov.uk/About/corporate-info/Caseproclast5

35. With regard to the removal of the requirement for corroboration in relation to Children’s Hearings court proceedings, the Scottish Government anticipates no significant financial implications for the Scottish Government, Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration (“SCRA”), COPFS, SCS, local authorities or others.

Carloway provisions in general

36. In addition to the costs identified above, there will be one-off costs for police and COPFS to provide training for the changes in the Bill relating to Lord Carloway’s recommendations. Additional IT requirements for the police will be implemented as part of the wider IT police programme.

37. COPFS anticipate a short-term increase in the number of appeals during the three years following the commencement of the Bill.

Measures with no or marginal costs

Appeal procedures

38. The Bill makes changes to appeal procedures to encourage more timeous progression of appeals and to eliminate duplication of procedures. The intention is to avoid unnecessary delay, in accordance with the requirements of the European Convention on Human Rights. Reduced numbers of late appeals would lead to a slight saving for SLAB.

Vulnerable adult suspects

39. The provisions in the Bill relating to vulnerable adult suspects will not entail additional costs to local authorities and police as Appropriate Adult Services are provided at present on a non-statutory basis.
Exculpatory and mixed statements

40. The Bill amends the restrictions relating to admissibility of statements made by an accused person. The provisions relating to exculpatory and mixed statements are not anticipated to have any cost implications.

Finality and certainty

41. The Scottish Government does not anticipate there will be any additional costs associated with the provision that adjusts how the Appeal Court considers cases referred by the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (“the SCCRC”).

Jury majorities

42. The Bill’s provisions relating to jury majorities required for conviction are not expected to have any additional costs.

COSTS ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

43. Costs on the Scottish Administration will fall on the Scottish Government, SPA, COPFS, SCS, SPS and the Legal Aid Fund. These are set out separately below. Total non-recurring financial costs on the Scottish Administration will be around £4,352,000 over two years, and there will be total recurring financial savings of £6,530,000 per year.

COSTS ON THE SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT

44. The Scottish Government does not expect any of the Bill’s provisions to have cost implications for the Scottish Government.

SCOTTISH POLICE AUTHORITY

45. The police will be affected by a number of measures in the Bill, set out below. This is based on estimates provided by Police Scotland.

46. This financial memorandum has been developed during the transition to the new police body Police Scotland. Throughout this document there are references to SPA as the body with financial authority. All police costs identified in this document are attributed to SPA. The development of these estimates has been undertaken using information provided by Police Scotland. There are also references to the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (“ACPOS”), primarily relating to historic research.

Measures with cost implications

Period of custody: statutory review of police detentions

47. The Bill provides for police review of any period of detention before charge at or about six hours after detention and that such a review should be carried out by an officer of at least the rank of inspector who has not been directly involved in the investigation.
Due to the limitations of the prisoner management information technology systems being used by forces at present, it is not possible to provide accurate contemporary statistics for suspect detention rates; the basis for assessing the financial impact of this measure therefore is previous research with figures amended to account for recent, more general prisoner holding trends.

In establishing an estimate, Police Scotland has looked at the number of suspects detained by way of section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, on the basis that these are the detainees currently subject to time limits for detention. Previously published ACPOS research, the Solicitor Access Data Report 2011, suggests that suspects detained by way of section 14 accounted for 79.3% of the 20% of the prisoner population who had the right to solicitor access. This suggests that approximately 15.9% of the prisoner population is detained under section 14. During 2011-12 forces dealt with a total of 204,400 prisoners. If the ratios found during the research are applied to this figure, the number of suspects coming into police premises who would be detained for investigative purposes may be assumed to be in the region of 32,400 per annum or around 90 per day.

The findings of this research indicated that only 16.5% of detentions exceeded six hours. Police Scotland has indicated that in order to complete a review at or around six hours it is likely that the review process will often commence earlier than the six hour point. As such, it has assessed that custody reviews may occur in around 20% of all (detention) cases, 6,480 occasions per annum.

The introduction of Investigative Liberation may lead to a reduction in the number of persons detained for 6 hours or more. This is considered in more detail at paragraphs 57-59. The Scottish Government anticipates that 10% of detainees would be considered for investigative liberations, so the number of reviews is reduced to 5,830. See table below for summary.

Table 7: estimated numbers of prisoners relevant for six hour review

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Total prisoners</th>
<th>204,400</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Prisoners with a right to solicitor access</td>
<td>20% of 204,400</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prisoners detained under section 14 with a right to solicitor access</td>
<td>79.3% of 40,880</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prisoners detained under section 14 with a right to solicitor access still detained at six hour point</td>
<td>20% of 32,400</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prisoners detained under section 14 with a right to solicitor access still detained at six hour point not eligible for new investigative liberation procedures</td>
<td>90% of 6,480</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
52. There are a number of variables that could impact on the length of time needed to carry out a custody review, including the ready availability of information, enquiry officer(s) and the custody review officer. Police Scotland suggest an average transaction time of 30 minutes per review, giving notional costs of £99,000.

\[
5,832 \text{ inspector reviews} \times 30 \text{ minutes} \times £33.86 \text{ per hour} = £99,000
\]

53. These figures are based on the premise that an inspector need not be physically present to carry out a review.

54. This estimate is based on the hourly costs associated with an inspector’s time. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will become part of inspectors’ general workloads. This £99,000 is therefore classed as an opportunity cost.

Liberation from police custody – investigative liberation

55. The Bill will give the police the express power to liberate a suspect from detention, prior to charge/report, subject to any appropriate conditions necessary for carrying out further investigations.

56. Around 80% of persons coming in to police custody do so on the basis of there being a sufficiency of evidence to arrest without questioning. The number of persons eligible for investigative liberation is anticipated to be broadly similar to the numbers currently being dealt with in terms of section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. As explained in paragraph 49, the number of prisoners detained under section 14 and with a right to solicitor access is estimated at 32,400 per annum or around 90 per day.

57. Previous ACPOS research\(^\text{11}\) suggests that the average detention time is just under four hours and almost 84% of detentions are concluded at six hours or less. Less than one per cent exceeded twelve hours.

58. A significant proportion of detainees can be under the influence of drink and/or drugs and therefore not fit for interview, or have additional welfare needs that require medical assessment or attention. These factors impact on the police’s ability to interview suspects but also impact on the appropriateness of such individuals being quickly liberated from custody to return at a later date for questioning. There will also be cases where the nature of the crime(s) under investigation and the threat the suspect would pose to victims, witnesses or the community in general is such that they could not be liberated prior to the conclusion of the investigation.

59. Police Scotland therefore estimates the proportion of detainees that would be considered for investigative liberation at around 10%. This would equate to around 3,240 persons per annum being released on investigative liberation.

60. The police would then have the option of whether or not to place conditions on the suspect. Police Scotland estimates that around 16% of individuals released from police custody on undertakings are subject to special bail conditions. However, given the circumstances likely to be prevailing at the investigative liberation stage, where the threat to the criminal justice process is arguably greater, Police Scotland suggest that the proportion of suspects that will be placed on conditions would greatly exceed the levels seen at undertaking: possibly around half of the estimated 3,240 cases that will occur over a twelve month period.

\(^{11}\)http://www.acpos.co.uk/Documents/News%20Releases/SolicitorAccessDataReport.pdf [Link no longer operates]

61. Application of conditions is likely to be done at the inspector level. Police Scotland estimate that the process would take somewhere in the region of 30 minutes per case:

62. Application of special conditions to investigative liberations:

\[1620 \text{ suspects} \times 30 \text{ minutes} \times £33.86 \text{ per hour} = £27,000\]

63. Such decisions would be appealable on application to a sheriff. Given the likely role of Procurator Fiscal in that appeals process, there would be a requirement for the police to provide COPFS with a report in these cases. COPFS has estimated 425 cases per annum. It may be possible that the ‘decision log’ used by the officer imposing the conditions could be used as the basis for this report, in which case there would be little additional demands on the police. Otherwise an officer would need to formulate a report.

64. There will be a number of suspects who will not comply with their conditions bringing increased workload and cost to the police in terms of crime recording, investigation, arrest/report and potential appearance from custody. There is also the likelihood that on some occasions details of the investigative liberation may need to be altered to accommodate unforeseen circumstances, either on the part of the investigating officers or suspect. This will inevitably involve officer/staff time. The impact of this should be low given the small numbers.

65. It is likely that there will be an additional increase in prisoner throughput due to those released on investigative liberation being re-arrested as a result of them having committed offences. It is not possible to accurately estimate what the level of offending will be but if it were to be 20%, this would translate to an additional 324 prisoners of whom a proportion would be kept in custody (particularly where the offence related to threats or attacks upon victims or witnesses in the original case under investigation). Given the likely spread of further detention times from a few hours to more than a day (weekend detentions), even if only the minimum additional cost of £180 is applied to each of these prisoners this would result in a further increase in costs:

\[324 \text{ person breaching conditions of undertaking} \times £180 \text{ per detention} = £58,000\]

66. To ensure the rights and welfare needs of the suspect are recognised and met there will be a need to formally ‘process’ suspects when they return. This will involve the usual search and risk assessment in order to draft a suitable care plan. It will also include a formal offer and/or reminder of legal rights. A proportion of returning suspects are likely to require the services of an interpreter or appropriate adult or in some cases a consultation with a medical practitioner to establish whether or not they are fit for interview. Police Scotland has given an average processing cost of £180 per arrival.

\[3,240 \text{ prisoners} \times £180 \text{ per detention} = £583,000\]
67. The table below summarises the potential costs identified by Police Scotland associated with investigative liberation.

Table 8 – Potential police costs associated with investigative liberation

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Cost Description</th>
<th>Cost £</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Inspector level authorisation of investigative liberations and application of conditions</td>
<td>27,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Additional work associated with people breaching conditions of investigative liberation</td>
<td>58,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Processing of prisoners returning from investigative liberation</td>
<td>583,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>669,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

68. These projections do not consider any costs associated with the notification of amendments to or cancellation of liberation dates. This will likely be achieved via telephone or e-mail and supported by a formal written notice. The Scottish Government anticipates that these costs would be marginal.

69. This estimate is based on the hourly costs associated with an inspector’s time. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of inspectors’ general workloads. This £669,000 is therefore classed as an opportunity cost.

Liberation from police custody – presumption to liberty

70. The Bill provides that when the police do not intend to recommend opposition to bail at a court hearing, the suspect should be released, either unconditionally or on an undertaking, to appear at court on a specified future date.

71. During the year 2011-12 Scottish police forces dealt with over 204,000 prisoners. SCS advise that during that same year 54,036 persons appeared in court on a new charge. It is only this group that will be impacted upon by the presumption to liberty and an expanded regime of undertaking.

72. Police Scotland estimates that the Bill’s provisions on presumption to liberty may result in a decrease of between 10% and 20% in the numbers of prisoners appearing from custody – between 5,400 and 10,800 prisoners.

73. Police Scotland advises that, given the nature of how costs are accrued in this area, the savings to the police from this reduction would be insignificant – detainees would have already been received in custody, may have required medical assessment and been given blankets, bedding, food, etc. It is likely that all of these releases would entail the application of special conditions, which requires the authority of an inspector, taking an average of 30 minutes per case.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

\[
\begin{align*}
5,420 \text{ prisoner releases} \times 30 \text{ minutes} \times 1 \text{ inspector} @ £33.86 \text{ per hour} &= £92,000 \\
10,840 \text{ prisoner releases} \times 30 \text{ minutes} \times 1 \text{ inspector} @ £33.86 \text{ per hour} &= £184,000
\end{align*}
\]

74. A mid-range estimate for this activity would be £138,000.

75. None of these projections includes any contingency in relation to ‘bail’ monitoring activity, whether as an additional role for frontline officers to undertake or, given potential the numbers involved through the creation of ‘Bail Managers’ as there are in some forces in England and Wales.

76. This estimate is based on the hourly costs associated with an inspector’s time. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of inspectors’ general workloads. This £138,000 is therefore classed as an opportunity cost.

Legal advice – facilitating access

77. The Bill implements Lord Carloway’s recommendation that legal access should be made available to all suspects, “regardless of questioning, as soon as practicable after… the detention of the arrested suspect at the police station”. Police Scotland has indicated that about 20% of those in police custody are currently offered access to legal advice.

78. During 2011-12 forces received a total of 204,200 prisoners. Using the 20% figure provided by Police Scotland suggests 40,840 of these would have been eligible for legal advice, leaving around 163,360 people who go through police stations and are not currently offered access to a solicitor, who will now have a right to this access.

79. Information provided by SLAB currently places the numbers of persons accessing legal advice in Scotland as being in the region of 60 per day or 21,900 per annum; this equates to a current acceptance rate of 53.6%.

80. In discussion with SLAB and other stakeholders the Scottish Government has concluded that the take-up rate for this group will likely be lower than for those who are questioned, on the basis that detainees being released without being questioned are less likely to seek legal advice. A likely range of 20% to 53.6% take-up rates for solicitor access for this non-interviewed group has been modelled, with a best estimate at 35% (see table 9 below). It should be noted that Police Scotland feels that take-up rates may be higher than this.

81. The format for legal advice will be a mix of telephone and in person. Currently around 15% of advice provided by SLAB is in person at the police station; the rest is provided through the Solicitor Contact Line. In England and Wales the ratio is markedly different – around 70% of those requesting legal advice see a legal advisor in person at a police station. However, as Lord
Carloway points out in his report\textsuperscript{12}, the system in England and Wales is not directly comparable because private communication with a solicitor is interpreted to include an accredited representative of a solicitor (i.e. a paralegal), and the introduction of fixed fees has had an impact on the type of advice offered. A proportion of 30\% of advice offered in person, with 70\% by telephone, has been modelled based on discussions with SLAB and other stakeholders.

82. Additional access to solicitors will have implications for the police in terms of staff time to facilitate this, in terms of making contact with the solicitor, making arrangements for consultation, and escorting the detained person. Police Scotland has estimated that facilitating a solicitor visit would involve 30 minutes of staff time, while facilitating a telephone consultation would involve 15 minutes of staff time. Using a 30:70 split gives an average figure of 19.5 minutes, or 0.325 hours.

Table 9: costs for police from additional legal advice

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Scenario</th>
<th>Number of additional cases where legal advice provided</th>
<th>Impact on police</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>20% take-up for non-interviews</td>
<td>32,672</td>
<td>$32,672 \times 0.325 \times £21.86 = £232,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35% take-up for non-interviews</td>
<td>57,176</td>
<td>$57,176 \times 0.325 \times £21.86 = £406,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53.6% take-up for non-interviews</td>
<td>87,561</td>
<td>$87,561 \times 0.325 \times £21.86 = £622,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

83. This gives a best estimate of £\textbf{406,000} of additional police staff time involved in facilitating access to legal advice. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of inspectors’ general workloads. This has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

Legal advice – modifications to custody estate

84. There are currently limited facilities in existence to permit solicitors to consult confidentially with clients at police stations. Police Scotland anticipates that in order to facilitate the additional telephone and face to face consultations that might result from a right to legal access, additional interview accommodation may be required. Of the police premises in Scotland with custody holding facilities there are 42 which are identified as primary facilities and a further 55 are identified as secondary facilities. Primary facilities are resourced by designated staff from Custody Division and are where prisoners are kept prior to appearing at court. These are open on a 24/7 basis. Secondary facilities are opened on an ‘as and when necessary’ basis and are staffed by trained resources from Local Policing.

\textsuperscript{12}Carloway Review Report and Recommendations paragraph 6.1.6
85. There is an ongoing process of rationalisation of the custody estate, and Police Scotland has considered the prospect of further redesignation of custody estate centres.

86. Police Scotland anticipates that in order to accommodate the volume of legal access interviews a total of 160 consultation rooms may be required.

87. The cost of providing interview facilities varies substantially between locations. In some instances additional interview room facilities may be achieved at relatively low cost, in the order of £5,000 per room. In other instances more extensive work may be required and costs may be £35,000 or higher, per room. An average cost per room of £20,000 has been assumed. This gives total financial costs of £3,200,000. It should be noted that this is a capital cost.

\[ 160 \text{ interview rooms} \times £20,000 \text{ average cost} = £3,200,000 \]

88. Given the wide variety in individual costs per room, it is anticipated that this total capital cost could vary within a range of between £1,600,000 and £4,800,000.

89. Each interview room will also require fixed line telephone equipment to permit phone advice to be given to an accused by their solicitor during detention. Police Scotland advise that the cost per room will be in the order of £600.

Telephony associated with 160 interview rooms @ £600 per room = £96,000

90. The costs for modifications to the custody estate are in line with what was identified at the point of the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals (Scotland) Act 2010. Due to the scale of this work, it is assumed that it would be undertaken over a period of two years, with total capital costs of £1,648,000 per year. SPA is currently developing an estates strategy, and there is some financing carried over to SPA to implement upgrades to the custody estate.

Legal advice – letter of rights

91. The Bill states that every arrested and detained suspect should be provided with a copy of a “letter of rights” unless there are particular reasons not to do so.

92. Anticipated cost for the production of English language version of the Letter of Rights is £6,000 per annum for 200,000 copies of double sided A4 with two columns of print per page.

93. The costs for the development of non-English language versions will, primarily, be associated with the cost of translation services. Provisional estimates place the cost for translation into the ten most popular non-English languages at £2,000, as a one-off cost. Additional costs for desktop, ad hoc printing are unlikely to exceed £1,000 per annum.

94. Total estimated SPA costs for the letter of rights are therefore £7,000 per annum and £2,000 initial costs.
Questioning

95. The Bill will enable the police to seek judicial authority to question a suspect further after the point of charge or intimation of a report being sent to the Procurator Fiscal, but prior to the individual’s first appearance at court. Such a process could be used when new evidence emerges or other material becomes known, or where for good reason it was not possible to question the suspect properly prior to charge. The requirement to seek permission from the court to ask further questions provides an independent safeguard to this provision. The envisaged process would be akin to obtaining a warrant from a sheriff.

96. The Crown will also be entitled to make an application to the court for the police to be allowed to question an accused after his/her first appearance in court. Such an application can be made until the trial against the accused has commenced. This will also have implications for the police.

97. Lord Carloway does not recommend that this process should be restricted to solemn procedure only although he suggests that (at para 6.2.55), “no doubt a sheriff would be reluctant to grant permission in a summary case”. Accordingly, while an application in a summary case will be competent, it is assumed that the majority of applications will be in cases which are likely to be, or are being, prosecuted under solemn procedure. COPFS report in their annual case reporting analysis that, in 2011-2012, out of 101,606 cases disposed of in court, only 5% (5,132 cases) were by way of solemn proceedings.

98. There is the possibility that once an accused has appeared in court the police (via the procurator fiscal) or the Crown itself (seeking to allow a police officer to enquire on its behalf) will make requests to interview accused people, who may either be on bail or remanded in custody, about matters relating to DNA analysis results or associated with the examination of telephones or computers. Previously this type of questioning could only be conducted at court, in the course of a trial, with no opportunity to carry out investigations as a result of any answers. It is probable that all of these interviews would be carried out at police premises under tape recorded conditions. Persons would require to be given the right to consult with solicitors. There would also be the usual requirements regarding the assessment of prisoner welfare, etc.

99. This is a new procedure without precedent in Scotland, so it is difficult to establish concrete estimates for the frequency with which post-charge questioning will be used. COPFS and Police Scotland have provided estimates, based predominantly on professional judgement, and these vary significantly. Since COPFS will act as gatekeepers in the process, deciding which requests for post-charge questioning go forward to a Sheriff, the Scottish Government has used the COPFS estimates in its calculations.

100. COPFS has estimated that a total of around 200 instances of post-charge questioning might take place each year, of which 50 could be cases where the suspect is in custody before appearing in court the next day, 100 could be cases where the suspect has been released on undertaking or report, and 50 could be cases where the suspect has already appeared in court.

101. The cost of a suspect returning to police premises for questioning has been estimated by Police Scotland at £180, covering standard processing – details noted, checks and risk assessment carried out, solicitor advice offered and arranged, with the potential for medical assessment/assistance, interpreters, etc.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

200 persons detained for questioned after charge @ £180 per person =£36,000

102. Police Scotland has estimated the staff costs associated with a police interview at £580. This covers officer time for the application process, interview preparation, interview, and post interview procedures including the compilation of a report (including tape transcription) to the Procurator Fiscal.

200 persons interviewed @ £580 per interview=£116,000

103. These calculations exclude any costs associated with the pre-request / pre-interview analysis of the newly available evidence or its reporting to Crown as this work would already be undertaken in the normal course of a developing investigation.

Table 10: summary of projected police costs – questioning persons after charge

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Cost Description</th>
<th>Cost</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Prisoner processing</td>
<td>36,000</td>
<td>200 persons</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Interview related</td>
<td>116,000</td>
<td>200 persons</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>£152,000</td>
<td>200 persons</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

104. This estimate is based primarily on hourly staff costs. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of inspectors’ general workloads. This £152,000 has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

Corroboration and sufficiency of evidence

105. In order to inform his Review, Lord Carloway commissioned COPFS to carry out an analysis of data already within its possession. This suggested that there was potential for 458 additional prosecutions per year.13 Lord Carloway outlined a number of caveats to these results and subsequently commented in his evidence to the Justice Committee on 29 November 201114 that he did not expect the total number of prosecutions to increase.

106. However, analysis carried out by Police Scotland and COPFS suggests that there are likely to be increases in the number of cases reported by the Police to COPFS, and in the number of cases prosecuted by COPFS. This analysis was based on shadow marking exercises, i.e.

---

13 This comprised 268 cases which had been put on petition but later marked “No Further Proceedings due to Insufficient Evidence”, and 190 cases received by the COPFS National Sexual Crimes Unit but had not resulted in an accused being placed on petition. In relation to the latter, the Carloway Review referred to 95 cases, but this was on the basis of a 6 month sample, thus implying 190 cases over a year.

56
re-evaluating a sample of previous cases to identify how many might have progressed differently under the new system.

107. COPFS provided Police Scotland with draft new guidance on the reporting of cases without corroboration. Police Scotland then conducted a shadow reporting exercise in consultation with COPFS. The focus was on ensuring, wherever possible, that there was supporting evidence in each case. The results of the exercise demonstrated that the range of increased number of cases would be between 1.5 and 2.2%, and most likely to be at the 1.5% level.

108. National case reporting indicates that in 2011-12, 242,404 Standard Prosecution Reports (“SPRs”) were completed, indicating a case referred from the police to COPFS. A 1.5% increase would equate to an additional 3,636 cases reported nationally over a twelve month period.

109. The costs of investigating and reporting a case to Crown Office vary depending upon the nature of the crime under investigation, complexity of the investigation, number of officers involved and ready availability of evidence. However, Police Scotland estimate that the cost of submitting a basic SPR is £59.86.

\[
\text{Additional 3,636 case reported annually @ £59.86 per SPR=} \text{£218,000}
\]

110. This assumes that there will be no requirement to significantly change the format for reporting cases from the police to COPFS.

111. This calculation shows the estimated cost of an increase of 1.5% in police reporting. However, levels of reported crime have been falling for several years and are now at a near forty year low. See paragraph 34 for more detail. An increase of 1.5% is within natural annual variation.

112. This estimate is based on the staff time in completing an SPR. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of general staff workloads. This £218,000 has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

113. The removal of the requirement of corroboration is likely to result in additional cases being brought to court. Police Scotland has used the figures from police and COPFS shadow marking exercises (see paragraphs 150-153 for more detail on the COPFS exercise) to extrapolate an overall increase of 3.03% in the number of court proceedings to which the police would need to provide support.

114. Police Scotland has provided an estimate of the impact of this increase on overtime payments. Only those costs borne by Strathclyde Police were available in producing this estimate. In the last financial year, Strathclyde Police spent £2,323,000 on police witnesses attendance at court. It was previously reported that Strathclyde submitted 53.5% of SPRs across Scotland. Using the proportion of case reporting as a guide, this extrapolates to £4,343,000 nationally.
115. Given the above estimated increase in proceedings Police Scotland suggest that increases in cases proceeding to trial diet, and therefore witness costs, would be of a similar order. Therefore, court overtime payments could be anticipated to rise 3.03%, an increase of £132,000 to £4,474,000. Since this relates to overtime payments, this has been counted as a financial cost.

116. These costs do not recognise additional witness provision and associated costs where no direct court overtime is attributed.

117. Police Scotland also anticipates an increase in workloads associated with a COPFS marking decision to proceed. While it is possible to make an estimation of increased costs due to direct attendance at court using existing empirical evidence, it is much more difficult to make a definitive evaluation of the costs of additional work generated by COPFS making a marking decision to initiate criminal proceedings.

118. Routinely, the majority of additional work associated with summary cases prior to citation would tend to be the submission of witness statements. Average cases would use two to five witnesses. The time taken for submission would depend on original format and other factors, but Police Scotland has provided a broad estimate that for four witness statements, two officer hours would be required on average. If proceedings increased by 2,836 cases (based on the 1% increase indicated by the COPFS shadow marking exercise) that could see a potential increase in costs of £136,000 per annum.

\[
2,836 \times 2 \text{ hours} \times £23.91 \text{ per hour} = £136,000
\]

119. This estimate is based on the staff time involved. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of general staff workloads. This £136,000 has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

120. It is the increase in solemn work that has the potential to have a greater impact across the police service, but this is very difficult to quantify due to its diverse nature. On marking a solemn case, there will most likely be a further instruction to the reporting officer by COPFS to: submit essential statements immediately and the rest thereafter, proceed with forensic analysis, conduct identity parades, continue to trace witnesses, and obtain defence statements.

121. This list is far from exhaustive but demonstrates the nature of enquiries relating to solemn proceedings. Further, COPFS regularly tasks Precognition work to the police, a significant burden on investigation teams which has not been previously costed. In addition, any further enquiry work has a knock-on impact on other areas of business, for example case management and word processing.

122. Police Scotland has modelled typical staff costs directly associated with a solemn marking decision, which suggests an average cost of £3,789 per case.

123. Using the percentage increase indicated by the COPFS shadow marking exercise suggests an additional 953 cases, suggesting total police staff costs of £3,611,000 per annum.

\[
953 \times £3,789 = £3,611,000
\]
124. This estimate is based on the staff time involved. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of general staff workloads. This £3,611,000 has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

Carloway provisions in general – police training

125. Commencement and implementation of the Bill’s provisions relating to Lord Carloway’s recommendations will require training to be undertaken to ensure that relevant police personnel have a professional knowledge and understanding of the legislation and its associated impact on their day to day duties.

126. Police Scotland has estimated the requirement at two hours of e-learning followed by 16 hours of classroom learning for each officer. This can be achieved through reallocation of the officer from normal duties in most cases without the need for overtime payments, so staff time for attending training is treated as an opportunity cost.

127. The financial costs associated with the training for the remainder of the Bill’s provisions are estimated at £860,000, comprising:

- Development of e-learning package = £45,000
- Total travel, accommodation and refreshments costs for all training = £815,000.

128. The opportunity costs associated with the training for the remainder of the Bill’s provisions are estimated at £9,848,000, comprising:

- Total staff time for attending 18 hours of trainings = £8,437,000
- Course and briefing preparation by training sergeants = £10,000
- Staff costs for 3-hour briefing for senior staff = £60,000
- Training staff time for delivering training = £1,209,000
- ‘Train the trainers’ – development = £35,000
- ‘Train the trainers’ – delivery = £35,000
- Additional training resource in Edinburgh and Glasgow = £64,000.

Measures with no or marginal costs

Child Suspects

129. The Bill’s provisions for child suspects will have an impact for the police by way of additional time spent finding, waiting for and accommodating parental or similar support and/or legal support for 16 and 17 year olds wishing it. In preparing the Bill the Scottish Government worked closely with Police Scotland on the provisions relating to child suspects and as part of that Police Scotland performed a scoping exercise to identify the number of 16 and 17 year olds attending police offices across Scotland during financial year 2011-12.
Table 11: numbers of 16 and 17 year olds attending police offices

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Force Area</th>
<th>Aged 16 &amp; 17</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Northern</td>
<td>757</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tayside</td>
<td>267</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fife</td>
<td>828</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Central Scotland</td>
<td>177</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dumfries and Galloway</td>
<td>94</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lothian and Borders</td>
<td>1443</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Grampian</td>
<td>402</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>3968</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

130. Strathclyde were unable to provide numbers for this research but if they were taken to represent approximately the same again (based on the fact that approximately 50% of recorded crimes and offences in Scotland are recorded within the Strathclyde Police area) then a figure of 8,000 16 and 17 year olds attending police offices would be a reasonable total.

131. ACPOS, and now Police Scotland, have long been key partners in the roll-out of early and effective intervention (EEI) and the whole system approach to youth justice. The ethos of this approach promotes the diversion of young people away from formal measures and custody and in recent years. Nationally, since 2006-7 offence referrals to the children’s reporter have fallen by 66%, from 16,490 to 5,604 in 2011-12, with a 31% reduction from 2010-11 to 2011-12. Since 2008-9 the Policing Performance Framework has collected data on youth crime: the number of recorded crimes and offences committed by children and young people (8-17 year olds) decreased by 32% between 2008-09 and 2011-12. The number of children and young people (8-17) who committed crimes and offences decreased by 9% between 2010-11 and 2011-12 and fell 29% from 2008-9 to 2011-12. While the provisions in this Bill are not integral to the whole system approach they are consistent with a young-person-centred approach to youth justice which has seen substantial falls in the numbers of young people coming to the notice of police, requiring to be the subject of SPRs, and being taken to formal measures generally. As such, separating the savings associated with likely future falls in the number of young people being taken to police stations and interviewed from the costs of training, developing IT systems and additional waiting time from more general developments in policing practice would not be possible. Discussions with the Police suggest they would see these costs as intrinsic to the wider development of policing in Scotland and not attributable to this Bill.

Vulnerable adult suspects

132. The Bill provides a definition of a “vulnerable suspect” and puts in place special measures to ensure their rights are protected. Currently, when police are dealing with a vulnerable suspect or an individual about whom there is doubt about their capacity, then the services of an appropriate adult are sought. This should occur as soon as practicable and before interview.

133. Crown Office instructions on vulnerable suspects already provide that:
“Any cases involving suspects of any age who require the support of an appropriate adult must be provided with access to a solicitor prior to interview. They should not be allowed to waive this right.”

134. As the Bill’s provisions for vulnerable adults align with this Crown Office instruction, the Bill will not have a financial impact for the police.

Carloway provisions in general – police ICT

135. The Bill’s provisions will entail a significant level of change in the areas associated with custody systems, case reporting/management systems, and the Criminal History System.

136. The SPA is currently considering a major programme to redesign ICT processes and systems. If the programme is taken forward, any changes required for this Bill’s provisions should be achievable as part of this wider redesign without substantial additional costs.

Other provisions

137. The other Carloway provisions not mentioned in the previous section are anticipated to have no substantial costs for the SPA.

CROWN OFFICE AND PROCURATOR FISCAL SERVICE

Measures with cost implications

Liberation from police custody

138. COPFS has identified two scenarios where the Bill’s provisions for liberation from police custody could have resource implications for them.

139. COPFS has developed a process model for cases where a suspect has been released by the police, HMRC or UKBA on investigative bail and wishes to challenge his bail conditions. This model sets out the work required at an administrative and professional level, and shows overall staff costs for COPFS of £64.42 per case. With an estimated 425 cases per year that leads to £27,000 per annum in staff costs.

140. COPFS has also developed a process model for cases where a suspect has been released by the police, HMRC or UKBA on undertaking and wishes to challenge his bail conditions. This also shows anticipated staff costs of £64.42 per case. With an estimated 2,950 cases per year that leads to £190,000 per annum in staff costs.

141. In total, COPFS identifies £217,000 per annum in additional staff costs as a result of the Bill’s provisions for liberation from police custody. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of general staff workloads. This has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.
Questioning

142. COPFS has identified three scenarios where the Bill’s provisions for police questioning after charge could have resource implications for them. COPFS has provided process models for the three different scenarios, setting out work required at an administrative and professional level. See paragraphs 99-100 for more information on police and COPFS estimates of the prevalence of post-charge questioning.

143. For cases where the suspect has been advised he is to be reported to the Procurator Fiscal, is being kept in custody, and police/HMRC/UKBA wish to further question the suspect before he appears in court the next day, COPFS anticipate costs for them of £25.43 per case. With an estimated 50 cases per year, this leads to £1,000 per annum in staff costs.

144. For cases where the suspect has been advised he is to be reported to the Procurator Fiscal, has been released on undertaking or report, and the police/HMRC/UKBA wish to further question the suspect before he appears in court, COPFS anticipate costs for them of £43.38 per case. With an estimated 100 cases per year, this leads to £4,000 per annum in staff costs.

145. For cases where the suspect has appeared in court and police/HMRC/UKBA wish to further question the suspect, COPFS anticipate costs for them of £86.77 per case. With an estimated 50 cases per year, this leads to £4,000 per annum in staff costs.

146. In total, COPFS identify £10,000 per annum in additional staff costs as a result of the Bill’s provisions for police questioning after charge. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of general staff workloads. This has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

Corroboration and sufficiency of evidence

147. It is in relation to the provisions for the removal of the requirement for corroboration that COPFS has identified the most substantial cost implications. This relates to a possible increase in the number of reports received from the police, and in the number of prosecutions at solemn and summary court.

148. Detail of the Police Scotland shadow reporting exercise is provided in paragraphs 106-107. The results of the exercise showed a likely increase in the number of SPRs of between 1.5 and 2.2%, and most likely to be at the 1.5% level.

149. The increase in cases received from the police will result in increased costs for initial case preparation. This process is applied to all case received.
Table 12: additional COPFS costs for initial case preparation

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Process</th>
<th>Current Cost £</th>
<th>Increased cost £ (Low estimate)</th>
<th>Increased cost £ (Best estimate)</th>
<th>Increased cost £ (High estimate)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Initial case preparation</td>
<td>4,702,000</td>
<td>71,000</td>
<td>71,000</td>
<td>103,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

150. A further shadow marking exercise was conducted by COPFS to consider the potential impact on the number of prosecutions. A draft new qualitative prosecutorial test was applied by six Procurator Fiscal Deputes (PFDs) with a range of experience. The deputes' assessment was made on the basis of the information contained in the SPR submitted by the police. The deputes conducting the shadow marking exercise did not know the original marking decision.

151. The results of the COPFS shadow marking exercise demonstrated that an anticipated increase of the following was likely:

- Summary Prosecutions 1% (due to the statistical sample the range could be from -1% to 4%)
- Solemn Prosecutions 6% (due to the statistical sample the range could be from 2% to 10%).

152. The combined impact of the two exercises is summarised in the following table.

Table 13: Potential % increase in the number of prosecutions (to nearest 0.1%)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Summary prosecutions</td>
<td>0.5%</td>
<td>2.5%</td>
<td>6.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solemn prosecutions</td>
<td>3.5%</td>
<td>7.6%</td>
<td>12.4%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

153. A relatively small sample size was used in analysis of the potential impact of removing the requirement for corroboration. This means that the confidence interval between which the impacts could lie – presented as low and high estimates in the table – is very large. However it is extremely unlikely that impacts at the high end of the scale would be seen.

154. The increases in summary and solemn prosecutions will result in additional costs for COPFS, as set out in the following table.
Table 14: additional COPFS costs for summary and solemn prosecutions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Process</th>
<th>Current Cost £</th>
<th>Increased cost £ (Low estimate)</th>
<th>Increased cost £ (Best estimate)</th>
<th>Increased cost £ (High estimate)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Summary courts</td>
<td>20,365,000</td>
<td>102,000</td>
<td>509,000</td>
<td>1,283,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solemn courts</td>
<td>35,131,000</td>
<td>1,240,000</td>
<td>2,670,000</td>
<td>4,360,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

155. This gives a total estimated cost implication of £3,250,000 from increases in case volumes following the removal of the requirement for corroboration. These costs should be considered in the context of reductions in case volumes in recent years, as described at paragraph 34.

156. This estimate is based on staff costs. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of general staff workloads. This £3,250,000 has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

Carloway provisions in general – increase in appeals

157. While the level of appeals within Scotland is relatively stable, experience suggests that a change in law or a Supreme Court judgment normally leads to a short-term increase in the number of defence appeals lodged. COPFS therefore anticipate that the significant changes to the Scottish Criminal Justice System made by this Bill will give rise to legal challenges related to those changes.

158. Based on the number of appeals following the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010, COPFS anticipate that for the first three years after implementation of the Bill there is likely to be a 10% increase in the Appeals Unit case load. Due to the additional work involved, this would result in an increase in costs of £87,000 per annum for three years. This estimate is based on staff time costs, and so does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of general staff workloads. This has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

Carloway provisions in general – COPFS training

159. The removal of the requirement of corroboration will require COPFS to apply a new prosecutorial test. This is a significant change and applying a new prosecutorial test will therefore require training for all legal staff within COPFS. COPFS staff will also require to be trained on the new arrest/detention/investigative bail and appeal provisions and any miscellaneous items that may be lodged throughout the passage of the bill. This training will be one-off and not recurring.

160. The implementation of ECHR into Scots law in 1999 was also a significant change in the legal approach that was required to be taken by prosecutors and COPFS assess that the training needs for this Bill will be broadly similar to those undertaken at that time, which was three days training for legal staff.

161. The training requirement is assumed to extend to all 580 legal staff with an average of 20 trainees on each 3 day training event, and 815 operational admin staff with an average of 16 trainees on each one day training event.

162. Nothing has been included for the potential cost of updating existing training materials and events, which is assumed to be manageable within the normal workload of the Training Department, as this training will be prioritised over other more routine training.

163. COPFS has estimated total staff costs at £920,000, including trainer time to develop the course, trainer time to deliver events, and delegate time to attend training. COPFS training staff are already in place, and it is not anticipated that additional staff would be taken on to develop or deliver the training. This would be achieved within existing staff workload. In the great majority of cases, staff attendance at training would be by reallocation from their regular work, rather than as overtime. The above stated costs are therefore treated as an opportunity cost rather than a concrete financial cost.

Measures with no or marginal costs

164. The Bill provisions not mentioned in the previous section are anticipated to have no substantial costs for COPFS.

Carloway provisions in general – COPFS communication costs

165. It is anticipated that new documentation for COPFS will require to be produced in a number of areas. It is anticipated that in line with carbon management policies and becoming a more “green” organisation this documentation will likely be internet focused and as such, COPFS consider that any additional communication costs can be managed within the existing budget.

SCOTTISH COURT SERVICE

166. Costs on SCS will arise primarily from the increase in cases following the removal of the requirement for corroboration and the proposals in respect of new applications to the sheriff.

167. Whilst the Bill’s provisions relating to the Bowen recommendations are likely to make savings in court time, they are unlikely to make actual cash savings for the SCS. Any time freed up by the implementation of the provisions will be used to allocate court cases more quickly and use court time more effectively at both High court and local court level, but it appears that they are not of a scale that will result in the reduction of numbers of either judiciary or staff at any particular court. However some of the anticipated costs noted may be balanced by some of the estimated court time savings.
Measures with cost implications

Liberation from police custody

168. The Bill’s provisions for liberation from police custody will result in new applications to the sheriff for review of special conditions. This will require a fundamental change to the IT system to record information of police cases prior to the commencement of court proceedings. SCS has provided early estimates for this as one-off cost of £40,000, within a possible range of £30,000 to £50,000. This is capital expenditure.

169. There will also be an increase in costs in relation to the processing of the new type of applications, which may be opposed by the Crown. The current estimation of expected volumes is around 3,375 pa. If 50% of these are opposed by the Crown that would result in an additional 1,687 cases heard in court. SCS estimate around 15 minutes for such a hearing, suggesting costs of £84,000 per annum, and with unopposed chambers applications using a simplified procedure costing around £19,000 this would bring it to a total of cost around £103,000 per annum.

170. There is a finite amount of court time available under the current arrangements. The Scottish Government anticipates that these additional requirements will be managed within current resources. This £103,000 has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

Questioning

171. The Bill’s provisions for questioning of suspects after charge will require applications to the sheriff. In assessing costs for SCS, it is important to differentiate between applications made prior to the person’s first appearance in court, and those made following first appearance.

172. In the first case, SCS suggest that applications will be dealt with out of court by the sheriff (in a way similar to the police seeking a warrant), that there will be no opportunity for the applications to be opposed and if necessary the police may also seek a warrant for the accused to attend for questioning at the same time. It is anticipated that such applications will be cost neutral for SCS.

173. In the second scenario, where the application is made at or following first court appearance, a court diet will be fixed for the sheriff to consider the application made by the Crown and to hear any opposition to the application. There will be an increase in costs in relation to the processing of this new type of court application, which will require a court hearing.

174. COPFS has estimated that there would be around 50 cases per year of applications for post-charge questioning following first appearance at court. See paragraph 100 for more detail.

175. SCS estimates that each case, which will require to be called in court to allow for opposition, will take about 30 minutes of court time, giving a total estimated cost of £5,000 per annum.

176. There is a finite amount of court time available under the current arrangements. The Scottish Government anticipates that the additional requirements will be managed within current resources. This £5,000 has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

Corroboration and sufficiency of evidence

177. The removal of the requirement of corroboration is likely to result in additional cases being brought to court. The figures from police and COPFS for the numbers obtained in their relative shadow marking exercises suggested that increases will be in the following ranges. However, it is considered very unlikely that increases of the extent suggested in the high estimate will be seen (see paragraphs 106-107 and 150-153 for more detail).

Table 15: potential % increase in the number of prosecutions (to nearest 0.1%)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Summary prosecutions</td>
<td>0.5%</td>
<td>2.5%</td>
<td>6.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solemn prosecutions</td>
<td>3.5%</td>
<td>7.6%</td>
<td>12.4%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

178. The SCS annual report for 2011/12\(^{15}\) states that there were 6,564 cases in the solemn courts. In relation to summary proceedings, there were 74,080 cases in the Sheriff Courts and 57,633 in the Justice of the Peace courts. Applying the percentage increases in table 15 above would result in the following number of additional prosecutions. This assumes that 20% of solemn cases would be prosecuted in the High Court, with the remainder in the Sheriff Courts.

Table 16: additional prosecutions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>High Court</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>163</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sheriff Court solemn</td>
<td>184</td>
<td>399</td>
<td>651</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sheriff Court summary (includes Stipendiary cases)</td>
<td>370</td>
<td>1,852</td>
<td>4,667</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Justice of the Peace courts</td>
<td>288</td>
<td>1,441</td>
<td>3,631</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

179. Combining this with the average costs per case of providing Legal Aid in each court in 2012-13 allows estimation of the costs resulting from additional prosecutions. This gives a total estimated cost implication of £2,500,000.

Table 17: costs resulting from additional prosecutions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>High Court</td>
<td>£410,000</td>
<td>£900,000</td>
<td>£1,460,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sheriff Court solemn</td>
<td>£340,000</td>
<td>£740,000</td>
<td>£1,210,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sheriff Court summary (includes Stipendiary cases)</td>
<td>£120,000</td>
<td>£620,000</td>
<td>£1,560,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Justice of the Peace courts</td>
<td>£50,000</td>
<td>£240,000</td>
<td>£610,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>£930,000</td>
<td>£2,500,000</td>
<td>£4,840,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

180. However the cost of a High court case is significantly higher if it proceeds to trial, with the average plea costing less than 1.5% of the average case going to trial. The types of case making up the increase going to the High Court following removal of the requirement for corroboration is currently unknown, but if the cases coming to the High Court as part of the increase in business are more likely than average to test the Crown’s position on evidence and go to trial, the costs will increase accordingly.

181. These costs should be considered in the context of reductions in case volumes in recent years, as described at paragraph 34.

182. The costs from additional court time from the removal of the requirement for corroboration are to some extent balanced by the savings in court time associated with the Bowen elements of this Bill. See paragraphs 256-259 for more detail. There is a finite amount of court time available under the current arrangements. The Scottish Government anticipates that these additional requirements will be managed within current resources. This £2,500,000 has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

Measures with no or marginal costs

183. The Carloway provisions not mentioned in the previous section are anticipated to have no substantial costs for SCS.

SCOTTISH PRISON SERVICE

Measures with cost implications

Removal of requirement for corroboration

184. It is anticipated that the removal of the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases is likely to result in an increase in the number of prosecutions, which will impact on the SPS on the basis that additional prosecutions are likely to lead to additional convictions and additional custodial sentences. Based on the analysis by Police Scotland and COPFS (see paragraphs 106-107 and 150-153 for more detail), the potential scale of increases in prosecutions is as per the table below.

Table 18: potential % increase in the number of prosecutions (to nearest 0.1%)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Summary prosecutions</td>
<td>0.5%</td>
<td>2.5%</td>
<td>6.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solemn prosecutions</td>
<td>3.5%</td>
<td>7.6%</td>
<td>12.4%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

185. Figures from Criminal Proceedings in Scotland 2011-12 show that 118,590 individuals were proceeded against in the solemn courts, with the equivalent figure for solemn proceedings standing at 6,146. The increase in prosecutions could therefore be as follows:
Table 19: absolute increase in the number of prosecutions (to nearest 10)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Summary prosecutions</td>
<td>580</td>
<td>2,980</td>
<td>7,460</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solemn prosecutions</td>
<td>220</td>
<td>470</td>
<td>760</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

186. A relatively small sample size was used in analysis of the potential impact of removing the requirement for corroboration. This means that the confidence interval between which the impacts could lie – presented as low and high estimates in the table – is very large. However COPFS are of the view that the best estimate is expected to be an accurate forecast of the increased number of prosecutions.

187. Modelling of the potential impact of these additional prosecutions on the number of prison places required has been carried out on the following assumptions:
   - The distribution of crimes to which prosecutions will relate are as per the COPFS research done for the Carloway Review (recent shadow marking and reporting exercises identified only the overall impact at summary and solemn court level).
   - Additional prosecutions will follow the same pattern as those which have previously gone through the criminal justice system – that is, the same proportion will result in a successful conviction, the same proportion will result in a custodial sentence, and the average sentence length will be the same.

188. The costs of keeping accused people on remand has also been taken into account – there would only be additional costs where an accused person kept on remand did not receive a custodial sentence (for those who did get a custodial sentence, time on remand would be offset from the sentence served, thus meaning there were no additional costs).

189. SPS must take those offenders sentenced by the courts irrespective of the numbers in their custody at any one time. Through the years as the numbers of those in custody has increased SPS has shown that it is adaptable and has been able to react and accommodate these increases.

190. The table below sets out the number of additional prison places which could potentially be required from 2015-16 when the new provisions will come into force, and the associated costs of providing those extra prisoner places. It is anticipated that the full effect on prisoner places would not be seen immediately but would increase over a period of around 4-5 years. The figure of £37,302 used is the average annual cost of one prison place. This is calculated by dividing SPS’s overall running costs, including depreciation, by the design capacity of the prison estate in 2011-12.
Table 20: additional costs for SPS over time

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>2015-16</th>
<th>2016-17</th>
<th>2017-18</th>
<th>2018-19</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>% of impact</td>
<td>20%</td>
<td>60%</td>
<td>80%</td>
<td>100%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prison places</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Low estimate</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>140</td>
<td>180</td>
<td>230</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Best estimate</td>
<td>110</td>
<td>320</td>
<td>430</td>
<td>540</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>High estimate</td>
<td>190</td>
<td>570</td>
<td>760</td>
<td>950</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Costs based on £37,302 per additional place per annum</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Low estimate</td>
<td>£1,850,000</td>
<td>£5,200,000</td>
<td>£6,700,000</td>
<td>£8,500,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Best estimate</td>
<td>£4,100,000</td>
<td>£11,850,000</td>
<td>£15,900,000</td>
<td>£20,000,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>High estimate</td>
<td>£7,000,000</td>
<td>£21,100,000</td>
<td>£28,100,000</td>
<td>£35,200,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

191. Current Scottish Government projections\(^{16}\) anticipate prison population growth of around 200 per annum over the period in question, suggesting that the prison population may reach around 9,000 by 2017-18, against a current capacity of 8,100. The changes made by this Bill were not specifically considered in establishing these figures, but the projections do implicitly take into account likely legislative and other policy changes.

192. In the short term, SPS considers that it can accommodate the current forecast population within its existing capacity and existing budget. If the recent drop in short term and remand populations continues this will also help to absorb the potential impact of any offenders sent to custody as a result of the changes in the law on corroboration. Similarly the SPS considers it could operate safely at these levels with a comparatively moderate capital and running cost investment without the need to commission a new prison.

193. These possible increases in prisoner numbers should also be considered in the context of the introduction of the Community Payback Order as a more robust and flexible community sentence, the presumption against imposing short prison sentences of three months or less, and a range of policy initiatives designed to reduce reoffending such as the Reducing Reoffending

These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

Change Fund. This wider work is likely to have a positive impact on the prison population, and the capacity to absorb any increases from other sources.

194. SPS has indicated that the increases in prisoner population set out as best estimates above can be accommodated within the flexibility that exists in the provision of prison places. There are limits to this flexibility, and long term increases may accelerate the rate that this flexibility is used up. However, on the assumption of a steady level of resources being available to SPS, the additional costs set out above can be considered opportunity costs.

195. Prison population projections for 2017-18 range from 7,900 (low variant) to 10,500 (high variant). Given the wide range of uncertainty in the projections, at this stage it is not possible to say whether or not this proposal would trigger the need for additional capacity, nor the precise timing of any additional capacity requirements. Following implementation, the actual increase in the number of summary and solemn cases will therefore need to be monitored closely to see whether it is likely to have any implications for prison estate planning.

Measures with no or marginal costs

196. The Carloway provisions not mentioned in the previous section are anticipated to have no substantial costs for SPS.

LEGAL AID FUND

197. Estimated costs in this section are based on current legal aid fee structures which may be subject to change in future.

Measures with cost implications

Liberation from police custody

198. The Bill provides for suspects being liberated from police custody to return at a later stage for resumption of questioning. Special conditions can be attached to this, with the ability to challenge these special conditions in a court hearing before a sheriff. If representation is to be made available at these hearings, then Assistance by Way of Representation (ABWOR) would be the only way to do this, as criminal legal aid cannot be made available before the suspect is charged. SLAB estimate that the costs of such challenges would be in the region of £83,000, on the following basis:

- Police Scotland estimates for persons released on special conditions – 1,620 (see paragraphs 59-60)
- It is estimated that 25% of these people might challenge these special conditions – 405
- A figure of £200 has been used for the purposes of estimating the cost of the average cost of ABWOR for these hearings
- 405 x £200 = £81,000.
199. The new Bill also provides for suspects who are liberated from police custody to appear in court at a later date to also have special conditions attached, with the ability to challenge these special conditions in a court hearing before a sheriff. If representation is to be made available at these hearings, then ABWOR would be the only way to do this, as criminal legal aid cannot be made available before the suspect is charged. SLAB estimate that the cost of these challenges would be in the region of £585,000 on the following basis:

- 54,000 suspects currently released in this way.
- Police estimate that between 10% and 20% of these people could have special conditions attached (5,400 to 10,800, with a mid-range estimate of 8,100)
- When added to the current figure of 3,601 people released on undertakings with special conditions, this gives a total of 11,701
- It is estimated that 25% of these people might challenge these special conditions – 2,925
- A figure of £200 has been used for the purposes of estimating the cost of the average cost of ABWOR for these hearings
- 2,925 x £200 = £585,000.

200. It is anticipated that any increase in police or procurator fiscal liberation undertaking cases could also result in an increase in the number of breach proceedings which are raised when clients fail to attend at the police station or court after giving an undertaking to appear. Legal aid can be made available for these breach proceedings. In 2011-12, there were 2,301 grants of ABWOR, summary and solemn criminal legal aid for these proceedings. In total, £1,970,000 was spent for these types of cases during the year. If there is a 10% increase in these proceedings, then this would cost an extra £197,000.

201. In total, therefore, SLAB estimate additional costs of £863,000 per annum.

Legal advice

202. The Board currently runs the Solicitor Contact Line as part of the wider Police Station Duty Scheme. This provides a telephone solicitor contact point which operates 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Where a suspect being questioned at a police station requires legal advice, the police call the Contact Line who will either then contact the named solicitor for the client, or be available to provide telephone advice direct to the client. The contact line also makes arrangements for local duty solicitors to attend personally at police stations where this is required or requested by the suspect; or, if the duty solicitor is unavailable, to attend themselves. At present, the cost of paying Board solicitors and associated staff for this service is around £650,000 per year.

203. The Bill provides for accused people who are detained but not questioned to have the right to consult with a solicitor. It is anticipated that this would increase the calls to the solicitor contact line, and the number of instances where Board solicitors are required to advise suspects at police stations. At present, SLAB deals with around 60 suspects per day who are requesting legal advice. In a third of these cases, the suspects do not have a named solicitor, so solicitors on the Contact Line provide them with legal advice. In the other two thirds of these cases, the suspects do have a named solicitor who is then contacted to advise them that their clients are seeking legal advice from them.

204. As described in paragraph 78, the Bill is estimated to result in an additional 163,360 people being eligible to access legal advice in the police station.

205. In discussion with SLAB, Police Scotland and other stakeholders the Scottish Government has concluded that the take-up rate for this group will likely be lower than for those who are questioned, on the basis that detainees being released without being questioned are less likely to seek legal advice. A likely range of 20% to 53.6% take-up rates for solicitor access for this non-interviewed group has been modelled, with a most likely estimate at 35% (see table below). It is anticipated that the take-up rate for suspects who are interviewed would stay the same.

Table 21: total numbers of people seeking legal advice

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Scenario</th>
<th>Total people seeking legal advice</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>53.6% take-up for interviews; 20% take-up for non-interviews</td>
<td>22,224 + 32,672 = 54,896</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53.6% take-up for interviews; 35% take-up for non-interviews</td>
<td>22,224 + 57,176 = 79,400</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53.6% take-up for interviews; 53.6% take-up for non-interviews</td>
<td>22,224 + 87,561 = 109,785</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

206. At 20%, an additional 32,672 people could be looking for legal advice, giving a total of about 54,896, compared to the 22,224 SLAB are dealing with at the moment, an increase in the region of 2.5 times.

207. Taking a most likely estimated increase of 35% would mean an additional 57,176 people looking for legal advice, giving a total of about 79,400, compared to the 22,224 SLAB are dealing with at the moment, an increase in the region of 3.5 times.

208. Currently, the Solicitor Contact Line operates with two solicitors on shift at any one time 24 hours a day, seven days a week. SLAB has modelled staffing requirements on the contact line based on these potential percentage increases. Because of the 24/7 nature of this service, the costs of providing an additional solicitor for each day is roughly five whole time equivalents at about £59,000 per annum each (including shift allowances, attendance payments and employers’ costs). Therefore, the cost of providing an additional solicitor for each day would be about £295,000 per year.
209. The costs of these possible scenarios are summarised in the following table. As indicated above, it is anticipated that the 35% figure to be the one that is most likely.

Table 22: financial impact on the Solicitor Contact Line

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Scenario</th>
<th>People seeking legal advice</th>
<th>Impact on SLAB Solicitor Contact Line</th>
<th>Additional cost to SLAB</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>53.6% take up for interviews 20% take up for non-interviews (lower limit)</td>
<td>54,896</td>
<td>2 additional solicitors per shift</td>
<td>£590,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53.6% take up for interviews 35% take up for non-interviews (best estimate)</td>
<td>79,400</td>
<td>2 additional solicitors per shift 2 additional admin worker per shift</td>
<td>£890,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53.6% take up for interviews 53.6% take up for non-interviews (upper limit)</td>
<td>109,785</td>
<td>4 additional solicitors per shift 4 additional admin workers per shift</td>
<td>£1,780,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

210. A number of steps might be taken with the aim of ensuring that legal advice is provided in the most effective and efficient manner. These could include locating solicitors at the busiest police stations, email intimation from the Police to the Board, and wider use of video links.

211. It is anticipated that the great majority of additional advice as a result of the Bill would be offered by telephone. This is discussed at paragraph 81. There would likely be some increase in the number of personal attendances by solicitors, which could increase the average advice and assistance cost.

212. If the number of grants of advice and assistance by private and PDSO solicitors also increases 3.5 times as a result legal advice being available to everyone in a police station, then this would result in a total of around 12,600 grants of advice and assistance every year, an increase of 9,000.

213. SLAB has advised that, under the existing fee structure, the average cost of these cases would be likely to increase from £60 to somewhere in the range £90-£120, due to more personal attendances, as well as the following additional factors:

- The support required for vulnerable adults could well extend the time taken by solicitors at police stations
- The 6 hour review periods could also lead to increased advice
- Refusal of Police bail could also extend legal advice
- Questioning after charge, and questioning after police bail could also mean further legal advice.
214. This would result in an estimated increase in costs for advice and assistance by private and PDSO solicitors of between £810,000 and £1,080,000, with a mid-range estimate at £945,000.

Corroboration and sufficiency of evidence

215. It is anticipated that the removal of the requirement of corroboration would result in additional cases being brought to court. The figures from police and COPFS for the numbers obtained in their relative shadowing exercises suggested that increases will be in the following ranges. However, it is considered very unlikely that increases of the extent suggested in the high estimate will be seen (see paragraphs 106-107 and 150-153 for more detail).

Table 23: potential % increase in the number of prosecutions (to nearest 0.1%)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Summary prosecutions</td>
<td>0.5%</td>
<td>2.5%</td>
<td>6.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solemn prosecutions</td>
<td>3.5%</td>
<td>7.6%</td>
<td>12.4%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

216. During 2011/2012, there were proceedings against 6,146 people in the solemn courts and 118,590 in the summary courts. Applying the percentage increases in the table above would result in the following number of additional prosecutions. This assumes that 20% of solemn cases would be prosecuted in the High Court, with the remainder in the Sheriff Courts, and 64% of summary cases prosecuted in the Sheriff Courts with the remainder in Justice of the Peace courts.

Table 24: additional prosecutions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>High Court</td>
<td>43</td>
<td>93</td>
<td>153</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sheriff Court solemn</td>
<td>174</td>
<td>373</td>
<td>611</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sheriff Court summary (includes Stipendiary cases)</td>
<td>368</td>
<td>1909</td>
<td>4772</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Justice of the Peace courts</td>
<td>207</td>
<td>1074</td>
<td>2684</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
217. Combining this with the average costs per case of providing Legal Aid in each court in 2012-13 allows estimation of the costs resulting from additional prosecutions. This gives a total estimated cost implication of £3,900,000 using the best estimate of case volumes. These costs should be considered in the context of reductions in case volumes in recent years, as described at paragraph 34.

Table 25: costs for SLAB resulting from additional prosecutions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>High Court</td>
<td>£730,000</td>
<td>£1,580,000</td>
<td>£2,580,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sheriff Court solemn</td>
<td>£330,000</td>
<td>£700,000</td>
<td>£1,150,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sheriff Court summary (includes Stipendiary cases)</td>
<td>£230,000</td>
<td>£1,220,000</td>
<td>£3,040,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Justice of the Peace courts</td>
<td>£80,000</td>
<td>£410,000</td>
<td>£1,030,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>£1,370,000</td>
<td>£3,900,000</td>
<td>£7,790,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Appeal procedures

218. SLAB has indicated that any impact of hearings in chambers on late leave to appeal compared to oral hearings would be cost neutral. Solicitors and counsel are entitled to the same fees for appearing in chambers as they would be at more formal court hearings.

219. SLAB does not consider that there would be savings accruing from more cases proceedings by way of note of appeal as opposed to stated case. The current feeing structure means that counsel are paid slightly more for notes of appeal as opposed to stated cases, with solicitors being paid slightly more for stated cases.

220. SLAB has estimated that 33% of criminal appeal cases include work involved in submitting a late appeal. In addition, the average extra expense of work involved in these late appeals, notably presenting reasons why appeals should be heard late, is about £208 per case. SLAB therefore estimates that the additional cost of dealing with late appeals is around £137,000 per year. If the new measures reduce this by 50% then this could bring savings of around £68,500 per year.

221. In 2011-12, criminal legal aid was granted for 17 Bill of Suspension cases and 6 Bill of Advocation cases. If these cases proceeded by leave to appeal, with a sift system, then the costs of these could be reduced marginally.
Measures with no or marginal costs

Child suspects

222. SLAB figures show that 6.9% of suspects who are referred to the Contact Line are under 18, with 1.2% of suspects under 16.

223. The Bill states that all children under the age of 16 should have legal advice, and not have the facility to waive that right, and that suspects who are 16 or 17 should only be able to waive that right if there is agreement of any adult reasonably named by the person.

224. Police Scotland has indicated they do not consider that these measures will have a major impact on the numbers of young people seeking legal advice in police stations (as described at paragraph 131). Through other measures such as the Children and Young People’s Bill and the police’s own strategic reviews, they are looking to reduce the numbers of young people taken through police stations and the criminal justice system. Therefore, the Scottish Government has assumed that there will not be any specific increase in the number of cases where legal advice is requested as a result of these particular measures.

Other provisions

225. The other Carloway provisions not mentioned in the previous section are anticipated to have no substantial costs for SLAB.

SCOTTISH CHILDREN’S REPORTER ADMINISTRATION

226. No additional costs have been identified for SCRA. The removal of the requirement for corroboration in children’s hearings proceedings is not anticipated to impact on the number of children and young people referred to the Reporter nor on the role of Reporters in determining whether a case should be taken to a children’s hearing. The number of children’s hearings cases that are remitted to the court will continue to depend on whether the child or young person accepts the grounds on which they have been referred to the hearing.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

Measures with cost implications

Child suspects

227. The provisions relating to child suspects will potentially bring new costs to local authorities. 16 and 17 year olds can seek support from any person they name – from parent to relative to friend. In the great majority of cases such support is likely to be sought from people known to the suspect but where such support cannot be found local authority provision is the backstop. As Carloway notes in his review, that is the current practice for under 16s and works well.

228. Consultation with representatives of Police Scotland, Association of Directors of Social Work (“ADSW”) and Convention Of Scottish Local Authorities (“COSLA”) confirmed the Scottish Government’s initial view that only a small proportion of 16 and 17 year olds would want to seek support from a social worker. For the most part a young person seeking support is likely to do so from a parent, family member or friend. Where moral support is wanted, and where no such familiar provision can be found, existing practice for under 16s would be the provision of a social worker. In the context of 16 and 17 year olds this is new provision and there is therefore no solid basis beyond the experience of professionals for determining how often this would occur. Costs have been modelled based on such support being sought in 5%, 10% and, as an upper limit, 20% of cases. This is based on an assumption that the nature of the role and existing provision is such that it would most likely be best provided by social work services. This uses an hourly rate for social work support of £21 plus 25% on-costs giving a total of £26.25 and an average time commitment of four hours (the midpoint of a range of two to six hours allowing for variations in rurality and complexity). Further detail on the numbers of 16 and 17 year olds can be found at paragraph 129. Table 26 below sets out the cost implications.

Table 26: additional costs per year for local authorities

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Assumption</th>
<th>Cases</th>
<th>Costs</th>
<th>Total</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Lower – 5%</td>
<td>400</td>
<td>£26.25 x 4 x 400</td>
<td>£42,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mid – 10%</td>
<td>800</td>
<td>£26.25 x 4 x 800</td>
<td>£84,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Upper – 20%</td>
<td>1600</td>
<td>£26.25 x 4 x 1600</td>
<td>£168,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

229. 10% has been used as the most likely estimate. These costs would fall nationally across local authorities, distributed at the rates at which they bring young people to police offices.

230. This estimate is based on the hourly costs associated with a social worker’s time. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but would be part of the general social workers’ workloads. This £84,000 has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

Corroboration and sufficiency of evidence

231. Removal of the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases is likely to result in an increase in the number of prosecutions, which will impact on local authorities on the basis that additional prosecutions are likely to lead to additional community sentences. Based on the analysis by Police Scotland and the COPFS (see paragraphs 106-107 and 150-153 for more detail), the potential scale of increases in prosecutions is as per the table below.

Table 27: potential % increase in the number of prosecutions (to nearest 0.1%)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Summary prosecutions</td>
<td>0.5%</td>
<td>2.5%</td>
<td>6.3%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solemn prosecutions</td>
<td>3.5%</td>
<td>7.6%</td>
<td>12.4%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

232. Figures from Criminal Proceedings in Scotland 2011-12\(^{17}\) show that 118,590 individuals were proceeded against in the summary courts, with the equivalent figure for solemn proceedings standing at 6,146. The increase in prosecutions would therefore be as follows:

\(^{17}\)http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/11/5336
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

Table 28: absolute increase in the number of prosecutions (to nearest 10)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Summary prosecutions</td>
<td>580</td>
<td>2,980</td>
<td>7,460</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solemn prosecutions</td>
<td>220</td>
<td>470</td>
<td>760</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

233. Modelling of the potential impact of these additional prosecutions on the number of community sentences has been carried out on the following assumptions:

- The distribution of crimes to which prosecutions will relate are as per the COPFS research done for the Carloway Review (recent shadow marking and reporting exercises identified only the overall impact at summary and solemn court level).
- Additional prosecutions will follow the same pattern as those which have previously gone through the criminal justice system – that is, the same proportion will result in a successful conviction, and the same proportion will result in a community sentence.

234. The table below sets out the number of community sentences which could potentially be required, as well as the associated costs. Costs have been calculated on the basis of an assumed cost per community sentence of £2,400.

Table 29: additional costs for local authorities per year

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate</th>
<th>Best estimate</th>
<th>High estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Additional community sentences</td>
<td>120</td>
<td>480</td>
<td>1,140</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Additional costs</td>
<td>£280,000</td>
<td>£1,160,000</td>
<td>£2,730,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

235. The costs associated with community sentences are primarily for staff time. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will need to be considered by local authorities as an additional demand in managing staff workloads. This £1,160,000 has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

Measures with no or marginal costs

236. The provisions in the Bill in relation to vulnerable adult suspects will be of interest to local authorities but will not entail additional costs as Appropriate Adult Services are provided at present on a non-statutory basis.

237. The other Carloway provisions not mentioned in the previous section are anticipated to have no substantial costs for local authorities.
COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

238. No additional costs have been identified for other bodies, individuals or businesses.

ADDITIONAL INCOME

239. No additional income has been identified from the Bill, though there will be efficiency savings, as set out in the sections on the Bowen provisions and miscellaneous items, which will offset some of the additional costs. Savings in court time from the introduction of a compulsory business meeting (see paragraph 256-259) will reduce some of the costs from additional court time as a result of the removal of the requirement for corroboration (see paragraph 177-182).

PART B – BOWEN PROVISIONS

OUTLINE OF MEASURES

Measures with cost implications

Pre-trial time limits

240. This provision increases the time limit during which a person on remand must be brought to trial from 110 days to 140 days. This has a number of cost implications, as it will increase the prisoner population. This increase has been modelled at 40 extra places at any time.

First diets

241. This section provides that accused persons will be cited to a first diet, at which the trial diet will be set. The trial diet will be set according to the sheriff’s view of the state of preparedness of the parties. This will reduce the problem of citing parties and witnesses to diets which do not proceed, and thus create savings for the police, courts and legal aid budget as well as freeing up court time and reducing inconvenience to those involved.

Duty of prosecution and defence to communicate

242. This provides that prosecution and defence must meet in advance of the first diet to discuss their state of preparedness. Sheriff Principal Bowen described this as a Compulsory Business Meeting (“CBM”). A record will be kept of the meeting and the court must have regard to this record at the first diet. While the cost of preparing this record will fall on the COPFS the process of engagement will reduce the number of diets continued owing to unpreparedness, and indeed reduce the number of cases going to trial, as they are more likely to be resolved by early pleas. This will generate savings.

Plea of guilty

243. This removes the need to sign a plea of guilty. This will generate savings by allowing persons to plead guilty remotely.

Measures with no or marginal costs

244. The other Bowen provisions are anticipated to have no substantial costs.
COSTS ON THE SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT

245. The Bowen provisions are anticipated to have no substantial costs for the Scottish Government.

SCOTTISH POLICE AUTHORITY

246. The SPA will benefit from savings arising from fewer witness citations as a result of more efficient case management and early guilty pleas. Police officers will therefore be required to attend court less often. Over the financial years 2009-12, 56% of all witnesses first cited to sheriff and jury courts were police officers. The requirement on a police officer to attend court as a witness takes an average of 2.43 hours, not including travel time. This average reflects a time requirement that can last from one to six hours.

247. The Review found that, based on the volume of business in 2008-09, if three fewer witnesses were cited per case, there would be about 7,000 fewer witnesses cited overall. If seven fewer witnesses were cited, there would be about 17,000 fewer witnesses cited overall. (The volume of cases is, broadly, 2,400). Applying the average of 56% to these figures, the changes may save approximately 4,000 to 9,500 police witnesses. Again, applying the average time saved of 2.43 hours this would result in estimates of time saved at between 9,700 and 23,000 hours. There will also be savings in witness time arising from the increase in guilty pleas likely to result from engagement between the parties prior to the commencement of proceedings. Using a mid-range estimate of 16,350 gives annual savings of £391,000.

\[16,350 \text{ hours saved } \times \£23.91 \text{ hourly cost of a constable } = \£391,000\]

248. These savings will consist of police time spared for other activities, rather than money, as the strength of the police establishment will not be reduced. It does, however, balance some of the other demands on police time elsewhere in the Bill, and is recorded here as an opportunity cost saving.

CROWN OFFICE AND PROCURATOR FISCAL SERVICE

249. The Bill will result in savings for COPFS by ensuring that witnesses will only be cited to trial diets which are likely to go ahead thereby reducing citation costs, as well as reimbursement costs.

250. The cost of reimbursing a witness for loss of earnings, expenses etc. falls on COPFS. The amount of expenses witnesses can claim will depend on a range of factors. It is also not known how many fewer witnesses will need to be cited as a result of the changes. This is dependent on the volume of business and the complexity of cases as well as the success of the provisions in reducing the number of witness citations. Applying the range of witnesses saved described in paragraph 247 (7,000-17,000) to its current reimbursement costs, COPFS estimates a saving of approximately £75,000 to £181,000 a year. A mid-range estimate gives financial savings of around £128,000 per annum.
251. COPFS is also responsible for citing witnesses, so it would make savings by the mere fact of citing fewer witnesses. These arise from less time for a Solemn Legal Manager to decide which witnesses to call, and less time for the administrative member of staff actually to cite them. COPFS estimates citation costs at £580 per 1,000 witnesses. On the range shown above, of 7,000-17,000 witnesses saved, this would result in a saving of between £4,000 and £10,000. A mid-range estimate is a saving of £6,000 per annum. For comparison purposes, the numbers of witnesses first cited in sheriff and jury trials in each of the financial years 2009-12 was between 50,000 and 60,000. This saving relates to staff time and is therefore an opportunity cost saving, to be balanced against other opportunity costs for COPFS.

252. COPFS would, however, also have to carry some costs. These costs would arise from the requirement to attend the CBMs, and from preparing a record of these and lodging with the court in advance of the first diet. The work involved, including preparation, is estimated at half a day. The cost would depend on the seniority of the personnel undertaking this work. COPFS believes this would either be a Senior Procurator Fiscal Depute or a Solemn Legal Manager, at a half day’s cost of £178 and £150 respectively. This, however, is based on all CBMs being held by means of a face-to-face meeting. It thus represents a theoretical maximum. In many cases, no such face-to-face meeting will be held and the costs would accordingly be less.

253. CBMs will not need to be held where there is an early guilty plea under the procedure outlined in section 76 of the 1995 Act. However, such a meeting would be held where a plea of guilty is obtained at or around the first diet, or at any rate before the trial. Consequently the number of cases affected is higher than the 2,400 shown above, and has been estimated at about 3,350. This figure multiplied by the staff costs above gives a range of £503,000 to £596,000.

254. This figure is likely, however, to be reduced by a greater incidence of section 76 pleas through the new arrangements. A 5% increase, for example, would result in 118 fewer cases. This would save preparation time of one day overall per case – 118 days’ work. That work is shared among staff whose daily cost ranges from £150 to £357. The savings to offset against the costs of the CBM would therefore fall in a range of £18,000 - £42,000. The Scottish Government anticipates that a 10% increase is more likely, which would result in 236 fewer cases, and savings of between £35,000 and £84,000. A mid-range estimate gives a saving of £60,000.

255. Applying this reduction, and savings from a proportion of CBMs not requiring face-to-face meetings, the Scottish Government estimates additional costs of £370,000 per annum. These additional costs relate to additional demands on staff time. This does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will be part of general staff workloads. This has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.

SCOTTISH COURT SERVICE

256. It is anticipated that the proposal to introduce CBMs prior to indictment should result in savings to the courts through an increase in early pleas (because the parties will have engaged before trial) and thus avoidance of the costs of a full trial where evidence is led. It is difficult to predict how many cases will be affected, but SCS has provided estimated savings based on a 5% decrease and a 10% decrease.
257. In 2011-12, a total of 1,128 indictment cases went to trial, according to the SCS Annual Report\textsuperscript{18}. A 5% reduction in cases would be 56 fewer cases, and a 10% reduction would be 113 fewer cases. SCS costs of an individual case are estimated at £11,225 on average. The average cost for SCS of administering a plea is estimated at £187. The cost differential for each early plea is therefore a saving of £11,038. This suggests the following possible savings.

\textbf{Table 30: SCS savings from early pleas}

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>5% reduction</th>
<th>10% reduction</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Savings from early pleas</td>
<td>56 x £11,038 = £623,000</td>
<td>113 x £11,038 = £1,245,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

258. Following discussion with SCS, it is anticipated that an increase of 10% would be more likely, and this suggests savings of £1,245,000.

259. These savings would not be an actual cost saving, as cuts in staffing levels are unlikely to arise directly through implementation of these provisions. However, these savings will counteract some of the other costs in the Bill, particularly from the removal of the requirement for corroboration. This has therefore been recorded as an opportunity cost saving.

SCOTTISH PRISON SERVICE

260. It is anticipated that costs will arise from the provision which increases the time-limit for the period for which an accused person may be remanded before his or her trial commences from 110 to 140 days. In some cases those imprisoned for this longer period on remand will, as a result, spend a correspondingly shorter period in prison after conviction. While the 100 day limit is currently not infrequently extended, this proposal has nevertheless been modelled as requiring 40 extra remand places even after the increase in cases where an early guilty plea is accepted. This figure would include the part-place in secure accommodation referred to under “Costs of Local Authorities”.

261. The prison service estimates that the annual cost of a prisoner place in 2011-12 was £37,302, so this proposal would result in an increased cost for the SPS of approximately £1,500,000.

262. SPS has indicated that this increase in prisoner can be accommodated within the flexibility that exists in the provision of prison places. There are limits to this flexibility, and long term increases may accelerate the rate that this flexibility is used up. However, on the basis of a steady level of resources being available to SPS, the additional costs set out above are considered opportunity costs.

LEGAL AID FUND

263. The main area which the Scottish Government anticipates will have a financial impact on the Board will be the proposed introduction of CBMs. The current legal aid payment structure is already sufficiently flexible to accommodate the proposed changes. Payment for the work involved in the CBM would be allowable on a time and line basis. Similarly, if counsel is to be involved in these meetings, counsel’s Table of Fees would ideally be revised to accommodate their attendance at CBMs although in the absence of any such changes the Table does, at present, make provision for consultations with COPFS.

264. As with SCS, it is anticipated that the provision which introduces a compulsory business meeting would result in some savings to SLAB through early pleas reducing the need to hold full trials. In the case of SLAB, the savings arising from an increase of 5% in the number of cases currently going to full trial being resolved instead by an early plea, would amount to some £167,000. An increase of 10% would lead to savings of around £334,000. This is not a cost saving, but can be offset against the additional costs for SLAB elsewhere in the Bill.

265. Balanced against this are the anticipated additional costs for SLAB from attendance at CBMs. This is estimated at £658,000 per year, based on the current payment regime and on 9,916 sheriff and jury cases paid in 2011-12. It is expected that a CBM will take place in each case, and last an average of one hour:

- Solicitors’ fees - £603,000
- Counsel’s fees £55,000 (based on a sanction for counsel granted in 2.5% of sheriff and jury cases)
- Total - £658,000.

266. However, these figures represent a theoretical maximum where CBMs are all held face to face. SLAB advise that the costs could be significantly lower if these “meetings” took place in other formats, using video/telephone conferencing or by emails. These are permitted by the Bill, so the costs will be lower. In addition, it is anticipated that the CBM process will avoid adjournments and may lead to earlier settlement being achieved. This would lead to further savings. A 25% reduction in SLAB costs is anticipated as a result of these factors. A revised cost estimate is therefore £493,000 per annum.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

267. The proposal to increase the time-limit for the period for which an accused person may be remanded before his or her trial commences from 110 to 140 days will increase the number of persons held on remand (see paragraph 240).

268. In particular it could result in the occupation of a place in secure accommodation being occupied 25% of the time. At present there is capacity in the secure estate for further residents, so in the short term there is no anticipated additional cost. However, in the longer term an additional secure accommodation place could be required at the cost of around £225,000 per annum. For the purposes of this financial memorandum, the impact has been estimated at £56,000 per annum (0.25 x £225,000). This is classed as a financial cost as it is anticipated that...
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013 the place would use private provision. In the case of remand residents, this is borne by local authorities, and this cost would have to be spread among the local authorities sending individuals to that place.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

269. The requirement to attend CBMs in advance of first diets will create a cost for legal representatives. However, Sheriff Principal Bowen noted that this early engagement was already good practice taking place in some areas of the country. He also observed that the views of all parties were that meaningful engagement prior to first diet removed churn, and that defence agents stated they were willing to engage in early discussion.

270. Accordingly it would appear that many defence agents are willing to undertake this cost, even where they do not undertake it already (though, as noted below, there would be reimbursement on a “time-and-line” basis from the Legal Aid Fund). This willingness to accept CBMs may be explained by the reduction in inconvenience, and cost savings, for defence agents, created by greater efficiency in the disposal of court business.

271. Costs are therefore balanced by savings. In any case they will depend on variables such as distance of meetings from agents’ offices, duration, time spent in preparation etc. They are likely to be marginal, particularly given the Bills flexibility on the manner of holding the CBM.

272. Businesses are likely to experience savings arising from the calling of fewer of their employees as witnesses and (where trials are avoided by early pleas) jurors. Similar savings will arise for the individuals concerned. However, these are marginal and are not quantified.

ADDITIONAL INCOME

273. The Bowen provisions are anticipated to have no additional income beyond the efficiency savings identified above.

PART C – MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Measures with cost implications

Maximum term for weapons offences

274. Separate offences concerning possession of an article with a blade or point are contained in sections 47, 49, 49A and 49C of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995.

275. The Bill increases the maximum penalties available for each of these offences from four years imprisonment to five years imprisonment. For the purpose of this Financial Memorandum, the term ‘handling offensive weapon offences’ is used to cover all the separate offences contained within sections 47, 49, 49A and 49C of the 1995 Act.

276. The increase in the maximum penalties available for these offences does not mean that the court must impose the new maximum penalties. The court will continue to have absolute discretion in deciding what an appropriate sentence should be for each individual case within the overall legal framework and within each court’s sentencing powers.

277. It is therefore difficult to estimate with certainty what the impact will be of increasing the maximum penalties for these offences. The information provided below is a best estimate of the financial impact of the increase in the maximum penalties but should be treated with caution given the difficulties in accurately assessing the impact of how courts will decide to use higher maximum penalties in individual cases, if at all.

Scottish Prison Service

278. The Scottish Government anticipates that an increase in the maximum penalty for these offences is likely to have an impact on the sentencing behaviour of Scottish courts.

279. Sentencing data for 2011-12\(^1\) shows that:

- the number of people convicted of these offences was 2,276;
- the number of these people who received a custodial sentence for these offences was 805;
- the percentage of those people who received a custodial sentence was 35%; and
- the average custodial sentence length for these offences was 311 days\(^2\).

280. There are relatively few people who currently receive sentences of over two years for these offences (42 in 2011-12). Whilst the impact of an increase in the maximum penalties may be limited to those who currently receive sentences relatively close to the current maximum of four years, a general increase in average sentence levels might occur.

281. The table below provides figures which demonstrate the effect of a 5% increase in average sentence lengths (the low estimate), a 10% increase in average sentence length (the mid estimate), and a 15% increase in average sentence length (the high estimate). These figures are provided on an illustrative basis to help demonstrate the potential impact of the increase in maximum penalties for these offences. The calculation uses 2011-12 sentencing data as the base values and assumes that the increase in average sentence length occurs in year one.

282. The average annual cost of one prison place is £37,302. This represents the overall cost of running the Scottish Prison Service divided by the design capacity of the prison estate in 2011-12.

283. Under the current statutory early release rules, the additional time spent in prison will be half of the additional period of time by which a sentence has increased. For example, a person

\(^{1}\text{http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/11/5336/0}\)

\(^{2}\text{The figures given for offences also include a very small number of offences under section 141 and 141A of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. These offences relate to restriction of sale of offensive weapons and account for less than 1% of the figures given. The provisions in this Bill do not affect the maximum penalties for section 141 and 141A offences in the Criminal Justice Act 1988.}\) receiving an additional ten days onto their sentence as a result of an increase in the overall maximum penalties for an offence will generally spend an additional five days in prison and the figures included within the table below are calculated on that basis.

284. Where an additional period is added to a custodial sentence by a court as a result of increasing the maximum penalties for these offences which then leads to a sentence above four years being imposed (which will now be possible as a result of these provisions), different early release rules operate and the offender is classed as a long term prisoner. A long term prisoner is able to be considered for parole by the Parole Board at the halfway point of their sentence and must be released on non-parole licence at the two-thirds point of their sentence. However, very few offenders currently receive sentences close to the current maximum of four years and the Scottish Government considers it is reasonable to assume that only a handful of offenders, at most, will in the future receive sentences of more than four years and thus trigger the different arrangements for early release.

Table 31: handling offensive weapons offenses

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Low estimate (5% increase)</th>
<th>Mid estimate (10% increase)</th>
<th>High estimate (15% increase)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Average custodial sentence</td>
<td>326.5 days</td>
<td>342 days</td>
<td>357.6 days</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Increase in prison places</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>34</td>
<td>51</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Additional recurring costs</td>
<td>£600,000</td>
<td>£1,250,000</td>
<td>£1,900,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

285. Costs for SPS arising from the increase in length of prison sentences for handling offensive weapons offenses are anticipated to be around £1,250,000 per year.

286. SPS has indicated that this increase can be accommodated within the flexibility that exists in the provision of prison places. There are limits to this flexibility, and long term increases may accelerate the rate that this flexibility is used up. However, on the assumption of a steady level of resources being available to SPS, the additional costs set out above can be considered opportunity costs.

287. No significant additional costs are anticipated to fall on other parts of the Scottish Administration. The increase in the maximum penalties available for handling an offensive weapon offences will not increase the number of prosecutions taken forward each year and so there should be no new costs failing on either COPFS or SCS.

288. It is anticipated that the increase in maximum penalties will help further act as a deterrent to the carrying of offensive weapons and it is therefore possible that savings will accrue in the future in respect of fewer offences being committed, fewer prosecutions being required and therefore fewer court cases being undertaken. Estimates are not provided, however, as it would be difficult to distinguish the direct impact of the increases in maximum penalties leading to fewer offensive weapon offences separate from other policy efforts being undertaken to reduce offensive weapon possession e.g. education campaigns such as ‘No Knives, Better Lives’

21 http://www.noknivesbetterlives.com/
TV links

289. The measures in the Bill will allow the use of TV links for first callings from police custody.

290. The initial impact of the Bill can only be estimated at this time as there remains the need to develop the details of any implementation and use of TV links through testing and pilots, which can only be enabled by the provisions in the Bill.

291. The financial implications of the proposals are complex for three reasons. They allow tests to determine the benefits of allowing first callings through the use of TV links. However, until these tests have been run, these benefits cannot be fully assessed. As a result the costings are both estimated and provisional at this stage.

292. Additionally, the costs of the equipment and services needed to run a first calling by video will be-off set by the opportunities to share the equipment for other purposes that will bring additional benefits and efficiency gains, so the costs and benefits will, in any final roll-out, be shared by this joint use. Furthermore, the demands of a modern organisation are such that the use of TV links is integral to successful communication and therefore some related costs would be incurred anyway as part of the routine update of IT equipment.

293. Finally, other activities to improve the efficiency of the criminal justice system will impact upon the issues addressed in the Bill; the number of first callings may be reduced by the additional use of liberation by undertaking by police, for example. Within these parameters, the initial estimates are that the provisions in the Bill, will, if implemented to the fullest extent and at the currently highest estimate, cost £1,332,000 in capital terms. (These costs would cover all existing court rooms in Scotland used for both criminal and civil cases). The management of first callings would also potentially add an estimated £612,000 to the costs across the Criminal Justice Partners. However, it is highly unlikely that these levels will be reached within the first five years of the introduction of the provisions. During the pilot stages, the optimum deployment of TV links for first callings and the opportunities for cost savings will be fully explored. For example, it is likely that there will be additional savings of £67,000 per annum through agents using the equipment to speak to their clients.

294. In the initial stages, it is anticipated that the technology would be installed in 17 courts and eight Primary Custody Suites. The total costs for this are estimated at £124,000 capital costs and staffing costs of £512,000. The pilot phase will allow for a fuller assessment of the appropriate level and configuration of the equipment.

Costs on the Scottish Government

295. There are no direct cost or savings implications for Scottish Government from the changes in the Bill. However, the Scottish Government funds the key justice partners and it is through them that any additional expenditure and savings would be realised.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

Scottish Police Authority

296. It is anticipated that costs would arise for SPA as a result of the use of TV links for first callings.

297. The number or units equipped will depend on the pilots. It is anticipated that in the early stages, around eight Primary Custody suites would have TV link technology installed. Capital costs for equipment installation have been estimated at between £4,000 and £10,000 per site. The Scottish Government therefore anticipates capital costs of between £32,000 and £80,000 for SPA. Other uses of the equipment, for example with the NHS in delivering tele-medicine to custody units, and reducing defence agents’ travel to prisons to visit their clients, may be possible.

298. It is anticipated that the use of TV links for first callings will give rise to an increase in management and support costs for dealing with people in custody for a longer period if they are not being brought to court. Police Scotland estimate costs associated with providing detainees with basic requirements in police custody at £180 per day, most of which arises in the first four to six hours of the detention. Additional detention would not give rise to significant additional costs in terms of provisions for the detainee.

299. There has been some work suggesting that the additional cost of management and support for those in detention will be in the order of one to two additional member(s) of staff per site. Based on an estimated eight sites in the initial stages, this would involve up to 16 additional members of staff members, at a cost in the order of £512,000 per annum. These figures will be tested in the initial pilots: again, it is possible that these initial estimates are high.

300. Under these assumptions it is estimated that the cost to Police Scotland will be £80,000 capital and £512,000 staff costs per annum.

Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service

301. The proposals will not result in any costs or benefits for COPFS. However, in the longer term, the use of TV links could open the possibility of COPFS being represented remotely thereby saving travel and time costs.

Scottish Court Service

302. The other area where costs will be incurred initially is for SCS. There will be a need to upgrade some existing video equipment and in the longer term replace or install equipment in other court rooms.

303. There are currently 49 Sheriff Court buildings and 5 standalone JP courts. Of these, 45 Sheriff Courts have some TV equipment, whilst none of the standalone JP courts have equipment. Six of the courts (Edinburgh, Glasgow, Kilmarnock, Hamilton, Aberdeen and Dundee) have more than one room fitted with equipment; the rest have one court room. The Supreme Courts have four rooms with existing equipment. To upgrade this equipment would cost in the region of £1,500 per room: a total of £86,000.
304. It is unlikely that there will be a need to install the equipment in all court rooms as part of this programme. Over 50% of first callings from custody are held in 17 courts. Of the 17 busiest sites six already have multiple links. Therefore, in the initial stages of the pilot work, it is unlikely that significant new equipment will be needed in courts. It is anticipated that a further 11 court rooms will need to be equipped at a capital cost of £44,000.

305. Hearings to make determinations on the use of TV links in individual cases may have a small impact on court time. It is anticipated that this will be managed within existing resources.

Scottish Prison Service

306. It is anticipated that in the initial stages there will be a need to install TV link equipment in three prisons. At an estimated cost of between £5,000 and £10,000 per site, this suggests initial capital costs for SPS of between £15,000 and £30,000.

Individuals and businesses

307. The proposals in the Bill do not directly affect defence agents.

308. There will be contracts let to supply, install and run TV equipment as part of the pilots and in the longer term the roll out of the programme. These companies will benefit from this business.

Costs on local authorities

309. Although measures in the Bill will also allow first callings to occur via TV link for children appearing from a place of secure accommodation these would be very small in number. In the initial stages of the proposed pilot work, attention will not focus on children, while fuller costs and benefits can be established.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

310. There are no cost implications for the legal community from the changes in the Bill. As part of the wider TV links programme, they will be encouraged to visit their clients by such links when in police or prison custody and the equipment installed in the Police Custody Units will facilitate this.

Method of juror citation

311. Among the miscellaneous items in the Bill is a measure to enable SCS to choose the method of citation of jurors. In particular, this is intended to permit jurors to be cited by ordinary post, rather than by recorded delivery.

Costs on Scottish Court Service

312. In November 2012 SCS established that the then difference in unit costs of citation between first class post and recorded delivery (95p) entailed an additional running cost of £169,000 per annum. Up to this amount will therefore be saved by enacting the proposed change.
Measures with no or marginal costs

Sentencing prisoners on early release
313. No significant financial impact is anticipated associated with the provisions relating to sentencing on early release.

People trafficking
314. The introduction of a statutory aggravation for people trafficking is not anticipated to have any substantial financial implications for public, private or third sector bodies, or for individuals.

Police Negotiating Board
315. The final costs of a Police Negotiating Board (PNB) for Scotland will depend on detailed arrangements which have yet to be agreed with stakeholders. However, the Scottish Government expects it to be based on the structure of the current UK PNB. The annual costs of the UK PNB are around £500,000, of which the Scottish Government contributes 10%. A large part of this cost is for travel and overnight accommodation for members.

316. The PNB consists of a Staff Side, representing the Police Federations and staff associations, and an Official Side representing police authorities, police senior management and Ministers. UK PNB has 44 members in total. Each Side has a Side Secretary, an experienced negotiator to represent their interests. The Independent Chair and Deputy Chair provide a neutral voice to assist in bringing the parties to agreement, including informal mediation and conciliation if necessary. An independent secretariat is also provided to support the Chair and Deputy Chair, arrange meetings, circulate papers etc.

317. Based on the current Scottish Standing Committee of the UK PNB, PNB Scotland is expected to have 12 members. Travel and accommodation costs will be very much less than for the UK PNB, as a result of having fewer members and less distance to travel; meetings are likely to be held in the central belt where the majority of members will probably also be based. There are expected to be fewer meetings than UK PNB, because only one Police Service is involved; UK PNB often deals with agreeing a standard approach to issues across different police forces and authorities. This will reduce the cost of daily fees for the Independent Chair, Deputy Chair and Side Secretaries, as well as for travel, accommodation, meeting rooms and catering.

318. On the basis of these assumptions, it is estimated that costs for PNB Scotland will be under £50,000, and in line with the current Scottish Government contribution to UK PNB. There are therefore no additional costs associated with this provision.
SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

On 20 June 2013, the Cabinet secretary for Justice (Kenny MacAskill MSP) made the following statement:

“In my view, the provisions of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.”

PRESIDING OFFICER’S STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

On 20 June 2013, the Presiding Officer (Rt Hon Tricia Marwick MSP) made the following statement:

“In my view, the provisions of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.”
This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL

POLICY MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. The contents are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Parliament. Explanatory Notes and other accompanying documents are published separately as SP Bill 35–EN.

POLICY OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL

2. Scotland’s justice system demonstrates how Scotland can deliver distinctive solutions in complex areas. In 2011 the Scottish Government launched the Making Justice Work programme which aims to deliver efficiency and improvement by creating justice system structures and processes that are fit for the 21st century and enable access to justice. The Scottish Government is committed to a challenging modernising agenda to ensure our justice system is as efficient and effective as possible in meeting the needs of a modern and progressive country and to ensure that Scottish criminal law and practice is compliant with the European Convention on Human Rights (“the ECHR”) and able to withstand challenges on Convention grounds.

3. The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill is the legislative vehicle to take forward the next stage of essential reforms to the Scottish criminal justice system to enhance efficiency and bring the appropriate balance to the justice system so that rights are protected whilst ensuring effective access to justice for victims of crime. The Bill achieves these policy objectives by taking forward and further developing the majority of the recommendations of two independent reviews of key aspects of the criminal justice system. The Bill also includes a number of other key provisions which the Scottish Government considers also assist in meeting its overall objectives of ensuring a Safer and Stronger Scotland in which public services are high quality, continually improving, effective and responsive to local people’s needs.

4. The Bill comprises three elements:
   - Provisions which have been developed from the recommendations of Lord Carloway’s Review of Scottish Criminal Law and Practice1;
   - Provisions which have been developed from the recommendations of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure2; and

---

1 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/Review/CarlowayReview

SP Bill 35–PM  1  Session 4 (2013)
A number of additional relevant provisions which take forward a range of key justice priorities.

5. The additional provisions which are being taken forward by the Bill are intended to complement the reforms which are based on Lord Carloway and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s recommendations by implementing a key range of justice priorities or efficiency measures. These provisions are:

- Raising the maximum custodial sentences available to courts for handling offensive weapons offences, including knife possession, from four to five years;
- Making clearer the law on court powers to impose sentences on offenders who commit offences while on early release;
- Introducing a people trafficking criminal aggravation when sentencing for other crimes with a connection to people trafficking;
- Enabling increased use of live TV links;
- Changing the method of juror citation; and
- Retaining a collective bargaining mechanism in Scotland for the negotiation of police officer pay, following the Home Secretary’s decision to abolish the UK Police Negotiating Board.

BACKGROUND

Lord Carloway’s Review of Scottish Criminal Law and Practice

6. On 26 October 2010, Lord Carloway was asked to lead an independent review of criminal law and practice following the case of Cadder v HMA\(^3\) in which the United Kingdom Supreme Court decided that the ECHR requires that a person who has been detained by the police has the right to have access to a solicitor prior to being interviewed, unless in the particular circumstances of the case there are compelling reasons to restrict that right. The Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”) was introduced to deal with the immediate impact of that decision. However, the Scottish Government considered there was a further need not only to ensure the Scottish justice system continues to be fit for purpose, but that it also meets the appropriate balance of protecting the rights of accused persons with victims of crime.

7. The terms of reference for the review, which were agreed between Lord Carloway and Kenny MacAskill, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, were as follows:
   a) To review the law and practice of questioning suspects in a criminal investigation in Scotland in light of recent decisions by the UK Supreme Court and the European Court of Human Rights, and with reference to law and practice in other jurisdictions;

---

\(^2\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2010/06/10093251/0

b) To consider the implications of the recent decisions, in particular the legal advice prior to and during police questioning, and other developments in the operation of detention of suspects since it was introduced in Scotland in 1980 on the effective investigation and prosecution of crime;

c) To consider the criminal law of evidence, insofar as there are implications arising from (b) above, in particular the requirement for corroboration and the suspect’s right to silence;

d) To consider the extent to which issues raised during the passage of the 2010 Act may need further consideration, and the extent to which the provisions of the Act may need amendment or replacement; and

e) To make recommendations for further changes to the law and to identify where further guidance is needed, recognising the rights of the suspect, the rights of victims and witnesses and the wider interests of justice while maintaining an efficient and effective system for the investigation and prosecution of crime.

8. Lord Carloway carried out his independent review with the support of a specialist team seconded from justice organisations. The review team operated independently of their parent organisations, answering only to Lord Carloway. Lord Carloway also made extensive use of an independent reference group made up of representatives from justice organisations, legal practitioners, the judiciary and academics.

9. The review process consisted of a range of evidence gathering, research, analysis and consultation. The consultation process ran from 8 April 2011 until 3 June 2011 and received a total of 51 responses.

10. The Carloway Report was published on 17 November 2011. A copy of the Report and associated materials from the consultation process are available at the review’s website[^4].

11. The Bill takes forward and develops as a package the majority of Lord Carloway’s recommendations which require primary legislation. This comprises provisions in the following broad areas:

- Arrest
- Period of custody
- Investigative liberation
- Legal advice
- Questioning
- Child suspects
- Vulnerable adult suspects
- Corroboration and sufficiency of evidence
- Exculpatory and mixed statements

This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

- Appeal procedures
- Finality and certainty.

12. The Bill also makes provision to increase the majority to two thirds to return a guilty verdict. This is not a recommendation of Lord Carloway’s review, however, the Scottish Government considers this is necessary light of the removal of the requirement for corroboration.

Sheriff Principal Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure

13. In April 2009 Kenny MacAskill, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, commissioned Sheriff Principal Bowen QC “to examine the arrangements for sheriff and jury business, including the procedures and practices of the Sheriff Court and the rules of criminal procedure as they apply to solemn business in the Sheriff Court; and to make recommendations for the more efficient and cost effective operation of sheriff and jury business in promoting the interests of justice and reducing inconvenience and stress to the victims and witnesses involved in cases”\(^5\).

14. Sheriff Principal Bowen carried out his independent review with the support of a review team seconded from justice organisations. The review team also made use of an independent reference group made up of representatives from justice organisations, legal practitioners, the judiciary and academics.

15. The review process consisted of a range of evidence gathering, research, analysis and observation and monitoring of court proceedings.

16. Sheriff Principal Bowen published his Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure on 11 June 2010.\(^6\) The Scottish Government’s commitment to implement Sheriff Principal Bowen’s recommendations was supported by the Scottish Parliament with motion S3M-6636 of 24 June 2010.\(^7\)

17. The Bill takes forward and develops as a package those of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s recommendations which require primary legislation. This comprises provisions in the following areas:

- A requirement for the prosecutor and the defence to engage in advance of the first hearing;
- A case will be indicted to a first diet and will only proceed to trial when a sheriff is satisfied that it is ready;
- Increasing the time period in which an accused person can be remanded before having been brought to trial from 110 days to 140 days; and
- Removal of the requirement for an accused person to sign a guilty plea.

---

\(^6\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2010/06/10093251/0

This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT CONSULTATION (GENERAL)

18. Formal consultations were carried out by the Scottish Government with regard to the recommendations of Lord Carloway and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s reviews. Details of those consultations are outlined below.

Lord Carloway’s Review of Scottish Criminal Law and Practice

19. Lord Carloway’s report was based on a year-long process of consultation and research, including the involvement of a reference group and an extensive series of meetings, roadshows and observational visits. This is catalogued in Annexes D\(^8\) and E\(^9\) of the Carloway Report.

20. The Scottish Government listened closely to the comments and discussion following the publication of the Carloway Report. This included evidence sessions\(^10\) held by the Justice Committee in November and December 2011 and a Parliamentary Debate in the Scottish Parliament on 25 September 2012\(^11\). Many of Lord Carloway’s recommendations were widely accepted, in principle at least, and the main focus of debate centred on the recommendation to remove the requirement for corroboration and links between that recommendation and wider aspects of Scots law.

21. On 3 July 2012, the Scottish Government published a consultation paper Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice: The Carloway Report\(^12\). The consultation sought views on the Carloway Report and ran until 5 October 2012, posing 41 questions relating to Lord Carloway’s recommendations. The consultation document stated that the Scottish Government’s broad approach was to recognise Lord Carloway’s Report as a substantial and authoritative piece of work and to accept the broad reasoning as set out in the report. It also stated that the Scottish Government does not intend to revisit the review and that the consultation document was designed to promote public discussion of Lord Carloway’s recommendations to assist the Scottish Government in translating into legislation the package of reforms he proposed.

22. A total of 56 consultation responses were received, of which 21 were from individuals and 35 from organisations.

23. On 19 December 2012 the Scottish Government published the non-confidential consultation responses\(^13\) along with an independent analysis\(^14\). The analysis showed majority support for almost all of Lord Carloway’s recommendations. The exception to this was the recommendation to remove the requirement for corroboration, which attracted the largest number of responses, of which a majority, including some organisations representing the legal profession, favoured its retention. Some third sector organisations were in favour of the

\(^{10}\) http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/parliamentarybusiness/CurrentCommittees/45421.aspx
\(^{12}\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/4794
\(^{13}\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/4338/0
A large majority of respondents felt that safeguards should be put in place if the requirement for corroboration was abolished.

24. In light of the consultation responses a further consultation, Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice: Additional Safeguards Following the Removal of the Requirement for Corroboration\(^\text{15}\) was launched on 19 December 2012, and ran until 15 March 2013. This consultation document sought views on two proposals for additional safeguards: increasing the jury majority required to return a verdict and widening the trial judge’s power to rule that there is no case to answer. Views were also sought on whether the “not proven” verdict should be retained.

25. A total of 32 consultation responses were received of which 18 were from individuals and 14 from organisations. The analysis showed that there was majority support for the two additional safeguards proposals contained in the consultation document and that concerns were raised about the proposal to widen the trial judge’s power to rule that there is no case to answer. Whilst the majority of respondents supported the abolition of the ‘not proven’ verdict, some expressed concern about the consequences of doing so.

Sheriff Principal Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure

26. On 19 December 2012 the Scottish Government also launched a public consultation, Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice: Reform of Sheriff and Jury Procedure\(^\text{16}\), which ran until 15 March 2013.

27. The consultation document stated the Scottish Government accepted all of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s recommendations for the reasons set out in his report. It set out the proposal to require a compulsory business meeting between the prosecutor and the defence in order to ensure effective engagement and discussion about the case at an early stage. While the principle of the compulsory business meeting attracted wide support some concerns were expressed as to the proposed timing and format of the meeting. In particular, the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (“COPFS”), which will be a participant in all compulsory business meetings, and on whom the duty of preparing the note of such meetings will fall, favoured holding the meeting after the indictment without prescriptions on the method by which it should be held. On other issues, the balance of views was in favour of extending the current time bar from 110 days. However there were mixed views on whether the increase should be from 110 to 140 days.

28. There was support for the proposal to indict an accused person to a first diet and then proceeding with the trial diet only when the sheriff is satisfied it will go ahead. There was less support for the proposals to introduce sanctions, for making statements at petition stage requiring an accused person to engage with their solicitor, or for written narrations on the facts of a case in the event of an early plea. These may be delivered, if felt desirable, by methods other than primary legislation. Accordingly the Scottish Government has not pursued these issues.

---

\(^{15}\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/4628/0

\(^{16}\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/8141
ALTERNATIVE APPROACHES

29. An alternative approach would have been to retain the status quo and not implement the recommendations contained in Lord Carloway and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s reviews. However, such an approach would not be without risks. Lord Carloway’s review was conducted in light of recent court decisions regarding, for example, a person’s right to legal advice prior to police questioning. Such decisions necessitate a need to ensure that the rights of accused persons and victims of crime remain appropriately balanced. Furthermore, the UK Supreme Court’s decision in the Cadder case illustrates the importance of ensuring that Scottish criminal law and practice remains compliant with the rights set out in the ECHR.

30. Some of Lord Carloway’s recommendations, for example those concerning the procedure for arrest and detention, were by their nature general and high level, and further policy development work has been required to be undertaken by the Scottish Government in consultation with its justice partners. An alternative approach would have been to ask an independent body, for example the Scottish Law Commission, to further consider how the recommendations contained in Lord Carloway and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s reviews could most appropriately be implemented. However, the Scottish Government considered that, in light of the issues identified in these reviews, any benefits of doing so are outweighed by the risks of delaying these important reforms. The Scottish Government has also undertaken its own consultations on these reviews, which has helped to inform development of policy in these areas and enabled the refinement of the recommendations.

31. With the exception of the proposal to abolish the requirement for corroborative evidence, Lord Carloway’s recommendations were all supported by a majority of consultation respondents. An alternative approach could, therefore, have been to accept Lord Carloway’s recommendations with the exception of the proposal to remove the requirement for corroboration. However, Lord Carloway intended his recommendations to be implemented as a package, which was carefully constructed to ensure that the rights of suspects, the rights of victims and witnesses, and the wider interests of justice are appropriately balanced. The Scottish Government considers that implementing the report’s recommendations on a piecemeal, ad-hoc basis would risk undermining this objective. The Scottish Government was persuaded of the benefits of implementing the recommendations as a package, with any changes, or the way in which the recommendations could be taken forward, being considered in light of the consultation responses. The Scottish Government took the view, in particular, that the abolition of the requirement for corroboration is a necessary step towards a system which is able to take account of all fairly obtained evidence, respecting not only the accused but also victims and their families. This policy memorandum sets out in more detail how the Scottish Government proposes to specifically implement the recommendations and any alternative approaches considered.
PART 1 OF THE BILL

ARREST (CHAPTER 1, SECTIONS 1 TO 6)

Policy objectives

32. The policy objective is to simplify the process of arrest and detention of persons suspected of having committed a crime. The provisions in the Bill simplify and introduce greater clarity to the process whilst also equipping the police with the necessary powers to carry out their role of investigating and detecting crime.

Key information

33. The 2010 Act addressed the issues raised in the Cadder case by providing for a statutory right for persons to have access to a solicitor and extending the time the police could detain a person in order to perform their functions from 6 to 12 hours. In exceptional circumstances, a senior police officer could authorise an extension of the period for a further 12 hours allowing for a period of detention of 24 hours.

34. However, the Carloway review concluded that the distinction between arrest and detention had been eroded to such an extent that there was little purpose in continuing with the two different states. Lord Carloway recommended that it would be simpler, and more clearly in tune with ECHR, to have a single period of custody (detention), once a person has been arrested on suspicion of having committed an offence. He recommended that the powers currently conferred through section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) (to detain and question a suspect at a police station) are changed to a single power to arrest a person on the ground of “reasonable suspicion”. The Scottish Government was persuaded of the logic of having a single state of custody, which simplifies and clarifies rights and procedures for police and arrested persons alike.

35. The effect of the provisions in the Bill is to abolish detention under section 14 of the 1995 Act so that the only general power to take a person into custody is the power of arrest contained in the Bill. The test for the police arresting a person without a warrant is whether they have reasonable grounds for suspecting the person has committed, or is committing, an offence punishable by imprisonment. A warrant will be required for non-imprisonable offences unless obtaining one is not in the interests of justice.

36. The Bill provides that a constable must inform the person that the person is under arrest, of the general nature of the suspected offence and reason for arrest, and must caution the person. The person must also be advised of their right to legal advice and their right to remain silent.

37. The existing requirement that the police must charge a person upon arrest and prior to reporting the person to the procurator fiscal is removed. However, there remains a period at which police investigations come to a conclusion and the person has a right to be informed of the next steps. If a report is to be submitted to the procurator fiscal for an offence, then the person must be informed of that intention. This, in effect, has the same outcome as the current ‘charge’ in that it signifies a change in the person’s status and ends the period in which police can question a person. Any further questioning of the person which the police may wish to pursue will have to be authorised by judicial sanction (this is covered at paragraphs 83 to 101).

Consultation

38. Questions on Lord Carloway’s recommendations relating to arrest and detention were contained in the Scottish Government’s main consultation exercise.

39. The responses indicated general approval for the move to a power of arrest on the grounds of reasonable suspicion and respondents commented that this simplification will be better understood by the public. Some respondents remarked there will be a need for guidance on the term “reasonable suspicion”.

40. The majority of respondents who answered the question agreed with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that statutory rights for a person who has neither been detained nor arrested are unnecessary and the Scottish Government agrees with this.

41. Some respondents commented that the power to detain a person for a non-imprisonable offence seemed contrary to the ECHR. However, the Scottish Government recognises the police concerns about the potential difficulties of removing common law powers of arrest, particularly where offences are not punishable by imprisonment. The provisions in the Bill therefore retain the flexibility of police powers by enabling individuals to be arrested for non-imprisonable offences in particular cases where the police consider this to be proportionate and in the interests of justice and public safety.

42. Respondents also generally agreed with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the police should no longer be required to charge a person with a crime prior to reporting the case to the procurator fiscal. However, some respondents commented that there should be a clear and transparent process to ensure the person is aware that they have been reported to the procurator fiscal, of the allegations against them, and that they should be informed of the outcome of a decision not to prosecute.

Alternative approaches

43. The Scottish Government reviewed the current powers of arrest which exist in statute and how these will operate once Lord Carloway’s recommendation has been implemented. It considered leaving all the current powers of arrest which exist in statute as they are. However, this left a great number of differing powers of arrest which the police would need to remember in practice. The Scottish Government considers that in order to ensure consistency and a process which is easily understood, the only power of arrest, with a few exceptions, should be through the power of arrest recommended by Lord Carloway.
CUSTODY (CHAPTER 2, SECTIONS 7 TO 13)

Policy objectives

44. The policy objective is to ensure that a person is not unnecessarily or disproportionately held in police custody.

Key information

45. The key principles underpinning the provisions in the Bill are that a person should not be held unnecessarily or disproportionately in custody and that the police must, when considering custody, take account of whether it is fair, in the interests of justice, and necessary to protect the public or to prevent crime.

46. The police currently detain persons using powers contained in the 1995 Act. These powers were amended by the 2010 Act to extend the period that the police had to interview a person from 6 hours to 12 hours with the potential to extend that period for a further 12 hours on the authority of a senior police officer (i.e. 24 hours in total). The Carloway review noted the low number of cases in which extensions to the existing 12 hour initial maximum has been required since the passing of the 2010 Act and concluded that the detention period should be a maximum of 12 hours with no provision for extension. In recommending this Lord Carloway was mindful of the need to ensure that investigations are not carried out in such a manner that it infringes a person’s right to a fair trial or ceases to be effective because of excessive time restraints.

47. The Scottish Government agrees with Lord Carloway’s conclusion and the Bill provides that the maximum time that a person should be detained in police custody without charge on the same ground, or grounds, arising from the same circumstances, is 12 hours cumulatively. When a person requires urgent medical treatment and is taken to a hospital, the time taken travelling to or from the hospital, and the time the person is in hospital and not subject to police questioning, is not included in the 12 hour period.

48. Where a person is kept in custody without charge for 6 consecutive hours (at any time) a constable of the rank of Inspector or above, not directly involved in the investigation, must review, as soon as reasonably practicable, the person’s continued detention taking into consideration whether the arrested person remains a suspect and the person’s presence is reasonably required. The police will be required to keep a record of all such decisions made.

49. Lord Carloway’s review also highlighted that current law and practice has the potential to allow a person to be held, in certain circumstances, for a period of 4, and perhaps 5, days in police custody prior to appearance in court. The Scottish Government agrees with Lord Carloway that such lengthy periods are unacceptable. The Bill provides that, wherever practicable, a person is to be brought before a court to deal with the case not later than the end of the court’s first sitting day after the day on which the person was arrested (unless the person was released on an undertaking).

50. The Scottish Government considers that the provisions will provide the police with sufficient time to investigate offences thoroughly whilst also defining a period of time in which a person can be held in custody during investigation. The Bill also seeks to safeguard a person’s right to liberty by providing timescales within which a person should be brought before a court whenever practicable. The Scottish Government considers these proposals are proportionate and fair.

Consultation

51. Questions on Lord Carloway’s recommendations in relation to period of custody were contained in the Scottish Government’s main consultation exercise.

52. There was broad agreement with the recommendation that a person should be detained only if it is necessary and proportionate having regard to the nature and seriousness of the crime and probable disposal if convicted. However, some respondents expressed concern about the risk to the safety and security of victims and witnesses if a person was liberated.

53. The majority of respondents (14) agreed with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the maximum time a person can be held in detention (prior to charge or report to the procurator fiscal) should be 12 hours, in order to minimise the intrusion into the liberty of a person and based on the evidence that most detentions are dealt with within 6 hours, even after the introduction of the 2010 Act allowing the police 12 hours.

54. However, respondents representing enforcement agencies commented on the need for a longer period in exceptional circumstances, with the main reasons including the need to ensure the safety and security of the victim (not simply related to the seriousness of the crime), to take account of the fitness of the arrested person (e.g. wellbeing, state of intoxication), or to secure third party assistance (e.g. an appropriate adult or an interpreter), to allow investigators to secure vital evidence (e.g. through medical examinations).

55. There was overriding support for the proposal that the 12 hour period of detention should be reviewed after 6 hours by a senior police officer. Some respondents commented on the criteria that would be applied in determining whether detention should continue and on the most appropriate person to make this decision.

Alternative approaches

56. There was broad agreement that a person should be detained only if it is necessary and proportionate. However, the Scottish Government recognises that a decision to liberate a person must be balanced against the need to safeguard the rights of victims and witnesses and the Bill provides the police with powers to impose conditions on a person’s liberation, such as not to approach or contact a victim.
INVESTIGATIVE LIBERATION (CHAPTER 2, SECTIONS 14 TO 17)

Policy objectives

57. The policy objective is to ensure the police have the flexibility to manage a criminal investigation in a manner that balances the needs of the enquiry and public safety against the fundamental rights of a person suspected of having committed a crime.

Key information

58. The provisions in the Bill implement Lord Carloway’s recommendations by providing the police with powers to liberate a person from custody for a set period of time whilst they carry out further investigations into a suspected crime (referred to as “investigative liberation”). These powers are most likely to be of use in the investigation of serious crimes which often involve complex and technical examinations of telephones, computers etc.

59. In order to balance the interests of justice and protect the public the police will have power to set certain conditions on such liberation, similar to bail conditions: for example to refrain from certain actions such as approaching witnesses etc. The procurator fiscal will have powers to review any conditions set by the police.

60. The person’s rights are safeguarded in that investigative liberation will be limited to 28 days (with no power to extend this period) and the person can apply to a sheriff to have any conditions amended and/or terminated.

Consultation

61. Questions on Lord Carloway’s recommendations on liberation from police custody were included in the Scottish Government’s main consultation exercise.

62. Significantly more respondents (20), particularly enforcement organisations, agreed with the recommendation that the police should be able to liberate a person from custody on conditions.

63. Twice as many respondents (13) agreed than disagreed that a limit of 28 days is sufficient in all cases. Respondents cited a range of factors as necessitating this period including the detailed forensic analysis of evidence, cross-border jurisdictional enquiries, or a need to examine large volumes of documentary evidence.

Alternative approaches

64. The Scottish Government considered whether the police should only be able to liberate a person on investigative liberation during their initial period of custody and not unconditionally. In other words, a person could only be liberated for a period of 28 days, after which they had to be charged or released and could not be arrested for the same crime again. However, further consideration of this alternative approach tended to highlight that it would hamper police enquiries and provided little flexibility for the police when dealing with crimes. It was also not in keeping with Lord Carloway’s view as to how liberation from custody was to operate, in that the 28 days of liberation was only intended for those persons liberated on conditions, not a person liberated unconditionally. Therefore this alternative approach was not pursued.

RIGHTS OF SUSPECTS - LEGAL ADVICE (CHAPTER 4, SECTIONS 23, 24 AND CHAPTER 5, SECTIONS 35 AND 36)

Policy objectives

65. The policy objective is to set out clearly in legislation when a person’s right to access a solicitor arises, how this is communicated to the person and the circumstances in which these rights can be waived.

Key information

66. In response to the Cadder case, the 2010 Act amended the 1995 Act giving a person the right of access to a solicitor prior to and during interview by the police. Subsequently, Lord Carloway recommended that a person should have the right to legal advice from when the person is initially held in police custody, regardless of whether the person will be interviewed.

67. In his review, Lord Carloway recommended that there is no need to require the police to secure access by a person to a solicitor outwith a police station and no legislation is required in that regard. He also recommended that part of the standard caution prior to the interviewing of a person outwith a police station should include the information that a person has a right of access to a solicitor if that person wishes.

68. Under the new procedure for arrest, information on the right of access to a solicitor will be incorporated into the caution given to a person on arrest. The precise wording of the caution will remain non-statutory.

69. The Scottish Government considers that, in the majority of cases, the best place to facilitate access to a solicitor is at the police station, due to practical considerations and to ensure a private, safe and secure environment for individuals, legal professionals and the police. Accordingly, the person will be informed again of their rights and afforded access to legal advice as soon as practicable after arrival at the police station. The provisions in the Bill do not affect the existing right of a person to have intimation of the person’s detention sent to a solicitor and to a third person.

70. Those attending the police station voluntarily for interview will also have the right to have access to a solicitor prior to and during interview.

71. The right to access a solicitor does not extend to provision of assistance from a solicitor of the person’s choice, as this may not be achievable in all situations. The police currently try to accommodate such requests and it is anticipated that this practice will continue. Where a nominated solicitor cannot be contacted or is unable or unwilling to attend, the person will be offered the services of an alternative solicitor.
72. In accordance with Lord Carloway’s recommendation to introduce a Letter of Rights without delay, the Scottish Government will introduce a non-statutory letter in 2013. The provisions in the Bill will provide for a person’s right when held in police custody, to receive information on the person’s arrest, verbally or in a Letter of Rights, in accordance with Articles 3 and 4 of Directive 2012/13/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council on the right to information in criminal proceedings.

73. The Scottish Government has given extensive consideration to the appropriate means by which access to a solicitor should be provided to a person whilst at the police station, to enable advice and assistance to be delivered in an efficient and effective way. Lord Carloway recommended that “subject to what can reasonably be funded by the Scottish Legal Aid Board or the suspect himself/herself, it is ultimately for the suspect to decide whether the advice from the solicitor should be provided by telephone or in person”. Furthermore, Lord Carloway explained that, initially, the person will be expected to speak to a solicitor in private over the telephone, which will enable the solicitor to give immediate initial advice and to discuss whether the solicitor’s attendance at the police station is necessary or desirable. The Scottish Government decided in favour of provisions designed to allow flexibility as to the most appropriate means of communication, to allow for the means to be tailored to the needs of the individual. Whilst a telephone consultation may be appropriate for some individuals and in some circumstances, it is acknowledged that it may not be suitable for all.

74. The 2010 Act provided for a person to have a right to a private consultation with a solicitor before and at any time during questioning. Whilst it is understood that it is common practice by the police to allow a solicitor to be present during questioning, this is not explicit in the legislation. The Scottish Government considers that this right should be enshrined in legislation and the Bill includes provisions to this effect.

75. In relation to non-vulnerable persons waiving the right to legal advice, the opinion of Lord Hope in the UK Supreme Court case of McGowan v B17 made clear that European Court of Human Rights (“the ECtHR”) jurisprudence does not provide any support for the argument that, as a rule, a decision on whether to waive the right of access to a solicitor needs to be informed by legal advice. The provisions do require the waiver to be voluntary, unequivocal and informed. To demonstrate that a person’s decision to waive the right is made with an understanding of the right itself, the person’s waiver must be recorded and the reason for the person’s decision noted. Adults, other than vulnerable adults, will be able to waive their right to legal advice and so too, subject to special rules, will young people aged 16 to 17 (see paragraphs 102 to 129 for the special rules that apply to vulnerable adults and under 18s). But the waiver of the right to legal advice is not permanent; having allowed an interview to begin without having a solicitor present a person can stop the interview and insist on access to a lawyer”.

76. The right of the police to delay or withhold legal advice in exceptional circumstances is not affected by these provisions.

77. The provisions on the right to legal advice are also applicable to post-charge questioning.

---

17 2011 UKSC 54, para 46
Consultation

78. Questions regarding the implementation of Lord Carloway’s recommendations on legal advice were included in the Scottish Government’s main consultation exercise.

79. Respondents to the consultation agreed that access to a solicitor should begin as soon as practicable after the detention of an arrested person, regardless of questioning.

80. In relation to the best way of providing legal advice, respondents commented on the status quo and on a mix of methods including face-to-face, telephone and video technology, as appropriate. Significantly more respondents (21) agreed than disagreed (3), however, that the decision on the means by which legal advice is delivered should sit with the person.

81. There was all-round agreement that the right to waive access to legal advice, and the expression and recording of this, should be set in legislation.

Alternative approaches

82. There is no alternative approach that would achieve the Scottish Government’s policy objective of clearly setting out in legislation a person’s rights to legal advice.

QUESTIONING (CHAPTER 4, SECTIONS 27 TO 29)

Policy objectives

83. The policy objective is to provide the police with powers to question a person after the person has been charged with, or officially accused of, an offence and to ensure that such powers are used proportionately and in a manner that is consistent with the person’s right to a fair trial.

Key information

84. Lord Carloway noted in his review that in the course of investigating a crime, the police would normally question three broad categories of person: witnesses, suspects, and accused. The lines separating these categories may not always be clear. A person may move from one category to another during the course of an investigation, and indeed during questioning. The position in Scots law has been that although it is proper for the police to question a person, including one detained under section 14 of the 1995 Act, once the police are in a position to charge the person with the offence(s) under investigation, questioning should cease. Generally, once that point has been reached, it is proper for the police to charge the person with the offence and to conclude any questioning. Thereafter, although the person is entitled to make a voluntary statement to the police, there should be no further questioning at the initiative of the police. Evidence of admissions made by a person after charge has long been regarded as inadmissible or unreliable if the evidence was not thought to have been fairly obtained.

85. The exception to the general rule about post-charge questioning is found in the procedure commonly known as judicial examination, in which the prosecutor can, at the inception of a case being prosecuted under solemn procedure, question a person about the charge(s) on the petition, with a view to eliciting information about any line of defence on which they intend to rely at any forthcoming trial.

86. The Scottish Government agrees with Lord Carloway’s conclusion that in a human rights based system there is no particular reason why there should be a prohibition on the questioning of a person who has been, or ought to have been, charged with an offence, provided that the person’s rights continue to be adequately and effectively protected. Post-charge questioning might take place, for example, where the person could not be questioned for medical or other good reasons, such as a legitimate delay in obtaining access to a solicitor. Another example might be where, after a person has been charged, further evidence has come to light which the person might be able to comment upon. Developments in science, information technology, and investigative methods mean that modern police investigations can take longer and be more thorough. It is envisaged that this power will not be used regularly.

87. Accordingly, the Bill provides that a court will have the power, on application, to allow the police to question a person after the person has been charged with an offence. The Bill also provides that, once a case has called in court, the Crown can apply to a court at any time prior to the trial, for permission for the police to question the person, provided that the person’s trial has not commenced.

88. In considering an application, the court must be satisfied that it is in the interests of justice to allow the questioning. Moreover, the court must have regard to the seriousness of the offence with which the person has been charged, and the extent to which the person could have been questioned earlier about the matter. The purpose behind these provisions is to ensure that the power is exercised proportionately and appropriately.

89. The Bill also provides, as a further protection of the rights of the person, that where an application is granted the court must specify the maximum period for which the person can be questioned, and can make any further conditions it wishes; it could, for example, limit the scope of questioning if it thought it appropriate.

90. This power will apply to persons who are being held in custody pending a court appearance, and those who have been released by the police, whether on undertaking or for citation in due course. It will also apply to persons who have appeared in court, although in that case the application can only be made before the start of the person’s trial. And where the application relates to a case which has already called in court, the person is entitled to make representations, through a solicitor if the person wishes, before permission can be granted.

91. The Bill provides that, on granting an application, a court has a further power, if it thinks it expedient, to grant a warrant for the apprehension of the person in order that the questioning can take place.

92. Given this extension of the power of the police to question a person, and the fact that the person can make a voluntary statement to police if the person wishes, Lord Carloway concluded that the procedure known as judicial examination was no longer necessary. Accordingly, the Bill provides that this procedure is abolished. It further provides that the person will no longer have the seldom-used opportunity to make a declaration – in essence, a statement of their position – at the early stage of a case being prosecuted under solemn procedure.

93. The right of access to a solicitor will apply to post charge questioning. And when a person is taken into custody to be questioned after charge, the person will have the same rights under Chapter 5 of the Bill as a person who has not been charged (including the right to have intimation of the person’s arrest sent to another person, in the case of vulnerable suspects the right of access to an Appropriate Adult and in the case of under 18 year olds the right of access to a parent, carer or responsible person).

Consultation

94. Questions regarding Lord Carloway’s recommendations on post-charge questioning were included in the Scottish Government’s main consultation exercise.

95. A significant majority of respondents (15) agreed with the proposal that the police should be able to question a person after charge.

96. Some respondents to the consultation suggested that the power to question a person after charge was unnecessary, and that given the length of time the police can detain a person for, and the proposed introduction in the Bill of the investigative liberation option for the police, there is no need to allow for post-charge questioning, as the police will have had sufficient time to question the person. The Scottish Government, however, is of the view that putting on the face of this Bill the requirement that the court must grant an application before post-charge questioning can take place, together with the court’s power to limit the scope of the questioning or impose other conditions if it thinks it appropriate, adequately balances a person’s rights and the interests of society in the full and proper investigation of crime.

Alternative approaches

97. One approach suggested by some respondents to the consultation was that the police should themselves have the power to embark on post-charge questioning, provided that the questioning was endorsed by a senior police officer. The Scottish Government, however, has taken the view that the best way of ensuring a proportionate approach, and that a person’s rights are fully protected, is to place the decision in the hands of the court.

98. It was also suggested that it would be appropriate for the defence to be allowed to make representations before an application to question a person is granted. The Scottish Government has taken the view that once a case has called in court it is appropriate that the person should be able to make representations. The Carloway review did not think that such a provision is necessary before the case has called in court, and the provisions in the Bill reflect this approach as most likely to allow for the proper investigation of crime.

99. Some respondents wondered whether the abolition of judicial examination and declarations was necessary, noted that they can still be beneficial in certain circumstances, and suggested that they might benefit from amendment; alternatively, that post-charge questioning should be carried out by a procurator fiscal rather than the police.
100. The Scottish Government has considered this issue carefully. It has arrived at the view that, given that post-charge questioning will be regulated by the court, there is no longer any particular role for judicial examination, and that the police are the right organisation to carry out the questioning in the discharge of their investigatory functions. It further noted that the right to emit a declaration is almost never exercised by accused persons, who can in any event make a voluntary post-charge statement to the police should they wish to do so.

101. The Carloway review suggested that a test drawn from Article 6 (right to a fair trial) of the ECHR should be put on the face of legislation as the test for the admissibility of evidence in the course of a trial, and that consideration should be given to the abolition of existing common law tests of fairness and admissibility. Respondents to the consultation were divided on this and the Scottish Government has concluded that this recommendation should not be included at this time.

CHILD SUSPECTS (CHAPTER 5, SECTIONS 31 AND 32)

Policy objectives

102. The policy objective is to make provision to ensure that the highest standard of protection is offered to children who are involved in the formal criminal justice process.

Key information

103. The Bill enhances existing safeguards in the Scottish criminal justice system by making a number of changes to the way in which children and young people are treated in regard to arrest, custody, interview and charge, in a manner that reflects the fact that children of different ages have different levels of maturity and capacity. A key principle enshrined in the Bill is that in taking any decision regarding the arrest, detention, interview and charging of a child by the police, the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration.

104. Lord Carloway emphasised the importance of workability, practicality and the flexibility of any measures as they relate to children. Similarly, he recognised the value in maintaining the flexibility of judgement and informality of some contacts between young people and the police in less serious cases.

105. The provisions in the Bill importantly define a child as being under the age of 18 years for the purposes of arrest, detention and questioning. This means that the current provisions concerning notification to a parent, carer, or other responsible person and these persons having access to a child suspect will be extended to all persons under the age of 18 years.

106. The provisions in the Bill create a set of protections which are mandatory for those aged under 16 years to ensure their rights are protected in all criminal investigations. The role of the parent, carer or responsible person is to provide any moral support and parental care and guidance to the child and to promote the child’s understanding of any communications between a child and the child’s solicitor. A child under 16 has the right to access a responsible person if detained and, in any event, prior to and during interview, provided that access can be achieved within a reasonable time. The police will be able to delay or suspend that right in exceptional
The Scottish Government recognises the important role of a parent (or someone acting on behalf of the child in the role of a carer or responsible person) in protecting a child’s rights and providing moral support during investigation. Equally they recognise the importance of ensuring that a child under 16 years has access to legal advice. Therefore the provisions state that a child suspect under 16 years must be provided with access to a parent, carer or responsible person and a child cannot waive that right. Furthermore, when being interviewed as a suspect a child under the age of 16 years must be provided with access to legal advice and cannot waive that right; nor can a parent, carer or responsible person do so on the child’s behalf.

There is, however, a balance sought for children aged 16 and 17 years in order to provide a greater emphasis on their ability to make decisions for themselves and ensure their voice is heard in all parts of the process. The Bill provides that they have the right of access to any adult reasonably named by the person, and to a solicitor, in recognition of the need for support and guidance where a child wishes such support.

Lord Carloway noted that where no other support can be found for those under 16 years of age, current practice is for local authorities to provide it. In the case of 16 and 17 year olds unable to name any source of such support, the expectation is that guidance will make clear that, where it is so requested, the local authority will provide it.

However, where a 16 or 17 year old child wishes to waive the right of access to an adult named by them, then they must have advice from a solicitor. A 16 or 17 year old can only waive the right of access to a solicitor under section 24 with the agreement of an adult named by them. They are, however, entitled to have access to both such an adult and a solicitor should they wish to do so. The Bill also provides that if the 16 or 17 year old is considered vulnerable (i.e. they have a mental disorder and cannot communicate effectively or understand what is happening to them) then they will not be able to waive their right to legal advice.

Consultation

Questions regarding Lord Carloway’s recommendations on child suspects were contained in the Scottish Government’s main consultation exercise.

Of respondents expressing a view, the great majority were in favour of most of Lord Carloway’s recommendations with the exception of the right of 16 and 17 year olds to waive access to a lawyer.

Consultation has continued with representatives of the main national bodies, including the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities (“COSLA”), the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration (“SCRA”), the Association of Directors of Social Work (“ADSW”) and Police Scotland. This work seeks to ensure the appropriate balance is struck between legislation and guidance.

Alternative approaches

The status quo was not considered as an option following the Cadder case. It was for this very reason that the Scottish Government commissioned Lord Carloway’s review.
This policy seeks to achieve the workability and flexibility which Lord Carloway favoured and which the Scottish Government sought to secure by commissioning the review in the first place.

115. The Scottish Government considered making the provision of legal advice mandatory to all under 18s. However, it recognised that it is important to distinguish between the different needs, stages of development and potential circumstances of older and younger children. Thus, while it might appear attractive to treat all individuals under 18 years consistently, the age-based laws which allow for seventeen year olds to be living independently and married reflect the quite different contexts and degrees of self-determination that can exist between a 10 and a 17 year old. The Scottish Government preferred an approach which would allow children aged 16 and 17 years to make their own decisions with safeguards in place to support them in this.

VULNERABLE PERSONS (CHAPTER 5, SECTIONS 33 AND 34)

Policy objectives

116. The policy objective is to make provision to ensure that vulnerable adult suspects are not disadvantaged, in comparison to their non-vulnerable counterparts, during police procedures.

Key information

117. Lord Carloway’s review considered the position in relation to individuals who have permanent or semi-permanent vulnerabilities which affect their fitness to be interviewed when arrested and detained as a suspect by the police.

118. The current non-statutory role of an Appropriate Adult is to facilitate communication during police procedures between the police and vulnerable suspects, accused, victims, and witnesses (aged 16 or over) who have a mental disorder or learning disability. Appropriate Adults are specifically recruited for their experience (professional or otherwise) in working in the field of mental health and their communication skills. They are often social workers or health professionals (although they do not fulfil the Appropriate Adult role in that professional capacity). Appropriate Adults are expected to successfully complete nationally recognised training and follow the Scottish Appropriate Adult Network National (“SAAN”) Guidance.

119. Appropriate Adults are independent of the police and are not usually known to the person being interviewed. An Appropriate Adult monitors the police interview to ensure that the person is not unduly distressed, understands, and continues to understand their rights and why they are being interviewed, understands the implications of their answers or lack of them, and is not disadvantaged by their disorder. The Appropriate Adult can advise the interviewing officer of concerns and can prompt a suspension of the interview to discuss them. An Appropriate Adult can be present during every stage of the investigation, including searches, interviews, medical examinations, the taking of forensic samples (e.g. DNA), fingerprinting, photographing, and identification parades.

120. The Bill defines a vulnerable person for the purpose of police arrest, detention and questioning as a person aged 18 or over (as, for these purposes, a child suspect is to be defined as a person under the age of 18) who is assessed as vulnerable due to a mental disorder as defined in section 328(1) of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 (i.e. “any mental illness, personality disorder, learning disability however caused or manifested”).

121. As it is at present, and as suggested by Lord Carloway, it will be for the police to assess whether the person is vulnerable. Where a person is assessed as vulnerable, the police will endeavour to secure the attendance of an Appropriate Adult as soon as reasonably practicable after detention and prior to questioning. As is current practice, the Scottish Government would expect the police, in deciding whether a person is vulnerable: to be guided by comments from carers and others who know the person, to seek medical advice if necessary, and to keep the matter under review in case vulnerability becomes apparent at a later stage.

122. The role of an Appropriate Adult is to assist a vulnerable person to understand what is going on and to facilitate effective communication between the vulnerable person and the police.

123. In relation to training, the Bill will give the Scottish Ministers regulation-making powers so that they can detail who may provide Appropriate Adult services and what training, qualifications or experience are necessary to become an Appropriate Adult.

124. The Scottish Government does not intend the legislation to interfere with the existing non-statutory role of an Appropriate Adult and expects that the police will still be able request the support of an Appropriate Adult for vulnerable suspects, and accused persons aged 16 and 17 years old, and also for victims and witnesses aged 16 and over, through the current non-statutory route. However, the Scottish Ministers can, if it becomes necessary in the future, make alternative arrangements to ensure that Appropriate Adult services continue to be provided as at present.

Consultation

125. Questions regarding the implementation of Lord Carloway’s recommendations on vulnerable adult suspects were included in the Scottish Government’s main consultation exercise.

126. The majority (24) of those who responded to the questions posed in relation to vulnerable adult suspects agreed that there should be a statutory definition of ‘vulnerable suspect’\(^\text{18}\). Whilst most agreed with the proposed definition some respondents suggested linking this to definitions contained in other legislation or proposed alternatives. The Scottish Government decided to accept Lord Carloway’s proposed definition as it sits with the existing non-statutory definition of those who require support from an Appropriate Adult.

127. A large majority (20) of those who responded agreed that the role of an Appropriate Adult should be defined in statute and with Lord Carloway’s proposed definition. There was also agreement that statutory provision should be made to allow Scottish Ministers to define the qualifications necessary to become an Appropriate Adult. All respondents to the questions agreed that a vulnerable person must be provided with the services of an Appropriate Adult as soon as practicable after detention and prior to any questioning. However, concerns were raised in relation to a vulnerable person being allowed to waive the right of access to a solicitor with the agreement of an Appropriate Adult. The Scottish Government noted these concerns, and the instruction issued by the Lord Advocate to Chief Constables, that from 1 October 2012 a vulnerable suspect should not be allowed to waive their right of access to a solicitor (in response to cases where vulnerable suspects had done so, not fully understanding the caution or terms of interview, and the subsequent concerns about the admissibility of statements made during interview). The Scottish Government is content with the current position as set out in the Lord Advocate’s guidance.

\(^{18}\) Section 33(1) of the Bill. Support for a vulnerable person applies where (a) a person is in police custody, (b) a constable believes that the person is 18 years of age or over, and (c) owing to mental disorder, the person appears to the constable to be unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or to communicate effectively with the police.

128. Further consultation also took place with the SAAN, COSLA and ADSW to seek their views on the Scottish Government’s proposals. SAAN’s main concern was in relation to expanding the role of an Appropriate Adult so that a vulnerable person can only waive the right of access to a solicitor if the Appropriate Adult agrees to this, whilst COSLA and ADSW wished to be reassured that the legislation would not put a duty on local authorities to provide Appropriate Adult services. The Scottish Government has taken account of these views in developing the provisions.

Alternative approaches

129. The Scottish Government considered extending the provisions in the Bill include a statutory definition of (for the purpose of arrest, custody and questioning) vulnerable victims and witnesses and to specify the role of the Appropriate Adult in supporting them. Currently Appropriate Adult support is provided to vulnerable victims and witnesses on a non-statutory basis. However, the delivery of Appropriate Adult services to vulnerable suspects, accused, victims and witnesses appears to be working well in practice (and seems to go beyond that required by Lord Carloway’s recommendations). The Scottish Government does not intend at present to make any particular body statutorily responsible for the delivery of Appropriate Adult services, and so they decided to take a light-touch approach in confining the Bill provisions to the implementation of Lord Carloway’s recommendations, with the expectation that the non-statutory service will continue to run alongside these statutory provisions.

PART 2 OF THE BILL – CORROBORATION AND STATEMENTS

CORROBORATION (SECTIONS 57 TO 61)

Policy objectives

130. The policy objective is to remove the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases to enable decisions on the prosecution of criminal cases to be based on an assessment of the quality of the evidence against an accused person.
Key information

131. The requirement for corroborative evidence is a longstanding feature of Scots law. In general terms, the requirement for corroborative evidence can best be thought of as the requirement that there must first be at least one source of evidence that points to the guilt of the accused as the perpetrator of the crime and that, secondly, each “essential” or “crucial” fact requiring to be proved must be corroborated by other direct or circumstantial evidence. Generally, there are two “crucial facts” requiring proof in every crime: (1) that a crime was committed; and (2) that the accused committed it.

132. The Carloway review’s terms of reference (see paragraph 7) expressly set out that the current requirement in Scots law for corroborative evidence was an area that required to be examined in light of recent decisions of the appeal court, in particular concerning the right to access legal advice prior to and during police questioning. The question that Lord Carloway’s review considered was whether the requirement for corroboration continues to serve a useful purpose or whether “it is an artificial construct that actually contributes to miscarriages of justice in the broad, rather than appellate sense.” Lord Carloway concluded that the current requirement for corroboration in criminal cases should be abolished and that “in solemn prosecutions where there is no corroboration of testimony, there should be no requirement on the judge to warn the jury of any dangers perceived purely as a consequence of the absence of such corroboration”.

133. The rule requiring corroborative evidence is seen by some as a protection against miscarriages of justice in that it ensures that no person can be convicted of an offence solely on the basis of the testimony of a single witness. In his report, Lord Carloway stated that it is his view that the principal argument for abolishing the requirement for corroboration is that he could find no evidence that it serves its stated purpose of preventing miscarriages of justice. He observed that “The real protection against miscarriages of justice at first instance is the standard of proof required; that the judge or jury must not convict unless convinced of guilt beyond reasonable doubt.”

134. The second argument Lord Carloway made for removing the requirement for corroboration is that doing so may prevent miscarriages of justice occurring, in the broader sense of ensuring that in cases where there is evidence from a single witness to an offence, that witness is credible and reliable, and the judge or jury is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the accused’s guilt, a conviction would follow. Lord Carloway stated in his report that “in principle, judges or juries ought to be regarded as capable of deciding for themselves what weight to attribute to a witness’s evidence.” The fact that the evidence of a witness may be uncorroborated would be something the judge or jury would take account of in assessing what weight should be given to that witness’s evidence. Corroboration is concerned merely with the quantity, and not the quality, of the evidence against an accused person. It is not clear why, on the one hand, a case where there is a single independent and impartial eye-witness to an offence could not be prosecuted, while one involving a number of witnesses who may be unreliable (e.g. rival gang members in a street fight or feuding neighbours in a dispute) should be subject to this artificial restriction.

135. It has been suggested that the requirement for corroboration provides a degree of objectivity and consistency in assessing the evidence against an accused person. However, Lord Carloway found in the course of his review that different judges have different views on what constitutes corroboration in a particular case and he was not persuaded that the requirement provides any more consistency than an alternative approach, based on quality of evidence, would bring.

136. Corroboration is more likely to exist in relation to some offences than others. Where crimes are usually committed in private, the only potential evidence may be from the testimony of a complainer, and this can be a particular barrier to obtaining corroboration for sexual crime and for domestic violence as there may be nothing else, or very little, in the absence of statements made by suspects at interview. The practical effect of the requirement for corroboration can be to deny access to justice for victims of these types of crime. Equally, with certain less serious crimes, for example minor assaults or thefts, there may also be little evidence other than that of the complainer but that evidence may be of itself compelling.

137. Lord Carloway considered it worth noting the impact that the existence of the requirement for corroboration has in the advice given by solicitors to suspects. Lord Carloway noted that, in Scotland, it plays a major part in the solicitor’s decision to advise the client to say nothing for fear of the client inadvertently corroborating other evidence and thereby creating a sufficiency, which would otherwise not exist. As a result, whether a person is prosecuted for and convicted of an offence conviction which would be inevitable in other jurisdictions can depend entirely on whether the person elects to respond to questioning by the police. Such advice can place a person in a difficult position. It may be felt that a judge or jury would be more likely to accept the person’s account as credible if it were raised at the earliest opportunity. Yet, the person would almost always be well advised not to speak, at least in situations where there was no obvious sufficiency of evidence.

138. Lord Carloway’s review considered a number of cases that were dropped after the Cadder ruling because the police interview was not Cadder-compliant. Without the requirement for corroboration, a significant number of these cases may very well still have had a sufficient quality of evidence to have justified continued proceedings, even though evidence of the police interview would be inadmissible. Although this number may be perceived as small when compared to the totality of prosecutions in Scotland, it is still numerically significant. On one view it means that, in the broad sense, miscarriages of justice may have occurred in a number of these cases because of the requirement for corroboration. With no prosecution, evidence suggesting that a crime had been committed was not tested and witnesses, including victims, may have been left seeing the person, whom they regarded as perpetrating a significant crime, go free.

139. For the reasons outlined above, the Scottish Government is persuaded by the conclusion of Lord Carloway’s review that “the requirement for corroboration should be abolished for all categories of crime.” His review concluded that “it is an archaic rule that has no place in a modern legal system where judges and juries should be free to consider all relevant evidence and to answer the single question of whether they are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused person committed the offence libelled. Removing the requirement for corroboration will help to ensure access to justice for victims of crimes, such as domestic violence and sexual crime, which are typically committed in private, and where corroborative evidence can be difficult to obtain.” The Bill provides that in any criminal proceedings the judge, or as the case may be the jury, if satisfied that any fact has been established by evidence in the proceedings, is entitled to find that fact proved by the evidence despite the evidence not being corroborated. The removal of the requirement for corroborative evidence will apply in respect of all offences committed on or after the date on which the provision comes into force.

140. The requirement for corroborated evidence in relation to offence grounds in children’s hearings referrals to the sheriff court is also abolished.

141. A children’s hearing does not have a role in establishing the facts of a case; its role is to act in the best interests of the child and to determine what measures are required to address the needs of the child. If the grounds for referral at a children’s hearing are not accepted or not understood by either the child or the relevant person, the case is referred to the sheriff to determine whether the grounds are established. If the ground for referral is that the child has committed an offence, in determining whether the grounds are established, the standard of proof which applies is that which applies in criminal proceedings, beyond reasonable doubt, and there is currently a requirement for corroboration. If the sheriff finds that the ground is established the case will be referred back to a children’s hearing for it to determine whether compulsory measures of supervision are needed to support and protect that child.

142. The removal of the requirement for corroboration in children's hearings proceedings is not likely to have any significant impact and will not formally alter Reporter practice or decision making in relation to whether to refer a child to a children's hearing. The existing conditions for making these referrals (the referral ground applies and compulsion is needed) will still apply regardless of the court procedure. Reporters will have to consider whether there is a sufficiency of evidence upon which they could establish the grounds to the necessary standard of evidence.

Consultation

143. Questions regarding the implementation of Lord Carloway’s recommendations on the removal of the requirement for corroboration were included in the Scottish Government’s main consultation exercise. There were mixed views with regard to the recommendation that the requirement for corroboration should be removed. While the majority of respondents representing the legal profession were opposed, often citing concerns that the removal of the requirement could lead to an increased risk of miscarriages of justice, groups representing the victims of crime supported the recommendation as they took the view that the existing requirement for corroboration can present an artificial and unnecessary barrier to prosecution. What emerged clearly from the consultation is that, irrespective of their views on whether the requirement for corroboration should be removed, the majority of respondents considered that additional safeguards would be required to be built into the justice system if the requirement for corroboration is to be abolished. In light of this, the Scottish Government undertook a further consultation between December 2012 and March 2013, as a result of which it has been decided to make provision to increase the jury majority required for a conviction from 8 of 15 jurors to 10 (see paragraphs 171 to 182).

Alternative approaches

144. An alternative approach would have been to reject Lord Carloway’s recommendation and retain the requirement for corroboration. However, the Scottish Government considers that Lord Carloway’s review made a compelling case for its abolition, and while it is aware that some in the legal profession are concerned that removing the requirement for corroboration could increase the risk of miscarriages of justice, only very limited evidence has been put forward in support of the potential risks that have been identified and there is no other jurisdiction in the western world in which this requirement exists. Moreover, the Scottish Government considers that Lord Carloway’s recommendations are intended to be implemented as a coherent package, and by failing to implement a significant aspect of the recommendations contained in his report, there is a very real risk of undermining Lord Carloway’s stated aim of ensuring the justice system is appropriately balanced.

145. Some consultation respondents suggested an alternative approach whereby the requirement for corroboration was selectively abolished for specific offences which often occur in circumstances where corroborative evidence is likely to be difficult to obtain (e.g. domestic violence and sexual assaults). However, the Scottish Government considers that such an approach would be unnecessarily complex, with different rules concerning sufficiency of evidence applying in respect of different offences. This would be particularly problematic where an accused was charged with multiple offences on the same indictment, e.g. a rape and an assault forming part of a single course of conduct, and corroboration would be required in respect of one of the charges and not others. Moreover, the Scottish Government see no principled reason for retaining the requirement for corroboration for some offences and not others.

146. Some have argued that the removal of the requirement for corroboratory evidence should be retrospective, in that it should apply to all criminal proceedings after the provision comes into force, irrespective of the date on which the offence was committed. Supporters of this approach consider that this would enable COPFS to re-open historic cases which could not be prosecuted at the time owing to a lack of corroborative evidence. The Scottish Government considers that such an approach risks creating uncertainty about cases which had been discontinued many years, or even decades, previously and that, in practice, given the passage of time, it is likely that few such historic cases would have been capable of prosecution. Removing the requirement for corroboration for offences committed after the provision comes into force provides greater clarity and certainty.

EXCULPATORY AND MIXED STATEMENTS (SECTION 62)

Policy objectives

147. The policy objective is to provide that an exculpatory or mixed statement made by a person to a constable, or other person investigating an offence, is not inadmissible as evidence on account of being hearsay evidence.

Key information

148. Lord Carloway noted in his review that at the core of the Cadder case was the issue of the admissibility of statements made by a person to the police without the advantage of prior legal advice. Generally speaking, statements made by a person to the police would constitute hearsay evidence (and so not be admissible in court). However, confessions made in the course of police interviews are generally regarded as an exception to the rule against the admissibility of hearsay evidence because, as they are “statements against interest”, it is reasoned in law that they are more likely to be true than not. On the other hand, exculpatory statements (i.e. statements in which the person denies having committed an offence) made by a person in the course of a police interview would not be admissible as proof of fact.

149. Lord Carloway’s review did not seek to revisit the entire law of hearsay but did examine the treatment of statements made by a person in the course of a police interview which do not amount to a full confession and are either “mixed statements” which are partly incriminating and partly exculpatory (e.g. where a person admits to a lesser offence while denying the having committed a more serious offence) or wholly exculpatory. He concluded that “the distinction between incriminatory, exculpatory and mixed statements should be clarified so that, so far as statements made to the police or other officials in the course of an investigation are concerned, no distinction is drawn between them in terms of admissibility. All statements made by accused persons to such persons in that context should be admissible in evidence for all generally competent purposes, including proof of fact, in the case against that accused except where the content of a statement would otherwise be objectionable.”

150. It is important first to consider the reasons why hearsay evidence is not generally admissible in court. There is perceived to be a problem in an accused person being able to lead evidence at his trial of exculpatory statements as a substitute for giving evidence, not least because it might otherwise be expedient for an accused person to provide a carefully prepared narrative to a credible person shortly before the trial rather than giving evidence in person at court, so potentially avoiding cross-examination by the prosecution.

151. The law on the admissibility of exculpatory and mixed statements is complex and may not be easily understood by juries. It is not the case that exculpatory statements made by an accused person are currently not admissible at all. However, they are only admissible as evidence that an accused person’s story is consistent, where the accused has given evidence and his credibility or reliability is challenged and not as proof of fact.

152. In relation to proof of fact, a ‘mixed statement’ is admissible at the instance of the Crown and not at the instance of the defence. However, where such a statement is led by the Crown, both the incriminatory and exculpatory elements of the statement would be admissible as proof of fact. Lord Carloway expressed doubt as to whether a jury can be expected to understand and to apply the distinction between using a statement to test credibility and reliability and using it as evidence of proof of fact. Furthermore, there is a reasonable argument that the legitimate concerns about the use of hearsay evidence outlined in paragraph 150 do not apply in the same way where the accused person’s statement was made to officers charged with investigating the commission of an offence, who can be expected to challenge the accused person’s version of events in the course of the interview.

153. The Scottish Government agrees with Lord Carloway’s conclusion that “the current law on the admissibility of mixed and exculpatory statements made by a person during a police interview is not based on a rational and balanced approach to the relevance of statements. It is highly complex and potentially confusing to juries and others in the criminal justice system. It is at odds with the principle of the free assessment of evidence unencumbered by restrictive rules; and it fails to take account of the role of the police interview as part of the trial process.”
154. The Bill implements Lord Carloway’s recommendation by providing that, where a statement is made by an accused person to a constable or other person investigating an offence, it is not inadmissible as evidence on account of being hearsay. Other restrictions on the admissibility of evidence, such as those at section 275 of the 1995 Act concerning the admissibility of sexual history and character evidence, will continue to apply.

Consultation

155. Questions on Lord Carloway’s recommendations relating to exculpatory and mixed statements were included in the Scottish Government’s main consultation exercise.

156. Many more respondents agreed (20) than disagreed (3) that the rules distinguishing treatment of incriminatory, exculpatory and mixed statements should be simplified allowing the courts to assess them more freely. The consultation analysis found that “there was agreement that only statements made to the police or other officials should be allowed as this provides a safeguard against the use in evidence of statements made by the accused to friends or associates”.

Alternative approaches

157. In light of the strong support from consultation respondents for Lord Carloway’s recommendation, the Scottish Government considers that doing nothing is not a viable option. Lord Carloway indicated in his review that there might be a case for going further and providing that all relevant statements by an accused person should be admissible as evidence, irrespective of who to whom these statements were made. However, Lord Carloway acknowledged that “that may be a step too far at present. Furthermore, it could not be justified on the same basis as statements at interview since those outwith that context would not be being made as potentially part of the trial, as defined by the Convention jurisprudence.”

158. Respondents to the consultation on Lord Carloway’s Report expressed concern that allowing all relevant statements made by an accused person to be admissible as evidence, as opposed to only those made to the police, could result in accused persons using carefully prepared statements to friends or associates as a means of avoiding having to give evidence in court and face the possibility of cross-examination. More fundamentally, the effect of the Cadder case is that the police interview forms a part of the trial process, and so it is legitimate to consider hearsay statements made in such circumstances as an exception to the more general prohibition on the admissibility of hearsay evidence. Taking these viewpoints into consideration, the Scottish Government considered that only making such statements made to police admissible provided an adequate balance between the general policy of allowing judges and juries to test all available fairly-obtained evidence, and the possibility of abuse.
PART 3 OF THE BILL – SOLEMN PROCEDURE

METHOD OF JUROR CITATION (SECTION 64)

Policy objectives

159. The policy objective is to remove the current restriction on how the Scottish Court Service (“SCS”) cites persons for juries in order to permit a choice of methods.

Key information

160. Section 85(4) of the 1995 Act restricts methods of jury citation to registered post or recorded delivery. Removing this requirement will allow the SCS a choice among methods, as well as allowing for the possible use of developing technology, such as various forms of electronic communication.

Consultation

161. The main interested party in the citation of jurors is the SCS, by which it is carried out. The provision in the Bill was arrived at in consultation with the SCS, which took the view that citation by ordinary first-class post, for example, would not only save money, but might also result in improved communication with potential jurors (given some people’s reluctance to sign for delivery of post they had not been expecting). SCS also pointed out that in England and Wales citation is by means of first-class post.

Alternative approaches

162. The Scottish Government considered adding “first-class post” or similar wording to the list of permitted means of citation in Section 85(4). However, this would not provide the same flexibility as the chosen approach of avoiding specifying the method of citation at all.

SOLEMN PROCEDURE – IMPLEMENTATION OF SHERIFF PRINCIPAL BOWEN’S RECOMMENDATIONS (SECTION 63 AND SECTIONS 65 TO 69)

Policy objectives

163. The policy objective is to make provision to enable and promote the efficient and effective management of sheriff and jury cases.

Key information

164. The vast majority of cases heard before a jury in Scotland are heard in the sheriff court and include serious crimes such as violent assault, knife crime and supplying controlled drugs. In his Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure, Sheriff Principal Bowen made a number of recommendations for the more efficient and cost effective management of cases which he considered would have the additional benefit of reducing inconvenience and stress to the victims, witnesses and jurors involved.
165. The Bill requires early communication between the defence and prosecution, described by Sheriff Principal Bowen as a “compulsory business meeting”, after an indictment is served. The Bill does not prescribe the format of the communication. The intention is that prompt engagement between the prosecutor and defence will assist in the early identification of issues and, in some cases, earlier pleas of guilty. It should also help to ensure that cases proceed to trial in an orderly fashion with such matters as can be agreed in advance having been agreed. Parties will be required to keep a written record of this meeting which the Sheriff will consider. The time period between the service of the indictment and the first diet will be extended to 29 clear days to allow parties to communicate as required.

166. In order to accommodate this meeting the Bill increases the length of time for which an accused person can be remanded before having to be brought to trial from 110 days to 140 days. The Scottish Government is satisfied that this is proportionate and it is in accordance with the limit required in the High Court.

Consultation

167. Draft provisions in the Bill were subject to consultation between 19 December 2012 and 15 March 2013, as described at paragraph 26. The consultation led to some changes in the approach to the timing and manner of holding of the compulsory business meeting, in particular, given the views of the Crown, on whom the working of the proposed system depends. It also led to the Scottish Government’s decision not to proceed with sanctions, statements to the accused or written narrations.

Alternative approaches

168. While implementing the recommendation in broad measure the proposed approach departs from Sheriff Principal Bowen’s recommendations in some matters of detail, taking account of arguments expressed in response to consultation.

169. Sheriff Principal Bowen recommended that the compulsory business meeting take place before the indictment, to allow for engagement as early as possible, and that it should be by a face to face meeting wherever practicable. The Scottish Government considered this approach, and consulted on doing precisely this.

170. However, responses to the consultation suggested that parties would become clear on what matters they had to discuss only after the indictment is served. Some respondents to the consultation considered a requirement to hold face-to-face meetings would be practically difficult, be expensive and resource dependent. Since the Sheriff Principal reported, one of the objections to e-mail communication – that it was insecure – had been alleviated by the provision of new, secure systems. The Scottish Government was persuaded that delaying the compulsory business meeting until after the indictment, and allowing it to be held by electronic communication, would allow informed discussion in a way which promoted efficiency of time and money.
INCREASE TO JURY MAJORITY REQUIRED FOR CONVICTION (SECTION 70)

Policy objectives

171. The policy objective is to introduce an additional safeguard into the Scottish criminal justice system by providing that two thirds of jurors must return a guilty verdict in order for an accused person to be convicted.

Key information

172. At present, a simple majority of jurors is required for a guilty verdict to be returned. As juries are comprised of 15 people, at least 8 jurors need to vote for a guilty verdict for an accused person to be convicted. If jurors are excused during the trial, the trial can continue with a minimum of 12 jurors, but the support of 8 jurors is still needed for a guilty verdict; anything less is treated as an acquittal.

173. Scotland is the only common law jurisdiction where an accused person can be convicted on a simple majority verdict. Other systems which are based on a simple majority verdict generally have additional protections. For example, Italy allows conviction on a simple majority, but the two judges sit alongside six lay jurors. In Belgium, jurors can convict on a simple majority but a unanimous panel of judges can overturn ‘erroneous’ verdicts. More information on the rules on jury majorities in different jurisdictions can be found at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/4628/8.

174. The Bill makes provision that a majority of two thirds of jurors is required to return a conviction. Where there is a full complement of 15 jurors, this means that 10 jurors must return a guilty verdict. Under Scots law, a trial can continue providing the number of jurors does not fall below 12. As is the case in a number of other jury systems, provision is made that the number of jurors required to return a verdict is lowered where jurors are excused during the course of a trial. Provision is made that at least two thirds of jurors must return a guilty verdict for a conviction to result and as such, a jury of 14 requires a majority of 10, a jury of 13 requires a majority of 9 and a jury of 12 requires a majority of 8 jurors.

175. Provision is made that, where the required majority is not reached for a guilty verdict and there is no majority in favour of either of the other two available verdicts (‘not guilty’ and ‘not proven’), the jury is deemed to have returned a verdict of “not guilty”. Therefore, it will remain the case that under Scots law, it will not be possible for a hung jury to result in the accused person being subject to a fresh trial.

Consultation

176. The consultation on additional safeguards sought views on the proposals to increase the jury majority required to return a conviction from 8 to either 9 or 10 of 15 jurors following removal of the requirement for corroboration.

19 [http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/4628/0]
177. A clear majority of consultation respondents supported moving to a system in which a qualified majority rather than a simple majority of jurors is required in order to return a verdict of ‘guilty’. A majority of 10 jurors was favoured by many more respondents than a majority of 9 jurors.

178. Respondents were fairly evenly split on the question of whether it should be open for COPFS to be able to bring a fresh prosecution against a person in the event that the jury is unable to reach the required majority for any verdict. Generally speaking, respondents from a legal background were opposed to any changes which could result in hung juries and proposed that where the jury fail to agree a guilty verdict by the required majority, the accused should be acquitted, as is currently the case. Conversely, victims’ groups and enforcement agencies were supportive of requiring the same majority for any verdict to be returned and COPFS having a power to re-try the accused where the original trial end with the jury being unable to agree a verdict.

Alternative approaches

179. An alternative approach would have been to retain the status quo whereby a simple majority of 8 of 15 jurors is required for a conviction to result. However, in light of the overwhelming support for raising the jury majority required for a conviction from those who responded to the consultation, the Scottish Government does not consider that it would be justifiable for Scotland to remain the only common law jurisdiction in which an accused person can be convicted on the basis that 8 of 15 jurors considered that the case had been proven beyond reasonable doubt. Respondents to the earlier consultation on Lord Carloway’s review had expressed concern that without a change to the jury majority required for a conviction, a person could be convicted because a bare majority of jurors found the accused to be guilty on the basis of a single, uncorroborated source of evidence.

180. In some other jurisdictions, the same jury majority is required for the return of any verdict and where a jury fail to agree on any verdict (a so-called hung jury) it is open for the prosecution to bring a fresh trial. This is in contrast with Scotland where, at present, anything short of the required majority for a conviction is treated as an acquittal. Hung juries are not currently a feature of the Scottish criminal justice system and it is considered that, on balance, where the evidence led in a trial has failed to persuade at least one third of the jurors that the case against the person has been proven, it would not be in the public interest to allow a fresh trial to take place. It is worth noting that jurisdictions such as England and Wales, which do allow for re-trials to take place where a jury fails to reach a verdict, require a higher proportion of jurors to agree on a guilty verdict for an accused person to be convicted.

181. The Scottish Government consultation exercise also sought views on whether the ‘not proven’ verdict remains appropriate in light of Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the requirement for corroboration should be abolished. Analysis of consultation responses showed that a majority of respondents were in favour of moving to a two verdict system. However a significant minority of respondents were concerned that time should be given to allow the impact of implementing Lord Carloway’s recommendations to be assessed before making changes to the three verdict system. The Scottish Government has therefore determined that the ‘not proven’ verdict should be retained for the time being and further consideration given to whether it remains appropriate in light of the implementation of the other changes proposed following the Carloway review. The consultation document also sought views on whether the trial judge’s power to rule that there is no case to answer should be widened to include circumstances in which the judge considers that, while there is a technical sufficiency of evidence, no reasonable jury could consider the case to have been proven beyond reasonable doubt on the basis of the evidence led. The majority of consultation respondents supported this recommendation. However, the Senators of the College of Justice, who would be responsible for making decisions on whether to remove a case from the jury in High Court trials, were opposed. In their view, “…the system is…based on the jury being the judges of the facts and we would not be in favour of trial judges having power to take some cases away from the jury on the basis that there is a sufficiency of evidence but that a judgment is made on quality. Such a system usurps the function of the jury”. Some victims groups also expressed concern that such a power would be used by the defence to delay the outcome of proceedings and cause additional uncertainty.

182. This issue had previously been considered when the common law submission of ‘no case to answer’ was placed on a statutory footing by the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, following the recommendation of the Scottish Law Commission. At that time, the Scottish Government’s position was that, given that successful appeals on the grounds that no reasonable jury could convict were very rare, and taking account of concerns about the impact of such a provision on court time, the ‘no case to answer’ submission should not be extended in this way. In view of the concerns expressed by the judiciary and victims’ groups, the Scottish Government has concluded that it would not be appropriate to legislate to extend the trial judge’s power to rule that there is no case to answer.

PART 4 OF THE BILL – SENTENCING

INCREASE IN MAXIMUM SENTENCES FOR HANDLING OFFENSIVE WEAPONS OFFENCES (SECTION 71)

Policy objectives

183. The policy objective is to ensure that courts have appropriate powers to sentence persons who commit knife possession and other offensive weapon possession offences effectively.

Key information

184. Tackling knife crime is a key priority of the Scottish Government. The policy approach adopted by the Scottish Government is a combination of tough enforcement of the law coupled with initiatives to try and change the culture by educating and diverting people from carrying knives in the first place. This strategy operates in partnership with, amongst others, the police, other law enforcement agencies, the Violence Reduction Unit and youth work organisations, to help reduce the numbers of those who carry and use knives.

185. In terms of enforcement, Scottish police are carrying out a considerable number of stop and searches and the courts impose the toughest knife possession sentences in the UK. The table below shows that a person in Scotland is already 50 per cent more likely to be sent to prison than in England and Wales for knife possession and, for those who do receive a custodial sentence, a person’s sentence is likely to be nearly 70 per cent longer.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Offence</th>
<th>% given immediate custody</th>
<th>Average sentence length (days)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Possession of a sharp instrument/blade</td>
<td>29%</td>
<td>44%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

186. COPFS adopt a stringent approach to the prosecution of knife possession offences and they have made recent changes to strengthen their prosecutorial policy in this respect. For example, in April 2012 the Lord Advocate announced[^21] that anyone who is arrested with a knife in Scotland’s town and city centres will be prosecuted before a sheriff and jury. The effect of this prosecutorial policy is that the maximum prison term available upon conviction increased from one year to four years. The policy intention for the provisions in the Bill is to ensure that maximum sentences are available for such offences committed in town and city centres. More recently, the Lord Advocate reported[^22] in March 2013 the initial results of a zero tolerance approach to the prosecution of knife possession offences carried out between 1 December 2012 to 4 January 2013. COPFS are committed to operating a knife crime prosecutorial policy that helps reduce offending, and re-offending, and which provides an effective deterrent.

187. Alongside effective enforcement of the criminal law, the Scottish Government is investing in a number of programmes which aim to educate young people on the dangers and consequences of carrying a knife and support them to make positive choices. This includes the No Knives Better Lives[^23] (NKBL) initiative which is now in place in 11 areas across Scotland, supported by over £2m investment from Scottish Government since 2009. This youth engagement initiative is aimed at educating young people about the dangers of carrying a knife and the devastating personal consequences it can have on their future. NKBL also helps to shape positive attitudes and influence positive life choices by promoting opportunities for young people. The Scottish Government is also supporting Medics Against Violence, a charity which uses the experience and volunteered time of over 140 senior medical professionals to give young people an understanding of the consequences of violence and knife crime and how to avoid it.

[^23]: http://www.noknivesbetterlives.com/
This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

188. Since 2006/07, there has been a significant fall in the number of people who have been convicted of handling offensive weapon offences. In 2006/07, 3,550 people were convicted of these offences. In 2011/12, 2,276 people were convicted of these offences. This represents a fall of 36% between 2006/07 and 2011/12.

189. Since 2006/07, there has been a significant increase in the proportion of people receiving a custodial sentence for these offences and a significant increase in the average length of the custodial sentences imposed for these offences.

190. In 2006/07, 1,065 people received a custodial sentence for these offences which represented 30% of all those convicted in that year. In 2011/12, 805 people received a custodial sentence for these offences which represented 35% of all those convicted in that year.

191. In 2006/07, the average sentence length for handling offensive weapon offences was 161 days. In 2011/12, the average sentence length for these offences was 311 days. This represents an increase of 93% in average sentence length between 2006/07 and 2011/12.

192. Within this wider context, the Scottish Government wants to ensure that courts are fully and appropriately empowered to be able to effectively sentence those convicted of knife possession and offensive weapon possession. While sentencing in individual cases is appropriately a matter for the court within the individual circumstances of each case and within the overall legal framework the court operates in, the Scottish Government considers that increasing the maximum penalties for these offences to five years, as proposed in section 70 of the Bill, will reinforce the message to those who might consider carrying knives and offensive weapons that the consequences if caught will be severe. This should help in further deterring the carrying of knives and other offensive weapons as well ensuring that courts do have sufficiently effective sentencing powers to deal with individual cases where the court considers a severe sentence is required.

Consultation

193. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice announced the Scottish Government’s intention to increase the maximum penalties for knife possession and other offensive weapon possession offences in November 2012. This forms part of longstanding Scottish Government policy on knife crime to ensure there is tough enforcement available under the criminal law coupled with education and diversion activity. There has been no formal consultation on the proposal.

Alternative approaches

194. Increasing the maximum penalties for knife possession and other offensive weapon offences can only be done through primary legislation. The Scottish Government could leave the current penalties unchanged, but consider that the proposed increases will help further assist

---

24 The figures given for offences also include a very small number of offences under section 141 and 141A of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. These offences relate to restriction of sale of offensive weapons and account for less than 1% of the figures given. The provisions in this Bill do not affect the maximum penalties for section 141 and 141A offences in the Criminal Justice Act 1988.
efforts to reduce the number of people who carry knives and other offensive weapons which will, in turn, reduce the number of violent incidents involving these weapons.

SENTENCING PRISONERS ON EARLY RELEASE (SECTIONS 72 AND 73)

Policy objectives

195. The policy objective is to ensure that the courts always consider whether it is appropriate to punish a person for committing an offence while on early release from a previous sentence and to improve the flexibility of the powers of different levels of court to be able to impose punishments in such circumstances.

Key information

196. The courts have long-established powers to punish a person for committing a new offence while on early release from a custodial sentence given for a previous offence. These powers are contained in section 16 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 (“the 1993 Act”). These powers are commonly known as ‘section 16 Orders’ and are treated as a new sentence.

197. These powers exist to give discretion to the courts to punish a person who abuses the trust placed in them after being released prior to the end of their custodial sentence, by committing a new offence.

198. The powers contained in section 16 of the 1993 Act operate whether a person has been released early from a short term sentence (4 years or less) or released early from a long term sentence (more than 4 years). They are distinct from the powers contained in section 17 of the 1993 Act which allows persons released early from a sentence on licence to be recalled to prison for breaching their licence conditions. These section 17 powers therefore only generally relate to long term prisoners (i.e. serving sentences of more than 4 years) and are available to ensure protection of the public.

199. Where a person is released early from a long term sentence and they commit a further offence for which they are convicted, the person can be recalled to prison by the Scottish Ministers and the Parole Board for breaching their licence conditions under section 17 of the 1993 Act and separately receive a section 16 Order from the court at the point they are being sentenced for the new offence.

200. If the court decides it is appropriate to punish a person for committing an offence while on early release, the court has discretion to decide whether the section 16 Order should run concurrently with, or consecutive to, the sentence for the new offence.

201. The maximum length of a section 16 Order is the period of time equal to the date the new offence was committed and the date when the person’s original sentence ends. For example, a person who was serving a 12 month prison sentence will be released automatically after 6 months as this is the half-way point of their sentence. If the person commits a new offence on the day they are released, then the maximum length of a section 16 Order that a court could decide to impose would be 6 months – this being the period of time between the date of the offence committed on early release (6 months) and the end of the person’s original sentence (12 months).

---

25 There are some exceptions. For example, offenders committing certain sexual offences can receive licence conditions on early release for sentences of 6 months and more even though sentences between 6 months and 4 years generally do not contain licence conditions.

202. In the previous example, where a person received a sentence of 3 months for the new offence they committed on the day of early release, and assuming the court decided to use its discretion to impose a section 16 Order and that the section 16 Order should be the maximum permitted of 6 months, the court then has to decide whether the section 16 Order of 6 months should run concurrently to the sentence of 3 months, or consecutively to the sentence of 3 months.

203. If the court decides the section 16 Order should run consecutively to the original sentence, both sentences would be combined (or ‘single-termed’) to become one overall sentence of 9 months. If the court decides the section 16 Order should run concurrently to the original sentence, both sentences operate alongside each other i.e. the 3 month sentence and the 6 month sentence run at the same time.

204. As noted above, the powers of the courts to punish a person for committing an offence while on early release are contained within section 16 of the 1993 Act. There is a provision contained in section 204A of the 1995 Act which has the effect of prohibiting a court from imposing a new sentence to run consecutive to any existing sentence where a person has been released early. As can be seen from the above, this does not mean that the courts cannot punish a person for abusing the trust placed in them by committing an offence on early release but it does mean the courts must use a section 16 Order to do so rather than stating a sentence for a new offence should run consecutive to an existing sentence from which the person has been released early.

205. This area of sentencing law is intricate and not necessarily easily and widely understood. Courts do regularly use the powers under section 16 of the 1993 Act as statistics, as at September 2012, demonstrate:

- Section 16 Orders in custody – 543
- Prisoners in custody with both a section 17 Recall and a section 16 Order – 104.

206. The Scottish Government wishes to ensure that the discretionary powers of the court to punish persons for abusing the trust placed in them by committing an offence while on early release are widely understood by all those who operate in, and come into contact with, this part of the justice system. That is why in cases where the court is dealing with a person who committed an offence on early release, section 72 of the Bill places a new specific duty on the court to always consider whether it is appropriate for an additional punishment to be imposed on a person over and above punishment for the new offence.

207. The proposals do not change the substantive powers of the courts in this area and it will continue to be the case, as at present, that it is for a court to decide whether it is appropriate to impose a section 16 Order. The Scottish Government considers this is the correct approach as the court hears all the facts and circumstances of each case and is best placed to decide on how to deal with offenders within the overall legal framework. While it is clear from the statistics that the courts regularly make use of their section 16 Order powers, the Scottish Government considers there will be a general benefit through requiring courts always to consider in every relevant case whether a section 16 Order is appropriate.

208. Section 72 of the Bill also adds new flexibility to how different levels of court can impose section 16 Orders. Currently, a court which is sentencing a person for a new offence committed while the person was on early release from a previous sentence can impose a section 16 Order only where the previous sentence was imposed by the same level of court or a lower level of court. For example, a sheriff summary court sentencing a person for a new offence can only impose a section 16 Order as a punishment for committing the new offence while on early release if the previous sentence had been imposed by a sheriff summary court or a justice of the peace court.

209. Currently if the previous sentence was imposed by a higher level of court, it is only the higher court that can impose a section 16 Order. For example, a sheriff summary court sentencing a person for a new offence cannot impose a section 16 Order as a punishment for committing an offence while on early release if the previous sentence had been imposed by a sheriff solemn court or the High Court. In such a situation, the sheriff summary court can refer the case to the higher court for consideration as to whether a section 16 Order should be imposed.

210. The Bill will give new flexibility for lower levels of court to impose section 16 Orders when the previous sentence had been imposed by a higher level of court. The provisions will empower lower levels of court to impose Section 16 Orders when dealing with a person serving a previous sentence imposed by a higher court where the maximum potential length of a section 16 Order does not exceed the common law sentencing powers of the court.

211. The 1995 Act contains the relevant sentencing limits for common law offences for different levels of court. Section 3(3) of the 1995 Act provides that the sheriff solemn court cannot impose a sentence exceeding 5 years. Section 5(2)(d) of the 1995 Act provides that the sheriff summary court cannot impose a sentence exceeding 12 months. Section 7(6)(a) provides that a Justice of the Peace (“JP”) court cannot impose a sentence exceeding 60 days.

212. The new flexibility will mean that where, for example, a sheriff summary court is sentencing for a new offence committed while on early release from a previous sentence imposed by a sheriff solemn court (or by the High Court), the sheriff summary court will be empowered to impose a section 16 Order as a punishment for the person having committed the new offence while on early release if the maximum length of the section 16 Order does not exceed 12 months. Where a JP court is sentencing for a new offence committed while on early release from a previous sentence imposed by a sheriff summary court (or by a sheriff solemn court or by the High Court), the JP court will be empowered to impose a section 16 Order if the maximum length of the section 16 Order does not exceed 60 days.
213. In cases where a higher court had imposed the previous sentence and the maximum length of a section 16 Order exceeds the general sentencing power of the lower court (i.e. a section 16 Order exceeds 60 days for a JP court, exceeds 12 months for the sheriff summary court and exceeds 5 years for the sheriff solemn court), it will continue to be the case that the lower court can refer the case to the higher court for consideration of whether a section 16 Order should be imposed.

214. In line with general sentencing limits, the Scottish Government considers this new flexibility contained in section 72 of the Bill will empower different levels of court to consider imposing section 16 Orders in relevant cases which will help improve the efficiency and operation of the courts by meaning fewer cases need to be referred from lower courts to higher courts for consideration of the imposition of a section 16 Order.

Consultation

215. While the provisions in the Bill adjust the powers of the different levels of court and require the court to always consider whether to impose a section 16 Order, they do not substantively change the overall powers of our courts in this area. The Scottish Government has therefore not undertaken any formal consultation, though they have informally consulted the judiciary about the terms of the provision.

Alternative approaches

216. The Scottish Government could have decided not to place a statutory duty on the court and continued with the current legislative provision. It is clear that courts regularly make use of their section 16 Order powers and there is no reason to consider that would not continue to be the case. However, the Scottish Government considers it is preferable to place a specific duty on the court in this way so that a court must always consider whether to impose a section 16 Order in relevant cases. Placing a specific duty on the court through this Bill will help raise general awareness of the existence of these important powers for the courts.

217. Legislation is required to adjust the powers of lower courts to consider imposing section 16 Orders where the previous sentence had been imposed by a higher court and therefore there is no alternative approach that could achieve the policy aim.

PART 5 OF THE BILL – APPEALS AND SCCRC

APPEALS (SECTIONS 74 TO 81)

Policy objectives

218. The policy objective is to make provision to enable the efficient and timely management of appeals by addressing, as far as legislation requires, some of the sources of delay.

Key information

219. The Carloway review concluded that “the reputation of the [Scottish legal] system has been tarnished by the length of time it has taken to progress some appeals”. Lord Carloway’s views were given further point by the fact his terms of reference were to review the law in the light of recent decisions by the ECtHR. In this context, as he points out, the requirement in Article 6 (right to a fair trial) of the ECHR that persons are entitled to a fair trial within a reasonable time, applies to appeals.

220. Lord Carloway recognised that progressing appeals timeously is to a great extent dependent on those who conduct court business, and stressed that they are under a duty to ensure that cases are progressed efficiently. However, he made a number of recommendations relating to sanctions to encourage the timeous progression of appeals, the lodging of Notices of Intention to Appeal and Notes of Appeal, the rationalisation of procedures by which appeals may be heard, and the giving of reasons for allowing late appeals in plain language for victims or the next of kin.

221. The Scottish Government proposes to adopt an approach to Lord Carloway’s recommendations which observes their spirit, and in many cases their letter, while taking account of arguments for a different approach in particular cases, as set out below. The proposed approach is to ensure that there are changes to the law which support case management by the courts, promotes the progression of cases and address some of the difficult practices which have led to delay in the past.

Consultation

222. Questions on Lord Carloway’s recommendations in relation to appeals were included in the Scottish Government’s main consultation exercise.

223. While the recommendations on appeals attracted relatively little comment in the Scottish Government’s consultation on the conclusions of the Carloway review, the majority of those expressing a view supported the principles Lord Carloway had set out. The Scottish Government decided to take the approach set out below having considered with justice partners how the proposals would work in practice.

Alternative approaches

224. A possible approach would be for a more detailed application of Lord Carloway’s recommendations on sanctions, including specifying sanctions for breach of time limits and procedural requirements in legislation, or at least the granting of a specific power to make such sanctions by Act of Adjournal. However, the Scottish Government considered that stating sanctions in statute would be excessively rigid, recognising the general right of the courts to regulate their own activities. A power to make Acts of Adjournal already exists in the form of section 305 of the 1995 Act. Setting out a separate sanctions-making power could be felt to detract from the generality of this provision, so no specific powers to set sanctions in this respect are set out in the Bill.

225. However, Lord Carloway explicitly recommended amendments to discourage the late lodging of Notices of Intention to Appeal, or Notes of Appeal, and the Scottish Government accepts that this is a major source of delay which should properly be addressed. One such sanction would have been to abandon an appeal for which a Notice, or Note, was not lodged timeously. The Scottish Government has not taken this approach as technically no appeal exists until leave has been granted.

http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/4794

226. The Scottish Government considered giving effect to the sanction of requiring special cause to be shown, and likelihood of success to be demonstrated, in a two-step process. When seeking to lodge late, an applicant would have to show good reason for doing so. Having negotiated this stage, at leave to appeal stage an applicant who had been allowed to lodge late would have to demonstrate the likelihood of the appeal to succeed. Following consultation the Scottish Government chose to make applicants satisfy the “likely to succeed” test at lodging stage. While this might have the disadvantage of an application being considered on the basis of possibly incomplete documentation, it would have the advantage of allowing the full range of issues to be considered at an early stage. It would appear also to give legislative sanction to the current practice of the courts.

227. In implementing Lord Carloway’s recommendations on limiting the available procedures, the Scottish Government considered the maximalist approach he advocated of abolishing Bills of Suspension and Advocation entirely. However, given the difficulty of establishing all the circumstances in which such Bills might be used – and thus the effects of abolition – the Scottish Government has chosen essentially to abolish their use only where alternative statutory modes of appeal are provided by sections 74 and 174 of the 1995 Act. The key consideration here has been to avoid leaving open an appeal procedure to which no requirement of leave attaches, where the procedures of section 74 and 174 require it. In the case of Bills of Suspension, these are already not competent where the procedures of sections 74 and 174 are available.

FINALITY AND CERTAINTY – REFERENCES BY SCCRC (SECTION 82)

Policy objectives

228. The policy objective is to ensure the Appeal Court is appropriately empowered to consider interests of justice as part of how they consider Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission referred cases.

Key information

229. The Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (“the Commission”) was established in 1999 to investigate potential miscarriages of justice. Where the Commission investigate a case and consider that a miscarriage of justice may have occurred, they can refer the case back to the Appeal Court if the Commission think it is in the interests of justice to do so. This is a special power that only the independent Commission has to allow a case that may have exhausted the normal appeal process to be re-opened and considered afresh by the Appeal Court.

230. In considering a case based on a Commission referral, the Appeal Court considers these types of appeals on the basis of whether a miscarriage of justice occurred during the original proceedings. If a miscarriage of justice has occurred in the mind of the Appeal Court, they will overturn the conviction on that basis.
231. However, as part of the legislative response to the Cadder case, provision was included in the 2010 Act which gave a new power to the Appeal Court to reject a Commission reference, without having heard the appeal, if the Appeal Court considered that it was in the interests of justice to do so.

232. Lord Carloway’s recommendations, which are being implemented in the Bill seek to adjust the power of the Appeal Court given in the 2010 Act so that the Appeal Court retains an “interests of justice” test, but the point at which interests of justice are considered by the Appeal Court is adjusted. The provisions in the Bill will mean that the “interests of justice” test will operate as a part of how the Appeal Court considers an appeal based on a Commission reference rather than at the outset of a case being referred by the Commission i.e. the Appeal Court would no longer be able to reject a Commission reference on interests of justice grounds without having heard the appeal.

233. In his review, Lord Carloway indicated that he considered that appeal cases based on Commission referrals can on occasion raise wider issues in reaching a decision than first instance appeals and they can therefore include wider considerations than simply whether a miscarriage of justice had occurred. Both in his review and when he gave evidence to the Justice Committee on his report, Lord Carloway explained why he considered there was a need to ensure the Appeal Court had an explicit power so that they would consider appeals based on Commission referrals on the basis of whether a miscarriage of justice had occurred, and that it was in the interests of justice for the conviction to be quashed. On 29 November 2011 at the Justice Committee, Lord Carloway stated27:

“… The problem arises in this way. At the moment, if a case is referred by the SCCRC to the High Court it becomes an appeal—that is what it is. The appeal process can determine only whether there has been a miscarriage of justice in the original proceeding.

“If the court decides to allow the appeal because there has been a miscarriage of justice in the appeal process, and it has the same powers as it would have on appeal, which will include, for example, the power to order a retrial, it must either acquit the accused, because the appeal has been successful, or order a retrial.

“… When one talks about miscarriage of justice in this context it is important to remember that one is talking about a very limited point, which is whether something went wrong in the trial process.

“I will give one of the more obvious examples that we used. If the SCCRC refers a case, the appeal court has to decide whether there has been a miscarriage of justice but, in between those two stages, or perhaps even before the SCCRC has referred the case, the convicted person may have confessed to the crime. Either because the SCCRC did not know that or because it happened after the reference, that cannot be taken into account by the High Court in determining the outcome of the appeal. There would still have been a miscarriage of justice, but the person would have been proved to have confessed to the crime”.

---

234. Lord Carloway further explained that:

“…One situation in which we think the interests of justice test could be applied is when someone has deliberately not appealed in the first place. The SCCRC goes into that matter, but the question is ultimately this: should not it be the court that decides the interests of justice test in that setting? In other words, should not it lay down guidelines about when someone who has deliberately not appealed in the first place would be allowed to proceed by way of a reference from the SCCRC? It is an overriding interests of justice test that the SCCRC applies. I am recommending that, ultimately, the court should apply the same test in deciding the appeal.”

235. The Scottish Government considers that Lord Carloway’s recommendations on finality and certainty represent an appropriate development of the law to allow the Appeal Court to consider interests of justice as part of their consideration as to whether a miscarriage of justice has occurred in specific Commission referred cases. It accepts the examples above as showing that an “interests of justice” test needs to be applied by the court when hearing a referral from the SCCRC.

Consultation

236. Questions on Lord Carloway’s recommendations on finality and certainty were included as part of the Scottish Government’s main consultation exercise. Of those who responded to the consultation and offered a view on these recommendations, a majority were in favour.

Alternative approaches

237. Adjusting how the Appeal Court considers Commission referred cases requires primary legislative change and so there is no alternative approach available that would achieve the policy objective. Abolishing the “interests of justice” test altogether would not meet the policy objective.

PART 6 OF THE BILL - MISCELLANEOUS

AGGRAVATION AS TO PEOPLE TRAFFICKING (CHAPTER 1, SECTIONS 83 TO 85)

Policy objectives

238. The policy objectives are to require the courts to take into account any link between an offence and people-trafficking activity, and when dealing with a people trafficking offence, to take into account the fact that the person who committed it did so by abusing his or her position as a public official.
Key information

239. The underlying purpose, or motivation of committing, or conspiring to commit, any offence should be considered to be more serious when it takes place against a people trafficking background. The Scottish Government proposes a statutory aggravation to any criminal offence where it can be proved the offence had a connection with a people trafficking background.

240. Offences in connection with people trafficking are set out in:
   - Section 22 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 (as amended by section 46 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010).
   - Section 4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 as amended by section 46 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010.

241. There may be, however, other cases where, although the principal offence may concern for example tax fraud, benefit fraud, producing false documents, immigration offences, brothel keeping, and drugs offences etc., there is evidence that the offence has been committed against a background of people trafficking.

242. At present, there is no mechanism for recording where people trafficking forms the backdrop to the principal offence in a particular case. Where there is insufficient evidence to raise proceedings for a specific people trafficking offence (either in relation to section 22 of the 2003 Act or section 4 of the 2004 Act), there is no way of leading evidence to demonstrate to the court that the principal offence was committed against a background of people trafficking.

243. To meet obligations under Article 4.3 of the EU Directive on preventing and combating trafficking in human beings and protecting its victims and replacing Council Framework Decision 2002/629/JHA (2011/36/EU) the Scottish Government proposes to apply a statutory aggravation where a people trafficking offence has been committed by a public official while acting, or purporting to act, in the course of the official’s duties.

Consultation

244. The Equality and Human Rights Commission (“EHRC”) published the report of its Inquiry into Human Trafficking in Scotland in November 2011. Among other recommendations the EHRC recommended that a people trafficking background should be made a statutory aggravation in the sentencing of those convicted of related criminal offences. The EHRC’s recommendations were arrived at following a consultation process with organisations with an interest in tackling trafficking or supporting victims. The Scottish Government has considered this recommendation, and agrees with it.

Alternative approaches

245. There are no alternative approaches that would achieve the Scottish Government’s policy objective.

USE OF LIVE TELEVISION LINKS (CHAPTER 1, SECTION 86)

Policy objectives

246. The policy objective is to enable the use of live TV links for all diets in criminal proceedings with the exception of any diet where evidence is led as to the charge.

Key information

247. The policy objective is to enable the use of live TV links for all diets in criminal proceedings with the exception of any diet where evidence is led as to the charge.

248. The values of the Video Conferencing Project have been echoed by Lord Carloway and Sheriff Principal Bowen in their recent reviews. Both called upon the Scottish Government to examine expansion of the links between courts and those in custody.

249. In progressing its work, the Video Conferencing Project is currently unable to begin pilot work in the key area of first appearances in criminal cases being conducted via live TV link as this is currently prohibited by the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”).

250. Additionally, the Bill will also remove the current requirement upon the prosecutor to apply to the court for the use of TV links relating to a person’s first appearance from custody, and permit the prescription of which courts within a sheriffdom may use TV links.

251. A court will first have to determine, at an ad hoc hearing, whether TV links will be used in a case before a substantive hearing takes place and invite parties to make representations on this. In making a determination the court must consider whether the use of TV links is compatible with the interests of justice.

252. The court will have powers to decide, before or at a substantive hearing, whether it is in the interests of justice that the detained person is to appear in person and to postpone the hearing until the next day for their personal appearance. However, the court cannot postpone a hearing where the person makes their first appearance from police custody in order to prevent a person being unnecessarily or disproportionately detained.

---

30 See paragraph 1.0.19 of Lord Carloway’s Review on Scottish Criminal Law and Practice and paragraph 9.5 of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure.
253. The Bill expressly provides that TV links cannot be used for a hearing where evidence will be led as to the charge.

254. In expanding the existing provisions from the 2003 Act to include first appearances, the Bill will allow the Video Conferencing Project to make progress in this key area. First appearances currently account for a significant part of prisoner movement to courts. The key benefits of holding first appearances via a TV link will be to reduce the number of physical movements of detained persons, potentially reduce the time it takes for them to have their first court appearance, as well as a significant reduction in costs. This will be of particular benefit to women prisoners and young prisoners who are often transported across the country to court.

255. It should be noted that the extension of provisions from the 2003 Act to include first appearances does not mean these will be widely used immediately upon enactment. The Scottish Government is fully aware that the move to a wider use of TV links is a cultural change and that great care needs to be taken to ensure that any changes do not in any way jeopardise the efficient disposal of court business or, most importantly, the effective participation of a person in any hearing before the court.

256. That being the case, any use of these expanded provisions will be extensively piloted as part of the Video Conferencing Project. These pilot programmes will be developed in conjunction with all criminal justice partners including the Judiciary and the Law Society. Only once pilots have been successfully concluded will the use of TV links for first appearances become more widely used.

257. The Scottish Government is also keen to provide a safeguard to the expansion of use of TV links and is doing so by introducing a provision which allows the Lord Justice General to prescribe which courts can use this technology and for what diets. This will allow the Lord Justice General to control the roll-out of the use of TV links only allowing expansion when content that it is in the interests of justice to do so.

Consultation

258. The main criminal justice partners and legal bodies have been involved in discussion and development of the wider use of video technology within the justice system via interaction with the Video Conferencing Project. In relation to specific provisions within this Bill, the Scottish Government has worked closely with criminal justice partners in developing these provisions. No public consultation on the provisions has taken place.

Alternative approaches

259. There is no alternative approach to primary legislation that would achieve the Scottish Government’s policy objectives in this area.

260. It would be entirely possible to take no action and to leave the law as it stands. This, however, would prevent the use of TV links for first appearances in criminal proceedings even to be piloted and would defeat the aims of the Video Conferencing Project.
POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD (CHAPTER 2, SECTION 87)

Policy objectives

261. The policy objective is to establish a new mechanism for negotiating the pay and conditions of service of constables of the Police Service of Scotland.

Key information

262. The Police Negotiating Board (PNB) was established by statute in 1980 to negotiate the hours of duty; leave; pay and allowances; the issue, use and return of police clothing, personal equipment and accoutrements; and pensions of United Kingdom police officers. It makes recommendations on these matters to the Home Secretary, Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, and Scottish Ministers, who are responsible for setting out the pay and conditions of service of police officers through Regulations. The PNB also issues guidance on the interpretation of Regulations.

263. The PNB comprises an Official Side, representing police authorities, chief officers of police and Ministers, and a Staff Side representing police officers through their various rank-based staff associations. It has an independent Chair and Deputy Chair, appointed by the Prime Minister, who bring a neutral, independent voice to the negotiations and assist in bringing the parties to agreement, through support, informal mediation and conciliation. If the parties fail to agree on an issue, the matter can be referred to arbitration under the auspices of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service. More information is available at http://www.ome.uk.com/Police_Negotiating_Board.aspx together with the current Constitution. The current Scottish members of the PNB represent the Scottish Police Authority, the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland, Scottish Ministers, the Scottish Police Federation, Association of Scottish Police Superintendents and Scottish Chief Police Officer’s Staff Association.

264. On 1 October 2010, the Home Secretary launched the Independent Review of Police Officer and Staff Remuneration and Conditions, led by Tom Winsor. Its second report, published on 15 March 2012, recommended that the PNB should be abolished and replaced by an independent police officer pay review body by late 2014. The Senior Salaries Review Body would take responsibility for setting the pay of chief constables, deputy chief constables and assistant chief constables. This approach is now being taken forward in the UK Government’s Antisocial Behaviour, Crime and Policing Bill.

265. A pay review body is an independent body which gathers evidence from Government and organisations representing its review group, carries out independent research, and makes recommendations to Government on this basis.

266. The changes proposed by the UK Government to the UK-wide PNB require the Scottish Government to consider the future mechanism for determining police pay and conditions of service in Scotland. Following initial consultation with the Scottish bodies represented on the PNB, provisions are included in this Bill to establish a Police Negotiating Board for Scotland (“PNBS”). This will provide a collective bargaining mechanism for constables of the Police Service of Scotland in relation to the issues currently considered by the PNB.
267. The PNB is established under sections 61 and 62 of the Police Act 1996. Those provisions set out a broad framework for the Board and enable the Secretary of State to draw up its Constitution after consultation with the bodies to be represented. The provisions in the Bill follow a similar model. In particular, this approach allows the membership of the Board to be determined in the Constitution, which will be prepared by Scottish Ministers, so that the staff associations which are not established in statute have equal status with the Official Side and Scottish Police Federation.

268. The Bill inserts provisions establishing the PNBS into the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, and uses the terminology of that Act in setting out the issues on which the PNBS may make representations to Scottish Ministers. The requirement for Ministers to consult the PNBS before making Regulations is established by an amendment to section 54 of that Act. Ministers may require the PNBS to make representations about these issues within a set time period. The PNBS will also, if it wishes, be able to make representations about other matters relating to police governance, administration and conditions of service.

Consultation

269. In light of the proposal by the UK Government to abolish the PNB, the views of the members of the Scotland Standing Committee were sought on whether they wished to join an independent pay review body or retain a collective bargaining mechanism. All the members indicated that they preferred a collective bargaining approach. There will be further consultation with those members on the detailed arrangements for the PNBS, which will be set out in its Constitution.

Alternative approaches

270. The two options for obtaining recommendations on the pay and conditions of service of police officers are a collective bargaining mechanism or a pay review body. As noted above, all stakeholders in Scotland are in favour of retaining collective bargaining therefore no consideration has been given to the option of a pay review body.

271. It would be possible to take a different approach to the legislation, either by setting out more detailed arrangements in the Bill or by providing for this to be done in secondary legislation. However for the level of detail required, it is considered that a non-statutory Constitution is the best approach.

EFFECTS ON EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES, HUMAN RIGHTS, ISLAND COMMUNITIES, LOCAL GOVERNMENT, SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT ETC.

Equal opportunities

272. An Equality Impact Assessment (EQIA) has been carried out and will be published on the Scottish Government website at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/Recent.

273. The Bill will make significant changes to the law and practice of the Scottish criminal justice system. Consequently, the provisions in the Bill will, to varying degrees, affect all those who come into contact with the criminal justice system, from the accused, victims and witnesses to the police, COPFS and the SCS.

274. At every stage in the development of the policy underpinning the provisions in the Bill, there has been research and consultation with criminal justice partners, key stakeholders and the wider public. From Lord Carloway and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s expert reviews and the public consultations published by the Scottish Government to informal discussions with third sector organisations, policy officials have created an evidence base from which to develop and assess provisions against the equality duty and human rights legislation. Accordingly, the Bill’s provisions do not discriminate on the basis of age, disability, sex (including pregnancy and maternity), gender reassignment, sexual orientation, race or religion and belief.

275. Scottish Government Justice Analytical Services provided analytical expertise to facilitate a framing workshop for the EQIA process. This exercise enabled policy officials to identify relevant data and establish an accurate and informed context within which the reforms to the criminal justice system will operate and against which equality matters can be assessed.

276. The EQIA identified some potential impacts against the protected characteristics, both positive and negative. Where potential negative impacts were identified, measures were taken, or planned, to mitigate possible issues. None of the impacts identified were considered to pose significant issues for the legislation.

277. Investigative liberation may have a negative impact for victims of domestic violence, of whom 82% are female. However, the Bill provides the police with additional powers to attach special conditions when releasing a person from police custody on an undertaking or on investigative liberation, such as not to approach or contact a victim, and power to arrest a person who breaches such conditions.

278. The abolition of the requirement for corroboration will remove a potential barrier to the prosecution of domestic violence and sexual offences.

279. Consideration must be given to means of communication to prevent negative impacts for people with a mental disorder, both in terms of the passive presentation of information and of the active participation of an individual in proceedings at the police station. The service offered by Appropriate Adults is essential in supporting those with a mental illness, personality disorder or learning disability and provisions in the Bill on vulnerable persons seek to establish this important role in statute.

280. The provisions on child suspects will enhance safeguards in the criminal justice system to protect the rights of children and young people, whilst recognising the differing levels of support and autonomy required according to maturity.

281. Overall, the Scottish Government considers that the Bill will provide for a more efficient and effective criminal justice system whilst ensuring that additional support is available for those who need it and can be tailored to the specific needs of individuals.
Island communities

282. The provisions of the Bill apply equally to all communities in Scotland.

283. The reduction in the maximum period of detention from 24 hours to 12 hours may impact on the ability of the police to secure access to legal advice, or to an Appropriate Adult, in island communities within that period. In his Report, Lord Carloway noted that, according to the Solicitor Access Data Report published by the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (June 2011), people were more likely to waive their right of access to a solicitor at police stations in rural areas than in urban areas. Further research is required to determine the cause of this discrepancy; however, Lord Carloway recognised the role the internet may play in delivering access to a solicitor in the future, though only where it proves a suitable medium for the individual requiring advice. The Scottish Government consider that the introduction of a Letter of Rights will raise awareness of a person’s rights in custody, regardless of the person’s location. The Bill does not provide how legal advice must be provided which means that a decision can be made on the most practical and effective way in individual cases. The Scottish Government will continue to work with justice partners on methods of delivering access to legal advice.

284. Experience has shown that under the current arrangements the vast majority of vulnerable suspects have access to an Appropriate Adult in a reasonable timescale. In general, an Appropriate Adult is normally able to attend an interview within 90 minutes of receiving the call out. Whilst this may not always be the case in rural areas, the Scottish Government is not aware of significant difficulties in relation to the provision of the Appropriate Adult service in island communities. Following implementation of the Bill the Scottish Government will continue to work with key stakeholders including the SAAN (who collect and collate date on Appropriate Adults) to monitor progress and, if necessary, to identify any areas requiring additional work.

285. The provisions on the use of live TV link may have a positive impact on island communities. A detained person will be able to appear by live TV link in any hearing except where evidence will be led or presented, from a local destination at the place where the person is being detained. One of the main benefits envisaged is that prisoners may be able to appear in court sooner and that the costs and practical difficulties associated with transportation between an island and the court will be avoided.

Local government

286. The Scottish Government is satisfied that the Bill has minimal direct impact on local authorities. Any impact on the business of local authorities has been captured in the Financial Memorandum. COSLA and ADSW were consulted in relation to the provisions on child and vulnerable adult suspects.

287. Currently, child suspects under 16 years have the right to support from a parent, guardian or carer. A social worker will provide assistance where such a person cannot be found or the child does not wish such persons to be involved. The Bill extends this right to 16 and 17 year olds. Consultation with representatives of Police Scotland, ADSW and COSLA confirmed the Scottish Government’s view that in most cases a child is likely to seek support from a parent, family member or friend. However, there may be a requirement for increased support from social services as a consequence of the extension of the right to 16 and 17 year olds.
288. There are currently nineteen Appropriate Adult Services which operate on a non-statutory basis. Local authorities currently provide fourteen of these services from existing social work resources. They do not have separate budgets or dedicated local authority funding but subsume the role within the social work function as a discrete task. Four services receive dedicated funding from the local authorities in their catchment area and one service, which receives a small annual grant from the local authority, uses three volunteer Appropriate Adults who receive expenses only. The Scottish Government does not intend the provisions (which set out in statute the definition of a vulnerable person and the role of an appropriate adult in relation to arrest, custody and questioning of a vulnerable person) to interfere with the current service provision. It is expected that the services will continue to operate as at present (providing communication support to vulnerable suspects, accused, victims and witnesses aged 16 and over) and that there will be no additional costs to local authorities as a result of implementing the provisions. The Scottish Government does not intend to make any organisation statutorily responsible for providing the Appropriate Adult service at this time.

289. The removal of the requirement for corroboration is likely to result in an increase in the number of prosecutions, which will impact on local authorities on the basis that additional prosecutions are likely to lead to additional community sentences. This will have an impact on the staff resource required to supervise and support community sentences.

290. The proposal to increase the time-limit for the period in which a person can be remanded in custody before a sheriff and jury trial from 110 days to 140 days will increase the number of persons held on remand. This could result in the occupation of places in secure accommodation.

Sustainable development and environmental issues

291. The Bill will have no negative impact on sustainable development.

292. The potential environmental impact of the Bill has been considered. A pre-screening report confirmed that the Bill has minimal or no impact on the environment and consequently that a full Strategic Environmental Assessment does not need to be undertaken. It is therefore exempt for the purposes of section 7 of the Environmental Assessment (Scotland) Act 2005.

Human rights

293. The Scottish Government is satisfied that the provisions of the Bill are compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights, and are within the Parliament’s legislative competence. In particular, Lord Carloway’s Review sets out that it “sought to explore the law and practice in a number of other jurisdictions and the resulting jurisprudence flowing from the applicability of the European Convention.”

Arrest and custody (Part 1 of the Bill)

294. The Scottish Government acknowledges that the provisions on arrest and custody will engage a person’s rights under Article 5 of the ECHR. Detaining a person for questioning to further a criminal investigation is compatible with Article 5(1)(c) of the ECHR provided there are reasonable grounds for the suspicion and section 1 of the Bill reflects this. “Arrest” under the Bill is the mechanism by which a person is deprived of liberty and taken to a police station, where a decision will be made under section 7 on whether or not the person should continue to be held. Arrest is thus generally expected to amount to a temporary and relatively short deprivation of liberty. The Bill further safeguards Article 5 rights by providing (section 2(2)) that a person cannot be arrested in connection with an offence where the person has been charged, either by the police or prosecutor, in relation to that offence or another offence arising from the same circumstances.

295. Sections 11 and 12 of the Bill reduce the maximum time for which a person who has been arrested can be held in custody, from 24 hours to 12 hours. At the end of the 12 hour period a person must either be released from custody or charged with an offence. The Scottish Government considers that the procedure set out in the Bill for allowing an extension of the period from 6 to 12 hours meets the standard of “lawfulness” set by the ECHR. The provisions set out a procedure which describes the circumstances in which detention may be extended to 12 hours. The constable who authorises an extension must not have had any involvement with the investigation (thereby ensuring an objective view is given on whether an extension is justified) and must be of the rank of inspector or above.

296. Once charged, the police must consider whether the person’s continued detention is necessary and proportionate (section 10(2)). Article 5(3) of the ECHR provides that everyone arrested or detained in accordance with Article 5(1)(c) shall be brought promptly before a judge or other judicial officer. The maximum period for detention of 12 hours meets the “promptness” test that has been set down by the ECtHR. The Scottish Government has carefully considered the implications under Article 5 where a person is detained on a Friday afternoon and is not able to appear at court until the following Monday, or even a Tuesday if it is a court holiday. While this does not mean that the extension of the period of detention is itself a breach of Article 5, its operation in particular circumstances may lead to an individual’s Article 5 right to be brought before a court promptly being breached. However, Police Scotland, COPFS and the SCS are aware of the potential for incompatibility in particular cases depending on how the provisions are implemented. It is notable that the police are a public authority in terms of section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998 and must exercise the power to detain in a manner which is compatible with the ECHR. A duty is created in section 41 of the Bill which requires constables to take every precaution to ensure that a person is not detained unnecessarily. Article 5 rights will be safeguarded by these provisions.

Liberation from custody (Part 1 of the Bill)

297. A person should be released when it is not necessary to detain them whilst an investigation into the crime is on-going and the provisions in the Bill are aimed at securing the liberty of the individual where possible. The Bill makes provision (section 14) for conditions to be applied which will mitigate the risk of the person interfering with the proper conduct of the investigation and allow them to be released, rather than held in continued detention.

298. The Bill incorporates safeguards to ensure that any condition which is applied is necessary and proportionate to safeguard the proper conduct of the investigation (section 14(2)) and to prevent arbitrary decisions being made. The system provides for accountability for the imposition of conditions and a mechanism of review. Conditions must have a connection to the offence under investigation (section 14(2)) and they must be set by a constable of the rank of inspector (section 14(5)). Changes to conditions (whether adding, amending, or revoking them) must be authorised by an inspector who will have to be satisfied that the conditions are necessary and proportionate (section 16(7)). Conditions are subject to a maximum limit of 28 days (section 14(4)) however they must be kept under review during the investigation to ensure that they do not remain in place longer than necessary (section 16(3)). A person who has been released on conditions can apply to the court to assess the appropriateness of the conditions and this will be done in line with Convention rights (section 17). The court must satisfy itself that any conditions which have been set are in fact necessary and proportionate for the purpose for which it was imposed, and may remove any conditions which fail to meet the test or impose alternative conditions it considers are necessary and proportionate in the circumstances (section 17(3)).

Rights of suspects (Part 1 of the Bill)

299. The Bill strengthens existing protections by expressly setting out what information must be given to a person before interview, including a person’s right to access a solicitor, regardless of whether the person will be questioned by the police. The right applies to persons in police custody and to persons voluntarily attending a police station or other place for the purpose of police questioning. However, the right to a solicitor does not arise in all situations where a person is being questioned by the police. Police custody or its equivalent creates a need for protection against abusive coercion; the same is not the case for questioning at the locus or in a person’s home where the person remains at liberty. The Bill therefore provides for a right to access legal advice when person is taken into police custody or a person’s freedom of action has been significantly curtailed.

300. The ‘exceptional circumstances’ in which access to a solicitor during interview can be delayed mirror current law and are consistent with domestic and ECtHR jurisprudence.

301. In order for a right of access to a solicitor to be effective, a person (whether an adult or a child) must be capable of understanding the right and the consequences of waiver. For their own protection, the policy is that children aged under 16 years and (as per Lord Advocate Guidelines currently in place) vulnerable persons cannot waive a solicitor’s attendance during questioning. The position is more flexible for children who are 16 or 17 years old. The basic position is that they will have the right to support from a responsible adult and access to legal advice.

Post-charge questioning (Part 1 of the Bill)

302. The Scottish Government agrees with Lord Carloway’s view that Article 6 does not represent a barrier to the continuation of questioning after a person has been charged, or even after the accused has appeared in court. The provisions in the Bill contain safeguards to ensure that, where an application for post charge questioning is made, the rights of the person will be properly balanced against the wishes of the police to continue their investigation. The person’s rights will be protected by the factors the court requires to take into account in assessing the application (section 27(3)); by the right of representation; by the rights which will be afforded to the accused if an application is allowed, including legal advice (section 24(2)); and the limitations which can be placed on the duration and extent of any detention and questioning which takes place pursuant to a successful application (sections 27(6)(a) and 29(2)). The Convention rights are placed at the centre of the process and must be respected and considered throughout.
Corroboration and statements (Part 2 of the Bill)

303. Corroboration is not required by Article 6 of the ECHR. The fairness of the proceedings as a whole continues to be guaranteed under the Bill by a series of safeguards, foremost amongst which is the requirement that guilt should be established beyond reasonable doubt. The Bill further enhances the safeguards available by increasing the number of jurors that require to be in favour of a guilty verdict.

304. The Bill provides that previous statements made by an accused person in the course of questioning will no longer be inadmissible as evidence of a fact contained in the statement by reason of being hearsay. The purpose of the provision is to supersede the common law distinction in the application of the rule against hearsay as between incriminatory statements and exculpatory statements, so as to allow an accused to rely on their own previous exculpatory statements. However, the provision does not supersede any other objection to the admissibility of a previous statement. Accordingly there is no effect on rules regarding the admissibility of, for example, unfairly obtained statements. The Scottish Government do not consider that the provisions impact on a person’s rights under Article 6.

Solemn procedure (Part 3 of the Bill)

Pre-trial time limits (section 65)

305. Although the Bill increases the maximum length of time that a person can be remanded in custody pending a trial on indictment in the sheriff court from 110 days to 140 days, the Scottish Government does not consider that the increase is incompatible with the right guaranteed by Article 5(3) to a trial within a reasonable time. The increase is necessary to accommodate two significant changes that are designed to improve the efficiency of proceedings on indictment in the sheriff court. The first is an increase from 15 days to 29 days in the period that must elapse between the service of the indictment and the first diet. This allows sufficient time for the prosecution and defence to communicate and to draw up a joint record of their state of preparation. The second is a change in the procedure for fixing trial diets, which will henceforth only be fixed by the court at the first diet. This is designed to reduce the number of adjournments of trials and the inconvenience and disruption consequent on such adjournments. The increase brings the time limit for sheriff and jury proceedings in to line with that already applying in the High Court.

Duty to communicate (section 66)

306. The Scottish Government does not consider that such disclosure of information as is necessary to meet the requirement to communicate and draw up the written record of the parties’ state of preparation in proceedings on indictment in the sheriff court involves any incompatibility with the right of the accused to a fair trial. The information that requires to be disclosed for this purpose does not become available as evidence against the person, and is in any event the same information about the state of preparation that the sheriff is required to call for at first diet in terms of section 71(1)(a).
Appeals and Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC) (Part 5 of the Bill)

Extending certain time limits (sections 76 and 77)

307. The Scottish Government does not consider that the prescribing of the test to be applied by the High Court on an application to extend the time allowed for appealing against conviction or sentence involves any incompatibility with the Article 6 rights of prospective appellants. The provisions in question have no effect on the conditions of admissibility of appeals only the grounds on which certain conditions involving time limits may be relaxed. The aim (which is in accordance with the ‘reasonable time’ requirement in Article 6) is to reduce the number of late appeals, while recognising that there may be exceptional circumstances that justify allowing an appeal to proceed late. Any prospective appellant in solemn proceedings continues to be entitled to have a decision to refuse an extension reconsidered by the court, and the refusal of an extension does not prevent a subsequent application to the SCCRC.

308. The Scottish Government considers that it is compatible with the Article 6 rights of prospective appellants that applications to extend the time allowed for appealing against conviction or sentence should be dealt with in chambers, and that they should generally be dealt with without parties being heard. Such arrangements are compatible with the requirements of Article 6 as it is applied in relation to appeal proceedings, particularly since such applications only arise when the prescribed time limit has been missed, since the court does not hear the prosecutor in opposition to the application, and since the court has available to it both a statement of reasons for the lateness of the appeal, and a statement of the proposed grounds of appeal.

References by the SCCRC (section 82)

309. The Scottish Government does not consider that the provisions requiring the High Court not to quash a conviction or a sentence on a SCCRC reference unless it considers that it is in the interest of justice, is incompatible with a person’s rights under Article 6. The provision reflects the fact that a SCCRC reference is an extraordinary process, involving an exception to the principle of finality in criminal proceedings, and that it is appropriate that wider considerations should be applied than in an ordinary appeal. The High Court will be required to act compatibly with the ECHR in its assessment of where the interests of justice lie.

Miscellaneous (Part 6 of the Bill)

Use of live television link (section 86)

310. The Scottish Government considers that the limitations and conditions the provisions place on the use of live TV links are sufficient to guarantee compatibility with the rights of accused persons under both Article 5(3) and Article 6 of the ECHR. The use of TV links will be restricted to categories of hearing that have been specified for that purpose by the Lord Justice-General, and it will continue to be the case that an accused cannot be required to participate in a trial by means of a TV link. The provisions do not detract from the right of the person to consult in private with his or her legal representative. No substantive hearing can take place with the person required to participate by TV link unless the court has given a direction to that effect. Such a direction can only be made if the parties have been given an opportunity to make representations, and if the court is satisfied that the use of a TV links is not contrary to the interests of justice. Likewise, a court will be required to terminate the use of a TV link if at any point it considers that it is in the interests of justice for the accused to appear in person. The Scottish Government considers that the ‘interests of justice’ test will require the court to be satisfied that the use of a TV link is compatible with the rights of the accused under Article 5(3) and Article 6.
CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL

DELEGATED POWERS MEMORANDUM

PURPOSE

1. This Memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government in accordance with Rule 9.4A of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, in relation to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. It describes the purpose of each of the subordinate legislation provisions in the Bill and outlines the reasons for seeking the proposed powers. This memorandum should be read in conjunction with the Explanatory Notes and Policy Memorandum for the Bill.

2. The contents of this Memorandum are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Scottish Parliament.

Outline of Bill provisions

3. The Bill seeks to support the aims set out in the Policy Memorandum by introducing reforms to modernise and enhance the efficiency of the Scottish criminal justice system. The provisions in the Bill take forward a range of the Scottish Government’s key justice priorities. Some of these provisions have been developed from the recommendations of two independent reviews: Lord Carloway’s review of criminal law and practice and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s review of sheriff and jury procedure. The Scottish Government sought views on these recommendations in two separate consultations. A further consultation was also carried out on whether additional safeguards may be required if the requirement for corroboration is removed.

4. The Bill is in seven parts:

- Part 1 (Arrest and Custody) includes provisions on the powers of the police to arrest, hold in custody and question a person who is suspected of committing an offence. This part also provides for the rights of such persons in custody and makes specific provision for vulnerable persons and children.

- Part 2 (Corroboration and Statements) provides for the abolition of the corroboration rule in criminal proceedings as well as the admissibility of mixed and exculpatory statements.

http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/4794
http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2010/06/10993251/0
http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/4794
http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/4628
Part 3 (Solemn Procedure) makes a number of amendments to the solemn procedure set out in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) such as imposing a duty on parties in criminal proceedings to communicate, increasing the length of time for which an accused person can be remanded before having to be brought to trial from 110 to 140 days, and increasing the jury majority required for a guilty verdict.

Part 4 (Sentencing) increases the maximum sentence for handling offensive weapons offences, places a specific duty on the court to consider whether it is appropriate to punish an offender for committing an offence while on early release, and increases the flexibility for different levels of court to consider imposing a punishment on such offenders.

Part 5 (Appeals and SCCRC) amends the 1995 Act to make changes to appeal procedures in the High Court and adjusts how the Appeal Court will consider Scottish Criminal Case Review Commission referrals.

Part 6 (Miscellaneous) creates a statutory aggravation of people trafficking which will apply in cases where an accused commits an offence connected with people trafficking. This part also makes provision to enable the use of TV links by courts and establishes and sets out the functions for a Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

Part 7 (Final Provisions) contains general and ancillary provisions.

Rationale for subordinate legislation

5. The Bill contains a number of new delegated powers provisions which are explained in more detail below.

6. The delegated powers conferred by the Bill are either of a procedural or technical nature or relate to matters which, because of their nature, require a flexible procedure and thus it is felt appropriate that they be dealt with by subordinate legislation.

7. In deciding whether these provisions should be specified on the face of the Bill or left to subordinate legislation, the Scottish Government has carefully considered the importance of each matter against the need to:

- Strike the right balance between the importance of the issue and providing flexibility to respond to changing circumstances with the benefit of experience, without the need for primary legislation;

- Anticipate the unexpected, which might otherwise frustrate the purpose of the provision in primary legislation;

- Make proper use of valuable Parliamentary time;

- Ensure sufficient flexibility to respond to changing circumstances and to make changes; and
This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 35) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013

- Allow detailed administrative arrangements to be kept up to date with the basic structures and principles set out in the primary legislation.

Delegated Powers

QUESTIONING A PERSON WHO HAS BEEN OFFICIALLY ACCUSED

Section 28(3)(a) – Power to prescribe the form to be used for an application to the court for permission to question a person officially accused of committing an offence.

Power conferred on: The High Court of Justiciary
Power exercisable by: Act of Adjournal
Parliamentary procedure: Laid only

Provision

8. Generally, once a person has been officially accused of an offence (i.e. charged with it by a constable or accused of it in a complaint, petition or indictment) anything that the person may say to the police about the offence in response to questioning will be inadmissible as evidence. Section 27 will allow the police or prosecutor to apply to the appropriate court for authorisation to question a person about an offence after the person has been officially accused of committing it and anything the person says in response to questioning so authorised will be admissible evidence (unless the statement is inadmissible for a reason other than its having been made after the person was officially accused).

9. Section 28(3)(a) provides that the form to be used when making a written application under section 27 is to be in any form that may be prescribed by Act of Adjournal.

Reason for taking this power

10. Being able to specify the form for an application gives the courts a way of specifying what information they will require when considering a section 27 application and how they would like to see that information set out. It is typical for court forms to be prescribed by Act of Adjournal. It would be inappropriate to prescribe the form by primary legislation, not least because it would be a poor use of Parliament’s time to deal with this level of administrative detail. In any case, the courts are better placed than the Parliament to decide what information will be required for the assessment of a section 27 application.

Choice of procedure

11. Acts of Adjournal are subject to the default laying requirement under section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010. The contents and layout of court forms is not something that the Parliament needs to scrutinise closely.
12. Section 28(3)(a) provides that the form to be used the police are to use when making a written application under section 27 is to be any form that may be prescribed by Act of Adjournal.

VULNERABLE PERSONS

Section 34(1)(a) and (b) and section 34(2) – Power to make further provision, by regulation, in relation to who is to be considered a vulnerable person; the type of support they are to receive; who may provide that support; and what training, qualifications or experience are required.

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulation
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

13. Section 33 of the Bill provides that where a constable (who may be advised by a police custody and security officer) assesses a person in police custody, who is age 18 or over, as vulnerable due to a mental disorder, they must notify an Appropriate Adult (AA) (though this term is not used in the Bill it is commonly understood in practice) that the vulnerable person requires assistance, as soon as reasonably practicable, to understand what is going on and to facilitate effective communication between them and the police.

14. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 34(1) give the Scottish Ministers powers to amend by regulation: the category of person to be considered vulnerable who will require support to assist them to communicate effectively with the police; and the type of support that is to be provided (as set out in section 33(1)(c) and (3)). These powers would involve a change to primary legislation.

15. Subsection (2) allows the Scottish Ministers to specify by regulation who may be considered a suitable person to provide the support detailed in section 33(3) and what training, qualifications or experience is necessary to undertake this support role.

Reason for taking this power

16. There is no immediate intention to use the powers described above in relation to section 34(1)(a) and (b), which are designed to allow for the identification of new conditions which mean that a person requires assistance to facilitate effective communication, or the identification of other appropriate support measures for vulnerable persons. However, these powers will provide the flexibility to allow the Scottish Ministers to do so if it is found to be necessary in the future, without enacting primary legislation.

17. In relation to section 34(2), the Scottish Government does not intend the legislation to interfere with the role of an AA and expect that the police will continue to be able to request AA support for vulnerable persons and children aged 16 and 17 years, and also for victims, and witnesses aged 16 and over, through the current non-statutory route. There is therefore no immediate intention to prescribe who may be an AA or what training, qualifications or experience they should have. However, this power will provide the flexibility to allow the Scottish Ministers to do so, if it is found to be necessary in the future to address any failings or gaps in service provision, without enacting primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

18. These powers are subject to the affirmative procedure. The Scottish Government considers this is appropriate to allow the Scottish Parliament to give a high level of scrutiny to the detail of any changes to primary legislation.

SOLEMN PROCEDURE

Section 66 (new section 71C(6) of the 1995 Act) – Power to prescribe the form, content and manner of lodging of the written record of the compulsory business meeting, to be set out in an Act of Adjournal.

- Power conferred on: The High Court of Justiciary
- Power exercisable by: Act of Adjournal
- Parliamentary procedure: Laid only

Provision

19. The Bill establishes a requirement on the prosecution and defence to communicate before the first diet and to jointly prepare a written record of their state of preparation. A written record of this meeting must be prepared and lodged with the court prior to the first diet so that the sheriff may have regard to it. The new section 71C(6) gives a power to prescribe by Act of Adjournal (a) the form of the written record; (b) its content; and (c) the manner of its lodging.

Reason for taking this power

20. A prescribed set of requirements for the written record will be of assistance in providing guidance to the prosecution and defence agents who have to work together to prepare them, and to the sheriffs who will be using them to establish the efforts parties have made to achieve a proper state of preparedness. There are thousands of sheriff and jury trials every year; it would be very undesirable for the written record to take excessively diverse forms – though the provision does allow a degree of flexibility.

Choice of procedure

21. Detailed matters relating to court procedure are not considered appropriate to be included in primary legislation. Such administrative matters can appropriately be dealt with by the High Court by Act of Adjournal rather than being subject to any Parliamentary procedure (see section 305 of the 1995 Act, which makes provision about Acts of Adjournal generally). The power is subject only to the default laying requirement under section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010.
Section 67 (new section 83B(1)(a) of the 1995 Act) – Power to provide that the form of the minute continuing a trial diet or adjourned diet from sitting day to sitting day is to be set out in an Act of Adjournal

Power conferred on:  The High Court of Justiciary
Power exercisable by:  Act of Adjournal
Parliamentary procedure:  Laid only

Provision

22. The new section 83B(1) provides that a trial diet or, if it is adjourned, the adjourned diet, may be continued from sitting day to sitting day without it actually having been commenced. Under the new section 83B(1)(a) it may be continued in such a way by means of a minute to be signed by the sheriff clerk; the form of the minute may be prescribed by Act of Adjournal. The new section 83B(1)(b) provides that it may be thus continued up to a maximum number of sitting days as the minute may have prescribed.

Reason for taking this power

23. The new section 83B(1) allows for administrative efficiency in arranging when a diet may be held. To allow this administrative efficiency there must be a recognised form of minute by which diets may be continued. The power allows this recognised form of minute to be prescribed.

Choice of procedure

24. Detailed matters relating to court procedure are not considered appropriate to be included in primary legislation. Such administrative matters can appropriately be dealt with by the High Court by Act of Adjournal rather than being subject to any Parliamentary procedure (see section 305 of the 1995 Act, which makes provision about Acts of Adjournal generally). The power is subject only to the default laying requirement under section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010.

AGgravATION BY PEOPLE TRAFFICKING

Section 85 Meaning of expressions used – Power to modify subsections (1) to (3) of that section, to modify the meaning of the expressions “people trafficking offence”, the “public official” and “international organisation”.

Power conferred on:  The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by:  Regulation
Parliamentary procedure:  Negative procedure

Provision

25. Section 83 of the Bill makes provision about a statutory aggravation which applies in cases where an accused commits an offence connected with people trafficking and sets out the circumstances in which an offence can be regarded to have been aggravated by a connection with people trafficking. Section 84 makes similar provision about a statutory aggravation which applies in cases where a public official, acting or purporting to act in the course of his duties commits a people trafficking offence. Section 85 defines the terms “people trafficking offences”, “public official” and “international organisation” for the purposes of sections 83 and 84, and enables Scottish ministers to modify the meaning of these expressions.

Reason for taking this power

26. The power is intended to ensure that the statutory aggravation by people trafficking can be taken into account in respect of any new people trafficking offences created by other legislation, or if the current people trafficking offences are modified. The power also allows for the definition of “public official” and “international organisation” to be modified if it is considered appropriate to do so, for example, in light of experience of the statutory aggravation operating in the courts.

Choice of procedure

27. It is anticipated that any changes to these sections would in general be a consequence of changes in other legislation and the negative procedure would be appropriate.

ANCILLARY

Section 88 – Power to make ancillary regulations

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulation
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative if amends primary legislation, otherwise negative

Provision

28. Section 88(1) of the Bill enables the Scottish Ministers to make such supplemental, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider necessary or expedient for the purposes of, or in consequence of, or for giving full effect to, any provision made by or under the Bill.

Reason for taking this power

29. This power is necessary to allow flexibility as provisions in the Bill are brought into force. The power is limited to the extent that it can only be used if Scottish Ministers consider it necessary or expedient in connection with the coming into force of any provision of the Bill.

Choice of procedure

30. Regulations made under this section which contain a provision which adds to, omits or replaces any part of an Act are subject to affirmative procedure. Otherwise, Regulations made under this section are subject to negative procedure. This approach is normal for ancillary powers of this type.
Section 90 – Commencement

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Laid only

Provision

31. Section 90(2) enables the Scottish Ministers to appoint days on which the provisions in the Bill come into force (other than sections contained in Part 7 of the Bill which come into force on the day after Royal Assent). An order may include such transitional, transitory or saving provision as the Scottish Ministers consider necessary or expedient in connection with the coming into force of the provisions.

Reason for taking power

32. The power is necessary to enable Scottish Ministers to appropriately commence the provisions in the Bill.

Choice of procedure

33. The power is subject only to the default laying requirement under section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislation Reform (Scotland) Act 2010. This is typical for commencement orders.
Justice Committee

3rd Report, 2014 (Session 4)

Stage 1 Report on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Published by the Scottish Parliament on 6 February 2014
CONTENTS

Remit and membership

Report 1

Summary of recommendations 1

Introduction 8

Background to the Bill 9
- Cadder vs HM Advocate 9
- Lord Carloway’s Review of Scottish Criminal Law and Practice 10
- Sheriff Principal Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure 13
- Provisions in the Bill 14

Part 1: Arrest and Custody 16
- Arrest by police 16
- Procedure following arrest 23
- Custody: person not officially accused 25
- Custody: person officially accused 30
- Questioning 32
- Child and vulnerable suspects 37

Part 2: (Corroboration and Statements) and section 70 (Guilty Verdict) 44
- Introduction 44
- Lord Carloway’s Review of Scottish Criminal Law and Practice 44
- The provisions in the Bill 46
- General summary of evidence received 48
- Investigation, prosecution and quality of evidence 51
- Dilution and complexity of the corroboration rule 59
- Attitudes to sexual offences and domestic abuse 60
International comparisons 62
Retrospective application of abolition of requirement for corroboration 63
Requirement for corroboration as a safeguard 64
Additional safeguards 69
The case for further consideration 74
Committee’s conclusions 76
Section 62 - Statements by accused 78
Committee consideration 80

Part 3: Solemn procedure 80
  Management of sheriff and jury cases: background 80
  Pre-trial time limits 82
  Duty of parties to communicate 84
  First diets 89

Parts 4, 5 and 6: Sentencing, appeals, Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission, people trafficking and the police negotiating board. 90
  Sentencing (weapons offences) 90
  Sentencing (offenders on early release) 91
  Appeals 91
  Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission 95
  People trafficking 97
  Police Negotiating Board for Scotland 99

Policy and Financial Memorandums 100

General principles of the Bill 101
Justice Committee

Remit and membership

Remit:

To consider and report on:
a) the administration of criminal and civil justice, community safety and other matters falling within the responsibility of the Cabinet Secretary for Justice; and
b) the functions of the Lord Advocate other than as head of the systems of criminal prosecution and investigation of deaths in Scotland.

Membership:

Christian Allard
Roderick Campbell
John Finnie
Christine Grahame (Convener)
Alison McInnes
Margaret Mitchell
Elaine Murray (Deputy Convener)
John Pentland
Sandra White

Committee Clerking Team:

Irene Fleming
Joanne Clinton
Ned Sharratt
Christine Lambourne
SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The Committee accepts that there might be some benefit in simplifying the powers of arrest along the lines proposed in Part 1 of the Bill. However, we do have concerns regarding the possible consequences of this change and we therefore make a number of recommendations aimed at improving the provisions in Part 1 of the Bill under the relevant sections below.

2. The Committee has concerns that use of the term ‘arrested’ in relation to a suspect who has been taken into police custody for questioning but has not been charged may, amongst members of the public, be more suggestive of guilt than is currently the case for a suspect who is ‘detained’ for questioning. We consider the terminology in the Bill concerning arrest to be somewhat confusing and are not convinced that members of the public, the accused or the media will be able to distinguish between a ‘person officially accused’ and a ‘person not officially accused’. We also have similar concerns relating to the proposal to allow the police to ‘de-arrest’ a person when the grounds for arrest no longer exist (see paragraph 120 of this report).

3. While we accept assurances from the police that, as with the current position, they do not intend to release a suspect’s name to the media until they have been formally charged with an offence, i.e. ‘officially accused’, we consider that every effort should be made to ensure that the reputation of the accused is not detrimentally affected by these provisions. The Committee considers that the issue of suspects’ anonymity is problematic, but merits further and careful consideration.

4. The Committee is concerned that police officer training and adaptations to the new i6 programme required to effectively implement the provisions in Part 1 of the Bill may place a significant burden on an already stretched police service and individual officers. While we accept the Cabinet Secretary’s assurances that sufficient time will be given to Police Scotland to implement a training programme and to update the new ICT system before giving effect to the Bill, we ask the Scottish Government to ensure that adequate resources are made available to Police Scotland to carry out these tasks without further strain on its shrinking budget.

5. The Committee notes that the Bill does not give effect to Lord Carloway’s recommendation that ‘arrest’ be defined in the Bill. We further note that there was no consensus from witnesses as to whether arrest should be defined and, if so, whether this legislation was the best vehicle to do so. On balance, the Committee is not content with the Scottish Government’s decision to exclude such a definition in the Bill.

6. The Committee notes the Scottish Government’s position that the power of arrest contained in the Bill combined with common law rules would be sufficient in allowing the police to arrest a person attempting or conspiring to commit an offence. However, we heard from the police that they were not yet convinced by the reassurances given, and from the SHRC that it would have serious concerns if the police were able to arrest a person “who has done nothing contrary to the criminal law”\(^1\). We therefore call on the Scottish Government to further engage with both the police and the SHRC with a view to providing adequate reassurances on this matter.

7. The Committee notes the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward an amendment to allow a person to be quickly released from arrest (‘de-arrested’) when the grounds for arrest no longer exist. While we recognise that there may be situations where de-arrest could be a reasonable option, we have concerns that this should not lead to a situation where people are arrested without a proper assessment by police officers as to whether such action is appropriate. We would therefore welcome further details of the types of situation and expected frequency in which de-arrest would be used. The Committee also has concerns regarding use of the term ‘de-arrest’ and consider the words ‘released’ or ‘liberated’ to be more appropriate.

8. The Committee welcomes the recent introduction of a ‘Letter of Rights’ for those in custody, in accordance with the EU Directive on the Right of Information in Criminal Proceedings. We ask the Scottish Government to respond to the suggestion of some witnesses that information to be given to suspects at a police station should be provided both verbally and in writing with a view to ensuring that they clearly understand their rights.

9. The Committee heard a divergence in views amongst witnesses regarding the appropriate maximum detention limit. However, we note the statistics provided by Police Scotland relating to the period of 4 June to 1 July 2013 which show that, although the majority of persons (80.4%) were detained for up to six hours, a not unsubstantial number (19.2%) were detained for between six and 12 hours. Given these statistics, there are mixed views on the Committee as to whether detention beyond six hours is necessary.

10. We note the Cabinet Secretary’s commitment to consider whether the detention limit should be extended in exceptional circumstances. While we recognise that there may be situations, particularly in relation to complex and serious crimes, where it may be necessary to consider extending the detention limit, we remain to be convinced whether this is really necessary, particularly when, under the Bill, the police would have the option of releasing a person on investigative liberation. We therefore seek further information on the types of ‘exceptional circumstances’ in which the Scottish Government envisages that an extension to the detention limit would be granted, how often they are likely to be applied for, who would approve any extension, and how the Scottish Government intends to ensure that such extensions do not become commonplace over time.

11. The Committee seeks assurances that investigative liberation will not have an unnecessary impact on the suspect’s private life, whilst allowing the police to conduct complex investigations which could not be completed while the person is initially detained. We note that a person may apply to the courts to have any conditions imposed either removed or altered, which we believe is a welcome protection against disproportionate conditions being applied.

12. The Committee also notes suggestions from victims’ groups that the Bill should include a specific requirement for complainers to be notified of a suspect’s release on investigative liberation and of any conditions attached, however, we are unsure as to whether such a requirement needs to be placed on the face of the Bill. We ask the Scottish Government to work with the COPFS to ensure that, where they may be at risk, complainers are always informed timeously of the suspect’s release and of any relevant conditions applied.

13. The Committee notes that there are likely to be resource implications relating to investigative liberation.

14. Like many witnesses, the Committee is concerned that suspects are sometimes held in custody for unacceptably long periods before their first appearance in court. We believe that court sitting times must be extended to reduce such lengthy periods in custody and the backlog of cases. We also recognise that there are implications for police time and resources in holding people in custody.

15. We are not however convinced that specifying time-limits for periods in custody in legislation is necessary at this stage, particularly when a working group is actively considering options for Saturday courts. We recommend that this work be completed in a timeous manner to allow any recommendations of the working group to be implemented as quickly as possible. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s assurances that he will “take a keen interest in the issue” and requests details of the timescale for meetings and completion of the work of the group.

16. The Committee is content that sufficient safeguards are provided in the Bill regarding liberation of those officially accused from custody, in particular the right to apply to the sheriff to have any conditions imposed by the police reviewed.

17. The Committee notes the different experiences of witnesses from the legal profession in relation to when the caution is given to suspects by the police under current arrangements. We therefore ask the Scottish Government to respond to the specific suggestion made by the Faculty of Advocates that the Bill should specify that the caution, which must take place not more than one hour before any interview, should also be repeated at the commencement of the interview.

18. The Committee welcomes the extension of the right of access to a solicitor to all suspects held in police custody, regardless of whether the police intend to question the suspect, and that suspects are entitled to face-to-face contact with a solicitor. We recognise that there would be difficulties in specifying in the Bill that a suspect should be entitled to receive assistance from a solicitor of their choice, particularly in the more remote areas of Scotland, and we therefore agree with the Scottish Government on this matter.

19. The Committee is content with the procedure specified in the Bill allowing a constable to question a person not officially accused following arrest.

20. The Committee is persuaded that post-charge questioning may be required in certain complex and lengthy investigations. We also note that the majority of witnesses were content that the requirement on the police to apply to the court for approval for post-charge questioning provides sufficient judicial oversight to minimise the risk of miscarriages of justice.

21. However, post-charge questioning should only be used when absolutely necessary. To this end, we ask the Scottish Government to maintain a record of the circumstances and frequency in which post-charge questioning is used, including details of the applications that are refused by the courts. We further seek confirmation from the Scottish Government that existing rules providing that no adverse inference may be drawn from a suspect’s refusal to answer police questions would apply equally to post-charge questioning.

22. The Committee notes that the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill defines a child as a person up to the age of 18. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to explain why there is inconsistency between the protections for under-18s in this Bill compared with this recent legislation.

23. The Committee has concerns regarding the lack of consistency in use of the terms “welfare”, “best interests” and “well-being” of the child in this and other legislation. While we make no comment on which is the most appropriate term, we ask the Scottish Government to ensure consistency in the language used in section 42 of the Bill.
24. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s undertaking to give consideration to raising the age of criminal responsibility and would welcome regular updates on this work.

25. The Committee has concerns that the definition of vulnerable person in the Bill may not capture all individuals needing additional support when in custody. We also note comments from the police that there are difficulties in identifying vulnerable persons. We therefore ask the Scottish Government to give further consideration to the definition of vulnerable persons in the Bill and to reflect on whether this is consistent with the definition in the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2014. We also ask that the Scottish Government ensures that sufficient resources are provided to the police to undergo training in this important area.

26. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to respond to concerns raised by witnesses that its decision not to place the provision of appropriate adult services in the Bill could lead to a lack of funding by local authorities already facing significant financial challenges.

27. The majority of Committee Members are of the view that the case has not been made for abolishing the general requirement for corroboration and recommend that the Scottish Government consider removing the provisions from the Bill.

28. The Committee is convinced that, if the general requirement for corroboration continues to be considered, this should only occur following an independent review of what other reforms may be needed to ensure that the criminal justice system as a whole contains appropriate checks and balances.

29. The majority of Committee Members do not believe, in the event that the requirement for corroboration is abolished, that concerns relating to the need for further reform can be adequately explored during the passage of the Bill. The Cabinet Secretary’s proposal that the commencement of the provisions abolishing the requirement for corroboration be subject to a parliamentary procedure requires further explanation and consideration, which the Committee requires before Stage 2.

30. The Cabinet Secretary’s letter dated 4 February 2014 came in the late stages of consideration of this report, and therefore cannot form part of this report. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to provide, prior to the Stage 1 debate, further information on any review of additional safeguards (including the proposed remit, who might be involved, likely timescales and options for implementing recommendations).

31. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to provide more information on how any requirement for supporting evidence would differ from the current need for corroboration.

---

2 Margaret Mitchell, Alison McInnes and John Finnie believe that this review should be undertaken by a Royal Commission or the Scottish Law Commission.
32. The Committee also notes the Cabinet Secretary’s willingness to consider placing a revised ‘prosecutorial test’ on the face of legislation. The Committee accepts that such a step might form part of new checks and balances in response to the proposed abolition of the requirement for corroboration, but recommends that the matter should be included for full consideration in any review process.

33. The Committee is fully aware of continuing concerns relating to how the justice system responds to cases of rape, domestic abuse and other offences which often happen in private. Members note ongoing efforts to improve the situation for victims of such offences and agree that further steps need to be taken, including measures aimed at addressing low prosecution and conviction rates.

34. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to actively review all evidence relating to how improvements with regard to offences such as rape and domestic abuse may be achieved. This should include consideration of public attitudes as well as the justice system. In relation to the latter, all stages must be included, from initial contact with the police to the giving of evidence in court (e.g. whether victims of such offences should have access to legal advice and support where their personal or medical details may be revealed in court).

35. The Committee agrees that, if the requirement for corroboration is abolished, it should not apply retrospectively.

36. On balance, the Committee considers that there is a case for a review of the role of hearsay evidence in the criminal justice system but that this should be included in any wider review of the law of evidence.

37. On balance, the Committee accepts the need to extend the pre-trial time limits as proposed in the Bill. However, we do have some reservations as to whether the proposal to extend the current 110 day limit within which the trial of an accused person held in custody must commence to 140 days is proportionate. We are therefore pleased that the Scottish Government plans to monitor the implementation of this proposal, in particular to ensure that trials are started as soon as possible and that any extensions to the 140 day limit are rare. We seek updates from the Scottish Government on any findings and outcomes arising from its monitoring of implementation of this pre-trial limit.

38. While the Committee considers that achieving effective communication must, at least in part, be dependent upon the availability of adequate resources (discussed further below), we are persuaded of the potential benefits of this measure, in particular, in reducing the possibility of victims and witnesses having to attend court when their cases are not ready to proceed.

39. The Committee supports the proposals in the Bill for statutory communication between the prosecution and defence to take place after the indictment is served and for there to be flexibility in the method of communication to be used.

40. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to work with the COPFS and the Law Society of Scotland in seeking to resolve current difficulties in rolling out the secure email system to all defence solicitors, with a view to resolving such difficulties by the time the Bill comes into force.

41. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s commitment to review whether the Bill could usefully be amended to allow individual written records on the state of preparedness of cases to be submitted by the defence and prosecution.

42. The Committee agrees with witnesses that both the prosecution and defence solicitors must be adequately resourced for the duty to communicate to work effectively as planned. We note that the Scottish Government has worked with criminal justice partners to anticipate the costs and savings that may arise from this proposal, but we recommend that the Scottish Government closely monitors the resource implications during implementation to ensure that resources are in place where and when needed.

43. The Committee notes that the Bill does not impose any sanctions if the written record is not submitted timeously.

44. The Committee agrees that the proposal in the Bill for a trial only to be scheduled once the sheriff dealing with the first diet is satisfied that the case is ready to proceed will reduce inconvenience to witnesses, and give certainty to both the prosecution and defence regarding the date of the trial.

45. The Committee welcomes the Scottish Government’s continued focus on knife crime and its efforts to change the culture of carrying knives. The Committee is content with the increase in maximum sentences for offences relating to the possession of a knife or offensive weapon from four to five years.

46. The Committee welcomes the provisions in sections 72 and 73 on sentencing offenders on early release.

47. The Committee welcomes the policy objective to speed up appeals and understands that there are practical reasons why appeals ought to be lodged timeously. We note the concerns that, in applying a higher test for allowing late appeals, cases with merit may not be heard unless they meet an exceptional circumstances test. We ask the Scottish Government to consider the Law Society of Scotland’s recommendation that sections 76 and 77 be redrafted with an emphasis on the interests of justice. The Committee also notes that Lord Carloway made other recommendations in relation to the speeding up of appeals.
48. The Committee welcomes the removal of the gate-keeping role of the High Court when dealing with referrals from the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC).

49. However, we are concerned that the Bill retains the High Court’s interests of justice test, albeit during the determination of an appeal resulting from a referral from the SCCRC. Given that, according to Lord Carloway, despite the occasional lapse, the SCCRC has been a “conspicuous success in discharging its duties conscientiously and responsibly”, we are not convinced that the arguments for the High Court replicating the duties of the SCCRC in this respect have been made. Consequently, we recommend that the High Court should only be able to rule on whether there has been a miscarriage of justice in these cases, and if there has been, the appeal should be allowed.

50. The Committee welcomes the two aggravations with regard to people trafficking proposed in the Bill. The Committee requests that the Scottish Government keeps it updated on progress with the Modern Slavery Bill and its extension to cover Scotland.

51. The Committee welcomes the establishment of a separate Police Negotiating Board for Scotland which will include participation from all ranks of police officers.

52. The Committee supports the general principles of the Bill. However, this is with the exception of proposals regarding the corroboration provisions. Our recommendations on this issue are set out in the main body of this report.

INTRODUCTION

53. The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill\(^4\) was introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013 by the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Kenny MacAskill MSP. The Parliamentary Bureau designated the Justice Committee as lead committee in consideration of the Bill at Stage 1.

54. The Committee considered its approach to the Bill at its meeting on 25 June. It issued a call for written evidence on 26 June and received 54 responses and 11 supplementary submissions. It took evidence on the Bill over 11 meetings between 24 September and 8 October and between 19 November and 14 January from a range of criminal justice bodies, victims’ groups, legal and human rights experts, as well as from Lord Carloway, Sheriff Principal Bowen and from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice.

55. The Finance Committee also issued a call for written evidence on the Financial Memorandum on the Bill. It took oral evidence from the Scottish Government Bill Team on the costs associated with the Bill at its meeting on 20

---

3 Carloway Review, page 367.
4 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, as introduced (SP Bill 35, Session 4 (2013)). Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/parliamentarybusiness/Bills/65155.aspx
November. The Finance Committee reported\(^5\) to the Justice Committee on the Bill on 13 December. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee published its report\(^6\) on the Delegated Powers Memorandum on the Bill on 30 October.

BACKGROUND TO THE BILL

Cadder vs HM Advocate

56. On 26 October 2010, the UK Supreme Court’s judgement in the case of Cadder vs HM Advocate\(^7\) held that rules under which the police in Scotland could detain and question a suspect without the suspect having a right of access to legal advice breached the right to a fair trial (including the implied privilege against self-incrimination) recognised in Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).\(^8\)

57. In response to this ruling, the Scottish Government introduced legislation which was passed by the Scottish Parliament under emergency bill procedure on 27 October 2010. The resulting Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010\(^9\) (“the 2010 Act”) made a number of changes affecting:

- access to legal advice by suspects - enshrining a right of access to a solicitor, both before and during police questioning, and providing for related changes to state funded criminal legal assistance;

- police powers of detention - extending the maximum period during which the police are able to hold a suspect in custody for the purposes of investigation, prior to arrest, from six hours to 12 hours, with the possibility of extension to 24 hours; and

- possible appeals - seeking to restrict any impact which court rulings, such as that in Cadder, may have on already concluded prosecutions (eg providing that the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC) must have regard to the need for finality and certainty when considering if it is in the interests of justice to refer a case to the High Court).\(^10\)

---

\(^7\) Cadder vs HM Advocate. Available at: http://www.supremecourt.gov.uk/decided-cases/docs/UKSC_2010_0022_Judgment.pdf

\(^8\) European Convention on Human Rights. Available at: http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Convention_ENG.pdf

Lord Carloway’s Review of Scottish Criminal Law and Practice

58. Following the case of Cadder v HMA, Lord Carloway (a High Court judge) was asked by the Cabinet Secretary for Justice to lead an independent review of criminal law and practice.

59. The Scottish Government considered that such a review was necessary in order to ensure that the Scottish justice system continued to be fit for purpose and that it also met the appropriate balance of protecting the rights of accused persons with victims of crime in light of the changes brought about by the Cadder judgement.\(^\text{11}\)

60. The following terms of reference of the review were agreed between Lord Carloway and the Cabinet Secretary for Justice:

(a) to review the law and practice of questioning suspects in a criminal investigation in Scotland in light of recent decisions by the UK Supreme Court and the European Court of Human Rights, and with reference to law and practice in other jurisdictions;

(b) to consider the implications of the recent decisions, in particular the legal advice prior to and during police questioning, and other developments in the operation of detention of suspects since it was introduced in Scotland in 1980 on the effective investigation and prosecution of crime;

(c) to consider the criminal law of evidence, insofar as there are implications arising from (b) above, in particular the requirement for corroboration and the suspect’s right to silence;

(d) to consider the extent to which issues raised during the passage of the 2010 Act may need further consideration, and the extent to which the provisions of the Act may need amendment or replacement; and

(e) to make recommendations for further changes to the law and to identify where further guidance is needed, recognising the rights of the suspect, the rights of victims and witnesses and the wider interests of justice while maintaining an efficient and effective system for the investigation and prosecution of crime.\(^\text{12}\)

61. A review team was set up in December 2010 which was supported by an expert reference group\(^\text{13}\) consisting of leading practitioners and representatives in relevant fields. The review process involved a range of evidence gathering, research, analysis and consultation. The consultation process ran from 8 April to

\(^{11}\) Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Policy Memorandum (SP Bill 35-PM, Session 4 (2013)), paragraph 6. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_Bills/Criminal%20Justice%20(Scotland)%20Bill/b35s4-introd-pm.pdf

\(^{12}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 7.

\(^{13}\) A list of members of the reference group is available at: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/Review/CarlowayReview/referencegroup/members
3 June 2011 and 51 responses were received. The report of the review was published on 17 November 2011.\textsuperscript{14}

62. In his report, Lord Carloway set out 76 recommendations in relation to the following areas:

- arrest and detention of suspects - a new system of arrest and detention in police custody; including proposals aimed at avoiding unnecessary or disproportionate detention and police powers to liberate suspects subject to conditions for the purpose of carrying out further investigations;

- legal advice and police questioning of suspects - proposals on suspects’ rights of access to a lawyer and the nature and scope of police questioning, including additional safeguards for children (under 18) and vulnerable adult suspects;

- rules of criminal evidence - including a proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases, but rejecting any change to current rules preventing adverse inference being drawn at trial from an accused’s failure to answer questions during the police investigation; and

- appeal procedures - proposals to rationalise the current system of criminal appeals, and to achieve a balance between upholding the finality of criminal cases and allowing potential miscarriages of justice to be challenged; including a stricter test for allowing late appeals to proceed and changes to the interests of justice test applied by the High Court in relation to references from the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission.\textsuperscript{15}

\textbf{Justice Committee consideration}

63. Following publication of the report, the Justice Committee took evidence from a range of interested professionals, academics and stakeholders to obtain a snapshot of initial reactions to Lord Carloway’s recommendations. At the conclusion of this process, the Committee sent a letter to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice in January 2012 setting out its observations on the main issues highlighted in the evidence.\textsuperscript{16}

\textbf{Scottish Government consultation}

64. On 3 July 2012, the Scottish Government published a consultation paper\textsuperscript{17} which sought views on the recommendations made by Lord Carloway in his report. The consultation ran until 5 October 2012 and posed 41 questions relating to Lord Carloway’s recommendations.

\textsuperscript{14} Review of Scottish Criminal Law and Practice (The Carloway Review). Available at: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/Review/CarlowayReview
\textsuperscript{15} SPICe briefing, page 6.
\textsuperscript{17} Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice: The Carloway Report. Available at: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/4794
65. The consultation document stated that the Scottish Government’s broad approach was to recognise Lord Carloway’s Report as a substantial and authoritative piece of work and to accept the broad reasoning as set out in the report. It also stated that the purpose of the consultation was not to revisit the review but instead that it was designed to promote public discussion of the recommendations to assist the Scottish Government in translating the package of reforms proposed into legislation.18

66. The Scottish Government received 56 responses to the consultation. It published the non-confidential responses 19 along with an independent analysis of these responses 20 on 19 December 2012. There was a majority in support of almost all of Lord Carloway’s recommendations. The exception to this was the proposal to remove the requirement for corroboration, which attracted the largest number of responses. Although some third sector organisations were in favour of the recommendation, a majority, including some organisations representing the legal profession, favoured its retention. In addition, a large majority of respondents felt that safeguards should be put in place if the requirement for corroboration was abolished.21

67. In light of these responses, the Scottish Government launched a further consultation 22 on 19 December 2012 which sought views on the need for safeguards following the removal of the requirement for corroboration. In particular, it sought views on two proposals for additional safeguards: increasing the jury majority to return a guilty verdict and widening the trial judge’s power to rule that there is no case to answer. Views were also sought on whether the ‘not proven’ verdict should be retained.

68. The consultation ran until 15 March 2013 and 32 responses were received. The Scottish Government published the responses received 23 on 21 June 2013. While many of the respondents still disagreed with the proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration 24, there was majority support for the additional two safeguards proposed 25.

---

18 Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice: The Carloway Report, paragraph 1.8.
21 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 23.
22 Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice: Additional Safeguards Following the Removal of the Requirement for Corroboration. Available at: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/4628/0
23 Additional Safeguards Following the Removal of the Requirement for Corroboration: Consultation Responses. Available at: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/06/7066
Sheriff Principal Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure

69. In April 2009, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice commissioned Sheriff Principal Bowen QC to conduct an independent review of the practices and procedures relating to solemn sheriff court cases (sheriff and jury cases).

70. The remit of the review was:

“To examine the arrangements for sheriff and jury business, including the procedures and practices of sheriff court and the rules of criminal procedure as they apply to solemn business in the sheriff court; and to make recommendations for the more efficient and cost-effective operation of sheriff and jury business in promoting the interests of justice and reducing inconvenience and stress to the victims and witnesses involved in cases.”

71. Sheriff Principal Bowen carried out his review with the support of a review team seconded from justice organisations. An independent reference group comprising representatives from justice organisations, legal practitioners, the judiciary and academics also supported the review process, which consisted of a range of evidence gathering, research, analysis and observation and monitoring of court proceedings.

72. The report of the review was published on 11 June 2010. It set out 34 recommendations for sheriff and jury cases, not all of which would require legislation. It included proposals in the following areas:

- communication between prosecution and defence - improving out of court discussion between the two parties by establishing compulsory business meetings;
- management of cases - improving the effectiveness of first diets (existing pre-trial court hearings) and the scheduling of trials; including the recommendation that a trial sitting is not allocated until the sheriff dealing with the relevant first diet is satisfied that all outstanding issues have been resolved;
- time limits - providing the parties with more time to prepare cases by bringing time limits more into line with High Court cases; including an extension to the deadline for bringing custody cases to trial; and
- monitoring and evaluation of reforms.

73. In putting forward these proposals, Sheriff Principal Bowen indicated that the success of the proposed reforms would be dependent upon a legal aid structure.

---

26 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 13.
27 A list of members of the reference group is available at page 10 of the review document: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/Doc/314393/0099893.pdf
28 Policy Memorandum, paragraphs 14 and 15.
which is supportive of early resolution, sentence discounting in appropriate cases and effective judicial management. He also noted that—

“This Review has been conducted in the full knowledge of the stringencies likely to be imposed on public sector spending in the foreseeable future. I have made no recommendation which is likely to result in significant public expense; to the contrary I believe that the recommendations of this report, if implemented, will help make better use of resources and result in demonstrable savings in the long term.”

Scottish Government consultation

75. The Scottish Government indicated its broad support for Sheriff Principal Bowen’s recommendations, stating in the consultation document that—

“The new system model will … be one where the attention of all parties is directed to timeous engagement and early resolution of any issues that are susceptible to agreement. In the new system, actual court time will be dedicated to hearing issues which are genuinely still in dispute. This will result in savings of time and money and spare victims and witnesses inconvenience and distress. The system model will be supported by incentives to parties to play positive roles, and Sheriff Principal Bowen also places a strong emphasis on judicial management.”

76. It published the responses to the consultation along with an analysis of these responses on 21 June 2013.

Provisions in the Bill

77. The Bill comprises provisions which have been developed from recommendations of Lord Carloway’s Review of Scottish Criminal Law and Practice, and from the recommendations of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure, as well as a number of additional relevant matters which take forward a range of Scottish Government justice priorities.

78. In terms of Lord Carloway’s recommendations, the Bill includes provision in the following broad areas: arrest, period of custody, investigative liberation, legal... advice, questioning, child suspects, vulnerable adult witnesses, corroboration and sufficiency of evidence, exculpatory and mixed statements, appeal procedures, finality and certainty.

79. Although not a recommendation of Lord Carloway, the Bill also makes provision to increase the jury majority to two thirds to return a guilty verdict. The Scottish Government considered this necessary in light of the removal of the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases.38

80. In terms of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s recommendations, the Bill’s provisions include:

- a requirement for the prosecutor and the defence to engage in advance of the hearing;
- a case will be indicted to a first diet and will only proceed to trial when a sheriff is satisfied that it is ready;
- increasing the time period in which an accused person can be remanded before having been brought to trial from 110 days to 140 days; and
- removal of the requirement for an accused person to sign a guilty plea.39

81. In addition, the Bill makes provision for matters relating to the sentencing of offenders, people trafficking, the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland (PNBS), the use of live TV links which, according to the Policy Memorandum, are intended to complement the reforms based on the two reviews.40

82. The main provisions of the Bill are set out in six parts:

- Part 1 (arrest and custody) which deals with police powers to arrest, hold in custody and question suspects as well as protective rights of suspects (restating a number of existing rights and powers as well as providing for a number of important reforms);
- Part 2 (corroboration and statements) which abolishes the current general requirement for corroboration in criminal cases and makes changes to ‘hearsay’ rules in so far as they affect the admissibility in evidence of certain statements made by an accused person;
- Part 3 (solemn procedure) which makes provisions aimed at facilitating the better preparation of sheriff and jury cases, and changing the rules on jury majorities in all solemn procedure cases;
- Part 4 (sentencing) which makes provision for sentencing for possession of a knife or offensive weapon and for people who commit an offence during a period of early release from a custodial sentence;

38 Policy Memorandum, paragraphs 11 and 12.
39 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 17.
40 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 5.
Part 5 (appeals and the SCCRC) which makes provisions seeking to address delays in determining appeals and makes changes to the way in which the High Court deals with references from the SCCRC; and Part 6 (miscellaneous) which makes provisions seeking to create a statutory aggravation relating to people trafficking, allowing for greater use of live television links between prisons (or other places of detention) and the courts, and establishing a Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

PART 1: ARREST AND CUSTODY

Arrest by police

Powers of arrest: overview

83. Police officers are currently able to take suspects into custody, and hold them for the purposes of investigation or appearance in court, on the basis of:

- common law and statutory powers of arrest; and
- powers of detention under section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

84. Common law powers allow a police officer to arrest a suspect without a warrant where this is necessary for the purposes of preventing the suspect from escaping, committing further offences, or hindering the course of justice. This power may be exercised where the officer has a reasonable suspicion that the suspect has committed an offence. In addition, the common law allows an accused to be arrested and held in custody, on the basis of a warrant granted by the court, where necessary to secure the person’s attendance at court.

85. Statutory powers of arrest are attached to a wide range of statutory offences and are generally applicable on the basis of reasonable suspicion that a person has committed an offence.

86. Powers of detention set out in section 14 of the 1995 Act, may be exercised where a police officer has reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person has committed or is committing an offence punishable by imprisonment.

87. In his report, Lord Carloway stated that “the distinction [between detention and arrest] has been eroded to such an extent that there is little purpose in continuing with two different states of custody”, therefore “it would be simpler, and more clearly in tune with the ECHR, if there were a single period of custody, once a suspect has been arrested on suspicion”. He added that “the existence of two distinct means of taking a person into custody … is a peculiar, if not unique, feature of modern Scots criminal procedure” and he therefore recommended

---

41 SPICe briefing, page 5.
42 SPICe briefing on the Bill, page 10.
43 SPICe briefing on the Bill, page 10.
44 SPICe briefing on the Bill, page 10.
45 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.0.4.
46 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.1.4.
that the common law and statutory rules on arrest and detention be replaced with a general power of arrest on ‘reasonable suspicion’.

88. The Bill generally gives effect to Lord Carloway’s recommendations in relation to arrest and custody. The Policy Memorandum on the Bill states that the Scottish Government was “persuaded by the logic of having a single state of custody which simplifies and clarifies the rights and procedures for police and arrested persons alike”. It confirms that “the effect of the provisions is to abolish detention under section 14 of the 1995 Act so that the only general power to take a person into custody is the power of arrest contained in the Bill”. The Policy Memorandum also explains that “the test for the police arresting a person without a warrant is whether they have reasonable grounds for suspecting the person has committed, or is committing, an offence punishable by imprisonment”. A warrant would still be required for non-imprisonable offences “unless obtaining one is not in the interests of justice”.

89. At present, the arrest of a person on suspicion of having committed an offence is followed by the police charging the suspect. The Bill seeks to remove the necessity for the police to charge a person upon arrest and prior to reporting to the procurator fiscal for prosecution. The Policy Memorandum indicates that, where a suspect is to be reported to the procurator fiscal without being charged, the police must still advise the suspect of this intention. It goes on to state that: “this, in effect, has the same outcome as the current ‘charge’ in that it signifies a change in the person’s status and ends the period in which police can question a person”. The Bill provides that any further questioning must be authorised by judicial sanction, an area which is explored later in this report.

90. In providing for police powers and rights of suspects, the Bill distinguishes between people who are ‘officially accused’ and those who are ‘not officially accused’ of committing an offence. In many cases this would be the distinction between a suspect who has or has not been charged with an offence. However, given that a suspect may be reported for prosecution without charge, the category of persons who are ‘officially accused’ includes suspects who have not been charged but in relation to whom the prosecutor has initiated proceedings. Procedures relating to these two groups are discussed later in the report.

Powers of arrest: simplification or needless change?
91. A large number of witnesses and respondents to the Committee’s call for written evidence supported the provisions in the Bill in relation to arrest and detention. In its written submission, the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) described the proposal “as a welcome simplification of the often complex rules regarding powers of arrest”; while Assistant Chief Constable Malcolm Graham told the Committee that Police Scotland believes that the case

---

47 Carloway Review, paragraph 4.0.8.
48 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 34.
49 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 35.
50 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 35.
51 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 37.
52 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, section 55.
has been well made and that the changes are required. He explained that “the current terminology persistently causes confusion because the term ‘detention’ is used for somebody who is remaining in custody prior to court, rather than for a means of temporary arrest”. Professor James Chalmers of the University of Glasgow said that he did not see any difficulty merging the two concepts, suggesting in fact, that “doing so will give us a much more rational and sensible system than the one that we have”. Professor Fiona Leverick, also from the University of Glasgow, agreed that the provisions in the Bill around arrest and detention were “a vast improvement” in simplifying a particularly confusing system.

92. The Faculty of Advocates also welcomed “the simplification, clarification and modernisation of the law of arrest and detention”. Murdo Macleod QC, representing the Faculty, told the Committee that “the distinction between detention and arrest is almost academic anyway, because people are now entitled to have their solicitor present with them during detention as well as afterwards”.

93. However, the Law Society of Scotland was less convinced, arguing that “the current system is working well and there is no requirement to move to a system of arrest on the basis that a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed or is committing an offence”. In oral evidence, Grazia Robertson of the Law Society added that “the system, as changed in light of Cadder, seems to have bedded in … and to be working well”.

94. Calum Steele of the Scottish Police Federation (SPF) also said he was “not entirely convinced” that the need for change had been demonstrated or that the proposed wording would be more easily understood. He suggested that “it seems to be unnecessary to create a new set of statutory provisions that are almost identical to an old set of statutory provisions, with just a change in terminology”. David O’Connor of the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents (ASPS) told the Committee that he tended to agree with this position.

95. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice told the Committee that, “at present, detention and arrest blur into each other” and that “the provisions will improve the law and will be easier for the police to apply than those under the current system”. He went on to argue that “it will bring the Scottish system more into line with the European Convention on Human Rights, which refers to … detention as the period of police custody following arrest”.

---

58 Faculty of Advocates. Written submission, page 1.
60 Law Society of Scotland. Written submission, page 2.
96. The Committee accepts that there might be some benefit in simplifying the powers of arrest along the lines proposed in Part 1 of the Bill. However, we do have concerns regarding the possible consequences of this change and we therefore make a number of recommendations aimed at improving the provisions in Part 1 of the Bill under the relevant sections below.

Powers of arrest: public perception
97. When asked to comment on whether the public perception of a person who is under arrest differs from that of a person who is being detained, ACC Graham accepted that “the term ‘arrest’ has a different feel for the public from ‘detention’”. However, he suggested that “people largely understand that in Scotland … your guilt or innocence is decided at the point when you go to court, not because the police have either detained or arrested you”. He went on to argue that “there would not be any release of information until somebody was arrested and could be charged under the current system, so I do not see that that would change because we had moved to a position of arrest under suspicion”. He added that “I do not think that would come into the public domain in the way you have described, and it would not change the public perception”. Professor Chalmers said, in any case, that he was “not sure that the distinction between arrest and detention is well understood by the general public; they both involve largely the same thing, which is somebody being taken into custody”.

98. The Cabinet Secretary told the Committee that “although somebody may be arrested by the police, they are presumed innocent until a court case conclusively proves otherwise” and that “everyone in Scotland recognises that point, although, sadly, it sometimes does not appear to be portrayed in that way in the media”. He added that “ordinary citizens in Scotland find it pretty hard to explain the difference between arrest and detention and why some people are arrested straight by the police and others are detained”.

99. The Cabinet Secretary was asked whether he would consider giving suspects in certain sensitive cases anonymity to protect the reputation of those who have been arrested but are not officially accused. He responded that “these are matters on which we do not have a formal policy” but said “we are happy to consider them and engage with the committee, the legal profession and, doubtless, the media and those involved in social media”. He added that this was “a legitimate and understandable point” but that, “as always, the devil is in the detail, especially in relation to social media”.

100. The Committee has concerns that use of the term ‘arrested’ in relation to a suspect who has been taken into police custody for questioning but has not been charged may, amongst members of the public, be more suggestive of guilt than is currently the case for a suspect who is ‘detained’ for questioning. We consider the terminology in the Bill concerning arrest to be somewhat confusing and are not convinced that members of the public, the accused or the media will be able to distinguish between a ‘person officially accused’ and a ‘person not officially accused’. We also have similar concerns relating to the proposal to allow the police to ‘de-arrest’ a person when the grounds for arrest no longer exist (see paragraph 120 of this report).

---

101. While we accept assurances from the police that, as with the current position, they do not intend to release a suspect’s name to the media until they have been formally charged with an offence, i.e. ‘officially accused’, we consider that every effort should be made to ensure that the reputation of the accused is not detrimentally affected by these provisions. The Committee considers that the issue of suspects’ anonymity is problematic, but merits further and careful consideration.

Power of arrest: resource implications

102. While noting that the provisions in relation to the general power of arrest in the Bill appeared to be “relatively straightforward”, the SPF suggested that there could be cost implications arising from the provisions, particularly regarding training for police officers and adapting ICT systems “at a time when the service budget is under extreme pressure”. 76 Chief Superintendent David O’Connor of ASPS agreed that “the change appears, on the surface, to be relatively simple”, but “there will be significant training issues for Police Scotland in ensuring that everyone fully understands what the change from ‘detention’ to ‘arrest on suspicion’ means”. 77 He later added that, although this “is a big ask, it is doable”. 78

103. John Gillies of Police Scotland accepted that “the training and re-education of the service in relation to these provisions would be considerable” and said that it was “difficult to put a cost on such training, but it is fair to say that it would be quite a distraction to the service”. 79

104. Stevie Diamond of Unison suggested that the i6 ICT programme, 80 which is due to come into operation in 2015, could need “rejigging … before it starts, to accommodate the provisions in the Bill”. 81 ACC Graham explained that work was “on-going to ensure that the i6 programme can be designed … to encompass as many of the proposals in the Bill as possible”, however, “we cannot design in those proposals with any degree of certainty until the Bill becomes an Act”. 82

---

76 Scottish Police Federation. Written submission, page 1.
80 i6 is the new ICT programme for Police Scotland which is currently under development. It covers six broad areas: crime, criminal justice, custody, missing persons, vulnerable persons and productions/lost and found property.
105. The Cabinet Secretary told the Committee that “Police Scotland is content and understands the obligations that go with any new legislation”. He later added that the Scottish Government has had discussions with the police and advised that “they will take time to ensure that training is given—some of it will be on the job, some of it will be online and some of it might take place at Tulliallan.” The Financial Memorandum assumes that the Bill provisions will take effect in the financial year 2015-16, which the Cabinet Secretary told the Committee would allow time for the police to undergo the necessary training.

106. The Committee is concerned that police officer training and adaptations to the new i6 programme required to effectively implement the provisions in Part 1 of the Bill may place a significant burden on an already stretched police service and individual officers. While we accept the Cabinet Secretary’s assurances that sufficient time will be given to Police Scotland to implement a training programme and to update the new ICT system before giving effect to the Bill, we ask the Scottish Government to ensure that adequate resources are made available to Police Scotland to carry out these tasks without further strain on its shrinking budget.

Definition of arrest
107. In his report, Lord Carloway stated that “there would be benefit in stipulating exactly what ‘arrest’ is in statute”. He therefore recommended that, “in line with the concepts expressed in Article 5 of the Convention, arrest should be defined as meaning the restraining of the person and when necessary, taking him or her to a police station”. The Bill does not however include a definition of ‘arrest’.

108. ACC Graham told the Committee that “it would be helpful if ‘arrest’ was defined in the Bill in the way that Lord Carloway set out [as] we have great concerns about the absolute requirement in the Bill to take a person to a police station when they have been arrested, and we agree with Lord Carloway that the inclusion of ‘when necessary’ will help to ensure that a person’s liberty is not taken from them unnecessarily.”

109. Mr O’Connor of ASPS said that his “understanding of arrest is that the person is no longer free to go about their lawful business, or has not been advised that they are free to do so” and that this definition is “common throughout the services”. Mr Steele of the SPF agreed that this definition was “well understood and well applied” and that “it did not appear to cause any confusion”.

110. The Committee also heard from Professor Chalmers that “one of the difficulties with defining ‘arrest’ was that existing law is quite unclear on it”. He argued that, as “the Bill does not provide a comprehensive scheme for regulating arrest but simply sets out the circumstances in which that power might be exercised, I am not sure that the Bill is the place to define arrest comprehensively or that the Carloway review gives us a good basis for doing that".\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 8 October 2013, Col 3351.}

111. \textbf{The Committee notes that the Bill does not give effect to Lord Carloway’s recommendation that ‘arrest’ be defined in the Bill.} We further note that there was no consensus from witnesses as to whether arrest should be defined and, if so, whether this legislation was the best vehicle to do so. On balance, the Committee is not content with the Scottish Government’s decision to exclude such a definition in the Bill.

\textit{Police powers: arrest to prevent crime}
112. In its written submission, ASPS argued that “the proposed powers of arrest should be clear that an arrest can be made to prevent an attempt to commit a crime”\footnote{Association of Scottish Police Superintendents. \textit{Written submission}, page 1.}. Mr O’Connor of ASPS explained that there may be circumstances where an arrest is necessary to take a person who may be a threat to him or herself and to the public to the police station to access the services and care they need.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 1 October 2013, Col 3291.} These concerns were shared by Police Scotland. ACC Graham told the Committee that reassurances had been given by Scottish Government officials that common law powers covering such situations would be retained, although he said that this “does not give us huge comfort at the moment”.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 1 October 2013, Col 3291.}

113. However, Shelagh McCall told the Committee that the Scottish Human Rights Commission (SHRC) "would be extremely concerned about the idea that the police could arrest someone who had done nothing contrary to the criminal law".\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 8 October 2013, Col 3369.} Professor Chalmers agreed that “the idea … is quite disturbing”, adding that “it is not clear why that would be necessary”.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 8 October 2013, Col 3369.} Ms McCall and Mr Macleod QC concluded that section 1 of the Bill was probably adequate in enabling the police to arrest a person if he or she had committed or was committing an offence.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 1 October 2013, Col 3326.}

114. When asked whether he was satisfied that the new statutory power of arrest would allow an arrest to be made to prevent a crime, the Cabinet Secretary said that “the difficulty arises when people are thinking about offending”.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 7 January 2014, Col 4056.} Aileen Bearhop of the Scottish Government confirmed that the common-law offence of attempting to commit a crime and conspiracy would remain.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 7 January 2014, Col 4056.}

115. \textbf{The Committee notes the Scottish Government’s position that the power of arrest contained in the Bill combined with common law rules would be sufficient in allowing the police to arrest a person attempting or conspiring to commit an offence.} However, we heard from the police that they were not yet convinced by the reassurances given, and from the SHRC that it would have serious concerns if the police were able to arrest a person “who has done nothing contrary to the criminal law”\textsuperscript{99}. We therefore call on the Scottish Government to further engage with both the police and the SHRC with a view to providing adequate reassurances on this matter.

Procedure following arrest

\textit{Arrested person to be taken to police station}

116. Section 4 of the Bill provides that a person arrested outwith a police station must be taken as quickly as is reasonably practicable to a police station.

117. In relation to this requirement, ACC Graham told the Committee that this “absolute requirement ... does not retain sufficient flexibility in the system for circumstances in which we might wish, in effect, to de-arrest somebody”.\textsuperscript{100} David Harvie of the COPFS suggested that “in circumstances in which, for example, evidence comes to light prior to getting to the police station that the person in custody may be the wrong individual, the strict terms of the Bill as drafted might mean that the person has to be taken to a police station even though at that stage they are no longer under suspicion”.\textsuperscript{101}

118. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice told the Committee that he had listened to the evidence received on this matter and agreed “to make provision for the release of a person from arrest when the grounds for that arrest cease to exist”, which “has been referred to in evidence as ‘de-arrest’”.\textsuperscript{102} Aileen Bearhop of the Scottish Government added that “it is recognised that there will be cases in which the grounds for arrest no longer apply and the person should no longer be under arrest, so we will change the Bill to ensure that the arrest can be stopped and the person can be released straight from the street without having first to be taken to a police station only to be sent home”.\textsuperscript{103}

119. The Committee notes the Scottish Government's intention to bring forward an amendment to allow a person to be quickly released from arrest (‘de-arrested’) when the grounds for arrest no longer exist. While we recognise that there may be situations where de-arrest could be a reasonable option, we have concerns that this should not lead to a situation where people are arrested without a proper assessment by police officers as to whether such action is appropriate. We would therefore welcome further details of the types of situation and expected frequency in which de-arrest would be used. The Committee also has concerns regarding use of the term ‘de-arrest’ and consider the words ‘released’ or ‘liberated’ to be more appropriate.

\textit{Information to be given at police station}

120. Section 5 of the Bill specifies the information to be given to suspects at a police station. This includes: (a) that the person is under no obligation to say anything, other than to give the information specified in section 26(3)\textsuperscript{104} of the Bill; and (b) of any right the person has to have intimation sent and to have access to certain persons under other sections of the Bill. For example, under section 30, children under 16 have the right to have intimation sent to a parent; under section 36, a person in police custody has the right to consultation with a solicitor; and under section 33, vulnerable persons have the right to assistance from an appropriate person.

121. Lord Carloway recommended in his report that suspects held in custody should be provided with a ‘Letter of Rights’\textsuperscript{105}, clearly setting out all of their rights, including access to a solicitor.

122. The UK opted into an EU Directive on the Right of Information in Criminal Proceedings in 2012, requiring Member States to ensure that a Letter of Rights be provided to those held in custody.\textsuperscript{106} In July 2013, the Scottish Government introduced a non-statutory Letter of Rights for those in custody. Section 5(3) of the Bill specifies that a suspect must be provided as soon as reasonably practicable with information (verbally or in writing) as is necessary to satisfy the requirements of the EU Directive.

123. Mr Macleod QC of the Faculty noted that this information could be provided verbally or in writing, and was keen to “state strongly that that information should be given both verbally and in writing”, given that “many arrestees or people who are brought into custody have literacy problems”.\textsuperscript{107} Ann Ritchie of the Glasgow Bar Association (GBA) agreed with this position, arguing that “studies show that information given verbally and in writing is more easily understood”.\textsuperscript{108}

124. Ms Ritchie also had concerns that section 5 of the Bill was “incredibly and unnecessarily complex” for an accused person to follow and suggested that the section needed to be rephrased and set out in clear terms\textsuperscript{109}. However, Mr Macleod QC said he was “not sure that an accused person would be pouring over section 5 in any event”, suggesting that he or she would be able to obtain the information that they need through the Letter of Rights.\textsuperscript{110} Mr Harvie of COPFS argued that this section “is one of the key foundations that make the Bill Convention compliant” and that it should therefore remain in the Bill.\textsuperscript{111}

125. The Committee welcomes the recent introduction of a ‘Letter of Rights’ for those in custody, in accordance with the EU Directive on the Right of Information in Criminal Proceedings. We ask the Scottish Government to respond to the suggestion of some witnesses that information to be given to suspects at a police station should be provided both verbally and in writing with a view to ensuring that they clearly understand their rights.

\textsuperscript{104} Section 26(3) of the Bill specifies that a person under arrest must give their name, address, date of birth, place of birth (where required), and nationality.

\textsuperscript{105} Carloway Review, paragraph 6.1.24.

\textsuperscript{106} SPICe briefing, page 20.

Custody: person not officially accused

Keeping person in custody

126. Until quite recently, section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provided a maximum period of six hours during which a suspect could be held in custody and questioned by the police. Such a suspect could be questioned without being allowed access to legal advice.

127. The Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010, which was enacted in response to the UK Supreme Court’s judgment in Cadder v HM Advocate, extended the maximum period in which a suspect could be detained for questioning from six to 12 hours, with the possibility of an extension to 24 hours. It also provided a right of access to a solicitor for detained suspects, before and during police questioning. The Policy Memorandum accompanying the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Bill stated that it was considered necessary to set out access to a solicitor as a specific statutory right “to ensure certainty in the law, and of course, provide a specific and identifiable protection for suspected persons”. It also explained that, “with the introduction of a system based on solicitor access during detention, six hours is not considered by COPFS, the Scottish Police Services Authority or the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland to be an adequate maximum period”.

128. In his report, Lord Carloway accepted that “there is … little, if any, doubt that a six-hour maximum is unrealistic in many, albeit not most, cases” and said that “there will continue to be a significant proportion of cases for which six hours will be too restrictive a period to allow proper and effective investigation”. He argued that “it is important to maintain the central principle that persons suspected of an offence are not unnecessarily or disproportionately kept in custody”, and therefore suggested that “a period of 12 hours is reasonable” (with no power of extension).

129. He also recommended that the police should be required to undertake a formal review of a suspect’s detention at or around six hours from the time that he or she is brought into custody, suggesting that this “would not be an unreasonable burden on the police”. The purpose of this review, he argued, would be “to ensure that the continued detention of the suspect is justified, that any causes for continued detention, such as the suspect’s fitness for interview or delays in contacting a solicitor, were being properly addressed and that their welfare is being taken into account”.

---

112 SPICe briefing, pages 10-11.
113 Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Bill. Policy Memorandum, paragraph 16.
114 Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Bill. Policy Memorandum, paragraph 19.
115 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.2.20.
116 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.2.23.
117 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.2.23.
118 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.2.33.
119 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.2.34.
120 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.2.36.
130. The Bill’s Policy Memorandum states that the Scottish Government agrees with the 12-hour maximum detention period and six-hour review proposed by Lord Carloway, arguing that it would provide the police with sufficient time to investigate offences thoroughly, while also safeguarding a person’s right to liberty. Section 11 of the Bill seeks to give effect to these recommendations.

131. In a supplementary written submission to the Committee, Police Scotland provided figures for persons detained under section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 during the period between 4 June to 1 July 2013:

- 2693 persons detained for up to a maximum of six hours (80.4%);
- 643 persons detained for between six and 12 hours (19.2%); and
- 13 persons detained beyond 12 hours.

132. The proposal in the Bill for a 12-hour maximum period in which a person could be held in custody was supported by a number of witnesses, including Murdo Macleod QC of the Faculty of Advocates and Professor Leverick.

133. ACC Graham said that Police Scotland supported a 12-hour normal limit, but argued that the Bill should also provide for an extension of up to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances to ensure sufficient time to complete serious and complex investigations. He said that “the number of cases for which we would need to go for an extension beyond 12 hours is very small, but they are the most critical cases—rapes, murders and other complex cases in which … not having that additional time would hamper our ability to keep people safe and could hamper the ends of justice being met.” Mr Harvie of COPFS agreed that there may be a need to extend the period of custody beyond 12 hours “in the most serious cases involving the most complex investigations.”

134. Other witnesses suggested that a return to a six-hour limit may be more appropriate. For example, Grazia Robertson told the Committee that the Law Society considered that “six hours is a sufficient and proportionate time for the police to carry out their tasks”, however, it “acknowledges the arguments in favour of 12 hours”. Ms McCall said that “there is no evidence that a 12-hour period is necessary” and therefore the SHRC would support reintroduction of the six-hour limit with an extension beyond six hours in exceptional circumstances. ACC Graham told the Committee however that the previous six-hour limit was “woefully inadequate … even in basic cases at times”.

135. Ms McCall had particular concerns surrounding the holding of child and vulnerable adult suspects in police custody for any length of time. She suggested

---

121 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 50.
122 Police Scotland. Supplementary written submission, page 1.
that “the Parliament should think carefully about whether it is ever appropriate to hold a child or vulnerable adult for more than six hours”. The SHRC therefore recommended in its written submission that “the Bill should state that taking a child into custody is a measure of last resort because it really ought not to happen unless it is absolutely necessary”.

136. On a related issue, Police Scotland said that it was not persuaded of the need to include in the Bill the requirement for a review of a person’s detention after six hours as it could “create an additional unnecessary layer of management intervention and associated demand on the service”.

137. However, the Faculty of Advocates argued that the Bill should include a requirement to maintain a record of the review of detention after six hours to ensure that suspects are not being detained for longer than is necessary and proportionate.

138. The Cabinet Secretary told the Committee that—“I am … aware of police concerns about the 12-hour limit for keeping persons in custody and the need to consider provisions to allow an extension in exceptional circumstances. I continue to listen to all the arguments for potential extension in exceptional circumstances.”

139. The Committee heard a divergence in views amongst witnesses regarding the appropriate maximum detention limit. However, we note the statistics provided by Police Scotland relating to the period of 4 June to 1 July 2013 which show that, although the majority of persons (80.4%) were detained for up to six hours, a not unsubstantial number (19.2%) were detained for between six and 12 hours. Given these statistics, there are mixed views on the Committee as to whether detention beyond six hours is necessary.

140. We note the Cabinet Secretary’s commitment to consider whether the detention limit should be extended in exceptional circumstances. While we recognise that there may be situations, particularly in relation to complex and serious crimes, where it may be necessary to consider extending the detention limit, we remain to be convinced whether this is really necessary, particularly when, under the Bill, the police would have the option of releasing a person on investigative liberation. We therefore seek further information on the types of ‘exceptional circumstances’ in which the Scottish Government envisages that an extension to the detention limit would be granted, how often they are likely to be applied for, who would approve any extension, and how the Scottish Government intends to ensure that such extensions do not become commonplace over time.
Investigative liberation

141. Lord Carloway noted in his report that, “in the modern era, there are a number of steps in a police investigation which can take a considerable time” and so “it may not be practicable for them to be completed within the proposed 12-hour maximum period”. However, he recognised that “it may be neither necessary nor proportionate for a suspect to be detained whilst these steps are being undertaken” and therefore concluded that “liberation, subject to conditions for a limited period whilst the police investigation is completed would seem a sensible alternative to prolonged detention in some cases.”

142. Lord Carloway therefore recommended a new system of investigative liberation under which the police could release an arrested suspect, who had not been charged but was still under investigation, on conditions and with the possibility of further questioning on return to police custody (following re-arrest). The period of custody, prior to charge, would still be limited to a total of 12 hours, whether or not the person was released and then rearrested and returned to police custody. Lord Carloway also proposed that the conditions under which a suspect would be released could include any special conditions as necessary, such as prohibiting the suspect from visiting a particular area, but that the suspect could apply to a sheriff for the review of the release conditions.

143. Lord Carloway recommended that the period during which a suspect could be subject to investigative liberation should not exceed 28 days as “the longer the liberation period, the greater the potential detrimental impact to the suspect” and that “it would seem prudent, therefore, to constrain any period of liberation without charge”. He added that “a balance needs to be struck”.

144. The Bill gives effect to these recommendations. Section 14 allows the police to release suspects from police custody on conditions which may be applied for a maximum of 28 days while they carry out further investigations into a suspected crime. Section 17 provides that the person who is subject to conditions imposed may apply for a review to a sheriff, who may remove them or impose alternative conditions.

145. The Policy Memorandum on the Bill states that “these powers are most likely to be of use in the investigation of serious crimes which often involve complex and technical examination of telephones, computers, etc”. It goes on to suggest that “a person’s rights are safeguarded in that investigative liberation will be limited to

---

136 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.3.5
137 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.3.5
138 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.3.5
139 SPICe briefing, page 18.
140 SPICe briefing, page 18.
141 SPICe briefing, page 18.
142 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.3.12.
144 Explanatory Notes, paragraph 44.
145 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 58.
28 days (with no power to extend this period) and the person can apply to a sheriff to have any conditions amended and/or terminated.\(^{146}\)

146. ACC Graham told the Committee that Police Scotland “welcomes the step to introduce investigative liberation although ... 28 days would potentially be restrictive as an absolute time limit” particularly for longer-running more complex cases.\(^ {147}\) Mr Steele said that “the practice of investigative liberation is a good thing in its own right ... however, significant resources are required to make it happen smoothly”.\(^ {148}\) Mr O’Connor agreed that technology would be required to support investigative liberation and track all suspects who were subject to conditions under the process.\(^ {149}\)

147. Ms McCall of the SHRC argued that a suspect released on investigative liberation should have a right to anonymity given that, at that stage, he or she would not have been officially accused of committing a crime to “ensure proper respect for their rights to private life under Article 8 of ECHR, which include right to reputation”.\(^ {150}\) She went on to suggest that, where a person is “released on the condition that, for example, they need to come back to the police station at a particular time ... that time may not be convenient for them due to their caring commitments or important work commitments or, indeed, their solicitor’s commitments, so there may be some issues there”. She went on to argue that “the Bill does not build in enough limitations around the reasons why people might be released under such conditions, what the limits of those would be and when those would be appropriate”.\(^ {151}\)

148. Both Victim Support Scotland and Scottish Women’s Aid argued that there should be a specific requirement in the Bill for the complainer to be notified of the suspect’s release on investigative liberation and of any conditions attached.\(^ {152}\) ACC Graham told the Committee that he “would be happy if that were the case”,\(^ {153}\) while Mr Steele said that he had “little hesitation supporting the view that [the complainer] should be made aware when certain conditions apply or cease to apply”.\(^ {154}\)

149. In response to suggestions that the police should be able to apply for a longer period of investigative liberation, the Cabinet Secretary told the Committee that “in the main, 28 days should be enough”. He also dispelled claims that the 28-day period would have significant resource implications for the police, stating “I cannot for the life of me see why it should ... after all, no matter whether the person was remanded or detained; the police would probably be doing the same work anyway”.\(^ {155}\)

\(^{146}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 60.
\(^{152}\) Scottish Women’s Aid. Written submission, page 3.
150. The Cabinet Secretary also said that he would be happy to consider any suggestions made by the Committee of further checks and balances to protect the rights of the accused released under investigative liberation and with conditions imposed. However, he highlighted that it would be for the courts to consider the acceptability of the period and conditions imposed in each individual case.\textsuperscript{156}

151. The Committee seeks assurances that investigative liberation will not have an unnecessary impact on the suspect’s private life, whilst allowing the police to conduct complex investigations which could not be completed while the person is initially detained. We note that a person may apply to the courts to have any conditions imposed either removed or altered, which we believe is a welcome protection against disproportionate conditions being applied.

152. The Committee also notes suggestions from victims’ groups that the Bill should include a specific requirement for complainers to be notified of a suspect’s release on investigative liberation and of any conditions attached, however, we are unsure as to whether such a requirement needs to be placed on the face of the Bill. We ask the Scottish Government to work with the COPFS to ensure that, where they may be at risk, complainers are always informed timeously of the suspect’s release and of any relevant conditions applied.

153. The Committee notes that there are likely to be resource implications relating to investigative liberation.

Custody: person officially accused

Person to be brought before court

154. Lord Carloway’s review examined the length of time that suspects may be held in police custody before their first appearance in court and found that “the current law and practice has the potential to allow a person to be held, in certain circumstances, for a period of four, and perhaps five, days in police custody prior to appearance in court”.\textsuperscript{157} He argued that “the criminal justice system cannot operate on a part-time basis” and that “in a human rights based system, it cannot simply close down in part over periods of days whilst suspects languish in temporary cells awaiting decisions on their continued detention or liberty”.\textsuperscript{158}

155. He therefore suggested that “greater practical steps must be taken to ensure that those suspects who are to be reported in custody appear in court with greater promptness than is currently achieved in some sheriffdoms”.\textsuperscript{159} He recommended that a suspect being held in police custody should appear in court on the first day after charge and that “unless there is some extraordinary feature preventing it, a person should be appearing in court, at the very latest, within thirty six hours of arrest whatever day of the week that arrest occurs upon”.\textsuperscript{160}

\textsuperscript{157} Carloway Review, paragraph 5.2.24.

\textsuperscript{158} Carloway Review, paragraph 5.2.26.

\textsuperscript{159} Carloway Review, paragraph 5.2.26.

\textsuperscript{160} Carloway Review, paragraph 5.2.32.
156. Section 18(2) of the Bill provides that, wherever practicable, the suspect must be brought before a court not later than the end of the court’s first sitting day after the day on which they are taken into police custody. The Policy Memorandum states that “the Bill seeks to safeguard a person’s right to liberty by providing timescales within which a person should be brought before a court whenever practicable”.

157. There was broad agreement amongst witnesses that court sitting times needed to change with a view to minimising the time that suspects are held in custody prior to their appearance in court. For example, Professor Leverick suggested that “we probably need to make some provision for weekend and perhaps holiday court sittings”, although she was unsure as to whether this would need to be addressed through legislation. Ms McCall argued however that the need to extend court sittings beyond the working week had been recognised for a number of years, yet working practices had not changed and therefore legislative intervention was necessary. She added that “Lord Carloway’s original recommendation would be an appropriate way in which to solve the problem”.

158. The Cabinet Secretary told the Committee that a working group, led by Police Scotland and involving the COPFS and the SCS, had been established to consider options for Saturday courts “because I am aware of the pressures on courts, and on those who do the detaining as well as those who are being detained”. He gave his assurances that he would “take a keen interest in the issue” and committed to providing feedback on how the work progresses.

159. Like many witnesses, the Committee is concerned that suspects are sometimes held in custody for unacceptably long periods before their first appearance in court. We believe that court sitting times must be extended to reduce such lengthy periods in custody and the backlog of cases. We also recognise that there are implications for police time and resources in holding people in custody.

160. We are not however convinced that specifying time-limits for periods in custody in legislation is necessary at this stage, particularly when a working group is actively considering options for Saturday courts. We recommend that this work be completed in a timeous manner to allow any recommendations of the working group to be implemented as quickly as possible. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s assurances that he will “take a keen interest in the issue” and request details of the timescale for meetings and completion of the work of the group.

Police liberation

161. The Carloway report notes that “the presumption must be in favour of liberation in all cases and the main reasons for which a suspect will continue to be held in police custody legitimately must … be confined to situations in which

---

161 Section 18 of the Bill.
162 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 50.
he/she poses some risk, either to an individual, the public or the interests of justice, if at liberty”.

162. In order to facilitate liberation from custody in as many cases as possible, he recommended, in cases where a suspect has been charged, that the police should be given the power to impose special conditions when releasing the suspect on an undertaking to appear in court on a specified date. Lord Carloway also suggested that the COPFS should have a power to review police decisions on liberation and on any standard or special conditions imposed, and that a suspect may apply to a sheriff for a review of liberation conditions.

163. The Bill would give effect to these recommendations. Section 19(1) and (2) provide that where a person is in custody having been charged with an offence, the police may: release that person on an undertaking under section 20; release the person without an undertaking; or refuse to release. The terms of an undertaking are that the person agrees to appear at a specified court at a specified time and to comply with any conditions imposed. A person may only be released from police custody on an undertaking if he or she signs its terms.

164. Under section 21 of the Bill, the procurator fiscal may modify the terms of an undertaking by changing the court or time specified, or rescind the undertaking altogether. Section 22 provides that a person subject to an undertaking containing conditions may also apply to the sheriff to have the conditions reviewed and the sheriff may remove or alter these conditions.

165. The Committee is content that sufficient safeguards are provided in the Bill regarding liberation of those officially accused from custody, in particular the right to apply to the sheriff to have any conditions imposed by the police reviewed.

Questioning

Rights of suspects

166. Under section 23 of the Bill, the police must inform a person suspected of committing an offence of their rights one hour (at the most) before any interview commences. These rights are:

- the right not to say anything other than to provide the person’s name, address, date of birth, place of birth and nationality;
- the right to have a solicitor present during any interview; and
- if the person is being held in custody, the right to have another person and a solicitor informed that they are in custody, and the right of access to a solicitor while in custody.

167. As referred to earlier in this report, the Scottish Government has introduced a ‘Letter of Rights’ to be given to every suspect being held in police custody.

---

166 Carloway Review, paragraph 5.3.1
167 Explanatory Notes, paragraph 59.
168. Mr Macleod QC argued that the Bill should be amended to specify that the caution, which must take place not more than one hour before, should also be repeated at the commencement of the interview.\textsuperscript{168} While Ms Robertson of the Law Society highlighted that the current approach was working well in practice “for the protection of everyone, including the police officers”.\textsuperscript{169} Ms Ritchie told the Committee that the “practice varies with different police officers”, and therefore it may be helpful to be enshrined in the Bill.\textsuperscript{170}

169. The Committee notes the different experiences of witnesses from the legal profession in relation to when the caution is given to suspects by the police under current arrangements. We therefore ask the Scottish Government to respond to the specific suggestion made by the Faculty of Advocates that the Bill should specify that the caution, which must take place not more than one hour before any interview, should also be repeated at the commencement of the interview.

Right to have a solicitor present

170. The Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010, which followed the UK Supreme Court’s ruling in Cadder v HM Advocate (2010), significantly extended the rights of suspects to obtain legal advice. Under this Act, suspects detained, arrested or attending voluntarily at a police station have a statutory right to a private consultation with a solicitor before questioning. This may be conducted by telephone or in person.

171. In his report, Lord Carloway recommended that the right of access to a solicitor should be extended to all suspects held in police custody, regardless of whether the police intend to question the suspect.\textsuperscript{171} He stated that “it is estimated that over two-thirds of suspects requesting legal advice name a preferred solicitor, although that does not mean that he/she will have had previous dealings with that solicitor.”\textsuperscript{172} He noted, however, that it may not be possible to make contact with the nominated solicitor or the solicitor may not be willing or available to provide advice within a reasonable time.\textsuperscript{173} He therefore recommended that “the right of access to a lawyer does not extend to the provision of assistance from a solicitor of the suspect’s choice”, however, “in accordance with current practice, efforts should be made to secure the attendance of that lawyer within reasonable time”.\textsuperscript{174}

172. Section 36 of the Bill seeks to give effect to Lord Carloway’s recommendations on the right of access to a solicitor, including where a suspect being questioned is under investigative liberation. The Policy Memorandum confirms that this right does not extend to the provision of assistance from a solicitor of the suspect’s choice, as this may not be achievable in all situations.\textsuperscript{175} It also states that “the Scottish Government decided in favour of provisions designed to allow flexibility as the most appropriate means of communication, to allow for \textsuperscript{171} Carloway Review, paragraph 6.1.5.

\textsuperscript{172} Carloway Review, paragraph 6.1.30.
\textsuperscript{173} Carloway Review, paragraph 6.1.30.
\textsuperscript{174} Carloway Review, page 168.
\textsuperscript{175} Policy Memorandum, paragraph 71.
the means to be tailored to the needs of the individual”, therefore allowing telephone consultation where appropriate.\(^{176}\)

173. Ms McCall of the SHRC told the Committee that, “under Article 6 of the ECHR, the state ought to respect an individual’s choice of legal representative in so far as possible”, but she acknowledged that this may not always be possible, particularly in rural areas where lengthy travel may be required.\(^{177}\) Ms McCall further stated that “the purpose of legal assistance is two-fold: first, it is to protect the right against self-incrimination; and, secondly, it is to provide a check on conditions of detention and to ensure against ill treatment”. She added that, “in that second respect, it is difficult to assess over the telephone someone’s vulnerability when they are in custody”.\(^{178}\)

174. When asked to clarify whether the Bill makes it clear to individuals in custody that they have the right to face-to-face contact from a solicitor and not just advice over the telephone, Lesley Bagha, a Scottish Government official, said that “the suspect would be told that they have a right to speak to a lawyer … they would discuss the matter with their lawyer, and their lawyer might choose to come down [to the police station]”. She went on to explain that “the aim is just to keep some flexibility”, adding that “if the suspect is being questioned, there is a right for the solicitor to be present, which is an enhancement from the current position” but “it may be that in many cases a telephone call is sufficient”.\(^{179}\)

175. The Committee welcomes the extension of the right of access to a solicitor to all suspects held in police custody, regardless of whether the police intend to question the suspect, and that suspects are entitled to face-to-face contact with a solicitor. We recognise that there would be difficulties in specifying in the Bill that a suspect should be entitled to receive assistance from a solicitor of their choice, particularly in the more remote areas of Scotland, and we therefore agree with the Scottish Government on this matter.

Person not officially accused: questioning following arrest

176. The Bill enables a constable to question a person following arrest provided the person has not been officially accused of the offence (i.e. charged or where a prosecutor has started proceedings), or an offence arising from the same circumstances. The person has the right, however, not to answer any questions other than providing the police with their name, address, date of birth, place of birth and nationality.\(^{180}\)

177. The Committee is content with the procedure specified in the Bill allowing a constable to question a person not officially accused following arrest.

\(^{176}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 73.

\(^{180}\) Explanatory Notes, paragraph 70.
Person officially accused: authorisation for questioning

178. The Policy Memorandum notes that “the position in Scots law has been that, although it is proper for the police to question a person, including one detained under section 14 of the 1995 Act, once the police are in a position to charge the person with the offence(s) under investigation, questioning should cease”. It goes on to state that, “generally, once that point has been reached, it is proper for the police to charge the person with the offence and conclude any questioning” and thereafter “there should be no further questioning at the initiative of the police”.\(^{181}\)

179. Lord Carloway recommended that this prohibition on police questioning of a suspect after they have been charged with an offence should be relaxed.\(^{182}\) He stated that “there should be a process whereby the police, if they feel there is good reason to question a suspect after he/she has been charged or reported to the procurator fiscal but before he/she has appeared in court, can apply to the sheriff for permission to do so”.\(^{183}\)

180. In the Policy Memorandum, the Scottish Government states that it agrees with this recommendation and provides examples of when post-charge questioning might be appropriate, such as a legitimate delay in obtaining access to a solicitor, or where further scientific evidence comes to light.\(^{184}\) The Bill therefore provides that a court will have the power, on application, to allow the police to question a person after they have been charged with an offence, however, the court must be satisfied that it is in the interests of justice to allow the questioning.\(^{185}\) The Policy Memorandum states that, where an application is granted the court must specify the maximum period for which the person can be questioned and can set any further conditions it considers to be appropriate (for example, limiting the scope of questioning).\(^{186}\) The right of access to a solicitor will also apply to post-charge questioning.\(^{187}\)

181. A number of witnesses said that they were content with the measures proposed. For example, Murdo Macleod QC stated that the Faculty was “relatively relaxed” about the provision to allow post-charge questioning.\(^{188}\) He went on to suggest that it was “unlikely that there would be any great scope for miscarriages of justice” as safeguards had been built into the Bill, including a requirement to apply to the court for approval for post-charge questioning and that a solicitor must be present during that questioning.\(^{189}\) Professors Chalmers and Leverick agreed with Mr Macleod that the safeguards in place, in particular the requirement for an application to be made to the court before post-charge questioning takes place, were sufficient.\(^{190}\) Mr Macleod did however suggest that the Bill should set a maximum period for post-charge questioning rather than timings being specified by the court. His preference was for a further six hours (in addition to the original

\(^{181}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 84.
\(^{182}\) SPICe briefing, page 22.
\(^{183}\) Carloway Review, pages 193-194.
\(^{184}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 86.
\(^{185}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraphs 87-88
\(^{186}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 88-89.
\(^{187}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 93.
12-hour limit), to facilitate the questioning to take place, for example, travel time, etc.\textsuperscript{191}

182. Mr Harvie of the COPFS said that, “in modern investigations, flexibility is needed to allow us to go back and say ‘We’ve uncovered this information. Do you have anything to say about it?’”.\textsuperscript{192} ACC Graham told the Committee that there had been occasions where Police Scotland had wanted to undertake such questioning “particularly in serious and complex long-running cases in which the point of charge comes at a stage in the investigation when there is still a large amount of investigative work to do”.\textsuperscript{193} He gave assurances that post-charge questioning would be used sparingly and in consultation with the Crown.\textsuperscript{194}

183. Others had concerns regarding the proposals. For example, Justice Scotland said that it “considers that the perceived value of post-charge questioning is overstated and is unsure of what value it will add in the Scottish context”. It further stated that “any expansion of post-charge questioning must be accompanied by a legal framework providing safeguards in line with the recommendations of the Joint Committee on Human Rights”.\textsuperscript{195}

184. Ms McCall of the SHRC suggested that, although there was no difficulty with the principle, she was “not sure that the protections of judicial oversight are sufficiently robust”.\textsuperscript{196} In its written submission, SHRC also stated that the Bill should explicitly state that no adverse inference should be taken from silence during post-charge questioning.\textsuperscript{197}

185. Ms Ritchie from the GBA said that she saw “no need for the provision at all” and could not see how it assists either the prosecution or defence.\textsuperscript{198} Ms Robertson advised that the Law Society was also opposed to post-charge questioning on a practical level, suggesting that “what is envisaged is cumbersome, will make things somewhat bureaucratic and will result in our being back in a police office with our clients, presumably in a large majority of cases advising them to make no comment”.\textsuperscript{199}

186. Lesley Bagha, a Scottish Government official, told the Committee that “the position on post-charge questioning is very much the same as the position on pre-charge questioning, which takes place before somebody is officially accused, in \textsuperscript{195} The Joint Committee on Human Rights recommendations include that: post-charge questioning deals with evidence which has come to light after charges were brought; the total period of post-charge questioning lasts for no more than 5 days in aggregate; the presence of the accused’s lawyer is necessary during any questioning; review of the transcripts from questioning after it has occurred by the same judge who authorised the post-charge questioning to ensure it remained within the prescribed scope of questioning.

\textsuperscript{196} Justice Scotland. Written submission, paragraph 19.
\textsuperscript{198} Scottish Human Rights Commission. Written submission.
that there is a right to silence and the person does not have to say anything”.\textsuperscript{201} She went on to state that, “rather than the legislation saying that no adverse inference should be made, it is assumed that there is a right to silence”.\textsuperscript{202}

187. The Committee is persuaded that post-charge questioning may be required in certain complex and lengthy investigations. We also note that the majority of witnesses were content that the requirement on the police to apply to the court for approval for post-charge questioning provides sufficient judicial oversight to minimise the risk of miscarriages of justice.

188. However, post-charge questioning should only be used when absolutely necessary. To this end, we ask the Scottish Government to maintain a record of the circumstances and frequency in which post-charge questioning is used, including details of the applications that are refused by the courts. We further seek confirmation from the Scottish Government that existing rules providing that no adverse inference may be drawn from a suspect’s refusal to answer police questions would apply equally to post-charge questioning.

Child and vulnerable suspects

Child suspects: overview

189. In his report, Lord Carloway argued that, for the purpose of arrest, detention and questioning, a child should be defined as anyone under the age of 18 years, and noted that child suspects require extra protection. He therefore recommended that:

- there should be a general statutory provision that the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration in taking any decision regarding the arrest, custody, interview and charging of a child;
- all children should have a right of access to a parent or other responsible person if detained by the police and only those children aged 16 or 17 should be able to waive that right; and
- children under the age of 16 should not be able to waive their right of access to a solicitor, but children aged 16 or 17 should be able to waive the right with the agreement of a parent or other responsible person.\textsuperscript{203}

190. The Bill seeks to give effect to Lord Carloway’s recommendations on child suspects. The Scottish Government states in the Policy Memorandum that it considered making the provision of legal advice mandatory to all under-18s, however, it concluded that “there is a balance sought for children aged 16 and 17 years in order to provide a greater emphasis on their ability to make decisions for themselves and ensure their voice is heard in all parts of the process”. Its

\textsuperscript{203} SPICe briefing, page 24.
preferred approach therefore is to “allow children aged 16 and 17 years to make their own decisions with safeguards in place to support them in this”. 204

191. There was general support for the measures proposed in the Bill; however, some witnesses had concerns regarding the ability of 16 and 17 year olds to waive their right of access to a solicitor. Ms Robertson of the Law Society told the Committee that those under 18 should not be allowed to waive this right 205 and Mr Macleod QC said he agreed with the Law Society’s position 206.

192. Ms Driscoll of the Child Law Centre noted that young people often waive their right to a solicitor because they do not understand the situation they are in, or they assume that having a lawyer may suggest that they are guilty. However, she went on to confirm that she was “not suggesting that there should be no discretion at the ages of 16 and 17, but we need to be satisfied that a young person understands the right that they are waiving”. 207

193. Mr Harvie of the COPFS explained that, as a result of recent case law, the Lord Advocate had issued guidance indicating that there is to be a strong presumption that 16 and 17 year olds should not be able to waive their right of access to legal advice. He went on to state that “the guidance sets out various requirements that the interviewing officer must take into account” and “as it currently stands, the guidance offers perhaps a greater level of comfort than might be foreseen from the bare terms of the legislation”. 208

194. Professor Leverick said that the Bill “has got it about right”. She suggested that “imposing legal assistance on all 16 and 17-year olds even if they are adamant that they do not want it and are capable of understanding the implications of that decision may well be disproportionate in respect of the costs involved”. 209 Mr Baillie, Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, agreed that the Bill “strikes just about the right balance”. 210

195. The Cabinet Secretary told the Committee that he believed that the Bill strikes the correct balance in allowing 16 and 17 year olds to waive their right to access to a solicitor on the advice of an appropriate person. 211 He explained that “those under 16 clearly are protected but … we recognise that 16 and 17 year olds are in a different position”, adding that “they still have to be protected, but they can marry, pay taxes or join the army”. He further stated that the Bill provides sufficient protection in ensuring that the right cannot be waived without advice from an appropriate person. 212

196. The Committee notes that the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill defines a child as a person up to the age of 18. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to explain why there is inconsistency between the protections for under-18s in this Bill compared with this recent legislation.

Best interests of the child

197. The Policy Memorandum states that “a key principle enshrined in the Bill is that, in taking any decision regarding the arrest, detention, interview and charging of a child by the police, the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration”. The section title in section 42 of the Bill refers to the term ‘child’s best interests’, however, in the text of section 42(2) the phrase ‘well-being of the child’ is used.

198. Mr Baillie argued that the Bill should be consistent in referring to the ‘child’s best interests’.

199. Mr Baillie told the Committee that case law existed for both ‘best interests of the child’ and ‘welfare’, which he advised was also “well understood”. He also highlighted that the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill refers to the ‘well-being of children and young people’, while the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 refers to ‘best interests’. He argued that, in light of this confusion “we need to bring some consistency to the application of the phrases that are used” in legislation.

200. The Committee has concerns regarding the lack of consistency in use of the terms “welfare”, “best interests” and “well-being” of the child in this and other legislation. While we make no comment on which is the most appropriate term, we ask the Scottish Government to ensure consistency in the language used in section 42 of the Bill.

Age of criminal responsibility

201. In its Do the Right Thing Progress Report 2012, the Scottish Government stated that “following the raising of the age of criminal prosecution in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, we will give fresh consideration to raising the age of criminal responsibility from 8 to 12 with a view to bringing forward any legislative change in the lifetime of the Parliament”.

202. A number of witnesses told the Committee that the Bill should have included provisions to raise the age of criminal responsibility in line with the Scottish Government’s commitment in the Progress Report 2012. For example, Ms McCall

---

214 Children in Scotland. Written submission, page 1.
215 Barnardo’s Scotland. Written submission, page 1.
217 Do the Right Thing is the Scottish Government’s response to the 2008 concluding observations from the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child.
told the Committee that this was “a missed opportunity”, while Ms Driscoll said that “it is not a major change, but a leftover change [and] it would stop us having the youngest age of criminal responsibility in Europe, which is something to be ashamed of”.

203. Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People agreed that an opportunity had been missed to address this issue in the Bill. He said that, “in the absence of any indication that there will be another criminal justice bill, the matter must at least be raised to get some clarity on how the Scottish Government will give effect to its commitment to raise the age of criminal responsibility, which I welcome”. Mr Ballard of Barnardo’s Scotland told the Committee that “it would seem entirely appropriate for the Scottish Government to do it in the Bill”. Aberlour Child Care Trust stated in written evidence that, “given that this Bill represents an entirely appropriate legislative vehicle for such a change, we were dismayed that no such provision has been made in the Bill, particularly when sections 31-33 deal directly with protecting the rights of child suspects”.

204. However, Professor Leverick said she was “not sure that the issue needs to be revisited at all [and] if it does, the Bill is possibly not the right place to do that, given that there is already an awful lot in it”.

205. The Cabinet Secretary said that “we are aware of the calls for the minimum age of criminal responsibility to increase” and added “we are happy to see what we can do within the lifetime of this session of Parliament, but I do not think that it would be practical to raise the age in the Bill, especially given that consultation will have to take place and that there are disputes about what that age should be”. He added that “not everything can be included in the Bill” and “there are understandable concerns about the age of criminal responsibility, and we are happy to give an undertaking to work on that”.

206. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s undertaking to give consideration to raising the age of criminal responsibility and would welcome regular updates on this work.

Vulnerable adult suspects: overview

207. Lord Carloway recommended a number of additional safeguards for vulnerable adult suspects in police custody. He argued that there should be a statutory definition of a ‘vulnerable suspect’ and that these suspects should be given the right of access to an appropriate adult as soon as possible after they are taken into custody and prior to any questioning. He further recommended that the role of the appropriate adult should be defined and that vulnerable suspects

---

223 Aberlour Child Care Trust. Written submission, page 1.
227 Carloway Review, paragraph 6.0.7.
should be able to waive their right of access to a lawyer only if the appropriate adult agrees.228

208. The Bill broadly gives effect to these recommendations, including providing a statutory definition of a ‘vulnerable suspect’ and that they should have a right of access to an appropriate adult as soon as possible after they are taken into custody.

209. However, it does not allow vulnerable adults a right to waive their right of access to a solicitor with the agreement of the appropriate adult. The Policy Memorandum on the Bill states that “concerns were raised in relation to a vulnerable person being allowed to waive the right of access to a solicitor with the agreement of an appropriate adult”.229 It went on to state that “the Scottish Government noted these concerns and the instruction issued by the Lord Advocate to Chief Constables, that from 1 October 2012, vulnerable suspects should not be allowed to waive their right of access to a solicitor (in response to cases where vulnerable persons had done so, not fully understanding the caution or terms of interview, and the subsequent concerns about the admissibility of statements made during interview)”.230 The Scottish Government therefore said that it was “content with the current position as set out in the Lord Advocate’s guidance”.231

210. The Bill defines a vulnerable person, for the purpose of police arrest, detention and questioning, as “a person aged 18 or over who is assessed as vulnerable due to a mental disorder as defined in section 328 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003, (i.e. any mental illness, personality disorder, learning disability however caused or manifested)”.232 As at present (and recommended by Lord Carloway), it will be for the police to assess whether the person is vulnerable, and for them to try to secure the attendance of an appropriate adult as soon as reasonably practicable after detention and prior to questioning.233

211. The Policy Memorandum states that the current non-statutory role of an appropriate adult is to facilitate communication during police procedures between the police and vulnerable suspects, accused, victims and witnesses (aged 16 or over) who have a mental disorder or learning disability.234 It goes on to explain that appropriate adults are independent of the police and are not usually known to the person being interviewed.235 They are often social workers or health professionals and are expected to complete national recognised training and follow the Scottish Appropriate Adult Network National Guidance.236

228 Carloway Review, paragraph 6.0.7.
229 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 127.
230 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 127.
231 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 127.
232 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 127.
233 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 127.
234 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 127.
235 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 127.
236 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 127.
212. The Bill will give the Scottish Ministers regulation-making powers so that they can specify who may provide appropriate adult services and what training, qualifications and experience are necessary to become an appropriate adult. \(^{237}\)

213. The Policy Memorandum states that “the Scottish Government does not intend to make any particular body statutorily responsible for the delivery of appropriate adult services”, following concerns expressed by COSLA and the Association of Directors of Social Work that this responsibility would fall on local authorities. \(^{238}\)

Vulnerable adult suspects: definition and training

214. A number of witnesses expressed concern that the definition of a vulnerable adult was too narrow. For example, Mr Macleod QC argued that the term ‘owing to a mental disorder’ should be removed from the Bill, leaving the definition in sections 25 and 33 as “the person appears to the constable to be unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or to communicate effectively with the police”. He suggested that it would be difficult for a police officer to assess whether a person is suffering from a mental disorder, whereas it would be clearer that they were unable to understand what is happening or unable to communicate effectively with the police. \(^{239}\)

215. Professor Leverick shared these concerns and suggested that “we do not have to follow slavishly what happens in England and Wales, but the equivalent terminology used in the legislation in England and Wales refers to mentally vulnerable suspects, which does not necessitate any mental disorder as such”. \(^{240}\)

Mark Ballard of Barnardo’s Scotland argued that “the reliance on mental disorder as the determinant of vulnerability is unhelpful, because there are many more reasons why adults … can be vulnerable and require support specifically to deal with that vulnerability”. \(^{241}\)

216. However, Rachel Stewart of the Scottish Association for Mental Health (SAMH) argued that the “mental disorder definition … encompasses quite a wide range of mental health problems, learning disabilities, personality disorders and autistic spectrum disorders”. She suggested that each of these conditions require different responses and therefore “the police need support and training to be able to support people who are in that situation”. \(^{242}\)

217. Ms McCall agreed that there was “a real challenge in identifying vulnerable people and the police must be properly trained to do so”. \(^{243}\) ACC Graham also acknowledged that there were difficulties in identifying vulnerable people in custody, however, he said that “we have never had more checks and balances at the point when somebody is questioned and detained, to ensure that we do everything that we can to identify whether we need to call on the services of somebody to offer support and independent advice."

---

\(^{237}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 123.

\(^{238}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 128.

218. When asked to respond to concerns raised by witnesses regarding the definition of vulnerable persons specified in section 33 of the Bill, the Cabinet Secretary told the Committee that “I tend to think that the term ‘mental disorder’ is perfectly understandable.” He explained that “a mental disorder is defined as a ‘mental illness’, ‘personality disorder’ or ‘learning disability’, and there is tried and tested practice according to which the police have been assessing the vulnerability of suspects, accused, victims and witnesses for many years.” He added that “we are not asking police officers to act as psychiatrists; we are asking them simply to make an assessment of somebody’s ability”, which “has been routine custom and practice and has worked well.”

219. The Committee has concerns that the definition of vulnerable person in the Bill may not capture all individuals needing additional support when in custody. We also note comments from the police that there are difficulties in identifying vulnerable persons. We therefore ask the Scottish Government to give further consideration to the definition of vulnerable persons in the Bill and to reflect on whether this is consistent with the definition in the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2014. We also ask that the Scottish Government ensures that sufficient resources are provided to the police to undergo training in this important area.

Vulnerable adult suspects: appropriate adults

220. Witnesses, including the SHRC, welcomed the view that vulnerable persons should not be able to waive their right to legal assistance without an appropriate adult being present, as “there must be someone present who is capable of advising properly on decisions made.”

221. The right of access to an appropriate adult as soon as possible after they are taken into custody was broadly welcomed by witnesses. However, concerns were raised surrounding the funding of appropriate adults. For example, Ms McCall argued that “the state has an obligation to put in place a proper system, so there must be a conversation and a decision about how appropriate adults are going to be paid for” and that training for appropriate adults, which is to be provided for in regulations would be “critical.”

222. Mr Ballard said he had concerns that the Bill only provides for appropriate adults on a statutory basis for those aged over 18 who are considered to have a mental disorder and therefore local authorities under financial pressures may not be able to support the provision of appropriate adults for 16 and 17-year-old suspects. He went on to argue that “it is not clear that support will be guaranteed unless provision is made statutory in the Bill.” Aberdeen City Council shared these concerns. In its written submission, Police Scotland also agreed that “provision of appropriate adult services has not been placed on a statutory basis within the Bill [and] there is therefore some concern based on limited reporting, that funding may not be secured or maintained within the constraints facing the public sector as a whole”.

---

223. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to respond to concerns raised by witnesses that its decision not to place the provision of appropriate adult services in the Bill could lead to a lack of funding by local authorities already facing significant financial challenges.

PART 2: (CORROBORATION AND STATEMENTS) AND SECTION 70 (GUILTY VERDICT)

Introduction

224. Part 2 of the Bill seeks to abolish the general requirement for corroboration in criminal cases. It also seeks to make changes to ‘hearsay’ rules in so far as they affect the admissibility in evidence of certain statements made by an accused person. Section 70 on jury majority is included in this part of the report as it was considered by the Committee in connection with the proposed abolition of corroboration.

Lord Carloway’s Review of Scottish Criminal Law and Practice

Background

225. The proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases arose from recommendations made by Lord Carloway in his Review of Scottish Criminal Law and Practice. As part of the remit of the review, Lord Carloway was asked to consider “the criminal law of evidence … in particular the requirement for corroboration and the suspect’s right to silence.” The perceived need for review in this area arose following recent decisions of the appeal court concerning, in particular, the right to access legal advice prior to and during police questioning. The decisions followed the judgement by the UK Supreme Court in Cadder v HM Advocate.

226. In response to this ruling, the Scottish Government introduced legislation which was passed by the Scottish Parliament under the emergency bill procedure on 27 October 2010. The Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010, amongst other things, provided for access to legal advice by suspects. As a consequence of this legislation, it was argued that greater access to legal advice would result in fewer confessions, which in turn could lead to greater difficulties in acquiring corroborative evidence. Lord Carloway was therefore asked to include in his review the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases.

251 Aberdeen City Council. Written submission.
252 Police Scotland. Written submission, paragraph 6.5.
253 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.0.1.
227. In light of this remit, Lord Carloway considered whether the requirement for corroboration continued to serve a useful purpose or whether “it is an artificial construct that actually contributes to miscarriages of justice in the broad, rather than appellate sense”. He rejected any change to the current rules preventing adverse inference being drawn at trial from an accused’s failure to answer questions during the police investigation. The Bill therefore does not seek to change the law in this area.

The requirement for corroboration

228. According to the Policy Memorandum, the requirement for corroboration requires: (a) that there be at least one source of evidence that points to the guilt of the accused as the perpetrator of the crime; plus (b) corroboration of each “essential” or “crucial” fact by other direct or circumstantial evidence. Generally, the “crucial facts” requiring proof are that a crime was committed and that the accused committed it.

229. Following consideration of the relevant issues during his review, Lord Carloway recommended that the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases should be abolished. He reached this conclusion for a number of reasons.

230. Firstly, he addressed the argument that the current requirement for corroboration is a protection against miscarriages of justice (in the sense of preventing wrongful conviction) as no person can be convicted of an offence solely on the basis of testimony of one witness. His principal argument was that he could find no evidence that the requirement served this purpose. Instead he concluded that “the real protection against miscarriages of justice at first instance is the standard of proof required; that the judge or jury must not convict unless convinced of guilt beyond reasonable doubt.”

231. Secondly, he stated that the requirement for corroboration could actually cause miscarriages of justice (in the sense of preventing the prosecution of strong cases). He argued that it should be possible to convict on the basis of evidence from a single credible and reliable witness if the judge or jury is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the accused’s guilt. He said that he believed that, “in principle, judges or juries ought to be regarded as capable of deciding for themselves what weight to attribute to a witness’s evidence” and the fact that evidence was uncorroborated would be something that the judge or jury could take into account in assessing what weight should be given to a witness’s evidence.

232. His third argument was that the requirement for corroboration was frequently misunderstood by everyone, “not least judges”. He considered it to be an “artificial bar” to prosecution and conviction as the system was skewed by “prioritising quantity over quality” and that “elaborate legal theories, unique to Scotland, would become unnecessary.”

254 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.2.5.
255 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 131.
256 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.2.41.
257 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.2.42.
258 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.2.44.
have been devised over recent years in an attempt to fit an archaic requirement into today’s reality”. 259

233. He also observed that corroboration was “more likely to exist in relation to some offences than others”, 260 with particular difficulties arising in relation to crimes which tend to be committed in private. This could be a particular barrier to obtaining corroboration for sexual crimes and for domestic abuse, as there could be little evidence in the absence of statements made by suspects at interview. The practical effect of this therefore was that the requirement for corroboration could “deny access to justice for victims of these types of crime”. This could also be the case with certain less serious crimes, such as minor assaults and thefts, where “there may also be little evidence other than that of the complainer but that evidence may be of itself compelling”. 261

234. Finally, Lord Carloway highlighted the impact that the requirement for corroboration has on advice given by solicitors to suspects. He concluded that there is “little doubt that in Scotland it plays a major part in the solicitor’s decision to advise his/her client to say nothing for fear of his/her inadvertently corroborating other evidence and thereby creating a sufficiency, which would otherwise not exist”. 262 Therefore, whether a person is prosecuted for and convicted of an offence “can depend entirely on whether the person elects to respond to questioning by the police”. This in practice could put the person in a difficult position as “it may be felt that a judge or jury would be more likely to accept the person’s account as credible if it were raised at the earliest opportunity” but that the person would “almost always be well advised not to speak, at least in situations where there was no obvious sufficiency of evidence”. 263

235. He concluded that the requirement for corroboration is “an archaic rule that has no place in a modern legal system where judges and juries should be free to consider all relevant evidence and to answer the single question of whether they are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused person committed the offence libelled”. 264 He therefore recommended that the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases should be abolished.

The provisions in the Bill

236. The Scottish Government accepted Lord Carloway’s arguments for removing the requirement for corroboration. In the Policy Memorandum, the Scottish Government stated that it sees Lord Carloway’s recommendations as a “coherent package” and therefore, failing to implement a significant aspect of the recommendations, ran the risk of “undermining Lord Carloway’s stated aim of ensuring the justice system is appropriately balanced”. 265

259 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.2.45.
260 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.2.49.
261 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.2.50.
262 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.2.50.
263 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 136.
264 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 137.
265 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 144.
Sections 57 to 61: Abolition of corroboration rule

237. Sections 57 to 61 of the Bill provide for the abolition of the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases. According to the Explanatory Notes, section 57 provides that (subject to the conditions set out in subsequent sections) where a fact has been established by evidence in any criminal proceedings, the judge and the jury is entitled to find the fact proved by the evidence although the evidence is not corroborated. In effect the section abolishes the requirement in Scots common law that the essential facts of a case be proven by evidence from two different sources (“corroborated evidence”). This proposal applies to almost all criminal cases, not just those crimes often committed in private, such as sexual offences.

238. The Bill excepts from this provision enactments which provide that, in relation to proceedings for a specific offence, a fact requires to be proven by corroborated evidence (the Explanatory Notes cite the example of section 89(2) of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 which provides that a person cannot be convicted of speeding on uncorroborated evidence).

239. Section 59 provides that the abolition of the requirement for corroboration only applies in relation to proceedings for an offence committed on or after the date on which section 57 comes into force.

240. Section 60 provides for the circumstances where an offence is committed over a period of time which includes the date section 57 comes into force. Section 61 makes transitional and consequential provisions.

Section 70: Guilty verdict

241. Section 70 of the Bill seeks to amend the law concerning the size of the majority required for a jury to return a verdict of guilty, in both the High Court and the sheriff court. It provides that a jury of 15 members may return a verdict of guilty only if at least 10 of them are in favour. It also sets out the number of jurors required to return a verdict of guilty where the jury size falls below 15. In each case, a majority of at least two thirds of the jurors is required. Finally, the section provides that a jury is to be regarded as having returned a verdict of “not guilty” if it does not return a verdict of “guilty” and there is no majority in favour of either a “not guilty” or “not proven” verdict.

242. This provision was included in the Bill as an additional safeguard in light of the proposed removal of the requirement for corroboration. However, the change to jury majorities was not proposed by Lord Carloway, who did not envisage the need for any additional safeguards. Instead it arose from the Scottish Government’s consultation on Lord Carloway’s recommendations where a significant number of respondents highlighted the need for safeguards to be put in place should the requirement for corroboration be removed. In its subsequent consultation on safeguards, the Scottish Government sought views on three possible additional safeguards; this is the only one taken forward in the Bill.

---

266 Explanatory Notes, paragraphs 137-143.
267 Explanatory Notes, paragraph 139.
268 Explanatory Notes, paragraphs 186-190.
269 A majority of respondents to that consultation said that corroboration should be retained.
General summary of evidence received

243. There were witnesses who supported Lord Carloway’s position that abolishing the requirement for corroboration would achieve access to justice for more victims of crime, in particular, cases which are generally committed in private such as rape, sexual abuse and domestic abuse. It was considered that removing the requirement would improve the ability of prosecutors to bring credible cases to court where currently the absence of corroborative evidence prevents them from doing so.

244. The proposal was welcomed mainly by organisations which support victims of crimes\(^{270}\), such as Rape Crisis Scotland and Victim Support Scotland, as well as by Police Scotland, Scottish Police Federation, Association of Scottish Police Superintendents, and the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. In its submission to the Committee, Rape Crisis Scotland said that “what we do know is that the requirement for corroboration disproportionately affects complainers in sexual offence crimes, the vast majority of which are committed in secrecy and without witnesses”.\(^{271}\) The Committee noted that, during the course of evidence, the Scottish Police Federation changed their position on this issue.

245. The Committee also received evidence in strong opposition to the proposal from a significant number of witnesses, including the Lord President, on behalf of the Senators of the College of Justice (bar one), the Faculty of Advocates, the Law Society of Scotland, Justice Scotland, and the Scottish Human Rights Commission. The main grounds of opposition were that corroboration provides a vital safeguard against wrongful conviction and therefore the requirement for it in criminal cases could not be abolished without further consideration being given to the consequences of doing so.

246. Lord Gill, the Lord President of the Court of Session, considered the proposal to be a matter of constitutional importance, asserting that corroboration was “one of the great legal safeguards in our criminal justice system”.\(^{272}\)

247. The Committee also heard from a number of academics who specialise in criminal law. Although they disagreed as to whether the requirement for corroboration should be abolished, they were all in agreement that, given the potential impact of the changes proposed, the process would benefit from a more holistic review of the checks and balances present within the Scottish criminal justice system.

248. In particular, in considering how this point had been reached, Professor Pamela Ferguson from the University of Dundee described the process as “piecemeal reform” and expressed concern that “no one is stepping back and \(^{270}\) The Scottish Parliament’s Cross Party Group on Adult Survivors of Childhood Sexual Abuse did not support the proposal but instead recommended that consideration be given to better application of the law on corroboration.

\(^{271}\) Rape Crisis Scotland. Written submission, page 1.

taking a broad view of the criminal process, looking at the checks and balances and doing a proper comparative study with other jurisdictions”.

The case for reconsidering corroboration post-Cadder

249. The Committee explored with witnesses the perceived requirement to rebalance the criminal justice system as a consequence of the UK Supreme Court ruling in the Cadder v HM Advocate 2010.

250. The Cadder case led to detained suspects being given the right to legal advice where facing police questioning. The Lord Advocate highlighted the impact that this change had in prosecuting rape cases. He stated that it was, prior to the Cadder case, common for a suspect to admit under police questioning that sexual intercourse had taken place, whilst arguing that it was consensual. However, greater access to legal advice post-Cadder had led to fewer admissions of this type and thus increased difficulties in corroborating this element of a rape case. He did not criticise the outcome but noted that “it is just a fact that, in many such cases, we do not have that source of evidence now‖.

251. The Lord Advocate acknowledged that every criminal justice system is about checks and balances “to ensure that the guilty are convicted and the innocent acquitted”. However, he argued that the right of the accused to have access to a solicitor as a result of the Cadder case had had an impact and that “the system’s delicate balance was disturbed and a rebalancing exercise needed to be carried out”.

252. Sandie Barton from Rape Crisis Scotland confirmed her view that the change was required as a result of the Cadder ruling and that the rights of the accused “have continued to increase without any commensurate increase in the rights and protections afforded to victims”.

253. ACC Malcolm Graham from Police Scotland agreed that the Cadder decision had shifted the balance in the legal considerations of those cases and that it was therefore right that Lord Carloway should make recommendations “to ensure that there is an equal focus on the rights of everyone who is involved in the justice system”. However, he was not completely convinced that the proposal was made directly as a response to Cadder as “the issues that I am describing were present in police investigations, and had subsequent consequences in the justice system, before the Cadder decision was made”.

254. Mark Harrower from the Edinburgh Bar Association acknowledged the change of “landscape” as a result of the Cadder case but was not convinced that the removal of the requirement for corroboration was the right place to look in order to redress this balance. He noted that “if fewer people confess, there will be corroboration in fewer cases from that source, but that does not mean that there will not be corroboration from other sources”. He further noted that advances in science meant that methods of sourcing DNA evidence were always improving, and that "we are able to get evidence from other sources in many more cases that we possibly could not have got in days gone by." 279

---

255. Shelagh McCall of the Scottish Human Rights Commission (SHRC) told the Committee that—

“One of the misunderstandings of the Cadder decision, as the Commission sees it, was the notion that it gave suspects some added advantage and that, therefore, there required to be some recalibration of the system in favour of victims and witnesses. In fact, Cadder brought Scotland into line with the minimum measures that were necessary to comply with article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, on the right to legal assistance". 280

256. On a related issue, the Policy Memorandum states that it would not be appropriate to remove the provisions in the Bill dealing with corroboration, whilst approving other provisions flowing from the Carloway Report, since the report’s recommendations should be treated as a single coherent package of measures. 281 It further states that, “by failing to implement a significant aspect of the recommendations contained in [Lord Carloway’s] report, there is a very real risk of undermining Lord Carloway’s stated aim of ensuring the justice system is properly balanced”. 282 Witnesses were therefore invited to respond to this in the context of the proposal that the provisions relating to corroboration should be removed from the Bill and referred for further consideration.

257. Professor Peter Duff from the University of Aberdeen argued that reform of corroboration could be considered separately from the current Bill. He noted that the main thrust of the Carloway report and of the Bill was to “cope with Cadder, new arrest procedures, new representation at police station procedures and so on”. He therefore concluded that removing corroboration from the Bill “would make no difference to the rest of the Bill in my view”. 283

258. Professor James Chalmers from the University of Glasgow also pointed out that the Scottish Government had not taken forward all of the evidential recommendations in the Carloway review. He cited the example of Lord Carloway’s recommendations that there should be a new statutory test for the admissibility of evidence, which is not included in the Bill. He therefore concluded that “the suggestion that the corroboration requirement cannot be taken out because it is all or nothing is not one that the committee should be persuaded by”. 284

---

281 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 144.
282 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 144.
Investigation, prosecution and quality of evidence

Investigation and prosecution

259. As already noted, a principal argument put forward by supporters for abolishing the requirement for corroboration was that doing so would improve access to justice for victims of certain crimes. Lord Carloway concluded that the requirement for corroboration creates “miscarriages of justice in the broader sense, because perfectly legitimate cases that would result in a conviction are not being prosecuted because of the corroboration rule.”

260. This was generally highlighted in relation to crimes which are committed in private, where the testimony of a complainer may be the only source of evidence. This could be “a particular barrier to obtaining corroboration for sexual crimes and for domestic violence as there may be nothing else, or very little, in the absence of statements made by suspects at interview”. The practical effect of the requirement for corroboration could therefore be “to deny access to justice for victims of these types of crimes”.

261. The Lord Advocate said that he supports the proposed abolition, noting that “prosecutors and I see the acute effect of the rule of corroboration in certain areas of criminal offending—particularly sexual offending, including rape, and domestic abuse. As women and children are very much in the majority of victims in those areas of criminality, the effect of the corroboration rule is disproportionate on them.” He noted that, in 2012-13, 2,803 domestic abuse charges were not taken up because there was insufficient admissible evidence. His concern, therefore, was that “we are not providing the possibility of access to justice for a sizeable proportion of victims in those charges”.

262. ACC Graham considered the existence of the rule as an “unfair bar to justice”, in particular, “in the commission of the very offences that perhaps we would most seek to address, there is an intention on the part of the perpetrator to exploit some of the technical rules that prevent proceedings from taking place.”

263. Lily Greenan from Scottish Women’s Aid also welcomed the proposal as it would “provide the opportunity for the kinds of discussions that happen in backrooms at the moment to be heard in court”.

264. Alan McCloskey from Victim Support Scotland indicated that in his view it was also about victims, witnesses and the public having more confidence in the system. He noted that if removing the requirement would allow “more cases to be considered and potentially taken forward on the basis of a reasonable prospect of conviction … that will allow confidence in the system”.\textsuperscript{292}

265. However, not all witnesses were convinced whether ‘access to justice’ would be served by taking such an approach. Indeed, there was a variety of views on exactly what ‘access to justice’ means. A supplementary written submission from the COPFS stated that “it is important to be clear at the outset that the abolition of the requirement for corroboration is not about improving detection or conviction rates … it is about improving access to justice for victims”.\textsuperscript{293} However, Lord Gill responded to this point by stating that “I think that that is a rather simplistic statement from the Crown”. He went on to state that “if your case is unlikely to succeed, I am not convinced that you are doing the complainer any favours by bringing it; after all, it is an ordeal for them”.\textsuperscript{294}

266. Lord Gill said that that he was also concerned that the removal of the requirement for corroboration would have a deleterious impact on the quality of justice in Scotland. He agreed that there was a concern to ensure that sexual crime and domestic abuse are properly and effectively prosecuted. However, he was concerned that abolishing the requirement for corroboration would result in weak cases with uncorroborated evidence being brought forward. He therefore questioned whether juries would convict on the word of one person with nothing else to support it.\textsuperscript{295}

267. Mr Harrower from the Edinburgh Bar Association considered the removal of the requirement for corroboration to be “a massive step simply to get at crimes that are committed in private”. He said he believed that other options should also be explored, suggesting that “we need to be more imaginative if we want to assist the Crown in finding ways to support complainers’ evidence rather than removing corroboration across the board”.\textsuperscript{296}

268. There was also a general expectation that abolishing the requirement for corroboration would increase the number of cases prosecuted, particularly in the case of sexual abuse, rape and domestic violence.

269. In his review, Lord Carloway referred to research which the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) had been commissioned to carry out to examine the impact that removal of the requirement for corroboration would have on the number of cases brought forward for prosecution. In his report, he highlighted the result of this research, noting that the results suggested that “a substantial proportion of cases, which are currently not prosecuted because they fail the corroboration test, could be prosecuted with the reasonable prospect of securing a conviction”.\textsuperscript{297} The quality of this research was challenged during evidence.

\textsuperscript{292} Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report, 10 December 2013 Col 3901.}
\textsuperscript{293} Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. Supplementary written submission, paragraph 4.
\textsuperscript{297} \textit{The Carloway Review}, paragraph 7.2.34.
270. The COPFS stated in its written evidence that, in preparing for this Bill, it had, with the police, conducted further research into the impact of the abolition of the requirement on the number of cases that could be brought forward. It reported that the result of the exercises suggested “a 1.5% increase in the number of cases which will be reported to the COPFS by the police; a 1% increase in COPFS summary business; and a 6% increase in COPFS solemn business.” Further details of this exercise are set out in the Financial Memorandum which accompanied the Bill. Again, these projections were challenged during evidence.

271. Raymond McMenamin from the Law Society of Scotland warned that it was “easy for some people to be swayed by the numbers game” and therefore emphasised that the issue should not be approached on this basis, noting the need to “look at each case individually and decide whether it is appropriate to bring a prosecution and whether it is in the public interest”.

272. Professor Duff warned against removing the requirement for corroboration simply to enable more cases to be prosecuted. In his view, this could actually result in an increase in acquittals and therefore more unhappiness on the part of the victims. He therefore concluded that “rather than resolving the problem with a quick fix, the Government would have succeeded in making the problem worse”.

273. Professor Ferguson shared this view, cautioning against taking forward the proposal just to get more people access to court. She acknowledged that, for some, it was about getting the accused into court, however, the vast majority were looking for a conviction. She therefore noted the danger that “expectations will be raised and people will go to the police and say, ‘I know it’s just my word against his, but that’s good enough now because there’s no corroboration requirement’, but it will not be good enough because juries will not convict.”

274. All witnesses shared the view that the conviction rate for cases of sexual offences and domestic abuse was unsatisfactory. However, there were differing views on whether removing the requirement for corroboration would significantly address this.

275. The Lord Advocate told the Committee that “it has been said that the abolition of corroboration is intended to increase the conviction rate for rape or other sexual offending [but] I have never seen that as the purpose and I have never ever said that it was all about increasing the conviction rate”.

276. While Professor John Blackie from the University of Strathclyde agreed that the low conviction rate for sexual offences was of serious concern, he also agreed that abolishing the corroboration requirement would not necessarily change that. He considered the rate of sexual offences to be a concern which required more

---

298 Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, Written submission, paragraph 35
299 Financial Memorandum, paragraph 32 serious consideration and was worried “if abolition of corroboration was being seen as a quick fix … to a serious social and justice problem”.

277. James Wolffe QC from the Faculty of Advocates considered there to be uncertainty as to the practical effect of the provisions. He noted that—

“At first flush one might expect the rate of conviction for sexual crimes to decrease, because one is prosecuting crimes with a lesser evidential basis [however] there might be an increase in the conviction rate, not in sexual cases but across the board. Whether that will be so, and what the implications for the system and its resourcing will be, are anyone’s guess.”

278. Ms Barton of Rape Crisis Scotland agreed that removing the requirement for corroboration would not of itself make a difference in improving the conviction rates for offences committed in private but that, although the numbers involved may be small, the cases are significant to the people involved”. She also regarded the proposal “as an important step forward” and that “alongside other important measures, it could make the difference”.

279. Professor Duff said that he shared the view that abolishing the requirement for corroboration would not necessarily increase the conviction rate. In addressing this point, he suggested, as a different approach to cases of rape and other sexual assaults, reform that would allow the appointment of a lawyer to safeguard the complainer’s interest during the trial.

280. In response to these points, the Lord Advocate indicated that he did not consider the justice system to be about conviction rates; instead it was about delivering justice. He reiterated his view that enabling greater access to justice was the main objective in bringing forward this change, noting that, in his experience, “people have wished for the opportunity for their version of events and account to be heard in a court of law with the possibility that the jury, with the burden of proof and all the protections, would reach a verdict on that”.

281. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice confirmed his view that corroboration must be abolished “because it is denying access to justice for not tens or hundreds but thousands of people each year”. In terms of the number of convictions, he acknowledged that decisions on guilt and innocence rest with the judiciary and the jury, however, he considered that, by not providing access to justice, “we are not giving victims the opportunity to have closure.”

282. The Cabinet Secretary could not confirm or guarantee that any particular offence prosecuted as a result of abolishing the rule would result in a conviction.

---

308 Professor Duff. Written evidence, paragraph 5.
However, he accepted that this was a matter of speculation; nevertheless, he said he believed that “it is likely that increased access to justice will lead to more convictions”.

Quality of evidence

283. Some witnesses had concerns regarding the perceived artificial nature of the requirement for corroboration. In particular, it was argued that the requirement for corroboration resulted in a focus on the quantity of evidence, as it needed to come from two separate sources, rather than the quality of evidence. Lord Carloway highlighted this as one of his arguments in favour of abolition.

284. ACC Graham, agreeing with this position, said that, “in some cases, an assessment of the quality and sufficiency of the evidence as a whole is prevented because of a technical barrier in one of the facts of the charge not being corroborated technically in the way that the law is constructed”.

285. Ms Greenan from Scottish Women’s Aid echoed this view and identified issues in the current application of the requirement which meant that there could be a temptation for investigators and prosecutors to say “we’ve ticked the two boxes—we can put that one forward”. She emphasised that this was not a criticism of how the fiscal service operates as a rule but that it was “just a recognition that, when people are pressured, they do the minimum that they need to do to move on to the next thing on their list.”

286. However, some witnesses were concerned that the abolition of the rule would have a detrimental impact on the quality of evidence being presented. In particular, it was suggested that there may be a temptation to try to bring more cases forward with less chance of conviction as the bar set by corroboration would no longer apply.

287. Mr Harrower from the Edinburgh Bar Association highlighted the need for good quality evidence, noting that “juries find it difficult to assess cases involving crimes, particularly of a sexual nature, that are committed in private” and that “the case very often boils down to one person’s word against another’s”. He was therefore concerned that this would become more difficult without the requirement for corroboration, noting that—

“Currently the cases that go to court have that element of additional evidence. What is proposed is that we put cases into court where that additional element is absent. How can we expect juries to be more sure where that evidence is not there?”

Police and Crown investigations

288. Some witnesses had concerns that, without the legal requirement for corroboration, police officers and prosecutors might come under pressure to do the minimum required, not always looking for corroborative evidence even if it might be expected to be available.

---

289. Lord Gill was concerned that, as corroboration was costly in terms of police time and resources, the prosecution might not look for corroboration when it was not required. In particular, at a time when resources were scarce he said he believes that it would be unfortunate if “economies were to be made in that direction”.318

290. Mr Wolfe QC echoed this concern, noting that “significant additional costs” had been identified for criminal justice bodies as a result of provisions of the Bill.319 However, the expectation set out in the Financial Memorandum was that these new costs would be absorbed without any increase in funding. He acknowledged that, if the removal of the requirement was the right thing to do, the means to resource this would have to be found. However, his main concern was that “a system that one might already regard as stretched will become overstretched” and that “any investigation that does not have to be carried out might not be”.320

291. The COPFS emphasised that it was the requirement for corroboration that was being abolished, not the concept of corroboration itself. It confirmed therefore that—

“In many cases corroborative evidence as we currently understand it will be available. In all cases the police and the COPFS will look for evidence which supports the credibility of the allegation of the commission of a crime as it is this supporting evidence which will often be a check and balance against possible injustice.”321

292. The COPFS also indicated that, irrespective of the proposed changes, the standard of proof remained that a charge must be proved beyond reasonable doubt, which was the main safeguard against miscarriages of justice.322

293. The Lord Advocate confirmed that the police and prosecutors are under a number of obligations to properly investigate cases. Police are under a common law duty to investigate a case fully. Under the ECHR, prosecutors and the police are under a duty to “properly and fully investigate cases and bring forward all relevant evidence”.323 Police and prosecutors are also under a duty in their disclosure obligations to ensure that cases are properly investigated and that any evidence in favour of or adverse to an accused person is properly disclosed. Finally, prosecutors are under duties to ensure that trials are conducted fairly.324

294. ACC Graham also refuted the notion that the proposal was resource driven, highlighting that “it is absolutely not the case that our support for the proposed

---

322 Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. Written submission, paragraph 34.
323 Article 6 of the ECHR seeks to protect the right to a fair trial.
changes to the law on corroboration is driven in any sense by financial pressures”. 325 He offered further reassurance, stating that—

“With neither hesitation nor qualification, I can say that the standard of investigation across the board would not change, were this law to be brought in as proposed. There is an absolute requirement on the police to undertake investigations, with diligence and rigour, to an evidential standard that is established through case law, which would not change as result of any of the bill’s proposals.” 326

295. This position was supported by Chief Superintendent O’Connor of the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents who noted that “in terms of policing nothing will change, because police officers will continue to go out there and conduct very comprehensive investigations and gather all the evidence” and that “full, detailed and comprehensive investigations will continue in the police service”. He added that he had “absolute confidence that the police service will continue to seek corroboration from whatever source; thereafter, it is a matter for the Crown to look at the veracity, sufficiency and competency of the different strands of evidence”. 327

296. The Cabinet Secretary said that he had no concerns in this area, noting the view of the Lord Advocate that “the police would always look for additional evidence”. He also highlighted concern at the current draw on resources resulting from application of the rule, which often required duplication of effort by police officers in a number of areas. 328 The Committee however, has concerns that there may be resource implications elsewhere.

New prosecutorial test

297. The Lord Advocate highlighted a proposed new prosecutorial test which would be in different terms to the current test (which he characterised as being largely based on an assessment of the quantity of evidence). As part of the new test, the prosecutor would have to make the following assessments—

(a) a quantitative assessment - is there sufficient evidence of the essential facts that a crime took place and the accused was the perpetrator?

(b) a qualitative assessment - is the available evidence admissible, credible and reliable?

(c) on the basis of the evidence, is there a reasonable prospect of conviction in that it is more likely than not that the court would find the case proved beyond reasonable doubt? 329

298. The COPFS stated that reform of the evidential part of the prosecutorial test would shift focus onto the credibility of the allegation and the quality of evidence which supports the allegation. It confirmed that only if a case meets the new evidential part of the test would the prosecutor consider what, if any, action to take in the public interest (this aspect would not change with public interest considerations remaining as at present). 330

---

299. Application of the test would “allow proceedings to be raised in a number of cases where at present the Crown cannot proceed due to a technical lack of corroboration for what are credible allegations where there is compelling supportive evidence”. 331 Finally, the COPFS confirmed that the test would be published as part of the Prosecution Code and that further guidance would be provided on the way this test would be applied. 332

300. The Lord Advocate indicated that, in applying the reasonable prospect of conviction test, it would be “necessary to look at the principal allegation, so the complainant’s version or account is considered” and whether the complainant’s account is “credible and reliable”. He also confirmed that a view would be reached on the “totality of the evidence” and that factors to be assessed would include “whether there is supporting evidence for the complainant’s account, whether it is circumstantial and what evidence there is against that account”. 333 He added that “I would not – and prosecutors would not – take up a case without any supporting evidence”. 334

301. Mr Wolffe QC had some reservations that this was not sufficient to allay fears about prosecutorial decisions should the requirement for corroboration be abolished. He argued that this was a constitutional issue as “the Parliament is looking at the statutory structures within which a trial will take place and the safeguards in that regard” but that the test would not be “enshrined in statute” and so far had been “the subject of relatively little debate”. 335

302. In particular, Mr Wolffe QC noted that “Lord Advocates come and go and may change their guidance” and therefore the application of the test and the guidance informing prosecutorial decisions was also subject to change. In particular, he highlighted the example of certain classes of individual identified in the COPFS written submission where it was confirmed that proceedings would not be taken without strong supporting evidence. His concern was that this demonstrated the test would be applied “in different ways to different classes of case” in ways that are “unclear and unknown”. His concerns therefore remain that the prosecutorial test is “not a legislative safeguard, and precisely how the test will be applied remains to be seen”. 336

303. Professor Chalmers echoed this concern, noting that “it would be wrong to suggest that [the new prosecutorial test] offered additional safeguards. All it does is ask the question that the prosecution would have to ask in the absence of the requirement for corroboration.”

304. Questions were also raised as to how any requirement for supporting evidence would work in practice. Professor Chalmers highlighted what he saw as the incoherence of a position where there would be no legal requirement for supporting evidence although “without it prosecutions will not go ahead”. 338 Professor Duff concurred with this view, questioning what the requirement for supporting evidence would mean in practice—

“If we do not need corroboration but need supporting evidence, one has to ask what that supporting evidence is. Actually, it is simply corroboration by another name, which is the position in most other jurisdictions”. 339

305. The Cabinet Secretary reiterated the Lord Advocate’s assertion that cases would not be brought forward without supporting evidence. He cited the situation in the Netherlands where to secure a conviction there had to be “additional evidence beyond the principal matter” which is a position he believes the Lord Advocate wishes to move towards in Scotland. In terms of ensuring that such an approach was secured in the future, he indicated that he would be happy to place the new prosecutorial test on the face of legislation and “enshrine what has to be proven before there can be a conviction”. 340

Dilution and complexity of the corroboration rule

306. Lord Carloway argued that the requirement for corroboration is a complex concept which is often misunderstood and misinterpreted. In his report, he stated that the complexities of the current requirement mean that there is difficulty in the rule being understood by people outside the world of criminal practice. He continued this argument further in oral evidence to the Committee where he said that “I do not think that the concept is particularly well understood by many of the legal profession [and this can be seen] by the decisions that continue to come out from the courts from time to time”. 341

307. Professor Duff agreed that the law on corroboration is very complex, noting that “judges have, on occasion, tried to find a way around it so that they can open the way to conviction for those who they think are guilty” and that “the problem is that the law has become so complicated that nobody really understands it properly.” 342

308. ACC Graham noted that the complexity of the rule had developed over time in order to “fit in with developments in society, legal process and evidential availability, and the original concept in very simple terms has perhaps been overtaken by all those changes and developments”. 343 The Lord Advocate followed up this point, noting that it is not only complex but that the interpretation of corroboration has changed over the years and that “prosecutors have been pretty creative in legal arguments to try to place cases before the court”.

309. Professor Chalmers accepted that it may well be the case that the rule is complex, however, he argued that any replacement would likely be equally as complex—

“We ought to remember that systems that do not have corroboration will safeguard against wrongful conviction through a wide range of different measures that are designed to prevent it. In the aggregate, those measures might turn out to be as complicated and confusing as corroboration itself. It is not clear that a system without corroboration is necessarily simpler.”

310. Professor Duff emphasised this point, noting that—“I would not say that corroboration should be abolished because it is complicated; it is complicated, but all evidentiary doctrines are complicated. I am not sure that one can really address it in an atomistic way ... without looking at the overall context.”

311. The Cabinet Secretary considered that these difficulties helped to justify the need to abolish the corroboration requirement as, in his experience, “we do not know what corroboration is”. He said that, when “two of our most senior academics” were asked to provide a synopsis of the law of corroboration, they admitted that they could not reach one on which they could agree.

312. His view was that “in the main laws should be understandable not just to lawyers but to the general public” and that “one lawyer will disagree with what another views as corroboration”. He therefore concluded that “when we cannot get the academics or the judiciary to agree on the law of corroboration ... we are leaving it to individuals to make a decision ... about access to justice, and there is something fundamentally wrong with that.”

Attitudes to sexual offences and domestic abuse

313. A more general issue raised during evidence related to the role public attitudes in general, and jury attitudes in particular, play in the low conviction rate for certain types of case, including rape. The Committee noted evidence that, whilst the law restricts research into the basis upon which juries come to decisions, prosecutors face significant difficulties in, for example, explaining why a rape victim may offer little physical resistance to an assailant.

314. Tony Kelly from Justice Scotland concurred that the conviction rate for incidents of violence against women is an issue. He stated that at the root of poor conviction rates were “prejudices and attitudes” and that “further consideration and work will be needed before we get anywhere near addressing that”. 350

315. Ms Barton from Rape Crisis Scotland noted that the Scottish Government had commissioned research which highlighted that “a quarter of people still believe that a woman is partly responsible [for any assault] if she has been drinking or if she has been wearing revealing clothing”. 351

316. The Lord Advocate was similarly concerned that public perceptions are an issue in relation to offences, such as rape, for example “that a woman who wears a short skirt is asking for it”. He also highlighted research conducted throughout the world into “jury myths”, including issues such as “delayed reporting, a lack of physical resistance, or the way that a woman is dressed” and how this affected how jurors viewed cases. 352 He noted that it was important to counter such attitudes in the presentation of cases 353 and that “through the national sexual crimes unit, we have been using expert evidence on many of what I call the rape myths to educate the jury as part of the trial process, and that work will continue”. 354

317. Ms Greenan from Scottish Woman’s Aid argued that “attitudes, assumptions and prejudice”, rather than evidence, could be the decisive factors in relation to successfully prosecuting some offences. She added that “the notion that removing the requirement for corroboration will in any way change that situation is false”. 355 She also claimed, however, that it would provide “a greater opportunity to have the discussions and probe the issues in the courtroom” and that “removing the requirement for corroboration would provide the opportunity for the kinds of discussions that happen in backrooms at the moment to be heard in the court”. To her, the important point was that “we will open up discussions about the evidence that really exists about violence against women by having them in the courtroom”. 356

318. Ms Barton agreed with this point. She also noted that this was part of a long-term picture that included access to judicial training, wider prevention work on changing values and attitudes and the introduction of female forensic examiners. This would all contribute towards “changing the culture of the courtroom and affording rights to complainers”. 357

319. When invited to respond to the suggestion that taking forward prosecutions which are more reliant on the evidence of the complainer alone would result in such complainers being subjected to more vigorous questioning in court, Lily Greenan responded that the “court cannot be any harder for victims in rape or sexual violence cases, who get grilled and ripped to shreds in court”. She added that—

“For victims of interpersonal crimes such as domestic abuse, rape and sexual assault, I do not see how it could be worse or how we could get a worse conviction—or failure—rate. I therefore do not accept those arguments as a reason not to consider abolishing the requirement for corroboration.”

320. Ms McCall from the SHRC acknowledged that corroboration is an impediment to certain types of cases getting to court, however she noted that this is not the only issue; “we need a much wider strategy to try to shift those cultural norms, if they are norms”. She indicated that, in terms of changing social attitudes, the SHRC had highlighted the need for “a comprehensive strategy for tackling violence against women, as well as an action plan for how to put that strategy into place”.

321. Professor Fiona Raitt from the University of Dundee highlighted a model she had been working on whereby a complainer in a rape or sexual assault case would receive legal advice during the hearing of their case. She noted that it was generally agreed that women who are aware of their rights relating to access to their medical and sensitive records were in a much stronger position in relation to the evidence they are able to give under cross-examination. She added that such complainers could not always rely on the judge or the Crown to protect their position in court and that this may be even more of an issue if the requirement for corroboration is abolished.

322. Professor Duff suggested that consideration should be given to introducing broader court procedures in considering how to address poor conviction rates in rape and sexual abuse trials. He considered that comparative research could be carried out to examine how such cases are conducted in other jurisdictions.

323. The Cabinet Secretary acknowledged that there are “various factors that we do not know in why juries come to decisions”. However, he said that he believed that the proposed changes would bring about greater confidence in the system which, in turn, would lead to more victims coming forward. His view was that, “if victims believe that the law provides support for them, they are more likely to report crimes and go through all the stages that can be traumatic for them”.

International comparisons

324. During his evidence session with the Committee, Lord Carloway indicated that, in having legal requirement for corroboration, Scotland was out of step with other countries. He noted that it is “the only country in the world that has the rule” and that in this regard “it was different from that in any other country in the civilised western world or the Commonwealth.”

---

325. Mr McMenamin took a different view, noting that Scotland is not the only jurisdiction that has a requirement for corroboration. He acknowledged that it was true that “our application of corroboration is more widespread and we rely on it more than any other country, but other countries also apply it”. He noted that the United States of America used corroboration a lot and that “research will show that other jurisdictions think that corroboration must be considered in many cases”. He added that in England “the system contains certain safeguards whereby judges in certain cases can caution juries regarding corroboration and prosecutions based on single-source evidence”.

326. Ms McCall emphasised the difficulty in making such comparisons, noting that “other systems have other safeguards to ensure the quality of evidence” and that “the difficulty with looking at other systems and saying that they do just fine without corroboration is that you are comparing apples and pears”.

327. Professor Ferguson also countered Lord Carloway’s argument, noting that colleagues from different jurisdictions had confirmed that, despite stating that they had no official requirement for corroboration, it did operate unofficially in other jurisdictions. She noted that “when we probed a bit more deeply, they all said ‘No prosecutor would go ahead without what you call corroboration or two pieces of evidence’ and that judges would not find someone guilty beyond reasonable doubt just on the witness of one complainer”.

328. Lord Gill argued that “we should be proud of the fact that we have something that other jurisdictions do not have. It is one of the great hallmarks of Scottish criminal law.”

Retrospective application of abolition of requirement for corroboration

329. Section 59 of the Bill provides that abolition of the requirement for corroboration would not apply retrospectively. Thus, corroborated evidence would be required for the prosecution of offences committed before the date of abolition.

330. Petition 1436 in the name of Collette Barrie calls for retrospective application. The Committee agreed to consider the petition alongside its consideration of the Bill on 24 September 2013.

331. Ms Barrie argued that making abolition retrospective would ensure full access to justice for victims of crime and noted that, by doing so, “perpetrators of the most heinous acts [would be] held to account for their actions and prevented from harming others”.

---

369 Collette Barrie. Written submission, page 5.
332. In its written evidence, Rape Crisis Scotland concluded that to not make this change to the legislation retrospective would in effect mean that “survivors of historic child sexual abuse or rape will continue to face this barrier to justice.”

333. In terms of the appropriateness of the provisions applying retrospectively, Ms Barrie drew a parallel with the Double Jeopardy (Scotland) Act 2011 which allows for retrospective application of its provisions. She noted that, during the passage of that Bill, it was argued that “it is immaterial whether the conviction or, as the case may be, the acquittal was before or after the coming into force of the Act.”

334. However, a number of witnesses argued strongly against retrospective application when questioned on the point during oral evidence. It was described as “unworkable and inappropriate” and “fundamentally unconstitutional” by Mr McMenamin and Mr Wolfe QC. Robin White of the Scottish Justice’s Association said that “there are almost never any justifications for any retrospective criminal legislation”.

335. The Cabinet Secretary said that, although he had sympathy for those who seek to bring in the provision retrospectively, he did not consider such an approach to be possible. He argued that any attempt to remove the need for corroboration in relation to offences committed before commencement of the relevant provisions could cause confusion and “great difficulties for prosecution”.

Requirement for corroboration as a safeguard

336. A principal argument put forward for retaining the requirement for corroboration was its central importance within the Scottish criminal justice system and its importance as a check against miscarriages of justice (in the sense of wrongful convictions).

337. Lord Gill stated that the requirement for corroboration is an important protection that has reduced the number of miscarriages of justice. He therefore emphasised his fear that “there would be many more [miscarriages of justice] if corroboration were to be abolished”.

338. Mr Harrower echoed this position, indicating that the relatively low number of miscarriages of justice in Scotland could be attributed to the high bar set by the requirement for corroboration. He also said he was concerned that miscarriages of justice would increase if the requirement was abolished as “it stands to reason that, if we lower the standards that are required, we will convict more innocent people”. He argued that juries are currently assisted by existence of the 370 Rape Crisis Scotland. Written submission, paragraph 2.2.

371 Collette Barrie. Written submission, page 5.
corroboration requirement when trying to establish the truth of matter and that it was regarded as "an independent check" for both juries and sheriffs. 376

339. Professor Duff highlighted the pressure on prosecutors in sexual assault and domestic violence cases, noting that "they are under great political pressure to prosecute every case". His concern was that, without the protection of the requirement for corroboration, cases which are reliant on the evidence of a single individual would be prosecuted, thus increasing "the danger of miscarriages of justice". 377

340. Mr Wolffe QC stated that, given the significance of the requirement for corroboration in the overall context of the Scottish criminal justice system, "one must look very hard at what one is putting in its place, and one must ask whether one is getting the right balance between safeguards against miscarriages of justice on the one hand, and a reasonable system for prosecuting crime on the other". 378

341. Mr Kelly of Justice Scotland cautioned that without corroboration and with nothing added to safeguard against wrongful conviction, Scotland may be in breach of article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights (right to a fair trial). He said that if the requirement for corroboration was taken away, "it is difficult to see what the argument would be when Scotland goes to the European Court of Human Rights to respond to an accused person’s complaint that he has not had a fair trial". 379

342. Lord Carloway acknowledged the perception that corroboration is central to the criminal justice system, stating that "more than any other feature of the criminal justice system, it is seen by many as a defining and distinctive characteristic of the Scots law of evidence in criminal cases". 380

343. He also acknowledged that "the necessity of having corroborated evidence has ... lain at the heart of the criminal justice system since time immemorial and has been, and still is, regarded by many as an "invaluable safeguard' against the occurrence of miscarriages of justice". However, he said that he could find no evidence that the requirement served this purpose, instead concluding that "the real protection against miscarriages of justice at first instance is the standard of proof required; that the judge or jury must not convict unless convinced of guilt beyond reasonable doubt". 381 He backed up this assertion with evidence from his review, confirming that during that process "we were given no material to suggest that there is a difference and that the rule in relation to corroboration reduces the likelihood or incidence of miscarriage of justice in our jurisdiction". 382

344. In the broader sense, Lord Carloway said that the requirement was actually creating miscarriages of justice "because perfectly legitimate cases that would

---

380 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.2.1.
381 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.2.41
result in a conviction are not being prosecuted because of the corroboration rule.\textsuperscript{383}

345. ACC Graham advised the Committee that he had not heard any credible evidence to support the view that there would be an increase in miscarriages of justice. He was also reassured that sufficient provisions were in place to avoid this happening. In particular, he noted that “the burden of proof, the test of sufficiency of evidence put before the court and all the other measures for carrying out a qualitative assessment of the inadmissibility and so on of the evidence are in place”.\textsuperscript{384} The Lord Advocate echoed this point, noting that the standard of proof remained the same and that it was “a matter for the jury whether, having tested the evidence, they find the case to be proven beyond reasonable doubt”.\textsuperscript{385}

346. Mr McCloskey from Victim Support Scotland stated that—“There would still need to be a reasonable prospect of conviction, and the jury or the judge will have to consider that the matter is proved beyond reasonable doubt. Those absolute cornerstones of our system will still be there, and they should remain.”\textsuperscript{386}

Sufficiency of protection after abolition

347. Mr Wolffe QC expressed serious concerns about the proposed abolition of the corroboration requirement without having proper safeguards in place to address any change to the balance of justice. He noted that there is a need to examine the issue—

“In the context of the other things that have been done by way of adjusting and compensating in a system that has until now—in ways that cannot be overemphasised—been fundamentally based on that doctrine being at the heart of our criminal justice system”.\textsuperscript{387}

348. Mr Harrower was similarly concerned, noting that—

“Miscarriage of justice cases are very costly for the system in terms of both money and public confidence. Until now, we have managed to avoid them for a reason and, to me, corroboration is the main reason.”\textsuperscript{388}

349. Ms McCall also urged caution in relation to abolishing the corroboration requirement without considering what other measures should be introduced in its place. She noted that access to justice for an accused person includes there being the proper means by which to challenge the quality of evidence against him—

“At present, corroboration serves that function as a means of quality control. If we abolish it without reassessing the system and seeing what other safeguards might be needed, there will be nothing, apart from the ability to cross-examine, to provide the proper means to challenge the reliability of evidence.”

350. Ms McCall cited examples of types of evidence where there would be difficulties if the requirement for corroboration were abolished. These included dock identification which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had determined was acceptable in conjunction with the requirement for corroboration. The European Court of Human Rights had also expressed concerns about evidence from anonymous witnesses and undercover witnesses “due to the difficulty for the defence to challenge its quality and ensure its integrity”. Ms McCall said she was therefore of the view that examples of this type highlighted “the breadth of the implications of abolishing corroboration across the system” and that time therefore needed to be taken “to examine the matter properly.”

351. In terms of the possibility of miscarriages of justice, the Cabinet Secretary’s view was that—

“We should recognise that the requirement for corroboration has not avoided miscarriages of justice here, and equally that the lack of corroboration has not resulted in them elsewhere. They occur for a variety of reasons. The fact that we are one of the few countries that have a commission to review criminal cases is a tribute and testimony to the serious view that we take of the matter. That is the position.”

352. With regard to ECHR compliance, the Cabinet Secretary confirmed that “a victim might choose eventually to go to Europe to challenge the system because they are not getting access to justice” as a result of the barrier presented by the current corroboration requirement.

353. In terms of further review, he accepted that issues highlighted, such as dock identification, needed to be examined further in terms of the impact of the abolition of the requirement would have on using such evidence. He also said that he was open to further suggestions of areas that would require review, acknowledging that “we cannot go from the old regime to the new regime without ensuring that we have it right”. He indicated that the Scottish Government was happy to take the time to get it right.

354. The Cabinet Secretary confirmed that, although there was urgency to implement the changes as quickly as possible, it had always been the Scottish Government’s intention that the changeover to the new system would not be triggered until 2015. This would allow time for the necessary training for “not just police officers but the judiciary and prosecutors”.

Retention of corroboration in certain cases

355. An alternative proposal was to remove the requirement for corroboration only in respect of certain types of cases, such as rape, sexual abuse and domestic abuse.

356. In its submission, the Scottish Parliament’s Cross Party Group on Adult Survivors of Childhood Sexual Abuse suggested that wider definitions of corroboration should be permitted in private cases as it would seem disproportionate “to do away with corroboration for all crimes when it only impedes justice in some cases”.

357. However, Lord Gill did not consider that retaining corroboration only in relation to certain cases to be “a wise approach”, noting that “if you legislated specifically for one type of offence and relaxed the evidential requirements in respect of it, you could create, in a sense, a privileged class of complainers for that type of crime”. He therefore concluded that “the legislation must apply across the board”.

358. Ms Greenan agreed with Lord Gill’s point, stating that “the justice system should be for everyone on an equal basis”. She also highlighted the importance of not complicating matters in solemn cases noting that “technical directions to juries are problematic in terms of what counts and what does not count” and therefore that “anything that makes the process more complicated is going to be harder”.

359. Mr Harrower also noted that cases very often came to court with a number of different charges and so there was potential for confusion, particularly for juries—

“If a complainer has alleged a number of different types of crime against the same person, how do we explain to a jury that charges 1 and 2 do not require corroboration but charges 3 and 4 do? Juries have to absorb a lot of directions in a short space of time, it is sometimes difficult for them to get their heads around them but they do their best. It will make things very complicated if we create certain classes of case in which corroboration is not required.”

360. The Cabinet Secretary confirmed that such an approach had been considered but concluded that the law of evidence “should be, in the main, clear across the board” and that taking such a step would “cause great difficulties for those who operate the system”.403

---

Additional safeguards

361. Lord Carloway, in his review, did not anticipate the need for additional safeguards in the event that the requirement for corroboration was abolished. He said that he did not think the system needed to be rebalanced as he did not accept the argument that the corroboration requirement is a protection against miscarriages of justice.

362. However, a significant number of responses to the Scottish Government’s consultation on Lord Carloway’s recommendations404 reached a different conclusion, highlighting the need for additional safeguards to be introduced should the requirement for corroboration be abolished. Given the central role that the requirement for corroboration plays, there was a strong view that additional provisions needed to be in put in place to protect against wrongful convictions.

363. Lord Gill stated that—

“If there is a good solid case for abolishing corroboration, there should be no need for any safeguards. The moment that we say that there have to be safeguards, we are conceding that the change creates a risk of miscarriage of justice, which in my view, it will”.405

364. In response to concerns such as these, the Scottish Government launched a second consultation, with a view to providing additional safeguards, seeking views on three additional areas of possible reform: (a) changes to the current system under which a guilty verdict only requires the support of eight out of 15 jurors; (b) giving the judge in a jury trial the power to acquit the accused, without referring the matter to the jury; and (c) removing the ‘not proven’ verdict as an option in criminal cases.

365. While reform in all three areas was generally welcomed, some reservations were expressed at introducing (b) and (c) as safeguards. Therefore, the only additional safeguard included in the Bill relates to the jury majority required in order to reach a guilty verdict (requiring a two-thirds majority of jurors in order to establish guilt).

Guilty verdict

366. The proposed reform to the rules on jury majorities (within the context of the planned abolition of the requirement for corroboration) was not one of the main issues highlighted in evidence to the Committee. It was, however, argued that reform in this area alone would not provide a sufficient additional safeguard, although it might be desirable.

367. Professor Duff suggested that this provisions in the Bill appeared to be “rather plucked out of thin air” and that there was “no evidence to support whether that would make any difference and no detailed consideration of it”. 406

368. Mr McMenamin had similar concerns, querying how the figure of 10 out of 15 had been reached and noting that “no research has been carried out on the matter”. In terms of the adequacy of the provision as a safeguard, he compared it to the English system, where corroboration is not used in such a widespread fashion, but—

“Juries are in the first instance, directed to return unanimous verdicts. Only on the judge’s direction can there be a 10 out of 12 majority verdict for a conviction, which is still a substantially higher standard than 10 out of 15.” 407

369. Mr Kelly was also not convinced that the change would provide the necessary safeguards. He noted Justice Scotland’s position that there was nothing “particularly significant or scientific about plucking a magic figure out—pushing the majority figure up and then tweaking it in the event of jury members falling out”. He added that there was no reason that this would ensure “proof beyond reasonable doubt” and “in the absence of any research or further work, we thought that that was quite a blunt way to deal with the removal of corroboration”. 408

370. Ms Barton was not convinced of the need for the safeguard, observing that “it feels as if it is being suggested in response to popular opposition to the removal of corroboration”. Rape Crisis Scotland is, she said, opposed to an increase in the jury majority “because of what we know about prejudicial views, particularly in cases of sexual violence”. 409

371. However, there was a general view that changing the jury majority requirement in returning a guilty verdict was a positive step in improving confidence in the criminal justice system, even irrespective of the corroboration debate.

372. Michael McMahon MSP gave evidence to the Committee on this Bill in the context of his own Criminal Verdicts (Scotland) Bill, which makes almost identical provision in relation to the majority required for a jury to return a guilty verdict. The proposal to reform the majority rules was advanced as a balance to the proposal to remove the ‘not proven’ verdict, which his Bill also seeks to achieve.

373. In terms of the general need for reform in this area, Mr McMahon highlighted the need for public confidence “that a jury has considered the evidence and found … beyond reasonable doubt”. He also highlighted that there was a general view expressed in response to his consultation that “the fact that very serious cases can be concluded one way or another on a straight majority needs to be looked at”. 410

---

374. Lord Carloway acknowledged that “the increase in the numbers necessary for a verdict of guilty from eight to 10 may result in greater confidence in the criminal justice system at solemn level”. However, he argued that there needed to be greater consideration given to how the majority operated in the context of other systems.\textsuperscript{411}

375. The Cabinet Secretary noted that the provision had been made in response to the consultation as it provides an additional safeguard following the removal of the requirement for corroboration, which he considered to be “a reasonable position to be in”.\textsuperscript{412}

\textit{Power of judge and reasonable jury}

376. As part of its consultation on safeguards, the Scottish Government also sought views on the option of giving the judge in a jury trial the power to acquit an accused on the basis that no reasonable jury could consider the case to have been proved beyond reasonable doubt on the basis of the evidence led.

377. This option is not included in the Bill as introduced. This is on the basis that, despite the majority of respondents supporting the proposal, the majority of the Senators of the College of Justice, who would be responsible for making decisions on whether to remove a case from the jury in High Court trials, were opposed to it. The senators’ response argued that the system was based on the jury being the judges of fact and that such a reform would usurp the function of the jury.\textsuperscript{413}

378. Mr Wolffe QC noted that such a power existed in the appeal process and so “logically, that implies that we recognise that, on occasion, juries bring in verdicts that are unreasonable”. He was therefore of the view that it seemed “odd” that the judge, who was independent and impartial, highly trained and had heard the evidence, should not have the power to withdraw the case from the jury.\textsuperscript{414}

379. Ms McCall noted that, in terms of the Lord Advocate’s intention that cases should not come to court without supporting evidence, there may be circumstances where the supporting evidence brought by the Crown “does not pass muster”. In those circumstances, the judge would have “absolutely no power to do what the prosecutor would have done had he known the situation before the case came to court”.\textsuperscript{415}

380. Ms Greenan was of the view that giving such powers to judges and sheriffs would have to be accompanied by shrivial and judicial education.\textsuperscript{416} Ms Barton suggested that perhaps it should be left up to the jury to decide. She noted that the bar of no reasonable doubt would have to be reached “which is fairly high bar to reach”.\textsuperscript{417}

\textsuperscript{413} Policy Memorandum, paragraph 181.
381. The Cabinet Secretary acknowledged that he could “see some good reasons why it should be within the power of the judge to take a matter away from the jury if he or she believes that there is an insufficient case to go forward with”.

‘Not proven’ verdict

382. The Committee also received evidence on the third proposed safeguard consulted on by the Scottish Government, i.e. the abolition of the ‘not proven’ verdict.

383. Lord Carloway, in his review, suggested that “if the issue of majority verdicts were to be examined, a review of the three-verdict system would have to follow”. In addition, all of the academic experts on criminal law who gave oral evidence to the Committee did not see any problem with the ‘not proven’ verdict being reviewed.

384. As already noted, Michael McMahon MSP’s Criminal Verdicts (Scotland) Bill seeks to remove the option of the ‘not proven’ verdict. When giving evidence to the Committee, he suggested that the reform is necessary in order to maintain confidence in the judicial system as this second verdict of acquittal currently causes confusion.

385. The majority of respondents to the Scottish Government’s consultation favoured moving to a two-verdict system. However, a significant minority were concerned that time should be given to allow the impact of Lord Carloway’s recommendations to be assessed before making changes to the three-verdict system. The Scottish Government therefore concluded that the ‘not proven’ verdict should be retained for the time being until further consideration could be given to the appropriateness of possible reform in light of the other changes brought about by the Carloway review.

Summary cases

386. In terms of additional safeguards, it was noted that the change to the jury majority requirement would have no impact on summary cases where the sheriff or justice of the peace would determine guilt. In fact, the Committee received evidence that summary procedure accounts for over 90% of all cases that come to court, yet there are no additional safeguards proposed for summary cases.

387. However, some witnesses did not see the absence of any proposal for additional safeguards in relation to summary cases as a particular problem. Professor Ferguson argued that concerns relating to the requirement for corroboration being abolished were not as great in relation to summary cases. She noted that, “although [summary cases] form the bulk of the work of courts, the stakes are not as high as under solemn procedure”. Professor Duff agreed with this suggestion, stating that “decisions about guilt or innocence in [summary] cases would be made by sheriffs, who are experienced lawyers and who will … be well able to see the failures in witness testimony". 424

388. In relation to trials presided over by justices of the peace, Professor Blackie suggested that consideration could be given to whether it would be better to have three justices, instead of one, if the requirement for corroboration were abolished.425

389. However, Professor Chalmers urged some caution citing anecdotal evidence of sheriffs hearing cases where the evidence of a prosecution witness had been persuasive but was then shown to be unreliable by the evidence of witness cited to provide corroboration.426

390. Mr Kelly said that he had particular concerns about the safeguards available to the accused in summary cases should the requirement for corroboration be removed. He said that if “we do not have that, and in a summary case, we have nothing else, the irresistible conclusion would seem to be that there will be an unfair trial”.427

391. The Cabinet Secretary said that he considered the issue of safeguards in summary cases to be about “how the system operates in the new landscape” and that some of it would be down to judicial training through the Judicial Institute for Scotland.428

The need for further safeguards

392. A number of witnesses argued that it was not possible to identify a coherent package of checks and balances without more detailed analysis of how a system without the need for corroboration should operate. It was argued that such a review could not take place within the context of scrutinising the Bill. For this reason, witnesses were reluctant to offer more than examples of possible additional safeguards when questioned by the Committee.

393. Lord Gill described the existing system as “quite coherent and logical”, consisting of “a series of checks and balances that attempt to achieve not just fairness to the defence, but fairness to the prosecution as well”. He did not think that “you could take one brick out of the wall” without considering the consequences of doing so and therefore considered that the proposed changes had to be examined holistically, considering “all the various safeguards in the criminal system in the round”.

394. Mr McMenamin from the Law Society questioned the adequacy of the provisions, noting that “if the Bill passes into law in its present form we will be in danger of having a system of justice in which the safeguards against wrongful conviction are so minimal as to be capable of being described as basic”.429 Mr Wolfe QC echoed this point, advising that the proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration “with the very limited adjustment to the jury majority and no additional safeguards in summary cases is not one that the faculty can support”.

395. Professor Chalmers suggested that the question of safeguards could not be dealt with adequately during the passage of the Bill as the question was “very complex and would require extensive comparative research”. He therefore did not consider that it could be dealt with by way of amendment to the Bill.

396. Mr Wolffe QC agreed with this view, suggesting that it was important not to look at corroboration in isolation but to look “in the round at all the structures and rules of our criminal justice system”. He noted that, “over the years, a variety of options that form part of the suite of safeguards in other jurisdictions have been looked at in Scotland” but had been rejected on the basis of the “protection of corroboration”. He therefore concluded that, if the requirement for corroboration were abolished, “we have to look again at a variety of the rules that we apply routinely in our courts”.

397. Lord Gill suggested that the sorts of issues that would need to be examined as part of this process include: reconsideration of the admissibility of certain statements; re-examination of the use that can be made of confessions; re-examination of the right of the accused not to testify; and examination of the right of the accused to withhold his defence at the earliest stage of a prosecution.

398. The Cabinet Secretary said that he was not opposed to further work being carried out to consider what further safeguards would be required. He indicated that, although the Scottish Government remained “committed to the removal of the requirement for corroboration, [there was a need to] get the landscape right and we must balance the scales of justice”. He confirmed that the Scottish Government was “open to any suggestions for additional safeguards”.

399. When asked to confirm whether it was his intention that the Bill would contain provision to the effect that the abolition of the requirement for corroboration would not occur until a committee or some other vehicle had proposed safeguards with which the Justice Committee was satisfied, he confirmed, “yes, we are perfectly comfortable with that direction of travel.”

The case for further consideration

400. A general theme running through the evidence received was the need for holistic consideration to be given to the criminal justice system in light of the proposed changes. In addition to consideration being given to the need for further safeguards, some witnesses argued that a holistic review needed to be carried out of the consequences of the abolition of the rule, given its core function within the criminal justice system.

---

401. In oral evidence, Lord Gill emphasised that “the rule is not simply a technical rule of the law of evidence that can be changed as part of a discussion of evidence, it is part of the constitution of this country and one of the great legal safeguards in our criminal justice system”. He therefore argued that “a change of such profound importance ... should be made as part of a much wider consideration of criminal evidence and not simply as an ad hoc response to one particular decision of the United Kingdom Supreme Court, which is the situation in which we find ourselves”.

402. A number of witnesses concurred with this point. Mr Wolffe QC suggested that the issue should be examined by “looking at the whole criminal justice system in the round”. He asserted that “we need to look at the system at large and all its elements so that we can secure a system that strikes the right balance between prosecuting crimes effectively, including those sexual crimes and crimes of domestic abuse that rightly raise public concern, and avoiding miscarriages of justice”.

403. Mr McMenamin questioned the extent to which the provisions in the Bill had been properly consulted on and noted that the Law Society’s view was that these matters should have been “subject to consideration on a wider scale than has been the case”.

404. Mr Harrower also warned against removing the requirement for corroboration without giving proper consideration to the consequences of doing so. He cautioned that “we have to make sure that we do not make rash decisions, because once we get rid of corroboration, it will be gone. In my submission, that would be to the detriment of our system unless we have properly thought out checks and balances in its place.”

405. Mr Kelly from Justice Scotland agreed with these points, noting that “we just do not know what the consequences will be”. He suggested that areas of concern could be highlighted, however, “we do not know what effect removal will have on the overall fairness of trials in relation, not just to victims of sexual crimes, but to victims in general and accused persons in Scotland”.

406. Professor Duff said that he had been a member of the Carloway reference group which advised the review process. He indicated that the vast majority of experts in the group had wanted the issue of corroboration referred to the Scottish Law Commission. He noted that a range of views were held amongst the experts on corroboration but that they all thought that “if we are to remove corroboration, we have to have a very good think about it and about what all the other safeguards are”.

407. However, some opposition was expressed to this proposal. ACC Graham argued that Lord Carloway had had sufficient time to consider the issues and report to the Scottish Government. He also suggested that the time since the report had been published had allowed everyone to consider the matter carefully. Mr O’Connor from the ASPS and Mr Ross from SPF both concurred with this view, indicating that the police service “will do the same as we are doing now irrespective of whether the bill is passed as it is or not”. 443

---

408. The Lord Advocate regarded Lord Carloway’s review as “an extensive piece of work”, noting that “it took a year, there was a review group and a reference group, there were four or five roadshows, there were visits down south and to the continent, the review group spoke to experts and visited the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission and Glasgow sheriff court and there were various other matters, all of which are in Lord Carloway’s report”. 444

409. Lord Gill suggested that further consideration of the issue could be taken forward as part of the work of the Scottish Law Commission or by a Royal Commission. He noted that “the Government has appointed royal commissions, departmental commissions … to examine such issues” and suggested that such an exercise “would not necessarily take a lot of time or cause a great deal of delay”. 445

410. The Cabinet Secretary said that he remained convinced that the case for abolishing the requirement for corroboration had been made. However, he reiterated his position that he was happy for further consideration to be given to the need for additional safeguards. In doing so he acknowledged the need to take steps to ensure that “we do not remove a manifest injustice for those on one side of the equation and replace it with a manifest injustice for those on the other side”. 446

Committee’s conclusions

411. The proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration is seen as a controversial reform which has divided opinion on the Committee.

412. The majority of Committee Members are of the view that the case has not been made for abolishing the general requirement for corroboration and recommend that the Scottish Government consider removing the provisions from the Bill. They are concerned that the case for abolition has paid insufficient regard to the importance of this requirement within the Scottish criminal justice system, in ensuring that the system as a whole is properly balanced and gives due weight to the interests of those facing criminal allegations, complainers and society. In addition, they are not convinced that abolition would improve ‘access to justice’ in a meaningful way for victims of crimes, such as rape and domestic abuse, which are often difficult to successfully prosecute. Improving the situation for such victims must involve a lot more than prosecuting more cases without a realistic expectation of a significant increase in convictions.

413. Some Members of the Committee believe that the case for removing the requirement for corroboration has been made. They consider that access to justice will be improved by such a reform, in particular, for victims of crimes which often occur in private.

414. The Committee is convinced that, if the general requirement for corroboration continues to be considered, this should only occur following an independent review\(^{447}\) of what other reforms may be needed to ensure that the criminal justice system as a whole contains appropriate checks and balances. Any such review should consider the system in a holistic manner, looking at relevant procedures and safeguards during both investigation and prosecution of criminal allegations.

415. The majority of Committee Members do not believe, in the event that the requirement for corroboration is abolished, that concerns relating to the need for further reform can be adequately explored during the passage of the Bill. The Cabinet Secretary's proposal that the commencement of the provisions abolishing the requirement for corroboration be subject to a parliamentary procedure requires further explanation and consideration, which the Committee requires before Stage 2.

416. The Committee acknowledges that, in proposing a review of additional safeguards, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice has, in part, taken into account the concerns of witnesses. However, even at this late point in the Stage 1 process, the Committee has not received clarification from the Scottish Government regarding the timing and nature of any such review. The Cabinet Secretary’s letter dated 4 February 2014 came in the late stages of consideration of this report, and therefore cannot form part of this report. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to provide, prior to the Stage 1 debate, further information on any review of additional safeguards (including the proposed remit, who might be involved, likely timescales and options for implementing recommendations).

417. The Committee notes evidence from the Cabinet Secretary and Lord Advocate relating to a possible requirement for ‘supporting evidence’ in cases where corroboration is not available. Members of the Committee have, however, received only limited evidence on how this might operate in practice. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to provide more information on how any requirement for supporting evidence would differ from the current need for corroboration.

418. The Committee also notes the Cabinet Secretary’s willingness to consider placing a revised ‘prosecutorial test’ on the face of legislation. The Committee accepts that such a step might form part of new checks and balances in response to the proposed abolition of the requirement for corroboration, but recommends that the matter should be included for full consideration in any review process.

\(^{447}\) Margaret Mitchell, Alison McInnes and John Finnie believe that this review should be undertaken by a Royal Commission or the Scottish Law Commission.
419. The Committee is fully aware of continuing concerns relating to how the justice system responds to cases of rape, domestic abuse and other offences which often happen in private. Members note ongoing efforts to improve the situation for victims of such offences and agree that further steps need to be taken, including measures aimed at addressing low prosecution and conviction rates.

420. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to actively review all evidence relating to how improvements with regard to offences such as rape and domestic abuse may be achieved. This should include consideration of public attitudes as well as the justice system. In relation to the latter, all stages must be included, from initial contact with the police to the giving of evidence in court (e.g. whether victims of such offences should have access to legal advice and support where their personal or medical details may be revealed in court).

421. The Committee agrees that, if the requirement for corroboration is abolished, it should not apply retrospectively.

Section 62 - Statements by accused

422. Section 62 seeks to modify rules on the admissibility of hearsay evidence in criminal proceedings as they apply to both exculpatory and mixed statements made by an accused.

423. The section provides that evidence of such statements would no longer be held inadmissible, as evidence of any fact contained therein, on account of the evidence being hearsay. The section only applies to statements made by an accused in the course of being questioned (whether as a suspect or not) by the police or another official investigating an offence.448

Hearsay evidence

424. The law of evidence includes various rules restricting the use of hearsay evidence in criminal cases. In a 1995 report on the use of hearsay evidence in criminal proceedings, the Scottish Law Commission noted that:

“The rule against hearsay has been formulated as follows: ‘Any assertion other than one made by a person while giving oral evidence in the proceedings is inadmissible as evidence of any fact or opinion asserted.’

The term ‘hearsay’ is misleading since the rule applies not only to statements made orally but also to statements made in documents and to statements made by means of conduct such as signs or gestures: all are inadmissible as evidence of the truth of the matters stated, unless an exception to the rule applies.”450

448 Explanatory Notes, paragraph 144
449 ‘Hearsay evidence’ is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted.
425. According to the Policy Memorandum, hearsay evidence is not generally admissible in court as—

“There is perceived to be a problem in an accused person being able to lead evidence at his trial of exculpatory statements as a substitute for giving evidence, not least because it might otherwise be expedient for an accused person to provide a carefully prepared narrative to a credible person shortly before the trial rather than giving evidence in person at court, so potentially avoiding cross-examination by the prosecution”.\(^{452}\)

426. A number of exceptions rendering hearsay evidence admissible already exist. Exculpatory statements can be admitted as evidence that an accused person’s story is consistent, “where the accused has given evidence and his credibility or reliability is challenged and not as proof of fact.”\(^{453}\)

427. A ‘mixed statement’ (ie one which is partly incriminatory and partly exculpatory) is admissible at the instance of the Crown in relation to proof of fact. However, where such a statement is led by the Crown, “both the incriminatory and exculpatory elements of the statement could be admissible as proof of fact.”\(^{454}\)

428. A confession made by an accused person is also covered by an exception to the general rule against hearsay evidence and is admissible as evidence of the truth of the things said. This exception has been justified on the basis that a person has less interest in lying where a statement is purely incriminatory.\(^{455}\)

429. Lord Carloway noted “a perception that there is a problem in an accused being able to lead evidence at his/her trial of exculpatory statements, or even partly exculpatory statements, as a substitute for giving evidence”.\(^{456}\) However, he argued that it was difficult to justify the exclusion of exculpatory answers given during a police investigation where, in relation to the right to a fair trial under ECHR, a police interview may be regarded as part of the trial process.

430. He further argued that the current rules relating to the admissibility of exculpatory and mixed statements are contrary to the principle of the free assessment of evidence unencumbered by restrictive rules, as well as being unnecessarily complex and confusing.\(^{457}\)

431. He therefore concluded in his review that—

“The current law on the admissibility of mixed and exculpatory statements made by a person during a police interview is not based on a rational and balanced approach to the relevance of statements. It is highly complex and potentially confusing to juries and others in the criminal justice system. It is at

---

\(^{451}\) Exculpatory evidence’ is evidence favourable to the defendant in a criminal trial that exonerates the defendant of guilt.

\(^{452}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 150.

\(^{453}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 151.

\(^{454}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 152.

\(^{455}\) SPICe briefing, page 31.

\(^{456}\) Carloway Review, paragraph 7.4.3.

\(^{457}\) Carloway Review, paragraph 7.0.8.
odds with the principle of the free assessment of evidence unencumbered by restrictive rules; and it fails to take account of the role of the police interview as part of the trial process.

432. The Scottish Government agreed with this conclusion and the Bill therefore implements Lord Carloway’s recommendations in this area by providing that, where a statement is made by an accused person to a constable or other person investigating an offence, it is not inadmissible as evidence on account of being hearsay.

Committee consideration

433. The evidence received by the Committee was generally supportive of the provision. For example, the Sheriff’s Association said that the current rules are “far too complex and unlikely to be understood by juries however carefully framed the directions given to them are”. It did conclude, however, that the provisions must be “subject to the right of any party, and the judge, to make comment on them as regards the circumstances in which the statements were made, their content and what inferences could legitimately be drawn from the statement”.

434. On the other hand, the Law Society of Scotland noted that the existing rule was designed to prevent an accused from avoiding giving evidence on oath and being subject to cross-examination. The new provision would, therefore, “allow an accused alleged to have committed a sexual assault to have his position of consent considered without going into the witness box”.

435. On balance, the Committee considers that there is a case for a review of the role of hearsay evidence in the criminal justice system but that this should be included in any wider review of the law of evidence.

PART 3: SOLEMN PROCEDURE

Management of sheriff and jury cases: background

436. Under current rules, the main stages of a sheriff and jury case (sheriff court cases dealt with under solemn procedure) are:

- initial decision to prosecute under solemn procedure;
- appearance of accused on petition;
- indictment;
- appearance of accused at first diet; and

458 Carloway Review, paragraph 7.4.19.
459 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 154.
460 Sheriff’s Association. Written submission, page 13
462 The first two stages are common to solemn procedure cases which are ultimately dealt with in both the sheriff courts and the High Court.
463 Following further consideration (including possible discussion with the defence) the COPFS may decide that it is appropriate to proceed with a prosecution under solemn procedure with a view to holding a sheriff and jury trial; where this is the case, the COPFS prepares a document known as the indictment setting out the final charges and notifying the accused of the dates for the first diet and trial sitting.
437. Current time limits for sheriff and jury cases are as follows:

- 80 day rule (custody cases) – an accused who has been remanded in custody at the petition stage is entitled to be released on bail if not served with an indictment within 80 days of the warrant committing the accused for trial (the time limit can be extended by the court);
- 110 day rule (custody cases) – an accused who has been detained for more than 110 days without the trial commencing is entitled to be released on bail (the time limit can also be extended by the court); and
- 12 month rule (applicable where accused released on bail) – the trial must commence within 12 months of the accused’s first appearance on petition (the time limit can be extended by the court), with failure resulting in the case falling and the accused no longer facing prosecution.

438. The Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure led by Sheriff Principal Bowen, which reported in 2010, made a number of recommendations aimed at achieving “more efficient and cost effective management of cases which he considered would have the additional benefit of reducing inconvenience and stress to the victims, witnesses and jurors involved”. The review report noted a range of concerns in relation to how sheriff and jury procedures work in practice, including:

- the need for improved communication between prosecution and defence;
- too many cases in which the parties have not reached the appropriate stage of preparation by the time of the first diet;
- a need for greater consistency in the management of cases by sheriffs;
- problems arising from trial sittings being overloaded with cases on the assumption that most trials will not proceed; and
- evidence of relatively inexperienced prosecutors having to manage a significant administrative burden of trial sittings with large numbers of cases whilst, at the same time, starting a trial.

Replicating High Court reform
439. The proposals in the Bill generally replicate the Bonomy reforms in the High Court. Sheriff Principal Bowen told the Committee that “aspects of the High Court model are acknowledged to be a considerable improvement—particularly the fact that trial sittings now proceed”. 471

440. There was some concern amongst witnesses as to whether measures that work effectively in the High Court would also work in relation to the much greater numbers of cases dealt with in the sheriff courts. For example, the Faculty of Advocates stated that “the volume of cases in the sheriff court and the pressure on COPFS, particularly in Glasgow and Edinburgh will make it a difficult task to transpose, in effect, High Court procedure into the sheriff court”. 472

441. However, the Cabinet Secretary told the Committee that “the change has worked remarkably well [in the High Court] and that, given the nature of the High Court, it should work reasonably well in sheriff and jury cases”. 473 He did acknowledge that “the challenge is that there are more cases in the sheriff and jury system”, but went on to say that “the principles, such as taking an early focus, minimising what has to be discussed and debated and ensuring that we inconvenience people as little as possible if they do not have to be cited or called, are the same”. 474

442. Those proposals in Sheriff Principal Bowen’s review requiring legislative reform are, in broad terms, taken forward through this Bill and are discussed in turn below.

Pre-trial time limits

443. Sheriff Principal Bowen recommended changes to the statutory time limits in sheriff and jury cases aimed at allowing more time for the better preparation of cases and reducing some of the pressures caused by higher levels of business. His report stated that “a high volume of cases, each compressed into a short timescale, results in late pleas and adjournments through lack of time to prepare; it is this which leads to substantial inconvenience to the public and professionals who are drawn into the criminal process”. He added that “it is not possible to resolve these issues without changing the system”. 475 The report therefore recommended that—

- all cases — the minimum period between service of the indictment and holding of the first diet should be extended from 15 to 29 days;
- custody cases — the current 110 day time limit for commencing the trial should be extended to 140 days, with the first diet taking place within 110 days (bringing both into line with High Court time limits);
- bail cases — in addition to the current rule that the trial must commence within 12 months of the accused’s first appearance on petition, statute

---

472 Faculty of Advocates. Written submission, paragraph 59.
should require that the first diet must commence within 11 months of that date (again mirroring High Court procedure); and

- monitoring – court sanctioned extensions to the proposed 140 day time limit should be properly recorded and monitored.

444. Section 65 of the Bill seeks to make these changes to time limits. The Policy Memorandum states that “in order to accommodate [early communication between the prosecution and defence] the Bill increases the length of time for which an accused person can be remanded before having to be brought to trial from 110 days to 140 days”, adding that “the Scottish Government is satisfied that this is proportionate and it is in accordance with the limit required in the High Court”.

445. In evidence to the Committee, Sheriff Principal Bowen stressed that the “provisions [on time limits] are, in the main, consequential on [the statutory requirement for communication between the prosecution and defence discussed later in this section of the report] — in particular, the proposed removal of the 110 day rule and its alteration to 140 days, which might give rise to some issues”. He went on to argue that “in the current climate, in which cases are far more complex because of things such as DNA analysis, mobile telephone analysis and closed-circuit television, it is difficult to see how our timescales could be any shorter”, adding that if the 110-day limit was retained, “we would have to reduce the 80-day limit [in which to serve an indictment to a person in custody], which I do not think is possible”.

446. Some concerns were raised by witnesses regarding the proposed extension from 110 days to 140 days. In its written submission, Justice Scotland said that it “does not support the proposal to increase the 110-day time limit to 140 days wholesale”, as “the justification for such an increase has not been made”. It went on to argue that, “whilst there has been a rise in the complexity of some cases indicted even in the Sheriff Court, very many are comparatively straightforward and a longer period before the case must be brought to trial may prove counterproductive to the aim of ensuring parties prepare their cases at as early a stage as possible”. It added that “of most significance is the period of time victims must wait for justice to be served and accused persons to be tried, particularly those remanded in custody.”

447. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice responded to these concerns, stating that “the requirement of someone on remand to have their indictment served within 80 days … remains sacrosanct and the extension of the time-limit from 110 to 140 days puts solemn procedure in the sheriff and jury system in line with that in the High Court”. He added that “the change simply takes into account the complexities of many cases as a result of forensics and other aspects”. He also restated the Scottish Government’s commitment made in its response to Sheriff Principal

---

476 SPICe briefing, page 41.
478 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 166.
481 Justice Scotland. Written submission, paragraph 42.
Bowen’s review that it intends to monitor implementation of the proposals, highlighting that “with the change to 140 days, the situation will have to be monitored to ensure that any extension is granted only with good cause”.\(^{483}\)

448. On balance, the Committee accepts the need to extend the pre-trial time limits as proposed in the Bill. However, we do have some reservations as to whether the proposal to extend the current 110 day limit within which the trial of an accused person held in custody must commence to 140 days is proportionate. We are therefore pleased that the Scottish Government plans to monitor the implementation of this proposal, in particular to ensure that trials are started as soon as possible and that any extensions to the 140 day limit are rare. We seek updates from the Scottish Government on any findings and outcomes arising from its monitoring of implementation of this pre-trial limit.

Duty of parties to communicate

449. Sheriff Principal Bowen recommended the establishment of compulsory business meetings between the prosecution and defence in sheriff and jury cases to take place early in the case preparation process. He stated that this recommendation “mirrors many aspects of best practice already followed in some areas of the country and reflects the views of all parties be it the Crown, defence, sheriffs or clerks that meaningful engagement prior to First Diet removes churn”.\(^{484}\) He added that “currently both the Crown and defence state they are willing to engage in early discussion but this often does not occur or is ineffective” and that “the purpose of making the meeting compulsory is [therefore] to establish as routine a process of effective engagement and discussion”.\(^{485}\)

450. Section 66 of the Bill generally seeks to give effect to this recommendation on early communication. The Policy Memorandum states that “the intention is that prompt engagement between the prosecutor and defence will assist in the early identification of issues and, in some cases, earlier pleas of guilty”.\(^{486}\) It further suggests that this provision “should also help to ensure that cases proceed to trial in an orderly fashion with such matters as can be agreed in advance having been agreed”.\(^{487}\)

451. Sheriff Principal Bowen said that he had heard from both defence solicitors and procurators fiscal regarding the difficulties in “getting a hold of each other”, particularly as they can often be away from their desks in court or with clients. Therefore, “the clearest possible way forward was to place a statutory duty on both parties to communicate”.\(^{488}\) While he accepted the view that “the volume [of cases in the sheriff court] means that a lot of time will have to be spent at first diets and that will have to be managed, but … it will save a lot of time further down the line". 489

\(^{486}\) Policy Memorandum paragraph 165.

\(^{487}\) Policy Memorandum paragraph 165.

452. Victim Support Scotland said that it supports this measure as “resolution at an early stage relieves witnesses from having to attend a trial, protecting them from the potentially stressful and traumatic experience of giving evidence”. 490 In addition, Grazia Robertson of the Law Society stated that “the suggestion of meeting and attempting to resolve resolvable cases would help the defence solicitors to know which cases to prepare for by way of a trial and give them some knowledge of when that trial might take place”. 491

453. While the Committee considers that achieving effective communication must, at least in part, be dependent upon the availability of adequate resources (discussed further below), we are persuaded of the potential benefits of this measure, in particular, in reducing the possibility of victims and witnesses having to attend court when their cases are not ready to proceed.

Timing and method of communication

454. While acknowledging that “the timing of the compulsory business meeting has been a matter of considerable debate and reflection on my part”, Sheriff Principal Bowen recommended that the meetings should generally be held prior to the indictment being served as this would ensure early disposal of as many cases as possible. 492 He further recommended that, wherever practicable, compulsory business meetings should involve face-to-face meetings, which he described as “an example of best practice and necessary to satisfy the requirements of the meeting”. 493

455. However, the Bill provides that the meeting should take place after an indictment is served and does not prescribe the format of the communication. Responses to the Scottish Government’s consultation “suggested that parties would become clear on what matters they had to discuss only after the indictment is served” and that “a requirement to hold face-to-face meetings would be practically difficult, expensive and resource dependent”. 494

456. The Scottish Government states in the Policy Memorandum that it “was persuaded that delaying the compulsory business meeting until after the indictment, and allowing it to be held by electronic communication, would allow informed discussion in a way which promoted efficiency of time and money”. 495 Furthermore, the Policy Memorandum states that “since Sheriff Principal Bowen

490 Victim Support Scotland. Written submission, paragraph 59.
494 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 170.
495 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 170.
reported, one of the objections to email communication—that it was insecure—had been alleviated by the provision of new, secure systems”. 496

457. In oral evidence, Sheriff Principal Bowen told the Committee that he understood the reasoning behind this and was content with the Scottish Government’s decision not to reflect his exact recommendations in terms of the timing and method of communication between prosecution and defence. 497

458. The COPFS said that it supports the approach contained within the Bill requiring communication to take place after the indictment is served but prior to the first diet, as “this is the point at which some form of resolution is most likely to occur”. 498 John Dunn of the COPFS told the Committee during oral evidence that, “as a member of the reference group, I always held the view that the best time for the meeting was after the case had been indicted”. The Law Society also considers the timing suggested in the Bill to be appropriate. 499

459. The COPFS also agreed with the flexibility provided for in the Bill regarding the method of communication used, stating that “the advent of secure email and secure online disclosure allows for more effective means of communication between the Crown and the defence which in turns allows space to be created for those difficult cases which would benefit from a face-to-face discussion”. 500
However, in oral evidence, John Dunn indicated that roll-out of the criminal justice secure email system to defence solicitors had met with some difficulties including a low take-up rate. 501

460. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice advised the Committee that “the defence and prosecution both preferred the meeting to be held post service of the indictment because it would give them the opportunity to focus on the matter”, adding that “I understand that when Sheriff Principal Bowen gave evidence to the Committee he indicated that he was happy and content with such an approach”. 502
He further noted that “we face challenges with the IT system at present”, but said he was “confident that Crown prosecutors and everyone else will be able to resolve the issues”. 503

461. The Committee supports the proposals in the Bill for statutory communication between the prosecution and defence to take place after the indictment is served and for there to be flexibility in the method of communication to be used.

462. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to work with the COPFS and the Law Society of Scotland in seeking to resolve current difficulties in rolling out the secure email system to all defence solicitors,

496 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 170.
500 Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. Written submission, paragraph 43.
with a view to resolving such difficulties by the time the Bill comes into force.

Written record

463. Sheriff Principal Bowen recommended that a written record reflecting issues covered during the compulsory communication between prosecution and defence should be lodged with the court prior to the first diet. This record would capture discussions held and any issues remaining to be resolved in order to ensure that the court is fully informed when a case calls for a first diet.\(^{504}\)

464. The Bill specifies that details on the form of the written record, the information it should contain and how it must be lodged will be prescribed by act of adjournal. Michael Meehan of the Faculty of Advocates told the Committee that there were advantages to this approach, including that “it can … be amended as people become used to how it works in practice and find out what works, what does not work, what could be improved, what could be left out and so on”.\(^{505}\)

465. The Bill also appears to require the submission of a single record covering the state of preparation of both the prosecution and defence. In written evidence, the Law Society highlighted that “in High Court cases the practice which has developed is for each party to individually prepare and email to the court an electronic record of that party’s preparation” and that “an electronic copy of the record is also emailed to the other parties in the case”.\(^{506}\)

466. During oral evidence, witnesses from COPFS and the Law Society argued that the Bill should (if necessary) be amended so that the requirement to prepare a written record is satisfied by the submission of separate reports by prosecution and defence.\(^{507}\) Michael Meehan of the Faculty of Advocates agreed with this position, suggesting that “there could be practical difficulties involved in getting everybody together to put in one document and, if you cannot get everybody together, no one can move forward”. He added that “it would be easier if the prosecution could prepare its document, submit it to the court and copy other people in, and then each defence party did likewise”.\(^{508}\)

467. In its written submission, Justice Scotland stated that “placing the obligation on the procurator fiscal to lodge the complete written record seems unnecessarily burdensome”, highlighting that “current High Court practice, where parties e-mail their own part of the written record to the clerk, seems preferable”.\(^{509}\)

468. The Cabinet Secretary told the Committee that the Scottish Government was aware of the concerns surrounding joint submission of the written record and was “happy to review the issue and see how we can resolve it”.\(^{510}\) Kathleen McInulty, a Scottish Government official, added that “the issue needs to be considered and given further thought because if there are separate schedules it is likely to take sheriffs longer to assimilate the information”. 511

\(^{506}\) Law Society of Scotland. Written submission, page 6.

\(^{509}\) Justice Scotland. Written submission, paragraph 43.

469. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s commitment to review whether the Bill could usefully be amended to allow individual written records on the state of preparedness of cases to be submitted by the defence and prosecution.

Resource implications

470. Several witnesses had concerns about the resource implications of the measures in the Bill regarding communication between prosecution and defence. Justice Scotland, for example, argued that, “if the aims of the reforms are to be achieved, it is crucial that adequate resources are made available to the COPFS and Scottish courts” and that defence solicitors receive adequate funding “in relation to the additional (and earlier) work required of them as a result of the proposed reforms”. 512

471. The Law Society said that it “remains concerned regarding the resource implications for both Crown and Defence”. 513 Grazia Robertson of the Law Society told the Committee that, “if this is not properly resourced, there could be further delay in the system”. 514 Mr Dunn acknowledged that the COPFS is facing financial pressures, but stated that “we have dragooned ourselves in such a way that we can try to accommodate that pressure”. 515 He added that it was “now organised along lines of federations, or larger groupings of what used to be 11 areas [and] within the federations, we are organised along functional lines so that we do a proportion of business that allows for some specialisation”. 516

472. The Cabinet Secretary agreed that “there will be increased costs through legal aid that we will have to address, but there will also be savings in the systems as a result—it is hoped—of having fewer citations not just for witnesses and jurors but for specialist witnesses”. 517 He told the Committee that anticipated costs are set out in the Financial Memorandum on the Bill, adding that “we know that there are issues to be addressed, but we have quantified the costs and worked with relevant agencies and we believe that we can manage them”. 518

473. The Committee agrees with witnesses that both the prosecution and defence solicitors must be adequately resourced for the duty to communicate to work effectively as planned. We note that the Scottish Government has worked with criminal justice partners to anticipate the costs and savings that may arise from this proposal, but we recommend that the Scottish Government closely monitors the resource implications during implementation to ensure that resources are in place where and when needed.

512 Justice Scotland. Written submission, paragraph 41.
Sanctions

474. Sheriff Principal Bowen told the Committee that “we agonised long and hard over the question of sanctions, both for defence and the fiscal, if the [written record] was not lodged, and we came to the conclusion that it was virtually impossible to come up with an appropriate sanction”. ⁵¹⁹ He added that “it is very much a matter for sheriffs to take a strong line, making it clear that, if it is not done, not only the court but the public will be inconvenienced”. ⁵²⁰

475. On the absence of sanctions where the written record was not submitted in time, Mr Dunn of the COPFS highlighted that “the 2005 practice note says that the High Court judge would regard that state of affairs as ‘unacceptable’ … however, the reality is that those provisions have been in place for some eight years now and I am not conscious of there being any occasion when a written record has not been submitted”. ⁵²¹

476. The Committee notes that the Bill does not impose any sanctions if the written record is not submitted timeously.

First diets

477. Section 67 of the Bill seeks to give effect to Sheriff Bowen’s recommendation that a trial should only be scheduled and witnesses cited once the sheriff dealing with the first diet is satisfied that outstanding issues have been resolved. His report stated that “implementation of this recommendation will help to ensure that a trial sitting is centred on trials which are proceeding, and not on juggling a number of cases with the prospect of few actually resulting in the leading of evidence”, adding that “this should reduce the administrative burden on the Scottish Court Service and fiscals who are due to conduct trials, and ought to lead to more certainty for defence agents”. ⁵²²

478. The Law Society stated that, “as indicting cases to the first diet will happen every day in Sheriff and Jury courts in both Glasgow and Edinburgh, consideration must be given to the impact that this proposal will have on ‘hub’ jury courts in rural areas and how this will work in practical terms.” ⁵²³ The COPFS however supports the proposal which it expects to “reduce the inconvenience to witnesses” in particular. ⁵²⁴

479. The Committee agrees that the proposal in the Bill for a trial only to be scheduled once the sheriff dealing with the first diet is satisfied that the case is ready to proceed will reduce inconvenience to witnesses, and give certainty to both the prosecution and defence regarding the date of the trial.

---

Sentencing (weapons offences)

480. Section 71 of the Bill increases the maximum sentence from four to five years for a number of statutory offences relating to the possession of a knife or offensive weapon in a public place, school premises or a prison.

481. The change forms part of the Scottish Government’s policy in respect to knife crime of “tough enforcement” alongside supporting education and diversion projects. The Scottish Government believes that the increase in maximum sentences for knife crime will reinforce the message that carrying knives is a serious offence and will deter people from doing so.

482. South Lanarkshire Council welcomed the proposals and agreed with the Scottish Government that these changes would reinforce the gravity of the offences in the minds of the public and those who commit knife crime.

483. Murray Macara QC of the Law Society of Scotland sympathised with the desire to address the problem of knife crime. However, he was unsure whether increasing the maximum sentence would have much of an effect. He suggested that “the answer lies in culture rather than penalty” and that “deterrent sentences can address that culture only so far”. Mr Macara also noted that it was likely that the maximum sentences would be used only when someone had a significant record of carrying knives or other violent behaviour.

484. In his evidence to the Committee, the Cabinet Secretary noted that there has been a marked decrease in the offence of handling a weapon. He added that the “situation is getting better, but we would be remiss if we were complacent.”

485. The Cabinet Secretary stated his belief that the judiciary should be afforded the flexibility to sentence those convicted of carrying a knife to up to five years. He also made clear his view that sentences are a matter for the judiciary who will do so “on the basis of clear facts and circumstances”.

486. The Committee welcomes the Scottish Government’s continued focus on knife crime and its efforts to change the culture of carrying knives. The Committee is content with the increase in maximum sentences for offences relating to the possession of a knife or offensive weapon from four to five years.

---

525 SPICe briefing, page 42.
526 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 193.
527 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 192.
528 South Lanarkshire Council. Written submission, 23 August 2013.
Sentencing (offenders on early release)

487. Under section 16 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993, courts are able to order a person who has committed an offence during a period of early release from a custodial sentence to serve part or all of their outstanding sentence. These orders are known as “section 16 orders” and are separate and additional to the normal powers of the court to sentence the offender for the new offence.

488. Sections 72 and 73 seek to ensure that courts consider using section 16 orders in appropriate cases and provide the lower courts with greater flexibility to impose such orders without referring the case to a higher court. The Scottish Government has, however, stated that the proposed reforms “do not substantively change the overall powers of our courts in this area”.

489. The Committee received little evidence on this issue. During oral evidence, both the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) and the Law Society of Scotland did not raise any concerns and agreed that the proposed reforms did not represent a substantial change.

490. The Committee welcomes the provisions in sections 72 and 73 on sentencing offenders on early release.

Appeals

491. Sections 74 to 81 of the Bill make a number of amendments to procedures and rules for appeals. They are:

- the removal of the requirement for prosecutors to gain the leave of the court of first instance when making appeals relating to preliminary pleas or diets;
- the prescription of the test applied by the High Court when considering an application to extend the time limits for lodging an appeal and providing the grounds for the appeal;
- removal of the right for a hearing when the High Court considers applications to extend the time limits for lodging an appeal and providing the grounds for the appeal;
- removal of the possibility of using a bill of advocation to appeal decisions which could be appealed using sections 74 or 174 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995; and
- ensuring that appeals, arising from summary proceedings, heard by the High Court are final and conclusive.

492. These provisions stem from recommendations in the Carloway Review and aim to improve the efficient and timely management of appeals. The

---

533 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 215.
535 Explanatory Notes, paragraphs 206 to 217.
Carloway Review noted that Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, which entitles persons to a fair trial within a reasonable period of time, applies to appeals.\(^{538}\)

493. The Bill does not seek to take forward all of the recommendations of the Carloway Review in this area. Notably the following recommendations are not provided for in the Bill:

- giving the High Court statutory powers to impose sanctions to enforce time limits and its own procedural decisions; and
- abolishing appeals by means of bills of suspension and advocation.

494. In regard to the first of these, the Scottish Government decided not to set out the High Court’s powers in legislation because “stating the sanctions in statute would be excessively rigid, recognising the general right of the courts to regulate their own activities”.\(^{539}\)

495. In relation to the second, the Scottish Government noted the difficulty in identifying all of the circumstances in which bills of suspension and advocation are used, and therefore the effects of the complete abolition of these routes of appeal. However, it stated that proscribing the use of a bill of advocation to appeal decisions which could be appealed using sections 74 or 174 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 would prevent the circumvention of the requirement for leave to appeal from the first instance court under the statutory routes of appeal.\(^{540}\)

496. In its written evidence, Justice Scotland noted that the “primary mischief identified by the Carloway Review related principally to the overall length of time taken to deal with appeals, not the need for appeals to be started on a more timely basis”.\(^{541}\) Justice Scotland questioned whether there is any evidence that the current tests for allowing late appeals are too lax and stated that “the discretion to extend time, although already closely guarded, may be key to ensuring justice in an individual case”.\(^{542}\) It also argued that the strength of the grounds for an appeal may not be readily identifiable from examining papers in chambers and that the right to a hearing should be retained, before permission to appeal is refused due to lateness.\(^{543}\)

497. However, the COPFS welcomed the provisions relating to appeals as an “across-the-board tightening of procedures [which] will improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the appeals process generally”.\(^{544}\)

---

\(^{536}\) Carloway Review, pages 352-353.
\(^{537}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 218.
\(^{538}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 219.
\(^{539}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 224.
\(^{540}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 227.
\(^{541}\) Justice Scotland. Written submission, 16 September 2013.
\(^{542}\) Justice Scotland. Written submission, 16 September 2013.
\(^{543}\) Justice Scotland. Written submission, 16 September 2013.
\(^{544}\) Crown and Procurator Fiscal Service. Written submission, 12 September 2013.
498. During oral evidence, the Committee heard that appeals in Scotland are, on the whole, dealt with efficiently and timeously. Some types of appeals are more likely to take a long time, for example, Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC) referrals, appeals on the grounds of defective representation and where new evidence is led. Murray Macara QC from the Law Society of Scotland noted that “we have a system that is capable of delivering appeals to a conclusion very quickly [and] what must be remembered are the causes for delay.”

499. Fraser Gibson from the COPFS explained that, for example, delay can “be down to appellants seeking to add new grounds of appeal [or] recover other documents which [can spin] out the legal process to the extent that it takes a number of years”. Michael Walker of the SCCRC noted that “sometimes the appellant changes solicitors or legal teams and, each time they do that, the team comes to the case anew”.

500. James Wolffe QC from the Faculty of Advocates pointed out that sections 76 and 77 relate to the late notes and grounds of appeal and not the subsequent progress of the appeal. This progress “is left to the courts’ case management”. Speaking as a council member for Justice Scotland, Mr Wolffe expressed concerns that “narrowing the access to the appeal court … would restrict access to justice” and could result in those rejected appeals being taken to the SCCRC. Mr Macara shared these concerns and argued that it may not be in the interests of justice “that an appellant should be denied the opportunity to appeal simply because of an excessively rigid and fixed timetable”. Mr Macara argued that sections 76 and 77 should be toned down, for example with the words “justified by exceptional circumstances” replaced with “in the interests of justice”.

501. Mr Gibson from the COPFS laid out the Crown’s position that there should be a strict test to justify a late appeal. He stressed the importance of appeals being made quickly to prevent the courts continually revisiting old cases to the detriment of current cases and because evidence and papers cannot be kept forever. Evidence, such as forensics or witnesses’ recollections, can also degrade. Mr Gibson summarised by stating that time-limits “are there for a reason”.

502. Mr Gibson also argued that the Bill would allow the court flexibility and explained that, when deciding on whether the exceptional circumstances test is met, the court will balance the length of the delay, the reasons for the delay and the merits of the appeal. In doing so, the court will “arrive at an accommodation that serves the interests of justice”.

503. The Committee explored with witnesses whether more could be done during appeals to speed up the process, such as taking up Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the High Court be given power to impose sanctions to enforce time-limits and procedural orders. The Faculty of Advocates had concerns with this proposal. Mr Wolffe explained that, under these proposals, a lawyer could be in a position where they could be penalised for fulfilling their professional responsibility in acting in the best interests of their client (e.g. by advancing a new and late ground for appeal). Furthermore, while the court may be able to exercise discretion in applying a sanction, it would have to make additional and separate inquiries to discover the circumstances around any breach of its orders to do so. 553

504. The Committee also asked witnesses whether the Bill should have included Lord Carloway’s recommendation to completely abolish bills of suspension and advocation. Mr Gibson agreed with the Scottish Government’s position that it would be difficult to put in place statutory provisions to ensure that there is a mode of redress for all the circumstances where bills of suspension and advocation are used. 554

505. The Cabinet Secretary said that there should be clarity for both those seeking to appeal and other people who are affected by the process, such as victims. He continued—

“What we are doing here is giving the accused clear intimation of what the timescales are for marking an appeal against sentence or conviction or both. That also makes it clear to victims that if an appeal is not in by a specific time, it will not come in—barring exceptional circumstances.” 555

506. The Cabinet Secretary said that he did not believe that the proposed ‘exceptional circumstances’ test would be too restrictive. He added that the appeal court would be able to work with the test and that solicitors would be able to “clearly understand” that “exceptional circumstances are beyond something that just did not fit into someone’s schedule”. 556

507. The Cabinet Secretary reiterated the Scottish Government’s view that case management is a matter for the judiciary. 557

508. The Committee welcomes the policy objective to speed up appeals and understands that there are practical reasons why appeals ought to be lodged timeously. We note the concerns that, in applying a higher test for allowing late appeals, cases with merit may not be heard unless they meet an exceptional circumstances test. We ask the Scottish Government to consider the Law Society of Scotland’s recommendation that sections 76 and 77 be redrafted with an emphasis on the interests of justice. The Committee also notes that Lord Carloway made other recommendations in relation to the speeding up of appeals.

Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission

509. The Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC) is an independent body which reviews cases where it is alleged that a miscarriage of justice may have occurred. Should the SCCRC consider that a case may be a miscarriage of justice and that it is in the interests of justice to do so, the SCCRC can refer the case to the High Court. In most respects, the High Court then deals with the case as if it were a normal appeal.\(^{558}\)

510. Following the Cadder judgement, the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”) explicitly provided that the SCCRC must consider the needs of finality and certainty when applying its interests of justice test. The 2010 Act also provided that the High Court can decide not to hear an appeal if it determines that it is not in the interests of justice to do so. The rationale for these changes was a concern that the Cadder judgment would result in a large number of applications to the SCCRC.

511. The Carloway Review recommended that the High Court should not have the power to reject a referral on the ground of the interests of justice before hearing the appeal (a ‘gate-keeping’ role). It did however recommend that, when deciding an appeal, the High Court should consider both whether there has been a miscarriage of justice and whether it is in the interests of justice for the appeal to be allowed. Lord Carloway also recommended that the requirement of the SCCRC to consider finality and certainty when reviewing a case be retained.\(^{559}\) The Scottish Government agreed with Lord Carloway and section 82 of the Bill reflects his recommendations.

512. Michael Walker from the SCCRC noted that finality and certainty had, in practice, always formed part of the SCCRC’s decision-making in relation to the interests of justice. The 2010 Act simply stated this element expressly.\(^{560}\)

513. Lord Carloway argued that, allowing the High Court to consider the interests of justice during the determination of an appeal resulting from an SCCRC referral would ensure that, if new evidence confirming the guilt of the convicted person came to light between the time the SCCRC decides on the referral and the court decides on the appeal, the High Court could take this into account. He stated that a “retrial is almost never going to be an option in an SCCRC reference, because of the timescales.”\(^{561}\)

514. Academics from the University of Glasgow School of Law argued that the example given by Lord Carloway is unlikely and, in any case, the Bill would be inadequate in dealing with this as it “creates no power for the court to hear evidence of the alleged confession and so take it into account”.\(^{562}\)

515. Fraser Gibson explained that the COPFS supports the Bill as it is currently drafted for two reasons, “first, it future proofs the system against things like the

---

\(^{558}\) SPICe briefing, page 46.

\(^{559}\) Carloway Review, page 369.

\(^{562}\) Chalmers, Farmer and Leverick. Written submission, 28 August 2013.
Cadder case happening again and, secondly, it guards against the possibility of error”.\(^{563}\) The SCCRC rejected these arguments on the basis that its track-record suggests that it is capable of dealing with cases that redefine the interpretation of law and that there is no evidence of the SCCRC making errors.\(^{564}\)

516. Mr Walker stated that the SCCRC’s position is “that there should be no veto of a commission reference by the appeal court in the interests of justice at either stage of the appeal”.\(^{565}\)

517. The SCCRC made the case that it applies its own tests consistently to a high standard: 67% of referrals to the High Court have led to successful appeals (which contrasts with around 1% of ordinary appeals being successful); since the 2010 Act came into force, 20 of its 21 referrals have proceeded to a full appeal;\(^{566}\) and since the SCCRC was established there have been 29 occasions where the SCCRC has not referred a case to the High Court solely because it would not be in the interests of justice to do so.\(^{567}\)

518. Both the Faculty of Advocates and the Law Society of Scotland put forward the view that it cannot be in the interests of justice to allow a conviction which the High Court has found to be a miscarriage of justice to stand.\(^{568,569}\) Murray Macara argued that the SCCRC and the High Court have distinct roles, saying that “the commission should be trusted to continue [applying its own tests prior to referral] and that the High Court, as the appeal court, should concern itself with whether it has been established that there has been a miscarriage of justice”.\(^{570}\)

519. Mr Walker also suggested that the “public would have some difficulty coming to terms with a court at the end of the process finding that there had been a miscarriage of justice but saying, for another reason, that it was not in the interests of justice to allow the appeal”.\(^{571}\) Furthermore, the SCCRC argued that such an outcome “would seriously undermine both the independence of the Commission and its role in strengthening public confidence in the ability of the criminal justice system to address miscarriages of justice”.\(^{572}\)

520. Mr Walker recalled that the report of the Sutherland Committee, which recommended and led to the establishment of the SCCRC, was clear that the gatekeeping role of determining whether an appeal should be heard should not be given to the High Court, but is the role of the SCCRC. He added, “that is why the commission exists”.\(^{573}\)

---

\(^{568}\) Faculty of Advocates. Written submission, 6 September 2013.

\(^{569}\) Law Society of Scotland. Written submission, 6 September 2013.

\(^{572}\) Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission. Written submission, 2 September 2013.

521. The Cabinet Secretary said that he believes that the Bill strikes the right balance and, while he values the role of the SCCRC, he said that “it is important that the High Court should consider and take cognisance of whether there has been a miscarriage of justice and … the interests of justice.” The Cabinet Secretary added that he believed that the provisions would be “used or considered sparingly.”

522. He echoed Lord Carloway’s view that, by considering the interests of justice, the High Court would be able to reject appeals where the original trial was not dealt with appropriately but further evidence had come to light since confirming the guilt of the appellant. The Committee noted that when a case is appealed to the High Court under the normal route, the court only determines whether there has been a miscarriage of justice. The Cabinet Secretary argued that having the additional test for appeals arising from SCCRC referrals is justified because those cases “tend to be a lot more historic.”

523. The Committee welcomes the removal of the gate-keeping role of the High Court when dealing with referrals from the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC).

524. However, we are concerned that the Bill retains the High Court’s interests of justice test, albeit during the determination of an appeal resulting from a referral from the SCCRC. Given that, according to Lord Carloway, despite the occasional lapse, the SCCRC has been a “conspicuous success in discharging its duties conscientiously and responsibly”, we are not convinced that the arguments for the High Court replicating the duties of the SCCRC in this respect have been made. Consequently, we recommend that the High Court should only be able to rule on whether there has been a miscarriage of justice in these cases, and if there has been, the appeal should be allowed.

People trafficking

525. Sections 83 and 84 of the Bill create two statutory aggravations relating to people trafficking. Section 83 provides that any offence may be aggravated if motivated by the objective of committing or conspiring to commit a people trafficking offence. Section 84 provides for an aggravation of a people trafficking offence where the offender has abused a public position in committing the offence.

526. Section 85 of the Bill defines “a people trafficking offence” as:

- an offence under section 22 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003;
- an offence under section 4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004.

527. The Equality and Human Rights Commission’s (EHRC) report on an Inquiry into Human Trafficking in Scotland recommended the creation of an aggravation of people trafficking. Respondents to the Committee’s call for evidence were supportive of this measure.\(^{577}\)

---

528. The Scottish Government stated that the aggravation of a public official committing the offence of people trafficking meets its obligations under Article 4.3 of the EU Directive on preventing and combating trafficking human beings and protecting its victims.\(^ {578}\)

529. The Committee heard evidence from Alison Di Rollo from the COPFS that she welcomed the aggravation as set out in section 83. She stated that the aggravation would be “another element in the toolkit for prosecutors” and would be used where there is not enough evidence to libel a substantive case of people trafficking but nonetheless enough to present “the court and sentencer a context or background of trafficking that would aggravate the offence and so lead to a more extensive sentence”.\(^ {579}\) She also argued that courts recording offences aggravated by people trafficking will “shine a light on that activity so that statistics are more robust”.\(^ {580}\)

530. Ms Di Rollo made it clear that the COPFS will, if there is enough evidence, always prosecute a substantive charge of people trafficking rather than simply relying on an aggravation of some other offence. She added that “aggravation will not be used as an easy option or a shortcut”.\(^ {581}\)

531. Bronagh Andrew from Community Safety Glasgow (TARA Project) also welcomed the proposals as another tool to combat people trafficking. She noted that victims of human trafficking can be “extremely traumatised and have little information about the human traffickers, so it can be difficult for investigations to progress”.\(^ {582}\)

532. Ms Andrew suggested that it would be helpful for a shared definition of human trafficking to be set out in statute. She noted that Jenny Marra MSP has lodged a consultation on proposed legislation, which defines human trafficking.\(^ {583}\)

533. The Cabinet Secretary said that he recognises that there is a problem with people trafficking in Scotland. He said that the Government believes “that the first necessary step is to bring in a general aggravation, because we are conscious that that will help to raise awareness and allow evidence to be led”.\(^ {584}\)

534. The Cabinet Secretary agreed that more work is required in this area, including possibly a broader legal definition of human trafficking. He said that the

\(^{578}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 243.

Scottish Government is in talks with the UK Government about whether provisions in the forthcoming Modern Slavery Bill can be extended to Scotland.\textsuperscript{585}

535. The Committee welcomes the two aggravations with regard to people trafficking proposed in the Bill. The Committee requests that the Scottish Government keeps it updated on progress with the Modern Slavery Bill and its extension to cover Scotland.

Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

536. The Police Negotiating Board (PNB) established in 1980 provides a forum for negotiating hours of duty; leave; pay and allowances; the issue, use and return of police clothing; personal equipment; and pensions of police officers in the UK.\textsuperscript{586} It makes recommendations on these matters to the Home Secretary, Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, and Scottish Ministers, who are responsible for setting out the pay and conditions of police officers through Regulations. The PNB also issues guidance on the interpretation of Regulations.

537. The Policy Memorandum on the Bill explains that “the PNB comprises an Official Side, representing police authorities, chief officers of police and Ministers, and a Staff Side representing police officers through their staff associations”.\textsuperscript{587} If the parties disagree on an issue, the matter can be referred to arbitration under the Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

538. The Independent Review of Police Officer and Staff Remuneration and Conditions, led by Tom Winsor, recommended in its second report of 15 March 2012 that the PNB should be abolished and replaced by a new independent pay review body. In relation to other parts of the UK, this approach is being taken forward in the UK Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Bill which includes provisions seeking to abolish the PNB and create a pay review body – the Police Remuneration Review Body. The new body would consider the pay and conditions of most police officers in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. In relation to senior police officers, that role would be performed by the existing Senior Salaries Review Body.

539. Although the new pay review body would not make recommendations in relation to areas of policing which have been devolved to Scotland, the proposed abolition of the PNB is one of a number of proposals which gave rise to the need for the legislative consent of the Scottish Parliament. On 8 October 2013, the Scottish Parliament agreed to a Legislative Consent Motion granting the abolition of the PNB, as it affects Scotland.

540. In the Policy Memorandum on this Bill, the Scottish Government indicates that, as a result of initial consultation with Scottish police bodies, it will seek to establish a Police Negotiating Board for Scotland (PNBS) to continue the current collective bargaining approach to police pay and conditions rather than adopting the approach favoured by the UK Government.\textsuperscript{588} Section 87 of the Bill provides a framework for establishing a PNBS. It is intended that further detail will be set out in a constitution prepared by the Scottish Ministers. The Scottish Government published a consultation paper seeking views on this approach and the detailed operation of a PNBS which closed on 27 September 2013.

\textsuperscript{586} Policy Memorandum, paragraph 262.

\textsuperscript{587} Policy Memorandum, paragraph 263.

\textsuperscript{588} Policy Memorandum, paragraph 266.

541. There was broad support amongst police bodies for the proposal to establish a PNBS. John Gillies said that Police Scotland welcomes this proposal, noting that “the PNB operates informally in Scotland, so it is just a case of taking that forward”. Calum Steele said that the Scottish Police Federation also welcomed the proposal, however, he indicated that “it remains unclear whether the Scottish Chief Police Officers Staff Association will take the view that it should fall within the ambit of the Review Body on Senior Salaries” rather than the PNBS. He warned that “if we lose very senior officers’ buy-in to the view that the negotiating mechanism is the right way of dealing with pay and conditions across the service, we lose a fundamental link in ensuring that there is a common, negotiated and fair approach to terms and conditions”.

542. In evidence to the Committee, the Cabinet Secretary confirmed that the Scottish Chief Police Officers Staff Association had indicated its willingness to participate in the new PNBS, adding that “all police officers, from the newest constable to the chief constable, will therefore be dealt with by the board”.

543. The Committee welcomes the establishment of a separate Police Negotiating Board for Scotland which will include participation from all ranks of police officers.

POLICY AND FINANCIAL MEMORANDUMS

544. The lead committee is required under Rule 9.6.3 of Standing Orders to report on the Policy Memorandum which accompanies the Bill. The Committee considers that more detail would have been helpful.

545. The same rule also requires the lead committee to report on the Financial Memorandum. The Committee notes that the Finance Committee received a number of written submissions and took evidence from the Scottish Government Bill Team. However, we have made a number of observations relating to the resource implications arising from the Bill and have asked the Scottish Government to monitor costs during implementation.

SPICe briefing, page 49.
GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE BILL

547. Under Rule 9.6.1 of Standing Orders, the lead committee is required to report to the Parliament on the general principles of the Bill.

548. The Committee supports the general principles of the Bill. However, this is with the exception of proposals regarding the corroboration provisions. Our recommendations on this issue are set out in the main body of this report.
The Committee reports to the Justice Committee as follows—

INTRODUCTION

1. The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (the Bill) was introduced by the Scottish Government (the Government) on 20 June 2013.

2. The Policy Memorandum states that the Bill—

   “is the legislative vehicle to take forward the next stage of essential reforms to the Scottish criminal justice system to enhance efficiency and bring the appropriate balance to the justice system so that rights are protected whilst ensuring effective access to justice for victims of crime.”

3. Under Standing Orders Rule 9.6, the lead committee at Stage 1 is required, among other things, to consider and report on the Bill’s Financial Memorandum (FM). In doing so, it is required to consider any views submitted to it by the Finance Committee (“the Committee”).

4. In July 2013, the Committee agreed to invite a range of organisations potentially affected by the Bill to submit written evidence.

5. A total of 16 pieces of written evidence along with a further two supplementary submissions were received. All written submissions can be accessed via the Committee’s website at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/parliamentarybusiness/CurrentCommittees/65990.aspx.

6. The Committee also received a letter from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice (dated 18 November 2013) drawing its attention to planned increases in funding relating to certain provisions within the Bill which had not been reflected in the FM.

7. At its meeting on 20 November 2013 the Committee took evidence on the FM from the Government Bill Team.

---

1 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Policy Memorandum, paragraph 3
9. Following the evidence session, the Committee received a letter from the Bill Team dated 3 December, providing further information on the FM.

THE FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

10. The FM states that the Bill has been developed around three elements—

- Implementation of the recommendations of Lord Carloway’s review of the criminal justice system as a package of reforms;
- Implementation of the recommendations of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure; and
- A number of miscellaneous provisions.

11. The FM states that the Bill’s financial implications will “primarily affect the Scottish Police Authority (SPA), the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) the Scottish Legal Aid Board (SLAB) the Scottish Court Service (SCS) and the Scottish Prison Service (SPS). It goes on to state that “the measures which will have the greatest financial implications are connected with the Carloway provisions, particularly the removal of the requirement for corroboration and the provisions on access to legal advice...the Bowen and miscellaneous provisions on the whole have lower financial costs.”

Total financial costs

12. A table summarising the “total financial costs by organisation” (Table 2) is provided after paragraph 11. Table 4 then breaks down the “total financial costs by Bill provision” and suggests that between 2015-16 and 2018-19 the Bill will result in total recurring costs of £6.587 million per annum, and in non-recurring costs of £2.703 million and £1.648 million in 2015-16 and 2016-17 respectively.

13. When asked in oral evidence whether it envisaged any further non-recurring costs after 2016-17, the Bill Team explained that these costs were “primarily police capital costs for additional interview rooms” which had been “based on what the police told us.”

Total opportunity costs

14. The FM provides a table after paragraph 11 summarising “total opportunity costs by organisation” (Table 3). Table 5 then breaks down the “total opportunity costs by Bill provision” and suggests that such opportunity costs are expected to amount to between £26.685 million and £34.748 million in each of the years between 2015-16 and 2018-19.

Opportunity Costs

---

2 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 10
3 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 11
5 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 11
6 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 11
15. During the Committee’s scrutiny of the FM it became apparent that a key, overarching theme was the FM’s use of opportunity costs. Whilst certain opportunity costs could be specifically attributed to either the Carloway or Bowen provisions (and where appropriate, are considered under these respective headings below), a significant part of the oral evidence session focussed on a more general discussion relating to the Bill Team’s definition and usage of the term.

16. The Bill Team explained that the FM differentiated between financial costs and opportunity costs, stating—

“We consider opportunity costs to be the impacts on staff time and other existing resources that can be managed through measures such as prioritisation of functions and increased operational efficiency.”

17. It further explained that—

“Where a new process has been identified or an increase in volumes of cases has been predicted, and where the impact of that has been spread throughout Scotland in such a way that it is manageable within existing resources, that is classified as an opportunity cost.”

18. The Bill Team stated that “a lot of what is in the Bill is business as usual for many bodies”, but that business might need to be reorganised to absorb the changes. It pointed out that the new processes being introduced “are not being layered on top of old processes; they are replacing what is in place already.”

19. In summary, the Bill Team stated—

“I suspect that that is a more cogent explanation of opportunity cost - it is what we expect to be done in the normal course of business as usual, even though we are facing a significant change management exercise.”

20. In response to the suggestion that this appeared to differ from the standard definition of an opportunity cost and that the FM seemed “to be using the term almost as a code for efficiency savings” the Bill Team stated—

“although everyone in central or local government is being asked to look for efficiency savings, that is not the core of the opportunity costs as we use the term in the financial memorandum. The general expectation on bodies is that they will make efficiencies, but we are not necessarily offsetting new costs against efficiencies. A lot of these costs are not new; instead, they are resources that are being used for something different.”

---

21. When asked whether certain activities might therefore not be able to be undertaken as a result of changes stemming from the Bill, the Bill Team gave the example of police training costs totalling around £9.8 million (as noted in paragraph 128 of the FM). It explained that, had the training been carried out in 2014-15 as originally planned, it would have resulted in real costs relating to the requirement for backfilling and overtime. However, it stated that, as a result of changing the implementation date to allow the training to take place in 2015-16—

“the police have indicated that they will be able to spread the training across the year in a way that ensures that it can be accommodated in normal police time and will not require any backfilling or overtime.”

22. Noting that the FM estimated a recurring opportunity cost to the SPS of £22.75 million per annum by 2018-19, the Bill Team explained that it had used an average figure of £37,000 per prisoner but that this did not mean that the cost of incarcerating one additional prisoner would amount to the same sum. It explained that—

“The cost of putting an extra 200 or 300 people in prison per year will not be £37,000 each; it will be the amount that it costs to feed those extra prisoners and the various direct costs that are attributable to their being in prison.”

23. The Bill Team further explained that—

“The indication that we have had from prisons is that the costs of an extra 200-odd prisoners are already largely included in what have been put forward as the annual prison running costs. The prison running costs include some flexibility for prisoner numbers going up or down on an annual basis. That is why, in previous years, prisons have had underspends during the year. Running costs have been slightly lower than had been anticipated because prisoner numbers have been slightly lower.”

24. When it was suggested to the Bill Team that it might be possible to disguise costs in any FM by arguing that they could all be absorbed, it agreed “that that could lead to our trying to badge everything as an opportunity cost, which would be misleading.”

---

25. However, the Bill Team explained that this was the reason why it had “been careful to agree the opportunity costs with our partners”, noting that “when they have felt that there would be an additional financial cost, our partners have been vocal.”

26. The Bill Team further stated that “had we called many of those costs financial costs that would not have been transparent, either. We are not spending £10 million on training police officers specifically for the bill. That training will form part of their normal in-year training.”

27. When asked whether it had identified what training, tasks or normal duties would not be undertaken to enable police officers to attend training courses required as a result of the Bill, the Bill Team stated that, whilst “it would be for the individual agencies to comment in detail on what they would and would not do”, it had discussed detailed implementation plans with them. It stated that this process was continuing but pointed out that “We are talking about the financial year 2015-16, which is quite far ahead to be thinking about training and workload issues.”

28. Responding to suggestions that such issues would have had to be considered in order to inform the long-term cost implications provided in the FM, the Bill Team agreed that this was the case and that the training had been modelled but that “we might not have to look at the exact detail of which training courses police officers will or will not go on.”

29. In response to questions relating to the apparent upwards trajectory of predicted opportunity costs for the SPS as provided in table 3 of the FM (rising from £6.85 million in in 2015-16 to £14.6 million and £18.65 million in 2016-17 and 2017-18 respectively, and to £22.75 million in 2018-19) and whether these opportunity costs must, at some point, become real financial costs, the Bill Team replied—

“I can see how the table is slightly misleading. The figure for 2018-19 is for the Bill’s full impact, and we expect the figure to be at that level from then onwards. The figures are staggered in that way because they are modelling prison sentences that might be several years long. In the first year there would be additional sentences, whereas in the second year there would be additional sentences but also people continuing to serve the sentences that were brought in in the first year. That is why the figures ramp up to a particular level, which we expect to be the long-term level.”

30. When asked how this assumption might be affected by prison sentences of longer than three years, the Bill Team acknowledged that this was “not an exact science”, but stated—

---

“I think that the figure was reached using an average prison sentence of eight years; therefore, it will take four years to reach the average level. After four years, people will start to leave prison who went into it as a result of the Bill, and our analysts suggested that that is where the figures will start to level out.”

31. West Dunbartonshire Council stated that the FM’s estimate of an additional cost of £1.244 million in additional demand for social workers appeared to be “the result of a series of informed guesses” and that the assumption that it would result in opportunity costs—

“appears to have been arrived at on the basis of no evidence whatsoever; including, very importantly, the capacity of local authorities to make decisions regarding the allocation of staff time to accommodate new work arising as a result of the consequences of legislation and over which we have little or no control. This would bear an interpretation of additional costs, joining a lengthening list of unfunded additional demands on the local authority.”

32. West Dunbartonshire Council went on to state that the additional financial burdens arising from the Bill “should be funded in full by the Scottish Government through an additional funding allocation.”

33. Fife Council stated “we recognise that opportunity costs could become actual costs and would need to revisit these issues should demand increase to such an extent that would detract from the aim of the Bill to modernise and enhance efficiency.”

34. The Association of Scottish Police Superintendents (ASPS) stated in written evidence that “much of the costs are classed as opportunity costs and I would advise close scrutiny of these in the wider context of police reform.” It further stated—

“It is my understanding that the Police Service of Scotland must subsequently achieve year on year real financial savings due to the annually reducing budget and that therefore the opportunity to use resources “freed up” by efficiency savings is questionable. It is a more likely scenario that resources “freed up” have to be offered Early Retirement (ER), Voluntary Retirement (VR) or redeployed to fill gaps arising from ER and VR wherever possible.”

35. When asked directly if the Government was prepared to give a commitment to reviewing costs in the future “in the light of experience so that any marked increase could be funded” by it, as suggested by Falkirk Council, the Bill Team stated—

---

23 West Dunbartonshire Council. Written submission, paragraph 5
24 West Dunbartonshire Council. Written submission, paragraph 7
25 Fife Council. Written submission, paragraph 10
26 The Association of Scottish Police Superintendents. Written submission, paragraph 16
“Yes. We will certainly be monitoring the bill’s impact and maintaining communication with the key bodies.”

36. The Bill Team reiterated this undertaking in its letter of 3 December stating that it was “in the process of developing detailed implementation plans with key partners, and will maintain close communication with these bodies up to and beyond the Bill’s provisions coming into effect.”

37. The Committee is concerned about the lack of clarity regarding the usage of the term “opportunity costs” within the FM.

38. The Committee notes the view of some witnesses that these opportunity costs could become actual costs and recommends that the lead committee asks the Cabinet Secretary for Justice to confirm that these costs will be fully funded.

39. The Committee recommends that the Government publishes periodic updates on the costs of the Bill, including the “opportunity costs.”

Part A – Carloway Provisions

Costs on the Scottish Administration (paragraphs 43 - 226)

40. The FM states that “costs on the Scottish Administration will fall on the Scottish Government, SPA, COPFS, SCS, SPS and the Legal Aid Fund….Total non-recurring financial costs on the Scottish Administration will be around £4,352,000 over two years, and there will be total recurring financial savings of £6,530,000 per year.”

Removal of requirement for corroboration

41. The Bill removes the current requirement for corroboration in criminal cases. The FM states that Police Scotland and COPFS conducted “shadow reporting and shadow marking exercises” which suggested this would be likely to result in increases in the number of cases reported by the police to COPFS and in the number of cases prosecuted by COPFS.

42. The FM states that “an increase in prosecutions would have potential cost implications for SPA, COPFS, SLAB and SCS in terms of increased workload.” As additional prosecutions are likely to lead to additional convictions and therefore to additional custodial and community sentences, the FM states that this would also impact on the SPS and on local authorities.

---

28 Scottish Government Bill team letter
29 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 43
30 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 32
31 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 34
43. On the basis of the shadow exercises, the FM predicts that the increase in police reports to COPFS would be likely to be in the range of 1.5 – 2.2% with a “most likely estimate of 1.5%.”

44. The FM also predicts that the resultant change in the number of summary prosecutions would be in the range of a 1% decrease to a 4% increase, “with a best estimate of a 1% increase.” Solemn prosecutions are predicted to increase by between 2% and 10%, “with a best estimate of a 6% increase.”

45. Taken cumulatively, the FM’s “best estimate” is that there would be a 2.5% increase in summary prosecutions and a 7.6% increase in solemn ones.

46. The Faculty of Advocates (“The Faculty”) stated that the FM did “not provide sufficient information on these exercises to allow for meaningful comment” and that “even if the results of the shadow exercises…are to be regarded as reliable, there are reasons…to believe that the analysis in the FM understates the resources implications.” The Faculty also suggested that it was unrealistic to treat additional costs as opportunity costs.

47. The Faculty stated that the predicted increase in the numbers of prosecutions was “surprisingly small”. It also suggested that—

“the cohort of “additional” cases is likely to contain a significantly higher proportion of sexual offences than the current caseload, and, in particular, to include a higher proportion of cases in which the case will essentially turn on an assessment of the complainer’s evidence against an assessment of the accused’s evidence. Such cases are significantly more likely to go to trial rather than to be resolved by a plea, yet it would appear (para. 180) that no allowance for this has been made in the assessment of the additional costs.”

48. The Faculty went on to state that, as noted in the FM, “the average plea costs 1.5% of the average case going to trial” and pointed out that an increase in prosecutions for rape would impact disproportionately on the High Court.

49. The Faculty’s submission further noted that increases in the numbers of prosecutions (over and above those predicted in the FM) would have a resultant impact on those organisations listed above. It stated that “the Legal Aid Board does not appear to have included any estimate for costs attributable to additional appeals generated by the change in the law. This contrasts with COPFS, which has made an allowance for this in the first three years of the new regime.”

50. When questioned on this point by the Committee, the Bill Team stated that this was due to the fact that COPFS had specifically raised this point (and had been able to provide evidence) but “the issue was not raised with us by any of the other agencies, so we felt that it would be specific to the work of that team and we have not looked at it in other areas.” It further stated, however, that “It would not be standard for the financial memorandum to say that there will be more appeals because we are changing the law.”

51. The Committee invites the lead committee to seek clarification of the reason why it would not be standard for a projected increase in the number of appeals resulting of the Bill to be included in the FM.

52. When it was suggested that a potential increase in the number of appeals must have some financial implication for organisations other than COPFS, the Bill Team stated that it “did not have sufficiently robust evidence to suggest that there would be an increase in the number of appeals across the board.”

It gave an undertaking, however, to “have conversations with other agencies” and to “get back” to the Committee on this point.

53. In its letter of 3 December, the Bill Team stated—

“If there is an overall increase in appeals, that will impact on the legal aid fund, as pointed out by the Faculty of Advocates. The legal aid fund is a demand-led fund, and the Scottish Government has undertaken to meet all associated demand-led costs. We will monitor the impact of the Bill on the legal aid fund, and funding will be available to cover any increases as a result of this Bill.”

54. The letter further stated that the potential for a related impact on the SCS had also been considered and that the Government and the SCS had agreed that any short-term increase in appeals could be managed within existing resources.

55. The Committee welcomes the Government’s commitment to monitoring the impact of the Bill on the legal aid fund and making additional funding available if required.

56. In their joint submission, Police Scotland and the SPA provided greater details on the basis for their shadow marking exercises. Having concluded these exercises, their submission stated that two points had become apparent in relation to the volume of reports to COPFS—

- “There is no great volume of unreported matters, where a named suspect is known to the police, which would be likely to ’swamp’ the justice system should the rules on evidence be amended as indicated; and
- In almost all matters where there is any degree of supporting evidence, the police will tend to report under the current regime, particularly in serious allegations.”

---

41 Scottish Government Bill team letter
42 Police Scotland and the Scottish Police Authority. Written submission, paragraph 31
57. In written evidence, COPFS stated that it was “content that the estimated costs and savings set out in the Financial Memorandum (as they apply to COPFS) are reasonable and are as accurate as possible in respect of the time periods considered.” It also subsequently provided greater detail of the basis for its shadow marking exercise in supplementary written evidence before offering to provide further details to the Committee should it so require.

58. In oral evidence, the Bill Team acknowledged the “reasonable point” that the published FM had not provided “a huge amount of detail” on COPFS’ shadow exercise, but pointed out that further detail had subsequently been provided in its supplementary written evidence. Noting that the Faculty had “also stated that, overall, the Financial Memorandum is a reasonable summary of costs”, the Bill Team confirmed that, in its view, the shadow exercise was “quite a robust way of evidencing the estimates. We feel that the estimates are strong and reliable.”

59. Later in the meeting it expanded on this point stating—

“The exercise that was undertaken was absolutely robust and thorough. Perhaps the description of it in the financial memorandum was not as detailed as it might have been, but the additional information that the Crown Office has now presented gives a good picture of the thorough investigation that occurred.”

60. The Bill Team also highlighted that it had “conducted a detailed exercise on the back of the shadow marking exercise” and had undertaken “an analytical exercise based on existing models for predicting impacts.”

61. The Committee notes that a more detailed description of the basis for the shadow marking exercise was provided in supplementary written evidence. However, it asks why this was not originally included in the FM in order to facilitate proper scrutiny of the estimated costs.

62. The Bill Team further explained that the FM’s estimates were “in most instances, a range of possible outcomes within which we have indicated a best estimate” and that, unless otherwise indicated, these best estimates had been based on “the professional experience and judgment of the various bodies involved.” It confirmed that his was the methodology which informed the Government’s planned timetable for implementation and stated that “a full plan will be prepared once the final terms of the Bill are known.”

63. The Bill Team later stated that it had “identified where there are additional costs for which we need to provide extra funding”, but that it expected “the police and courts to be able to deal with the business that arises from the changes, by and large, as normal.” Expanding on this point, it stated—

“We are talking about increased volumes of between 1 and 6 per cent at the serious end, so we do not expect an overwhelming amount of additional casework as a result of the Bill. The Crown Office has confirmed that in its evidence.”

64. In response to questions regarding whether any increase in rape convictions might result in future savings by reducing the crime rate over time, the Bill Team agreed that this was a policy objective but that any such future savings had not been quantified in the FM as the period which it covered was “too short to take account of that kind of effect.”

65. When asked whether, conversely, it was possible that removal of the requirement for corroboration might result in fewer convictions and therefore, in savings, the Bill Team acknowledged that “arguments can be made about the impact on the conviction rate. Some argue that the rate might be lower and some argue that it might be higher.”

66. The Bill Team explained that the FM’s calculations had been based on existing conviction rates “simply because that is the best evidence that we have available”, “because we felt that anything else would be speculation”. However, it also stated that it had “worked in other factors” including Lord Carloway’s analysis of the types of cases that would go forward, and it “built that into the model of the additional cases that will proceed.”

67. When questioned specifically about the Bill’s potential impact on the SPS, the Bill Team explained that, whilst a number of factors could be expected to impact on the size of the prison population, the SPS had stated that “in the short term, the estimates set out in the Financial Memorandum are manageable within capacity.”

Forensic Services

68. The SPA/Police Scotland submission stated that—

“The impact of the Bill will compel the Police Service to change and introduce new working practices that will impact on Forensic Services. This will affect the number of cases forensic services are required to examine which would be over and above our current demand as well as the impact on us having to examine more cases in a shorter timeframe.”

69. It provided a table estimating that a 2% increase in its forensic services workload would result in increased costs to Police Scotland of £529,000 per annum

---

54 Police Scotland and the Scottish Police Authority. Written submission, paragraph 9
whilst a 4% increase would result in increased costs of £1,056,000. In the Cabinet Secretary's letter of 18 November, he explained that these potential increased costs had not been raised during the FM’s development but that following discussions between his officials and Forensic Services, "it has been agreed that the most likely impact is a 2% increase, at a cost of £529,000 per year."

70. The Committee welcomes the provision of this additional funding but questions why this requirement was not highlighted during the original consultation.

71. Both ASPS and the SPA/Police Scotland submissions made the point that the police will need to invest in new ways of working as a result of the Bill. ASPS stated that, whilst it appreciated that police ICT costs to support the changes were incorporated in the wider police ICT investment programme, "some reference should be made (in the FM) to the ICT cost that is attributable to this Bill, in order that this is captured and understood for the future, without wishing to raise a risk of "double counting.""

72. With regard to opportunity costs, the Faculty stated—

"In characterizing the additional costs to the Court Service as "opportunity costs" the FM relies on savings in court time which it is anticipated will be achieved by the Bowen proposals. Since those proposals relate to solemn cases prosecuted in the sheriff court, it is difficult to see how they could be relevant to the High Court. While a trial is running the court staff and other court facilities cannot be otherwise used and it is, for that reason, open to question whether the additional costs to the Court Service should be characterized as "opportunity costs", which can be absorbed through efficiency savings."

73. In response to questioning on this point, the Bill Team confirmed that the proposals would impact on sheriff courts but stated that it had "developed the estimates in close co-working with the Scottish Court Service, which has indicated to us that it is able to accommodate those within existing resources." It further pointed out that the SCS had indicated this to be the case in its written submission.

Costs on local authorities (paragraphs 227 - 237)
74. The FM states that "the provisions relating to child suspects will potentially bring new costs to local authorities," whilst "removal of the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases is likely to result in an increase in the number of prosecutions, which will impact on local authorities on the basis that additional prosecutions are likely to lead to additional community sentences."

---

55 Cabinet Secretary for Justice letter
56 Association of Scottish Police Superintendents, Written submission, paragraph 13
57 The Faculty of Advocates, Written submission, paragraph 31
58 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 20 November 2013, Col 3339
59 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, Financial Memorandum, paragraph 227
60 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, Financial Memorandum, paragraph 231
75. The FM estimates that these provisions will result in total recurring opportunity costs of £1.244 million for local authorities and provides a more detailed description of the basis for this estimate in paragraphs 227 to 237.

76. The FM’s “best estimate” is that the Bill would result in 480 additional community sentences per year at a total cost of £1,160,000. However, it states that, as costs associated with these would primarily relate to staff time, “this does not translate directly into additional financial cost, but will need to be considered by local authorities as an additional demand in managing staff workloads. This £1,160,000 has therefore been classed as an opportunity cost.”

77. Falkirk Council suggested that the removal of the requirement for corroboration would be likely to result in an increased number of community sentences and that this would have implications for “already overstretched criminal justice social workers.” It stated that it believed the Government’s estimates “to be flawed in relation to an expectation that this extra work can be subsumed within existing resources” and that the Bill would result in increased staffing costs for local authorities.

78. West Dunbartonshire Council stated that “the potential increase for Community Payback Orders is also likely to increase demand on criminal justice staff – with no financial contribution provided.”

79. Renfrewshire Council also stated that it would find it “very difficult to absorb this additional workload without additional resources,” pointing out that it was already absorbing significant increases in supervision and unpaid work orders subsequent to the introduction of Community Payback Orders without any additional funding.

80. A number of local authorities also drew attention to the potential for an increased number of social work reports arising from the removal of the requirement for corroboration. Dundee City Council, for example, stated—

“We do not believe that all the potential additional costs have been accurately reflected in the FM. No consideration has been given to the potential increased volume of Social Work reports as a result of an increase in the number of prosecutions and associated requests for Social Work court reports. The FM assumes that the costs of supporting additional community sentences will not translate directly into additional financial cost but will be an additional demand in managing workloads.”

81. Similarly, Fife Council stated—

---

61 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 54
62 Falkirk Council. Written submission, paragraph 9
63 Falkirk Council. Written submission, paragraph 11
64 West Dunbartonshire Council. Written submission, paragraph 10
65 Renfrewshire Council. Written submission, paragraph 4
66 Dundee Council. Written submission, paragraph 4
“We note the potential increase in workload from increased Community Sentencing and would anticipate additional costs could be attached to Local Authorities in the preparation of Criminal Justice and other associated reports as well as placing an increased demand on services providing community based statutory supervision.”

82. In response to questioning from the Committee relating to the FM’s “best estimate” of an additional 480 additional community sentences per year, the Bill Team explained that this figure would amount to an increase of around 2.8% which could be considered to result in opportunity costs which “are manageable because the workloads of social workers and other relevant agencies can be repositioned.”

83. When asked what percentage increase in community sentences might be needed before it would result in additional financial costs for local authorities, such as the need to recruit additional staff, the Bill Team stated that it did not have the calculations to hand, but—

“In the discussions that were had, the feeling was that the potential increase was not anywhere near enough for there to be a cost. Even when we looked at the figures at the high end of the range and divided the cases across all the various authorities in Scotland, the numbers did not come out high enough for there to be an absolute need to recruit additional staff. It was felt that the potential additional cases could be managed by current staff levels.”

84. The Committee invites the lead committee to seek clarification from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice as to what percentage increase in community sentences would be required in order to result in financial costs according to Government calculations.

85. The Bill Team also explained that it had developed the FM’s estimates “through consultation with COSLA and ADSW” and not through discussions with individual local authorities. It stated that it was “therefore understandable that a small number of local authorities might not completely hold the same views as those bodies” and further noted that local authority submissions to the Committee were “not unanimous in the positions that they present.”

86. The Convener suggested that, whilst he understood that COSLA had been consulted as the umbrella body, it appeared that some local authorities felt that their concerns had not been addressed. However, the Bill Team stated that these concerns had not been raised during the production of the FM and that it stood by the FM’s estimates with regard to opportunity costs. It further stated that it had “calculated the costs on a Scotland-wide basis” and that its information “strongly suggests that there will be no great impact on any particular local authority and that, therefore, the proposals can be absorbed within current allocations of staff.”

67 Fife Council. Written submission, paragraph 9

87. Nevertheless, the Bill Team undertook to respond to the Committee “by letter on the various issues that local authorities have highlighted so that we can reassure you on each and every one.”

88. In this letter, the Bill Team explained that “these costs would arise in the context of substantial decreases in crime rates in Scotland in recent years, as well as a range of policy initiatives designed to reduce reoffending.” It further pointed out that the Government “had protected the overall community justice budget, including funding within that for community sentences” before stating that the 2014-15 draft budget contained an increase of £500,000 in cash terms (it is not clear from the letter whether this increase relates specifically to funding for community sentences or to the wider community justice budget).

89. The letter also stated that the Government had provided additional flexibility to local authorities and that it was for them to allocate funding on the basis of local need. As any additional costs would be “spread across the country and represent a small percentage increase,” the letter states “that in the context of reducing crime rates and the additional funding commitment, this work can be managed within existing resources.”

90. Similarly, when specifically asked why some local authorities felt that increased volumes of social work reports did not appear to have been considered in the FM, the Bill Team stated that it had consulted in good faith and that “the concern about social work reports was not raised with us when we produced the memorandum, so it is not reflected in it.” It also confirmed that “the submissions have not caused us to move away from what has been said already” and that it understood the FM’s position to be correct.

91. Expanding on this point in writing, the Bill Team noted that social work reports were not mandatory in all cases. Again it pointed towards “substantial decreases in crime rates” and stated that, in this context, a small increase in the number of social work reports spread across the country “would be manageable within existing resources.”

92. On a separate point, with regard to the concerns of certain local authorities, the Bill Team suggested that—

73 Scottish Government Bill team letter
74 Scottish Government Bill team letter
76 Scottish Government Bill team letter
“Some of the local authority submissions assume that certain things will happen under the Bill that are not necessarily provided for in it and that are not intended to be provided for in it.”

93. When asked to elaborate on this suggestion, the Bill Team offered to do so in writing. However, when the subject of the provision of appropriate adults arose later in the evidence session (see paragraphs 95 to 98 below), it became clear that this was the topic to which the Bill Team had referred and that further information in writing on this point would no longer be required.

94. The Committee invites the lead committee to ask whether both COSLA and individual local authorities were invited to respond to the consultation or whether COSLA was simply invited to respond on behalf of all local authorities in Scotland. If all local authorities were not invited to respond, the Committee invites the lead committee to ask why they were not invited to do so.

Vulnerable adult and child suspects

95. Where the police assess an individual as being “vulnerable”, the Bill would require them to secure the attendance of an Appropriate Adult as soon as reasonably practicable after detention and prior to questioning. The FM states that these provisions “will not entail additional costs as Appropriate Adult Services are provided at present on a non-statutory basis.”

96. However, a number of local authorities questioned this assumption. Aberdeenshire Council, for example, stated that at present, social workers undertake the role on a voluntary basis and that training costs for volunteers total £5,000 per annum. In the event that the provision of appropriate adults became a statutory duty for local authorities, it suggested that the requirement to ensure they are available 24 hours a day would mean that social work backfill and additional funding for training would be necessary. It stated that—

> “The likely cost of backfill would be 1 x peripatetic social worker post and likely cost of increased coordination would be 1/2 post coordinator to Coordination referrals, appropriate adult training and awareness. So overall cost approx £65k per year.”

97. In oral evidence, the Bill Team confirmed that the Government had “no intention of making that provision statutory”, and stated that, as the Bill as introduced did not make the provision of appropriate adults a statutory requirement, no related costings had been included in the FM. It further stated that it had an agreement with COSLA that practices regarding the provision of appropriate adults would not alter as a result of the Bill and, therefore, no additional costs relating to this provision were expected. It did undertake however, to “carefully monitor how the Bill is implemented” and would “react if there are, in fact, changes.”

---

78 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 236
79 Aberdeenshire Council. Written submission, paragraph 5
98. The Bill Team provided further clarification in its letter of 3 December, confirming that “the Bill does not introduce a new appropriate adult scheme, and it does not change the role of either the police or the appropriate adult.” Therefore, it suggested that “the concern raised by Aberdeenshire Council in particular seems to come from a misunderstanding of the effect of the Bill.”

99. The letter did confirm, however, that the Government had “made a specific commitment to COSLA to review the impact of the Bill in relation to vulnerable adults after implementation.”

100. The Committee welcomes this commitment to reviewing the impact of the Bill in relation to vulnerable adults after implementation.

101. Currently children aged 16 or under who are detained have the right to access to an adult named by them in advance of and during an interview. The Bill extends this right to those aged 18 or under. The FM predicts that “in the great majority of cases such support is likely to be sought from people known to the suspect” (such as friends or family members) but that there will be cases where support is sought from a social worker instead.

102. The FM suggests that the most likely proportion of cases where the services of a social worker would be requested would be 10% of cases (around 800 cases per year). It estimates that this would result in additional annual costs per year for local authorities of £84,000 but that this would be an opportunity cost as it would form part of a social worker’s general workload.

103. Falkirk Council, however, stated that “it is difficult to understand what formula the Scottish Government has used to base their calculation on that 10% of young people will need this.” It stated that it knows “anecdotally” “that many young people (particularly those who have been previously looked after) seek this support from social workers” and that the potential impact on its resources was therefore “very difficult to quantify or predict” at this stage.

104. The Bill Team addressed this subject in its letter of 3 December, stating that consultation with ACPO, ADSW and COSLA had resulted in the assumption that “only a small proportion of 16 and 17 year olds would want to seek support from a social worker.”

105. The letter reiterated the basis for the FM’s “best estimate” of additional costs totalling £84,000 per year across Scotland and stated that, in the context of falling rates of youth crime, this increase “would be manageable within existing resources.”

---

81 Scottish Government Bill team letter
82 Scottish Government Bill team letter
83 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 163
84 Falkirk Council. Written submission, paragraph 8
85 Scottish Government Bill team letter
86 Scottish Government Bill team letter
Legal Advice

106. With regard to Grants of Advice and Assistance, the Law Society stated that “the existing funding arrangements for solicitors carrying out police station work are inadequate and need to be reviewed” and that “funding mechanisms for this work are not structured appropriately and the rates are unduly limited.”

107. Noting that SLAB had confirmed that the Government intended to review the payment mechanism as part of its work on the Bill, the Law Society stated that it would encourage this review to take place as soon as possible and that it would be keen to engage with it.

108. The Law Society also noted that the Bill would provide for police questioning after charge and that there would be a right of access to a solicitor for such questioning. It pointed out that on the basis of the FM, it appeared that all additional work relating to this would go unpaid and that, in its view, it was not appropriate for the Government to expect such work to go unremunerated.

109. In his letter of 18 November, the Cabinet Secretary stated that whilst SLAB had provided estimates in relation to this point, they had “unfortunately” been overlooked during the drafting of the FM and that this would now be remedied. The additional anticipated cost of this was stated as being £34,000 per year. (KM letter)

Part B – Bowen Provisions

110. Following Sheriff Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure, the Bill makes provision for a number of changes to the operation of sheriff and jury business, including increasing the period on which a person may be held on remand from 110 to 140 days.

Costs on the Scottish Administration (paragraphs 245 – 266)

111. The FM provides a description of the estimated cost implications of the Bowen provisions on a number of organisations as follows—

- SPA (paragraphs 246 – 248) - £391,000 per annum in savings.
- COPFS (paragraphs 249 – 255) - £370,000 per annum in additional costs.
- SCS (paragraphs 256 – 259) - £1.245 million per annum in savings.
- SPS (paragraphs 260 – 262) - £1.5 million per annum in additional costs.
- SLAB (paragraphs 263 – 266) - £493,000 per annum in additional costs.

Costs on local authorities (paragraphs 267 – 268)

112. The FM states that the “proposal to increase the time-limit for the period for which an accused person may be remanded before his or her trial commences from 110 to 140 days will increase the number of persons held on remand.” The FM then estimates that this increase “could result in the occupation of a place in secure

87 The Law Society of Scotland. Written submission, paragraph 25
88 Cabinet Secretary for Justice letter
89 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 267 accommodation being occupied 25% of the time” which, it states, would result in increased (shared) costs to local authorities of £56,000 per annum.

113. A number of local authorities questioned this estimate in written evidence. Renfrewshire Council, for example, stated that the weekly cost of a placement was currently £5,412, meaning that the additional annual cost of a 30 day increase to it alone would amount to £69,583. It further stated that the FM’s assertion that the additional cost would be shared amongst local authorities was flawed as—

“local authorities adhere to a financial framework where service requirements are purchased by spot placements on a needs required basis and not block placements and individual local authorities bear the costs. Therefore authorities will not have spare capacity to accommodate and will not be able to spread the costs among authorities.”

114. West Dunbartonshire Council also queried the FM’s estimate stating—

“How this translates into the stated additional need for a single additional secure accommodation place is not clear at all, and especially as the FM then states at Para 268 that this place is anticipated to be required only 25% of the time. This logic seems to contradict Para 230 which talks about 40 extra remand places at any time. The logic seems to suggest that at any point in time that 39.75 of these places will be within the SPS provision (or elsewhere).”

115. Whilst Falkirk Council stated—

“We believe the impact of this cannot be estimated but has the potential for very large costs for local authorities. There is the possibility that the courts may view secure care as the first option for 16/17 year olds, rather than a remand to a Young Offenders Institution. If this position was taken, costs could be magnified given there are currently 60 16/17 year olds in Polmont Young Offenders Institution on remand or sentenced.”

116. Dundee City Council estimated its potential increase in expenditure relating to young people in secure care on remand to be around £45,000. It further pointed out that it would also incur additional costs relating to secure transport costs to courts, children’s hearings or medical appointments at an average cost of £610 per journey.

117. In its letter of 3 December, the Bill Team acknowledged that “the section covering this in the FM does not go into detail on the process of obtaining estimates” before setting out further details on its modelling exercise which were intended to address the issues raised by local authorities. On the basis of the predicted “very small impact in financial terms” and in the context of a “substantial reduction” in the use of secure remand places, it concluded “that the small

---

90 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Financial Memorandum, paragraph 268
91 Renfrewshire Council. Written submission, paragraph 4
92 West Dunbartonshire Council. Written submission, paragraph 5
93 Falkirk Council. Written submission, paragraph 14
94 Scottish Government Bill team letter percentage increase estimated for in the Bill would be manageable within existing resources.”

118. The Committee notes that this more detailed explanation was provided in response to points made in written evidence. However, it asks why this was not originally included in the FM in order to facilitate proper scrutiny of the estimates it contained.

CONCLUSION

119. The lead committee is invited to consider this report as part of its scrutiny of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill’s FM.
Present:

Gavin Brown
Kenneth Gibson (Convener)
John Mason (Deputy Convener)
Jean Urquhart
Malcolm Chisholm
Jamie Hepburn
Michael McMahon

Also present: Bruce Crawford and John Swinney, Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Employment and Sustainable Growth

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Financial Memorandum from—Elspeth MacDonald, Deputy Director, Criminal Justice Division, Peter Hope-Jones, Policy Officer, Criminal Justice Bill Team, and Kerry Twyman, Finance Business Partner, Justice, Scottish Government.

On resuming—

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Financial Memorandum

The Convener: Our second item of business is to take evidence from the Scottish Government bill team as part of our scrutiny of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill's financial memorandum. I welcome Elspeth MacDonald, Peter Hope-Jones and Kerry Twyman. I understand that a member of the bill team would like to make a brief opening statement.

Elspeth MacDonald (Scottish Government): Thank you, convener—I will make an opening statement.

The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill is a wide-ranging and forward-thinking reform that will modernise and strengthen the Scottish criminal justice system. Most of its provisions have been developed from the recommendations of two independent reviews: Lord Carloway’s review of criminal law and practice and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s review of sheriff and jury procedure.

Lord Carloway’s review was prompted by the Cadder case, which had a significant and immediate effect on the criminal justice system and resulted in the abandonment of hundreds of prosecutions, including some for very serious crimes. The provisions of the bill that implement the recommendations of Lord Carloway’s review are intended to create a criminal justice system that is able to meet the requirements of modern society and provide as much resilience as possible against any unexpected future developments in European Court of Human Rights jurisprudence.

The costs that are associated with the bill are of course set out in detail in the financial memorandum. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice and the Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Employment and Sustainable Growth have made it clear that the costs are reasonable in the context of reforms that will put Scotland at the forefront of human rights protections and introduce efficiencies to the criminal justice system.

The financial memorandum was developed through close consultation and discussion with key partners, including Police Scotland, the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, the Scottish Prison Service, the Scottish Court Service, the Scottish Legal Aid Board, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the Association of Directors of Social Work. The costs are based on the information that was provided by those various bodies—including the shadow marking exercise—and on their professional experience and judgment. We consider what we have set out to be the best possible estimate of the costs that are associated with the bill as introduced.

I can give more detail on the process, if the committee would find it useful. However, that might come out in questioning.

The Convener: I am happy to see whether it comes out in questioning. I might even ask something along those lines myself.

As usual, I will start off the questions and then open out the session to committee colleagues. My first question is in regard to written evidence from the Faculty of Advocates, which states:

“In characterising the additional costs to the Court Service as ‘opportunity costs’ the financial memorandum “relies on savings in court time which it is anticipated will be achieved by the Bowen proposals. Since those proposals relate to solemn cases prosecuted in the sheriff court, it is difficult to see how they could be relevant to the High Court.”

Can you comment on that, please?

Peter Hope-Jones (Scottish Government): The faculty is correct to point out that the specific savings that are identified in the sections on sheriff and jury reforms will impact on sheriff and jury courts. However, we developed the estimates in close co-working with the Scottish Court Service, which has indicated to us that it is able to accommodate those within existing resources. That is also indicated in the written submission to the committee.

The Convener: Okay. You will have seen some of the responses that we received from local authorities on the financial memorandum’s estimate of the provisions’ total recurring opportunity costs. West Dunbartonshire Council stated that the figure appears to be the result of a series of informed guesses”. The council also stated that the assumption that it would result in opportunity costs “appears to have been arrived at on the basis of no evidence whatsoever”.

Peter Hope-Jones: The first thing to say with regard to the responses from local authorities is that the estimates in the financial memorandum were developed, as we have said, through consultation with COSLA and the ADSW. We reached agreements with those bodies as representatives of local authorities more widely. We did not talk with individual local authorities. It is therefore understandable that a small number of local authorities might not completely hold the same view as those bodies. It is worth noting, too, that the local authorities’ responses to the committee are not unanimous in the positions that they present.

We went through a detailed process to estimate the impacts on local authorities. There are two major ones to consider. One relates to corroboration, on which there was a detailed exercise on the back of the shadow marking exercise, about which I can talk more if members are interested in it. The second concerns the proposals on the sheriff and jury procedure. Again, we undertook an analytical exercise based on existing models for predicting impacts and I can provide more details on that if it would be helpful.

10:15

The Convener: Some of the local authorities are quite critical. West Dunbartonshire Council said that no consideration had been given to “the allocation of staff time to accommodate new work arising”.

It also said:

“the potential increase for Community Payback Orders is also likely to increase demand on criminal justice staff—with no financial contribution provided.”

I am concerned that some of the local authorities feel that their concerns have not been addressed at all. I understand what you say about COSLA as the umbrella organisation, but the local authorities seem to feel that their direct concerns have not been considered.

Peter Hope-Jones: The concerns that have come out were not raised with us when we were producing the financial memorandum. As I said, we discussed the impacts, so we stand by the estimates in the memorandum as part of the opportunity costs that have been presented more generally.

Elspeth MacDonald: I propose that the difference is that we dealt with COSLA and the Association of Directors of Social Work and calculated the costs on a Scotland-wide basis. The information that we have strongly suggests that there will be no great impact on any particular local authority and that, therefore, the proposals can be absorbed within current allocations of staff. If that were not to be the case, we would want to know that, but that is the best information that we have.

Some of the local authority submissions assume that certain things will happen under the bill that are not necessarily provided for in it and that are not intended to be provided for in it.

The Convener: Will you elaborate on some of those?

Elspeth MacDonald: Could I elaborate on that in writing? It is something that I have just come across.

The Convener: Thank you for that.
You talked about social work directors being consulted, but Dundee City Council says:

“No consideration has been given to the potential increased volume of Social Work reports as a result of an increase in the number of prosecutions and associated requests for Social Work court reports.”

If social work directors were consulted, I am confused as to why the council thought that no consideration had been given to that.

Elspeth MacDonald: Somewhat unhelpfully, I am also confused, because we consulted in good faith, if you know what I mean. We understand the position to be as we set it out. It is robustly set out in the financial memorandum and we understand what we say to be correct. The submissions have not caused us to move from what has been said already.

Peter Hope-Jones: In the financial memorandum, we have tried to drill down quite deeply into the impacts of the abolition of corroboration. Quite a lot of detail is set out on that. However, the concern about social work reports was not raised with us when we produced the memorandum, so it is not reflected in it.

The Convener: Opportunity costs have already been raised. You have an explanation in the financial memorandum of what they are, but I ask you to talk us through that for the public record and so that everybody knows what we are talking about.

Elspeth MacDonald: The financial memorandum differentiates between financial costs and opportunity costs. We consider opportunity costs to be the impacts on staff time and other existing resources that can be managed through measures such as prioritisation of functions and increased operational efficiency.

That approach was agreed with our key partners as we moved forward. We discussed it in detail, and over some time, with all the bodies that we have mentioned. Where a specific need has been identified for additional staff as a result of the bill, that has been included as a financial cost. Where a new process has been identified or an increase in volumes of cases has been predicted, and where the impact of that has been spread throughout Scotland in such a way that it is manageable within existing resources, that is classified as an opportunity cost. That is the approach that we took with local authorities.

There may be savings, but an example of opportunity costs would be around training. Initially, Police Scotland anticipated a substantial requirement for the backfilling of posts and overtime payments in order to achieve implementation of the bill in 2014. Notably, the Commonwealth games and other major events will be a real drain on police resources. We responded to those concerns, and we have set out a timetable for implementation, which allows training to be completed without the need for widespread backfilling and overtime payments. That works through staff schedules and cover arrangements, which means that the staff costs that are associated with training can be considered as opportunity costs rather than a financial cost.

That is about reorganising the business to absorb the changes. A lot of what is in the bill is business as usual for many bodies. Court cases are business as usual for the courts and investigating crime is business as usual for the police. However, there are new ways of doing that business that people will need to be trained up for, and then those new ways of doing business will become business as usual, too.

We should not lose sight of the fact that the new processes that are being introduced are not being layered on top of old processes; they are replacing what is in place already. For example, the new process for arrest and detention replaces what is there already. The new process for looking after suspects of crime is different, but the police look after suspects of crime as a matter of course now.

I suspect that that is a more cogent explanation of opportunity cost—it is what we expect to be done in the normal course of business as usual, even though we are facing a significant change management exercise. Organisations throughout Scotland should be able to deal with that, and that is the way in which we have looked at it. That is also the way in which our key partners have accepted it.

The Convener: I will touch on one specific area before opening up the discussion to colleagues round the table: that of vulnerable adult and child suspects. When the police assess an individual as being vulnerable, the bill requires them to secure the attendance of an appropriate adult as soon as reasonably practicable. The financial memorandum states that that “will not entail additional costs ... as Appropriate Adult Services are provided at present on a non-statutory basis.”

Local authorities are questioning that assumption. Aberdeenshire Council has said that social workers undertake the role on a voluntary basis and that training costs are £5,000 per volunteer. If that provision becomes statutory, it would mean that those individuals would have to be available 24 hours a day, and there would be backfilling costs that have not been considered. Could you talk us through that aspect of the FM?

Elspeth MacDonald: That is the example that I was thinking about of a local authority making an assumption that something will become statutory that is not statutory now. We have no intention of making that provision statutory although, if the Parliament makes it statutory, we would have to reconsider the matter. The bill as introduced did not make a statutory requirement for appropriate adults to be provided. Therefore, that is not included in the costings of the bill.

The Convener: You are saying that there is no inevitability or likelihood that that will take place.

Elspeth MacDonald: It is certainly not the Government’s policy that it should take place, although obviously the bill is now in the hands of the Parliament.

Peter Hope-Jones: At the core of the estimates on vulnerable adults is an agreement with COSLA that the practice around providing appropriate adults will not change as a result of the bill. They will continue to be offered in the way that they are now, and therefore the costs will be the same. We have also agreed with COSLA that we will carefully monitor how the bill is implemented. We will continue to liaise with COSLA and react if there are, in fact, changes.

The Convener: Thank you for that. I open up the discussion to colleagues round the table.

John Mason: The convener raised the question of opportunity costs. Will you say a bit more about that? I understand from your explanation to the convener that you are suggesting that opportunity costs exist where something is going to stop and something else is going to start, so the amount of work just carries on. My understanding was that it is hoped that the legislation will lead to more rape convictions. Does that mean that there will be more people going through the courts and more people in prison?

Elspeth MacDonald: The stop and start is part of the explanation, and the rest is that we expect this to become business as usual. We expect the police and the courts to be able to deal with the business that arises from the changes, by and large, as normal. We have identified where there are additional costs for which we need to provide extra funding.

John Mason: You said that it will become business as usual. My understanding is that less serious cases never go to court because the courts are so full. If you bring in more rape cases, will that mean that other cases will fall out of the system?

Elspeth MacDonald: Sorry, but I do not agree with your original proposition that less serious cases would not proceed.

John Mason: Do you agree that that is what happens at the moment?

Elspeth MacDonald: I am saying that I do not agree that that is what happens. It is not for me to answer that, but that is not my understanding of what happens at the moment. We would expect the most serious cases to proceed. We are talking about increased volumes of between 1 and 6 per cent at the serious end, so we do not expect an overwhelming amount of additional casework as a result of the bill. The Crown Office has confirmed that in its evidence.

John Mason: On the Scottish Prison Service, paragraph 192 on page 70 of the financial memorandum states:

“In the short term, SPS considers that it can accommodate the current forecast population within its existing capacity and existing budget.”

Is there spare capacity in the prisons at the moment?

Peter Hope-Jones: Yes. The Scottish Prison Service has indicated to us that there is capacity in the prison system to accommodate the increase that we have indicated in the short term. The SPS and the Scottish Government undertake regular prison population projections and plan the estate provision on that basis, and we will continue to do so in order to monitor the actual impacts of the bill.

John Mason: I had understood that at least some prisons are overcrowded and are at more than their expected capacity. Is that not the case? If it is the case, they could not have spare capacity.

Peter Hope-Jones: It would be for the Scottish Prison Service to comment on that in detail, but my understanding is that, if more people are convicted, that should reduce the crime rate over time and therefore there should be a saving. Has that been built in, or is it too long term?

Peter Hope-Jones: That has not been reflected directly. It is something that we discussed and obviously it is a policy objective, but it is hard to quantify a specific impact in individual years.

10:30

Elspeth MacDonald: The period of the financial memorandum is too short to take account of that kind of effect although, as Peter Hope-Jones says, it is one of the objectives that we are aiming for.
John Mason: If I have read the media correctly, some people have questioned whether there will be more convictions, because there will be other hoops to go through instead of corroboration, such as stricter jury numbers. One school of thought is that there will be fewer convictions and therefore that there will be savings. Has there been a risk analysis or probability assessment of that?

Peter Hope-Jones: In our calculations in the financial memorandum, we used existing conviction rates, simply because that is the best evidence that we have available. However, we worked in other factors. For example, for Lord Carloway’s review, he did some analysis of the types of cases that would go forward for prosecution, and we built that into the model of the additional cases that will proceed.

Arguments can be made about the impact on the conviction rate. Some argue that the rate might be lower and some argue that it might be higher. For the purposes of our calculations, we went with the current figure, because we felt that anything else would be speculation and would involve trying to add or take away a certain percentage, which would not be particularly constructive.

Jamie Hepburn: On the shadow exercises that have been undertaken, the Faculty of Advocates set out that the financial memorandum “does not provide sufficient information on those exercises to allow for meaningful comment.”

How would you respond to that suggestion?

Peter Hope-Jones: The shadow marking exercise was set up by the Crown Office and the police so it would be for them to answer on the detail of exactly what they underwent. However, it should be noted that the Crown Office has provided supplementary written evidence to the committee that provides more detail of exactly what went into that exercise. Since then, it has also set out, in evidence to the Justice Committee, the new prosecution test, which reflects broadly what was done in the shadow marking exercise.

Jamie Hepburn: You would refute the suggestion that there is not enough information about those exercises.

Peter Hope-Jones: In the financial memorandum as published there is not a huge amount of detail. That is a reasonable point. However, what the Crown Office has put out since gives a decent picture of what was undertaken.

Jamie Hepburn: So the information is there.

The Faculty of Advocates also stated that the predicted increase in the number of prosecutions is “surprisingly small”, the implication being that the figure given might underestimate the cost of prosecuting cases through the courts. However, I noted that the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service has set out that it is content that the estimated costs and savings set out in the financial memorandum, as it applied to the COPFS, “are reasonable and are as accurate as possible”.

How would you respond to the faculty’s suggestion that the predicted increase in the number of prosecutions was surprisingly small?

Peter Hope-Jones: I noticed that in the submission from the Faculty of Advocates. The first thing that I would point out is that the faculty also stated that, overall, the financial memorandum is a reasonable summary of costs. Secondly, it did not give much evidence for why it feels the way you describe. The estimates for corroboration in the financial memorandum were as the result of those detailed shadow marking exercises, which reproduce the process of decision making in actual cases. It was quite a robust way of evidencing the estimates. We feel that the estimates are strong and reliable.

Elspeth MacDonald: It might be useful at this point for me to provide the detail that I referred to earlier on the process that we went through in reaching what we have in the financial memorandum. We undertook detailed discussions with partners about the implications of the bill for their services. That included looking at what would happen if impacts were at the higher end of ranges and the likelihood of that happening.

Our financial estimates are, in most instances, a range of possible outcomes within which we have indicated a best estimate. Where we have used a range, it is because it is best statistical practice to do so. We have then based best estimates—unless we have specifically indicated our own workings on the point—on the professional experience and judgment of the various bodies involved. We have used that methodology with the various bodies that we have referred to, so we consider that the result has been a thorough consideration of the implications of the bill, including the need for training and changes in processes and methodology. That is informing our planned timetable for implementation, and a full plan will be prepared once the final terms of the bill are known.

I hope that that provides some sort of background to the process, which has been pretty robust, I have to say, and has taken some time.

Jamie Hepburn: That is helpful. The faculty also suggested—the deputy convener made this point, too—that “the incidence of convictions may change” as a result of the bill and that, if so,
“an assessment which simply applies the existing proportion of cases in which a conviction is secured to the ‘additional’ cases prosecuted would underestimate the costs to SPS and local authorities.”

How do you respond to that?

Peter Hope-Jones: That is an illustration of exactly what I was talking about earlier. The Faculty of Advocates submission argues that the conviction rate may be higher, and that would impact on the number of convictions and therefore on prisons. However, as we heard, there is an argument that the conviction rate may in fact be lower because a bar is being removed to certain cases going forward, which potentially increases the number of cases. We felt that there was no sufficiently robust evidence either way on which to base a calculation, and that is why we have used the existing figure.

Jamie Hepburn: I appreciate that it is pretty difficult to know what the conviction rate may be in future. The deputy convener also referred to the Scottish Prison Service position in response to the financial memorandum. For absolute clarity, can you confirm that it is not expressing any concerns about capacity issues in prisons or about the costs involved in the bill and that such concerns have not been presented to you?

Peter Hope-Jones: There are wider conversations about prison capacity. Prison numbers are projected to increase by about 200 places per year in any case. That does not specifically incorporate the predictions in the financial memorandum, but it does reflect an expectation that there will be legal changes and that those changes are liable to lean more towards stronger prison sentences. It is also worth noting that we should consider the increases in prisoner numbers in the wider context of such things as community payback orders as a more robust and flexible community sentence, the presumption against imposing short prison sentences of three months or less, and the range of policy initiatives designed to reduce reoffending, such as the reduce reoffending change fund. There is a wider picture about prisoner numbers, obviously, and the bill feeds into that wider conversation.

Jamie Hepburn: I suppose the point is that the Scottish Prison Service is not knocking the Government’s door down saying that there is a financial problem as a result of the bill.

Peter Hope-Jones: Not as a result of the bill. It has said that, in the short term, the estimates set out in the financial memorandum are manageable within capacity.

Jamie Hepburn: Thank you.

Gavin Brown: Is the average cost of a community sentence £2,400?

Peter Hope-Jones: I believe that that is the figure that we use in our calculations. Let me just check that—it is set out in the financial memorandum. If you repeat the question, I will confirm the figure.

Gavin Brown: Is the average cost of a community sentence £2,400?

Peter Hope-Jones: We have used the figure of £225,000.

Gavin Brown: Sorry?

Peter Hope-Jones: We have used the figure of £225,000.

Gavin Brown: For a community sentence?

Peter Hope-Jones: Oh no—I am sorry—the figure that I cited was for secure accommodation.

The Convener: Perhaps you could get back to the committee with that information.

Peter Hope-Jones: Yes. We will get back to you on that.

Gavin Brown: Let us assume that the cost is of that magnitude. You assume that there will be an increase in the number of community sentences. You have a low estimate of 120, a best estimate of 480 and a high estimate of 1,140. If we work to your best estimate of 480 additional community sentences a year, on what basis do you assume that there will be no additional costs on local authorities with that number of additional cases?

Peter Hope-Jones: The costs associated with community sentences are different from those associated with prisons in that they are mostly about the staff time involved in the supervision of the sentences. It is worth noting that the 480 additional cases modelled in the financial memorandum are, at around 2.8 per cent of the total figure of 16,916, a relatively small percentage increase.

The position is set out as part of the opportunity costs model that we have explained in some detail. They are manageable because the workloads of social workers and other relevant agencies can be repositioned.

Gavin Brown: What percentage increase in community sentences would be needed for there to be an additional cost to local authorities?

Peter Hope-Jones: I am not sure that I can answer that specifically. However, aside from the bill, there is increasing emphasis on community sentences in the justice system.

Kerry Twyman (Scottish Government): We do not have the calculations to hand. On staff time, we were talking about an extra couple of hours a week, the expectation would be that current staff could absorb that; were we talking about a large enough increase in cases to require additional staff to be recruited, there would be a financial cost. In the discussions with COSLA on the issue, it was not considered that there would be a high enough impact, based on these numbers, to require the recruitment of additional staff members.

Gavin Brown: In that case, what percentage increase is needed before new staff are required? You are saying that you have not done those calculations.

Kerry Twyman: In the discussions that were had, the feeling was that the potential increase was not anywhere near enough for there to be a cost. Even when we looked at the figures at the high end of the range and divided the cases across all the various authorities in Scotland, the numbers did not come out high enough for there to be an absolute need to recruit additional staff. It was felt that the potential additional cases could be managed by current staff levels.

Gavin Brown: In evidence presented to the committee, West Dunbartonshire Council, which the convener mentioned, has said that there would be additional costs; Falkirk Council has said that there would be increased staffing costs; Fife Council has questioned your assumptions; and Renfrewshire Council has said that it would be very difficult to absorb the costs. The message that we are getting from local authorities is that there will be increased costs, but you are saying that there will not. I am simply trying to work out the percentage increase in sentences before additional costs are incurred. We are getting a very different message from what you have presented to us.

10:45

Peter Hope-Jones: Only a minority of local authorities have written in on this issue and it should be noted that, although they have picked up a number of small issues, Fife and South Lanarkshire said in their submissions that, overall, the financial memorandum gives a reasonable estimation of the costs and they broadly accept it. As I have said, the agreement was made with COSLA as the representative body.

Elspeth MacDonald: It might be helpful if we respond by letter on the various issues that local authorities have highlighted so that we can reassure you on each and every one.

The Convener: That is going to be a big letter, right enough.

Elspeth MacDonald: Yes, but my point is that, in some cases, assumptions have been made that do not apply and, in others, we can provide the committee with specific answers. We would look to do that rather than not answer your question now.

Gavin Brown: I accept the point that not every increase in cases will lead to additional costs, but I find it very difficult to accept that there will be no additional costs whatever. No doubt some of the costs can be absorbed, but the evidence that we have received is that not all of them can be, and I merely ask you to reflect on how you have reached your conclusion that none of the additional cases will lead to additional costs. I find that surprising, but I will leave the matter there.

Elspeth MacDonald: I am happy to respond and clarify the position for you.

Gavin Brown: Thank you.

The Convener: You do not need to respond on the assumed costs of community sentencing, because the figures can be found in table 29 of the financial memorandum.

Michael McMahon: I have only a short question. We have seen evidence of the disparities in the figures that are being cited and read the concerns of local authorities. In its submission, Falkirk Council has stated that, because of the concern about what might be described as the wide margin of error between the financial memorandum and the local authorities’ assessments of the impact of the legislation,

“It would be preferable if the ... Government gave an undertaking to review costs in the light of experience so that any marked increase could be funded”.

Can you give that commitment?

Peter Hope-Jones: Yes. We will certainly be monitoring the bill’s impact and maintaining communication with the key bodies.

Malcolm Chisholm: I find this financial memorandum interesting for two reasons. First, many of the debates on costings are inextricably bound up with the bill’s fundamentally controversial aspects, a good example of which is corroboration. There is an inherent uncertainty about all of this, but I suspect that people have reached their particular conclusions because of their position on the policy rather than anything else. I will certainly follow the matter with great interest.

That was merely a comment. My question is more about the second aspect of the financial memorandum that I have found intriguing: opportunity costs. I must admit that, all this time, I have been struggling to see why you have used the term. As I understand it, the opportunity cost of a policy is all the things that you cannot do because you are implementing that policy. However, you seem to be using the term almost as a code for efficiency savings, which I have to say puzzles me. If it is fundamentally related to efficiency savings, such a move has been questioned by the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents, which is saying—and I will not read out the quote—“Look, we’re already making lots of efficiency savings to free up resources for early and voluntary retirement.” Some people might have the suspicion that some of the big sums of money attached to opportunity costs are slightly misleading and that they really should be called financial costs. After all, you cannot have unending efficiency savings and simply badge up all the additional costs to be dealt with through efficiencies.

Elspeth MacDonald: I have already explained what opportunity costs are. There is an element of efficiency saving but, as far as the police are concerned, the fact is that, if the bill is passed, 17,234 police officers who are doing their job one way just now will have to do their job differently and the main costs of that will fall on the front-line officers.

In some instances, the bill’s provisions—the Bowen provisions, for example—will provide efficiencies themselves. However, although everyone in central or local government is being asked to look for efficiency savings, that is not the core of the opportunity costs as we use the term in the financial memorandum. The general expectation on bodies is that they will make efficiencies, but we are not necessarily offsetting new costs against efficiencies. A lot of these costs are not new; instead, they are resources that are being used for something different.

Malcolm Chisholm: That might be closer to the normal meaning of opportunity cost, but it raises the question of what will not be done that is currently being done. Central to the concept of an opportunity cost is the idea that you cannot do certain good activity because you are now doing something else. However, that does not seem to have been acknowledged in the narrative around opportunity costs in the financial memorandum. Indeed, you seem to be almost redefining language in a way that I find slightly puzzling.

Kerry Twyman: The police costs form one of the largest opportunity costs in the bill; as paragraph 128 of the financial memorandum makes clear, the figure for that is £9.8 million, the bulk of which relates entirely to training. In that case, the term “opportunity costs” might, as you suggest, not mean substituting something for something else; instead, because we have moved the implementation date from 2014-15—a year in which, according to the police, the additional training would have required backfilling and overtime, with all the real financial costs that that would have carried—to 2015-16, the police have indicated that they will be able to spread the training across the year in a way that ensures that it can be accommodated in normal police time and will not require any backfilling or overtime. It would therefore have been very misleading to have classed that as a financial cost; the training, the figure for which is £8 million, will be carried out during normal police time.

As for the £1.2 million for training staff time for delivering training, we are talking about staff who are currently in post delivering training. The discussion, again, was about whether, if we moved the implementation date to 2015-16, it could be worked into the normal training for police without the need to take on additional training staff, which again would carry a real financial cost. Arguably, that could not be classed as a real financial cost as it was effectively being absorbed by moving the implementation date and not carrying any additional cost.

As we have discussed, a similar argument can be made about the prisons cost. At the moment, prisons have flexibility in managing their portfolio and estate and can move prisoners around and they indicated to us that no direct financial cost arose from the bill’s provisions.

I do not know whether that helps.

Malcolm Chisholm: The prisons example is probably the best one because it has the highest cost—I think that the figure is £22 million as a result of increased prison places. It is hard to imagine how we can have a lot more prisoners at no real cost.

Kerry Twyman: It comes down to the use of the average figure of £37,000 per year for a prisoner place. This is where the opportunity cost concept comes into its own, because putting one more prisoner into the prison estate will not necessarily cost £37,000. That figure takes into account the costs of and depreciation in the estate, and putting in one more prisoner will not require the building of a whole new prison. We have used the figure of £37,000, but that is the average cost of a prisoner across the estate. The cost of putting an extra 200 or 300 people in prison per year will not be £37,000 each; it will be the amount that it costs to feed those extra prisoners and the various direct costs that are attributable to their being in prison.

Malcolm Chisholm: Even those are financial costs rather than opportunity costs. You might assume that staffing levels are related to the number of prisoners in some way, too.

Kerry Twyman: The indication that we have had from prisons is that the costs of an extra 200-odd prisoners are already largely included in what have been put forward as the annual prison running costs. The prison running costs include some flexibility for prisoner numbers going up or down on an annual basis. That is why, in previous years, prisons have had underspends during the year. Running costs have been slightly lower than had been anticipated because prisoner numbers have been slightly lower. That happened last year, in 2012-13.

Malcolm Chisholm: I may not have looked at enough financial memorandums to know, but that seems an interesting concept to introduce into the world of financial memorandums. It could be used in any financial memorandum to disguise financial costs. I am not accusing you of doing that—I would have to look into the issue more—but it could always be argued that the costs involved are not real costs because they can all be absorbed. Do you know what I mean?

Kerry Twyman: Yes. That is why we have been careful to agree the opportunity costs with our partners. When they have felt that there would be an additional financial cost, our partners have been vocal. As I outlined, there are specific areas in which the police have said that the bill will result in additional financial costs, and those have been captured in the financial memorandum. The same goes for the Scottish Legal Aid Board.

We would not have called the costs in question opportunity costs if that had not been agreed with the partners concerned. You are absolutely right that that could lead to our trying to badge everything as an opportunity cost, which would be misleading. However, had we called many of those costs financial costs that would not have been transparent, either. We are not spending £10 million on training police officers specifically for the bill. That training will form part of their normal in-year training.

John Mason: I have a supplementary question on the issue that has just been asked about. Mention has been made of paragraph 128, which refers to “staff time for attending 18 hours of training”.

I do not know whether that applies to every officer. Paragraph 126 says:

“This can be achieved through reallocation of the officer from normal duties in most cases without the need for overtime payments”.

Therefore, the extra time that Mr Chisholm was talking about will be included in officers’ total normal hours. That means that they will go to less training on things such as first aid and equal opportunities or that they will spend less time on the beat. I do not see the police in my area sitting around or having long tea breaks.

Have you done any digging on what normal duties will be cut out to enable that extra work to be done?

Peter Hope-Jones: It would be for the individual agencies to comment in detail on what they would and would not do, but we have had conversations about detailed implementation plans. That process is continuing, but the outcome will depend slightly on the final form of the bill and other factors. We are talking about the financial year 2015-16, which is quite far ahead to be thinking about training and workload issues.

The Convener: I do not know that it is. Is all that not included in the forward financial projections in the financial memorandum?

Peter Hope-Jones: What precisely are you referring to?

The Convener: You said that 2015-16 was quite far ahead. Surely we have to think about such things when we look at the long-term cost implications in the financial memorandum.

Peter Hope-Jones: Absolutely, but we might not have to look at the exact detail of which training courses police officers will or will not go on.

The Convener: Surely you have to do that as part of the process of looking at the overall costs. When it comes to the financial memorandum and the bill, you must know what you will be paying for.

Peter Hope-Jones: I am sorry—I do not mean to suggest that we have not modelled what training will be required for the bill. That is set out as an opportunity cost, and it will need to be balanced against other training priorities.

11:00
The Convener: I want to go back to some things that have not been covered during the session. The total recurring costs are a very precise £6.587 million per annum, but I note that non-recurring costs are £2.703 million and £1.648 million in 2015-16 and 2016-17, respectively. Do you envisage any further non-recurring costs, or will it all be resolved within two years, after which the costs will, in effect, be zero?

Peter Hope-Jones: The non-recurring costs to which you refer are primarily police capital costs for additional interview rooms. Those costs are modelled on the basis of what was put to us as the plan for meeting the requirements of the bill. The position around police premises is slightly more complicated now that we have a single police force, and all sorts of rationalisation is being done around that. Those figures are based on what the police told us.

Within the change that is going on at the moment, there is reasonable capacity because of costs being freed up through the rationalisation of the estate. Apart from what is being modelled here, work is being done in the police on capital fund management and the building of new facilities. Those costs are therefore potentially manageable within the other work that is going on.

The Convener: Thank you for that.

In its submission, the Faculty of Advocates has said that no “estimate for costs attributable to additional appeals generated by the change in the law” seems to have been considered.

Peter Hope-Jones: Yes. A cost is quoted for the Crown Office. It raised that with us as a specific issue for its team that deals with appeals, which saw an increase in workload as a result of the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010. It anticipates that there will be another increase in workload for that team. However, the issue was not raised with us by any of the other agencies, so we felt that it would be specific to the work of that team and we have not looked at it in other areas.

The Convener: You do not think that there should be any costs in the financial memorandum to reflect that.

Peter Hope-Jones: It would not be standard for the financial memorandum to say that there will be more appeals because we are changing the law. That does not apply to all financial memoranda of this type. However, we felt that it was worth reflecting that in the financial memorandum simply because the Crown Office raised a specific issue about that particular team and was able to provide evidence.

The Convener: Gavin Brown wants to come in.

Gavin Brown: My question is on a separate point.

The Convener: That is okay. You have the floor.

Gavin Brown: Table 3 of the financial memorandum, which is on page 39 of the document that I have in front of me, has a heading that refers to opportunity costs. For the SPS, the opportunity costs for 2015-16 are £6.85 million, becoming £14.6 million for 2016-17 and then going up to £18.65 million and £22.75 million. Do the opportunity costs for the SPS continue along that trajectory over time? I take on board the fact that there is not a direct cost every time that there is an extra prisoner. However, if the opportunity costs are on that trajectory, they must, at some point, become real financial costs and they cannot then be classed as opportunity costs.

Peter Hope-Jones: I can see how the table is slightly misleading. The figure for 2018-19 is for the bill’s full impact, and we expect the figure to be at that level from then onwards. The figures are staggered in that way because they are modelling prison sentences that might be several years long. In the first year there would be additional sentences, whereas in the second year there would be additional sentences but also people continuing to serve the sentences that were brought in in the first year. That is why the figures ramp up to a particular level, which we expect to be the long-term level.

Gavin Brown: Would there be no prison sentences of longer than three years? You say that the figure will get to £22.75 million and never go higher than that, but what if some prison sentences were considerably longer than three years? Surely the figure would then go up.

Peter Hope-Jones: I think that the figure was reached using an average prison sentence of eight years; therefore, it will take four years to reach the average level. After four years, people will start to leave prison who went into it as a result of the bill, and our analysts suggested that that is where the figures will start to level out. It is not an exact science, so there might be some variation, but that is the picture that our analysts developed.

The Convener: Okay. That was a digression from what we were talking about—I apologise for that.

Let me take you back to appeals. You were talking about the financial memorandum. Surely, if there is an additional cost from appeals under the legislation, that should at least be touched on in the financial memorandum. That cost must be funded somehow, must it not? If additional appeals are generated by a change in the law, there must be a financial implication.

Peter Hope-Jones: We did not have sufficiently robust evidence to suggest that there would be an increase in the number of appeals across the board. The team in the Crown Office raised a particular issue about its workload and that is what we reflected.

The Convener: Should that be looked at a wee bit further?

Peter Hope-Jones: We can have conversations with other agencies and get back to you, if that would be helpful.

The Convener: Thank you very much.

The financial memorandum states that Police Scotland and the COPFS conducted shadow reporting and shadow marking exercises. That was touched on earlier in Jamie Hepburn’s questioning. The Faculty of Advocates has stated:

“The FM does not provide sufficient information on those exercises to allow for meaningful comment.”

Earlier, you talked about the process being thorough and robust, but the Faculty of Advocates has said that it cannot even comment meaningfully on the exercises because the process has not been robust and thorough. How can we get an accurate reflection of what the bill will impact on financially if that is the case?

Peter Hope-Jones: The exercise that was undertaken was absolutely robust and thorough. Perhaps the description of it in the financial memorandum was not as detailed as it might have been, but the additional information that the Crown Office has now presented gives a good picture of the thorough investigation that occurred.

The Convener: Okay. Thank you.

Would the bill team like to make any further points before we wind up?

Elspeth MacDonald: I thank the committee for its thorough scrutiny. We will provide the other information that was asked for that we could not provide off the cuff.

The financial memorandum represents a great deal of hard work with all the main bodies concerned, all of which have signed it off. It is, therefore, an agreed position with the main bodies that are affected by the bill. Despite the financial memorandum’s novel aspects, we intended at all times to reveal to the committee as much relevant information as we could, together with our thinking behind the conclusions that we reached.

The Convener: Thank you very much for responding to our questions. We look forward to receiving further information in writing.
Written evidence to the Finance Committee

Aberdeenshire Council
Association of Scottish Police Superintendents
Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service
Dundee City Council
Faculty of Advocates
Falkirk Council
Fife Council
Joint Submission from Scottish Police Authority and Police Scotland
Renfrewshire Council
Scottish Court Service
Scottish Legal Aid Board
Scottish Prison Service
South Lanarkshire Council
The Law Society of Scotland
West Dunbartonshire Council
West Lothian Council

Supplementary evidence

Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service
The Law Society of Scotland
Letter from Scottish Government Bill team to Convener, 3 December 2013

Correspondence

Letter from Cabinet Secretary for Justice to Convener, 18 November 2013
1. Currently the appropriate adult’s scheme is run on a voluntary basis in that social workers volunteer to train as appropriate adults and undertake this if an appropriate adult requested.

2. If it is made a right that people have access to an appropriate adult this will mean that financial assistance is required to ensure availability of appropriate adults on a 24 hour basis.

3. In terms of current costing, the current appropriate adult scheme is run on £5k per year. The £5k covers training costs and social workers do this on a voluntary basis. However, what this means is that a full service is not provided.

4. However, if it were to be a duty upon local authorities to provide appropriate adults then we would need social work backfill to ensure we could deliver this service and funding for training more social workers.

5. The likely cost of backfill would be 1 x peripatetic social worker post and likely cost of increased coordination would be 1/2 post coordinator to Coordination referrals, appropriate adult training and awareness. So overall cost approx £65k per year.
Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. I provided a joint response with the Scottish Police Federation. Our comments reflected our joint view that while we supported much of the policy intention and many of the measures proposed we were not wholly convinced in relation to the case for the wholesale abolition of the requirement for corroboration. Our comments did not focus on the financial aspects other than we would welcome detailed evidence of the benefits and cost of change.

2. We also welcomed any opportunity to streamline processes, reduce time and costs associated with current processes and procedures. Elements of the Bill may eventually enable some efficiency to be achieved in policing but there is a risk of increased pressure on the Criminal Justice System downstream from policing. I accept that an assessment has been undertaken to identify the potential increase in reporting of cases and prosecutions that might follow but remain concerned.

3. We also supported the removal of the requirement for corroboration in certain aspects of legal procedure such as the need to corroborate the service of certain legal documents. However our general stance was and remains that we are not wholly convinced of the case that corroboration is not required.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

4. We did not offer any detailed consideration on the financial assumptions.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

5. Yes.

Costs

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?

6. Our members are the senior operational leaders of the police service. They provide operational leadership and direction as Divisional and Departmental Commanders carrying Strategic and Tactical responsibility for high risk policing operations with direct personal and professional legal accountability for their decisions. This includes Firearms and all other major policing operations as well as the day to day operations including decisions whether to retain an arrested person in custody or release them into the community, where the lives and personal safety of members of the public depend upon the decisions made.

7. While there are no direct implications for ASPS as a Staff Association for much of the Bill, there may be implications for my members who will have to work within the legislation and apply it in practice. There may also well be indirect implications for my members arising from future legal challenges to this new legislation as new Case Law is generated.

8. An area of direct relevance to us as a Staff Association is Chapter 2, Section 87, Police Negotiating Board Scotland. We welcome this development as necessary and proportionate given the wider developments across UK policing negotiating arrangements. I note the FM provides no detail on the anticipated costs and that the Scottish Government are to “pay such expenses as are necessary to enable PNBS to carry out its functions”\(^1\). I will respond in more detail to the separate Scottish Government consultations on PNB.

9. Support for the work of the UK PNB, which is in the process of being wound up, has included specialist support from the Office of Manpower and Economics and I hope that this has been taken into account in terms of funding as such support will still be required.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

10. I was unable to locate reference to the projection of costs “over 15 years” in the FM. I am however aware of the 15 year projection of estimated costs and savings for police reform. The projected costs and savings in the FM for the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill for the policing elements are based on the best estimate of Police Scotland. Much of the costs are classed as opportunity costs and I would advise close scrutiny of these in the wider context of police reform.

11. The challenge to achieve the required savings arises as a consequence of the Outline Business Case (OBC) for police reform. ASPS were not afforded the opportunity to comment on the financial aspects of the OBC and Police Scotland is struggling to find the savings that were offered in the OBC. There are elements of the FM that highlight financial costs as opposed to opportunity costs required to achieve the policy objectives. These relate to practical aspects such as estate and making custody facilities meet the requirements of the legislation. However, it remains difficult to comment constructively on the accuracy and reasonableness of the FM, as I believe the Bill still requires some additional work and have made a submission to the Justice Committee to this effect.

12. The Bill is driven from a Human Rights perspective, which I fully support. It is therefore important that the processes and procedures put in place by Police Scotland focus on safeguarding Human Rights. It is a particularly challenging task for policing in the context of achieving significant financial savings year on year.

\(^1\) Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, Paragraph 249
The information was however presented over 4 years (2015/16, 2016/17, 2017/18, and 2018/19) in tables throughout the FM. I note that the Bill seeks to “modernise and enhance the efficiency of the Scottish Government criminal justice system”\(^2\). There is no doubt that the Bill will modernise Scottish Criminal Justice System (SCJS) by the measures proposed, to a significant degree. However, I believe an opportunity to further modernise and streamline police powers relating to powers of search which has been missed which I believe would improve justice and reduce costs.

13. I appreciate that the costs of Police ICT to enable this change are incorporated in the wider police ICT investment\(^3\) programme but some reference should be made to the ICT cost that is attributable to this Bill, in order that this is captured and understood for the future, without wishing to raise a risk of “double counting”.

14. I note that the costs in the FM are assessed as “financial” if it relates to a specific need for additional staff to perform a new function or one-off capital costs associated with the Bill. Other costs are assessed as “opportunity costs” which can be defined as “the best alternative uses that the goods or services could be put to”\(^4\). These opportunity costs in terms of policing must be viewed in the context of the budget set by the SPA for 2013/14 and the reducing budget for policing leading up to and during the period of the new Bill’s implementation.

15. In relation to policing, on 28 March 2013 the Scottish Police Authority set the 2013/14 budget\(^5\) for the Police Service of Scotland at the available funding level of £1,062,449,000 against expenditure budgets of £1,126,343,000 resulting in a requirement to achieve spending reductions of £63,894,000 in the financial year 2013/14.

16. It is my understanding that the Police Service of Scotland must subsequently achieve year on year real financial savings due to the annually reducing budget and that therefore the opportunity to use resources “freed up” by efficiency savings is questionable. It is a more likely scenario that resources “freed up” have to be offered Early Retirement (ER), Voluntary Retirement (VR) or redeployed to fill gaps arising from ER and VR wherever possible.

17. The majority of costs in policing relate to people costs. The main way in which costs will be reduced will be by reducing the head count providing the service. This means primarily police staff posts being reduced. The business change required by policing arising from this Criminal Justice Bill is significant and is outlined in the FM. This change will need to be managed in the context of a period of significant budget

---

\(^2\) Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, Paragraph 3

\(^3\) http://www.spa.police.uk/assets/126884/175734/item-13-i6-business-case

\(^5\) http://www.spa.police.uk/assets/126884/147077/Item02-budget-final reduction, reducing numbers of police staff and a major operational challenge in the form of the Commonwealth Games. It is important to note the context and acknowledge the scale of the likely challenge.

18. Much of the opportunity cost relates to using resources differently to deliver the business change required: removing out of date training and guidance material, designing and delivering new training material and associated training, abstraction for attending training courses and so on. An assessment also appears in relation to the time required for new work in relation to reviewing detention by Inspecting ranks, considering and applying bail conditions and case managing “investigative bail” and so on.

19. Intuitively these assessments do not appear unreasonable but would welcome understanding to what extent any adjustment has been made for “optimism bias” in not only the assessments for policing (SPA) but right across the SCJS organisations impacted by this Bill. In addition, it I would welcome clarity if an allowance has been made for increase in costs over the period associated with inflation and other relevant on costs associated with staff costs.

20. Much of the detail has been worked through and detailed modelling carried out in relation to how Police Scotland would configure itself to meet the new requirements arising from the Bill. For example, work is already underway to reduce the supervisory ratios across Police Scotland to ensure necessary cost savings are achieved under a policy of management delayering.

21. ASPS understand and accept the need for management delayering but would encourage the Justice Committee to seek assurance that there is a clearly defined model with sufficient Inspectors to meet the new requirements under the Bill. There can be a temptation to just “add in” the new requirements and responsibilities to the roles and responsibilities of Inspectors. I do not think this would be in keeping with the spirit or intention of the Bill which seeks to protect the rights of detained persons and protect the public.

22. In addition the Chief Constable will be held to account by the Scottish Police Authority for performance across an extensive range of indicators which includes the overall detection rate along with targets for submission times to the Procurator Fiscal Service. This will undoubtedly create a pressure to increase the number of reports that the SCJS as a whole may have to deal with. I would also encourage clarity over the potential impact that achieving all of the performance indicators might have on the rest of the Criminal Justice System.

---

8 http://www.spa.police.uk/assets/126884/140136/item62-performanceframework
If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

23. At this moment in time I do not see direct financial costs for ASPS, but seek assurance that PNB Scotland related costs (specialist support) will be met.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

24. It is difficult to comment on the uncertainty of the estimates but would hope that a sufficient allowance has been made for optimum bias as well as for inflation and pay rises. The FM also "wraps up" the costs associated with ICT to enable this change in the wider police ICT programme. This change will require ICT to make it work and the costs associated with this need to be robustly scrutinised and monitored given the history of public sector ICT programmes.

Wider Issues

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

25. There are areas of the Bill which in my view need further work and therefore it is difficult to assert that all the costs are reasonably captured. I have made a submission to the Justice Committee in relation to the areas I believe need further work.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

26. The Bill introduces major change. It changes what until now has been a mixture of Common Law and Statute Law police powers into precise statutory legislation. It is probable that detailed legal debate may follow on the precise meaning of any particle wording in the legislation and therefore additional guidance or indeed a Code of Practice may become necessary to ensure police apply their powers in accordance with the intention of Parliament.
FINANCE COMMITTEE CALL FOR EVIDENCE
CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL: FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM
SUBMISSION FROM CROWN OFFICE AND PROCURATOR FISCAL SERVICE

Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. Yes - COPFS were aware of both consultation exercises and submitted a response to the initial public consultation on Lord Carloway's proposals which took place between 3 July and 5 October 2012. In this response COPFS supported the broad principles contained in the consultation paper but, at that time, did not comment on any financial assumptions made. COPFS did not provide a response to the second public consultation on additional safeguards required following the removal of the requirement for corroboration.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?
2. Yes - COPFS contributed to the preparation of the Financial Memorandum and our submissions have been accurately recorded in that document.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
3. Yes.

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum? If not, please provide details.
4. Yes - Policy officials from COPFS provided a written submission to the Scottish Government in relation to the Financial Memorandum. This focused on the areas which were likely to directly impact on the work of COPFS and included the following:

- Corroboration - the removal of the requirement for corroboration will have an impact on the numbers and types of cases that will be prosecuted in future.
- Training - the removal of the requirement for corroboration will require COPFS to apply a new prosecutorial test which will be a substantial change and require a significant amount of training for all legal staff within COPFS.
- Appeals – although the level of appeals within Scotland is relatively stable, it has been proven that a change in law normally increases the number of defence appeals lodged.
Communications Costs - new documentation for COPFS will require to be produced in a number of areas although this documentation will likely be internet focused.

Information systems costs – work is ongoing and these are still to be finalised.

Challenges to conditions of Investigative Liberation/Undertakings and Post-charge questioning – a number of different processes have been identified and their resultant costs have been estimated.

Solemn Procedure - details of the proposed overall costs and savings of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s recommendations which form Part 3 of the Bill have been assessed.

5. COPFS is content that the financial implications referred to above are accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the Financial Memorandum and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

6. COPFS is content that the estimated costs and savings set out in the Financial Memorandum (as they apply to COPFS) are reasonable and are as accurate as possible in respect of the time periods considered.

7. It was not possible to provide exact figures in relation to some of the information and certain assumptions required to be made. For example, the regimes of post charge questioning introduced by s27-29 of the Bill and investigative liberation introduced by s14 to 17 are entirely new processes in the Scottish criminal justice system and it is difficult to estimate the frequency with which they will be used and challenged. However, COPFS is satisfied that the information provided is as reasonable and accurate as possible in the circumstances.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

8. The Financial Memorandum sets out the total estimated costs to COPFS. However, COPFS is content that these costs can be met from within the organisation, following an internal review of processes and procedures.

Does the Financial Memorandum accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

9. Yes. As stated in the response to question 5 above, certain assumptions were made in relation to the information provided for the Financial Memorandum. These assumptions and associated estimates have been accurately covered in the Memorandum.
Wider Issues

Do you believe that the Financial Memorandum reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

10. COPFS believes that the Financial Memorandum reasonably captures the costs associated with the Bill, but can only comment in respect of COPFS.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

11. It is not anticipated that there will be future costs associated with the Bill that would impact on COPFS.
FINANCE COMMITTEE CALL FOR EVIDENCE

CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL: FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

SUBMISSION FROM DUNDEE CITY COUNCIL

Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. No

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. N/A

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
3. N/A

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
4. We do not believe that all the potential additional costs have been accurately reflected in the FM. No consideration has been given to the potential increased volume of Social Work reports as a result of an increase in the number of prosecutions and associated requests for Social Work court reports. The FM assumes that the costs of supporting additional community sentences will not translate directly into additional financial cost but will be an additional demand in managing workloads. However locally we are already facing a sustained increase in the number of community based sentences (up 30%) within a context of reduced Criminal Justice Grant funding leading to funding pressures and the proposals in the Bill will exacerbate this problem should no additional funding be provided. In addition, should the Change Fund be successful in achieving its objectives, there is a presumption in the fund criteria that these services are funded from mainstream CJS funding in the longer term should there be a local commitment for them to continue. This would further reduce resources available to fund an increasing number of community based sentences.

5. In relation to the proposal to increase the time limit for the period of remand from 110 to 140 days we consider the potential financial implications to be underestimated based on our recent experience. Taking the whole system approach which encourages young people to stay under supervision for longer periods of time, any serious offending will potentially involve remand in secure provision paid for by the local authority. Through comparing the cost of 2 Dundee young people recently placed in secure care on remand before and after the proposed changes we estimate the potential increase in expenditure would be around £45k under the new proposals. In addition, the local authority incurred expenditure of over £12k on secure transport costs relating to court/Children’s Hearing appearances/ medical appointments etc over the remand period for the 2 individuals, an average of around £610 per journey. It is therefore unreasonable to expect that this cost nationally would be around £56k per annum and that the costs would be met by local authorities.

6. The assumptions made around funding support to child suspects appear to be reasonable.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

7. See comments at 4 above.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

8. See comments at 4 above.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

9. See comments at 4 above.

Wider Issues

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

10. There could potentially be an impact on agencies supporting victims of crime through increased numbers of prosecutions.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

11. None considered
Introduction

1. The Faculty of Advocates is the independent bar in Scotland. Collectively, its members have unrivalled experience of advocacy before the Scottish courts and include acknowledged experts in many fields of law. The Faculty makes available to the people of Scotland a pool of skilled and well-trained advocates who are available for instruction in any court in the land. The work of the Faculty and of its members is integral to the maintenance of the rule of law in Scotland.

2. The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill proposes wide-ranging reforms of the criminal justice system. The Faculty’s response to the provisions of the Bill are elaborated fully in its response to the Justice Committee’s Call for Evidence. As will be evident from that response, the Faculty actively supports those parts of the Bill which it considers to be in the public interest. However, there are features of the Bill which the Faculty cannot support. In particular, it does not support the proposal, as it appears in this Bill, to abolish the requirement of corroboration.

3. The Faculty wishes to comment on the information in the Financial Memorandum (“the FM”) in relation to the proposal to abolish corroboration. The Faculty confines its comments to the Finance Committee to this aspect of the Bill. The key point which the Faculty wishes to make in relation to the abolition of corroboration is this. The requirement of corroboration is central to the practical operation of the criminal justice system in Scotland at every stage. Yet there is no clarity as to what will be put in its place. Without such clarity, the effects of the proposal cannot meaningfully be assessed. In particular, it is effectively impossible to make any reliable estimate of the resource implications of the proposal.

4. The analysis in the FM depends critically on two “shadow” exercises which have been undertaken, one by the police and the other by COPFS. The FM does not provide sufficient information on those exercises to allow for meaningful comment. The Faculty has asked for further information about them, but this has not, as yet, been forthcoming.

5. Even if the results of the “shadow” exercises on which the analysis is based are to be regarded as reliable, there are reasons, which are set out more fully below, to believe that the analysis in the FM understates the resource implications. Further, it seems to the Faculty to be unrealistic to treat additional costs which have been identified as “opportunity costs” which can be absorbed without a real increase in resources to key parts of the system.
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if you did, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

6. The Faculty responded in detail to both consultation exercises. Neither consultation addressed the resource implications of the proposals. In particular, the first consultation, Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice: the Carloway Report did not address the resource implications of the abolition of corroboration. The Faculty pointed this out in its response to that consultation (a copy of which is attached): see paragraphs 61 to 65.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

7. The issues which the Faculty identified in paragraphs 61 to 65 of its response in relation to the abolition of corroboration are addressed in the FM. For the reasons set out below, the Faculty does not consider that this analysis adequately addresses the likely resource implications of this part of the Bill.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

8. Yes

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organization, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details.

9. The proposal to abolish corroboration might, insofar as it increases the number of prosecutions, generate a financial benefit for advocates and therefore, indirectly, for the Faculty of Advocates. The scale of any such benefit is speculative. In any event, the Faculty does not consider any possible financial benefits to individual advocates or to the Faculty arising from this measure to be material considerations in assessing the merits or otherwise, in the public interest, of the proposal.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

10. No. Specifically, the Faculty does not believe that the estimated costs set out in the FM in relation to the proposal to abolish corroboration are reasonable or accurate.

11. The requirement for corroboration is, currently, central to the practical operation of the criminal justice system at all stages. It informs the investigations undertaken by the police and is fundamental both to the consideration of the case by the prosecutor and the conduct of the trial, as well as often being relevant if the case is appealed.

12. In particular, under the current law, a prosecution should not be initiated unless there is sufficient evidence in law – i.e. there must be evidence from more than one source to support the propositions: (i) that a crime has been committed; and (ii) that it was the accused who committed the crime. This is not a technicality. The existence of corroborated evidence provides some reasonable assurance that there are sufficient prospects of securing a conviction to justify initiating a prosecution and, if necessary, putting the accused to trial. Further, the requirement to look for corroboration, if it exists, helps to secure that cases are fully investigated and that evidence which may help to secure a conviction (or, indeed, which may be exculpatory) will be identified.

13. The Bill proposes to remove the requirement of corroboration, without putting in its place any new evidential standard or test to be applied by prosecutors and trial judges. It would follow that uncorroborated evidence from a single source would suffice in law to establish: (i) that a crime has been committed; and (ii) that the accused committed the crime. This might, for example, be the evidence of a single witness who alleges that the accused committed a crime against him or her.

14. In practice, it does not appear to be the intention that every case in which there is uncorroborated evidence from a single source will be reported by the police to the COPFS, or that every such case will be prosecuted. It appears to be assumed that police and prosecutors will apply an additional test or tests in deciding (in the case of the police) whether or not to report a case to the COPFS and (in the case of the prosecutor) in deciding whether or not to prosecute. The practical operation of these alternative tests is critical to any assessment of the resource implications of the proposal. The Crown Agent has recently intimated that the proposed test will be: “Is there a reasonable prospect of conviction in that it is more likely that not that the court would find the case proved beyond reasonable doubt?” In order to assess the impact of the change, it would be necessary to have an understanding of how it is intended that the test will, in practice, be applied.

15. The FM relies, critically, on the outcome of two “shadow” exercises, one undertaken by the police and one by prosecutors: see para. 106. The FM does not, however, provide material details of the basis upon which these exercises were undertaken: cf paras. 107, 150. This effectively disables witnesses to the Committee, or the Committee itself, from scrutinizing the analysis in the FM. The Faculty has requested additional information about these exercises, but this has not been forthcoming. The FM does disclose that these “shadow” exercises each involved re-evaluating “a sample of previous cases”: para. 106; para. 150. The Faculty offers the following general observations:

- The size of the sample(s) is/are not disclosed, although the FM does state that the exercise undertaken by COPFS was “relatively small”, with consequent, rather significant, implications for the statistical reliability of the conclusions: para. 153.

- The basis of selection of the sample(s) is not disclosed. It is, accordingly, impossible to assess whether or not the sample(s) were representative of the caseload of the police and/or the COPFS as a whole. This may be important, because the effect of the change in the law may vary with different types of case, such that, if the sample(s) was/were not in fact representative of the caseload, the results would not provide a sound basis for drawing conclusions.
It is not clear whether the two exercises were linked – i.e. whether the exercise undertaken by prosecutors involved “shadow” marking of the cases “reported” under the shadow exercise undertaken by the police, or of some other sample (and, if the latter, how that sample was identified).

It appears to have been assumed that a case investigated under the new regime would look in all respects identical to the same case investigated under the old regime. It is open to question whether this is a reliable assumption: there is a real concern that, in the absence of a legal requirement of corroboration, cases may be investigated by the police in a different way. It would follow, if that is correct, that “shadow” exercises undertaken on a sample of cases investigated under the current law would not provide useful information about cases which would be investigated under the new regime.

Each stage (the stage of reporting by the police and the stage of marking for prosecution), requires an exercise of judgment. The Faculty questions the assumption that the way that judgment would be exercised by the police or by the prosecutor would be the same in a real case as in a “shadow” exercise. In particular, the requirement, in a real case, to explain to the complainer a decision not to report the case or not to prosecute may affect the way that judgment will be exercised in circumstances where there is room for more than one view.

It would appear that the outcome of these exercises only identified the overall impact: para. 187. In particular, the work done did not, apparently, disclose whether the distribution of types of offence reported/prosecuted would be the same as under the current law: ibid. Yet, for reasons which we explain further below, the distribution of types of offence within the cohort of “additional” cases is likely to bear significantly on the resource implications of the proposal.

Additional cases reported by the police to the procurator fiscal

16. The FM reports that the “shadow” exercise undertaken by the police “demonstrated” that the range of increase in the number of cases reported to the procurator fiscal would be between 1.5% and 2.2%, but would “most likely” be at the 1.5% level. Having regard to the nature of the change in the law, these numbers are surprisingly small. In order to understand why that might be, it is necessary to see the instructions which were given to the police. The reason for concluding that the true increase will “most likely” be at the lower end of the range is not stated.

17. The additional cost to the police attributed to the reporting of cases (para. 109) is calculated relying on: (i) the lowest percentage for additional reports to the procurator fiscal; and (ii) the cost of a “basic” SPR (even though the FM acknowledges that cases vary enormously in their complexity). This figure would accordingly appear to be based on the assumptions which would generate the lowest possible cost.
18. The Faculty does not know whether it is realistic to characterize additional staff time requirements for the police as an “opportunity cost” (i.e. as capable of being absorbed within existing resources by efficiency savings, reorganization of work, etc). This is something which the Committee may wish to take up with the police.

Consideration by the procurator fiscal

19. The additional processing costs to COPFS identified as a result of an increase in the number of cases reported by the police (para. 149) is critically dependent on the reliability of the “shadow” exercise carried out by the police: we have commented on this above.

20. No assessment is reported of the additional time taken to assess cases under the new regime as compared with the old regime – unless this is included in the estimate at para. 149 of additional costs for “initial case preparation”. The application of a qualitative test is likely to be more time-consuming than the marking of cases under the current law and practice.

Additional cases prosecuted

21. By reason of the small sample size, there is a very large range between the lowest and highest estimates for additional prosecutions: para. 153. The FM nevertheless states that it is “extremely unlikely” that impacts at the high end of the scale would be seen: ibid. The basis for this assertion is not stated. It is said (para. 187) that COPFS is of the opinion that the “best estimate” stated is expected to be an “accurate forecast” of the number of additional prosecutions. The basis for this expectation is not stated. In particular, it is not clear whether it is based on professional statistical advice as to the conclusions which may properly, given the size of the sample, be drawn from the data.

22. The FM is internally inconsistent as to the absolute number of additional prosecutions. Table 16 and Table 24 contain different figures. It may be that the explanation is that the former is based on the actual number of cases in court, whereas the latter is based on the number of cases in which the defence was funded by the Scottish Legal Aid Board, but this is not clear.

23. An increase in the number of prosecutions will, as the FM identifies, impose additional costs on the police (paras. 113-124), on COPFS (paras. 147-163), on the Scottish Court Service (paras. 177-182) and on the Scottish Legal Aid Board (paras. 215-217). The “shadow” exercises only disclosed the overall impact, and not the distribution of types of offence: para. 187. The FM discloses, in relation to the additional prison costs, the nature of the additional cases which it is thought would be prosecuted under the new regime has (by reference to the different exercise undertaken for Lord Carloway’s review) been taken into account (para. 187), but does not suggest that the distribution of “additional” cases has otherwise been taken into account. Indeed para. 180 would suggest that this distribution has not otherwise been taken into account.
24. The failure to take into account the nature of the “additional” cases may be significant for the resource implications of the proposal. It may be, for example, that the cohort of “additional” cases is likely to contain a significantly higher proportion of sexual offences than the current caseload, and, in particular, to include a higher proportion cases in which the case will essentially turn on an assessment of the complainer’s evidence against an assessment of the accused’s evidence. Such cases are significantly more likely to go to trial rather than to be resolved by a plea, yet it would appear (para. 180) that no allowance for this has been made in the assessment of the additional costs. To put the financial implications of this in context, it is reported that the average plea costs 1.5% of the average case going to trial: para. 180. Further, if there were to be a significantly higher proportion of prosecutions for rape, the additional caseload would bear disproportionately on the High Court (since rape prosecutions must be brought in the High Court), and it is unclear whether the assumption as to the number of additional cases which would be prosecuted in the High Court (para. 178) has taken that into account.

25. Additional police costs attributable to an increase in the number of prosecutions. The FM identifies additional police costs attributable to an increase in the number of cases being prosecuted and going to trial: (i) direct costs by way of police overtime; (ii) opportunity costs by way of additional work required in the investigation and preparation of cases. The reliability of these estimates is critically dependent on the reliability of the estimated increase in the number of cases being prosecuted and going to trial. The FM rightly recognizes that the additional costs to the police involved in a solemn case are extremely difficult to estimate and vary significantly depending on the nature of the case. An average cost has been identified (para. 122) but this is based on an undisclosed piece of work. It is not clear, for example, whether the sample used to determine that average is, in fact, representative of the caseload which would be prosecuted under the new regime. If it is based on the current caseload, it may not be reliable for the new regime, where the profile of the caseload may be different, and where the incidence of solemn cases proceeding to trial may well be greater.

26. Additional COPFS costs attributable to increase in the number of prosecutions. The FM identifies additional COPFS costs by reference to the increase in the number of prosecutions, and is critically dependent on the reliability of those estimates. It may be inferred from the comment at para. 180 (albeit that comment is made in relation to SCS costs) that no allowance has been made for the likelihood that the “additional” cases are more likely to proceed to trial.

27. The FM characterizes the additional costs identified as “opportunity costs” – in other words, as costs which can and will be absorbed without any additional resources being provided. This seems to the Faculty to be unrealistic. It does not take into account the nature of some of the additional work involved. The conduct of a trial requires the attendance of a prosecutor in court. A prosecutor who is in court simply cannot be anywhere else. If there is a significant increase in the number of cases going to trial, an explanation is required as to how this could be absorbed by way of efficiency savings or otherwise without a real increase in resources.
28. The work of the COPFS is central to the public interest in the prosecution of crime and the Service must be adequately resourced to do its job effectively. Publicly available information suggests that the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service is under pressure. In August 2012, the Prosecution Inspectorate reported that overloading of the system (especially in the numbers of intermediate and trial diets) hindered proper preparation of summary cases\(^1\). In January 2013, it was reported that 20% of COPFS staff surveyed wanted to leave as soon as possible or within the next year. Only 30% stated that they would recommend COPFS as a good place to work (17% below the civil service average)\(^2\). In June 2013 a survey by the FDA reported that 23% of prosecutors said that insufficient time to prepare cases was a serious cause of stress\(^3\). To expect an already overstretched service to absorb the proposed additional workload (even assuming that the assumptions made and the results reported in the FM were otherwise to be correct) without additional resources would, in the Faculty’s view, be unrealistic.

29. Additional court costs attributable to increase in the number of prosecutions. The figures are critically dependent on the reliability of the estimate of the number of additional prosecutions. The costs attributed to the increase do not take into account the prospect that a relatively high proportion of the “additional” cases will proceed to trial: para. 180. Further, the FM assumes that 20% of the additional solemn cases would be prosecuted in the High Court: para. 178. The basis for this assumption is not clear. If it is based on the proportion of solemn cases currently prosecuted in the High Court, it may not be a reliable assumption. Rape may only be prosecuted in the High Court and if, for example, one consequence of the change in the law were to be an increase in the number of prosecutions for rape, that increase would, in its entirety, be borne by the High Court.

30. The additional cost to SCS appears to have been derived from the additional costs of providing legal aid in each court: para. 179. If this is a correct understanding of the FM, the costs identified would not, in fact, be the costs to the Court Service of the additional cases (whether direct costs or opportunity costs); rather they would be the costs to the Legal Aid Fund of providing legal representation to the accused. The latter is of course a real cost, but is not the same thing as the additional costs to the Court Service.

31. In characterizing the additional costs to the Court Service as “opportunity costs” the FM relies on savings in court time which it is anticipated will be achieved by the Bowen proposals: paras. 167, 180. Since those proposals relate to solemn cases prosecuted in the sheriff court, it is difficult to see how they could be relevant to the High Court: cf para. 167. While a trial is running the court staff and other court facilities cannot be otherwise used and it is, for that reason, open to question whether the additional costs to the Court Service should be characterized as “opportunity costs”, which can be absorbed through efficiency savings.

---

32. Additional costs to the Scottish Legal Aid Board attributable to increase in the number of prosecutions. SLAB has assessed the additional costs by applying the average cost of providing legal aid in each court in 2012-2013: para.
217. The estimate is critically dependent on the reliability of the estimate of the additional number of prosecutions. If it is correct that a significantly higher proportion of the “additional” cases is liable to run to trial, an average cost derived from the current cohort of cases would materially underestimate the costs to SLAB resulting from the proposal.

33. The Legal Aid Board does not appear to have included any estimate for costs attributable to additional appeals generated by the change in the law. This contrasts with COPFS, which has made an allowance for this in the first three years of the new regime: paras. 157-158.

Additional convictions

34. If the proposal results in additional convictions this will result, as the FM recognizes, in additional costs to the Scottish Prison Service ( paras. 184-195) and to local authorities responsible for supervising community disposals ( paras. 231-235).

35. The assessment of these additional costs depends critically on the reliability of the estimated number of “additional” prosecutions. The estimate of the additional cost to the prison service has sought to take into account the likely distribution of crimes to which the “additional” prosecutions will relate: paras. 187, 233. Because the “shadow” marking exercises only disclosed the absolute increases, reliance has been placed in that regard on work done by the COPFS for Lord Carloway’s Review.
The statistical reliability of that exercise has been criticized. It is unclear whether professional statistical advice has been taken on the appropriateness of combining the absolute increases in summary and solemn prosecutions derived from one exercise with the likely distribution of crimes from another exercise.

36. Perhaps more significantly, the FM proceeds on the assumption that the proportion of “additional” prosecutions which result in a conviction will reflect current experience and that the pattern of disposals will be the same: paras. 187, 233. The former assumption is open to question. Under the new regime, cases in which there is no corroboration will no longer be withdrawn from juries. Likewise, juries will no longer be directed that they can only convict if they find the essential facts proved by corroborated evidence. In these circumstances, the incidence of convictions may change – and may change across the board. If that is correct, an assessment which simply applies the existing proportion of cases in which a conviction is secured to the “additional” cases prosecuted would underestimate the costs to SPS and local authorities. The extent of the underestimate is unknown but it may be significant.

37. The figures used by SPS give a “low estimate”, “best estimate” and “high estimate”. The “best estimate” derives from the COPFS “best estimate” of the additional number of prosecutions: we have commented on this above. SPS is reported as expressing the view that it could accommodate the “best estimates” within existing flexibility (while commenting on the limits of that flexibility): para. 194. At the same time, SPS makes clear that the wide range of potential effects means that it is not possible to say whether the proposal would trigger a need for additional prison places (i.e. capital spending on prisons): para. 195.

38. If the proposal were to result in a higher number of convictions for sexual offences, it would follow that there would be an increase in the number of individuals with convictions on the Sex Offenders Register. It is unclear whether or not this has been taken into account when assessing the additional costs to local authorities.

39. The Faculty does not know whether it is realistic to characterize the additional staff time required of local authorities as an “opportunity cost”: para. 235. The Committee may wish to explore this with the Prison Service and local authorities.

If relevant, are you content that your organization can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organization will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

40. Not relevant to the Faculty of Advocates.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

41. No. Specifically, the FM does not accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimated costs associated with the proposed abolition of corroboration. The reasons for this are set out above.

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

42. The Faculty does not believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill, specifically the costs associated with the abolition of corroboration. The reasons for this are set out above.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify those costs?

43. The Faculty offers no additional comment in response to this Question.
FACULTY OF ADVOCATES

RESPONSE

by

FACULTY OF ADVOCATES

to

THE SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT

on

REFORMING SCOTTS CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE:

THE CARLOWAY REPORT

GENERAL RESPONSE TO THE CONSULTATION

1. The matters raised in this Consultation Paper are of fundamental importance to the administration of justice in Scotland. They should be the subject of full consideration by a Royal Commission on the criminal justice system in Scotland or other similar inquiry with the widest possible remit. In particular, if the requirement of corroboration is to be reviewed, this should be done as part of a review of the Scottish criminal justice system as a whole.

2. The requirement of corroboration is central to the current operation of the criminal justice system in Scotland. If that requirement were to be abolished, an accused person could be convicted of the most serious crime on the uncorroborated evidence of a single witness whom seven out of fifteen jurors do not believe. The proposition only has to be stated to be seen to be unacceptable in any modern system of criminal justice.

3. The proposal to abolish corroboration requires a number of questions, which are identified in the body of the response, to be addressed. A central question is the alternative criterion which is to be applied by prosecutors when they are deciding whether or not to prosecute cases. Corroboration cannot be abolished without dealing with this issue. This criterion is of such public importance that it should be the subject of informed public debate and be articulated in statute.

4. In addition to the present Consultation Paper, the Scottish Law Commission has recently made recommendations for major reform of the law on similar fact evidence and Michael McMahon MSP is currently consulting on a proposal for a bill on Criminal Verdicts. The implementation of any one of these proposals would have significant consequences for the criminal justice system. The Faculty does not accept that our criminal justice system is so defective that it needs radical change on all these fronts. But if there really is a case for wholesale reform, the system should be reviewed as a whole by a body with the widest rmit to consider all these issues together.

5. The Faculty’s responses to the particular questions asked in this Consultation should be read subject to and in light of this general response.

ARREST AND DETENTION

Question 1

6. The Faculty would support the simplification, clarification and modernisation of the law of arrest and detention in light of the European Convention.

7. The key requirements of any simplification and clarification of the law are these:-

(i) that individuals should not have their liberty restricted without good reason, sufficient to justify the restriction of liberty;

(ii) that an individual who has been taken into detention or custody, should be released at the earliest possible opportunity unless there is good and sufficient reason for continued detention or custody;

(iii) that there should be appropriate safeguards: (a) to ensure that any detention is lawful; (b) to ensure that persons in custody are treated appropriately while in custody; and (c) to ensure that detention or custody continues no longer than is justified; and

(iv) that any exercise directed to the gathering of evidence (including the questioning of the suspect) should respect the suspect’s Article 6 rights.
8. There are two fundamental rights in play here: the right to liberty, articulated in Article 5 of the Convention; and the right to a fair trial, articulated in Article 6. Both must be fully respected by any reform of the law.

9. The Faculty agrees with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the police should have a power of arrest on reasonable suspicion that the arrested person has committed a crime. It does so, though, in the context of agreeing also with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that a suspect should not be detained unless his or her detention is necessary and proportionate. The mere fact that the police have reasonable suspicion that a person has committed a crime, on its own, is not and should not be sufficient reason to deprive that person of liberty beyond the formal step of arrest.

10. As Lord Carloway recommends, a person should be advised of the reason for his or her arrest. As with the current law on detention, a written record should be made and kept of the time of arrest, the reason for the arrest, and confirming that the suspect has been told that reason.

Question 2

11. The Faculty agrees with this recommendation. In practice, the police do not always charge a suspect prior to reporting a case to the Procurator Fiscal and the charges ultimately brought are often different from those levelled by the police. However, it is, in the Faculty’s view, essential that the suspect is told: (a) that the case is being reported to the Procurator Fiscal; and (b) the reason why the case is being reported to the Procurator Fiscal. Again, a written record should be made and kept of these matters. Lord Carloway’s proposal envisages that after charge the suspect may be subject to further interview only on the authority of the Court. This should also be the case where the suspect is not the subject of charge but of report to the fiscal. One could otherwise envisage the police choosing not to charge, but reporting to the fiscal, with a view to continuing or repeating interviews.

Question 3

12. No. The Article 6 rights of the suspect must be respected whether or not he has been detained or arrested. If, for example, the police were to decide to interview a suspect without arresting or detaining him, they should first give him an opportunity to take legal advice. In Ambrose v. Harris the UK Supreme Court held that it is not contrary to Article 6 for the police to ask certain limited questions of a suspect who has not been arrested or detained even though the suspect has not had access to a lawyer. But Ambrose should be not be taken to justify any type or degree of questioning of a suspect who has not been arrested or detained without giving the suspect the opportunity to consult a lawyer. The issue is one on which there is limited authority as yet from the European Court of Human Rights.

Question 4

13. The question mis-states Lord Carloway’s recommendation. Lord Carloway recommended that a suspect should not be detained unless it is necessary and proportionate to do so, and in particular that the suspect: (a) is liable to escape; (b) will not appear at an appointed court diet; (c) is likely to commit further crimes; or (d) may destroy evidence, interfere with witnesses or otherwise obstruct the course of justice. He further recommended that in determining whether a suspect’s detention or continued detention is necessary and proportionate the nature (including the level of seriousness) of the crime and the probable disposal if convicted must be taken into account. Only in exceptional circumstances should a person be detained where the charge does not involve an imprisonable offence.

14. The Faculty understands the phrase “is liable to escape” to refer to flight risk generally and not just to escape from custody. The recommendation as formulated suggests, for reasons which are not evident, different degrees of likelihood or risk in respect of the various heads - “will not appear”, “is likely to commit” or “may destroy” – and this will require attention.

15. Subject to these observations of detail, the Faculty agrees with Lord Carloway’s recommendation, taken as a whole. The nature and seriousness of the crime and the probable disposal are plainly relevant to the question of whether detention is justified. But the mere fact that the charge involves an imprisonable offence should not be sufficient on its own to justify continued detention. Potentially imprisonable offences are regularly dealt with by alternatives to prosecution such as fiscal fine. Lord Carloway has identified the particular circumstances which may, depending on the circumstances, justify continued detention.

16. If, following arrest, the police decide to detain a suspect, a written record should be made and kept to that effect, including a short statement of the reason or reasons why it was considered necessary to detain the suspect. As we state below, early access to a lawyer is an essential safeguard to ensure that suspects are not detained unnecessarily or inappropriately.

CUSTODY

Question 5

17. The Faculty agrees with Lord Carloway's recommendation. The maximum period of detention should be no greater than the period within which it would be reasonable to expect the police to decide whether or not to charge the suspect or to refer the case to the procurator fiscal. If a longer period were to be allowed, there would be a risk that individuals would be routinely held up to the maximum. Although it is suggested that there is a small number of cases in which the 12 hour period would not suffice, it might be reasonable to anticipate that these are cases where the police would be justified in reporting the case to the fiscal at an early stage and where there would be a basis for seeking authorization for continued detention of the suspect pending appearance in court.

Question 6

18. If any extension of the 12 hour period is to be contemplated, this should be permitted only on a judicial warrant.

Question 7

19. The Faculty agrees with this proposal. Further, a record should be made and kept of the fact of the review and of the reasons for any continued detention of the suspect. This is an important safeguard against individuals being detained for longer than is truly necessary and proportionate.

Question 8

20. This question raises essentially practical issues upon which the Faculty is not best placed to comment. The period of detention in custody before appearance in court should be as short as practicable.
Question 9

21. The Faculty agrees that the police should be able to report a case to the fiscal without first charging the suspect, and that a formal charge should not be necessary at that stage in order to justify continuing to hold the suspect for first appearance in court (assuming the suspect’s detention to be otherwise justified as necessary and proportionate and assuming an appropriately short period before first appearance). However, the suspect should be advised of the reasons why he is to be detained at that time – and be told both: (i) the reason why the case is being reported to the fiscal; and (ii) the reason why it is considered necessary and proportionate to continue to continue to hold him in custody for first appearance. A written record should be made and kept recording those reasons and that the suspect has been advised of them.

LIBERATION FROM POLICE CUSTODY

Question 10

22. The Faculty agrees that the police should have the power to liberate a suspect from custody on condition that he attend for interview at a subsequent date. The Faculty considers that this is the only condition which the police should be permitted to impose on liberation. The Faculty would not support giving the police – as opposed to a judge - power to impose other conditions on the liberty of the citizen.

23. So far as the power to require the suspect to return for interview is concerned, the Faculty would regard this as an improvement on the current position, in which a suspect may be taken into custody at any hour of the day or night, and may, once he has been given access to a lawyer, be interviewed at that time. It would often be fairer that the suspect be given advance notice of the basis of suspicion, and advance notice of the interview. The suspect can then take legal advice and absorb that advice in advance of the interview. It is more likely that the suspect’s solicitor will be able to attend an interview of which advance notice has been given. At the same time, the police are able to take their inquiries forward, and prepare for the interview on that basis.

24. Legislation on this subject should address the question of disclosure by the police to the suspect’s lawyer. Without proper disclosure of the case against the suspect, the lawyer's ability to give informed advice and the suspect's ability to take an informed decision will be hampered.

Question 11

25. The Faculty agrees that a limit of 28 days should be set on the power to require the suspect to return for interview. There should be a time limit and 28 days seems reasonable.

Question 12

26. This question raises a practical issue upon which the Faculty is not best placed to comment other than to observe that, if the police are to be given the power to require a suspect to attend for interview, the suspect is entitled to be given fair notice of the date and time of interview, not least so that he can arrange to take advice, and, indeed, so that he can make representations if the time is inconvenient.

LEGAL ADVICE

27. The Faculty agrees that a person who has been detained by the police should have a right of access to a lawyer as soon as practicable after his detention.

(i) Any citizen has a right to consult a lawyer at any time. The real questions are: (a) whether or not the police may (or in what circumstances they may) refuse a citizen that basic right; (b) whether or not (or in what circumstances) the police should be required positively to remind the citizen that he has a right to consult a lawyer; and (c) whether or not legal aid should be made available.

(ii) The deprivation of liberty is a circumstance in which the opportunity to take legal advice is of particular importance. If the police deprive someone of liberty, they should be required to advise him at that time of his right to consult a lawyer. The police should not be permitted to refuse the lawyer access to his client in such circumstances. The state should make legal aid available to cover the cost of a consultation with a lawyer.

(iii) The purposes of access to a lawyer even though questioning is not anticipated are these: (a) to ensure that any deprivation of liberty is lawful and proportionate; (b) to secure the release of the suspect as soon as there ceases to be sufficient reason for continued detention; and (c) to minimise the risk of mistreatment during custody. If, of course, the police intend to question the suspect, access to a lawyer is also required in order to secure the suspect's fair trial rights.

28. The question of how legal advice may best be provided in a practicable way is a matter best addressed by solicitors who are involved in giving such advice. As a matter of principle, as Lord Carlway recommends, it is for the suspect or accused, who has been detained, to decide on the way legal advice is recorded. If the suspect wishes to have a face to face meeting with his lawyer, or, indeed, if the lawyer wished to have access to his client in detention, on what basis of principle could the police refuse to allow this?

Question 14

29. The Faculty does not foresee difficulties with this recommendation. The suspect, like any citizen, has a right to consult his solicitor. He is also not obliged to speak to the police if he does not wish to do so. If the suspect is to be interviewed by the police he should be reminded of his right to consult a lawyer, and given an opportunity to consult his lawyer before he speaks to the police.

30. The wording of the caution requires careful consideration. The phraseology used in the question is, in the Faculty's view, inappropriate. The suspect should be advised that he may have access to a solicitor as a right (and not simply if he wishes).

Question 15

31. The Faculty agrees with Lord Carlway's approach.

Question 16

32. The Faculty agrees that the right to waive access to legal advice and the requirement that an appropriate record of any waiver should be made and kept (as of other matters) should be set out in legislation.

33. It goes without saying that the right of access to legal advice can be waived only by someone who has been fully informed of that right. Indeed, the suspect should also be advised of the basis of the suspicion against him and the reasons for his detention if he is being detained. If the suspect is not fully informed, any waiver will not be effective.

Question 17

34. The Faculty agrees with Lord Carloway’s recommendation. What is under consideration is the position of a suspect who is: (a) suffering a deprivation of liberty; and/or (b) facing a criminal investigation. The issues at stake are significant. Sound advice will require not only legal knowledge and understanding, but may require the exercise of sound judgment with an eye to a future possible trial process. It is essential that any person giving such advice: (i) be properly qualified to do so; and (ii) be accountable professionally for the advice given.

QUESTIONING

Question 18

35. The Faculty does not oppose this proposal, on the basis that the suspect will have proper access to informed legal advice before and during any interview, and also that no adverse inference would fall to be drawn from a decision on the suspect’s part not to answer questions. Any questioning after charge or intimation that the case is being reported to the procurator fiscal should be under the control of the Court. An application to the Court in that regard should be made by the prosecutor (and not by the police). The defence should have an opportunity to make submissions to the Court as to whether any application should be granted.

Question 19

36. The Faculty agrees that the procedure of Judicial Examination should be abolished. It is little used. The accused should remain entitled to give a Judicial Declaration.

Question 20

37. The Faculty does not agree with this proposal. Application of the common law rules on fairness can result in the exclusion of evidence which has been improperly or unfairly obtained in advance of, or at, trial. If these rules were to be replaced with the general Article 6 test, trial judges would exclude such evidence only if they could decide at the stage of considering the question (which in proceedings on indictment would often be at a preliminary hearing), that a fair trial could not take place if the evidence were to be admitted. Often the outcome will be to admit the evidence on the basis that for aught yet seen doing so will not result in an unfair trial – indeed on the basis that the question of whether or not there has in fact been an unfair trial will only be capable of being properly assessed once the trial has been concluded.

38. The difficulty with this approach is that where, at the end of the trial, it has become apparent that the admission of the evidence had resulted in a breach of Article 6, the trial judge would have no option but to desert the case – or, if he did not take that step, the conviction would be quashed on appeal. The consequence would either be wasteful retrials or, indeed, the risk that individuals who should be convicted would escape justice. It would be far better to retain exclusionary rules of evidence which are capable of having practical purchase in advance of trial and which may be expected to secure that trials are conducted in a manner which will ultimately be held to be compatible with Article 6.

CHILD SUSPECTS

Question 21

39. The Faculty agrees with this proposal. As the Consultation Paper recognizes, both domestic and international law treat persons as children for at least certain purposes up to the age of 18.

Question 22

40. The Faculty agrees with this recommendation. The requirement to take into account the best interests of the child as a primary consideration – though not necessarily the over-riding or paramount consideration – is expressed in the International Convention on the Rights of the Child which, though not part of domestic law, is binding on the United Kingdom in international law. The ICRC may be taken into account when assessing whether or not there has been an interference with Convention rights.
Question 23

41. The Faculty does not agree that there should be any statutory articulation of the role of the parent, carer or responsible person. The purpose of giving a right of access to such a person is, speaking generally, a recognition of the vulnerability of the child and his or her dependence on his or her parent, as well as the parent’s interest in the care and guidance of the child. But it would be quite wrong, in the Faculty’s view, to articulate the parent’s role in statute. In particular, it is not and should not be the role of the parent in such a situation to promote or facilitate communication between the police and the child. To articulate such a responsibility in statute suggests that the parent is present to provide assistance to the police, rather than to provide moral support to and protection of the child.

Question 24

42. The Faculty agrees with this proposal.

Question 25

43. The Faculty agrees with this proposal.

Question 26

44. The Faculty agrees with this proposal.

VULNERABLE ADULT SUSPECTS

Question 27

45. The Faculty agrees that there should be a definition of a ‘vulnerable suspect’. The Faculty does not agree that the definition should be framed by reference solely to the subjective view of the police officer authorizing detention. If a suspect is in fact vulnerable (and can be proved to be so), then he or she should be entitled to protection whether or not that vulnerability has been recognised by the police.
Question 28

46. The Faculty has no comment on this question.

Question 29

47. The Faculty agrees that a vulnerable suspect should be provided with the services of an appropriate adult as soon as practicable after detention and prior to any questioning.

48. The Faculty does not agree that the appropriate adult should have power to agree to the waiver by the vulnerable suspect of his right of access to a lawyer. In the Faculty’s view, a vulnerable suspect, like a child, should not be able to waive the right of access to a solicitor. The right of someone who has been detained by the police to have access to a lawyer is a basic right. It would be objectionable for the appropriate adult, in effect, to have power to consent to its waiver.

Question 30

49. Appropriate adults should have training and qualifications such as to enable them to fulfill their role.

CORROBORATION

Question 31

50. The Faculty does not agree that this conclusion can properly be addressed "setting aside any question about whether this would require other changes to be made". The requirement for corroboration is not a rule which can be considered in isolation. It is at the heart of the day-to-day operation of the criminal justice system in Scotland.

51. To set the Faculty’s response on this issue in context, it is necessary to describe at least in summary the way the requirement for corroboration comes to bear under the current law at different points in the criminal justice system. We set out below the position in solemn procedure. The same general position applies with appropriate adjustment in summary procedure.

(1) The police, in the investigation of crime, the police require to be mindful of the requirement of corroboration. That requirement will inform not only the course of the investigation, the scope of the investigation and determination of when it may be complete, but also decisions as to whether or not to report a case to the procurator fiscal.

(2) The prosecutor.

(a) Marking decisions. Prosecutors currently make marking decisions (decisions as to whether or not to prosecute) on the basis of two essential criteria: (i) is there sufficient evidence in law? and (ii) is a prosecution in the public interest? Generally speaking, in relation to serious crimes, where diversion from prosecution is not a realistic option, and there is corroborated evidence, the public interest will favour prosecution. If there is corroborated evidence this generally supports the view that there is a realistic prospect of conviction. In most cases the question of whether or not there is corroborated evidence is easily answered. Marking decisions can accordingly in many cases be taken relatively quickly essentially by reference to whether there is a sufficiency of evidence. This is the context in which, as the Faculty understands it, COPFS has moved away in recent years from routine precognition of cases.

(b) At trial. At trial the prosecutor will seek to elicit evidence which would, if accepted by the jury (or, in summary procedure, the judge), be sufficient in law. If, in relation to any charge on the indictment or complaint, the evidence as it emerges at trial would not, taken at its highest, be sufficient in law, the prosecutor should withdraw that charge (and if the prosecutor does not do so, a no case to answer submission will be sustained by the judge).

(3) The trial judge

(a) Submission of no case to answer at close of prosecution case. If the prosecution has not led sufficient evidence in law to justify the accused being convicted of the offence charged or of any related offence of which he could be convicted under that charge (e.g., person charged with attempted murder could be convicted of the lesser charge of assault), the defence may make a submission at the close of the Crown case that there is no case to answer. This type of submission is made immediately after the close of evidence for the prosecution. The trial judge will require to rule on that submission and, if the judge sustains the submission, the charge in question will be withdrawn from the jury. The trial judge has no power to withdraw a case from the jury on the basis that he is not satisfied with the quality (as opposed to the sufficiency) of the evidence. The question for the judge is whether there is evidence which, if it were to be accepted by the jury, would be sufficient in law.
(b) Submission as to sufficiency after the close of all the evidence. The defence may make submissions that: (i) there is insufficient evidence in law to justify the accused being convicted of an indicted offence or any other related offence of which he could be convicted under that charge; (ii) there is no evidence to support some part of the circumstances set out in the indictment (e.g. an aggravation such as permanent impairment). If the trial judge is satisfied that there is sufficient evidence in law to justify the accused being convicted of the indicted offence or any other offence then the judge must reject the submission and the trial proceeds as if no submission had been made. If the trial judge is satisfied that the evidence is insufficient in law to justify the accused being convicted of the indicted offence or of any other offence, the judge must acquit the accused of that charge. If the trial judge is satisfied that the evidence is only sufficient to justify the accused being convicted of another related offence, then the indictment will be amended accordingly. This type of submission is made after the close of all the evidence either before or after the prosecutor has addressed the jury on the evidence.

(c) The judge’s charge. The judge will, in any event, require to consider whether or not there is evidence which, if accepted by the jury, would be sufficient in law for a conviction. Judges routinely advise juries to that effect. The judge will also direct the jury on the requirement of corroboration.

(4) The jury. It is for the jury to decide whether or not it accepts any particular item of evidence and then to consider whether or not, on that basis, there is corroborated evidence of the essential facts. One consequence of the direction that there must be corroboration of the essential facts is that juries should not reach their decision based on one piece of evidence (say, a plausible witness, or a confession) without addressing the acceptability and effect of other evidence which is available to them.

(5) Appeal. On appeal, the conviction will be quashed if, in fact, there was not evidence which, taken at its highest, satisfied the requirement for corroboration. Quite separately, the appeal court has the power to quash a conviction on the basis that no reasonable jury would have convicted the accused. This latter ground of appeal rarely succeeds: even if the appeal court has a transcript of the evidence, it recognise that the jury had the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses and of assessing their demeanour, and was in a position to assess the credibility and reliability of the witnesses in a way that the appeal court cannot do on the papers.

52. The requirement of corroboration accordingly permeates the criminal justice system at every stage. The abolition of the requirement would, if no other changes were made, create a system which would look quite different at every stage.

(1) The police would presumably report cases to the fiscal on the basis that there was a single piece of evidence supporting each of the essential facts, namely: (a) that a crime had been committed; and (b) that the accused was guilty of the crime.

(2) Assuming a single piece of evidence to support: (i) the fact that a crime had been committed; and (ii) that the accused was guilty of the crime, the only question for the prosecutor in deciding whether or not to prosecute the case, would (if no other change was made to the criterion to be applied by prosecutors in marking cases for prosecution) be whether the public interest favoured prosecution.

(3) On the assumption that there is at least a single piece of evidence supporting each of the essential facts, there would be no basis upon which the trial judge could withdraw a charge from the jury no matter how unsatisfactory the evidence.

(4) Juries would be directed that they could convict on the basis of a single piece of evidence acceptable to them: (a) that the crime had been committed; and (b) that the accused was guilty of the crime.

(5) An accused could be convicted on the uncorroborated testimony of a single witness (or some other item of uncorroborated evidence), even if seven out of the fifteen jurors disbelieve the witness.

(6) On appeal, again assuming a single piece of evidence supporting each of those essential facts, the only basis upon which the appeal court could review the case by reference to the quality or sufficiency of the evidence would be the “no reasonable jury” test.

53. The proposal to abolish the requirement of corroboration accordingly invites at least the following questions, the answers to which would be relevant to any decision as to whether it is a wise or appropriate step:-

(1) What safeguards or guarantees are there to be that the police will not short-circuit the investigation of cases?

(2) What criterion are prosecutors to apply when deciding whether or not to prosecute cases?

(3) On the assumption that prosecutors are to be required to apply some criterion in deciding whether or not to prosecute, should the trial judge not have power to withdraw the case from the jury if, in fact, the evidence at trial does not meet that criterion?
(4) Separately, should trial judges be given the power – or indeed the duty in all or certain classes of case – to warn the jury of the dangers of convicting on the basis of uncorroborated evidence.

(5) Is it acceptable that an accused could be convicted on the basis of one uncorroborated item of evidence even if seven out of the fifteen jurors do not accept that evidence or do not find it a sufficient basis for conviction?

Investigation of crime

54. There is a legitimate concern that if corroboration is not required then, even where it is potentially available, the police will not carry out exhaustive enquiries to discover it and the Crown, in certain circumstances, will simply not lead it. In the current climate where there are significant pressures on resources and pressure by way of time and cost there is a real possibility that only the bare minimum will be done. This could easily have the effect of causing, rather than preventing, miscarriages of justice for complainers as well as for accused persons. Often, it is the apparently minor piece of corroborative evidence that makes rather than breaks a case. For example, a complainer in an allegation of sexual assault through nerves, vulnerability or for some other reason presents to the jury as an unsatisfactory witness and on his, or her, testimony alone the jury would not be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt. However the skilled prosecutor, at present, may be able to point to another piece of evidence, which not only provides the technical corroboration but also bolsters the credibility of the complainer and satisfies the jury to the required standard and a conviction follows. In the world without corroboration would the police be allowed the time and resources to establish if any such evidence existed or in order to meet targets and other demands would the unsupported evidence of the complainer be considered sufficient?

Decisions to prosecute

55. If corroboration were to be abolished without substituting any other criterion upon which prosecutors are to proceed when marking cases for prosecution, there would be great pressure on COPFS to prosecute any case where some evidence exists regardless of the quality of that evidence. Cases would be pursued and complainers subjected to the trial process where there was, in fact, no realistic prospect of conviction. Such a situation would be unfair both to complainers and to accused person and would involve a waste of public resources.
56. It seems to be accepted or acknowledged that, if corroboration were to be abolished, prosecutorial marking decisions would not simply be based on a test of sufficiency (plus public interest), but would be based on some qualitative assessment of the evidence as a whole. The comparative exercise carried out as part of Lord Carloway's review used a "reasonable prospect of conviction" test. The application of a qualitative test of this sort would depend significantly on individual judgment. Slightly different formulations of the test could, at least in theory, have a significant effect on the type and number of cases which would be prosecuted. Are prosecutors, for example, to prosecute any case where there is some evidence unless there is no reasonable prospect of conviction? Or are they to prosecute a case only if there is a reasonable prospect of conviction?

57. In the Faculty's view, the question of what test should be applied by prosecutors in the event of the abolition of corroboration is a question which cannot be avoided if corroboration is indeed abolished – indeed is intrinsic to the question of whether or not corroboration should be abolished. That question is one of great public interest. It should be the subject of explicit, informed and public debate, and any test should be prescribed by law.

The role of the trial judge

58. If prosecutors are to apply a "reasonable prospect of conviction" test, or indeed, some other qualitative test, in deciding whether or not to mark a case for prosecution, what is to happen if the evidence as it in fact emerges at trial is not of a quality which should properly have been held to meet the test? Surely the prosecutor should then be obliged to withdraw the case from the jury. And if the prosecutor were not do so, the trial judge should have the power to withdraw the case from the jury. It would surely not be acceptable to have a system in which, if the evidence does not come up to the standard which would have justified a prosecution in the first place, the defence could not make a submission to that effect, and the trial judge could not, withdraw the case from the jury.

59. In any event, if the requirement of corroboration were to be abolished, the question of how the judge should charge the jury would have to be addressed. Judges would presumably, at least, have to direct juries that there must be at least one piece of evidence which the jury accepts and which supports each of the following facts: (i) that a crime has been committed; and (ii) that the accused is guilty of the crime. But should the judge be required to direct the jury on the need to consider all the evidence that they have heard and to consider whether there is evidence which supports, or on the other hand, undermines, the Crown case? If (as our system has hitherto assumed) there are dangers in convicting on the basis of uncorroborated evidence, judges should have the power, if they consider it appropriate to do so, to give juries a warning to that effect.

Jury verdicts

60. To remove the requirement of corroboration without addressing the majority verdict would, in the Faculty’s view, result in the unacceptable position that a person could be convicted on uncorroborated evidence of a single witness when seven of the jurors are not satisfied that the evidence is of a quality which would support a conviction (or, indeed, where seven members of the jury believed that the accused was innocent). The Faculty considers that there is a case for reforming the majority verdict in any event. Changing the majority verdict would, however, raise further issues, some of which are addressed in Mr. McMahon’s consultation. The Faculty refers to its response dated October 2012 to Mr. McMahon’s consultation, a copy of which is attached.

Resource implications

61. Quite apart from these issues of principle, it seems to the Faculty that the resource implications of the proposal require to be addressed. In order to assess the potential impact of the proposal on the resources required by the criminal justice system, it would be necessary to consider at least the following:

(1) What is the likely impact on the number of cases reported to the procurator fiscal?

(2) What is the likely impact on the resources required by COPFS in the precognition and marking of cases?

(3) What is the likely impact on the number of cases which are prosecuted?

(4) What is the likely impact on the incidence of convictions?

62. In particular, it appears to the Faculty that there would be likely to be significant implications for the organization, staffing and resourcing of the prosecution service. If there were to be a material increase in the number of cases reported by the police, this would add to the work of the prosecution service. In any event, a qualitative assessment of the evidence as a whole, if it is to be done properly, is likely to be a more complex, anxious and time-consuming task than an exercise focused principally through questions of technical sufficiency. It is hard to see how the exercise could be done properly without a reversal of the trend away from precognition. Otherwise, in reality, the first time that a prosecutor would be in a position to assess the strengths, weaknesses and coherence of the evidence would be when the evidence is led at trial.

63. Conflicting views appear to have been expressed as to the effect of the abolition of corroboration on the likely number of prosecutions. The consultation paper reports (at para. 9.5) the exercise undertaken for the purposes of Lord Carlway’s review, which suggested that around 450 additional serious cases would have been prosecuted in court in 2010 applying a “reasonable prospects of conviction” test without a requirement for corroboration. The effect in relation to less serious cases is not discussed. The potential impact on the prosecution service of any increase in the number of less serious cases reported to the Crown would have to be considered in light of the recent report of the HM Inspectorate of Prosecutions on Summary Case Preparation, which identified that overloading of the COPFS already hinders proper case preparation. The consultation paper also states (para. 9.10) that Lord Carlway observed in his evidence to the Justice Committee that he would not expect the total number of prosecutions to increase. Lord Carlway stated that some cases which are currently prosecuted might not be, if assessed on a qualitative test. Depending on the actual effect on the number of prosecutions, there could be very significant consequences for the resourcing of both prosecutors and the courts. If there were indeed to be an additional 450 “serious cases” (a proportion of which, including serious sexual cases, would be prosecuted in the High Court), each of these cases would require resources to be devoted to their prosecution.

64. Each of these cases would require the expenditure of legal aid on the defence and each of them would take up time and resource in the court system. If, on the basis of a considered analysis, it were to be thought right that these additional cases be prosecuted, then it would be right that the resources should be found, but it would, in the Faculty’s view, be rash to embark on a reform which would impose additional demands on prosecutors and courts without a detailed analysis of the practical implications, and without ensuring that the necessary resources would in fact be available.

65. If the change in the law were to increase the number of convictions (as the Consultation Paper suggests), additional resources would be required for the professional assessment, supervision and/or incarceration of persons convicted of serious offences.

Conclusion

66. The Faculty does not support the present proposal to abolish the requirement of corroboration. The Faculty adheres to its view that the reform of corroboration cannot be addressed without considering other structural features of the criminal justice system as a whole. In any event, the resource implications of the proposal have not, so far as the Faculty is aware, been adequately addressed.

Question 31

67. If the requirement for corroboration were to be removed, it would be necessary to address a number of features of the system. The criminal justice system requires to be one which, structurally, secures a fair trial within a reasonable time, and which secures that only guilty individuals are convicted. The Faculty rejects the proposition that this is something which depends on or can be established by evidence. There is, for obvious reasons, no evidence as to how our system (with all its particular features) would operate without the requirement of corroboration in place.

68. The Faculty has identified above a number of issues which would require to be addressed in order to assess the proposal that corroboration be abolished.

OTHER CRIMINAL EVIDENCE ISSUES

Question 33

69. The test for sufficiency of evidence at trial and on appeal is currently the requirement that there must be corroborated evidence of the essential facts. For the reasons already stated, the Faculty considers that, in the absence of a review of the issue which addresses the various questions which the Faculty has identified in this response, this requirement should not be changed.

70. The Faculty understands, though, that the question is directed to the question of sufficiency in the absence of a requirement of corroboration. In that event, the test for sufficiency would presumably be that there would require to be one source of evidence of each of the essential facts – namely: (i) that a crime has been committed; and (ii) that the accused was guilty of the crime.

71. As has been observed above, the removal of the requirement of corroboration will necessarily involve the substitution of a different criterion for the prosecution of crime, based, presumably, on qualitative factors. It seems to the Faculty that once such a criterion has been articulated, it should be applied consistently throughout the system and the trial judge should have the power to withdraw a case which does not meet that standard from the jury.

Question 34

72. The Faculty agrees with this proposal.

Question 35

73. The Faculty agrees that the current rule should not change.

APPEAL PROCEDURES

Question 36

74. The Faculty takes issue with the way in which this question is framed. The law provides for time limits in a variety of contexts both in civil and in criminal procedure, and in criminal cases both at first instance and on appeal. It goes without saying that such time limits should, as a general rule, be observed. But the law also, generally, recognises that the strict enforcement of time limits, in various contexts, could work injustice, and permits the court to vary such time limits, or to excuse non-compliance, in appropriate circumstances. There is no good reason not to apply the same approach to time limits in relation to criminal appeals. Indeed, the context – an accused’s last chance (apart from the SCCRC) to correct a miscarriage of justice in relation to a conviction or sentence - would suggest that, if anything, the interests of justice may justify a departure from the strict adherence to time limits more readily in this context than in some others.

75. The ordinary sanction where an application is made late, and the court is not satisfied that it should exercise any dispensing power, would be to refuse the application. The Faculty does not accept that there is a case for permitting the Court to order that particular steps should not be paid for out of public funds in this particular context. The practical effect of such a sanction would be that the lawyers involved would not be paid for the work which they had done in the representation of their client. It is not to be assumed that lateness or delay is necessarily attributable to or involves fault on the part of the lawyers instructed by the appellant. Lawyers who are at fault may, rightly, be sanctioned through complaints and professional disciplinary procedures. In practice, late applications may occur after a change of agency. The new agents may take the view that an application, though late, is in the appellant's best interests. If counsel is asked to advise as to whether or not grounds of appeal are arguable, he or she must give advice, whether or not the application would be timeous or not. Counsel instructed to make the application is under well-recognised professional obligations in that regard. The risk of incurring a sanction of refusal to pay for late applications would deter agents from acting in such cases and would be unfair to counsel.

76. In no other area of criminal legal aid work is the Court entitled to take the view that agents and counsel should not be paid for work legitimately undertaken. The Scottish Legal Aid Board ensures that it only pays for work reasonably done with regard to economy. The imposition of such a sanction would be likely to generate satellite litigation. Fairness would require that the lawyers involved should be entitled to appeal against any such sanction. And one could envisage that challenges to such orders would be made on behalf of appellants who were thereby disabled from advancing their appeals.

Question 37

77. The Faculty would support the simplification of the provisions for appeals. However it would be essential to ensure comprehensive coverage. For example, bills of suspension are available to challenge warrants. It is not clear that the proposal would bring warrants within the statutory appeal. The Faculty would also observe that leave to appeal is currently not required for bills of suspension and advocation: if leave is required in relation to such cases, this would imply an additional limitation on access to the Court.
Question 38

78. The Faculty wishes to comment on two matters: (a) the proposed amendments to the 1995 Act in respect of applications to lodge a Notice of Intention to Appeal late or to lodge a Note of Appeal late; and (b) the suggestion that further consideration should be given to whether the practice of trial counsel not appearing in appeal proceedings constitutes a problem, and, if so, what steps should be taken to solve that problem.

Amendments to appeal provisions

79. An appeal is the last opportunity – short of an application to the SCCRC – for challenging an alleged miscarriage of justice. The criteria for access to the Court should be articulated with that in mind. The proposed amendments would set a very high test for applications to lodge a Notice of Intention to Appeal late or to lodge a Note of Appeal late and this is liable significantly to limit access to the Court for appellants who have not lodged the relevant document in time. It would not be enough to show cause for allowing the late Notice or Note, but it would have to be "special cause". It is difficult to see how, in practice, the requirement that the grounds of appeal disclose that the appeal would "probably succeed on the grounds stated" could be applied in circumstances where there will have been no report from the Sheriff or Judge. By contrast, the test for timeous grounds is arguability. One consequence of setting the bar higher in this regard may be additional applications to the SCCRC.

Practice of trial counsel not appearing in appeal proceedings

80. The Faculty would be willing to engage with any other bodies which are considering this issue, but would offer some general observations. Firstly, the Faculty does not accept that there is a problem which requires to be addressed. There is a fundamental constitutional point at stake here – namely, that an accused person or appellant is entitled to instruct the counsel of his or her choice. While any counsel or solicitor advocate with rights of audience in the High Court should be competent to conduct any trial or criminal appeal, in practice, trials and appeals draw on different skills. It is not unreasonable for solicitors to advise their clients to instruct different counsel for these different tasks. Secondly, it is not self-evident that it is necessarily in the interests of justice that trial counsel also conduct any appeal. It may well be in the client's interest, and indeed in the interests of justice, that a fresh mind should be applied to the case. Sometimes, indeed, an appeal point may relate to the way that the case has been conducted at trial. Thirdly, many appeals involve questions of law arising from the judge’s charge or otherwise. Such appeals do not necessarily require any reference to the evidence at trial. Even those cases that do require reference to the evidence can normally be dealt with on the basis of the Sheriff’s or Judge’s Report. Fourthly, there would be serious practical and logistical issues both for counsel and for the court if trial counsel were routinely required to deal with any appeal. Would trial counsel in such a position be required to withdraw from another trial commitment if it clashed with the appeal diet? Is this really in the interests of justice if, say, the trial is a complex case running over several weeks or months and counsel has been engaged from the outset?

FINALITY AND CERTAINTY

Question 39

81. The Faculty agrees with this proposal.

Question 40

82. The Faculty agrees with Lord Carloway’s recommendation

Question 41

83. The Faculty agrees with these recommendations.
Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. Falkirk Council has not responded to the Call for Evidence on the Bill itself or any previous consultation.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. Falkirk Council has not provided previous comments but does have concerns regarding the financial assumptions reflected in the FM.
3. The Bill has been subject to an equality impact assessment and the Scottish Government itself foresees little impact on local authorities and has stated this quite clearly. If the provisions are considered, not individually but holistically, alongside the recent Children’s Hearing Act and the implications of the Children & Young People Bill, as well as the GIRFEC agenda and the principles behind the Whole Systems Approach and Early & Effective Intervention, then we have some concerns about the potential implications, and the possible financial issues, raised by this Bill.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
4. Yes.

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details.
5. No, we continue to have concerns as follows:

Scottish Government itself raises the following possible implications:

- A potential for increased requests for support from Social Work in relation to young people aged 16/17 who are either in the process of being “charged”/in Court/or imprisoned.

6. The assumption which is being made is that the majority of young people will seek this support from family members or friends. However, we already know anecdotally that many young people (particularly those who have been previously looked after) seek this “support” from Social Workers.

7. We are therefore concerned about the potential impact on local authority resources and it is very difficult to quantify or predict the impact at this stage.
8. In relation to the section on Appropriate Adults, our concerns are around:

- If Police Scotland are required to make the initial assessment in relation to “vulnerability” then, initially, this is likely to result in increased requests for Appropriate Adults to be present as they are likely to err on the side of caution.

- If the definition of the identity of an Appropriate Adult, training, qualifications and experience are to be made more explicit in regulations then consideration has to be given to the implication that this may be assumed to become the role of the “registered” Social Worker in statute, without any funding to support this. There may well be increased resource implications for local authorities and also out of hours services.

- It is difficult to understand what formula Scottish Government has used to base their calculation on that 10% of young people will need this.

9. In relation to the “removal of the requirement for corroboration” being likely to result in an increase in the number of prosecutions and the likely increase in additional Community Sentences being given, we have various anxieties:

- The number of Community Sentences has already risen considerably. Again, if we consider the holistic overall proposals included in the Bill, it is clear that the principles are focused on keeping young people up to the age of 18 outwith the Court and prison service whenever possible. Whilst we would agree that this would clearly be in the best interests of the young person, there is no doubt that this has implications for already overstretched Criminal Justice Social Workers attempting to supervise the already increased number of Community Sentences.

10. We know that currently our numbers have increased. In 2012/13, 651 individuals were made subject to community payback orders in Falkirk. We estimate that number to be closer to 800 if trends continue as they have for the past 5 quarters.

11. We believe the Government estimates to be flawed in relation to an expectation that this extra work can be subsumed within existing resources.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

12. No, we consider that the proposals within the Bill will lead to increased staffing costs for local authorities.

13. Scottish Government acknowledges its belief that the proposal to increase the time limit for the period for which an accused person may be remanded before their trial commences from 110 to 140 days will increase the number of people held on remand. In particular, Scottish Government expects there to be an increase in the use of secure placements and expects local authorities to fund this from within existing resources.

14. We believe the impact of this cannot be estimated but has the potential for very large costs for local authorities. There is the possibility that the courts may view secure care as the first option for 16/17 year olds, rather than a remand to a Young Offenders Institution. If this position was taken, costs could be magnified given there are currently 60 16/17 year olds in Polmont Young Offenders Institution on remand or sentenced. This has particular implications for Children & Families budgets and raises a debate in relation to where the Whole Systems Approach sits – whether this is with core Children & Families Services; Youth Justice or Criminal Justice.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

15. No. Please refer to responses to questions 4 and 5. Falkirk Council believes that Scottish Government should provide additional funding to local authorities or through the Criminal Justice Authority to meet the potential staffing costs in relation to increased numbers of community sentences and also in relation to the use of secure placements for young people on remand. Alternatively, funding for these secure placements could be met directly by Scottish Government.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

16. Falkirk Council has concerns about the margins of uncertainty being considerable. It would be preferable if the Scottish Government gave an undertaking to review costs in the light of experience so that any marked increase could be funded by the Scottish Government.

Wider Issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

17. No.

18. In relation to the proposal to reinforce recall to custody measures

• As of itself, this may not impact greatly on numbers. However, when taken cumulatively with other measures in the Bill, this is likely to increase the numbers of assessments prior to recall. It may impact on housing service costs when accommodation has been sourced then given up and then sourced again; and interrupt supervision/support plans, especially for those serving short recall periods.
Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

19. Yes, particularly in relation to the Appropriate Adult proposals, where training and qualification requirements are to be defined in guidance. It is not possible to quantify these costs.

20. Whilst some of the proposals in the Bill may not appear, on the face of it, to have an immediate financial impact on local authorities, we are concerned with the cumulative effect of the Bill when also considered alongside legislative changes already being implemented in other areas.
FINANCE COMMITTEE CALL FOR EVIDENCE
CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL: FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM
SUBMISSION FROM FIFE COUNCIL

1. There were 3 cost implications identified in the consultation – one financial cost and two opportunity costs.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Proposal to increase time-limit for remand – will increase numbers held on remand – possibly more use of secure accommodation</th>
<th>Financial Cost</th>
<th>£56k across Scotland</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Child suspects – 16-17 year olds have the right to a responsible person. In majority of cases it will be someone they know, but local authority Social Work is the backstop.</td>
<td>Opportunity Cost</td>
<td>£84k across Scotland</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Removal of the need for corroboration of evidence – likely to result in increase in prosecutions, therefore increase in the potential number of community sentences</td>
<td>Opportunity Cost</td>
<td>£1,160k across Scotland</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
2. YES

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
3. YES
Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
4. YES

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? In not, please provide details?
5. YES

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?
6. YES

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?
7. YES

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?
8. YES

Wider Issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?
9. We note the potential increase in workload from increased Community Sentencing and would anticipate additional costs could be attached to Local Authorities in the preparation of Criminal Justice and other associated reports as well as placing an increased demand on services providing community based statutory supervision.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?
10. We recognise that opportunity costs could become actual costs and would need to revisit these issues should demand increase to such an extent that would detract from the aim of the Bill to modernise and enhance efficiency.
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. The Scottish Police Authority (SPA) and Police Scotland have not made a written submission to the Scottish Parliament Finance Committee. Police Scotland provided financial data of the estimated costs of the implementation of the Bill within our written submission to the Justice Committee.

2. The financial memorandum accompanying the Bill has been correctly attributed to the Scottish Police Authority, recognising their statutory role in financial governance. The costs provided represent our estimate of the probable costs from introducing new business practices as a direct consequence of the Bill.

3. Whilst we have been robust in the process used to estimate the financial costs of the Bill, it is not possible to precisely predict all the consequences of the Bill. Therefore, we expect that the actual costs of the Bill will differ.

4. Police Scotland participated in a consultation exercise which preceded the Bill and offered comment on the assumptions made.

Financial Impact on Police Scotland

5. The financial memorandum has used the cost data provided by Police Scotland.

6. Police Scotland is determined to ensure that the challenges of implementing the proposed legislation are embraced to deliver the maximum benefits to the people who live, work, visit and invest in Scotland, further reduce crime and anti-social behaviour and keep them safe.

7. Police Scotland welcomes and supports many of the provisions within the Bill. The business case for Police Reform requires Police Scotland to operate with significant budgetary constraints. The Bill will compel the Service to invest significant resource to introduce and maintain what are unquestionably new working practises. This will take many forms, however, the deployment of new technology, infrastructure and personnel will feature prominently.

8. A number of the practises introduced by the Bill have a real and enduring impact on Police Scotland’s resources. We anticipate providing further detail in this regard and would welcome the opportunity to discuss these with members of the Committee.
Financial Impact on Forensic Services

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Additional staff required</th>
<th>2% increase in workload £000</th>
<th>4% increase in workload £000</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Staff Costs</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Salary and On Costs</td>
<td>417</td>
<td>834</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Training Costs</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Non Staff Costs</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Property Costs</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Supplies &amp; Services</td>
<td>73</td>
<td>146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Transport Costs</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Administration Costs</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Payment to Other Bodies</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total Costs</td>
<td>529</td>
<td>1,056</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

9. SPA Forensic Services welcomes and supports many of the provisions within the Bill. In common with other public bodies, it is also compelled to operate within established budgetary constraints. The impact of the Bill will compel the Police Service to change and introduce new working practices that will impact on Forensic Services. This will affect the number of cases forensic services are required to examine which would be over and above our current demand as well as the impact on us having to examine more cases in a shorter timeframe.

10. The removal of corroboration will have a positive impact as we will no longer need to corroborate our casework. However, we will still be required to check our work and therefore the impact is not expected to be significant compared to the anticipated increase in our workload.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

11. Recognition requires to be made that the information provided by Police Scotland was derived from an analysis, extrapolation and projection of existing work elements.

12. In order to inform the Bill debate generally and submission of the Financial Memorandum in particular, it was agreed in January 2013 that a comprehensive shadow-marking exercise was required. This would serve to indicate what, if any, increased submission of Standard Prosecution Reports (SPR) would likely be were the rules on Corroboration to be amended as proposed.
13. The basic format of the exercise was to review Crime Reports (CRs) raised by the police where:
   - a named suspect was known;
   - no SPR had been submitted to COPFS in relation to the matter; and
   - enquiries had been meantime completed.

14. This exercise followed an earlier, although much smaller, exercise conducted by the ACPOS Solicitor Access Implementation Team (SAIT) in January 2012. An overview of both exercises is included below.

15. Available timeframes and IT limitations were factors in the parameters of both exercises. Both exercises were commenced on the presumption that any matter currently reported would continue to be reported under any new evidential rules.

1. SAIT Exercise – January 2012

16. One police division was selected for analysis purposes as representative of the national construction of police areas.

17. Over the preceding nine month period (April 2011 – December 2012), it was recorded that 10,676 SPRs had been submitted. Within the same period, a further 2,199 Crime Reports (CRs) had also been raised where a suspect had been named, but not subject of a SPR.

18. A quantity was then discounted for analysis purposes, reasons including: suspect eliminated from enquiry; SPR submitted in relation to another named person within the report; age of suspect. (NB. Perhaps crucially, given the necessary recency of the date range examined, ‘open’ enquiries were not discounted at this time).

19. This left a record of 1,479 CRs over the nine month period which satisfied the identified criteria. Due to the onerous nature of re-examining this type of volume (only one individual participant was available at this time), the nominated sample was reduced to a single month within the date range. August 2011 was selected and produced 161 CRs (with 184 named suspects) where no SPR had been submitted.

20. Every CR in this range was re-read in conjunction with the known recommendations of Lord Carloway and consideration given to a SPR, should the requirement for corroboration be removed.

21. Primary criteria adopted in the exercise were that:
   - where substantial evidence from a single source against the suspect existed; and
   - no exculpatory or contradictory evidence was recorded, then the matter would be reported.
22. This exercise concluded that, out of the 161 CRs identified, 63 persons would be subject of a SPR under a new regime. Extrapolated over the 9 month period, this translated to an increase of 509 cases. Compared to the 10,676 already submitted, this suggested a potential increase in reporting of 4.77%.

2. Carloway Review Project Team – January 2013

23. A further, large scale, exercise was arranged in parallel to, but separate from, a Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) marking exercise. The Police exercise was based within the legacy Strathclyde Police force area due to I.T. restraints and reporting timelines. For comparison, in the Financial Year 2011-12, Scottish Police submitted 242,404 SPRs, of which Strathclyde submitted 129,782 (53.5%).

24. The exercise was based on the most recent 12 month period figures available to the participants (December 2011 – November 2012). Over that period, 133,027 SPRs had been submitted by Strathclyde. Analysis of Crime Recording systems showed that a further 13,221 CRs had been raised, where there was a named suspect but no associated SPR. At a base level, this indicated that an absolute maximum increase in SPRs was 9.9%. This, of course, was before any qualitative analysis.

25. Quantitative Social Science Research tools suggested that, for a core ‘population’ of 13,221 then a sample of 1,377 reports would provide a degree of confidence of 95% (+/- 2.5%) that the sample was truly representative. A bulk sample was initially provided. However, it became apparent that, given the close proximity in time, a number of these ‘unreported’ cases had actually since been subject to a SPR or some form of enquiry was on-going. As such, and although the others were indicative of the core population, only those enquiries that had been concluded without SPR were considered for analysis.

26. Using a team of 5 police officers with relevant background and experience, 1409 CRs were subsequently reviewed. Direct guidance and support was given by COPFS (not available to the SAIT exercise the previous year). Of the 1,409 CRs, police participants identified 141 occasions where, under a new evidential regime, a SPR would be submitted where none had been before (10.0% of unreported CRs).

27. Compared to the total already submitted (133,027) this would suggest an increase in reporting of 1,322, a percentage increase of: 0.99%.

28. Further to police analysis, there was an additional qualitative review whereby COPFS staff reviewed a proportion of those CRs where the police had concluded no SPR would be submitted. Out of 286 CRs, a further 32 were identified as being of potential interest to the PF (11.2% of those re-assessed). Extrapolated across the core sample and applied to the annual return, this led to an upward adjustment of the likely percentage increase in SPRs to between 1.5% - 2.2%.

29. The range in the findings was as a result of recognising the different treatment of certain crime types in the criminal justice process.
30. It is recognised that the reporting and prosecution of incidents can be a very subjective exercise, both to the circumstances of the matter being investigated and the professional experience of the individual concerned.

31. However, from the two exercises carried out by the police, there are two points that became apparent in relation to the volume of reports to COPFS:

- There is no great volume of unreported matters, where a named suspect is known to the police, which would be likely to ‘swamp’ the justice system should the rules on evidence be amended as indicated; and
- In almost all matters where there is any degree of supporting evidence, the police will tend to report under the current regime, particularly in serious allegations.

32. Nothing in discussions with partner agencies or around the contents of the Criminal Justice (S) Bill suggests a significant change to that position.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

33. Due to technical issues SPA / Police Scotland did not receive a formal request to submit written evidence to the Finance Committee and as such could not comply with the original submission deadlines. We are grateful that this has been recognised and that we have been afforded an opportunity to contribute.

Costs

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?

34. Please see question one.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

35. Please see question one.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

36. Please see question one.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

37. Please see question one.

Wider Issues

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

38. Please see question one.
Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

39. Whilst we have been robust in the process used to estimate the financial costs of the Bill, it is not possible to precisely predict all the consequences of the Bill or subordinate legislation. We expect that actual costs will differ.
FINANCE COMMITTEE CALL FOR EVIDENCE
CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL: FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM
SUBMISSION FROM RENFREWSHIRE COUNCIL

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. Not individually, however comments were provided to wider ADSW committees for inclusion within ADSW responses.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. No

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
3. As the report impacts on a range of social work services it takes time to gain information as to the potential impact.

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
4. The bill does have a financial implication for Renfrewshire Council which we feel has not been accurately reflected in the FM. The 2 areas of concern are:

(i) The financial impact from increasing the Pre-trial time remand limits from 110 to 140 days as set out in paragraph 240 of the FM.

- The FM states in paragraph 268 that the financial impact on all authorities is estimated at £56k per annum. However this value appears under estimated as Renfrewshire Council would suffer a financial cost of £70k alone within the first 3 months of this financial year. Currently Renfrewshire budget for 3 placements at 110 days. The weekly cost of a placement is currently £5,412 per week, the Bill introduces an increase of 30 days resulting in an additional £69,583 in placement costs per annum. This is demonstrated in table 1 below:
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No of residential Placements</th>
<th>Increase in Remand days from 110 to 140 days</th>
<th>Total No of additional days required</th>
<th>Additional Number of Weeks required</th>
<th>Weekly Residential Costs</th>
<th>Cost of additional Remand days</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>30 days</td>
<td>90 days</td>
<td>12.86 weeks</td>
<td>£5,412</td>
<td>£69,583</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

- The Bill suggests addition service requirements “will be classed as a financial cost as it is anticipated that the place would use a private provision. In the case of remand residents, this is borne by the local authorities, and this cost would have to be spread among the local authorities sending individuals to that place.” This option will not apply many Local authorities, including Renfrewshire Council, as local authorities adhere to a financial framework where service requirements are purchased by spot placements on a needs required basis and not block placements and individual local authorities bear the costs. Therefore authorities will not have spare capacity to accommodate and will not be able to spread the costs among authorities.

- The residential schools budget has incurred several budget pressure over the past few years due to increased demand for placements, therefore any further service requirements could not be funding within exiting budgets.

(ii) The financial impact of the anticipated Additional Community Sentences orders due to the removal of the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases, as set out on paragraph 234 table 29 of the FM.

- Table 29 highlights that the best estimate anticipates 480 additional community sentences for local authorities. Renfrewshire Council currently incur around 3% of all community sentence orders across Scotland which would result in an additional 14 orders per annum for Renfrewshire. As paragraph 234 states “costs have been calculated on the basis of an assumed cost per community sentence of £2,400” therefore estimated additional costs for Renfrewshire Council are £33,600.

- Paragraph 235 states that this cost will be “classed and an opportunity cost” and “will need to be considered by local authorities as an additional demand in managing staff workloads”. Renfrewshire council would find it very difficult to absorb this additional workload without additional resources as the Council is already currently absorbing an increase of 17% in supervision orders, and 78% increase in unpaid work orders since the introduction of Community Payback orders without any additional funding. Furthermore criminal justice contact levels are defined by risk and needs analysis which then provides a level of intensity which defines contact levels under National Outcomes and Standards for Social Work Services in the Criminal Justice System (Scottish Government 2010), thus the capacity to manage workloads by efficiency is limited.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

5. No we do not feel that all the estimated costs set out in the FM are reasonable or accurate due to our concerns highlighted in response to question 4 above. Costs are based on an assumption that some costs are opportunity costs and can thus be met within increasing efficiency and workload management, which is not realistic.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

6. As above we are not content that these costs can be met within existing budgets due to increasing demands on remand within secure care and criminal justice community orders.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

7. Reasonably - these are low/medium and high estimates, with costs estimated from the medium levels, it is clear there are uncertainties.

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

8. No other costs identified.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

9. It is not possible to identify specific costs, the cost pressures related to proposals for appropriate adults for 16 and 17 years olds i.e. secure remand, are unknown, given national policy where young people where at all possible are dealt with in the childcare system to address needs appropriately.
Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. The Scottish Court Service (“the SCS”) did not participate in the consultation exercises. However, the SCS has liaised with Scottish Government throughout the development of the Bill and on the financial implications arising from the Bill.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. Our views on the potential costs arising from the Bill are reflected in the Financial Memorandum.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
3. Yes

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
4. The FM accurately reflects the financial implications for the SCS.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?
5. We have no reason to doubt the projections made in the FM.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?
6. We are content that SCS can meet the costs in the terms set out by the Financial memorandum.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?
7. The figures in the Financial Memorandum represent an informed estimate of the costs which will vary depending on the volume of applications.

Wider Issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?
8. Yes
Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

9. No
Introduction

1. The Scottish Legal Aid Board (the Board) assisted the Scottish Government in the development of the Financial Memorandum to the Bill and all the figures contained therein in relation to legal aid were provided by the Board.

2. The Law Society of Scotland recently sent us a copy of their response on the estimated financial implications of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. We did not see a draft of this before it was submitted to the Committee, and although their response has now been published, we must clarify and correct some of the statements and assumptions made in that response. Their response relates to the impact of the Bill on legal aid costs, and in particular refers to the estimate of the cost implications of the Bill on legal aid, as set out in the Bill’s Financial Memorandum. We note that the Law Society believe that the legal aid costs associated with the Bill “have been reasonably captured within the Financial Memorandum” to the Bill, but that in their response they take issue with the estimated legal aid costs associated with the right to legal advice for suspects.

3. We are concerned that some of the comments made in the response from the Law Society in relation to the likely legal aid costs in connection with the right to legal advice to suspects are incorrect and may mislead. Unfortunately they show very little understanding of the current arrangements and costs associated with the operation of the Board’s Solicitor Contact Line and the Police Station Duty Scheme on which the likely future costs were based.

Operation of the Solicitor Contact Line and the Police Station Duty Scheme

4. The Board employs around 12 solicitors to provide a 24/7 service for suspects who are being questioned at police stations, and who require legal advice. We normally have two solicitors on shift at any one time. The service is staffed by solicitors 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. Our solicitors have a range of experience from criminal private practice and the prosecution service.

5. Where a suspect is being questioned in a police station and requests legal advice, the police telephone the Board’s solicitor contact line. Where a suspect requests advice from a named solicitor, Board solicitors will contact that named solicitor straight away. If the Board are unable to speak directly to the named solicitor, a message is left to inform them that a suspect is seeking advice. If no return call is received, a Board employed solicitor will provide telephone advice where this is requested. If there is no named solicitor, or the named solicitor cannot provide advice, Board employed solicitors can provide telephone advice. If an attendance at a police station is requested, those solicitors who are part of the police station duty scheme can be asked to attend the police station. In addition, where a duty solicitor cannot attend, a Board employed solicitor can attend if required.

6. This service was set up in the aftermath of the Cadder decision by the Supreme Court and the following emergency legislation passed by the Scottish Parliament to give suspects the right to legal advice when being questioned at police stations. The service commenced on 4 July 2011, when regulations came into force placing a statutory duty on the Board to make solicitors available for this purpose.
We fulfil this obligation by having Board solicitors available to provide telephone advice to suspects, and a series of local duty rotas where personal attendances can also be provided by private and PDSO solicitors where the suspect requests this.

7. The service ensures that suspects can get access to legal advice in a timely manner and indeed has gained a positive reputation amongst the legal profession and other partners in the justice system, including the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland.

Comments in relation to the Law Society’s response

Costs of the SLAB Contact Line
8. On pages 4 and 5 of the Law Society’s Response, various comments were made about the costs of the SLAB Contact Line and the amounts paid to private solicitors under the advice and assistance scheme.

9. The conclusion drawn here about the average costs of providing advice to suspects by the SLAB Contact Line solicitors and private solicitors as shown on page 5, are at best incorrect and misleading.

10. These figures compare the two thirds/one third split of the 21,900 suspects seeking advice at police stations in a year between private named solicitors and SLAB Contact Line solicitors. Their response then goes on to use these figures to obtain an average case cost between the payments made to private solicitors and the total costs of running the SLAB Contact Line. The average quoted in the two bullet points at the top of page 5 are misleading and inaccurate and do not provide an accurate average of the costs associated with providing advice to suspects in police stations.

11. To obtain the SLAB Contact Line average, the Law Society use the total costs of the service (around £650,000 per annum) and divide these by the one third of suspects who received advice from the SLAB Solicitor Contact Line (approximately 7,300 suspects) to give an average cost of £89.04 per person advised. However, this average does not reflect the workloads of the solicitor contact line who also deal with the two thirds of suspects who request a named solicitor as part of their role in ensuring that suspects obtain a solicitor when they request one. The duties of the SLAB Contact Line solicitors are to contact and chase up private solicitors where these are requested by the suspect. The average cost of advice given by the Board contact line solicitors is actually substantially lower than the incorrect figure calculated by the Law Society.
12. In relation to the average costs of private solicitors advising suspects, a completely incorrect figure of £15.61 is noted. This came from information which the Law Society requested from us earlier this year when they asked us how many advice and assistance accounts were submitted and what was the total expenditure on police station work during 2011/12. On 22 April 2013 we advised them that there were 1,464 cases paid at a total cost of £228,000 including VAT. This effectively gives an average payment of £155.73.

13. However, the Law Society’s response has used the figure of £228,000, and divided it by 14,600 which is two thirds of the estimated total suspects requesting legal advice (21,900) who were referred to private solicitors. This then gives a completely misleading figure of £15.61 per case.

14. Using the financial year of 2011/12 for any comparisons does not take into account the circumstances at the time. The Solicitor Contact Line and Police Station Duty scheme did not become operational until 4 July 2011, and in the three months which followed, many solicitors refused to participate in the scheme, which meant that they could not claim payment for any advice given to their clients. For a more valid comparison, we have recently looked at the advice and assistance costs paid to private solicitors for providing advice at police stations during 2012. As at September 2013, 8,087 grants of advice and assistance were made to suspects for the year 1 January 2012 to 31 December 2012. Of these cases 2408 accounts have now been paid at a total of £322,625, giving an average payment of £134.00 (as compared to the £15.61 calculated by the Law Society).

15. As such we are confident that the costs associated with running the Solicitor Contact Line provide value for money to the taxpayer, as well as safeguarding the rights of suspects to receive legal advice in police stations as timeously as is possible, when this is requested.
Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. The Scottish Prison Service (SPS) as an Agency of the Scottish Government (SG) did not take part in either of the SG consultation exercises which preceded the Bill. SPS were however fully involved in agreeing with SG policy colleagues the financial assumptions and narrative within the Financial Memorandum in so far as they related to SPS.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. Yes.

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
3. N/A.

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
4. Yes.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over the period highlighted in the FM for each service are reasonable and accurate?
5. Yes

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?
6. Please refer to the SPS sections in the financial memorandum in particular 190-195. The wording in these sections were agreed with SPS.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?
7. Yes
Wider Issues

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

8. Yes.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

9. No.
Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

South Lanarkshire Social Work Resources did take part in the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill but did not comment on the financial assumptions made.

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

N/A

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

Yes

Costs

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?

Section 39 states that the provision in the Bill relating to vulnerable adult suspects will not entail additional costs for local authorities and police as Appropriate Adult Services are provided at present. This causes some concern as the Bill will probably result in an increase in the demand for this service which will have a budgetary impact for local authorities.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

Yes

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

There is a genuine concern that there will be an increase in the request for Appropriate Adult Services, although this will not be confirmed until the Bill is embedded. As part of an interim phasing –in of the Bill I would recommend that additional funds are made available to the local authority to meet this projected cost. Apart from being involved for several hours in police interviews and processes, there has been a significant increase in the levels of citations by the Procurator Fiscal for Appropriate Adults to attend Court.
Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?
I would not disagree with it at this time.

Wider Issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill?
If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?
Yes it reasonably captures the costs associated to the Bill.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?
I feel at this time that any future cost would be conjecture and hence would prefer not to comment. However, if this is a concern, perhaps this matter could be followed up with local authorities via a review of the implementation of the Bill, after a period of 12 months.
FINANCE COMMITTEE CALL FOR EVIDENCE

CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL: FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

SUBMISSION FROM THE LAW SOCIETY OF SCOTLAND

Introduction

1. The Law Society of Scotland aims to lead and support a successful and respected Scottish legal profession.

2. Not only do we act in the interests of our solicitor members but we also have a clear responsibility to work in the public interest. That is why we actively engage and seek to assist in the legislative and public policy decision making processes.

3. To help us do this, we use our various Society committees which are made up of solicitors and non-solicitors and ensure we benefit from knowledge and expertise from both within and outwith the solicitor profession.

4. We welcome the opportunity to comment upon the estimated financial implications of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”).

General Comments

5. Our comments relate to the impact of the Bill on legal aid costs. We believe that the legal aid costs associated with the Bill have been reasonably captured within the Financial Memorandum to the Bill. However, we wish to comment upon the legal aid costs in relation to:

   • Right to Legal Advice to Suspects

   • Duty of Prosecution and Defence to Communicate

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF LORD CARLOWAY’S REVIEW OF SCOTTISH CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE

Right to Legal Advice to Suspects

6. We welcome the provisions of the Bill in relation to the right to legal advice to suspects.¹

7. There is a European Convention on Human Rights (“ECHR”) dimension to these provisions. Lord Carloway’s review was conducted in light of the Cadder v HMA² judgement of the UK Supreme Court on the ECHR requirements of a person’s

¹ For detailed comment on the provisions we refer to our response on the Bill itself - http://www.lawscot.org.uk/media/659951/crim_written_evidence_criminal_justice_(scotland)_bill%20_final_2013.pdf

² [2010] UKSC 43
right to legal advice prior to police questioning. The Cadder case illustrates the importance of ensuring that Scottish criminal law and practice remains compliant with the rights set out in ECHR.

8. There are unavoidable costs associated with ensuring that this area of law and practice is compliant with ECHR and able to withstand challenges on Convention grounds.

Paragraphs 24, 77 – 82 and 197 – 214 of the Financial Memorandum

Paragraph 24

Legal Advice – Cost Implications Generally

9. Paragraph 24 of the Financial Memorandum explains that the Bill extends the right to legal advice to suspects detained by the police, regardless of whether questioning takes place. The paragraph states that this will likely lead to an increase in requests for legal advice and that this will have cost implications for the Scottish Legal Aid Board ("SLAB") and the police.

10. This paragraph requires a minor clarification. The cost implications are actually for the legal aid fund rather than for SLAB itself. The SLAB administers the legal aid fund but the organisation’s running costs are part of a separate budget.

Paragraphs 77 – 82

Increase of Persons Requesting Legal Advice

11. Paragraphs 77 to 82 of the Financial Memorandum to the Bill outline the number of additional people likely to be requesting solicitor advice as a result of extending the right to legal advice to suspects detained by the police to situations where questioning does not take place.

12. Paragraph 81 states "The format for legal advice will be a mix of telephone and in person. Currently around 15% of advice provided by SLAB is in person at the police station; the rest is provided through the Solicitor Contact Line. In England and Wales the ratio is markedly different".

13. We question the basis of the comparison. Other than where advice is provided by the SLAB Contact Line or the Public Defence Solicitors' Office ("PDSO"), the advice is provided by private solicitors. The percentage split between telephone advice and personal attendance advice provided by private solicitors might be different from the percentage split for telephone advice and personal attendance.

---

3 In the case of Cadder v HMA [2010] UKSC 43 the UK Supreme Court held that ECHR requires that a person who has been detained by the police has the right to have access to a solicitor prior to being interviewed unless in the particular circumstances of the case there are compelling reasons to restrict that right.

4 The Cadder case sought to apply to a Scottish case the principles set out in the judgment of the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights in Salduz v Turkey [2008] 49 EHRR 19.
advice provided by SLAB. If the difference is significant that might undermine the assumptions around numbers of additional telephone and personal attendance advice required.

Paragraphs 197 – 201

Liberation from Police Custody

14. We agree with the comments in paragraphs 197 to 201. We believe the figures are accurate and reasonably capture the costs associated with this part of the Bill. We note that Assistance By Way of Representation (“ABWOR”) would be the only way to make representation available at these hearings, as criminal legal aid cannot be made available before the suspect is charged. We welcome clarification on how ABWOR is to be made available for these hearings.

Paragraphs 201 – 211

SLAB Contact Line

15. Paragraphs 201 – 209 outline the financial impact on the SLAB Solicitor Contact Line.

16. Solicitors at the SLAB Contact Line provide advice in a third of police station advice cases (either by telephone or, in person, where the duty solicitor is unavailable). In the remaining two thirds of cases, the advice is provided by “named solicitors” or duty solicitors – in other words, solicitors who are not employed as SLAB Contact Line Solicitors.

17. The cost to the legal aid fund of solicitors employed by the SLAB Contact Line providing advice to approximately one third of suspects overall and associated staff costs to administer the system is around £650,000 per annum. This is a significant cost.

18. Where the advice is not provided by the SLAB Contact Line or the PDSO, the advice is provided by private solicitors either by telephone or personal attendance. This is funded through the Advice and Assistance regulations. The Financial Memorandum does not provide a total cost for these cases. However, on 22 April 2013 we received an email from SLAB which stated that the total cost of police station Advice and Assistance cases for 2011-2012 was £228,000.

19. Paragraph 79 states that the number of persons accessing legal advice in Scotland is in the region of 21,900. As far as it is possible to make a like for like

---

5 Paragraphs 202 and 203 of the Financial Memorandum
6 Paragraph 203 of the Financial Memorandum
7 Paragraph 202 of the Financial Memorandum
8 We are aware that a significant amount of police station advice being provided by private solicitors goes unpaid and that one of the reasons for this is that Advice and Assistance fees are not always claimed. These issues are likely to be resolved if contributions are removed from police station work and if the payment arrangements are revised (as suggested elsewhere in this response).
comparison and on the basis of two thirds of advice being provided by named solicitors and one third of advice being provided by SLAB Contact Line Solicitors the per person costs are as follows:

20. SLAB Contact Line costs the legal aid fund approximately £89.04 per advised person per annum and Private solicitors cost the legal aid fund approximately £15.61 per advised person per annum.

21. It is difficult to make a direct comparison between the two sets of providers so this is a very broad calculation and the figures will be inexact. However, on any view, the SLAB Solicitor Contact Line seems disproportionately expensive when set against the total cost of advice provided overall.

22. The estimated additional cost of the SLAB Contact Line as a result of the changes brought about by the Bill is £890,000 which would mean a total cost to the legal aid fund of £1,540,000 per annum (£650,000 + £890,000).

23. These are direct costs to the legal aid fund. Given the pressure on public finance we suggest that the costs of the SLAB Contact Line are reviewed.

Paragraphs 212 – 213

Grants of Advice and Assistance

24. Paragraph 212 outlines the anticipated increase in the numbers of grants of Advice and Assistance. Paragraph 213 provides information on the increase to the average cost of these cases under the existing fee structure.

25. In our view, the existing funding arrangements for solicitors carrying out police station work are inadequate and need to be reviewed.

26. Commenting on legal aid in his Report, Lord Carloway states: “The detail of the nature and extent of the provision of legal aid is broadly outside the scope of this Review. This is something for the Scottish Government and the Scottish Legal Aid Board to consider. But the manner in which the right of access to a lawyer is made “practical and effective” will depend very much on that provision.”

27. For solicitors that are not employed by SLAB, funding for advice provided to suspects at a police station is covered by the Advice and Assistance payment

---

9 A proportion of the two thirds of cases will be dealt with by PDSO solicitors, for example.
10 Paragraph 209 of the Financial Memorandum – this is the best estimate. Par. 209 makes clear the upper limit is an increase of £1,780,000 which would lead to a total cost of £2,430,000.
arrangements under the Police Station Duty Scheme. This was established as an “interim scheme”.13

28. The Advice and Assistance payment arrangements, which were incorporated into the police station duty scheme on an interim basis, were not designed solely for police station advice. As a result, funding mechanisms for this work are not structured appropriately and the rates are unduly limited. Also, we believe that there should be no contributions for work carried out at a police station.

29. On 6 August 2013, SLAB issued an update to solicitors which stated: “At present, police station advice is paid for under Advice and Assistance. The Scottish Government’s intention was always to review the payment mechanism as part of the work on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill 2013.”14

30. We welcome this review and would encourage it to take place as soon as possible so that existing payment arrangements can be improved. We would be keen to engage with the Scottish Government and SLAB on this issue.

Simplified Payment Arrangements Required

31. Police station advice work is chargeable on a time and line basis. This method of remuneration is not efficient or effective for this type of work. We believe that the structure of fee arrangements should be simplified and that a system of block payments should be introduced to replace the existing Advice and Assistance arrangements.

Increased Payment Rates Required

32. In his report, Lord Carloway states: “returning to the general theme of when and where the trial takes place, the Convention jurisprudence dictates that the trial no longer starts at the door of the court but at least by the time the suspect is in some form of custody. It is that, perhaps relatively new, feature of the criminal justice system that augments the role of the solicitor at this early stage of the proceedings.”15

33. We believe it is therefore appropriate that the solicitor, who is providing advice at the police station part of the process, is paid at a similar rate to that which he or she would be paid if appearing at trial.

---

12 SLAB set up this interim scheme in accordance with its duty established under the Criminal Legal Assistance (Duty Solicitors)(Scotland)Regulations 2011, to arrange for solicitors to be available for the purpose of providing Advice and Assistance to suspects
13 SLAB 2011 Guidelines on Police Station Duty Scheme
14 SLAB website update, 6 August 2013 - http://www.slab.org.uk/providers/mailshots/newsfeed/Police_Station_Duty_solicitorsx_attendance_at_police_stations
15 Lord Carloway Report at paragraph 6.1.38 -
34. The limited payment rates that are currently available for this work must be seen in the context of recent cuts in criminal legal aid and the decline in expenditure in criminal legal assistance in recent years. Andrew Otterburn and John Pollock, authors of the Society’s annual “Cost of Time” survey, have reported in an article in the Journal of the Law Society of Scotland that “life has continued to be extremely difficult for smaller firms and in particular those that undertake legal aid”.

Paragraph 213 - Police Questioning After Charge

35. The Bill provides for the possibility of police questioning after charge. The right of access to a solicitor will apply to post charge questioning.

36. Paragraph 213 of the Financial Memorandum takes the impact of this change into account in calculating the increase to the average cost of cases. However, there seems to have been little consideration given as to how solicitors will actually be paid for this work.

37. In solemn cases it has not been made clear that this work will form part of a separate chargeable payment “block” under existing legal aid regulations, nor has it been made clear that the work would be classified as preparation which remains on a time and line payment basis.

38. If the questioning takes place after the Legal Aid Granting it is not possible to revert back to Advice and Assistance to seek cover for the work carried out. The same general restriction applies in summary work, i.e. a solicitor is not able to claim for Advice and Assistance cover after legal aid is granted. Therefore as summary work is paid by a fixed fee, as things stand, if the questioning was after the Legal Aid Granting, it would be subsumed into the fixed fee.

39. In other words, in both solemn and summary cases, all the additional work, perhaps even travelling to a police station out of hours would go unpaid. We believe that it is not appropriate for the Scottish Government to expect the solicitor profession to provide advice to suspects in cases without proper remuneration.

Paragraph 214

The Cost of Increased Personal Attendances

40. Paragraph 214 states that there will be an “estimated increase in costs for Advice and Assistance by private and PDSO solicitors of between £810,000 and £1,080,000 with a mid-range estimate at £945,000.” These figures are not transparent enough.

---

18 Section 27 of the Bill
19 Paragraph 93 of the Policy Memorandum
41. The reference to PDSO solicitors is incorrect. There will be no increase in Advice and Assistance costs for PDSO solicitors. PDSO solicitors submit legal aid accounts but do not claim fees from the fund (PDSO solicitors receive salaries). The increased cost of provision through Advice and Assistance funding will be separate to any increased cost of the PDSO and the two costs should be reflected in the Financial Memorandum separately.

Longer Term Costs

42. The estimated increases to Advice and Assistance costs in paragraph 214 might not reflect the longer term position if the payment structures are revised. This is noted generally at paragraph 197 of the Financial Memorandum.

Removal of Criminal Contributions from Police Station Interviews

43. The Financial Memorandum, including the figures in paragraph 214, does not take into account the removal of contributions from police station interviews.

44. Criminal contributions apply to Advice and Assistance feeing arrangements and consequently, at the moment, are applicable in funding for police station interviews. However, we understand that Section 17 of the Scottish Civil Justice Council and Criminal Legal Assistance (Scotland) Act 2013 will be utilised contemporaneously with the regulations introducing the contributions system under that Act. This will remove contributions from grants of Advice and Assistance for police station interviews. Given eligibility criteria have been removed from these matters previously, this development would ensure that every member of the public who needs the services of a solicitor whilst questioned in a police station gets free automatic legal aid, thereby increasing access to justice significantly.

45. We have been advised by the Scottish Government that the intention is for contributions regulations to be in force from November 2013. The removal of contributions for police station interviews is unlikely to have a significant impact on costs. However, given the anticipated timescales for removal, it is surprising the changes are not reflected in the cost analysis of this part of the Financial Memorandum.

Contributions in Police Station “Non-Interviews”

46. We understand that no decisions have been taken on whether the removal of contributions will extend to all Advice and Assistance cases in police stations (i.e. to include situations where the suspect is not questioned).

47. We believe that contributions should be removed for all police station advice cases.

48. Financial contributions are not practical for this work. A suspect is not able to confirm his or her income and capital, presenting the solicitor with substantial difficulty in calculating the suspect’s contribution level with any accuracy. This has the potential to complicate and delay the process of arrest and detention, which is contrary to the policy objectives of the Bill. Also, in the event that a suspect does not pay the contribution assessed the solicitor will have little option other than to raise an action in the small claims court.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF SHERIFF BOWEN’S INDEPENDENT REVIEW OF SHERIFF AND JURY PROCEDURE

Duty of Prosecution and Defence to Communicate

Paragraphs 242 and 263 - 266

49. Section 66 of the Bill introduces a requirement on the prosecution and the defence to communicate and to lodge a written record of their state of preparation in advance of the first diet.

50. Paragraph 242 of the Financial Memorandum states: “While the cost of preparing this record will fall on the COPFS the process of engagement will reduce the number of diets continued owing to unpreparedness, and indeed reduce the number of cases going to trial, as they are more likely to be resolved by early pleas. This will generate savings.”

51. Paragraph 263 of the Financial Memorandum states: “Payment for the work involved in the CBM would be allowable on a time and line basis.”

52. It is clear that the rationale for the introduction of this engagement is to encourage the early resolution of cases where possible.

53. In order to ensure that this policy objective is fully achieved we believe that criminal legal assistance funding should correspond with the work being carried out.

54. Solicitors will be required to attend managed meetings with prosecutors and assist in the preparation of written records. In order to support investigation and preparation of cases to facilitate their resolution at the earliest possible stage, fees should be structured so that the solicitor receives an early resolution fee for achieving a resolution by way of a section 76 hearing or at the first calling on indictment. An early resolution fee would support the cost effectiveness and efficiency of the wider criminal justice system.

55. The summary justice reforms introduced an early resolution fee for summary matters. These reforms generated significant savings in criminal legal assistance and dealt with other problems in the wider justice system such as reducing court delays.

56. We would welcome an early resolution fee for solemn matters and believe this is necessary in order to give practical effect to this policy intention of the Bill.

---

20 Policy Objective as outlined at paragraphs 32 and 44 of the Policy Memorandum
Conclusion

57. The costs to the legal aid fund associated with the Bill have been reasonably captured within the Financial Memorandum. However, in relation to the provisions on the right to legal advice to suspects and the duty of prosecution and defence to communicate, some of the longer term impact needs to be considered carefully. In addition, certain changes are required to the funding structures to ensure that these provisions are both practical and effective.
Consultation

Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

1. No

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?

2. N/A

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

3. N/A

Costs

If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?

4. No

5. The Bill identifies areas where there is an anticipated increase in demand for Local Authority services, as follows:

   i) Carloway Provisions – identifies a mid-risk estimated cost of £1.244m, which according to the FM, as this is additional demand for Social Worker time means that it is an opportunity cost. The opportunity cost premise assumes that the demand on existing Social Worker time can be re-prioritised to allow this work to take place and therefore there is no real new cost to local authorities. This assumption appears to have been arrived at on the basis of no evidence whatsoever; including, very importantly, the capacity of local authorities to make decisions regarding the allocation of staff time to accommodate new work arising as a result of the consequences of legislation and over which we have little or no control. This would bear an interpretation of additional costs, joining a lengthening list of unfunded additional demands on the local authority.

   There is concern that the estimated cost represents a best estimate and that the estimate of potential additional demand for CPOs is itself based on best estimates of prosecutions and convictions; in other words it is the result of a series of informed guesses.

   There is also concern that it is not clear whether or not costs of additional CJSW Reports are included in the estimate of opportunity costs arising from additional demand for CPOs (Para. 234 and 235 of FM), there is no mention of this in the financial memorandum.

ii) The Bowen Provisions – advises that an additional cost across Scotland for local authorities will be £56,000 per year. How this has been calculated is unclear. Para 240 of the FM advises: “This has a number of cost implications, as it will increase the prisoner population. This increase has been modelled at 40 extra places at any time.”

How this translates into the stated additional need for a single additional secure accommodation place is not clear at all, and especially as the FM then states at Para 268 that this place is anticipated to be required only 25% of the time. This logic seems to contradict Para 230 which talks about 40 extra remand places at any time. The logic seems to suggest that at any point in time that 39.75 of these places will be within the SPS provision (or elsewhere).

Para 268 also suggests that as there is currently capacity in the secure estate at present then there is no short term cost, this assumes that if a place is used that the unit charge for all secure places is reduced in proportion to the increased use of secure places. It is not clear that this would operate this way in practice as secure charges do not tend to vary based on uptake during a year.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?

6. No – as above

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

7. No – as identified above. In relation to the “opportunity costs” this becomes difficult as increasing demand is placed on Social Work services with only finite resources and will tend to require local authorities to consider whether their existing resource (i.e. number of Social Workers) is sufficient to meet demand, thereby likely to place financial burden on local authorities. This should be funded in full by the Scottish Government through an additional funding allocation.

8. In relation to the response at 5 ii) above it is very unclear as to how the £56k p.a. has been generated and there is a real risk that this is therefore underestimated. A transparent FM would advise how these costs are estimated.

9. Due to the way that the FM proposes to distribute the £56k (across 32 local authorities) it is very likely that those authorities who do experience the actual cost due to a secure placement will not be funded sufficiently.

10. The FM’s view on opportunity cost is interesting when viewed that the Social Workers involved in some of the additional work may work for Criminal Justice Partnerships – where it is understood the ring-fenced Scottish Government funding is being frozen for the next 2 financial years. The increase in service demand here could have unexpected consequences for other aspects of Criminal Justice activity. In addition the potential increase for CPO’s (Para. 234 and 235 of FM) is also likely to increase demand on Criminal Justice staff – with no financial contribution provided.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

11. The FM identifies low, medium and high levels of potential demand and therefore cost, however many of these are based on best estimates of demand increases.

Wider Issues

Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill? If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?

12. Other than what is identified above, not clear what other implications may be at this stage.

Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

13. Not known at this stage.
Consultation
Did you take part in either of the Scottish Government consultation exercises which preceded the Bill and, if so, did you comment on the financial assumptions made?
1. No

Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the FM?
2. Not applicable

Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?
3. Not applicable

Costs
If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the FM? If not, please provide details?
4. It is unclear whether the Bill will impact on remand in secure accommodation for young people, if this is the case there would be an impact on our expenditure on secure accommodation. We do not believe that the Bill will have any other financial implications for West Lothian Council.

Do you consider that the estimated costs and savings set out in the FM and projected over 15 years for each service are reasonable and accurate?
5. If remand in secure accommodation for young people is included then this needs to be accurately reflected.

If relevant, are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill which your organisation will incur? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?
6. If remand in secure accommodation for young people is included additional budget would require to be allocate to reflect the additional cost.

Does the FM accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?
7. It is difficult to comment given that there is very little impact on the council.

Wider Issues
Do you believe that the FM reasonably captures costs associated with the Bill?
If not, which other costs might be incurred and by whom?
8. It is difficult to comment given that there is very little impact on the council.
Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

9. We are not aware of any additional future costs associated with the Bill.
1. I refer to my letter of 20 September 2013 in relation to the financial implications of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. I thought it might be helpful to provide some additional information in relation to the shadow marking exercise carried out by COPFS to assess the possible impact of the abolition of the requirement for corroboration on the numbers of cases which might be taken up if this proposal was introduced.

2. A statistically relevant and random selection of cases was identified in the region of 950 cases. This sample size was chosen with the aim of obtaining estimates that had an accuracy of around +/-5% with 95% confidence. These cases had previously been marked by prosecutors in October or November 2012 and were then re-marked applying the proposed new test for prosecution and guidance. The cases covered all types of offending. The shadow marking decisions were then compared with the initial marking to assess the changes in marking due to the application of the new test.

3. Six shadow markers were picked to represent a cross section of COPFS staff and to reflect the differing experience levels of those engaged in case marking within our organisation. A Principal Procurator Fiscal Depute oversaw the marking and acted as case reviewer.

4. The cases were selected from cases marked for Solemn proceedings, Summary proceedings and those marked No Action.

5. Only some categories of cases marked for No Action are likely to be affected by the change in prosecution test and the sample only therefore included those which are most likely to be affected namely cases marked for No Action where there was insufficient admissible evidence; where there were mitigating circumstances; and in a more widely ranging “other” reasons category.

6. The sample size gave results on a service wide basis for COPFS but was not specific for geographical Federations.

7. In addition, the sample gave figures for Solemn proceedings generally but did not differentiate between High Court and Sheriff & Jury proceedings.

8. The six markers marked about 160 cases each. To avoid any contamination of the decision making process, the shadow markers were only given access to the Standard Prosecution Report (SPR) and they were not aware of the initial marking. The full range of marking decisions was available to them.
9. The exercise was intended to demonstrate the impact of the change in prosecutorial test on the numbers of cases where application of the new test changed the decision to proceed to court, that is those cases where at present we do not take action but would do so using the new test; and those cases where at present we do take action but where in future we would not.

10. It should be noted that the new prosecutorial test will not have an impact on the forum where the cases should be prosecuted i.e. it will not affect whether a case is prosecuted in the JP court, Sheriff Court or High Court but the impact is simply whether the case is prosecuted or not.

Statistical analysis of results

11. The results of the shadow marking exercise had to be weighted having regard to the relative numbers of cases for each category that are processed by COPFS each year. For example there are significantly more summary prosecutions than solemn prosecutions therefore an appropriate weighting had to be applied to the results to “multiply” them up to get a service wide perspective. In addition, marking is done at individual subject level – assumptions had to be made on the average number of subjects per case to convert the figures to case level. A best estimate of the change in the number of cases that can be expected, with an associated confidence interval with a range of values was calculated with the following results:-

- Solemn – 1.06 - resulting in an increase of 6% in Solemn cases. This is calculated with a margin of error/confidence interval of between 1.02 to 1.10 i.e. a range of potential increase of between 2% and 10%

- Summary – 1.01 – resulting in an increase of 1% in Summary cases with a range of between 0.99 and 1.04 i.e. a range of 1% reduction to 4% increase in Summary business
1. We submitted evidence to the Finance Committee on the Financial Memorandum to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill and, in particular, around the costs of providing advice to suspects at a police station. We have subsequently seen the written evidence provided by the Scottish Legal Aid Board, which discusses our analysis of the costs of this provision. We thought that it may be useful to the Committee’s deliberations to clarify our approach.

2. We calculated the average cost of advice per person on the basis of the number of people who have received advice at a police station, rather than the amount of accounts submitted to the SLAB or the number of accounts paid by the SLAB. We think that looking at average costs of advice using either of these other two perspectives is also valid, albeit limited, with the large number of accounts that have not been paid. Accordingly, we think that considering the cost of advice on a per person basis is a reasonable indicator, particularly as the data for the number of people receiving advice is robust.

3. From the latest update on advice provided at a police station, the SLAB details the number of people that have received advice:
   - Between 4 July 2011 and 30 June 2012, 22227 requests for advice (comprising 7518 instances of telephone advice from the SLAB’s Solicitor Contact Line and 14709 by named solicitors);
   - Between 1 July 2012 and 30 June 2013, 22632 requests for advice (comprising 8021 instances of telephone advice from the SLAB’s Solicitor Contact Line and 14611 by named solicitors);
   - And in the three months from 1 July 2013 to 30 September 2013, 6508 requests for advice (comprising 2484 instances of telephone advice from the SLAB’s Solicitor Contact Line and 4024 by named solicitors).

4. As the SLAB notes in its written evidence to the committee, at September 2013, for the 2012 calendar year, 8,087 grants of advice and assistance were made to suspects and 2408 had been paid at a total cost of £322,625. The SLAB suggests an average case cost of £134.00 on this basis: we think this is a valid, though limited, perspective. According to the SLAB’s own data, the number of cases paid is, for instance, less than a third of the number of grants made and indeed around a sixth of the number of instances of advice provided by named solicitors. Considering the average cost of provision on a per person basis does recognise the overwhelming majority of instances of advice that have either yet to be paid or will not see accounts submitted for payment.

---

1 Police Station duty scheme update – Solicitor Contact Line, Scottish Legal Aid Board, 11 October 2013
5. The SLAB also notes that the average costs stated for advice by its Solicitor Contact Line do not reflect the costs incurred in the two thirds of cases where a named solicitor is requested. As the SLAB’s written evidence states, “The duties of the SLAB Contact Line solicitors are to contact and chase up private solicitors where these are requested by the suspect.” We see from the Financial Memorandum to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill that the cost per solicitor for the contact line is £295,000 per annum (5 full-time equivalent staff at £59,000 each). We do recognise, as the SLAB’s written response states, that relaying requests for advice to private practitioners constitutes a significant part of that cost.

6. We hope this information clarifies our written evidence to the Committee and is helpful in deliberations. If we can assist further, we would be happy to do so.
Justice Directorate
Criminal Justice Division

T: 0131-244 5063
E: Elspeth.MacDonald@scotland.gsi.gov.uk

Kenneth Gibson MSP
Convener
Finance Committee
The Scottish Parliament
Edinburgh
EH99 1SP

3 December 2013

Dear Mr Gibson

Thank you for the opportunity on 20 November to give evidence on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill Financial Memorandum (FM). At that session I undertook to write to the Committee with further information on the issues raised by local authorities in their submission, and on appeals.

As I indicated during the evidence session, the discussions that contributed to the development of financial estimates were undertaken with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities (COSLA) and the Association of Directors of Social Work (ADSW), rather than with individual local authorities. The eight local authorities which have provided submissions to the Committee raise five key issues. I address these below.

Removal of requirement for corroboration: community sentences

Dundee, Falkirk, Renfrewshire and West Dunbartonshire question the costs in the FM relating to management of community sentences for the anticipated increase in cases going to court.

The FM gives an explanation of how these figures were calculated, and the Crown Office has provided supplementary written evidence on the shadow marking exercises which informed these calculations. Using these figures, we estimated 480 additional community sentences – which is 2.8% of the total figure of 16,916, reported in SG statistical publication Criminal Proceedings in Scotland 2011-12.

These costs would arise in the context of substantial decreases in crime rates in Scotland in recent years, as well as a range of policy initiatives designed to reduce reoffending, such as the Reducing Reoffending Change Fund. In addition, as outlined in the draft 2014-15 budget, the Scottish Government has protected the overall community justice budget, including funding within that for community sentences. In fact for 2014-15 there has been an increase of £500,000 in cash terms. We have also provided additional flexibility, as recommended by Audit Scotland, for Community Justice Authorities: It is for these authorities to allocate funding on the basis of local needs and demands and they were provided with the additional flexibility to do so from 2013-14 onwards.

The costs associated with community sentences as a result of the Bill’s provisions on corroboration will be in the form of demands on staff time. They will be spread across the country and represent a small percentage increase. We therefore concluded that in the context of reducing crime rates and the additional funding commitment, this work can be managed within existing resources.

Removal of requirement for corroboration: social work reports

Dundee City Council have suggested a potential increase in the volume of social work court reports as a result of the removal of the requirement for corroboration. As social work reports are not mandatory in all cases, the increase in reports is likely to be less than the number of additional cases as a result of the Bill’s changes.

This should also be considered in the context of substantial decreases in crime rates in Scotland in recent years, as well as a range of policy initiatives designed to reduce reoffending. These costs will be in the form of demands on staff time. As with community sentences, they will be spread across the country and represent a small percentage increase overall. We therefore concluded that in the context of reducing crime rates, these would be manageable within existing resources.

Vulnerable adults

Aberdeenshire, Falkirk and South Lanarkshire Councils have expressed concerns about the section on costs for provision of Appropriate Adults (AAs). The concern raised by Aberdeenshire Council in particular seems to comes from a misunderstanding of the effect of the Bill.

The provisions in the Bill are not placing a duty on either the police or local authorities to provide AA services. What the Bill does is define vulnerable person and the role of the person who is to support them, and provides that where a police constable considers that a person in police custody is age 18 or over and is unable, because of a mental disorder, to understand what is happening or to communicate effectively, they must notify a person who they consider suitable to provide the support required. This is in line with existing practice.

The Bill does not introduce a new Appropriate Adult scheme, and it does not change the role of either the police or an AA. We anticipate that provision of AAs will continue to operate as at present. It is on this basis that we have agreed with COSLA that there are likely to be no additional costs for local authorities as a result of the Bill.

We have made a specific commitment to COSLA to review the impact of the Bill in relation to vulnerable adults after implementation. We will examine data collected by the Scottish Appropriate Adult Network and the police, and continue to liaise with key stakeholders like COSLA and Police Scotland, in order to identify any financial impact.

Provision of social worker support to 16/17 year old suspects

Falkirk Council questions the FM’s assumptions around the provision of social worker support to 16 and 17 year old suspects. However, the submission from Dundee City Council specifically states its view that “the assumptions made around funding support to child suspects appear to be reasonable.”

The Bill’s provisions in this area state that for the purposes of arrest, detention and questioning, a child should be defined as anyone under the age of 18 years. This means that the current provisions concerning notification to an adult reasonably named by the person and these persons having access to a child suspect should be extended to all persons under 18 years of age.

Consultation with representatives of Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (ACPOS), ADSW and COSLA took place between January and April 2013 and confirmed that in their view only a small proportion of 16 and 17 year olds would want to seek support from a social worker. For the most part a young person seeking support is likely to do so from a parent, family member or friend. Where moral support is wanted, and where no such provision can be found, existing practice for under 16s would be the provision of a social worker.

In the context of 16 and 17 year olds this is new provision. The FM models costs assuming such support was sought in 5%, 10% and, as an upper limit, 20% of cases. This gives a best estimate of £84,000 per year. These costs would fall nationally across local authorities, distributed at the rates at which they bring young people to police offices.

There is clear evidence that youth crime is falling in Scotland: the number of detected crimes committed by children and young people in 2012-13 fell by 22% compared to the previous year, to a level half that seen in 2008-09. In this context, we concluded that the anticipated increase is manageable within existing resources. We have already indicated that we would be content to revisit this with COSLA following implementation.

Pre-trial time limits for sheriff and jury cases

Dundee, Falkirk, West Dunbartonshire and West Lothian Councils comment in their written submissions on costs associated with providing secure accommodation as a result of the increase in pre-trial time limits for sheriff and jury cases from 110 to 140 days.

The section covering this in the FM does not go into detail on the process of obtaining estimates. I set out here some further information, which should address the issues raised by local authorities.
The Scottish Government undertook a modelling exercise to estimate the impact of the Bill's Sheriff and Jury provisions on the prison population and community sentences. This exercise made use of an existing model for projecting the Scottish prison population, which was adapted to focus specifically on the remand population for cases being heard in the Sheriff and Jury courts. In order to get the most accurate estimate possible, the analysis excluded individuals who are subsequently given an immediate custodial sentence, on the basis that any increase in remand time for this group would result in an equivalent reduction in time spent in custody post-sentencing.

The conclusion of this modelling exercise was that 40 additional prison places would be occupied at any time. It is worth emphasising that the impact of this change is relatively small because only a small minority of cases are expected to extend beyond 110 days, which is the current limit.

In order to estimate the impact on secure accommodation provision, officials applied the existing proportion of suspects requiring secure accommodation to this expected increase. There was no clear evidence for this proportion differing for the additional demand, so this should give a reasonable estimate. This suggested an additional one quarter of a place in secure accommodation across the whole of Scotland at any one time.

There is capacity within the existing system to absorb this increase at present. It may lead to a small increase in use of private provision, and so a financial cost of £56,000 per annum is stated in the FM. This constitutes 0.25 x £225,000 (the annual cost of a secure accommodation place). This cost will be spread across all 32 local authorities, so is a very small impact in financial terms.

The specific concern raised by Falkirk Council is that “courts may view secure care as the first option for 16/17 year olds.” This would require a change in judicial practice, and there appears to be no reason to think that would happen as a result of the Bill.

The Scottish Government are supporting Local Authorities to implement the Whole System Approach which aims to ensure that alternatives to remand are in place. Since the launch of the approach there has been a considerable reduction in the use of place of safety and remand in secure care. The most recent figures demonstrate a reduction of over 40% with figures falling from 77 between 1 August 2010 and 31 July 2011 to 45 between 1 August 2011 and 31 July 2012. In the context of this substantial reduction, we concluded that the small percentage increase estimated for the Bill would be manageable within existing resources.

Appeals

You also asked us to consider further the likely impact of the Bill on appeals, in relation to a query from the Faculty of Advocates as to why a cost was anticipated for Crown Office but not for the legal aid fund.

The FM suggests an opportunity cost of £87,000 for the Crown Office Appeals Unit, which Crown Office agreed was manageable within existing budgets. This was as a result of a specific observation from Crown Office that the workload of its Appeals Unit can increase following changes to the law or a Supreme Court judgment. Crown Office made specific reference to the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010.

The potential impact on appeals levels was discussed with stakeholders and it was agreed that the specific issue raised by Crown Office would be included in the FM, but that it would be designated an opportunity cost on the basis that it is manageable within existing resources.

If there is an overall increase in appeals, that will impact on the legal aid fund, as pointed out by the Faculty of Advocates. The legal aid fund is a demand-led fund, and the Scottish Government has undertaken to meet all associated demand-led costs. We will monitor the impact of the Bill on the legal aid fund, and funding will be available to cover any increases as a result of this Bill.

Baseline funding for the legal aid fund has already been increased by £4 million for 2015/16, and there is also a programme of savings underway within SLAB, the benefits of which have yet to be realised.

We also considered potential impact on the Scottish Court Service (SCS), and agreed with SCS that any short-term increase in appeals can be managed within existing resources.

Monitoring of impact

The process of developing financial estimates for the impact of the Bill was rigorous and extensive. It involved close consultation and discussion with key delivery partners, making use of research activity, statistical analysis, and the professional judgement and experience of stakeholders. It is as accurate an estimate as we can make at this time.

We have already committed to monitor the actual impact of the Bill in specific areas as set out above. We will also look at the wider impact of the Bill, particularly in those areas raised out by local authorities, as part of our ongoing management of implementation of the Bill. We are in the process of developing detailed implementation plans with key partners, and will maintain close communication with these bodies up to and beyond the Bill’s provisions coming into effect.

Thank you again for the opportunity to provide clarification on the Bill’s Financial Memorandum, both in person at Committee, and in this letter. I hope the above information is helpful in the Committee’s considerations.

Yours sincerely

Elspeth MacDonald
Deputy Director, Criminal Justice Division
November 2013

Dear Kenneth,

I am writing in relation to the Finance Committee’s scrutiny of the Financial Memorandum for the Criminal Justice Bill. There are two issues that have emerged from the written evidence submitted to the Committee by stakeholders which are likely to constitute financial impacts of the Bill, and which are not reflected in the Financial Memorandum.

Police forensic costs

The joint submission from the Scottish Police Authority raises the impact on SPA Forensic Services of an increase in the number of cases as a result of the Bill’s provisions on corroboration. The submission sets out estimated staff requirements, and therefore the anticipated financial impact, for a 2% and a 4% increase in workload.

These costs were not raised with the Scottish Government during development of the Financial Memorandum, but my officials have now discussed this with Forensic Services. It has been agreed that the most likely impact is a 2% increase, at a cost of £529,000 per year.

The basis for this 2% is as follows. The bulk of the Forensic Services' workload comes from police requests for analysis, but in a minority of cases they can also be asked by Crown Office to undertake investigation. Therefore it is reasonable to expect a 1.5% increase in the police cases, as suggested by the police shadow marking exercise, as well as a small further increase from Crown Office cases – estimated at 0.5% in agreement with Forensic Services. Paragraphs 105-107 of the Financial Memorandum give further information on the police shadow marking exercise.
SLAB costs for post-charge questioning

The submission from the Law Society of Scotland suggests that the Financial Memorandum should include anticipated costs for the Bill’s provisions for police questioning after charge. This was discussed with the Scottish Legal Aid Board during the development of the Financial Memorandum, and they provided cost estimates. Unfortunately it was overlooked in pulling together the Financial Memorandum, and I would like to remedy that omission now.

The total cost anticipated for this is £34,000 per year. The Financial Memorandum sets out and explains estimates for anticipated frequency of post-charge questioning (paragraphs 171-176). We have used estimates provided by Crown Office: 200 instances of post-charge questioning per year, of which 50 would be after the first Court appearance.

The £34,000 total has two elements. The cost of a solicitor providing advice before and during further questioning will be applicable in all 200 anticipated cases, with an average cost (provided by SLAB) of £120, giving a total estimate of £24,000. There will be additional legal costs around requests for post charge questioning which are challenged in court. This would only to apply to those 50 cases where questioning is anticipated after the first appearance at court, again with an average cost of £200 per case (provided by SLAB), giving a total of £10,000. For the purpose of the Financial Memorandum we have assumed that every request is challenged, which provides a maximum potential additional cost.

I hope that this is clear. My officials will be happy to provide any further clarification on this during the evidence session planned for 20 November.

Kenny MacAskill
Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee

53rd Report, 2013 (Session 4)

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Published by the Scottish Parliament on 30 October 2013
Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee

Remit and membership

Remit:

1. The remit of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee is to consider and report on—
   (a) any—
   (i) subordinate legislation laid before the Parliament or requiring the consent of the Parliament under section 9 of the Public Bodies Act 2011;
   (ii) [deleted]
   (iii) pension or grants motion as described in Rule 8.11A.1; and, in particular, to determine whether the attention of the Parliament should be drawn to any of the matters mentioned in Rule 10.3.1;
   (b) proposed powers to make subordinate legislation in particular Bills or other proposed legislation;
   (c) general questions relating to powers to make subordinate legislation;
   (d) whether any proposed delegated powers in particular Bills or other legislation should be expressed as a power to make subordinate legislation;
   (e) any failure to lay an instrument in accordance with section 28(2), 30(2) or 31 of the 2010 Act; and
   (f) proposed changes to the procedure to which subordinate legislation laid before the Parliament is subject.
   (g) any Scottish Law Commission Bill as defined in Rule 9.17A.1; and
   (h) any draft proposal for a Scottish Law Commission Bill as defined in that Rule.

Membership:

Christian Allard
Richard Baker
Nigel Don (Convener)
Mike MacKenzie
Margaret McCulloch
John Scott
Stewart Stevenson (Deputy Convener)
Committee Clerking Team:

Clerk to the Committee
Euan Donald

Assistant Clerk
Elizabeth White

Support Manager
Daren Pratt
The Committee reports to the Parliament as follows—

1. At its meetings on 24 September and 29 October 2013 the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee considered the delegated powers provisions in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill at stage 1 (“the Bill”)\(^1\). The Committee submits this report to the lead committee for the Bill under Rule 9.6.2 of Standing Orders.

2. The Scottish Government provided the Parliament with a memorandum on the delegated powers provisions in the Bill (“the DPM”)\(^2\).

OVERVIEW OF BILL

3. This Bill was introduced by the Scottish Government on 20 June 2013. The Justice Committee is the lead Committee.

DELEGATED POWERS PROVISIONS

5. The Committee considered each of the delegated powers in the Bill.

6. At its first consideration of the Bill, the Committee determined that it did not need to draw the attention of the Parliament to the following delegated powers:

---

\(^1\) Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill [as introduced] available here: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_Bills/Criminal%20Justice%20Bill/b35s4-introd.pdf

\(^2\) Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill Delegated Powers Memorandum available here: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_Bills/Criminal_Justice_Bill_-_DPM.pdf
Section 28(3)(a) – Power to prescribe the form of an application for authorisation for the police to question a person about an offence

Section 66 (new section 71C(6) of the 1995 Act) – Power to prescribe the form, content and manner of lodging the written record of the compulsory business meeting

Section 67 (new section 83B(1)(a) of the 1995 Act) – Power to provide the form of the minute continuing a trial diet or adjourned diet from sitting day to sitting day

Section 88 – Power to make ancillary regulations

Section 90 – Commencement

7. At its meeting of 24 September the Committee agreed to write to Scottish Government officials to raise questions on the remaining delegated powers in the Bill. This correspondence is reproduced at the Annex.

8. In light of the written responses received by the Committee, it agreed that it did not need to draw the Parliament’s attention to the following delegated power:

Paragraph 4(1) of the new schedule 2A to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 (as inserted by section 87 and schedule 3 to the Bill)

9. The Committee’s comments and, where appropriate, recommendations on the other delegated powers in the Bill are detailed below.

Section 34(1)(a) and section 34(2) – Power to make further provision in relation to support for vulnerable persons

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>the Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>regulations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>affirmative procedure</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

10. Section 33 of the Bill makes provision for vulnerable persons who are held in police custody. Section 33(5)(a) of the Bill defines the term “mental disorder” for the purposes of section 33 by reference to section 328(1) of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”). While the Scottish Ministers have power under section 34(1)(a) of the Bill to amend section 33(1)(c), there is no power to amend the specific definition of the term “mental disorder”.

11. The Committee accordingly wrote to the Scottish Government to ask whether Ministers considered it necessary to take a power to amend the definition of the term “mental disorder” should it become necessary to do so in the future. The Committee considered that circumstances might arise that could render the definition of that term unworkable in the context in which it is used, for example, where the definition of the term in the 2003 Act is itself amended.

12. In its response, the Scottish Government explained that it did not consider that the definition of the term mental disorder would require to be amended in the near future. It also explained, however, that it was recognised that circumstances could arise which might render it necessary to amend that definition. The Scottish Government accordingly agreed to consider bringing forward an amendment at Stage 2 in order to take a power to enable Ministers to amend the definition in future.

13. The Committee welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to consider bringing forward an amendment to the Bill at Stage 2 in order to allow for the definition of the term “mental disorder” to be amended.

Section 85(4) – Power to modify subsections (1) to (3) of that section

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>the Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>regulations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>negative procedure</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

14. Sections 83 and 84 of the Bill provide respectively for the general aggravation of an offence by its having a connection with people trafficking activity and the aggravation of a specific people trafficking offence where there has been an abuse of a public position. Section 85(1) to (3) of the Bill define the terms “a people trafficking offence”, “a public official” and “an international organisation” respectively for the purposes of the Bill. Section 85(4) grants power to the Scottish Ministers to modify sections 85(1) to (3) by regulations. Section 85(5) provides that those regulations are to be subject to the negative procedure.

15. The Committee wrote to the Scottish Government to seek an explanation as to why the power in section 85(4) of the Bill was drawn in such wide terms given that it conferred authority upon Ministers to “modify” the definitions in section 85(1) to (3) without further specification as to how the power would be exercised. The Committee also asked the Scottish Government why it was considered appropriate for the exercise of a power to make textual amendments to primary legislation to be subject to the negative procedure.

16. In its response to the first part of the Committee’s question, the Scottish Government explained that the power in section 85(1) to (3) is limited to allowing for the relevant definitions to be amended if necessary. The power would not be used for any other purpose. Taking the Scottish Government’s response into account, the Committee considers that while the power could in theory be drawn more narrowly, its scope is acceptable. The Committee agrees that the power will require to be exercised in the context of sections 83 and 84 of the Bill. Any exercise of the power for a purpose other than modifying the specified definitions would not be permissible. The Committee is accordingly content with the scope of the power in section 85(4).

17. In relation to the second part of the Committee’s question, the Scottish Government has agreed to bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 to make the exercise of the power in section 85(4) subject to the affirmative procedure. The Committee welcomes this commitment by the Scottish Government, and considers that affirmative procedure affords the Parliament a more appropriate level of scrutiny over the exercise of the power, given that it enables textual amendments to be made to primary legislation.
18. The Committee is content with the scope of the power in section 85(4) of the Bill.

19. The Committee welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 of the Bill to make the exercise of the power in section 85(4) subject to the affirmative procedure.

Section 86 – Use of live television link

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>the Lord Justice General</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>direction</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>none</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

20. Section 86(1) of the Bill inserts new sections 288H – 288K into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). The new provisions allow the court to determine that a detained person is to participate in a specified court hearing by use of a live television link. In making such a determination, the court is to have regard to any representations made by the parties as well as the interests of justice.

21. The new section 288(J)(1) of the 1995 Act, as inserted by section 86(1) of the Bill, provides that the Lord Justice General may, by directions, specify types of hearing in which a detained person may participate by live television link. Under section 288(J)(2), such directions may specify types of hearing by reference to the venues at which they take place, particular places of detention or categories of cases or proceedings to which they relate.

22. The power to make directions under the new section 288J of the 1995 Act was not addressed in the DPM. The Committee therefore wrote to the Scottish Government to seek an explanation as to why the power was to be exercisable by direction - which would not be subject to parliamentary procedure or scrutiny - as opposed to by subordinate legislation, which would at the least be laid before the Parliament. The Committee also asked the Scottish Government whether it was intended that directions made in the exercise of this power would be published.

23. In its response, the Scottish Government considers that the function of specifying types of hearing is essentially operational in nature and is consistent with the Lord Justice General’s overarching duty to make and maintain arrangements for securing the efficient disposal of court business in terms of section 2 of the Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008. The Scottish Government also explains that decisions on specifying hearings, or revoking or varying previous directions, will require to be made on the basis of a variety of considerations which may change over time and that on some occasions, a direction specifying a type of hearing may require to be made at short notice.

24. While the Committee accepts that the function of specifying hearings is properly one to be exercised by the courts as opposed to the Scottish Government, it does not share the Scottish Government’s view that this function is purely operational in nature for two reasons. Firstly, a court will only be empowered to make a determination as to whether a hearing should be conducted by live television link once directions are made by the Lord Justice General. That is because a determination under the new section 288H can only be made in relation to a “specified hearing”. A specified hearing is defined in the new section 288K of the 1995 Act (as inserted by the Bill) as a hearing of a type specified in directions having effect for the time being under the new section 288J.

25. The scheme of appearance by television link is therefore predicated upon the exercise of the direction-making power in section 288J. For that reason, the Committee considers that this function is a significant legal function, as opposed to a purely operational one, as the relevant provisions of the Bill cannot take effect in a practical sense until directions are made.

26. Secondly, the Committee considers that participation in a court hearing via a live television link alters the character of that hearing in a manner which has the potential to impinge upon the convention rights of those involved, unless there are sufficient safeguards in place to protect those rights. The Committee therefore considers that the Parliament has an interest in having an overview of the arrangements which are being made. In particular, the Committee considers it important that all parties are afforded fair notice of a specification of a particular type of hearing under the new section 288J. If, as the Scottish Government has indicated may happen, a direction specifying a type of hearing is made at short notice, parties may be denied that fair notice, which could mean that they have insufficient opportunity to prepare representations to present to the court when it makes a determination under section 288H. The Committee considers that this would be unacceptable, and of potential detriment to the rights of those involved, including the rights of the detained person.

27. The Committee further considers that information as to the types of hearing that are specified for the purposes of the new section 288H ought to be available publicly in advance of the specification taking effect, and that the current practice of publishing court directions after they are made is insufficient to meet this requirement. The Committee considers that the making of subordinate legislation, which would require at the least to be laid before the Parliament before it could come into force, would better achieve the requirement of publicity which the Committee considers to be an essential protection for the rights of persons who may be affected where the court determines that a hearing is to be conducted using a live television link.

28. The Committee therefore accepts the principle that the specification of hearings in which an accused person may be required to participate by live television link is a matter which should be regulated by the Lord Justice General as head of the Scottish court service. However, the Committee considers that the Parliament retains a separate interest in the exercise of this particular function. It is not persuaded that the function should be exercised without affording notice to the Parliament and the public in advance. Accordingly the Committee draws the power in section 288J(1) of the Bill to the attention of the Parliament and recommends that the Scottish Government consider bringing forward an amendment at Stage 2 to make the power to specify types of hearings which may be conducted by live television link exercisable by way of subordinate legislation to which section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 would apply.
Correspondence with the Scottish Government

On 24 September 2013, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee wrote to the Scottish Government as follows:

Section 34(1)(a) and (b) and Section 34(2) – Power to make further provision in relation to support for vulnerable persons

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative procedure

1. Section 33(5)(a) of the Bill defines the term “mental disorder” by reference to section 328(1) of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003. While the Scottish Ministers will have power under section 34(1)(a) of the Bill to amend section 33(1)(c), there is no power to modify the definition of “mental disorder” in section 33(5)(a). The Committee considers that it could become necessary to alter that definition in the future, for example in the event of changes to the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 definition by reference to which the term is defined in the Bill.

2. The Committee therefore asks the Scottish Government whether it considers it necessary to take a power to amend the definition of the term “mental disorder” in section 33(5)(a) of the Bill and, if not, how the Scottish Government would propose to amend that definition in the future, should it become necessary to do so (for example when exercising the power to amend section 33(1)(c))?

Section 85 – Power to modify subsections (1) to (3) of that section

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

3. Sections 83 and 84 of the Bill provide respectively for the general aggravation of an offence by its having a connection with people trafficking activity and the aggravation of a specific people trafficking offence by the abuse of a public position. In both cases, the court must take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence and, where the sentence imposed is different from that which would have been imposed had the offence not been aggravated, stating the extent of, and the reasons for, that difference.

4. Sections 85(1) to (3) of the Bill define the terms “a people trafficking offence”, “a public official” and “an international organisation” respectively for the purposes of sections 83 and 84. Section 85(4) grants power to the Scottish Ministers to modify sections 85(1) to (3) by regulations. Section 85(5) provides that those regulations are to be subject to the negative procedure.

5. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- Why the power in section 85(4) of the Bill is drawn in such wide terms? In particular, the Committee seeks an explanation as to why the power does not include greater specification as to the manner in which the provisions in primary legislation to which it refers may be modified.

- Whether it considers that the affirmative procedure may afford the Parliament a more appropriate level of scrutiny over the exercise of this power, considering that it enables the Scottish Ministers to make textual amendments to primary legislation?

Section 86 – Use of live television link

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>the Lord Justice General</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>direction</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>none</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

6. Section 86(1) of the Bill inserts new sections 288H – 288K into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The new provisions allow the court to determine that a detained person is to participate in specified court hearings by use of a live television link.

7. The new section 288J(1), as inserted by section 86(1) of the Bill provides that the Lord Justice General may, by directions, specify types of hearing in which a detained person may participate by live television link. Such directions may specify types of hearing by reference to the venues at which they take place, particular places of detention or categories of cases or proceedings to which they relate.

8. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- Why it is considered appropriate for the power in section 86(1) of the Bill to be exercisable by directions which will not be subject to any level of parliamentary scrutiny?

- Whether it is considering publishing the directions to be issued by the Lord Justice General?

Power to prepare the constitution of the new Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

9. Part 6 of the Bill establishes the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland (“the PNBS”). The PNBS makes representations to the UK and Scottish Governments in respect of police hours of duty, leave, pay and allowances, pensions and uniforms.
10. Paragraph 4(1) of the new schedule 2A to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 provides that it is for the Scottish Ministers to prepare the constitution for the PNBS. Under paragraph 4(2), the constitution must regulate the procedure for the PNBS to reach agreement on representations it makes to the Scottish Ministers. Paragraph 4(3) lists a number of matters which the constitution of the PNBS as prepared by the Scottish Ministers may refer to, including membership, internal organisation and procedures.

11. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- Why is it considered appropriate that the power to prepare the constitution of the PNBS is not to be exercisable through the making of subordinate legislation, and therefore subject to parliamentary scrutiny?

- How is it intended that this power be exercised, i.e. what matters in addition to those already prescribed in the new schedule 2A to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 are to be addressed in the constitution of the PNBS?

On 3 October 2013, the Scottish Government responded as follows:

1. The Committee asks the Scottish Government whether it considers it necessary to take a power to amend the definition of the term “mental disorder” in section 33(5)(a) of the Bill and, if not, how the Scottish Government would propose to amend that definition in the future, should it become necessary to do so (for example when exercising the power to amend section 33(1)(c))?

The Scottish Government thanks the Committee for raising this question. Although it is not considered likely that the definition in section 33(5)(a) of the Bill will require to be amended in the near future, the Scottish Government recognises that circumstances may arise which render the definition of “mental disorder” inapposite in the context of the Bill. We will therefore consider further whether to bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 conferring a power to amend.

It should be noted that a similar power may be required in section 25(2)(b) as the same definition of “mental disorder” is used in that section. If the definition is changed in section 33, section 25 should also be amended to mirror this.

2. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- Why the power in section 85(4) of the Bill is drawn in such wide terms? In particular, the Committee seeks an explanation as to why the power does not include greater specification as to the manner in which the provisions in primary legislation to which it refers may be modified.
The Government does not share the Committee’s view that the power in Section 85(4) is drawn in wide terms. The power simply allows for the modification of definitions relevant to sections 83 and 84. Those are the operative sections, the power is limited to defining what is meant in those sections by the expressions “people trafficking offence” and “public official”.

- Whether it considers that the affirmative procedure may afford the Parliament a more appropriate level of scrutiny over the exercise of this power, considering that it enables the Scottish Ministers to make textual amendments to primary legislation?

The Government is grateful to the Committee for raising the question of appropriate procedure and given all the circumstances has reflected on this. The Government recognises that whilst it is intended that this power shall be primarily used where other legislation has amended the definitions and inadvertently failed to correspondingly update section 85, it is accepted that it may also be used to amend the definitions where court practice and procedure in such cases dictate this is necessary. Accordingly in the former example, Parliament will probably have been given greater scrutiny of the amendment elsewhere. However, it is recognised that in cases of the latter example, the Government will be seeking to redefine the circumstances in which the people trafficking aggravations apply (albeit in a limited way) and this could amount to a significant change to the terms of the legislation which Parliament agreed to. On this basis, having further considered, the Government is content to confirm that in response to the Committee’s concern, it will bring forward a Stage 2 amendment to make section 85(4) power subject to affirmative procedure.

3. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- Why it is considered appropriate for the power in section 86(1) of the Bill to be exercisable by directions which will not be subject to any level of parliamentary scrutiny?

The function to be conferred on the Lord Justice-General is essentially operational in nature, and is therefore considered to be consistent with the Lord Justice-General’s overarching responsibility for making and maintaining arrangements for securing the efficient disposal of business in terms of section 2 of the Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008. Decisions specifying hearings, or revoking or varying previous directions, will require to be made on the basis of a variety of considerations. These include the relevant features of different types of hearing, the availability of television link facilities at various courts and places of detention, and the facilities available to allow for confidential communications between persons appearing and their legal representatives. Operational experience gained from the developing use of television links will also have to be considered and acted upon. It is considered that the Lord Justice-General is best placed to assess these matters and to discharge the function in a manner consistent with the interests of justice.

In view of the number of criminal courts, the number of places of detention and the variety of types of hearing that might potentially be conducted by television link, directions may require to be made fairly frequently as the use made of the technology develops. On occasions a direction may also have to be made at short notice. In both respects it is considered that the function would not be well suited to the procedure and timescales associated with the promulgation of Acts of Adjournal.

- Whether it is considering publishing the directions to be issued by the Lord Justice General?

There is a standard procedure for publishing directions. Once made, the directions are forwarded to the Scottish Court Service for publication on its website. They are also intimated in the offices of court, circulated to legal publications (including Greens etc.), to the Law Society, Faculty of Advocates and Judicial Institute. The Government did not consider it was necessary to include provision about publication as directions made under these provisions will be published according to this procedure.

4. The Committee asks the Scottish Government:

- Why is it considered appropriate that the power to prepare the constitution of the PNBS is not to be exercisable through the making of subordinate legislation, and therefore subject to parliamentary scrutiny?

The constitution of the current PNB deals with the procedural minutiae of day to day internal administration and process. It is not subordinate legislation in the Westminster Parliament. The Scottish Government regards that as proportionate and sensibly reflects the nature of the procedural detail with which the constitution typically deals. Our starting point is therefore that the PNBS constitution, dealing with the same order of detail, is not something that ought automatically to be made a statutory instrument simply because it can be; a balance has to be struck and, for the reason below, we think that balance rests on the side of the PNBS constitution being made by Ministers after discussion with those who will make up its members.

The PNBS is intended to continue the work the PNB does in Scotland at present with as few changes as practicable to reflect that it is intended to continue the status quo ante for Scotland. The constitution will be set out by Scottish Ministers following consultation with the organisations represented on the Board. This allows it to be flexible and to adapt quickly to changes in the policing landscape. The same approach is used for the current PNB, which allowed for the Scottish Standing Committee to be established and for changes to be made to take account of the introduction of the Scottish Police Authority and the Police and Crime Commissioners in England and Wales. It is the intention of all members of the PNB Scotland Standing Committee that the PNBS be more collaborative than the current PNB. We therefore need the processes and procedures set out in the constitution to be flexible, allowing changes to be made to ensure that we have the correct formal structures in place to allow agreements to be made between the two sides of PNB but which do not impede agreement through open discussion.
• How is it intended that this power be exercised, i.e. what matters in addition to those already prescribed in the new schedule 2A to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 are to be addressed in the constitution of the PNBS?

The provisions set out in schedule 2A cover the principal areas to allow for the organisation of the PNBS. They also give flexibility for the specific processes and procedures to be set out by Scottish Ministers following consultation with the organisations represented on the Board. An example of the processes that could be agreed under paragraph 4(3) of schedule 2A would be the formation and organisation of sub-groups or technical working groups, such as are set out within the current PNB constitution. An examination of the current constitution of the PNB gives a clear picture of what the PNBS constitution is likely to include and paragraph 4 of schedule 2A has been drafted deliberately to give further specification of the content of the constitution than the Police Act 1996 prescribes for the PNB constitution at present.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee considered the delegated powers provisions in this Bill at Stage 1 and agreed to seek further information from the Scottish Government.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

11:35
The Convener: Under agenda item 6 we consider the delegated powers in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill at stage 1.

The committee is invited to agree the questions that it wishes to raise with the Scottish Government on the delegated powers in the bill. It is suggested that those questions are raised in written correspondence. The responses that are received will help to inform a draft report on the bill, which the committee will consider at a later date.

Section 33(5)(a) of the bill defines the term “mental disorder” by reference to section 328(1) of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003. Although the Scottish ministers will—under section 34(1)(a) of the bill—have the power to amend section 33(1)(c), there is no power to modify the definition of “mental disorder” in section 33(5)(a). “Mental disorder” is a defined term that appears only in section 33(1)(c). The committee may consider that it could become necessary to alter that definition in the future—for example, in the event that changes are made to the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 definition, by reference to which the term is defined in the bill.

Does the committee therefore agree to ask the Scottish Government whether it considers it necessary to take a power to amend the definition of the term “mental disorder” in section 33(5)(a), there is no power to modify the definition of “mental disorder” in section 33(5)(a). “Mental disorder” is a defined term that appears only in section 33(1)(c). The committee may consider that it could become necessary to alter that definition in the future—for example, in the event that changes are made to the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 definition, by reference to which the term is defined in the bill.

Members indicated agreement.

The Convener: Sections 83 and 84 of the bill provide, respectively, for the general aggravation of an offence by its having a connection with people trafficking activity and the aggravation of a specific people trafficking offence by the abuse of a public position. In both cases, the court must take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence and, in circumstances in which the sentence that is imposed is different from the one that would have been imposed had the offence not been aggravated, it must state the extent of, and the reasons for, that difference.

Subsections (1) to (3) of section 85 of the bill respectively define the terms “a people trafficking offence”, “a public official” and “an international organisation” for the purposes of sections 83 and 84. Section 85(4) grants power to the Scottish ministers to modify subsections (1) to (3) of section 85 by regulations. Section 85(5) provides that those regulations are to be subject to the negative procedure.

Does the committee agree to ask the Scottish Government why the power in section 85(4) of the bill is drawn in such wide terms? In particular, the committee may wish to seek an explanation of why the power does not include greater specification of the manner in which the provisions in primary legislation to which it refers may be modified.

Members indicated agreement.

The Convener: Does the committee also agree to ask the Scottish Government whether it considers that the affirmative procedure may afford the Parliament a more appropriate level of scrutiny over the exercise of the power, considering that it enables the Scottish ministers to make textual amendments to primary legislation?

Members indicated agreement.

The Convener: Section 86(1) of the bill inserts new sections 288H to 288K into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The new provisions allow the court to determine that a detained person is to participate in specified court hearings by use of a live television link. In making such a determination, the court is to have regard to any representations that the parties have made on the issue of participation via television link, as well as the interests of justice.

New section 288J(1), as inserted by section 86(1) of the bill, provides that the Lord Justice General may, by directions, specify types of hearing in which a detained person may participate by live television link. Such directions may specify types of hearing by reference to the venues at which they take place, particular places of detention or categories of cases or proceedings to which they relate. Does the committee agree to ask the Scottish Government why it is considered appropriate for the power in section 86(1) of the bill to be exercisable by directions that will not be subject to any level of parliamentary scrutiny?

Members indicated agreement.

Stewart Stevenson (Banffshire and Buchan Coast) (SNP): I am certainly content to ask the Government that question. However, we should also ask the Government whether, if it concludes that there should be no parliamentary process—we are, after all, talking about rules of court—it should consider some provision to ensure that the directions are at the very least published and available for scrutiny.

The Convener: Is the committee content with that suggestion?
The Convener: Part 6 of the bill establishes the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland. It is being set up in response to the UK Government’s forthcoming abolition of the Police Negotiating Board, which operates on a UK-wide basis and makes representations to the UK and Scottish Governments in respect of police hours of duty, leave, pay and allowances, pensions and uniforms.

Section 87 of the bill inserts a new schedule 2A into the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 to make provision for the new PNBS’s status, chairing and membership, disqualification and remuneration and expenses. Under paragraph 4(1) of new schedule 2A, it will be for the Scottish ministers to prepare the PNBS’s constitution and, under paragraph 4(2), the constitution must regulate the procedure for the PNBS to reach agreement on its representations to the Scottish ministers. Paragraph 4(3) lists a number of matters to which the PNBS’s constitution, as prepared by the Scottish ministers, may refer, including membership, internal organisation and procedures. As the power to prescribe the PNBS’s constitution is not to be exercisable through the making of subordinate legislation, the constitution, once prepared, will not be subject to parliamentary scrutiny of any kind. Does the committee agree to ask the Scottish Government why it is considered appropriate that the power to prepare the PNBS’s constitution is not to be exercisable through the making of subordinate legislation and therefore subject to parliamentary scrutiny?

Members indicated agreement.

The Convener: Does the committee also agree to ask the Scottish Government how it intends that power to be exercised and what matters, in addition to those already prescribed in new schedule 2A to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, are to be addressed in the PNBS’s constitution?

Members indicated agreement.
ANNEXE B: EXTRACTS FROM THE MINUTES

21st Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 25 June 2013

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered its approach to the scrutiny of the Bill at Stage 1 and agreed: (a) to issue a call for written evidence; (b) proposed witnesses; (c) to delegate to the Convener authority to approve the final composition of witness panels where necessary; and (d) not to appoint an adviser.

25th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 24 September 2013

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—
Rt Hon Lord Carloway, Lord Justice Clerk.

Roderick Campbell indicated that he is a member of the Faculty of Advocates. Alison McInnes indicated that she is a council member of Justice Scotland and a member of the Cross-Party Group on Adult Survivors of Childhood Sexual Abuse. Margaret Mitchell indicated that she is the Convener of the Cross-Party Group on Adult Survivors of Childhood Sexual Abuse.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee agreed to defer further consideration of its approach to the scrutiny of the Bill at Stage 1 to its next meeting.

26th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 1 October 2013

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—
Assistant Chief Constable Malcolm Graham, and John Gillies, Director HR, Police Scotland;
Chief Superintendent David O'Connor, President, Association of Scottish Police Superintendents;
Calum Steele, General Secretary, Scottish Police Federation;
Stevie Diamond, Police Staff Scotland Branch, Unison;
David Harvie, Director of Serious Casework, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service;
Grazia Robertson, Member of the Law Society Criminal Law Committee, Law Society of Scotland;
Ann Ritchie, President, Glasgow Bar Association;
Murdo Macleod QC, Faculty of Advocates.

Roderick Campbell indicated that he is a member of the Faculty of Advocates. Alison McInnes indicated that she is a member of Justice Scotland.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee further considered its approach to the scrutiny of the Bill at Stage 1.

27th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 8 October 2013
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—
Shelagh McCall, Commissioner, Scottish Human Rights Commission;
Professor James Chalmers, and Professor Fiona Leverick, University of Glasgow;
Tam Baillie, Commissioner, Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People;
Mark Ballard, Head of Policy, Barnardo’s Scotland;
Rachel Stewart, Policy and Campaigns Manager, Scottish Association for Mental Health;
Morag Driscoll, Director, Scottish Child Law Centre.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee deferred its review of the evidence received to date on the Bill at Stage 1 to a future meeting.

Work programme (in private): The Committee considered its work programme and agreed: (a) the timetable and witnesses for its further scrutiny of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill; [. . . ]

28th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 29 October 2013

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee reviewed the evidence received to date on the Bill at Stage 1.

32nd Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 19 November 2013

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—
Murray Macara QC, Law Society of Scotland;
James Wolffe QC, Vice-Dean, Faculty of Advocates;
Michael Walker, Senior Policy Officer, Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission;
Fraser Gibson, Head of Appeals Unit, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service;
Alison Di Rollo, Head of National Sexual Crimes Unit, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service;
Bronagh Andrew, Assistant Operations Manager, the TARA Project, Community Safety Glasgow.

33rd Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 20 November 2013

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—
Rt Hon Lord Gill, Lord President of the Court of Session;
Rt Hon Frank Mulholland QC, Lord Advocate;
Catriona Dalrymple, Head of Policy Division, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.

Roderick Campbell indicated that he is a member of the Faculty of Advocates.
34th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 26 November 2013

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—Robin White, Vice-Chair, Scottish Justices Association; Raymond McMenamin, Solicitor Advocate, member of the Criminal Law Committee, Law Society of Scotland; James Wolffe QC, Vice-Dean, Faculty of Advocates; Mark Harrower, President, Edinburgh Bar Association.

Roderick Campbell indicated that he is a member of the Faculty of Advocates. Alison McInnes indicated that she is a member of the JUSTICE Scotland Council.

35th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 3 December 2013

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—Assistant Chief Constable Malcolm Graham, Police Scotland; Chief Superintendent David O'Connor, President, Association of Scottish Police Superintendents; David Ross, Vice Chairman, Scottish Police Federation; Shelagh McCall, Commissioner, Scottish Human Rights Commission; Tony Kelly, Chair, Justice Scotland; Alan McCloskey, Acting Deputy Chief Executive, Victim Support Scotland; Sandie Barton, Helpline Manager and National Co-ordinator, Rape Crisis Scotland; Lily Greenan, Manager, Scottish Women's Aid.

Roderick Campbell indicated that he is a member of the Faculty of Advocates. Alison McInnes indicated that she is a member of the Justice Scotland Council.

36th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 10 December 2013

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—Professor Peter Duff, University of Aberdeen; Professor Pamela Ferguson, and Professor Fiona Raitt, University of Dundee; Professor James Chalmers, University of Glasgow; Professor John Blackie, University of Strathclyde; Michael McMahon MSP.

37th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 17 December 2013

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—Sheriff Principal Edward Bowen, and Gerry Bonnar, Secretary, Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure;
John Dunn, Procurator Fiscal, West of Scotland, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service;
Grazia Robertson, Member of the Law Society Criminal Law Committee, Law Society of Scotland;
Michael Meehan, Faculty of Advocates;
Cliff Binning, Executive Director Field Services, Scottish Court Service.

Roderick Campbell indicated that he is a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

1st Meeting, 2014 (Session 4) Tuesday 7 January 2014

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—
Kenny MacAskill, Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Lesley Bagha, Criminal Justice Bill Team Leader, Aileen Bearhop, Head of Police Powers Team, Jim Devoy, Policy Officer, Youth Justice Team, and Philip Lamont, Head of Criminal Law and Licensing Team, Scottish Government.

2nd Meeting, 2014 (Session 4) Tuesday 14 January 2014

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—
Kenny MacAskill, Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Kathleen McInulty, Policy Manager, Criminal Justice Bill Team, Scottish Government.

Roderick Campbell indicated that he is a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

3rd Meeting, 2014 (Session 4) Tuesday 21 January 2014

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered its draft Stage 1 report. Various changes were agreed to and the Committee agreed to continue considering the report at its next meeting.

4th Meeting, 2014 (Session 4) Tuesday 28 January 2014

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee continued considering a draft Stage 1 report. Various changes were agreed to and the Committee agreed to continue considering the draft report at its next meeting.

5th Meeting, 2014 (Session 4) Tuesday 4 February 2014

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered a revised draft Stage 1 report. Various changes were agreed to and the Committee agreed its report to the Parliament.
ANNEXE C: INDEX OF ORAL EVIDENCE

25th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 24 September 2013

Rt Hon Lord Carloway, Lord Justice Clerk

26th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 1 October 2013

Assistant Chief Constable Malcolm Graham, and John Gillies, Director HR, Police Scotland
Chief Superintendent David O'Connor, President, Association of Scottish Police Superintendents
Calum Steele, General Secretary, Scottish Police Federation
Stevie Diamond, Police Staff Scotland Branch, Unison
David Harvie, Director of Serious Casework, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service
Grazia Robertson, Member of the Law Society Criminal Law Committee, Law Society of Scotland
Ann Ritchie, President, Glasgow Bar Association
Murdo Macleod QC, Faculty of Advocates

27th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 8 October 2013

Shelagh McCall, Commissioner, Scottish Human Rights Commission
Professor James Chalmers, and Professor Fiona Leverick, University of Glasgow
Tam Baillie, Commissioner, Scotland's Commissioner for Children and Young People
Mark Ballard, Head of Policy, Barnardo's Scotland
Rachel Stewart, Policy and Campaigns Manager, Scottish Association for Mental Health
Morag Driscoll, Director, Scottish Child Law Centre

32nd Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 19 November 2013

Murray Macara QC, Law Society of Scotland
James Wolfe QC, Vice-Dean, Faculty of Advocates
Michael Walker, Senior Policy Officer, Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission
Fraser Gibson, Head of Appeals Unit, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service
Alison Di Rollo, Head of National Sexual Crimes Unit, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service
Bronagh Andrew, Assistant Operations Manager, the TARA Project, Community Safety Glasgow

33rd Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Wednesday 20 November 2013

Rt Hon Lord Gill, Lord President of the Court of Session
Rt Hon Frank Mulholland QC, Lord Advocate
Catriona Dalrymple, Head of Policy Division, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service
34th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 26 November 2013

Robin White, Vice-Chair, Scottish Justices' Association
Raymond McMenamin, Solicitor Advocate, member of the Criminal Law Committee, Law Society of Scotland
James Wolffe QC, Vice-Dean, Faculty of Advocates
Mark Harrower, President, Edinburgh Bar Association

35th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 3 December 2013

Assistant Chief Constable Malcolm Graham, Police Scotland
Chief Superintendent David O'Connor, President, Association of Scottish Police Superintendents
David Ross, Vice Chairman, Scottish Police Federation
Shelagh McCall, Commissioner, Scottish Human Rights Commission
Tony Kelly, Chair, Justice Scotland
Alan McCloskey, Acting Deputy Chief Executive, Victim Support Scotland
Sandie Barton, Helpline Manager and National Co-ordinator, Rape Crisis Scotland
Lily Greenan, Manager, Scottish Women's Aid

36th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 10 December 2013

Professor Peter Duff, University of Aberdeen
Professor Pamela Ferguson, and Professor Fiona Raitt, University of Dundee
Professor James Chalmers, University of Glasgow Professor John Blackie, University of Strathclyde
Michael McMahon MSP

37th Meeting, 2013 (Session 4) Tuesday 17 December 2013

Sheriff Principal Edward Bowen, and Gerry Bonnar, Secretary, Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure
John Dunn, Procurator Fiscal, West of Scotland, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service
Grazia Robertson, Member of the Law Society Criminal Law Committee, Law Society of Scotland
Michael Meehan, Faculty of Advocates
Cliff Binning, Executive Director Field Services, Scottish Court Service

1st Meeting, 2014 (Session 4) Tuesday 7 January 2014

Kenny MacAskill, Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Lesley Bagha, Criminal Justice Bill Team Leader, Aileen Bearhop, Head of Police Powers Team, Jim Devoy, Policy Officer, Youth Justice Team, and Philip Lamont, Head of Criminal Law and Licensing Team, Scottish Government.
2nd Meeting, 2014 (Session 4) Tuesday 14 January 2014

Kenny MacAskill, Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Kathleen McInulty, Policy Manager, Criminal Justice Bill Team, Scottish Government.
On resuming—

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: Agenda item 4 is our first evidence session on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. I welcome the Rt Hon Lord Carloway, the Lord Justice Clerk; Elise Traynor, deputy legal secretary to the Lord President; and Jacqueline Fordyce, law clerk to the Lord Justice Clerk.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): Before we start, convener, I draw members’ attention to my entry in the register of interests. I am a council member of Justice Scotland and a member of the cross-party group in the Scottish Parliament on adult survivors of childhood sexual abuse. Both those groups have submitted written evidence, although I have not been involved in drafting it.

The Convener: Thank you. Does anybody else have anything to declare that is relevant?

Margaret Mitchell: I am the convener of the cross-party group on adult survivors of childhood sexual abuse.

Roderick Campbell: I refer to my entry in the register of interests, which states that I am a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

The Convener: I wish that I had something to declare, so that I could feel important, but I do not—so far—so there we are.

We move to questions from members.

Colin Keir (Edinburgh Western) (SNP): My question relates to your report, Lord Carloway. In paragraph 7.2.56, on page 285, you mention that there are “a series of rules which, realistically, are not capable of being understood by many outside the world of criminal legal practice.”

Will you explain further the current difficulties in understanding the rule?

Rt Hon Lord Carloway (Lord Justice Clerk): So far as corroboration is concerned—which is the issue that is being addressed here—it is reasonable to say, as I said in the report, that corroboration and how it operates is not widely understood by the public. Further, I do not think that the concept is particularly well understood by many of the legal profession, and there are continuing difficulties with what it means among the judiciary, at both the High Court and sheriff court levels. That can be seen by the decisions that continue to come out from the courts from time to time.

Do you want a specific example?

Colin Keir: Yes. Obviously, that is quite a sweeping statement and it would be handy to have some examples.

Lord Carloway: Would you like an example in relation to public misconception?

Colin Keir: Yes.

Lord Carloway: An example that I think that I gave the last time that I was at the committee was the misunderstanding about what corroboration means in relation to, for example, a finding of a DNA specimen or a fingerprint. If one were to find a fingerprint or DNA of someone, say on a windowsill in a house that had been the subject of a housebreaking, the finding of that fingerprint or DNA sample is in itself—and without more—sufficient for guilt. I get the impression, however, that some people think that there requires to be another piece of evidence against the person in order to bring in a verdict of guilty, but that is not the case.

Corroboration comes into play in that particular situation in that, in Scotland, two forensic scientists would be required to speak to the finding of the DNA sample, two forensic scientists—they could be the same or different—would be required to speak to the taking of the sample from the suspect, and two forensic scientists would be needed to speak to the comparison between the sample that was found and the sample that was taken from the suspect. One gets the impression that, in the public’s mind, corroboration is about different pieces of evidence, but it is not—it is about having different witnesses speaking to particular things.

Colin Keir: Can I continue, convener?

The Convener: Yes. I have not stopped you.

Colin Keir: I have been given the first chance to ask questions, which does not happen very often under this convener, I can tell you.

The Convener: No, then—you are not getting another question. [Laughter.]

Colin Keir: Lord Carloway, your report highlights that "there is no evidence ... to support the idea that the formal requirement for corroboration reduces miscarriages of justice."

Will you elaborate on that?

Lord Carloway: During the review, we consulted widely with a range of people, including the legal profession in particular and others outwith it, and at no point did anyone come up with any material to suggest that the incidence of miscarriage of justice in Scotland, which is the only country in the world that has the rule, is different from that in any other country in the civilised western world or the Commonwealth. We were given no material to suggest that there is a difference and that the rule in relation to corroboration reduces the likelihood or incidence of miscarriage of justice in our jurisdiction—that is essentially what was meant.

11:15

The Convener: Can I just ask you about your use of the plural “we”? I recall that you made it plain at the previous session that we had with you that this is your review or report.

Lord Carloway: Yes, that is correct.

The Convener: You have referred to a review team and a reference group. Who were those people?

Lord Carloway: Those who were in the reference group ought to be detailed in the report. I will find that information in a moment. I apologise if I have used the word “we” when referring to the review team, but the report is certainly mine. The assistance that I had consisted of a full-time secretary to the review and two full-time members of staff. We also co-opted a member of the police on a part-time basis to give us views on police procedure.

Now, if the information on the membership of the reference group is not there—

The Convener: It is—it is annex D of your report. I am looking for your members, but I do not see any names here. It is annex—

Lord Carloway: Annex E?

The Convener: I have found the names now in annex D. It states that the members of the review team were Tim Barraclough, Ian McFarlane—this information is on page 394 of your report.

Lord Carloway: Is it not page 387?

The Convener: I have page 393.

Lord Carloway: That is probably because—

The Convener: It is a different copy.

Lord Carloway: The report was not produced in hard copy; it was produced electronically only.

The Convener: Right. You used the term “we”, although you made it clear that it was your report. Who in the group disagreed with your finding or line on corroboration? That is the contentious one—let us be honest about it. Who among all the people outlined in annex D disagreed with that line?
Lord Carloway: Now, there’s a question. The table in annex D on the reference group shows that it included Ian Bryce, a member of the Law Society of Scotland, a review team. My recollection is that—you do not hold me to this if my recollection is entirely wrong—the Law Society representative was in favour of retaining the rule on corroboration. I think that the Scottish Human Rights Commission was in favour of retaining it, and I suspect that John Scott was in favour of retaining it. Those are the main ones who come to mind as expressing views seeking to retain the rule, rather along the lines of the consultation materials that were produced by their representative bodies.

The Convener: It would be very useful for the committee to know who in the reference group and the review team agreed with the finding that corroboration should be abolished.

Lord Carloway: I cannot answer that question positively, because of the way in which the reference group operated. It operated during the course of the report’s preparation; it was not that we put the report to the reference group for approval—that was not the way in which it was done. We had a series of meetings with the reference group at which its members could express their views, but we did not have a system whereby the final report was put to the reference group and we noted who was in favour of one part of the report and who was in favour of the other.

The Convener: I just wanted to nail this bit about whose report this is, because you used the term “we”. The committee has read a paper from The Modern Law Review that makes a fairly serious allegation. At page 840, it says:

“The review process may have given the views of a single individual a momentum which will be difficult to counter.”

The inference seems to be that it was you and you alone who suggested that the law of corroboration should be abolished.

I give you the opportunity to say that you are not a man alone, saying in your review that you alone want the change.

Lord Carloway: You are asking me to recall who exactly said what at meetings a year or two ago. My recollection is that those who were in favour are those who expressed supporting views after the report was produced. For example, the Crown Office and the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland were in favour. I do not wish to answer for people who might or might not have changed their views after seeing the report.

The Convener: As I understand it, you did not all sit down to discuss this major issue, with minutes in which people asked for their position for or against the proposal to be noted.

Lord Carloway: The minutes of all our meetings are on our website. We sat down and had sessions on corroboration—yes, we did.

The Convener: I hear that, but this is big—it is huge. I am trying to get at how this major proposal was included, because you used the term “we”, but you previously used “I” and said that it was your report.

Lord Carloway: It is my report—I accept that. I am not suggesting that anyone on the reference group was asked to endorse the report, and I think that I made that clear when I previously appeared before the committee. The cabinet secretary asked me to produce a report, and it is my report. I do not seek in any way to detract from that.

The Convener: So you refute the line in the article by James Chalmers and Fiona Leverick that “sweeping changes to the Scottish criminal justice system may now stem from the recommendations of a single individual.”

Lord Carloway: I do not refute that in the sense that it is my report and therefore they are my recommendations—that is correct.

The Convener: I just thought that, when you introduced the word “we”, we had to clarify that.

Elaine Murray: I will go further on corroboration issues that arise from the bill rather than your report. I am interested in your reaction to the bill and to some of the submissions that we have received on it. I think that 12 organisations are in favour of abolishing the requirement for corroboration and 15 oppose that, so views are conflicting.

The view has been expressed that the value of the empirical research for the review was overstated and that it was not appropriate to make a direct comparison with European models of justice, which do not make the presumption of innocence and which take an inquisitorial rather than adversarial approach—a direct translation cannot be made between the Scottish criminal justice system and other European systems.

Lord Carloway: As far as I am aware, the system in every European country that has signed up to the European convention on human rights has the presumption of innocence.

In reaching my views on corroboration, I did not concentrate solely on European systems, particularly as there are clear procedural differences between us and Europe, as you said. The fundamental reason why I recommended the change in relation to corroboration is that Scotland is the only country in the civilised world—I include in that the whole of western Europe and all the Commonwealth countries—that has a rule that requires corroboration.
My view is that the corroboration rule in this country is not reducing the incidence of miscarriages of justice in a narrow sense but creating miscarriages of justice in the broader sense, because perfectly legitimate cases that would result in a conviction are not being prosecuted because of the corroboration rule. We looked at other countries, and that was a main driver for the recommendation that Scotland must change, to bring itself into line with modern thinking on criminal justice.

As for the research, in the course of producing the report, we had an opportunity to test how the system operates in Scotland. We took all the petition cases—that is, all serious cases—that were considered in Scotland in 2010 and examined every one that had been what the prosecutors would call no pro-ed—in other words, marked for no prosecution. We had more than 450 cases that had been marked no prosecution—numerically, that is a large number of cases. We then tried to apply the type of rule that other countries would apply to those cases. By “other countries”, I do not mean only England and Wales or Ireland—south or north—but countries with a similar approach to us, such as Canada, Australia and New Zealand. Something like 268 of those 458 cases—serious cases that we had not prosecuted in Scotland—would have been prosecuted in those other countries with a realistic prospect of success.

That is why we used that cohort as illustrative of the problem that exists in this country as a result of the operation of corroboration. Serious cases are not being prosecuted when, in other countries, they would be and the people involved would be found guilty. Moreover, those cases are not classified as resulting in miscarriages of justice in those other countries.

Elaine Murray: The argument has been made that, in countries that do not have corroboration, there are a number of safeguards against unsafe conviction. The bill goes with one—an increase from a simple majority to a two-thirds majority for a guilty verdict. It does not consider, for example, the abolition of the not proven verdict or other safeguards that may exist in other countries. Does the bill contain sufficient safeguards if corroboration is abolished?

Lord Carloway: I do not consider that the abolition of the requirement for corroboration requires any rebalancing of the system by the introduction of further safeguards. I made that relatively clear in my report. Because of the fundamental view that it would not cause miscarriages of justice of the type that we are discussing in the narrow sense of appellate jurisdiction—that is, something going wrong in the trial process—I did not consider that it was necessary to introduce any safeguards.

The Government proposed certain safeguards following upon my review. I can comment on those if you wish me to do that, but I do not consider any of them to be directly relevant to the question of the abolition of corroboration.

Elaine Murray: I would be interested in your views on the safeguards that the Government suggested, including those that were not taken forward.

Lord Carloway: The increase in the numbers necessary for a verdict of guilty from eight to 10 may result in greater confidence in the criminal justice system at solemn level. If we know that there are at least 10 in the majority rather than eight, it may introduce more confidence in the system. I have no problem with that proposed reform. However, as I think I have said previously, when one compares that with other systems, one must be extremely careful to understand how the majority verdict system operates in other countries. Again, there are public misunderstandings, but a large number of people in the legal profession—including on the criminal side of things—also misunderstand how the systems operate in England and Wales and what one would call Anglo-American common-law jurisdictions.

Our system is straightforward. We require a majority of eight for a verdict of guilty but there is no requirement for a majority to return either of the acquittal verdicts. That is not the way in which the systems abroad operate—I appreciate that I am saying things that some of you already know—with some countries retaining the necessity for unanimity for the verdict. Such a system operates by requiring a majority of 10 to two or unanimity for either of the two verdicts that can be returned.

11:30

The practical import of that is straightforward. Some people think that having an eight to seven majority requirement makes our system weaker with regard to guilty verdicts, but that is not necessarily the case. In Scotland, if eight jurors are in favour of a not guilty verdict, the defendant will be acquitted. In other jurisdictions, if eight out of 12 jurors are in favour of a not guilty verdict, the defendant will not be acquitted, because those countries require a majority or unanimity for both guilty and not guilty verdicts.

One can analyse that and work out how it would operate in practice. The problem that other jurisdictions have is the so-called hung jury. It is important that the committee understands, as I am sure most—if not all—of you will, that there is a huge difference between simply having a majority system for the verdict of guilty, and requiring a majority verdict for guilty and not guilty verdicts, as happens in other systems.

That takes me on to the second element of Elaine Murray’s question, which I think was probably about the not proven verdict. Contrary to various comments in the press, I have not expressed any view on whether the not proven verdict ought to be abolished. If you are considering its abolition—which I know is proposed in another bill—you must be very careful, given what I have said about the difference between the way in which our system operates in relation to majorities and the way in which other systems operate in that regard. You would have to consider the issue very carefully in order to decide what you think the effect of a change of that nature would be.

To put it another way, if you are dropping the not proven verdict, you have to consider whether you wish to introduce the same system as other countries have, and require a majority of 10 out of 15 for any verdict that the jury is to return, which would be the equivalent of what happens abroad.

The Convener: Alison McInnes has a supplementary.

Roderick Campbell: I have one, too.

The Convener: Will either of you pick up on the issue of the cases that were re-examined—

Alison McInnes: That is the subject of my supplementary.

The Convener: Thank you. Alison McInnes will ask that question—if she does not, I will.

Alison McInnes: Lord Carloway, you mentioned that you had reviewed those 458 cases—

Lord Carloway: Well, I did not do that personally, but it was done.

Alison McInnes: Yes—that was done in the review. How long did it take to analyse those cases? Who carried out that review? It has been criticised as a cursory desk-top study that was undertaken in a one-sided way, and involved simply asking whether a case would have proceeded to court if corroboration was not required. No one from the defence side of the cases was involved in discussing how a case would have played out in court.

Lord Carloway: Absolutely—there was no one from the defence side, because that was not the question that we were asking. The question was being asked of prosecutors. We had the materials available for review, and two procurators fiscal were asked the question. We had the data on the 458 cases that were discontinued because of lack of evidence, but that does not necessarily mean lack of corroboration. Lack of corroboration would be a principal factor, but the case would have been no pro-ed on the basis of insufficient evidence.

The question that we were asking, therefore—which we asked of prosecutors—was, "Would you have prosecuted this case if the requirement for corroboration was abolished?" We asked prosecutors to apply the standard for prosecution that one would expect to see in other countries—namely, would there be a realistic prospect of conviction in the case?

If your question is, "Would all the 268 cases that would have been prosecuted have resulted in a guilty verdict?", the answer is absolutely not; we are not suggesting that that would have been the case. In a proportion of those cases, the jury would have acquitted—we did not have any difficulty with that. The significant point is that a lot of the cases would have resulted in convictions.

Alison McInnes: You assert that, but it is very difficult for you to evidence it in any way whatsoever, because you have not been able to factor in how the juries would have handled these things.

Lord Carloway: It is an estimate—

Alison McInnes: Upon which hinges an immensely profound change. The review is nothing more than a desk-top survey.

Lord Carloway: It is absolutely a desk-top survey. I agree entirely. That is what it was always intended to be.

Alison McInnes: I have substantive questions, but I will come back to them later.

The Convener: I have a question on the same point. The Modern Law Review article picks up on this issue, which is not just about prosecuting. The question that was asked was, "Would there have been a reasonable prospect of conviction?", which you have alluded to. The article states:

"On the basis of this evidence, the Review concluded that corroboration is in fact an 'impediment to justice', and in fact even a cause of miscarriages of justice, which the Review takes as including both wrongful acquittal and wrongful conviction. The research design is at best curious and at worst badly flawed."

It states that the review appeared to be unaware of research carried out by the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice in the early 1990s, which dealt with these matters. It goes on to say:

"On that basis the Royal Commission concluded that 'a supporting evidence requirement would affect only a very small percentage of cases'. This research suggests that, in practice, the abolition of the corroboration requirement would not lead to a significantly greater number of prosecutions or convictions."

That is pretty tough stuff.
My colleague Alison McInnes alluded to the fact that the review was a desk-top survey by two prosecutors. There are people out there in certain fields who think that if corroboration is abolished, perhaps in sexual assault and rape cases, there will be a greater prospect of convictions and so on. However, nothing that I am reading in your evidence supports that. You are the very man who sits and tells us about the quality of evidence, but I have to say that the quality of evidence on which the assertions were made is pretty thin.

Lord Carloway: I did not make a recommendation to abolish the requirement for corroboration based solely on that research. As I think I have explained, the critical feature that I ask the committee to bear in mind is that Scotland is the only country in the civilised world that retains this archaic rule of medieval jurisprudence. It is holding back the criminal justice system.

The Convener: I will let committee members in. I do not think that the committee takes the view that there is not a case for the abolition of corroboration, but we are asking whether this is the right way to make that argument.

Roderick Campbell: I have a supplemental question, Lord Carloway. I want to touch on the question of majority verdicts. When you gave evidence on 29 November 2011, you said that you did not think that the issue of majority verdicts was directly connected with the work that you were doing. You went on to say:

“I think I said that if we go down the route of examining majority verdicts we must examine the not proven verdict.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 29 November 2011; c 544.]

The Government is proposing not to proceed with any immediate work in relation to the not proven verdict. Do you have any comments on that? Do you think that the two can be disentangled or should they be considered together?

Lord Carloway: I do not think that they should be considered together. For the reasons that I gave earlier, I think that they are entirely separate issues. If you are analysing the question of the not proven verdict, you have to analyse the question of majorities for either a verdict of not guilty or a verdict of guilty and to try to get to grips with what effect you think that would have on conviction rates and, of course, the potential for miscarriages of justice. I regard the two issues as quite separate. I agree with the Government’s view that if one is looking at the question of abolition of the not proven verdict, further work requires to be done in that regard.

Roderick Campbell: Okay. May I move on to something slightly different?

The Convener: I will move on if your question is on something different. I have John Finnie, Margaret Mitchell, Sandra White and Alison McInnes to bring in, then I will let you back in again. John, is your question on corroboration?

John Finnie: No, it is on something completely different. I beg your pardon.

The Convener: Can we finish off with corroboration, interlocking juries and not proven verdicts? I will come back to you, John.

Margaret Mitchell: Good morning, Lord Carloway. I want to ascertain whether the fact that no other jurisdiction has the requirement for corroboration is a reason in itself to abolish it.

Lord Carloway: That fact is an extremely good indicator that Scotland is on its own in the western civilised world in relation to justice systems, and that is a very good pointer to one having something anachronistic in one’s system. In the perhaps slightly more academic aspects of the report, I have traced the reason why we still have the rule, and it is because of historical anachronism. Over time, everyone else abolished it for good reason.

Margaret Mitchell: But the fact that everyone else happens not to have the requirement is not in itself a sufficient reason to abolish it.

Lord Carloway: It is not an absolute reason, no. However, if one realises how isolated Scotland is on this and what other countries think about our having such a rule, I think that that is an extremely persuasive reason why the rule must go. The same happened previously in relation to civil cases, in which we had exactly the same arguments.

Margaret Mitchell: Does any other member of the judiciary agree with your view that the requirement for corroboration should be abolished?

Lord Carloway: Do you mean at the High Court level?

Margaret Mitchell: I mean anywhere, at any level.

Lord Carloway: I think that you have received responses from at least two sheriffs who agree with my recommendation.

Margaret Mitchell: Among all the judiciary in Scotland, two sheriffs agree with your recommendation. Does that not give you pause for thought about whether you have got this right?

Lord Carloway: I conducted a year-long review into the matter, on which we consulted widely. As you will see from the terms of my report, I had no doubt whatsoever when compiling my recommendations that the recommendation to abolish the requirement for corroboration would be met with extreme resistance among the Scottish Margaret Mitchell: Why is that the case, Lord Carloway?

Lord Carloway: Because it is ingrained into the minds of the lawyers in this country that the requirement for corroboration is an important factor that prevents the occurrence of miscarriages of justice. I spent a long time analysing the matter, and I came to the conclusion that they were in error because there is no evidence to support that proposition.

Margaret Mitchell: But that is just your conclusion. Given the magnitude of this decision and the weight of opinion from all sections of the criminal justice system, surely the proposal should be put to the test—rather than put in a bill—by being made the subject of a wider review. If you are confident, as you certainly seem to be, you would not mind that additional scrutiny. Such a review should include the option to retain the requirement for corroboration and to try to improve it.

Lord Carloway: I was asked to carry out a review by the Cabinet Secretary for Justice. I had specific terms of reference, which included looking at the question of corroboration. That was the task that I was asked to do, and that is the task that I carried out. I was not asked to consider whether there would be better or longer ways of carrying out that task. I carried out that task to the best of my ability and I looked at as much material as I thought was necessary in order to reach a reasoned conclusion.

Margaret Mitchell: Why did you not suggest that one option would be to look at how corroboration could be improved?

Lord Carloway: I do not think that the concept of a requirement for corroboration is something that we should have in our criminal justice system.

Margaret Mitchell: With respect, that is only your view.

Lord Carloway: It is not only my view. There are plenty people who agree with me, as we saw during the consultation process. You have material from the Crown Office, from ACPOS and from certain sheriffs and others who support the idea that the requirement for corroboration should be abolished. You have views to the contrary that are primarily from members of the Scottish legal profession, who are opposed to change. That is not a particularly unusual set of circumstances.

Margaret Mitchell: You have asserted that abolishing the requirement for corroboration will not lead to miscarriages of justice in the future, but that is merely an assertion. Is it not?

Lord Carloway: It is not an assertion. It is based on a detailed review that I carried out on the operation of the rule in Scotland. As I said, there is no evidence whatsoever that Scotland’s incidence of miscarriages of justice is any lower than that of any other country in the civilised world.

11:45

Margaret Mitchell: What opportunity do people who hold the contrary view have to debate the issue properly? The measure is being steamrollered through. If the cabinet secretary agrees with it, we have a majority Government and—

The Convener: Allow that some of us have different views will you, please?

Margaret Mitchell: It will potentially go through on your say-so, Lord Carloway. Forgive me, but when you are speaking, an old Scottish phrase comes to my mind: “We are all out of step but oor Jock”. The criminal legal system is not having its view widely debated, and that is a travesty.

Lord Carloway: During the course of my review, everyone was offered the opportunity to give their views on the subject. They are all contained on the website of the review process, in so far as the contributors consented to that.

It is not for me to decide whether the law should be changed. That is for Parliament. I am not attempting to steamroller anyone into doing anything. I was asked to conduct a review of the matter. I have produced my recommendations, which I am convinced are correct on this topic. Everyone had the chance of consulting and, as I recall, we produced a consultation document at the tail end of 2010 and received responses to that. I produced my report and there have been responses to that. There is now a bill and there have been responses to that. Obviously, it is this committee’s job to decide whether the recommendation is correct or wrong. If you disagree with my views and you consider that corroboration should be retained, that is entirely a matter for Parliament, and I respect that view, and of course, I enforce the law of corroboration in the courts every day.

Margaret Mitchell: For the avoidance of doubt, the consultation was done on the presumption that corroboration would be abolished and it considered what would need to be done, if anything, to guard against miscarriages of justice. In other words, the option to retain and improve corroboration was not considered. It seems to me that you have a real hostility towards considering that and recommending it, as you could have done within the remit that you were given by the Scottish Government.
Lord Carloway: I am sorry, but I cannot understand that.

The Convener: In fairness to Lord Carloway, he carried out the review under the Government’s remit. He could not just change the remit himself. That is one of the problems that we face.

Margaret Mitchell: The option of corroboration could have been left open. Why not look at retaining corroboration but improving it?

The Convener: That is a question for the cabinet secretary about the nature of the remit of the review. By no means do I want to stop robust questioning, but the review remit was a matter for the cabinet secretary; we will deal with him when he comes before the committee.

Margaret Mitchell: I thought that the remit was to look at corroboration. Could I have some clarification on what the remit was? If the remit was to look at corroboration, the review could have looked at all aspects of it and considered retaining it as well as abolishing it.

Lord Carloway: I was asked to look at that and that is exactly what I did. That is what we consulted on.

Margaret Mitchell: And improving it? The middle road was not suggested.

Lord Carloway: I am not quite sure what you mean by improving corroboration.

Margaret Mitchell: I mean retaining corroboration and looking at other sources of evidence, such as the timescales involved with the Moorov doctrine, which means looking at cases that are so similar that, even though the time between them is longer, they can be used as evidence. There is also the training of the judiciary. There is a host of ways, it seems to me, that are so similar that, even though the time between them is longer, they can be used as corroborative evidence. That is also something that we will have to determine over time.

John Pentland: We heard earlier that 458 cases have been reviewed and some 268 of them could have gone to court for judgment. Will the courts be tooled up to deal with the increasing number of cases that may be referred?

Lord Carloway: Whether an increasing number of cases will be referred is a difficult question to answer because it depends on the standard that is applied by the Lord Advocate and also, I presume, on the level of resources that the Lord Advocate has.

The Convener: Can I stop you there, Lord Carloway? I thought that we were still on corroboration, John. Your question was a supplementary on the issue of corroboration.

John Pentland: I just thought that the number of cases will be one of the practical challenges that—

The Convener: I agree. I will let Lord Carloway continue with his answer, but I will then bring in other members, because I have others waiting. Please excuse me, Lord Carloway; do continue with your answer about the pressure on courts.

Lord Carloway: The Lord Advocate will no doubt set the standard of prosecution, which will depend on a number of practical matters and not just the realistic prospects of prosecution. Presumably, he can only prosecute so many cases and the courts can only cope with so many cases per year. The number of cases will be determined by those practical factors.

I am not persuaded that there will necessarily be a significant increase in the number of cases that are prosecuted. There may be an increase in the number of cases that might be prosecuted, but it will be for the Lord Advocate to set the appropriate standard, and I imagine that he will set a higher qualitative standard than is currently applied in practice.

The Convener: Thank you.

Sorry about that, John. It is just that I am trying to keep us on corroboration, the impact on juries and so on.

Roderick Campbell: Can I ask a supplementary question?

The Convener: On?

Roderick Campbell: On what Lord Carloway has just said.

The Convener: The pressure on courts?

Roderick Campbell: No. It is on the test for the Lord Advocate. It follows on from what Lord Carloway has just said.

The Convener: All right. I will then bring in Sandra White.

Roderick Campbell: Lord Carloway, do you agree that the new test that the Lord Advocate and others will need to put together will have to focus on the credibility of the allegations and the quality of the evidence that supports them, requiring prosecutors to assess all the available evidence with regard to admissibility, credibility and reliability?

Lord Carloway: The short answer is yes. I think that there will be much more focus on the part of the prosecutors on the quality of material that is in front of them.

The reality at present is that, if you are sitting looking at a series of statements and there is corroborative evidence to support the proof of the crime, there is a temptation to mark the case for prosecution. Once that is taken away and you have to apply a different test, which involves really looking at the quality of evidence, I think that there will be a much more careful analysis of the evidence before the case goes to court, because there will not be a formal corroboration requirement.

Roderick Campbell: Following on from that, it is not necessarily the case that there will be more prosecutions.

Lord Carloway: Absolutely. You put it better than I did in my previous answer.

The Convener: I am sorry to jump in before Sandra White, but The Modern Law Review article states that the assertion about quality versus quantity

"is misconceived and is not developed beyond the single paragraph in which it appears. The structure of a Scottish trial is in fact such as to separate out questions of quantity and quality with reasonable effectiveness. The quantitative requirement created by the corroboration rule is a matter of law for the judge, normally to be determined at the point of a submission of no case to answer."

The article suggests that the idea that getting rid of corroboration means that prosecutors—and, indeed, the defence—will focus more on quality rather than quantity is a false argument, because that happens in any event.

Lord Carloway: It happens to a degree, because there is always a residual power with the prosecutor not to prosecute something in the public interest for whatever reason he thinks fit.

The Convener: That is surely a separate matter from quality and quantity.

Lord Carloway: It is the same thing. If you do not think that you have sufficient quality of evidence, you will not prosecute because it is not in the public interest to do so.

The Convener: I would have thought that sometimes cases are not pursued in the public interest because it is such a narrow matter that it would not be appropriate to prosecute. Is it not correct that there are other issues that are not prosecuted in the public interest?

Lord Carloway: I am not sure about that.

I am saying that, at present, if there is a legal sufficiency of evidence, there is a temptation to prosecute, because if you do not do so in the face of a sufficiency of evidence, your decision may be open to criticism. If you do not have that barrier—the limitation produced by the requirement for corroboration—you are in a much more free-thinking, free-flowing world, in which you have to look at the quality of the evidence and decide: is it in the public interest to prosecute the case? The decision depends on the quality of the evidence that is available.

The Convener: Can I put that a different way? When it comes to the credibility of a witness in a rape or sexual assault case, if the Crown is of the view that the witness will not stand up to scrutiny—perhaps because of their lifestyle or something—will the prosecutors say to that person, “I’m not going to prosecute this because, if I put you in the witness box, I think that we will not be successful because they will not believe you”? On the other hand, will they say, “There is no need for corroboration now; I will put you up anyway, whether or not your credibility withstands it.”

In my view, the protection for the person who alleges the offence against them is corroboration, no matter how slight it is. If it comes down to credibility alone, you take away that protection in such cases.
Lord Carloway: It is obviously for the Lord Advocate to determine exactly what procedures he will follow in deciding whether to prosecute a case, whether it is a rape case or another sexual offence case. The reality of the situation is that many single-witness cases are currently not being prosecuted because of the absence of corroboration, but its absence can be a matter of pure chance.

The Convener: I appreciate all that, but will you answer my question? What will the Crown say to somebody whose credibility prosecutors think will not stand up, even if the Crown believes them?

Lord Carloway: I can give you a view on that, if you wish, but I cannot answer for the Lord Advocate—

The Convener: Of course not.

Lord Carloway: I cannot answer for the Lord Advocate as to what he or she will tell complainers in sexual cases, but I know that this is done daily throughout the rest of the civilised world. Decisions are made about whether to prosecute sexual offences not on the basis of chance that there happens to be an admixture of distress or other evidence, but on the basis of whether the prosecutor, looking at the evidence as a whole, considers that there is a realistic prospect of the jury convicting.

The Convener: So prosecutors may say to somebody, “I would like to take you to court so that you can give evidence against this party, but I do not think you will be believed, so I will not prosecute.”

Lord Carloway: As I understand it at the moment, in such cases, although there is a minimum requirement of corroboration, it is still for the prosecutor to determine whether the case should be proceeded with in the public interest, so the situation that you describe will happen now.

The Convener: I agree, but at least there would be something else to support the Crown bringing the case forward. There would be something other than the credibility of the party.

My concern is that, in the recent case in England, for example, in which a chap in some soap opera was—rightly—found not guilty, the only evidence was that of the accuser. There was no corroboration, and that evidence was not believed. Are we going to import that into Scotland?

12:00

Lord Carloway: I am not entirely sure what the question is, convener.

The Convener: The question is: does that make it harder in some circumstances? Many people have certain beliefs about rape and sexual offences. The corroboration requirement does not apply to all cases in all courts, but those in which it does are more likely to result in successful prosecutions.

I put it to you that there may be circumstances in which it will be harder on the person who alleges that they have been sexually assaulted or raped because, if the case proceeds only on their evidence, they will have only their credibility to put before the court. That results in a difficult choice for the prosecuting Crown Office between putting that person in the witness box, after which they will perhaps find that they have not been believed, or not putting them in the witness box because that would be tough on them and they would not be believed.

Lord Carloway: I agree entirely with what you say about the difficulty of making a decision on whether or not to prosecute. I am recommending that, instead of just proceeding with a case because there happens to be a piece of corroborative material, one proceeds on the basis of having properly analysed the quality of the evidence. I suggest to the committee that that is a better system than the one that we have now.

With regard to the complainers in sexual offences cases, the reality at present—I have views on the subject that cover a different topic—is that, in almost all such cases, it is clear that the question of the credibility and reliability of the complainer will be a central feature. Whether or not you decide to recommend the abolition of the requirement for corroboration, that will not be changed.

The Convener: I agree.

Lord Carloway: It will not change either way.

The Convener: Sometimes the Crown may have to turn round and say to a woman or a man who alleges such an offence, “We’re not going to prosecute because we don’t think you will be believed”, because that is all the evidence that it has. The complainer may be saying, “Well, you don’t need corroboration any more”, and people outside will say the same and expect the case to be prosecuted. Someone is perhaps going to have to tell them, after assessing the quality of evidence, “We are not prosecuting this case”, notwithstanding that corroboration is no longer required. That is tough—that is all that I am saying about that.

Roderick Campbell: I have a supplementary, convener—

Sandra White: Convener?

The Convener: I beg your pardon, Sandra—I got carried away.
Sandra White: I understand, convener. A lot of us have been very patient in waiting to come in.

Good afternoon, Lord Carloway—it is afternoon now.

I am not a lawyer, but I am a member of the Justice Committee, and I want to put forward the view of the people on corroboration. You mentioned that, in civil law, corroboration is no longer taken on board, and that certain people in the judiciary look on the requirement for it as ancient or archaic. It is up to them whether they view it in that way, but I am interested in how it affects people out there.

The convener and others have mentioned rape cases, domestic violence and so on. Written evidence from Sheriff Maciver in 2013 made it clear, as well as raising the issues of rape and domestic violence, that the removal of corroboration will, in general, enable the public to have better protection in court. If an elderly person is mugged in their home, for example, there is no corroboration or other witness present, so the change would be effective for them.

We have to get away from the idea that the requirement for corroboration affects only domestic abuse and rape cases. There are other areas in which crimes against individuals do not have any element of corroboration.

I was interested in what you said in your opening remarks, Lord Carloway, about corroboration not being widely understood. When I first came to the Justice Committee, I did not have much of an idea of what corroboration meant, but I have been out—as most of the committee members have—to speak to various people. I have spoken to Scottish Women’s Aid, Rape Crisis Scotland and others, and the fact is that the requirement for corroboration, or for another witness to have been present, is preventing justice from being done in what is a very horrendous crime.

Can you give us an example of how, for crimes such as rape or domestic abuse where the case involves one person’s word against another’s, abolishing the requirement for corroboration would benefit the person who the crime was committed against?

Lord Carloway: It is difficult to say that there would be a benefit to the complainer in any form of crime in that sense.

The important feature is that, if the requirement for corroboration is abolished, the prosecuting system and the courts will be able to secure convictions in cases where there is by definition no corroboration. There are many such cases. They are particularly prevalent in the domestic setting, but they are by no means exclusive to that setting.

There are many cases in which the undoubted victim of the crime will know who did it—there may be no real issue of identification because, for example, the person involved is a relative—and what was done. Currently, when the victim of the crime goes to the authorities and explains what has happened, the case is simply not prosecuted. To my mind, that is an injustice in our criminal system, and that injustice exists nowhere else in the world. Other countries regard the fact that we have such a rule as disturbing.

You asked for examples, and one can give many. In a simple robbery case, you—being a perfectly respectable citizen—may be standing at the bus stop with a bag when somebody whom you know comes along, snatches your bag and runs away. Let us make no mistake: some of our criminal fraternity know about the law of corroboration and they know how to adapt their practices in accordance with it.

If you, being a member of the Justice Committee, are robbed in that way at the bus stop and you know the person because you have lived all your life in the same close or whatever, when you go to the police, the police will tell you, “Well, that is just too bad, because there is no corroboration.” The other person will not even be prosecuted, never mind acquitted. If, on the other hand, it so chances that a friend of yours wanders round the corner and sees the person snatching your bag, the person will be prosecuted and convicted. Whether or not justice is done depends on whether someone wanders round a corner.

The Convener: In fairness, Lord Carloway, as you have said, there does not have to be another person. There could be other evidence to corroborate.

Lord Carloway: But in the situation that I have described, there is unlikely to be other evidence.

The Convener: Possession of the stolen goods might constitute other evidence.

Lord Carloway: Yes, that is an option.

Sandra White: I have a small follow-up question, as I want to get the issue correct in my mind.

As we have talked about, for people who have suffered horrific crimes such as domestic violence, rape or abuse, the experience of prosecution can sometimes be very difficult. My understanding is that the proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration is part of a more holistic approach to criminal justice, under which the Lord Advocate will, for example, put forward specific details on the circumstances in which a case will be prosecuted and may use special measures to allow witnesses to give evidence by videolink. Would that type of approach be beneficial?
Actually, I know or believe that such an approach would be helpful, but I want to ask for your thoughts on that. Obviously, Women’s Aid and others are worried about what defence lawyers might say, but, as part of a holistic approach to the criminal justice system that includes the use of special measures such as video-links, would it be beneficial for victims of sexual crimes if there was no longer a requirement for corroboration?

Lord Carloway: Are you asking about the introduction of special measures in court and matters of that sort?

Sandra White: Yes.

Lord Carloway: The short answer to your question is, in my view, yes.

In relation to video-links, I have written papers that are probably available on the internet about where I consider we should be going in relation to evidence. In many cases, especially summary cases, the idea that we should require all the witnesses to come into court to give evidence in a courtroom is something from the past. We are in an age of technology that allows people to give evidence by a number of means. I do not wish to go into the issue in detail, because I suspect that it is a completely different area—

The Convener: Yes—it is not part of the bill.

Sandra White: I just wanted to clarify that point.

The Convener: Yes.

The next question is from Alison McInnes.

Alison McInnes: Lord Carloway, I was going to ask whether you had had pause for thought over the past year, given the significant concerns of many of your peers and colleagues, but you have been fairly robust this morning. You have been surprisingly dismissive and almost disdainful of some of your colleagues and the significant concerns that they have raised about the recommendation on corroboration. I want to go back to the discussions that you had with the cabinet secretary in the early days, before you agreed to take on the role of carrying out a review. Can you recall those discussions?

Lord Carloway: I remember being asked to enter a room by the Lord President—the Lord Justice General—who said that the Government was anxious to have someone of sufficient knowledge and experience in the field to conduct a review. In that sense, if I remember rightly, I was not selected by the cabinet secretary—I was selected by the Lord Justice General. I suspect that I then had a brief meeting with the cabinet secretary. I certainly had some form of exchange, perhaps through email, on the terms of reference, as might be expected.

Alison McInnes: At the heart of the review was the aim of future proofing our criminal justice system against ECHR challenge following the Cadder ruling. At what point did the consideration of corroboration and its removal come into the discussions on the remit? Did you posit that, or did the cabinet secretary put it into the remit? Is it something that you have always had a bee in your bonnet about?

Lord Carloway: No. If I had been asked, before I sat down and started reviewing the matter, whether the rule on corroboration ought to have been abolished, I would probably have come up with exactly the same reasons as the rest of the legal profession has done. It was the conduct of the review that persuaded me that we are wrong.

Alison McInnes: Can you recall whether the cabinet secretary specifically put that in the remit?

Lord Carloway: Do not hold me to this—I am almost certain, but I do not wish to be absolutely positive because I would need to look at the email exchanges—but my recollection is that the question of corroboration was already in the draft terms of reference before I agreed to them. The reason for that is relatively straightforward. You might recall that the case of Cadder had, in effect, reviewed by a rather strange method the case of McLean, which had said that we do not need the particular safeguard of a solicitor being present at interview because we have a whole lot of other safeguards, central to which is corroboration. The United Kingdom Supreme Court said that corroboration is not a safeguard in that context. As I understand it, that is why corroboration, among other things, was put into the remit. As soon as one started to look at the Cadder-type situation, one then had to look at the safeguards.

I apologise if I seem disrespectful of my colleagues, as that is not my intention and I respect their views, as I always have. I had no doubt what their views would be because they were expressed to me during the course of the review, some of them forcefully and some not.

Alison McInnes: Indeed, but on at least a couple of occasions this morning, you have said that other people misunderstand corroboration.

Lord Carloway: Absolutely.

Alison McInnes: Paragraph 35 in the submission from Justice Scotland states:

“We are not satisfied that any sufficient safeguards are proposed on the face of the Bill and we remain gravely concerned about the future of Scottish criminal law in the absence of corroboration. We consider that, without significant change, successful challenges to convictions under Article 6 ECHR as miscarriages of justice and incompatible with the right to a fair hearing are inevitable, whether before the Appeal Court, the UK Supreme Court or the European Court of Human Rights.”
You were asked to future proof the system against challenges, and here we have a central challenge being put forward. How do you respond to that?

Lord Carloway: I am not sure that I was asked to future proof the whole Scottish criminal legal system; I was asked to look at specific matters. The committee has asked about my terms of reference, but I am not sure that I was asked to provide a guarantee. For the reasons that I have given, I disagree with Justice Scotland’s view on this. I am not sure that I can expand on that without repeating what I have said.

12:15

Alison McInnes: Justice Scotland identifies three obvious areas: identification evidence, disputed expert testimony, and the admissibility of and weight to be afforded to confessions. Are you going to address these issues?

Lord Carloway: All those issues have been discussed in other countries that do not have the rule of corroboration. The first area that you mentioned was identification evidence. We already have the pronouncements of the UK Supreme Court on the issue of identification and how it should be dealt with. We give juries warnings in cases that have only eyewitness identification evidence. South of the border, of course, they rely on single eyewitness evidence to convict people and there is no suggestion that the incidence of miscarriages of justice in England is greater than it is here.

Alison McInnes: As I recall, England does not have dock identification.

Lord Carloway: England does not have dock identification, because it is prohibited. In England, there is a series of other methods by which an accused person can be identified. The UK Supreme Court has told us that dock identification is convention compliant, provided that certain safeguards are put in place, which they are. Again, I do not wish to bore the committee with the details but, as you would expect, they include whether the witness has had the opportunity of identifying the accused before court at an identity parade as they now exist. The absence of dock identification has, as I understand it, already been ruled on.

Alison McInnes: I have a final question. When you were speaking in response to Mr Pentland, you suggested that there is a real need to give victims the chance to take their case to court even without corroboration. I thought that we always prosecuted in the public interest, but it is beginning to sound as if we are moving towards prosecuting in the victim’s interest. Is that fair?

Lord Carloway: I am not suggesting that there should be private prosecution in Scotland. The system here is that the Lord Advocate intervenes and he makes the decision about whether a prosecution should go ahead. I am not suggesting any change to that system.

The point that you are making has, I think, been touched on, possibly by the Crown Office, and it has certainly been mentioned by previous Lord Advocates. There are certain rights under the ECHR to have adequate remedies to protect the citizen. For example, there is the right to security of person, and so on. Basically, people have a general right of that sort. The legal system under which an individual operates must provide a proper remedy, including the remedy that people are properly prosecuted and punished for crimes. As I think someone has said in the past, at some stage someone might decide to take a challenge to the European Court saying, “I don’t have a remedy because the man didn’t come round the corner and see what happened.” We might have to address such a situation in due course.

I hope that the changes to our system will not be forced on us from outwith but that they can be duly considered by our own Parliament.

The Convener: I have Roderick Campbell followed by John Finnie, Elaine Murray and Margaret Mitchell. I will try to get everyone in. I know that I am guilty of asking too many questions myself.

Roderick Campbell: I would like to start with a supplementary question to something that was raised a little while ago. It was about sexual history. Do you have a view on reviewing sexual history applications under sections 274 and 275 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 in the context of corroboration if corroboration were to go?

Lord Carloway: In the context of corroboration? I am not quite sure what the link is.

Roderick Campbell: Some people have suggested in their submissions that the committee ought to consider that but, if you do not have a view, I will not press the question.

Lord Carloway: I think that I am on record as speaking on several occasions about the need for greater protection for the complainer in sexual offences cases and for what one might call a more robust enforcement of certain provisions in that regard. I can say that with confidence having had protective measures that I suggested in relation to lines of questioning overruled by the appeal court some years ago. I have strong views on that, but I am not sure that there is a direct link with corroboration.
Roderick Campbell: I just wanted to raise the point.

On the complainer’s credibility being more in focus in the system if we have no corroboration, should consideration be given to the defence having greater freedom to challenge the complainer’s credibility, as some have suggested in their submissions?

Lord Carloway: I consider that, as a generality, the ability to challenge the complainer’s credibility in sexual offences cases is quite adequate to secure a fair trial at present and might be strengthened.

The Convener: Sorry, do you think that the protection for the complainer should be strengthened?

Lord Carloway: Yes.

The Convener: Even though there might be nothing else. Everybody wants successful, just prosecutions for sexual offences, but my concern is that that might not be the case. The defence might rightly argue that, if it is the accused’s word against the complainer’s word and the complainer has a bit of a history, it is going to open it up and start questioning the complainer’s credibility and sexual history. The bill might make the complainer more vulnerable to that and some of the protections might be eroded.

Lord Carloway: The level of protection that should be afforded to rape complainers has been considered widely in the Commonwealth, notably in Australia and Canada, which—as you will know—have very strict rape shield laws. No doubt it differs from state to state but, as I understand it, not only do they have relatively robust rape shield laws—which are to do with the protection of the witness’s dignity—and a system in which there is no corroboration, they have prohibitions on judges cautioning juries about the absence of corroboration in that category of case because it is not thought to be fair when one is balancing the interests of the accused and those of the victim.

The Convener: I am sorry, but that is not the question that I was asking. I was asking whether taking corroboration out of the picture and pursuing cases of that nature without it would leave female or male victims open to tougher questioning about their sexual histories if it is in the defence’s interests to do that. The protection for certain individuals, such as an element of corroboration, assists them and is not a problem, but abolishing corroboration might open things up. I thought that that was where Roddy Campbell was going with his questioning—that the protections that, rightly, exist now might be eroded in some way over time.

Lord Carloway: I can see no reason why they should be. It would be contrary to the way that criminal justice is going generally in the world, to return to the wider picture. The tendency is towards greater rape shield protections.

The Convener: I accept your point.

Roddy, do you have another question?

Roderick Campbell: I have not really embarked on the major question that I want to ask you, Lord Carloway, which largely concerns procedural safeguards.

When you gave evidence in November, you suggested that you saw no need for alternative safeguards. You reiterated that this morning. Notwithstanding that, the Government embarked on a second consultation in relation to additional safeguards.

We have dealt with majority verdicts and the not proven verdict, but we have not really touched on direction to the jury. Do you remain of the view, which you expressed in November, that the judge and the jury should have the freedom to assess quality? A number of the senators of the College of Justice—a minority—said that they see a direction to the jury as part of the evidence and not as a factual matter for the jury. That is also the view of a number of other people including the Scottish Human Rights Commission, which has also raised concerns in relation to article 6 of the ECHR.

Since you prepared your report and gave evidence, a couple of European Court decisions have touched on the importance of procedural safeguards. Will you expand on whether you remain of the view that the additional safeguards are not required?

Lord Carloway: In talking about procedural safeguards, are you focusing particularly on jury directions?

Roderick Campbell: Yes. I am interested not only in the direction that no reasonable jury could convict but in the jury’s discretion to exclude evidence and in whether, as the Scottish Human Rights Commission suggests, there should be a statutory discretion on the face of the bill, following section 78 of the English legislation—the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Sorry—I am wrapping up too many things in one question. It is the general topic of procedural safeguards that I would like you to comment on.

Lord Carloway: There is a suggestion that the judge or sheriff in a jury trial should be able to withdraw the case from the jury if he or she thinks that no reasonable jury could convict. I can address that—Roderick Campbell: Perhaps you could deal with that one first.

Lord Carloway: I do not think that that reform should be encouraged. The reason for that is primarily procedural. Let us imagine that a jury trial is coming to an end, all the evidence has been heard and somebody makes a submission that there is no case to answer. If that goes in favour of the Crown and the jury subsequently convicts, the case can be subject to an appeal in the normal way, so that does not create a problem.

On the other hand, if there is a submission that there is no case to answer, the judge’s decision is that no reasonable jury could convict and he or she acquits the accused, that will, in effect, terminate the jury trial unless an appeal court can be convened extremely rapidly. If that is not done, the trial will be wasted if the decision is wrong, because it cannot be appealed without having a new trial. That is one reason why, as far as safeguards for the accused are concerned, he has a right of appeal if he is convicted. It is much more difficult, if the decision is wrong, for the prosecutor to appeal effectively without forcing people to go through the whole process again.

The other reason why I am against the reform is that it would give a single judge power in relation to what he thinks a reasonable jury should do with the evidence, and we should guard against that. It is different to have a ground for appeal that is based on reasonable verdict. There is much less scope for idiosyncratic decision making in that case, because three judges make the decision. Experience dictates that there have been decisions that have led to acquittals that cannot then be changed in circumstances where they are demonstrated to be wrong.

That is my answer on that suggestion.

Roderick Campbell: You would accept that a number of your colleagues take a different view.

Lord Carloway: I do not think that many of them take a different view on that issue.

Roderick Campbell: It is not possible to determine that from the submission as it refers only to minorities and majorities, so we do not know the numbers. However, a minority of the senators seem to believe that it is a matter that the judge should deal with.

Lord Carloway: That is correct. There was a minority view, but the majority said that the reform should not be introduced, broadly for the reasons that I have given. That is the position.

Roderick Campbell: One of the principal points that you seem to be making is that an appeal court of three judges is more likely to get it right than a single idiosyncratic judge.

Lord Carloway: That is the way in which the legislation is framed at the moment. The question of what a reasonable jury would or would not do is determined in retrospect by the appeal court. However, if there is an insufficiency of evidence—in the sense that there is just no evidence that the person committed the crime—then even if the requirement for corroboration is abolished, it will still be possible to make a submission, which the judge can sustain, that there is no evidence. That would continue to be the case.

Again, I looked at this matter in the context of the review and I looked at the way in which they did those things south of the border. I spoke to someone who was, in effect—I cannot remember his precise title—the appeal court administrative judge in the Court of Appeal in England. I also spoke to various people in other systems. I think that they are all generally of the view that if there is enough evidence on which a jury could convict, then that is really a matter that ought to be left to the jury. If it turns out that the decision is wrong, the appeal court can sort that out.

Roderick Campbell: You are confident that that does not leave a line of exposure for an article 6 claim in the European Court.

Lord Carloway: Yes, I am reasonably confident on that, but it is sometimes a difficult matter to be confident on.

Roderick Campbell: Indeed. Moving on to the general concept of statutory guidelines such as section 78, I detected in the submissions a general view that such matters are best left to the discretion of the judge rather than having statutory discretion in the bill. Do you adhere to that view?

Lord Carloway: Sorry, this is section 78 of—Roderick Campbell: The suggestion was made by the Scottish Human Rights Commission, among others, that we should have something on the face of the bill resembling section 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 in England.

Lord Carloway: I cannot remember precisely what section 78 states.

Roderick Campbell: It is about the direction to exclude unfair evidence.

Lord Carloway: Oh, right. I beg your pardon. If evidence is unfairly obtained, that discretion is already there in Scotland, so I am not sure that—

Roderick Campbell: The question is whether to have something statutory rather than leaving discretion to judges. I think that your colleagues’ view is that the discretion is best left to judges, rather than it being statutory.
Lord Carloway: I think that the judge’s discretion is sufficient at the moment, without any additional powers. That probably answers the question.

Roderick Campbell: I will let other members in, as I am conscious of the time.

The Convener: I am conscious of the time, too, but I hope that you can stay a little bit longer, Lord Carloway, as this is our only opportunity to go through this matter. I hope that we can go on for another 20 minutes to half an hour—I think that we will manage to exhaust all our questions by then. Thank you very much for staying, as I appreciate that it is a long session. John Finnie has the next question.

John Finnie: Thank you, convener, and Lord Gill. I would like to touch on some of the practical applications of your report.

The Convener: I think it is Lord Carloway we have with us and not Lord Gill, but if you want to cause judicial ructions—

John Finnie: I am sorry, Lord Carloway. I do beg your pardon for that, and for my voice. I am a bit heady today, I am afraid.

I am interested in practical applications of your report in areas such as arrests and custody. Your remit was very clear and included a review of developments since 1980 in relation to arrest and detention and the effective investigation and prosecution of crime. On arrest without warrant for offences that are not punishable by imprisonment, will you say why you thought that the course of action that you suggested is appropriate?

Lord Carloway: Yes. Again, it is basically a question of being able to process the particular person. For many relatively minor offences, it would be sufficient for the prosecuting authorities to serve a complaint on the person in due course. However, to do that, you have to find out, for example, who he is and where he lives. If you do not have a power of arrest whereby you can detain and, in effect, restrain the person for the purposes of finding out those things, then you will not be able to prosecute him at all. So, you need a very limited power of arrest in order to carry out the essentials if you have a disruptive individual whom you are trying to process.

John Finnie: So, if the individual is co-operative—

Lord Carloway: There ought to be no requirement to arrest someone for an offence that is not imprisonable, if you are dealing with someone who tells you properly what their name and address is. Of course, you might suspect that although they are apparently being co-operative, they are not giving you the right information. That is what my recommendation concerns.

John Finnie: Would you see a benefit, as others do, in having a statutory definition for the reason for arrest and subsequent detention?

Lord Carloway: I cannot remember exactly how it is phrased at the moment. Is there not a qualification in relation to non-imprisonable offences, which means that that would be done only in certain circumstances?

John Finnie: I am looking at section 1, which deals with the power of a constable.

Lord Carloway: Yes, I would hope that those three subsections cover the issue.

John Finnie: It is a long time since I had cause to enforce this, but would the part that refers to a belief that the person will “obstruct the course of justice” be similar to the common-law power of arrest for various reasons?

Lord Carloway: That provision deals with the kind of activity that I have mentioned. The notion of obstructing the course of justice would cover a situation in which someone said that their name was M Mouse and you had reason to suppose that it was not. You would have to arrest him and take him to a police station so that you could process him properly.

The issues are relatively well defined for a situation in which you encounter someone in the street who is committing a non-imprisonable offence and who is, in one way or another, not cooperating. The definitions in section 1 are clear. Seeking to avoid arrest basically means someone avoiding giving their name and address by running away. Similarly, if someone continued to commit a breach of the peace or whatever the offence was, they could be arrested for that, as they could be arrested for interfering with witnesses or evidence in some way.

John Finnie: Your view is that that is comprehensive enough.

Lord Carloway: I think that it is, yes.

John Finnie: I want to move on to deal with the information that is to be given on arrest and the information that is to be given at the police station. The Scottish Human Rights Commission was concerned about the possibility that sections 3 and 5 of the bill do not provide sufficient information to fully protect the right of silence, under article 6 of the ECHR.

Lord Carloway: As far as I am aware, the sections are convention-compliant at the moment. Under the sections, the constable informs the person of the reason for the arrest and tells them that they do not have to say anything, and then takes the person to the police station, where he is... placed under some form of restraint and is given the additional information in relation to his right to legal representation.

John Finnie: Is that the appropriate time to talk about legal representation, rather than at the point of arrest?

Lord Carloway: As long as you are not engaged in questioning the person at that point, it should not be a practical problem. However, as you rightly identified, it is at the point at which a person’s movement has been curtailed that he is entitled to be advised of his rights to have legal assistance.

John Finnie: Is it robust enough to prevent spontaneous admissions en route to the police station?

Lord Carloway: The person is told that he does not have to say anything. There is not much else that anyone can do. Advising him that he has a right to legal assistance earlier will not assist him, as you cannot give him legal assistance before he gets to the police station. At least, I think that that is the reasoning.

John Finnie: One hears of innovative situations in other jurisdictions in which police officers have, for instance, facilitated the person under arrest gaining legal advice over the phone, prior to being taken to a police station, by giving them a mobile phone. Would that be a positive?

Lord Carloway: I am not sure. If the person was behaving in an appropriate way I cannot see why one would necessarily stop them doing that. You would do it anyway before you indulge in any form of— as they put it in Europe—interrogation of the person.

John Finnie: Okey-doke. Can I ask about investigative—

The Convener: Was that an okey-doke?

John Finnie: Did I say okey-doke?

The Convener: I think you said okey-doke, but that is fine.

John Finnie: Surely it has been in the Official Report before now.

I want to move on to investigative liberation and to the concerns expressed about the range of questions and the period that an investigation can go on for, and about the unintended consequences of that investigation. For instance, there is the potential for someone to face suspension from their job on the basis that an investigation has gone ahead.

Lord Carloway: That is why the 28-day limit was put in—to stop it going on, as we heard it did in England, where people were effectively under investigation for a prolonged period. That was why I recommended that there be a time limit put on the investigation.

John Finnie: Should subsequent investigative periods have regard to a suspect’s work and family commitments and, indeed, access to a solicitor during them?

Lord Carloway: Could you maybe expand a little on that? I am not quite sure—

John Finnie: You acknowledge that there can be implications for an individual’s family and work circumstances if further investigations go on. Should the police have regard to the family and work circumstances and, indeed, to the availability of the individual’s solicitor, prior to engaging in that further investigation?

Lord Carloway: Do you mean prior to releasing the person on investigative bail?

John Finnie: No. I mean prior to the continued investigation.

Lord Carloway: I am not sure that I quite grasp the situation that you envisage. Do you mean that, rather than release the person, the police should simply process him through the courts, depending on his family circumstances?

John Finnie: No. I mean a person who has been dealt with and released, and at a future point is subject to further questioning by the police.

Lord Carloway: Oh, right.

John Finnie: I mean the regard that the police officer should have to the individual’s domestic and work-related circumstances, and the availability of a solicitor to facilitate their being legally represented when it takes place.

Lord Carloway: If he is re questioned, he will again be entitled to legal representation, as I understand it.

John Finnie: As things stand, would there be anything to preclude someone from being repeatedly rearrested after the 28 days?

Lord Carloway: The time limit of 12 hours for questioning applies throughout. In other words, if you are rearrested, the time that you have already spent in custody counts. That will in itself limit arrest, at least for the purposes of questioning. If you repeatedly arrest someone for the same offence, that would be oppressive conduct and I suspect that the courts would take a very dim view of that if it resulted in any unfairness. However, I am not sure that we had any evidence—or I had any evidence—that this was something in which the police indulged.

John Finnie: Can I move on, Lord Carloway, to information to be given before an interview? The Scottish Human Rights Commission is of the opinion that the suspect and his solicitor should be informed prior to the interview of the content of the “reasonable grounds for suspicion”.

12:45

Lord Carloway: The person should already have been told why he is being arrested. He should be aware of the general reason why arrest is being carried out because that ought to be given at the point of arrest and, I think, also at the police station, and that is recorded.

The person may not be given the information that has led to the reasonable suspicion, and I suspect that the reason why it is not thought appropriate to give that information is that it may disclose, for example, who is providing the evidence against him at a very early stage, which might have repercussions.

I do not think that it is a requirement, certainly in human rights terms, to tell the person of the nature of the evidence against him as distinct from the allegation that is being made against him. If he gets a solicitor, the solicitor can advise him not to answer any questions until such time as the source of evidence is apparent. If he gets legal advice, that ought to deal with that type of situation.

John Finnie: Another concern voiced is that an individual might be arrested but not taken to a police station. Of course, it is arrival at the police station that triggers some of these things.

Lord Carloway: Is it not in the bill that the person has to be taken to a police station as soon as practicable?

John Finnie: You take that to mean taken directly to a police station.

Lord Carloway: Within reason, yes. We did not have any evidence in relation to detention—

The Convener: I think that the words used in the bill are “reasonably practicable”, which is an expression that we understand. Obviously it would depend on location, rurality and so on.

Lord Carloway: The police would be able to tell you about this a lot better than I can, but there are certain operational reasons why you would not take someone to a particular police station. You might have to take them to a high-security facility or suchlike.

We did not have any evidence that when someone was detained and was supposed to be taken to a police station, the police were doing anything significantly different by way of transporting them around the country or other such things that we hear about in films.

The Convener: We will move on. Alison McInnes, are your questions on this tack?

Alison McInnes: They are still about police custody, but post charge.

Lord Carloway, your report went into some detail about the length of time for which suspects may be held in police custody prior to their first appearance in court. You expressed some concern about that. You concluded:

“a significant proportion of suspects are held for periods which are at least at the outer limits of what may be regarded as acceptable even under the Convention. More important than that, suspects are being held for periods that are longer than ought to be regarded as acceptable in Scottish human rights terms.”

That was a welcome conclusion.

I am really interested to know whether you think that the bill has gone far enough in addressing that problem. As far as I can see, the bill provides that wherever practicable the suspect must be brought before the court not later than the end of the next court sitting day. There is no suggestion that we should be moving to weekend courts or anything like that. Would you have liked the bill to go further?

Lord Carloway: I think not at the moment. My view was that this is something that has to be kept under review. Here is a new regime, which may not be radically different from that under the emergency legislation or which existed before it, whereby a person is supposed to appear in court on the next court day. That sounds good, but when you examine how it is operating in practice, you see that it is a problem. It is a practical problem that is primarily for the Crown authorities to resolve. They have the power to resolve it, along with the Scottish Court Service, by ensuring that there is a court sitting day in some kind of proximity to the point when the person is charged. What I was saying was, “Here is a new regime. Let’s see how it operates but somebody should be keeping it under review to make sure that people are not being kept in custody for longer than three days, or 36 hours.”

Alison McInnes: It might be worth while to read you the Sheriffs Association’s response, which says:

“We believe that the establishment of regular Saturday Courts ... would impose an unacceptable degree of extra strain and excessive extra costs on an already overburdened criminal justice system” and would be unnecessary in the light of increased liberation powers. Is that a fair way of responding?

Lord Carloway: It is a fair way of responding, but I do not necessarily agree with it.

The Convener: Alison McInnes might want to rephrase her question.
Alison McInnes: Yes.

Lord Carloway: The approach does not involve more work being done; it just means doing the work at a different time.

Alison McInnes: You suggest that we should not worry about the bill not being specific on the number of hours for which someone can be in custody, but I read out the reaction of the people who can fix that.

Lord Carloway: The committee should be worried in practical terms about the amount of time for which people are kept in custody. Exactly how to fix that is a much more difficult question. I was loath just to recommend the introduction of Saturday courts—weekends are the problem that we are talking about—if the problem could be solved in a practical way.

Part of the problem is that, when people are processed into a court’s cells on a Monday morning, little has been done on their cases. They languish in a cell and, at that point, nobody is in a position to decide whether they should be put through the court, released unconditionally or released conditionally. If we got to a system in which decisions were taken over the weekend—which would not require legislation, because it does not require a court to sit—people could be processed much more quickly on a Monday, whether or not it was a holiday. Custody courts would also not go on well into the afternoon, which I said in the report should not happen, especially given the conditions in which people are kept.

Margaret Mitchell: I will return to your review’s terms of reference. The section that is relevant to corroboration is paragraph (c), which says:

“To consider the criminal law of evidence, insofar as there are implications arising from (b) above”, which is

“To consider the implications of the recent decisions, in particular the legal advice prior to and during police questioning, and other developments in the operation of detention of suspects since it was introduced in Scotland in 1980 on the effective investigation and prosecution of crime”—

Lord Carloway: I am sorry; I am not with you.

Margaret Mitchell: I was just quoting paragraph (b), which is not really relevant but is mentioned in paragraph (c). The relevant words are:

“in particular the requirement for corroboration and the suspect’s right to silence”.

Nothing in your terms of reference stopped you looking at retaining and improving corroboration, did it?

Lord Carloway: I did look at retaining corroboration. That is what I was asked to do and I did it.

Margaret Mitchell: You looked at retaining or abolishing the rule; the review did not consider how to improve it.

Lord Carloway: I am sorry, but no one as far as I can recall suggested some form of intermediate step.

Margaret Mitchell: In that case, was the review not fundamentally flawed? In view of that, there should be a full review. Plus, the weight of opinion against abolition was that something of this magnitude should be fully reviewed and not passed in a bill that has many other provisions—it is too important.

Lord Carloway: I did not determine the method by which the situation was reviewed. I was asked to carry out a review and I did that.

Margaret Mitchell: There was nothing to stop you looking at improving corroboration.

Lord Carloway: I say with due respect that I do not think that the requirement for corroboration can be improved.

Margaret Mitchell: That is your view.

Lord Carloway: Yes.

The Convener: We have an answer.

I will briefly, because it has not been touched on, mention section 82, which deals with the SCCRC. This is a little hobby-horse of mine. You will recall that, following Cadder, we got in—under the wire—a double test for the SCCRC, which was that it had to consider not only whether there had been a possible miscarriage of justice, but whether it was in the interests of finality and certainty to make a referral to the High Court. In the same emergency legislation, we introduced the ability of the High Court to reject a referral. You have asked for that second part to be changed, which would get rid of the gatekeeping role of the High Court. I would have liked something else to have been done for the SCCRC, but that is just my view.

It is a complete mystery to me why you still support the idea that, even if the High Court considers that there has been a miscarriage of justice, it can determine that upholding an appeal is not in the interests of finality and certainty. I am a simple person. If there has been a miscarriage of justice, there has been a miscarriage of justice. If a person has been wrongly convicted and their appeal has been successful, the appeal should be granted. I do not understand the interests of finality and certainty provision. I think that it erodes the integrity of the High Court as the court of appeal.

Lord Carloway: There are basically two points to pick up on. I have suggested that the gatekeeping role be ended, but I have also suggested that, in addition to there having been a miscarriage of justice, it should be in the interests of justice that the appeal be allowed. The issue is to do with the definition of “miscarriage of justice”. In looking at this provision, we are not talking about a miscarriage of justice in a general sense; we are talking about a miscarriage of justice in the sense of something having gone wrong in the trial process.

I will give a straightforward example of the first area where that would be something that the court would look at. Let us say that someone comes before the court with an appeal of this nature—we should remember that that normally happens at a stage that is well remote from the trial process—but that, in the interim, new evidence against the person emerges or the person confesses. I am suggesting that, in a reference—as distinct from a straightforward appeal—the court should be able to take into account those wider considerations, which the Crown may or may not wish to put forward, as to whether, in the interests of justice, it is appropriate for that conviction to be quashed. Retrial is almost never going to be an option in an SCCRC reference, because of the timescales.

The Convener: You posited that highly unlikely example the last time you appeared before the committee. Your argument is very narrow because, as you quite rightly say, if that happened, the appeal could be granted and a new trial could be held on the new evidence; the two aspects could be separated.

The provision does not apply only to cases in which new evidence appears; it gives the High Court wide discretion. That is why I am concerned. Even if the SCCRC has already looked at finality and certainty and, notwithstanding that, has referred the case to the High Court, that test will have to be gone through again.

Lord Carloway: Yes.

The other example that I was going to give relates to the situation—which does arise—in which the SCCRC is not given, and does not have, complete information. In that situation, the court should be able effectively to review the matter. The situation that I envisage—we have had such cases in the past—is one in which a person who has lodged an appeal after his conviction and has taken a conscious decision to abandon that appeal, or has taken a conscious decision not to appeal within the time limits, comes along several years later and says, “I now want to appeal.”

We, as the court, would look at the merits of the case and consider his grounds for appeal, but in such a situation we would often say, “Well, I’m sorry, but you didn’t appeal within the time limits, and you haven’t given us a proper explanation as to why. We don’t think your grounds for appeal are bound to succeed”—or something of that nature—“and we are therefore refusing you leave to appeal late.”

13:00

It would be very odd to have a situation in which a court said, in the interests of finality and certainty—particularly in relation to victims and any other people involved—“We are not allowing you to appeal because you are too late.” If such a case comes back to us from the SCCRC several years later, we have to take a decision irrespective of the previous decision.

The Convener: As you and I know, however, the SCCRC does not say willy-nilly that there may have been a miscarriage of justice. I do not have the stats in front of me, but referrals are relatively successful. There was a change in the law in 2010, which I think was made because everyone thought that, after the Cadder case, people would be rushing to the SCCRC. Emergency legislation usually turns out to be bad.

My concern is that the SCCRC will have fully considered whether there has been a miscarriage of justice, and will even have applied the test of finality and certainty, which did not exist before. At least you are recommending that we get rid of the High Court’s ability to say, “We don’t care about that case and we’re not going to take it”, so that it will take the case in any event. However, it still has the test: it can still say that there has been a miscarriage of justice, but that it will not, in the interests of finality and certainty, grant an appeal.

You have given specific examples, but those are special cases, and that is not what the legislation says. Indeed, the executive of the SCCRC said in evidence to the committee that the legislation proposes

“not to remove the gatekeeping role of the High Court at all, but instead to dismantle the gates at the bottom of the driveway and reassemble them at the entrance to the front door.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 13 December 2011; c 651.]

The bill is, in effect, saying, “Right, we’re taking away the ability to say that we don’t want to accept a referral from the SCCRC and we’re taking the gates down, but we’re putting them back up at the top of the hill. We have heard the case and, yes, there has been a miscarriage of justice, but in the interests of finality and certainty, it’s just tough, but we’re not granting the appeal.”

I have heard your examples, which are clear, but very unusual. There are remedies available—a case can be retried, or whatever—but my concern is that the proposed change does not give confidence to people who have taken their case through the SCCRC system and gone through all the tests that it applies, who have had the case referred to the High Court and had their appeal heard, and have heard that there has been a miscarriage of justice, but then not got their appeal. Where is the security in the system in that respect? Do you have faith in the High Court?

Lord Carloway: I had such considerations in mind when I made the recommendation. You have expressed very articulately why there should not be a gatekeeping role in that sense, as the court must hear the merits of the appeal. However, the test for a referral by the SCCRC concerns not only whether a miscarriage of justice has occurred in the narrow appellate sense, but the question of the interests of justice.

The Convener: Yes, and it has done that.

Lord Carloway: What I am saying is that the question whether it is in the interests of justice for an appeal to be allowed outwith the normal course of criminal appeals should be capable of being reviewed by the courts, which are, after all, supposed to be the experts in that field.

The Convener: If the test was not there before,
why is it there now?

Lord Carloway: I am trying to explain that. The interests of justice test has always been there in relation to the SCCRC’s recommendation: the SCCRC must take into account not only whether a miscarriage of justice has occurred but whether it is, nevertheless, in the interests of justice to make a recommendation.

The Convener: Why was the finality and certainty test for the High Court not there before?
That is what I am getting at. That is new.

Lord Carloway: I cannot answer that because I was not involved with the emergency legislation. I think that you have explained that already by saying that a Cadder floodgates-type situation was expected—

The Convener: Yes—and it did not happen.

Lord Carloway: That did not happen, but, for reasons that I have gone into in the review, there have been situations in which we, in the courts, have had referrals for cases in which a person had decided not to pursue his appeal in the first place.

There is no doubt that each case must be dealt with on its own facts and circumstances, but it is difficult to argue that it is in the interests of justice to allow someone who has deliberately decided not to carry on with an appeal to go to the SCCRC and come back to the court years later.

The Convener: Well, in the interests of finality and certainty in this meeting, we will just have to disagree on that. I have no doubt that some of us will disagree on many matters.

I thank you very much, Lord Carloway—I appreciate that it has been a long meeting for you,
The Convener: Item 2 is our second evidence-taking session on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill at stage 1. We have two panels of witnesses today and we will consider part 1 of the bill, on arrest and custody, with both panels. In addition, we will explore the establishment of a police negotiating board for Scotland with the first panel. That is in part 6 of the bill.

I welcome our first panel—some more people who have season tickets for the committee. I will not call them the usual suspects, although that might be appropriate in the circumstances. With us are Assistant Chief Constable Malcolm Graham; John Gillies, who is director of human resources at Police Scotland; Chief Superintendent David O’Connor, who is president of the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents; Calum Steele, who is general secretary of the Scottish Police Federation; and Stevie Diamond from the police staff Scotland branch of Unison.

Thank you all for your written submissions. We move straight to questions.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): Before we start, I draw members’ attention to my entry in the register of interests. I am a council member of Justice Scotland.

The Convener: Thank you. Do you want to ask a question?
Alison McInnes: No. [Laughter.]

The Convener: Not yet, anyway.
Alison McInnes: That’s right.

The Convener: You should have qualified that. I call John Finnie, to be followed by Margaret Mitchell, Roderick Campbell and Elaine Murray. We are off to a flying start. Look how alert they are—they must have had their porridge.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): I will start with a question about an operational matter. The Law Society of Scotland and the Scottish Human Rights Commission have questioned whether the need for the change from “detention” to “arrest on suspicion” has been demonstrated. Will the panel express their views on that, please?

Calum Steele (Scottish Police Federation): I am not entirely convinced that that need has been demonstrated. It seems to me that, beyond the statement that it will be more easily understood by the general public, there is no real reason why we should move from the current provisions of “detention” to “arrest on suspicion”. It seems to be unnecessary to create a new set of statutory provisions that are almost identical to an old set of statutory provisions, with just a change in terminology.

Assistant Chief Constable Malcolm Graham (Police Scotland): We believe that the case has been well made and that the changes are required. As members will be aware, the previous arrangements were designed in the late 1970s, when the justice system was entirely different and society was a different place.

The case that Lord Carloway laid out in his report for why the changes need to take place—and why the recodification should be made as one complete set of circumstances as opposed to changes being made piecemeal—is overwhelming. The move to consistent terminology around arrest as opposed to arrest and detention is welcome. The current terminology persistently causes confusion because the term “detention” is used for somebody who is remaining in custody prior to court, rather than for a means of temporary arrest.

Chief Superintendent David O’Connor (Association of Scottish Police Superintendents): Bringing the concepts of detention and arrest together may simplify the process in some respects. I tend to agree with what Malcolm Graham and Calum Steele said.

I add that although the change appears, on the surface, to be relatively simple, there will be significant training issues for Police Scotland in ensuring that everyone fully understands what the change from “detention” to “arrest on suspicion” means.

The Convener: I saw heads nodding when training issues were mentioned. Does anybody want to come in on that? John Gillies was nodding and so was Calum Steele.

John Gillies (Police Scotland): The need for training and re-education of the service in relation to the provisions would be considerable. We would have to take a view on that being done alongside the current change within Police Scotland and reform towards the new organisation. It is difficult to say now what impact such an abstraction would have across the board. We would have to give due consideration to how the training would be rolled out.

It is difficult to put a cost on such training, but it is fair to say that it would be quite a distraction to the service. If the provision is to be implemented, we will need to take a view on when it should be implemented, based on the on-going changes to the service.

Calum Steele: There is also the reality that you cannot not know what you know, and police officers, whether they joined in the 1970s or whenever, know detention and know the process of detention from beginning to end. Unlearning that and learning something else, as with any type of human behaviour, will result in inadvertent misapplication of the wrong pieces of legislation and recording of the wrong pieces of information in notebooks and so on. I have yet to hear a cogent argument for why it makes something better to change terminology largely without changing content, and I fear that the consequence of the wrong information being recorded because officers are dealing with a new set of processes, even if the general principles of fairness are applied, could lead to cases being thrown out of court.

John Finnie: I would like to follow up with Mr Graham. We have evidence from the Scottish Human Rights Commission, which says of evidence supporting the change:

> “Unless such evidence is produced, the greater interference with individual’s private lives involved in longer detention periods may not be justified.”

That follows from the statement:

> “The Commission is unaware of any evidence which suggested that prior to October 2010 the police were systematically hampered in their efforts to investigate crime by the limits of the 6 hour detention period.”

Is that incorrect?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I would say that that is very incorrect. We have produced evidence in the past and in our written submission on why the six-hour period was woefully inadequate. That had become clear to operational officers, even in basic cases at times.

Members will also be aware that we previously made a written submission about proportionate and judicious use of the extensions that have come in since 2010. We were very clear at the time that we needed a system that could be expanded and was flexible. In most cases detentions could be dealt with in six hours, and the vast majority are still dealt with in under 12 hours. In the small proportion of cases for which we have sought extensions from 12 to 24 hours, that extension has absolutely been required. We have provided evidence of such cases in the appendices to our written submissions, and I argue strongly that without those extensions the ends of justice might well not have been served, because we would not have been able to gather evidence in those serious crime cases.

The Convener: I would like you to clarify that, because the Police Scotland submission states that > “0.4% of all persons detained require to be extended beyond 12 hours”.

but we do not have a percentage for the extension beyond six hours. Can you give us that?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I apologise if the data are not in there. We have data and I will ensure that they are submitted. Of course, there is no extension from six to 12 hours in the current system, but we have data showing the times for which people have been kept, and that the vast majority of cases are still dealt with in under six hours. Of course, the vast majority of cases are less serious cases, so I am keen to get across the point about scalability. The number of cases for which we would need to go for an extension beyond 12 hours is very small, but they are the most critical cases—rapes, murders and other complex cases in which the criticality of not having that additional time would hamper our ability to keep people safe and could hamper the ends of justice being met.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: In addition to what has been said, we can track the matter back to 1979, when the Thomson committee first looked at powers of detention and timescales for detention. The options at that time were six hours, 12 hours or 24 hours, and the service certainly had a view back in 1979—as many people round the table will remember—that the 12-hour detention period would be the most appropriate.

The world has moved on considerably, and the six-hour detention period is not suitable in some instances, particularly for complex and difficult investigations.

The Convener: Are you disputing that, Calum?

Calum Steele: I am disputing the idea that I have that recollection of 1979. I was six years old.

The Convener: Now you are just showing off. I am not bothering about that.

It is important for us to know the figures, because if we are asking about the bill’s provision for detention for up to 12 hours, we need to know whether the limit needs to be fixed. One of the arguments is about whether it needs to be changed from six hours, so evidence on that would be very helpful.

John Finnie: I am slightly changing the subject, but I would like to ask about custody.

The Convener: Before we move on, does anybody have a supplementary question on the issue that we have been discussing?

Margaret Mitchell (Central Scotland) (Con): My question is on arrest.

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): My question is also on arrest.

The Convener: Is it on the terminology? I would like a question on that.

John Finnie: My question is connected with the power of arrest and detention in custody.

The Convener: Given your previous on this, I will let you proceed.

John Finnie: In the context of the discussion around moving away from the notion that arrest is a form of punishment that is administered by the police, Lord Carloway refers to the purpose of arrest. There has been an altered police response to detaining people in custody for domestic abuse and drink-driving. How does present practice in that regard square with Lord Carloway’s proposals? Perhaps Mr O’Connor might respond to that.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: While the bill is being discussed, we would be looking for guidelines from the Lord Advocate on interpreting the bill’s provisions and how they should be applied by the police in a variety of circumstances. We will need a set of guidelines that the police service can draw on.

John Finnie: Do any other members of the panel have a comment on that?

Calum Steele: I do not disagree with what Chief Superintendent O’Connor said.

John Finnie: What do you see the purpose of the Lord Advocate’s guidelines being? There are Lord Advocate’s guidelines at the moment on detaining people in custody.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: There are. A number of different parts are laid out in the Lord Advocate’s guidance. I suppose that a key part is that the officers in charge of the station might decide to detain a person in custody and that that would not subject an officer to any claim whatever. I think that we should discuss that as part of the discussion on the bill.

The Convener: I will let John Finnie back in afterwards, but I want to let other members in at this point.

Margaret Mitchell: Good morning, panel. I wonder whether you can comment on the written submission from the ASPS. Perhaps Mr O’Connor could do so first. The submission states that the powers of arrest in the bill “lack an explicit power to arrest to prevent a crime”, which is set out in the “general duties of a constable defined in the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012”.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: We were looking for clarification in relation to that because there will be circumstances in which the police come across somebody who is a threat to themselves and to the public. An arrest might be necessary in order to take that person to a police station to get them access to the services that they need. We posed the question in our submission for clarification that that power will still exist.

Margaret Mitchell: That is an important point. It would be a huge concern if the bill was to mean that the police could not deter and prevent crime. Would the other panel members like to comment? Perhaps the representative of Police Scotland could do so.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I agree with David O'Connor. We had concerns about that issue at an early stage of drafting. We made representations on it and sought reassurance that the common-law powers that David O'Connor described would be retained. That aspect is not included in the bill in a statutory sense; all that we have at the moment is what is described as a "letter of comfort" from those who are drafting the bill. To be frank, it does not give us huge comfort, at the moment.

There are other issues around arrest. For example, at the moment there is a power to arrest when a crime has not been committed but there is a breach of a civil order that has a power of arrest attached to it. We must ensure that that power is included for things such as matrimonial homes interdicts, which we would routinely deal with. We also have a concern around the absolute requirement to take a person to a police station when they have been arrested, which we argue does not retain sufficient flexibility in the system for circumstances in which we might wish, in effect, to de-arrest somebody. Lord Carloway's recommendation was less rigorous than that; he recommended that people should be taken to a police station when necessary.

Margaret Mitchell: I want to go on to that as soon as is practicably possible. However, would your preference be that the bill include an explicit power to arrest in order to prevent a crime?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I think that that would be very helpful.

10:15

Margaret Mitchell: Could I have the view of the other panellists?

The Convener: I am glad you are taking over from me, Margaret. I want an easy day—I locked myself out of the house. I am thrilled to be here. [Laughter.]

Margaret Mitchell: You asked me to ask the questions, convener. What can I do?

The Convener: Go for it, Margaret.

Witnesses should indicate when they want to come in, but do not feel obliged if you have nothing to add. I am sure that Calum Steele has something to add.

Calum Steele: The only thing that I have to add is that I have nothing to add.

Margaret Mitchell: Do you agree that the bill should include such a power?

Calum Steele: I agree.

Margaret Mitchell: Does Unison have a view?

Stevie Diamond (Unison): We do not have a view on that, I am afraid.

Margaret Mitchell: I like to give everyone a shot, convener.

The Convener: I know, but I am feeling peeved. Do not make me peeved. I am feeling very vulnerable today.

Margaret Mitchell: Do you want me to leave "as soon as practically possible"?

The Convener: Certainly not. I do not want to exercise an arrest on a person who is not officially accused.

One thing has not yet been addressed, although I had hoped that John Finnie would have covered it. On detention and arrest, to say "arrested and under suspicion" to the public makes them think that the person has done it. Are you telling me that the understanding of the public will be clearer? To me, that is not the case because the wording is unclear. If a person is detained and it is reported in the newspaper that that man or woman "has been detained" for something, that is one thing, but if it is reported that they have been arrested, people will not notice the words "not officially accused"? Could you comment on the language—which I had thought John Finnie was going on to discuss?

Calum Steele: That gets to the very nub of the matter. I have yet to see anywhere evidence that the wording is more easily understood. I look at some of the recent examples south of the border. I know that there is civil litigation on-going on this, so I will be mindful about how I phrase this. In the Jo Yeates murder inquiry, the landlord of the building in which she was murdered, who happened to be quite an eccentric-looking gentleman, Christopher Jefferies, was arrested, and it was reported that he had been arrested. I cannot speak for what the general public across the whole United Kingdom thought about it, but my sense from the subsequent furore was that they thought that the man was guilty, because of the terminology that was applied—that he had "been arrested". I do not sense that, when individuals are detained in Scotland and it is then reported that they were subsequently arrested, there is a difficulty in understanding the difference between the two. That is just an observation, however.
Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I have a contrary view. I do not think that the cases from England and Wales bear comparison, because we are in a different system; there, there is a power to detain for up to 72 hours. In the case that was mentioned, that extension was granted—albeit using a judicial submission in relation to that extension. We have a far more limited form of arrest. An arrest on suspicion, as is proposed, would still be for a maximum of 24 hours.

With due respect, convener, in relation to—

The Convener: With respect, on the perception, what you have said is true technically—I think that the case that you mention is not sub judice any more—but the concern that the committee shares is about innocent people being found guilty by the tabloid press, or even by the broadsheets.

Roderick Campbell: “Arrest” is not defined in the bill. In his report, Lord Carloway recommended that “arrest should be defined as meaning the restraining of the person and, when necessary, taking him/her to a police station”.

I am interested in the panel’s thoughts on whether there should be a definition of arrest, and on what Lord Carloway recommended.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: My understanding of arrest is that the person is no longer free to go about their lawful business, or has not been advised that they are free to do so. That is the sort of definition that we have worked with, and it is a definition that is common throughout the service. That arrest puts controls on the arrested person and allows the police to do a number of things to control the person. I do not have Lord Carloway’s definition in front of me; I understand the first part of it, but am not sure about the second. That takes us back to what Malcolm Graham said and the ability to de-arrest in certain circumstances. There will be occasions when it is necessary to arrest somebody at the locus, or some other area in a public place in order to confirm their identity and so on. Once that has been done, the grounds for arrest potentially no longer exist.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: The very fact that we are discussing terminology and the definition of arrest takes us back to my previous point. The situation that David O’Connor described and Lord Carloway’s definition are similar to the current definition of detention, which is that the person is not at liberty to go about their business. I strongly contend that the public notion of that is not influenced by communication or public information from the police, because we do not release information about individuals until they are arrested.

There is less likely to be a distinction in people’s thinking between what happens in Scotland and what happens in England and Wales, given that people are probably influenced by United Kingdom media sources, as Calum Steele said. People are less likely to differentiate between the systems in such a way.

It would be helpful if “arrest” were defined in the bill in the way that Lord Carloway set out. As I said, we have great concerns about the absolute requirement in the bill to take a person to a police station when they have been arrested, and we agree with Lord Carloway that the inclusion of “when necessary” will help to ensure that a person’s liberty is not taken from them unnecessarily and that they are not detained for any longer than is necessary.

The process of taking someone to a police station and going through their rights must, quite properly, be done thoroughly, so it takes some time. In the appendices to our submission, we set out scenarios in which we think it would be in the interests of justice and of the suspect if we could de-arrest a suspect before they were taken to a police station.

The Convener: I have a funny feeling that “de-arrest” does not have a sexy ring to it. I do not see the banner headline, “That man who was arrested and not accused has now been de-arrested.”

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: New legislation inevitably brings up new terms. If I have just made up a word, I apologise.

The Convener: It is in the public domain now.

Calum Steele: I agree almost entirely with David O’Connor. The definition of arrest that the police service uses is well understood and well applied, and I do not think that it causes confusion—unlike the approach that we are about to introduce.

The Convener: We have heard and noted your view. A lot of committee members want to come in on this point. I will bring in Sandra White and take her out of my list.

Sandra White (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP): We are discussing criminal justice and I am being taken out—that sounds good, at this time of the morning.

Public perception, which the witnesses talked about, is important and should maybe be discussed more. The perception is that if someone is arrested, as opposed to being detained, they are suspected of being guilty of a crime. There is no getting away from that, whether we are talking about the tabloids here, down south or wherever.

I want to look a wee bit beyond that. If someone is detained at their place of employment, their employer might understand that, but if they are arrested and not charged with a crime, and they have to say to their employer, "Under this new legislation I have been arrested," how will that work for them?

I have a lot of concern about the definition of the terms “detention” and “arrest”. I understand that six hours might not be long enough for someone to get a lawyer and so on. However, we need a definition in the bill, so that people completely understand what is meant. The police understand what is meant, but the public take a different view of what “arrested” means. How will that work for someone who is in employment?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I take the point. Perhaps what we need in whatever is passed into legislation is a fairly sophisticated piece of communication that will inform people about the changes that have been made. I have worked extensively with some of the legislation in England and Wales and I am not aware that the perception is vastly different there, or that people there have a wider perception that being arrested on suspicion makes them guilty of a crime. People largely understand that one of the key tenets of the justice system across the UK, and particularly in Scotland, is that you are innocent until proven guilty and that, whether you are detained or arrested, your guilt or innocence is decided at the point when you go to court, not because the police have either detained or arrested you.

I have not seen or heard any evidence of a difference in perception in England and Wales, where they do not have the concept of detention. Indeed, I now find the terminology confusing, as Lord Carloway throughout his report uses the term “detention” to mean when somebody is to be kept in police custody after arrest, and that is fundamentally confusing now.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: The key part concerns detention as arrest. We currently have detention on suspicion and we are moving to arrest on suspicion. The key words are “on suspicion”. That is the part that we need to focus on.

The Convener: I am afraid that I think that the key word for the public will be “arrest”. That is the issue. As politicians, we know that perception is a huge part of anything and, although I can see the technical arguments, I remain unconvinced at the moment that changing that terminology is helpful. The issues raised by Sandra White about the perception—whether or not employers do anything about it—among other employees if someone is arrested on suspicion are pertinent. It is very hard to shake that mud off you if it has been thrown in such cases. You said that you did not think that people in England had taken that view, but your argument is undermined by the Yeates case, where they did. That man was convicted, hung, drawn and quartered because he looked odd and the press ran the story, and he was arrested. My take on it is that that very case undermines your argument, but I shall ask other committee members for their views.

John Finnie: I would like to read an extract from Lord Carloway’s report, which says:

“The Review considers that the opportunity should be taken to simplify, modernise and clarify the circumstances in which, where an individual is under suspicion of having committed a crime, the lawful deprivation of his/her liberty can take place.”

Perception is important and the committee has an obligation to provide good law for the Police Service to follow.

I would like to press Mr Graham on the difference between arrest and detention. I share my colleagues’ concern that the public will take the view that arrest is something more definitive. As you have said, the trigger point for publicity is when someone has been arrested, and I wonder whether one of the unintended consequences of that may be people’s unwillingness thereafter to come forward with information: they will think that the police have all the information that they need to arrest a person, and a person is in custody, so they will not bother to go along with their snippet of information. Of course, the police rely on public engagement at that level.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: To clarify, do you mean the point at which somebody would currently be detained prior to them being arrested?

John Finnie: You are saying that someone being arrested would be the trigger for information to be released. If Joe Bloggs is now in custody, a member of the public might say, “Well, they’ve obviously got the wherewithal to have that person there, so I don’t need to come forward with this bit of information that may or may not be helpful,” even though their information could be crucial.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: When I used that as an example, I meant that, when somebody is arrested under the current scheme, that is the likely trigger for us to release information to the public, but that information would not include the details of an individual until they appeared at court. It appears sensible for that to remain under the proposed legislation. There would not be any release of information until somebody was arrested and could be charged under the current system, so I do not see that that would change because we had moved to a position of arrest under suspicion. I do not think that that would come into the public domain in the way that you have described, and it would not change the public perception.
I take the point that the term “arrest” has a different feel for the public from “detention”. Therefore, we should focus on the idea of arrest under suspicion. However, it is not my understanding that there is currently a huge amount of information around when people are detained in that short period prior to being released or, in many cases, arrested. I do not have the figures to hand, but perhaps it would be helpful if we produced some information—assuming that it is available—about the number of people who are detained and subsequently released where grounds no longer exist, as opposed to the number of people who are arrested and charged. That might give you a sense of the situation.

The Convener: Data is always helpful.

Calum Steele: I do not doubt that, in general, the position narrated by Mr Graham is correct. When press releases are put out, they will come on the back of the police arresting a person and reporting to the procurator fiscal. That is not true in all cases, however. I hesitate to give any just now, but I can say with some degree of certainty that there are examples, usually in the higher-profile cases and where there is awareness and a significant media interest, where the police will notify the press that individuals have been detained and are helping the police with their inquiries. As a general provision, the notion that that is done only when the police make an arrest and charging takes place is not 100 per cent accurate. There are other examples, usually in the higher-profile cases, where, in a bid to provide some information to those who are interested, a notification of detention is given.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: I pose a question, which the Justice Committee may wish to consider. We have been talking about arrest and detention and the potential impact on the arrested persons, but perhaps the question should be asked how victims or complainers would feel about the matter. Groups and organisations representing victims may well have a particular view on the issue, and we cannot lose sight of that. What is their perception of it?

The Convener: The question should be what is just. The perception is that such a notification may be unjust to someone who has been taken in under detention.

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): I wish to ask about investigative liberation. There is a suggestion that a person should be released on conditions, which may be applied for a period of up to 28 days. The Faculty of Advocates and the Law Society of Scotland believe that the courts should be able to review the period. Police Scotland and the SPF suggest that 28 days is too short a maximum period for that. Scottish Women’s Aid believes that there should be a requirement that the “complainer be notified of the suspect’s release” and, presumably, of the conditions of their release.

What are your views on who should be reviewing the period, on whether 28 days is sufficient, on whether the complainer should be notified of the release and on the conditions under which a suspect is released?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Investigative liberation is one of the areas that Lord Carloway considered following a number of visits to England and Wales to consider the PACE act—the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984—which has now been in place for some 30 years and which has worked well, as we understand it, albeit in a slightly different way from what is now proposed. We welcome the step to introduce investigative liberation although, as has already been said, 28 days would potentially be restrictive as an absolute time limit. On occasion, it may not be sufficient and proportionate in circumstances where we could justify an extension.

We do not make any proposal on what that extension process should be, nor on whether there would be a recourse to the court, a judicial process and reviews within the 28-day period. We have suggested that we would be happy to consider that as an internal process. As with all other custody processes and so on, we normally have guidelines for review that are not necessarily laid out in statute, and we have not made any distinct proposals that they should be in statute.

Calum Steele: My understanding is that the time period relates to the time in which the conditions are applied to the investigation. It does not necessarily mean that the investigation ceases in its own right after 28 days. Indeed, it would be entirely right and proper for investigations to continue, irrespective of whether conditions on interim liberation apply or otherwise.

I wish to move on to some of the additional issues associated with interim liberation, as well as addressing the question whether victims and witnesses should be made aware. The SPF gave a fairly comprehensive response on the matter in relation to the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill and, even without that in front of me, I am content to note that our view was that as much information as possible should be given to victims and witnesses at key stages of the investigation and inquiry. I have little hesitation supporting the view that they should be made aware when certain conditions apply or cease to apply.
When it comes to the notion of the 28 days and interim liberation, or even interim liberation in its own right, the proposal is probably sensible. However, we have to consider the mechanics of how such things happen. We must consider the availability of solicitors, of police officers and of the suspects. I am mindful about how day-to-day policing takes place, and the fact is that traffic can prevent someone from being at a place at the particular time when they were meant to be there. I fear that there is significant potential for police officers, solicitors and those suspected of offences to miss each other. An interim liberation might be set for a particular place and time, such as midday. The police officer might get there at midday, the solicitor might have got there at 10 to midday, but the suspect might not turn up until a quarter past, by which time the police officer has concluded that they are not going to show up, and they go off to deal with something else. Then, the suspect turns up, but we find ourselves talking about whether or not we are going to arrest the person for breaching their bail conditions.

There is potential to complicate the criminal justice landscape with sets of circumstances that could, in their own right, be explained away by timing. Because of the dynamic nature of police work, the suspect could well be there at the appointed time, date and place but, as a consequence of being held up dealing with an incident, which they might have attended in good faith with the reasonable expectation of being clear of it in a proper timeframe, the police officer might be unable to get back to the police station. Furthermore, someone has to be standing at the appointed place with a stopwatch—metaphorically—switching it on and off to ensure that the overall time has not been exceeded.

That means having an awful lot of administration, or using a lot of information technology. Whichever it is, it means a lot of expense. At a time when police budgets, and indeed budgets across the whole public sector, are under massive pressures, I am not necessarily convinced that proper consideration has been made of the expense that will be associated with the administration of the process, however right and proper it is—and I do think that it is right and proper to have the ability to continue an investigation after the formal period of arrest or detention, or whatever it will be called, comes to an end.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: I am a little bit confused as to whether we are talking about investigative liberation or interim liberation. Investigative liberation is where somebody is suspected of a crime, the 28-day period applies and various conditions can be applied; interim liberation, as I understand it, is where somebody has been charged and conditions can be imposed on the accused until they appear in court. Interim liberation is perhaps worthy of further discussion.

The Convener: Now—at this moment? Yes, please.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: If that is okay.

The Convener: Yes, otherwise it will be left hanging in the air.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Currently, police officers have the power to grant an unconditional undertaking or undertaking with standard conditions when releasing accused persons from custody. Those can include not committing a crime, not interfering with witnesses, not behaving in a manner that causes or is likely to cause alarm, and complying with any other special conditions.

Under the bill, the thresholds that are associated with the application of the conditions to a written undertaking have been revised. Police officers continue to be allowed to grant unconditional undertakings to appear in court. Beyond that, an inspector or an officer of the rank of inspector can apply an additional condition where it is necessary and proportionate only for the purpose of ensuring that the accused does not obstruct the course of justice in relation to the offence for which he is being investigated. That moves on from the police powers that we currently have to prevent further crimes being committed. We can apply the standard and additional conditions, but the bill proposes having an inspector applying a condition only in relation to the charge that is under investigation.

The Convener: I understand—you are talking about investigative liberation as opposed to interim liberation.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: I am talking about interim liberation.

The Convener: Okay, but investigative liberation can spread its tentacles further.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Yes, it can. It is very confusing.

The Convener: Yes, I have just been confused.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: With your permission, I will try my best—as the whole bill is trying to do—to simplify things. I am grateful to David O’Connor for moving us on.

The Convener: I will give you points out of 10.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I think that release on undertaking is the term that is used for interim liberation—that is certainly the term that we would use.
With your leave, convener, I will come back to the point that was made about investigative liberation. We welcome the proposal and support the intent behind it, which is to minimise the time that people should be kept in custody, whether they are detained, arrested on suspicion or arrested subsequently. However, I agree with Calum Steele about its complexity and the systems that will have to be put in place. We have outlined the complexity and the detail of some of the costs of the systems. Like many provisions in the bill, it would require an information and communication technology system upgrade. There is complexity in managing that—complexity for people and a complexity of systems that will undoubtedly come with a cost—but we welcome the intent.

The Convener: What happens if, when investigative liberation has been granted in relation to a specific offence, you turn something else up that leads you to think that a different crime is also being committed?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: That is not an unlikely scenario. Currently, when we are dealing with people for one crime, we may encounter another.

The Convener: What happens in those circumstances?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: If the circumstances were connected with the crime that we were investigating, we would have to take it as a whole. In other words—

The Convener: Let us say that it was not; let us say that it was completely different.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: We would deal with it separately and it may be that we would deal with it at that time within the constraints. We would not be able to add another 28 days on, as it were, and say, "We will take 56 days, because we have found another crime." That would clearly not be in the interests of justice or fairness, if that is the point that you were making.

Currently, if we have six hours and we uncover another crime, either we would deal with it later—we would come back and detain somebody at a separate time—or we would need to deal with it within the constraints of the other matter that we were already dealing with. In the same way, if we find a gun when we are out searching a house under a warrant that has been issued on suspicion of drugs, we might go and get a warrant to search further for firearms, because we now have that suspicion, so we would carry on and do that.

The Convener: But you cannot have a fishing warrant.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Absolutely. I imagine that it would be the same in these circumstances. I do not think that there is any detail of how such situations would be dealt with as a concurrent process under investigative liberation.

The Convener: My deputy convener does not understand this either, so she might make me not feel so foolish.

Elaine Murray: Under investigative liberation, what happens when we come to the end of the 28 days? Is it the case that the conditions are lifted but you can continue investigating? Or do you have to drop the case?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: My understanding is that the conditions would fall but the investigation could continue. The period of 28 days has no doubt been chosen based on a judgment about proportionality. However, our concern is that, although that period is absolutely fine for a large number of cases, it would not be fine for a number of longer-running more complex cases. We have laid out the details of some of those cases in an appendix to our written submission. We would therefore contend that to put in place a system whereby we can extend the 28 days would mean that the conditions could be extended. Otherwise, it becomes a cliff edge that you fall off. The investigation continues but the—

Elaine Murray: The suspect would still be at liberty and the conditions—for example, there might be a curfew or they might be told not to go anywhere near the complainer or whatever—would fall after 28 days.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Arguably, the conditions would fall in a rather arbitrary way.

The Convener: John Finnie wants in. You have a look on your face that suggests that you disagree.

John Finnie: I am never sure when enough is enough. Will six months be enough, Mr Graham? Will a year be enough? For how long do you see that cliff being on the horizon?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: We have not sought to put in a period for which the 28 days could be extended. Clearly, there would have to be a limit, but it would be reasonable for there to be a period beyond 28 days for the exceptional circumstances that we have highlighted in the appendix. Perhaps it would be another 28 days.

10:45

John Finnie: Would a judge, rather than a chief police officer, grant the extension?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: It could be done either way. Different measures are in place for various sections in the bill and in various other pieces of legislation. Some decisions have to go back to a court; sometimes a specific rank in the police is specified; sometimes it is a matter of guidance from the Lord Advocate; and sometimes it is for the police to make a decision about the matter. We have not made a specific recommendation, but we could work with either approach.

The Convener: I will go back to investigative liberation. Somebody has been arrested but—I have forgotten the term already—has not been officially charged although they are under suspicion and you have sent them out with conditions for 28 days. That relates to what you think they did, but what happens if, in the middle of that, you find something completely different that they might have done? The 28 days and the conditions apply to the first thing; what happens to the second? Do you have to bring the person back in, arrest them on suspicion of having done it and set another 28 days running because of the separate matter, which has nothing to do with the first job?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: There might be circumstances in which it would be reasonable to do that.

The Convener: That is what I was trying to work out. It would not be connected at all. We could have two or three cases all with this technical stuff running.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: That would be the same under the current system when somebody is detained, albeit that the timescales are far shorter. Clearly, the test of the fairness to the accused person when we get to court would have to be met. Therefore, if the circumstances were part of the same course of conduct, the police would not seek to commence a separate process.

The Convener: I appreciate that. I am being clear that I am asking about a completely separate matter—something never occurred to you and, “Oh, whoops, this has turned up.” I just want to understand how it would operate.

Margaret Mitchell: The Faculty of Advocates and the Law Society of Scotland believe that the period of investigative liberation should be reviewed by the courts. Would you like that to be explicit in the bill?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: We would be satisfied if the period could be reviewed, depending on the timescale and the extension, by a senior police officer, but we could work with either system.

Margaret Mitchell: Does anyone else have a view on that?

Calum Steele: It never surprises me when the legal profession wants to have more work.

Margaret Mitchell: How cynical.

The Convener: Dearie me. I hope that you are never up on anything yourself, Mr Steele.

Margaret Mitchell: Elaine Murray mentioned Scottish Women’s Aid. It specifically wants there to be a requirement for the complainant to be notified of the suspect’s release on investigative liberation and of whether any conditions have been attached to the liberation. Do you have views on that request?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I would be happy if that was the case.

The Convener: It is a bit like bail conditions.

Margaret Mitchell: It would not be overly onerous but quite reasonable to do.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Yes, definitely.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: To go back to a point that Calum Steele made, the impact of investigative liberation on police resources should not be understated. In addition, we will clearly need some form of technology for custody management to support the measure and track all the different investigative liberations throughout Scotland. Police Scotland needs to work towards that as we go forward.

Margaret Mitchell: Would you expect that to be built into the information technology system that Police Scotland is currently considering?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Absolutely.

John Pentland (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab): I have a supplementary question to the one that Margaret Mitchell asked about police resources. Calum Steele made a general comment that, sometimes, the cost and the resource will not be worth the benefits that we will draw from the bill. Does he believe that what David O’Connor asked for would be a waste of money?

Calum Steele: That is a loose paraphrasing of what I said. I am saying that the police service has little money at this moment, like every other public service. We might not necessarily suddenly materialise or magic up the money that will be required to develop the necessary IT systems, to bring about the changes and training that will be required and to put in place the staffing—the police officers or police staff—to manage the clocks or the times and to ensure that the timescales that apply to an investigation are not breached overall.

Taking a piecemeal approach would be a waste of time. Whenever anything is done piecemeal, it never works. By the time that the rest of the service catches up with what is a very low common denominator many years on from the start, much of what is being used is invariably antiquated and further out of date than it was to begin with.

I make it perfectly clear that the practice of investigative liberation is a good thing in its own right. However, significant resources are required to make it happen smoothly—not just in a way that is effective for the police service but in a way that causes minimum disruption for the legal profession and for suspects. There is no indication of where those resources will come from.

John Pentland: You have given the example of investigative liberation. Do you have other examples of where danger might arise if the resource does not follow the bill? What will be the practical challenges after the bill is implemented?

Calum Steele: There are simple things. I go back to where we started, with arrest and detention. I am sure that Stevie Diamond will talk about this shortly, because he has intimate knowledge of the subject. Some computer systems that are used across the police service still require floppy disks. They are not just 3.5 inch floppy disks but 5.25 inch floppy disks—disks that are genuinely floppy. The notion that we could simply replace that just because we have to change the terminology and the process approach to arresting someone on suspicion rather than detaining them is fanciful.

Where such computer systems are not used—that is largely in more rural areas—and where we have paperwork and correspondence to go through, that is done methodically and logically. The notion that we will destroy stocks of paperwork just because of different terminology is nonsense. We are expecting to train people in what are essentially the same provisions in new clothes, which does not make sense either.

When the service has the least amount of cash resources, adding something that seems to deliver the least benefit seems particularly burdensome. That is difficult to justify when whatever resources are available could be used to deal with the ongoing challenges that the service faces.

The Convener: I see that Malcolm Graham and Stevie Diamond want to contribute. We will eventually come to John Gillies’s bit, which is the police negotiating board—we should bear it in mind that we have another part of the bill to ask about. Does John Gillies want to respond to John Pentland, too?

John Gillies: Yes, if I could.

The Convener: Has Mr Diamond spoken yet?

Stevie Diamond: Yes—once. I made a short comment.
resources, we must make it clear that the issues around checks and balances and review are not insignificant, particularly for inspecting ranks.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I agree with much of what has been said. The point about the dependency between the service’s ability to deliver an information and communication technology system that is fit for the service, in the shape that we are currently in, and the implementation of the eventual act, is absolutely key. That is a dependency that we have recognised from the outset.

Work is on-going to ensure that the i6 programme can be designed, at the stages that it is at, to encompass as many of the proposals in the bill as possible. Stevie Diamond made an accurate point, however, that we cannot design in those proposals with any degree of certainty until the bill becomes an act. The phasing is critical, and the dependency is clear. We do not want to have to put in place cumbersome and bureaucratic paper systems to service the needs of some of the complexities of the bill if we can design them into the ICT system that will be delivered after the time when, as I understand it, the bill may be enacted.

The Convener: You also have all your duties under the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill, which is coming up. That will require tracking for all the data and so on. Is too much being asked?

Calum Steele: I do not think that anyone watching this discussion would think that too much is being asked of the Police Service in what it is meant to give the general public. Sometimes, however, the burden, whether it is self-applied or applied by others with regard to how day-to-day policing activity takes place, can seem too much. In much of what is likely to come out of the bill before us, that burden is not insignificant.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Without overstating it, the bill is the most significant piece of proposed legislation since the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980. It is the largest proposed change to criminal justice, with the largest impacts on policing, since that time. The change is required, and we are supportive of what is in the bill, but there needs to be a recognition that a cost will be associated with it.

We have worked hard to assess and capture those costs accurately, as is represented in the financial memorandum accompanying the bill. I agree with everything that has been said and with the point that a lot is being asked, but the bill represents a generational change—it will not be a recurring event every two, four or six years. It is a generational change that we need to commit to for the right reasons, as John Gillies has said. It is about fundamental changes for human rights, for our society and for our legal system, ensuring a fair and equitable balance between the rights of those who are accused or suspected of crimes and the victims. We should commit to doing that properly.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: It is a matter of timing. We are six months into the transition to Police Scotland, which is the biggest change in policing in Scotland that we have ever seen. On the back of that, we have one of the biggest changes to the criminal law in Scotland in a generation. I know that there is a longer run-in for the bill but, to return to where I started, there has to be the right understanding, knowledge and training for police officers and police staff as we go forward. It is a big ask, but it is doable.

11:00

John Pentland: I become a wee bit concerned knowing that the Scottish Police Authority has to save £72 million next year. We have heard about the bill being implemented successfully, but will its implementation be successful only if the money comes along to make that happen?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I can answer that very clearly. We articulated the costs in the way that we did because there are additional costs associated with the bill. As you rightly point out, it will be very hard, and increasingly so, for us to find those costs from within the existing budget that Police Scotland has been offered.

The Convener: Does anybody else wish to comment on costs or on resources in general, such as staffing?

Calum Steele: The question is slightly oversimplified. The bill’s success will very much depend on whether the right things are in it. The Police Service of Scotland’s ability to deliver on the bill’s expectations will absolutely depend on ensuring that the correct amount of money is given to the service to make that happen.

Stevie Diamond: We are already under huge financial constraints over the next two years. We agree that the bill is required and needs to go forward, but there must be a realistic expectation about when and how its provisions will be delivered and whether the funding will come from within the service.

The Convener: Are you disputing the financial memorandum?

Stevie Diamond: Not as such. We are saying that there must be a realistic period of time to deliver what the bill requires.

The Convener: Does anybody else want to comment on resources? This is your chance to tell us.
Chief Superintendent O'Connor: Everything comes at a cost, and we need to look at the bill's value in keeping people safe, improving services to victims, and improving the criminal justice system. There are conflicting priorities and competing demands with—dare I say?—an ever-reducing pot of money. Very difficult decisions have to be made by the chief constable, but for us, the bill has been costed and must be taken forward.

The Convener: I want to move on, because we are running into a long day and there are still questions on the police negotiating board for Scotland, for example.

Alison McInnes: I want to look at section 27 and post-charge questioning. Police Scotland has welcomed the proposal, but others, such as the Edinburgh Bar Association, have urged caution. Justice Scotland said that it “considers that the perceived value of post-charge questioning is overstated and is unsure of what value it will add in the Scottish context.”

Will Police Scotland give its views on why it has welcomed that provision?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: We have given it a cautious welcome, as you pointed out. We do not have experience of post-charge questioning, but we have experience of wanting to do it on a number of occasions, particularly in serious and complex long-running cases in which the point of charge potentially comes at a stage in the investigation when there is still a large amount of investigative work to do, in fairness to the accused and in the wider interests of justice. To be able to go back with questions would not only further the investigation, but be deemed to be a fair opportunity, should an accused wish to provide more information than we had the opportunity to get at the first point of questioning. We welcome the proposal for those reasons.

Our best guess — this is a professional judgment — is that the approach would be used sparingly; it would not be used routinely in more straightforward summary cases. In all likelihood, we would use the tactic in consultation with the Crown, should the provision become enacted.

Alison McInnes: Is there any conflict with the European convention on human rights?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I do not see any conflict, given the way that the courts have laid it out and the argument for there being a proportionate balance in the justice system — on a case-by-case basis, obviously. As is the case with everything that the police do, that would be a test that the court would consider.

Alison McInnes: Is there any benefit in trying to limit and set out more clearly the circumstances in which that questioning could be done—for example, in dealing with evidence that comes to light after the charge is first brought?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: That is clearly one set of circumstances. We sometimes wish that we had a device or mechanism for doing such questioning. In the first instance, it probably extends beyond such circumstances to more serious and complex cases in which, at times and due to the volume of material, the information might be there but we might not have got to it by the stage at which we require to put other processes in place. I do not think that we would want to be constrained to the specific limitation that you mention, but that would undoubtedly be one of the sets of circumstances in which what you suggest would be relevant.

Roderick Campbell: I want to go back to section 25, which is on consent to interview without a solicitor. Does the panel have views on the suggestion in section 25 that 16 and 17-year-olds who are not suffering from a mental disorder can consent to being interviewed without a solicitor with the agreement of a relevant person? Should they be allowed to waive their right to a solicitor?

Calum Steele: The abilities of 16 and 17-year-olds are a very topical issue. There is a debate on whether they should be allowed to vote. Well, they are allowed to vote, so they should know their own minds in that regard. However, I can understand why the argument can be advanced in both directions. There is, of course, the additional balance that in the criminal justice system there is a definition of when someone becomes an adult. I do not have an answer. I will leave that to the legislators.

Roderick Campbell: Thank you.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I share the concerns expressed by the Police Federation, and there is an additional concern about some of the implications. Circumstances might arise in which the police would, in effect, be instructing a solicitor on behalf of a person who had already stated, with questionable competence or otherwise, their desire to waive their right to a solicitor. I am concerned about how that would work in terms of who instructs the solicitor. I say that from the perspective of seeking to achieve the same aims as the bill seeks to achieve; indeed, they are the same as Lord Carloway’s aspirations. However, a technicality is involved that relates to the services of a solicitor being instructed by the police rather than the individual who rightly should be giving such instructions.

The Convener: Is there some confusion here? We have just completed stage 1 scrutiny of the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill and the age... at which young people can be treated differently is 18. Why are we sticking with 16 here? A witness or an accused can also be a victim. Why are we not tidying this up?

Calum Steele: I think that that is a question for Lord Carloway. [Laughter.]

The Convener: Let me rephrase the question, Mr Steele, as you are being awkward with me. Do you want the age to be 18 or over so that it ties in with other legislation that we are putting through? Would that be sensible?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: That is my point. As a result of the passage of time, there is now a mix of ages. European case law is fairly clear on the age of a child and some of our legislation differs from that because of history. Things would be clearer and operations would be simpler for sure if there was consistency around the age of a child.

There is a connected issue around the rights of suspects, whether children or adults, while they are in custody and the use of the appropriate adult scheme. The bill requires the police to ensure that an appropriate adult is made available for certain vulnerable suspects. I know that others have expressed a concern about that in their written submissions, and I emphasise our concern that, although that is absolutely the right thing to do and it is consistent with common practice, we have seen a huge increase in the number of requests for appropriate adults because of an enhanced understanding of the circumstances in which that is fair and proportionate. However, different schemes are in place in different local authority areas, and they are creaking at the seams. To impose such a condition on the police without any statutory requirement for there to be a scheme in every area could leave the police in a difficult position. It should not be our responsibility to supply that independent person.

The Convener: I am aware of the time and the fact that we have another panel of witnesses.

John Finnie: Can I ask a very brief supplementary on that point? Setting aside the bill, are there not huge challenges for the police service in identifying vulnerable people, with people sometimes coming forward after the event and identifying themselves as vulnerable?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: That could undoubtedly be the case. However, we have never had more checks and balances at the point when somebody is questioned or detained, to ensure that we do everything that we can to identify whether we need to call on the services of somebody to offer support and independent advice.

The Convener: Is what is in the bill on the proposed police negotiating board for Scotland all absolutely fine and no problem? Do you have any comments about that? Is there anything that you are happy—or unhappy—about on that, Mr Gillies?

John Gillies: Police Scotland welcomes the creation of the PNBS. We are certainly pro collective consultation, with the opportunity for staff associations to get round the table to negotiate on key matters, as set out in the legislation. We have made submissions on elements of the detail that we think can be developed. For example, special constables are not included in the bill at this point. We have asked why, if specials are afforded the same equipment and clothing as regular officers, there is no specific reference to them. However, we are generally very supportive of the proposals. The Police Negotiating Board operates informally in Scotland, so it is just a case of taking that forward.

Calum Steele: The SPF and, indeed, the wider staff side of the existing PNB standing committees welcome the creation of a new police negotiating board for Scotland in its own right. However, in our view, the disbanding of the UK PNB is abhorrent and does a fundamental disservice to the fine women and men of the police service in England and Wales—and, indeed, in Northern Ireland, whose position currently remains unclear.

We submitted a fairly comprehensive response to the separate consultation on the PNB for Scotland, which closed on Friday of last week. I appreciate that most committee members have probably not got our response in front of them. We have some issues with the proposals.

This is not a point of debate between John Gillies and me, but in our view the issue of uniforms and equipment should not be negotiable: uniforms and equipment are either provided or not. Special constables are not covered because this is about terms and conditions—in effect, pay and rations. Unless a decision is taken to have salaried special constables, we see no reason why they should be covered by the proposed police negotiating board for Scotland.

The cabinet secretary has made some helpful comments about the shortcomings that currently exist in terms of the ability of the respective secretaries of state or, indeed, the Home Secretary to overturn the decision of an arbiter or an arbitration tribunal. An arbitration tribunal decision is binding on one side only: the staff side. We consider that to be manifestly unfair. The cabinet secretary has indicated that he would be willing to have binding pay decisions. However, although the legislation is structured in such a way that future cabinet secretaries can be bound, it does not necessarily bind Parliament. We need to ensure that that is addressed in the bill, because although we might have confidence in an individual cabinet secretary’s ability to do the job, binding that individual to an agreement is not the same as having binding arbitration in its own right.

Although our response has many further lengthy elements, on the whole we are very supportive of the proposals, albeit that we see shortcomings in some areas that can be improved. It would be a massive lost opportunity if we simply took up what has been a broken system—certainly in recent years—that the Home Office has dominated for no purpose other than to ensure that the Government’s agenda is not breached. We must not just replicate that model in Scotland without trying to overcome some of its weaknesses.

The Convener: Mr Diamond, do you want to comment from your members’ point of view?

Stevie Diamond: We are not covered by the PNB.

The Convener: Right. John Finnie has a question.

John Finnie: Will the chief officers participate in the PNBS?

John Gillies: Our chief officers are covered by the current arrangement. The Scottish Chief Police Officers Staff Association is currently represented on the informal PNB. We envisage the SCPOSA continuing to be represented as one of the three constituent staff groupings in Scotland.

11:15

John Finnie: For the avoidance of any doubt whatsoever, am I right that the terms and conditions of all police officers in Scotland will be dealt with by the PNBS?

John Gillies: The Scottish Chief Police Officers Staff Association, the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents and the Scottish Police Federation are all covered.

Calum Steele: That is absolutely correct in terms of the proposal in the bill. However, it remains unclear whether the Scottish Chief Police Officers Staff Association will take the view that it should fall within the ambit of the Review Body on Senior Salaries. It is certainly the view of my association—David O’Connor will speak for himself—that if that was to happen, it would be a fundamental issue for the proposed police negotiating board for Scotland. If we lose very senior officers’ buy-in to the view that the negotiating mechanism is the right way of dealing with pay and conditions across the service, we lose a fundamental link in ensuring that there is a common, negotiated and fair approach to terms and conditions. An elitist approach could be created, from which some could infer that they were better than the rest. We think that that would be particularly damaging.

The Convener: Thank you. Given the pressure of time this morning, please feel free to write to me as committee convener with any points that you think perhaps we should have pursued, which I will then circulate to committee members. I have learned during this session that the expression that I must get into my head is “arrested but not officially accused”.

11:16

Meeting suspended.

11:22

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel of witnesses: David Harvie, director of serious casework, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service; Grazia Robertson, member of the criminal law committee, Law Society of Scotland; Ann Ritchie, president of the Glasgow Bar Association; and Murdo Macleod QC of the Faculty of Advocates.

Thank you for your written submissions. Again, I invite the committee to ask questions on the same parts of the bill as before. I know that you are all ready with your pencils sharpened.

Margaret Mitchell: One area that we did not cover in the previous evidence session was the authorisation for keeping in custody. The Faculty of Advocates and the Law Society of Scotland’s recommendation is that keeping a person in custody should be authorised by an officer of the rank of sergeant, as opposed to a constable. Could you say a little about why you consider that that should be the case?

Murdo Macleod QC (Faculty of Advocates): If I may, I will start by saying that the Faculty of Advocates is grateful for the opportunity to give evidence and to assist the Justice Committee with its scrutiny of the bill. We support the simplification, clarification and modernisation of the law of arrest and detention in Scotland. We have made certain comments in writing, which I hope we can discuss, on 14 of the 56 sections in part 1, but in broad terms the faculty welcomes the thrust of the reforms set out in part 1 and the general direction of travel. Any criticisms will, I hope, be largely constructive.

The Convener: We always view criticism from the faculty as constructive, notwithstanding comments that have been made by other witnesses.
Murdo Macleod: With regard to Mrs Mitchell’s question, which I think is directed to section 7 of the bill, I think from recollection that the proposal is that it should be someone of the rank of constable who determines whether an arrestee should be kept in custody.

However, section 9, on “Review after 6 hours”, which is another innovation, indicates that continuing detention is to be reviewed by someone “of the rank of inspector or above”.

It is quite a leap from constable to inspector, so we suggest that, rather than having a police constable look at what another police constable is doing, it should be done by a sergeant, who would of course be senior to the rank of police constable.

Margaret Mitchell: There seems to be a certain consistency in that proposal. Do any of the other panel members—

The Convener: Yes. Sorry. I was just going to ask that. Ms Robertson is first.

Grazia Robertson (Law Society of Scotland): The Law Society of Scotland, too, welcomes the opportunity to address the committee today on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. On Mr Macleod’s specific point, the duty sergeant, as he is known, currently takes decisions with regard to keeping people in custody and releasing people on bail undertakings—he has responsibility for those tasks at present. We felt that it would be more appropriate for someone of that rank to have the obligations as stated in the bill.

The Convener: Do other panel members want to comment?

David Harvie (Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service): This is obviously a matter directly for Police Scotland, but it is my understanding that, as my colleague said, in respect of primary custody sites decisions are taken by custody sergeants; at secondary sites, which are sometimes opened up if there are large numbers, the most senior officer may be a constable rather than a sergeant, but my understanding is that decisions are referred to a custody sergeant. So, at present, regardless of whether the senior officer is a constable or a sergeant, the decision is always taken at sergeant level. It would be a matter for Police Scotland, but I wonder whether the proposal from the Faculty of Advocates would have any significant impact on Police Scotland’s current process. It would appear that in practice the decisions are taken at sergeant level, regardless of whether the person is at the site or not.

Margaret Mitchell: The bill would open the possibility of decisions being made by a constable, which is not the case at present. It is a fair point to have raised.

David Harvie: Indeed.

Ann Ritchie (Glasgow Bar Association): This is perhaps a bit of a notional concept, but I wonder whether a police officer of any rank in a busy police station on a Saturday night would be likely to overrule the investigating officers. It is likely that the officer would take their lead from those who had investigated the case. I wonder how many times the decision of those who bring a person into custody by arresting them on whether the arrestee should be retained in custody is likely to be overruled. I would be surprised if that happened very often.

Margaret Mitchell: Would you nonetheless welcome the proposal that the decision should be taken by a duty sergeant?

Ann Ritchie: I do not think that the decision should be taken by someone of a similar rank; it should be taken by a higher-up sergeant or inspector.

Margaret Mitchell: That is helpful. Thank you.

Elaine Murray: I would like your views on the 12-hour limit. Police Scotland believes that the current capability of extending the limit to 24 hours should be retained for exceptional circumstances, whereas other organisations argue that it should not be retained. Indeed, I believe that the Edinburgh Bar Association suggests that we should reimpose the six-hour limit. I invite reflections on that issue.

Murdo Macleod: The faculty is content with the 12 hours and welcomes Lord Carloway—I think he started this off—reining in the 24 hours, which was the response to the Cadder case in the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010. If one looks carefully at the responses, one sees a thread, namely that 12 hours would be sufficient. Of course, that consists of six hours, then a review of six hours. One would imagine that that would be pretty readily granted in the circumstances by a senior officer of the rank of inspector or above.

All that I would say additionally is that they would of course still have the 28 days, during which a person could be released and the police could impose conditions which, if allowed—I am sure that we will come on to discuss them—could be quite stringent. The hours limit is not the end of the road as far as the police are concerned.

Grazia Robertson: The Law Society’s position is similar to that of the Edinburgh Bar Association in that we feel that six hours is a sufficient and proportionate time for the police to carry out their tasks, although we acknowledge the arguments in favour of 12 hours.

We welcome the fact that the bill proposes at least to curtail the period of time to 12 hours, as opposed to extending it further, in recognition of the fact that it is the restriction of someone’s liberty. As Lord Carloway said, the measure should be taken only when there is an absolute necessity for it. However, the Law Society echoes the position of the Edinburgh Bar Association and feels that six hours is appropriate.

11:30

David Harvie: The Crown Office’s written submission suggests that, given the small number of cases that we are talking about—Police Scotland has indicated that we are looking at only 0.4 per cent of all persons detained—there is an argument, in the most serious cases involving the most complex investigations, for there to be the possibility of the period being longer than 12 hours. Police Scotland’s written submission is helpful in providing comparators from other parts of the UK. There is no suggestion that the power that is currently available to the police to detain someone for up to 24 hours in top-end investigations involving only 0.4 per cent of all persons detained—which Police Scotland says equates to one person every two and a half days—is being used excessively. In those instances, they have found that necessary and proportionate to further the investigation.

Roderick Campbell: I refer to my registered interest as a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

My first question is of a general nature. Does the panel think that the bill as drafted is keeping up with the thrust of developments on the European convention in the European Court of Human Rights case law? Are there any respects in which the panel thinks that we might not be up to speed?

Ann Ritchie: I think that it is—the bill is certainly attempting to be up to speed. The Cadder case did not result in suspects being provided with some added advantage of having a right of representation in a police station. I would be concerned if the committee thought that there was anything other than the minimum protection that is required to secure a fair trial and that a rebalancing exercise was required because suspects are obtaining the advantage of a solicitor when they are in custody, resulting in our having to do something like remove the requirement of corroboration, although I appreciate that that is a separate issue. It is not about that. I ask the committee to be aware that the rights of the suspect in the police station are the minimum protections required under the ECHR, rather than something that needs to be offset with, in effect, some disadvantage.

Grazia Robertson: The ECHR provisions were in our minds when we formed our response, and that is indicated in the comments that we have made on the provisions in the bill. I commend to the committee the written submission that you received from the Scottish Human Rights Commission, which focuses on the ECHR provisions. It is useful to see how those fit with the bill as it is drafted.

David Harvie: Rather than look at this as an incremental response to recent case law, it should be regarded as an opportunity to do what Rod Campbell describes, which is to ensure that the system that we are all seeking to operate is a just and fair one that will be convention compliant. We welcome, for example, the phraseology in section 10, which, reading across, makes direct reference to some of the provisions in article 5 regarding the checks and balances that are included in relation to judicial intervention and review at particular stages during the investigation process, which are new.

You asked what I felt about the bill in its entirety, and there is one thing that I would pick up on. I missed the beginning of the conversation involving the earlier panel, but I know that there were issues around the powers of a constable and the fact that, when someone has been arrested, detained or whatever we eventually decide to call it, it will be necessary to take them to a police station.

I wonder whether, in circumstances in which, for example, evidence comes to light prior to getting to the police station that the person in custody may be the wrong individual, the strict terms of the bill as drafted might mean that the person has to be taken to a police station even though at that stage they are no longer under suspicion.

Murdo Macleod: Section 5(3) refers to a European directive. That is about the letter of rights, which the committee will be familiar with. The European directive on rights of access to a lawyer is coming in shortly, although Britain may not opt into it. That is not clear, but there have been indications that we may attempt to follow the majority of implementations. The bill as drafted attempts to fall into line with both those directives and with Cadder and the lessons learned from that.

I agree with Ann Ritchie, who makes an important point. Giving rights to the accused, such as a reduction in the amount of time that they can be in custody, is not a quid pro quo for the abolition of corroboration. Those are standalone provisions that, in the faculty’s view, would have had to be enacted in any event.

Roderick Campbell: Do you have any brief, general thoughts on how the letter of rights provisions are working at this early stage?

Murdo Macleod: They came in only in July but, as we have said in our written submissions, we would direct the committee’s attention to section 5(3), which is the Government’s attempt to say that the terms of the letter of rights directive must be implemented and that the arrestee “must be provided as soon as reasonably practicable with such information (verbally or in writing)”. We would say strongly that that information should be given both verbally and in writing.

It is an unfortunate but inevitable consequence of the state of Scottish society that many arrestees or people who are brought into custody have literacy problems. They may also be frightened by what has happened, and it seems only fair to us that, rather than simply being handed a letter with the seven rights on it, the rights are also read out to them. It would not take long, and that is after all what happens when you are cautioned by the police. You do not have to say anything.

The Convener: Is it not the case that you have to understand the process—whether the problems are to do with literacy or language—or the process could be at fault?

Murdo Macleod: Precisely.

Ann Ritchie: There are studies that show that information that is given verbally and in writing is more easily understood, and that is important if we are trying properly to protect the rights of suspects in a meaningful way.

Sandra White: I do not know whether members of this panel heard the evidence of the previous witnesses, but we got into a good discussion about detention and arrest. I note that the Law Society of Scotland is questioning whether the need for change has been demonstrated, and I believe that that is what Calum Steele also said. What are your thoughts on that? I cannot quite get my head around the need for change, either.

Grazia Robertson: I was interested to hear the police officer Calum Steele’s comments and also the response from committee members. It is my view that someone who is not officially under suspicion or investigation, or whatever the precise term is—

The Convener: That is it. One cannot remember.

Grazia Robertson: Well, I try to remember it and then I forget it.

If we are trying to simplify and modernise, I find that concept particularly difficult. Lord McCluskey said that law should be kept simple, if only for the benefit of the profession. I know that he was making a joke, but the real point is that we as solicitors have to explain to our clients what it all means. If you tell someone that they are not officially accused, but they then undergo an interview in which questions are put to them that in effect accuse them of various offences, it becomes difficult to know what their status is.

You will see from the Law Society’s written submission that I am sympathetic to the points that Calum Steele raised. The Law Society cannot see a reason for the change that makes sense in relation to simplifying things. I can see that it would change things, but not that it would necessarily simplify or modernise them. I suggest that the system, as changed in the light of Cadder, seems to have bedded in well and to be working well.

Ann Ritchie: I agree. I wonder whether it is necessary to legislate or whether changes and improvements could be achieved through recommendations or Lord Advocate’s guidelines. The committee should think about the law of unintended consequences. I am concerned that things could be introduced under the bill but then forgotten about. There needs to be some sort of meaningful review. If the bill was enacted in its present form, how its provisions worked would very much depend on the manner in which the police enforced them.

There are a number of consequences to the bill, not least for the legal aid system. My understanding from the Scottish Legal Aid Board’s submission is that there is no parallel at present for all the pre-charge work. For the most part, the trigger for legal aid is the service of prosecution papers and, as I understand it, any change to that will require changes to primary legislation. There are many factors that it would be easy simply to overlook in the vigorous move to pass the bill to be ECHR compliant.

The Convener: With respect, I was not about to overlook that. I was looking at section 24 and the provisions about times and the right to have a solicitor and I was going to ask about the issue, but we will come back to it, including the implications for the Scottish Legal Aid Board and firms in terms of costs and resources.

Do others want to comment on whether we need the change in the first place? Are we not better off where we are?

Murdo Macleod: I will strike a different note from that of my two colleagues. First, I should qualify what I say by recognising that they meet clients regularly and discuss things with them, which is one step removed, as it were, from where I and my colleagues come in. However, the Faculty of Advocates believes that the proposed change would simplify matters. My colleagues might have a better take on this, but might it not be the case that, if someone is told that they are not officially accused and then their status changes and they are officially accused of something, that is simpler than our saying to them, “You’re detained under section 14’, “You’re here by virtue of a statutory warrant” or “You’re here by virtue of a common law warrant”? I respectfully suggest that the proposed change will simplify matters.

Following Cadder and the sequelae to that, it seems to me that the distinction between detention and arrest is almost academic anyway, because people are now entitled to have their solicitor present with them during detention as well as afterwards. We are in favour of the adoption of the change.

David Harvie: On whether there is a requirement for simplification, I brought with me a couple of pages from Renton and Brown, which many of you will be familiar with. I pause simply to observe that the first comment under “Common law offences” is:

“It is difficult to state clearly the common law regarding arrest without warrant”.

When one looks under “Statutory offences”, it starts with:

“It is not clear what common law rights the Scots police have to arrest without warrant for statutory offences.”

That is the starting position as far as the main textbook on criminal procedure is concerned.

I welcome, and the Crown welcomes, the attempt to make the procedure more straightforward. I take the point that was raised earlier about perception and the use of language in relation to sections 1 and 2, but the underlying aim of those sections is to provide one system in which, if there is reasonable suspicion, an individual has a particular status. I support the aims of the bill in that endeavour.

Sandra White: For me, Murdo Macleod hit the nail on the head in what he said about perception. He may have heard what the previous panel said about that.

I am interested in something that Ms Robertson said. I keep saying this, but I am not a lawyer and I do not have a legal background. Ms Robertson, you talked about making the law easier for people who are engaged with it, be they witnesses, victims or even accused. I thought that you said something quite interesting—

The Convener: She said many interesting things.

Sandra White: Yes, but the one that caught my interest was that you had to explain to clients their rights and that they might be accused of certain things. Could you expand on what happens at present if someone is detained, and what difference it will make if the bill comes to fruition and people are arrested? What did you mean by what you said?

11:45

Grazia Robertson: I was simply saying that the procedure at the moment is to explain to the client that they are detained, and to advise them of their obligations and what powers the police have in relation to that. There is then a natural change in the person’s status after the period of detention: they are either released or charged, or they might be simply released and told that the procurator fiscal will take a decision. That procedure is well established and there is a flow that can be explained to the client.

Under the bill, we will have to say to someone that they are now of the status of being not officially accused, but their power to leave the police station is curtailed and they will be asked questions in the course of a police interview that will necessarily make accusations against them.

At present, at least, the whole purpose of the interview is for the police to say that the person is there in connection with, for example, a charge of assault. Accusations are then presented and he or she is asked to comment on them, although the person can choose whether to comment.

The term “not officially accused” seems clumsy at the least. Does it serve a purpose and does it enhance or progress matters? From the provisions, we cannot see how matters are progressed or how the current system is enhanced, particularly given that the system was changed and improved relatively recently in light of the Cadder decision. Procedures are now in place that in our view seem to work well.

The Convener: Does anyone else wish to comment on the issue? I think that it is troubling the committee.

Ann Ritchie: I appreciate that I might appear to be excessively critical of some provisions of the bill, but I am trying to put forward the perspective of the Glasgow Bar Association and our members, who are at the coalface and who go into police stations on a daily basis—I do that, too.

To answer the question, we could look at section 5, for example, which is called “Information to be given at police station”. That is information to be given to a suspect or arrested person. Sections 5(1) and 5(2) are drafted in a way that is excessively complex, bearing in mind that section 5 relates to information that is to be given to an arrested person whose solicitor has not yet arrived at the police station—in effect, it involves telling them that they have the right to a solicitor. I appreciate that not many suspects will go home and read the law but, although the bill is supposed to be an improvement on the present law, what would the man in the street think if he looked at section 5 and was told that those are his rights if he is arrested? If anybody can assist me to explain in layman’s terms what that means, I would be grateful.

I deal with legislation every day, but I find section 5 incredibly and unnecessarily complex. I wonder whether introducing such complex legislation could on any view be deemed to be an improvement. Section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provides fairly straightforward rights on which we can advise clients. At present, detention is for up to 12 hours, and section 14 provides a statutory formulation of a suspect’s rights. It is clear that they have to give their name, address and date of birth. Section 5 of the bill sets out the information that is to be given to suspects, but I have to say that I cannot see how it will improve the situation.

The Convener: So how much of the bill would you delete? I mean that seriously: which sections would you suggest?

Ann Ritchie: I do not think that deletion is the right word. The provisions should be rephrased and set out in clear terms. Basically, section 5 needs to lay out that a person has a right not to say anything and a right to access by certain people, and it should name those people. The cross-referencing makes that very difficult. If the section was handed to a member of the public walking past the building today, they would be none the wiser as to their rights.

The Convener: I take it that you would substitute detention for arrest—detention should make a reappearance. From a person’s point of view, there is a watershed between detention and arrest. They know that they are moving into a different zone. To talk about arrest with that phrase that none of us can remember, and then change it to arrest with that other phrase, is difficult to follow.

Ann Ritchie: I have perhaps strayed from the original issue, but section 5 is about giving suspects rights. Perhaps someone else here can assist me by explaining how I can put that in a nutshell.

The Convener: Should we perhaps substitute “arrest” with “detention”? The process itself may not be at fault entirely, but perhaps the terminology makes it complicated. If the provision referred to “information to be given on detention”, that would begin to adjust matters a little. I am putting the issue very broadly, but is that the point that you are making?

Ann Ritchie: That is not really the point that I am making. Regarding whether we need to change from the present situation, under which a suspect is “detained” to one in which the suspect is “arrested”, Mr Macleod has indicated that the Faculty of Advocates thinks that such a change would be a good move and Mrs Robertson has said that the Law Society takes the view that it is perhaps not necessary. I am suggesting that the change is perhaps not necessary because the detention procedures are fairly clearly understood at present.

Grazia Robertson: One extra point that I want to make relates to our criticism that the bill is full of legalese. Words such as “detained” or “arrested” are quite easy for people to understand. We are always striving for the law to be more understandable.

David Harvie: Without wanting to go back over the definitions of “arrest” and “detention”, I want just to clarify the point that was raised about section 5. I appreciate that section 5 has been drafted in such a way that it cross-references to a number of different sections, but as I read it the person will be told verbally and/or in writing—depending on whether the committee picks up the legitimate point that the Faculty of Advocates has made about how people understand information—that says, “You don’t need to say anything. You have the right of access to a solicitor. If you happen to be of a particular age, you can have the right to have another person to assist you.”

Regarding section 5(3), those are the kinds of things that I would have thought would be necessary from a convention perspective and from a European Union perspective. If any of us found ourselves in a situation where we were taken to a police station, we would want to know those things. The unobjectionable intent is to say to people before the solicitor even arrives, “This is the basic information that you need to know about what your rights are.” Therefore, I do not think that the section needs to be deleted. I think that the section is one of the key foundations that makes the bill convention compliant.

Murdo Macleod: I have some sympathy with my colleague Ms Ritchie on the need to flick through the bill to get to the relevant qualification or section. Unfortunately, however, many pieces of legislation are like that. Even the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which is our day-to-day guidebook, is full of alterations and amendments.

I will play devil’s advocate, if I may. Although we did not make this point in our written submission, I think that the arrestee—or whatever you call the person who has been arrested—will have a letter of rights that sets out all their rights. I am not at the coalface, but I am not sure that an accused would be poring over section 5 in any event. The accused will just want to know what their rights are, and they will derive that knowledge from the letter of rights that they are now given as of two months ago.
The Convener: They will be more worried about what will appear in the local paper, given the terminology.

Margaret Mitchell: I have a question specifically for Mr Macleod and Mr Harvie, who have both indicated that they are in favour of the simplification in the new provisions on the power of arrest.

Do you have any concern that an unintentional consequence of the new powers-of-arrest definitions—I can only assume that this is unintentional—is that the power of arrest to prevent a crime is not explicit in the bill? Do you have a view on that, given that the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 places a specific duty on constables to prevent crime?

David Harvie: I do not know what the intention is in relation to that and I do not know whether it is an omission. However, from a public interest perspective and a convention perspective in terms of the rights of the public in a broader sense, the power would be a crucial element in enabling the police to intervene at the appropriate time if it is necessary to prevent criminality from taking place.

As we know, there are a number of occasions on which the police might have evidence of conspiracy to commit an offence that has not yet taken place. Therefore, it would seem sensible that the power of arrest or detention—or whatever it is eventually called—applies in those circumstances.

Margaret Mitchell: If it was not included, would you shift your view from being in favour of the simplification to supporting the status quo?

David Harvie: I suppose that as a prosecutor I would seek to argue that, if it was a conspiracy, the people were already committing an offence and, therefore, we could arrest. I would seek to work within the legislation.

Murdo Macleod: Or, indeed, an attempt to commit an offence.

David Harvie: There would be ways of arguing it, but I agree that it is not explicit in the bill.

Margaret Mitchell: Surely the fact that we are even having the debate defeats the argument that it is a simplification.

David Harvie: I said that I supported the intention to simplify. There was some informed discussion earlier about perception and use of terminology but, to go back to the Renton and Brown position that I quoted earlier, the key textbook acknowledges that the overall position on common-law arrest and how it relates not only to common-law offences but to statutory offences is not straightforward. Therefore, the attempt to simplify it is most welcome. The bill goes a long way towards that, but part of the reason why we have this process is because there are opportunities to refine the thinking.

Margaret Mitchell: That is a huge distinction and a welcome one—supporting the attempt to simplify without stating that the bill does that.

Murdo Macleod: It is not something that we had addressed previously but, echoing to some extent what Mr Harvie says, I notice that section 1(1) says that a person can be arrested if they have committed or are committing an offence, so there is a power for the police to stop someone in the process of committing a crime. As Mr Harvie says wearing his prosecutor’s hat, if someone is conspiring to commit a crime or even attempting to commit a crime, they could be arrested at that stage. However, I take Ms Mitchell’s point.

John Finnie: I have a question about section 23, “Information to be given before the interview”. We have received evidence from the Scottish Human Rights Commission, which “welcomes the requirement for the information to be given on arrest, set out in Section 3.”

However, it goes on to say:

“the Commission is of the opinion that the suspect and his solicitor should be informed prior to interview of the content of the ‘reasonable grounds for suspicion’.”

I concur with that view. Do the witnesses have a view on it?

Murdo Macleod: I concur with it. Considering the coalface, my understanding is that some information can be given to solicitors when they attend at the police station, but I am not sure whether that is codified anywhere.

What the commission suggests seems sensible, but the Faculty of Advocates also finds peculiar subsection (2) of section 23, which concerns the caution and which says that, “Not more than one hour before” the commencement of the interview, the person should be cautioned that they need not say anything.

We submit that that should be amended to say, “Not more than one hour before and at the commencement of any interview” because, currently, as you will all be aware, at the beginning of the interview—many are tape-recorded—the arrestee would be cautioned that they need not say anything. Sometimes, that caution is repeated. That should happen at the commencement of the interview as well as “Not more than one hour before”.

Ann Ritchie: It strikes me that the caution that is mentioned in section 23(2)---

“that the person is under no obligation to say anything”--- states only half of the present common-law caution, which is that they are under no obligation to say anything and that anything that they do say may be noted and may be used in evidence.

I do not know whether that is simply an omission but I suggest that, under the present law, if that was the limited nature of the caution—just to advise that they are not under an obligation to say anything—the answers to any questions given in interview would be deemed to be inadmissible as unfair. I wonder whether an addition should be made to the caution to say that any information that is given may be used against the person.

12:00

Grazia Robertson: The Law Society view on the information that is to be given is that, to make the interview with a client meaningful, it is necessary to have a certain amount of information to be able to advise them. It is then that a solicitor’s private consultation with their client has some meaning and significance and serves its purpose. If the solicitor has no information, or very little information, the private consultation will be of no great assistance to the client and, to a degree, will not fulfil its purpose of providing legal advice. It is essential that the solicitor has a certain amount of information.

As a practising solicitor, when I go to a police station, I ask police officers for information and I am usually provided with sufficient information to allow me to give some meaningful advice to my client. I do not think that that has been a problem to date.

With regard to cautioning, on a practical level, when a solicitor attends for interview with their client, the caution is repeated on tape, as Murdo Macleod indicated. That is done for the protection of everyone, including the police officers. It ensures that there is evidence that they are performing their function properly, and it is also a reminder to the client of the very important protection that they need say nothing but that, if they do say something, it may be used in evidence. Again, that is working well in practice.

Ann Ritchie: I have found that the practice on how much information is given varies with different police officers. Recently, I have been in situations in which the police officers have simply stated that I would become aware of what evidence they had through the questions that they asked. To my mind, that is pointless. In such situations, as Grazia Robertson indicated, the pre-interview consultation becomes meaningless. My advice to the suspect would have to be that they should make no comment, on the basis that I have not been given any information on what the case against them is. The practice seems to vary. Full disclosure would assist.

Grazia Robertson: I am not trying to jump on the next bandwagon, but if the provision to abolish corroboration were to come in, our advice might well require to change in that pre-interview consultation. There are many factors that, in due course, would indicate that a certain amount of information would be required from the solicitor for him or her to perform their role properly.

The Convener: There will be an opportunity to have a big bite at corroboration at a later stage.

Grazia Robertson: Not by me, but I am sure that my colleagues will be here.

The Convener: I was referring to the various professions as well as others.

Murdo Macleod: I think that the provision of information to arrestees is of crucial importance; in our view, it is, to some extent, neglected. For example, with regard to investigative liberation, it seems to us that when a person is liberated—when they are not officially accused—they should be told, in essence, what Grazia Robertson tells us that she has been told by some police officers. That should be done on a formal basis—the arrestee should be told what it is that he is suspected of having done and what the evidence is. Without that, the appeal to the sheriff that is provided for at two stages would have to be heard in vacuo, with the defence having no understanding of what the evidence was against the arrestee.

Following on from what Mr Finnie said, I believe that the provision of information to the accused at various stages of the process must be catered for.

The Convener: Before we move on, I am minded to drop item 6 on the agenda so that we can have a good cross-examination of the panel that is before us and deal with the other items on our agenda. Next week’s meeting will not be too long—we will hear from two panels—so we can consider the draft report on the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill then. I am also mindful of the fact that many committee members will speak in this afternoon’s debate, which will probably start at about 10 past 2. Are members happy with that?

Members indicated agreement.

The Convener: I just wanted to alert members. “Don’t panic,” as someone once said.

John Finnie has a supplementary question.

John Finnie: I want to clarify a couple of points with the panel.

Will the issue of the caution require to be dealt with in the bill? Process-wise, could there not be a series of cautions throughout the process?
We have also heard about the Lord Advocate’s guidelines on the retention of people in custody. Would your associations have routinely been consulted on such matters or, indeed, would there be any benefit in being consulted on them?

Ann Ritchie: No.

Grazia Robertson: No.

Murdo Macleod: No is the answer to your second question.

Your first question brings us back to the point made, I think, by Grazia Robertson about the ongoing process and the fact that the caution is repeated various times. As you will know yourself, Mr Finnie, the caution is repeated when, for example, there is a rest break. However, the bill seems to say just that the caution should be made not more than an hour before the interview, which I am very curious about.

Ann Ritchie: If the bill is to improve the status quo and what we have at present, I see no reason why the full caution should not be stated in it. It seems fairly simple.

John Finnie: Some people might take the jaundiced view that it is down to the involvement of the Scottish Human Rights Commission. Is it your view that the interests of justice are served if there is equitable treatment?

Murdo Macleod: Undoubtedly—and it cuts both ways. If someone is not properly cautioned, is not following the proceedings and is not reminded of their statutory duties, it might lead to an appeal in due course. It is therefore to everyone’s benefit that the rights are reiterated.

Ann Ritchie: There is no great advantage in having suspects being acquitted on what the public would deem as technicalities. That is not particularly satisfactory for any party.

Grazia Robertson: I agree.

David Harvie: I did not envisage section 23 as meaning that a caution would be administered off-tape—for want of a better phrase. If that is what is envisaged, it does not help anyone. Given that this is a process in which an individual goes through a number of stages, my reading of the section was that as and when an individual is told that they can have a solicitor they will also be reminded of the current position. Equally, I would expect that, at the commencement of any interview that is being recorded, the person will be reminded of their status and the caution.

Alison McInnes: Scots law has traditionally prohibited any questioning following police charge. However, section 27 introduces the idea of post-charge questioning, and a number of people who have submitted written evidence have questioned the value of such a move and its compatibility with the right to guard against self-incrimination. What are the panel’s views on that point?

Murdo Macleod: The faculty is relatively relaxed about that. I think that I am right in saying that an application for further questioning after the person is officially accused must be run past a sheriff. In other words, it must be justified and cannot be done on some spurious basis; given that a solicitor has to be present during any subsequent questioning by the police, we think it unlikely that there is any great scope for miscarriage of justice. It would be a counsel of perfection to say that such questioning should always be done in front of the sheriff.

I came in at the end of the previous evidence session, but I heard one of the police officers who was giving evidence say that it would rarely happen. However, if it was not the norm—one can understand how it would not be the norm, given the pressures that the police are under and the limited time that they have—and if they went through this process in the knowledge that they had more time to do it, it might clog up the courts a bit if it always had to happen in front of a sheriff. We will have to see what happens, but we are satisfied that the checks—namely, that the application has to come before a sheriff or, in the High Court, a judge and that a solicitor will be present and able to advise the arrested or, indeed, the accused by that stage not to say anything if that is thought appropriate—meet the issues that you have highlighted.

Alison McInnes: You see no need for any further protections or safeguards such as full disclosure.

Murdo Macleod: The reasons for making the application would obviously be ventilated in court and one would expect the defence and the sheriff to ask about the nature of the further inquiries.

Ann Ritchie: I see no need for the proviso at all. If exculpatory evidence became available in the course of an inquiry after a person had been charged, it would be disclosed to the defence. Is it being suggested that, if the accused person was questioned formally about that, a prosecution would simply be dropped if they came up with a response to it? I find that very unlikely.

On the other hand, if incriminatory evidence were to be obtained from the accused, there is a question whether that procedure would fall foul of article 6 of the ECHR and the right against self-incrimination after charge. Regardless of the outcome of that questioning, I cannot see how it assists either the prosecution or the defence. In my view, it is unnecessary.

Grazia Robertson: I think that the Law Society’s submission sets out our view that we are opposed to post-charge questioning on principle.
There comes a time when the Crown must be put on notice that it is its obligation to prove the case against the accused, and when the accused can no longer be obliged to, as it were, facilitate his own conviction.

However, there is also a pragmatic element to all this. For example, when the police officers were discussing certain aspects of the bill, they mentioned the difficulties of carrying out these procedures and how cumbersome and time consuming they might be. As envisaged, this authorisation will involve an application to the court that states that the person accused has an opportunity for representation. I assume that that would happen by way of a solicitor because it seems unfair to make the person speak on his or her own behalf, but that means that it becomes another hearing. Mr Steele said—very light-heartedly, I am sure—that lawyers are always looking for more business; I would respond equally glibly that police officers are always looking for more power, and there comes a time when that must stop and someone must say, “We will not assist you any further—you are on your own to prove the case and investigate it appropriately.”

Both in principle and on a pragmatic level, what is envisaged is cumbersome, will make things somewhat bureaucratic and will result in our being back in a police office with our clients, presumably in a large majority of cases advising them to make no comment.

The Convener: I cannot get my head around the information in the financial memorandum about the costs of all this to the Scottish Legal Aid Board. On page 72 of the memorandum, for example, it is estimated that the additional costs of breach of liberation proceedings will amount to £863,000 per annum.

Grazia Robertson: With regard to the costings, I also heard the police officers say that post-charge questioning would be used in very rare and serious cases, but the bill itself refers to matters before a sheriff or on indictment. In other words, it envisages the power being available for relatively less serious matters. With regard to SLAB, however, we cannot comment on what it has in mind by way of giving assistance.

The Convener: The figures are not from SLAB but from the financial memorandum, which the Government has to produce to let us know what the bill will cost. On page 72, it says that the additional costs of “police or procurator fiscal liberation” will be “£863,000 per annum”, while on page 74 there is a stream of costs related to the “financial impact on the Solicitor Contact Line”, the highest of which is nearly £2 million. On another page, there is a table setting out “costs for SLAB resulting from additional prosecutions”, the high estimate for which is nearly £8 million and the low estimate nearly £1.5 million. Those are big figures.

Grazia Robertson: They are, but they are probably more guesstimates than estimates. Other estimates for other provisions have traditionally been very rough, and I suggest that there might be some caution in those figures.

The Convener: The estimate for one of the costs runs from £1.5 million to £8 million, which is a huge range. My point is that, given the pressures on the criminal legal aid bill in particular, substantial pressure will be embedded in everything that now has to happen for people to have legal representation at the various testing stages in the process that is set out in the bill.

Grazia Robertson: The Law Society represents not only the public but its members, who are solicitors, and we would be very concerned if any pressure was brought to bear on solicitors to effectively have their funding cut to enable them to represent their clients and ensure that they fulfil their obligations under the bill. The Law Society is obviously concerned about how funding is envisaged.

I recall the comments that the police officers made in relation to certain elements. They said that costing should not always be an issue, and I agree. We cannot always decide not to proceed with something simply because it might be expensive. However, there has to be a balance, taking into account whether what you intend to introduce is necessary, proportionate and of value, and whether it assists in the administration of justice. If there is little value in the procedure, it has to be weighed up against the potential costs.

12:15

David Harvie: I will pick up on the point about costs, and then address one or two of the earlier points.

If one considers the costs of the justice system in its entirety, if there were to be some benefit to narrowing down the points at issue for trial in appropriate cases, that in itself might have a knock-on cost saving in relation to the matters that are clearly at dispute at trial, if it has been possible to narrow them down as a result of such a process. In costing terms—this has just occurred to me, so it has not been explored or costed—one has to consider the entirely, as opposed to each individual step. There may be circumstances in which that results in greater amounts of evidence being agreed and so on.
I will explain my view on that—and I take the point that was made earlier about the standard advice being not to say anything. I am not sure that that will always be the case. For example, if the accused has given instruction and has an explanation to give in relation to particular evidence, he or she may take the opportunity to do so at that stage, rather than having to give evidence at trial. That might be a perfectly legitimate tactical decision on the part of the defence—to provide information that gives an explanation or creates a disclosure obligation on the Crown, for instance. There are a number of elements to that, and one should not always assume that the advice will necessarily be to say nothing.

On the point about how regularly or otherwise such an approach may be taken, I have some sympathy with my colleagues regarding the administrative process that might be involved. The same would apply from a Crown perspective or a shrieval perspective. We can safely say that we will not be opening the floodgates to such applications, not least because, when one considers the criteria, it is apparent that there is a certain level of judicial scrutiny—there are appropriate hurdles that need to be crossed. Section 27 sets out the need for the seriousness of the offence to be taken into account, and we must also consider the necessity for the step to be taken.

Even at that stage, the hearing will be an adversarial process, as I understand it, with an opportunity for representations to be made. If the decision is that a further interview can be conducted, the parameters for that interview, including even the time of the interview, can be dictated by the court. All sorts of cross-checks and balances can be used to ensure that such an approach is taken in serious cases, when it is necessary to do so and in controlled circumstances where there is an opportunity for an alternative view to be put.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham highlighted some situations earlier concerning larger-scale investigations, and I think that Ms McInnes raised a point regarding instances in which new information has simply come to light beyond the interview. In very large cases, it may well be that the quantity of information that is available, even from the initial search, is of such a scale that it is not possible exhaustively to examine all that information and understand its import. In some investigations relating to material that has been recovered online, there might be many gigabytes of material. The committee will be familiar with comparisons that are made about printing out that amount of information on sheets of A4, and the paper stretching from here to the moon, or whatever. Such examples are precisely the reason why, in modern investigations, flexibility is needed to allow us to go back and say, “We’ve uncovered this information. Do you have anything to say about it?”

Murdo Macleod: I will respond to what Mr Harvie said and revert to the original question about the accused’s rights in such circumstances. Mr Harvie says that the timeframes will be limited by the judge or sheriff. The faculty has grave concerns about that and feels that they should be fixed periods, like the 12 hours, the six hours and the current 24 hours, rather than left to the whim of sheriffs, who might have different ideas on the matter. That relates to sections 27(6) and 29(2). We say that the maximum period for questioning should be a further six hours and that the maximum period of arrest to facilitate that—perhaps to enable people to travel to a police station—should be 12 hours.

Mr Harvie said that questioning after a charge provides an opportunity for the accused to put his position. Surely we cannot rely on the Crown going through the process of seeking to question after a charge as the opportunity for the accused to give his version of events. The committee will later discuss judicial declarations, which are to be abolished—perhaps that is a more controversial provision in the bill. The arrestee or the accused—we can call them what we like—must be given the opportunity to put forward a defence. They cannot rely on the Crown to give them that facility.

Ann Ritchie: It strikes me that considerable public money could be spent on someone who has not yet been charged, has had access to a solicitor for questioning, has been liberating pending further investigation and is questioned again. That person might never be charged. That public expense might be necessary, but perhaps the bill is introducing solutions that will create problems. I ask the committee to consider that.

The Convener: Does Alison McInnes have a supplementary question?

Alison McInnes: Yes—this was my question.

The Convener: You had been—metaphorically—deleted from my list. I should not have deleted you.

Alison McInnes: Mr Harvie said that we have safeguards because an application would be heard before a sheriff. The test in the bill is the interests-of-justice test, which seems far too wide. Mr Macleod addressed that and discussed safeguards that we might need to explore, so that is fine.

Roderick Campbell: If the provision is used, participants will be mindful of potential implications under article 6 of the ECHR if it is abused, so there are long-stops.
I asked the previous panel about section 25. I would be grateful for this panel's views on 16 and 17-year-olds being able to waive their right of access to a lawyer.

Murdo Macleod: I heard the previous question and the response. If the age limit was raised to 18, it would be curious that a person could get married and join the Army but could not waive that right. However, the faculty has not addressed the point in detail. The letter of rights draws a distinction between people up to the age of 16 and people up to the age of 18. If the suspect was availed of the additional safeguard of not being allowed to waive their right, that would only be to the suspect's benefit. We would be happy to entertain that idea.

Grazia Robertson: The Law Society's position is that the protection of being unable to waive the right to a solicitor should be given to those who are under 18. That is a safeguard; it is not an onerous obligation. It is appropriate to give under-18s the same protection as under-16s are given.

Even the bill defines a child as someone who is under 18. Given the particular vulnerabilities—on which I think that the police commented—of people of such an age who might find themselves in a police station, it is entirely appropriate that they should have access to legal advice. They need not take it—no one need do that—but it should be made available to them, because it is a protection and a safeguard.

The Convener: It is simpler and more consistent than having something for 16-year-olds and then something different for 17 and 18-year-olds, which would be unnecessarily complex.

David Harvie: The matter was considered recently by the appeal court in McCann v HMA. As a result of that, the Lord Advocate issued guidance that indicated that, in relation to 16 and 17-year-old suspects, there is to be a strong presumption that they should not be able to waive their right of access to legal advice. The guidance sets out various requirements that the interviewing officer must take into account. The key point is that the more serious the case, the less likely it is that the presumption should be rebutted. As it currently stands, the guidance offers perhaps a greater level of comfort than might be foreseen from the bare terms of the legislation. In essence, it is a rebuttal of strong presumption.

Murdo Macleod: There is another tricky point in section 25(2)(b), which is the provision in which a person

"Mental disorder" is a specific phrase. In our submission to the committee, we say:

“It may be very difficult for a police officer, without medical training and without any assistance from a police casualty surgeon, to assess whether or not a person is suffering from a mental disorder.”

We urge the committee to remove the words “owing to mental disorder” and leave the provision that the person is unable to understand what is happening—a police officer would be able to see that—and is not able to communicate effectively with the police. Why on earth should a person in that state not be availed of their rights? In any event, if they were not availed of such a right, the evidence would probably be inadmissible.

The committee should seek to remove the phrase “owing to mental disorder”. That applies in section 33, too.

The Convener: I bring this evidence session to a close, because the committee has more to do. If you think that we ought to have raised supplementary points and we have not done so, please feel free to write to me as convener; any such submissions will be distributed to the committee and put on our website.

I thank you for your evidence, and we look forward to receiving your drafted amendments—I expect that amendments will be drafted and sent to members of Parliament to lodge at stage 2. We might see some of you back here when we move on to discuss other issues in the bill.
The Convener: Item 2 is our third evidence session on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. As was the case last week, we will look only at part 1, which is on police powers to arrest, hold in custody and question suspects. We will hear from two panels of witnesses today. I welcome our first panel. Shelagh McCall is a commissioner at the Scottish Human Rights Commission, and Professor James Chalmers and Professor Fiona Leverick are from the University of Glasgow—I think that you were in a starring role last week. Thank you for your written submissions.

We begin the questions right away.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): Good morning, panel. I have a question for Ms McCall. I am interested in the references that you make in your submission to the alterations that were made post-Cadder. You state:

“The notion that some sort of ‘rebalancing exercise’ requires to be carried out in the form of removal of other procedural safeguards, such as corroboration”— which we are not covering today—

“is mistaken and the provisions abolishing corroboration without providing an adequate alternative safeguard are of considerable concern to the Commission.”

Will you expand on that, please?

Shelagh McCall (Scottish Human Rights Commission): Certainly. I thank the committee for inviting the commission to give evidence.

One of the misunderstandings of the Cadder decision, as the commission sees it, was the notion that it gave suspects some added advantage and that, therefore, there required to be some recalibration of the system in favour of victims and witnesses. In fact, Cadder brought Scotland into line with the minimum measures that were necessary to comply with article 6 of the European convention on human rights, on the right to legal assistance.

From the commission’s perspective, there was a fundamental misconception about the starting point for the Carloway review and, indeed, the emergency legislation, which was the idea that there needed to be some tipping of the scales the other way. The most obvious tipping of the scales has been in the proposal to abolish corroboration. Following Lord Carloway putting forward that proposal, which now appears in the bill, there has not been—in the commission’s view—enough scrutiny of the implications of doing that without putting in another safeguard.
Shelagh McCall: I understand that.

The Convener: We are not looking at corroboration today.

Shelagh McCall: It would start to address them, but it would not address them fully. For them to be addressed fully, when a suspect is initially cautioned, he should be told of his right to legal assistance, and that should be enshrined in statute. Secondly, when a suspect is not to be taken to the police station but is to be questioned, he should be offered the opportunity of legal assistance and that should be facilitated in the way that it would be if he was at the police station.

John Finnie: If that was not the case, is there a danger that it would taint the whole system?

Shelagh McCall: If that was not the case, there would be a danger that suspects would not be made fully aware of their rights at the initial point of interaction with the police. There would also be a danger that, when people were interviewed outwith a police station and they gave incriminating answers, that would be in breach of their right to legal assistance under article 6 and might render the trial unfair.

There is also a flip-side. The ability to facilitate legal assistance outwith a police station would avoid the unnecessary interference with people’s private lives that is caused by taking them to a police station when it is not otherwise necessary.

The Convener: John Finnie will know about this. Is it not tricky for a police officer to know when the questioning has slipped into their saying, “I think you may have committed an offence”? A police officer might start off by just asking questions about an incident but, in the course of asking those questions, become aware that the person may be involved in another way that could reasonably be suspected to be criminal. I am thinking about the practicalities for the officer on the ground.

Shelagh McCall: That is one of the reasons why we say that the bill should attempt to define what a suspect is. If there is a definition of a suspect that states which people need to be given a caution, a right to legal assistance and all the things that follow from that, a policeman will know whether someone falls within that definition and it will give clarity for both the suspect and the police officer.

I appreciate what the convener says. There is obviously a middle ground. For instance, if a policeman comes across a scene in the street in which someone is dead on the floor and there are 10 people standing around, the policeman will ask, “What happened?”, and some people may answer that. At that stage, the policeman will not know whether a crime has been committed, never mind whether any of those people is a suspect. There is a spectrum.

However, a statutory definition of what a suspect is and what triggers their rights would assist police officers in such situations.

The Convener: Do you have one?
Shelagh McCall: I do not have a written definition in front of me. I am not a parliamentary draftsman.

The Convener: It will help the committee if, in due course, someone proposes an amendment on that, in the event that the Government does not, because it will enable us to test how useful a definition would be.

Sandra White (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP): Good morning, everyone.

My question follows on from John Finnie’s question about the reformed powers of arrest. The SHRC raised the issue, but any of the witnesses can answer. The Carloway report expressed concern that the “marking of a person as a suspect could be given undue weight by the public and media, to the detriment of the suspect and subsequent criminal proceedings”.

Do you have any thoughts on that? You put forward your thoughts on the Carloway report, but will you expand on them?

Shelagh McCall: In the situation in which someone is released under what will be called investigative liberation—in other words, when they are essentially bailed to be brought back by the police at a later stage—our position is that, to ensure proper respect for their rights to private life under article 8 of ECHR, which include the right to reputation, and given that they will not be officially accused of anything at that time, they ought to have a right to anonymity, and that ought to be built into the bill.

An example of how that can go terribly wrong was in the Joanna Yeates investigation in England, when Christopher Jefferies, a former teacher who was her landlord, was named as having been arrested.

The Convener: We went through that previously, so we are well aware of that tale and the trial by newspaper and so on.

Shelagh McCall: That is an example of precisely the situation that one would seek to avoid. While someone is not officially accused, a lot of their private rights will be at stake, including their employment rights, and they ought to be protected at that stage.

Sandra White: Does anyone else have thoughts on that?

The Convener: The witnesses are not nominating themselves to answer, so I would just leave it.

Sandra White: Okay.

The Convener: You are doing a Margaret Mitchell on me, now. That is what I call inviting other witnesses to speak. I am sure that the witnesses are perfectly able to tell me when they want to say something.

Professor Fiona Leverick (University of Glasgow): We will jump in if we need to.

Sandra White: Can I ask a quick supplementary question, convener?

The Convener: Of course.

Sandra White: Other people might come in on the liberation aspect, but I want to talk about the suspect aspect. Concerns have been raised in evidence about the issue of being detained and arrested, which is obviously connected to somebody being a suspect. Are you concerned about the use of the wording “detained” and “arrested”?

Shelagh McCall: I do not think that the wording is the problem. That is a conceptual issue. It is what is actually happening that is the issue in terms of people’s rights. We think that the bill would be greatly improved if, at the beginning, a principle for interpreting the provisions was inserted that sets out the presumption of liberty. That would mean that, when officers wonder whether they should arrest a person at all, keep a person in custody or put conditions on a person’s liberation, that could be informed by the guiding principle of being in favour of liberty unless it is necessary to do otherwise. As we set out in our written submission, perhaps a dozen or so sections of the bill could be improved by having that principle at the start.

Sandra White: Thank you.

The Convener: You referred to anonymity, Ms McCall, but if somebody is arrested without being officially suspected and they are then released on investigative terms, the condition might be that they do not approach other people because they could corrupt or intimidate possible witnesses. How could there be anonymity in that situation? Other people would have to be told that the person had been arrested and that, although they had been released, the police were continuing to investigate them. Surely some people would have to be told that.

Shelagh McCall: The police will obviously know what the conditions are. It is similar to the bail situation—

The Convener: But some members of the public will have to know.

Shelagh McCall: I suppose that it might be argued that, if there is a complainer who is the direct victim of the alleged offence, there might be a duty to protect them from potential harm. However, we have seen that for the police to publicise someone’s name in such a situation can be extremely problematic.
The Convener: So there should be anonymity in the sense of the police not publicising the person’s name, but you concede that there could be circumstances in which some people would have to be informed that somebody was out on investigative release.

Shelagh McCall: There could be such circumstances, because the police have a positive duty to protect people from breaches of their rights under articles 2 and 3, which are the right to life and the right to be protected from cruel treatment and so on.

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): Good morning, panel. Last week, we heard a variety of views on the concept of bringing detention and arrest together. Given that “arrest” is not defined in the bill, I referred the various panels of witnesses at last week’s meeting to Lord Carloway’s recommendation in his report that “arrest should be defined as meaning the restraining of the person and, when necessary, taking him/her to a police station”.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor said that his understanding of arrest “is that the person is no longer free to go about their lawful business, or has not been advised that they are free to do so.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 1 October 2013; c 3293.]

That was generally considered to be, in many respects, just a redefinition of the current position in relation to detention. I heard what Shelagh McCall said earlier about the difficulties in merging the concepts of detention and arrest without having a definition of “arrest”. Do you have any thoughts on that?

Professor James Chalmers (University of Glasgow): I do not see any difficulty in merging the two concepts. In fact, I think that doing so will give us a much more rational and sensible system than the one that we have. One of the difficulties with defining “arrest” is that existing law is quite unclear on it. The committee heard evidence from a previous witness who quoted from Renton and Brown’s “Criminal Procedure”, the standard textbook in the area, which starts with the statement that it is “difficult to state clearly” the law of Scotland on “arrest”. The bill does not provide a comprehensive scheme for regulating arrest but simply sets out the circumstances in which that power might be exercised.

I am not sure that the bill is the place to define arrest comprehensively or that the Carloway review gives us a good basis for doing that. It might be valuable to define arrest, but I am not sure that it can be done in the bill.

Roderick Campbell: Where would it be done?

The Convener: Sorry, but I want to let Professor Leverick in.

Professor Leverick: I agree with Professor Chalmers. The important point is that the bill clarifies what was previously quite a confusing situation in which both detention terminology and arrest terminology were used. What is in the bill is a vast improvement on that because it simplifies the structure.

The Convener: Do any committee members disagree with that point? Professor Leverick is thinking in terms of the accuracy of the process, but as politicians we are probably thinking about perception, which is a huge factor not only for politicians but for a person who has been arrested but “not officially accused” of an offence. The concern is that we will have situations like the Yeates case, in which somebody is arrested and given investigative release, and the press then run stories about the person’s arrest.

I do not know why the bill is changing the use of the terms “detention” and “arrest”. I understand the distinction between being detained and being arrested, which are different situations. Frankly, I do not understand why the bill uses the term “arrest” for both situations. You solidly support the bill’s change in that respect, Professor Leverick.

You can tell me whether I am misguided in my view. I am happy to be told that I am misguided, because I am told that all the time.

Professor Leverick: I do not think that the terminology is as problematic as you think it is. I do not believe that there is much distinction between the term “arrest” and the term “detention”. For one thing, we cannot guarantee that the press will report the terminology accurately anyway. The important point is that we have a real protection here that is not available in other jurisdictions, which is that the detention period—it is the period of “arrest” under the bill—is very short. There is perhaps more of a problem with investigative liberation, which can be a lengthy period. However, I honestly do not think that the term that is used, whether it is “arrest” or “detention”, is important. If it concerns you that much, you could just swap “arrest” for “detention”, because that would not really make any difference to the bill.

The Convener: That is what I am asking about. The terminology does not make any difference to what is done. I think that it is just the different label that is the issue. Do committee members feel the same as me about that?

Roderick Campbell: I do not. I am interested in following up Professor Chalmers’ point about where one would seek to clarify the terminology. What priority should the committee give to doing that?
Professor Chalmers: I do not think that that is a priority, because the general term “arrest” has been used successfully for quite some time, despite the fact that nobody can state exactly what the law in that area is. The area could be reviewed by the Scottish Law Commission or an ad hoc working group to try to bring some clarity to it. However, I do not think that that is a priority, because the present system appears to be workable.

I will pick up briefly on some other points that have just been made. The current position in England is that arrest involves reasonable suspicion that somebody has committed an offence, and detention in Scotland involves reasonable suspicion that somebody has committed an offence, so in effect the terms serve the same purpose. I am not sure that the distinction between arrest and detention is well understood by the general public; they both involve largely the same thing, which is somebody being taken into custody.

I take the point about the media coverage that has occurred in England on a number of occasions, but there are two important differences to note. First, the lengthy periods of detention that are permissible in England allow a head of steam to build up in a way that would not be possible in Scotland, particularly if the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill is passed in its current form. The second difference is the rather stricter approach of the Scottish courts to contempt of court, which might affect the way in which Scottish newspapers choose to report cases. I would be surprised if a change in terminology in itself made a difference to the reporting of cases.

Shelagh McCall: I will throw something into the mix. I do not think that the words that we use to describe it really matter. We have to think about what the function is. One function is to tell the police what powers they have, so that they are clear that what they are doing is lawful. The flip-side of that is what, from a suspect’s point of view, flows from the decision to arrest, detain or whatever it is.

In rights terms, the Strasbourg court is moving towards talking about curtailment of freedom of action rather than being deprived of liberty. The curtailment of freedom of action is what triggers, for example, the right to legal assistance. The committee needs to be aware that, whatever we call the power, there will be circumstances in which people’s freedom of action is sufficiently curtailed that they ought to have legal assistance even though they are not being taken to the police station.

We saw an example of that in the G case in the Supreme Court last year, when someone who was present during a search under section 23 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 was not given legal assistance because they were not in a police station. The Supreme Court said that, as the person was essentially handcuffed and not free to leave, they should have had a lawyer. That is the difficulty; it is a functional question rather than a question of description.

Elaine Murray: The problem is that, although the words may mean the same thing, the public think that, when someone has been arrested, the police have sufficient evidence that they may have committed a crime. There is a difference between a situation in which the police have a suspicion and want to know what is going on, so the person is taken in to find out what is going on and what they know about it, and one in which there is sufficient evidence that the person may have committed an offence to trigger an arrest.

Professor Leverick: I am not sure that the word “detained” would not also carry that implication. I am not sure that one word is necessarily any better or worse than the other.

Professor Chalmers: Your question seems to rest on the premise that, first, the public do not know what detention means—that may be true—and, secondly, that that might be a good thing. I am not sure that that is true at all.

The Convener: They know that detention is different from arrest. They may not know the technical things that lawyers know, but they know that it is different from being arrested.

Professor Leverick: But they might not necessarily see it as being better or worse. We are all casting around and making claims, but we just do not know. If somebody wishes to do a public survey of what is generally understood by the two different terms, we could have the discussion on an informed basis, but until that happens this matter is a bit of a red herring.

Professor Chalmers: I am reasonably confident that the public know that there is a difference between being detained and being charged with a criminal offence. However, I am not sure that there is a public understanding that detention and arrest are different things. Arrest is normally combined with a charge, and that is understood as being a different stage, but that is not quite the same point.

Professor Leverick: We could be wrong. Nobody will know the answer until somebody does some sort of survey.

The Convener: Or until the first press reports come out after the law changes and somebody says, “So much for the restraint of the press. I see that they’ve arrested that man”, because the press have not put a bit in parentheses in the report to say that the man has not yet been—what is it?— officially accused. I struggle to remember that phrase. Maybe we, as politicians, are just a bit prickly about those things and about perceptions. Who knows?

Elaine Murray: What are your views on the reduction in the time period from 24 hours to 12 hours? Some witnesses, particularly those from the police, have said that on occasion a bit more than 12 hours will be needed to complete an investigation. Should there be a provision on exceptional circumstances? Under what circumstances should an exception be granted?

Professor Leverick: I do not have the operational understanding of police matters to be able to say whether exceptional circumstances would justify a 24-hour period. That may be the case; it is something that the police would be able to advise you on.

I would be happy with the 12-hour limit. You have to remember that, if we extended it to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances, the police would not necessarily get 24 hours in which to question the suspect because there would probably have to be a break period within the additional time. It would not be compatible with ECHR to question someone continuously for 24 hours. In England and Wales, where an extension is permitted, a provision in the code of practice states that suspects must have—I think—an eight-hour break from questioning.

In effect, if you extended the time period in exceptional circumstances, you might gain an additional four hours or so, at most. The police might be able to give convincing evidence on cases where that would be justified, but I am not in a position to do so. Until I have seen such evidence, I would be inclined to stick with the 12-hour limit.

Shelagh McCall: The commission has a completely different view. Taking someone into custody engages their rights under article 8, which contains their right to a private life, as it interferes with their private life. Under article 8(2), the state must justify that, and part of the justification must be that it is necessary. The Strasbourg court has said that that must be based on evidence and not anecdote. There is no evidence that a 12-hour period is necessary for the purposes of detaining someone or keeping them in custody. In fact, when the data was collected during the Carloway review, it showed that 83 per cent of people were released in fewer than six hours.

Going back to Mr Finnie’s question about the commission’s comments after Cadder and the emergency legislation, we said at that time that there was no justification for increasing the period to 12 hours, and certainly none for increasing it to 24 hours. That remains our position because the evidence has not changed. The bill should be amended to reintroduce the six-hour period, because that should be the norm, with the possibility of extending it to 12 hours should there be a particular reason why that is necessary. However, the reasons must relate to the provision of article 6 rights, such as the right to legal assistance, the right to an interpreter, the requirement for medical treatment, or something of that nature. It is not about the police being allowed to go and do X while someone is sitting in the cells.

Colin Keir (Edinburgh Western) (SNP): I want to ask about the 83 per cent figure that Shelagh McCall mentioned. I have not seen the figures, but perhaps you could let us know about the 17 per cent who were not released in fewer than six hours. Do you have any idea how many people in that 17 per cent ended up being convicted?

Shelagh McCall: I have absolutely no idea because the data was not collected by the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland and Lord Carloway.

Colin Keir: It would be interesting to know whether the extensions were justified in those cases.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): I want to follow up Elaine Murray’s point about the custody hours that are available. Could I hear the panel's views on the impact on children and vulnerable adults, and whether the six-hour limit that is proposed by the SHRC should ever be extended in particular cases?

Shelagh McCall: We state in our written response that the committee and the Parliament should think carefully about whether it is ever appropriate to hold a child or a vulnerable adult for more than six hours. I know that the committee will hear from the children’s commissioner later, and I am sure that he is better informed than I am. One of our recommendations is that the bill should state that taking a child into custody is a measure of last resort because it really ought not to happen unless it is absolutely necessary.

Alison McInnes: Does Professor Chalmers have a different view?

Professor Chalmers: One protection that will remain is that the admission of any statement that is made in police custody is subject to a test of fairness when the prosecution seeks to lead it in court. In applying that test, the court will be able to take into account whether someone who is vulnerable has been held in circumstances that made it difficult for them to exercise their right to silence and made it more likely that they would confess to acts that they did not commit, and so on. The court could take those facts into account and could decide not to admit a statement regardless of the fact that the legal maximum had been complied with. The police would have to be careful about holding a vulnerable adult or child right up to the wire.

10:00

The Convener: I refer to your article in The Modern Law Review at page 849. You state:

“Lord Carloway states that ‘there are very strong arguments that a child under the age of 16 should not be able to waive the right of access to a lawyer’ but does not set out explicitly what these are, other than alluding to the serious nature of cases involving children that are likely to end up in court.”

You might want to comment on that.

Secondly, you state:

“these proposals go beyond the equivalent provisions in England and Wales, where an appropriate adult can request legal assistance for a child who has indicated he does not want it, but a child ‘cannot be forced to see the solicitor if he is adamant that he does not wish to do so’. They also go beyond what is necessary under the ECHR, as the European Court of Human Rights has never suggested that children cannot waive procedural rights, although for waiver to be valid, the assistance of a legal adviser or appropriate adult may be required.”

I would like you to comment on that.

We have talked about the difference between 16 and 18-year-olds and whether we should just move the bar to 18 anyway. Will you comment on that, too, please?

Will you comment and elaborate on what you put in the article? Do the proposals go too far? Should we say no?

Professor Leverick: What is in the article is not particularly a statement of opinion by us. The things that we put in the article are correct.

The Convener: Indeed, but do we require to say that absolutely no child of 16 or under can waive their rights?

Professor Leverick: I do not think that we require to do that. There is certainly no legal reason why that is required. If I had to offer a personal opinion, I would probably say that the bill has got it about right. Under-16s probably should not be permitted to waive the right to legal assistance, but imposing legal assistance on all 16 and 17-year-olds even if they are adamant that they do not want it and are capable of understanding the implications of that decision may well be disproportionate in respect of the costs involved.

The Convener: So you would keep the distinction in the bill.

Professor Leverick: I think that the bill has got it about right. Having said that, I cannot claim to be a great expert on child psychology.

The Convener: I do not know what to say to that. None of us claims that. We try to do our best with the information that is in front of us.

Professor Chalmers: Our statement that the proposals “go beyond what is necessary under the ECHR” is not meant as a criticism in any way; it is simply an observation. I know that the committee has been concerned about the idea of future proofing the criminal justice system against ECHR developments. None of us can give guarantees on how ECHR case law might develop in the future, but the views of the European Court of Human Rights might change in the area, and it would certainly be advantageous for the system to offer more protection than the bare minimum that is required by the convention.

The Convener: Ms McCall, do you want to comment on the distinctions in the bill? Are you content with them?

Shelagh McCall: The Scottish Human Rights Commission’s view is that the bill is right to say that children under 16 should not be allowed to waive legal representation. As Professor Chalmers has said, that is not because Strasbourg says that children cannot waive their rights—they can—but Strasbourg looks extremely critically at the circumstances in which that happens, because one of the important things about a waiver of rights is that it has to be exercised with full information about the facts and the consequences of waiving rights. Whether children, in the absence of a lawyer to tell them about the consequences, can properly make that decision, given their lesser maturity and capacity compared with adults, is a real issue.

In the commission’s view, it is not appropriate to substitute parents as the decision makers for children, who are the holders of their own rights. It is not a parent’s or an appropriate adult’s job to do that. There is a danger that the parent may be just as ill informed or misinformed about the importance of legal representation as the child may be. That is why we say that the bill has got it right in that respect.

Alison McInnes: To remain on children’s rights, what are the panellists’ views on whether the bill is a missed opportunity to raise the age of criminal responsibility to 12 and on other Committee on the Rights of the Child requirements?

Shelagh McCall: The commission’s view is that it is a missed opportunity, and this committee ought to take the opportunity to recommend that. It is clear that Scotland has an extremely low age of criminal responsibility and that the international trend is upwards from where we are. There is a real opportunity in the bill to do something about that, and that opportunity ought to be taken.

The Convener: I was just checking whether that would fit under the purposes of the bill in any event.

Professor Leverick: I do not necessarily disagree with Shelagh McCall, but I think that there is already an awful lot in the bill. Relatively recently, a long consultation process on the age of criminal responsibility was carried out by the Scottish Law Commission and I am not sure that the bill is necessarily the best place to revisit that.

Alison McInnes: When and where would be best?

Professor Leverick: I am not sure that the issue needs to be revisited at all. If it does, the bill is possibly not the right place to do that, given that there is already an awful lot in it.

Alison McInnes: We want to make sure that our bills have an awful lot of the right stuff in them rather than an awful lot of things that we are not sure are necessary.

The Convener: I do not know whether you are agreeing or disagreeing, Alison—you are having a bit of a mumble to yourself. That is allowed, though—mumbles are allowed.

Roderick Campbell: I would like to address the issue of people receiving legal advice by telephone. Section 36(3) describes a person’s right to consultation with a solicitor when they are in police custody. It states that “consultation’ means consultation by such means as may be appropriate in the circumstances and includes (for example) consultation by means of telephone.”

What is the panel’s view on that provision?

Shelagh McCall: The commission’s view is that there will be circumstances in which a telephone consultation is inadequate. The purpose of legal assistance is twofold: first, it is to protect the right against self-incrimination; and, secondly, it is to provide a check on conditions of detention and to ensure against ill treatment. In that second respect, it is difficult to assess over the telephone someone’s vulnerability when they are in custody.

Also in relation to section 36, the choice of the method of consultation with a solicitor belongs to the suspect, and the bill ought to make that clear. The police may say—as I think that they do at the moment—that the suspect can first have a chat on the phone with a solicitor. However, if the solicitor and the suspect decide that the solicitor should come to the police station and be present, that choice should belong to the suspect, not the police.

Professor Chalmers: It is important to read that provision together with section 24, which creates the right for the suspect to have a solicitor present during the interview. However, as Ms McCall has said, that is not the only function of a solicitor. I agree that it would be useful if the bill made it clear that the choice must be that of the suspect, not that of the police.

Professor Leverick: The point about one of the solicitor’s functions being the ability to check the conditions of detention is important. The European directive on the right of access to a lawyer in criminal proceedings sets out that that is one of the solicitor’s functions in that situation. Therefore, we must ensure that the bill complies with that. That means that, if somebody wants their solicitor to visit them outside the interview situation, we probably have to allow that.

The Convener: Have you finished, Roddy?

Roderick Campbell: I have finished, but Colin Keir wants to ask a question.

The Convener: You cannot bring him in, because John Pentland is waiting.

John Pentland (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab): Yes, I have a question.

The Convener: I wondered whether you were going to ask about vulnerable witnesses, but that is fine. Were you going to ask about that, Colin?

Colin Keir: I want some clarification of what has just been said. What if people up in the darkest Highlands engage a Glasgow solicitor? How would that affect the process?

The Convener: I do not know whether we will let you talk about the darkest Highlands—they might be gloriously sunny autumnal Highlands. However, I will let you ask about that, and I will then bring in John Pentland.

Colin Keir: That was basically my question. How would it affect proceedings if someone was somewhere up in the Highlands and Islands that was not terribly accessible and, following the telephone call, it was decided that a solicitor had to travel from Glasgow, Edinburgh or Dundee? There would be a delay. How would that progress in a practical sense?

Professor Leverick: I am probably not the best person to answer that question, as I do not have the practical experience.

The Convener: There you are, Colin—there is your answer.

Shelagh McCall: I can answer the question. Under article 6 of the ECHR, the state ought to respect an individual’s choice of legal representative in so far as that is possible. If an individual who is in custody in the islands says that they want to speak to Mr Smith in Glasgow, that should and can be facilitated. However, if an appearance in person by the solicitor is required, it may be legitimate to say that the person’s choice of solicitor cannot be respected because it would take the solicitor nine hours to get there, whereas Mr Y from just down the road could come and provide legal assistance. It may be legitimate, on such an occasion, to depart from respecting someone’s choice of representative. Nevertheless, the state must have measures in place to ensure that solicitors can be brought to the police station to perform that very important function.

The Convener: There would need to be a bit of common sense about it.

Colin Keir: Sometimes that has been sadly missing, convener.

The Convener: John Finnie’s face was a picture when you referred to the “darkest Highlands”.

John Finnie: I was thinking that it was an interesting geographic term.

The Convener: Absolutely, but we will have no violence, John—no violence.

John Pentland: Would the panel care to expand on their views with regard to vulnerable adult suspects? The SHRC reckons that the bill might be too narrow in focusing only on people with a mental disorder. Professor Leverick and Professor Chalmers have stated that it is notoriously difficult to identify vulnerable adult suspects.

Shelagh McCall: There is a real challenge in identifying vulnerable people, and the police must be properly trained to do so. It is good to have an understanding that mental disorder, as defined in the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003, gives rise to vulnerability. That is encouraging. However, that definition misses people who do not suffer from a mental disorder but who appear, for whatever reason, not to understand what is going on. That may be because they have taken some intoxicant, because they are medically unwell rather than mentally disordered, or because there is a language or communication issue. There are all kinds of reasons why people’s vulnerability can be increased in custody. At the moment, the bill does not allow the police the flexibility to deal appropriately with people who are not evidently mentally disordered, and we would encourage some amendment in that respect.

Professor Leverick: I agree entirely. We do not have to follow slavishly what happens in England and Wales, but the equivalent terminology used in the legislation in England and Wales refers to mentally vulnerable suspects, which does not necessitate any mental disorder as such.

Professor Chalmers: The provision on support for vulnerable people refers to someone who, “owing to mental disorder”, is “unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or to communicate effectively with the police.”

It might seem slightly odd that somebody who is “unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or to communicate effectively” for another reason does not fall within the scope of section 33. If somebody met that criterion, support would have to be provided, otherwise the court would hold as inadmissible any incriminating statements—or any statements—that they made, because the fairness test would not be met.

The Convener: That is a fair point to make about section 33.

John Pentland: Shelagh McCall said that one of the measures that we could put in place would be proper training for the police. Do you think that any other measures may be necessary?

Shelagh McCall: In our written submission, we raised some concerns about funding for appropriate adults. The state has an obligation to put in place a proper system, so there must be a conversation and a decision about how appropriate adults are going to be paid for. In addition, appropriate adults must be properly trained. I know that there is provision for regulations to be made about that, but the training will be critical. We must also ensure that appropriate adults are used in the right way, not the wrong way. They cannot be substitute decision makers; they are just there to facilitate communication and to use their expertise for that purpose. That is why we welcome the view that vulnerable persons should not be able to waive their right to legal assistance. There must be someone present who is capable of advising properly on decisions to be made by a vulnerable suspect.

The Convener: There would also be a protection, in that any statement would be inadmissible in court if the solicitor were able to show that, in taking evidence, the police had been oppressive or whatever to somebody who was vulnerable.

Roddy, do you still have a question on vulnerable people?

10:15

Roderick Campbell: No.

The Convener: Right. It is not you next; it is Elaine Murray, who is not on vulnerable people.
Elaine Murray: No, I am not on vulnerable people today.

Lord Carloway expressed some concern about the period after someone has been officially accused, when they can be released, liberated on an undertaking or detained prior to going to court. He was concerned about the period that could elapse between being a person being officially accused and getting to court, which is not addressed in the bill. Are you concerned about that? I presume that resource issues are part of the reason why that has not been addressed in the bill, but ought it to have been?

The Convener: Ms Leverick, you are nodding.

Professor Leverick: I agree entirely with Lord Carloway’s sentiments. I think that the period could be unacceptable long. I am not sure whether that ought to have been addressed in the bill, although it is addressed in the equivalent legislation in England and Wales.

We probably have to make some provision for weekend and perhaps holiday court sittings, which obviously has a resource implication. Whether that needs to be addressed specifically in the bill, I do not know. If practice does not change without legislative intervention, there might have to be such intervention.

Shelagh McCall: For some time, we in Scotland have been at the outer reaches of breaching article 5 of the ECHR—article 5 being the right to liberty—which is why Lord Carloway recommended in his review the introduction of a 36-hour period. He identified situations in which a suspect may be held for four days or so before appearing in court, which is pushing at the boundaries of a human rights breach.

Elaine Murray is right to observe that the bill does nothing to address Lord Carloway’s concern. The commission’s position is that the rule has been the same for many years but the situation has not improved and working practices have not changed, so a legislative solution is necessary. Lord Carloway’s original recommendation would be an appropriate way to solve the problem.

Elaine Murray: Do you have any concerns about people being questioned after charge, which is a new development in the bill?

Professor Chalmers: It is not something about which I have any concerns, given the safeguards that are in place—in particular, the requirement for an application to be made to the court before such questioning happens.

Professor Leverick: I agree with that. If those safeguards were not in place, I might be concerned about repeated harassment of people who were being held in custody. However, with the safeguards that are in place, including the fact that the accused person will be notified of an application being made to the court—it will not come as a terrible surprise to them—and able to make representations as to why that might be inappropriate, I do not have any particular concerns about it.

Shelagh McCall: The commission has concerns. In European human rights case law, there is nothing that prohibits questioning after someone is officially accused, but one has to think about what the purpose is. If the sole purpose is to overcome someone’s right to silence—in other words, to get them to incriminate themselves—that may breach article 6 and the right against self-incrimination.

I thought about this before coming to the committee today, and it is very hard to think of situations in which the questioning would be designed for any purpose other than to try to get someone to say something against their interests when confronted with, for example, DNA evidence, closed-circuit television footage or something of that nature.

There is a danger that such questioning might fall foul of article 6 because of its purpose. As a matter of principle, there is not a difficulty with it, but I am just not sure that the protections of judicial oversight are sufficiently robust.

The Convener: If the sheriff consents to post-charge questioning and the accused refuses to say anything, would that be held against them in proceedings? They might maintain their right to silence, if you will, and when questioned say, “I am not going to say anything.”

Shelagh McCall: It should be made explicit in the bill that, if the person chooses not to say anything, no adverse inference can be drawn, because Strasbourg is moving towards saying that drawing an adverse inference from silence is a breach of article 6. It is not there yet but, in our view, it is likely to start to go there. We see a withdrawal and a backing off from that position in England, and it would be very foolish for this Parliament to introduce a bill that walked into that situation.

The Convener: So, at the moment, adverse inference can be drawn from silence.

Shelagh McCall: It is not clear, because the method of questioning has never been allowed before. Our recommendation is that the bill should be amended to include no adverse inference.

The Convener: Do you want to comment on that, Professor Chalmers?

Professor Chalmers: I would be surprised if, on the basis of the bill, the courts felt able to draw adverse inferences from failure to answer questions in such situations, but there would be no harm in making it explicit that none should be drawn.

The Convener: Is that what you would wish to see in the bill?

Professor Chalmers: I certainly agree that there should be no possibility of adverse inferences being drawn in such situations.

Professor Leverick: I suspect that it would not happen anyway, but there would be no harm in putting in a specific provision to that effect.

The Convener: At stage 1, we are looking at points to raise in debate and on which to have responses, so it is important to tease the matter out.

Roderick Campbell: Lord Carloway referred to the possibility of having Saturday courts to reduce long delays in court appearances. Do the witnesses have a view on whether the bill adequately ensures that suspects are not held in custody for too long before a court appearance, or could it do better?

Professor Chalmers: I endorse what Ms McCall already said on that point. It could be dealt with without legislative intervention, but we are at risk of eventually falling foul of article 5 of the ECHR, which may require Saturday courts.

Professor Leverick: I suspect that we need Saturday courts. Whether we need legislation to bring them about I am not sure.

The Convener: Are there issues with court closures if we try to have Saturday courts but the courts do not exist?

Professor Chalmers: We have plenty of space in courts on Saturdays, so I suspect that that is not the issue. The issue is the people to put in them.

Professor Leverick: I guess that I would not be terribly happy if I was the one who had to work in the Saturday courts; unfortunately, we need to introduce them, with all the implications that that has for the people who then have to work on Saturdays and for resources. Sadly, it is necessary.

The Convener: I might have to open up a local court again. I might have to take the key and let them in on the Saturday, or get the jannie to open it specially.

Sandra White: Section 4 of the bill says that an arrested person should be taken "as quickly as is reasonably practicable to a police station."

Do the witnesses have any concerns or comments about how that would affect the police or the suspect?

Professor Leverick: In what sense?

Sandra White: Would it have an adverse effect on the suspect or the police, or could it be a good thing? There is a concern that, because of the provision in section 4 that a suspect should be taken "as quickly as is reasonably practicable to a police station", the police might act too quickly.

Professor Chalmers: There might be an argument that, in some circumstances, the police would arrest someone too quickly, but I am not sure that that can be addressed in the bill. No concerns have occurred to me about the section.

Shelagh McCall: The decision to arrest someone is the critical decision in terms of interfering with a person's private life and liberty. If the consequence of arrest is that certain rights, such as legal assistance, need to be facilitated, the quicker that is done, the better, because it means that, ultimately, someone might spend less time in custody.

The question is interesting in relation to the grey area before the decision is taken to arrest somebody. In our view, that is properly addressed by the police facilitating legal assistance wherever they are and not having to go to the police station for that purpose. The concern is not about taking people too quickly to the police station, but about unnecessarily taking them there.

The Convener: On the other hand, if you are taken to the police station, you know that you are in trouble. If you are questioned in your house, you might not be aware of that, but if you are taken to the police station, the whole agenda has changed.

Shelagh McCall: However, if you are given a proper and full caution when the police arrive at your door—for example, "We have grounds to suspect that you have committed the offence of blah, you need not say anything and you are entitled to a lawyer"—the caution will bring home to you that you need to be aware that you are in trouble and that you have certain rights.

The Convener: Thank you.

Do the witnesses have anything else that they wish to say to us, other than what a lovely panel we are?

Professor Leverick: You are a lovely panel.

The Convener: You can compliment us on that, but is there anything that you wish we had asked that we have not asked?

Shelagh McCall: The only thing that I will say—this follows on from Sandra White's question—is that the reasons why someone may be taken to the police station ought to be defined in the statute. For example, they should be told, "We are taking you there to question you", "We are taking you there to recover evidence that we could not recover otherwise”, or, “We are taking you there because we think that you might destroy evidence that we need to get.” Providing specific reasons for arresting someone and taking them to the station would provide clarity both for the police officers and for those being arrested.

John Finnie: I have a question that I do not think has been covered—please forgive me if it has. On the investigative liberation provisions in sections 14 and 17, the SHRC refers to the implications for “a suspect’s work and family commitments” and the implications in terms of article 8. Can you expand on that, please?

Shelagh McCall: As I understand it, under the investigative liberation provisions, the bill envisages that someone may be released on the condition that, for example, they need to come back to the police station at a particular time. That time may not be convenient for them due to their caring commitments or important work commitments or, indeed, their solicitor’s commitments, so there may be some issues there.

If a person is released under conditions such as a curfew, that is a serious interference with their private life and may in fact interfere with their right to liberty. The bill does not build in enough limitations around the reasons why people might be released under such conditions, what the limits of those would be and when those would be appropriate. As we say in our written submission, we think that the investigative liberation provisions could be improved by a bit more scrutiny of such issues.

John Finnie: Is your concern that we would have a situation in which the police would consider the full range of options—curfews, timings and so on—and then de-escalate them due to the level of compliance by the accused, rather than a situation in which evidence would escalate the conditions?

Shelagh McCall: Exactly. In interfering with someone’s private life, it is for the state to justify how far that goes, and it should go only the minimum distance necessary to secure the aim that is being pursued, such as the proper investigation and detection of crime.

John Finnie: How would a curfew-like condition be recorded? Would the report that ultimately goes to the Procurator Fiscal Service record the reason why liberation with a curfew was suggested?

Shelagh McCall: Similar to the bail provisions that exist at the moment, there could be standard conditions, such as that the person will be of good behaviour and that they will not interfere with witnesses. The application of additional or extra conditions such as a curfew should be done only to secure compliance with those standard conditions. In other words, is a curfew necessary to ensure that the person is of good behaviour and does not interfere with a particular witness or behave in a particular way? All of that should be recorded in the police report, so that there is a proper record of why things were done. There would be an opportunity for the fiscal and the sheriff to scrutinise that, so it needs to be properly recorded at that stage.

John Finnie: What would be the implications for the system if disproportionate liberation conditions were applied to an accused person?

Shelagh McCall: The implications for the system would be that the accused might have some claim for breach of his rights, sheriffs might be unnecessarily burdened with reviewing investigative liberation conditions and the fiscal’s time might be clogged up with reviewing and remedying inappropriate conditions.

The Convener: Sorry—we are not at the end, because John Pentland wants to ask a question. I thought that we had finished, but there is a postscript.

John Pentland: Convener, I tried to catch your eye, but you turned your head.

The Convener: Dearie me. I will make a point of not doing so from now on, John.

John Pentland: Thank you very much.

It is often said that prevention is better than cure. Police witnesses have argued that section 1 of the bill should be amended so that constables are clearly empowered to arrest a person in order to prevent crime. Can I have your comments on that?

10:30

Professor Chalmers: Let me make two comments. First, I know that the witnesses last week suggested that, because the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 imposes on the police a statutory duty to prevent crime, they might therefore need the power to arrest people to prevent crime. I find that slightly surprising, as that is not, presumably, a new duty for the police. For some time, the police have had a duty actively to prevent crime. I am not sure that that legislation creates the need for a new power.

Secondly, I can see an argument for a power to arrest to prevent crime, but I would want more detail on how the police would envisage exercising that power. I am not entirely clear what would be done with someone who was arrested solely for the purpose of preventing a crime. If someone is suspected of attempting to commit a crime or conspiring to commit a crime, they can be arrested because they have already committed a criminal offence and they can be brought before a court. If someone has not committed a crime of any sort, I am not sure what would be done with them once they were arrested. If a power of that sort was to be created, I would like some clarity on that from the police, who suggested it.

Professor Leverick: Under the equivalent legislation in England and Wales, there is a power to arrest if there are reasonable grounds to suspect that someone is about to commit an offence. Like Professor Chalmers, I would like to know a bit more about how that would actually work. If someone has not committed an offence and you have arrested them, what do you do with them next?

Shelagh McCall: Following the exercise of that power in England, there have been some European cases that have not gone in the police’s favour. We would be extremely concerned about the idea that the police could arrest someone who had done nothing contrary to the criminal law. Section 1(3) of the bill sets out reasons why a constable may arrest someone for a non-imprisonable offence, one of which is that the person would “continue committing the offence”. That would seem to cover the situation where someone had begun to commit an offence, the situation was going to escalate and the police wanted to intervene. We suggest that the list in section 1(3) is probably adequate to assist the police in that situation.

Professor Chalmers: This may echo some of the evidence that the committee received last week, but I think that it is worth noting that the Scottish law of attempt and conspiracy is rather broad. A conspiracy is committed at the time that any two people agree to commit a criminal offence; an attempt to commit a crime is committed not at the last minute before a crime takes place but at the point when the accused moves from planning a crime to perpetrating the crime. Both those devices would allow the police to intervene at a very early stage. As Ms McCall says, the idea that someone could be arrested without having done anything contrary to the criminal law is quite disturbing. It is not clear why that would be necessary.

The Convener: I am looking in John Pentland’s direction now very carefully and will make a point of doing so.

Rather than say that there are no further questions—someone is bound to put their hand up if I do—let me just say thank you very much for your evidence.

I suspend the meeting for five minutes.
“if the 16 or 17 year old is considered vulnerable (i.e. they have a mental disorder and cannot communicate effectively or understand what is happening to them) then they will not be able to waive their right to legal advice.”

We must be clear that vulnerability for a 16 or 17-year-old may be due to their age and stage of development and not a mental disorder. The problem is that the multiple definitions of vulnerability that exist are not properly drawn out. In particular, the reliance on mental disorder as the determinant of vulnerability is unhelpful, because there are many more reasons why adults, children and young people can be vulnerable and require support specifically to deal with that vulnerability.

Tam Baille (Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People): Trying to define vulnerability is a thankless task. The policy memorandum has made a stab at it. We could suggest improvements, but, at the end of the day, it will come down to judgment, which will have to be exercised on the basis of experience, training and guidance.

We cannot just have blanket coverage. There are certain times when we want to identify those who are vulnerable as opposed to those who are not. We will come on to talk about our views on the waiver, which is really where the vulnerability provision comes in.

Vulnerability is really difficult to define. I have experience of running hostels for children and young people, where we took in the most vulnerable. We ended up trying not to define vulnerability too tightly because, at the end of the day, it came down to individual judgment. However, that judgment will need to be backed up by one of the key things in the bill, which is the training and guidance that will be offered as a result of the bill’s implementation.

The Convener: I take the panellists to section 33(1)(c), which I think is what John Pentland was looking at. The expression “owing to mental disorder” is the bogey phrase there. I was going to ask you about that, Ms Stewart, because I think that your submission explained the complexities of defining vulnerability.

Rachel Stewart: From SAMH’s point of view, the mental disorder definition, which comes from the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003, encompasses quite a wide range of mental health problems, learning disabilities, personality disorders and autistic spectrum disorders. Each of those conditions requires a different response, different training and different support. Although, as has been said, it is narrow and it takes just one condition or disorder, it does not set out how people would need to be treated. Sorry—I am not being very clear.

The Convener: That is all right.

Rachel Stewart: You could argue that anyone in custody is vulnerable. It is a stressful and anxious environment for people to be in, and police need support and training to be able to support people who are in that situation.

The Convener: There might be some right toughies in custody, though—people who are not that vulnerable. We might have a dispute about that.

John, do you want to go back to that issue?

John Pentland: Tam Baille mentioned that training is essential. Rachel Stewart’s organisation goes a step further and recommends that we set up a stand-alone appropriate adults service. I ask her to expand on that. I think that the SAMH submission also mentions that the relationship between the national health service and Police Scotland should be strengthened. Is there a weakness there at the moment?

Rachel Stewart: To take the appropriate adult provisions first, we welcome their inclusion in the statute but we note that there are no plans in the policy memorandum to set up any back-up for existing services and schemes. Those are run in different guises across Scotland: some of them are funded, and some of them rely on social worker extraction. We think that, to improve the patchy nature of the service, it would be better to resource it to ensure that appropriate adults receive training and support, that they are retained and that they have assistance to deal with some of the issues that they will face and improve their own mental health.

Some people get a good appropriate adult service because there is that back-up. Others wait for several hours before getting a social worker who might not have training in a certain area. Those people might not be facilitated in the same way and their rights could be affected.

The second point was about links between the NHS and the police.

10:45

John Pentland: Yes. Your written submission says that those links need to be strengthened. Have you identified a weakness?

Rachel Stewart: A lot of people who enter custody are in crisis, and there are some pilot schemes in Scotland in which the NHS and the police work together on alcohol issues. If someone in a custody suite had severe anxiety or depression, they might not need an appropriate adult to help them to communicate, but they might need a nurse present who could say whether they needed to see a doctor and ask when they last took some medication. For such issues, we would like to see that level of support. There is a bit of a precedent, in that the NHS provides treatment in prisons nowadays, so the links between the justice system and the health service are closer. We think that that should be taken to its logical conclusion.

Mark Ballard: Aberdeen City Council’s appropriate adults service highlighted in its written submission the issues around the fact that section 33 provides statutory support only to those aged over 18 who are deemed to have a mental disorder and that there is a gap in the legislation regarding 16 and 17-year-olds. The policy memorandum states:

“The Scottish Government ... expects that the police will still be able to request the support of an Appropriate Adult for vulnerable suspects, and accused persons aged 16 and 17 years old, and also for victims and witnesses aged 16 and over, through the current non-statutory route.”

We have concerns that, if it is not a statutory requirement to provide that service, local authorities that are under severe financial pressure may not support the provision of the service. It is not clear how that support will be guaranteed unless its provision is made statutory in the bill.

The Convener: I am a bit confused. I am talking about the appropriate person rather than an “appropriate adult”. The term that the bill uses is “appropriate person”. Is that right?

Mark Ballard: Yes.

The Convener: Section 31(5) defines an appropriate person, and it seems to me that they do not have to be provided by the state, the voluntary sector or anybody else. Section 31(5)(b) states that, could be an appropriate person. Am I right, or am I misunderstanding the issue? I am all for granny being the appropriate person.

“if a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, an adult who is named by the person in custody and to whom a constable is willing to send intimation”

Tam Baillie: You are talking about the “appropriate person” for 16 and 17-year-olds, but the policy memorandum talks about a “responsible person”. The Convention of Scottish Local Authorities has already made representations that if the assumption is that the “responsible person” for a 16 or 17-year-old will be a social worker or legal representative, it seems to me that they do not have to be provided by the state, the voluntary sector or anybody else. Section 31(5)(b) states that,

“if a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, an adult who is named by the person in custody and to whom a constable is willing to send intimation”

The Convener: That phrase does not appear in the bill—it is just in the policy memorandum.
would still be able to have a responsible person present, but they could waive their right to legal representation. However, I understand that, if they did not have a responsible person present, they would have to have legal representation. Also, there may well be vulnerable young people for whom you would want legal representation to be present. Therefore, it is a judgment call.

In my estimation, the bill strikes just about the right balance, but I recognise that there may be pressures. People may say that there should be blanket legal provision, but that would have resource implications. I am mindful of the representations that have been made to the committee about the need to be careful if children aged 16 or 17 waive their right to legal representation. Therefore, there is a judgment to be made.

Morag Driscoll: We have some real concerns about the issue. As Tam Baillie correctly points out, the age of majority is 18, and a young person who is believed to have committed an offence will normally be dealt with through the children’s hearings system. However, we get calls to our advice line about the issue. Last year, we received 3,800 calls and a substantial number of those dealt with criminal matters.

We find that young people waive their right to a solicitor when they should have one present because they do not understand the situation. One autistic youngster was offered a lawyer and when his father, who was not allowed to be with him at that stage, asked why he had declined, the youngster said, “What’s a lawyer?” Some young people’s parents will also tell them, “You don’t need a lawyer because you’re innocent.” The young man who did not know what a lawyer was had a social worker with him.

There are so many stresses that a young person can be under and assumptions that they can make—they can be frightened or feel that they do not need a lawyer—that I worry about their having the ability to waive the right to legal representation. Having somebody with them is no guarantee that the right decision will be made. I would rather that we errred on the side of providing legal representation for all people who are vulnerable enough not to be considered full adults.

Having a parent present is not necessarily appropriate, as parents no longer have the right to direct once the child is over 16; they have only the right to guide. If the young person wants their parent to be with them, that is great and a sign of a healthy relationship. However, they may not have a healthy relationship with their parent—it may be fraught with difficulties or the parent may be involved in the crime. Therefore, I would favour the young person having the choice or, by default, a professional being brought in when necessary.

The Convener: The parent could be the victim, too.

Morag Driscoll: Yes, or a sibling could be the victim. All sorts of conflict could be set up. I worry about saying that, because somebody is 16 or 17, we will recognise their autonomy in the way that is proposed. It is great to recognise their autonomy, but protections must be built in, in case the child is a high-functioning sufferer of an autistic spectrum disorder, for example, and nobody has realised. For somebody who is in care, it may be more appropriate that they have their foster parent with them.

The Convener: Do we not then come back to the judgment of what is vulnerable? There is an issue about evidence. If a vulnerable person does not get protection, the evidence could be disallowed.

Morag Driscoll: Perhaps we should presume that someone who is under 18 is vulnerable, unless we are sure that they are not. We should not be saying that someone is not vulnerable until we are sure that they are.

The Convener: I would have difficulty with that, but I am just mumbling away to myself. Can an 18-year-old who has two kids be presumed to be vulnerable?

Morag Driscoll: No. It is about 16 and 17-year-olds.

The Convener: Can a 17-year-old with two kids be presumed to be vulnerable?

Tam Baillie: I am not going to go to the wire on that one. The bill has just about got it right. I recognise some of Morag Driscoll’s reservations. If the committee feels strongly that there should be no discretion as a matter of course, it will need to satisfy itself that that is manageable and that it will achieve the right result, which is proper safeguards for children and young people. At some point, we will have to look at the definition of vulnerability.

Morag Driscoll: I am not suggesting that there should be no discretion at the ages of 16 and 17, but we need to be satisfied that a young person understands the right that they are waiving.

Mark Ballard: Barnardo’s Scotland entirely shares Morag Driscoll’s concerns.

Section 42 says that when constables are deciding whether to hold a child in custody or interview a child about an offence, the wellbeing of the child should be of primary concern. That is directed at everyone under the age of 18. However, section 30(2) says that intimation must be sent if the child is under 16, but may be sent if the child is over 16; section 30(3) says that intimation is to be sent to the parent if the child is... under 16, but can be sent to any person who is “reasonably named” by a child who is over 16; and section 31(5) says that an “appropriate person” for the under 16s means any person who the constable considers to be appropriate, but for 16 and 17-year-olds, it can be any adult who is reasonably named by the young person.

It seems to us that there is an inconsistency between the blanket position described in section 42, which is that someone who is under 18 is a child and their wellbeing should be the primary concern, and the way in which sections 30 and 31 treat 16 and 17-year-olds as if they are adults and in the same category as adults. There seems to be a disconnect between different sections in the bill.

Tam Baillie is quite right to say that a judgment needs to be made, but from Barnardo’s Scotland’s point of view, there is a disconnect between whether we consider those who are under 18 to be children, as in section 42, or adults, as is effectively done in relation to intimations in section 30(2).

The Convener: I should say to Tam Baillie that shrugging or making faces is not recorded—you have to say something.

Tam Baillie: I do not have a problem with increased protection for young people up to the age of 18, at the same time as there is increased recognition of the capacity of children as they reach the age of 18 to know their voice, their views and their opinions. I do not think that that is a contradiction.

The Convener: That is an interesting point, and the committee will probably reflect on it in its stage 1 report. There are conflicting views about the differences between under 16s, and 16 and 17-year-olds.

Elaine Murray wanted to draw attention to something.

Elaine Murray: Yes. Section 25 is about consent to interview without a solicitor. Sub-paragraphs 25(2)(b)(i) and (ii) provide for someone who is unable to “understand sufficiently what is happening”.

Surely the young person who does not understand what a solicitor is or thinks that they do not need one because they are innocent would be caught by that provision.

Morag Driscoll: You are relying on the police who are doing the interview to spot that, and they might not necessarily spot it in someone who is apparently high functioning. You are asking frontline police officers to have a lot of expertise in spotting these things. That is worrying, particularly when so many of these kids appear to be confident and to know what is going on; in fact, they are not confident and do not know what is going on. They can be very reluctant to say, “I don’t get it,” and just retire into saying, “No comment,” or, as some young people have said, “It was easier to say that I had done it.”

11:00

The Convener: Okay. You have made that point.

Alison McInnes: I turn to the length of time that suspects can be held in custody. The bill reduces the current 24-hour maximum detention period, but we heard from the SHRC representative on the previous panel that it would like the period to be reduced to six hours. In particular, the SHRC questioned whether it was ever right for vulnerable or young people to be held in custody for longer than six hours. What is the panel’s view on that issue?

Morag Driscoll: The Child Law Centre feels strongly that consideration should be given to how long a child should be held and whether a child should ever be held in a police station. There are protections in the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 in relation to children not being held in police stations unless absolutely necessary, in which case they should be held for the minimum time possible.

Vulnerable witnesses can be interviewed in much more relaxed surroundings, such as the amethyst room; perhaps we could look at options along those lines. If a child has to be held because of their behaviour, could we look at alternatives? Children could be held in units or other places. We must also look at the length of time for which a child is held. Is it appropriate for a child to be held for the same length of time as an adult? We have some concerns.

There is the idea that children could be questioned at home. That sounds wonderful, but we are getting too many calls about situations in which children have not had solicitors because the police have told the family, “We could talk to you at home. You can have a lawyer, but you will have to go to the police station for that.” Children are being done, because the parent is torn between taking their child down to a place that they have seen on television, or keeping them at home, in which case the child will not have a solicitor. There are real tensions around where children are interviewed and held. Sometimes it is necessary to hold a child who is really going off the scale or has been accused of something that is very dangerous, but we still have to look at the appropriateness of the practice. Such an approach is taken elsewhere in legislation.

Alison McInnes: Can you explain what an amethyst room is?
The Convener: What room?

Alison McInnes: I think that Morag Driscoll mentioned the amethyst room, where children could be interviewed.

Morag Driscoll: Child witnesses or young people who are allegedly victims of a sexual offence are usually interviewed by a specialist police squad called the amethyst squad. The interview room tends to be very comfortable—it is a sitting room with padded chairs and a camera that can record the interview. They are interviewed in an environment that is much more comfortable than a normal police interview room, which has hard furniture that is stuck down, and which usually does not smell very nice.

The Convener: I do not always have an image of someone under 17 who is taken in by the police being a sensitive flower. Without prejudging them, some of them can be gey tough.

Morag Driscoll: Yes, they can be, but I am talking about children from 13 up to maybe 16 or 17. They are not all tough. If they were all that tough, we would not send them through the children’s hearings system.

The Convener: I never said that they are all tough, but they are not all shrinking violets. I am balancing it with what the public see.

Morag Driscoll: That is my point. I am saying that there must be a balance between the vulnerable accused—the police might get better information from an interview in a less intimidating environment—and the tough nut who has been there lots of times before and is quite proud of that because they come from a family that regards it as a rite of passage. A balance must be struck. However, I would always question whether we should automatically hold children in a police station, and there are already protections in the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Tam Baillie: I said that I warmly welcome the bill’s definition of a child as someone under the age of 18, because that is consonant with the UNCRC. In fact, it is quite clear that, to be in line with the UNCRC, a child should be held or detained as a last result and for the minimum possible period. That approach should be adopted in the bill. If a child is detained for longer than six hours, there should be stringent safeguards around why that is the case. We already attend to the issue diligently in the children’s hearings system, as there are very strict rules about children being held in secure accommodation. There is an opportunity to bring in a similar discipline under the bill, on the basis that people under the age of 18 are children.

Mark Ballard: I agree entirely with that. Again, I draw the committee’s attention to section 42. The stringent safeguards that Tam Baillie talked about should be built into the early parts of the bill that deal with arrest, for example. At the moment, no clear link is drawn between the different treatment of children outlined in section 42 and the early parts of the bill that, as Alison McInnes pointed out, deal with matters such as six-hour and 12-hour stays in a police station. That needs to be drawn out more fully to enable the police to understand how to take into account their responsibilities under section 42.

Rachel Stewart: It is up to the police to determine within six hours whether suspects who may have a mental disorder are vulnerable and require assistance with communication. Getting an appropriate adult, social worker or someone else who can help to facilitate the information transfer between police, solicitor and the individual can take a lot of time, especially in rural areas, especially if the scheme that the local authority operates is not well resourced and especially if a social worker has to be extracted from their day job or the person is needed in the middle of the night. That is something to consider.

Alison McInnes: Has an opportunity been missed in the bill to tackle the requirements of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and raise the age of criminal responsibility to 12?

Tam Baillie: Yes.

Alison McInnes: Would you urge us to raise the age?

Tam Baillie: Yes. The Government has already made a commitment to consider the matter. The issue is whether the bill is the way to do it. In the absence of any indication that there will be another criminal justice bill, the matter must at least be raised to get some clarity on how the Government will give effect to its commitment to raise the age of criminal responsibility, which I welcome.

Mark Ballard: I completely agree with what Tam Baillie has just said. I draw the committee’s attention to the commitment that the Scottish Government made in the “Do the Right Thing Progress Report 2012” on its progress on advancing the rights of the child and the UNCRC. It said that it would “give fresh consideration to raising the age of criminal responsibility from 8 to 12 with a view to bringing forward any legislative change in the lifetime of this Parliament.” As Tam Baillie says, in the absence of any other legislation that could do that “in the lifetime of this Parliament”, it would seem entirely appropriate for the Scottish Government to do it in the bill. That would be in appropriate to insert it at this stage. That is the time to test the proposition thoroughly so that we Government would have the mechanism or the doubt whether, at this stage, we and the committee ought to test such propositions. It is about process. The Government and the substantive decision has been made.

The Convener: Do you accept the point that the previous panel of witnesses made on that? They were sympathetic to the idea, but they said that it is a biggie. It would be a really big thing to do in the bill at this stage. We would have to go out to consultation and have more witnesses before the committee at stage 1. We are already on our fourth panel, I think. Although the previous witnesses were sympathetic—I am not pre-empting how members of the committee might feel about the idea—they felt that it is too big a thing to plump in now. It might be better to put it in another bill.

Mark Ballard: In response to that, I again highlight the commitment that the Scottish Government made in the “Do the Right Thing Progress Report 2012”—

The Convener: It is nothing to do with commitment.

Mark Ballard: —that it would consider introducing such legislative change

“In the lifetime of this Parliament.”

The substantive change was delivered through the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, under which the age of criminal prosecution was raised to 12. From our point of view, we are talking about a loophole that needs to be closed. The substantive decision has been made.

The Convener: I am talking not about principle but about process. The Government and the committee ought to test such propositions. It is doubtful whether, at this stage, we and the Government would have the mechanism or the time to test the proposition thoroughly so that we could get it right, so I am not sure that it would be appropriate to insert it at this stage. That is the only point that I am making. The members of the previous panel were quite sympathetic to the idea of raising the age, but they doubted whether it could be done in the bill.

Alison McInnes: In the evidence that it gave as part of the previous panel, the Scottish Human Rights Commission made it clear that the bill is absolutely the right vehicle for raising the age.

The Convener: It did. Forgive me—it was the two professors who had doubts.

Alison McInnes: The point is that raising the age is unfinished business from the 2010 act.

The Convener: I misrepresented the SHRC, but the two professors were of the view that there is already enough going on.

Morag Driscoll: The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, which is also going through the Parliament, deals with getting it right for every child, talks about supporting young people and puts emphasis on the UNCRC. The proposed change is unfinished business. As my colleague said, it is not a major change but a leftover change. It would stop us having the youngest age of criminal responsibility in Europe, which is something to be ashamed of. In other countries that do not criminalise the under-12s, the sky has not fallen in, and we have other ways of dealing with the issue. Let us finish the job. Last time, we did only half the job; in fact, we did three quarters of it. This is the last bit, and the bill is the perfect opportunity to do it.

The Convener: You have made the case powerfully. Does anyone else wish to comment?

Tam Baillie: At the very least, the committee should raise the issue in its report.

The Convener: I think that we will. The matter has been raised in our evidence sessions. Members will have views on whether the issue ought to be included, but it is certainly a good point to raise.

I will take John Finnie next, because he has not been in yet. I have to watch my Johns.

John Finnie: You are very kind, convener.

I go straight to section 42, which is entitled “Duty to consider child’s best interests”. There is engagement between the public sector, the police and the local authorities, all of which signed up to the GIRFEC principles with regard to joint investigations. I understand that, despite the fact that great improvements have been made, there is still a tension to do with whose interests are being served and what objectives the different sides have to achieve. Section 42(2) states:
"In taking the decision, the constable must treat the need to safeguard and promote the well-being of the child as a primary consideration."

On one level, that may seem a laudable concern, but I am sure that many cops would say, “My job is to investigate crime.”

My question is twofold. The bill states that “the well-being of the child” should be “a primary consideration”, but the SHRC says that it should be the paramount consideration. Would you like to comment on the existing tension? How will training—I imagine that considerable training will be required—address the implementation of that provision? I ask that as someone who used to be a representative of police officers, who would see their obligation as being to investigate crime.

Tam Baillie: I warmly welcome the fact that the phrase “child’s best interests” is in the bill, but I suggest that we should be consistent in our use of terminology, because “best interests” turns into “well-being” in section 42(2). I think that it would be wise to have “best interests” in section 42(2).

This discussion has a resonance with some of the debate that will unfold as part of the consideration of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, where, in my estimation, “best interests” turns into “well-being” in section 42(2). I do not entirely see how best interests can be treated as a paramount consideration. I am uncertain how wellbeing, which is multifaceted, could be primary, but I can entirely see how best interests can be treated as paramount. As Tam Baillie said, there is case law on it, but we have case law on “best interests” as well. We are in a place where we should consider how consistent we are with regard to those obligations.

Mark Ballard: I strongly agree with everything that Tam Baillie said in supporting having “best interests” in the bill and on the challenge that police officers will face in making the transition. As he said, it is part of a wider transition that is driven by the getting it right for every child agenda.

I also agree with the points that the convener and Tam Baillie made about wellbeing. As defined in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, it is a multifaceted term that covers all the articles of the UNCRC. The more usual use, as the convener pointed out, is that the best interests or the welfare of the child are paramount, which is in accordance with article 3 of the UNCRC.

The different rights in the UNCRC that are translated into the GIRFEC wellbeing indicators might be in conflict; there might be a conflict between the right to privacy and the best interests of the child. It is important to us that welfare has paramountcy over all other rights and considerations. I am uncertain how wellbeing, which is multifaceted, could be primary, but I can entirely see how best interests can be treated as paramount. As Tam Baillie said, there is case law on that and on how a child’s welfare can be treated as a paramount consideration. I am not sure whether “wellbeing” is the right term. As has been pointed out, the title of section 42 contains the phrase “best interests”, which is not quite the same as wellbeing. It would be more helpful for police officers and consistent with things such as the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill if “welfare” or “best interests” were used as the primary consideration.
We fully support the principle that “best interests” should be in the bill and that GIRFEC will require change. We have seen that change happening in police forces, particularly in Highland.

The Convener: The darkest Highlands. [Laughter.]

Mark Ballard: Highland has been the GIRFEC pathfinder area.

John Finnie: Well said, Mr Ballard.

Morag Driscoll: There is a great degree of unanimity here. I endorse what both Tam Baillie and Mr Ballard have said. Wellbeing is a difficult concept to define in a legal context, whereas best interests and welfare have a long history, are well understood and are consistent across the legislation. The Faculty of Advocates has spoken strongly about the matter, as has the Law Society of Scotland, in relation to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. We need that consistency in relation to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill as well.

In respect of young people who offend or are dangerous to themselves and others, the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 already allows us to override the child’s best interests. It may not be in the child’s best interests for them to go into secure accommodation, but that may be necessary in the interests of the safety of the child or other people. When it comes to investigation, if the police are required to regard the best interests of the child as paramount, there may still be times when that needs to be overridden because things are dangerous or extreme. Such times are, mercifully, rare.

The Convener: I understood that. It is not your fault—it was mine for not understanding the explanations.

Tam Baillie: It is not clear to me from section 14, on investigative liberation, whether, in the exercise of that provision, the best interests of the child must be considered. That may be a drafting issue or it could be down to the fact that I have not quite understood it. However, I can imagine circumstances in which the imposition of a curfew would have a significant impact on a child’s best interests—for example, if the thing that kept them off the streets was the youth club that they attended and the curfew cut across that. It would be worth seeking reassurances on that.

My reading of the bill is that the intention is that consideration of the child’s best interests will ribbon its way through every stage of the process and will be taken into account particularly in relation to investigative liberation. If that is not the case, it should be, in order to make section 14 consistent with the other sections.

Mark Ballard: I offer clarification of the position of Barnardo’s on wellbeing. In relation to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, we believe that wellbeing is the appropriate term to use in planning children’s services, which needs to be done in the round, and in conducting a needs assessment, when the breadth of the child’s needs must be considered. We are concerned with wellbeing as a primary consideration and think that there are situations when, in relation to the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, wellbeing is the appropriate standard. However, we do not see it as the appropriate terminology for the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, for the reasons that we have discussed.

The Convener: I foresee a long debate at stage 1 about the drafting of the bill and that word.

I thank you all for your evidence. Is there anything that you want to add that we have not asked about?

Mark Ballard: I want to highlight issues where children are affected by the justice system through parental imprisonment. There is evidence to show that up to a third of prisoners’ children are present when their parent—

The Convener: Sorry, but where does that appear in the bill?

Mark Ballard: It is not in the bill, but we would like to see recognition of it in the bill. We talked about section 42 and the duty to consider the child’s best interests. Consideration should also be given to the impact of the imprisonment, detention and arrest of a parent on children and young people. We would like the committee to think about that as the bill goes forward.

The Convener: Thank you for putting that on the record.

Rachel Stewart: The training in supporting vulnerable persons that is specified in the policy memorandum, which will be dealt with in regulations, is very much for the appropriate adults. There might be a missed opportunity to ensure that the police, who are the gatekeepers for support for vulnerable people, are given appropriate training. As my colleagues have discussed, it is sometimes difficult to ascertain someone’s vulnerability.

The Convener: To give the police their due, in the past few years they have got a lot better at recognising the subtleties of autistic spectrum disorders and so on. I understand that they now undergo training in that.

Rachel Stewart: I agree. However, the custody sign-in sheet asks whether the person has a mental disorder or an illness and whether they have ever attempted suicide.
The Convener: We are not happy with the use of the phrase “mental disorder” in the bill, which would be reflected on forms and so on. The evidence to date has certainly not made us happy with that.

Alison McInnes: Is Ms Stewart’s point not that it is not sufficient to give someone a form and ask them to identify whether they are vulnerable? Are you not looking for more in-depth training?

Rachel Stewart: The questions that the police ask people when they enter custody might not catch somebody with a learning disability, as they might not say that they have a mental disorder. Also, some people who have a mental health problem and who have had a bad experience previously with the police might not want to disclose the fact.

The Convener: The point is that we are not happy with the use of that expression in the bill in general.

Tam Baillie: I offer a point of clarity following Mark Ballard’s point about children who are affected by their parents being arrested, detained or sentenced. If consideration of the best interests of the child is going to ribbon its way through the bill, it would be advisable to look at the sections that deal with arrest, detention and investigative liberation to ensure that they take account of the best interests of a child who may be affected by decisions on any of those things. That is the point of reference that you were looking for when you asked where the issue appears in the bill.

The Convener: Home might not be a good place to be sent back to, or it might be a good place.

Tam Baillie: Yes. It cuts both ways, but as long as it is in the bill, it will be a consideration.

The Convener: Thank you all very much for your evidence.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: Let us get back into harness, team. I welcome to the meeting today’s first panel of witnesses on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Murray Macara, Queen’s counsel, is from the Law Society of Scotland; James Wolffe QC is vice-dean of the Faculty of Advocates; Michael Walker is a senior policy officer of the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission; and Fraser Gibson is the head of the appeals unit in the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.

I would like to take questions from members in segments, as that will help the panel and help the clerks to draft the stage 1 report. We will start with questions on sentencing for weapons offences, then move on to sentencing of offenders on early release, then on to appeals and finally to the SCCRC. Can I have questions on sentencing for weapons offences?

Roderick Campbell: I will kick off with a very basic question. Does the panel think that the courts need increased sentencing powers to deal with offences involving the possession of knives and other offensive weapons?

The Convener: Panel members can self-nominate to answer questions; the microphone will come on and I will call you. Michael Walker is first, please.

Michael Walker (Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission): No. I defer to Murray Macara on this issue. I am here principally to speak to the issues involving the SCCRC.

The Convener: I beg your pardon. Who wants to answer this question, then? Murray Macara does.

Murray Macara QC (Law Society of Scotland): First, I thank you, convener, for the opportunity to give evidence. In answer to—

The Convener: I hope that you keep that spirit in mind as we get to the end of the evidence session.

Murray Macara: I might as well get the compliments out early.

The Convener: You must have heard that I do not do flattery. On you go.

Murray Macara: The Law Society has no particularly strong views about sentencing. It is not very long since the maximum sentence for carrying a knife or a bladed instrument was increased to four years. I do not know, but I suspect that that maximum sentence has not been imposed terribly often.

Having read the consultation document that accompanied the material that I was supplied with, I can readily understand the public’s concern about the prevalence of knife crime and the Parliament’s desire to address the scourge of knife crime.

Fraser Gibson (Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service): I, too, thank you very much for the invitation, convener.

Sentencing is clearly a matter for Scottish Government policy, rather than for the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. I note from the policy memorandum that the Scottish Government has outlined its policy on knife crime offences and, of course, as the Lord Advocate has often said, we are committed to tackling the scourge of knife crime in Scotland.

Roderick Campbell: This question is for Mr Gibson in particular. Are you able to say how many offences attract sentences close to the current maximum of four years?

Fraser Gibson: I am not, I am afraid. I do not think that we necessarily hold statistics on that at the moment.

Margaret Mitchell: I am given to understand that the figure might be that just one out of 805 offenders was given a sentence of four years and that 95 received a sentence of less than two years. In view of that, will the bill’s proposal to increase the maximum sentence from four to five years, which sounds good and as if it would be more of a deterrent, make a huge difference? If not, what would?

The Convener: I do not know whether anyone on the panel wishes to address that or feels able to do so.

Murray Macara: I do not know whether increasing the maximum sentence from four to five years will make much of a difference. I have no reason to doubt the statistics that Mrs Mitchell has quoted. However, I suspect that the answer lies in culture rather than penalty. Somehow, in some areas of Scotland, the culture of certain people carrying knives needs to be changed. I would think that deterrent sentences can address that culture only so far.

Margaret Mitchell: If the statistics are right that only one out of 805 offenders was given a sentence of four years, surely the maximum deterrent has not been tested sufficiently to justify bumping it up to five years.
Fraser Gibson: Perhaps one point to bear in mind is that anybody who pleads guilty to a crime will get a discount in sentence. Certainly, in cases with guilty pleas we would not expect to see the maximum four-year sentence imposed, even if the judge was discounting that. The actual sentences that have been imposed might not give the full picture.

Margaret Mitchell: Is there a more general point then that we really need the statistics and evidence before us in order to judge how sentences are working and how effective the bill’s proposals might be?

The Convener: I do not know whether that is a matter for the Crown Office, but it might be a matter for Mr Macara.

Murray Macara: The material that I have been supplied with—in other words, the policy memorandum—contains a lot of information about the progress that has been made in recent years but I suspect that more research is needed.

The Convener: Just to clarify for the record, what type of cases relating to possession of a knife or offensive weapon would attract the maximum sentence?

Murray Macara: The record of the accused would determine the imposition of the maximum sentence. Undoubtedly, someone sentenced to four years’ imprisonment—which, indeed, has been imposed on one occasion—must have a significant record for either carrying knives or violence.

The Convener: In your experience, have any first-time offences attracted the maximum sentence? What kinds of offensive weapons or knives would a person have to be carrying in that case?

Murray Macara: It is inconceivable that a first offender would attract the maximum sentence.

The Convener: So a person wandering about Princes Street with, say, a machine gun would not in theory get the maximum sentence.

Murray Macara: We are talking about knives here, though.

The Convener: We are talking about knives and offensive weapons.

Murray Macara: Someone with a machine gun would be prosecuted under different legislation.

The Convener: Glad to hear it.

Elaine Murray will ask about the sentencing of offenders on early release.

Elaine Murray: Section 16 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 allows a court to order that a person who has committed an offence during a period of early release from a custodial sentence be returned to custody to serve part or all of the period of the whole sentence still outstanding at the point when the new offence was committed. Although sections 72 and 73 alter that in some respects, the policy memorandum suggests that those changes “do not substantively change the overall powers of our courts in this area”.

Do you agree that the proposed changes will have a minimal effect on the courts?

Fraser Gibson: That is certainly my view.

Murray Macara: I agree. In my experience, courts are alert to the fact that the man who is about to be sentenced has been released early and they will generally take into account the provisions in section 16 of the 1993 act. I do not think that this change to oblige the court to take the matter into account will make a significant difference.

The Convener: We are whizzing on here. With regard to the appeals procedure, do you share concerns raised in the Carloway report about delays in progressing appeals in the current procedure? Surely that cannot be in the interests of justice either for the person appealing or for the Crown, which might itself be making an appeal.

Fraser Gibson: There have been a number of cases in the recent past—not, I hope, so much nowadays—in which appeals have taken an excessive length of time to come to a conclusion.

The Convener: What do you mean by an excessive length of time? Are we talking about years?

Fraser Gibson: Indeed. An example of that is the recent European Court of Human Rights decision on the William Beggs case, as a result of which Mr Beggs was awarded a sum of money because of the considerable number of years that his appeal had taken.

The Convener: I am afraid that I do not know that case. How many years are we talking about?

Fraser Gibson: I do not have the details with me, but I think that it might have been as many as five or six.

Michael Walker: I can also tell the committee that an SCCRC referral appeal that was heard on Friday has taken six years to reach the preliminary hearing stage. We are not even talking about a final decision in that case.

The Convener: Do these cases involve people in custody?

Michael Walker: Yes.
The Convener: Do people remain in custody all that time while they wait for their appeal to be heard?

Michael Walker: Generally, yes.

The Convener: Are they ever released pending the appeal?

Fraser Gibson: They are entitled to apply for interim liberation. Obviously, the court assesses the risk that the person in question poses before reaching any decision.

The Convener: What causes these delays? Six years seems an extraordinary length of time.

Fraser Gibson: The European court opinion on Beggs contains a detailed analysis of the cause for the delay in that case.

The Convener: Crumbs—I missed that. Can you give me the bullet points?

Fraser Gibson: I can certainly make that available to the committee. In some cases the delay has been down to appellants seeking to add new grounds of appeal over the years as the appeal goes on, or seeking to recover other documents, which has spun out the legal process to the extent that it takes a number of years. I can think of another commission referral—Graham Gordon—that took a number of years to come to a conclusion.

Michael Walker: It is not always the fault of the court or the process. Sometimes the appellant changes solicitors or legal teams and, each time they do that, the new team comes to the case anew. As Fraser Gibson said, appellants sometimes add additional grounds and the case can seem to spin out of control before it eventually comes to an end.

The Convener: What do the proposals in the bill do to remedy that? Do they go far enough? Should something else be done to accelerate appeals within reason, given that those other issues will remain?

James Wolfe QC (Faculty of Advocates): I belatedly add my thanks to the committee for allowing me to appear today.

No one could justify delay in the disposal of criminal appeals. In Scotland, we are proud of the expedition with which we deal with first instance business in the criminal courts and we should collectively be striving to achieve the same in the appeal court.

The committee should perhaps appreciate that the proposals in the bill, particularly in sections 76 and 77, are specifically focused on the question of late notes of appeal and late grounds of appeal and the like. They do not deal directly with the subsequent progress of appeals. That is very much left to the courts’ case management responsibilities and that is firmly within the province of the court.

The specific proposals to deal with late notes of appeal and late grounds of appeal allow the court to permit those to be lodged in what is described as “exceptional circumstances” and the court must then have regard to certain things in deciding whether the circumstances are exceptional.

Wearing my other hat as a council member of Justice Scotland, I draw the committee’s attention to the observations of that body in its written evidence to the committee. It makes the point that, on the face of it, the provisions in sections 76 and 77 would restrict access to the appeal court. The court already has a discretionary power to refuse to receive late notes of appeal and grounds of appeal. One would imagine that the court might be relied on to allow such documents to come in only when that is properly justified. Justice Scotland expresses the concern that narrowing access to the appeal court at the stage of an appeal being taken would restrict access to justice by restricting access to a process that puts right miscarriages of justice. It is ultimately tied to the consideration that the committee will have to give to the role of the SCCRC. If appeals are knocked out at that stage, they might simply go to the SCCRC and be considered at a later stage.

Murray Macara: I do not want to introduce a note of complacency but, until now, the questions have focused on the issue of delay and one or two examples have been given of exceptional delay. However, those are exceptional cases. I appreciate that Lord Carloway is concerned about the possibility of delay in the appeals process, but some appeals are processed expeditiously; I am thinking particularly of appeals against sentences that come up within two months or so.

We have a system that is capable of delivering appeals to conclusion very quickly. What must be remembered are the causes of delay. Michael Walker’s example of a six-year delay was in an SCCRC referral. Inevitably, a commission referral takes longer than conventional appeals because anyone who is successful in obtaining a commission referral must have exhausted the conventional appeal process before going to the commission.

11:15

Fresh evidence and defective representation appeals inevitably take longer than other appeals. For example, defective representation appeals invariably involve a change of solicitor. Therefore, there are reasons for delay. My concern is that introducing an excessively rigid system could bring about miscarriages of justice. In the wider picture, it may not necessarily be—I will trot out a phrase that we will no doubt use later—in the interests of justice that an appellant with a good appeal should be denied the opportunity to appeal simply because of an excessively rigid and fixed timetable.

The Convener: Generally, you are not happy.

Murray Macara: Generally not happy.

The Convener: That is fine. Other members will probe why that is the case.

John Finnie: My question is perhaps a bit off script but, given that we are talking about delays, I wonder whether the panel will comment on the circumstances of someone who is convicted, serves a period in custody and then, some years on, seeks avenues of redress, which may be limited, only to find that the Crown no longer retains some or all of the documentation.

The Convener: That matter is not related to the bill.

John Finnie: That is why I gave a preamble and hesitated about asking the question.

The Convener: I am sweeping your question to the side, but you have made your point.

Roderick Campbell: How often are they used? Does anyone have statistics on that?

The Convener: Nobody is indicating that they wish to respond; I will not force anyone to do so.

Alison McInnes: Roderick Campbell has just covered the issue that I was going to ask about.

I draw members’ attention to my entry in the register of interests and the fact that I am a council member of Justice Scotland.

Margaret Mitchell: I take what was said about restricting access to justice, but is there not a balance to be had in a little bit of flexibility? Will the panel therefore comment on the Carloway report’s recommendations that were not taken up, such as the High Court’s power to impose sanctions with the aim of enforcing time limits and procedural orders and, in particular, the power to order particular steps to be taken, such as not making funds available from the public purse?

The Convener: The panel cannot comment on that.

Margaret Mitchell: Without being too prescriptive in relation to the recommendations, I know that the Crown is quite supportive of doing whatever it can to increase efficiency and effectiveness.

The Convener: Perhaps the Crown does not want fines or conditions imposed on it. It might be the Crown at fault. I am not saying that the Crown is at fault—I am just saying that it might be.

Fraser Gibson: I am not sure that it is appropriate for me to comment on that, convener.

Margaret Mitchell: Nobody has any comments?

The Convener: Are there any practical things that the court could do to focus agents on both sides on increasing efficiency? You cannot tell me that no delays can be avoided. There must be delays that could be avoided in the appeal procedure. Should the court perhaps have some means of penalising parties, so to speak?
Fraser Gibson: It is perhaps fair to say, lest the committee comes away with the impression that delays are commonplace in appeals these days, that the court has made substantial progress over the past few years in dealing with delays. It has done that primarily by dealing with business efficiently, by appointing an administrative judge for appeals and by being strict about applying time limits on cases and allowing additional grounds of appeal to be lodged late. That is why sentence appeals are now dealt with expeditiously and solemn conviction appeals are dealt with much more quickly than they were a few years ago.

The court has made some progress in that direction, for which it is only fair to give it credit. That is not to say that other improvements could not be made, but I do not think that it is the Crown Office’s place to say exactly what they should be.

James Wolffe: I concur with that observation. Mr Gibson has a much closer and more intimate knowledge of the appeal court than I do, but it would be wrong to give the impression that nothing has been done or is being done by the court in the exercise of its case management powers.

The court can do a great deal by being rigorous in the application of time limits, by exercising discretion carefully and by insisting on explanations that are satisfactory before steps are allowed to be taken out of time. Ultimately, the court needs to bear in mind its responsibilities not only to administer justice but to secure that justice is done within a reasonable time.

The steps that the court is able to take are perhaps not steps that are susceptible to legislation because they depend on the court exercising the powers that are available to it in the course of a case, with a view to securing the effective administration of justice. I concur with Mr Gibson that a great deal of the work can be done through the court’s administration powers.

Margaret Mitchell: Can I put it another way, convener?

The Convener: I do not know, but you can try.

Margaret Mitchell: Do you feel that the Carloway recommendations on the court being able to impose sanctions, which would enforce time limits and procedural rules and perhaps help efficiency, are unnecessary? By and large, there is not a problem—that is coming over loud and clear—and I do not think that anything ever works perfectly, so has the Carloway report highlighted unfairly that that proposal should be considered?

James Wolffe: Perhaps I can offer this comment—our difficulty with that particular proposal is that lawyers who are involved in the representation of their clients could be penalised for steps being done out of time in circumstances in which that was not their fault.

If one thinks of a change of agency, for example, a new agent may take the view that it is their professional responsibility to seek to advance a new ground of appeal even though it is very late. The agent may take the view that that is the right thing to do in the interests of their client. It would be unfair, one might think, if such a lawyer were to be penalised simply because their application was being made late.

Margaret Mitchell: The recommendation is that the court can impose measures; it is not that it must impose them. There would therefore be an element of discretion to cover the situation that you outlined. However, where there was no justification the sanction would be there to send the very strong message that there is no excuse for a delay in particular situations.

James Wolffe: One would then have a satellite set of inquiries into precisely how a particular state of affairs came about. The Scottish Government has perhaps wisely taken the view that it does not wish to pursue that particular proposal.

Margaret Mitchell: So, the Carloway review obviously failed to take that into account when it made its recommendation.

James Wolffe: In many of these issues, we are dealing with matters upon which different views may reasonably be taken by different people.

Margaret Mitchell: Much could be said on both sides.

Sandra White: I will pick up on those points about different views from different people, penalties and so on. When a case is moved to another lawyer, the original lawyer may feel penalised if they are not able to bring forward the appeal. Is it the client or the lawyer who would feel penalised if he was not able to make the appeal? If an appeal was made, would that be on the basis of new evidence? What would be the relevant aspects?

You suggest that appeals that take six years to be heard are the exception. I note your comments about people having different opinions. What are the criteria for appeals if a case goes on for six years, particularly bearing in mind situations that involve changing lawyers or a lawyer finding a new piece of evidence? I would like to hear your opinion on that, and on exactly what constitutes a late appeal. Is it the lawyer or the client who is penalised?

James Wolffe: The basic ground of appeal is that of a miscarriage of justice. There are a variety of different ways in which a miscarriage of justice might be said to have occurred. There could be a variety of circumstances in which a particular issue arises outwith the normal time limit. Ultimately, if an appeal is not allowed to proceed or if a particular ground of appeal is excluded, it is the client—the accused, or the convicted individual—who is losing the right of appeal or the opportunity to appeal.

If a ground upon which one could reasonably conclude that there had been a miscarriage of justice is knocked out of the ordinary appeal process, the person has the remedy, in our system, of going to the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission. The commission then has to exercise its judgment as to whether the appeal should be referred back to the appeal court. Ultimately, if a potentially good appeal is excluded from the system, it goes without saying that it is the convicted individual who does not have the opportunity to ventilate that ground in the appeal court who is losing out.

Murray Macara: In this respect, we are talking about appeals against conviction, rather than appeals against sentence. The problem is that we cannot generalise about appeals against conviction. There are straightforward appeals in which the sole point might concern there being insufficient evidence to allow the jury to convict. There might have been a misdirection by the trial judge. Such appeals can and do take place very swiftly.

The problem often arises because the appellant thinks that he has fresh evidence or that his existing solicitor or previous solicitor and counsel misrepresented him. Invariably, those issues require investigation and that is where delay creeps in. Often, what an appellant thinks is a good argument for an appeal with regard to, say, defective representation or fresh evidence does not, in fact, fit within the fairly narrow framework that the courts apply in such appeals. However, nevertheless, to satisfy the client, those matters require to be investigated.

That might be an aspect of the case that the appeal court is reluctant to acknowledge, but the client’s wishes have to be followed to an extent in investigating whether the previous solicitor did not represent the accused to an appropriate standard.

Sandra White: That was the point. Thank you very much for being so concise and clarifying it for me. If the appellant is not happy with the representation, he can appoint another lawyer to appeal the case.

Murray Macara: Invariably, that leads to delay and the system must be able to accommodate that delay. That is simply what I am saying.

Sandra White: Thank you. That has clarified it for me.

The Convener: This area is quite technical for us and I will ask a couple of questions to get at some of your issues. Do I take it that you are not happy with the phrase “exceptional circumstances” popping up throughout section 76 and into section 77? Would you be happy if the bill just said “the High Court may make a direction only if it is satisfied that doing so is justified” period and left it to the court to take a view on whether it is justified, rather than introducing a test of exceptional circumstances? You have talked about process and ensuring that cases are managed more efficiently. Would you prefer that the words “exceptional circumstances” were simply not in those sections?

Murray Macara: I would like it toned down.

The Convener: What does that mean? Does it mean that we should take out “exceptional circumstances” or that we should put in other words?

Murray Macara: We should put in another phrase, such as “unless it is satisfied in the interests of justice”.

The Convener: It already says: “only if it is satisfied that doing so is justified”. Instead of “justified”, do you want words such as “in the interests of justice”? I am not asking you to amend on the hoof, but do you want something like that?

Murray Macara: Something like that. Everything in law is about setting barriers or thresholds. No doubt the parliamentary draftsmen who were responsible for section 77 were entrusted with the task of ensuring that the threshold was set high in that provision. Our argument is that the bar should not be set quite so high.

The Convener: That applies in section 76 as well.

Murray Macara: Indeed.

The Convener: So something along the lines of “unless it is in the interests of justice” would be acceptable.

I move on to section 78, “Certain lateness not excusable”. That seems to me pretty draconian. There is no flexibility at all for the bench on written intimation of intention to appeal or the lodging of a note of appeal.

Fraser Gibson: It seems to me that that provision simply seeks to prevent people from circumventing the earlier provisions. There is a general power of dispensation in section 300A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 and section 78 simply says that it is not possible to use that general power of dispensation to get round the conditions in relation to the sections on solemn and summary appeal.

The Convener: So you are happy. I see happy faces, so that section is okay. I am trying to get to the issues with that fairly technical procedure.

Rod, do you want to come in?

Roderick Campbell: No, convener. I intended to ask a question on section 78, so you have stolen my thunder.

The Convener: Heavens. You have lots of thunder to come, though.

Murray Macara: We are not happy with section 78, because—

The Convener: You are not happy? I thought that you were all smiling at me.

Murray Macara: I am personally not particularly happy with section 78. Some imaginative lawyer will try to advance an argument as to what might constitute “exceptional circumstances” under sections 76 and 77. As Fraser Gibson explained, the purpose of inserting section 78 is to demonstrate what does not amount to an exceptional circumstance: a failure to lodge a note of appeal in accordance with the appropriate time limit.

The Convener: If we remove the words “exceptional circumstances”, what impact does that have on section 78?

Murray Macara: I would think that it has an impact on section 78.

Fraser Gibson: I am not sure that it does. All it means is that you would try to use section 300A. All that section 78 is doing is saying that you cannot use section 300A to circumvent the other provision, whether that involves exceptional circumstances or something else. Whether or not the test should be about exceptional circumstances would depend on the terms of the relevant section laying down the time limit for summary or solemn appeals. The Crown’s position is that a high test is justified for a late appeal. There should be some reason beyond the ordinary—whether it is classified as exceptional or something else—when someone is seeking to appeal late.

Mr Finnie raised a point about papers being destroyed. That just illustrates why if someone wants to seek remedies, they should do so quickly. No system can operate by perpetually revisiting old cases; it simply has to move on and litigate the current cases, otherwise it will cease to function. There is an onus on people, if they wish to exercise their right to justice, to do it quickly.

It seems to me that, as it is phrased, the exceptional circumstances test, although it contains the word “exceptional”, has an element of flexibility. The phrase “exceptional circumstances” is used, but the bill goes on to list the things that the court has to look at in reaching a decision, and part of that is the proposed grounds of appeal, which obviously brings into consideration the merits of the grounds of appeal, the length of time that has elapsed—in other words, how late someone is applying—and the reasons that have been given for their applying late. When you look at the reasons, you can see that the proposal allows the court to perform quite a careful balancing act, weighing how much merit it sees in an appeal against the reasons why it is so late, and to arrive at an accommodation that serves the interests of justice. That is how the court approaches such appeals at the moment—balancing the reasons for lateness against how good the grounds of appeal are before coming to a decision. I would be surprised if the court would substantially depart from that under the new test.

The Convener: How long do you keep papers for?

Fraser Gibson: It depends on the type of case, and it also depends on whether an appeal is marked on time, but we clearly cannot keep everything forever. It is not just a question of papers. Witnesses’ memories dim; witnesses die; some forensic evidence degrades. Nothing can exist in perpetuity.

The Convener: I ruled out John Finnie’s question about losing papers, and I jumped on him when he was trying to ask what would happen if the papers were not there. However, if somebody is lodging an appeal and one of the exceptional circumstances is that the papers were not available, that ties in with his question. I am just curious to know how long they are kept. Solicitors have to keep certain papers for quite a long time. How long do you keep papers for?

Fraser Gibson: It depends on the type of case.

The Convener: A solemn case.

Fraser Gibson: You asked about “papers”; it depends on the type of papers. Productions, for example, even in a murder case, may belong to a witness. If no appeal is lodged, that witness is entitled to get those things back. They might belong to an accused person, so the Crown does not have a right to hold on to productions or labels in perpetuity, even though in the most serious solemn cases the Crown papers should be retained for a long period of time. It depends what you mean by “papers”. It is not necessarily the same thing as evidence.

The Convener: I hear that. We shall come to the SCCRC in a minute. There may be fresh evidence or it may be felt that there has been a miscarriage of justice, so the court might need the papers some considerable time after conviction.

Fraser Gibson: That is the point that I am trying to make about why people should seek remedies quickly.

The Convener: I have to let John Finnie in now. I apologise.

John Finnie: If there were clarity about a document retention policy, which should apply across the public sector so that the citizen can know how long documents are retained for, there would be no dubiety about why, of a group of documents of similar status, some could be found but others could not, and it would be clear that there was nothing untoward about that.

Fraser Gibson: No system is perfect, no matter how you try to make it so. It simply would not be feasible to hold on to everything in perpetuity. An appellant knows, or should know, the time limits for lodging an appeal. They are there for a reason.

John Finnie: I previously tried to establish whether there was a document retention policy. Is there one?

Fraser Gibson: There is one. I do not have the exact detail of it to hand, but I can make that available to you.

The Convener: You have some homework now.

We will move on to the SCCRC, which is a hobby-horse of mine. During the progress of the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Bill in 2010 as emergency legislation, I tried to delete the entire section that changed the way in which the SCCRC operated and made referrals to the High Court. I do not know whether you are aware of that, Mr Walker.

Michael Walker: I was not aware of that.

The Convener: It would be helpful to me and other committee members if you could remind us of the process that applied before the 2010 act, including the criteria that the SCCRC applied before a referral and how the High Court had to respond.

Michael Walker: Of course, convener. The commission has a dual test. It must ask itself whether there may have been a miscarriage of justice and, as the second part of the test, whether it is in the interests of justice to refer the case to the High Court. What the emergency legislation in 2010 did was to give the appeal court—the High Court—for the first time the power to reject a reference by the commission where the court took the view that it was not in the interests of justice for the reference or the appeal to proceed to a full appeal hearing.

You are right. The commission’s position in 2010—and it remains its position—was that there should be no veto of a commission reference by the appeal court in the interests of justice at either stage of the appeal process. The current position is that, as I have just said, the court has the ability shortly after the reference is made to knock out the commission referral. The proposal in the bill is to move that to the end of the appeal process.

I will give you a couple of statistics that I think support the commission’s position. In the 14-year period since the commission’s inception in 1999, 67 per cent of the referrals that the commission has made to the appeal court have been successful. I think that it is fair to say that the commission has a high strike rate and does not—

The Convener: Does that figure refer to referrals on sentence and conviction?

Michael Walker: Sorry. I should have said that it refers to conviction and sentence. The total number of successful referrals is split almost 50:50 between conviction and sentence.

The point that I was going to make is that that statistic shows in blunt terms that the commission does not clog up the appeal court with spurious referrals. The 67 per cent statistic compares very favourably with that for normal appeals, where the success rate is under 1 per cent.

I will give one other statistic. Since the emergency legislation that gave the appeal court the power came into force, the commission has made 21 referrals to that court, of which the first 20 proceeded to a full appeal. That statistic shows that it is reasonable to infer that the commission does not use its interests of justice test unreasonably.

The Convener: What happened to the expression “finality and certainty” in relation to the SCCRC? It still lurks, does it not?

Michael Walker: “Finality and certainty” is in the emergency legislation. When the commission applies its interests of justice test, it has to have regard to finality and certainty.

The Convener: Did you do that before the emergency legislation?

Michael Walker: We did, convener. It was always part of the commission’s remit to do that. The legislation simply put it in statute. What is the definition of “finality and certainty”? That is a difficult question to answer. It would bring in the idea, which Fraser Gibson alluded to, that the proceedings have to come to an end at some point, so the age of the conviction is important. That is a factor that the commission would take into account in deciding whether it is in the interests of justice to refer the case.
Against that, however, a balance has to be struck, because the whole point of the commission’s function and its ethos is to allow recourse to someone who has had an appeal and, perhaps many years later, feels that they have suffered a miscarriage of justice and comes to the commission. If the commission takes the view that there may have been a miscarriage of justice in the case, the simple fact that it is old, even with our having regard to finality and certainty, is not a determinative reason not to refer the case.

The Convener: I do not know whether you have the figures on this, but how many cases in which people have considered that there may have been a miscarriage of justice have you not referred in the interests of finality and certainty and the interests of justice? How often has the test been applied and, as it were, prevented a referral?

11:45

Michael Walker: I do not have the second figure to hand. On your first point, the key statistic is that the commission rejects approximately 90 per cent of the applications that it receives, so only a very small number of cases are referred to the appeal court. Of that number—

The Convener: Is the commission refusing those applications on the basis that, in its view, there is no possibility that there has been a miscarriage of justice?

Michael Walker: Yes.

The Convener: I am trying to tease out how far the other test applies.

Michael Walker: I was going to come on to that. It is not common for the commission, where it has concluded that there may have been a miscarriage of justice, to conclude that it is not in the interests of justice to refer the case. I do not have the exact figures on that, but I can certainly get them for you.

The Convener: That would be useful—thank you.

Michael Walker: I can give you a couple of examples of where the commission takes that view. Sometimes an applicant asks the commission to review a particular offence, and the commission looks at the case and decides that there may have been a miscarriage of justice. However, if the person has been convicted of numerous offences in the same indictment or complaint, we may take the view that it is not in the interests of justice to refer the case because that would make no difference to the applicant’s sentence.

I will give a more topical example. There have been occasions following the Cadder judgment on which the commission has taken the view that a piece of evidence is inadmissible and that there may have been a miscarriage of justice in a technical sense but has gone on to say that the inadmissible evidence in question was not disputed at trial so it is therefore not in the interests of justice to refer the case.

The Convener: Yes, I see.

Michael Walker: We use that power—albeit sparingly, perhaps. In every case for which we are considering referral we will always take into account the interests of justice. To come back to my original point, we do not feel that the commission, following on from the Sutherland committee, should have its functions and remit—as the Lord Justice-General made clear in a recent case—simply duplicated by the appeal court. As the bill proposes, the appeal court should take its own view on whether it is in the interests of justice to knock out a case.

The Convener: So your position—as I understand it—is simply that you are glad that the gatekeeping role is gone, but that, if there has been a miscarriage of justice, the appeal should be allowed.

Michael Walker: I am saying that, in the vast majority of cases—

The Convener: By the High Court.

Michael Walker: It should not be for the High Court to decide whether it is in the interests of justice. The role was given to the commission, and if the commission decides that it is in the interests of justice—

The Convener: Absolutely—you are pushing at an open door with me in that regard, Mr Walker.

Michael Walker: Okay—I will say no more about it.

The Convener: I have not changed my position since the emergency legislation was introduced. Does anyone else want to ask the SCCRC any questions?

Roderick Campbell: Yes. I would like to clarify something, Mr Walker. It is my understanding that one of the reasons for the inclusion of the gatekeeping role in the emergency legislation was that it was feared that there would be a lot of applications post-Cadder. That situation has not materialised, as Lord Carloway has said.

Michael Walker: Right—it has absolutely not materialised. We received numerous Cadder applications, the bulk of which we rejected. Of those cases that we referred to the appeal court, which numbered fewer than a handful, all were successful. The opening of the floodgates that was predicted did not happen.
The Convener: What do you think of Lord Carloway’s argument that, if a case is referred by the SCCRC and we take away the gatekeeping of the High Court and the appeal court, but during the course of the appeal—this is very suppositional—the appellant confesses to another offence, it would not be in the interests of justice to allow such an appeal to be granted?

Michael Walker: That is an interesting argument to consider, and we have thought about it before. If the commission reached the view that there may have been a miscarriage of justice in a particular case—by applying some of the tests that James Wolfe pointed out—and then uncovered new information or evidence, or if the applicant confessed to that particular crime, we would perhaps not consider a referral to be in the interests of justice, albeit that we believed that there may have been a miscarriage of justice.

From what I understand, you are saying with regard to Lord Carloway’s example that somehow the confession may be made post the commission’s referral—

The Convener: Yes.

Michael Walker: That has never happened, and I do not foresee it ever happening.

The Convener: I thought that there would just be another trial.

Michael Walker: The applicant could certainly be retried.

The Convener: The argument was that it would therefore not be in the interests of justice. I think that Mr Gibson wants to say something.

Fraser Gibson: I think that something similar has happened in England. After the Criminal Cases Review Commission, which is the English equivalent of the SCCRC, referred a case, further forensic work was carried out and DNA evidence was uncovered years later that implicated the appellant in the murder. It was quite a famous case, but I cannot remember the name of it.

Michael Walker: Was it the Hanratty case?

Fraser Gibson: Possibly.

Michael Walker: I do not see that as an argument for retaining the interests of justice test.

Fraser Gibson: But it might have been what Lord Carloway had in mind.

The Convener: I do not think that it would be the same case. Would it not involve a separate crime? Of course, it could be the same case if there were a confession.

Fraser Gibson: The Crown Office supports the retention of an interests of justice test for the court for two reasons. First, it future proofs the system against things like the Cadder case happening again and, secondly, it guards against the possibility of error.

As Michael Walker has said, all the Cadder cases that the commission has referred and which have gone to argument before the appeal court have been successful. What that demonstrates is that in change-of-law cases one has to be careful about finality and certainty. After all, if a case is referred in which the essential corroborating admission is no longer available after the Cadder decision, because that admission was given without the benefit of legal advice, it is inevitable that the referral and appeal will succeed because, by the time we get to the appeal, there will be insufficient evidence. If the court did not have this power, it would not be able to do anything with a case referred in error in terms of the finality and certainty test except quash the conviction. Everyone accepts that the SCCRC does a very valuable job, performs a very valuable function and does an extremely difficult job, but anyone is capable of making an error. Of course, the appeal court recently rejected a referral in the case of Francis Carberry.

Michael Walker: As I understand it, the Carberry decision is still being litigated; Mr Carberry’s solicitors have sought special leave to go to the Supreme Court. As a result, I am not sure whether it is appropriate to discuss that case.

The important point is that, when you look at the commission’s track record, you just will not see all these mistakes that Fraser Gibson has suggested might or might not happen. In fact, our track record shows precisely the opposite. As for Mr Gibson’s very specific and technical point about sufficiency of evidence in the Cadder cases, I have already said that, in many of those cases, the commission applied its own interests of justice test and did not refer the cases to the appeal court. It is not that there has been a change of law, evidence has become inadmissible and the commission has simply referred every case to the appeal court—quite the reverse. The commission looked at all those cases and, in many instances, rejected them. They did not even reach the appeal court. I come back to my point that, in my view, that should be the function of the commission, not the appeal court.

The Convener: So you are the gatekeepers.

Michael Walker: I think so. The establishment of the commission followed the recommendations of the Sutherland committee, which made it quite clear that this particular role should not be given to the appeal court. That is why the commission exists.
Roderick Campbell: How is it equitable that only SCCRC appeals have an interests of justice test and other forms of appeal do not?

Fraser Gibson: The rationale, I guess, is that they are special. For a start, they emerge with time. Some cases arise many years late and in many of those cases a retrial will not be possible. Ultimately, the commission has to consider whether it is in the interests of justice to refer them; that is not a requirement for any timeous appeal, as long as it can be argued that the appellant can raise it and that it can get past sift and be heard by the appeal court.

Murray Macara: The Law Society of Scotland’s position is that the commission’s approach is an appropriate one. Since the commission was established in 1999, it has established a strong reputation and has great credibility. It sets about its tasks very conscientiously. From 1999 to 2013, it has applied all the appropriate tests: it has looked at whether there has been a miscarriage of justice; it has applied the broad test of the interests of justice; and it has looked at issues of finality and certainty. Our argument is that the commission should be trusted to continue doing that and that the High Court, as the appeal court, should concern itself simply with whether it has been established that there has been a miscarriage of justice.

James Wolfe: That is also the position of the faculty. Lord Carloway said in his review:

“The case for maintaining a gatekeeping role for the High Court would have greater force if there were a perception that the SCCRC had a significant track record of frivolous or inappropriate references and it were thought that some further measure was required to bring greater discipline to their activities. The Review is content to note that there has been no suggestion from any source, nor is there any other reason to suppose, that this is the case. Indeed, it seems to be widely accepted that, despite the occasional lapse, the SCCRC has been a conspicuous success in discharging its duties conscientiously and responsibly.”

Michael Walker: I would echo those thoughts.

The Convener: Quelle surprise!

Murray Macara: I wonder whether I can say something else. I know that we are not considering corroboration today—

The Convener: Oh please—do not mention the C-word!

Murray Macara: That is a treat yet to come for this committee. It must be a matter of concern to the commission that corroboration is likely to be abolished or may be abolished, because that could lead to the floodgates opening in terms of the number of applications going to the commission. You can imagine that an individual who was convicted on the basis of a single source of evidence might well want to pursue whatever remedies are open to them—the only remedy that might be open is an application to the commission. I suspect that if corroboration goes, the commission’s work will increase significantly.

The Convener: I already thought that that issue would be coming down the track. Roderick Campbell and Alison McInnes want to ask questions. I will take Alison first.

Alison McInnes: Convener, I am not having a good morning.

The Convener: It is allowed. I often have mornings like that.

Alison McInnes: I was going to discuss section 82, but I think that we have had a very clear exposition of the points of view on it already.

The Convener: Okay. I call Roderick Campbell.

Roderick Campbell: What do panel members think public opinion would be in circumstances where the court took a view that there was a miscarriage of justice but did not think it was in the interests of justice to allow the appeal? I know that it would depend on the case, but are there any general thoughts on that?

Michael Walker: I think that the public would have some difficulty coming to terms with the court at the end of the process finding that there had been a miscarriage of justice but saying, for another reason, that it was not in the interests of justice to allow the appeal. The role of the commission is to try to increase public confidence in curing miscarriages of justice. Will the public have less belief in its role if, at the end of the process, the appeal court simply stamps its foot and refuses to allow the appeal?

The Convener: I am not going to go into the merits or otherwise of corroboration, but do you think that abolishing it might result in a heavier workload for the SCCRC? Are you building that into your projections?

Michael Walker: I am not entirely sure whether we have thought that far ahead. We are entering the realms of a certain amount of guesswork. We have a very close relationship with our colleagues in the English commission. Given that they do not have corroboration, we have asked for statistics about the number of cases that they have. The picture is not clear. They generally deal with a proportionally similar number of cases and referrals to the SCCRC, but in England there are other safeguards—principally, the provision that in a jury case there must be a 10 to 2 majority, which we do not have. You cannot make a like-for-like comparison because it is difficult to find empirical data.
The Convener: Do you think that there would be an immediate impact on your workload?

Michael Walker: We are in the realms of guesswork, but yes, possibly.

The Convener: We have exhausted our questions for you. I thank the panel very much for attending. We will get to corroboration at some point. I will suspend the meeting for a couple of minutes while we change panels, but members should stay put.

11:59

Meeting suspended.

12:01

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel of witnesses. Alison Di Rollo is head of the national sexual crimes unit in the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service and Bronagh Andrew is assistant operations manager of the trafficking awareness-raising alliance project at Community Safety Glasgow. Thank you for waiting. We will go straight to questions from members.

Sandra White: Good afternoon. It is nice to see you here. My question is on a procedural matter. The bill will create two statutory aggravations relating to people trafficking, and provisions in relation to aggravating factors in general, where it is proven that someone committed an offence in circumstances in which one of the statutory aggravations is also established. How might the proposed statutory aggravations be used in practice? What difference will they make?

Alison Di Rollo (Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service): It probably falls to me to answer that. Aggravation will provide another element in the toolkit for prosecutors on receipt from the police of a case that could be about wide-ranging criminal activity of a sexual nature, of a financial nature or whatever.

Where it is not possible to find sufficient credible and reliable evidence to libel a substantive trafficking offence in section 4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc) Act 2004 or section 22 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003, the aggravation will enable us to lead evidence and to put to the court and the sentencer a context or background of trafficking that would aggravate the offence and so lead to a more extensive sentence. It will also allow the courts and criminal justice system to record more accurately human trafficking activity in this country.

I am pleased to be able to sit here today in a position where, to use that horrible phrase, the direction of travel—

The Convener: I agree—it is a horrible phrase.

Alison Di Rollo: The phrase is ghastly, but it makes the point that we have made progress in awareness, detection, prosecution and conviction of offenders who are involved in trafficking. We will—-one hopes—continue to do that. The proposed aggravation will give us increased flexibility and increased powers to bring evidence to the court to shine a light on that activity so that statistics are more robust and accused persons who are convicted of such heinous crimes are sentenced to longer periods of imprisonment.

Bronagh Andrew (Community Safety Glasgow): I agree with Alison Di Rollo that the aggravation will be another tool in our arsenal in the fight against human trafficking. Many of the women whom we support are extremely traumatised and have little information about the human traffickers, so it can be difficult for investigations to progress. We support the statutory aggravation offence for trafficking women.

Sandra White: I might be straying into another area—I seek your advice on that—but we have seen the recent revelations about young girls apparently being brought up to Scotland for genital mutilation. The bill includes aggravated offences. I am not suggesting that the bill should be rewritten, but do you think that aspects of the bill might pertain to that practice? It has been suggested that young women from England, Wales and other places are being brought up to Scotland for genital mutilation. Could that be considered in the context of the bill?

Alison Di Rollo: I do not think that the bill needs to be strengthened or expanded in that regard; rather, I think that that is a good example of the kind of context in which it could be used.

I will stress something that Baroness Kennedy mentioned in the Equality and Human Rights Commission’s report, which is that the aggravation will give us an opportunity to prosecute sexual offences in a wider context because genital mutilation crosses borders between child abuse, sexual abuse and physical abuse. If we had uncorroborated or evidentially weak information that a child had been trafficked in order to be mutilated, I am content that the provisions of the bill would allow us to factor that into preparation of our case and the evidence that we would lead in support of it, because the mutilation aspect is a discrete criminal offence in this country.

I am anxious to get back to my desk, because I am dealing with a trafficking case that involves extremely serious sexual offences. It might be the... right decision to prosecute for the extremely serious sexual offences, which include rape—an offence that attracts life imprisonment—along with either the accompanying substantive trafficking offences, if we can prove them, or with the aggravation that the rapes in question have been committed against a background of trafficking. Your point about female genital mutilation is highly pertinent. The case that I am dealing with strengthens my conviction that the aggravation provision is a helpful one.

I take the opportunity to make a clear statement that I hope will be of assistance to the committee: it will always be in the public interest to bring a substantive trafficking charge, either under section 4 of the 2004 act for exploitation, or under section 22 of the 2003 act for prostitution, where there is sufficient credible and reliable evidence, and we will do so. I make that statement to clarify that the aggravation will not be used as an easy option or a shortcut.

The Convener: I am looking at the bill’s definition of “people trafficking offence”, which refers to other legislation. I do not have a clear understanding of that definition, which has been extended. One tends to think of it as applying to sexual exploitation or exploitation at work, but I did not think about it in the context of the issue that Sandra White raised. What is the definition of “people trafficking offence” in law? I see that it is an offence under section 22 of the 2003 act.

Alison Di Rollo: Section 22 of the 2003 act is the provision that deals with trafficking in relation to prostitution. There are two key elements to it. That is interesting, because if we fall down on either of them, we will not be able to prosecute under that charge and we may fall back on the aggravation. The first essential element is to prove that the accused has arranged or facilitated “the arrival in the United Kingdom ... or travel there”.

That is the trafficking bit. We need to prove that they have been complicit in moving the person around.

The additional element, as far as section 22 of the 2003 act is concerned, is that we need to prove that the trafficking is for that person to “exercise control over prostitution”. That means that they have exercised “control, direction or influence over the prostitute’s movements in a way which shows that the person is aiding, abetting or compelling the prostitution.”

It is about controlling, influencing and moving people around.

That can be contrasted with the provisions of section 4 of the 2004 act, on trafficking people for exploitation. Again, the essential element is the trafficking element, which is the facilitation of the arrival of the person in the country of people, or moving them around. That could refer to taxis going from the west end of Glasgow to the south side; we take a very broad-brush approach to that aspect.

The committee will be aware that exploitation could be about slavery or forced labour, or offences under the Human Tissue Act 2004 involving body parts, organs and so on. With regard to forced labour, section 4 of the 2004 act would require us to prove that the complainant was “subjected to force, threats or deception designed to induce” them to provide the services.

The Convener: From what you have just said, what my colleague referred to—female genital mutilation—does not come under the heading of people trafficking.

Alison Di Rollo: No. That is a discrete offence in its own right.

The Convener: Yes, I know, but it does not come under the bill’s provisions on people trafficking.

Alison Di Rollo: No.

The Convener: I think that we have been endeavouring to see whether we could make a link and bring female general mutilation under the bill as being associated with trafficking. Am I making sense? People trafficking is defined in the bill, but female genital mutilation was introduced as something that might be regarded as an aggravated offence under the bill. Can that be done for female genital mutilation, given that the bill is to do with people trafficking?

Alison Di Rollo: Yes, because what is in the bill does not refer to section 4 of the 2004 act or to section 22 of the 2003 act. That is my reading of it.

The Convener: The bill defines people trafficking.

Alison Di Rollo: Yes.

The Convener: So, it does. I cannot see how the aggravated offence—what my colleague referred to—cannot be extended. Am I misunderstanding it?

Alison Di Rollo: With respect, convener, you are, because we can apply the aggravation to rape, identity fraud, theft and drugs offences. Any offence, such as rape, could be aggravated.

The Convener: What section are you talking about?

Alison Di Rollo: It is section 83(2), which states that “An offence is aggravated by a connection with people trafficking activity”.

...
Sandra White: So that could mean any offence.
Alison Di Rollo: Yes.

The Convener: I do not agree, but I must not debate it with you. I will have to think that one through, because I think that I am thinking differently. I will let others in now.

John Finnie: My question is for Ms Di Rollo. If I noted it correctly, you talked about awareness, detection and prosecution. I note that you are the head of the national sexual crimes unit, and I know that tremendous work has been done by TARA and the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. With regard to awareness, I wonder whether the association of trafficking with the sex industry is a challenge. I represent the Highlands and Islands, and I am aware of two instances relating to forced labour and drugs cultivation. I do not think that there is sufficient awareness out there. What is being done to increase awareness that trafficking is not simply an urban prostitution-related issue but a much broader one?

12:15

Alison Di Rollo: Police Scotland, through its national unit, is doing a good deal of work to raise awareness and to encourage reporting—in particular of cases outwith the sex industry, such as you referred to. For example, in respect of youngsters going round in vans on charity collections, or cannabis farms being found in private housing estates, people are generally becoming more aware of the possible connection with trafficking.

Beyond that, as we have heard in a recent conference and in evidence to the committee, it has been recognised that raising awareness is a wider societal issue. I must confess that, as a prosecutor, I sit at the end of the food chain, if you like, and take cases that are reported to us from the police. We help and play a role in securing convictions and gaining publicity for those convictions, so that people are aware that such crimes are happening on their doorsteps.

Bronagh Andrew: Perhaps I can help. Last month, the UK human trafficking centre published statistics for 2012 on use of the national referral mechanism. The statistics show a definite increase in individuals being identified about whom there are concerns that they have been trafficked for labour exploitation. As you know, our colleagues in Migrant Help are funded by the Government to support victims about whom there are concerns that they have been trafficked for labour or domestic servitude. It is unfortunate that the organisation is unable to attend today. I am aware that it is getting busier. The message on trafficking is getting out there.

The Scottish Government has convened a sub-group of the anti-trafficking progress group to look specifically at awareness raising and training. The sub-group is very keen to ensure that there is a wider awareness of the different types of exploitation from which human traffickers profit.

John Finnie: Does the legislation go far enough? Are there other elements that could have been picked up on?

Bronagh Andrew: That is quite a difficult question. In our written submission, we raised concerns that there is in Scots law no definition of human trafficking. Colleagues work to the Council of Europe definition, which has three key elements. Those cover the act of exploitation, including the recruitment, the means, the deception, the coercion and the abuse of a position of vulnerability; the intention to exploit; and the exploitation itself. It would be helpful to have an agreed shared definition that is legally binding.

Following the bill’s introduction, two consultations are taking place on legislating specifically for human trafficking. The UK Government is gathering evidence on the need for a modern slavery act and, in the Scottish Parliament, Jenny Marra MSP has issued a consultation on her proposed human trafficking bill for Scotland. Both look at pulling together the disparate legislation and seek to agree a shared definition of human trafficking in domestic legislation.

John Finnie: Clearly, Scots law is distinct. What liaison, if any, is there with other authorities? Human trafficking recognises no boundaries. There were issues in the north of Ireland; there will be issues with the border with England. Is there cross-border co-operation?

Alison Di Rollo: Absolutely. We refer a lot to “operation factor”, which involved extremely close co-operation with the Police Service of Northern Ireland. We also have regular dialogue with the Crown Prosecution Service; we recently spoke to it about the possibility of identifying expert evidence to lead prosecutions in Scotland in the way that one might use expert evidence from drugs officers on how that industry operates. We are looking at that and we have very close co-operation, as is increasingly the case across Europe. Indeed, the case to which I return after this session has very much an international dimension, with on-going dialogue through Interpol.

John Finnie: To return to the previous point on the absence of a common definition on human trafficking, while accepting that there are various jurisdictions, surely to have a Europe-wide—for argument’s sake—definition would be of benefit?
Alison Di Rollo: That is a matter for the legislature and others. I am content to work with whatever legislative provisions are deemed to be appropriate. I work contentedly with the current legislation. I am not suggesting that a common definition would not be a good idea, but that is more for others.

John Finnie: The lack of a definition is not problematic in your dealings with other jurisdictions.

Alison Di Rollo: It is not, either technically or legally, given the definitions that we are working to.

The Convener: We must move on because I am mindful of the need to finish by 12.30 pm. I call Roderick Campbell to be followed by Elaine Murray.

Roderick Campbell: Ms Di Rollo mentioned that we should not think of aggravations as being a soft option that could be used in preference to section 22 of the 2003 act and section 4 of the 2004 act. I believe that I am right in thinking that there have been only a handful of convictions for people-trafficking offences but are more such cases coming through the system?

Alison Di Rollo: Yes.

Roderick Campbell: Are there substantially more offences?

Alison Di Rollo: There are materially more. I think that between 2007 and 2012 only two people were convicted of trafficking offences in Scotland; that number has increased to seven. I am aware of the increase because, as lead prosecutor, I see all the cases; they come through my unit of specialist prosecutors. At the moment, there are seven cases pending. We have secured additional convictions and there are in train more cases covering domestic servitude, trafficking for prostitution and forced labour. On John Finnie’s point, the cases are not focused entirely on prostitution; we are getting cases across the board.

Roderick Campbell: Thank you. That was helpful.

The Convener: Do you have a question, Elaine?

Elaine Murray: I had a question about the need for further legislation, but it has pretty much been answered. I presume that even if there were further legislation the aggravated offences would be useful in prosecutions.

Alison Di Rollo: Yes.

Sandra White: Perhaps I did not make myself clear enough earlier; Bronagh Andrew’s response about the European definition of trafficking clarified the matter for me. Trafficking is all about making people move against their will and without their permission.

I will go back to the controversial question of how we might use the aggravation provision; I think that Alison Di Rollo mentioned body parts. Trafficking is about moving people against their will; if you move young women across Britain and up to Scotland because, for example, you think that it is easier to perform genital mutilation, surely that will produce body parts, so classing those as two separate aggravations would help to convict anyone who was involved in such activity. Can you clarify whether that is the case?

Alison Di Rollo: That would depend on the circumstances. I think that I see the point that you are making; if a child was brought to Scotland to be subjected to the offence of genital mutilation, it might or might not be possible to establish a trafficking background. On the convener’s point, to bring a child to Scotland for that purpose on an isolated basis rather than on an organised or commercial basis would not necessarily be a trafficking offence.

The Convener: Yes, I think that that is right.

Alison Di Rollo: As far as I am concerned, the fact that a child had been brought from her home country to a strange foreign country to be subjected to female genital mutilation would, in and of itself, be an aggravation and we would seek to lead evidence of that. However, it very much depends on the people responsible and their wider activities whether an aggravation or some other substantive offence could be proved.

The Convener: I am mindful that we must not get into a big debate about the subject, but my point, which referred to the two definitions that you mentioned and the references to the other pieces of legislation, was about someone being brought into the country not just against their will but against their will for a specific purpose, which did not include the issue that was raised by my colleague. I am concerned that you are being trammelled by the definitions. The point is that the people in question were brought into the country not just against their will but for the purposes of exploitation, whether that meant menial work, slavery or sexual exploitation. However, genital mutilation is not covered and I wonder whether, in view of the definitions, that offence would be difficult to prosecute as an aggravation under the bill.

Alison Di Rollo: If that aggravation was not present, it would not be appropriate to prosecute it.

The Convener: I appreciate that but I am talking about the specific purposes. I think that I will need to read the material again and give it a bit more what I would call thunking.

Alison Di Rollo: We can be confident that we have created a discrete offence in relation to female genital mutilation; we also have discrete offences for trafficking and we will now—God willing—have the additional tool of evidential aggravation, where the evidence supports it. We still need evidence to prove the aggravation.

The Convener: Perhaps not corroboration, but we are not going to mention that word today.

I thank the witnesses very much for their evidence and patience and the committee for their questions.

I say to members before they put away their papers that there are other items on the agenda; however, as we have only five minutes left, I suggest that we take items 3, 4 and 5 next week. We do not have time to consider them tomorrow because we have two panels of witnesses. [Interruption.] Apparently we have three panels. Is that not good? Buy one, get one free. With members’ leave, we will take items 3, 4 and 5 on today’s agenda next week.

Members indicated agreement.
Scottish Parliament
Justice Committee
Wednesday 20 November 2013

[The Convener opened the meeting at 09:30]

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Christine Grahame): Good morning. I welcome everyone to the 33rd meeting of the Justice Committee in 2013. I ask those who are present to switch off mobile phones and other electronic devices completely, as they interfere with the broadcasting system even when they are switched to silent. No apologies have been received.

We move on to our fifth evidence session on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill at stage 1, with two panels of witnesses today. We will consider provisions on corroboration and related reforms—we have got to it at last, committee—and will hear evidence from the Lord President and, later, from the Lord Advocate.

I welcome our first panel: the Rt Hon Lord Gill, Lord President of the Court of Session; Roddy Flinn, legal secretary to the Lord President; and Elise McIntyre, deputy legal secretary to the Lord President. Good morning to you all.

I understand that the Lord President wishes to make a brief opening statement.

Lord Gill (Lord President): Thank you, madam convener. I will make three brief points. I am here today to give you the view of the judges. Different judges have different points of emphasis, of course, but I would like to convey the judges’ general feeling on this controversial issue.

First, in my view, the abolition of the rule of corroboration is a matter of constitutional importance. In my opinion, the rule is not simply a technical rule of the law of evidence that can be changed as part of a discussion of evidence; it is part of the constitution of this country and one of the great legal safeguards in our criminal justice system. Therefore, a change of such profound importance, if you are contemplating making it, should be made as part of a much wider consideration of criminal evidence and not simply as an ad hoc response to one particular decision of the United Kingdom Supreme Court, which is the situation in which we find ourselves.

Secondly, there is a remarkable degree of opposition to the change across the entire legal profession. I am not suggesting that that, in itself, is a conclusive consideration against the abolition of corroboration—please do not misunderstand me on that—but such a degree of opposition across the entire profession should give us all pause for thought. Those are the views of people with considerable experience in the practical operation of the criminal justice system.

Thirdly, time and again throughout the controversy the point has been made that other countries can do without the rule of corroboration, and it is asked why Scotland is out of step. I think that that is the wrong way to look at it. We should, in fact, be proud of the fact that we have something that other jurisdictions do not have. It is one of the great hallmarks of Scottish criminal law.

We are all privileged to live in a just society in Scotland, the reason for which is that our criminal justice system is rooted in the idea of fairness. Corroboration is, in my opinion, a critical element in that. I am not here to apologise for the fact that we have corroboration; I think that we should all be grateful that we do.

Those are the three main points that I wanted to make, madam convener. In the course of the committee’s questions, I might be able to suggest other ways out of the problem, but that is the general view of the judiciary. In preparation for the response of the judges to the Scottish Government’s consultation, I asked every judge to express their view individually to me. With the exception of my colleague the Lord Justice Clerk, all the judges were opposed to the abolition of corroboration.

The Convener: Wow! You have cheered me up, I can tell you. My position on abolishing corroboration is well recorded, although that may not be my colleagues’ position. We will now take questions from members.

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): Lord Gill, I appreciate what you are telling us about the views of the judiciary on the issue, but organisations that support sufferers of domestic abuse and sexual abuse take a different view. They make the argument that, if corroboration were abolished, there would be more prosecutions of domestic and sexual crimes and that the verdict would rest on the quality of the evidence that is presented in court rather than on the quantity of evidence, as happens at present under the requirement for two pieces of independent evidence. How would you respond to those two points?

Lord Gill: Obviously, it is a matter of concern to ensure that sexual crime and domestic abuse are properly and effectively prosecuted. It is in the nature of those types of crime that proof is difficult to produce—that is just a fact of life. We should be careful of the risk that, by legislating in an attempt to cure one perceived problem in one corner of the... criminal justice system, we make a reform the consequences of which are completely unknowable across the whole spectrum of the criminal justice system.

Elaine Murray: Is there an alternative that would address the problems with domestic and sexual crimes? It has been suggested to me that there could be a pilot in which we abolish the need for corroboration for those particular crimes to see how successful that is. Alternatively, we could further amend what is considered to be corroboration to make it easier to prosecute those crimes.

Lord Gill: I think that that would not be a wise method of legislation. If you legislated specifically for one type of offence and relaxed the evidential requirements in respect of it, you would create, in a sense, a privileged class of complainers for that type of crime, which would have an unsettling effect on the rest of the criminal justice system. If you legislate on the matter, the legislation must apply across the board.

Elaine Murray: Would no further development of what is considered to be corroboration help to address the problems with those types of crimes?

Lord Gill: It is remarkable how corroboration has strengthened in my time in the legal profession and on the bench. When I was a young lawyer, corroboration often came in the form of a fingerprint, but we do not hear much about fingerprints nowadays. The advances in DNA testing have been quite extraordinary, with the result that many crimes that 20 years ago would never have been detected, or that would certainly never have been prosecuted, can now be prosecuted successfully. I realise that that is not entirely an answer to the point that you are making, Mrs Murray. However, I feel that corroboration works with deadly effect nowadays in the sort of cases that I am talking about.

Margaret Mitchell (Central Scotland) (Con): I appreciate your opening statement, Lord Gill, because there has been a feeling that it is a done deal that corroboration will be abolished, so we should look at the safeguards. It has been of particular concern that a third way has not been considered. A third way, whereby we retain corroboration but look at how we can improve the law of evidence, would be worthy of exploration. I know and have met representatives of Rape Crisis Scotland and we have had good conversations about their concerns—there is mutual agreement on some points. Adult survivors of abuse who have experience of court have come up with some excellent suggestions as to how a third way could be achieved.

You mentioned progress in the quality of evidence, which should, in theory, make corroboration easier. Others have mentioned the fact that, in court, a time limit is often applied in relation to the application of the Moorov doctrine. If that were relaxed, it would help to achieve convictions in interpersonal-type cases. We could also provide more training for procurators fiscal to enable them to understand why it might take three days for a rape victim to come forward, so that that can be explained to a jury. Do you think that it is worth looking at a third way?

Lord Gill: I do. It is not wise to assume that if you abolish corroboration you will increase the conviction rate. I am sceptical of that claim. What you are doing is giving the defence the chance to make a really powerful speech. Instead of having to face a corroborated case, the defence can go to the jury and say, “Would you convict my client on the word of one person with nothing else to support it?” That could be a very powerful line to take with juries. I am not persuaded that if you abolish corroboration that will increase the conviction rate.

To return to your main point, Mrs Mitchell, I do not think that we should just take one brick out of the wall, as it were, and say, “We’ll change this. It’s a rule of evidence, so we can change it.” You have to think about the effect on the whole system. The system that we have today is quite coherent and logical. It consists of a series of checks and balances that attempt to achieve not just fairness to the defence, but fairness to the prosecution as well. The overriding principle in all our trials is that justice should be fairly dispensed.

If you are going to consider a change of such profound importance, it must be looked at against a wider picture. My suggestion is that there should be an examination of all the various safeguards in the criminal system in the round. There could be, for example, reconsideration of the admissibility of certain statements, a re-examination of the use that can be made of confessions, a re-examination of the right of the accused not to testify, an examination of the right of the accused to withhold his defence at the earliest stage of a prosecution, and so on. Those are the various tensions within the system, and the problem must be looked at in that context.

The Parliament’s legislative record over the past few years shows an openness to change and an open-mindedness to consider the issue in a wider context to reach the wisest outcome. I think that we are looking at the issue in much too narrow a context.

09:45

Margaret Mitchell: The other concern is that the committee is under pressure. It is scrutinising a lot of legislation—indeed, not only is this the second time that we have met this week, but we had to meet twice in a week very recently—and there is a concern that we are not giving these important issues the time that we would like to give them. Is there an argument for considering the third way of retaining and trying to improve the current system, looking at very complicated issues such as the rights of the accused, which are paramount, and defence evidence, but taking this particular issue out of the bill and getting some other body to examine it properly in depth? Would that be a sensible way forward?

Lord Gill: I would suggest as much myself. In the past, the Government has appointed royal commissions, departmental committees and so on to examine such issues, and I think that such an approach would be a good way out of our difficulty. An examination of all the various facets and their interaction would allow a balanced judgment to be reached.

Margaret Mitchell: That is very helpful.

Lord Gill: I do not think that that would necessarily take a lot of time or cause a great deal of delay. The public in Scotland are very knowledgeable, as is the profession, and we have academic support from the law schools. As the issues are pretty well known, it should be possible to come to a wise conclusion by looking at the matter overall.

Margaret Mitchell: That would allay the fear that, by getting a commission to examine the issue, we would simply be knocking it back. That would certainly not have to be the case. A commission could deal with the issues, which, as you have said, are well known.

Lord Gill: It would not be a way of avoiding the problem; it would be a positive way of getting a better outcome.

The Convener: You say that the process would not necessarily take a long time. Can you give us some idea of a timescale for it?

Lord Gill: I do not know, but I cannot imagine that it would take years, if that is what you are worried about.

The Convener: That is what I wanted to know.

Lord Gill: I do not think that it would take that length of time.

The Convener: You have opened up the issue of the different ways in which evidence is used in court. You might not know the answer to this, but has there been any inquiry or academic research into why, when the Crown thinks that it has a terrific case, juries do not convict or, indeed, into how juries think about things? I realise that the anonymity of the juries would have to be maintained in such research.

Lord Gill: That is a big question. The restrictions on one’s access to the views of juries are so tight that it has never been possible to carry out proper academic research on how juries reach their verdicts. I am afraid that jurors cannot be interviewed.

The Convener: Should there be some academic research that maintains the anonymity of juries but which still examines certain issues? After all, we sometimes get perverse decisions. We would not be seeking to blame jurors; the point is that we do not know how, on the basis of the evidence presented, juries reach their verdicts. Of course, I realise that that is part of the whole drama of the courtroom.

Lord Gill: I have no developed views on the subject and have not gone into it in my own mind in any great detail. However, my experience has been that, by and large, juries get it right.

The Convener: That answers that question.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): Good morning, Lord Gill. Like my colleagues, I have been very reassured by your comments and have three questions for you based on the evidence to the committee. First, can you comment on the suggestion in the written and oral evidence that we have received that, given the terms of reference of Lord Carloway’s review, the proposal to abolish corroboration is a “rebalancing” act?

Lord Gill: I would put it more strongly than that. You have to think very carefully about the consequences of the move. It is not a rebalancing act at all, but a major change that will have consequences, many of which are unknowable at this stage. It is not just a piece of law reform in the narrow area of the law of evidence, but something that would affect our society’s whole approach to justice and which could have very serious consequences.

By and large, we do not have many miscarriages of justice in Scotland and when they are discovered we put them right. We have very few at the moment, but my fear is that there would be many more if corroboration were to be abolished.

John Finnie: Another point that has been raised by many sources and which you have touched on briefly is that with advances in DNA testing, and with closed circuit television and other covert surveillance, more corroboration is available.

Lord Gill: Indeed. If the prosecution does not need corroboration, the risk is that in some cases it might take the view, “Why go looking for it? We’ve got the complainer and their word might be good enough.” My other worry is that looking for corroboration can be costly in terms of police time and resources and it would be unfortunate if, at a time when resources are scarce—and if corroboration were available—economies were to be made in that direction.

Finally, what happens if a prosecution is brought without corroboration? If the defence can show that corroboration might have been available, it would be a very powerful defence point.

John Finnie: Thank you very much. You have covered my points.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): I, too, welcome your comments. I am very concerned about this profound change and have been calling for a royal commission on the matter for some time now.

I want to pursue the likelihood of wrongful convictions and fears that you have expressed in that respect. Other reforms have been galloping through our system—changes to double jeopardy and the proposals on admissibility of evidence of bad character and previous convictions. When the change on corroboration is taken with those, will the accumulated changes bring great risks?

Lord Gill: That comes back to my point that corroboration has to be seen in that much wider context. If a change of such importance is to be considered, those other considerations are exactly what must be taken into account.

Alison McInnes: That was helpful.

We know that England and Wales has a lot of checks and balances that we do not have. However, I am not sure how useful it would be to get into a discussion about whether it would be a little bit better if we had this instead of that, given your position that we should set the matter aside and look at things in the round. Is that right?

Lord Gill: Yes.

Alison McInnes: Thank you.

The Convener: Are you alluding to the size of juries and the three verdicts, which no one has raised yet?

Alison McInnes: Yes.

The Convener: Should we be considering those matters as well?

Lord Gill: The moment you say, "If we're going to abolish corroboration, let's change the majority from the necessary 8-7 to 10-5 or whatever", you are actually conceding that by abolishing corroboration you are creating a greater risk of a miscarriage of justice. To bring in that kind of safeguard would be, I think, an acknowledgement that abolition of corroboration would bring a greater risk of things going wrong.

The Convener: Should the three verdicts, including not proven—the whole thing—also be considered?

Lord Gill: That could usefully be looked at too, as part of the general survey of the criminal law.

Sandra White (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP): You mentioned that you are looking at corroboration, and we are looking at the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill in the round. Jury changes, double jeopardy and other parts of the law have been touched upon. Are you saying that the Justice Committee should go ahead with the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, but that corroboration should be taken out and looked at as a separate entity?

Lord Gill: That would be a wiser course.

Sandra White: I just wanted clarification on that point. Following what John Finnie said, Lord Gill mentioned advances in corroborative evidence, including DNA testing. You said that there is now more corroboration available, and I think that you also said that, if there is corroboration available and you have other witnesses, why go looking for it? I was concerned by that remark, because you have mentioned that the majority of judges are not in favour of abolishing corroboration, but we are also talking about victims here, not just the judicial system. Victims do not always get justice in some aspects of the law—for example, in domestic violence cases, in rape cases, or in offences against older people or offences against children in children's homes, when there is not a person who can corroborate. If there is other corroborative evidence there without another person, why would you not go looking for it? You said, "Why go looking for it?"

Lord Gill: Forgive me, but I—

The Convener: I do not think that is what Lord Gill was saying.

Lord Gill: I do not think I said that.

Sandra White: I wrote down exactly what Lord Gill said. I would like him to clarify that point.

Lord Gill: I am sorry if I have not expressed myself clearly enough. I am as concerned as anyone if a crime of a sexual nature, a crime against a child or a case of domestic abuse goes unpunished or unprosecuted. That would plainly be a matter of concern. However, in attempting to provide a solution to that problem, we must be careful not to make a reform that spreads across the entire criminal justice system. Abolition of corroboration would not apply only in cases such as you mentioned; it would apply in every criminal case. It would apply, for example, if any of us were to be involved in an accidental misunderstanding in a shop, if the shop assistant said, “I saw you... picking up something and putting it in your pocket.”

The Convener: I wish you had not been looking at me when you said that.

Lord Gill: If any of us found ourselves in that kind of situation, we would begin to see the value of the law of corroboration. It applies widely.

Sandra White: You have not quite addressed the point that I was making. Maybe I have picked you up wrong, but you certainly said that even if you did not go looking for it, the defence would ask, if they had corroboration from another person, why they should go looking for it.

The point that I am trying to make is about corroboration by DNA, video cameras—as were mentioned by Mr Finnie—and other forms of corroborative evidence. On the example that you gave, most shops have CCTV cameras, which would supply corroborative evidence of whether a crime had been committed, although I do not particularly want to go down the road of discussing somebody being accused of taking something from a shop. What I am asking is whether justice is served if defence lawyers do not bother going looking for other corroborative evidence if they have another person.

Lord Gill: I was thinking more about a case in which the prosecutor who has to make the decision whether to bring a prosecution has the word of one witness, and decides that that is enough and that they can go ahead with the prosecution, thereby failing to follow up other lines of corroboration. That might present the defence with quite a good argument—that other evidence was there if the prosecution had looked for it but it did not bother. That was really the only point I wanted to make.

Sandra White: You were looking at the question from the other angle.

10:00

The Convener: I might get myself into trouble now, but here goes. One of the things that I heard the cabinet secretary say—I have heard it said before on behalf of Rape Crisis Scotland and Scottish Women’s Aid—is that we are not talking about securing more prosecutions, but about access to justice. I do not know what that means, so would you comment on that? I thought that the purpose of putting the proposal into the legislation was to secure more prosecutions but, apparently, that is not the case and it is about securing access to justice. I remember hearing that clearly on a television interview, and I have heard it subsequently.

Lord Gill: The only rational justification for the proposal must surely be to increase the rate of convictions. It must be. What other reason could there be?

The Convener: I agree with you, but I was allowing you to corroborate what I think about it. That statement was quite extraordinary, because I thought increasing the number of convictions was the driving force behind the proposal, even if we narrow it down just to cover sexual and rape offences, although it will apply across the piece.

Alison McInnes: Following on from that, we know that the number of rape convictions in other jurisdictions is still very low and the rates are not improved by their not having a requirement for corroboration. Other forces are at work that prevent juries from coming to conclusions about those cases. We are in danger of moving from prosecuting in the public interest to prosecuting in the victim’s interest. I wonder whether the cabinet secretary is moving towards allowing the victim to have their day in court. How would you respond to that?

Lord Gill: That is not the basis on which our prosecution system works. It works on the basis that the Lord Advocate decides whether, in the public interest as he sees it, a case is to be prosecuted. It is a marvellous feature of our criminal justice system. The privileged position of the Lord Advocate as the head of the prosecution system is one of the things that makes it so fair. He makes an independent, unbiased decision by looking at the case and deciding whether it is in the public interest to prosecute it. If he says that he will not prosecute a case, no one can gainsay that decision. It is not for the complainer to say that they want the case to be prosecuted.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): I have looked at the papers and evidence from a different background because this is only my second meeting at the Justice Committee. After hearing what I have heard this morning, I would like to hear you develop the point about the problem of access to justice. At one point you said that there were problems with the justice system and that we should somehow find solutions to change it. Will removing corroboration improve access to justice, in your view? Will it be more about the quality of evidence than the quantity?

Lord Gill: I do not think that removing corroboration will improve the quality of justice in Scotland in any way. There is a serious risk that there will be even fewer convictions, for the reasons that I have already given. I also think that if we make this change in isolation without looking at the wider picture, we might find that there will be consequences that are unknowable at the moment but that could be adverse to the system.
Christian Allard: So, you think that we should not start by removing corroboration. We should establish something else.

Lord Gill: No. To remove the requirement for corroboration is to start in exactly the wrong place.

Christian Allard: On access to justice, would abolishing corroboration increase the number of cases that would be brought to prosecution?

Lord Gill: No.

Christian Allard: Definitely not?

Lord Gill: It might increase the number of prosecutions, but I am not convinced that it would increase the number of convictions.

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): I declare an interest as a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

Good morning, Lord Gill. I have listened carefully to what you said, which has to a degree pre-empted a line of questioning on which I was going to embark.

To be fair to Lord Carloway, when he gave evidence on 24 September, under questioning from me he basically accepted that it is not necessarily the case that there would be more prosecutions under the proposed new prosecutorial test. One does not need to be too harsh on what he suggested.

I take your point on what the purpose of the change would be if there were not more prosecutions or convictions and have taken on board everything that you have said so far, but let us speculate for a moment. The Scottish Human Rights Commission regards corroboration as performing a “quality control function”. What other quality-control functions are there in the system? What kind of quality-control functions would you like to see in a different system that did not rely on corroboration?

Lord Gill: I do not know, but I am pretty certain that changing the majority rule is not the answer. It is illogical, actually. If there is a good solid intellectual case for abolishing corroboration, there should be no need for any safeguards. The moment that we say that there have to be safeguards, we are conceding that the change creates a risk of miscarriage of justice, which, in my view, it will.

Roderick Campbell: Should statutory provisions to exclude evidence such as those in England under section 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 be considered in Scotland, or are you happy with common-law powers?

Lord Gill: No. I make it clear that I am not here to suggest that the status quo in Scottish criminal law should be preserved immutable and unchangeable. Every legal system must constantly renew itself because it must adapt to changing needs and circumstances. Therefore, it is perfectly right and proper that Parliament should reconsider corroboration among many other questions in the criminal law. I am not suggesting for a moment that the subject is off-limits for discussion—far from it. We can all benefit from reconsidering our most comfortable assumptions and examining them to determine whether they are still valid in modern conditions. However, one ought not to make an ad hoc response to one decision of the Supreme Court and say that we can change that particular rule of evidence. That is not the path of wisdom.

Roderick Campbell: In a nutshell, considering things in isolation is the wrong way. Is that your view?

Lord Gill: There are other rights of the accused that could usefully be looked at. For example, the fact that the accused can withhold his defence until a fairly late stage in the prosecution could usefully be re-examined, as could the vexed question of the use of statements, which has been a constant source of trouble in the courts. That can all be seen as part of one general problem, which is how to keep the law just, fair and up to date.

The Convener: I see that members have supplementaries but I think that we have pretty well established the position and do not want to have Lord Gill repeating himself over and over again. Are you bringing something new to the discussion, John?

John Finnie: Yes, convener.

The Convener: Well, we’ll see.

John Finnie: We will—and I am sure that you will keep me right.

In advance of our evidence session with the Lord Advocate, from whom we will hear next, we have received supplementary written evidence from the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, which says:

“It is important to be clear at the outset that the abolition of the requirement for corroboration is not about improving detection or conviction rates. It is about improving access to justice for victims”.

The submission then cites a Supreme Court of Canada ruling from 1954, which states:

“It cannot be over-emphasised that the purpose of a criminal prosecution is not to obtain a conviction; it is to lay before the jury what the Crown considers to be credible evidence relevant to what is alleged to be a crime.”

Are there any frailties in that approach?
Lord Gill: I think that that is a rather simplistic statement from the Crown. What is the point in bringing a prosecution unless there is a reasonable prospect that it will succeed? Surely the criterion for bringing prosecutions is that it is in the public interest for the person in question to be prosecuted in order to be convicted and punished for the crime that has been committed. If it is simply a matter of giving access to justice, I have to say that that is not my understanding of the Lord Advocate's role. Of course, I might be wrong.

John Finnie: And clearly such a premise would not result in justice for the accused.

Lord Gill: If your case is unlikely to succeed, I am not convinced that you are doing the complainer any favours by bringing it. After all, it is an ordeal for them.

The Convener: I would not have thought that court would be therapy for anyone.

Alison, did you wish to ask a question?

Alison McInnes: No. I think that Lord Gill's counsel has been very wise and that he has covered most of the points.

The Convener: I do not think that John Pentland has had an opportunity to ask a question yet.

John Pentland (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab): I just have a supplementary.

The Convener: Please ask it. I think, however, that we have clearly established the position.

John Pentland: I certainly think that Lord Gill's remarks have raised the bar with regard to the contentions associated with the bill.

You told us that one should not assume anything, but should the Government get its way are you satisfied that the proposals provide sufficient checks and balances to protect witnesses and combat a culture in our courts with regard to the rights of the accused? So far most of the comments that I have heard have come from professional bodies and agencies; I have not heard that much about witnesses. Do you foresee any pitfalls or downsides, should the bill get the go-ahead? Do you think that the bill contains the required protections for those who appear in court?

Lord Gill: Altering the majority rule is an exercise in damage limitation. It might do some good but my feeling is that the issue has not been fully thought through and that there could be some adverse consequences.

The Convener: That has taken my breath away. I think that Lord Gill has underlined—indeed, double underlined—his position; I do not think that, with phrases such as "damage limitation", you can ask any more of him.

That said, Lord Gill, do you have any final comments?

Lord Gill: I would like to leave you with one thought. The controversy that has resulted from Lord Carloway's review has actually served quite a useful purpose in bringing out into the open a great many things that, over the years, we have just taken for granted. It is always useful to re-examine one's assumptions and see whether they are keeping up to date with a very fast-changing world. However, although it has been a useful exercise, it all points to the need for a wider and more general re-examination of all the checks and balances that apply.

The rule of corroboration is not some archaic legal relic from antiquity. We did not get where we are by accident. The fact that our law has this rule—a rule that I regard as one of its finest features—is the result of centuries of legal development, legal thought and the views of legal writers, politicians and practitioners down through the ages. It has been found to be a good rule. I simply ask the committee to listen to the wisdom of the ages—it has a lot to tell us.

The Convener: Thank you very much, Lord Gill.

10:16

Meeting suspended.

10:24

On resuming—

The Convener: Our second panel of witnesses comprises the Rt Hon Frank Mulholland QC, the Lord Advocate, and Catriona Dalrymple, the head of the policy division in the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. Good morning—it is still morning.

As with the Lord President, I offer the Lord Advocate the opportunity to make a brief opening statement.

The Lord Advocate (Frank Mulholland QC): Good morning, everyone. The committee is concerned with the proposal to abolish the corroboration rule, which has exercised most of the debate on the bill. I will make a few opening remarks about that.

I support abolition, for a particular reason. Prosecutors and I see the acute effect of the rule of corroboration in certain areas of criminal offending—particularly sexual offending, including rape, and domestic abuse. As women and children are very much in the majority of victims in those areas of criminality, the effect of the corroboration rule is disproportionate on them. That is why I support the abolition of corroboration.

Witnesses have raised a number of matters with the committee, and I will deal with two of them. I am of course happy to answer any questions that members have. It has been said that the abolition of corroboration is intended to increase the conviction rate for rape or other sexual offending. I have never seen that as the purpose and I have never ever said that it was all about increasing the conviction rate.

I see abolition as being about access to justice for victims of domestic abuse, rape and other sexual offending. Any modern criminal justice system should have that. It seems that a class of victims in those areas of criminality are denied access to justice, particularly because of the legal requirement for corroboration. I will illustrate the point with figures. In 2012-13, 2,803 domestic abuse charges could not be taken up because there was insufficient admissible evidence. I suggest that it is a real concern that we are not providing the possibility of access to justice for a sizeable proportion of victims in those charges.

Yesterday, I asked the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service's policy division to give me the figures for the rape charges that could not be taken up in the past two years because of insufficient evidence. The information is not statistically robust, as a full double-checking exercise was not undertaken, but I wanted an indication of the number of charges that could not be taken up because of the requirement for corroboration. About 13 per cent of rape charges that were reported to the Crown were affected—that was about 100 in one year and 70 in the other year, which makes 170-ish over two years. I suggest that that is a cause for concern for anyone who is interested in delivering justice in Scotland.

I accept that we must ensure fairness in any criminal justice system. All Scotland’s prosecutors—certainly those whom I work with—are imbued with that notion of fairness. I can speak in due course about the checks and balances, which I have no doubt that I will be asked about.

The suggestion has been made that, if corroboration is abolished, the police and the prosecution will look for only a limited amount of evidence and will not look for additional evidence. I refute that suggestion. If it were correct, we would expect the police and prosecution currently to stop at corroboration from two sources of evidence. They do not do that. Under the Human Rights Act 1998 and the European convention on human rights, we have a duty to deliver effective criminal sanctions, which includes an effective investigation and effective prosecution. A raft of case law, particularly Smith v Her Majesty's Advocate in 1952, sets out the duties of the police under common law.

10:30

On the suggestion about limited evidence, I think that the chief constable has already commented that that will not happen; it certainly will not happen under my watch as Lord Advocate. I do not subscribe to the notion that we would wish to bring cases with limitations on the amount of evidence that could have been available and present that to a court and jury.

I am happy to take questions from members.

The Convener: Thank you very much. That is very useful.

Elaine Murray: Lord Gill advised us that he surveyed the judiciary on its views on the removal of corroboration, and all but one were opposed to that. Has a similar survey been undertaken with procurators fiscal to ascertain the views of the people on the ground?

The Lord Advocate: No; we have not surveyed all COPFS members of staff. When Lord Carloway’s review was published, we had quite an extensive meeting in the Crown Office, which was attended by most senior civil servants and procurators fiscal, including the three federation heads, the Crown agent, the head of operations and the deputy head of operations. We had quite a robust chat about the Crown’s position and, at the end of the meeting, I did not detect any dissension among the leaders of the COPFS.

The answer to your question is that we did not have a full and comprehensive survey, but that was an indication.

Elaine Murray: So that is not the view of the service overall; it is the view of senior people in the service.

The Lord Advocate: I think that that must be the case.

Elaine Murray: I want to go on to the effects on victims, which is obviously the primary consideration in the suggestions. You say that you do not think that there would be a larger number of successful prosecutions and that this is about access to justice. I wonder about the victim who does not get to go to court and there no longer being the view that that is because of corroboration but because they were not believed, or somebody who goes to court and the jury does not believe them. There are all sorts of reasons why people do not believe women when it comes to domestic violence or rape; it is about prejudices in the jury and so on. Will not there be an even more deleterious effect on the victim? They may go through the process, in which it is her word against his, and at the end of the day the jury may not believe her and it is basically perceived that she has lied. Is not that even worse for a victim than being told that they cannot go to court because there is no corroboration?

The Lord Advocate: I have many years of experience as a prosecutor and have been involved in many difficult conversations with complainers about charges of sexual abuse and rape to explain to them why we cannot take up the case, and in all my time as a prosecutor, I have never known anyone to express thanks for our not being able to take up a case. On the contrary, in my experience, people have wished for the opportunity for their version of events and account to be heard in a court of law with the possibility that the jury, with the burden of proof and all the protections, would reach a verdict on that.

Elaine Murray: Admittedly, people may not give thanks for a case not being taken to court, but could it not be even worse if a person went to court, went through all the process, and was not believed at the end of the day?

The Lord Advocate: I am not saying that there might not be some validity in what you say. All I am saying is that, from my experience of having those difficult conversations, I have never known that sentiment to be expressed. Can I just take your point one stage further? It is a matter for the Parliament, but if corroboration is abolished, the prevailing view among procurators fiscal is that it will lead to much more difficult conversations with complainers and victims because rather than say that there is insufficient evidence within the law to take up the case, we will need to explain the reasons why the evidence is not credible or reliable. That will be much more difficult than explaining to a complainer or victim that there is insufficient evidence. However, we do not shy away from that. We think that it is a point of principle to give greater access to justice for victims. We think that that is the right thing to do, particularly in the two areas of criminality that I spoke of.

Christian Allard: Good morning, Lord Advocate. You referred to access to justice in your opening remarks. You made your point clearly and gave us a lot of statistics. I am not keen on statistics because sometimes they do not tell the whole story. You gave us a number of case studies in your supplementary evidence. Would you like to tell us more about one of those?

The Lord Advocate: Yes. They are anonymised real cases, and there are many more. I can speak from personal experience about where the effect of Cadder is most acute. In a rape case prior to Cadder, it was fairly common that the victim or complainer stated that she was raped by a named person. The requirement for corroboration requires us to corroborate the crucial facts, and in a charge of rape there are three crucial facts: first, we need to corroborate penetration; secondly, we need to corroborate lack of consent; and thirdly, we need to corroborate mens rea, which is the accused’s intention. Those are the three crucial facts that we must corroborate.

Elaine Murray referred to the dynamic of the type of offending that is rape. It is fairly common in rape cases—we refer to it as counterintuitive—for victims to think about whether to report an allegation of rape to the police. The victim might want to think about it and talk about it with their family or friends, or it might not dawn on the victim what happened, or they might be unsure about precisely what happened, so there is commonly delayed reporting of rape allegations. We are told by the experts that that is normal behaviour and we will explain that to the jury in rape prosecutions.

In pre-Cadder cases, it was fairly common during interviews for an accused person to say, “Yes, we had intercourse, but it was consensual.” In those circumstances, we have corroboration of penetration because we have the complainer’s evidence that she was penetrated and raped and we have corroboration from the accused’s statement under interview by police officers. However, post Cadder, the effect of Cadder in many such cases is that, on advice, accused persons are saying nothing. I am not being critical of that option being taken; it is just a fact that, in many such cases, we do not have that source of evidence now.

The effect of Cadder in many rape cases is that we do not have corroboration of penetration because, by the time the alleged rape is reported, forensic opportunities are lost and gone. There is no point in taking intimate samples one or two weeks after the alleged rape, so we will not get corroboration from that source. Where prosecutors had sufficient evidence pre Cadder, we do not have that now, and therefore we cannot take up many rape cases. That seems to me a matter of real concern.

I will give you an example of a case that I dealt with about three weeks ago, which I will anonymise. I heard Margaret Mitchell speak on the extension, or perhaps redefinition, of Moorov. However, we can never get away from the fact that Moorov requires two victims as complainers. I had a case in which two sisters had been horrifically sexually abused as children over many years by a member of the family. The girls were told that no one would believe them or love them if they spoke up, so they did not do so. Eventually, as adults, they got the courage to speak up and make a complaint to the police because, quite simply, they were concerned that their relative had access to children of the same age.

We took up the case and indicted it in the High Court, and we were prepared to proceed to trial. However, one of the victims could not, mentally, go ahead with it. We tried to give the woman as much support as was necessary throughout the process, and we got medical reports on whether it would be too detrimental to her health, but we could not force her to give evidence. That meant that the whole case fell, because it was a Moorov case. The Parliament, the committee and the public at large should be concerned about that.

I respect the views of people in the legal profession, judges and police officers. Everyone who is involved in the criminal justice system and beyond has an opinion on the matter. However, they do not see the cases that cannot be taken up because of the requirement for corroboration. Police and prosecutors are seeing that class of case.

The abolition of corroboration would have a disproportionate effect on women and children. I have heard others say that, although there are people who oppose that view. The United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, which is a powerful voice, supported that view in a report published in July this year that called for the abolition of corroboration.

The Convener: I think that I speak on behalf of the committee in saying that we would wish those prosecutions to be successful; we are not at odds on that. Our concern is that, given the substantial evidence that we received earlier from the Lord President on behalf of all the High Court judges bar one, it seems that abolition may be counterproductive for those victims, for whom we share your huge concerns.

Lord Gill suggested a review of all the rules of evidence, some of which you have mentioned, such as the right to silence. He made it plain that he does not view corroboration as set in aspic, but he suggested that we look at everything so that the difficulties that you find as a prosecutor might be overcome in a different way. I would like your comments on his proposal because, although we would all wish for successful prosecutions, we are concerned that abolition will not achieve for those victims what you and I, and the public, would wish it to achieve.

The Lord Advocate: I have a couple of points on that. First, on the hypothesis that corroboration is abolished, how would the Crown approach its work in deciding whether to take up a case? In my two written submissions to the committee, a distinction is drawn between corroborative evidence and supporting evidence. I am sure that everyone here understands that. I would not—and prosecutors would not—take up a case without any supporting evidence. However, that is different from a legal requirement for corroboration. Of course, when reaching a decision, we would want to look at evidence that supports what the complainor or victim is saying and we would apply the reasonable prospect of success test and look at issues of credibility and reliability. I hope that that gives the committee some reassurance.

10:45

On your wider point about a review, which was maybe the principal thrust of your question, I completely respect Lord Gill, as I do Lord Carloway and all the judges in Scotland. They have a difficult job and they have a view. However, I have a view as well, and the prosecutors have a view. In the past couple of days, I read Lord Carloway’s review report, which seems a major piece of work. It took a year, there was a review group and a reference group, there were four or five roadshows, there were visits down south and to the continent, the review group spoke to experts and visited the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission and Glasgow sheriff court and there were various other matters, all of which are in Lord Carloway’s report. It was an extensive piece of work, and what we are discussing is his recommendation, although it is not his only recommendation, as the report covers a raft of areas.

My view is that it is not necessary to go down the road of having a royal commission or having the Scottish Law Commission look at the issue. However, I respect other people’s views, and if that is the view of the Parliament and the Scottish Government, I will be happy to go along with it. We will contribute to any review, but I reiterate that I do not think that one is necessary given the extent of the work of the Carloway review.

The Convener: I will let other members pick up on whether Carloway’s view on corroboration was thorough. That could be—if you will forgive me—open to challenge. If members want to pick up on that, I would be very pleased.

Alison McInnes: I absolutely agree that no one should be beyond the reach of the justice system and that we need to strive to do all that we can to help victims of rape and sexual assault, but is it not the case that conviction rates are poor across many jurisdictions and they are not significantly different in, for example, England?

The Lord Advocate: Do you mean conviction rates for rape?

Alison McInnes: Yes.
The Lord Advocate: It is well recognised that there are issues. Elaine Murray hit on a number of public perceptions, such as that a woman who wears a short skirt is asking for it. I completely disagree with that, but such views are out there and it is important that we counter them in the presentation of cases. Through the national sexual crimes unit, we have been using expert evidence on many of what I will call the rape myths to educate the jury as part of the trial process, and that work will continue.

The statistic is often quoted that 3 or 4 per cent of rape allegations that are made to the police result in convictions. In Scotland, of the charges that are taken up, the conviction rate is running at about 48 to 50 per cent. However, I would say—I feel strongly about this—that the justice system is not about conviction rates; it is about delivering justice. My concept of justice is that it is for the accused, the victim and the public. The conviction rate is a barometer of how we are doing; it is not the be-all and end-all of matters.

Alison McInnes: Can we be clear that you think that it is important for a victim to have their day in court, as it were, whether or not it is in the public interest to prosecute?

The Lord Advocate: No. It is important in cases in which there is supporting evidence and an account or allegation that can be regarded as credible and reliable by a jury. There should not be any barrier to justice for such victims in situations of horrific allegations—rape is a horrific crime. Circumstances in which there is supporting evidence that can be regarded as credible and reliable are the circumstances in which a complainer should have access to justice.

Alison McInnes: In your introductory remarks, you said that, because of a lack of corroboration, 2,803 domestic abuse cases and about 13 per cent of rape cases had not been taken forward. You have also said clearly that there will need to be rules on sufficiency of evidence. How many of those cases in which there was no corroboration would not have been taken forward because there was not a sufficiency of evidence?

The Lord Advocate: We have done shadow marking exercises to ascertain the proportion of those cases that would be taken up if we applied a reasonable prospect of conviction test and where there was supporting evidence. Catriona Dalrymple was in charge of that exercise so, if you do not mind, I will hand over to her to give you the figures.

Alison McInnes: Can I just check whether the answer will relate to the figures that the Lord Advocate gave earlier or to an earlier piece of desktop work that was done for Lord Carloway?

Catriona Dalrymple (Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service): It is an earlier piece of work—

Alison McInnes: So you are not comparing the same two things this morning.

Catriona Dalrymple: No. The shadow marking—

Alison McInnes: So I am not sure that that answers my question. It does not help me much at all.

The Convener: The issue that Alison McInnes is raising relates to the Lord Advocate’s remark that Lord Carloway did a thorough piece of work. That would embrace corroboration, although we appreciate that there are other issues that are far less contentious.

Paragraph 7.2.31 of the Carloway report talks about the cases that were looked at by the Procurator Fiscal Service. I understand that the work was done by two procurators fiscal, one of whom was active and one of whom was retired. Pronouncements were made in relation to the number of cases that would have gone to prosecution and that would have been successfully prosecuted. It has since transpired that the work, which was part of the empirical basis for getting rid of corroboration, was done over a three-week period by two PFs. I think that that is what my colleague is asking about. Obviously, Lord Advocate, you are entitled to bring other evidence as a separate matter. I will pass my copy of the report to Alison McInnes if she wishes to follow up the point.

Alison McInnes: No, thank you. I am well aware of that, and I note that the desktop exercise was brisk and not very thorough. I was referring to the Lord Advocate’s evidence this morning. He gave us figures and suggested that we should be shocked that 2,803 domestic abuse cases were not taken forward because there was no corroborating evidence, but he cannot tell me how many of those would have been knocked out with the new rules on sufficiency of evidence, and therefore—

The Lord Advocate: No, I can.

Catriona Dalrymple: We can.

The Convener: We will hear that, then.

Catriona Dalrymple: It might be helpful if I explain the broad shadow marking exercise that the Procurator Fiscal Service conducted and thereafter explain how we narrowed that down and did an additional exercise in relation to domestic abuse cases.

The purpose of the exercise was to assess the impact of the abolition of the requirement for corroboration on the prosecution service. We consulted statisticians and identified a relevant and random selection of cases. That was about 950 cases that had been reported to the Procurator Fiscal Service. The statisticians were confident that the sample size that was chosen provided an accuracy of plus or minus 5 per cent, so the results are designed to have a 95 per cent accuracy and confidence level. Members will have to excuse me, because I am not a statistician—I am a lawyer.

The Convener: Neither are we, although we might have one here.

Catriona Dalrymple: I am glad.

The Convener: If you get bamboozled, we will get bamboozled.

Catriona Dalrymple: The cases had previously been marked. They were real-life cases that had been reported to the Procurator Fiscal Service between October and November 2012. We conducted a selection process to choose the individuals—and they were provided with draft guidance and the new prosecutorial test.

With the six people who were identified, we tried to replicate a normal team within the fiscal service that would make decisions on cases, so we had a broad range of experience. We had some people who are relatively recently qualified and in whom the corroboration mindset is perhaps not so ingrained, and we had other individuals who have in excess of 30 years of experience of working in Scottish criminal law.

The six markers looked at about 160 cases each. To avoid any contamination of decision, they were given access to the police reports and they were not aware at all of the initial case marking decision. It was all done offline and they did not know what had happened to the cases previously. There was no impact in relation to the forum, or where the case would be prosecuted, because ultimately the exercise was designed to assess whether more or fewer cases would be prosecuted. The forum does not come into the equation when you are looking at the abolition of corroboration.

In the exercise, the prosecutors were given 160 cases each and they were given their own time to do the work. We then analysed the results. In essence, the impact of applying the new prosecutorial test to the business was a mid-range 1 per cent increase in summary cases, which would mean about 1,227 new cases being reported. In solemn cases, there was a mid-range 6 per cent increase, which would mean an extra 721 cases.

You might ask how that compares to Lord Carloway’s exercise. It is kind of like comparing apples and pears, but we have managed to do some comparison. Annex A of Lord Carloway’s report looked at 458 cases and an extra 141 sexual cases. The percentages that are quoted there are percentages of the cases that they looked at. When Lord Carloway’s figures are multiplied out, looking across all solemn business, our statistician worked out that they demonstrate within the range of a 9 per cent increase.

The shadow marking exercise that we conducted with the six prosecutors who were identified and selected is in no way inconsistent with Lord Carloway’s exercise.

The Convener: Just to clarify, is that 9 per cent of cases that are taken to court?

Catriona Dalrymple: It is a 9 per cent increase in the amount of solemn business that is taken to court.

The Convener: Were there any predictions of how many cases would have been successful? That is the issue.

Catriona Dalrymple: No. That is a jury question, not a job for the prosecutors.

The Convener: Yes, it is, but Lord Carloway’s review makes predictions about how many cases would have been successful.

Catriona Dalrymple: It should be borne in mind that our test is based on a reasonable prospect of conviction. We make an assessment of the credibility of the allegation based on whether there is a reasonable prospect of conviction before we decide to mark a case for prosecution.

The Convener: That is a very important piece of evidence. Could we have that in written form?

Catriona Dalrymple: Yes. We have written to the Finance Committee because this information is in the financial memorandum, but we can follow that up with a letter to the Justice Committee.

The Convener: It is in the financial memorandum?

Catriona Dalrymple: Yes, it is in the financial memorandum on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

The Convener: I missed that. My apologies.

Catriona Dalrymple: We were concerned because we have to look at the impact of the business that is also reported to the COPFS. We needed to work with the Police Service of Scotland to identify what increase in business is likely to be seen in the reports. I am sure that the Police Service of Scotland will provide its own evidence on the exercise that it conducted, but it might reassure the committee to know that we conducted our exercise in tandem. We offered guidance to the police as the Lord Advocate would in relation to the reporting of cases to the COPFS.

In that exercise, the police had a similar sample size and the increase in the number of reports was about 1.5 per cent, which equates to another 3,720 cases being reported.

The Convener: We see it now. It is on page 44 of the explanatory notes.

Catriona Dalrymple: That is right. We have to look at the increase in the number of cases that the police receive, which was likely to be 3,720. In planning for the legislation, we thought that the 1.5 per cent increase was quite low, so I sent one of my team out to the police station to review what the police had decided to report for the exercise. It became apparent that the police had made correct judgments in most of the cases, and there was little in addition to that that we thought would meet the reporting test to the COPFS. We are therefore relatively confident about the exercise that the police conducted.

11:00

Ms McInnes followed up on the issue of domestic abuse. The other exercise that we conducted internally was an exercise to look at domestic abuse cases, because we were acutely aware of the barrier that prevails there as far as access to justice is concerned. We looked at an additional 328 cases that had been marked no proceedings because of insufficient admissible evidence and we applied the new prosecutorial test to them. We thought that an additional 1,000 domestic abuse cases per year could be prosecuted in the light of our new prosecutorial test.

Given that we have demonstrated an increase of 1,227 in the summary cases in the shadow marking, it is clear that our assumption is that the majority of the increase in the number of cases that we are likely to take to court—on the summary side—will be in domestic abuse cases. That is the evidence that we have to date from the exercises that we have conducted. I hope that that is helpful.

The Convener: For the avoidance of doubt, will you clarify exactly what the new prosecutorial test is? There might be more to it than simply not having corroborated.

The Lord Advocate: The test is one that is applied in other jurisdictions, and it is whether there is a reasonable prospect of conviction. In other words, the test is whether it is more likely that, if the evidence were presented to a reasonable jury, it would result in a conviction. Obviously, there are component parts of that test.

The Convener: I see. Alison, do you want to follow up on that?

Alison McInnes: When did the Lord Advocate first come to the view that corroboraton needs to be abolished?

The Lord Advocate: I have always thought that, but I have never said it because, as someone who worked in a system that had corroboraton in it, I did not think at the time that there was much support for its abolition, so I kept my own counsel. I have always been of that view—I have not recently had a conversion on the road to Damascus.

The Convener: Or on the road to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

Margaret Mitchell: Good morning. I would like to tease out which other jurisdictions the reasonable prospect of conviction test was based on. What factors were taken into account? What was applied?

The Lord Advocate: We visited and spoke to senior prosecutors at the Crown Prosecution Service in England and Wales. We also spoke to the Director of Public Prosecutions in the Republic of Ireland and others. I was recently at a heads of prosecuting agencies conference that was attended by heads of prosecution from Commonwealth jurisdictions around the world.

Margaret Mitchell: Could you be a bit more specific? What precisely was in the tests that you looked at and applied to the cases that we are talking about?

The Lord Advocate: We looked at others’ tests and their component parts. In applying the reasonable prospect of conviction test, it is necessary to look at the principal allegation, so the complainant’s version or account is considered. Factors are looked for that tend to suggest that her or his account is credible and reliable. Among the factors that are assessed is whether there is supporting evidence for the complainant’s account, whether it is circumstantial evidence and what evidence there is against that account—in other words, is there any counterbalance? Then a view is reached on the totality of the evidence.

In Scotland, we do not look at complainant or victim-centric evidence; we look at the allegation and whether there is supporting evidence for it. If we considered that there was sufficient independent supporting evidence for the allegation, we would reach the view that there was a reasonable prospect of conviction.

A load of factors are taken into account. The decision depends on what the evidence is—it might be eye-witness evidence, forensic evidence or medical evidence. It is difficult to talk about the generality of cases; the test depends on the facts and circumstances of each individual case. An attempt is made to ascertain—on the basis of an objective assessment of the evidence as a whole—whether there is a reasonable prospect of conviction.

As part of the process—on the hypothesis that the conclusion has been reached that there is a reasonable prospect of conviction—the public interest test would be applied: is it in the public interest to raise proceedings? We would take into account various factors, such as the seriousness of the charge, the antecedents of the person who is accused and any mitigation that was apparent from the information before us, in deciding whether it would be in the public interest to raise proceedings. That is how we would go about it.

Margaret Mitchell: I am still struggling to understand what is going to be introduced in the law of evidence—the nitty-gritty of it, the quality of evidence or whatever—that will be different from the system just now and which you saw in the Northern Irish, Welsh and English systems. Am I correct in saying that this is based on how things are done in England, following the Carloway report and the two PFs that looked at cases for that?

The Lord Advocate: No.

Margaret Mitchell: In the research that the procurators fiscal did for the Carloway report, did they make a comparison with the outcome if the cases had been prosecuted under the English system?

The Lord Advocate: What we needed to do was—

Margaret Mitchell: Can you answer my question, please?

The Lord Advocate: I will endeavour to answer it. We looked at what test—

Margaret Mitchell: I am asking about Carloway specifically. We can return to the research that you have just done.

The Lord Advocate: The test did not come from the Carloway report. What we—

Margaret Mitchell: I know, but I am asking you just now about Carloway. You mentioned other jurisdictions in talking about the new test that you used after the Carloway report test was found lacking. I am asking what the Carloway fiscals' research was based on—was it the English system, in which there is no corroboration?

The Lord Advocate: I think that it was the English system—was it?

Catriona Dalrymple: Yes, I think that that is right.

Margaret Mitchell: Did either of those procurators fiscal have any experience of the English system?

The Lord Advocate: No, I do not think that they had experience of the English system, but they have experience as—

Margaret Mitchell: In your opinion, then, would it—

The Convener: Please let the Lord Advocate finish. You can then come back in.

Margaret Mitchell: Certainly.

The Lord Advocate: They have many years’ experience as prosecutors, so they know how to apply a test and assess the evidence. They know how to look for evidence in support of or against an allegation and they know how to apply the public interest test.

Margaret Mitchell: Would it not have been better to have passed the cases to prosecutors who are au fait with and have experience of the English system, to get their opinion? Similarly, in the exercise that you have just carried out, in which you looked at Wales and Northern Ireland, would it not have been better to have passed the cases to those jurisdictions for independent and objective analysis from their experience? Would that not have been better than taking the Scottish experience and saying, “We think that this would have made a difference”? Would that not have provided more conclusive evidence?

The Lord Advocate: No, I do not think so. It would have been possible to send the cases to CPS prosecutors. There is no doubt that that could have been done, but those involved were very experienced prosecutors with years of experience. They know how to apply a test and analyse a case—they know what to look for. I do not think that, had the cases been passed to prosecutors down south, the results would have been different.

Margaret Mitchell: I beg to differ.

You are the Lord Advocate for the whole criminal justice system—for every accused. Today, we have heard startling, compelling and welcome evidence that there would be unintended consequences from the abolition of corroboration. Your remarks have almost totally concentrated on the victims of sexual crimes. What about other victims and the unintended consequences in their cases? Given the weight of concern that exists and the Lord Advocate’s comments this morning—

The Convener: It was Lord Gill.

Margaret Mitchell: I am sorry—I mean the evidence of the Lord President, Lord Gill.

Corroboration has not stood still; it has changed over the years. We have the wisdom of the institutional writers and court practice over the years, which have been passed down in Scotland and of which we should be proud. Does all that give you any pause for thought that you might be wrong and that there might be another way than abolishing corroboration that could be looked at to help the victims of sexual abuse, to make it paramount that the accused’s right to be presumed innocent is not compromised, to ensure that we have no more miscarriages of justice and to provide a better system for everyone?

The Lord Advocate: I am not saying that I am always right. I fully accept that other people may have a different view. Other people may be right and I may be wrong—I do not know. However, I think that I am right.

You mentioned alternatives and other possibilities. In a recent article in Holyrood magazine, Lord Hope was asked whether we should relax corroboration for the category of cases that we have talked about—sexual offending, sexual abuse and domestic abuse. His view was that we should not. When Lord Gill was asked a similar question, he said that it would not be appropriate. I agree with their views on that.

I have heard Margaret Mitchell speak about the possibility of developing the law of evidence or corroboration. We have developed things over the years—for example, in relation to Moorov. In the Moorov case, a four-year gap between two allegations was held to be insufficient for the application of the Moorov approach. Recently, we had a case where we argued generational abuse and the court applied a gap of about 13 years in applying Moorov. We have greater corroborating lesser, and we have argued that an attempt corroborates a completed act. It seems to me that prosecutors have been pretty creative in legal arguments to try to place cases before the court.

However, the law of evidence has a limit. It is a legal requirement to have evidence from two independent sources that the crime was committed and the accused was the perpetrator and on the crucial facts of the case. We can never get past that if we have the requirement for corroboration.

Can I tell you what effect corroboration has? We have to corroborate the taking of buccal swabs from alleged offenders, so two police officers are required for that. We have to corroborate the taking of intimate swabs from a complainer in a rape case. That may involve a child and injuries to the sexual parts. We have to corroborate—

Margaret Mitchell: Can I stop you there?

The Convener: No—let the Lord Advocate finish. We have plenty of time.

The Lord Advocate: In the case of child pornography, we need to corroborate that children are under the age of 16, so that must be done by two witnesses. We have to corroborate forensic analysis, so two forensic scientists have to speak to the results of forensic examination, and transmission of samples is required to be corroborated. That seems completely unnecessary. That is where I am coming from.

Margaret Mitchell: We seem to be back to sexual offences. I am looking at the whole system and every accused who comes into the criminal justice system. My question is whether you are prepared at least to look at a third way, in which corroboration is retained. We are looking at all aspects of the law of evidence.

You mentioned the need for two witnesses. Without corroboration, if a case comes down to a witness’s credibility, it is likely that vulnerable witnesses—who at present can give evidence via videolink or under special measures—will be required to attend, because judging their credibility will be all important. That is perhaps a downside, in contrast to the other things that you say are positive.

We are looking at the matter in the space of a couple of hours this morning. We have spent time on corroboration, which is one aspect of a huge bill. Given the importance of getting this right, would it be more sensible to take the abolition of corroboration out of the bill, to look at the third possibility of retaining and improving corroboration, as well as the other possibilities of retention and abolition, and to have a commission to properly hammer this out so that we are sure that we are being transparent, that justice will be seen to be done and that the right answers have been decided on?

11:15

The Lord Advocate: I have two points. You mentioned the effect that the abolition of corroboration might have on alternative means of giving evidence, such as by CCTV. You suggested that, rather than give evidence from a remote site, witnesses would have to come to court to give evidence. You used the example of assessing a witness by seeing them. I do not think that giving evidence by CCTV or remote link in any way affects the assessment of credibility and reliability. In my humble opinion, I do not think that that should or would be the effect of the abolition of corroboration.

To go back to your principal question, which was about giving the issue more detailed consideration, you may have it in mind that a royal commission or the SLC would look at it. I have heard and respect all members’ views. Ultimately, the decision is for the Scottish Parliament and not for me. I am only giving you my view. Given the extent of the work that Lord Carloway did in his review, I do not think that more consideration is necessary.

Margaret Mitchell: Given the pressure on the budgets of Police Scotland and various others, can you micromanage to avoid the kind of situation that Lord Gill said could possibly happen in which, if you do not need to establish corroboration, you do not go the extra mile to incur the costs of looking for corroboration, and the effect of that is unsuccessful prosecutions?

The Lord Advocate: I touched on that in my opening remarks. The police are under a common-law duty to investigate a case fully. The case of Smith v Her Majesty’s Advocate sets out those duties. As prosecutors and police, we are under a duty, in the European convention on human rights, to properly and fully investigate cases and bring forward all relevant evidence. We are also under a duty in our disclosure obligations to ensure that cases are properly investigated and that any evidence that is in favour of or adverse to an accused person is properly disclosed.

Prosecutors are under duties to ensure that a trial is conducted fairly. The notion that we would not want to bring to court the strongest case that we could is alien to me. The work done by police and prosecutors can sometimes result in an accused person being exonerated—not being taken to court. That is perhaps sometimes overlooked. There are plenty of examples of good investigative work carried out by police and procurators fiscal that results in no prosecution at all.

I can give a serious example of that from way back in the early 2000s when, just before hogmanay celebrations, a number of people were accused of terrorist offences. They were arrested when living in a flat in Easter Road in Edinburgh. Some sinister productions or exhibits were found in the flat, one of which looked like a diagram of where a bomb would be placed in Jenners and the Edinburgh Woollen Mill on Princes Street.

I know for a fact that the police, with support from the procurator fiscal, traced all the flat’s occupants. One of them was traced to Perth in Australia, and he said, “Yeah, that’s my work. I work for Glenmorangie whisky company and I prepared that diagram. It was where I was having a whisky display in Jenners and the Edinburgh Woollen Mill.” As a result of that investigation, the case went nowhere and was—quite properly—not taken up. That is an example of the determination and the morality—the notion of the right thing to do—required to investigate a case fully, which could exonerate someone who is accused of very serious offences.

To answer your question directly, what I am saying is no, not on my watch, and I suspect not on the watch of any future Lord Advocates or chief constables in Scotland. We would always want to bring the best case that we could to court.

Margaret Mitchell: The point is that you cannot micromanage every case. We know that there will be pressures; there is no doubt about that. If you do not need corroboration—I rest my case.

The Convener: She has rested her case. That is good, because I have a lot of people waiting to ask questions.

Lord Advocate, you gave examples of when two police officers need to speak to something in which it appears to me and other committee members that corroboration is over the top. Is there a way in which, under a review procedure, we could look at dispensing with the requirement for corroboration in such instances, unless a challenge is made? I am not an expert, but you seem to have made a fair case for its being too much. However, we have not been able to examine the issue, and I suspect that Lord Carloway did not have time to look at it. We are talking about getting rid of corroboration across the piece and not in a particular set of circumstances. Could it be useful to examine that as part of a review of the whole area of evidence?

The Lord Advocate: That might be useful and I do not demur from the suggestion. However, when work is being carried out on corroborating the taking of samples, we do not know whether we will be required to lead corroborated evidence. In a homicide case, for example, the body has to be identified. The way in which that happens in Scotland is that family members have to attend a mortuary and identify their loved one—thankfully, by looking at a screen—prior to a post-mortem examination. I suggest that nothing could be more horrendous than having to do that.

That identification must be corroborated. The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 says that, if the identification of the deceased referred to in the post-mortem report is not challenged within six days of the trial, that evidence is presumed and evidence of identification does not need to be led. However, at the time when identification is required, we do not know whether there will be a challenge six days from the trial, so police officers require a double identification to comply with the rule for corroboration. The rule could be looked at again, but I am giving examples of how it applies in practice.

The Convener: That is helpful but, having raised the issue, we have moved from corroborating evidence in court to what is corroborated in gathering evidence and what happens in transferring and transmitting evidence—moving it from one place to another. I simply wanted to follow up on whether the issue could form part of any review of what does and does not require corroboration in court. That is it.

The Lord Advocate: Of course it could.

The Convener: Thank you.

Sandra White: I was going to ask you about the requirements and technical burdens, but you have already answered that question.

I have no doubt that all of us around the table want justice for victims, although we may go about it in different ways. We have been looking at court cases and at the prosecution and defence, but we must remember that there are victims who want access to justice, and there have been 2,803 domestic abuse cases and 170 rape cases that have not even gone to court. To me, that is a dereliction of justice for those victims. The statistics highlighted by Ms Dalrymple show a possible increase of between 1 and 7 per cent in the number of such cases going to court. We would all welcome that, but getting to that point involves the issue of corroboration.

In his evidence, Lord Gill was very much of the view that we should not get rid of corroboration and that the judiciary were very much opposed to doing so. I broached the question of guidelines, as we are looking at the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill in the round, and he seemed to say that corroboration should come out and that other aspects, such as the not proven verdict, should be looked at again.

What is your view of Lord Gill’s opening comments on that issue? Members of the committee have talked about evidence going forward to prosecution, and Elaine Murray mentioned juries. If corroboration is abolished and more such cases go to court and before juries, so that access to justice is opened up, it may be that juries’ attitudes and social attitudes, will change and that we will see more justice done for victims.

The Lord Advocate: That is a good point. Social attitudes change over time. I frequently give the example of the social attitudes to drink-driving in the 1960s or to racial abuse in the 1970s compared with now.

There have been studies throughout the world into what are called jury myths—how jurors throughout the world view certain evidence, such as delayed reporting, a lack of physical resistance or the way that a woman is dressed. Prosecutors and police must recognise that.

We hope that, over time, the public—or some members of the public; not all members of the public subscribe to those views, although a proportion do—change their attitudes. That would be a good thing. We recognise those views and, in certain cases, lead expert evidence that, for example, delayed reporting is normative behaviour.

Sandra White: Convener, could I follow that up?

The Convener: Of course. I do not want to curtail the discussion. I will certainly take the other members who are down to ask questions, but we should bear in mind the fact that we have another panel of witnesses and they have to be away by 12.45. I alert members to that and ask for short questions, if possible.

Sandra White: Thank you very much.

Lord Advocate, my other question is, obviously, about corroborative evidence. That is what it all comes down to. I asked Lord Gill about that, and he mentioned the prosecution. In regard to the defence, if there are two witnesses in a case, one could be someone’s friend—they could be a witness on behalf of the defence, not necessarily on behalf of the victim—and they may not tell the truth. We still have two witnesses. You have made it plain that the police and procurators fiscal do their utmost to get corroborative evidence.

I am probably wrong about this—I am not accusing anyone—but is it more likely that the defence would not necessarily push so hard for the case to go ahead because there were only two people there without looking at the corroborative evidence that could be obtained? I am talking not about the prosecution or the victim, but about the accused.

The Convener: I am completely lost.

Sandra White: Perhaps everybody is lost, but in my head that seems to be—

The Convener: I am completely lost.

The Lord Advocate: Let me answer it this way—

The Convener: You are not lost. That is good, because, to be frank, I did not understand the question.

The Lord Advocate: I will answer it from the accused’s point of view. The accused is not required to corroborate anything. That is a rule of law and a good one. I do not have a problem with it.

Defence counsel and solicitors do a very good job in Scotland. To have a fair trial, counsel and solicitors are required to be at the top of their game to challenge and test the evidence. My experience from many years in the criminal justice system is that that is what happens. It is part of the suite of legal protections to ensure a fair trial that we have legal representation, that we have robust testing of the evidence, that the defence is able to carry out its own investigations and lead its own witnesses if it wants to and that the accused is able to make a statement during interview on legal advice and to give evidence if they want. There are many more protections.

The accused does not need to corroborate anything. That is a fundamental rule of law in Scotland.

John Finnie: Lord Advocate, you alluded to the Cadder case and, if I noted you correctly, said that you were not critical of it. You also outlined for us that, as a result of Cadder, one of the three essential requirements in relation to corroboration in a rape case—they are all part of the consideration of the public interest. If there were sufficient credible and reliable evidence to place a case of rape before a jury, it would be inevitable that, given the seriousness of the charge, you would take proceedings, because that would be in the public interest.

John Finnie: You have already acknowledged that, as a result of Cadder, there has been a rebalancing with regard to the accused, who is now entitled to see a solicitor. That will normally result in their not saying something that would have provided some of the evidence that in the past would have supported your bringing a prosecution. You are saying that that has now been removed.

The Lord Advocate: I will try to answer that question with reference to a situation in which a woman displays counterintuitive behaviour and delays reporting. As a result, there are no forensic opportunities to corroborate—

John Finnie: That would be like example 1 in the Crown Office's supplementary submission.

The Lord Advocate: Yes.

There might still be supporting evidence. There might, for example, be powerful evidence of recent distress; the woman might say that her pants were ripped and—lo and behold—she has retained them and they are indeed ripped; and there might be forensic evidence that is consistent with her account. However, you can never fill in the gaps in such a case because there would be no corroboration of penetration. In those circumstances, no matter the quality and quantity of the supporting evidence, you would never have sufficient evidence to take up the allegation of rape.

John Finnie: So where, apart from a suggestion from the accused that the act was consensual, would the corroboration of penetration ordinarily come from?

The Lord Advocate: It would ordinarily come from the forensic evidence, if there was the opportunity to get that. If you could not get that evidence, it would in most cases be difficult to obtain corroboration. It may be, for example—

John Finnie: So your conclusion in example 1 is a statement of fact rather than a summary of the outcome of the particular set of circumstances that it narrates.

The Lord Advocate: I am sorry—I do not appreciate the point.

John Finnie: The outcome of example 1 is

“As there is no corroboration of penetration, we cannot prosecute the charge of rape.”

The Lord Advocate: Yes. That is the case.

John Finnie: But, in any case, that is just a statement of fact.

The Lord Advocate: Yes, but if you abolish corroboration, there is still supporting evidence that would require you to take up that case. It is a matter for the jury whether, having tested the evidence, they find the case to be proven beyond reasonable doubt. That is an example of a case that we cannot take up at present with the rule requiring corroboration. If corroboration is abolished, that is the type of case that we would take up, as there would be supporting evidence as well as the complainer’s account.

John Finnie: The information that is outlined in the supplementary written submission does not say whether there was a medical examination—possibly a delayed medical examination.

The Lord Advocate: Such a medical examination would not provide the evidence to identify or corroborate the identification of the perpetrator.

John Finnie: We will move on.

You discuss the reasonable prospects of conviction in the supplementary submission. You cite a Canadian case, Boucher v The Queen, from 1954. The Supreme Court of Canada stated:

“It cannot be over-emphasised that the purpose of a criminal prosecution is not to obtain a conviction”.

Does that conflict with anything that you have said—namely, that you would proceed only if there was a reasonable prospect of conviction?

The Lord Advocate: No, I do not think that it does. If a person is innocent, I want him to be found innocent. I do not want a miscarriage of justice, and I do not want someone to be wrongly convicted. In assessing whether there is a reasonable prospect of conviction, a gateway test is used to determine whether the case is to be indicted. In those circumstances, the case is put before the court and is properly tested. Ultimately, it is for the jury to decide.

The requirement for corroboration has an effect, as the gates are shut for many victims of rape, sexual abuse, domestic abuse and other crimes predominantly involving those categories of criminal offender.

John Finnie: I wish to ask about false allegations. In your supplementary written evidence, you provide what might be reassuring commentary for regarding the depth of scrutiny that is applied to false accusations. What about joiners, van drivers, shop workers or unemployed youths?

“police officers, teachers, social workers, health professionals and prison officers”

The Lord Advocate: We must recognise that teachers and other professionals, including police officers, are perhaps in a more vulnerable position in relation to false allegations. There are currently procedures in place for allegations against teachers, for example, before a decision can be taken whether to prosecute. The matter must be referred to Crown counsel so that the case is thoroughly looked at. The same applies to cases involving police officers.

I would like to think that procurators fiscal throughout the country apply their common sense. They are trained, they analyse a case and they look at the evidence. They look for any indication that an allegation may be false. Ultimately, if proceedings are raised, the evidence will be rigorously tested before a court of law. That is the same for a joiner as it is for a teacher or a police officer.

The Convener: John Finnie should not look concerned. We must move on to the next agenda item, but—I have discussed this—we will have a further opportunity, if required. I will let Roderick Campbell in, because he has been sitting there waiting, but anybody who has not come in—

John Finnie: I have concluded, anyway.

The Convener: Excellent—I just do not want anybody to worry that I am curtailing this evidence session, as it is a very important analysis. We might invite you back at some point, Lord Advocate, if we have further questions. The same might be true for Lord Gill or other witnesses on this issue. I do not want members to feel that I am suppressing debate and questions on the matter. I want to hear the last question, which is from Roderick Campbell. I know that Alison McInnes is on the list, but we can come back to her later, if that is all right.

Roderick Campbell: I wish to follow up on the differences that the new prosecutorial tests will make. I have read paragraph 15 of your additional submission, Lord Advocate. As regards the qualitative assessment, can you clarify the difference that the new test will make in comparison with current practice?

The Lord Advocate: Current practice does not have that test. We will be applying the test across all our consideration of criminal allegations. When we consider a case, the primary focus—an undue focus, in my view—is currently on quantity. Is there corroborated evidence? If the answer is yes, we then consider credibility and reliability, but no test of reasonable prospect of conviction is currently applied by prosecutors.

To give some reassurance to the committee and the Parliament, I am saying that, if the Parliament chooses to abolish corroboration, we will apply a reasonable prospect of conviction test where there is supporting evidence for an allegation. I hope that that will reassure the committee and the Parliament.

Roderick Campbell: There might not be a formal test currently, but you consider credibility and reliability.

The Lord Advocate: Yes, but we do not consider credibility and reliability against a reasonable prospect of conviction test.

Roderick Campbell: I am just about with you, I think.

The evidence of a victim’s distress is a comparatively recent addition as a corroboration tool. Could you explain to the committee some of the difficulties that it gives rise to?

The Lord Advocate: Do you mean in relation to the evidential value of recent distress?

Roderick Campbell: In addition to corroboration as it was in centuries gone by, how that operates in practice and the difficulties that it causes.

The Lord Advocate: Recent distress is obviously a piece of evidence. In a non-forcible rape, it only corroborates the lack of consent; it does not corroborate penetration and it does not corroborate mens rea. It will only take you some distance regarding the three crucial facts that you must consider or corroborate in a charge of rape.

There are conditions in relation to distress. It must be recent, and it must be displayed to the first natural confidante. There is a raft of case law regarding the gap in time between an allegation being made and distress being displayed and whether that can be taken into account by the jury.

To return to the example that we have been discussing, the effect is that distress does not corroborate penetration and cannot be used to that effect.

Roderick Campbell: My final point—given the time—is in relation to the two written submissions from the Crown Office. There is no comment on what might be described as safeguards if corroboration is removed. Is that because you did not want to get drawn into that debate?

The Lord Advocate: Yes, in the sense that there is also the question whether the not proven verdict should be abolished. The Scottish Government has announced that that will be considered by the Scottish Law Commission, which I welcome. I do not have a problem with that.

There are many safeguards in the trial process, and I have alluded to some of them today. I did not think that we were being asked about those particular additional safeguards. If that is something on which the committee wishes further information, however, we can respond in writing.

Roderick Campbell: I am quite interested in that. In view of the time, I am happy to leave the matter there for the moment.

The Convener: If you could follow that up in writing, Lord Advocate, that would be very helpful.

I bring this evidence session to an end, simply because we must now move on to other business. Thank you very much for your evidence, Lord Advocate and Ms Dalrymple. I suspend the meeting for five minutes to allow the table to be set up for a round-table session.

11:43

Meeting suspended.
The Convener (Christine Grahame): Good morning. I welcome everyone to the Justice Committee’s 34th meeting in 2013. Please switch off mobile phones and other electronic devices completely, as they interfere with the broadcasting system, even when they are switched to silent.

No apologies have been received.

Under agenda item 1, we will continue to take evidence on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. This is our sixth day of evidence at stage 1. We will hear from our panel of witnesses on corroboration and related items.

I welcome to the meeting Robin White, who is vice-chair of the Scottish Justices Association; Raymond McMenamin, who is a solicitor advocate and member of the criminal law committee of the Law Society of Scotland; James Wolfe QC, who is vice-dean of the Faculty of Advocates; and Mark Harrower, who is president of the Edinburgh Bar Association. Good morning and thank you for your written submissions.

We will go straight to questions from members.

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): Last week, we heard from the Lord Advocate that he is very supportive of the abolition of corroboration on the basis that, post Cadder, it is now very difficult to get corroboration, particularly in rape cases—even corroboration that intercourse had taken place, whether it was forced or not. What is your response to the concern that Cadder has changed the landscape and that we now need to think about removing corroboration in order to protect rape victims?

Mark Harrower (Edinburgh Bar Association): Good morning. Thank you for allowing me to give evidence.

The landscape has changed in that, now that suspects have the right to legal advice before formal police questioning, they are more likely to exercise their right to silence. I understand the concern that a rebalancing of the evidential layout as a result of Cadder is needed, but my concern is that the removal of corroboration is not really the right place to look. I think that we are starting in the wrong place.

It is true that, if fewer people confess, there will be corroboration in fewer cases from that source, but that does not mean that there will not be corroboration from other sources. Cadder is a development in that line but, as we have heard, methods of sourcing DNA evidence are always improving, and we are able to get evidence from other sources in many more cases that we possibly could not have got in days gone by.

Do we need to remove corroboration because there will be fewer instances in which penetration is corroborated? That would be a dangerous way to go. The rates of conviction by juries in such cases are notoriously among the lowest rates of conviction in jury trials that go ahead. It is too simple to say that juries take that approach because there is not enough supportive evidence. I think that juries are hesitant to convict in all serious cases, and there are many reasons why they acquit in rape and attempted rape cases. We need to look at the whole picture.

The removal of corroboration across the board would certainly be a massive step simply to get at crimes that are committed in private, as it is recognised by Lord Carloway as one of the pillars of our system at the moment. We need to be a bit more imaginative if we want to assist the Crown in finding ways to support complainers’ evidence rather than removing corroboration across the board.

James Wolfe QC (Faculty of Advocates): I, too, am grateful to be giving evidence on the proposal, which, in respect of its systemic impact on the criminal justice system as a whole, is perhaps the most significant that the committee will have had to consider.

Like Mark Harrower, I would respond to the question in a number of ways. The first point is the one that he made. In circumstances in which one might be less likely to get an admission at police interview, one answer is to look harder for other sorts of evidence. In many cases of the sort that we are talking about, DNA evidence is a realistic option.

The second point is that the proposal to abolish corroboration will affect every case across the whole criminal justice system. As I suspect that we all appreciate, the rule reflects, at root, the practical common sense that if there is evidence from more than one source there can be a degree of confidence that the case is well made. At root, there is a serious policy question to be asked. Is that rule—as a safeguard against miscarriages of justice, which is fundamental to the operation of the justice system—a good rule, which we should hold on to, or is the particular issue that has been identified in relation to the cases that we have been talking about of such significance that the rule needs to be changed?
If one is going to change the rule, there are a number of things to look at. Are there alternative approaches, short of abolishing corroboration across the board? Should one be looking at modifications of the way in which corroboration operates in particular types of case? In any event, given the systemic and fundamental nature of corroboration at every stage of our system, one must look very hard at what one is putting in its place, and one must ask whether one is getting the right balance between safeguards against miscarriages of justice on the one hand, and a reasonable system for prosecuting crime on the other.

Fundamentally, that is why the faculty supports the recommendation that Lord Gill made to the Justice Committee last week—that is, that the issue ought to be examined looking at the whole criminal justice system in the round. Indeed, the faculty’s position from the outset has been that the issue is of such fundamental importance to our criminal justice system that, if we are going to look at it, we must give it to a body such as a royal commission or the Scottish Law Commission, with the widest possible remit to consider the implications right across the system.

Raymond McMenamin (Law Society of Scotland): Thank you for the invitation to give evidence on behalf of the Law Society of Scotland, convener.

It is important to remember that Cadder was nothing to do with corroboration. Cadder was to do with the rights of individuals in police stations and what should apply in that particular set of circumstances. The Carloway review opened up the issue of corroboration and how it might fit into the bigger picture. The Law Society of Scotland welcomes the wider debate; the society thinks that there should be a debate about the whole thing, which should not simply focus on how one can get people convicted following Cadder and how one might apply evidential rules in order to get convictions. I would go so far as to say that if the motivation for the bill is to have people convicted in certain classes of case, that is wrong and indeed quite shameful.

There must be a degree of deliberation about where we are starting from in all this and where we wish to go, because if the bill passes into law in its present form we will be in danger of having a system of justice in which the safeguards against wrongful conviction are so minimal as to be capable of being described as basic—and, indeed, compared with other jurisdictions, primitive. Commentators and lawyers from other jurisdictions will look at Scotland and wonder why we are going backwards in this area. They will wonder whether we have learned nothing at all from the Cadder experience.

The Law Society takes the view that we have a great opportunity to widen the debate to look at corroboration and other safeguards that might apply, and at how those might fit into our system. To that end, the Law Society has invited a number of parties, for and against the retention of corroboration, to a debate in January next year. For the moment, however, we have to consider the initial starting point, which is Cadder and the rights of individuals, not the issue of how we can convict people.

Robin White (Scottish Justices Association): I have four points to make that, to a large extent, underline what has been said already.

The Lord Advocate’s observations are powerful, but they seek to extrapolate from a limited range of examples. Rape is an appalling crime, but it is not clear to me that one should, from the difficulties of convicting in such cases, extrapolate to every criminal case that there is. It is easy to forget that, according to much of the literature on the issue, more than 90 per cent of all criminal cases are summary cases. There is a heavy emphasis on juries in much of the debate, but they are involved in a narrow range of cases. They are important—quantity is not the only dimension—but they are involved in only a tiny proportion of all cases, and, of course, sexual assaults and rapes are a tiny proportion of jury cases. I am not suggesting that those cases are not important; I am pointing out that the effects of abolishing corroboration would be felt enormously more widely than that.

The second point, which has been touched on and has been referred to in written evidence, is that there has never been an easier time to get corroboration, because of the scientific and medical advances of the past few decades. In some senses, therefore, it is a strange time to be talking about abolishing the requirement.

The third point, which is slightly more fundamental, concerns the balance metaphor that is explicit or implicit in much of the debate. I have trouble with the balance metaphor because it assumes that there are only two interests to be weighed—a set of scales or a chemical balance is obviously the idea behind it—whereas there are frequently more than two. It assumes that there is some sort of unit of account that allows you to say, “I have put more on that side of the balance, so I must put the same amount on the other side.” However, there is no unit of account that can be applied. It assumes that you can tell when the balance is in balance—you may recall that a chemical balance has a little indicator that shows when that is the case, but there is no such indicator in this debate. The use of that metaphor leads to an infinite debate whereby one change is argued to require another change somewhere. else, which is argued to require another change, and so on. That infinite continuation of debate is, perhaps, unfortunate.

My fourth point, again, reiterates what others have said. The essential issue is that corroboration, like cross-examination, is a means of testing the quality of evidence. Much of the debate has been about corroboration as quantity. There is clearly a quantitative aspect, but one should not forget that there is also a qualitative aspect: it improves the case if there is corroboration. Therefore—as others have said; this is hardly novel—there is a need to consider everything in the round. I notice that the not proven verdict has been sent off to the Law Commission. That is an interesting and quite important issue but I suggest that it is of enormously less importance than the corroboration question, so why should corroboration also not be sent off to the Law Commission or some other body to be considered, as well as the alternative safeguards that would be put in place if it were to be abolished?

Elaine Murray: The Lord Advocate has also argued that the proposed prosecutorial test, which, I presume, is similar to the test that exists in England, would act as a safeguard against prosecutions that were based on flimsy evidence, as it is based on a reasonable prospect of conviction.

I was therefore quite interested in Mr McMenamin’s comment about other jurisdictions, because we have been told by supporters of the proposal that very few jurisdictions across the world use corroboration and that, because we have it, we are somehow behind the times.

Raymond McMenamin: A lot of people are under the apprehension that corroboration does not exist in other jurisdictions when, in fact, it does. The English have it; the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 contains provision for requiring corroboration of confessions made to the police by persons with mental handicaps. If our bill passes into legislation, we will not have the same safeguard that is built into the English system, which will mean that vulnerable people will be better off in England than in Scotland by virtue of corroboration. The Dutch system, too, uses corroboration for confession evidence. A lot of people are therefore wrong to think that we are the only country that applies corroboration.

It is true that our application of corroboration is more widespread and that we rely on it more than any other country, but other countries also apply it. I have cited the English and Dutch jurisdictions but I know that the United States uses corroboration a lot and, indeed, research will show that other jurisdictions think that corroboration must be considered in many cases. In England, the system contains certain safeguards whereby judges in certain cases can caution juries regarding corroboration and prosecutions based on single-source evidence.

I am not saying that that is right or wrong but it is different from our system, which we have developed in a different way. We are now about to see that aspect disappear and, unlike in many other countries, corroboration will simply not feature. I agree with my colleagues that it is the main safeguard that will go if the bill goes through; as Mark Harrower has pointed out, the minimum that could be done in solemn cases is to increase the votes on a jury by two. Some will say that we still have the not proven verdict but no research has been carried out on its impact as a safeguard; all we know is that it is a verdict of acquittal. We cannot look into the minds of juries—indeed, we are prevented from doing so.

My point is the same as that made by the Lord Justice General. This has not been thought through, and it needs to be thought through a lot more thoroughly than it has been. We need to do more research into other jurisdictions, into what systems might apply here in Scotland and into whether we entirely abandon corroboration or—as is a distinct possibility—retain it in part for certain cases. That approach might well work but it has not been looked at. If we simply throw corroboration out altogether, we will be in danger of throwing the baby out with the bathwater.

The Convener: As you have rightly pointed out, how juries think about cases and come to their decisions is an unknown quantity but Mr Harrower said that he thought that there were reasons why juries do not convict. What are those reasons? What are your thoughts based on?

Mark Harrower: Juries find it very difficult to assess cases involving crimes, particularly of a sexual nature, that are committed in private. They go into court not looking to acquit people but wanting to do their job properly, and I think that the jury system is probably the fairest method of trying someone that can be used.

As a defence lawyer who over the years has represented a number of people accused of rape, I know that such complaints come out of emotionally charged situations in which alcohol is often present and in which the people involved very often know each other and have history between them. More than any other type of case, juries find it very difficult to assess cases of rape and other such allegations because they see a witness—and indeed the accused, if they give evidence—for only a short time in the witness box. Moreover, when witnesses give evidence in court, they find it an unnatural environment; for example, they might be giving evidence via a television screen as a result of special measures. A person—this applies both to the accused and to the complainer—may not perform well on the day because of the pressures of being in court.

Although some contributors of evidence on the bill have referred to certain preconceptions in Scotland that need to be tackled—regarding how women dress, for example, or other things that have in the past been identified as problems—modern juries nowadays are hesitant to convict in rape cases because, even with corroboration, the case very often boils down to one person’s word against another’s. Even if the case gets to court with corroboration of penetration, the question comes down to whether there was consent or not, and that is still a very difficult assessment for juries to make.

That assessment will become even more difficult if we put cases into court where there is no corroboration. At present, as the Lord Advocate said, there needs to be some support for the three essentials in order to prove rape: penetration, lack of consent, and mens rea on the part of the accused. Currently, the cases that go to court have that element of additional evidence. What is proposed is that we put cases into court where that additional element is absent. How can we expect juries to be more sure when that evidence is not there?

With regard to the qualitative test that Elaine Murray mentioned, we need only look over the border to a very recent case that involved a very high-profile prosecution for rape based solely on the evidence of a complainer. That resulted in an unanimous acquittal of the person who was accused, but we must consider what effect the case has had on the system. Whether that was a miscarriage of justice depends on one’s definition of the term; I know that Lord Carloway says that the matter is so important that we need that discussion, to say that one thing should happen prematurely, given the need for wider research and discussion, to say that one thing should happen.

When someone is acquitted in a high-profile case such as the one in England, it is equally damaging for the criminal justice system if we are left wondering why the case ever got to court in the first place. In the newspaper reports about the Le Vell case, commentators were asking how on earth that case got to court in the first place. The case would never have made it to court in Scotland, because of corroboration. The result of the Le Vell case is that the accused’s life is ruined, and there is a lot of rebuilding to be done. In addition, we must consider the effect on the complainer in future, as she has been disbelieved and will have to deal with that.

We need to make difficult decisions in our justice system about which cases we put into court. It is not simply a question of just putting witnesses in and letting them get on with it. The rules that we have established over a very long time have—as Lord Gill said—served us extremely well. We have very few miscarriages of justice in this country because we have set the bar quite high and said that we will not put cases into court unless we can be sure that, if a conviction is returned, we have got the right person.

The Convener: I will take Margaret Mitchell first, followed by John Finnie, Roderick Campbell, Sandra White, Alison McInnes and John Pentland. All the questions are on corroboration, so there is no such thing as a supplementary. I see that Christian Allard wants to come in too.

Margaret Mitchell (Central Scotland) (Con): We have heard quite a lot of evidence this morning, and I want to be clear about three things. First, do panel members agree that other jurisdictions’ not having corroboration is not a reason to abolish corroboration in Scotland?

Secondly, the Carloway report examined two options: to abolish and to retain corroboration. The third option is to retain corroboration and to improve the law of evidence in order to make corroboration easier. That option seems to be viable, but it was not considered. Would the panel favour consideration of that option? I am thinking in particular of the Law Society of Scotland’s upcoming debate, which will address the options of retention and abolition but, perhaps, not the third option, which might usefully be added.

Thirdly, Lord Gill made another suggestion which—for the avoidance of doubt—two of the panellists have already indicated would be good. The committee is very worried about pressure of work and the fact that we are considering the very lengthy Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, which has many other provisions with which abolition of corroboration is slotted in. Given the importance of corroboration to the criminal justice system and Scots law, and the weight of opinion against abolition, would the panel favour taking the provisions out of the bill and giving them to a royal commission, for example, so that the issue could be properly examined?

Raymond McMenamin: On that last point, yes—the Law Society of Scotland would favour the provisions on corroboration coming out of the bill and going before a royal commission. We think that the matter is so important that we need that wider debate. We also need wider research, as I have already mentioned. I agree entirely with the suggestion.

Margaret Mitchell: What about the options?

Raymond McMenamin: At present, it would be premature, given the need for wider research and discussion, to say that one thing should happen over another. However, at the moment, corroboration should not go; we have nothing to put in its place that would provide the safeguard that corroboration currently provides.

Margaret Mitchell: Could I ask you to look at it another way—to look at retaining corroboration but improving the law of evidence to make corroboration easier? As Mr White already said, with new technology and with more DNA evidence, we should be able to use the law of evidence to try to make corroboration easier.

Raymond McMenamin: I think that we already do that, because corroboration has in various respects been whittled down—for want of a better expression—to the bare minimum. For example, in cases where there is scientific evidence, there is now statutory provision—there has been for some time—for only one scientist to be called to give evidence for the Crown, and notice is given by the Crown, in the service of an indictment, that that is to happen. Only one person is needed to speak to scientific evidence.

Lord Carloway, whom I have heard speak on corroboration on a number of occasions, has stated that in his view, corroboration has been reduced in various areas to almost nothing, which is one of the reasons why he advances his argument for its abolition. It is correct that it has been reduced; in our evidential rules, it does not take much at all to corroborate a confession. For example, special knowledge confessions basically mean that if somebody makes in a confession a reference that suggests that they may have been the perpetrator—that they have knowledge of how a crime was committed—that is enough. We already apply a very much-weakened rule regarding corroboration in many respects.

Margaret Mitchell: I think that we are looking at this in different ways. I am looking to strengthen corroboration and to see how it could be improved and more easily established, and not just as it relates to DNA and new technology but in terms of what happens in court at the moment—for example, the Moorov doctrine and the timescales that are applied in practice, which could be relaxed a little to improve things. Those are just two propositions that we are bringing to the panel today, which I think rather proves the point that there is an argument for a third way, which is at least to consider retention while improving the law. I do not think that either of us—

The Convener: I caution you about using the word “we”. I have no problem with what you are saying, but you need to speak for just yourself—as does everyone else.

Margaret Mitchell: Yes—okay. It is something to consider.

On the third point, with regard to what other jurisdictions do, Lord Gill made the point in his opening statement at last week’s meeting that what other jurisdictions do is not a reason in itself to retain or abolish corroboration.

The Convener: We have had Mr McMenamin’s answer; do other witnesses concur? Mr Wolfe?

James Wolfe: Thank you, madam convener. I agree with all three propositions that have been put to me. On that last point on comparison with other jurisdictions, it is perhaps a mistake to look narrowly at the question of corroboration and what other systems have in relation to the rule of corroboration. You have to look at a system in the round. A much better informed authority than me, the regius professor of law from the University of Glasgow—along with his colleagues—has submitted written evidence to the committee that states that if "the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill as it now stands" were to be enacted, it would

"reduce the level of protection against wrongful conviction offered in Scotland below that offered in any other comparable jurisdiction."

That statement is by three distinguished academics from the University of Glasgow; I suggest that it must be taken seriously.

The other point that perhaps is worth making in relation to the contrast between Scotland and other jurisdictions is that, over the years, a variety of options that form part of the suite of safeguards in other jurisdictions have been looked at in Scotland, but have been rejected on the basis that we have, among other reasons, the protection of corroboration. I can give the examples of dock identification and the picking out in court of the accused by a witness. Many systems regard that as an unfair procedure, but it is regarded as being acceptable in our law, within limits. One of the reasons why it has been found to be acceptable in our system is that we have corroboration.

10:30

If we are to abolish corroboration across the board, we have to look again at a variety of the rules that we apply routinely in our courts, and to decide whether they should remain an acceptable part of a modern criminal justice system that does not have corroboration. I suggest that it is therefore important to look at corroboration not in isolation, and I have given a number of reasons why. The Faculty of Advocates does not suggest that there is no issue to be examined. We welcome the debate on such a serious and important issue. However, if corroboration is to be examined, we should look in the round at all the structures and rules of our criminal justice system.
Robin White: If the system were unique, that would look like a very good reason for abolition: “They’re all out of step except our Johnny”. However, the common objection is not that that is not an argument but that it is a burden of proof issue. That is to say that it is an argument, but no more than an argument. If you like, it is not a knock-down argument, hence the suggestions that the matter needs to be looked at more fully.

Mark Harrower: The proposal to abolish corroboration should be taken out of the bill. I do not think that I have spoken to a single solicitor in my jurisdiction who supports abolition. You might think that my profession would be the one to benefit most from more cases going to court, but we do not want it.

Every solicitor who has been doing the job for a long time, running trials week in and week out, will be able to talk about a handful of cases—I hope only a handful—in which he or she genuinely believes there have been miscarriages of justice. Most such miscarriages of justice are below the radar because they happen at summary level; as we have heard, the majority of prosecutions in Scotland are at summary level. In 2011-12, 96 per cent of people who were convicted were convicted in the sheriff summary courts and justice of the peace courts, and the so-called safeguard of the majority raising jury will not even touch that because juries never go near the sheriff summary courts or JP courts. The majority of convictions in this country have nothing to do with jury voting. That is one of our main concerns. Nothing in the bill is proposed as an additional safeguard on summary business.

Apart from that, most solicitors will be able to tell you that they have dealt with a number of cases in which people were convicted, and most decisions on guilt were based on questions of credibility and reliability, which means who the judge or jury believed and who they rejected. When a judge or jury comes to a decision that goes against a solicitor’s client, there is not much that the solicitor can do about it: that is the end of the line. You only get one shot at a trial in Scotland and you only really get one appeal. Appeals against conviction generally have to be based on errors in law. You cannot ask the appeal court to revisit all the evidence and come to a different decision about who the sheriff or jury believed.

We have a one-stop shop, which is why we in Scotland have been so determined to ensure that we get it right first time around. That is why the formula at which we have arrived has produced very few miscarriages of justice. During the past few decades in England, a number of high-profile miscarriages of justice have been overturned in the appeal court. Many of those convictions were based on single sources of evidence—primarily confessions—whereas we in Scotland always look for an independent check. We have avoided what has happened in England by virtue of the formula at which we have arrived over a long period. To change that suddenly and to take one part of that equation away without looking at what we need to replace it with would be a big mistake.

As far as evolution of the law of evidence is concerned, it would be possible to look more at what we could do in particular cases to assist the Crown to get cases to court. However, we need to look at that very carefully because the law of corroboration would need to be watered down in respect of crimes that were committed in private if we are to get more of the cases that the Lord Advocate talked about into court. Is that what we really want to do, though? Do we want to create a special class of case in order to get cases involving one against one into court so that juries can make a decision?

We can look at the options. The law of corroboration has managed to evolve over the years; in recent times we have managed to bring home two convictions for murder in cases in which no body was recovered. That happened in a system in which we have all the challenges that corroboration puts in front of the Crown. I think that we can say that our justice system actually serves this country very well in respect of such difficult cases.

I agree with everyone else that we cannot just rush to judgment on this matter. We need to look at the whole system because all the elements are interdependent. I have heard sheriffs say many times that they have found proof beyond reasonable doubt in corroboration. Sheriffs, of course, will give reasons for their decisions in a conviction case, but juries cannot do that. Perhaps we need to look more closely, too, at how juries arrive at their decisions before we can safely say that a jury majority of 10 is a safe margin.

The Convener: I have raised previously the issue of how juries arrive at decisions. I put it to you that you would say what you said about corroboration because you are a defence lawyer, so if we were to get rid of corroboration, fewer of your clients would get off. How do you answer that?

Mark Harrower: Many solicitors start off on my side of the fence as defence lawyers, but quickly become prosecutors or go to other parts of the system. We all have an interest in the system working properly. As I said earlier, we can all think of cases—we do not really forget them—in which we know deep down that there have been miscarriages of justice.

I can think of a case from a few years ago of a rape conviction that was returned against a man in his early 20s who had no previous convictions. After a night’s drinking he met a young woman in the town and they got together; there was evidence on video of their being together. Later on, intercourse happened in a public place and according to the complainer it was non-consensual, but according to him it was consensual. Without going into all the details of the case, I remain convinced to this day that that young man was innocent and nobody will ever convince me otherwise. He was very well represented by someone who was a defence solicitor, and is now one of the top prosecutors in Scotland, who will not be convinced otherwise, either. Because it was a decision that was based purely on credibility and reliability, there was nothing I could do. I had to sit and tell him and his mother that because our law is that all questions of credibility and reliability are exclusively for the jury or the judge, his case was at the end of the line.

I do not want to see an increase in cases like that, which is the reason why all my colleagues and I are opposed to the abolition of corroboration. We believe, as does Lord Gill, that abolition will mean an increase in miscarriages of justice. It stands to reason that if we lower the standards that are required, we will convict more innocent people.

James Wolffe: As professional lawyers, we are fundamentally interested in the proper administration of justice both in securing convictions against the guilty and in acquittal of those who are not guilty. In looking into the matter, the Faculty of Advocates convened a committee that included advocates with considerable prosecution experience as senior advocate deputes, as well as those with experience from the defence side. It is important that the committee understands that it was that body that put together the response from the Faculty of Advocates.

The faculty’s fundamental concern with the bill is that if the provision in relation to corroboration is enacted with the ancillary provision that would increase the jury majority from eight to 10, we would be left with a system that fundamentally runs an unacceptable risk of an unfair trial in Scotland.

The Convener: I thought that it was important to get that on the record because one of the issues that will be raised is that you are speaking from the defence side alone. It gives an opportunity for that to be challenged elsewhere.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): Good morning, panel. I have a question about the phrase “access to justice”, which keeps cropping up in evidence. The argument that is being put is that the requirement for corroboration is denying people access to justice. I would appreciate your comments on that, along with issues around sufficiency of evidence and what the rationale for prosecution is in relation to the public interest.

Raymond McMenamin: Prosecution should always be in the public interest. That must be the starting point.

There is an issue with our system of corroboration in that when certain persons make complaints and there is no corroboration or back-up evidence, they are not in a position to give evidence. A prosecutor will decide that the case cannot go to court because of a lack of corroboration. That may well have to be looked at.

In considering that, we must have a system that is robust and fair to all—that is, to witnesses and accused persons. It is a difficult thing to reconcile, but at present the Law Society—whose members, I hasten to mention, consist of defence lawyers, prosecutors and those who represent the interests of people who have been victims of crime—feels that there is now a great opportunity to look at all that and to come up with a system that will serve us well in the future. However, it is a difficult issue and I accept totally that in our corroborative system, there are some people who will make complaints who will not have the chance to give evidence.

James Wolffe: Perhaps one needs to look at it this way. One ought to be concerned about access to effective justice. We do not serve anyone’s interests by bringing a prosecution that does not have a reasonable prospect of success. It is not in the interests of a complainer to be put through a trial in which the jury will only acquit. To put an accused person through a trial when there is not a reasonable prospect of conviction is not only a waste of public resource but deeply unfair to that accused person.

If one is going to talk about prosecution in the context of access to justice, it is important that we are talking about access to effective justice and not simply the airing of an allegation in the abstract.

Robin White: Given the remarks that “Defence lawyers would say that, wouldn’t they?”, I have the advantage of being disinterested in this matter, being neither a prosecution nor a defence lawyer—

The Convener: That was a correct use of “disinterested”. That is one of my bugbears.

Robin White: I am glad that it will appear in the Official Report.

The Convener: Yes. I love it.

Robin White: I am pleased to have given you pleasure.
The Convener: I am not saying that you did not know what you were saying, but so many people use it in the wrong way. Miss Campbell taught me how to use it.

Robin White: We must keep up standards.

As a minor member of the judiciary, I speak with a degree of disinterestedness. On access to justice, I take it that that was, in effect, a reference to victims. I am concerned by some aspects of the view that is being taken of victims in the criminal justice system. Victims and witnesses tend to be collapsed into one group. There are clearly very important issues about witnesses; they are not infrequently victims. In the past, the criminal justice system has been very remiss in treating them simply as prosecution fodder—or defence fodder, as the case might be.

We have to distinguish the interests of victims as victims, from the interests of witnesses who may be victims. The significance of that is that there is a danger of losing touch with—I think it is uncontroversial to say it—the underlying purpose of the entire criminal justice system, in so far as it is a system, or with criminal law and criminal procedure. Criminal law is that part of the law that identifies behaviours that are to be punished—I will use that word—and for which sanctions are to be applied. Criminal procedure is the means by which rules for identifying those people are laid down. The underlying purpose of the criminal law is to identify those who have done a category of wrong that we will punish.

10:45

Another part of the law is entirely concerned with compensation of victims of one sort or another—the law of delict. There is masses wrong with the law of delict, just as there is masses wrong with the criminal law, but we have to be careful not to trespass out of the criminal justice system into the delictual system and assume that the function of the criminal law is to provide a remedy for victims. If it does that, that is all well and good, but I hope that it is uncontroversial to say that that is not its fundamental function. If we are going to try to change the criminal justice system’s fundamental function, we should know that we are trying to do that and not do it by a side wind.

I have a second point on sufficiency and public interest. The prosecutor’s test for prosecution has already been mentioned, and I think that we are coming back to it. I am certain that I am correct in saying that, in the Carloway report, there was no discussion of what that test might be if corroboration were to be removed. I see that the written evidence from the Crown Office mentions what it thinks the test should be, but I think that it is accurate to say that there has been little discussion of that. What the Crown Office writes might be sensible, but it is not something on which there has been general debate. If the nature of the decision to prosecute is to change, as it must, there will have to be considerable debate about what the test will be.

Mark Harrower: We have to remember that our system, like all systems of justice, is a human system that is never going to be perfect. We can never convict everyone who is guilty and we cannot protect everyone who is innocent every day of the week. All that we can try to do is achieve a balance whereby we properly and fairly process as many guilty people as possible while keeping miscarriages of justice to a minimum. I think that we have managed to achieve that.

The phrase “access to justice” implies opening up the courts to those who have complaints and who want to see the person whom they perceive has wronged them brought to justice and convicted and punished. We have to remember that not everybody who makes a complaint is telling the truth. Unfortunately, because it is a human system, although many people come to court to do their best and tell the truth, a number of people come to court to lie. It is difficult for a human system, especially if it deals with witnesses in a short space of time, to ascertain who is telling the truth and who is lying.

We ask juries to make those decisions, and we recognise that it is difficult to do. In Scotland, we have given them some assistance by saying, “Look for something else—an independent check.” That is true not just for juries but for sheriffs, and it has worked very well for us. By lowering the standard of proof, you will open the doors of the court to more complainers and increase the risk of convicting more people on lesser evidence, which will increase the risk of miscarriages of justice.

John Finnie: With regard to the crime of rape, the three elements that you mentioned—consent, mens rea and proof of penetration—were alluded to last week by the Lord Advocate, who said that, before Cadder, we had a situation where an accused may have previously admitted to consensual intercourse and one of the elements had then been proved. If one of the catalysts for the removal of the requirement of corroboration is to improve the conviction rate for heinous crimes including rape, do you think that there will be an alteration to the three elements, or are there other consequential effects of that? It would seem that, if you do not prove penetration, you are talking about another heinous crime, potentially.

Mark Harrower: As I said earlier, even with corroboration, juries find it difficult to decide who they think is telling the truth in such situations. I do not know how you are going to corroborate penetration other than by an admission from the accused or forensic evidence. It is just not going to happen unless you can find some compelling supporting evidence.

The supplementary Crown submission provides a number of examples that I think are powerful arguments but which do not amount to corroboration as we know it. Either you have corroboration or you do not and if you get rid of it, it will be possible to convict someone of rape who might never have met the person in question. I know that the Crown intends to apply a qualitative test and look for supporting evidence, but I have not heard it say, "We'll definitely not prosecute if there is no supporting evidence." We need look only at the Le Vell case down south, which, despite the lack of supporting evidence, was prosecuted all the way. We should seek to avoid such a situation in Scotland, however difficult such choices might be and however difficult it might be to tell someone you think might make a very good witness. "I'm sorry but this is the rule." We need such rules to ensure that we maintain the balance that has been struck here.

The Convener: Have you concluded, John?

John Finnie: No, convener. I have one final question on Mr Harrower's point about the two recent murder convictions in cases where no body had been found, which showed that, with corroboration and sufficient investigation, a conviction could be obtained. That would often require a Crown Office direction to the police service and the availability of dedicated police resources. Do you think that, as presently configured, our system has sufficient resources for the Crown to ensure that that would happen in every case?

James Wolffe: Although we are discussing fundamental principles with the committee, one cannot ignore the resource question. Indeed, the Faculty of Advocates has made a response to the bill's financial memorandum. On its own analysis, the Crown predicts an increase of between 3.5 and 12.5 per cent in the number of solemn prosecutions if corroboration is abolished, which equates to 220 to 760 additional cases prosecuted on indictment each year, and a much greater number of additional summary prosecutions. We have sought in our written comments to address the various assumptions that the Crown has built into its approach to resources, but the bottom line is that, as a result of the measure, significant additional costs have been identified as being required at all stages of the criminal justice system, particularly in the Crown Office and the courts. Indeed, the estimate for the courts is £3.25 million in staff resources and about £900,000 in training.

A striking feature of the financial memorandum is its statement that the additional costs to the Crown and the courts system will be absorbed without any increase in funding. Of course, if this is the right thing to do, one will have to find ways of resourcing it, but with such a systemic change one needs to take a clear-eyed view of the practical consequences for the system. We must be concerned that, first of all, a system that one might already regard as stretched will become overstretched and, secondly, any investigation that does not have to be carried out might not be. I say that, of course, without suggesting any want of integrity on the part of the police or prosecutors.

The Convener: We will move on. I call Roderick Campbell.

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): I refer to my entry in the register of members' interests; I am a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

As it says in the submission from the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, the second part of the new test for prosecution, which requires a prosecutor to make an assessment about the public interest, is no change from the current situation. However, the first part—the evidential test—will be made up of three elements. As the Crown said, those will be:

- "(i) a quantitative assessment—is there sufficient evidence of the essential facts that a crime took place and the accused was the perpetrator?"
- "(ii) a qualitative assessment—is the available evidence admissible, credible and reliable?"
- "(iii) on the basis of the evidence, is there a reasonable prospect of conviction in that it is more likely than not that the court would find the case proved beyond reasonable doubt?"

To what extent will the new test provide safeguards against potential miscarriages of justice when prosecutions go forward? How much of an improvement will it be?

Raymond McMenamin: It might not provide any safeguards. That is largely speculative. There are assessments that a professional prosecutor will have to make, based on his or her experience, but within that there are no real safeguards.

That is especially the case given the point that has just been made. There is a widespread perception in the legal profession that the Crown is struggling with its workload, which is a concern. That might not be something that the Lord Advocate will readily accept or admit to, but I am a practising defence lawyer and can confirm that there is such a view of the Crown. We are talking about beleaguered procurators fiscal marking cases—and Crown counsel perhaps less so. If the prosecution system is under stress, our chances of having prosecutors think about safeguards as they mark cases are diminishing all the time.

James Wolffe: As I said, I do not for a moment doubt the integrity with which prosecutors will seek to apply the test. However, there is a constitutional point. In looking at the bill, the Parliament is looking at the statutory structures within which a trial will take place and the safeguards in that regard, but the Lord Advocate's guidance to prosecutors is not to be enshrined in statute and has as yet been the subject of relatively little debate, as Mr White said.

Lord Advocates come and go and may change their guidance. I note that the Lord Advocate has acknowledged that for certain classes of individual, which are identified in paragraph 33 of the Crown Office's supplementary submission, “proceedings ... would not be taken up without strong supporting evidence.”

One understands why the Lord Advocate said that in the context of those particular cases. However, that is an example of how the guidance that will be provided will result in the test being applied in different ways to different classes of case, in ways that are, as yet—and in saying this I am not being critical of the Crown's written evidence—unclear and unknown.

Legislators who are looking at the bill must ask, “Are we putting in place a system that adequately secures the conviction of the guilty and the acquittal of the innocent? Will the structure that we put in place provide adequate assurance in that regard?” Of course the prosecutor's role is important, but it is not a legislative safeguard, and precisely how the test will be applied remains to be seen.

The Convener: Does anyone else want to comment?

11:00

Mark Harrower: On the ground, in the courts, the bar is seeing prosecutors who are under increasing pressure. They have big workloads nowadays, and there seem to be categories of case that they are on instruction to proceed to trial with, come what may. That rather counts away from the tradition that we have always had in which prosecutors have had the discretion to discontinue cases if they did not believe that they were in the public interest.

In recent times, certain cases have been highlighted as being of particular concern to society, such as cases with racial or religious aggravations. I have spoken to prosecutors about that. A stalking case was highlighted in the Daily Record as recently as last week. According to the Daily Record, the Crown Office stated: “pleas of not guilty in such circumstances should not be accepted without evidence being heard at trial.”

Stalking cases under section 39 therefore now seem to fall under the category of cases that have to go to trial.

As recently as this morning, I spoke to a prosecutor to ensure that what I am about to say is right. There is a certain category of cases in which a certain sensitivity is identified, and it is thought that almost all cases of that type should proceed to evidence. Certain cases are therefore prioritised for trial.

The proposed new test will require prosecutors to do a great deal of independent assessment of the evidence and to take on responsibility in those cases, as they will need to assess what supportive evidence there is, the quality of that supportive evidence, and whether it is enough to justify the case going to court. They are expected to make a decision on whether the case could reasonably proceed to a conviction on the basis of what will often be written statements.

A lot of people are prosecuted year on year. In 2011-12, 124,736 people were proceeded against in court and prosecuted. If corroborative evidence did not apply to all of those cases, how would that assessment be made? We do not expect prosecutors to get in the complainers in every single case, so they will need to make the assessment based on written statements. In the smaller cases—the summary cases that I have mentioned, in which people can still get up to 18 months in jail if they are convicted—those written statements will very often be taken by police officers, who will sometimes not be very experienced. They can be taken late at night when those officers are under pressure—for example, in the middle of George Street when a big rammy is going on. How are prosecutors to make a proper assessment of whether the case has a reasonable prospect of conviction, based on statements alone, especially when prosecutors may be subject to the additional influence of having to be careful of cases with particular sensitivity? I worry about how that test will apply and how our prosecutors, who are so used to corroborative evidence, will change their mindset to apply it properly.

The Convener: You are being delicate but, given the stalking case example, are you implying that, because of the sensitivity, sexual assault, rape and domestic violence cases will be taken to court almost no matter what? Is that where you are going?

Mark Harrower: I think that we see categories of case going into court in which prosecutors are clearly under instruction to get on with it. For example, just a couple of weeks ago, I saw a domestic abuse case file sitting on a table in court with a big note from a senior prosecutor to the junior prosecutor that said that there was a reluctant complainer in the case, but proceed anyway.

It could be said that it is in the public interest to proceed with all domestic abuse cases, as that is quite rightly an area of concern, but I think that, if we apply that to every single case of a particular type, we will plug up the courts with cases that have to proceed to a conclusion. For example, I had a jury trial in the sitting in Edinburgh last week that was one of nine jury trials that were adjourned out of that sitting. I think that that was the third or fourth trial diet that that case of mine had got to.

As Mr Wolfe said, we have to be able to balance the resources in this country, which are not infinite, with prioritising cases that truly are the most important ones, and we need to guard against imposing blanket directions in cases of a particular type because we are worried about what the Daily Record might say.

Roderick Campbell: I want to move on to another subject: the reasonable jury point, which was in the Scottish Government's second consultation on safeguards and which is not proceeded with in the bill. What is the panel's view on that point? Lord Carloway suggested that there were two reasons why the proposal would be inappropriate. One was that, if the judge got it wrong, it would be very late in the day for the prosecutor to try to appeal the decision, and it would be costly in terms of resources. The second was that, if one judge alone made the decision, it would be an opportunity for an idiosyncratic judge to decide, whereas if the decision is restricted to the appeal court with three judges, they are more likely to get it right.

Are there any thoughts on that and on the implications?

James Wolfe: As I understand it, Mr Campbell is raising the question of whether the trial judge should have the right to withdraw a case from the jury on the basis that the evidence does not meet the appropriate standard, whatever it is.

First, we have a ground for appeal in our system that allows the appeal court to set aside a conviction on the basis that no reasonable jury would have convicted. Logically, that implies that we recognise that, on occasion, juries bring in verdicts that are unreasonable. It seems odd that we are depriving the one independent and impartial judge, who is highly trained and has seen the evidence, of the power to withdraw a case from the jury in those circumstances.

That ties in with the point about prosecutorial discretion. For example, a prosecution may be brought in good faith on the basis that it is thought that the evidence meets the test, but at trial, when the witnesses appear, the evidence does not meet the test. One would hope that, in those circumstances, the prosecutor would withdraw the case from the jury, but he or she might not. Are we to say that the judge may not say, "I do not take the view that the evidence meets the test that would have allowed the case to be prosecuted in the first place, and I am going to take it away from the jury"? It is odd that such a proposal has not been taken forward.

To meet immediately the objection that the provision would put power in the hands of a trial judge who may exercise it idiosyncratically, the Parliament has recently provided for a right of appeal where a trial judge upholds a no-case-to-answer submission. We have had experience of such appeals, and appeal courts are convened very swiftly—effectively overnight—so that the appeal court can review the trial judge's decision to uphold the no-case-to-answer submission and remove the case from the jury by that means. The appeal court is convened swiftly so that, if the Crown appeal is upheld, the case can go straight back to the jury and the jury can decide it. The Parliament has already put in place the mechanism that can deal with the concern that Lord Carloway expressed. There is no reason why a similar Crown appeal could not be made available against a decision of the type that we are discussing.

Robin White: I emphasise again the point about the propensity of trials to be summary. We are discussing further safeguards that are to be introduced, but the discussion has related entirely to jury trials, which—as we know—make up a tiny proportion of trials. It is difficult to imagine how that particular form of safeguard could be operated in summary trials, because the fact finder and the law decider are collapsed into one, so a summary sheriff or a justice of the peace would presumably have to advise himself on the matter.

Roderick Campbell: On the question of the number of jurors in agreement—whether it should be 10 or 12; I will put it that way—the judges collectively seem to be happy enough with two thirds. However, the written evidence from the Faculty of Advocates suggests that, as that would still mean that potentially five people would take a different view, it would not be a safe way of preventing miscarriages of justice. Are there any further comments on that, or is there just a difference between the faculty and the judges?

Raymond McMenamin: If a third of a jury have reasonable doubts, does that not raise alarm bells about the conviction, even more so than in the current situation, in which we need only eight out of 15 jurors to convict?

I appreciate that senior judiciary have expressed the view that 10 out of 15 might be appropriate, but where has that come from? Again, no research has been carried out on the matter. For example, we have not looked in detail at other jurisdictions. If we are going to take the English and Welsh system as a template for a system that does not use corroboration in such a widespread fashion, we should remember that the juries in that system are, in the first instance, directed to return unanimous verdicts. Only on the judge’s direction can there be a 10 out of 12 majority verdict for a conviction, which is still a substantially higher standard than 10 out of 15.

Referring, again, to the academic studies that James Wolfe mentioned earlier, I note that the only other system that applies a single straightforward majority is the Russian one. I am not decrying that system in any way, but I understand that it is different; for a start, it relies not on a single verdict but on a kind of questionnaire that the jury has to fill in. Moreover, we know that in other jurisdictions juries sometimes sit with qualified lawyers or others who might advise them.

As I said very early on in this session, the Law Society of Scotland is deeply unhappy with the proposal to simply increase by two the number required for conviction without any background or research.

Mark Harrower: I agree that insufficient research has been carried out into how juries reach their verdicts. For example, in a jury trial that I conducted a couple of years ago of a nurse accused of assaulting an elderly patient, the nurse was—rightly, in my opinion—acquitted unanimously. However, when I went into the jury room after the case to help the bar officer to clear out all the productions—we had received very voluminous defence productions for the case—we found a piece of paper on the table that said, “10 not guilty, two not proven, one don’t know”. We would never have known how that jury reached its final verdict—if that was, of course, how it reached its verdict—but the fact is that jury deliberations have traditionally been shrouded in secrecy and we do not know how juries arrive at their decisions. All that we can hope is that they can understand in a very short space of time the complex directions that we give them. Sometimes they will come back with questions, to which the sheriff must give concise answers that, again, one hopes they will understand.

Occasionally you will get a verdict from a jury that you cannot understand but, by and large, juries do their best. Nevertheless, before we reach any view on whether 10 out of 12 is safe, it might be that we should take more of a look at how juries arrive at their verdicts in the first place.

James Wolfe: As I understand it, the norm in common-law systems is unanimity or near unanimity. Moreover, the very difference of opinion on this one issue shows that we need to look at the system at large and all its elements so that we can secure a system that strikes the right balance between prosecuting crimes effectively, including those sexual crimes and crimes of domestic abuse that rightly raise public concern, and avoiding miscarriages of justice.

The Convener: As time is pressing, we will move on.

Sandra White (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP): Good morning. I am glad that Mr Wolfe has mentioned crimes of domestic violence, because last week we were given figures that showed that hundreds of domestic violence and rape crimes do not reach the courts. Obviously that was a matter for concern and we considered those figures alongside the issue of corroboration. I mention that simply because Mr Harrower has constantly referred to one miscarriage of justice down south; I would argue that those figures show that there are hundreds more miscarriages of justice. After all, justice is also for victims, which is indeed the issue that we are considering in the round in this bill.

The Lord Advocate has said that because of the corroboration requirement, he is unable to prosecute many crimes that have been committed, simply because they happened in private, the victims of which, of course, could be children and elderly people. Although the supporting evidence might be persuasive, the cases cannot be prosecuted because the corroboration rule has not been met. If corroboration remains, what do you as experts in the justice system suggest we put in place to ensure that victims in such cases receive justice?

11:15

James Wolfe: First, there is understandable public concern about those categories of cases, which are rightly ones to be taken extremely seriously. Secondly, as I recall, the Lord Advocate gave statistics to the committee on the number of cases in those categories that were marked for no prosecution on the basis that there was insufficient evidence. Alison McInnes then asked a very pertinent question, which was how many of those would be prosecuted by applying the new test. It is important to recognise that, at least on the Lord Advocate’s view of his own test, not every case in which a complaint of sexual crime or domestic abuse is brought would be prosecuted. So, I think that one has to be slightly careful about the numbers that one looks at.

Thirdly, it is important to understand that abolishing corroboration is not a panacea for the difficulties that those cases raise. Mark Harrower has already identified some of the difficulties that I suspect any of us who have prosecuted serious sexual crime will recognise.Fourthly, those of us who have prosecuted those crimes recognise the value of corroborating evidence in supporting a complainer’s evidence and in persuading a jury to accept that evidence. Further, the corroborating evidence might be extremely important if the complainer is, for a variety of reasons, a difficult witness. It is therefore very important that we do not end up with a system in which there is a diminution in the efforts that are put into ensuring that all investigations are carried out and evidence obtained.

I do not suggest that there might not be room for examining the way in which corroboration works. If I understand it correctly, Lord Hope has suggested that one might look again at the role that distress plays in corroborating the different elements of a sexual crime. One might look at the corroboration of crimes by reference to facts and circumstances that are consistent with the complainer’s account. I do not wish to commit the faculty to a view on those points, but—

The Convener: They are just observations.

James Wolffe: I do not suggest that there is not a case for examining the way in which corroboration works in relation to sexual crimes, nor do I for a moment suggest that the issues in relation to those crimes do not create a case for examining whether corroboration is a doctrine that we should retain. Our fundamental concern is that if we are going to take away corroboration—ultimately, there is a serious policy question about whether to do that or not—then we must appreciate that the whole system will look completely different at every stage: the investigation stage, the prosecution stage, the trial stage and the appeal stage. One must look very hard at whether we will leave ourselves with, as the academics from Glasgow say, a system that fundamentally runs an unacceptable risk of unfair trials taking place in this country.

Sandra White: Thank you very much for that, Mr Wolffe. I agree with your point about the number of cases not coming to court because of a lack of corroboration. The Lord Advocate was very honest in saying that it is still high compared with the number in respect of some other crimes.

I want to pick up on some of Mr McMenamin’s comments about corroboration and no one having said what could be put in its place. We talked about corroboration being removed from other countries’ judicial systems. Mr McMenamin said that in England there is a provision for vulnerable people under the Mental Health Act 2007 and that there is similar provision in Holland. You also said, Mr McMenamin, that we rely on corroboration more but that it has been whittled down to almost nothing.

When we talk about corroboration as a separate issue, you say that it has been whittled down even more, but we use it more. Will you elaborate on that? Why do we need to keep corroboration as it stands if we rely on it too much and it has been whittled down to almost nothing?

Raymond McMenamin: Over the years, there have been a number of cases before the appeal court that have addressed corroboration in various areas of law. I will not go into the detail of those particular cases but suffice it to say that not everything has to be corroborated. The essentials of a criminal case—that a crime was committed and the identity of the person who committed the crime—have to be corroborated, and we have corroboration of those essential matters in such cases as a check and a system of safeguarding against miscarriages of justice.

It is correct that corroboration has diminished in that what is today being called the corroboration doctrine does not apply as strongly to certain evidential aspects as it does to others. However, if you are going to convict someone in a court of law, you need a system of checks and balances to avoid miscarriages of justice, and at the present time we have corroboration; we have nothing else of any substance. It is important to acknowledge that. Until we can come up with something to replace it—although we might never come up with something that will satisfy everyone—I suggest that corroboration has to stay.

The Convener: You say that corroboration has been whittled down, but the Lord Advocate said in committee last Wednesday:

“Can I tell you what effect corroboration has? We have to corroborate the taking of buccal swabs from alleged offenders, so two police officers are required for that. We have to corroborate the taking of intimate swabs from a complainer in a rape case...In the case of child pornography, we need to corroborate that children are under the age of 16, so that must be done by two witnesses. We have to corroborate forensic analysis, so two forensic scientists have to speak to the results of forensic examination”.

That does not sound to me as if the use of corroboration is being whittled down. Would you care to address that?

Raymond McMenamin: As I mentioned before, in certain areas, such as forensic science evidence, the Crown can serve notice that it is going to call only one forensic scientist although that might mean that it needs to call two forensic scientists during the course of the case, or have two forensic scientists prepare a report. When it comes to the service of indictment, the Crown is entitled to give notice that it intends to call only one witness.

The Convener: I accept that that is true for the collection of evidence. Should any alleged inquiry into or review of corroboration look at the requirements of corroboration in the collection of evidence as well as in court proceedings?

Raymond McMenamin: Yes. There is scope for looking at the application of corroboration throughout the evidential procedure and perhaps in relation to the classes of cases in which it might apply. That is worthy of debate.

The Convener: I am sorry to have interrupted but no one else had raised that point, and I know that the Lord Advocate said:

“That is where I am coming from.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3745-46.]

The point seemed to be a substantial one for him when he was giving evidence last week, and you have addressed it.

Sorry, Sandra.

Sandra White: No, that is fine. I was going to go a wee bit further but you have clarified some of my points, convener.

Mr McMenamin, you said that we do not have anything else apart from corroboration. I asked previously whether anyone had any ideas about what we could have as guidelines. There are the proposed jury changes—which some say are fine and some say are not—and the judge being able to take the decision away from the jury. Do you agree with those aspects of the bill? I am not just speaking to Mr McMenamin—

The Convener: Mr McMenamin is giving you the eye.

Sandra White: Yes. These are ideas that have been proposed and there are areas in which I probably have a lot of confusion. We are looking at the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill in the round and, as Mr Wolffe has said, there is not just one part to it; it has lots of different parts. If we were to take the corroboration issue out of the bill and look at it separately, what knock-on effect would that have? What would be the effect if we passed the rest of the bill without including the abolition of corroboration?

The Convener: The question is whether that would sabotage the bill. Could the bill proceed without that in it?

Raymond McMenamin: The position of the Law Society is that all matters that are subject to the bill should have been subject to consideration on a wider scale than has been the case. However, we are where we are. As has been suggested, if the provisions concerning corroboration and jury numbers are taken out of the bill, we would support that. We would also support further consideration being given to those aspects.

The Convener: I think that the term that I was struggling for is “wrecking amendment”. Would the bill still function without those provisions?

James Wolffe: It seems to me that the only provision that is linked—in practical terms, if not logically—with the abolition of corroboration is the increase in the majority that is required for the jury.

I should say, as the committee will appreciate, that the Faculty of Advocates broadly supports many parts of the bill. In particular, although we have made some observations about them, we support the provisions in part 1 relating to arrest and custody. We would certainly welcome the removal of the specific provision dealing with corroboration and the one associated provision that deals with jury majority, precisely so that those other parts of the bill can proceed swiftly to enactment.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): I refer members to my entry in the register of members’ interests and the fact that I am a member of the council of Justice Scotland.

I want to return to a couple of points and then, if I have time, touch on one new thing.

The Convener: Yes, I want us to touch on something new.

Alison McInnes: John Finnie talked about access to justice, and I want to pursue whether the panel shares my concern that the issue seems to be driven by a desire to give victims their day in court rather than by the need to secure prosecutions in the public interest, and my worry that that might be a dangerous road to go down.

Mr Harower made detailed points about the prosecutorial guidance and the decisions to pursue certain cases regardless, in a way, because they were, perhaps, politically sensitive. Beyond the dangers of individual miscarriages of justice, might these profound changes be significant, constitutionally, in the hands of a less benign Government?

The Convener: Less benign! You could be a minister, the way you are going. I sense a new coalition.

Mark Harrower: Many solicitors worry about some of the emphases that are being placed on certain types of case in court. All types of case that go to court are important, and the consequences in all cases are important for the people who are affected by them. We seem to be concentrating on certain types of case. I understand the drivers behind that, such as the focus on domestic abuse, which has obviously been a problem in Scotland. The problem is that, when that approach is applied in practice, wide nets are cast and in every type of case that is categorised as, for example, domestic abuse, people are brought into court and there are regular appearances from custody. The numbers in Edinburgh sheriff court have gone up substantially this year as far as prosecutions are concerned. Since April this year, there has been a 50 per cent increase in cases that are registered in the JP court, where we now see fairly serious road traffic cases—of course, there is a policing initiative on road traffic at the moment—and a 38 per cent increase in cases that are registered in the sheriff court, where there are drives on issues such as domestic abuse and the football legislation.

We just worry that there seems to be an ever-increasing desire to cast a very wide net and let the courts sort it out—to put more cases into court and let the judges and juries make their decision. Unfortunately, when you do that, you end up catching all sorts of cases, some of which could be dealt with in other ways.

There is a political drive behind the review and the Government is obviously under pressure from various groups. However, we must remember that we have come across these problems in the past. In days gone by, there was a particular concern about people being robbed on the highways when there were no witnesses. Those crimes were committed in private, but back then we were able to resist the temptation to remove the requirement for corroboration, although that would obviously have dealt with the problem.

Now, we have a similar type of problem, although a different section of society is affected by it. The media highlight the issues and the public, I think, understand the problems. As a justice system, we have to make sure that we do not make rash decisions, because once we get rid of corroboration, it will be gone. In my submission, that would be to the detriment of our system, unless we have properly thought out checks and balances in its place.

11:30

Robin White: I will address those two points, if I may. I am not sure that I would characterise the first point in precisely the same terms. I repeat that there is a danger of extrapolating from a narrow range of what are, no doubt, dreadful cases. The suggestion is not that the requirement for corroboration be removed from sexual assault and domestic abuse cases but that it be removed from everything—theft, ordinary assaults, breach of the peace and so on.

I turn to the second point, which is the “less benign Government” point. When Mr Wolfe addressed it, he described it as the constitutional point. It is not entirely clear to me why the new test, post-corroboration, should not be put into statute.

Raymond McMenamin: The question was about whether the proposal is motivated by the desire to give victims their day in court. To put it bluntly, it should never be motivated by that. In fact, victims are not victims until it has been established in court that they are victims. That is the first point.

Secondly, as I think Mr Finnie mentioned, it should always be a case of prosecution in the public interest. In certain circumstances, it may not be in the public interest to put a single witness in court to give evidence. It may not even be in the interest of that particular witness to stand in a court of law with no back-up evidence, be cross-examined at length and find that the accused is acquitted.

Also, going back to the point that hundreds of cases could be brought to court, I think that it is easy for some people to be swayed by the numbers game here. We cannot approach it on that basis. We have to look at each case individually and decide whether it is appropriate to bring a prosecution and whether it is in the public interest.

James Wolfe: I will make an observation on the last part of the question. It is important to have in mind the constitutional significance of what we are doing here. We are considering the way in which the criminal justice system operates, and ultimately we should all be concerned about securing the rule of law in Scotland for the long term. That is why our fundamental focus is on the safeguards that are required to make sure that, notwithstanding changes of Lord Advocate, changes of Government, changes of social attitudes and moral panics about one thing or another, we have a system of criminal justice that secures the liberties of the citizen in Scotland while at the same time ensuring that those who commit crimes can be brought to book.

That is why the Faculty of Advocates welcomes the debate that putting the issue on the agenda has given rise to, but it is also why the faculty cannot support the proposals in the bill and would welcome a much broader review of the criminal justice system.

Alison McInnes: The new point that I said I wanted to make is that, in tandem with considering the bill, we are considering a petition that calls for the retrospective application of the removal of the requirement for corroboration. It would be useful to have on the record the panel’s views on the implications of such a move.

Robin White: If I can leap in, I would say that there are almost never any justifications for any retrospective criminal legislation.

Raymond McMenamin: In two words, it is unworkable and inappropriate.
James Wolfe: It is fundamentally unconstitutional.

Mark Harrower: I agree with the other contributors.

The Convener: Thank you. We needed to get that point down.

I call John Pentland, to be followed by Christian Allard. Those will be the last questions, because we have had a long session and time is moving on.

John Pentland (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab): I have not been on the Justice Committee for long, so I am sure that you can understand that my knowledge of the legal system has been severely stretched.

What we have is a proposal for the abolition of corroboration. I find that there are two teams: yourselves and the Lord Advocate. In the Lord Advocate’s submission, he highlights clearly the point that the system needs to be modernised for the reasons that have been outlined, such as that nearly 2,800 potential victims have not had their day in court. I agree that the phrase “their day in court” is not the right terminology; perhaps we should say instead that they have not had their opportunity to see justice done.

This is the second evidence session that we have had on corroboration. While the Lord Advocate came up with ideas, other witnesses last week and the witnesses today have not been helpful to the extent that, although they have said that we need to change, they have not suggested any modifications that would help the people whom we believe are not getting access to justice.

Is it too early for me to ask whether you have any fresh ideas that would help the people whom we think the system is failing? Do you have any ideas about how we could ensure that those people get their opportunity to see justice done? Do you think that, somewhere along the line, consensus could be reached on the proposal that is being made? The grenades that have been thrown into the ring include statements that the prosecutors office may not be up to speed in dealing with all the people who could come to see it. Instead of finding a solution, it seems that we will end up miles and miles apart. I would have found it helpful if you had given us ideas so that I could understand what would be the best way to ensure access to justice.

The Convener: I heard Mr White say that we could perhaps look at corroboration in particular cases. I think that that was the issue that you were raising. What you said surprised me, because I would have thought that we would be looking at something that would apply in any case. It might help John Pentland if you could expand on that.

Robin White: I certainly do not deny saying those words, but I have no recollection of doing so.

The Convener: Oh dear. We will check the Official Report during the week.

Robin White: Which I will certainly trust.

I did not wish to be understood to be proposing that there be corroboration in some cases and not in others.

The Convener: No. I thought that the inference was about what constituted corroboration. That would fit in with something that I think Mr McMenamin said. I cannot actually remember who said it—it has been such a long morning—but I think that the expression, “It has gone to almost nothing” was used. It would be helpful to know if there is any way forward that would reconcile the Lord Advocate’s position on corroboration, which we understand, with yours. We understand the difficulty that is posed for domestic abuse and sexual assault cases and for people who genuinely do not have a remedy in the criminal law.

Raymond McMenamin: It might have been me who said that it is perhaps worth looking at what categories of case require corroboration.

The Convener: It might have been. I beg your pardon, Mr White.

Raymond McMenamin: The basis for saying that was that I know that in certain jurisdictions in the United States there has been application of corroboration to particular types of case. I am not suggesting that we do that, but it is perhaps worth looking at.

The Convener: In an overall review.

Raymond McMenamin: In an overall review—exactly.

If the committee will forgive me, I am not going to come up with any solutions today, and I would be very surprised if any of my colleagues did so. We are dealing with a very complex situation, and corroboration can at times be a very complex area. It has occupied rather a lot of the appeal court’s time over the past few decades.

However, we must acknowledge that it is a system that has developed here, and that to move away from it would be a seismic shift for Scotland. We must also take into account that, for all that the Lord Advocate has stated his argument for the abolition of corroboration, the people who are against its abolition, certainly at present, include the major legal institutions in this country: the Scottish Law Commission, the Faculty of Advocates, the Law Society of Scotland, the Scottish Police Federation—as I understand it—and almost all of the shrieval bench. If that does not tell you something, frankly it ought to.

To discard corroboration in the light of the opinion of those bodies is a rash act, and perhaps a foolish one. The issue is worthy—as we have all said—of greater debate and consideration.

James Wolffe: There is, of course, a perfectly respectable view that the doctrine of corroboration as we have developed it over a long period of time reflects the practical commonsense notion that one wants to cross-check evidence from more than one independent source on the essential facts before bringing a case to court.

However, as I said earlier, I would not for a moment suggest that there is not a case for looking at the way in which corroboration works in certain types of case. I would not immediately be attracted by a system that says that we should have corroboration for some types of case and not for others, although it is interesting that, for some time—as I understand it—in the law of England and Wales, corroboration was required only in sexual cases, precisely because of some of the difficulties that those cases present.

To illustrate some of the things that might be examined, I mentioned earlier the question of the role that distress plays, which at present is quite limited. It can corroborate certain elements of the crime, but not others. That could, along with the question of corroboration of mens rea, be considered, although—as I said earlier—I would not wish to commit myself to a view on them.

The Convener: You also mentioned facts and circumstances.

James Wolffe: Indeed, and there is the question of whether one needs to have an independent source of evidence that positively incriminates rather than simply providing a cross-check of consistency. There may well be ways in which the doctrine itself could be adjusted. As I said, I do not come with a menu, or a prescription that those suggestions are necessarily the right way to go.

It is interesting to note that the Lord Advocate, in his guidelines, does not by any means suggest that the cross-check is unimportant or not useful. Ultimately, the question that is before you as legislators is the abolition of corroboration, and you have to look at that in the context of the other things that have been done by way of adjusting and compensating in a system that has until now—in ways that cannot be overemphasised—been fundamentally based on that doctrine being at the heart of our criminal justice system.

The end point for the Faculty of Advocates is not that there are certain things that one might not wish to look at or that there is no debate to be had, but that the proposal in the bill to abolish corroboration with the very limited adjustment to the jury majority and no additional safeguards in summary cases is not one that the faculty can support.

11:45

The Convener: I do not want us to go over old ground. However, I thought that John Pentland asked a good question. It is certainly the issue that the committee has to consider.

John Pentland: It is just a pity that with regard to any suggestion that modifications or solutions be found, Mr McMenamin’s mind seems to be made up. I might have picked him up wrongly but I note that in response to Sandra White, for example, he said that it was unlikely that the Law Society would support any change and that he thinks it rash for this proposal to be in the bill in the first place. If we are going to try to help victims who do not get any justice in court, Mr McMenamin might have to open up his mind a bit.

Raymond McMenamin: The Law Society’s position is that it is prepared to look at the overall situation; after all, we have invited people to debate the matter with us. We just think it utterly illogical to approach the issue by saying, “What’ve you got to replace corroboration? Nothing? Well, let’s get rid of corroboration then.” That is the situation in which we find ourselves just now.

Robin White: In essence, Mr Pentland’s point is that last week, the committee heard evidence that corroboration ought to be abolished entirely; this week, it has heard evidence that such a course of action is not appropriate. He is asking whether there is no middle point. At the risk of going over old ground, I would respond by pointing out, first, that there was a further consultation paper on safeguards, which, in mentioning only two or three things about juries, seemed a little perfunctory. Secondly—this is the main point that many people at this end of the table have made this morning—the distance between those positions is the very reason why the matter should be referred to the Scottish Law Commission, a royal commission, a departmental committee or whatever. There might be a number of middle points but no one has looked for them.

The Convener: We move on to a final question from Christian Allard. Members should bear in mind that this session has lasted nearly two hours and we still have more work to do.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): Good morning—or is it afternoon?

The Convener: It is nearly afternoon.

Christian Allard: I seek some clarification on what we have heard this morning and what we heard last week from Lord Gill. As I understand it, we are talking about removing the requirement for corroboration but, this morning, we have heard that it will be taken out of the system altogether and simply discarded with nothing to replace it. Is it not the case that in other jurisdictions and judicial systems where there might be no requirement for corroboration it is still used extensively in many cases? Surely if in removing the requirement for corroboration we can still retain it in the system the evidence that Lord Gill gave last week does not make sense. After all, he made it very clear that the legislation must apply across the board. Do you agree with that view? From what I have heard this morning, it seems that some of you might not.

Mark Harrower: It will be difficult to create different classes of case, some of which will require corroboration and some of which will not. Moreover, cases very often come to court with a number of different charges. If a complainer has alleged a number of different types of crime against the same person, how do we explain to a jury that charges 1 and 2 do not require corroboration but charges 3 and 4 do? Juries have to absorb a lot of directions in a short space of time; it is sometimes difficult for them to get their heads around them but they do their best. It will make things very complicated if we create certain classes of case in which corroboration is not required.

The Convener: So that the committee and the public understand the point, can you give an example of the kind of complaint that would have those different elements to it?

Mark Harrower: If a complainer alleged rape at knife-point, there might be a charge of rape for which the evidence could come from the complainer alone, irrespective of evidence of penetration, if the requirement for corroboration was removed. However, if there was an accompanying charge of possession of a knife in a public place, perversely we might need a witness to state that the man had a knife in a public place. In practice, the Crown would probably not be too bothered about the additional charge. However, it would have to be explained that two witnesses were needed for that charge but that only one was needed for the rape charge. There might also be a charge for an act by the accused to try to destroy or get rid of evidence; again, we would have to decide whether such a charge would require two sources of evidence or just one.

Lord Gill’s point is that creating different classes of case, some of which would require corroboration and some of which would not, would be a very complicated exercise. To go back to Mr Pentland’s question, if there is a determination to remove or weaken evidential requirements—in effect, that is what getting rid of corroboration would do—in order to improve access to justice and give witnesses their day in court, we must understand that more cases going to court would not be the only consequence. What else would be achieved? I do not think that any of the contributors to the consultation that I have heard, including Lord Carloway, can say that more convictions would be achieved. In fact, Lord Gill quite clearly believes that a decrease in the conviction rate would be achieved. It stands to reason that if we weaken the rule on the amount of evidence that is needed, we are even less likely to get convictions in the type of cases in which juries are already reluctant to convict.

If more and more people were acquitted of sexual crime, what would be the knock-on effect for the system? That would not increase public confidence in the system at all. If one or two high-profile miscarriage of justice cases were produced as a result of the evidence change, that would be very costly for the system financially because appeals to the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission are very costly and compensation must be paid if convictions are overturned. In addition, many years down the line when some people come out of prison, the public sometimes wonder what went wrong. Miscarriage of justice cases are very costly for the system in terms of both money and public confidence. Until now, we have managed to avoid them for a reason and, to me, corroboration is the main reason.

Christian Allard: I want to press you on what you just said about the rate of conviction. I pressed Lord Gill on that subject and asked him:

“On access to justice, would abolishing corroboration increase the number of cases that would be brought to prosecution?”

He answered, “No.” When I pressed him further by saying “Definitely not?”; his answer was:

“It might increase the number of prosecutions, but I am not convinced that it would increase the number of convictions.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3727.]

What do you think?

The Convener: That is Mr Harrower’s point.

Mark Harrower: I agree with Lord Gill on that. If we are going to have more cases in which there is deemed to be enough evidence, we will increase the number of cases that go to court. All the additional cases that the Lord Advocate talked about could end up in our courts. However, I do not see how the conviction rate, or the percentage of cases in which we achieve a conviction, can do anything other than stay the same or fall.

I have figures for 2011-12 that show that for rape and attempted rape cases, 20 were “Acquitted not guilty”, 16 were “Acquitted not proven” and 50 were “Charge proved”. So, 36 were acquitted and 50 were charge proved; an additional eight people had pleas of not guilty accepted or the case was deserted. The conviction rate is about 50:50 at the moment.

The Convener: Those figures are for what year?

Mark Harrower: They are from the statistical bulletin “Criminal Proceedings in Scotland 2011-12”, which the Scottish Government produced on 27 November 2012. There is a table on page 23 that shows how many people were proceeded against in court and a breakdown of the outcomes.

The Convener: That is fine. We have the reference for the Official Report. The figures are interesting.

Mark Harrower: Nobody is saying that juries are not doing their job properly or that they are going into court and trying to find ways of acquitting people. Juries are going into the court at the moment and hearing corroborating evidence, but they are not being convinced. How do we expect to increase how often they are convinced if we take away one of the major checks on the proof of the allegation that is put to a jury?

The Convener: I will stop now unless anyone else wants to come in. It seems that Mr Wolffe does.

James Wolffe: May I make two brief observations? First, like Mr Harrower, I am not attracted by having different rules for different types of crime, which is why I am pretty diffident about offering possible modifications. The issue is well worth looking at, but one would have to look very hard at possible modifications.

Secondly, on the consequences for the conviction rate, our real problem is that we just do not know what they will be. Lord Gill talked about as yet unknown consequences and he was right to do so, because at first flush one might expect the rate of conviction for sexual crimes to decrease, because one is prosecuting crimes with a lesser evidential basis, but at the same time we are removing a requirement for corroboration across the board—judges will no longer uphold no-case-to-answer submissions, and juries will no longer be told that they must find corroborated evidence—so for all that we know there might be an increase in the conviction rate, not in sexual cases but across the board. Whether that will be so, and what the implications for the system and its resourcing will be, are anyone’s guess.

The Convener: I am looking at the clock and thinking that this has been a long evidence session. I thank the witnesses very much. We will have a five-minute break. I apologise to our witnesses for the next agenda item, who are waiting to give evidence.

11:56

Meeting suspended.
On resuming—

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: I welcome to the meeting Assistant Chief Constable Malcolm Graham of Police Scotland; Chief Superintendent David O’Connor, who is president of the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents; and David Ross, who is vice-chairman of the Scottish Police Federation.

This is our seventh day of evidence on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill at stage 1. We will hear evidence on corroboration and related reforms.

Good morning. I thank all the witnesses for their written submissions. We will go straight to questions from members.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): Good morning. Let us start with corroboration. The Scottish Police Federation’s written submission states:

“The abolition of corroboration will inevitably result in the lower end cases being subject to appeal.”

There will be a great difference in relation to corroboration. On the same page, the federation says:

“there should be no blanket abolition of the requirement for corroboration.”

That is the exact term, as opposed to removing corroboration altogether. What are your views on that? In the debate out there about corroboration, is there perhaps a mistake in the language? We are talking about the removal of the requirement for corroboration as opposed to the removal of corroboration, and saying that removing the requirement for corroboration does not mean that corroborative evidence or corroboration will be taken out altogether.

The Convener: I appreciate that you have not been on the committee for long, Christian, but I think that everybody on it understands that we are discussing the removal of the absolute requirement for corroboration. We are very clear: although we David Ross (Scottish Police Federation): As discussion and debate around corroboration has moved on, the intention of what is contained in the bill has become clearer. Our view is that we are now talking about the removal of the requirement for corroboration of every strand of evidence in favour of checks and balances across all the evidence and other safeguards. In truth, our view is now that those checks and balances mean having other evidence that supports the evidence of an eye witness, rather than there being two eye witnesses.

The Convener: I am afraid that we have always known that it was never two eye witnesses, Mr Ross. We have been aware of what it is. Perhaps you can clarify what you mean by “every strand”. Are you talking about the ingathering of evidence rather than the court process? It would be helpful if you could analyse what you mean in that way.

David Ross: By and large, the gathering and reporting of evidence is done using two police officers or two forensic scientists, for example. Our view has always been that that is unnecessary and costly and does not provide any great benefit to the criminal justice system. That view of corroboration was part of our response, so we were always opposed to its blanket removal.

The most recent comments from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice and the Lord Advocate suggest that we are talking about checks, balances, safeguards and other evidence. In truth, we are talking about corroboration from different sources rather than, for example, each eyewitness’s account being corroborated by another eyewitness’s account, or, indeed, forensic evidence being corroborated by some other form of evidence. If that is what we are talking about—I understand that absolutely it is—we have moved to a position where we are quite supportive of it.

The Convener: That still sounds like corroboration to me.

David Ross: Absolutely; it sounds like corroboration to me, too.

We have the requirement for corroboration now. In every case the police have always gathered and reported, and will always gather and report, as much evidence as is available. It was never the case that we would stop as soon as we had a sufficiency of evidence and that will not be the case, irrespective of the outcome of the passage of the bill.

Assistant Chief Constable Malcolm Graham (Police Scotland): It is helpful that you have provided clarity, convener, that we are discussing the removal of the absolute requirement for corroboration. We are very clear: although we understand that particular facts must be corroborated before any proceedings would commence—for instance, identification and certain elements of the essential facts in a crime—that is often done irrespective of the weight or quality of other supporting evidence that would not be considered to meet the technical requirement of corroboration. That is an unfair bar to justice for many victims of crime, particularly in crimes in which vulnerable people have been exploited and in which, in the commission of the very offences that perhaps we would most seek to address, there is an intention on the part of the perpetrator to exploit some of the technical rules that prevent proceedings from taking place.

Chief Superintendent David O’Connor (Association of Scottish Police Superintendents): Our association has taken time over the past year to look at and engage in the debate and the consultation. At the outset of the debate, we had concerns about the wholesale abolition of corroboration, but some clarity has been brought to the debate recently. We were concerned that we could end up with a situation in which we would have cases with a suspect or an accused and a victim, and that we might move from the criminal burden of proof to something that looked more like the civil burden of proof. A key safeguard for us is that we are retaining the criminal burden of proof—that is, we have to prove a case beyond all reasonable doubt.

The Convener: That was always the case, so I am surprised that it took you a year to work that out. I am sorry to be rude, but what you were concerned about has never been on the agenda.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Absolutely, but there has also been a great deal of debate and discussion. Over the past year, we have been seeking some reassurance that some of the safeguards with regard to corroboration of the different strands of evidence that David Ross referred to are going to be put in place.

The Convener: I believe that Christian Allard has a question on this matter.

Christian Allard: Do you think that the removal of the requirement for corroboration will lead to more prosecutions?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: The intention behind our support for the proposal to remove the absolute requirement for corroboration is that a larger number of victims will get access to justice, which might mean more prosecutions. We have conducted some exercises on the police’s current role in carrying out thorough investigations to gather the available evidence—I am sure that we will come back to that later—as well as, over the past two years, exercises that show a small increase in the number of cases that we would report to the procurator fiscal based on our understanding of what the change in the law would mean if Parliament were to pass the bill.

That small change would move things disproportionately towards more solemn procedures, which would mean a larger increase in cases reported to the Crown that, under the current system, would not be reported and which would likely be heard by a sheriff and jury or in the High Court. A number of those cases would be serious sexual crimes and the types of cases that I mentioned earlier, in which the particular dynamic with which the crimes are committed and the ways in which the perpetrators often target victims result in a lower likelihood of the technical barrier of corroborating every essential fact being overcome. When we looked across that large valid data set, we found that, with the proposed changes, there would be an increase of around 2 per cent in the number of cases that would be reported, which equates to almost 3,000 additional victims being given access to justice. At the moment, the police assess those cases and conclude that there is not a technical sufficiency of corroboration to allow us to report them to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.

I am also aware that the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service has conducted similar exercises based on what we report to them and the new prosecutorial test. Indeed, I believe that the Lord Advocate has already submitted evidence on that.

The Convener: Given the difficulty that the committee has had with the term “access to justice”, it might be helpful if you could define it for us.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Access to justice is a broad term. There are different stages at which victims can access justice. First of all, I should stress that one of the areas that Police Scotland is focusing on is our clear role in keeping people safe; one way of doing that is to prevent people from committing crime, and one way of preventing people from committing crime is to ensure that they are brought to justice for the crimes that they have already committed.

The term “access to justice” would include people reporting to the police that they have been the victim of a crime. We will do everything that we can to investigate such reports thoroughly; indeed, I would be very happy to describe what I mean by that because it is clear from the wider speculation around the debate that some of the people who are commenting on the matter perhaps do not understand the rigours of police procedure and the investigatory process. In broad terms, however, “access to justice” would mean giving the people the opportunity for their case to be considered by the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.
and the prospect of its being taken to court. Our assessment is that if the law were to be changed as proposed an additional 3,000 victims would have the opportunity to have their case considered by the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. At the moment, those victims do not have that opportunity at all.

I would be very happy to supply some specific examples of cases—

The Convener: I think that the committee now understands the police perspective with regard to access to justice. The problem is that each panel of witnesses that gives evidence has a different line on it because the people concerned are at different points in the process. However, what you have said has been very helpful.

I have a list of members who wish to ask questions. John Finnie is first up.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): I have some questions for my former colleagues and friends Mr Ross and Mr O’Connor on what might be perceived as the staff associations’ changing position on this matter. The Scottish Police Federation’s submission says:

“Corroboration is also particularly important in maintaining public confidence in the criminal justice system.”

In fairness, though, I should note that earlier in the submission the federation says:

“The SPF are not opposed to making some amendments in relation to ... the service of legal documents or ... the transportation of productions”.

That said, the federation says in the same submission:

“Blanket removal of corroboration would risk exposing not only police officers but every other member of the public “to more spurious and malicious allegations which would be harder to refute”.

What, if anything, has changed in this debate? I certainly hope that nothing has.

David Ross: In truth, I think that you are quoting from our response to Lord Carloway’s report rather than our response to the bill. [Interruption.]

The Convener: Just bear with us while we confirm that.

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): The comments are actually on page 2 of your written submission, which says:

“Blanket removal of corroboration would risk exposing police officers to more spurious and malicious allegations which would be harder to refute and similarly so for every other member of the public.”

David Ross: Our position is and remains that the blanket removal of any requirement for corroboration would potentially expose the criminal justice system to all of those things.

The Convener: Forgive me, but that is exactly what the bill is proposing. It is proposing the blanket removal of the mandatory requirement for corroboration.

David Ross: Coming back to the clarity that I mentioned earlier, I do not think that that was necessarily our understanding when the submission was written. We were responding to the notion that corroboration was being taken out of the system altogether. Our view was predicated on comments from many different sources but the notion that evidence from one source, whether from an eyewitness or whatever, could be sufficient to convict someone was, for us, a step too far with regard to this debate. It has been made clear that that will not be the case. If we are talking about the general requirement for corroboration of each strand of evidence as opposed to the requirement for corroboration across the whole of the evidence, our position would be that we would support the latter but not the former.

John Finnie: For the avoidance of doubt, I must point out that the function of the committee is to scrutinise the specifics of the legislation, and I have been referring to your response to that.

More than one witness has referred to clarity in the debate. I do not know what the source of that clarity has been; perhaps it was Lord Gill, whose position was unequivocal. However, notwithstanding where either of you believes that that clarity has come from, we are scrutinising the legislation—not what you might think it is, but what it is—and I have quoted from your written evidence on the proposals in that legislation. Does your submission still stand or should we expect a further submission from the Scottish Police Federation?

David Ross: Given all the discussion and debate that has already taken place, it is very difficult for me to answer your question. I do not consider our position to have completely turned from one of resistance to one of support. As our understanding has grown about what we are talking about in the legislation, our position has moderated to the extent that we would support the removal of the general requirement for corroboration in favour of a sufficiency across the whole of the evidence to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

John Finnie: I will come on to Mr O’Connor in a moment but, Mr Ross, has your evolving position—if I can put it that way—been influenced by the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service’s supplementary written submission? In paragraph 33, it refers to false allegations against professionals and the measures that would be put in place for “police officers, teachers, social workers, health professionals and prison officers”, which would be that “proceedings in such cases would not be taken up without strong supporting evidence.”
Has that reassurance altered the federation’s response?

10:30

David Ross: I would not say that it is just that reassurance that has done so; it was partly that and partly general comments about corroboration by the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General. However, it was specifically about the Lord Advocate’s comments to us regarding, for want of a better description, checks and balances, and safeguards for complaints about professionals.

John Finnie: I fully understand your obligation to represent your members’ interests and that that reassurance would be helpful, but I return to the SPF’s statement that “Blanket removal of corroboration would risk exposing police officers to more spurious and malicious allegations which would be harder to refute”.
You might have gained some reassurance with regard to that, but your submission stated that the case would be “similarly so for every other member of the public.”
I presume that it is not your view that there should be a higher threshold.

David Ross: Absolutely not. Our view is that there should be the same threshold for everyone, irrespective of what position they do or do not hold.

John Finnie: Okay. Thank you.
Mr O’Connor, your written—

The Convener: Mr Graham wanted to come in. Do you still wish to do so, Mr Graham?

John Finnie: I will come to Mr Graham.

The Convener: Are you working your way along the line?

John Finnie: I am indeed.

The Convener: Go for it.

John Finnie: Mr O’Connor, the ASPS’s written submission states that, with regard to the abolition of corroboration, “it remains not wholly convinced—" which I would have as being unconvinced—
“of the case for complete abolition.”
Can you comment on that in the light of the questions that I posed to Mr Ross, please?

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Yes. We have had a great deal of debate, and one of the things that we keep coming back to from a police perspective is that in terms of policing nothing will change, because police officers will continue to go out there and conduct very comprehensive investigations and gather all the evidence. They are bound by disclosure in terms of the gathering of evidence and will report the facts and circumstances to the Crown. Nothing will change and full, detailed and comprehensive investigations will continue in the police service.

John Finnie: You have been a senior investigating officer dealing with very serious crimes.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Yes.

John Finnie: We heard that there have been two murder cases in which no body was recovered but convictions were obtained and that the basis of the convictions was the collation of huge tracts of circumstantial evidence, for want of a better phrase. Is that correct?

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Yes. Circumstantial evidence can be a strand in the chain of evidence, as can many other parts of evidence. During the debate on corroboration, we have found that it can mean different things to different people. It is not just about having two eyewitnesses but about the whole gamut of evidence, and the science has moved forward considerably in recent times.

John Finnie: Yes, indeed. I do not think that you would find anyone who would dispute that Police Scotland will pull out all the stops for a serious crime such as murder. It will often do that at the direction of the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, which will lead the investigation.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Yes.

John Finnie: However, I do not think that you can give such an assurance for, say, a minor breach of the peace or a minor assault. They can be very traumatic events for the victim, but there will not be the same level of energy or chasing forensic examination for such offences, because—as you know—there are many of them and they are particularly frequent at weekends.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: As I have said, evidence can come from a variety of sources. I have absolute confidence that the police service will continue to seek corroboration from whatever source; thereafter, it is a matter for the Crown to look at the veracity, sufficiency and competency of the different strands of evidence.

John Finnie: But I am not talking about the initial response; I am talking about, if you like, the supplementary response. We know that follow-up inquiries will take place, often at the direction of the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. However, that will not happen with the run-of-the-mill breach of the peace in which it might be a single individual, who is a credible witness, who is accused, or with an assault or something of that nature.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: I would certainly have confidence in the service that whether it is a matter of public disorder, a minor assault or whatever, the investigating officers would seek evidence from eyewitnesses, closed-circuit television or mobile telephones. There is a variety of modern ways by which evidence can be drawn in, even for minor matters. Barely an incident goes by for which there is not access to mobile phones or CCTV.

John Finnie: It is for those very reasons—we have all those additional sources of evidence that were not available historically—that we have been told that there is less requirement than ever before to remove the requirement for corroboration.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Yes—each of those different parts can corroborate. To return to where I started, I have absolutely no doubt that the police service will continue to carry out investigations and to draw in evidence from whatever source it takes to put together a case to allow the matter to be reported to the Crown Office and to allow it to make the decision.

John Finnie: What is the position of the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents on the proposal to abolish the absolute requirement for corroboration? Are you for it, or agin it?

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: At this time, we are more content with the proposals provided that, as we move forward, we are quite clear about what the marking rules will be. Indeed, we have heard a great deal about looking for not just the quantity but the quality of evidence. To return to my starting position, the criminal burden of proof will remain the same in as much as a case must be proved beyond all reasonable doubt against the accused.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: John Finnie is seeking assurance on Police Scotland’s position were the law to change. I am in a position to offer that assurance: with neither hesitation nor qualification, I can say that the standard of investigation across the board would not change, were this law to be brought in as proposed. There is an absolute requirement on the police to undertake investigations, with diligence and rigour, to an evidential standard that is established through case law, which would not change as a result of any of the bill’s proposals.

I will go through what some of those requirements are in the case law. In Smith v Her Majesty’s Advocate in 1952, it was opined that it is the duty of the police to put before the procurator fiscal everything that may be “relevant and material” to the issue; in McLeod v HMA in 1998, it was opined that “all material evidence for or against the accused” must be disclosed; and, more recently, under McDonald, Dixon and Blair v HMA in 2008, all material evidence that either materially weakens the Crown case or materially strengthens the defence case must be disclosed, so the evidence must be disclosed whether it shows that the suspected party is innocent or guilty. The police must supply all that information to the Crown.

The police’s position, whether an offence is minor or serious, will not change the rigour and diligence with which we will investigate crimes and gather all available best evidence.

I must address very strongly the contentions from a number of quarters. You referred to Lord Gill’s fear that the police may not go seeking corroboration. We do not set out to seek corroboration; we set out to investigate the circumstances of an offence or crime that has been reported to us or has come to us by other means. That means that we need to establish whether a crime has occurred; if it has, we need to establish who has committed the crime.

John Finnie: You will of course rely on what is termed a credible witness; someone can appear to be a credible witness—

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: We do not set out to gather evidence that corroborates or otherwise one or two stands; we set out to gather all the evidence available. In some cases, multiple strands of evidence will corroborate the same fact; in other cases—the ones to which I referred—we know that that is extremely unlikely. That is because the nature and dynamic of the offending means that some of the essential facts will be corroborated in a higher proportion of cases.

It is clear from international perspectives on the current corroboration laws in Scotland that that is deemed to be discriminatory against some of those who are most likely to be victims of certain crimes. It is clear from the police perspective that, in some cases, an assessment of the quality and sufficiency of the evidence as a whole is prevented because of a technical barrier in one of the facts of the charge not being corroborated technically in the way that the law is constructed.
John Finnie: Could one of those characteristics be penetration? That is one of the three characteristics that we heard would be required to prove the crime of rape.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: If it is an essential fact in any crime—penetration is an essential fact to be proved for rape—it can be difficult, at times, to provide corroboration of that fact. It is highly likely that we are talking about circumstances in which eyewitnesses, with the exception of the victim, are unlikely to be present. Therefore, we must find supporting evidence that is consistent with the account of the victim. However, meeting the artificial and technical barrier in law of corroboration is not always possible. My contention in relation to our experience of dealing with victims is that, in a large number of cases in which there is credibility and a large amount of quality evidence, the failure to get over that technical barrier can prevent, in the terms that I have previously explained, victims of serious and less serious crimes getting access to justice.

John Finnie: I am aware that “access to justice” is the current buzz phrase, and it has featured strongly. Has Police Scotland made any assessment of the likely increased level of charges of false accusation of crime or wasting police time that might be associated with any proposed change?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: We have not made any assessment of that, and I can explain why. It is interesting, when we are trying to focus on the victims of serious and less serious crimes, that the debate is sometimes brought back to the issue of false allegations. We have done work on the number of false allegations that are currently made, and we have seen that the level is extremely low. I would prefer that we focus our attention on dealing with the large number of victims of crime, who, at the moment, do not have their needs or expectations met by the justice system.

John Finnie: It would be entirely wrong to paraphrase questioning of this nature in a way that suggests that it was not supportive of victims. You would not want anyone to be the victim of a false accusation, I presume.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Absolutely not and, at the moment, if that were the case—

John Finnie: Can I ask about policy formulation?

The Convener: Let the witness finish, please.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: We absolutely would not want anyone to be the victim of a false allegation and, as you are aware, there are cases in which, when someone is falsely accused of an offence, that is investigated thoroughly to the same standard that I have described and, occasionally, that results in proceedings being taken and prosecutions being made through the justice system. That is an extremely small number of cases compared with the overwhelming and rising number of reports that we are receiving about serious sexual crime, which is a far bigger issue to focus on.

John Finnie: It is certainly an important issue.

We have heard from a number of witnesses that the proposal is about rebalancing after Cadder. We heard from the Lord Advocate that Cadder brought about challenges connected with the investigation of the crime of rape, as an accused who formerly might have indicated that the event was a consensual act is now saying nothing, which means that one of the three characteristics that is required to prove the crime is removed. Could you comment on that? Is it a rebalancing?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Following Cadder, there was a requirement to examine whether a rebalancing was required. My understanding is that Lord Carloway was asked to do that piece of work. As a result of his widespread and in-depth examination of the legal issues that arose from the Cadder case, he came up with a number of recommendations.

I do not feel that the proposal is a response to the rebalancing of Cadder, because the issues that I am describing were present in police investigations, and had subsequent consequences in the justice system, before the Cadder decision was made. That issue notwithstanding, the Cadder decision provided a different balance in the legal considerations of those cases and, therefore, following Lord Carloway’s examination of the impact of the decision, it is entirely right and proper that he should come up with a number of recommendations to ensure that there is an equal focus on the rights of everyone who is involved in the justice system.

John Finnie: May I ask one more question, convener?

The Convener: I will let you back in, but you have had a good run and we have a big queue.

John Finnie: I appreciate that.

Can you advise us how policy formulation is done by Police Scotland? How do you come to a point at which this view is agreed to be Police Scotland’s view? Is it Mr House’s view, or is there engagement and consultation with staff associations and operational officers before the view is formulated?
10:45

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Ultimately, I am here as a representative of the chief constable, so it is the view of the Police Service of Scotland, which is endorsed by the chief constable, albeit that—as the committee will accept—he cannot personally be here to offer that view on every occasion. I am not sure what your question was intended to infer. If you are asking whether we just take a view from the chief constable and then replicate it in any forum that we attend as his representatives, the answer is no.

A large amount of work is done on developing an informed and comprehensive position on issues that are extremely important not just for Police Scotland but across Scottish society. We consult the staff associations, as I am sure my colleagues will confirm; other agencies, to allow us to take account of their perspective; people with whom we work and on whom our work impacts; and—in this case in particular—some of the organisations that represent victims. At times that work involves us asking police officers to do specific pieces of work to develop proposals, which would then be endorsed by the governance forums of Police Scotland and ultimately by the Police Scotland executive team that is led by Sir Stephen House.

The Convener: I think the point of the question was that it seemed that Police Scotland and the SPF had different views at one point.

If John Finnie is going to pull that face, I will let him back in later.

Margaret Mitchell: There seems to have been quite a movement in the SPF’s position. The issue is obviously quite complex, and we as a Justice Committee are very concerned that we do not have enough time to scrutinise a decision on an issue of such magnitude in the way that we would like. In view of that, would you be in favour of taking the issue out of the bill and moving it to, for example, a royal commission so that it can be looked at thoroughly to satisfy everyone? That option was not considered in the Carloway review, which looked only at abolition or retention. I would like to hear the panellists’ views on that suggestion.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I am happy to go first on that. On the question of time, I go back to the points that I made about the other decisions that were made and implemented very quickly in the justice system. John Finnie referred to the Cadder decision, which in effect came from the Salduz case in the European Court of Human Rights. The timescales for the decisions and in particular for the implementation of the changes that resulted were extremely tight, and posed considerable challenges for the justice system.

Lord Carloway was given a substantial period of time in which to make his considerations and report to the Scottish Government. The long time since that report was made has allowed us all to consider the matter carefully. I have described what Police Scotland has done; I am sure that colleagues can speak about what they have done to formulate their views and perspective, and how their position may have evolved as more information and clarity from some of the key agencies that are involved has entered the public domain.

I do not think that we need more time to look at some of the issues, or indeed to look at any of the issues that we have covered today in some detail. There are a large number of victims of serious crime who are not having their expectations of the justice system met in this society.

The Convener: Whatever the committee’s views are—I think that I speak for us all—about the retention of mandatory corroboration, we are absolutely on the side of those victims you are talking about who are not having their day in court or having the Crown consider whether their case ought to be prosecuted. That is not the issue for the committee. The issue is whether this change will deliver justice and bring fairness for the victims. The reason why we are—and John Finnie is—testing you on the matter is that, although it may appear that we have had sufficient time, we have already had the SPF changing position in the course of its evidence to this committee.

I apologise to Margaret Mitchell—I just wanted to make that plain. You must not portray us as somehow not wishing to see those cases dealt with. What I have described is the position of everyone on the committee, whatever their position is on corroboration. That must be put on the record. We have got people coming before us next who represent victims and so on, and I want them, too, to know that. Sorry—it is not the case that because we are testing you we are somehow against them.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Thanks for the clarification, convener. It was not my intention to suggest that you were not supportive of victims. It is incumbent on me to present the perspective of Police Scotland and to try to balance some of the corroboration arguments that have been made by some members in the debate that has been going on more widely than in this room.

Margaret Mitchell: It is still unclear to me what you are saying, Mr Graham. I think that you are saying that Police Scotland would implement the provisions tomorrow because you are perfectly happy with them. I am asking you to consider the fact that, regardless of how long Lord Carloway took to come to his opinion, it was the opinion of just one judge. There has been a weight of opinion expressing real concern about the abolition of corroboration as proposed by the Carloway report. Does that give Police Scotland any pause for thought? Do you totally rule out taking the provisions out of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, so that they will quickly go into law next year without being properly tested by something like a royal commission? That might not take very long but would ensure the depth of scrutiny that the issue deserves.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: The depth of scrutiny that the issue deserves has been addressed in Lord Carloway’s report and the consideration that has taken place thereafter. The process of parliamentary scrutiny will enhance that consideration, and we are delighted to be providing evidence in that process, as we do for many bills. I do not think that there would be any enhancement of the position as we understand it or that there would be any change to the Police Scotland view should we delay the proposal as it currently stands.

Margaret Mitchell: Thank you. That allays all my worst fears about a single police force.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: You talk about deferring the proposal and other ways of scrutinising the bill, but those are matters for the committee. I return to where I started. Whether or not you defer the proposal now and implement it in a year’s time, nothing will change about the way in which the police go about their business of gathering evidence and reporting the facts and circumstances. We will continue to conduct thorough, professional investigations and report the facts and circumstances to the Crown.

Margaret Mitchell: That is not the question, Mr O’Connor. My question is whether you think there would be merit in fully discussing the proposal and having it looked at inside out to make sure that we get it right for your police officers and for the ordinary man in the street who goes into the courts. Would there be some merit in putting the proposal to a royal commission so that every aspect of it is looked at thoroughly by those from all walks of life who are in the best position to contribute to that?

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: I believe that the scrutiny that is being applied by the committee today, which is raising the important issues that have been raised to date, is part of that scrutiny. There may be merit in taking it forward to a full royal commission and bringing other professionals and other views into the equation for a full discussion, but that is a matter for others. From a police perspective, I hope that the level of scrutiny that is being applied just now will inform the debate.

Margaret Mitchell: But you would not rule out a royal commission looking at it.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: That is very much a matter for others.

David Ross: Our view is probably similar to that of our colleagues in the ASPS. If you asked me whether our current position is the unanimous view of the Scottish Police Federation, I would have to say no. It is our view, on balance, that we support the removal of the general requirement for corroboration. However, irrespective of whether we have a royal commission, I do not think that that will ever be the unanimous view of the Scottish Police Federation nor of the whole service. There are a wide variety of views not just in the Police Service but across the whole criminal justice system about whether the removal of corroboration is the right or wrong thing to do, and a lot of people’s views sit somewhere in the middle. I genuinely do not know whether a royal commission would bring more clarity and afford people more opportunity to make up their minds about whether they support the proposal. I tend to think that the more information people are provided with and the more scrutiny is applied, the better, because it is important that, whatever we do, we get it right and that the criminal justice system is not damaged by progressing the bill.

I take the same view as David O’Connor on what we would do as a service. We will do the same as we are doing now irrespective of whether the bill is passed as it is or not.

Margaret Mitchell: Could I pin you down, please, Mr Graham? Police Scotland’s submission says:

“corroboration of all material facts will always present significant challenge.”

What do you understand is required just now as the very basics of corroboration in the criminal justice system?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: As the committee has heard, and as Lord Carloway explained in his report, the current law in relation to corroboration in different cases is extremely complex. That is one of the issues that are under examination. The complexity is based on the legal developments over the years, from the starting position, which was identified by Lord Carloway as dating back to some principles from the Old Testament, to a position where the “corroboration fiddles”, as some commentators have described them, have twisted and adapted it to fit in with developments in society, legal process and evidential availability, and the original concept in very simple terms has perhaps been overtaken by all those changes and developments. If your question is, “What do you understand by the current law under corroboration?”, my answer is that there is a complex set of case law that lies underneath that and it would take some time to go into it.

Margaret Mitchell: That is an amazing answer. Are you saying that, given that complexity, you do not think that there is a case for the issue being taken out to a royal commission?

Will I tell you what the basic requirement is? It is really quite simple. Two essential facts require to be established: did an offence occur, and did the accused do it? Both of those essential facts require to be corroborated, nothing else. That should not be too difficult, should it, Mr Graham?

The Convener: Now, now. I know that everyone is passionate about the matter, but could we keep the tone polite, please?

Margaret Mitchell: I will keep the tone, with great difficulty.

The Convener: I know, but you will manage it. She is good at that.

Margaret Mitchell: We are looking at a tenet of Scots law that has been passed down by the institutional writers, which has been flexible and which has not only provided justice for victims but, crucially, protected the rights of the accused. Once imprisonment is imposed on someone unjustly, you can never get that back, which is why the standard of proof is beyond reasonable doubt.

So I ask you again, given the complexity that you have talked about, whether there is not a case for taking the matter out? Have the views and evidence that you have heard today not changed your mind in the very slightest?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I will go back to where you started by describing the current legal position that the essential facts require to be corroborated. I had already covered that in my evidence and I understand that position clearly.

Margaret Mitchell: You clearly did not.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I had thought that your question was what corroboration—

The Convener: In fairness, Mr Graham, you said that there has been a crime and there has been identification—or words to that effect. I appreciate that members are concerned about the matter.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Could I perhaps finish my answer?

Margaret Mitchell: Convener, I sought clarification specifically on the comment about all material facts needing to be corroborated way down the line, which is simply not the case.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: What I was trying to provide in my answer was some exploration of the depth of concern that there is about the complexity of what corroboration actually means in the huge variety of different cases. Although the test at a high level is simple, the interpretation of what corroboration means in different cases has been twisted and has developed through time.

Margaret Mitchell: I think that we prefer the word “evolved”, rather than “twisted”. You may not want to use the word “twisted”.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I accept that, but there is certainly a perception that that evolution has perhaps gone to a point where the original concept now needs to be revised in the way that is being proposed.

My answer to Ms Mitchell’s final question about whether I am not now convinced, based on what I have heard today, that further examination needs to be taken—in whatever terms that would happen—is that I am not convinced of that at all, for the reasons that I have outlined, which I will not repeat, noting the convener’s earlier comments. However, there needs to be a clear focus on what the justice system is there to achieve. The current law around corroboration is unclear to people and the proposal would provide clarification and simplification. It is very clear that there is a long history of the law evolving and developing to take account of changes in society, public values and so on. It is absolutely appropriate that the proposal that is currently in the bill is taken forward now.

11:00

Margaret Mitchell: On a different point, I have a question for Mr Ross and Mr O’Connor. Following on from John Finnie’s point about professional witnesses being susceptible to malicious allegations, the Lord Advocate has given some assurances—some guidance, almost—that proceedings in such cases would not be taken without strong supporting evidence. Does it give you any cause for concern that the Lord Advocate may change and a new Lord Advocate may have a different view?

David Ross: As we are the staff association that represents the vast majority of police officers, the proposal initially gave us quite significant concern because our members frequently find themselves in positions where they themselves are uncorroborated. They may be on their own attending an incident and dealing with several people who could make some sort of spurious allegation against them, corroborated by each other.

That has always been the case and, to date, such allegations have not resulted in a vast number of police officers being prosecuted. The evolution of CCTV, mobile phones and so on—indeed, in some areas, our own cameras on police officers—has provided a degree of protection to prevent that. What the Lord Advocate has said in relation to measures that he would put in place regarding other evidence to support any such allegations has indeed provided some reassurance.

However, I am personally aware of significant numbers of individuals who have not been proceeded against for making false accusations of crime against police officers and wasting police time on the basis that it would not be in the public interest to do so. Certainly when I was a joint branch board secretary in Northern Constabulary, I had a drawer full of letters from the procurator fiscal in Inverness telling me precisely that. Although there might have been a sufficiency of evidence to prosecute an individual, it was not in the public interest to do so.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: It is a fair and valid point. We have raised concerns and, over the years, we have seen false allegations and acts of what we would consider to be public mischief. It has been an issue of concern in the past. The Lord Advocate has given a reassurance, but I have to say—and I hope that David Ross would agree—that there would be some concerns among our members that it could be an issue.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: It is important to stress—it was already hinted at, so my apologies if I did not pick it up properly—that I do not think that anybody would be seeking a different standard of investigation or legal process to be applied to people in different positions in society or in different professions.

We can agree on the point that was made about the burden of proof, which will remain as it is just now. The sufficiency of evidence that will need to be gathered for that burden of proof to be met will be changed slightly in relation to the quantitative assessment of the evidence that is put forward. Assessment of the quality of the evidence is absolutely key in relation to the final outcome in court and the sufficiency test being met—it is very important to emphasise that.

Sandra White (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP): Good morning, gentlemen. I put on the record my thanks to Police Scotland for its work during the recent tragedy at the Clutha Vaults in Glasgow.

The Convener: You say that on behalf of the entire committee. We appreciate how involved not just the chief constable but the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and the Scottish Ambulance Service have been.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Thank you.

Sandra White: I want to go over some of the issues that have been raised, more for clarity than for anything else. The convener was correct to say that we have been looking at the corroboration issue for quite some time and we all know about it but, for the general public out there and the press, you will confirm that, whatever your thoughts on the issue, it is vital for us to remember that it is the legal and technical aspects of corroboration that we are proposing to remove and not corroboration per se?

The Convener: I think that we have established that.

Sandra White: Convener, from speaking to the general public and the press, as we all do, I think that it is necessary to get it on the record that it is the legal and technical—

The Convener: In fairness, I think that I put it on the record clearly when Christian Allard asked his questions that we know exactly what it means, and I said clearly—

Sandra White: Convener, I am not disagreeing with you. I would just like it on the record, for the sake of the public and the press—

The Convener: You have said it again.

Sandra White: —that it is the legal and technical aspects that we propose to abolish and not the whole thing.

In Scotland, corroboration has a narrow technical meaning. In a recent article, Professors Chalmers and Leverick stated:

“The Scottish law of corroboration has become technical and highly complex, and cannot simply be described as a ‘two witness’ rule.”

You mentioned that, Mr Graham, and so did David O’Connor and David Ross, but will you elaborate on the point? You talked about evidence and said that this area is technical. We could talk about rape victims, but I am also talking about older people who are in nursing homes and children who are in care homes, where there may be no other witness. Will you elaborate on what evidence you would look for? Would evidence of distress be enough to be corroborative evidence?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I am grateful for the opportunity to provide clarification. We have already discussed the fact that we are talking about the removal of the absolute requirement for corroboration, but there is an important point about public consciousness. It is impossible to explain the nuances and technical complexity of the area in a short time. Even in the length of time that the committee has to examine the matter, I would not be able to articulate it in any depth given the case law from different cases and the different admimicles of evidence. Where the standard of corroboration would be met is a highly complex matter and it has developed to such an extent that it is difficult even for those who practise law and indeed High Court judges to interpret it consistently, as we have heard.

On the examples that you raised, I think that I have already said that one of our key concerns is that the law as it stands is potentially discriminatory against particular vulnerable groups. We examined a case that involved what we would call bogus or fraudulent workmen and an elderly victim. An elderly woman was approached at home by some people who were looking to do roofing work. They offered to do the work for £500. She thought that her roof needed some maintenance and she gave them the money from her purse. They went away for a short time and came back later to say that they needed £300 for materials. She gave them the money for that as well, and they said that they would go to a builder’s yard to get some materials, but they never turned up at the house again.

That case was reported to the police with detailed descriptions of the men and the registration number of the van. The two males who were in the van were stopped a short time later and they were wearing similar clothes. In addition, the ladders on the roof of the van matched the description that had been given, and a quantity of business cards were found that were similar to a business card that had been given to the woman. In all the circumstances, there was a high quality of evidence, but it was deemed that the essential facts of the case did not pass the test of sufficiency for each of the essential facts to be corroborated. That case is a good example because, despite the overall quality of evidence, it is the type of case that might not hit the bar at the moment. That case did not. In future, there will be an increased prospect that such cases will hit the bar.

I need to be clear that that is not to say that we will be able to resolve all such cases through the justice system. The part that the police play in that is just one of many. I think that it is illustrative of the point that I am trying to get across, which is that there is a technical barrier that prevents the overall quality of the evidence from being assessed and which therefore does not allow such evidence to be presented to a court and a jury in the justice system that we quite rightly have in Scotland.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Corroboration is a highly technical and complex subject. Over the years, as a commander and a senior investigating officer, I have seen many cases being reported to the Crown in which we believed that there was corroboration. For one reason or another, many of those cases were not proceeded with. We clearly believed that there was corroboration, but the Crown took a different view. For me, that highlights the complexity of the subject.

Sandra White: Mr Ross?

David Ross: I have nothing to add, other than to say that the police’s role is to gather the evidence and to report it to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. It is a matter for the Crown and the courts to determine whether that evidence is sufficient and whether they believe the evidence that has been presented.

Sandra White: Is it not a fact that the International Criminal Court does not ask for what, in technical terms, is known as corroborative evidence?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I am less qualified to comment in detail on international law or jurisprudence than many other witnesses who will appear before the committee.

As I said earlier, without trying to articulate international law, I understand that it has been reported fairly widely that the technical barrier of corroboration in Scotland, as it is now deemed, is seen as being potentially discriminatory in comparison with what happens in other legal systems internationally.

Sandra White: To clarify my point, I will quote the International Criminal Court’s rules of procedure and evidence. They say:

"a Chamber shall not impose a legal requirement that corroboration is required in order to prove any crime within the jurisdiction of the Court, in particular, crimes of sexual violence."

Corroboration is not a legal requirement of the International Criminal Court. People might get fed up hearing this, but I say again that we need to remember that it is the abolition of the legal and technical requirements for corroboration that we are talking about.

Can I ask about the test for prosecution, or should I come back to that?

The Convener: I do not know whether that is relevant to this panel. Quite rightly, we are looking at the issue from the point of view of the police, and I do not know whether that question falls within that box. The witnesses can answer it if they would like to, but I do not know whether that is an area that they want to wander into.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Clearly, I would not wish to speak on behalf of COPFS or the Lord Advocate. However, we will be working with them to develop the proposals to ensure that the guidance that the Crown provides to the police remains appropriate. I think that the Lord Advocate has outlined some of the measures that would be put in place to ensure that there was a clear understanding that—to echo what has already been said—in essence, there will be no change to the standard of police investigation. That is an extremely important point to make.

The Convener: I do not think that we challenge that.

Can I move on, Sandra?

Sandra White: Yes—thank you, convener.

The Convener: I do not want to shorten questions, but I am conscious of time and we have had a good bite at the issue and have resolved quite a lot—or perhaps not.

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): My first question is for ASPS and the Scottish Police Federation, which are organisations that represent police officers of particular ranks—I assume that is correct. I just wonder whether the change in position on corroboration has been discussed with your membership.

David Ross: Indeed it has been. We consult our members through our joint central committee on almost all decisions that we make. Ultimately, our position is determined by that committee, which is representative of the whole of the country. Every police officer in Scotland who is a member of the Scottish Police Federation has had the opportunity to comment on the matter, but they have not all chosen to do so, and the view is not the unanimous view of the Scottish Police Federation. Indeed, our previous position was not the unanimous position of the federation; it was our view on balance. Our view now is our view on balance, based on how the debate and our understanding have developed.

11:15

Elaine Murray: What do you think changed your membership’s view on the matter?

David Ross: Probably a better understanding of what we are talking about. The initial fear when people talked about the blanket or wholesale abolition of corroboration was that corroboration in all its forms would no longer exist. I absolutely understand that that was not the intention, and those who sit at the helm of the Scottish Police Federation understood that, too, but it was not necessarily our members’ understanding as the debate came out, broadly because a number of them had read Lord Carloway’s report and that is not what it said. It seemed to indicate that corroboration in the criminal justice system would simply be completely eradicated.

Elaine Murray: Obviously, we are discussing the bill, not Lord Carloway’s report. The bill says: “If satisfied that a fact has been established by evidence in the proceedings, the judge or (as the case may be) the jury is entitled to find the fact proved by the evidence although the evidence is not corroborated.”

The bill does not talk about different strands; it says that the fact can be “proved ... although the evidence is not corroborated.” That has always been the position in the bill; it has not changed.

David Ross: Yes. The word “corroboration” is probably a misnomer, because we are talking about a sufficiency of evidence to prove beyond reasonable doubt that somebody committed an offence.

Elaine Murray: I appreciate that the police are often frustrated by presenting a case to the procurator fiscal that is then not taken forward. Police officers have said to me over the years that it is an extremely frustrating experience for them to have done the investigation and then to find that the case is not taken forward.

I think that Mr Graham made a case around the 3,000 additional victims who would be able to have their cases taken to court.

The Convener: No—to the Crown.

Elaine Murray: Yes, to the Crown. The Crown would then decide whether to take the case to court.

The evidence from England is that the conviction rates for sexual offences and domestic abuse, for example, are no higher there than they are in Scotland. Therefore, are we not just talking about people’s ability to go to court to be disbelieved rather than their being told that their case cannot be taken to court in the first place?

Do the proposals mean greater justice for victims, or will people just get further down the process before their case is kicked out?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I would be happy to address that.

Eventual outcomes in the whole justice process and outcomes in court cases are very difficult for the police to predict and comment on, and a comparison with England and Wales is perhaps not a straight comparison, because there are a large number of differences in legal procedures and criminal law that might have an impact beyond the changes that are proposed in the bill. Indeed, my understanding is that the conviction rates for certain types of crime that I have covered are currently higher in England and Wales than in Scotland.
There have been many fairly significant changes in how some crimes are approached. You mentioned serious sexual crimes. Since Police Scotland was created, we have fairly dramatically changed our approach to investigating and working with victims and victim support agencies on serious sexual crime. We work very closely with the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service to ensure that we all work together to take advantage of any opportunities where there is quality evidence. Therefore, if the law is changed, it will be very hard to determine what impact that will have alongside all the other changes that are currently going on.

I already mentioned the increase in reporting of serious sexual crime to the police, which is an extremely positive development that in part is down to the proactivity of the police in tackling domestic abuse and working with victims groups. Overlaying that, some of the measurement and assessment will make it very complex to unpick and understand what has had the impact on the eventual outcomes.

What is important is that we are doing everything that we can to demonstrate that support and outcomes for justice are extremely important for the victims of such serious crime. Elaine Murray said that the police are frustrated at times when a case is not taken forward. In such times, the organisation has a sense of frustration regarding the mission that we are here for: to keep people safe and to act in the interests of victims of crime who have come forward and expect that we will do everything that we can to meet their expectations.

Elaine Murray: Mr Ross referred to checks and balances. Of course, one is the prosecutorial test, which we have already discussed. The other two are the judge’s ability to dismiss a case and the change in the jury majority, which we were told would not affect something like 96 per cent of summary cases and so will not be a check or a balance. Are those checks and balances sufficient?

David Ross: We are probably more persuaded of that element now than we were when we responded on the bill initially. The checks and balances across the whole case—not just by the Crown but by the court—are sufficient that whatever evidence is presented will still need to meet the burden of proof.

Elaine Murray: There was never any intention of changing the burden of proof, was there?

David Ross: I do not think that there was, but there was a widespread perception that there was.

Elaine Murray: Really?

The Convener: I am flabbergasted that anybody in the criminal justice system, from the police onwards and upwards to the High Court, ever thought that we were looking at touching the burden of proof or the standard of proof.

David Ross: That is not what I said. I am talking about corroboration. If we had talked about a sufficiency of evidence, rather than used the word “corroboration”, and explained the intention in those terms, it would have been easier for everyone to understand.

Roderick Campbell: I have an anorak question for Malcolm Graham, I am afraid. We heard from the Crown Office about an exercise that looked at the number of cases that the police might refer to it. Its evidence was that “the increase in the number of reports was about 1.5 per cent, which equates to another 3,720 cases being reported.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3741.]

You may have been talking in global figures earlier, but do you agree with those Crown Office figures? Do you want to write to us to confirm the slight differences?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I could write to you with a greater level of detail. We have done two exercises and the Crown did a separate exercise that came out with broadly similar but slightly different figures. The Crown used different case samples and in at least one of the exercises there was a distinction between solemn procedure and summary procedure. I would be happy to write with the details of all the figures.

Broadly speaking, the overall figure was a 2 per cent increase in cases, and that is where the figure of 3,000 victims came from. I am happy to clarify that in writing.

Roderick Campbell: I am happy to leave the question there.

In his report, Lord Carloway did not recommend that any safeguards would be necessary if the requirement for corroboration was abolished, on the basis that in his view the principle safeguard is the requirement to prove a case beyond reasonable doubt. I am now confused as to what appropriate safeguards the SPF thinks have emerged in the system that they were not aware of before. Can you clarify what safeguards you believe will be necessary if the requirement for corroboration is removed?

David Ross: In truth, as I have already explained, I think that there was an issue of perception rather than reality in our understanding of what was initially meant in Lord Carloway’s report regarding the removal of the requirement for corroboration.
As I have already articulated, it has always been our position that we gather and report as much evidence as is available and that it is for the court to determine whether there is a sufficiency of evidence to prove beyond a reasonable doubt whether somebody is guilty.

I do not think that our position has changed, but our understanding has changed in terms of what we are talking about here. If we are talking about corroboration being achieved across the whole of the evidence, I think—as I have said—that we are sufficiently persuaded that that will continue. We have talked about checks and balances, the whole of the evidence, special measures and so on. All those things taken together still mean corroboration for me.

I suppose that, in terms of perception, that was not our initial understanding. There was, rightly or wrongly, a perception among us that the evidence from one single source could provide sufficient proof to take a case to court and to convict somebody, and that was a step too far for us.

Roderick Campbell: In your written submission, you state that the “link between corroboration and low conviction rates ... needs further detailed research”.

I assume that you now do not want to carry out “further detailed research”. Your submission went on to say that you believe that the “majority verdict of juries would ... have to be reconsidered”.

Is either of those points relevant to you now?

David Ross: I think that the research has already been done to some extent by Police Scotland. Whether the issue would benefit from more research, I genuinely cannot comment on. I am mostly content to accept the figures that Mr Graham has put forward, which I am sure are accurate.

I do not think that the majority verdict is a matter for us to form a view on; it is a matter for those in the legal profession.

Roderick Campbell: Finally—I am conscious of the time—we talked earlier a bit about penetration. Presumably you would accept that, if the only evidence in the absence of corroboration is the complainer’s evidence that there has been penetration, the case might be sufficient to pass to the Crown Office but might present difficulties for it in deciding whether to proceed further.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: If we are speaking about rape and serious sexual crime, the complexities of not only the essential facts that need to be proved for the different offences that now exist under more recent statutes but the circumstances in which corroboration would currently be considered would take some time to work through.

In relation to the specific point that you made, the easiest way in which to address that is to point out that the Lord Advocate has been very clear that he would not expect a case to be received with solely the testimony of one witness and no supporting evidence. In your example of a serious sexual crime, it is highly unlikely that that would be the case, but it is not impossible. I therefore reiterate what I have already said, which is that we will continue to do everything that we currently do to investigate thoroughly and professionally all such crimes and report matters to the Crown.

In relation to cases of serious crime, I think that the point was made at the start by Mr Finnie that it is more likely that we would report to the Crown where there is a higher level of doubt on our part that there might be a sufficiency. Quite understandably, such cases come under more scrutiny in terms of whether the evidential sufficiency test is met.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): What a very strange morning. We have been told repeatedly that we are removing corroboration but we are not removing corroboration. There is a lot of Newspeak going on here, which concerns me immensely. Let us be clear: the bill will remove the need for corroboration. There is no point in trying to fudge that, but I think that that is what has been going on this morning. I am really rather disturbed by that.

There has rightly been a great deal of focus on the victims, whom you have said might well have access to justice. However, Elaine Murray pointed out that access to justice might not be well served if the requirement produces more prosecutions but not more convictions. We have heard a lot of evidence in this committee that the removal of corroboration will mean the likelihood of many more miscarriages of justice. I would like the panel’s view on whether we should pay no heed to that evidence.

11:30

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I do not think that you should pay no heed to it. Everyone who comes before the committee presents a valid view for assessment and it is certainly not for me to say otherwise.

I am not sure of the basis of those views and, in monitoring some of the positions that people have held, I have not seen terribly much evidence to support the position that there would be more miscarriages of justice. I have represented our current position in comments that I have already made, and I note a previous caution about repetition.
The Convener: But have there not been some high-profile miscarriages of justice—the Birmingham six, for example?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: What I was saying is that I am not clear that the people who have presented the position in Scotland—

The Convener: A member of the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission gave us that evidence.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I am genuinely not clear about the link between those cases and the question of whether there was corroboration, because I have not examined the matter. I just do not think that there is any credible evidence to suggest that there would be more miscarriages of justice in Scotland. What I was going to say—without repeating myself—is that I think it a travesty of justice that so many people are not being given access to what they would expect because of the technical barriers that remain in place.

Alison McInnes: So you are not concerned at all about protecting the rights of the accused.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I would be concerned if I thought that there would be an enhanced chance of miscarriages of justice as a result of these proposals, but I have no evidence—and I do not believe—that there is such an enhanced chance. As we have said, it is clear that the burden of proof, the test of sufficiency put before the court and all the other measures for carrying out a qualitative assessment of the inadmissibility and so on of evidence are in place.

Alison McInnes: But they will not be in place when this legislation goes through.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Well, I disagree with that.

The Convener: You made the interesting comment that people are not being given access to what they would expect. I appreciate the difficulties that the police face in meeting the expectations of, say, victims of rape, sexual abuse or domestic violence when they cannot take their cases to the Crown Office, but what do you think those people will expect if this legislation goes through and there is no requirement for mandatory corroboration?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I deliberately used a phrase that lacks clarity and definition because what victims expect is different in different cases.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: It was suggested earlier that it would not be a better outcome if this change in the law merely resulted in more victims’ cases being taken to court without any increase in convictions. However, that is not the case with all victims.
Alison McInnes: That is fine.

John Pentland: Mr Graham, on behalf of Police Scotland you have welcomed the proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration. Unlike some, you have outlined the reasons why. However, this proposal comes at a time when Police Scotland will face significant financial pressures. Is there any connection? Has your support for the proposal perhaps been financially driven?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I agree that the proposal comes at a time when there are substantial financial pressures on Police Scotland and indeed the wider public finances. That has been well reported through the parliamentary committee structure. However, it is absolutely not the case that our support for the proposed changes to the law on corroboration is driven in any sense by financial pressures.

Indeed, members may be aware that the financial memorandum that accompanies the bill demonstrates that our assessment was that there would be a slight increase in costs associated with the changes that are proposed. That is because we anticipate that, as I have already said, we would have to report a slightly higher number of cases to the Crown. We would have to support for longer a slightly higher number of solemn cases, which would require a greater capacity in our information technology systems and greater resource.

The cost increase is not substantial, but I want to make it clear that, in our assessment, what is being proposed in the bill would cost us a little more money. There are no cost savings associated with the law change as it is being proposed.

The Convener: I have one final question. This is something that we have not touched on: investigative liberation and section 14, "Release on conditions", in which the person not officially accused—there is that expression again—is released before the 28-day period has expired.

Let me give you the opportunity to put your response on the record. That approach might be seen as helping the police when they do not have any corroboration: the police already have a "person not officially accused" but they are releasing them on conditions so that they can go and find the evidence that they perhaps should have had in the first place—I am not saying that that is your position—but the person was taken in as "not officially accused".

How do these things interact?

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: If I may challenge the phrase "perhaps should have had in the first place", it is a wild assumption—

The Convener: No, that is not my position. I am saying that that proposition might be put to you.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: Okay. Is the question whether there is a link between the proposed change in corroboration and the investigatory liberation proposals in the bill?

The Convener: Yes. That is the question.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: I do not think that there is a link between the two proposals, because I think that the position that we have taken on corroboration relates to all the circumstances of all the cases that we deal with.

There is a continuum that covers many situations, from long-running investigations in which, for very good reasons, we are trying to gather evidence—we know that a crime has occurred; it might be a serious crime or a less serious crime, but it might be many weeks or months before we identify who is responsible or get what we feel is a sufficiency of evidence to report to the Crown; and such a case would not necessarily fit within the requirements of the investigative liberation sections of the bill—to a position in which we arrest somebody in the commission of a crime and there is sufficient evidence at that point.

We have taken our position on the proposed change for corroboration out of principle, and we have supported the proposals on investigative liberation out of practicality.

The Convener: Actually, the test is "reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed an offence".

Some might say that "reasonable grounds for suspecting" is quite a light test.

Assistant Chief Constable Graham: That is the current test for somebody being detained and has been since 1980.

The Convener: So there is no change.

Chief Superintendent O'Connor: Not in terms of investigative liberation. I take on board the point that has been made about finding evidence against the accused, but the investigation should draw in all evidence. Some of that evidence may clear the accused, so the investigation has to be very balanced. That is what the time needs to be used for.

The Convener: Thank you. You do not need to add to that, Mr Ross. I simply put the point to the panel as part of the test of the legislation.

I thank you for your evidence session, which, for reasons that I think I understand, has been far longer than anticipated.
11:41

Meeting suspended.

11:50

On resuming—

The Convener: Okay—we are back in the saddle.

I welcome to the meeting Shelagh McCall, commissioner at the Scottish Human Rights Commission; Tony Kelly, chair of Justice Scotland; Alan McCloskey, acting deputy chief constable of Victim Support Scotland—wait, acting deputy chief constable? That is what it says here. I did not write this script. What would you like to be?

Alan McCloskey (Victim Support Scotland): Acting deputy chief executive.

The Convener: Then that is what you shall be.

I also welcome Sandie Barton, helpline manager and national co-ordinator at Rape Crisis Scotland; and Lily Greenan, manager at Scottish Women’s Aid.

I am sorry that you have all had such a wait, but you will appreciate that we really wanted to dig into the evidence from the previous panel. We will do the same with you.

I thank you all for your written submissions. Some of you have been here before and some have not. If you wish to make a comment or answer a question, indicate that desire to me and I will call you. Your microphone will come on automatically, as mine has done—it happens even when I have been saying indiscreet things, so I have to watch what I say.

Alison McInnes: I draw members’ attention to my entry in the register of members’ interests, which notes that I am a member of the council of Justice Scotland.

The Convener: Do you want to ask a question? You could get in first, if you wanted to.

Alison McInnes: All right, I will do that.

We are focusing entirely on corroboration at the moment. We have heard a lot this morning about access to justice and whether access to justice is increased if removing the requirement for corroboration results in more prosecutions, even if it does not necessarily lead to more convictions. I would be interested to hear panel members’ views on that.

Tony Kelly (Justice Scotland): Access to justice would be facilitated by the removal of corroboration. The problem is that that is a skewed view of things, and there are much greater things at work than increasing access to justice for victims and complainers. The problem is that, as Lord Carloway correctly identified, corroboration is at the foundation of every aspect of the criminal justice system, so the removal of the requirement for corroboration would operate at the stage of the reporting of crime to the police, the stage of the police reporting to the procurator fiscal’s office and the stage of the matter being taken to court, which is where the issue of access to justice is being invoked. Corroboration also acts during the course of the trial at present, and that safeguard would be removed. Most importantly, the power of the judge to rule on the question of the evidence that is being led would be wholly removed if the provisions were brought into force.

Sandie Barton (Rape Crisis Scotland): The issue of access to justice is important, although it has been spoken about in an almost derogatory way. The provisions are about improving the situation in relation to cases such as those involving domestic violence or sexual abuse, where there are real difficulties in gathering corroborative evidence. In the discussion with the previous panel, the confusion around corroboration was highlighted. It is not corroboration that is being removed but the quite high bar that requires every element of the case to have corroborative evidence.

There is no suggestion that the police will not look for supporting evidence to back up a report. That is a crucial point. The measure is about improving access to justice, whether that relates to reporting to the police or the number of cases that proceed to prosecution. The Lord Advocate gave compelling examples of cases in which there was a high level of supporting evidence. Most people would look at those cases and think that the supporting evidence corroborated the report that was given. The measure is about giving such cases access to court in a way that does not happen at present.

Alison McInnes: To clarify, I do not think that anyone has spoken in derogatory terms about access to justice or about the issues that you refer to, but it has been suggested in earlier evidence sessions that people somehow have a right to have their day in court, as if that in itself was important. I am interested in the other panel members’ views on that.

Alan McCloskey: From our perspective, access to justice is a wide-ranging term, but it starts with the victim being believed in the first instance that something has happened. They need access to information and support and they need justice to be done. In the simplest terms, they want justice to be done. They want the police and the Crown to help them to get access to justice. Yes, there are absolute rights for the accused, but victims and witnesses also have rights. That forms part of it. I take it to be a very simple concept.
The Convener: Does anybody else wish to comment on that?

Shelagh McCall (Scottish Human Rights Commission): I will zoom out slightly and say that, from the perspective of human rights, the Parliament has to ensure that the bill does two things: first, that it provides a right to effective investigation and prosecution where appropriate for victims of serious crime, which undoubtedly includes rape and domestic violence; and, secondly, that it ensures that, when an accused is brought into the investigation and prosecution system, he or she receives a fair trial.

Mr Kelly is right that the effect of corroboration plays differently in those two respects. I agree with him that, if we remove the legal requirement for corroboration, more cases will potentially get to court, although I pause to sound a note of caution about just how many more. I listened to the evidence from the Lord Advocate and the head of policy at the Crown Office. As I understood Miss Dalrymple’s evidence—members will have a better recollection of it than I do—she said that a review of 2,803 domestic incidents that were reported to the police found, I think, that 1,000 would have proceeded to court under the bill. The point is not that there will be an open door and everything will get through, because the prosecutorial test will have an impact. However, there will no doubt be an increased opportunity to get to court.

Once a case is in court, access to justice for an accused person includes there being the proper means by which to challenge the quality of evidence against him. At present, corroboration serves that function as a means of quality control. If we abolish it without reassessing the system and seeing what other safeguards might be needed, there will be nothing, apart from the ability to cross-examine, to provide the proper means to challenge the reliability of evidence. The European Court of Human Rights recognises some areas of evidence as inherently problematic, such as dock identification and hearsay evidence. We have to keep both perspectives in mind when we talk about access to justice.

Lily Greenan (Scottish Women’s Aid): I would like to add something about evidence. We should be clear that, with crimes of violence against women, whether it is sexual violence or domestic abuse—with respect to Shelagh McCall, I point out that domestic abuse is on the whole dealt with not as a serious crime but at summary level, although corroboration is still required to get it there—the evidence is not usually the driving force for whether there is a conviction; instead, the driving force is attitudes, assumptions and prejudice. The notion that removing the requirement for corroboration will in any way change that situation is false.

I represent the interests of a particular group of victims in the criminal justice system, although they are a substantial number—30 per cent of the cases that go through Glasgow sheriff court involve domestic abuse, so the workload is not insignificant. In relation to that group of victims, removing the requirement for corroboration will provide the opportunity for the kinds of discussions that happen in backrooms at the moment to be heard in the court.

That is an important part of the process of moving towards justice. We will not get there by removing the requirement for corroboration, but we will open up the discussions about the evidence that really exists about violence against women by having them in the courtroom rather than before anything gets near a sheriff—it is mostly sheriffs in our case.

It is important that the committee takes account of the fact that evidence is sometimes secondary to attitudes and prejudice in decision making, whether that is at shrieval level or in solemn proceedings.

The Convener: I am interested in comments from others on the panel.

Tony Kelly: It is an interesting recognition that the proposed abolition will not be a panacea that cures all the criminal justice system’s ills—perceived or otherwise. I completely agree that the conviction rate for incidents of violence against women is scandalous, but the focus of abolition seems to be on getting cases into court. No one concludes that getting all such cases into court will deal with the appalling conviction rate. I completely agree that at the root of that appalling rate are prejudices and attitudes. Further consideration and work will be needed before we get anywhere near addressing that.

Sandie Barton: I know that a lot of the debate has focused on whether removing the requirement for corroboration will make the difference. I agree that it will not do so of itself, but a number of other important measures are being considered as part of this bill and the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill.

For example, we are talking only now about automatic rights to special measures. Having a screen can make the difference in whether somebody feels able to give evidence. Not having female forensic examiners can be a massive barrier for some.

Of itself, removing the corroboration requirement will not make the difference, and none of us believes that it will. However, as an important step forward, alongside other important measures, it could make the difference.
The numbers might be small, but the cases are significant to the people involved. The impact on public safety also matters. When there is a large amount of good-quality evidence that indicates that someone is guilty of an offence but the case is not taken forward, that has a massive implication for the victim and for the safety of the public in Scotland.

Alan McCloskey: I echo those comments. This goes wider than corroboration and involves the whole system. If victims, witnesses and the public have more confidence in the system, they will be more likely to come forward to say, “This happened to me. Can somebody do something about it, please?” That is entirely reasonable.

Removing the requirement for corroboration contributes to that. If that allows more cases to be considered and potentially taken forward on the basis of a reasonable prospect of conviction—beyond that, the beyond reasonable doubt test will still apply—that will allow confidence in the system. Removing the corroboration rule forms an important part of that.

The Convener: I put to you the proposition that removing the requirement might have the opposite effect. We hear about the need for a change in attitudes and so on. The Crown might feel that it must take more cases forward and might lower its test of a reasonable prospect of success because corroboration is no longer a necessity in court, but the result might be that victims have a harder time in court because their credibility is challenged more. Do you have any concerns that the proposal might backfire?

We have spoken in private to people who have been through the court process in cases in which the accused has been acquitted, and they feel that they have been let down. Years later, that pain is still there. Do you have concerns that this might not work out how you think it will?

Alan McCloskey: As I said, it goes wider than corroboration. It is about the whole system, the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill and the journey that victims and witnesses go through, and it is their experience—

The Convener: I want you to focus on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill and the essential requirement for corroboration at court level. We have looked at the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill and have a good idea of what that is about—indeed, it has many good proposals in it.

Are you concerned that the proposal might not work out how you think it will? It might have a deterrent effect, because people might think, “I went through that all for nothing and to be not believed at the end of the day.”

Alan McCloskey: That is a potential outcome, but our view is that the removal of corroboration is positive.

Tony Kelly: I bow to the greater expertise of the witnesses from Scottish Women’s Aid and Rape Crisis Scotland, but it is crucial that, as Mr McCloskey said, witnesses must appreciate that they will be believed. That is, first off, what causes them to decide whether to report the matter. If, after going through the whole process, the verdict is one of acquittal and the witness has not been believed, the trauma is added to. That is my experience and that of the other people whom I have spoken to. Is that end in itself—that airing of the case and that access to justice—worth in and of itself the abolition of corroboration, regardless of the outcomes? No one seems to be focused on what those outcomes will be, or perhaps they are disregarded because we do not have to concern ourselves with them. However, they may well be crucial for the victims of crime.

Sandie Barton: On the convener’s point about the Crown Office feeling that it should put cases forward, the Lord Advocate was clear in outlining that there would be a determination about whether it is in the public interest to put a case forward and whether the quality of evidence is there, so I do not think that the Crown will feel under pressure to make a decision based purely on the victim’s needs if the supporting evidence to back up the decision is not there.

Court can be a very harrowing experience for people, regardless of whether there is corroborative evidence. I have worked with many women in cases in which there is an overwhelming amount of evidence, but the evidence is not the defining factor in how those cases play out in court. My point is a bit like Victim Support Scotland’s point—it is about changing the culture.

We are doing a bit of research with people who have gone through court. On judicial protection, some people say that there was clear monitoring of the questioning, and that the point and relevancy of the questioning were looked at. As I say, court is often a very traumatic experience, but are we saying that we cannot put victims forward because they might have a hard time and that we are doing that ultimately to protect them? The Lord Advocate highlighted that not many people would be thankful to be told not to go to court because it might not be a good place for them to be. That is not the answer.

The Convener: Victims always have a hard time, but they will have a harder time.

Sandie Barton: Victims have a very hard time at the moment, and dealing with that is about changing the culture of the courtroom. We have talked about judicial training with Mr MacAskill.
There is something in there about how victims are treated in a courtroom, but I do not know that removing the requirement for corroboration will impact on that in any way.

Lily Greenan: I echo what Sandie Barton has said: court cannot be any harder for victims in rape or sexual violence cases, who get grilled and ripped to shreds in court. That is perhaps less the case with domestic abuse cases because many of them go to summary court, where an awful lot of the technicalities of the case happen much faster, so there is not the playing-to-the-jury element.

I do not think that court is a pleasant experience for victims. Certainly, for victims of interpersonal crimes such as domestic abuse, rape and sexual assault, I do not see how it could be worse or how we could get a worse conviction—or failure—rate. I therefore do not accept those arguments as a reason not to consider abolishing the requirement for corroboration.

The police and the Crown Office will still look for the best evidence that they can find and we will get away from some of the more technical drudges that go on in the system, which prevent cases from going to court simply because there is no piece of DNA that says that a certain man was in a certain place at a certain time, although there is plenty of other evidence to link him to the crime. In recent times, we have been accused online of using anecdotal evidence. We have done that, but if 40 years of anecdotal evidence is not good enough for the committee and the Parliament, I do not know what is.

Anecdotally, we know of a woman who was beaten so badly by her husband—

The Convener: I am sorry to stop you, but I do not know what that is about. I am not online, you see.

Lily Greenan: No—that is fine.

We deal with the issue outwith the committee, and it has been interesting to read the suggestions that the arguments made by Scottish Women’s Aid and Rape Crisis Scotland, in particular, are irrelevant. If a woman who has been so badly beaten that her neighbours fear for her life and who runs into the street with her clothes hanging off her is unable to get into court because there is no corroboration that it was her husband who did it this time, there is something wrong with our system. That is the kind of situation that we want to address. Although that evidence is anecdotal, it is fact—that is what happened: the case could not go to court because there was insufficient corroboration in relation to his presence in the house at the time of the assault.

Yes, it is an emotive subject. Yes, it is about anecdotes and stories, but these are real people. I have some strong views on the need to remove the requirement for corroboration.

The Convener: Lord Gill mentioned the idea of a review of evidence in Scotland, looking at all the facts and circumstances that might have applied if we had had a different evidential base. For some committee members, the issue is that we perhaps need to look at the broader evidential base in court rather than narrow it down. That might have applied in that case, given that there was a history of such incidents. Would you like to comment on Lord Gill’s proposal that we look at the broader aspects?

Lily Greenan: We could and should do that whether or not the requirement for corroboration is removed. Investigators and prosecutors should always consider the full range of evidence that is available. I am concerned that, because we have a corroboration rule, there is not a tendency but a temptation to say, “We’ve ticked the two boxes—we can put that one forward.” That is not a criticism of how the fiscal service operates as a rule; it is just a recognition that, when people are pressured, they do the minimum that they need to do to move on to the next thing on their list. There are some concerns about how the system is working currently.

Alison McInnes: I would like to go back to Ms McCall’s point about the right of the accused to a fair trial. Justice Scotland and the SHRC have concerns about the removal of corroboration. We have also heard compelling stories from Police Scotland and Ms Greenan about people who are unable to access justice at the moment. In the interests of understanding both of the tests that need to be done, it would be useful if you were able to elaborate on your concerns about the miscarriages of justice that might occur if the need for corroboration were removed. Can you talk about the issue of less credible witnesses and accused people to help us to understand your concerns?

Shelagh McCall: I make it clear that the commission is not opposed to the abolition of corroboration as a matter of principle—it is not a requirement for a fair trial under the European convention on human rights. However, we are opposed to its abolition in the terms of the bill without proper consideration having been given to the unforeseen and unintended consequences of that or to how that will play out against what the Lord President described as centuries of legal development and a finely calibrated system. Undoubtedly, persuasive arguments are made—and rightly so—about more cases getting to court in which guilt is particularly difficult to prove. We have absolutely no difficulty with that; the issue is whether we are properly exploring what happens when we are in court, which brings me to your question.

12:15

First of all, let me pose a scenario. I listened carefully to the Lord Advocate's comment that, with regard to the prosecutorial test, a case would not be brought to court without supporting evidence. I welcome that. As I understood the Lord Advocate, if a case comes to the Crown Office without supporting evidence, he or his representatives will need to have a difficult conversation with complainers and tell them, "We will not take your case to court because there is no support." The difficulty arises when the case gets taken to court with supporting evidence that the Crown Office had and, during the trial, that evidence does not materialise from the witness box. It happens all the time—witnesses do not speak up, there is some flaw in the process or the evidence has been undermined in some way—but if, for whatever reason, the supporting evidence does not pass muster, the judge will have absolutely no power to do what the prosecutor would have done had he known the situation before the case came to court. We suggest that that problem could be addressed by giving the judge a no-reasonable-jury power to allow him to say, "The evidence in this case is of such poor quality that it cannot bear the weight of a fair conviction."

As for the other part of your question, which was about the types of evidence that cause us difficulty, the court in Strasbourg has made it very clear that certain types of evidence are inherently unreliable and, when cases with such evidence come to Strasbourg, the first thing that the court does is look for corroboration as a matter of fact, not as a legal requirement. Those types of evidence include hearsay evidence; indeed, in a case in which the Lord President, Lord Gill, issued the opinion, he said that the protections in England with regard to the quality of hearsay evidence admitted to a trial are not present in Scottish legislation and common law and that it would be "prudent" to introduce them.

Another example is dock identification. In evidence to the committee, Lord Carloway said that there were, of course, other safeguards in place in that respect. However, when the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council told us that dock identification was convention compliant, it said that the other safeguard was corroboration, which is what is being taken away. This is why such evidence is not allowed in England. Strasbourg is also concerned about evidence from anonymous witnesses and undercover witnesses, because it is very difficult for the defence to challenge its quality and ensure its integrity.

As we have listed all those types of evidence in our written submission, I need not rehearse them all with you. Although they are far removed from the types of evidence in the domestic abuse, sexual violence and other such cases that the other panellists deal with day and daily, they are nevertheless an example of the breadth of the implications of abolishing corroboration across the system. The committee's focus has for much of the time been understandably directed at such very difficult cases, but the fact is that this proposal will cover everything, which is why we are concerned that time be taken to examine the matter properly.

I agree with the Lord President that such work need not take a long time. This is not a case of kicking the matter into touch. The work could be done relatively quickly and in a participative way to allow everyone with expertise to input into the considerations and to ensure that a proper view is taken on whether this is the right way to do this or whether there is, in fact, a better way.

Sandra White: Can I ask a question, convener?

The Convener: I have got a lot of people waiting to ask about the same stuff, Sandra.

Sandra White: But it was on that particular issue.

The Convener: You will have to forgive me, but I think that others will follow up that particular issue.

Roderick Campbell: I refer to my entry in the register of interests as a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

On the no-reasonable-jury test that Ms McCall mentioned, we heard evidence last week from the Faculty of Advocates that Lord Carloway had made two points in opposition to it, the first of which was that it might slow the process. The faculty's evidence was that we have a similar situation now in relation to no-case-to-answer submissions, where an appeal court can be convened quite quickly if it is thought that the decision that an individual judge made was wrong. The faculty therefore did not accept the point about delay. In the Government's second consultation, Victim Support Scotland and Scottish Women's Aid, I think, were against the proposal. Could you expand, or would the panel generally like to comment, on what has been said on the no-reasonable-jury point?

The Convener: Who wants to comment first?

Roderick Campbell: In the policy memorandum, the Scottish Government indicated that one of the reasons that it had not proceeded with the safeguard was opposition from victims groups, so I am giving you the opportunity to expand on that point.
Lily Greenan: Sorry, can you clarify which safeguard you are talking about? I missed it.

Roderick Campbell: It is the safeguard of a judge having the opportunity to withdraw a case from the jury when he thinks that no reasonable jury could convict on the nature of the evidence as it is being presented. It was one of the three safeguards in the second consultation.

Lily Greenan: I am on record as suggesting to the committee previously that shrieval education and judicial education should be quite high up the list of things that we need to do in terms of safeguards for victims. There is a concern from our perspective that decisions are sometimes made based on attitude, assumption and prejudice not just by juries but by judges and sheriffs. That would be our concern about giving that discretion to judges.

Roderick Campbell: Do you have any comments, Mr McCloskey? You were opposed to the safeguard in your written submission to the second consultation.

Alan McCloskey: That would remain our position on that.

Roderick Campbell: You have nothing else to say on it?

Alan McCloskey: That would remain our position.

Roderick Campbell: Mr Kelly, do you wish to comment?

The Convener: You are doing a Margaret Mitchell now, Roderick.

Roderick Campbell: Sorry.

The Convener: I really do not mind. I can go to sleep and pass the list over. It is okay, Mr Kelly?

Tony Kelly: I am talking about post-abolition.

The Convener: Yes, so am I.

Tony Kelly: There would be no question of there being no case to answer, because the question of sufficiency would fly off. There is no way that we can judge sufficiency in the absence of corroboration because that was the only test for sufficiency.

The Convener: For the record, can you explain what can happen?

Tony Kelly: At the end of the Crown case, the defence can make a no-case-to-answer submission saying that the Crown case, at its highest, does not meet the minimum test of sufficiency of corroborated evidence and that therefore the case cannot proceed to the jury. If you abolish corroboration, no case to answer must fly off. If you do not put in a further safeguard about no reasonable jury, the judge has no power whatsoever after the trial starts—post-abolition—to rule on the question of sufficiency or the matter going to the jury.

The Convener: Ms Greenan, I hear what you are saying about judicial training and shrieval training. Can that not be done in a way that is detached from the bill? Should that not be happening anyway?

Lily Greenan: It is on-going—it is a work in progress. As with everyone else in the system, the awareness of judges and sheriffs changes over time. It is a long game. This is not something that will be fixed in a year or two years or five years. A generational culture shift is required in order to address the particular issues of violence against women differently in the justice system.

I want to pick up on what Tony Kelly said about “no reasonable jury”. That makes the assumption that juries are reasonable. I do not intend to be contentious about this—

The Convener: But you are going to be, anyway.

Lily Greenan: I am going to be contentious. I have only one experience of being on a jury. It was a long time ago.

The Convener: I must caution you. You cannot discuss having been on the jury or what took place.

Lily Greenan: I will not discuss what took place. Am I allowed to say something very general about—

The Convener: I would caution you against doing that.

Lily Greenan: That is fine. From my experience of the past 35 years of working in the field of violence against women, I can say that juries have sometimes made decisions that beggar belief. Without adequate research on how juries function—as I understand it, we still do not have legislation in place that would allow that to happen, although I have heard from Sandie Barton that there has been some research in England and Wales—we do not actually know what a reasonable jury is. It is a jury of our peers, which in practice appears to mean a particular demographic of people who are available during the day.

The Convener: In fairness, people have to leave their work to do jury duty. It is not just for people who are available during the day. I do not think that you are allowed to get off jury duty that lightly.

Lily Greenan: That comment is based on the research that was done around the establishment of the domestic abuse court, when there was a bit of side research on the make-up of juries. It was not about how juries function, but just about the make-up, so I will take that out. However, it raises a question about what a reasonable jury is and how that is assessed in law.

The Convener: Tony Kelly looks as if he is at the starting gate.

Tony Kelly: I am just about to start, if that is allowed. I am using a shorthand when I say “no reasonable jury”. The full safeguard would allow the judge to arrive at a decision in law that no reasonable jury properly directed would return a verdict of conviction. Of course, the response to that point in all the submissions that I have come across is to ask whether it is being suggested that a particular jury was unreasonable, and that takes us into a another discussion about that.

The Convener: That is not what we are talking about.

Tony Kelly: What I am talking about is judicial input, and the test is that no reasonable jury would return such a verdict. I am not questioning whether juries are reasonable, or asserting that they always are. I am talking about a judicial input that represents a minimum safeguard post-abolition.

Roderick Campbell: I would like to raise a couple of other points. First, something that we have not touched on this morning is the question of jury size. Mr Kelly, in your written submission to the second consultation, Justice Scotland posed the question of what proof beyond reasonable doubt means in terms of the size of a majority jury verdict. What is the panel’s view on the proposals in the bill?

Tony Kelly: Justice Scotland’s view was that there was nothing particularly sophisticated or scientific about plucking a magic figure out—pushing the majority figure up and then tweaking it in the event of jury members falling out. That did not attach a magical significance that would ensure proof beyond reasonable doubt. In the absence of any research or further work, we thought that that was quite a blunt way to deal with the removal of corroboration. I agree with Lord Gill that, as soon as we recognise that there must be a tweaking of the majority verdict, we recognise that what we are doing post-abolition is completely changing the field.

Sandie Barton: In his review, Lord Carloway did not think that there needed to be a change in the majority. In some ways, it feels as if it is being suggested in response to popular opposition to the removal of corroboration. We were opposed to an increase in majority partly, as Lily Greenan said, because of what we know about prejudicial views, particularly in cases of sexual violence.

I know that there are limitations on the research that can be conducted with juries, but there has been research conducted in England using real transcripts of court cases, to look at how decisions are arrived at, and much of it is not really down to legal fact and argument but based on myths such as, “If it were me, I would have fought to the death,” and “If it were me, I would have told straight away.” All those great myths are played out in jury decision making. Research that the Scottish Government commissioned highlighted the fact that a quarter of people still believe that a woman is partly responsible if she has been drinking or if she has been wearing revealing clothing, so we have concerns about what increasing the size of the majority would mean for the likelihood of reaching agreement, and also given what we know about the use of the not proven verdict, particularly for sexual crimes, where its use is disproportionately higher than for other crimes.

The Convener: Surely, according to what you say, if the requirement for corroboration is abolished, that will make things worse. Given that you say that juries are often perverse, they will have nothing other than credibility to go on, which will make an acquittal or a not proven verdict more likely.

Sandie Barton: There is corroboration and there is the jury majority, which the bill proposes should be increased.

The Convener: I am talking about the way that juries think. If there is corroboration of a sexual offence such as a rape, the jury must at least deal with that, but if there is no corroboration, what concerns me about what you say is that the jury would be even less likely to convict.
Sandie Barton: I suppose that that is what has concerned me about much of the discussion on the issue. There seems to be a view that either the corroboration requirement is totally met or there is no supporting evidence at all. In the vast majority of cases, there is supporting evidence. In the examples that the Lord Advocate gave, it is clear that there was a lot of supporting evidence but there was no corroboration in a particular element of the case. Of course that will be the case if there was only one witness. There has been much mention of that issue. Some of the underlying discussion has been about false allegations and the misconception that women make up stories. I think that that has underpinned some of the debate, but in the vast majority of cases that we, the Crown Office and the police are talking about, there is a significant amount of evidence, but they are still not getting to court.

The Convener: I do not think that we have heard a great deal about false allegations. The issue has been dealt with, but I do not think that it has dominated the discussions on corroboration. I am looking at other members of the committee. The point has been raised, as it ought to have been, but it has certainly not dominated the discussions.

Sandie Barton: It has not necessarily dominated the committee’s considerations; I am talking about some of the media reporting.

The Convener: We do not care about the media. The committee has integrity. We just look at the evidence as it is presented to us.

Roderick Campbell: We have dealt with two of the proposed safeguards in the Government’s consultation. Does the panel have a view on whether other statutory changes should be made, such as the insertion of a provision equivalent to section 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984? The bill does not include any additional safeguards in relation to summary cases in the event that corroboration is removed. Would the panel like to comment on that, too?

Tony Kelly: My view is that all those potential safeguards indicate that this is such a big topic that, rather than make amendments that tinker with how the criminal justice system as a whole operates, we need to study in greater detail the effect of those safeguards. There is some controversy about the effect of the abolition of corroboration and the effect, post-abortion, of the proposed safeguards—a provision equivalent to section 78 of the 1984 act, the no-reasonable-jury test and majority verdicts.

In the Government consultation paper, there was only very brief discussion about two of those safeguards. As I said in relation to majority verdicts, no sophisticated analysis was done of their effect. As a whole, those potential safeguards suggest to me that the matter is worthy of further investigation and further analysis.

Shelagh McCall: As Mr Campbell knows, we said in our written submission that the introduction of something like section 78 of PACE—which, put short, is a power for a judge to exclude a piece of evidence if allowing it would compromise the fairness of the trial beyond the point at which that would be tolerable—would be a good idea.

Lord Carloway suggested that Scottish judges already have a power whereby, if the trial is going to be unfair, they can exclude evidence. I do not necessarily agree with that. I think that the Scottish power is much narrower. In support of that view, I point to the fact that the commission can find only two reported cases in which the court considered that power and exercised it, and they were both appeal cases that involved Lord Gill. That is one thing that could be done.

I hark back to where the whole process began—Cadder and the emergency legislation. The committee will know that the Scottish Human Rights Commission is on record as criticising the Government for legislating in haste and potentially repenting at leisure. We are potentially about to do the same again with regard to the abolition of the need for corroboration, because while there is no objection in principle to it, no one has yet done a proper analysis of how it will impact on the rest of the system and how that might impact on fair trial rights.

We can sit here and give you examples of alternative safeguards from other systems, but I cannot possibly suggest that they are the answers to all the problems—one needs to do the proper scrutiny. More important, the question of a fair trial is a legal matter and a question of law, so we need to give a judge the tools to fulfil his duty to meet the requirements of the law. Without going through the exercise of asking what tools a judge will need if we take away the corroboration tool, we might increase the risk in real terms of unfair trials.

Christian Allard: We have talked a lot about the removal of corroboration, but I would like to have your thoughts on a particular point. The debate in the media so far has been about the removal of corroboration as opposed to the requirement for corroboration. Do you think that, given the evidence that we have received from the police this morning, very few cases would come forward without corroboration and that cases would have corroborated evidence? Do you think that it would be an incentive for cases to go forward—I am not talking about the isolated cases that we have discussed but solemn cases and so on—without corroboration just because the requirement for that will have been taken away? Can you quantify that?
Shelagh McCall: I cannot quantify that. I did not hear all the police evidence this morning. I came in at the end, but I think that I got the gist of what they were saying. Let me put it this way: as I said at the beginning, there seems to me to be no doubt that removing the technical requirement for corroboration will increase the number of cases that the police can report to the Crown and that the Crown can take to the court. There is no doubt about that and I do not think that anyone would suggest that there is any doubt about it.

In terms of whether ultimately cases will come forward from the police to the Crown without supporting evidence, I do not know. That is a matter for whatever the directions of the chief constable are at the time. Whether the Crown, through the Lord Advocate—not the present incumbent of that office, but a future one—would change the guidelines, I do not know. What is meant by the term “supporting evidence”, I do not know. What level that will reach, I do not know. Until we test all that, we do not know exactly what it will look like.

One might say that in a rape case, for example, we will have all the supporting evidence that we would normally expect now and that the only thing that we will not have to do is corroborate penetration, which I accept is a very difficult thing post Cadder. That might be so and might be fine, and we might always be in that position. However, when we are at the other end of the criminal justice system and we have a 16-year-old boy who is charged with breaking into a car, will the police investigate as thoroughly? I do not know the answer to that; it is a question for the police to answer.

I therefore do not think that any of that is quantifiable. However, with respect, I do not think that the issue is about what gets to court; I think that the issue is about what happens once an individual is in court. Those of us who work in court know that, day and daily, the supporting evidence does not always come up to snuff and that the judge has no power to do anything about it—that is the point that we are making.

Christian Allard: So you think that the quality of corroborative evidence is not always up to scratch.

Shelagh McCall: I think that every prosecutor, defence lawyer or judge will tell you that day and daily in courts witnesses’ evidence is not what it is expected to be on paper. If that happens and the remaining evidence in the case that we are left with, whatever it might be, is of poor quality, we are not giving our judges the power in the course of the trial to do anything about that to ensure a fair trial—that is the problem. Currently, they have some power through the corroboration requirement.

Christian Allard: Do other panel members have a comment?

Sandie Barton: In terms of the quality of—

The Convener: It is a Margaret Mitchell moment. I do not mind. We are adopting it now. I am just laughing because I usually get to call witnesses, but the members are all doing it themselves now. That is all right; I am devolving power to them. Right. Ms Barton.

Sandie Barton: I was just going to say, with regard to the collection of evidence beforehand and the decision about whether there is sufficient evidence to get to court, that however that is played out and whatever materialises—something may be anticipated that does not happen—if the decision is that no reasonable jury could convict, but the case is already being heard in front of a jury, perhaps it should be left to the jury. If the case has passed the bar in getting into the court, it will be in the court process, and it is up to the jury to make a decision. The bar is beyond reasonable doubt, which is a fairly high bar to meet.

The Convener: I am being asked whether some photographs can be taken for press reasons. I will certainly not agree to that, unless you agree. I will allow that only if you are not unhappy about it.

Lily Greenan: That is fine.

The Convener: Is Roderick Campbell unhappy about that? Do you want to comb your hair first?

Roderick Campbell: I presume that they will not be photographs of the committee.

The Convener: I do not know who they will be of, but I am asking the witnesses the question. They are quite content, so the photographer may proceed.

Shelagh McCall: I would like to follow up on the particular point that was being discussed.

The artificiality is that the appeal court overturns verdicts of juries on the basis that no reasonable jury that was properly directed could have come to a conviction. We are saying that, rather than go through the entire appellate process to the same outcome, that power could be given to the judge the first time round. If the Crown wants to appeal, that can be facilitated; it is facilitated now with no-case-to-answer submissions. If the defence wants to appeal, it can appeal at the end of all the proceedings in the usual way. I appreciate that there are often verdicts by juries that surprise everyone, but we are talking about a legal test that already exists and putting it into a forum in which it can be utilised at the right time.

The Convener: I think that we have tested that. If the committee will forgive me, we will move on. I think that we have got the gist of the test that will not be there.
We would like to finish by 2 o’clock. That will concentrate minds.

Roderick Campbell: Sorry, but I will be in the chamber this afternoon.

The Convener: I know you will. That is why I am moving along.

Elaine Murray: We have heard about some of the problems that corroboration creates for one-on-one types of crime in particular, such as rape and domestic violence, but the removal of the requirement for corroboration will affect the entire criminal justice system. Is another option the possibility of reforming what is considered to be corroborative evidence? Corroboration has changed over the years anyway. Things such as the Moorov doctrine have come in, so what is considered to be corroboration has changed. Is a possible alternative looking at further reform to corroboration to deal with some one-on-one crimes, such as domestic abuse or sexual violence crimes, to allow, for example, the victim’s distress to be considered as corroborative evidence in those crimes without having to change the system for everything, including shoplifting? Somebody could accuse me of shoplifting, and I may have lost the receipt. If there is no further evidence, I could be taken to court.

The Convener: Is that a confession?

Elaine Murray: No.

The Convener: I was just checking.

Elaine Murray: The removal of corroboration will affect a whole range of other crimes. Is it possible to reform corroboration so that victims of domestic abuse or sexual violence have greater access to justice without the whole of the rest of the justice system being affected?

Lily Greenan: Can I clarify something? Are you suggesting that an alternative would be to remove the requirement only for crimes such as sexual violence?

Elaine Murray: No. I am suggesting that the definition of corroboration could be reformed. The alternative has been suggested to us that it could be removed for certain crimes but not for the entire system.

Lily Greenan: We have argued that we should not look at removing the requirement only for certain categories of crime. The justice system should be for everyone on an equal basis. It is a bit of an all or nothing for us on that one.

On what else might be done to broaden the definition, I am not a lawyer, but my understanding is that corroboration now is not what it was when it first came into common use; that it evolves over time; that bits and pieces of it get tinkered with; and that there are different ways to look at the technical corroboration of evidence. It is in a constantly evolving state. I am not sure whether one can quantify that in statute and say, “We’ll do it this way and add this in” or, “We’ll allow this”, although I do not know enough about how that would work technically.

12:45

Elaine Murray: In principle, though, would it be an alternative to the blanket removal of the notion of corroboration?

Lily Greenan: Yes, it is perhaps worth considering, but I am not sure how it would be done in a way that is different from the way in which it has been evolving over the past couple of hundred years.

The Convener: Does anyone else wish to comment?

Sandie Barton: I know that the cross-party group on child sexual abuse has argued for a third way and looked at such reforms. In some ways that is unfortunate because, while the group’s ultimate goal is the same as ours, in some ways it is at odds with the rest of the victim organisations. The group’s submission states clearly that it would like the opportunity for justice and for more people’s cases to be heard.

There is an opportunity here. Our proposal is not about abolishing corroboration, but about considering how we apply the notion as widely as possible, looking at the supporting evidence. As Lord Carloway said, the narrow definition at present is so narrow as to be an impediment to justice. There has been a lot of discussion about miscarriages of justice that might happen, but we are concerned about the miscarriages of justice that are currently happening.

Lord Gill suggested some other areas of evidence that we could review. That would be helpful; I know that there are other provisions and other plans—to look at the not proven verdict, for example. I do not think that this bill is the only opportunity for looking at our criminal justice system and getting it right. However, we support the abolition of corroboration and the idea of looking at much wider supporting evidence in cases.

Shelagh McCall: Our concern is that, if the bill is passed and corroboration is abolished, what would happen in the interim to those people going through the trial process while the other changes are made and the law of evidence is reviewed? There is not an issue in principle, but the way in which the bill addresses the issue is a potential problem. Time should be taken to do precisely what has just been suggested by the witnesses and by Lord Gill and others, which is to review properly the implications and the other adjustments that may advance the system.

Elaine Murray: Do you think that the possibility of redefining what counts as corroboration might be part of that?

Shelagh McCall: I do not see why that should be off the table if the review covers the whole system of evidence. We need to look at future-proofing the system too, and the committee should guard against making a change now that will later need to be adjusted in some other way. I have made the commission’s position quite clear: we do not object in principle to the abolition of corroboration, but proper consideration is needed.

The Convener: Mr Kelly, are you at the starting block again?

Tony Kelly: No, I am not.

The Convener: You are not keeping apace with us here. I will take Sandra White followed by Margaret Mitchell and John Pentland, and then I will bring the session to an end, because we have other business—I am sorry.

Sandra White: Ms McCall said that the commission is not against the abolition of corroboration and that it had put forward a number of ideas. However, the reason that the Government did not pick up on the idea of the withdrawal of a case from a jury was that the judiciary and other groups were very much against it. I think that she is on her own on that particular aspect.

The Convener: Was that a question?

Sandra White: I am coming to my question. I am allowed to comment, surely.

The Convener: I just wanted to clarify whether members of the judiciary were against it as well. I cannot remember whether they were in favour.

Sandra White: No, they were not—it is in the report.

Roderick Campbell: The majority of the judiciary were against it; a minority of judges supported the line that Mr Kelly and Shelagh McCall have taken. Of the submissions, 20 were in favour of the judge having the power, and only three were against it.

The Convener: Thank you for that—I just wanted clarification.

Sandra White: Yes, absolutely—I am sure that Ms McCall would have clarified it herself.

I want to raise a point about the Strasbourg court, as Ms McCall mentioned its approach to corroboration. The Supreme Court of Canada, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women and the International Criminal Court also say that there is no requirement for corroboration. You picked the Strasbourg court because it is in favour of corroboration, but would you disagree with those other courts that say there is no requirement for it?

Shelagh McCall: No, I would not. You must understand that those other systems have other safeguards to ensure the quality of evidence. I understand that the International Criminal Court has a rule about the admissibility of evidence of insufficient quality and so on. It also has the equivalent of a no-reasonable-jury test. The difficulty with looking at other systems and saying that they do just fine without corroboration is that you are comparing apples and pears. All the checks and balances in those other systems are unseen. For example, in England, from the point of investigation, there are all the guidelines in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 about how evidence is gathered, recorded and disclosed. There is then the prosecution test and the safeguards of the trial. I do not disagree with those other systems, but they have other safeguards in place that prevent or guard against the dangers that we are identifying.

The difficulty for Scotland is that, in recent years, the safeguards that we had that allowed some quality control have gradually been abolished. For example, the no-reasonable-jury test existed at common law in Scotland until the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 was passed. It seemed to me that judges had no difficulty in applying that test, and I am not aware of a flood of appeals suggesting that idiosyncratic decisions were being made by judges in such cases. That was a relatively limited power that was rarely used; nonetheless, it was there. We have now abolished that and one or two other powers that could be cited if necessary.

Sandra White: Certainly, safeguards have been put in place. The Government has also asked groups such as yourselves and experts to suggest other safeguards, so I do not suppose that you are saying that there will be no safeguards if the legal and technical requirement for corroboration is abolished.

Does anyone else have a comment about that? I would like to open up the discussion.

Shelagh McCall: We are saying that to some extent. One has to think about how corroboration acts as a safeguard. Yes, it is a quantitative issue—we all know that. However, in its essence as a safeguard it is a measure of quality control. It allows a fact finder, a jury or a judge, in deciding whether to believe a main piece of evidence, to determine whether there is something that supports it that they accept—something that backs it up and gives them confidence in the quality of that main piece of evidence. That is how corroboration operates as a safeguard currently.

If corroboration is taken away, we will have no means of preventing evidence of extremely poor quality from ending up as the basis of a conviction because we do not have the no-reasonable-jury test or a proper exclusionary rule such as section 78 of PACE. From the point of view of quality control, once we remove corroboration there is nothing obvious that remains. There may be safeguards in jury majorities, the standard of proof and so on. However, Strasbourg says that it is important to give an accused person an effective and proper means to challenge the reliability of evidence and have it excluded if appropriate. That is what will be lacking.

Sandra White: In previous evidence sessions we heard about miscarriages of justice in England but not in Scotland. However, something like 3,000 people are not getting access to justice. Is that not against their human rights?

Shelagh McCall: That is why I said, right at the beginning, that the challenge for the Parliament is to provide the right to an effective investigation and prosecution for people who are victims of serious crime. Going back to Ms Greenan’s point, I mean serious crime in the European convention sense, not in how it is treated domestically; offences against a person and so on would tend to fall into that category.

The Parliament must achieve that, and we have acknowledged that there is a problem for victims of particular types of crime in getting their cases into court. One of the answers to that is the abolition of the requirement for corroboration, which will undoubtedly increase the opportunity for cases to go to court. However, we are concerned about what happens in court and the lack of adequate safeguards at that point to protect the fairness of trials. That is why I said that we are not opposed to the abolition of the requirement for corroboration in principle, but we believe that it needs to be thought through.

Tony Kelly: I echo those comments. The Strasbourg court does not require corroboration. It looks at the matter in the round and considers whether there has been a fair trial under article 6 of the convention. It is not a requirement of article 6 that there be corroboration, but whenever Scottish cases have gone there, or even when Scottish cases have been discussed by analogy with English cases and article 6 has been analysed, the first stop has been corroboration.

If you take that away, as is proposed, with nothing in its place other than the one safeguard of majority verdicts from juries, which would not apply in the vast majority of cases, which go before a sheriff, it is difficult to see what the argument would be when Scotland goes to the European Court of Human Rights to respond to an accused person’s complaint that he has not had a fair trial. A discussion of the safeguards in a summary case would be a very brief discussion because there would be none. The safeguard that we constantly harp on about is corroboration—that is our first stop. If we do not have that, and in a summary case there is nothing else, the irresistible conclusion would seem to be that there will be an unfair trial and a breach of article 6.

One way in which to avoid that is to introduce the other safeguards that have been proposed in a wider context. That would involve a wider appraisal of what the criminal justice system is about and what those safeguards are intended to ensure post abolition.

Alan McCloskey: Sandra White made a couple of points about the quality of evidence. The issue is about the quality of evidence and not necessarily about the quantity. Quality is the overriding principle. The criminal justice system must be human rights compliant for all—that is, for victims and witnesses as well as people who are accused. There are safeguards in the system. As I said, there will still need to be a reasonable prospect of conviction, and the jury or the judge will have to consider that the matter is beyond reasonable doubt. Those absolute cornerstones of our system will still be there, and they should remain.

The Convener: The Crown might rightly think that there is a reasonable prospect of conviction given the statements and the evidence, but it does not always turn out like that in court. The witness that we think is going to say something may say something completely different when they are challenged. I am not saying that the Crown does not apply the test, but once a case gets to court, things can sometimes unravel. I think that Ms McCall’s point is that, at that stage, there should be the prospect of saying that there is no case to answer, or certainly the prospect of the judge saying that no reasonable jury would convict on the evidence because it has turned out differently. Do you see that that can happen?

Alan McCloskey: I see that that could happen, but what we have now sometimes fails victims and witnesses. There are miscarriages of justice where the offender has walked away free and the victim is left—

The Convener: I am specifically testing you on the business of the judge being able to say to a jury that there is insufficient evidence given that the evidence that the Crown has quite rightly taken has not turned out as expected in court. Do you see that there would be a purpose in that?

Alan McCloskey: Yes.
The Convener: Do you think that we should have that?

Alan McCloskey: That is something that could be considered.

The Convener: I think that that is the point that was being made. I hope that I have understood.

Sandra White: I want to pick up on what Sandie Barton and Lily Greenan said. We should consider the issue in the round because, as we have heard, corroboration is just one part of it. My question is about the culture of the judicial system. I asked the Lord Advocate this question as well.

Sandie Barton gave an example involving a woman who has drunk too much or who is dressed in a certain way. If we get rid of the legal and technical form of corroboration and the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service deems that more cases will go forward, that will be noted by juries and judges. Eventually, as more cases come forward, the culture will surely change, because people will be confronted with sometimes horrific evidence that they would not necessarily have heard if those cases had not gone into the judge-and-jury trial system. I would say that people will not be quite so blasé—I hate to use that word, but sometimes some of the decisions seem quite blasé.

In the long term, will there be a change in attitude to people who have suffered from sexual abuse and domestic violence?

13:00

Shelagh McCall: Others are perhaps better placed to comment on that than I am. You mentioned the observations by the UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women about the problem with corroboration. The commission made a submission to the treaty body in which we said that there needs to be a comprehensive strategy for tackling violence against women, as well as an action plan for how to put that strategy into place. One part of that is undoubtedly the criminal law, but there are other parts that others are better placed to speak about than I am. It is important to understand that the reasons for the appalling conviction rate are wider than the existence of corroboration, as has been acknowledged. Undoubtedly, corroboration is an impediment to getting cases to court for some types of crimes, but we need a much wider strategy to try to shift those cultural norms, if they are norms.

Sandie Barton: Unfortunately, I think that they are norms.

I echo that point. Our focus on moving towards the abolition of the requirement for corroboration is part of a much wider drive. We do a lot of work jointly with the police. It was heartening to listen to Malcolm Graham, who echoed a lot of our thoughts on corroboration. We do a lot of training with the police. We have prevention workers across Scotland who look at how to change values and attitudes. The measure would be part of a much wider cultural shift that we need to make, but it is an important part in relation to the criminal justice system.

The Convener: I want to move on. Time is moving on and we have more work to do on our agenda that I cannot park.

Margaret Mitchell: The provision on corroboration has been introduced because of the lack of convictions in interpersonal assaults and crimes. The assertion has been that if we get rid of corroboration we will get more prosecutions. I want to turn that round and see whether there is another way to look at the issue. Current court practice does not allow consideration of evidence that could be used to establish corroboration, such as circumstantial and hearsay evidence and the testimony of expert witnesses. That could be changed. It could help victims immensely if those rules were changed and cases were brought to court with the prospect of conviction because of the certainty that the evidence was corroborated, which would therefore make the conviction more secure.

Another view that has been expressed is about quality and sufficiency of evidence, but those are subjective matters and much more subjective than considering whether something has been corroborated, yes or no.

Do you rule out retaining corroboration and looking at those rules of evidence to make convictions more secure and, in doing so, guarding against the very real danger that Mrs McCall has expressed of the accused being able to cite not having access to a fair trial?

Sandie Barton: I welcome some of those suggestions on what should be included. Our concern is that, if we have rules, we have exclusions. If the requirement is removed, there will be flexibility in building up the case and the picture of supporting evidence, but there would be less flexibility if we were prescriptive and exact about what evidence would and would not count under the rule of law. As much as possible, the police and the Crown Office look at the broadest picture that supports the complainer’s version of events, and I would welcome the widest application of that. However, the requirement in its technical form needs to go.

Just to clarify, this has not been brought about as a result of the low conviction rates, because conviction rates have been pretty abysmal for a very long time. This has come about because of the Cadder ruling. There has been a real focus on the rights of the accused. Their rights have continued to increase without any commensurate increase in the rights and protections afforded to victims.

Margaret Mitchell: The point, according to the evidence today, was not that the police would not look for anything. They have all this circumstantial evidence but the Crown does not take it into account. In the compelling example that you gave earlier, Ms Greenan, the circumstantial evidence would be taken into account, it would help the case to go to court and it would be counted towards establishing corroboration.

Without getting into the nitty-gritty of every single thing that could be done, is there not a case for at least considering retention and looking at the law of evidence to improve corroboration? It is so much easier to say, “Yes, we have a conviction because we have corroboration, and corroboration has been made easier.”

Lily Greenan: It sounds as if you are proposing something similar to Elaine Murray’s earlier proposal on looking more widely at what counts as corroboration and what supports it. I have already answered that point.

When we are talking about solemn proceedings, anything that makes the process more complicated is going to be harder. Technical directions to juries are problematic in terms of what counts and what does not count. I have a concern about adding more layers to something that is already problematic when it comes to getting cases into court. I am not sure in what way what you suggest is different from what was suggested earlier.

Margaret Mitchell: I suppose that I am looking at the subjective element that you have already said exists in juries. I might think, “That is quality evidence”, whereas someone else might not. Therefore, it is not as clear-cut as asking, “Was there corroboration? Yes or no.” It is much more difficult for a jury to be subjective about corrobative evidence.

Lily Greenan: It is still going to come down to how it is played by the prosecution and the defence and the extent to which the evidence is not the issue in such cases. Attitudes such as whether the woman consented or not play their part in the defence case. The issue is to do with notions of consent and what women are responsible for and what they are not responsible for. In relation to domestic abuse, it is about attitudes such as, “If it’s that bad, why is she still there?” The attitudinal stuff that can come into play overrides some of the evidential requirements.

Margaret Mitchell: My fear is that, by going to sufficiency and quality of evidence and not looking at the quantity that establishes corroboration, that will only continue.

The Convener: John Pentland has the last question, as usual.

John Pentland: I think that this is the first time that we have seen witnesses for and against. I congratulate them on that interaction. I have a question for each of you individually and for the organisations that you represent. What would be the consequences of corroboration if it were removed?

Lily Greenan: Do you mean if the requirement for corroboration was removed?

John Pentland: Yes.

Lily Greenan: I believe that the figure for domestic abuse incidents that did not proceed beyond police reporting was 2,800. A small proportion of those—about 1.5 per cent—would pass the new prosecutorial test. That is not a huge amount.

Being able to have the debates in the court with the solicitor, rather than in the fiscal’s office, opens things up. For me, it is about looking at the longer term. Sandra White mentioned the contribution that removing the requirement would make to a longer-term cultural shift. A greater opportunity to have the discussions and probe the issues in the courtroom, using quality evidence rather than a technical number of pieces of evidence, is the way forward.

It is part of a long strategy. I agree with Shelagh McCall that we need a violence against women strategy that addresses some of the issues in the justice system and an action plan to support that. My understanding is that that is on the way.

The question is how such a move can support a long-term shift in the justice system’s response to those issues. It will not be a magic fix, it will not sort stuff in the short term and it will not lead to more convictions. Previous witnesses talked about victims getting their day in court but that is not what it is about; it is about ensuring that people can be heard and that issues that are not reaching court at the moment can be discussed in court in Scotland. It is all about fairness.

Sandie Barton: I very much echo Lily Greenan’s comments. For us, the removal of the requirement for corroboration is part of a long-term picture that includes access to judicial training, some of our wider prevention work on changing values and attitudes and the introduction of female forensic examiners, which will present huge opportunities for those who previously have been unable to access the very crucial DNA evidence that can make the difference.
It is also about changing the culture of the courtroom and affording rights to complainers. Much of the discussion about miscarriages of justice has focused on the accused, but what about complainers’ rights? I know that amendments with regard to independent legal representation have been proposed to the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill, but we need to think about complainers’ rights and privacy. When you are raped, your medical records can be accessed and your mental health, sexual history and so on are fair game in court. This is all part of a much bigger push with regard to victims’ rights. This is not an either/or—you can strengthen the rights of both the accused and the victim to access to fair justice.

Alan McCloskey: We believe that the removal of corroboration will improve and strengthen Scotland’s criminal justice system. Although the issue is linked to the need for wider public confidence in the system, its removal will put victims and witnesses in a better position.

Tony Kelly: We just do not know what the consequences will be. I am sorry to sound like Donald Rumsfeld but there are probably too many known unknowns. We can point to areas of concern but we do not know what effect removal will have on the overall fairness of trials in relation not just to victims of sexual crimes but to victims in general and accused persons in Scotland.

Shelagh McCall: We can probably all agree that we want a system in which the public is confident that the innocent will be acquitted and the guilty convicted through a fair process. In our view, abolishing corroboration without looking at the system in the round increases the risk of unfair trials and miscarriages of justice and loses the opportunity to do just what Sandie Barton has talked about and find a way of increasing the rights of the victims of crime to an effective remedy and the rights of the accused to a fair trial.

The Convener: May I end on that comment, John?

John Pentland: Yes.

The Convener: Thank you very much. I thank the witnesses for waiting their turn and for their interesting evidence. You must forgive me, but we have to move on and I am going to keep talking.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

10:28

The Convener: Item 3 takes us back to the workface again. We are back to talking about corroboration and related provisions in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

I welcome our panel of academics. Professor Peter Duff is from the University of Aberdeen; Professor Pamela Ferguson is from the University of Aberdeen—

Professor Peter Duff (University of Aberdeen): Dundee.

The Convener: Dundee? How dare I? Oh, heavens. Am I forgiven? No. There was a look that shows that I am not forgiven.

Professor Fiona Raitt is from the University of Dundee; Professor James Chalmers is from the University of Glasgow—not Edinburgh; and Professor John Blackie is from the University of Strathclyde.

I welcome you all to the meeting and thank you for your written submissions. We will go straight to questions from members.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): Good morning. I would like to clarify something that we talked about last week. I am pleased that Assistant Chief Constable Malcolm Graham came back with clarification, which I would like you to hear and compare with the written evidence that some of you have given. He said:

“I am conscious that those who oppose the proposal often appear, perhaps conveniently, to abbreviate it, simply referring to the ‘abolition of corroboration’. I hope that my evidence to the committee assisted in dispelling this popular misunderstanding and clarified that the proposal is to abolish the absolute requirement for corroboration, not corroboration itself.”

He added:

“Corroboration will continue to have a place in Scots Law and feature within court proceedings. It is simply that our law currently requires that certain particular facts must be technically corroborated before any proceedings can be commenced.”

Some of the written evidence that we have received from you uses the abbreviation of “removal of corroboration”. You will know your own evidence, but the first line of the written submission from the University of Dundee says:

“We are not satisfied that the case for abolition of corroboration has been made.”

It goes on:

“The argument that other jurisdictions do not have corroboration, and therefore Scotland is ‘out of line’, also adds little: there is no corroboration requirement as such in England, but it is our understanding that prosecutors routinely look for corroboration and do not generally prosecute without it.”

That is exactly what the prosecutors of Police Scotland are saying: corroboration will not be removed, but they are happy to have the requirement for corroboration to be removed and for the situation to be as it is in England. Corroboration will still be used.

10:30

The Convener: First, I have to correct you: the police are not prosecutors and I do not think that they would be happy to be called that. That was a long question. I was asking for short questions and Christian Allard has set the bar. Witnesses know that they should self-nominate and indicate to me if they wish to respond. I think that we should take Dundee before Aberdeen.

Professor Pamela Ferguson (University of Dundee): I acknowledge that the legislation intends to abolish corroboration as a formal requirement. However, I fail to see why we are having this debate at all if we are saying that it will be business as usual because prosecutors will still look for it. In that case, why not keep it as a formal requirement?

I also acknowledge the fact that many jurisdictions look for corroboration. A couple of weeks ago Professors Duff, Raitt and I were in the Netherlands at a conference about the presumption of innocence. During coffee and lunch breaks, we asked academics about corroboration in their jurisdictions and, generally speaking, they said, “Oh no. We have no such thing as corroboration. Scotland is bizarre in having its corroboration requirement.” However, when we probed a bit more deeply, they all said, “But of course no prosecutor would go ahead without what you call corroboration or two pieces of evidence” and that judges would not find someone guilty beyond a reasonable doubt just on the witness of one complainer. Even if it is not called a formal requirement, corroboration operates unofficially, if you like, in many jurisdictions.

Christian Allard: So you agree that we are not talking about the removal of corroboration.

The Convener: Professor Duff will enter the fray.

Professor Ferguson: Just a quick point first—the answer will depend on the practice of the prosecution.

Professor Duff: That is the problem. As a commonsense rule of thumb, we all use corroboration in our everyday lives. We are more likely to act on confident information and we are more likely to have confidence in that information if it has come from two sources. As a matter of practice or an everyday rule, corroboration will still exist.

The important point about corroboration being a formal requirement—and the reason why I think that Malcolm Graham’s response is somewhat disingenuous—is that, at the moment, a prosecutor will not prosecute and a judge or jury cannot convict when there is no corroboration. That is the precaution. The bill will allow a judge, jury or prosecutor to go ahead when there is no corroboration and there is the possibility of conviction with no independent evidence.

Furthermore, we all know—and prosecutors complain—that the pressure on prosecutors in sexual assault and domestic violence cases is very great. They are under great political pressures to prosecute every case. What will happen, and what the justice minister envisages will happen, is that in cases in which there is only one witness to that sexual violence or domestic violence, the prosecution will go ahead. Prosecutors will be instructed to do that.

That brings with it a danger of miscarriages of justice, so having the formal requirement does make a difference. As Pamela Ferguson says, if we take the words in Police Scotland’s supplementary submission literally, there is going to be no change anyway, so why bother with it? That is not the message that we have been given.

Christian Allard: I want to hear from Professor Chalmers on the point because he said:

“While we express no view on the desirability of abolishing corroboration, we do not support the case made by the Carloway Review to justify this proposal.”

Again, you are talking about abolishing corroboration, but it is clear that that is not what we are talking about.

The Convener: Well, we know that we are not talking about abolishing corroboration per se; the issue is that, at the moment, it is a mandatory requirement. That particular comment is, I think, just shorthand. We do not need to go through all this again, but I ask Professor Chalmers simply to confirm that he objects to the removal of the mandatory requirement for corroboration.

Professor James Chalmers (University of Glasgow): The idea of removing corroboration itself makes no sense; indeed, it cannot be done. Police Scotland’s supplementary submission seems to suggest that there will be the possibility of corroboration and that it is not going to be abolished. It cannot be abolished unless we introduce a rule that prosecutions have to go ahead on the basis of one source of evidence. The defence that the bill does not propose the remove of corroboration itself is simply nonsense and the committee should pay no regard to it.

Christian Allard: I am—

The Convener: Please let Professor Blackie speak, Mr Allard.

Professor John Blackie (University of Strathclyde): I want to make two points. First, in civil cases, in which the requirement for corroboration was abolished in 1998, there have been all sorts of changes in practice. One could not have predicted what those changes were going to be when it was introduced.

Secondly, it is important that requirements with regard to evidence—for example, the use of hearsay in criminal law—are stated as such because they then become part of what is sometimes called in academic literature the protections for an accused. There is a complete difference between practice—after all, you will not go ahead with cases that you do not think that you will win—and requirements. I have not yet said what I mean about that requirement or indeed what is desirable in that respect, but practice and requirements are different things.

Alison McInnes: I am glad that Christian Allard has mentioned this new and rather strange defence that has been flying around for the past week and which I think simply plays around with words and attempts to obfuscate the quite significant change in the law that is being proposed.

Last week, Shelagh McCall of the Scottish Human Rights Commission told us about concerns about miscarriages of justice, given that, once corroboration is removed, there are very few other safeguards in the system to allow a case to be thrown out of court. Does the bill contain enough additional safeguards to avoid miscarriages of justice?

Professor Fiona Raitt (University of Dundee): This is going to sound like a circular argument, but I think that the requirement for sufficiency of evidence is much more important than people have recognised or commented on.

Given the tendency of the legal profession and the judiciary to be quite conservative, they will not need to look very far in their interpretation of sufficiency to find that corroboration would actually provide it. Given the discussion that we have had, I suspect that we will come full circle on this matter and that, in cases involving sexual offences, domestic abuse, children and vulnerable witnesses in general, prosecutors and, in particular, juries will seek the security of something equivalent to corroboration to achieve sufficiency. Juries will be charged by the judge to find sufficiency of evidence, which can usually be found in two sources.

Professor Duff: Taking the broad view, I know that the five of us are not of one mind about whether corroboration should be abolished. I am on the fence myself.

The Convener: Are you finely balanced on it or tipping one way or the other?

Professor Duff: I am teetering at the moment.

The Convener: Which way?

Professor Duff: I do not know. It depends on the breeze. [Laughter.]

Coming back to the previous question, I think that this issue should be looked at. Indeed, the majority of the Carloway expert group, of which I was a member, said that the issue had to go to the Scottish Law Commission for a balanced consideration—

The Convener: That is an interesting comment. Were any of the rest of you on that group?

Professor Ferguson: No.

Professor Raitt: No.

Professor Chalmers: No.

Professor Blackie: No.

The Convener: Perhaps your membership should have been declared at the beginning of the session.

Professor Duff: I am sorry, convener—

The Convener: It is no fault of yours, Professor Duff—I believe that this is the first time we have heard about the group. Can you tell us a bit more about it?

Professor Duff: I know that the group’s minutes have been made public because a student of mine found them on the web and wrote about them in their dissertation.

The vast majority of experts in the Carloway reference group wanted the issue referred to the Scottish Law Commission. I make that point because safeguards were the kind of thing that we wanted to be considered if corroboration were to be removed. Some of the people in the group were against the removal of corroboration per se; others, including me, were ambivalent. However, we all thought that, if we are to remove corroboration, we have to have a very good think about it and about what all the other safeguards are.

We have that one view and, of course, all the other judges disagree with it and again want the issue bumped to the Scottish Law Commission. I think that it is precisely what the Scottish Law Commission should be looking at—what kind of safeguards we will have if we get rid of corroboration. Could we get rid of it? Should we get rid of it? Most other countries do not have corroboration; that is fair enough, but what other safeguards are there? We have to come up with the right balance.

The suggestion that has been made at the last moment—which seems to be rather plucked out of thin air—is that the required jury majority be changed from the bare majority, with no evidence to support whether that would make any difference and no detailed consideration of it. It is a suggestion that goes back to the Thomson committee in the 1970s, but there has never been any research on it or on its likely impact.

If the issue were to go to the Scottish Law Commission, it could have a detailed look at what other safeguards we might want, including the one that Fiona Raitt mentioned—would sufficiency ensure that someone would be protected from the very credible but lying witness?

Professor Ferguson: I agree with Professor Duff. If we think about why we are where we are today, it is because we ended up with the Cadder case, which led to the police having to have solicitors present when interviewing suspects. As a knock-on effect, it was then mooted that we should abolish corroboration, and as a knock-on effect of that, we are now thinking about changing jury majorities. It seems to me that this is piecemeal reform. No one is stepping back and taking a broad view of the criminal process, looking at the checks and balances and doing a proper comparative study with other jurisdictions.

Professor Blackie: We know that there are some wrongful convictions—there are wrongful convictions in any system, however perfect it is. However, we do not know how many there are, and nor do we know how many wrongful acquittals there are, by which I mean people who have committed an offence that cannot be proved.

One thing that is greatly lacking in Scotland is empirical evidence, which exists in other jurisdictions. In America, there is a mass of literature on the impact of various protections and non-protections being in place, on the ability of juries to detect unreliability in evidence—which is very low, according to psychological work—and on witnessing as well.

Here we are in Scotland, not having addressed any of that interdisciplinary research, and we have come up with one thought—that we get rid of something—when what is needed is to look at the system holistically. It may be that we would then come up with many other changes, which might include the removal of the requirement for corroboration.

Professor Raitt: To add to that, I was struck by a comment that the Lord Advocate made when he gave evidence. I did not read the comment in the Official Report, so I hope that this is correct.

The Lord Advocate gave the example of two women who, when they were young girls, were very seriously abused. The prosecution went ahead but, when it came to the moment of appearing at trial, one of the women simply could not do it. The Lord Advocate commented that that is the problem with corroboration. I was very struck by that, because that is nothing to do with corroboration. The question is: why did a woman not wish to give evidence in court? The answer is to do with the adversarial process rather than anything else.

That point adds to the case for a broadening out of what we are looking at to consider all the issues that feed into where corroboration plays a role in the system.

The Convener: We are also at stage 3 of the Victims and Witnesses Bill this week—that bill will have an impact on court process and on how victims and witnesses feel within the court process.

Alison McInnes: We have heard the cabinet secretary stress quite a lot that he wants to widen access to justice—that is how he explains it. What is the panel’s view on whether the change on corroboration will result in more prosecutions but not necessarily more convictions?

Professor Chalmers: We have seen evidence—at least in the financial memorandum—from Police Scotland and from the Crown Office that suggests that they believe that there would be additional prosecutions. However, we know from evidence in other jurisdictions that it is difficult to get a conviction when there is no corroboration, so the ultimate number of convictions is unlikely to go up in that situation.

The danger with abolishing corroboration is unlikely to be that you would create a significant number of additional wrongful convictions; it is that you would let cases through the net that are really too risky to get to that stage. However, the effect on numbers is likely to be small.
juries. Did you read that evidence? I would be interested in your comments.

Professor Chalmers: I cannot add anything to your own comments. There is difficulty with seeing court as therapeutic. That is not a view that is often expressed by people who have been through the court process.

The Convener: Does anybody else want to comment? Did you feel that there was merit in that suggestion?

Professor Ferguson: I have certainly heard people from Rape Crisis Scotland say that, although for some women getting the accused into court is a big part of it, the vast majority are really looking for a conviction. The danger with the bill is that expectations will be raised and people will go to the police and say, “I know it’s just my word against his, but that’s good enough now because there’s no corroboration requirement,” but it will not be good enough because juries will not convict.

The Convener: The conviction rate for rape is poor. It is about 50 per cent, I think—I will just check that by looking at a recent parliamentary question that I asked. The answer shows 41 per cent of rape cases result in a verdict of acquitted not guilty or acquitted not proven.

Professor Chalmers: Those are figures for cases that have already got—

The Convener: They are figures for 2011-12. I wanted to find out the difference. I think that there are more successful prosecutions in domestic abuse and sexual abuse cases, but rape has a poor conviction rate.

Professor Chalmers: Those are figures for cases that have already got over the corroboration threshold, in the view of the Crown Office at least, because they have been taken to court. Abolishing corroboration could not raise that figure at all. It might raise the number of cases taken to court, but it is impossible to see any way in which it could raise the proportion of convictions that result.

Elaine Murray: I will carry on with the theme. The rationale behind the proposal to abolish corroboration is the lack of ability to take certain one-on-one crimes, such as sexual and domestic abuse, into court. It has also been said that there could be a case for retaining corroboration but with some reform—for example, inclusion of the distress of the victim as corroborating evidence—or indeed that a definition of what might be considered corroboration would be helpful in assessing whether or not cases should be taken to court. What are your views on that? Should we be recommending further investigation of the case for reform of corroboration?

Professor Duff: Lord Carloway rightly identified one of the problems, which is that the law on corroboration is very complicated at the moment. The reason why it is complicated is that judges have, on occasion, tried to find a way around it so that they can open the way to conviction for those who they think are guilty. In fact, a victim’s distress already can corroborate.

As Lord Carloway says, the problem is that the law has become so complicated that nobody really understands it properly. Judges continually try to define it and then finesse their definitions, so I do not think that defining it in statute would actually help. It would be almost impossible anyway, given how complicated the situation is. All that would happen is that the definition would get overlaid with another layer of case law and matters would come back to where they are now, with nobody knowing where they stand and it being difficult to predict whether there is corroboration.

If you were to simplify the definition greatly, there is a risk that fewer cases would get through the net. I am not sure what should be done about that, but again that is something that the Scottish Law Commission could perhaps look at.

Professor Chalmers: Can I disagree with that?

The Convener: You would not be academics if you did not disagree. In fact, you would not be lawyers if you did not disagree—and we would not be politicians if we did not disagree. [Laughter.]

Professor Chalmers: Students complain that we do not tell them the right answer because we do not agree.

The committee has before it supplementary evidence from the Crown Office giving a number of case examples. It gives five examples, although there are really only four, because number 3 is not an example at all.

What is significant about the examples is that none is a case in which there is no supporting evidence at all; there is always some supporting evidence thrown into the mix. I am surprised that in at least some of those cases the Crown Office does not believe that that evidence meets the legal requirement for corroboration, but that appears to be its view.

The Convener: For the record, what is the difference between corroboration and supporting evidence? You are saying that, in some of the cases, the supporting evidence could have been corroboration.

Professor Chalmers: Corroboration requires supporting evidence on all the essential elements of the crime and the fact of the accused being the perpetrator; it requires supporting evidence across the board. In some of the examples that the Crown Office gave, I am not sure why it took the view that such evidence was not there.

What is significant about the examples is that the Crown Office is not seeking to persuade the committee that it really wants to bring single-witness cases; it appears to be seeking to persuade the committee that it wants to bring cases where there is supporting evidence. That might be achieved through clarification of the law on corroboration.

Professor Duff mentioned distress as corroboration. One of the problems with that, which is flagged up in one of the examples, is that the extent to which distress can corroborate is limited; it can corroborate certain things but not others. That issue could be looked at.

The second thing I wanted to pick up on is the argument that corroboration is complex and that that might be a legitimate reason for thinking about abolishing it. We ought to remember that systems that do not have corroboration will safeguard against wrongful conviction through a wide range of different measures that are designed to prevent it. In the aggregate, those measures might turn out to be as complicated and confusing as corroboration itself. It is not clear that a system without corroboration is necessarily simpler.

The Convener: Professor Duff, do you wish to retaliate?

Professor Duff: No. I agree with much of what James Chalmers said. To try to define corroboration absolutely would be very difficult, although it could perhaps be defined more simply. As James said, once you start putting in place other mechanisms, you would get arms and legs growing and you would probably end up with as complicated a system.

I would not say that corroboration should be abolished just because it is complicated; it is complicated, but all evidentiary doctrines are complicated. I am not sure that one can really address it in an atomistic way—that goes back to Professor Blaikie’s point about a holistic view—without looking at the overall context.

The Convener: Is it Professor Blaikie or Blackie?

Professor Blackie: It is Blackie. Blaikies live in the north-east of Scotland; Blackies live in the south.

Professor Duff: Sorry.

The Convener: I got the University of Dundee wrong earlier, so you can get something wrong as well, Professor Duff. [Laughter.]

Professor Blackie: There are complexities and the explanation given is absolutely correct that judges have acted to water down corroboration in cases where it has got in the way. I rather suspect that the routine cases that come up day to day do not feel terribly complex. The complexity is perhaps with circumstantial evidence, rather than the paradigm of two witnesses.

On thinking about tweaking corroboration, there are quite a lot of jurisdictions around the world that have half-way houses. For instance, in South Africa there has to be corroboration of confession evidence. In some places, the requirement applies to an extraordinary range of different crimes, ranging from perjury through speeding to feigned marriages. I am not terribly keen on those examples.

More important are examples of jurisdictions where warnings are given. The difficulty with that, however, is that, if the warnings are discretionary, they depend on the judge’s understanding. Also, they only bite at the end of the trial, so they have no effect on the wider criminal justice process that starts with police work.

Those examples simply have not been looked at, and I do not have a firm view on them, either. I can see a ground for applying corroboration to certain serious crimes or crimes that are tried before juries only. There are all sorts of permutations, which is a reason in itself for having a holistic, wide, in-depth look at the whole system. The Scottish Law Commission is the obvious place to do that.

Alison McInnes: Professor Chalmers, you referred to the examples that the Lord Advocate gave and said that you were surprised that some of them had not made their way through to the courts. The Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service has recently rearranged how it deals with some cases and has specialist markers. Would not that assist in understanding? Professor Duff said that the process is very complicated, but a specialist marker for particular types of cases would make the process more efficient and easier to understand.

Professor Chalmers: Yes. I am absolutely sure that that is correct. My understanding of the examples that the Crown Office provided is that they are not real examples in that they have been anonymised and some details have been changed, so they might not really be cases that did not go through. In fact, it is clear that they are not cases that did not go through in that form.

I am concerned that we are not getting examples of real cases—albeit with anonymisation—and that details are having to be changed. That might be being done only for the purpose of anonymity, but it is impossible to tell.

Professor Duff: I agree that specialist markers might well help, and they might be able to spot that there is a possibility of corroboration when a less experienced marker would not. However, the danger, as I alluded to earlier, is that there is a great deal of political pressure on the Crown Office to prosecute all sexual offence cases. However specialist the markers are, they will be aware of the pressure that they should prosecute all rape cases. They are already aware of the pressure in respect of domestic violence cases. They complain constantly about having to prosecute what they regard as minor, trivial cases. They might be wrong or they might be right, but that is the pressure that they feel. I think that if corroboration goes, they will feel the pressure to prosecute all sexual offence cases regardless of whether supporting evidence or corroboration exists, which brings with it the danger of miscarriages of justice.

Elaine Murray: The change in the jury majority was mentioned earlier. Was there a debate in the round at the Law Commission about what would have to be done if the requirement for corroboration is abolished? What other factors should be taken into the discussion? What other safeguards, if you like, ought to be considered in conjunction with any consideration of abolishing the requirement for corroboration?

The Convener: I think that we are asking you to write the remit.

Elaine Murray: Just briefly.

The Convener: Yes, a brief remit; a few bullet points.

Professor Chalmers: I think that the committee has already had some written evidence on that from Professors Ferguson and Raitt, as well as from me. A possible remit for the Law Commission might be for it to consider generally what safeguards would require to be put in place if corroboration is abolished, and possibly whether a package of such safeguards would be preferable to corroboration or whether retaining corroboration would be preferable.

The Law Commission or another body could consider conviction on particular forms of evidence, such as dock identification, anonymous witnesses or hearsay evidence; the majority jury verdict; and the power or lack of power of a judge to withdraw a case from the jury. That is not a comprehensive list, so there might be other things to consider.

Professor Blackie: The Law Commission might want to look at the educational side of it. One thing that has been mooted is that experts could assist in instructing juries on the dangers of eye-witness identification evidence. There are problems with that and the courts are currently not happy about it. There is also the issue of police practice; for instance, in England, under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 codes of practice, the whole process of questioning suspects and other people is much more regulated than it is here. I am not saying that that is necessarily a good thing, but there is a big agenda there as well.

Professor Duff: That is the Scottish Law Commission tied up for five years already.

The Convener: Lord Gill told us that it would be a year, tops.

11:00

Professor Raitt: A difficulty that some people have alluded to in other papers is how evidence is or is not gathered in cases in which corroboration is difficult, such as sexual and domestic abuse cases. I know that the women's groups often feel that, especially when they have been working with women who have survived an attack, a lot more evidence could have been or might still be capable of being accessed that is not always followed up. That is very much a police practice issue and might not be one that you want to explore, but it should not be ignored. If the evidence is not gathered early on, it will not be there at a later stage.

There is—I think that everyone will subscribe to this—excellent practice in the sexual assault referral centres. There is a SARC in Glasgow, and one was to be set up in Dundee, but I do not think that it has got off the ground yet. They have a clinical, medical method of collecting evidence, which makes the process of the medical examination much more conducive, and women are more willing to consent to it happening. A great deal of therapy can go on with that at the same time, which would not happen in a usual examination at a police station. There are lots of small things that could make a difference.

The Convener: That is interesting. The Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill also deals with gathering medical evidence and determining the sex of the doctor who will examine a person, in so far as that is practicable.

Professor Raitt: Yes.

The Convener: We have heard little bits from everybody, apart from Professor Ferguson. Do you wish to say anything? You do not have to.

Professor Ferguson: The more we discuss the issue, the more we seem to be saying that the consequences that we are hoping for are unlikely to be achieved. In those sexual offence cases in which it is the word of the complainer against that of the accused, getting rid of corroboration will not help. Moreover, doing so will be dangerous in cases involving confession evidence and fleeting-glance eye-witness identification, which are notorious in every jurisdiction for miscarriages of justices.
If a witness is positive in their identification of the person who attacked them, it is very hard for a jury to ascertain whether they are correct. The witness might genuinely believe that they have identified the correct person, but they could well be mistaken. The Innocence Project in the United States of America has found that the major source of miscarriages of justice in that jurisdiction is a witness who is convinced that they have pointed to the perpetrator but who is shown later to have been quite wrong about that.

The Convener: Perhaps the panel can assist the committee by providing a general view of the time between a crime and when a case goes to court. The time between a crime and when the alleged victim identifies someone might be very long, and is even longer by the time they get to court. Will you give us some idea of the difficulties regarding the timeline for identification of the accused, which I think can be substantial?

I am looking for help and I am not getting any.

Professor Chalmers: A criminal trial can take place, especially in a summary case, well over a year after the incident took place. The committee can judge itself how difficult it is to remember faces a year after the event. We cannot offer special assistance on that.

A few moments ago, I referred to evidence from Professors Ferguson and Raitt when I should have said that it was from Professors Ferguson and Davidson. I mention that to be fair to Professor Davidson, who is not here.

Professor Blackie: A lot of psychological work has been done—principally in America, but some has been done in England and there is some foreign language stuff, too—to try to structure those issues, which we all feel intuitively. Broadly, in the first place, there are problems about the perception of one’s witnessing, remembering—the storing of the memories—and recall. At each stage, there is a danger of distortion. Although that is common sense, it is structured common sense, and plenty of evidence exists about that. The American literature is quite striking on the high levels of inaccuracy. After a year, it is as high as 40 per cent in some cases.

Professor Ferguson: The issue is compounded in our jurisdiction because we allow dock identification, which many jurisdictions do not. It is perfectly possible for a witness to say to the police that they think that they might know the person again in court, assuming that they will be asked to point the finger in a couple of weeks. However, as James Chalmers said, when a year down the line, they are in court giving evidence and at the end the prosecutor asks them whether they can identify the person whom they have spent the past hour and a half telling the court about, there is huge pressure on the witness to look at the person in the dock and say, “It must be him.”

That definitely occurs. I was briefly a prosecutor about 20 years ago and I have seen, first hand, witnesses who, when asked to identify the accused, say, “It’s that person there,” and point to the person who happens to be sitting in the dock.

The Convener: Mercifully, they do not point the finger at the judge. That would be intriguing.

Professor Blackie: It has happened.

Professor Ferguson: Usually, with a bit more probing—

The Convener: Has it happened? Excuse me a minute, Professor Ferguson. This is interesting.

Professor Blackie: It happened to me. I was an advocate for a very brief period, donkeys years ago, and it happened.

Professor Chalmers: Was the judge convicted? [Laughter.]

Professor Blackie: It was a sheriff, and no.

The Convener: So when asked to identify the person, the witness pointed to the judge. Oh, heavens. Did the judge acquit himself?

Professor Blackie: The case fell apart. [Laughter.] I was prosecuting, in the new Kilmarnock sheriff court.

The Convener: Professor Ferguson, please go on. I am sorry.

Professor Ferguson: I was just saying that usually, with careful probing, it is possible to get the witness to admit that they are pointing the finger at an individual because that individual is sitting in the dock. However, when the accused is unrepresented, it is easy to take what the witness says as ticking the identification box and then just to move on to the next witness.

Professor Duff: John Blackie is right to point to the wealth of social psychological research on the matter and the results of that research. What is striking is that although our common sense tells us that identifications that happen two, three or six weeks later, or indeed three months or a year later, are bad—we know that—the research indicates that the situation is much worse than a commonsense approach would suggest. We are much less reliable than we think we are, even when we think about the matter sceptically and objectively. That is often not realised.

Professor Blackie: That means that when we sit as juries or, indeed, judges—as fact finders—we come from an overoptimistic view about identification.
The Convener: I got a bit distracted by your story about the judge being identified, I must admit. We will not identify the judge in the case—that would not be appropriate. It was an interesting diversion for us though. We will move on.

Margaret Mitchell: The motivation for the proposed change seems to be to address low conviction rates for certain interpersonal crimes such as sexual assault and rape, on the basis that corroboration is the barrier. As we heard from Professor Chalmers, that does not explain why cases that pass the corroboration threshold are not resulting in convictions.

It seems to me that we should be looking more at court practice. I am interested in Professor Raitt’s suggestion that the complainer in a rape or sexual assault case should have legal advice. Women’s groups have told us that there is sometimes a problem with inbuilt prejudice in juries, which must be overcome. In the current financial climate, the prospect of that is nil. However, as the convener said, the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill is going through the Parliament, and an amendment to the bill has been lodged in advance of stage 3—

The Convener: Is this a trail? Is it your amendment?

Margaret Mitchell: Yes, it is.

The Convener: Ah, there is a surprise.

Margaret Mitchell: The idea is that rape victims would be given legal advice about whether to give permission for their medical records to be used, to ensure that victims are a bit more careful about exactly what they give permission for. Very often, the whole medical record is accessed, and things that are totally irrelevant are brought up in court, to discredit the complainer. Would the approach that I have proposed help with conviction rates? It could be piloted relatively cheaply and put in place pretty soon.

The Convener: Professor Raitt, I think that Margaret Mitchell is looking for a quotation in support of her amendment—I can see that you know that; it is written all over your face. I think that we can talk more broadly about court process and procedures.

Professor Raitt: I will not comment on the specific model that Margaret Mitchell suggested—

The Convener: I knew that you would not do so.

Professor Raitt: I have written about a possible model. The approach builds on the type of model that is available on the continent and, most important, is available in other adversarial jurisdictions. Ireland and Canada are the two main examples, but I suppose that England is also an example to some extent, because it has piloted voluntary sexual violence advisers—I think that Rape Crisis Scotland is trying to do the same thing. Of course, voluntary advisers are not legally qualified.

It is thought that women who know their rights in relation to access to their medical and sensitive records and in relation to sexual history evidence, and who therefore do not just assume that the Crown will defend their privacy rights, are in a much stronger position in respect of the evidence that they are able to give when they are cross-examined on what is in their records or on the facts of the case that is being prosecuted.

The evidence from the large studies that have been done, mostly in European countries, shows that women feel a lot more confident and are more willing to discuss intimate and difficult matters in court if there is someone there whom they know, who has been supporting them and who will object if anything inappropriate is mooted.

The difficulty is that although we always hear that judges have a role in intervening when witnesses are being pushed and they feel that they are being given a really hard time, judges are reluctant to intervene. Some time ago, I did a study with judges and when I asked about that, they all said, “We have to be very careful if we intervene because it could lead to an appeal.” They are put in a difficult position. Without that, we only have the Crown trying to do all the things that it has to do—to ensure a fair trial, look after the rights of the accused, prosecute in the public interest and, somewhere, look after the complainer’s rights.

We are in a problematic position in relation to the Human Rights Act 1998 if we do not recognise that women may need independent advice. In the particular situation of a rape case, the focus is on them, and it will become more so if corroboration goes. Juries tend to find it difficult to know what to do in a he-said-she-said situation, so independent advice could help.

Professor Duff: Margaret Mitchell is right. We have to look at the broader court procedures. We know that the conviction rate in rape trials in other jurisdictions that do not have the corroboration requirement is similarly bad, so it is nothing to do with corroboration. It is about court procedures.

Comparative research could be done to look at what is done elsewhere. I am aware of the cost issue but, if I recall correctly, the number of rape trials in Scotland last year was under 100. There would be a cost, but it would not be huge if you restricted the legal representation to rape trials, as Fiona Raitt has argued elsewhere.

The Convener: I have the figure. In 2011-12, there were 75 trials.
Professor Duff: Okay, so we had an advocate or a solicitor representing the woman complainer in 75 trials. That is a cost, but it is not a huge cost.

Professor Raitt: I add that it would not be for the whole trial, if we followed the models of other countries.

The Convener: Does anyone else want to comment? Margaret Mitchell does—good try, Margaret.

Margaret Mitchell: I was going to say, “Given the complexity of the matter”, but it is not necessarily complex. On the point about efficiency, I think that the stuff that has been going round about the quality of evidence is a total red herring. If there is more evidence, that will surely only help to prove the case.

Given that there has been such confusion, not least last week, when we heard depressing evidence from the police, is it the panel’s view that the issue should be taken out of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill and looked at either by the Scottish Law Commission or by a royal commission, where a panel of experts could look at it in depth and deliver some findings perhaps faster than the Law Commission could?

Professor Duff: Yes.

Professor Ferguson: Yes.

Professor Raitt: Yes.

Professor Chalmers: Yes.

Professor Blackie: Absolutely.

Margaret Mitchell: Thank you for that.

The Convener: There was a chorus there, although not in song—well, it is Christmas, after all.

I call Sandra White, to be followed by Roderick Campbell.

Sandra White: Thank you, convener, and good morning—

The Convener: Oh, wait a wee minute. John Finnie was slow to wake up. He has a supplementary question.

John Finnie: The policy memorandum, which the layperson is perhaps more inclined to go to, states at paragraph 130:

“The policy objective is to remove the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases”.

That is the very clear statement that the Government makes. On the issue that my colleague Margaret Mitchell raised, it states:

“the Scottish Government considers that Lord Carloway’s recommendations are intended to be implemented as a coherent package, and by failing to implement a significant aspect of the recommendations contained in his report, there is a very real risk of undermining Lord Carloway’s stated aim of ensuring the justice system is appropriately balanced.”

That is in the section of the policy memorandum on corroboration. Do you—

The Convener: You are on camera, Professor Duff, and you are grinning, so you had better answer that one.

John Finnie: My reading of that is that the recommendation to refer that aspect to the Scottish Law Commission puts the rest of the bill in jeopardy. Do the witnesses have a view on that?

Professor Duff: My view is that it absolutely does not. It is only one substantive section and two other little sections of the bill. The main thrust of the Carloway report and the main thrust of the bill is to cope with Cadder, new arrest procedures, new representation at police station procedures and so on—that stands alone. The removal of the corroboration part would make no difference to the rest of the bill in my view.

11:15

The Convener: Given your disclosure that you want the issue of corroboration to be referred to the Scottish Law Commission, were the rest of you on the review panel happy with most of the other issues?

Professor Duff: There was more or less general agreement to the rest of the package.

Professor Chalmers: Not only do I not believe that, but I do not believe that the Scottish Government believes it either.

The Convener: Can you take that past me again? I do not believe that you do not believe that I do not believe? That is one of those—

Professor Chalmers: Yes; exactly.

The Convener: What exactly do you not believe?

Professor Chalmers: The Scottish Government has not taken forward all the evidential recommendations in Lord Carloway’s review. Lord Carloway made specific recommendations on the admissibility of confession evidence that the Government decided could be left out of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill without destroying the “coherent package” that has been referred to, so the suggestion that the corroboration requirement cannot be taken out because it is all or nothing is not one that the committee should be persuaded by.

The Convener: I followed that.

Professor Ferguson: The jury verdict change is also not in the package as I understand it. The package is a moveable feast, to mix some metaphors.

The Convener: A package is a moveable feast. That does not displace my moment of the day, which was the case of the judge who was pointed at when the witness was asked to identify the accused. I wish I had been there. John Blackie was the defence at the time, I take it.

Professor Blackie: Yes.

The Convener: You would not have been very happy. [Laughter.] Anyway, we should get back to business. I digress.

Sandra White: I would like to go over some issues in order to clarify where we are. We have established that the bill is not about abolishing corroboration per se, but is about removing the mandatory requirement for corroboration. We established that in last week’s evidence, when the convener said it.

The Convener: That is long since gone. We are all clear as a bell about that.

Sandra White: There is a second point that we all seem to agree on. In his submission, Professor Duff said that the corroboration “requirement has been so ‘watered down’ over the years, principally by judges” that it is “not nearly as strong a safeguard against wrongful convictions” as was previously claimed.

Professor Duff also said—I am quoting; I am not saying this—that “Additionally, the ‘fiddles’ that judges have created to get around corroboration have led to a confusing, illogical and inconsistent set of evidentiary rules which practitioners, including judges themselves, often have great difficulty in applying.”

If that is absolutely true and if, as Professor Ferguson said, there is a tick-the-box approach to dock identification, why is corroboration so important? Why is it the be-all and end-all? It is not in other jurisdictions, which have other safeguards. Why do academics including you, judges and so on say that we cannot get rid of corroboration? We have talked about victims, people who experience miscarriages of justice and the accused, as Professor Blackie mentioned. Why is there a big difference between academics, judges and lawyers, and victims, who feel that 3,000 cases of domestic abuse, rape and so on are not being heard because they do not meet the specific requirement?

Professor Duff: I will go first, because you quoted me. As I said, I am on the fence about corroboration. It is not the absolute guarantee against miscarriages of justice that it is often thought to be, because judges have been forced to water it down in order to secure or to open the door to convictions where they think that that is necessary. However, it still has some value in preventing miscarriages of justice.

I am not against getting rid of corroboration, although some of my colleagues may be. It is an important part of the Scottish criminal justice process—I will avoid the word package—and the collection of protections that are there for the accused.

If you are going to get rid of corroboration—which, as I said, I am quite open to—you have to think more holistically, as John Blackie said, about other protections that you might need to put in place. You need to examine other systems that do not have corroboration to see where to strike the balance between the right of the victims of an offence to expect a prosecution, the rights of the accused and, in fact, the rights of all of us not to be convicted wrongfully of a crime that we did not commit. All I am saying is that one has to have a proper look at this. We are not convinced that the Carloway review looked at the matter in the round.

Professor Chalmers: I do not want to put words in my colleagues’ mouths, but I am not sure that any of us would say that a criminal justice system “requires” corroboration. Clearly it does not; many systems around the world do not use corroboration. However, where the system of protecting people against wrongful conviction has been built around the corroboration requirement, you cannot simply withdraw that requirement and put nothing in its place. It is the foundation of the system that we have built up over the years. I appreciate the concern about victims not having cases brought to court, but it is in no one’s interests—victims or anyone else—to have a system that wrongfully convicts people for crimes of which they are not guilty.

Professor Blackie: We were talking earlier about the conviction rate in sexual offence cases. However, the bigger social problem is not the conviction rate but that many, many more sexual offences do not go to court. It might be thought that by abolishing the corroboration requirement, that will change. In my view, it will not, and there are other matters that we probably ought to be looking at urgently with regard to that whole area. The situation is deplorable, and I would be very worried if abolition of corroboration was being seen as a quick fix—which it would not be—to a serious social and justice problem.

Sandra White: Thank you for your comments. Professor Chalmers mentioned wrongful conviction. However, it is wrongful for victims, too, if evidence does not meet the criterion.
Safeguards have been mentioned, and the committee has been considering that issue. The panel mentioned a number of them, such as jury size and the issue of distress. Have any of you, as academics, been asked by the Government, the Law Society or anyone else what safeguards you would put in place?

Professor Duff: We have been asked here to give some ideas.

The Convener: I asked for a remit.

Professor Duff: As I said, I was on the Carloway expert reference group. One of the reasons, among many others, why I was there was to talk about that issue.

To follow up Professor Blackie’s point, there is another side to the coin. We are perhaps focused unduly on wrongful convictions—we talked about it earlier. The problem is that if a lot more prosecutions fail, we do not know what will be the impact on the victims; they may be very disappointed. We all appreciate that court can be a terrible ordeal for victims but, as we have seen, removal of corroboration would do nothing about that. They may go through that terrible ordeal and end up with the accused getting an acquittal, which the victims might see as a slap in the face—the jury not believing them—which would make their situation worse. One of the problems is that an increase in prosecutions—which clearly the Crown wants—may result in an increase in acquittals and more unhappiness on the part of victims so, rather than resolving the problem with a quick fix, the Government would have succeeded in making the problem worse.

Sandra White: I do not think that I have a right to tell a victim that they cannot be heard in court and that their case cannot go forward. I cannot see into the future and know whether victims will feel better or worse. We should not assume that if there is an acquittal, every victim will feel bad about it. We should perhaps look at some of the positives. Rape Crisis Scotland and others said that it might be worse for victims, but others said that victims might feel better.

We should get this right and make it clear that going to court is not always a negative thing. People’s experience can be positive, because they feel able to tell their story. They might not be believed, but at least victims would feel that there had been some justice.

I am sorry, convener. That was a statement rather than a question.

The Convener: The simple point is that we do not know. As we have thoroughly aired the issue, we shall move on. Roderick Campbell is up next.

Roderick Campbell: Good morning. What are your views on the new prosecutorial test and the evidence that was given by the Lord Advocate on 20 November on the Crown’s general approach to evidence and the need for supporting evidence before reaching a view as to whether there would be a reasonable prospect of conviction?

Professor Chalmers: The test that is outlined in the Crown Office’s evidence is sensible; indeed, it is probably the only test that could have been proposed in the absence of corroboration and is consistent with what happens south of the border in England, where corroboration is not required. However, it would be wrong to suggest that it offers additional safeguards. All it does is ask the question that the prosecution would have to ask in the absence of the requirement for corroboration.

As for the need for supporting evidence, I do not understand the position that there should be no requirement for supporting evidence but that, without it, prosecutions will not go ahead. That is simply incoherent.

The Convener: Incoherent. That is a wonderful word. Does anyone else wish to comment?

Professor Duff: I agree entirely with Professor Chalmers. Just as people have objected to the removal of corroboration without its being given sufficient thought, those who are in favour of retaining it keep changing their arguments and have found themselves in some very inconsistent positions. As we have said, we are not clear about the difference between corroboration and supporting evidence. If we do not need corroboration but need supporting evidence, one has to ask what that supporting evidence is. Actually, it is simply corroboration by another name, which is the position in most other jurisdictions. In short, therefore, my answer is yes—the position is incoherent.

Roderick Campbell: The bill makes no provision for any additional safeguards, for want of a better word, in relation to summary cases—which of course make up the majority of criminal cases—if the mandatory requirement for corroboration were to be removed. Do you have any comments about that?

Professor Ferguson: One might argue that if corroboration is to be abolished it should be done for summary cases; after all, although they form the bulk of the work of the courts, the stakes are not as high as under solemn procedure. I find it more worrisome that someone could be convicted of a very serious offence under solemn procedure without corroborated evidence. Again, a law commission or expert body could consider whether there is an argument for taking a more nuanced approach and saying that some crimes or forms of evidence need corroboration, instead of its simply being abolished across the board.
Professor Duff: As Professor Ferguson said, the stakes in summary cases are not as high. The other point to make is that decisions about guilt or innocence in such cases would be made by sheriffs, who are experienced lawyers and who will—we assume, perhaps without justification—be well able to see the failures in witness testimony and realise that witnesses who have come across as being credible are actually not. Because sheriffs will be more aware of such dangers, the real danger is that a jury will be taken in, as it were, by a very plausible witness who presents well in court but who is simply not telling the truth. A sheriff is less likely to be taken in by that sort of witness.

Professor Blackie: Of course, not all summary cases are presided over by sheriffs; some are presided over by justices of the peace. One might consider whether, in such cases, it would be better to have three justices instead of one.

The other issue is the use of resources in small cases. As the Carloway report points out, the police do not devote a lot of resources to getting corroboration in summary cases for the very obvious reason that, as has been pointed out, there is such a huge number of them. That, again, might be an argument for taking a different approach to summary cases.

Professor Chalmers: Anecdotally, a number of sheriffs have said—I think that one went to print with an example—that they have heard summary procedure cases in which they found a first witness’s evidence to be persuasive and convincing and would have been prepared to convict based on that evidence. Only when a second witness gave evidence did they realise just how shaky and unreliable the prosecution case was, and that the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt had not been met. If corroboration were abolished, I would be surprised if the Crown would continue to call such second witnesses.

11:30

Roderick Campbell: I am conscious of the time, so I will move on to a question about the Scottish Law Commission’s role. I recently took the opportunity to review my book collection and came across Professor Raitt’s excellent book on evidence—I think that it is a 1990s edition. In it, you refer to the background to the abolition of corroboration in personal injury cases. Can we deduce from that that reference to the Scottish Law Commission is not necessarily the answer to all our problems?

Professor Raitt: I suppose that that must be true. The composition of the Scottish Law Commission changes, and most people have quite firm views, one way or another, on corroboration. Perhaps Peter Duff and I are no different; I, too, feel pretty much that I am on the fence in that I do not think that a great deal will change if corroboration is abolished. I may be completely wrong about that, but I think that the pull of relying on familiar culture will mean that we will not see a great change. However, I may be wrong; let us not put any money on that.

To answer the question a bit more fully, I think that the Law Commission would welcome the matter being referred to it. I am sure that it must feel that it was extraordinary that its “Report on Similar Fact Evidence and the Moorov Doctrine” came out at the time when the Carloway report came out. I suppose that the two had not really been speaking to each other because of events, but it seems to me that that very important Law Commission report got buried in respect of the media attention that it received and of attention to it in literature. A referral back so that the matter could be opened up in a wider context seems to me to be a much more sensible way forward.

Professor Blackie: I recently read the Hansard debates on that early legislation. Things have changed a great deal. That was the first-ever piece of work by the Scottish Law Commission. In its preliminary work—it was called “the memorandum” in those days—it recommended abolition of corroboration in personal injury cases but in the report, which was extremely brief, that suddenly changed to abolition of corroboration in everything. The proposals were introduced in the House of Lords, and Lord Reid was a Scottish judge there—they were political in those days, of course. Basically, the proposals were ripped apart because of that. All the research on the suggestion had been done in relation to personal injury. I honestly do not think that that example is a good guide as to what would happen today.

Roderick Campbell: Okay.

Professor Duff: It is interesting that it was thought appropriate, in order to get rid of corroboration in civil cases, to refer the matter to the Law Commission for its due consideration. It has always been accepted that corroboration in criminal cases is more important, which is why it has remained. Therefore, it seems strange that where removal of corroboration would be less important, the matter goes to the Scottish Law Commission for full consideration, but where removal of corroboration is more important, it does not.
The Convener: Are you finished?

Roderick Campbell: I would like to wrap up generally.

We have touched on the safeguards a couple of times this morning, but no one has really been drawn on the matter. Is that because you feel simply that the bill is misconceived? Why will you not be drawn on the question of what safeguards could improve the bill?

Professor Chalmers: Safeguards could not be dealt with adequately during the passage of the bill. The question is very complex and would require extensive comparative research. That could be done quite quickly—I do not agree with Professor Duff that it would tie up the Law Commission for five years—but the matter could not be dealt with by way of amendment to the bill.

The Convener: Were you being frivolous, Professor Duff?

Professor Duff: I was being frivolous.

The Convener: Can you amend what you said? How long do you think such work would take?

Professor Duff: I renege on my previous comment.

The Convener: Are we talking about a year? It is a serious point.

Professor Duff: How long did the SLC’s report on similar facts and previous convictions take? I think it was a couple of years.

Professor Raitt: Yes.

Professor Duff: I think that a couple of years would be a realistic time.

The Convener: Do the other panellists agree?

Professor Chalmers: It could possibly be done a little quicker than that, but it would depend on the Law Commission’s other commitments, on which I do not have information.

Professor Raitt: It struck me when looking at the options on safeguards that that is where we would see the interconnectedness of the rules of evidence unravelling. For example, hearsay evidence might become more important as part of the supporting evidence, which could be a disaster because the rules for hearsay evidence are even worse than those for corroboration.

The Convener: Yes. I remember doing essays on hearsay way back in the mists of legal time.

Michael McMahon is giving evidence next on his member’s bill. I know that this is the tail end of this evidence session—do not look at the clock. Could the panel comment on the advantages and disadvantages of the three-verdict system, on whether abolition of the not proven verdict should be considered, and on what would be the most appropriate time for such abolition? I know that the Government is considering referring the matter to the Law Commission. Professor Duff is a man who gets into the fray.

Professor Duff: I have written about the not proven verdict in the past and said that it should be abolished. That has been considered at least twice in the past 20 years. However, for reasons that are not clear, it has been kept; it is probably because of a historical fondness for the fact that it is very different. To me, though, the presumption of innocence leaves no room for the not proven verdict. In a trial, someone is either found guilty or the presumption of innocence means that they must be found not guilty. There is no room for a kind of second-class acquittal that states “Well, we’re finding you not guilty, but we’ll leave you with a bit of bad press hanging around your name.”

The Convener: What should be the route for abolishing the not proven verdict?

Professor Duff: I would be quite happy for it to stay in the bill, although it has come in by complete accident. However, it has been considered often enough before. Frankly, I do not think that it is important enough to go to the Scottish Law Commission.

The Convener: That provision is not in the bill.

Professor Duff: Is it not?

The Convener: It is in a member’s bill.

Professor Duff: Right—it is in Michael McMahon’s Criminal Verdicts (Scotland) Bill. I thought that it had been put into the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill along with the provision on changing the majority verdict, but I acknowledge that it is a separate matter. I would just treat it as an issue on its own merits, then.

Professor Ferguson: I agree that the not proven verdict does not need to go to the Law Commission and that it should be abolished. The biggest problem with the verdict is that jurors are not told by judges what it means specifically. When we talk to first-year law students about what the not proven verdict means, quite a number of them assume that it means that the Crown has not established the case beyond reasonable doubt, which means that the jury could not make up its mind and the Crown could have another bite at the cherry. That is quite wrong. People do not appreciate that the not proven verdict is the same as a not guilty verdict. It is a historical anachronism and we should get rid of it.

The Convener: I am asking you to consider the impact on abolishing the requirement for corroboration of absorbing into the bill the abolition of the not proven verdict. Is that one of the other things in the mix? Could it be done separately?

Professor Ferguson: It could be done separately; in my view, the two proposals are unrelated.

The Convener: That is fine.

Professor Raitt: I agree that the not proven verdict should go because it does not add anything.

Professor Chalmers: If juries are doing what they are asked to do—we must assume that they are; if they are not, we have other serious problems—then they must consider whether a case is proved beyond reasonable doubt. If so, they convict. If not, they do not. If they do not convict there is then the question of what acquittal they reach. On that basis, abolishing the not proven verdict would make no difference whatever. I agree that there is absolutely no reason for it to go to the Law Commission, and I cannot see any rational reason for retaining the verdict.

Professor Blackie: Another reason for abolishing the not proven verdict is that only about 10 per cent of acquittals are based on not proven verdicts, so it is not very common. Historically, it might have been better that we had the two verdicts of proven and not proven; there was no emotionally loaded language. We have the not proven verdict because that is what we had before the middle of the 18th century.

The Convener: The number of not proven verdicts is quite high in rape cases.

Professor Blackie: It is correct that the proportion is higher in rape cases than in others.

The Convener: It is 20 per cent.

Professor Blackie: Yes. It is interesting that the percentage is out of line in rape cases, which obviously says something.

The Convener: Yes.

Professor Blackie: In my ideal world, we would have two verdicts—proven and not proven—with no emotive language attached. It is has been well charted that the not guilty verdict came about by historical accident in the middle of the 18th century when a jury asked whether it could follow the English approach and bring in a verdict of not guilty, so it is anachronistic. That is particularly the case now that we have abolished the double jeopardy rule, which means that there can be retrials.

The Convener: Yes. Thank you very much, panel. I am glad that we managed to have that discussion, which Michael McMahon can hear about in the next evidence session.

Meeting suspended.

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome to the meeting Michael McMahon MSP, who, as members will know, has just introduced his Criminal Verdicts (Scotland) Bill. We will be scrutinising Mr McMahon’s bill at a later date, but there is some crossover between his bill and the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill and it will be useful to hear his views.

Given that I do not know how many parts your bill has, Mr McMahon, it would also be useful if you could explain what it does. As you will know, the previous panel endorsed the abolition of the not proven verdict. There you are, then—you start from a very good position.

Michael McMahon (Uddingston and Bellshill) (Lab): I certainly welcome that support, which is in line with the support that I received for the bill in general.

The bill, which has two main provisions and runs to only a page and a half, is very simple and will not be the most technically demanding piece of legislation that a committee has ever considered. Section 1 removes one of the acquittal verdicts, while section 2 amends the size of the majority in juries. In the responses that I received on that matter, some pointed out that there was no correlation between juries and the removal of the second acquittal, while others argued that, for a variety of reasons, it was important to take such changes into account. I am happy to explore those issues if members wish to fire questions at me.

The Convener: Indeed. Questions, please.

John Finnie: Is public perception an important part of your motivation for introducing the bill, Mr McMahon? I should also say that I share your view on the matter.

Michael McMahon: It is important. We need to have confidence in our judicial system and I believe that the third verdict is illogical and creates confusion. Sheriffs in our courts are not allowed to explain to the jury what the verdict means; in fact, when they have done so, it has led to action being taken against them and cases being reviewed. The verdict itself is set out only in common law, not in statute. That is creating confusion and we need to get clarity into the system so that people can have confidence in it.

That is why section 2 of the bill is so important. People need to have confidence that a jury has considered the evidence and found, one way or another, beyond a reasonable doubt. A simple majority leaves that question hanging. As the responses to my consultation made clear, the fact that very serious cases can be concluded one way or another on a straight majority needs to be looked at.

John Finnie: How would the two new verdicts be styled? I do not know whether you heard Professor Blackie’s comments on the matter.

Michael McMahon: I did not, but in my consultation I made the point that the original Scots law verdicts were proven and not proven and that it was the not guilty verdict that was added. However, it is only through custom and practice, the common law and common usage that these three verdicts are allowed in Scotland and, as a result, the current system exists by dint of history rather than through any considered decision on the matter. In short, we should bear it in mind that the system was not designed to be this way and, indeed, that is where I think part of the confusion arises.

The not guilty verdict was added to the proven and not proven verdicts and then the guilty verdict replaced the proven verdict. As I said, the system that we have now was not designed, but developed over about 400 years and we need to look at it. In my consultation I suggested that we could either revert to the original verdicts or, given how controversial the not proven verdict has become, move away from it altogether and have only guilty and not guilty. Most people preferred the latter option but I am open to being persuaded that we retain proven and not proven in order to have a distinctive Scots law system. However, the danger is that the confusion about the not proven verdict would be carried over. A clean break might be better.

John Finnie: When we discuss juries, we always hear about the lack of research into their integrity and ability. Have you come up against the same issue with regard to your bill?

Michael McMahon: It is a very difficult issue. In fact, I could not use a number of responses to my consultation because people are not allowed to comment on what happens within a jury. There are academics who have commented on their own knowledge and experience of the issue but, although I could tell the committee many anecdotes that I heard about people’s experiences of serving on a jury—

The Convener: You are not allowed to, Mr McMahon.

Michael McMahon: Exactly. Because that evidence is purely anecdotal, it has not been included in my consultation findings.

Elaine Murray: Section 2 of your bill is pretty much identical to section 70 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill on changing jury verdicts, which has been included partly as a safeguard should the requirement for corroboration be removed. Do you feel that the argument with regard to your proposal on jury verdicts is a separate one and that the change is required, even if the proposal to remove the requirement for corroboration is referred back?

Michael McMahon: When I consulted on the removal of the third verdict, respondents also raised the issue of juries. I think that only one or two academics who responded said that juries should be looked at in terms of the third verdict and corroboration. Most respondents focused on the third verdict and juries. One academic said that, regardless of whether we change the law on corroboration or the third verdict, we should look at juries anyway, because the straight majority requirement raises questions about whether a conclusion has been arrived at beyond reasonable doubt.

Elaine Murray: The previous panel seemed to suggest that the not proven verdict was being referred to the Scottish Law Commission for consideration. Have you had any discussions with the Government about that?

Michael McMahon: The matter is reviewed periodically and, in my experience, the conclusion has always been that it should not be addressed. Again, despite the consultations that we have had and the commissions that the Scottish Government has set up—the Carloway commission and others—the not proven verdict has never been addressed. Although it is always a matter for conjecture and discussion, it has never progressed to consideration by a formal commission or by the Scottish Government in any of its consultations.

The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill does not refer to the matter at all but focuses on the verdicts—although, as I said, some people have made a connection between the two issues.

The Convener: The Scottish Government states in the policy memorandum that accompanies the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill that, in response to its consultation on whether the not proven verdict should be abolished,

> “a significant minority of respondents were concerned that time should be given to allow the impact of implementing Lord Carloway’s recommendations to be assessed before making changes to the three verdict system.”

We may end up with a criminal justice bill that includes the abolition of the requirement for corroboration and a change to juries, or we may instead end up with a bill that leaves out the issue of corroboration and possibly jury size too. That clutters up what you are doing in a sense. I am sympathetic to your position, but I do not know how we can disentangle your proposals from what has been included in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Apparently, from the evidence that we received, it seems that there was not a great deal of research behind the proposed change to a majority of 10 out of 15 jurors; that just sort of came about.

I am not saying that your proposal in that regard just came about, but that is what happened with the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. How do you reconcile that? What if the bill addressed just the not proven verdict on its tod, as it were, and did not touch juries? The jury issue is a difficult one for me.

Michael McMahon: I consulted twice on my proposed bill. The first consultation did not focus much on juries, but the information that I received made me realise that the jury aspect could not be disentangled, so I decided to have a second consultation as I felt that we needed to consider the issue much more thoroughly than had previously been the case.

The original consultation focused purely on the removal of the third verdict, but the issue of juries was a prominent feature in the responses that I received. I took stock of that, and carried out a further consultation on a proposal to introduce a bill in two parts, specifically because of those two issues.

I am aware of the legislation that the Government has introduced on previous occasions, and I have waited on it doing some work on the not proven verdict. However, I felt that it was time to move the issue forward, which means having to address the issue of juries—

The Convener: I appreciate that.

Michael McMahon: We will just have to wait and see what impact the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill will have.

Taking part 1 of my bill into the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill could be considered, depending on the committee’s findings and on whether the Government thinks that there has been sufficient consultation to allow it to incorporate my proposal on the third verdict as we move forward.

Sandra White: Good morning, Michael—it is still morning. I am very supportive of the context around your proposed bill, and I have learned some interesting historical facts from you and Professor Blackie—for example, that our verdicts were proven and not proven until 400 years ago, when we took on the English legal terms of guilty and not guilty. Funnily enough, I have said that we should perhaps just go back to the verdicts of proven and not proven, as you mentioned. We might want to have a wee look at that.

We have discussed the jury issue, and you said that you went back out to consultation on that subject. Was that because it could be part of a safeguard if you got rid of the not proven verdict?

Michael McMahon: Some people have suggested that that could be considered as a safeguard. If we removed the third verdict and left the simple majority, that would be a concern to a number of people. That was highlighted quite clearly. It was pretty much a response to those questions being posed in the first consultation.

Sandra White: The Government has said that it is supportive and that perhaps it will go to the Scottish Law Commission. Can you give us a timescale for when you would like to see your bill being passed? If the issue went to the Scottish Law Commission would your bill take longer to go through?

Michael McMahon: That might well mean that it would take longer. However, convener, I am in your hands because the committee’s work programme dictates whether my proposed legislation could be fitted in anyway. I am certainly open to having a discussion about how quickly the bill could be introduced. Whether it would have to wait on a Scottish Law Commission investigation would be worth considering.

We have been here for 14 years and looked at an awful lot of legislation. This is one of the most controversial areas of the judicial system—

12:00

The Convener: Not quite.

Michael McMahon: One of.

The Convener: Close.

Michael McMahon: It is one of the most controversial aspects of the Scottish judicial system and we have never looked at it. I feel that we have to address the issue of the not proven verdict, one way or another.

Sandra White: I want to clarify something convener, because I do not know whether I have overstepped the mark.

The Convener: You never do that, do you?

Sandra White: I just wanted to clarify that the Government has indicated that it agrees in principle with the Scottish Law Commission that a review should be carried out.

The Convener: I think that I said that, but I know that no one ever listens to me so I do not take it personally.

Sandra White: I wanted to clarify the point for Michael McMahon.
Michael McMahon: I am aware that that is under consideration.

The Convener: You will understand that if your bill progresses, its second part would change jury verdicts and there is another piece of legislation that does that. The committee might want to consider that when we review our work programme. The jury issue is the main issue for the committee and we are exploring that area in our scrutiny of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

However, you had good support, as you know. Do feel free to come to the committee the next time.

Michael McMahon: I did not want to overstep the mark.

The Convener: Oh no, no. We are very relaxed in here; too relaxed sometimes. I thank you. You have been very helpful.
On resuming—

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: Time presses, so we will move on to agenda item 4, which is another evidence session on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, on court procedure provisions. I welcome Sheriff Principal Edward Bowen, who conducted the review of sheriff and jury procedure, Morag Williamson, project manager to the review, Stewart Walker, the Scottish Court Service secondee to the review—I have never got to say the word “secondee” before; what a lovely word—and Gerry Bonnar, secretary to the review. I understand that the sheriff principal wishes to make an opening statement.

Sheriff Principal Edward Bowen (Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure): I shall be brief. Thank you for inviting me here this morning. I begin by saying that I have been retired for two and a half years.

The Convener: Have we dragged you out of retirement for this?

